On the other point, I do not think I can rule the hon. member out of order for reading quotations from a previous speech in this same debate, although I must say that there comes a time under the rules when lengthy reading of extracts is regarded as obstruction. I hope that we can rely on the hon. member's discretion. As the hon. member for Lethbridge has been interrupted, and as it is now two minutes to six, perhaps he would agree that we call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) insinuated that I had made a speech in this house which someone had prepared for me. I think I should say that no one prepared my speech, nor do I think that anyone prepares the speeches of the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Blackmore: I am glad to hear the hon. member say that, Mr. Speaker.

Now, I was at the point of giving an account of the prosperity certificate to which the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) referred with complete propriety the other night. It is necessary to get the background of the whole situation in 1936 when the Alberta government attempted to issue prosperity certificates and use them.

In the first place, here are a few facts about Alberta's financial history. Alberta began her provincial existence in 1905 with no debt whatever. Between 1905 and 1921, under a Liberal government, she went into debt to the extent of $100 million. Up to 1935, under a U.F.A. administration following the 1921 election, she was in debt to the extent of $167 million. The average interest rate on that whole debt was 4.95 per cent.

Now, that was bad enough. Roughly $10 million of this $67 million debt which the U.F.A. had incurred, largely because of the depression, was in the form of Alberta savings certificates which represented money that had been borrowed by the government from ordinary people at 4 per cent. These Alberta savings certificates were provincial promises to pay on demand. This is exceedingly important to bear in mind. The total amount of that savings certificate debt was $9,414,468.15, to be exact. If hon. members are at all interested in facing facts they must recognize the significance of this $10 million worth of savings certificates, and the effect they would have on the credit of the province. Ask yourselves the question, what would you have done if you had been in charge of the province at that time, and then you will not feel nearly so smart when you are contemplating what Alberta did.

On August 27, 1935, the United Farmers of Alberta government had to announce it could no longer pay either interest or principal in respect of the savings certificates. This move destroyed the credit of the province. No longer could Alberta borrow money anywhere on the world's money markets; that is very important for all Liberals to bear in mind. Social Credit had nothing to do with it at all. The Social Credit administration under William Aberhart's leadership took office on September 3, five days after the loss of Alberta's credit by the U.F.A.'s financial default.

Mr. Hanna: What was the date of the election?

Mr. Blackmore: August 22; thank you for asking. Mr. Aberhart later said that when he became premier not only was the treasury empty but the bottom was scraped out of the barrel. My question is, what would you have done about it? What would the Liberal government have done if they had come to power at that time when the credit of the province was completely destroyed, with $10 million of demand savings certificates facing them, any one of which could be brought to their attention as a demand for payment at any time.

There were plenty of other difficulties, too.

In 1935 Alberta's economy was to a very large extent an agricultural economy and agricultural prices were tragically low. Freight rates were especially burdensome upon Alberta. Albertans were scarcely out of the very depths of the depression. To add to this adversity, in the year 1935, when Social Credit took over, Alberta's farmers in the south were afflicted with drought; in the north, they were rained out; in the centre, they were stricken with frost.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: You notice the idiotic laughter which manifests itself every once in a while. It is an absolute refusal to face facts seriously.

The civil service had to be paid, and the other manifold obligations of a provincial government had to be met. I ask once more, what would a Liberal government have done in the circumstances? Answer that.

The Lethbridge Herald, in an article entitled "Watch Your Step", under date of August 21, 1935, the night before the election, used these words, and I quote:

> We might as well be blunt about it and say positively and emphatically that if Alberta electors should send a majority of Social Crediters to Edmonton tomorrow, Alberta is headed for disaster.
> Mr. Hoadley has told the people of Alberta that it is impossible for the province to finance itself through loans or bonds because of the fear investors have that Social Credit may come into control of the government of Alberta.
> Alberta for the 18 months that Mr. Aberhart mentions wouldn't be able to finance itself. It could not make a loan; it could not borrow money, because the people who have the money wouldn't invest in a province where Social Credit was being experimented with. Then what would happen?
> Aberhart could not administer the affairs of Alberta on the revenues that come to it from the people of Alberta only. Expenditures would have to be slashed, relief grants which up to the present have been financed mostly by loans from the Ottawa government would be cut down. So would mothers' allowance; old age pensions; hospital grants; school grants; all social and other services to which the people of Alberta have been accustomed.

Now, that was the sort of panicky talk that was taking place throughout the whole province.

The Social Credit government had promised improvement in every respect. There was an abundance of nearly every kind of goods and services. This is the important thing, Mr. Speaker. There were plenty of goods. It was said the warehouses were literally bulging with goods. There was a grave shortage of purchasing power in the hands of the people; that was all.

The province greatly needed roads everywhere. There were 80,000 miles of road allowances in Alberta, every mile of which needed good roads built along them. There were many thousands of unemployed in Alberta, all ready to go to work to build roads. There were many needy farmers who could work on roads while their crops grew or while they were waiting for another year's harvesting. There was plenty of road building material, such as gravel. There was sufficient machinery. There was food, clothing and shelter enough to sustain the workers. Is there any conceivable reason why the people of Alberta, roughly 900,000 of them should not have been able to work together to build these roads? Yet, under a Liberal administration those roads would never have been built at that time and would not be built today under similar circumstances.

The Social Credit government was a monetary reform government. The members knew that units of money created by a government could be sound if the units created were not too numerous in relation to the goods and services available. This had been abundantly proven through the operation of Canada's Finance Act of 1914, to which I referred on January 14. The dominion parliament had reaffirmed implicit confidence in the principles and performance of the Finance Act by extending that act in 1919 and then in re-enacting it in 1923 as the Finance Act of 1923 under the great Liberal finance minister, Hon. W. S. Fielding. The reference to this is in the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, published in 1933. In the face of these facts, why should not Alberta create money just as sound as the money created by Sir Thomas White, dominion finance minister? That is the first question.

In addition to the backing which Sir Thomas White would have, Alberta was placing a 100 per cent backing of coin and other Canadian cash in two years, to uphold these prosperity certificates. If Alberta affixed her signature to a million dollar bond, that bond was considered sound. Why should not a one dollar bond of Alberta be just as sound? When hon. members get that answer in a sensible manner, they will be in a position to appreciate the problem. The Alberta government, with obvious good logic, issued some thousands of Alberta one dollar bonds, called prosperity certificates. A million dollar Alberta bond to be redeemed in 20 years would be sound, why should not a one dollar Alberta bond to be redeemed in two years be sound? The prosperity certificate was in effect a bond and at the same time a promissory note. That was the status of the prosperity certificate; and all the laughing off by superficial minds will not change the situation one bit.

But any bond which might circulate—and here is where the difficulty arose—from hand to hand could be classified as currency. Here is where the stamp requirement entered the picture. Consequently if Alberta issued a one dollar bond and put it into circulation by trading it to an unemployed man in return for two hours of work on an Alberta road, then Alberta would be violating the currency legislation of the Dominion of Canada.

In order to avoid such dominion currency legislation Alberta had to penalize that road worker by obliging him, or whatever person accepted the bond from him, to put on the back of the bond a stamp from time to time, the denomination of the stamp being fixed at one cent and the period of time being fixed at one week. This was the only way that we could see of avoiding the currency law. It was not a question of whether the prosperity certificate was sound. It was a question of whether this big dominion government would permit the province to use that financial device in order to get out of what looked like an impossible financial situation.

The prosperity certificate was issued as a promise to pay by the provincial treasury. I now refer hon. members to the passage which the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) read into the record, which reading is accurate and which, as I said a few minutes ago, is a service to the country because it gives the people a chance to get the truth. If you get the full truth about Alberta there will be nothing but admiration and wonder as to how the administration ever got out of the difficulties they were in in 1935—all difficulties which they had nothing to do with causing—and all the time being opposed by the most sordid opposition from the hon. members of the Liberal party, 100 per cent, all the time. Lies, misrepresentations and distortions just filled the air like smoke.

The date selected on which the stamp was to be affixed to the prosperity certificate, as I remember it, was Wednesday. Whoever found himself in possession of a one dollar prosperity certificate on Wednesday night at a certain hour would be required to affix to it a one-cent stamp. There was thus encouragement to people to keep the prosperity certificates circulating. The hon. member said that it looked like a giant taxation system. It could be looked at in that way. But look at the high degree of discount people will give right today in order to get a dollar's worth of trade. For almost any businessman today it would be an almost negligible thing to give one cent on the dollar to get a dollar's worth of trade, or any ordinary worker who is unemployed would certainly be glad to give one cent for the privilege of earning a dollar. That is what it amounted to.

The cause for the cessation of the use of these prosperity certificates was, of course, among other things, probably first the never-ending attack organized against them by the opposition. The very men whose party were responsible for putting Alberta in the financial position it was in were loudest, most inveterate and sordid in their opposition, trying to make it impossible for their own province to come out of the mire. There you have the record of the Liberals of 1935, and they are just as bad today. The last thing in the world they are ever concerned about is how the province is going to get ahead or how Canada is going to get ahead. The only thing that interests them is how to get their miserable selves back into office for another term.

The next reason was the fact that so many opponents of Social Credit refused to accept those prosperity certificates because of prejudice. There were many people who could just as well as not have accepted prosperity certificates such as people who were running stores, garages and the like. If they had accepted these certificates and passed them on just as they would any ordinary money, there would have been no burden on anybody and the effect would have been surprising on the prosperity and the pick-up generally of the province.

The third reason why prosperity certificates were not accepted was that they were not legal tender for obvious reasons. It was not the fact that the people as a whole rejected them. It was the fact that the stubborn, sordid Liberal opposition made it impossible for the device to work. That is all it was. Let the blame go right where it should lie. They worked together with some Conservatives who were just as bitter as the Liberals were. What did they care about the well-being of their own province? Nothing!

I ask hon. members this question. How long would our present Bank of Canada dollars be accepted freely if in the first place a one-cent stamp were to be required to be affixed on the back of each dollar every week? There would be hesitation to accept it, would there not? But it would not be because the dollar is not sound. In the second place, if anyone in Canada were free to refuse to accept a Bank of Canada dollar in payment of a debt—that is if the dollar was no longer legal tender—how long would it be accepted? I think that is enough to show that it was not a matter of the prosperity certificate being unsound at all. Fundamentally, it was just as sound as any unit of money but it had to be used under these difficulties to which I referred in order to avoid the currency laws passed by this dominion parliament.

What were the accomplishments of the prosperity certificates? The hon. member did not tell us about those. I do not blame him. He was putting forward his own case. I will put forward mine. In the first place they built many miles of roads. Let it be borne in mind that when the Social Credit government of Alberta came into power there were only 75 miles of hard-surface roads in the whole province of Alberta. There were 80,000 miles of roads but only 75 miles of them were hard surfaced and that hard surface was the result of an experiment with the Athabasca tar sands and those hard-surface roads were not anything like what we call hard-surface roads today. Anybody who will go into Alberta today and travel over the magnificent system of highways to be found there will wonder how in the world any government of an agricultural province built that many fine roads in the course of 19 years. The prosperity certificates made possible the start. They helped to tide Alberta out of a financial position any other government would have found impossible.

I will say this. If a Liberal government had gone into power there, unless it had had a special dispensation from Ottawa or somewhere else, it could never have managed at all.

What might the prosperity certificates have done for Alberta if they could have been free from the handicap of stamps? The number of prosperity certificates that could have been issued and used in Alberta would have depended upon the surplus goods and services there were in Alberta ready for the people to buy and use, and that amount was simply stupendous. I do not know how many prosperity certificates could have been used but my opinion is that the government could have issued enough of them until prices began to go up. Of course, the minute prices begin to go up, then you have inflation. That is the way to judge.

There are a great many people who say a great deal about the prosperity certificates, and who try to hold them up to ridicule and all that sort of thing. But that is not helping to solve the problems of this country. The Liberals today who are in power—the great big party with a tremendous majority—are just sitting like a lot of frozen tomato plants. They do not know what to do about this unemployment situation and they are trying to whistle in the dark to make themselves believe that the thing does not exist. But they just do not know what to do. Meanwhile their agents are at work misrepresenting Social Credit, the only thing that could help them solve the problem. I am sure I do not know what will happen if depression actually sets in. I am not saying that it will set in, but there is every indication that unemployment is going to increase. I ask the Liberals frankly: What are you going to do about this unemployment in case it continues to increase? Are you just going to sit like a lot of frozen tomatoes, waiting hopelessly just as your forebears did from 1935 to 1939—it is enough to make anyone just nauseated; it is a disgusting situation—while men tramped up and down and rode back and forth on the cars, almost hating the country in which they lived?

I ask: What harm did the prosperity certificates do to anyone? Did they ever cause inflation? No; no rise in prices. Was any one of them not redeemed? No; they were all redeemed in good Canadian money, except those that were not presented for redemption. The cost of the stamp was deducted but that is all. I ask once more: What would the Liberals have done? I should like to know what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr Prudham) and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) would have done. I should like to have seen them form a government in the province of Alberta at that time and to have seen how they would have performed. These men are loud in their demands to destroy the government of the province of Alberta but just let them try to find a way out of the difficulties that faced Alberta then or that face Canada now.

They would fail just as miserably as the Liberals failed in this house in 1935 to deal with unemployment and other ills in this country.

If the Liberals had gone into power in the province of Alberta of course they would have gone for a loan. All they can think about is debt. They are never satisfied unless the country is loaded with an unbearable burden of debt. I think it was only five or six years ago that Harper Prowse, leader of the Liberal party in Alberta, said he would borrow $100 million and build a blanket of roads all over Alberta. That is exactly what he would do. He would have had the province loaded with such a burden of debt that every return it received from every source would have been required to service the debt. These Liberals would be perfectly happy to be able to wave helpless hands, shrug shoulders, and say they could not do anything about it.

If the Liberal organization had been in power there what would they have done? In those days the dominion government was talking about imposing a loan council upon the provinces which meant that in order for a province to obtain any amount of money beyond a certain figure it had to agree to allow the dominion government to tell it what it could or could not borrow. If Alberta had accepted a loan council in those days then her financial autonomy would have been destroyed. That is what the Liberals would have done. Meanwhile they would have left unemployed the people who were ordinarily employed on the roads through the use of prosperity certificates.

Just in passing I might ask the question: Why does the hon. member bring up the prosperity certificates here? I want to attribute nothing but the very best motives but it would be surprising if he did not bring up the prosperity certificates with the intention of trying to discredit the great Social Credit administration in the province of Alberta. The certificates were a trivial little thing that was only one of the struggles that the province made in its tremendous efforts to get out of the difficulties it was in.

Then I refer to the matter of dictatorship. It is an absolute falsehood to say that a Social Credit administration would have to have a dictatorship. If I do not know as much about it as the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), it would be a most astonishing situation. The statement that Social Crediters believe that printing money is all that is necessary in order to solve the difficulties of the country is just as false and preposterous as the other piece of nonsense.

I should like to give the house a picture of something on the happy side. What I have already given is a picture of the very unhappy situation which faced Alberta at that time. What is the situation of Alberta today as she faces this great fiftieth anniversary of her becoming a province? From a Canadian Press dispatch that appeared in the Lethbridge Herald of September 16, 1954, we learn that Alberta's net surplus for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954, was $22,614,000. That is just about $9 million more than the total revenue Alberta had the first year after the Social Credit government took office in 1935.

In the year ended March 31, 1954, Alberta had revenues of $197,043,200, more than $42 million greater than the previous year. That is how this province of Alberta is growing today. Yet these Liberals would destroy the administration that accomplished that! How can they consider themselves to be patriotic Albertans?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: If you will just listen you will learn something, but you do not learn if you do not listen. The government received from petroleum and natural gas leases $49,590,010. That is leases. The province of Alberta has reserved lands contiguous to parcels on which oil has been discovered, has held them until the time when people wished to have them and has sold the drilling rights on them on the open market at auction. During that one year the revenue from sales of such leases was $49,590,010. As I told some hon. members last year, if a Liberal government had been in power they would have had that money to divide among their friends.

The net funded debt of Alberta decreased in the year by $3,019,382. The unfunded debt of the province decreased by $83,304. Capital expenditure for the year was $89,911,864, including $35,228,877 spent on highways, bridges and ferries. There was $5,387,535 spent on public buildings and other public works, while $3,207,790 was spent on the St. Mary and Milk rivers irrigation project for capital development. The University of Alberta received $1,165,216 by way of capital expenditure. I wonder whether there is any reason why a government doing all that should be destroyed.

Loans and advances to municipalities and rural electrification associations amounted to $34,638,465 compared with $6,093,876 the previous year. The amount spent on public welfare, institutions and charitable grants was $36,453,388. Alberta's income from the federal-provincial tax agreement was $29,802,545. I am putting these last figures on the record just so that we shall not have the Liberals running around telling people that the dominion government gave all the money to the province.

From the budget speech of the premier of Alberta delivered on March 5, 1954, we learn certain things about the debt situation of Alberta and I am going to give a series of figures so that we can see what has happened to the debt of Alberta since 1936 when the Social Credit government first began to manage the affairs of the province. As of March 31, 1936, the total debt was $167,027,144. In 1940 it was $156,501,773. In 1945 it was $150,159,819. All that happened before oil in any large measure was discovered. Oil was first discovered in great quantity in the Leduc field in 1947. As of March 31, 1950, the debt was $130,600,687. As of March 31, 1952, the debt was $100,437,090, and as of March 31, 1953, it was $97,452,424.

An hon. Member: Table it.

Mr. Blackmore: And at December 31, 1953, it was $94,283,654. These figures show that there has been a very rapid decrease in the debt ever since the Social Credit administration took office. Not only were they able to pick up the reins and carry on by devices which they were able to work out, but they were able to reduce the debt from the very first year. Yet the Liberals in Alberta want to destroy the administration that has done that!

Mr. Prudham: Why do you not tell them about Alberta defaulting?

Mr. Blackmore: Come into committee where I can get at you and I will take you all to pieces. You have not got a leg to stand on—just a poor, miserable politician, that is all.

Cash and investments in the hands of the province at December 31, 1953, amounting to $169,160,868, consisted of the following:

Cash	$ 5,480,938
Bonds and debentures	80,355,568
Loans to municipalities:
Self-liquidating Projects Act	19,315,400
Municipal Capital Expenditures Loans Act	24,736,111
Rural electrification loans	4,092,288
Loans to Alberta government telephones	35,180,563
	$169,160,868

Show me in the British Empire any unit of government anywhere that is doing anything to compare with that?

Mr. Prudham: Why do you not tell them that Alberta was the only province that defaulted on its bonds?

Mr. Blackmore: I could not hear what the hon. member said but he will have plenty of opportunity to repeat it in committee some time. When he does I will aim to be right here.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that his time has now expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for the brilliant and courteous manner in which they have fulfilled their task.

I was not at all surprised at the oratory of the mover, the hon. member for Verdun, who has been for many years a fellow member of the Montreal bar.

I am sure that the movers of the address have expressed the feelings of their electors and that the latter have reason to congratulate themselves and to be proud of their members.

I take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the government on the efficient and worthy legislation already enacted and which they propose to enact during the session.

I represent an important Montreal constituency of approximately 100,000 people made up of Canadians of various racial origins, French, English, Jews, Poles, Italians and Ukrainians; all are unanimous in approving the way in which the government administers the affairs of the country.

The amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act have been well received by the public at large and they will alleviate the hardship of seasonal unemployment among a certain class of workers.

Some of the previous speakers have asserted that those amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act were but palliatives and would not remedy the situation. To refute their arguments one can say that there is and always will be seasonal unemployment, owing to the geographical position and the climate of our country.

I have been living in Montreal for over 30 years and every winter there has been a period of unemployment, more particularly among day labourers. Those people are happy today to be able to receive unemployment insurance benefits during that temporary period of unemployment; they consider this legislation beneficial and will find it even better following the amendments made by the government.

It has also been stated in the house, Mr. Speaker, that the government's immigration policy was creating unemployment and depriving our workers of their livelihood. In the constituency of Papineau which I represent, there are many foreigners, the majority of which is made up of Italians. One must not believe that all these people come to Canada to seek employment and work as day labourers; many of them bring funds and go into business. In my constituency and elsewhere several of them have established marble, jewelry and watchmaking industries, and they employ Canadian labour without racial discrimination.

I have always found that the government's immigration policy was selective and that it did not increase the number of unemployed; on the contrary, it has helped Canadian industry to develop and expand. I am confident that the government will maintain that policy which is a source of stability for the Canadian economy.

The amendments which the government intends to introduce to the Blind Persons Act have been greeted with satisfaction by that group of citizens. A large number of blind people are finding it hard to make a living in spite of their talents and skills. They can hardly be expected to resort to begging. I feel confident that this government action will help lighten their burden and make their life somewhat more cheerful.

Another piece of social security legislation which was generally welcomed throughout the country was the Disabled Persons Act, passed by the house last year. This action by the government and especially by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), gained high praise everywhere. It will bring those people who come under the act valuable aid and comfort. These disabled people, who were a burden for others, will be able to bear their infirmity better, remembering that they are not forgotten. They will forget the difficulties of life and be in a position to procure relief and welfare for themselves.

Now, before closing, I wish to take exception to a remark made lately by one of the C.C.F. members in this house. The hon. member said that Quebec was the sore point with regard to national unity, that its people would react and that such reaction would be to the benefit of the communist party. I shall tell my hon. friend, the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), that, if he has drawn such conclusions after visiting the province of Quebec, I wonder in what circles and in what places he has been. Yesterday the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) gave him enough details on the life and people of Quebec to make it unnecessary for me to go over it again.

The people of the province of Quebec are respectful of authority and of established order and I dare say to the hon. member that, if a very small group of the communist party stirs with no set purpose, the whole of the population cannot be made responsible for it. One has to live but a short time in the province of Quebec, as in any other province, to see that the people are in no wise different from the people of other provinces, but only that they have a Canadian mentality like the others and that they want the progress of the country, national unity and peace both in Canada and abroad.

We shall never see the day when the province of Quebec will be in the hands of the communist party, because the people of Quebec are too hardworking, sound and honest to believe in Utopia.

The people of Quebec are happy and content to live in a democracy and especially under the leadership of the Liberal party, which they have nearly always chosen to guide their political destiny.

(Text):

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in common with many others who have preceded me in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne may I offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick), upon the fine manner in which they delivered their addresses. Their efforts were definitely worth while, and I was reminded of the occasion a few years ago when I had the opportunity of delivering my maiden speech in the House of Commons. With my own experience in mind, I believe I can sympathize with them in their ordeal.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to your attention and to that of hon. members a simple and constructive step which can be taken immediately by the government to increase employment by at least 10 per cent in one of our most important industries, and at the same time save some Canadian consumers $71 million this year. I refer to a decision in the 1955 budget which would remove the excise or luxury taxes now levied on passenger automobiles.

I hasten to say that I am not advocating the removal of all taxes from automobiles. The present total of taxation amounts to 25 per cent of the manufacturer's selling price. Of this amount, 10 per cent is in the form of the general commodity sales tax, and the remaining 15 per cent is a luxury tax. It is this utterly unrealistic added burden of taxation on one of the most important and, I might add, most expensive necessities of normal life under modern conditions in this country, which should be removed.

I am certain there is scarcely a member in the house who does not feel that this luxury tax should have been removed some years ago, when the reason for its imposition had ceased to exist. I refer of course to the fact that the automobile luxury tax, as we know it today, was first of all a wartime austerity measure and then a control device to conserve exchange and to combat inflation. It has been continued at its present or at a higher level for some years now, regardless of its depressing effect upon an industry which accounts for one-eighth of all retail sales, regardless of its limiting effects upon employment and regardless of the severe hardship it imposes upon consumers in the low and average income brackets.

The two great problems facing many Canadians today are unemployment and inadequate family income to meet the demands of our modern standard of living. The government could go a long way toward relieving both these problems if, in the forthcoming budget, it would abolish this outmoded and unrealistic luxury tax on passenger cars.

In some measure I speak of this growing need as a representative of the riding of Ontario, one of the two great centres of automobile manufacturing in Canada. I speak also in much larger measure for all Canadians who are forced to pay this arbitrary and artificial penalty of over $400 if they wish to buy the most modestly priced family car of Canadian manufacture on the market today. I admit that they should pay something, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure all hon. members will agree, that $150 or $160 per car, which is the amount of the sales tax, is a fair contribution of this family necessity to the federal treasury.

The luxury tax costs each modest car owner an additional $240 or so. It is a luxury tax but in this case it is not imposed on the luxury. I think it will be generally agreed that this proposition is self-evident. The facts are—and this is the finding of a very thorough and extensive survey—that 83 per cent of passenger car use on an average day in Canada is for essential travel of one kind and another; that 65 per cent of every hundred miles of car travel is directly connected with the necessity of making a living; and that today almost one million of our citizens are driving, for these essential purposes, cars which are ten years old and more. Apart altogether from the important safety factors involved, it must be obvious that the continuance of this luxury penalty on new car ownership is seriously affecting the efficiency of the entire national productive effort.

The estimate I have given of a 10 per cent immediate increase in employment, if this luxury tax were removed, is conservative. Most labour leaders, I am told, think it would be considerably higher. Even so, I know what a 10 per cent increase in high pay employment would mean, not only in my own riding, or in the Windsor area, but in many other parts of Canada. Mr. Speaker, 260,000 Canadians depend for all or a large part of their income on the manufacture of motor vehicles, the supply of materials and component parts, and the sales and service of these vehicles. All would receive benefits, direct or indirect, from the removal of this luxury tax. Four thousand or perhaps five thousand new jobs would open up in the manufacturing industry alone and as many again in the supply industries. The latter, incidentally, actually give work to more people than the manufacturing industry itself.

I need not explain to this house, Mr. Speaker, that I am not talking about stopgap, marginal, low wage employment. The jobs I speak of are preferred jobs in our national work force. If our economy continues to expand, and the Canadian-made automobile is allowed its full share of the domestic market, they will be steady jobs.

It will give hon. members some idea of the magnitude of the burden of this present luxury tax on the payroll resources of the industry when I say that this year, and I mean the fiscal year 1954, the federal taxes paid by the automobile manufacturing industry in Canada exceeded the total paid in wages and salaries by some $13 million. The figures, I believe, are $137 million in taxes and $124 million in wages and salaries.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that on these facts alone, the immediate removal of the luxury tax would be fully justified. But there are other compelling reasons, perhaps the foremost of which is the long list of consumer benefits that would follow from the rechannelling of those $70 million into new disposable income. Some of it would be spent on cars, and much of it would be spent on other commodities. Regardless of what happened to it, the fact remains that Mr. and Mrs. Canada would have $70 million more in their pockets and purses, to spend or save, than last year.

If there is anybody on the opposite side of the house—and I am sure there is not one but many—who may be interested in raising the level of Canadian retail spending next year, I commend this simple and available source of substantial millions.

The exciting prospect of the immediate redistribution of these millions is even more appealing if we look at the kind of Canadian families who will benefit the most. They are, naturally, the people who buy most of our passenger cars. Who are they? Again I quote the very reliable independent survey made of this and other basic facts of automobile ownership. Although it was made about three years ago, I am informed by those conversant with up-to-date statistics that its conclusions are still valid.

At the time of the survey, 81 of every 100 passenger cars were owned by households whose senior wage earner had an annual income of less than $4,000. Sixty-five of every hundred passenger cars were owned by families whose main source of income was less than $3,200. I have said that the luxury tax amounts to well over $200 in the cost of the average car. Its removal, Mr. Speaker, would be the equivalent of a round of pay raises of between 5 and 10 per cent for every $2,000 to $4,000 wage earner who buys a new car this year. I might say also at this point, sir, that I have inquired into the matter of passing on to the consumer the luxury tax removal, and I am most reliably informed that the entire reduction would be passed on by the manufacturers and dealers.

Also important in this connection—and I trust this aspect will have the serious consideration of the minister—is the application of the tax reduction or removal to cars in the hands of dealers. On some other occasions the government policy has been strangely inconsistent on this point. When the luxury or sales tax has been increased, this has generally been made to apply to all cars still in the hands of dealers. On the other hand, when reductions have been made it has not been applied to such cars. Perhaps I should explain that the sales and excise taxes on passenger cars are collected from the manufacturer before the car goes to the dealer for sale to the consumer. It is to all intents and purposes still an unsold car, merely having moved from the factory into the chain of distribution. Surely it is most unfair to all concerned to treat these cars still in the sales rooms and waiting to be sold as though they had actually been sold while the higher tax levels were in effect.

Of course, the tax will have already been paid on these cars by the manufacturer, and we all know how reluctant governments are to give back money to taxpayers, but surely the injustice of retaining such tax moneys is too obvious to allow this kind of thing ever to happen again. I have made some inquiries as to the practical aspects of giving these rebates, and am informed that the necessary checking, auditing and policing of dealers is a simple matter which the large manufacturers could handle on behalf of the government without any untoward incidents.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I will go so far today as to ask the Minister of Finance to make an immediate announcement that whenever new rates are announced, whether up or down, they will apply to all cars not actually sold to consumers. This is the only way to be absolutely fair. It might be thought that such an announcement at this time would suggest that a reduction or removal of the luxury tax had already been decided on. But this is not the case. Whether the tax is changed or not—and this could be acknowledged in the minister's statement—there will still be hesitation on the part of dealers to accept new car deliveries between now and the bringing down of the budget, unless such a policy is announced now.

It is common knowledge that there are rumours of some measure of automobile tax reduction in the air. I think it is not too much to say that the minister himself has had a good deal to do with starting those rumours. It would be a wise and gracious act on his part—and of immense help to the industry—if he would now recognize the difficult position of the dealers and state that no decision has been reached about next year's auto taxes—which is, I am sure, quite true—but that if or when changes are made, the new rates, up or down, will apply only when cars are sold to their new actual owners.

We must of course consider the effect of the tax removal on government revenues. I am sure that this is the question which is most important to the minister at the moment. I have said that the sum total of revenue from the luxury tax is currently about $71 million. However, even its complete removal would not mean a loss of anything like this amount to the treasury. I have heard various estimates of the actual loss, but the consensus of informed opinion is that it might be no more than half of the present tax "take", or about $35 million. This is due, of course, to the fact that the $71 million would go almost in its entirety into the main stream of consumer spending on cars and other commodities. The current estimate of the direct federal revenue on all commodity spending is between 20 and 25 per cent. That is one way the treasury would get back a substantial part of the $71 million. It would gain in other ways also.

For example, it would gain possibly 10,000 new taxpayers from the new jobs which the tax cut would create. Whether they came from other industries or not, the fact remains that new jobs would be created throughout the economy, and we all know that new jobs mean inevitably new heads for the tax collector to count.

It would gain also from the substantial volume of new spending on cars, and from additional taxes on the accessories that always accompany new car ownership. The same applies to tires, car radios and so on, whose sales would be immediately stimulated by the upturn in new car buying.

I could mention many other general benefits from the measure of tax relief which I am advocating. It would afford some measure of relief to the overcrowded public transit systems of many of our cities. It would make life easier and simpler for those hundreds of thousands of Canadians who travel many miles to their work by passenger car, and to all of those who have fallen in with a new pattern of Canadian living, namely a small home in the suburbs or countryside.

In closing, I am well aware that someone may ask the important question: Why this year? I think there are some compelling answers to that question. The sharp rise in unemployment is one current development that I am sure the government is anxious to check. I believe that the minister will find ready corroboration for the estimate of new jobs I have suggested, namely a 10 per cent rise in automotive manufacturing employment and at least an equivalent rise in the supply and service industries.

Another good reason for the tax cut this year is the fact, not generally realized, that one of the contributing factors to the economic slowdown of last year was a drop of 18 per cent in the total sales of the Canadian automobile manufacturing industry in 1954 over the previous year. I am told that the luxury tax removal would almost certainly restore that 18 per cent drop in the current year and then go on to add new production records to the output of this great industry in the years ahead.

I trust that I have said enough to make it clear, and to convince hon. members of the house, and particularly the government, that the 1955 budget is indeed the time for the final and long overdue removal of the luxury tax on this now common necessity.

Mr. N. C. Schneider (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable criticism regarding the excessive time occupied by the debate on the speech from the throne at the opening of each session. We should, however, remember that this debate is a report on the state of the nation. Each member of the house is given an opportunity to speak on the problems of his particular part of the dominion, and in that way parliament is given a survey of the problems and needs of the whole of Canada.

Having been honoured by the privilege of seconding the motion in reply to the speech from the throne when I entered parliament, I can appreciate the excellent efforts by the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) this session. I wish to associate myself with all those who have congratulated them on their really fine speeches, and I feel that our parliament has gained two worthy members who will surely be an asset in our debates.

After a long and busy life in business, I am dismayed at the waste of time occupied by many speeches in the house and the needless quotations from newspapers and other writers giving opinions of very little interest to other members. We are elected to this parliament to express the opinions and the wishes of our constituents, but above all I believe that we are elected to act on our own decisions, and are personally responsible.

I am delighted that the throne speech calls for some revision of the house rules and I urge that private members' speeches be limited to 20 minutes. It has been estimated that the cost of operating parliament while in session is $10,000 a day. At this time we are sitting 5½ hours per day, and that figures out to $1,818 per hour, and 20 minutes, which is one-third of that, cost $606. Surely no private member is vain enough to think that his ideas cannot be expressed in $606 worth of time, and that he should occupy $1,212 worth of time in 40 minutes.

The savings effected by this reduction would be fair to all and the party leaders' and ministers' privileges could remain as they are, giving ample time for summing up all the arguments presented without endless repetition by speaker after speaker.

Also the saving in the cost of printing of Hansard would be surprising when we think of the thousands of copies printed, and finally the printing and binding into those rows of big black books which gather dust in our offices.

A shortening of time of speeches would result in more time for the estimates at the end of the session and the real subject matter and purpose of the debate would benefit by a sharper focus resulting from the elimination of unnecessary repetition.

To faithfully represent the highly industrialized riding of Waterloo North, I must make a request regarding the excessive number of reports required from various departments of government. These federal reports added to all those from other levels of government represent a terrific amount of work in our business offices. Business is required to report the amount of various supplies and services used in the past year, and also estimate their requirements for the coming year.

How much machinery, building construction, coal, fuel oil, and many other items require a great many reports? One company figures that they made out a total of 167 returns.

There is no denying the value of these statistics to some people, but I feel that as a rule the summary of it all is published so long after it is gathered that it is almost worthless. I urge the Department of Trade and Commerce, and particularly the bureau of statistics, to immediately give consideration to a study of the co-ordination of these government demands for information, and that all these questionnaires be looked at intelligently and sympathetically and some means be found to consolidate and minimize these reports.

The monthly coal statement is an example of their complaint. Coal was a problem during the war, but at present it is in good supply, and the same applies to fuel oil and many other items. In addition to the monthly reports we must also give a summary of the whole year, and woe unto the manager whose year's figures do not correspond with the monthly reports.

I have in my hand a resolution from the city council of Kitchener reading as follows:

That whereas the current unemployment situation in the city is a source of deep concern;

And whereas the Department of National Defence has already indicated their intention to construct an armouries in the city;

And whereas in the opinion of this council an armouries building in the city is greatly needed;

And whereas the building of a district income tax office has been proposed for this city;

Be it therefore resolved that this council petition the federal government to proceed immediately with the construction of these buildings as a means of alleviating in some measure the present unemployment.

There is also a letter from the Kitchener-Waterloo family service bureau board of directors drawing attention to the extent of the distress prevailing in our community because of the lack of some form of relief for the employable unemployed who have reached the end of their resources. The building of the new income tax office in Kitchener is assured, but the armouries is still a crying need in this hundred year old community with a combined population of over 70,000 in the twin cities of Kitchener-Waterloo. The patience and loyalty of our four units, the 54th light anti-aircraft regiment, the 48th field squadron, R.C.E.; the 3rd company, R.C.A.S.C., and the 24th field ambulance is commendable, and the oddity of an anti-aircraft regiment housed on the sixth floor of an office building does not help the militia.

I do not favour the idea of constructing public works projects for the purpose of relieving unemployment, but it would be of some assistance and would be justified in this case. My deep concern is for the 3,479 unplaced applicants listed in the last report from our local unemployment insurance office. Many of the causes of the present business recession cannot be avoided during this painful readjustment to quick-changing world conditions. Canada took great pride in rapidly raising her standard of living, but now we find that we have priced ourselves almost out of the world markets. The only exception is the market of the United States, and they buy from us only when it suits them, and only until we interfere with their producers, at which time they protect them by raising the tariff or putting on an embargo.

Some of our hon. friends in the opposition seem to be extremely worried when Liberal members from industrial centres mention protection. We are labelled protectionist Liberals, but that does not worry us at all because we have the confidence of our constituents and throughout the years the Liberal government has always followed a policy of reasonable protection for our young and growing industries.

Mr. Rowe: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schneider: I am really amused by the criticism of opposition members, particularly the acting leader (Mr. Rowe), who feels that I am inconsistent and shed crocodile tears when pleading for protection for the factory workers of my riding. At first I was quite flattered by this attention from a veteran of 25 years in this parliament. I am no longer concerned about his misleading remarks, and have decided that his irritation is caused by the fact that in doing my duty I am doing what his non-conservative Conservative party should do according to policy and tradition.

Mr. Rowe: You should be sitting over here.

Mr. Schneider: I chose this seat.

During the last session there were as many good speeches for protection of the textile mills from this side of the house as there were from the Conservatives. The really outstanding speeches on behalf of the textile mills came from the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), on the Conservative benches, and the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. White) on the government benches. The Conservatives spent most of their time on the problem of wheat, hoping to gain favour in the west.

As the Acting Leader of the Opposition knows quite well, the percentage of Conservative voters in the cities in my riding is very high, almost 50 per cent. In criticizing me, does he suggest I should disregard their present plight and talk politics instead of employment? I have chosen to place the interests of my people above party politics. The hon. member can follow his choice of politics first, but he cannot wisecrack me into following his ideas.

Mr. Rowe: We have one convert, anyway.

Mr. Schneider: Yes, a wisecracker. In the present recession—

An hon. Member: The 20 minutes are up.

Mr. Schneider: Oh, no. In the present recession, the problem has very seldom been insufficient protection. We have practically the same protection at this time as we had when conditions were considered to be at their best. In my opinion, the real causes of our problems today are the following: First, the dumping of surplus goods into our country in spite of Bill No. 29 passed during the last session, which makes provision for a price not lower than the average of the past six months in the country of origin. Secondly, the importation into our country of high grade goods and equipment which undersell our product in our home market because of the low wage rates in the country of origin. A good example of this is in the manufacture of electrical goods. The wages paid are as follows: Switzerland, 45 cents per hour; England, 53 cents; France, 58 cents; Belgium, 62 cents; Canada, $1.51 and the United States, $1.87. This comparison of rate is applicable to many importations into Canada today. In the face of this condition, how can we expect to sell in the export market?

Another cause of our unemployment is the serious loss of purchasing power of our farmers, both in the prairies and in the east. Farm income has dropped 15 per cent in the last two years, mostly as a result of lower prices for wheat. World wheat prices are definitely beyond our control, and along with all other wheat producing countries we suffered a drop of approximately 13 cents per bushel below the previous crop year. Because of the high cost of almost everything the farmer buys, he is having difficulty in making a profit on many of his products. The root of the problem is that while his selling prices appear to him to be low, these same prices have been amongst the highest in the world. According to last year's records the following wholesale prices prevail: beef in England, 21 cents; in Montreal, 33 cents; bacon in England, 28 cents; Montreal, 62 cents; cheese in England, 24 cents; Montreal, 32 cents; eggs in England, 50·6 cents per dozen; Montreal, 52·4 cents. The problem is to find some way to market our surplus abroad at prices which will give the producer a fair return. Experience has proven that when the farmer is prosperous he spends his money on equipment made in the city and we are all prosperous.

Another serious cause of unemployment, and one which is particularly irritating to our Canadian manufacturers, is the unsympathetic attitude of some of our government purchasing officials. Directives have been given to all such officials by the various ministers, but we still find orders and contracts for foreign made equipment being given when a Canadian company could supply it, sometimes at a lower price. Orders are sometimes given to Canadian companies who in turn buy and supply foreign goods. It is an unpleasant experience to lose such an order to a foreign firm, pay taxes to pay for the goods and send your employees home for lack of work. I appeal to all government spending bodies to carefully check each and every purchase to make sure that all possible employment is given to Canadian workmen.

Mr. Rowe: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schneider: It is easy to stand here and say what you think is wrong with our country, but it is quite another matter to offer a solution to these problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schneider: Who is making this speech, please?

Mr. Rowe: It sounds like a Conservative.

Mr. Hodgson: It is your own members in the rump over there who are interrupting.

Mr. Schneider: It is easy to stand here and say what you think is wrong with our country, but it is quite another matter to offer a solution to these problems. Our young country could be compared to a young boy at his first birthday party. Johnny Canuck is a lively youngster with a reputation as a hearty eater and a fast grower. Other people outside his family have great confidence in him and are urging him to eat everything in sight. They are killing him with kindness by feeding him operating capital for investment in this wonderful country faster than he can digest it. Foreign capital has been fed into Johnny Canuck so fast that his dollar value has a premium of 3½ per cent over the dollar of the richest country in the world, namely the United States of America. This diet is too rich for his stomach and while this high dollar value feels good at first, it is just like Johnny's cake and ice cream, and now he has an old-fashioned bellyache. Our high dollar value of 1.03½ is a serious handicap in selling our surplus products in the export market. If our 3½ per cent premium were removed we would gain an advantage of approximately 6 cents per bushel on our export sales of wheat. That would result in a faster movement of our surplus wheat and would greatly relieve Johnny Canuck's stomach ache.

Our dollar at par, or lower, would immediately stimulate our export trade and it would discourage the spending of our Canadian shopping and vacation dollar in the United States with whom we are so far out of balance.

Very few of us have training or experience in international finance, and I am sure I do not know how this devaluation of the Canadian dollar can be accomplished. But unpleasant as it is, many Canadians agree that it is one of the solutions for the present problem. While I certainly do not advocate or compare our present position with that of Great Britain, I believe that they devalued the pound sterling to about half of its former or normal value. Surely if they did it our financiers can also find a way to give us some relief.

Great Britain is enjoying full employment while we sit here with Johnny Canuck's stomach full of rich food and like all small boys he does not want to take his castor oil. This parliament should encourage our finance minister in his present efforts to find some solution to this most pressing problem and to give us at least an even break with the United States dollar in securing export trade.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) and what he had to say with regard to what it costs when one rises to speak for 10, 15 or 20 minutes in the house. I have been trying to figure how much it is going to cost for me to speak for this 5 minutes. However, I am not going to allow a little thing like that to worry me, because this is something that has been going on since 1867 and it will not be changed in my time. I want to draw something to the attention of the government and I am not going to take long about it. I have never before spoken twice in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Many letters are arriving at our desks these days asking what the government intends to do regarding support prices on the various agricultural commodities. I want to take this opportunity of bringing this very important matter before the house at this time.

Canadian farmers have shown a strong preference for stability in the prices they receive for their products as against the wide price fluctuations that result from the operation of the so-called free market. Undoubtedly the majority, like industrial workers, prefer a reasonable, assured income to a "feast-or-famine" arrangement.

At the end of world war II, in 1944, the Agricultural Prices Support Act was passed "to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture" and "to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations". The act was continued until 1950 when it was made permanent legislation.

In practice, the act has done little to provide the farmer with a stable income but has rather been used in times of emergency, such as the 1952 foot-and-mouth disease outbreak, to ward off some of the effects of the drastic reduction in the farmers' earnings. Also, the three-man prices support board set up under the act has done little or nothing to keep farm income under review and take steps to carry out the terms of the act. This board was established to examine the need for support for various commodities from time to time. The act laid down no conditions for support and no methods for determining the extent of support. Each commodity is treated as a special case. In practice the board acts only when approached by a group of producers, or in a widely recognized emergency. At no time has a formula been set up that people would understand. When a price has been set, it seems to have been something that someone reached up in the air for and said, "That is it". There should be a formula based on the cost of production and some return for the producer, and it should be something that would apply to all the different cases. The board can only recommend, since the cabinet decides what support, if any, shall be given.

Support may apply throughout certain periods to all or to only a limited quantity of a commodity which is produced in certain areas. It may be given by offers to purchase or by guarantee of price. In 1944 a fund of $200 million was allowed, or set aside with losses to be recovered from the consolidated fund each year.

By far the greatest expenditures—about 85 per cent from 1944 to March 31, 1954—have been those made for hogs and cattle as a result of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease.

Most support has been short-term. Butter is the only commodity for which support prices have been announced for two year periods, but even then the announcement has been made just before the beginning of the period.

That the board deals most frequently with wholesalers and packers rather than directly with farmers has provoked strong criticism in the country. Prices are negotiated with the wholesalers and packers so that they will be able to pay, with some profit to themselves, certain prices to producers. It has been said that farmers have received as little as 10 cents a dozen for eggs for which packers received 38 cents plus 5 cents for storage. Instances were cited in the House of Commons here of producers obtaining from $1 to $2 less in Winnipeg, and from $3 to $4 less in Saskatoon than they were entitled to per hundredweight of beef. Even when the full price has been allowed it has often not covered the farmers' costs, with the result that production was drastically reduced in the following season. In 1950 potato growers in the maritimes planted 105,000 acres of potatoes. The next year their price was supported at only $1.20 per barrel and acreage was reduced by 35 per cent. Consumers in Toronto had to pay 66 cents for 10 pounds of potatoes in January, 1952.

In its brief to the cabinet in 1953 the Canadian Federation of Agriculture stated:

> The announcement of the reduction in the floor price for hogs from 26 cents to 23 cents apparently resulted in a very serious reduction in sow breedings. . . . We believe that in the best interest of more stable production and price, it would be advisable to establish a higher floor than 23 cents in order that production might be maintained in future months at least at the level of domestic requirements.

Because of the low support price production dropped, and pork loin sold in Toronto in January, 1954, at 78 cents per pound.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if my hon. friend were not reading his speech he could not get so far away from the facts as he has been ever since he started.

Mr. Fulton: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, I take credit for being a better reader than some of the members on the other side of the house.

Mr. Gardiner: Some of the others stick to the truth.

Mr. Bryce: That is all right.

Mr. Knowles: And more worth reading, too.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bryce: Again in 1954 this protest was made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture:

> Our federation believes that the purpose of the egg support price as a protection to producers against loss and as a stabilizing influence in the industry is not being fully achieved because the level of support is too low. . . . Study should be given to establishing equivalent support prices at the producer level.

The failure of the present policy to ensure fair and stable returns for agriculture has become increasingly evident in the past two years. In 1944, when the act was passed, the relation between the prices of farm products and the commodities and services used by farmers was fairly satisfactory. It continued to be so until 1951, although certain sections of agriculture experienced many difficulties. In 1953 general wholesale prices were 69 per cent above those of 1944. The 11 factor index of principal farm costs had risen 61 per cent and farm living costs had risen by 66 per cent, but the wholesale prices of farm products were only 40 per cent higher than those of 1944. The situation is now further deteriorating and the avowed aims of the 1944 act are far from being realized.

In its latest brief the interprovincial farm union council had this to say:

> There is only one realistic and equitable solution for this problem. That is the immediate adoption of a new national agricultural policy that will provide price guarantees for all Canadian farm products sold on domestic markets on a basis equivalent and adjusted from time to time to the cost of living index. This price, naturally, would be in line with the prices of consumer goods and services required by farmers.

The price for eggs has come under criticism by the poultry producers but while the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has set the price at 38 cents the producer does not get that and in many cases takes a lot less.

Mr. Gardiner: He does if they are grade A large.

Mr. Bryce: I am delighted to hear what the minister has to say but if he mumbles I cannot hear it.

Mr. Gardiner: I never mumble.

Mr. Bryce: Let me hear what you have to say.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bryce: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Studer: Read a little slower.

Mr. Bryce: The minister has said that the egg stations should be paying at least 32 cents per dozen to the producers, but the letters that members get prove that the farmers do not receive 32 cents per dozen for their grade A eggs.

Mr. Gardiner: The minister never said that at all.

Mr. Bryce: Well—

Mr. Argue: He just prepared the text that said it.

Mr. Bryce: If you did not say it, it is just another of those things. The newspapers quoted you as saying it.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no. It is not one of those things, either.

Mr. Argue: The farmers get 27 cents.

Mr. Gardiner: It is 32 cents near Toronto and Montreal and there is a wider margin elsewhere.

Mr. Bryce: I will take you to Manitoba where they are getting 20 cents a dozen.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, for nest run of eggs.

Mr. Bryce: For No. 1 eggs.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, not under our support.

Mr. Bryce: Oh yes. I will take you there. You and I will go to Manitoba and when you come back you will know more about it.

Mr. Argue: He was there, Scottie, and that is why you are here.

Mr. Bryce: There are 400,000 people employed in connection with the dairy industry and an industry like the dairy industry should be looked after. The production, processing and distribution of dairy products, together with the beef and veal obtained from the dairy cow, make the dairy industry a vital component part of our national economy. The many butter and cheese factories and condensories in Canada, as well as the hundreds of milk plants, contribute much to our total national wealth and provide employment for a large number of Canadians. It should not be overlooked that milk is one of the most important foods in maintaining the health of our population.

The important role of the dairy industry with respect to both soil conservation and fertility is another important aspect which cannot be overlooked when estimating the significance of the industry as a whole. It is, therefore, of vital concern not only to those connected with the industry itself but to all Canadians to regard the future of our dairy industry with great care.

The amount of money that has been spent under the Agricultural Prices Support Act has been repeatedly published in the newspapers. From 1946 to March 31, 1954, $80 million was spent. Let us look at this $80 million that has been spent. The sum of $69 million was spent on beef and pork support during the foot-and-mouth disease, something the government could not help, something that nobody could help. It was a national disaster.

Mr. Studer: That is not what you said at that time.

Mr. Bryce: The $69 million should not be taken into consideration as being agricultural price support.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Studer: That is not what you said at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bryce: That leaves $11 million, and out of that $11 million only a little more than $1½ million went for the support of butter. On the other hand, many other products that were supported cost more than the butter support. For instance, there is gold. With the tremendous importance of the dairy industry the amount of $1½ million was well spent money to keep that industry functioning.

I am sure everyone realizes that butter or butterfat is the key to the whole dairy industry. If you do not maintain this floor price then you are going to bring calamity and disaster to the dairy industry. If the people who are idle were provided with employment no doubt they would eat butter and there would be no surplus. I want to draw to the attention of the house that I am speaking not only for myself as a farmer, but on behalf of this group, who are representative of farmers who are dependent upon the dairy industry for their livelihood. I would be bold enough to say I am speaking for 400,000 dairy farmers who are facing disaster, if the government does not announce this butter price and let those farmers know what is going to be done before the cows freshen in the spring.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member who just concluded his speech that he is not the only one, nor is his group the only group or party in the house that speaks for the farmers. I know he has heard a great many speeches from the official opposition since the opening of this session which should warrant his coming to the sound conclusion that if any party has spoken at this session on behalf of the farmers, there can be no mistake as to its being the official opposition.

I should like to make two or three points briefly. The first is that in the last several years many parts of Canada have experienced misfortune. Since coming to the house I recall the disaster of the Fraser river flood, the fires at Rimouski and Cabano, the Red river or Winnipeg disaster and "Hurricane Hazel" which did so much damage not only in the Toronto area but in other parts of Canada.

Nor am I unmindful of the tragedy that befell the city of Sarnia because of the tornado in 1953. It so happened that it occurred almost exactly at six o'clock in the evening when the youngsters were probably in their kitchens, and citizens were not on the streets. Otherwise we would have suffered a terrific death toll, because on street after street buildings were blown down, and the streets were littered with fallen trees and other debris. It is miraculous that we escaped without serious death loss.

My point is that in the event of tornadoes, hurricanes or fires such as I have mentioned, or in the event of flood damage, exemptions should be given from income tax. The non-business property would be under one classification. I would suggest briefly that the difference between the value of the property immediately before the disaster and its value immediately after should be taken into consideration, and that such amount, less the insurance allocated to the insurers, should be the amount deducted for purposes of income tax.

Business loss would be in a different category, and income tax deductions could be the same as in the United States where the loss is in the proportion of the adjusted basis of the entire property which the value of the destroyed part bears to the value of the entire property. And such loss must also be reduced by any insurance or other compensations.

Mr. Speaker, some three years ago this coming April I spoke at length upon the necessity for lowering the level of the great lakes, not only because of the serious damage the lake levels have been doing to lake shore property, but for other reasons which should be taken into consideration immediately. We know that the St. Lawrence seaway project is under way, and that when it is completed the lake level will be lower than it is now. But I believe that at this time we must face the serious loss which property owners must endure before the lake level is reduced.

We have seen in the press recently that in the county of Essex and elsewhere in Ontario there is bound to be considerable damage this coming spring. And I can say without hesitation, living on the shore of lake Huron, that the high lake levels are doing a terrific amount of damage to very valuable property. I am not going to speak at length about the cause of these high levels, because there is some idea that permitting certain waters to flow into lake Superior, thus increasing the flow into lake Huron, could be controlled, and that the damage done by the increased flow is someone's responsibility. We hear it said from time to time that the federal government is responsible, or could be held responsible.

I am not arguing the merits of that particular case, but I think perhaps a sound case could be made out. The point I make is that, pending completion of the St. Lawrence seaway scheme, action must be taken now. There is action that could be taken to lower the lake levels now. We understand that when the seaway is completed the levels of lakes Huron, Ontario and Superior may be lowered by some three or four feet. At the moment however lake levels are very high. I have here a graph giving information back as far as 90 years, but unfortunately it cannot be placed on Hansard in this form. It is available to anyone who would like to see it, however.

Some years ago Canada was greatly alarmed about the amount of water the Chicago drainage scheme was taking from lake Michigan. I believe that at the height of intake some 9,000 cubic feet per second were going in through that scheme. Action was taken in the United States courts, and as a result this flow was reduced to about 3,200 cubic feet per second. I would suggest that this government should consult with that of the United States in an endeavour to see if we cannot put more water through that scheme now, thus lowering the level of lake Huron and the levels of the lakes and rivers between that and the St. Lawrence river. I believe this is necessary, because if we could have, let us say, 8,000 or 9,000 more cubic feet per second going through that drainage scheme the lake level would be reduced by some 12 or 15 inches within a year. And we want to have the lake level reduced.

I suggest, as I did at that time, that the Welland canal should be kept open all winter. A good deal of water can go through there, if it is kept open—and it certainly cannot if it is closed.

As stated before, consideration should be given to controlling the amount of water flowing from lake Superior into lake Huron. This is absolutely necessary and, according to engineers both in Canada and the United States, quite feasible. The Trent canal is another physical means of increasing the flow and lowering these lake levels. And the blasting of the rock at Galop, with the control system at Iroquois, is another means whereby the level of lake Huron could be reduced very rapidly.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the necessity for action now. There is no occasion to wait two or three years. Lake levels are going to be reduced, and if there is action we can take, then let us take it without delay.

Do not wait until another $4 million or $5 million worth of damage is done before any action is taken. As I said a moment ago, and I am going to repeat it, the simple way to do it is to permit another 10,000 or 12,000 cubic feet a second to go through the Chicago drainage canal, lessen the flow from lake Superior into lake Huron by 5,000 to 7,000 cubic feet per second. That would alleviate the distress which many people in the province of Ontario are going to experience in the coming spring.

The next matter I should like to mention is the plight of the municipalities. Over the years since I have been here I have emphasized this problem, as have many members of my party. We have urged that we have a dominion-provincial conference, a continuing conference incidentally, because when there is a delay between conferences a great deal is lost. When this conference is called it is most necessary that the plight of the municipalities be one of the major considerations dealt with. We all come from a city, or a town or a rural area. There is not one person in this house who does not know the serious difficulties that the junior municipalities are facing. Unfortunately their tax revenues are practically dried up. They depend on real estate taxation, and their projects are held up. They are subject to suggestions and practically orders from senior governments to set certain standards which these municipalities cannot meet because of their narrow revenue bases. They are confronted with a rapidly developing financial crisis. Let there be no mistake about that.

The increased cost for education and highways, the increased cost of administration, and I would include in that the increased salaries of their employees such as policemen, firemen and so forth, to which they are entitled if they are to maintain a high standard of living, have become a burden. Because of the limited revenues of these municipalities their plight is becoming so acute that some action must be taken, and it can be taken only through a conference. I have suggested before in this house, and so have other members of my party—it was suggested yesterday by the hon. member for London (Mr. Mitchell)—that the municipalities should be exempt from sales tax on any purchases that they make. I have said this before, and in fact it is a plank in our platform. It is one of the soundest arguments that anyone can advance, because the provincial governments of this country are exempt from sales tax, and yet the municipal governments and the boards of education who require anything for the service of their people must pay a sales tax. Probably because of our arguments over the last several years there has been an exemption on fire equipment and road equipment if it costs $1,000 or more, but that is not good enough. The amount that could be saved by my city of Sarnia if it were exempt from sales tax would amount to something over $75,000 this year. That is no small item. In larger centres it would be many times that amount. They need it.

Another matter that I should like to mention is the payment of taxes by all crown property. Since 1945 we have argued in this house for the payment of taxes, or an amount in lieu of taxes, by crown companies and by the government on all crown properties. When I say "crown properties" I mean provincial crown property as well as federal crown property. I have pressed persistently for the taxation of crown companies or payment in lieu of taxes and I am happy to say that that formula was accepted by this government in November 1949 despite previous strong objection. We are fortunate in Sarnia in having the Polymer Corporation, one of the most successful corporations that ever operated in this or any other country. Today they pay into the coffers of the city of Sarnia some $285,000 as their share of taxes in that particular city. We do have a formula today under which, if crown property amounts to a certain percentage of the total assessment, there is some relief. That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. I sincerely feel that all crown buildings and properties whether in the city of Ottawa, in the city of Sarnia, the city of Winnipeg, the city of Vancouver or any place else, should pay the same tax as the property next door which is owned by an individual or an industry.

I am going to say something that has not been said in this house before. The next dominion-provincial conference should deal with the science of government. May I give one illustration? Our townships and counties were laid out in the days of oxen. I will confine myself to Ontario; in fact I will confine myself to western Ontario. I have sat on a township council and I have attended county council meetings. In the county of Lambton we have 10 townships that were laid out in the days of the ox-cart. We are almost beyond the oil age and into the atomic era. We must streamline our governments, whether municipal, provincial or federal, to the needs of the day. Where we have 10 townships in my county or 12 in others, as the case may be, we could well do with four. So far as voting is concerned—I am not going into details—the county councils could be represented by population. We have to get away from this idea of adhering to something that was enacted in 1867 or 1868 as it affects the boundaries of our townships. Extra costs are imposed on the administration of our counties because they were laid out before the days of the automobile. It is time we considered that together with the other matters which concern the plight of the municipalities.

I am going to refer to something which some people will say is a provincial matter. I am going to refer to many school sections in our province. Perhaps I should confine myself to my own. There are many school houses, the little old red school house in which the sanitary conditions are substandard. Perhaps the floors are scrubbed three or four times a year. I was amazed the other day when I read a report of a medical health officer which said that in 65 per cent of two townships the schools had substandard sanitary conditions. That also applied to the purity of the water. That may come within provincial or school board jurisdiction according to some people, but that is not the way I see it, because the health and welfare of the children of this country are the concern of everyone whether they sit in this parliament or in any junior parliament. It is about time that we put teeth into some of our laws. We hesitate to put into the batteries of our cars water that is not pure, and yet we allow our young children from coast to coast who go to these little red school houses to drink polluted or contaminated water. These municipalities need increased assistance for education and highways. I am going to suggest for consideration that when they get around to this dominion-provincial conference the municipalities be allowed the three cents per gallon gasoline tax which is now imposed and which was an extra imposition during the war. Later this government relieved us of that particular three cents. Other governments then took it upon themselves to collect it.

I have no hesitation in saying right now that I think that in order to save the municipalities from the plight they are facing they should be given some measure of revenue, and this three cents per gallon could be collected in the municipalities and would be a big factor in their being able to provide better services to the people.

The amusement tax may not mean a great deal in revenue, but I submit it should be collected by the municipalities and thus provide another means of increasing the revenues which they so badly need.

For the few minutes left at my disposal I am going to refer to a matter and I have no apology to make for doing so. During the discussion of the estimates a year ago I referred to the sale by Canadian National Railways of some property in Point Edward, which is just next door to Sarnia. It is just off the bridge crossing to Port Huron.

At that time I was wondering what had happened to some 30-odd acres lying on the shores of the river St. Clair which is part of the St. Lawrence seaway scheme. These 30-odd acres would have made an excellent industrial site and no government or government agency should have disposed of them because they were located on the banks of the seaway. No one knew better than the Canadian National Railways and the Department of Transport the full details of the seaway development. We were all assured that this was in the offing, and yet we find that these 30-odd acres were sold for $10,500, about half the price of good farm land in western Ontario.

As I say, this was a choice industrial site, or even a residential site. Let me say for the record that good industrial sites are being purchased in that area by the chemical industries at prices up to $2,000 or more an acre. Yet we find the Canadian National Railways which owned this particular property selling it for the small sum of $10,500.

I can understand the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) not answering my question but in fact it gave me free-wheeling to discuss it. I understand that part of this property has been sold for residential purposes at somewhere around $45,000 and no doubt the remainder will be sold for the same amount. This sale was made within months of the purchase.

There may be some significance in the fact that the purchaser, who happened to have been the Liberal defeated candidate in the last election, purchased this property just after the 1949 election.

Another piece of property comprising about 14 acres was sold for $8,000-odd. This adjoined the other property I just mentioned. Within months of its being purchased from the Canadian National Railways part of it was sold for $45,000.

It is about time that somebody in this house had the courage and conviction to say to the C.N.R. officials that somebody in Canada is entitled to think for himself. Apparently they want to save us the painful chore of thinking for ourselves. In view of what I have told the house tonight I am saying that we have in that system $2,000 or $3,000 men who are drawing $10,000, $15,000 or more a year. Surely anyone who would make such a silly, asinine decision is not competent to hold a $10,000 or $15,000 job.

The matter of weeding out inefficiency is just as indispensable in our system as is the rewarding of the energetic and efficient. We must never lose sight of the fact that our so-called profit system is a profit and loss system. I think it is about time that the officials in the Canadian National Railways woke up and found that out.

In this chemical valley of Canada we find the Canadian National Telegraphs office located in an old passenger railway car down on the waterfront, a location which certainly is not a credit to the Canadian National Railways. They need not wonder why they are not getting their share of the business; neither is it fair to the employees.

The staff of the Canadian National express are housed in another old passenger car up by the railway sheds. If you call that efficiency and sound business I must say that I disagree with you.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house for more than a few minutes before this subamendment is voted on. The subamendment as moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) reads:

> We further regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary fundamental economic and financial measures to place Canadian producers and workers on a sound and prosperous basis, and to ensure our economy against recurring recessions.

To me that is only an anaemic mockery of the amendment moved by the official opposition. It does not appear to me to be an amendment at all. It is only a watered-down reiteration of the amendment which it is supposed to amend.

If members of the Social Credit party are so serious in their admiration of our amendment that they want to try to copy it, then rather than trying to amend it I think they should support it.

I may say that we in the official opposition have no intention of supporting it. There is nothing new in the subamendment and there is no reason that I can see why this party should support it. I am not going to enlarge on our reasons. We have no confidence in that party. I do not think they will ever have a chance to put such a motion into effect.

I have no confidence in the subamendment. It simply mimics the amendment we have moved and therefore I intend to vote against it. I hope my party will vote against it.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harris: May I ask the hon. member if it would be possible for him to make his views known at this time so that we could have a vote on the one subamendment.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

[Mr. Murphy (Lambton West).]

Mr. MacInnis: I cannot very well accommodate the leader of the house unless I have unanimous support, which apparently I have not.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I shall not detain the house for more than a few minutes. I want to do something similar to that done by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) when he spoke a moment ago. I want to state our position in regard to the amendment to the amendment moved by the Social Credit member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) yesterday. The amendment reads:

> We further regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary fundamental economic and financial measures to place Canadian producers and workers on a sound and prosperous basis, and to ensure our economy against recurring recessions.

We are able to vote for that subamendment, Mr. Speaker, because it is the kind of subamendment we have been moving on such occasions as this in this house for the last, I do not know how many years. As a matter of fact, it is the kind of subamendment we moved to this address which was voted upon the other day. When I heard that the genial member for New Westminster was going to move the amendment for the Social Credit party, I knew it would be an innocent, reasonable amendment for which any reasonable person could vote, that is any reasonable person who wanted to see the government do something to keep the economy going. If the amendment had been moved by my stern friend the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) or by the very knowledgeable member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), I am sure it would have been quite a different amendment. Perhaps we would not have been able to vote for it. As I said, the amendment is quite a reasonable one which regrets that the government has not done certain things.

The only way in which we differ from both the members on my left and the members on my right is that they insist the government should do things but they are always unwilling to give the government the necessary means of control to do those things. If you ask the hired man to do something, you have to give him the tools to do the job. You cannot complain about controls or that the government interferes and at the same time expect the government to promote business. At least, you cannot logically do that, but I have long ago given up expecting logic of the members either to my right or to my left. For that reason, we are going to vote for the subamendment. We are not playing politics. It is something we do because we want to do it.

I should like to refer to one other matter. When the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) was speaking in this house on Tuesday night, he said, as reported at page 756 of Hansard for February 1, 1955:

> I have never doubted the integrity of purpose of hon. members, not even my hon. friends to my left.

Well, you know that sort of patronizing attitude gets my goat. Even the members to his left! Surely, the hon. gentleman does not think he is better than we are. Supposing I say I have never doubted the integrity of hon. members, even of the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe)? We are members who, I think, are just as highly respected in our several communities as any other hon. member either on this side or on that side of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: When my friend has to find fault with us, I imagine there is a great deal in our program and in our policies that could be legitimately criticized by people who do not agree with it. Nevertheless, I want to tell members in this house that there are very few men, women and children in this dominion who are not better off today because there is a C.C.F. party.

Let me read to you from an editorial that appeared in one of the Vancouver newspapers some time ago concerning this party. It says:

> Canada needs a strong party of the left, a party of protest, a party which advocates policies entirely opposed to those of the existing government. The Co-operative Commonwealth Federation is that party and it is doing a good job . . .

This newspaper is the Vancouver Sun.

> This newspaper does not believe in the socialist theories of the C.C.F., but it believes in letting the people judge these theories for themselves.

Then the editorial finishes in this way:

> It has been the C.C.F. in British Columbia and in Canada, fighting day in and day out for the poor people, that has compelled the government to progress, to adopt reforms which otherwise would not have been adopted . . . the C.C.F. remains the only sure voice of social protest in the country.

Mr. Gagnon: Huh.

Mr. MacInnis: You can "huh" as much as you like, but you cannot "huh" that off.

Mr. Dufresne: Who wrote that?

Mr. MacInnis: The Vancouver Sun, a Liberal paper. I have no doubt I could get an equally good editorial from a Conservative paper. As a matter of fact, when election day comes around there is no political party in this house that has anything to offer that has any appeal to the mass of the people except some of the things that the C.C.F. has popularized.

Mr. Dufresne: You haven't a monopoly.

Mr. MacInnis: All right, so we have not a monopoly. It is there for you to have if you want it. We would not want a monopoly if that were possible. We do not care who brings these things about, as long as things are done for the people of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I could say much more along the same line, but I just wish to say again—

Mr. Dufresne: Again?

Mr. MacInnis: Does my friend want me to continue? He can easily say so, if that is what he wishes. When anyone is enjoying what I am saying I can go on for hours.

I say again that we are voting for this amendment because we feel that it justifiably criticizes the government for not doing the things that it should do to take care of the people in the country who are unable to take care of themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Hansell: No, we are not ready for the question. I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Hansell the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, should it happen that this debate is concluded tomorrow, and we all hope it will be very shortly after we resume at 2.30, we shall then take second reading of Bill No. 3, with respect to the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements, followed by second reading of Bill No. 4, to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 4, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

PAKISTAN TO BECOME INDEPENDENT REPUBLIC WITHIN COMMONWEALTH

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to inform the house of a declaration issued from the prime ministers' conference at two p.m. eastern standard time today, as follows:

The government of Pakistan have informed the other governments of the commonwealth of the intention of the Pakistan people that, under the new constitution which is about to be adopted, Pakistan shall become a sovereign, independent republic. The government of Pakistan have, however, declared and affirmed Pakistan's desire to continue her full membership of the commonwealth of nations and her acceptance of the Queen as the symbol of the free association of its independent member nations, and as such the head of the commonwealth. The governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Ceylon, the basis of whose membership is not hereby changed, accept and recognize Pakistan's continuing membership in accordance with the terms of this declaration. The government of India, the basis of whose membership is also unaltered, similarly recognize Pakistan's continuing membership.

In notifying the other prime ministers of Pakistan's intention, Mr. Mohammed Ali reaffirmed his country's steadfast adherence to the commonwealth. The other prime ministers, in accepting this proposal, welcomed Pakistan's continued association and co-operation as a member of the commonwealth and assured Mr. Mohammed Ali that the friendship and good will of their countries towards Pakistan would remain unaffected by this constitutional change.

Accordingly, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon hereby declare, as they did in 1949 when a similar decision was taken in respect of India, that they remain united as free and equal members of the commonwealth of nations, freely co-operating in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, all hon. members and all Canadians will rejoice in this new demonstration of the traditional capacity of the commonwealth to strengthen its unity of purpose while adapting its organization and procedures to changed circumstances. Everyone will rejoice in the fact that, notwithstanding the exercise by the people of Pakistan of their right to determine the form of their domestic government, it has been found possible to have Pakistan remain a member of the commonwealth and to continue for the peace of the world the association of those nations whose traditions give them the same concept of a proper way of living and of democratic processes designed to further the welfare of the men and women of their respective nations.

Mr. Weir moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the following members, namely: Messrs. Ashbourne, Bertrand, Blair, Boivin, Bonnier, Boucher (Restigouche-Madawaska), Brown (Brantford), Bryson, Campbell, Cardiff, Charlton, Dechene, Dickey, Fairclough, Mrs., Fairey, Fontaine, Gingras, Girard, Gour (Russell), Habel, Hansell, Healy, Hodgson, Houck, Howe (Wellington-Huron), Huffman, James, Johnson (Kindersley), Kickham, Langlois (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere), Lefrançois, MacEachen, Maltais, Mang, McGregor, McIvor, McWilliam, Patterson, Pommer, Regier, Robinson (Bruce), Rochefort, Schneider, Simmons, Small, Smith, Stanton, Stick, Thibault, Tustin, Valois, Weaver, Wylie and Zaplitny, will act as members on the part of this house on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house has appointed Messrs. Applewhaite, Bertrand, Bourque, Brown (Essex West), Carrick, Castleden, Coldwell, Dechene, Dinsdale, Fraser (Peterborough), Fraser (St. John's East), Gingues, Gourd (Chapleau), Habel, Hamilton (York West), Hansell, Hellyer, Henderson, Howe (Wellington-Huron), Hunter, Jones, Jutras, Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare), Knight, LaCroix, Leboe, Leduc (Gatineau), McCulloch (Pictou), McGregor, McWilliam, Philpott, Pickersgill, Pouliot, Ratelle, Reinke, Robinson (Bruce), Shaw, Small, Smith, Thibault, Tucker, Tustin, Weselak and White (Middlesex East), a committee to assist His Honour the Motion agreed to.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR FAIR ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to amend the Canada Grain Act (distribution of box cars).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE ALLOWANCES AND PERMISSIBLE INCOME, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act to increase the allowances and the permissible income; to further extend the benefits of the act; and also to provide for the salaries of the board.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REFERENCE TO POSSIBLE STRIKE BY C.B.C. EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue what the government or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation propose to do about the threatened strike of technicians employed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which seems likely to occur.

[Mr. Weir.]

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say offhand just how the corporation proposes to meet this situation but they have made plans to carry on on a temporary and part-time basis should a strike occur. I was speaking to the officials of the corporation just a short while ago and I can say to the house and to the public that they are prepared to carry on further negotiations with the employees if such request is made on behalf of the employees.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister in a position to indicate to what extent the corporation thinks it can carry on operations should a strike occur?

Mr. McCann: No, I am not in a position to answer that. I can say that the majority report of the board of conciliation is such that the C.B.C. is prepared to accept it and act accordingly.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED REPLACEMENT OF MANAGEMENT PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he will comment on a report in today's Winnipeg Free Press, a copy of which I sent to him, which makes reference to statements made in Winnipeg last night by Mr. F. H. Keefe, general manager of Canadian National western lines. He is reported to have said, "We have been told that this year we must reduce our annual—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. gentleman feel that he must quote the statement of the gentleman in question in order to ask his question? Our rules do not allow that.

Mr. Knowles: I recognize that, but I feel that the statement, which is brief, is important to asking the question.

An hon. Member: Against the rules.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Keep to the rules.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has sent a copy of the statement to the minister does he not think that that is sufficient?

Mr. Knowles: If the minister will read the copy of the statement I will be satisfied not to do so. Will he comment on the statement, a copy of which I sent him, and indicate who are included in the management who will be replaced, as is announced in the statement?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me notice that he proposed to ask a question based on this news report which is said to be appearing in today's issue of the Winnipeg Free Press. I received this advice only shortly before I came into the house. The news item includes what purports to be a quotation from an address by Mr. F. H. Keefe, general manager of the Canadian National western region to Beaver lodge, local 691, brotherhood of railroad trainmen, and I am asked to comment on what is reported to have been said by Mr. Keefe on that occasion.

I am sure that the house and the hon. member will appreciate that I could not expect to be supplied with up-to-date information as to what may or may not be said by officers of the railway when fulfilling engagements to speak to audiences who have seen fit to invite them. In the circumstances it is necessary for me to refer the hon. member's remarks to the management so that they may make whatever inquiries are appropriate. I shall be glad to consider when those inquiries have been made whether I should make any further comment on this statement alleged to have been made by Mr. Keefe.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question. When the minister is seeking information from the management will he ascertain whether this report is correct and just what members of—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: Will the management carry out further lay-offs in order to prevent themselves from being replaced?

Mr. Marler: I shall make the appropriate inquiries in order to give my hon. friend the appropriate answer.

NATIONAL REVENUE

LOCATION OF INCOME TAX OFFICES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if the Department of National Revenue has decided to open new income tax offices in the interior of British Columbia. If so, in what towns will the said offices be located and when will they be opened for service?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. In reply to the first part, it will not be new offices, but the answer is yes, one office. As to the town in which said office will be located, that has not yet been decided as we want to give the public the best possible services in the best possible location.

GRAIN

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, notice of which I have sent him. In view of newspaper reports that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) was requesting that the reduction in freight rate assistance on feed grain being shipped to British Columbia be carried out on a graduated basis, and in view of previous representations made by the member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) with respect to this same question, would the minister state whether or not he is contemplating revising his previous statement regarding this matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me a copy of his question. I think of necessity my reply will have to be somewhat along the line of the reply given a few moments ago. I have not been in the habit of communicating with the Minister of Fisheries or any other minister of the government through the press. I have not seen the report and do not know if it reports the minister correctly. I have been in communication with the minister by telephone and wire and no change has taken place in the decision reached as a result. If any such changes are made I shall announce them to the house in due course.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GAGETOWN CAMP—SETTLEMENT OF PROPERTY CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister aware that a considerable number of former owners of property in the Gagetown camp area have not agreed to settlement of their claims and consequently have not received payment for property taken over by the department, nor have arbitration proceedings or legal action been started? In consideration of the serious financial position in which these people are placed as a result, will the department arrange for part payment of these claims pending future settlement?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I find that out of 1,630 claims involved in the Gagetown expropriation, over 92 per cent have been settled amicably, and without resort to litigation—which I think constitutes a very excellent record on the part of the departmental officers.

Of the claims where settlement is still uncompleted, some are delayed because the owners or heirs cannot be found, or because the owners or heirs of estates cannot agree as to their own idea of price, or for various other technical reasons.

I might say that expropriation proceedings are about to be initiated in a few cases. Cash advances have been made on a number of occasions to persons whose property has not yet been settled for, where need has been demonstrated, I was of the view that all such cases had been taken care of, but if the hon. member knows of any persons who are suffering hardship among the few that are left, and will give me their names, I shall be pleased to have such cases looked into.

NATURAL GAS

SIGNING OF CONTRACTS BETWEEN PRODUCERS AND PIPE-LINE COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister explain why no natural gas purchase contracts have yet been signed between western Canadian gas producers and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited? Is this government prepared to take action to remove the reasons for unwillingness of producers to sign contracts with the pipe-line company?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend evidently has much more information about the subject than I have. He evidently is in close touch with the people for whom he is asking the question and I suggest he seek information there.

Mr. Nickle: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Could the minister explain why eastern Canadian utilities have been and are hesitant to sign gas purchase contracts with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, and why to date only one contract—amounting to only about 15 per cent of the hoped for eastern market—has been signed?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member for Calgary South if, by his question, he is now seeking information?

Mr. Nickle: I am.

Mr. Speaker: In it he is giving a great deal of information.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If it is information, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nickle: If there is no answer, I would like to ask a further supplementary question—and this, I think, is one which the minister could see fit to answer. Is the minister aware that capture by western Canadian gas of a part of the Minneapolis region market in the United States mid-west is in jeopardy because Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is unable at the current federal power commission hearings to show proof of gas purchase contracts, or security of supply and price for American consumers, or to provide complete assurance that its project can be financed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Of course when these questions are being asked, the rules do not provide notice be sent to me. I am not aware of what the questions contain until I hear them.

The hon. member has asked the minister to explain three sets of situations, and he has outlined the situations he wants to have explained. That is not my conception of questions being asked for the purpose of seeking information. The hon. member, by way of supplementary questions, cannot and should not, in my view, question the minister further by supplying a whole list of information on which he wants to have an explanation.

There is a committee of supply in which various departmental policies and administrative measures are discussed, and where questions of the kind the hon. member has in mind can be asked. I feel there are a good many questions which could wait until the committee of supply is established. When the various departments are called there is an opportunity for discussion on the first item, at which time the minister can be asked what is to be done with respect to certain legislative measures. I imagine the hon. member might wait until the committee of supply to have these questions dealt with.

[Later:]

Mr. Nickle: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister now or will he be shortly in a position to give an explanation or at least a statement to this house concerning the critical matter with respect to natural gas pipe lines to which I have made previous allusion?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to do so at the moment. Whether I will be in the future, I cannot say. But if I make a statement in the future, he will know that I am then ready.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

REPORT ON STUDY OF RATES ON IMPORTS OF ETHYLENE GLYCOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Is it the intention of the minister to report to the house on the study of tariff rates by the tariff board on imports of ethylene glycol, requested by the former minister of finance last year. If so, when may the house expect such a report?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I have not received the report myself, but I shall make inquiries and advise my hon. friend.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON APPLICATION OF ACT IN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. In reply to a question on Tuesday last with regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the minister stated the act applied to all parts of Manitoba. Would he now state if that is the correct situation and, if not, what parts of Manitoba are not included under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The answer I gave a few days ago to the question was as follows:

> But the Prairie Farm Assistance Act applies all over the settled portion of the province of Manitoba, and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act does not.

Now, it would be difficult for me to go over the province of Manitoba and give the sections of land upon which people may be settled and to which it does not apply. I would refer the hon. member to the act—particularly to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act section 2 (1) (k) and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act section 3 (3) (c), and to an amendment brought in in 1952-53, which is section 1 (1) (7). And by reading those and the remainder of the act, it will be apparent to him what parts are covered.

Mr. Bryce: May I ask a supplementary question. Is there any possibility of amendments being brought in at this session to take care of cultivated land that is not being taken care of under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Mr. Gardiner: All cultivated land, except that which was settled on and which had previously been provincial land prior to December 31, 1940, is covered in Manitoba. But as to just where those lands are, it is difficult for me to say in answer to this question.

[Later:]

REQUEST THAT PAYMENTS UNDER ACT BE DOUBLED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister or the government received a request from the interprovincial farm union council asking that the government double the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for 1954 as an emergency measure? If so, would the minister like to comment on this request at this time?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am not sure whether I received such a request from the organization spoken of, but I have received such requests from different organizations. I am not in a position to comment further than that at the moment.

NATIONAL GALLERY

FUTURE PURCHASES OF WORKS OF ART

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, which he may now take as notice. Is the minister in a position to give the house information with respect to whether or not the national gallery intends to make larger purchases than usual of works of art during the coming year?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think I would prefer to take the hon. member's question as notice.

Mr. Speaker: This is one question directly on the point I mentioned a moment ago, when I pointed out that in committee of supply questions may be asked with respect to what a department intends to do. Certainly there is no urgency in the hon. member's question. When the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is called in supply he will probably use whatever information he may now get to ask supplementary questions at that time. I think we should exercise a certain amount of patience and wait until departments are before the committee of supply to ask these questions.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING FUTURE PURCHASES OF URANIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether Mr. W. J. Bennett, president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, was stating government policy in his speech in Toronto a week ago concerning future purchases of uranium?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): There again, I am not exactly sure what Mr. W. J. Bennett said. I shall be glad to look it up.

Mr. Fleming: It has been in all the newspapers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I know; but I do not read the papers too carefully.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I regretted a little bit having to adjourn the debate last night for I recognized that it was the desire of some in the house to take the various motions, to dispose of them and to adopt the motion for an address to His Excellency in reply to his speech at the opening of the session. However, the remarks made by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) with respect to our amendment and also with respect to our party, I must say, provoked me a little bit and I do not believe they should be allowed to stand without being answered.

Our amendment was designed not for any political purpose. It was designed because we felt—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid that the hon. member may not now refer to the amendment that was disposed of yesterday. That amendment has been disposed of. He must now cover some other ground.

Mr. Hansell: I recognize the fact, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot debate that amendment. I was only referring to it in the light of the present amendment that we are now debating. I will not refer to it in any way. I will say, however, that the present amendment that we are debating could not possibly be put into effect without adjusting our monetary policy in this country. What the hon. member said is another thing.

The hon. member is extremely capable in the matter of throwing around a great deal of loose language and a great many loose sentences. While I have not been in this house as long as he has, it is true, nevertheless I have nearly 20 years behind me; and I have watched my hon. friend perform in this house. I decided a long time ago that he is too mouthy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member should be an excellent judge.

Mr. Hansell: May I say this, Mr. Speaker. Last night was not the first time he has held this group up to ridicule.

Mr. Fulton: And it will not be the last time either.

Mr. Hansell: It is also not the first time he has attempted to ridicule me. There comes a time when our patience becomes a little bit exhausted.

I want to deal with his amendment, Mr. Speaker; but I want to deal with his party since he is so proud of it and since he has no confidence in ours. I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman was in my constituency not so long ago and I think the people of that constituency welcomed him. I think they gave him a hearing. I did not go to his meeting because I did not think he would do me any harm. As a matter of fact, I think he did me some good. Whether it was a result of his visit or not, when the ballots throughout the constituency were counted, it was found that I had one of the largest majorities I ever had. In fact, all my opponents lost their deposits. I should like to think that he is responsible for that outcome.

However, after his meeting, I walked downtown. By the way, may I say that he did not hold that meeting in my town but in my constituency. When these Conservatives go out and hold meetings in Alberta, they have to bring in every Conservative for hundreds of miles around in order to get an audience; so, of course, some from my town went over to his meeting, a distance of 40 to 50 miles, to listen to what he had to say. I met a couple downtown the next day and this lady said to me, "You know, the other day we went over to High River to listen to that cabinet minister". I lifted my eyebrows and I said, "Cabinet minister? I did not know there was any cabinet minister there". She said, "Why, yes, he was—er—" and she began to hum and haw and poked her husband. Then I recalled, of course, that it was the Right Hon. Mr. Rowe.

An hon. Member: Right Honourable? You are wrong.

Mr. Hansell: I was wrong. I am told it is the wrong honourable Mr. Rowe.

Mr. Knowles: Not left, anyway.

Mr. Hansell: In any event I said to her, "What did this gentleman tell you?" "Oh", she said, "he told us a lot of things". I said, "I do not want to know how much he told you; I should like to know what he told you". She said, "He told us"—then she turned to her husband and she said, "What did he tell us?" Her husband said, "Oh, shucks, don't ask me". Anyway, I told them this; I will tell my hon. friend what I told them. I said, "I know Mr. Rowe. He is a very fine gentleman and all that. But as far as his work in the House of Commons is concerned, I am going to tell you something. Most of us think he is the biggest windbag in the House of Commons".

An hon. Member: Next to you.

Mr. Lennard: You are quite a windbag yourself.

Mr. Hansell: I think we will all agree that my hon. friend has one virtue. He is rather quick on the draw.

Mr. Fulton: If he has one virtue, then he has one more than you.

Mr. Hansell: In order to make his speeches interesting at all, he must get a rise out of somebody. Then he is quick on the draw. But he uses a sort of blunderbuss. When he is quick on the draw and pulls the trigger, there is a great big boom. Then when the air is all cleared and you try to find what he has hit, there is nothing there. There may be a pinfeather but you find he has not even hit the moon.

Mr. Harkness: When you pull the trigger there is just a click.

Mr. Hansell: He does a lot of talking without saying anything. I am going to give our Conservative friends some advice in a little while, and I am going to give it to them because I know they will not take it.

An hon. Member: Why don't you sing a song?

Mr. Hansell: Take my hon. friend's speech the other day when he lambasted the government on their trade and tariff policies. It was free trade this and tariffs that and free trade that and tariffs this. Let me tell my hon. friends they can go through the country and talk about free trade and tariffs all they like and I do not believe the people of Canada are interested in it, not that much. There may be the odd businessman who is. So far as tariffs and free trade are concerned I know that over the years the position has been reached that when the Liberals are in power they are free traders and they boost the tariff and when the Conservatives are in power they are high tariff men and they take it down a little bit. The fluctuation of tariffs over the past number of years has not amounted to very much.

My hon. friend is a responsible gentleman in the Conservative party but I am going to say that he is behind the times. He is living in the past. He had better cast aside his knickerbockers and begin to wear something that is fitting to a new age. That goes for the entire party. I think they can learn a little bit from some of the rest of us even if we may not have had the experience that their acting leader has had. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) came to my constituency a few years ago. He is a fine and honourable gentleman and I have nothing against him. But he tried to put on a resounding campaign. He came there and talked about North Star engines and how the government had missed the boat with respect to these engines. I followed the hon. gentleman a few nights later in the campaign. May I say here that I can generally get a fair audience when I go around the country. I do not have to hire cars and get all my friends from a hundred miles around to come and hear me.

I had my audience and I said to them: "I understand the leader of the Conservative party has been here talking about North Star engines. I would like to know how many of you people are interested in North Star engines. Let me see your hands raised." I looked around and there was nary a hand. I said: "I would like to know how many of you people are anxious to get enough money to be able to buy a ticket to ride on a North Star airplane". Of course all their hands went up. Let me tell my hon. friends that they had better get pretty close to the people when they go out and want to flirt for their support.

An hon. Member: We do not flirt with them. We leave that to you.

Mr. Hansell: I know my Conservative friends are not going to take my advice, and that is why I am giving it to them. Let me tell my hon. friends that unless they go across this country and present an alternative to what the people have today they will never get halfway to first base. The only thing they seem able to do—and I am not now speaking for the Liberal party—is to lambaste the government, kick them all over the lot and never say how they would solve the same problems—never, never, never. There is one thing about Social Crediters. When we go throughout the country, we take the odd crack at the government too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Hansell: Oh, yes—and when we do we offer a solution. My friends may say the solution is all cockeyed. I am not concerned with what my friends say. I am concerned with what the people say and what they think. I say that when any party goes out and complains about the present administration they had better be ready to present an alternative. I have followed the work of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) who has, in the Conservative party, a position similar to that which I have in ours. I have followed his work with a good deal of interest. It pays me to do so, and I read the newspapers. This boy can go throughout the country and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, you can read every one of his speeches and they are all destructive so far as present government policy is concerned, but I have yet to find one instance where he has ever presented some idea as to how his party is going to deal with the same problems. Now, what did the Acting Leader of the Opposition say the other night?

Mr. Low: Nothing.

Mr. Hansell: I know I cannot discuss our amendment, Mr. Speaker. I know you will not let me.

Mr. Byrne: Move another one.

Mr. Hansell: In referring to our amendment, the hon. member used the words, "anaemic mockery". I do not know what to think of those words. I am not going to use such words with respect to the amendment of his party. I believe there are some things in the amendment that are good, and we are not going to play politics with it. We are going to be big enough to cast politics aside. I will tell you what we are going to do. We are going to vote for his amendment with the knowledge that what it envisages could not be accomplished without putting into operation the various monetary proposals that we have placed before the house in years gone by.

An hon. Member: Twenty dollars a month for everybody.

Mr. Hansell: Let us examine what the amendment says. It reads:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary measures: (a) to retain and expand Canada's markets abroad for our production, particularly of wheat and other products;

We can agree with that. But let me ask my hon. friend how he is going to expand markets for our surplus grain and other surplus products? Never does he say. Throughout the last election campaign the Conservatives talked about the failure to find markets. I want to say right now that if in this complex world we were to adopt the monetary policies of the present government we would find it just as hard to get foreign markets as they are finding it. But my hon. friends go out and say, yes, we have got to have foreign markets. How are they going to get foreign markets? Let them tell us what program they would pursue in order to get foreign markets. It is all right to do a little clowning and call the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) a travelling salesman.

Mr. McIvor: He is a good one.

Mr. Hansell: But if you are going out to get foreign markets you may have to travel a little bit and you may have to sell Canada to some other nation. I do not mean sell it down the river, but you may have to create confidence in Canada. But let my hon. friends tell us what programs they have to recapture any markets that we may have lost.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They are all silent over there now.

Mr. Fulton: We have told you often but you could not understand it anyway.

Mr. Hansell: I have not heard it.

Mr. Fulton: Their heads are up in the Social Credit clouds. They just could not understand it.

Mr. Hansell: What is the next part of the amendment? It reads:

> (b) to solve the urgent problem of unemployment;

Let me ask my hon. friends how they would solve the unemployment problem?

Mr. Fulton: We have told you that, too, but you have not bothered to read it.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend says they have told us. They must have told us in such startling language that it did not make any impression.

Mr. Fulton: Your head was just up in the Social Credit clouds, and you could not understand it.

Mr. Hansell: What is next?

(c) to relieve Canadian taxpayers from the burden of excessive taxation—

The hon. member for Kamloops had better wait a little while. I have something good to say about him.

Mr. Fulton: I hope I can change your mind about that.

Mr. Hansell: I do not want him to disarm me. The paragraph continues:

—and thereby enable Canadian producers to lower their cost of production and to meet increasing competition;

We agree with that. Let me ask my friends again, how are they going to meet the necessary expenditures in this country and reduce taxation? The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) reminds me that in a previous election campaign the Conservatives said they would make a reduction in taxation of $500 million. I remember the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) standing here and saying, "Now, I should like to know how we can do it, because we would be glad to do it if you can tell us how." He said that we could slice this off, and that would save so many millions. We could slice this off—he did not think it would be good, but we could—and it would save so many millions. However, he did not get very far. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was left out on a limb. He could not answer how taxation could be slashed to that extent and yet meet the expenditures required to run this country.

The next paragraph reads:

(d) to eliminate waste and extravagance in government and improve its efficiency;

I think there is some waste. We would agree with that. We can vote for that. But let me ask again, Mr. Speaker, how would that be done? When the Leader of the Opposition insisted a few years ago on going into the expenditures in the public accounts committee, he chewed over his tongue and kept chewing it, and no matter how he probed into these public accounts he could not come up with very much of a suggestion as to where to cut expenditures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: Believe me, if he could have, he would have blasted it from one end of this country to the other. I am not saying that there are no wasteful expenditures. I am not an accountant. I am not too much concerned about that. I leave that for somebody else.

The next paragraph reads:

(e) to facilitate and encourage the processing of our natural resources in Canada, and thereby increase opportunities and employment for Canadians;

Well, it sounds good. We are for it. But once again, let my hon. friends devise a program and state right on the dotted line exactly how they would accomplish this. That is the thing we want to know.

The last clause reads:

(f) in co-operation with the provinces to develop an effective contributory plan which will assure that every Canadian will have adequate hospital and medical services.

I am not going to deal with that. We believe there should be some plan whereby everyone could get medical services. We believe we have a good one in Alberta. However, that does not matter for the moment. We could vote for that amendment, but when we do so we do so with firm knowledge that you could not put those things into operation without an adjustment of monetary policy.

What else did my hon. friend say? He said he had no confidence in this party. In the first place, I am glad he does not have any confidence in this party. Then, he said that he did not believe we would ever have a chance of putting our motion into effect. I am just going to deal with that for a little while. In dealing with this, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am not saying these things about every individual in that party. This is what I was going to say about the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), who interrupted. I believe there are some very fine men in the Conservative party—and women, excuse me. I have the greatest admiration for the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and for the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: I had the hon. member for Kamloops mentioned in my notes, but perhaps I had better scratch that off.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear; please do.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know that I have too much confidence, but I have a high regard for some of their men, particularly some of these young men who have a bright political future and an opportunity such as perhaps very few men have. Might I say, however, that as a party they are more dead than the ancient mummies of Egypt.

Mr. Nowlan: At least we survived and that is more than you did.

Mr. Hansell: If these young, aspiring members are sincere, they will not tag along with these stand-patters, such as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe).

Now, what is happening to their party? I will give them advice, and I am giving my Liberal friends some advice too. I know that it takes effective leadership to lead a party. I recognize that well enough. I have seen leaders come and go. I was here when the late R. B. Bennett was here, and I had a very high regard for him. It might be of interest for you to know that I applied for a position as office boy in Mr. Bennett's law firm many years ago. I am ashamed that I did not get the job.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Bennett was too smart for that.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) should be quiet. I want to have something nice to say about him. I do not want him to cross me up. I have seen these leaders come and go. I was here in Mr. Bennett's time and I had a high regard for him, partly because he was from my own city. He was a very clever man when he was here leading the opposition. Mr. Bennett resigned, and Dr. Manion came on the scene. I was here when he was here. He was trying to lead a party that was struggling to get recognition and come back into power. Well, Dr. Manion was defeated, as we know, in the next election and then the Hon. Mr. Hanson took over as house leader. He did his best, but what did he have to work with?

Then, Mr. Hanson was replaced by our very good friend the late Mr. Graydon. He did his best. He was house leader for a while. While these men were house leaders, do you know what the party was doing? They were scouting all over the universe to find a leader. At last, they went to Winnipeg and thought they had found one. They called upon Mr. Bracken. Now, Mr. Bracken was a very fine gentleman. He did his best. He was a successful businessman—I say businessman because he was a successful administrator. Let me say this. It is all very well to talk about leadership, but when you place a man in the position of leadership, for goodness' sake give him something to lead. That is exactly what these men have not had.

Then, of course, they had a talk with Mr. Drew and they asked him to take the leadership. He took the leadership but he did not have anything to lead. He could present no alternative. Now, what are they talking about? They are talking about lack of confidence in Mr. Drew. Let me say this. Mr. Drew is just as good a leader as any of them, but he has nothing to lead. I say this in all sincerity. When a man is put in as leader of the official opposition in that way he has two strikes against him to start with.

Let me say this to my Liberal friends. There are some provinces in this country where they will never come back into power again. They look around for a leader. We will take this man whose name might be Mr. Laing. Mr. Laing sat opposite us in the house. He is a very fine gentleman; I have nothing against him; but when you put him in a position where he has two strikes against him and he does not make good you complain. Here is another gentleman, Mr. Tucker. He is a fine gentleman; I have nothing against him. They tried to revive the old party in Saskatchewan and they called upon him. He is as good as anyone else for a leader with two strikes against him. He had nothing to lead, and so—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member. What strikes me at this moment—this may be the third strike—is that we are now discussing the history of political parties not only in this house but also in the various provinces. Certain gentlemen are involved, of course. Those who are not present might find some members who will come to their support in order to comment upon the remarks of the hon. gentleman. In the speech from the throne debate, especially after the national affairs of this country have been debated for so many days, we ought to find yet enough material concerning national affairs, the ones that come under our jurisdiction as a federal parliament, to debate. We should not at this moment start another debate of a few days perhaps with respect to the leadership contests that have taken place and an analysis of the various parties with respect to the success that they might have had at an election time or the number of strikes that they have against them or in their favour.

The hon. member of course is taking advantage of the fact that he is entitled to make a speech on everything in the debate on the speech from the throne; but I would point out that it must relate to the affairs which are under our jurisdiction. Of course he may say this parliament cannot exist unless we have the party system and that we should discuss party politics and so on. I would not find too much fault with that except I am worried about the consequences. I would ask him to put himself in my place if, after his speech is concluded, I have to listen to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) giving his own account of his own interpretation of leadership and party success in Saskatchewan.

Someone from British Columbia may come to the support of Mr. Laing, who is the leader in British Columbia, and we may hear from the Conservative party with respect to the administration of their own internal affairs. I think we must make a distinction between the internal affairs of parties that are represented in this house or in the provinces and the national affairs which come under our jurisdiction and with which we as a parliament are called upon to deal. I would like the hon. gentleman to take into consideration what I have said.

Mr. Hansell: I will do that.

Mr. Harkness: Bat out a few more of those foul balls.

Mr. Hansell: I have no particular desire to go off at a tangent, but I would point out that the only reason the hon. member gave last night for his attitude was that we were presenting an amendment that we would never have the opportunity to put into practice. I will admit that I may have traversed a good deal over political ground, but I would point out that the Conservatives of this country are bidding for power to run the affairs of this nation, and that is a very important thing. They are going out and telling the people of this country that we are a lot of crackpots and do not know what we are talking about. They are also telling the people of this country what a terrible failure the Liberals are, without presenting an alternative.

I have not much time left. The hon. gentleman said that we would never get into power; we would never be able to put into practice the things we desire, the monetary reforms we desire. Let me tell my hon. friend that it is the Conservative party of this country that is on the skids. No other party is slipping so fast. I will say this in concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, if you wish. I do not know when the Liberal party will be displaced. It may not be in my lifetime, it might be in the next election; but I am going to tell my Conservative friends right now that when the Liberal party is displaced it will be the Social Crediters who will displace them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friends may laugh.

Mr. Rowe: That does not make it so.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friends may laugh but I am telling them that because it is a fact which nobody can deny. The Social Credit party is the only party in this country that is in the ascendancy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: How many candidates did you run in the by-elections?

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friends can say "oh, oh". It is just like whistling when you are going through the graveyard, their own political graveyard; that is what it is. We Social Crediters go out and we present an alternative.

I do not like to get back on this matter of leadership, but since some of them think they might be reviving themselves by changing leadership, let me say that there is no greater place where a man can be destroyed than to put him in as leader of the Conservative party. Let me tell the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), whose name has been prominently mentioned, as I tell it to all those young Conservatives over there, that if he ever toys with the leadership of that party, if he ever accepts the leadership of that party, he will sign his own political death warrant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: You can laugh at it if you like, but take my words as they stand on Hansard, and in a few years those words will come back to you like lightning striking you to the ground, because I am prophesying these things are true.

We are going to vote for this amendment, Mr. Speaker, because we do not have complete confidence in this government. We can present an alternative to this country that will solve its major problems, an alternative which we have expounded in this house for years. The alternative which we have expounded in this house for years—

An hon. Member: Completely discredited.

Mr. Hansell: Did my hon. friend say "completely discredited"? By whom?

An hon. Member: By the people.

Mr. Fulton: You did not even dare run candidates in the by-elections.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend says that we did not dare run a candidate in the election.

Mr. Fulton: In the by-election.

Mr. Hansell: You do not suppose that we are in the position where we are compelled to take dares?

Mr. Fulton: I thought you said you were on the verge of power.

Mr. Rowe: They have gained only four seats in four years.

Mr. Hansell: When a man is training for a bout—

Mr. Pearkes: A rout.

An hon. Member: A bout?

Mr. Hansell: —he has his guards at the gate. Why? So that the opposition do not know the kind of punches he is going to land, so that the opposition do not know what form he is in. We are not so foolish as to contest every by-election and let people know what our punches and holds are.

Mr. Fulton: You are afraid they might find out.

Mr. Hansell: We are playing for higher stakes than by-elections. I was sorry I was interrupted by some hon. member back here —I do not know who it was—who interjected the remark "completely discredited". This movement has never been discredited. We are in two provinces now and all we need is one more. We will get it and then our Social Credit movement will roll through this country with such speed that these gentlemen will begin to wake up when it is all over. But it will be too late for them.

We will go through this country and present the only alternative that is possible in this country, the alternative that will work, the alternative that will capture the imagination and hearts of the people when once they see that it is financially possible to distribute the abundance of our production.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I find myself caught in a rather odd geographical position just now between conflicting forces. The last thing I want to do is to get into any internecine warfare between the various branches of the Conservative party. That is entirely their business and none of mine. But I do admire the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) when he gets up and says that he is going to cast politics aside and then for 40 minutes simply refuses to take his own advice. Possibly he was just as wise, as I do not know how anyone in this house can cast politics aside.

But I shall take your advice, Mr. Speaker, and deal with national matters in a rather different sense. I am not concerned with warfare on this side. As far as I am concerned the enemy is in the other part of the house where I can see the whites of their eyes. I feel sufficiently inimical today to ask certain questions, especially of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), because the government owes these answers to parliament and to the country. They are matters of common concern about which all of us are perturbed. We do not know what the facts are and we have no inkling yet of what government policy will be. We should like to know what the answers are.

In the first place it is time we knew exactly the status of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and the position of the government with regard to that company. Is it the government's intention to subsidize private enterprise, or is it the government's intention to insist that private enterprise stand on its own feet? Is the treasury of the people of Canada to be looted once again in order to help private enterprise, or is it not? These are questions which I should like to have answered.

It is of course a piece of outstanding impertinence for any believer in private enterprise to suggest means whereby the treasury of the people of Canada is used to support private enterprise. The government will have to make up its mind whether it is going to help this pipe-line company or whether it is going to take over this pipe line as we in the C.C.F. have advocated. If a subsidy is granted, if a guarantee is granted, if the government is going to take the risk then the government should take the profits.

We have long said that the national interest demands that this pipe line be owned by the people of this country. We say so for two reasons. The first and obvious one is that we want to protect the consumer. I am quite certain that were this pipe line nationally owned gas would be provided to the consumer at from 30 per cent to 40 per cent below what it will be by a commercial corporation.

Then we also have to protect the future. I fear that if this pipe line comes under private enterprise it will be pushed through by men without the vision or imagination to realize what Canada will be like ten or fifteen years hence. The pipe line will be completely inadequate for the needs of this country. We shall have a 30-inch pipe line in the next year or two perhaps, and in ten years we may require another 30-inch pipe line. That is surely a squandering of capital if ever I saw it. If the job is going to be done, let it be done properly now. If this company does not have the finances to do the job properly, let the government take it on as a matter of service to the people of Canada. As I said, to do otherwise would be to waste money.

Yet here we have private enterprise once again coming to the treasury of the people of Canada asking for a subsidy, asking for a handout. None of us knows what the cost will be. It might be nothing; it might be $15 million; it might be many millions more. None of us at the present time know. All we do know is that the treasury of Canada is being asked to guarantee the profits of Texas tycoons who will do their very best during the coming years to take as much as they can out of the pockets of the people of Canada.

Maybe some will say that if this guarantee does not go through it will be against the national interest, that the pipe line ought to be started this year. If it is so much in the national interest, let the government do the job and let us not subsidize foreigners. We have done that in the past to our cost.

As for the capitalization of the company, we still do not know what it is going to be. I have heard it said that there will be $50 million share capital out of an investment of $300 million, the rest of course being in the form of bonds. Forecasts have been made as to the possible financial position of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited within a few years. I saw one in the Financial Post that within five years this company would be showing a profit, after depreciation, after the payment of bond interest and before taxes, of $20 million a year. A return of $20 million a year on an investment capital outlay of $50 million or $60 million is a pretty handsome return. That is the sort of return which this group whom I call Texas tycoons are going after.

The best thing that could happen would be for the government to take over the whole proposition and do the job. This in other fields has been done already by one minister of the government whose political philosophy was born yesterday and will die tomorrow. I refer to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who nevertheless has done a first-class job with Trans-Canada Air Lines and Polymer Corporation. I only hope that he has the wisdom to see the necessity of the people of Canada owning this pipe line. We in the C.C.F. will never for one moment consent to its being subsidized by the treasury of Canada.

There is another matter in our minds which is perhaps of greater general interest. I refer to the whole question of foreign investment in Canada. Most of the foreign investment here is American, although quite a substantial part is European. And under certain conditions I welcome both. I welcome more European investment because I want to see greater diversity of investment in this country, rather than have us almost in thraldom to one country.

But the significant thing is that when one looks at the financial structure of Canada one is struck by the small, the almost insignificant part which Canadian capital itself has played in the opening up of this country. When I think of the Canadian capitalist I think about what Robert Burns said about the mouse—the "tim'rous beastie". Unquestionably, when it comes to investment in their own country, Canadian capitalists are frightened, cowardly creatures depending always upon outsiders to do the job which they should be doing themselves. They are men without vision, men without confidence, men without any courage whatsoever. I think of what the future of Canada has for all of us, and then I realize that Canadian capitalism has abdicated in favour of the foreigners. And that is a dangerous situation.

Mr. Nickle: May I ask the hon. member a question? Do you advocate following the policy followed by the Douglas government in Saskatchewan, so far as gas and oil are concerned—in other words, an open invitation for private capital to come into that socialist province to do the job that socialism could not do?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Rubbish! Absolute rubbish! It is being done there under conditions where the rights of the people are being safeguarded.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): And the oil firms of Canada knew that, and the oil firms of the United States knew that. At first they would have nothing to do with it; but their lust for profit is so great, they have gone in on the government's terms. And my hon. friend knows that as well as I do.

Mr. Nickle: Are not the terms better in Saskatchewan under private enterprise than—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I cannot hear you.

Mr. Nickle: Are not the terms of the Saskatchewan government, so far as gas and oil are concerned, a little more lenient toward private enterprise than are the terms covering the crown lands in the adjoining private-enterprise provinces?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I doubt that very much. And what is your objection to private enterprise? The only thing is that you don't believe in it. Your idea of private enterprise is to get the government to subsidize you. Why don't you stand on your own feet? When you talk about private enterprise, go and do your job on the pipe line, but don't come to parliament asking for help. I hope you are not going to do that.

Now, let us get back to where I was, before this interruption took place. I was talking about the Canadian capitalist being afraid to invest in his own country, and depending upon the Americans to do the job for him.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This may be only speculation on my part, but I am almost certain the hon. member to whom he has been addressing his remarks is the one member in the house who would be objecting to what he is saying.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I cannot help that. But my point is this, in this particular context, that we have been depending upon foreign capital coming into Canada to develop this country, and to open it up.

One can have only admiration for the drive and energy the Americans have shown in exploring and developing this country. But my regard for them, my admiration for that drive and energy ceases when it appears that American capital is going to own Canada. We are getting into the position where, very definitely, in the economic sense we are becoming an American satellite. Where you have economic strength, there you have political strength; where you have economic ownership, there you ultimately have political ownership. And I object to Canada's being regarded as either an economic or a political annex of the United States.

I condemn the pattern; I oppose the trend; and my fear at the moment is that the government, by its inaction in this matter, is selling Canada into economic bondage. And all that we can do to oppose it will be done.

There are three kinds of investment in the country just now. There is that which is known as the sticks and stones investment—investment in buildings, investment in plants, investment in machinery, investment in these means of production by which employment is given and Canadian wealth is increased. That is good investment. That is the sort of investment that we—and quite rightly—ought to encourage, although I would like to see Canadians doing much more of it. I would like to see Canadians taking the risks which some of the Americans have been taking. And obviously, if Canadians themselves are not going to do it, then others are going to do it.

But this also has been very obvious during the last year. There has been a very definite switch in investments, which is now taking two other forms; and in a highly vulnerable economy such as ours they are dangerous.

In this connection I shall quote a paragraph from the monthly review issued by the Bank of Nova Scotia, where it says:

> Moreover, the apparent dependence of the current premium on capital movements not directly associated with Canadian economic growth is scarcely reassuring. So long as the bulk of the capital inflow took the form of direct investment by United States firms and direct borrowing in New York by Canadian provinces and municipalities, the inflow was actually financing the development of resources and industry and was predominantly of a long-term nature. Over the past year, however, there has been some slackening in the pace of Canadian development, and at the same time a sudden increase in the inflow of funds for investment in existing securities.

It is this sudden inflow of funds which ought to be causing more alarm than apparently it is at the moment on the treasury benches. There is this great investment in Canadian companies, which will last just as long as the profit situation lasts. For money, in itself, knows no patriotism; money follows no flag; money only follows profits. And such investment can be very dangerous to the economy of one's country.

When we look at the Canadian scene we can see what is happening. There is the type of investment coming into this country which is buying stocks and shares for long-term investment, and buying them in such magnitude that Canadian industry is being taken over by the United States. One can think of oil, of foodstuffs, of automobiles, of the electrical industry; and there are others. And what must be the disturbing feature to the Canadian investor is this, that there are stocks and shares of Canadian corporations being bought at prices greater than a projection of company earnings justifies. And that, in itself, can be dangerous for Canadians, although it implies a faith in Canada which I think is well justified.

However, as I said earlier, where you have this economic control in a country, eventually you will get political domination. And again Canada may be in the position of being grateful to Quebec for once more saving this nation, as such.

There is a third type of investment, and this is really a dangerous type which we see before us today. I refer to investment by non-resident-owned investment corporations. They are posing a very serious threat to the Canadian economy.

First of all I think we ought to consider what is happening in the American market just now. It could be said fairly I think that in the American stock market we see people who are the victims of Couéism—who believe that they are going to be better off and better off every day in every way. They apparently believe in a chicken in every pot and a car in every garage and a portfolio of investments in every safe. And they are not going to achieve their ambitions.

Perhaps this optimism is prompted by a statement made by the President of the United States last October, before the election, when he said that national production in the United States might reach $500 billion in ten years' time. Others have said the same thing during the last few months, although there are very responsible economists in the United States who take grave issue with this, and who warn the people in that country of the dangers which are almost obvious in their own economic situation.

One of the most alarming is the gap between stock prices and production indices. Unless that gap is met, is narrowed, there will be trouble. Perhaps one could call the present situation by a name other than Couéism; perhaps we should call it voodoo prosperity, prosperity by incantation. But the power of that voodooism extends now to Canada and is threatening our own investment.

The exchange situation between Canada and the United States is about as unhealthy as it could possibly be. The exchange rate in no way whatsoever reflects the balance of trade between the two nations. The exchange rate is something spurious and synthetic and ultimately dangerous to the Canadian economy.

Then within the last few months we have had this greatest danger of all, namely financial investment or finance investment—let me put it that way—which has been so greatly responsible for the rise of the Canadian dollar. For instance, in June of last year the United States dollar was at a discount of 1-7/8 points. In July it was at a discount of 2-9/16 points. Yet in those two months the Canadian government, through the exchange fund, bought $71 million of United States funds in an attempt to stop our dollar rising and they were completely and totally unsuccessful. The situation has become worse despite the fact that the exchange equalization fund has been buying United States dollars. It became so much worse in August that, despite the attempt of the Bank of Canada, the discount on the U.S. dollar went to 3 per cent and in December it rose to 3-7/32. That is an extremely serious thing for Canada in more ways than one.

I am not going to go into the implications to Canada from the point of view of exports or from the point of view of imports. At the moment I am dealing with the matter solely in the restricted sphere of finance. We have these non-resident investment corporations which, in the last few months, I am convinced, have poured $150 million into this country and probably more; I think $150 million would be a conservative estimate. This inflow of money does not assist in any way the development of this country. In fact it will become a definite hindrance. These shares are sold only to United States investors. It is true that in Canada there is a 15 per cent withholding tax on the dividends of these corporations, on the money received; but then there are no dividends declared by those corporations because the Americans are in them for capital gain. They do not want to see any dividends declared. All income which comes in is used to buy still more Canadian securities on the market.

One of the reasons for this desire for capital gain is, of course, that Americans feel that they will be better off in the long run by paying a lesser capital gains tax than a larger income tax. They have funds which are known as open-end funds. There is no limit to them. As long as there is demand in the United States, these United States funds will be used to buy Canadian securities in unlimited quantities. Of course, if they can buy them, they can also sell them. That is one of the things which should perhaps give us pause because if, perchance, it should so happen that there were a break in confidence, one can imagine the sort of break which would occur on the stock markets of this country and one can well imagine how many Canadian investors would be wiped out.

The main problem is this: What is being done about it? The government may say, "We are using the exchange equalization fund". I do not think they are doing so to any substantial extent but I am not prepared to blame them for that. The exchange equalization fund has in the past shown itself to be inadequate and it is an extremely expensive way of working. I remember that in 1950 there was a determined move on the part of United States capital to come to this country. The exchange equalization fund spent $600 million in buying United States currency in order to try to stop that movement but they could not hope to dam the flood. That was a heavy outlay of money. I do not think for a moment that the exchange fund can have any great effect on the situation as it exists, although it should still be used.

One other reason for United States money coming into this country is the attraction of a long-term interest rate somewhat higher than that which exists in the United States. The obvious way to cure that situation is by means of open market operations by the Bank of Canada whereby our interest rate is brought down to such a level that it offers no attraction to the Americans and, as far as Canadians are concerned, is an inducement to Canadians, if they are going to go into long-term borrowing, to do their borrowing on the Canadian market rather than on the United States market.

The exchange equalization fund must be used. Bank of Canada policy must be such that the interest rate is kept below that of the United States as far as possible. But neither of these two suggestions gets us away from the problem of what to do about these non-resident investment corporations which are creating so much havoc. I think there is only one answer. I should like to hear what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has to say because he must provide an answer. He must give an answer to Canada as to what government policy is going to be in this matter. I think the only answer is to impose on these corporations punitive, frankly discriminatory taxes which will discourage them from coming into Canada and operating in the way in which they operate. They are operating quite properly from their point of view or from anybody's point of view, but the net effect of their operations is to create an extremely serious economic problem within Canada. That problem must be faced and an answer must be found for it. I do not think at the moment there is any answer other than a punitive tax on these corporations; a tax on their income even although it is not distributed; a tax heavy enough to dissuade any others from coming into this market.

There are plans afoot whereby tens of millions of United States dollars are going to come into this country in the near future in the form of non-resident investment corporations and they are merely going to make our exchange situation so much worse. I maintain that the most serious problem today in finance which the minister has to solve is this one with respect to these corporations. He must find an answer. He must give an answer to this house so that we shall know what we are doing. If no answer is given and if this unhealthy situation continues between the Canadian and the American dollars, then, as I said earlier, it will be proof that the government is prepared to sell Canada into economic bondage.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to intervene the second time in this particular debate. In explanation, may I say that sometimes events take place which make one change his mind. This is one occasion when I feel that I should again refer to one principal problem that is of vital concern to my own riding as well as to other ridings in the province of British Columbia.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

On January 19, as recorded in Hansard, I referred to the situation that exists in British Columbia with respect to the price of feed grain. I drew to the attention of the house the fact that a certain price was paid on the prairies for the best grade of feed and then I referred to the extremely high price that had to be paid by the farmers who purchased it in the province of British Columbia. I suggested that possibly some investigation might be carried on in order to determine the fairness or otherwise of the price spread in this regard. I had not any idea then that even at that time, apparently, measures were under consideration to impose further hardship upon the farmers in British Columbia.

At page 667 of Hansard we find the regulations respecting freight assistance on western grains and millfeeds. Here it is brought to our attention that the assistance given in the transportation of feed grains to British Columbia was to be cut considerably. Since that time questions have been asked in this house. On February 1, I believe it was, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) with respect to the possibility of rescinding this particular measure and giving some assistance to the farmers of British Columbia. The reply given by the Minister of Agriculture was to the effect that full consideration had been given to the situation that would exist following the introduction of this measure; and he further stated that he could not see where any alteration could be made at the present time. The matter was referred to again on other occasions which I will not deal with now. I might say that I received several telegrams, and other members have also received telegrams, from interested groups in the province of British Columbia, protesting very strongly the action that has been taken in reducing the freight assistance on feed grains. In the Vancouver Province of Tuesday, February 1, an article appeared headed, "Grain Rate Subsidy Cut to be Appealed". I should like to read certain excerpts from the article. It reads in part as follows:

B.C. groups say more increases burden on producers. A meeting behind closed doors in Vancouver Monday planned an all-out appeal to the federal government against a cut in grain rate subsidies which takes effect today. Members of the feed manufacturers association, B.C. federation of agriculture and the poultry industries council met with W. M. Mott—

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Patterson: I continue:

—and George Cruickshank—

Mr. Blackmore: Who is he?

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: I continue:

—who made their plea to the government through Hon. James Sinclair, Minister of Fisheries. Mr. Sinclair promised to telephone agriculture minister Gardiner and ask for the cut to be made on a graduated basis to give farmers a chance to prepare for the added cost. Local experts estimate that British Columbia farmers are going to pay more than $1 million of the $3,600,000 saving in feed grain freight assistance payments planned by the federal government.

I have further quotations but I am not going to read them at the moment. However, we do see that through particular organizations and particular individuals approaches have been made to the government and the Department of Agriculture with respect to this matter. In this debate we have been discussing the reduction in farm income. We have been talking about the difficulties that the farmers of Canada have been facing throughout past days and years. Yet it seems that now, after struggling against these great odds, the farmers of British Columbia are being subjected to further hardship by the drastic reduction in feed grain freight assistance. It seems to me that this is adding insult to injury. I do not propose to speak further on this matter. It has been called to the attention of the minister. I feel that his answers have not been satisfactory by any means and we are requesting that this matter be reconsidered; that the spread in prices be investigated and that the assistance be returned to its previous level until there is an improvement in the general conditions of the agricultural industry.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? The question is on the following motion—

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before you put the question I should like to deal with one matter that arose while I was speaking last night. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) asked me two questions which I believe should be answered. Consequently I have a certain amount of unfinished business. The hon. member is entitled to the answers to questions that the people of Canada generally are asking. I therefore think it is quite worth while to give them a little attention before we take the vote. The questions are recorded at page 825 of Hansard of yesterday. The minister asked:

Why do you not tell them about Alberta defaulting?

Later he asked this question.

Why do you not tell them that Alberta was the only province that defaulted on its bonds?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member? Throughout the debate on the address we at times allow remarks on the administration of provincial governments which, so far as I am concerned when I am in the chair, I feel sorry that I have allowed because as a result we have a debate on provincial affairs instead of a debate on national affairs. The hon. member made a speech yesterday in the course of which he was asked certain questions. Usually questions are dealt with while a speech is being made or immediately after it is finished. If the hon. member wishes to make further answer to the hon. member's questions of yesterday having to do with matters that deal only with provincial affairs, about which we can do nothing at all, I would imagine that since we have disposed of the amendment, in the debate on which the particular questions were asked, it might be quite just for the Chair to say at this moment that since we are debating the amendment of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe we should restrict ourselves to a debate on national affairs and not go into provincial matters.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Macleod for not having extended the scope of his remarks and perhaps being more out of order than he was on matters which do not concern national affairs. I would be reluctant at this moment to allow a further relaxation of the rules. I am sure the hon. member for Lethbridge will find another opportunity to deal with the particular matter that he would like to deal with at the moment, but I think he will agree that if he deals with whatever means were used by the Alberta provincial government to cope with its financial difficulties it would not be a matter which comes within the purview of federal administration. If he would like to co-operate in that respect, I will hear him on matters concerning national affairs.

Mr. Blackmore: I am in your hands, Mr. Speaker. I do not desire to do anything that would be out of order at this time, but the answer to these two questions certainly does affect the whole management of the Canadian economy during these times. The way Alberta had to manage her affairs in order to get out of her difficulties is just a pattern of the kind of thing that could happen to any one of probably two-thirds of the provinces of Canada within four years from this day if we go into a depression. Consequently, I am inclined to think it would be quite in order to discuss the matter now.

There is another reason why I should like to discuss it, if you can see fit to permit it, and the house will support you in so doing, namely, that it is well to answer such questions right after they are asked. I could not answer them last night because the questions were raised when Mr. Speaker was rising in his chair to tell me that my time had expired. Therefore it was quite impossible to answer them then. If it is your desire and you so rule, I will simply answer the hon. member's two questions in one sentence, and I will promise that when we come to the budget debate I will go into much greater detail and explain the whole matter then.

Mr. Speaker: I would be glad to allow one sentence.

Mr. Blackmore: Then I will simply say that the answer—

Mr. Harris: May I say one word, Mr. Speaker? I had come to the same conclusion as the hon. member for Lethbridge, that the answers he might make to the questions would concern fiscal matters almost entirely and that the remarks he would like to make would be more appropriate on the budget debate. I have been looking forward to his remarks in that particular debate. I should imagine he could combine it and we could perhaps be better informed on the subject at that time than we could now, when fiscal matters are not directly under discussion.

Mr. Blackmore: I am completely in agreement with what the minister has said. The reason I thought we should deal with the matter right now was, as I said, that the minister himself will be very deeply interested in what did occur under the ministers of finance in 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938, because if we come into a depression he will be dealing with similar matters. The provinces in this country simply cannot sustain the financial responsibilities which the British North America Act imposes upon them unless they have financial resources other than those now available to them. It is really a matter of deep concern to all of Canada.

Those things being understood, I will just answer the question of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) by saying that Alberta had no possible alternative to the course which she took. Alberta did not default on the bonds at all. She was declared in default by the bondholders because she asked them to refund her loan at a rate of interest which she could sustain. She had found it was impossible for her economy to sustain an interest rate of 5 per cent. She wanted that interest rate cut and it was when that request was made, as I said a minute ago, that the bondholders refused to even treat with her and they declared the bonds in default. It was no action of the province of Alberta.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, now that we have arrived at the point when the main motion is to be discussed, there are a number of matters which I wish to bring up. We have been debating this motion since January 10, following the speeches made by the mover and the seconder on January 7, with the exception of four days or so during which we discussed matters of international importance.

In the years I have been in this house, having regard to the problems that face our country, I have never seen a ministry so silent in respect of those things about which the people of Canada are seeking information. What is to be done for the unemployed? With the exception of a qualified promise in the speech from the throne and a temporary expedient in the form of legislation already passed by parliament, there is no suggestion of what is to be done. There is nothing in regard to trade and the loss of markets abroad. A total of 55 or 56 supporters of the government have spoken, but not one minister has given answers to the major problems facing Canada; not a word regarding our loss of trade. Day after day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has sat and listened, but not a word from him. Nothing in regard to what took place at the conference in Washington; nothing in regard to the measures to be taken to secure trade in various parts of the world. Parliament has been treated in recent weeks by the cabinet with a cavalier disregard of the rights of the Canadian people, and almost with condescension.

The House of Commons is becoming nothing but a tape recorder for the cabinet, a constitutional nuisance to be tolerated by the cabinet. Some announcements are made outside the house while parliament is sitting, such as the announcement regarding the granting of a licence to Canadian Pacific Air Lines to operate a trans-polar route or the announcement yesterday by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) regarding a matter that affects agriculture, not only in British Columbia but in Ontario and Quebec. I refer to the reduction in the subsidies on feed grains.

We ask questions, returns are passed, months go by. On several occasions recently hon. members of this house have tried to find out about Canadian National employees who stand in jeopardy of losing their positions, many in fact already having lost them. On January 26 I endeavoured to bring up this matter in the form of a question. I inquired about lay-offs of employees of the Canadian National Railways. These employees want to know what is the policy. They hear that on the western division some $3,500,000 is to be saved by the simple expedient of cutting off the heads of the lower employees, the labouring men, rather than giving consideration to reducing some of the extremely high salaries of officials at the top.

We are told nothing in regard to trade. There is no adequate answer by any minister of the crown regarding the position of agriculture in this country; no answer by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to what is to be done about the situation revealed by the dominion bureau of statistics, which shows that trade is decreasing. We have tried to get information from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I understand that he has a speech on the subject of trade in cold storage; let him bring it out. On January 10, as reported on pages 19 and 20 of Hansard, I asked the following question to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied:

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he in a position to say anything regarding the visit of three ministers of the government to Washington recently, and whether or not the United States government has given any indication that it intends to discontinue its apparent policy of applying quotas and embargoes against Canadian agricultural products?
> Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Before the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is completed I hope to make a statement on Canadian trade policy which I think will contain the information my hon. friend is seeking. The visit to the United States concerned a number of matters. It would be difficult to answer the hon. member's question categorically, but I think the information will be forthcoming in the next two or three weeks.

On February 1 the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) directed some questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with GATT, to which the minister replied as follows:

> Owing to the length of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that I could contribute more to the expedition of the business of the house if I refrained from speaking. I have heard no great interest in trade matters displayed in this debate, and perhaps in the circumstances the statement could be deferred until an appropriate bill is before the house or until later in the session.

Such diffidence, such consideration for the sensibilities of parliament, has not in the past been one of the characteristics of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. According to a report in the Canadian press dated January 7, when the minister returned from Washington he said:

Trade Minister Howe, on return from his Washington trip last night, said it may take a "few days" to find out what results his talks with United States cabinet ministers had.

Some "compromises" are likely, he said in an interview, but at the moment he could not say what impact they will have on international negotiations to strengthen the seven-year trade pact.

He said he would know in a few days. When I asked a question on January 10 he gave the house to understand that before this debate concluded he would speak to the house on this matter which affects the Canadian people more than any other problem. We have not had a word. Are we coming to the end of GATT? Are we in such a position that the minister cannot make one of his periodical optimistic statements?

Surely parliament has a right to know what is taking place. I note that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who could not answer certain questions asked in parliament last week, found it necessary to wait until he left for the old country before parliament was told what it could not find out when he was here. Are we to have to wait until the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in Australia or New Zealand several weeks hence before we are to find out about this policy? We ask the minister to bring out that speech which is in cold storage and let the people know what he has done, what took place at Washington and what he expects will be the situation in the days that lie ahead.

What of our trade? The optimism which was displayed by the minister in January and February of 1954 has been dissipated in the light of our experience since then. I am not going into many statistics; I am simply going to point out that the preliminary figures for the full year 1954 are now available, and that our total exports in 1954 amounted to $3,942 million whereas in the previous year they amounted to $4,173 million. So far as imports are concerned they too have been reduced during the year by approximately $280 million.

The total trade for 1954 including exports and imports was $8,037 million, while in 1953 it was $8,556 million. What is going to be done? Has GATT collapsed? Recent reports in the Financial Post give some indication of what took place. And I am not going to restrict the request for a report to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) could tell us whether the United States administration has a policy all its own, and whether it refused to consider objections raised or the alternatives offered on the part of Canadian representatives when they were in Washington. Why this silence? Over the years we used to get these reports regularly during the session, but for some reason or other in 1955 the optimistic reports of the past are unavailable.

The minister dare not speak and tell what actually took place in 1954. As a matter of fact one of the government's former officials, Gerald Godsoe, who during the period of the war occupied a high position in the government of this country, said while speaking before the Chautauqua Institution in July of last year:

One of our problems is the decided risk we run in having so many of our eggs, and such large ones, in the same basket—in our present dependency on your market. This makes it ever-important for us that . . . we concentrate diligently on greatly improving our trade with Britain.

Then he went on to say:

The United States for a long time to come will be dependent on Canada for certain minerals and other natural resources and products. From the point of view of the Canadian economy it is desirable to have a larger proportion of these taken in the future in manufactures rather than in the raw or simply processed form.

Thereby he gives support to the policy of this party so often enunciated, and repeated so recently by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe).

During the period between January and November what happened to our farm income? What happened to our farm markets? Some days ago the minister indicated that there was nothing to worry about. There has been some increase in wheat marketing since November, but the wheat record for 1954 is a sorry commentary on the policies of this government. Here is the record, according to the bulletin issued January 13 by the dominion bureau of statistics. Excerpts from that report indicate that domestic exports of all products to the United States in the 11-month period declined to $2,097,705,000 from $2,199,713,000. Exports of all products to the United Kingdom in the same period of 1954 went down from $617,908,000 to $575,583,000. So far as commonwealth countries are concerned, the report says that in the 11-month period exports to all other commonwealth countries declined to $178,702,000 from $219,402,000, or by approximately $41 million. For the Latin-American countries, in the same 11 months as compared with the 11 months in 1953, trade dropped from $183,242,000 to $168,009,000. Everywhere in the world our markets are disappearing.

The ministers travel. They make peregrinations and pilgrimages here, there and everywhere. I cannot use "pilgrimate" as a verb, but I think it could be said that while they "pilgrimate" trade stagnates.

What about wheat? Well, the record cannot be laughed off any longer. On a number of occasions in 1954 the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) indicated in this house that we were losing our markets for wheat. The answer was that there was nothing to worry about but that wheat marketings were keeping up. So far as wheat is concerned, exports between January and November of 1953 amounted to $530,903,000, while during the same period in 1954 those exports were valued at $339,871,000, or a decrease of $190,000,000.

Surely those are not figures that support the optimistic attitude displayed by this government. I think they indicate and display the reason for the unaccustomed silence on trade matters by the ministers of this government, who in the past have boasted about increases in trade throughout the years. What about wheat flour? Exports of wheat flour between January and November 1954 were valued at $81,371,000, while in the same period of 1953 they were valued at $93,590,000, or a fall of approximately $12 million.

What about other grains, that is grains other than wheat? The record is even worse, proportionately. Between January and November, 1953, exports of other grains amounted to $196,263,000, while during the corresponding period of 1954 they were $115,915,000, or a fall of approximately $81 million.

Those records tell the story. They indict this government for its failure to look after trade, for its failure to act, and for its continued reliance upon optimistic statements rather than actual statistics. As to shipments of wheat the record is lamentable. I am not going to quote it unless someone wishes me to do so, but an article appearing early in February by the Canadian Press indicates that all major grain countries except Canada showed increased wheat exports in the first four months of the current crop year. Canada's shipments dropped in those four months by 6,100,000 bushels, the bureau of statistics reported. United States exports in the same period increased to 72,500,000 bushels from 70,000,000 bushels; Argentine exports increased by approximately 2,000,000 bushels to 45,200,000 bushels; Australia's exports increased by approximately 4,700,000 bushels to 26,700,000 bushels.

It is all very well to say that shipments are falling behind demand and sales. The record indicates that we have lost in considerable degree not only our markets for wheat but also our competitive possibilities as against the other wheat producers. That is the picture, Mr. Speaker, upon which the Canadian people ask for information—encouragement, if you will—from the government, rather than the silence that has characterized this government in recent days.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We believe in deeds, not words.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Imagine it, Mr. Speaker; with problems facing us such as unemployment, immigration, trade and all these ancillary problems, only three ministers have spoken and none has faced the issue. We have a right to ask that, before this debate concludes, the Minister of Trade and Commerce renounce this new spirit of a high regard for parliament and its sensibilities and give to the Canadian people the picture as it is, and also some of the plans of the government for the future.

I should like to ask the minister a question. Is the government at the present time giving consideration to having the Bank of Canada take steps that will do away with the premium on the Canadian dollar? Is that subject being considered today? Certainly that premium is in reality, as it now exists, a penalty upon commonwealth and foreign buyers of our export goods. In operation it has the effect of boosting general tariff rates. It means that, through the export tax which it actually creates, our producers in Canada find themselves with even greater difficulties in meeting the competition faced in the restored economies of various countries.

What is going to be done about it? A suggestion was recently made by the president of the Royal Bank of Canada, James Muir, in which he prescribed the use of open market operations by the Bank of Canada in order to affect the rate of exchange and remove this penalty on Canadian exporters, this obstacle in the way of Canadians in meeting competition in the world of today. Here is our position.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Does my hon. friend wish me to answer that question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend asked me a question. Does he wish me to answer it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I should like to say that if the people of this country believed my hon. friend, the dollar would not be at a premium today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the first time we have obtained an answer from the minister with regard to any of these matters, and it is about as intelligent as the usual answer he gives when he has not an answer. You know, Mr. Speaker, we may smoke them out.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The suggestion is made that we are going into bankruptcy with the dollar at a premium. That is something new.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other day the minister said with great feeling that he did not want to waste the time of parliament by making a speech.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My speeches are brief, anyway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend has never been one of those to whom parliament has been an institution to be respected.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps on reflection the hon. member might want to modify that expression.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not make a reflection, as a matter of fact. I am sorry that Your Honour took it as a reflection. I made it as a statement of fact with regard to the attitude so often taken by the minister in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member not think that for one hon. member to say of another that he has never been one of those who have considered that parliament should be respected is to say something that might be somewhat unparliamentary?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to indulge in anything unparliamentary. If Your Honour says it is somewhat unparliamentary, then I certainly do not want to leave such an impression because I have respect for parliament, the absence of which is sometimes shown by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would not pay the slightest attention to my hon. friend. I do not think anyone in Canada pays any attention to him. If they do, I have never noticed it. I am sure I do not. Therefore anything he says is quite all right.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to have that admission, Mr. Speaker, because it supports the view I have had of the attitude of the minister toward the members of this house, all of whom are equals.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I should sincerely hope not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I again ask the minister and the government to let the house and the country know the situation with regard to the trade position, and also the measures that are to be taken to meet this serious situation resulting from extraordinarily strong competition by other countries, and also resulting from the high price tags placed on Canadian products by reason, in considerable measure, of the unnecessarily high taxes which are imposed by this government and which have continued in existence for several years.

For almost a month, Mr. Speaker, with the exception of the interlude of four days during which we discussed the international situation, parliament has been endeavouring to secure information, first, on the matter of unemployment and what is being done to meet it. That is something that affects every part of our country and every industry and every group of people within this country. I ask that information be given with regard to the railway employees who, because of the fact that they work for a government corporation, have not that freedom to speak which those who work for other than government corporations enjoy and have the right to expect.

Then we want to know what is being done with regard to the question of farm markets. A few days ago the matter of the importation of cheese was raised and the Minister of Trade and Commerce glibly said we had nothing to do with that, that the import permit legislation did not apply in the case of cheese being dumped into this country. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. White) showed conclusively that under the orders in council in effect under the Agricultural Prices Support Act power is conferred upon the government, whenever floor prices in our country are being interfered with in any way or when the floor policy is being in any way undermined, to utilize the authority contained in that act. Yet a few days ago, when asked in effect, "What are you going to do about it?" the minister said, in effect "There is nothing we can do. Anyway, they promised us that there would not be any more for a period of several months."

Surely, Mr. Speaker, having regard to agricultural conditions today, the falling income of farmers throughout this country, the rise in the cost of the things the farmer has to buy, the farmer has a right to expect such action as the laws of the country permit to the end that agricultural prosperity shall not be unnecessarily undermined at a time when agriculture is facing a most difficult challenge. On the one hand the prices of the things he has to sell are going down and on the other hand the prices of the things he has to buy are rising. After all, one reason that we are here is to endeavour to bring about, through discussion, improvement in conditions when they are adverse.

The government have the information. It is another thing they keep in cold storage, along with a lot of other surpluses they have. We ask them, even at this late date, to open up that government refrigerator and reveal the situation with respect to trade, agriculture and the workers of this country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before this debate concludes I should like to say a few words on a matter which is of considerable importance to a great many workers in this country. It is a matter concerning which I sought to ask a question this afternoon on the orders of the day, to which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) has agreed to get an answer as soon as possible. My request, as I shall develop it in a moment or two, is that that answer should be obtained and given to the house today.

Before I comment further on that subject, perhaps I might be permitted for a moment to express my regret that I had to be away from the house and away from the building at the time the vote was called on the amendment moved by the official opposition. It was only because of the sudden passing of a close personal friend that I had to leave the building and miss the vote, much to my regret. As hon. members are aware, that amendment included a plea for health insurance, which I cannot now discuss, but like my colleagues I would have voted for it gladly.

On the orders of the day this afternoon I asked the Minister of Transport if he was aware of a report in today's Winnipeg Free Press, part of which now appears as a Canadian Press dispatch in this afternoon's Ottawa Journal. I should like to give the house the main part of the story as it appears in the Free Press, for the Free Press gives the context in a way that is missing from the story that hon. members are reading at this moment on the front page of the Ottawa Journal. The Winnipeg Free Press story reads as follows:

> F. H. Keefe, general manager of C.N.R. western lines, at a banquet of Beaver lodge, local 691, brotherhood of railroad trainmen, Thursday night, said that because of dwindling traffic it had been necessary to make periodic lay-offs.

According to the Free Press report Mr. Keefe went on to say:

> "We have been told", he said, "that this year we must reduce our annual maintenance budget by $5 million. And unless we can balance our budget the president has told us he is going to replace the present railway management."

Because that last paragraph is before hon. members in the evening edition of the Ottawa Journal they know the wording of that statement, but I point out that it was made in the context of a discussion by Mr. Keefe about the periodic lay-offs that have been necessary on the C.N.R. It is that aspect of it to which I ask the Minister of Transport to address himself in particular. As hon. members know, for the past year or more there has been hanging over the heads of C.N.R. employees across the country the fear of further unemployment. Hundreds of employees have been laid off in various parts of the system from coast to coast. In addition, there have been a number of instances of shops being transferred from one city to another, all of which has resulted in a terrible state of uncertainty and in serious damage to morale so far as the employees of Canadian National Railways are concerned.

This announcement that the president has told the management that they must reduce their annual maintenance budget by $5 million and balance the budget or be fired will certainly add to that uncertainty. It raises the question of whether the management will feel that in order to save their own jobs they have to lay off more employees and cut down their maintenance costs. I suggest that in view of the seriousness of the situation that arises from a statement such as this having been made by a responsible official of Canadian National Railways, the Minister of Transport should make a further statement about this matter in the house today.

I do not know how much longer this debate is going to continue. The minister might be able to make such a statement in the course of this debate; but if this debate should come to an end I am sure that at six o'clock or eight o'clock the house would gladly consent to a reversion to motions or orders of the day so the minister might make an announcement. He certainly should do so in order that the additional uncertainty created by this statement can be cleared up. I cannot help but wonder what is meant by the statement that unless the C.N.R.'s maintenance budget is balanced the president is going to replace the present railway management. I should like to know how far up in the railway management this proposal of replacement is to be implemented.

If I may use a phrase that hon. members will recall from a couple of years ago, I ask the question, does it include those at or near the top? Does it include the president himself? These are questions that it might be well to have answered.

My main concern is with the effect of an announcement like this on the morale of the C.N.R. employees. Hon. members will recall that for a couple of years we have been asking questions about the lay-off of C.N.R. employees. Time and again the former minister of transport, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, would stand in his place and express the hope there would be no more lay-offs, and invariably that hope would be shattered.

Lay-offs have continued to take place. In addition there have been transfers such as the one I referred to the other day, that of the foundry from the Transcona shops at Winnipeg to the shops at Montreal. All this uncertainty is most unfair to the employees of this publicly-owned system. Then there are other questions. I have one on the order paper about the pension position of employees who are laid off just a few years before they would qualify for their pensions. I know of cases where the employees concerned feel they have been treated quite unfairly.

It would appear from Mr. Keefe's statement that now some sort of ultimatum has been handed down by the president of the railway which has put those just below him in the position where they feel that in order to save their own jobs they have to be tough with the employees of the system generally. An announcement like that is certainly a sample of bad public relations, if nothing else; and if it is a serious announcement, if it means what it says, it represents a policy which should be reversed.

My reason for rising at this time is to make a plea that the Minister of Transport not let this matter wait until Monday, when questions might be asked on orders of the day, but that he make a statement some time today clearing up the whole situation. Let us have it clear that employee relationships on the C.N.R. are not run by a series of ultimatums from the president. Let us have the C.N.R.'s employee relationships put on a decent and proper basis, one that will be fair to all concerned, in this great national system.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to take the time of the house for just a moment, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want to leave the record made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) this afternoon unchallenged. He said some very unnecessarily cutting and even contemptuous things about business enterprise in this country which I think are not borne out by the facts. I do not propose to take more than a moment just to review what we all know.

Take first the era of railway construction. Nobody could suggest there was not enough enterprise. It was sometimes suggested there might be too much. I think the courage of those who originally spanned this country with the Canadian Pacific, which now spans the world, was beyond praise. Take again the later railway development period. Whatever could be said of it, it was not characterized by cowardice. Then we know about the agricultural implement industry. It is a world-wide industry. We could go on to the mining industry, both gold and base metals.

We then come to the twenties, and we recall the development of the paper industry. Later we come to the oil and gas development, in which admittedly there is a great deal of United States capital. But why not? Decades ago on this continent the United States was being developed by money from Europe, and there is nothing to our discredit in the fact that United States money is flowing in here freely. But I am informed by responsible people that more than $500 million in Canadian money has gone into the recent oil and gas development.

Finally I wish to give this figure, which came to me as a surprise and which I think we might all bear in mind. Between 1945 and 1952 the increase in foreign investments in Canada was $3·2 billion. During that time the total capital expenditure in Canada was $24·4 billion. In other words, the percentage of foreign capital, comes to only between 12 and 13 per cent of the amount of capital invested. I put that on the record, Mr. Speaker, because I should not like the Hansard of this day to be left with that damaging and I think very unfair statement, at the expense of Canadian business enterprise.

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I had not meant to speak again during the debate on the address in reply. However, if I take a few minutes of the time of the house it is because I have received numerous requests and letters from all over my constituency, asking me to speak on behalf of the working people of Quebec city, and more particularly those of the constituency I represent, and ask the federal government to undertake top priority projects, so as to help the working people of Quebec.

Statistics provided by the various offices of the unemployment insurance commission, regardless of what their compilers may think, do not accurately record the exact number of people who are unemployed at the present time. I refer more particularly to the city of Quebec, as I am conversant with the situation there and I know whereof I speak. I also know that the same situation prevails everywhere in Canada.

I should like to see the government undertake such works at once as would be of particular assistance to the workers of the city of Quebec. Some of the people in my region are in dire need. At this very moment many families cannot obtain unemployment insurance benefits and have to beg food from their neighbours, to feed their wives and children.

In a country like ours, so rich in resources, a situation like this should not exist. Yet it does exist, particularly in Quebec. I cannot understand why the district of Quebec is always the first to suffer, and is hardest struck whenever there is an economic depression in Canada.

There is surely some lack of foresight somewhere and, in my opinion, in the circumstances the only one responsible is the government of Canada, which has taken upon itself to solve the unemployment problem in the country.

Mr. Leduc (Gatineau): What about the provincial government?

Mr. Dufresne: Provincial governments do not have to take care of unemployment in their province.

Mr. Leduc (Gatineau): Since when?

Mr. Dufresne: Since the government stated, after taking over provincial revenues, that the central government would assume the responsibility for the problem of unemployment. Since the government has meddled with matters under provincial jurisdiction it should now do something.

Mr. Leduc (Gatineau): What about Quebec autonomy?

Mr. Dufresne: That is precisely what we aim to preserve, back home. The hon. member who is interrupting is undoubtedly very glad to be living in the province of Quebec where, like his ancestors, he has been able to enjoy the rights which are so dear to us and were so dear to his Canadian ancestors. In spite of the interruptions that may come from the other side of the house—

Mr. Villeneuve: That has nothing to do with unemployment.

Mr. Dufresne: If you had minded your own business, you would have been spared this remark.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the federal government to undertake, as soon as possible, the necessary works in Quebec in order to help our people. In glancing at the estimates submitted to the house—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The minister of finance for the province of Quebec said yesterday in his speech that the province is prosperous.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Quebec West, but I would like to point out that the house is not in committee, and also that hon. members should not interrupt him, as they have been doing just now.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I hope you have not intervened because you thought I was worried. I am not afraid of those interruptions; I can face them and handle them.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): What ignorant bravery!

Mr. Dufresne: Ignorance! That is all we find among government backbenchers. They have given good proof of their ignorance by their constant failure to speak in the house. They are satisfied with voting. Speaking of ignorance, we have noted the absence of several members from that side of the house—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): And what about your own side?

Mr. Dufresne: There were 16 missing on this side.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have not spoken of the hon. member's ignorance. I said: "What ignorant bravery". There is a difference.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Both are true.

Mr. Dufresne: That is not exactly a medical term.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): In your case it would be psychism. That is a medical term.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time I have requested such works; I have done so on numerous previous occasions.

It is all very well to see in the estimates submitted by the government that projects be undertaken in various parts of Quebec, allegedly to alleviate unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the projects to be undertaken in Quebec will not solve that problem. If the unemployment problem is widespread today, we need large scale works to remedy the situation.

The people of Quebec have been requesting for several years the deepening of the St. Charles river, the control of water pollution in the Lairet river and the removal of level crossings. In doing so, the government would make a humanitarian gesture that would bring happiness and welfare to the families of Quebec city and protect the health of our people. I believe we should start looking after the health of our human resources.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Health matters are under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Dufresne: If the federal government was in as good health as the Quebec provincial government, I do not think we would have to blame it as we are now doing.

Coming back to the sanitation of the waters of the Lairet river, I think it is ridiculous that the authorities of a religious community, namely the Sisters of St. François d'Assise hospital, were recently asked to spend an amount of $300,000 to protect their buildings, which were threatening to crumble at any moment into a river which is nothing but an open cesspool for the city of Quebec.

I am therefore asking once again that those works be undertaken for the people of Quebec. If the government ignores my requests, I hope that it will at least alleviate the distress of the people I have the honour of representing in the house, and take care of their needs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take up a certain statement made the other night by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis). I did protest somewhat at the time, but he thought it advisable to make a correction the following day through the press. The hon. member stated that the federal government was contributing for hospital construction an amount equal to the contribution of the provinces.

Mr. Lesage: He made a correction in the house the following day.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

Mr. Dufresne: And, as the hon. member lives in the province of Quebec, he no doubt had in mind the government of that province. I must say that the government of my province contributes to hospital construction exactly five times the amount contributed by the central power.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It is also its responsibility.

Mr. Dufresne: It is not complaining about it, but all I wanted to do was to correct an inaccurate statement made by a member sitting on the government side.

Mr. Lesage: He put it right himself the next day.

Mr. Dufresne: He rectified it, but he maintained that I was not telling the truth in stating the contrary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was challenged by the same member. I have not answered yet, but I am going to do it this afternoon. He said he was in favour of doubling the family allowances in this country, and that, for once, he agreed with me because in the course of a previous speech I had declared myself in favour of such a measure. In my view, it would be a wonderful thing for large families, because that would increase, in particular, their buying power and would ensure prosperity in our country.

I therefore favour an increase in family allowances by the federal government consistent with the economy. The hon. member dared me to go down to Quebec with him—travelling together—that would be something new. I think I must say today that I have no intention of accepting his invitation.

First, because I do not think that the hon. member would be very welcome—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Why?

Mr. Dufresne: Why? Because I always thought that you should not go and ask favours of those to whom you are not even grateful for a full stomach.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Dufresne: I would not want to shame the hon. member for St. Mary—

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Certainly.

Mr. Dupuis: Do you solve your problems with your stomach or with your heart?

Mr. Dufresne: In the case I am concerned with, as I have said, I am sorry to tell the hon. member that he could not solve them either way, for he has shown that he has neither the stomach nor the heart for it.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would not consider modifying that phrase somewhat. We must not allow too many interruptions, otherwise the hon. member who has the floor cannot go on with his remarks, and the decorum is affected to a certain extent.

I realize that often, in answering a member who has interrupted, the words that come to mind are not always the right ones. That is why I would ask the hon. member to modify the phrase he has used, for I do not think that he meant it, especially where he said of an hon. member that he has no heart.

Mr. Dufresne: I bow to your wish, Mr. Speaker. I will modify my phrase. I will say that the hon. member's stomach is not as large as I thought, and that his heart is indeed much smaller than I thought.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): You seem to be an authority on the subject.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, the other day an hon. member told the house about a statement made by one of the C.C.F. members, as reported in a British Columbia paper. This socialist member felt that his rights had been encroached upon, and no later than the next day he made a correction of that statement which amounted to nothing less than a kind of statement. You will remember that the point at issue was the use of French in the parliament of Canada. Here is the verbatim report of the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

(Text):

I have said and said repeatedly that not only it is their God-given right to speak French but that it is also a legal right under confederation. I would do nothing to impede the use of the language. I admire my French-speaking colleagues personally, I admire their culture and I admire their language. But as I said before, when they are perfectly capable of speaking in English, and many of them as well as or better than myself, why use a language that the majority in the commons do not understand?

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, since you no doubt listened closely to those words, you will certainly have noticed how well they reveal the lack of logic displayed by British Columbia socialists. The hon. member admires the French language. He is apparently much taken with his French-speaking colleagues; he loves them very much; he has a large place in his heart for them. The hon. member admits that this right has been conferred on us by the Canadian constitution. On the other hand, he would like us to forgo that right. Such indeed is the attitude prevailing in British Columbia, and I am hardly surprised that my French-speaking compatriots, especially those of Maillardville, have to suffer from the bigotry of certain people. While on the subject of Maillardville, I wonder what these gentlemen would think if, having chosen to live in Quebec, their children were taught nothing but French or catechism.

Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the same situation in which my compatriots find themselves. They have the right to go anywhere and a section of the Canadian constitution allows anyone to speak either of the two official languages of the country. I cannot see why fanaticism should stop our compatriots from speaking the language of their ancestors.

Besides, great improvement in this regard has become noticeable in this country. In fact, I am pleased to point out that the province in which we find ourselves just now, the province of Ontario, shows considerable improvement. The government of this province gives grants to Catholic and French schools. Furthermore this province also has a French teaching service under a director, as well as a French school inspection service.

I note also with pleasure that, on both sides of this house, many of our English-speaking colleagues make special efforts to learn the other official language of the country, which shows that with good will and by eliminating fanaticism, something can be done. I could mention the example of a man of over fifty who courageously undertook to learn French and who can now speak it well enough to make himself understood anywhere in the province of Quebec, in the fine tongue of Racine. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Drew, leader of the Conservative party. There are others whom I might be permitted to mention, especially on this side of the house; we have for example the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener), who all speak excellent French.

Mr. Lesage: There is even the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

Mr. Dufresne: I was just going to say, Mr. Speaker, that, even as far as British Columbia, one may find a brilliant representative, the hon. member for Kamloops, who speaks excellent French, which is entirely to his credit. I therefore hope that other members will be encouraged to follow their example.

Before I resume my seat, I would like to speak in the name of all the credit unions of the city of Quebec, which sent me some resolutions and requested me to ask the government to honour the late founder of these credit unions, Commander Alphonse Desjardins, by issuing a commemorative stamp in this year 1955 which marks the hundredth anniversary of his birth. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this request will be transmitted by your good offices to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), and that, by putting on a stamp the likeness of the late Commander Desjardins, it will be possible to pay tribute to his devotion and spirit of enterprise as well as to all the good he was able to do, not only in French Canada, but everywhere in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only one more thing to ask. Our present position is rather serious. In the immediate vicinity of Formosa, a danger is simmering that may break out not only into a war between communist China and the United States, but into a world-wide conflict.

I think that, whenever we have to face moments as tragic as this, it is becoming more and more important, for us in Canada, to have a common symbol around which all Canadians, of whatever language and creed, may gather. You have already guessed, Mr. Speaker, that the question involved is nothing else than that of a truly Canadian flag. May God spare us such an eventuality—but, if ever we should have to tread the bloody path of a new war, let us hope that those who, for the defence of democracy and civilization, will give their lives on the battlefields, will have at least, before they pass away, the consolation of knowing that they will be buried draped in the folds of a truly Canadian flag.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1955-56

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the message of His Excellency the Governor General, together with the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1956, presented on January 28, 1955, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Harris: I think we have had a good day and we might now call it six o'clock. At eight o'clock we will go on with the order of business that I indicated last evening.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL RIVERS

PROVISION REQUIRING LICENCE FROM GOVERNMENT OF CANADA TO CONSTRUCT, OPERATE AND MAINTAIN ANY IMPROVEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable the Canadian government to ensure that the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements are carried out in an orderly manner and in the national interest. By international river improvements I mean any works which alter the natural flow of waters going from Canada to the United States, and which also affect the actual or potential use of such water outside Canada. The provisions of this bill therefore relate to such international rivers as the Columbia and the Milk river, which cross the international boundary. They are not intended to apply to such boundary waters as the great lakes or the St. Lawrence river, or to rivers crossing provincial boundaries as, for example, the Ottawa or the Saskatchewan.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the minister if it applies to the Saint John river in New Brunswick?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, I think not. The headwaters of the Saint John river are, I believe, in the state of Maine.

Mr. Green: No, in Quebec.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps it is in Quebec. I believe it forms the boundary of the state of Maine. That would come under the jurisdiction of the international joint commission, as I shall show in a moment.

Problems associated with the use, flow and levels of international boundary waters can be resolved by reference to the international joint commission, which operates under the provisions of the boundary waters treaty of 1909. Similarly, problems associated with works in waters south of the international boundary, that cause flooding back across the boundary, are also under the jurisdiction of the international joint commission.

By article 2 of the boundary waters treaty, the government of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction and control of the use of all waters within Canada, which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary, and has the right to divert and use these waters within Canada. The United States has the same rights south of the boundary. Therefore these matters are not within the jurisdiction of the international joint commission. This international rivers bill is designed to deal with these matters, since no other legislation covers regulation in this field.

At the present time the development and utilization in Canada of waters that eventually pass beyond the boundaries and out of the control of this country is a matter of ever-increasing importance in the development of the Canadian economy. This is true of the Columbia river system and similar watersheds. The use of such waters has to be viewed not only in its present implications, and in the light of our relations with the United States, but also in the light of the future water and power requirements of Canada and of Canadians. Any short-run advantage that might accrue from an immediate utilization of these resources should, of course, receive serious consideration.

However, it will be the duty of the government of Canada to make sure that the short-run advantage is consistent with long-term planning. The demand for hydroelectric power in Canada is insatiable; in fact, our industrial economy is largely built on low-cost electricity. In 1920, 5.6 billion kilowatt hours were produced. By 1928, this figure had nearly tripled to 16.3 billion. By 1941 the 1928 figure had more than doubled to 33.3 billion, and by the end of 1954 production had reached approximately 70 billion kilowatt hours. Within the year 1954 new installations both hydro and thermal generating electric power reached an all-time record —approximately 1,875,000 horsepower completed within that one year. The total installed capacity in Canada now stands at over 18 million horsepower, with another 4 million horsepower actually under construction as of January 1, 1955. Obviously it would be a shortsighted policy indeed that would jeopardize the power resources of Canada for a short-term advantage, or for an inadequate return.

We in Canada are apt to have the comfortable feeling that we still have an abundance of undeveloped hydroelectric power. However, much of our potential resources are in remote districts and do not warrant development at the present time. I think I can say that only two provinces, Quebec and British Columbia, are in the happy position of having sufficient accessible undeveloped power to meet their requirements well into the future. Ontario is now developing the power resources of the St. Lawrence river, which is their last major source of low-cost hydroelectric power. With this in mind, our duty to future generations is obvious, and that is to conserve carefully our remaining hydroelectric potential, in order to permit the further development of Canadian industries, and the further advance in the Canadian standard of living.

It is the prime purpose of this international rivers bill to ensure that the long-term national interest is safeguarded and is not prejudiced by development planned to serve immediate local purposes that may be inconsistent with the longer view. This legislation when enacted will enable the government to control, by licensing, the construction, operation and maintenance of works in Canada that affect international rivers. The purpose will be to ensure the most advantageous development of a water system, taking into account alternative development opportunities that may exist now, or that may open up in the future. Control will also be exercised over projects within Canada which have as a prime objective the creation of energy or other benefits outside of Canada. It is essential that the terms under which any such projects are authorized include appropriate safeguards to protect national interests.

As I have said before, in recent years we have begun to realize that water is not a limitless resource, nor is its development purely a local problem. There is fairly general agreement that we cannot afford to waste water and that every effort must be made to use our water resources efficiently. We have to take into account, when planning the use of our water resources, the various implications for industrial, regional, national and international development.

We used to think of development in terms of a single project. It is now necessary to think in much broader terms: to consider the effects which a number of projects may have on one watershed, and still further, to consider how the development of one watershed may affect the future use of water in an adjacent basin. Diversions, especially of flood waters, from one major drainage area to another, have become possible as a result of new developments in technology, thus making possible the co-ordinated use of our various sources of energy. Where adjoining watersheds exhibit different characteristics as to storage capacity and control, there is a strong argument for their physical inter-connection. Even when inter-basin transfers of water are out of the question, it still may be possible for one of its major by-products, hydroelectric power, to provide the means for co-ordination.

Economies in long distance transmission have made it possible to move electricity to load centres at least 500 miles away, and progress continues in extending these distances. In concerning ourselves with international river developments, we therefore need perspective. We must be prepared to look beyond the basins themselves to the ramifications in terms of energy, and the facilities for its effective use, before determining the effect that a specific project may have on the Canadian economy as a whole.

This means that careful consideration will have to be given to all proposals which involve the appropriation by outside interests, for the long term, or perhaps in perpetuity, of water resources of potential value to Canada. We must first find out whether we can make effective use of these water resources within Canada. If it is in our national interest to facilitate downriver utilization of water in another country, as a result of works undertaken in Canada, then we must make sure that Canadians obtain benefits commensurate with the water resources thus being provided to our neighbours.

In working out appropriate arrangements with our friends to the south, we must behave as reasonable neighbours do, perhaps even acting as partners in some of these vast undertakings. We must be prepared to settle many an issue in an atmosphere of give and take. Americans and Canadians have acquired a good deal of experience in resolving certain international water problems through the operations of the international joint commission. Similarly, it should be possible to resolve any problems that may arise out of developments affecting international rivers in a friendly and co-operative spirit.

I do not propose to deal today with the technical and legal details of this bill. That can be done much better when this matter is dealt with in the standing committee on external affairs, to which the bill will be referred after it has received second reading. But perhaps I might deal with two questions: Are the policies which have led the government to introduce this bill in line with the principles of the boundary waters treaty, as they have evolved over the last close to half a century? Is what we are proposing similar to practice in the United States designed to ensure the effective development of their own water resources? The answer to both these questions is yes. Let me elaborate.

As I have already pointed out, article 2 of the boundary waters treaty states that each country shall have, and I quote,

> . . . the exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion, whether temporary or permanent, of all waters on its own side of the line which, in their natural channels, would flow across the boundary.

Thus the treaty makes it quite explicit that Canada has complete authority over rivers flowing within her boundaries, leaving it to the government of Canada to control the use, flow, and levels of such rivers within our own territory, and to deal with any projects within Canada that might interfere with the natural flow of international rivers.

However, in exercising these rights Canada must bear in mind the rights of persons who may be affected by projects altering the natural flow of international rivers, or by the construction of storage dams and similar works which regulate the flow of waters. If such persons are injured, whether they are citizens of the United States or of Canada, they are entitled to compensation. They may come before the courts of the country that is interfering with the natural flow of international rivers, and claim compensation, whether or not they are citizens of that country.

This, we think, is a sound principle, for the rights of the individuals in both countries are thus protected. But it means that we in Canada must be very careful in granting any licenses that would create new vested interests outside our country. For, if at some future date there were promising opportunities to use Canadian water resources more effectively in our own country, vested interests in the United States might well have substantial claims on Canada.

The principle of compensation, as it has developed, covers all interests, including both private and public interests. An example of this is the case of the application for authority to build a dam on the Saint John river at Grand Falls, New Brunswick, which had the effect of raising the water levels in the international section of that river. The international joint commission granted its approval of the flooding at the boundary only after prolonged hearings, and on condition that the Canadian applicant carry out the terms of an agreement which the applicant had entered into with a United States company during the course of the hearings.

That agreement in effect conceded the validity of the arguments presented so forcibly to the international joint commission by counsel for the United States government. The counsel for the United States asserted that the "protection and indemnity" provision of the treaty did not relate exclusively to physical damage, but included also "compensation" and "a share in the benefits", which could be ordered by the international joint commission in any form desired by the United States, including the delivery of electric power. He asserted furthermore, that the compensation must take account of all interests, including the public interests of the United States and its states, as well as those of the private individuals whose property would be flooded. Finally, counsel claimed specifically on behalf of the United States a share of the power generated at the downstream site in Canada, proportional to the additional head made available by flooding in the United States and the share of the flow thus provided by the United States.

This point of view of the United States government was accepted by Canada. It is this type of thinking which the Canadian government intends to apply in administering the provisions of the international rivers bill when enacted.

Now there will be cases where the project involves the storage of water in Canada, and its release in a regulated flow. This may constitute a very valuable service to the downstream country. Not only may it reduce the damage from floods, but, through the conservation of flood waters, it may also make additional water available to the downstream country for power generation, or other purposes, during periods of low natural flow. Since the downstream country has no claim to this service, it is evident that Canada can reasonably require recompense in acceptable form if the downstream country requests us to provide the service.

Numerous formulae have been advanced to cover situations such as these. The resultant power might be divided equally, based on the thesis that, while the downstream country is providing the "head", the upstream country is providing the "flow". Head and flow together constitute power. One without the other is useless. The actual proportion of the power benefits received by the upstream and downstream countries will depend on the merits of each case; but there is little doubt that both countries will expect to get a reasonable share of the power developed as a result of joint efforts.

This important question of the great benefit conferred on downstream power plants by upstream storage is receiving increasing recognition in the proposals to govern downstream benefit settlements being worked out among the various states south of the border. The draft Columbia interstate compact, prepared by a commission which includes representatives of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming and the United States government, in providing for the allocation of power to be generated at downstream plants recognizes the contribution which will be made by storage and regulation of flow in the upstream states.

In guarding the national interest, we must be sure that any arrangements between Canadian and American interests are concluded at arm's length; that they are bound up in long-term contracts between responsible utilities; and that the recompense in power or cash for the resultant benefits in the downstream country bears a close relationship to a fair market price of the electricity so generated, as well as to the value to Canada of alternative water resource developments solely in this country. For example, unless the cost of electricity to the beneficiaries in the United States is comparable with that of the best alternative project within their own control, we would have good reason to be sceptical. As far as Canada is concerned, in order to be acceptable in the national interest, any private arrangement would have to ensure an optimum return in perpetuity and in real terms. By real terms I mean the going price of power from time to time, or better, compensation by an appropriate block of power delivered in Canada. Unless its terms fully accord with these requirements, governmental approval of the arrangement may have to be denied.

The principle that adequate compensation is a condition attached to the right of each country to exercise full control over waters flowing across the boundary was incorporated in the boundary waters treaty at the insistence of the United States secretary of state, Elihu Root. It was accepted by Canada and thus it became a fundamental principle of the treaty, having general application for the future.

The United States government has since, through the federal power commission, exercised authority over the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements in that country. As and when the international rivers bill becomes law, Canada will be exercising similar control over our international waters. This bill asserts the accepted principle that Canadians have full control over waters within Canada, and first call on their use.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize again that the authority asked for in this bill will enable the Canadian government to ensure that development and utilization of Canadian water resources covered by this legislation will be carried out in an efficient manner, thus protecting the national interests of this and future generations.

Hon. members will have noticed that international law and international practice have had much to do with the drafting of this bill. It seems to me that hon. members should be given an opportunity to discuss the provisions of the bill in committee, where they will have the guidance of General McNaughton and other experts on the subject matter of the bill. Since external affairs are involved, the appropriate committee would seem to be the committee on external affairs. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that, after this bill receives second reading, it be referred to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in the speech just made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in introducing this bill, and personally I am gratified that he has decided to have it sent to the standing committee on external affairs. When I spoke in the throne speech debate I asked that that be done, and I believe that committee can do an excellent job in considering this particular measure. In fact this is the type of bill which can best be handled by a committee of the house. Because we view the measure in this way we are not opposing second reading of the bill but we would like to make it clear that although we agree to let it have second reading in order that it may go to a committee, we are reserving the right to make a decision as to what shall be done after the bill has been through the committee and has come back to the house.

In his remarks the minister did not explain that the bill arises largely by reason of a dispute between the government of Canada and the government of the province of British Columbia. The latter government have made an agreement with the Kaiser interests in the United States under the terms of which that firm is to erect a dam across the lower end of the Arrow lakes, these lakes being an enlargement of the Columbia river.

Apparently the provincial government believe they have made a good bargain. They are to get quite substantial payments from the company and in addition a certain percentage of the power that is produced in the United States by reason of the dam being erected in Canada. The government of Canada apparently object to this agreement, and arising out of this controversy we have the present bill. I believe that the bill is of great importance because of this controversy, and also for other reasons.

In looking at the map of Canada I find that there are several important rivers which flow from Canada into the United States and accordingly would be subject to the terms of the bill. Actually there are not as many of these rivers as one would think. First there is the Saint John river which apparently rises in Quebec, flows into the United States and then into New Brunswick, but the minister has said tonight that it would not be subject to the terms of the bill.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps my hon. friend would not mind a correction. I do not think it flows into the United States. As I remember it, it rises in Quebec and becomes the boundary between the United States and the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Brooks: It flows through the state of Maine for quite a distance before it forms part of the boundary.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, perhaps it does.

Mr. Green: That is one of the questions which will have to be worked out in the committee. There seem to be no other rivers of any size which flow from Canada into the United States until we come to the Milk river in Alberta. There are two small ones in Saskatchewan, the Souris river and Frenchman river. One of the members from Saskatchewan tells me that he has never heard of Frenchman river, so I take it that one at least is not of great importance.

But once you get to the province of British Columbia there are several great rivers which will be affected by the bill. First of all there are the rivers in the Columbia river system including not only the Columbia itself but also the Kootenay, which is a tributary of the Columbia, and the Okanagan and Similkameen, all quite important rivers. In the Columbia river system there are also three great mountain lakes, Kootenay lake, the Arrow lakes, which as I said before are really a widening of the Columbia river for well over 100 miles, and Okanagan lake. All these lakes, therefore, will be subject to the terms of this bill.

Then there are the rivers which flow out of British Columbia into the panhandle of Alaska, notably the Stikine river and the Taku river. These are very large rivers, and it is of significance that on the Taku river the Frobisher interests plan to construct a great smelter which will be operated by power derived from the headwaters of the Yukon river. As I read the bill the Taku river will be subject to its terms. The Yukon river itself also will be subject to the terms of the bill because, as hon. members know, it flows from the Yukon Territory through the territory of Alaska. That may not seem important at the moment because the dominion government controls the Yukon Territory; but if the Yukon should become a province, which I am quite sure it will eventually, then it will be in the same position as the province of British Columbia is today with regard to the Columbia river system. The bill, therefore, affects some very important rivers in western Canada.

Presumably it will affect those rivers a long way from the boundary. In other words it does not affect them only at the boundary or within a few miles of the boundary; it affects them many miles back. For example, on the main Columbia river there is a wonderful power site several hundred miles north of the boundary at a place called Mica creek, which is up near the top of the big bend of the Columbia. Eventually at that point, and I hope at an early date, a dam will be erected and a project constructed which will cost, General McNaughton told the committee on external affairs last year, about $425 million and will produce a tremendous amount of power. I do not have the exact figure at hand at the moment, but that Mica creek project will be a very large power development.

The question arises in one's mind as to whether that Mica creek dam project also is going to be subject to the control of the dominion government under the provisions of this bill. The importance of the bill is very far-reaching, much more far-reaching than one would think at first glance. What is done on the Columbia river system will affect the people living in the interior of British Columbia for the next 100 or 200 years. This is not a short-term problem. It is vital to the development of that whole part of western Canada. This is one of the reasons I heartily agree with the minister when he says that the bill should go to the committee for study.

Another reason is that this is a brand new type of legislation. Offhand I cannot think of any similar legislation on the Canadian statute books. Parliament is dealing with a new problem, and for that reason too it is important that the bill be studied by a committee.

I believe the whole foundation of the bill is contained in the words—I cannot refer to a section, Mr. Speaker, but these words are used—"developing the water resources in the national interest". That is what this bill aims to do, develop the water resources of Canada in the national interest. Mind you, it goes further than covering future developments. The bill provides for taking licensing control over the existing developments. If there is a dam or power plant already in existence, under the terms of this bill that plant is now subject to licence. There are several large power plants on the Kootenay river just before it flows into the Columbia, and as I read the bill those plants will have to obtain licences within a year, otherwise the dominion government can demolish them. I propose to say something about this power of demolition a little later.

Another reason the bill should be considered by the committee is that it involves very grave constitutional questions. The provinces of Canada have always been very jealous of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights, and that is one reason the government of British Columbia is so concerned about this measure. General McNaughton recognized that in his statement to the external affairs committee last year. I have here the proceedings of that committee, and I am quoting from General McNaughton's evidence at page 174. He said:

> So from the commission point of view, that project—

He is referring to the Mica creek project.

> —could be cleared for construction at any time within a year. The people to build it, the responsibility of building that dam, lies with the provincial government.

This is General McNaughton speaking.

> They must say whether they are going to build it themselves through the B.C. power commission or whether they are going to bring in a group of private interests to build it. All these things are very definite possibilities, but the decision will lie with the provincial government.

Then I asked him:

Q. The dominion government would take no part in the construction of these developments?
A. The federal government of Canada has the over-all responsibility of negotiations with the United States.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has pointed that out tonight.

It is very essential that the negotiations in regard to the benefits that come from the regulated water and controlled flow, and so on, should be settled and will have to be settled before it would be wise for the provincial government to authorize someone to go ahead and build it.

General McNaughton's own evidence shows quite clearly that the provincial government is vitally interested in the Mica creek project, as well as any other projects on the Columbia river system.

Another reason the bill requires careful study was dealt with by the minister this evening when he mentioned downstream benefits. This doctrine of downstream benefits has only been worked out lately. General McNaughton told us that Canada was only able to make headway on that argument because the northwest states got into an argument between the upstream and downstream states, with the upstream states insisting that they should get benefits from the downstream states. Having established that principle in the fighting between themselves, Canada was able to come along and take advantage of their argument.

General McNaughton dealt with this question too, and at page 166 of the committee evidence he said:

As I mentioned before, power is the product of head and flow, the factors come in equally on it and it does seem and has seemed to those of us who are studying the matter, and a lot of other people as well, that when this additional power which is derived without any cost in the generating plant, because generating plants are idle unless the required flow is provided to them, that power which is produced in that way should be divided between the two countries. That has been the very forceful contention made to us by the government of British Columbia and it is the crux of the discussion which is going on with the United States.

The external affairs committee members were very much impressed by General McNaughton's evidence about downstream benefits, and in their report they inserted this paragraph:

Your committee also approves of the stand taken by the Canadian section of the international joint commission concerning recompense for downstream benefits on the Columbia river system.

Before I go on to deal with the Columbia system itself in some detail I should like to refer to the powers taken in this bill to seize works which have not been properly licensed.

As I say, they can be seized by the dominion government and can be removed, destroyed or otherwise disposed of. Now, it looks as though the province of British Columbia, if it cannot have the Kaiser people build a dam, may try to go ahead and build a dam itself with government funds. Under the seizure powers we can get into a position, Mr. Speaker, where the British Columbia government, having built a dam without getting a licence from the dominion government, may then have that dam removed by the dominion government.

Talk about Formosa. I can picture to myself Premier Bennett standing on this dam, and in the front line trenches will be the little corporal from Macleod with all the other Social Crediters who have come from the province of Alberta into British Columbia. Premier Bennett will have around him all the rest of his supporters who are not quite sure what Social Credit is, but anyway there they are.

Mr. Garson: And he will have Conservative support.

Mr. Green: Yes, and some Liberals, too. Then coming down the Arrow lakes will be Admiral Howe of Port Arthur; the commander of his landing party will be Mr. Laing, the provincial Liberal leader in British Columbia, and the people of British Columbia will be running to take shelter behind a boulder or stump or anything to get out of the line of fire. And I can imagine the leader of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), will be running off to the United Nations with the other nine provinces to try to get a cease-fire.

Mr. Knowles: What about Ripple Rock?

Mr. Nowlan: You can't hide behind that; it will be blown up.

Mr. Green: We are trying to settle the question of Formosa. If we do not look into this bill very carefully I am afraid we are going to have a civil war here in our own backyard. I would not call British Columbia the back yard; I mean the front yard.

I am really very much interested in this because 40 years ago the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who is an old friend of mine, sailed up these same Arrow lakes with me and the 54th Kootenay battalion on our way to a real war. Both of us are old-timers in the district. I was born there, and in fact my father was a pioneer right where this dam is supposed to be built. In any event, for the people of British Columbia this is a very serious question.

I come now to the Columbia river system itself. As I said in opening, that is the reason for the bill. There would not have been any bill of this kind brought forward had it not been for this controversy over the Columbia river system. General McNaughton told the committee last year of the great importance of that system. I quote from page 164 of the evidence of the external affairs committee. He said:

> This is probably one of the most important matters under discussion between Canada and the United States at the present time. It is an issue which is engaging the attention of the peoples of those parts, I was going to say, almost to the exclusion of everything else. It is without doubt the biggest issue in the west today and indeed, when it comes to be known about in the rest of Canada it will be regarded as a matter of first-class importance.

He told us that the Columbia river system is the third largest river system on the continent, the Mississippi being the first, the St. Lawrence the second. The Columbia river has practically the same power potential as the St. Lawrence river system.

The northwestern states of Washington and Oregon, through which the Columbia river flows, are short of power. On the other hand, the southern interior of British Columbia is not in that position. It has not been developed to anything like the same extent as the states of Washington and Oregon, and that is one reason for the problem. It has not been necessary for British Columbia to worry so much about power. Our industries in that area are not developed to the extent that they require as much power as is required by the industries of Washington and Oregon.

Eleven years ago the international joint commission was given instructions to investigate the Columbia river system. They have been a little dilatory in not having completed the examination earlier, although I realize that there have been reasons for the delay. General McNaughton told the external affairs committee last year that it would be some years yet before the Canadian survey of the system would be completed. I quote from page 169 of the evidence, where he said:

> ...if we are lucky we should have about two more years of field work, and after that we have to increase our office staffs for compilation of the report, and that may take from a year and a half to two years. It will be that long before we have a comprehensive report on the Canadian section of the basin which is comparable to what is known as the United States army engineers 308 revised report, which is a very comprehensive document. These reports are very voluminous; we have them in our office if anyone wishes to come in and see them. The Canadian report will be very comprehensive, and it must be so because we are dealing with investments that are literally astronomic; and if they are done properly they will have a benefit to our people down through the years. If mistakes are made they may well be impossible to correct, and even if you do correct them it will be very expensive and it may be disastrous. We must do these things properly.
> The fact that these surveys have had to run on does not mean we are necessarily unable to proceed with individual developments. Once we are satisfied that these individual developments fit correctly into the general scheme of planning to get the best out of the basin as a whole, we will get on with it.

Last year in the committee General McNaughton emphasized the need for co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments. He put that so clearly, and surely it must be evident to every hon. member that in order to have the portion of the Columbia river system which is in Canada properly developed, there must be co-operation between the two governments. That is why I regret all this warfare that has been going on between the governments. General McNaughton said on page 168:

> I want to say in that connection, when this reference comes to us from the two governments—

That is the governments of Canada and the United States.

> —that the provincial authorities have full access to the commission to make their representations. I am happy to be able to say to you that ever since that reference was sent to us, there has in fact been the closest association between the commission's officers and our board of engineers with the provincial authorities, without regard to the administration in power.
> There are no changes; the views put before us by British Columbia have been gone over by each succeeding government in detail and they have been reaffirmed in all their particulars. In dealing with British Columbia we feel we are dealing with views that are the consensus of views of all the people in that province, and I think when you have views with that sanction behind them that they are views to which we must all pay the greatest attention; they have to be given every weight in the considerations that come forward in the international field.

That of course was good sense. I believe there was co-operation at that time, which was less than a year ago. But here I must find fault with the provincial government. According to an answer given by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) on January 11, as reported at page 64 of Hansard, the British Columbia minister of lands and forests, Mr. Sommers, wired General McNaughton on September 17, 1954, about this proposed dam as follows:

> Government of British Columbia proposes to enter into agreement with Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation allowing said company to erect dam on lower Arrow lakes to store three million acre feet of water. Payment for same to be 20 per cent of power generated on American side delivered free to British Columbia.

The next day General McNaughton answered that wire and suggested that no action should be taken before the British Columbia government received a copy of the report of the new topographical studies of the Columbia system which were being made under the direction of the dominion government. Yet on that very day, September 18,

Mr. Sommers wired back to General McNaughton that British Columbia had executed an agreement. Mr. Sommers stated in the British Columbia legislature just this week that the provincial government intended to go ahead with the Kaiser dam.

Mr. Lesage: He said also that the agreement was signed on the 17th.

Mr. Green: Apparently he said also in the legislature this week that an agreement had been signed on September 17. Of course that could hardly be called co-operation. I stress again that the only way the Columbia river can be developed in a proper manner for the people of British Columbia, indeed for the people of Canada, is by co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments.

There is one other reason I believe this bill should be studied, and that is contained in the statement made tonight by the minister, when he made reference to the diverting of one river from its own system into another. I have seen press dispatches to the effect that part of the Columbia river might be diverted into the Fraser river. That has had its attraction for engineers, but on the coast we are much concerned about an undertaking of that kind. We had a terrible flood on the Fraser river just six years ago. This is also a most important fishing river. Millions of dollars worth of fish were caught last year in the Fraser river and off its mouth, and we will insist on a very close look being taken at any proposal to divert part of the Columbia river into the Fraser river system.

I do not think I need go any further to convince the house that the proper course is to have this bill sent to the committee for further study in order that we may get the whole story—not only that we may get it, but also that the provincial government and the people of British Columbia may get it. I was glad to hear the minister say that General McNaughton would be made available as a witness. I believe the government should also produce the officials of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources who have been making the survey. It should also produce the men who drafted this bill so we may find out the legal basis for the bill. From what the minister said tonight I assume they are relying largely on the boundary treaty, but in any event there should be a thorough examination of the law officers of the crown.

I hope an invitation will be extended to the provincial government to send their representatives. It may be that they are so annoyed about this matter that they will refuse to send anyone down. If they take that stand I think it could well be considered a sign of weakness. The government of British Columbia should be prepared to send representatives here to tell the provincial side of the story. I see no reason why the Kaiser people should not be requested also to send their representatives. They made a deal with the province of British Columbia involving a good many millions of dollars. They do not think they have done anything wrong, and I think it would be helpful if they were asked to come here to give evidence.

That is all I have to say about the bill. In closing I should like to emphasize that it is a far-reaching measure, not only because of its effect upon the Columbia river system but because of its possible effect upon other great rivers of Canada. By this bill we are establishing a precedent for a new type of project. As far as the Progressive Conservative party is concerned, we would like to see the bill go to the committee and we are willing to have it given second reading for that purpose. But, as I have said before, we reserve our right to deal with the bill on its merits when it comes back to the house from the committee on external affairs.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this bill is of particular interest to my constituents as well as to many people in British Columbia and many other Canadians. I was pleased with the logical explanation of the purposes of the bill given by the minister. I understand that its first purpose is to protect our national interests, to provide for the long-term development of our rivers, and to make certain that our international rivers are developed efficiently.

Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) I was pleased to hear the minister say he was going to recommend that the bill be referred to the committee on external affairs. This is a rather complicated question for people to deal with, particularly those who have not a firsthand knowledge of the situation. I think the committee should have an opportunity to hear General McNaughton and the officials of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, as well as other technical experts. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that the government of British Columbia should be invited to send representatives, as well as the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation. I am quite sure that the more daylight we can shed on this bill, the more convinced the great majority of members in the house will be that it is to the general advantage of Canada and in the interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, since the Columbia was discovered in 1811 by Thompson that area has been rich in history, rich in events, and also rich in unusual people. In view of the present interests in the development of the Columbia basin I think it was most appropriate that last year there was unveiled at Castlegar a monument to the memory and the service of David Thompson and what he did for Canada when he discovered the Columbia in 1811.

I have had the great privilege of living on the banks of the Columbia for nearly 50 years, and I have witnessed many interesting developments and many changes. Like all old-timers in that district I have always retained great confidence in the possibilities for development of the area. Fifty years ago it was sparsely settled land, almost unknown. You might say we lived almost in solitude, in small communities in the silence of the forest primeval, short on cash, generally speaking, but long on hope and ambition.

Now our ambitions and hopes are beginning to be realized. It was a very different country in those days from what it is today. To illustrate the distance between communities I will tell a story in connection with my father, who was a rather interesting and unusual character. When the first aeroplane went over our property, I think it was shortly after the first world war, my father called me out and said. "You see that thing, Bertie?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Do you know what it means?" I said, "No." "Well," he said, "it means there's no damned privacy anywhere nowadays."

I remember listening to the late Sir Richard McBride, former Conservative premier of British Columbia, addressing an audience in my district and telling us that we lived in paradise, a garden of Eden, and all that was required was ambition and hard work to become well off. I also remember listening to the father of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) who at that time was a member of the government of British Columbia. He also bucked up our spirits by telling us of the possibilities for getting rich by growing apples and so on.

I remember another occasion when a very well known governor general came to our district. I was on the reception committee. I remember him telling us that we lived in a paradise. And I shall never forget one old gentleman who was presented to the governor general, and the comments of that old gentleman. He was a well known Methodist and a very strong prohibitionist. I said to him, "John, what did you think of the governor general?" "Well," he said, "he might convince me that we are living in paradise; but from the look of that nose he could not convince me that we can bank on his vote for prohibition."

Now the situation is entirely changed. Our district has developed a great deal in the last 20 years particularly, and there are possibilities for greater development in the future. Whereas 25 years ago the Columbia river basin was almost unknown, today it is receiving attention across Canada and in the United States, and I have even had considerable correspondence from Great Britain. I think wherever there is a discussion of possibilities for the development of power, interest in that district is aroused.

In passing I believe it is of interest to note that there are four members in this House of Commons who spent their boyhood days in the Columbia and Kootenay districts. I am referring to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Simmons), and the hon. member for Kootenay West.

While we went almost unknown for many years, today the possibilities of our district are being generally recognized. I noted in reading the report of a committee of the congress of the United States the statement was included that from the standpoint of resources the Columbia is the mightiest stream on the North American continent.

I believe the interest of the federal government in the development of the Columbia in Canada commenced after the building of the Grand Coulee dam, when the possibilities for the development of power on the Columbia were demonstrated. It was as a result of that, I presume, that a reference was made to the international joint commission in March, 1944, by the House of Commons and by the congress of the United States. So far as I can gather, the information that has been obtained to date is perhaps the most complete and comprehensive concerning any river basin in Canada. Very good work has been done as a result of co-operation among various federal departments and the co-operation of the provincial government as well. $3 million has been spent to date. It will take about two years to complete the surveys and two years to compile the report. Then we should have complete and definite information as to the possibilities for power development on the Columbia.

While I am dealing with this question I should like to draw the attention of the house to some mistakes that have been made in the past. That is why many of us are greatly concerned lest serious mistakes be made in the future in connection with the development of the potential of the Columbia.

First of all it is fair to say that for many years all governments in Canada failed to realize the possibilities for development of the natural resources of the Columbia river basin.

Second, I think a mistake was made when the government of Canada failed to secure compensation from the United States for violation of article II of the Oregon treaty. I have mentioned that before, but I continue mentioning it because I think it is something that should be taken into consideration when we reach the point of negotiating arrangements with the United States authorities. Article II is as follows:

> From the point at which the 49th parallel of north latitude shall be found to intersect the great northern branch of the Columbia river, the navigation of the said branch shall be free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company, and to all British subjects trading with the same, to the point where the said branch meets the main stream of the Columbia, and thence down the said main stream to the ocean, with free access into and through the said river or rivers; it being understood, that all the usual portages along the line thus described, shall in like manner be free and open.
> In navigating the said river or rivers, British subjects, with their goods and produce, shall be treated on the same footing as citizens of the United States; it being, however, always understood, that nothing in this article shall be construed as preventing, or intended to prevent, the government of the United States from making any regulations respecting the navigation of the said river or rivers, not inconsistent with the present treaty.

Now it appears that when the Grand Coulee dam was built no representations were made by the Canadian government to the United States government. According to a letter I received from the Department of External Affairs the files were searched, and a review of the records disclosed this to be a fact. However, in the letter I received from Mr. H. H. Wright of the Department of External Affairs under date of April 14, 1949 he has this to say:

> A review of the records has disclosed; (a) that a similar question was asked in the House of Commons and a reply given by Mr. Bennett in 1935. The record is contained in Hansard, page 3883, dated June 13, 1935. A copy of this extract is attached for your information; (b) that during consideration by the international joint commission in 1941 of the application of the United States government for approval of the construction of the Grand Coulee dam, the Canadian government did not present testimony. However, at a hearing in Spokane on February 21, 1941, the Canadian government reserved the right to submit later any claims for damage in Canada arising from flooding of Canadian property, and, at a further hearing in Trail, a spokesman for the government reserved the right for it to file a brief at a future date.

I mention that matter again because in talking even with United States officials I found they were surprised that the Canadian government did not ask for some compensation for the violation of article II of the Oregon treaty. When we negotiate these big proposals for the development of the Columbia river with our friends in the United States I trust we shall not forget that we surrendered an extremely important right in article II of the Oregon treaty when the Grand Coulee dam was built, and that we are entitled to some substantial compensation.

Another mistake has been that up until recent years sufficient emphasis was never put on the recognition of the payment of downstream benefits in the nature of power. As I think the minister mentioned, the principle of recognition of downstream benefits is being adopted in the United States as a result of negotiations between one state and another in the development of power projects. But I want to bring to the attention of the house the fact that the man responsible for the recognition of downstream benefits in the United States is General McNaughton, chairman of the Canadian section of the international joint commission. He has spoken on this question in the United States at meetings at Seattle, Spokane and other places.

When he first suggested the principle of downstream benefits it at least created a great deal of surprise among the people he was addressing. But as a result of his educational program, shall I say, with respect to the recognition of downstream benefits and Canada's rights in that respect, they are now recognized between state and state and it looks as though, in the near future, in our negotiations with the United States we shall have little difficulty in having the principle of downstream benefits recognized by the authority we are dealing with in connection with any negotiations for the development of power or storage on the Columbia river.

I am not going to deal with the constitutional position, Mr. Speaker. It was mentioned by the minister when speaking on the bill, and was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I think that is one subject into which the committee might make inquiry, that we may all be informed as to the details of the constitutional position of this bill. Personally I am convinced that the bill has a sound constitutional basis because of certain clauses of the British North America Act and as a result of certain practices and procedures that have become recognized as between the Canadian section of the international joint commission and certain provinces in Canada with respect to the development of certain rivers.

However, Mr. Speaker, I expect that another member of our group will deal more particularly with that question as this debate proceeds. As I said before, to my mind there is no question as to the right of this parliament to pass this bill under the terms of the British North America Act. However, I think it is a subject that might well be discussed by the committee when it studies the bill.

I am now dealing with the purpose of the bill and its effect. One effect of this bill may be to discourage the building of the proposed Kaiser dam near Castlegar on the lower Arrow lakes. Because of that I want to deal with certain aspects of that proposal. I shall deal with it at some length because it is of great concern to many constituents whom I have the honour to represent.

The government of British Columbia has an agreement with the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation that provides for the building of a dam near Castlegar on the lower Arrow lakes that would return in power or taxes approximately $1 million per annum to the province of British Columbia; that is, if the company builds the dam. If, however, under the new plan the government financed the plan it would receive, according to the information I have obtained, an additional $600,000 per annum.

At this point I must say that in view of the constitutional position, in view of the federal government expenditures in the Columbia river basin totalling something over $3 million since 1945, and in view of the great interest of the international joint commission and the government of Canada in recent years in proposed developments on the Columbia river, it was most unfortunate that the government of British Columbia saw fit to conclude an agreement with the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation without consultation with the international joint commission and the government of Canada. I presume, Mr. Speaker, we must consider it an oversight due to lack of knowledge of the constitutional position, inexperience and possibly ignorance of the usual courtesies prevailing between governments or between governments and international commissions.

Extremely strong objections were voiced to the proposal to build this Kaiser dam on the lower Arrow lakes. Many of my constituents, supporters of all parties in this house, have informed me of their objections on varying grounds. Some are rather local in their grounds for objection, and some deal with the wider aspects of the problem according to the knowledge they have of the situation in general. Before I came to the house this session I was asked by certain business elements in Nakusp to call a public meeting there. We called a meeting of representatives from all the points between Nakusp and the lower Arrow lakes, and a number of representatives from Slocan lake also attended. They discussed this question thoroughly. At that meeting over 300 people unanimously expressed their opposition to the building of the Kaiser dam.

Then on my way to this house I was asked by certain representative Revelstoke business people and others to address a meeting in Revelstoke. There were about 200 people at the meeting from Revelstoke and points between Revelstoke and Arrowhead. I was asked to address the meeting because I had been a resident of the district for many years, and I know what I am talking about when it comes to a question of flood levels and things of that sort and what certain elevations mean. That meeting unanimously voiced objection to proceeding with the Kaiser dam and urged the early construction of the Mica creek dam.

Then I have had resolutions and expressions of opinion from trade unions, farmers' institutes representing small communities, fruit growers' organizations, community organizations in Kootenay West and prominent industrialists all in opposition to the suggestion that this dam be built on the lower Arrow lakes. I have talked to several civil engineers in my district, and I have not discussed this question with a single engineer who favours the proposal at this time. In addition, the Vancouver Province and the Vancouver Sun, large dailies in British Columbia, have carried a succession of excellent editorials concerning this proposal.

There are those who are for this proposal, Mr. Speaker, and there are those who are against it. In a democracy I think it is all to the good that both sides of any question be thoroughly aired. I think in British Columbia this subject has been fairly generally aired to date. I may say that to my knowledge not a single organization of any type in Kootenay West has endorsed the proposal to build the Kaiser dam at the lower end of the Arrow lakes.

Our reasons for objecting to the building of this dam are several. First, we believe that the government of British Columbia should be dealing with United States public power authorities rather than a private corporation. In support of that argument I wish to quote from the minutes of the committee of congress which sat in 1933 and 1934 to consider the development of the United States portion of the Columbia river basin. We find the following in the committee's report:

> We believe in private enterprise, in the expectancy of rewards for honest endeavour, labour, initiative and daring, in the things that have made America great. But some things are too big for private enterprise, and the Columbia river is one of these.

We believe that power developments on the Columbia river in Canada should be undertaken by public authorities whether they be provincial or federal or a combination of both.

Our second reason for objecting to the building of this dam is that to grant the Kaiser corporation water rights on the Arrow lakes would upset the pattern of public power development of the Columbia in Canada and affect plans for the building of dams at Mica creek and between Castlegar and the United States border. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) dealt with some of these questions in an excellent letter which he sent to various organizations in British Columbia who were making inquiries concerning the government's attitude with respect to the proposal to build the Kaiser dam. I have a copy of the letter here, and the minister goes to considerable length to explain the government's position. I want to congratulate the minister on the very detailed and clear-cut explanation he gave of the government's objections to the building of the Kaiser dam. A number of people who received this letter are very grateful to have this detailed and exact information. I am not going to read the whole letter, but I do want to refer to some of the reasons given therein for objecting to the building of the dam. In brief the letter says that the principal objections are as follows:

1. It would be unwise to proceed with this project at this time. The power potentialities of the Columbia river basin are still under investigation.

He gave very good reasons for that objection.

2. According to what is presently known, the project does not provide for the maximum use of the storage potential at the Arrow lakes and of the power potential on the Columbia.

I want to refer to that reason because I presume the minister is giving the reason by way of criticism of the present proposal, but I am quite sure he knows as well as I do that we can obtain plenty of storage on the Columbia river behind Mica creek without going ahead at this time with any storage on the Arrow lakes at all.

3. The carrying out of the Arrow lakes project at this stage might delay for quite a number of years the realization of other alternative projects more important to British Columbia and Canada.

[Mr. Herridge.]

We agree with that reason. This is his fourth reason:

4. The terms of the agreement proposed by the B.C. government will have an unfavourable effect on the Canadian aluminum industry, particularly in British Columbia.

This is his fifth reason:

5. The terms of the agreement are bad for B.C. and Canada.

He then gives a long explanation of that and concludes with some interesting figures. We agree with the minister, Mr. Speaker, that to grant these water rights to a private company, the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation, might have a serious effect on plans for the building of dams between Castlegar and the international boundary and at Mica creek.

Another reason for objecting to the proposal is that in the power-hungry United States there is a tremendous and immediate need for increased power production. There is tremendous pressure there for increased power production, and that need can only be met in full on the Columbia by storage in Canada. Canada is in the best bargaining position, as I see it, in Canadian history with respect to developments of this nature, and in our opinion the building of the Kaiser dam on the Arrow lakes would lessen our bargaining power for the building of a much greater development at Mica creek on the upper Columbia.

In support of that argument I want to quote briefly from the Trail Daily Times of December 28, 1954, which makes a brief reference to a speech by Governor Len Jordan of Idaho who is now chairman of the United States section of the international joint commission. The heading of the article is, 'Governor Pushes Plans for 'Columbia' Power". The dispatch is from Boise, Idaho, and this is what it has to say:

Governor Len Jordan was honoured at a dinner Monday night, a week before he leaves for Washington to become a key figure in water resource development negotiations between the United States and Canada. Jordan told reporters earlier he hoped to be able to speed up development of the Columbia river basin as chairman of the United States section of the international joint commission.

The Canadians are in the best bargaining position, he said, because they don't need power from the Columbia right away, while the Pacific northwest does. Their research as to power potential, he said, is at about the point the United States was in the late thirties when the army engineers compiled their comprehensive report on the basin.

We maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the granting of the right to build a dam on the lower Arrow lakes to provide power to certain United States companies would to some extent lessen the pressure and demand for power in the United States and to that extent would weaken our bargaining position. We also believe that it is completely unnecessary at this time to consider building a dam on the Arrow lakes and cause any flooding there. The storage of 3 million feet of water on the Arrow lakes would certainly cause some flooding. Hon. R. E. Sommers, in a radio address over station CBU, Vancouver, on Monday, November 29, 1954, when dealing with the Kaiser dam proposal, had this to say:

> Such a dam will not cause flooding of the Arrow lakes area as the water level will be held where it will not in any way damage existing communities, farm areas, or transportation facilities.

In view of statements made to the press by officials of the Kaiser corporation, who indicate that they intend to raise the Arrow lakes to the 1948 flood level; in view of the research that has been carried on by their employees with respect to the assessed values of properties that would be affected by flooding to the 1948 level; in view of the statements of their engineers when visiting various properties of constituents of mine that the company intended to flood to the 1948 level, it is hard to reconcile these statements, and as a result many of my constituents residing on the Arrow lakes are very concerned about this question.

If the level of the lakes is raised to the 1948 flood level it will mean, without any question, the flooding of many homesites. It will mean the flooding of considerable agricultural land between Renata and Nakusp. It will mean the flooding of industrial sites at Nakusp and Arrowhead and consequent loss of employment and investment in plants, homes, cleared land, etc. It will mean the covering of all beaches on the Arrow lakes for the greater part of the year. It will mean the destruction of all federal government investment in wharves and docking facilities.

My constituents, Mr. Speaker, are very concerned as to what will be the effect of raising the water in the Arrow lakes above normal. If it were raised to the 1948 flood level it would destroy a great amount of property, and would cause many people to lose their employment because of the closing down of several mills and things of that sort. As our people view it, they do not consider that the extent of this flooding and the ruin it could cause is justified by the return of a million dollars a year in power or taxes to the government of British Columbia.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the small mills and pole yards around the village of Nakusp on the Arrow lakes last year shipped out over a million dollars' worth of timber products. If the flooding were to the 1948 flood level it would mean that those industries would have to go out of operation as industrial sites on the foreshore became unusable. That is another reason I am glad to know this bill is going before a committee. In that way we can get some exact information as to the water levels that are proposed as a result of the building of this dam.

On the one hand we have the minister saying there will be no flooding on the Arrow lakes. On the other hand we have the company officials making statements to the press and going to the Revelstoke assessment office to check up on the value of the property included in the 1948 flood level for compensation purposes. At the same time we have officials of the Kaiser corporation saying they are quite willing to compensate for any farm homes, industrial sites or other properties flooded. I cannot reconcile these statements. I believe careful examination of certain witnesses is required to get at the facts.

We are opposed to the building of this dam because this group believe that the power potential of Canadian rivers should be first developed to increase industrial production in Canada and provide employment for Canadians. In that connection I should like to quote from the Vancouver Province of November 24, 1954. According to that newspaper the Hon. P. A. Gaglardi, when addressing the automotive retailers' association of British Columbia at the Hotel Vancouver, had this to say, and this statement is in quotation marks:

> "Industry on this continent is looking for power," he told the annual convention of the automotive retailers' association of B.C. at the Hotel Vancouver.
> "So far, only 13·4 per cent of our hydroelectric potential has been developed. We must develop more, and the only profitable way to do this is to sell or export it to the United States," he said.
> Defending the provincial government's stand on the Arrow lakes to supply the Kaiser interests in the United States with power, Mr. Gaglardi said, "this move must be done before atomic energy becomes a reality."

We cannot agree with the minister of public works of British Columbia. While we may make some co-operative arrangement about the storage of water, we believe that power produced in Canada should be used to expand Canadian industry.

What is the experience in looking forward to power developments in the future in Canada and in the United States? I have read a good deal on this subject, and I find that when the Grand Coulee dam was built some people in the United States considered there would be a surplus of power for many years. In fact there was considerable criticism because of the surplus power available at that time. What is the situation today? There is a severe power famine in the very area served by the Grand Coulee dam.

International Rivers

Then again, on April 10, 1942, an order in council was passed by this government that actually provided for the building of the Brilliant dam in the Kootenays for a public expenditure of approximately $10 million. At that time it was considered that the net return to the company on any investment in such additional plant would be negligible, and furthermore that after the war such a plant would probably be of little value to the company. Now, Mr. Speaker, to illustrate how careful we must be in looking to the future and, as the minister said, in thinking of future generations because things happen much more quickly now than they did a few years ago, I may say that in contrast to the opinion expressed by Consolidated Mining and Smelting at that time, the demand for power has increased to such an extent that the company has recently spent over $35 million in the building of another power plant at Waneta.

When addressing the Canadian-United States committee of the chambers of commerce at a meeting in Quebec last October, General McNaughton had this to say in part:

> But, please, do not think that this means there is going to be power in Canada which will be surplus and to spare. This is certainly not the case, for the most carefully made predictions show that only a comparatively short time remains until we may expect that all our economically available hydro power will be in use.

In view of the experience of the past in the United States and Canada I prefer to listen to the opinion of General McNaughton rather than the short-term view expressed by the minister of public works of British Columbia. I repeat that we believe in power development in Canada to provide permanent employment for Canadians. For the reasons I have outlined, we are opposed to the building of the Kaiser dam on the Arrow lakes. We intend to support this bill because we believe its effect will be to promote the sound development of the power and water storage potentials of international rivers, such as the Columbia, in Canada.

Before concluding, I must draw to the government's attention the great support for the early commencement of the Mica dam north of Revelstoke, which investigations have proven to be a practical project. The average annual flow of the Columbia is about 50 million acre feet, rising to 90 million acre feet on certain occasions. This dam would permit the storage of between 10 and 15 million acre feet at Mica creek. The building of this dam would provide great power resources for British Columbia, employment for Canadians, ample storage for United States plants, and without flooding established agriculture and industry.

[Mr. Herridge.]

We are informed that United States interests have already offered to spend up to $250 million to construct a dam at Mica creek, which the people of British Columbia would own, and generators could be installed to meet the requirements of industrial development in British Columbia as necessary. This offer alone indicates our strong bargaining position, and should be a spur to co-operation between the federal and provincial governments in developing the vast water resources of the Columbia river in Canada. I believe this vast development demands the establishment of a Columbia basin authority in Canada as the result of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, from my knowledge of the great developments ahead on the Columbia and their importance to the future of British Columbia and Canada, that co-operation must be the watchword if we are to achieve success. There must be co-operation in this development between the federal and provincial governments, as well as co-operation with the public power authorities in the United States.

Nature has blessed us with a natural resource that can be developed to the mutual advantage of all concerned, Canadians and Americans. I plead again for the co-operation so necessary to bring the developments on this river to fruition.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speakers who have taken part in the debate thus far. Several comments made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce are praiseworthy and should be taken note of at this time. One of the first that struck my ear was that we cannot afford to waste water. Since it has been established by the various speakers that this is more or less developing into a debate on the Kaiser dam, I think I am justified in taking a similar stand for at least part of my talk. When he says we cannot afford to waste water I would remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the Kaiser dam is proposed for the conservation and not for the wasting of water.

Another comment he made was that we should resolve any problem we have in a friendly and co-operative manner. I sincerely hope that in all the ramifications of this great bill and the many projects which are going to be entered into, that spirit will be remembered in deed as well as in word.

Another thing that struck me, Mr. Speaker, was that the rights of the individual are very important. I do not think there is anyone in this house who recognizes that any more than I do, but I should like to go a little bit further. I maintain that the rights of the provincial governments should be equally respected. Right through the whole talk of the minister all I could sense was a centralization here in Ottawa of the authority that is going to control and give permission for any development that might arise in the minds of people anywhere in Canada in respect of waters that cross international boundaries. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) emphasized the fact that in British Columbia we have more of these problems facing us than in any other province, and therefore we are more vitally concerned. But I do not like the idea of this Canadian government setting itself up as an all-wise authority to say either yes or no to any project that might take form in the minds of people in any part of Canada, and that refers to other things besides the development of water power.

I also noted that at the present time we can transmit power a distance of up to 500 miles. I did not think we could transmit it that far. I am not at the moment disputing the minister in that regard; we will admit that is so. In what way is our power to go? There is only one way it can go for use, and that is to the south. It is admitted that British Columbia has the greatest source of power in Canada. In fact we are told that there are power sites surveyed in the province of British Columbia whose potential has been ascertained that could supply more power than is used by the entire Dominion of Canada today. Those surveyed sites, Mr. Speaker, are only a part of the great power potential. Let that suffice for what the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to say.

I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra cover the geography of this great question so well. He mentioned rivers that I did not know existed in the province of British Columbia. He covered the ground so well that he saved me the necessity of referring to these things. But he did emphasize a point that I want to emphasize also, namely that this is new and important legislation entering into a field of development that is going to concern our province more than all the rest of Canada combined, and therefore we demand that it be given serious consideration in the debate on second reading as well as when it goes to the committee on external affairs. I am glad to know that the bill is being sent to that committee.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra also mentioned the invasion of provincial rights. I shall have a little more to say about that. I kept a sheet for the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West, but in his 40 minutes I found very little to write on it. The only thing I am going to do, for fear this house might think that everyone in this part of British Columbia is opposing the Kaiser dam, is to put on the record a short excerpt from a letter which I received dated January 20. This letter came from a reliable resident of a town not far from his, the little town of Burton. This is part of the letter:

> Without opposition in the house I am afraid my friend Mr. Herridge could make it appear that the residents in general are all against this dam being built. This is not the case. Of course there is some opposition but that stems mainly from the C.C.F. party. A big meeting held in Nakusp on December 20 passed a resolution opposing the dam being built, but that was a C.C.F. meeting and, I understand, there was quite a lot of opposition at that meeting to the proposals of the C.C.F., so you can see it might be reported to the house as 100 per cent against the dam unless others like yourself know differently.

I believe it was so reported. I think the words used were "the decision was unanimous"; therefore, Mr. Speaker, I place this on the record.

Mr. Herridge: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the meeting the hon. member refers to was called at the request of several businessmen, and the chairman of the meeting was a gentleman who is not a member of the C.C.F.

Mr. McLeod: I should like you to know, Mr. Speaker, that I am reading only from a letter which I have accepted. I might also quote another paragraph:

> As I stated in my letter,—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member and remind him of our rule that when a member quotes from a letter he must divulge the source. I do not think he has done that.

Mr. McLeod: Well, I vouch for the authenticity—that is a pretty big word.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member vouches for the authenticity he must not quote directly from the document. He must paraphrase it and make its words his own.

Mr. McLeod: Then I shall give you the name, because I have permission.

Mr. Speaker: If he wants to quote directly from the document he must divulge the source.

Mr. McLeod: I shall, Mr. Speaker, because I have the permission of the writer to divulge the name. It is Mr. H. W. Stones of Burton. He is a general merchant and a notary public. He writes:

> I am not a Social Crediter, but just try and prevent me from voting for them at the next election as this British Columbia government has done more for our part of the country since they have been in office than the other governments have done in the last 30 years.

I am not going to enter into any argument as to the mechanics of the dam because when I get talking about electricity, kilowatts and all the rest of it I do not know where I am. However, I am going to refer to the political aspect of the bill. My great opposition to the bill is that I believe it is nothing more nor less than a political instrument used by the government of Canada to thwart the province of British Columbia in a development which the people have a right to expect. I should like to read from a statement in the Vancouver Province under headlines so large that I think even the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) can see them. The headline is as follows:

Sinclair opens fight for Ottawa against B.C. over Kaiser Dam Plan

I am not going to read the whole article, but I would like to quote one or two excerpts. One thing that struck me is that the reporter said the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) took off his gloves. I was wondering why in the world he would do that, but after reading the article I came to the conclusion that he took them off so he would not get them soiled by the mud-slinging he was going to engage in. The minister was speaking at a meeting in North Vancouver, and in referring to the dam the article states:

The proposal, he said: "is bad for Canada, bad for B.C. and Mr. Howe (Right Hon. C. D. Howe) has notified B.C. that he is going to amend the act which controls the export of energy".

We need to go only a little further to see the political implication. I do hate smeary and dirty politics, and it is seldom that I stoop so low as to even quote things like these. He referred to the premier of British Columbia in these words: "in that wide toothpasty smile of his". That particular phrase strikes me because perhaps I am a little bit jealous of our premier. I just wish I had teeth that were so worthy of display as his. Then a little later the article states:

Premier Bennett is premier of B.C. only because of a last-minute decision to get on the Social Credit bandwagon.

I have before me the last issue of Maclean's magazine and I should like to refer to an article there. This particular article pays Mr. Bennett credit, though I have read others which have opposed him. I quote:

This remarkable change in Bennett's political fortunes is no accident. It's the logical outcome of a lifetime of study, labour and ambition: an object lesson in how to become a political strong man.

Mr. Speaker: I do not object to the words in the magazine article in question dealing with the premier of British Columbia, but in quoting that article the hon. member is not quoting something relevant to the principle of this bill.

Mr. Low: It is just as relevant as Mr. Jimmy Sinclair's remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the remark of the hon. member for Peace River. Would he be kind enough to repeat it, because to my knowledge the Minister of Fisheries has not taken part in this debate.

Mr. Low: He has not inside the house, but he has tried to take the debate outside the house. What was said by the hon. member is just as relevant to the principle of this bill as was the statement outside the house by the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I must tell the hon. member for Peace River that when a minister or an hon. member makes a speech outside the house he is not under my jurisdiction. It just so happens, and perhaps it is unfortunate, that the hon. member who now has the floor is under my jurisdiction. It is with that that I am concerned at the moment, and I know the hon. member will want to co-operate.

Mr. McLeod: I appreciate your ruling.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. McLeod: It is not quite ten o'clock; I have a couple of minutes yet. There is just one other item which does not deal with Mr. Bennett or any of the officials of the British Columbia government. The Minister of Fisheries said that the real head-on conflict is just coming to a boil. I have never heard of any conflict in British Columbia between the people of that province and the government of Canada. I am going to ask the government of Canada to get around the conference table and talk over this question. When they issue an invitation to the government at Victoria, as I hope they will, I am sure our premier will be quite willing to come here to discuss the matter with the government of Canada.

On motion of Mr. McLeod the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacInnis: What will be the business on Monday?

Mr. Harris: Whatever any private member has in mind.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 7, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED REPLACEMENT OF MANAGEMENT PERSONNEL

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked a question regarding an item in the Winnipeg Free Press attributing to Mr. F. H. Keefe, general manager of the Canadian National western region, certain remarks about reductions in the railway budget. Later on that same day the hon. member took the opportunity afforded by the debate on the address to comment on the statements attributed to Mr. Keefe.

I shall not reply to the comments of the hon. member but in fairness to Mr. Keefe and the management I think I should draw the attention of hon. members to the dispatch appearing in Saturday's papers in which Mr. Keefe flatly denies that at any time in his remarks did he mention Mr. Gordon or the management at Montreal. In his statement to the press, as reported by the Montreal Gazette of February 5, Mr. Keefe said he had intended to indicate that recent layoffs had been the result of falling traffic and that if business continued to decline other economies might be necessary. The Gazette report goes on to say that Mr. Keefe stated he had added in a jocular way, the occasion being a social banquet, some reference to his own job being at stake unless expenses were kept down. No statement was made by the president of the railway such as attributed to him in the Winnipeg Free Press report.

It will be of interest, I think, if I remind the house that in the dispatch containing Mr. Keefe's denial there was also a statement by Mr. J. R. McMillan, vice president of the railway in Winnipeg, that while avenues of economy are constantly being studied the present outlook is for traffic to continue at its present volume, and I particularly mention his opinion as reported in the same dispatch that no further staff layoffs are anticipated.

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORTED SALE OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE AIRLINES—RECOVERY OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that Queen Charlotte Airlines of Vancouver has received an offer or offers of purchase substantially in excess of the asset value of the company, and is it the government's intention to attempt to recover part or all of the quarter of a million dollar subsidy paid to the said company in the last two years if the sale transaction is consummated?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take the hon. member's question as a notice and reply to it tomorrow.

PRIVATE BILLS

HURON AND ERIE MORTGAGE CORPORATION

Mr. J. W. Monteith (for Mr. Mitchell, London) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, respecting the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 10, for the relief of Daisy Ruth Kirk Stanistreet.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 11, for the relief of Irene Christina Edwards Mackay.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 12, for the relief of Barbara Elinor Richardson Jones.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 13, for the relief of Wira Pushkar Tereshtshenko.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 14, for the relief of Stella (Stephania) Burnatowska Holowaty. — Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 15, for the relief of Harry Evert Finlayson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 16, for the relief of George James Nangreaves.—Mr. Hunter.

Private Bills—Divorce

Bill No. 17, for the relief of Carmela Lanza Morash.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 18, for the relief of Meyer Francis Doyle.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 19, for the relief of Julia Mary Collen Dwyer Rose.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 20, for the relief of Bela Koschitza Brawerman.—Mr. Hunter.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that since this is Monday any discussion of these divorce bills would cut down the time to be devoted to private members' resolutions. Therefore I propose to say nothing in detail about these particular bills but I do want to express the hope that some other method may be found for dealing with these divorce bills than having them come before this house.

Since these bills concern only two provinces may I offer the suggestion that hon. members from those provinces—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member to remind him that we are at the beginning of a new session. During previous sessions we have had debates as to how these divorce bills shall be dealt with on second reading. It being the beginning of a new session perhaps one may be permitted to adopt a new resolution. I have resolved that no matter how much latitude I may be inclined to give I shall not allow any discussion except that which relates to the principle of the bill. I do not think hon. members will find that they are referring to the principle of these bills when they stand up and offer suggestions as to how they should be dealt with. That is not the manner in which this can be brought about.

If the hon. member wishes to submit by way of a bill some other method by which these divorce bills can be dealt with, he will have ample opportunity to incorporate whatever suggestions he may have to offer. But I do not think it is in order on the second reading of these bills to make such suggestions, and I would like the hon. member's co-operation in respect to this point.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with what you have said. I am quite aware also that I have the right to go into the details of these bills. I could go into them thoroughly and keep the house for at least the next 40 minutes. But that is something that I do not want to do. Also I could have asked that each bill be called and dealt with separately, but that is something which I think would be completely wrong. I may have only 30 seconds left now, but the suggestion I was going to make would have taken but 30 seconds. However, that is your ruling and I bow to it.

[Mr. Hunter.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may do whatever is in order no matter how long it may take, but he cannot do anything that is not in order.

Mr. Knight: It would not be in order to suggest that the members of parliament who are from those provinces might meet and consider this matter and call in consultation interested people and devise some method agreeable to those provinces?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; the hon. member has asked a question. My reply is that it is not in order. Shall these bills be read a second time now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

QUESTIONS

RADIOACTIVITY TESTS

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace):

1. What are the physical measurements of radioactivity?
2. How many times has radioactivity been detected, at what strength, and for what periods, in (a) Ottawa; (b) Montreal?
3. Has any consideration been given to requesting the United States government to hold their proposed February atomic bomb tests in some location more distant than Nevada?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Radioactivity is measured in roentgens.

2. Radioactivity can be detected in the atmosphere at all times but following atomic and thermonuclear explosions the radioactive content is increased. Since March 1951 the defence research board has been measuring the radioactive content of the atmosphere in the Ottawa area and, while an increase in radioactivity has been noted following explosions, the increase has never been sufficient to constitute any hazard to human, animal or plant life. The defence research board has not made any examination of the radioactive content of the atmosphere in the Montreal area.

3. For the reasons given to the house on another occasion, Hansard of April 5, 1954, at page 3645, no danger of contamination is anticipated from the proposed February atomic bomb tests in Nevada. Hence, there is no need to ask the government of the United States to hold these tests at a more distant location.

MEAT AND POULTRY IMPORTS

Mr. Charlton:

1. How many pounds of (a) beef; (b) pork; (c) lamb or mutton; (d) poultry, have been imported into Canada each year from and including 1950?
2. From what countries, and of what dollar value in each case?

Mr. Dickey: 1 and 2.

Imports into Canada of (a) beef; (b) pork; (c) lamb or mutton; (d) poultry, by countries, during the calendar years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953 and during the period January 1, to November 30, 1954 (latest available).

Questions

TWO CENT POSTAGE RATE

Mr. Knowles:

1. What steps has the Post Office Department taken to inform the public as to what items can be mailed in Canada in unsealed envelopes for two cents postage?
2. What are the items that can be mailed for two cents postage?
3. Is consideration being given to make this information more widely known? If so, in what ways?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1. By means of: (a) The postal guide and monthly supplements thereto; (b) The booklet of postal information (available free of charge); (c) Display of notices in post office lobbies; (d) Paid advertising in newspapers, magazines, radio and other similar media; (e) Personal addresses by public relations officers to schools, service clubs, church groups and business organizations.

2. (a) Circulars, catalogues, books, greeting cards and other matter which is entirely printed; (b) Partly printed and partly written items not having the character of personal correspondence such as federal and provincial government statistical returns, notices of meeting cards, notice of polling cards, price lists.

3. The department takes advantage of every reasonable opportunity to disseminate postal information and will continue to do so.

NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. Hodgson:

What was the national debt at the end of the fiscal years 1935, 1940, 1945, 1950, 1953?

Mr. Benidickson: See page 119 of the public accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954.

PROPORTIONS OF TAXES RECEIVED AND SPENT

Mr. Balcom:

1. What proportion of each dollar received by the government comes from (a) individual income taxes; (b) corporation income taxes; (c) excise taxes; (d) customs duties and other taxes; (e) loans, etc?
2. What proportion of each dollar, received by the government, is spent for (a) national defence; (b) national welfare and social services; (c) veterans pensions?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. (x) (a) 27 cents* in 1953-54; (b) 27 cents*; (c) 20 cents*; (d) 17 cents.

*Excluding old age security tax receipts.

(x) These taxes total 91 cents. The remaining 9 cents is received from non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits. (See page 21 of the public accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954).

[Mr. Dickey.]

2. (a) 42 cents in 1953-54; (b) 12 cents *; (c) 3 cents.

*Excluding old age security pension payments.

DEBTS OWING BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Are regular payments being made by China, Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Greece on their outstanding debt to Canada?
2. If not, what reason is given in each case?
3. Have any of the above-mentioned nations indicated intention to keep up regular payments in the future?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. China, Greece and Rumania are not making any payments on their debt to Canada. Czechoslovakia has resumed payments on its indebtedness to Canada.

2. The government of China has indicated that it is unable to meet its obligation to Canada because of a shortage of foreign exchange and heavy military expenditure.

Rumania has not paid interest on its indebtedness since 1941 and no reasons have been officially communicated to the Canadian government.

Greece has not paid interest on or principal of its indebtedness since 1931, stating that it is unable to make such payments.

3. Czechoslovakia—Yes. China, Rumania and Greece—No.

REVENUES RECEIVED FROM PROVINCES

Mr. Hahn:

What was the sum total of all revenues received from each province by the federal government for each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954?

Mr. Benidickson: The federal government does not receive revenues from provinces outside of small amounts for rentals, sales of publications, etc.

GRAIN HANDLING

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SHAUGHNESSY HOSPITAL, VANCOUVER—FISH PURCHASES

Mr. Green:

1. From what firms has fish been purchased for Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver, during the past two years?

2. In each case, what other firms, if any, tendered for the sale of such fish?
3. What were the amounts of the respective tenders including those that were accepted?

HIGHWAY SAFETY CONFERENCE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the federal government, or any minister thereof, given consideration to inviting the appropriate representatives of the various provinces to meet for the purpose of discussing highway safety programs in order that efforts might be made to reduce the number of deaths and injuries on our highways?
2. If so, what is the result of such consideration?
3. Has a tentative date for such a meeting been proposed?

N.H.A. LOANS NEAR AIRPORTS

Mr. Knight:

1. Has the government recently issued regulations prohibiting the making of loans under N.H.A. for building in the vicinity of airports?
2. If so, what was the date of the announcement of such regulations?
3. What are the distances from the airports to which such prohibition applies?
4. Has the government announced any regulations tending to protect life in the areas prohibited where residential buildings have already been erected?
5. Near what airports are there such residential buildings, other than government buildings, within the prescribed area?
6. Has the government considered prohibiting future erection of any and all residential buildings within the prescribed areas?
7. If so, what has been the result of such consideration?

MONT JOLI AND RIMOUSKI AIRPORTS

Mr. Balcer:

FUEL PURCHASES, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Purdy:

What was the cost of fuel purchased by the federal government for use in each of the four Atlantic provinces, during the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1954, under the following headings: Nova Scotia coal, New Brunswick coal, other Canadian coal, United States coal, other imported coal, fuel oil?

FUR IMPORTS FROM RUSSIA

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What quantity of fur, raw and processed, has been imported into Canada from the U.S.S.R. since October, 1953?
2. What is the total value of such furs?
3. Of what varieties are the furs thus imported?

[Mr. Green.]

4. What tariff is imposed upon these furs?
5. What Canadian firms purchased pelts from Russia?
6. Have any muskrat skins been imported from any European country? If so, in what quantities and from what countries?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRAIN WRECK, AVOLA, B.C.

Mr. Hahn:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Transport, the board of railway commissioners and/or others, pertaining to Mr. A. G. Webster, conductor, relative to a train wreck on Canadian National Railways track at Avola, British Columbia, on May 28, 1942.

He said: I had an early understanding that this motion would stand for the time being.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

QUEEN ELIZABETH HOTEL, MONTREAL

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and communications since the first day of September, 1954, that have passed between the Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways respecting the lease of the Queen Elizabeth hotel in the city of Montreal to the Hilton Hotels Corporation.

Mr. Marler: This motion asks for the production of correspondence between the Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways respecting the so-called lease of the Queen Elizabeth hotel.

May I say at once that arrangements concerning the hotel are not a lease but an agreement for the management of the hotel, and with deference I submit that as the management of the hotel is clearly a matter of internal operation of the railway this motion should not be accepted by the house.

As hon. members know, parliament has consistently maintained the view that the management of the railway should not be required to make public information relating to the affairs of the system that their competitor is not obligated to produce.

In the circumstances I would hope the hon. member will agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says no, and naturally he expects me to collect the voices. I do not want to offer any objection to that today, but I want hon. members to follow my reasoning and think it over so that they will decide themselves perhaps what they should do in the future with respect to these motions. It is simply this: the house is entitled to get only what it is allowed to get. Bourinot claims that the house is not entitled to ask for confidential documents, documents of a private nature or for any documents which the minister may decide that it is not in the public interest to produce. When a minister rises in his place and says, "I cannot produce these", and an hon. member says "I would like the opinion of the house to be decided by a vote", it means one of two things; either the member who is now asking that I collect the voices for the purpose of provoking a division does not believe the minister when he says that the documents asked for are not in the public interest to produce, and therefore he is not accepting the minister's word, which in all cases must be accepted in this house. Whenever a member declares a thing to be such and such he declares it on his honour, and therefore his word must be accepted. If, on the other hand, the house should vote upon the motion in an affirmative way, it would mean that although a minister of the crown has declared that it is not in the public interest to produce certain documents, the house would override that and would force the production of confidential documents or documents which it is not in the public interest to produce, and thus the house would insist upon having documents which it is not entitled to obtain.

I would like hon. members to think that over because it seems to me that in most cases, as far as one can look back in Hansard since confederation, that was the decision arrived at. Of course, there was a time when these notices of motions for production of papers were debatable and long debates took place upon them. But all leaders of parties, in or out of power, have always agreed that they should not insist upon production of papers which are declared not to be in the interest of the house to get. See Bourinot, fourth edition, pages 249-254; Todd's Parliamentary Government in England, revised by Spencer Walpole, volume II, pages 157-160. See also debates, March 17, 1921, pages 1003-4, volume II, 1921.

Today, as I say, I will just leave these remarks for the consideration of hon. members, and perhaps later on I shall hear comments of hon. members on this reasoning. Does the hon. member for Prince Albert wish to say something?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Your Honour has seen fit to give a summary of the past procedure in giving an indication that any such appeal at this time would indeed be almost in the nature of an appeal from your own view, I am not going to press it at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I tell the hon. member from Prince Albert that I sincerely appreciate the attitude that he is taking on this particular matter. As I said, I do not want to impose a ruling today, but I should like hon. members to think over carefully what I have said because I do not see how one can get out of it. To me the situation is simply this. You can put on the order paper a notice of motion for the production of papers. If you were to ask for documents that it is not in the public interest to produce, the clerk of orders and notices would tell the hon. member who would like to put such notice of motion on the order paper: "You cannot put it on the order paper; I cannot accept it". You cannot ask for the production of confidential, private or personal documents or those documents that it is not in the public interest to produce. If you ask for documents and the minister says it is not in the public interest to produce those documents, if you do not accept his word it is tantamount to saying that the minister is not telling the truth. If he is telling the truth, there is only one thing to do and that is to have the motion dropped. For today the motion is to be dropped.

Mr. Fulton: May I make a suggestion, Mr. Speaker? I know that I am not entitled to question Your Honour but I make the suggestion that some opportunity be provided for further discussion on the point at another date this session. I take the liberty of suggesting that, as Your Honour has pointed out, in the old days these motions were debatable. It would then be open to the minister to satisfy or to attempt to satisfy the house as to the justification for his position that it was not in the public interest to produce the document. In the same way it would be open to the party seeking its production to try to satisfy the minister and the house that it was in the public interest. Your Honour has pointed out that that sort of debate is no longer permitted. I think it is for that reason that the practice of having a vote on such motions has arisen; because some members of the house may genuinely and sincerely disagree with the suggestion that the matter is against the public interest. Before we appear to accept the suggestion that such motion should not be the subject of division, I would again repeat my suggestion that there be further opportunity to discuss the matter.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that nowadays the motions are still debatable, but not when introduced in this way. If the hon. member looks at standing order 51 he will see this:

> . . . but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the Clerk to the order of "notices of motions".

COMPETITIVE VALUE OF GAS IN INDUSTRY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of the report made in 1954 by Dr. Hume and Mr. Arch Crozier containing the results of an investigation made regarding the competitive value of gas used in industry.

He said: With the leave of the house may I ask that this motion be withdrawn?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FIELD OFFICERS, P.F.R.A.-P.F.A.A.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a return showing the names of all personnel in the P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. who are officials or field officers, coupled with the salaries and expenses paid to each of them during the year 1954.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE AND PERMISSIBLE INCOME

On the order:

Mr. MacDougall—The following proposed resolution:—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of increasing the war veterans allowance and permissive income.

Mr. MacDougall: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I will allow the hon. member to let his notice of motion stand. I am sorry to appear to be so destructive today. Hon. members will notice that this motion deals with the war veterans allowance and permissive income. On the order paper there are two other notices of motions on the same subject, one in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) and the other in the name of the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. White). Hon. members will also have noticed that on the order paper, under government orders, there is in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) a resolution which reads as follows:

That it is expedient to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act to increase the allowances and the permissible income; to further extend the benefits of the act . . .

And so on. If we were to allow debate on this motion, it would anticipate a debate on a government order which has priority because the motion which stands in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs is one which is the first stage of a money bill. If hon. members will look at Campion, An Introduction to Procedure of House of Commons, page 144, under the heading "Rules relating to Substantive Motions", paragraph (5), they will find this:

Finally, certain matters by their very nature are inadmissible in debate, whether upon motion or otherwise. Such are matters anticipating an order of the day, and matters which have already been decided during the current session.

Then if the hon. member will look at page 152, under the heading "Anticipation in Debate", he will see this:

In applying the anticipation rule preference is given to the discussion which leads to the most effective result, and this has established a descending scale of values for discussions—bills, motions, amendments, etc. Thus a bill or other order of the day must not be anticipated by . . . discussion of a motion, amendment, or subject raised on another motion, such as that for the adjournment of the house.

By virtue of this rule the notices of motions standing in the names of the three hon. gentlemen I have mentioned must be dropped from the order paper because they are not admissible in debate.

This notice of motion, No. 7, is dropped.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DECLARATION TO ENSURE FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT AS TO JURISDICTION

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing a bill or declaration of rights to assure amongst other rights:

1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of radio;
2. That habeas corpus shall not be abrogated or suspended except by parliament;
3. That no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, and in no case by order in council;
4. That no tribunal or commission shall have the power to compel the giving of evidence by any one who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

And that as a preliminary step the government should consider the advisability of submitting for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the degree to which fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are matters of federal or provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, with respect to this motion which has to do with human rights, hon. members will also have noticed that there are on the order paper two other motions on the same subject, one in the name of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the other one in the name of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I want to tell these hon. gentlemen that there will be only one debate on human rights and since this motion is now being taken up, we will be dealing with this one.

Mr. Coldwell: If there is to be only one debate on human rights, Mr. Speaker, may

I have the privilege, with the unanimous consent of the house, of withdrawing my motion?

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Croll: In the light of your suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I also wish to withdraw my motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a motion similar to the one now before the house has been up for consideration on other occasions and represents in epitome many of the same characteristics as the resolutions introduced by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). On this occasion I intend immediately to place before the house a draft bill of rights—one that was drafted in the other place by a committee headed by the distinguished Senator Roebuck, and whose membership consisted entirely of Liberal members in the Senate—with the necessary changes made therein to meet certain terms contained in the resolution which I have introduced. I hope that on this occasion an opportunity will be given to have a vote, for it is strange that on the other occasions when this matter has been before the house there has invariably been a motion to adjourn the debate before any opportunity was given for the house to vote on the resolution. On the 24th of March, 1952, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) moved, at the conclusion of one or two speeches on the subject, that the debate on the resolution be adjourned, a vote was taken, and adjournment was upheld by 86 to 28. On December 7, 1953, when the house was considering a resolution by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) which had to do with the international declaration of human freedoms, again it was the present Minister of Finance who, after an amendment was placed before the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), moved that the discussion be adjourned, and it was adjourned.

I hope that a similar course will not be followed which simply has the effect of killing discussion and a vote, for the resolution then goes to the foot of the list and there is no possibility during the session of it coming up for further hearing. I am going to place before the house in summary a draft Canadian bill of rights or declaration of freedoms, which is as follows:

Human Rights

Article 1

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and the security of person.

Article 2

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to recognition throughout Canada as a person before the law.

Article 4

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law.

Article 5

Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 6

(1) No person shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

(2) Any person who is arrested or detained shall be promptly informed of the reasons for the arrest or detention and be entitled to a fair hearing within a reasonable time or to release.

(3) No one shall be denied the right to reasonable bail without just cause.

(4) No tribunal, royal commission, board or state official shall have the right to compel anyone to give evidence who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

Article 7

Every person who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall have an effective remedy in the nature of habeas corpus by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful. Habeas corpus shall not be abridged, suspended or abrogated except by parliament.

Article 8

Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 9

Every person is entitled to all the rights and freedoms herein set forth without distinction of any kind such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Article 10

Any person whose rights or freedoms as herein set forth have been violated may apply for relief on notice of motion to the supreme or superior court of the province in which the violation occurred.

Finally—

Mr. Garson: Might I ask my hon. friend a question? These are the material—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have one more.

Article 11

The above articles shall not be deemed to abridge or exclude any rights or freedoms to which any person is otherwise entitled.

Mr. Garson: I should like to ask my hon. friend if these are not the articles approved by the Senate committee which my hon. friend used in the last speech he made upon the subject in the last parliament. They are the same articles?

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are identical with the provisions which I placed before the house in 1952 and, I would say to my hon. friend, represent the result of the lengthy consideration by the committee headed by Senator Roebuck in the other place, subject to one or two amendments that I have added thereto in order to cover the situation as I see it.

Some contend that there is no reason for a discussion of fundamental freedoms in this house. Let me point out that Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the 19th of March, 1918, said this:

> Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and the universal testimony of history is that unless there is eternal vigilance on the part of a strong and resolute opposition, encroachments upon freedom and abuses in office will creep in, just as surely and just as certainly as weeds and tares will invade and choke the crops of the husbandman if he is not constantly on the watch. . . . Nothing is more certain than that one illegality will lead to another; that, as a logical consequence, wrong will be followed by wrong.

To indicate the value of the discussions which have taken place from time to time during the last eight or nine years, I point out that since 1952, when these matters were last discussed in this house, changes have been brought about in large measure due to the creation of public opinion respecting matters about which criticism was made at that time. One of the statutes introduced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) whereby discrimination on federal contracts is made punishable was a matter that had been discussed on several occasions in the house. Second, the fiction that the king can do no wrong, which throughout the years denied the subject, except in qualified circumstances, the right of action against the crown, in consequence of public opinion created through previous debates and through publicity, has been abolished within the last few years.

Another matter that was complained about in 1952 was that there was no right of appeal to the courts against the arbitrary denial of appeal against orders made by judges for contempt of court. Objection to the absence of the right of appeal was raised on more than one occasion when the subject of human freedoms was before the house, and public opinion was created. Newspapers had their own experiences when they found that there was no right of appeal, and ultimately the house passed an amendment which allowed the right of appeal. Finally, one other matter to which strong objection was taken because of its challenge to human freedoms and fundamental rights was the emergency powers act which a year ago now was allowed to lapse.

People say to me, what interest is there in the country in this subject? More than 800,000 Canadians have signed petitions on two occasions asking that Canada have the same protection for its rights and fundamental freedoms that 30 other countries with a federal system have, including India. The Canadian Daily Newspapers Association, a body with a membership of 86 of the 89 English and French language daily newspapers in Canada, representing 99·4 per cent of the circulation of all Canadian dailies, an organization that has no political connection, has taken a formal position in favour of a Canadian bill of rights. They pointed out the fact that while Canadians consider fundamental freedoms as part of their heritage, fundamental freedoms can be interfered with in the absence of a bill of rights. I quote from the brief of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association:

> . . . the daily newspapers of Canada urge that consideration be given to a constitutional guarantee of fundamental human rights, it is because they are convinced these rights are insecure. They know that threats have been made to freedom of speech, freedom of the press and other freedoms in the past. They feel sure that threats will be made in the future.

Then, again, from the same brief:

> The Canadian Daily Newspapers Association submits that . . . constitutional safeguards . . . not only prove that freedom of speech and freedom of the press lack adequate safeguards in Canada, but place the representatives of this country in a weak position, open to destructive attack, in implementing the obligations of this country as a member of the United Nations in respect to human rights and fundamental freedoms.
> The board of directors of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association, at a special general meeting in October, 1945 and in October, 1947, unanimously resolved that a statutory guarantee of essential freedoms might be covered in the following terms.

The amendments suggested by the daily newspapers association are as follows:

> No act of the parliament of Canada nor of the legislature of any province shall abridge the freedom of speech, of the press or of assembly or of worship or the right to petition the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province for the redress of grievances.

I believe that an amendment in that form might invade the powers of provincial legislatures under the British North America Act. Therefore I would not approve of such a course being followed until, as I intend to suggest later on, a submission is made to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In this brief of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association the following appeared:

> In Canada we have been coasting insecurely upon British precedents and sometimes violating them, and in the light of Canada's membership in the United Nations and its responsibility as a member, the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association urges that the parliamentary committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms give favourable consideration to a constitutional amendment guaranteeing these fundamental freedoms.

I point out, sir, that that brief was advanced by the newspaper association before the recent case of Blair Fraser in which the freedom of the press comes into issue. I shall not refer to the action in general as it is before the courts. Mr. Fraser was called to give evidence on an examination for discovery in an action commenced against him and Maclean's magazine for libel. He was asked who furnished him with the information upon which he based the allegations he made in an article in Maclean's magazine. He refused to give answers as to the identity of the individuals from whom he had secured the information. An application was made to a supreme court judge in British Columbia, in which province the action was commenced, to compel him to answer these questions.

The judge before whom the motion came directed him to answer these questions, and an appeal was taken to the court of appeal of British Columbia. The appeal was dismissed, one judge dissenting. A subsequent appeal was made to the Supreme Court of Canada but the supreme court refused leave to appeal, following generally the principle of that court in refusing to hear appeals dealing with questions of procedure in the courts.

The interesting situation in connection with the order made in the Blair Fraser case was this. Unless the law is changed, the result must be a drying up of the sources of information upon which the press in Canada must depend. In Great Britain the course followed by the courts on examination for discovery is very much different from the course followed as a result of continuing precedent in this country. Mr. Justice Freedman of the court of queen's bench in Manitoba, a great advocate of freedom before going to the bench, in an article in the Canadian Bar Review states:

> There is in England a rule of practice which is applied in the discretion of the court for the benefit of newspapers sued for libel, under which the defendant, except in special circumstances not very clearly defined, is not obliged to disclose the source of his information.

Then His Lordship went on to say this:

> It is of interest to note, however, that recently a Canadian judge refused to apply this English rule of practice to the different system of discovery prevailing here . . .

In this case the doctrine of the sanctity of the freedom of the press is undermined to a degree which has not been experienced in recent years in our country.

The situation in the United States is dealt with in Chaffee's book, "Government and Mass Communications", in which he says:

> The trend of the best legal judgment is away from all occupational privileges, even that of attorney and client, which is much the oldest.

As you know, sir, the only relationship that is entirely confidential is that between the lawyer and his client. He says:

> The reporter's claim to silence is less persuasive than that of the doctor, and the physician and patient privilege. . . . It would be absurd to safeguard the press confidences and leave the secrets of the confessional without legal protection.

The author states that in the United States, however, what happens when a press man is asked to reveal the identity of those from whom he received the information is that he relies on the fifth amendment, contending that, his answers would implicate him and that is the end so far as further questioning is concerned.

How serious this precedent is may be gained from the fact that the newspaper trade publication, Editor and Publisher, in an editorial, describes what happened in the Blair Fraser case as an "unbelievably dangerous precedent". It says this:

> This means that newspaper men cannot publish information received from confidential sources without fear of libel action they cannot defend if they are determined to protect their informants.

I believe, sir, that there is another example of the abridgement of fundamental freedom, the jurisdiction over which I am not at the moment discussing which, if allowed to remain unchanged, constitutes a dangerous encroachment upon the rights of the press to secure information. I believe that it is a question that deserves to be considered seriously, and that we in our country might well give attention to following the British precedent, whereby the sanctity and the independence of the press is maintained, except within very narrow limits. British experiences through the years have shown the necessity for the preservation of the independence of the press.

Is there indeed a substantial body of opinion within the country that believes in the necessity of consideration being given to a bill of rights, to one advocated not only by myself but also by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll)? I am not going into detail in that connection, except to say that the comprehensiveness of the appeal for action, enunciated again in the Blair Fraser case to which I have just referred, is indicated by the support given by the following church organizations who have joined together in a demand for a bill of rights. These are the Church of England in Canada, the Baptist Federation of Canada, the Churches of Christ, the Evangelical United Brethren, the Presbyterian Church, the Reformed Episcopal Church, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, the United Church of Canada, the Salvation Army, the Society of Friends, the affiliated members of the Canadian Council of Churches, the national council of the Y.M.C.A., the national council of the Y.W.C.A. and the Student Christian Movement of Canada.

On June 6, 1950, they set forth their views in their joint brief at page 341 of the proceedings of the Senate committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms:

> We are prepared to support every honest endeavour to secure a Canadian bill of rights which will adequately safeguard the personal, social, economic and political rights of every citizen. We seek after and pray for a society in which freedom is the freedom of men who acknowledge responsibility to justice and public order, and where those who hold political authority or economic power are responsible for its exercise to God and to the people whose welfare is affected by it. We do not feel that it is the duty of our council to propose the practical measures which might or should be taken to establish a bill of rights. Nor do we suggest that the wording of this brief is the final language which should be used to describe these human rights and fundamental freedoms in a legal document. We are convinced, however, that it is our duty and responsibility to declare that man, because of his worth in the sight of God, has rights which should be respected by all and safeguarded by law.

The Church of England in Canada presented its brief on May 9, 1950, and at page 247 of the proceedings of the committee it stated its belief that government in recent years has of necessity intruded into personal and family affairs in a way not visualized even a generation ago. It concluded that certain rights and freedoms before the law which may thereby be jeopardized will be more certainly recognized and respected if set forth in a statute or under the constitution.

I am not going to read the entire list of those who supported a bill of rights whose brief was presented by the late Bernard K. Sandwell. It is to be found at page 209 of the proceedings of the Senate committee on May 3, 1950. Here are the names of a few of those who asked for a bill of rights for Canada: Such clergymen as the Rev. W. A. Cameron of Toronto; Dr. John Coburn, Rabbi Feinberg, Canon Judd, Dr. Charles Russell. Among editors are included Oakley Dalgleish of the Globe and Mail, Grant Dexter of the Winnipeg Free Press, George Ferguson of the Montreal Star, Mrs. John Bird of Ottawa.

Educators are represented by Dr. Sidney Smith of the University of Toronto, Dr. Norman MacKenzie of the University of British Columbia, Dr. A. W. Trueman, now head of the national film board; Dr. E. J. Pratt, Professor Lower, Professor Scott, Dr. Malcolm Wallace and others; jurists by Samuel Freedman and L. Y. Cairns, in Alberta; businessmen by Joseph Harris of Winnipeg, F. G. Winspear of Edmonton and A. E. Grauer of Vancouver and others; labour leaders—several of them—including C. H. Millard; professional men by Sir Ernest MacMillan, Roger Ouimet, C. C. Papineau-Couture, Q.C., Dr. Penfield, Paul Lafontaine, Hugh MacLennan and others; and various members of parliament, including the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott).

I mention their names to indicate that there is a widespread demand in Canada for action in this regard. There are some who say that free peoples value freedom less than was done 50 years ago, and that the movement is toward restricting and curtailing free speech of those who are unorthodox. There are some who would make the human mind a replica of the Soviet parliament in which not a single negative idea is permitted. There are those who would deny trial and error, and free discussion. There are those who would deny the right to try ideas before the bar of public opinion.

I point out, in answer to those who might view freedom of speech as something dangerous to security and survival, that free speech is not licence. It denies censorship in advance. But anyone who speaks becomes subject to punishment when his words strike at the security of the state, or the rights of others.

Free speech is and always will be the essence of democracy. Free speech is simply free enterprise of the mind, which allows for the development of the full capacities of the individual, and with the state punishing wrongdoing when the use of free speech endangers the state or the equal rights of others.

The cold war and two world wars have taken a heavy toll of freedom. That is not alone a peculiarity of our country. In Great Britain one of the great Liberals, Lord Reading, has pressed for a bill of rights in that country, to meet the invasion and infringements of today. Lord Sankey and his distinguished committee dealt with this question at length and came to this conclusion:

> Under the stress of the new conditions, insecurity, abuses and tyrannies increase; and liberty, particularly liberty of thought and speech, decays. Phase by phase ill-adapted governments and controls are restricting that free play of the individual mind which is the preservative of human efficiency and happiness.

In yesterday's New York Times I read an article by that great tribune of liberty, Mr. Justice Learned Hand, who is recognized not only in the United States but throughout the world. He said this, in referring to the nonconformist:

> It has generally proved impossible to smother him and when it has, the society that succeeded has declined.

I have one quotation to make in support of the view I express. It is from a book which enjoys a market that no other book on human freedom has achieved in the last 25 years. I refer to "Freedom, Loyalty, Dissent" by H. S. Commager, who says:

> We do not protect freedom to indulge error. We protect freedom in order to discover truth. We do not maintain freedom in order to permit eccentricity to flourish; we maintain freedom in order that society may profit from criticism, even eccentric criticism. We do not encourage dissent for sentimental reasons; we encourage dissent because we cannot live without it.

There he is referring to the democracies.

> Ours is a system of freedom—freedom of inquiry, of investigation, of criticism and of creation.

Having said that, I come now to Canada and refer in particular to a book written by a Canadian political scientist, Professor Dawson. In his "The Government of Canada" he has set forth his views as to whether there is a need for a bill of rights. Referring to the traditional attitude taken in Great Britain, he states, at page 86:

> There is a need of a bill of rights. There is a growing conviction in Canada that this is not sufficient and that certain fundamental liberties and privileges should be singled out for special mention in the written constitution, so that they will not be at the mercy of any intolerant group in a legislature or a cabinet which may for a time happen to command a majority. That this is no imaginary problem is clearly illustrated by a number of infractions or threatened infractions of these rights which have occurred in very recent years.

After setting out what they were, he says this:

> None of these, moreover, occurred during the war, when certain of these rights might conceivably have had to be temporarily relinquished, although those conducting the spy cases pleaded as a justification an overriding concern for public safety.

Mr. Pouliot: Would the hon. member be kind enough to tell us what are the encroachments upon fundamental freedoms that he complains of in Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad that my hon. friend has mentioned that. I will give him the federal instances, particularly brought to the attention of the Roebuck committee by Mr. B. K. Sandwell. An order in council was passed, which the privy council said was perfectly legal, which if it had been enforced would have exiled without charge or trial about 10,000 Canadian citizens because of their race.

An order in council in the Eldorado case was passed which provided that the administrator of Eldorado might examine any person and that person was denied the right to have counsel or to exercise his constitutional right of non-incrimination unless protection was granted. Additional provision was made in the order in council that, however illegal or unlawful the administrator's acts might be, there was no right of action against him for his wrongdoing.

Another mentioned in the brief is the federal law which for a long time refused to allow a married man who was a citizen of Canada to bring his wife and children here because of their race.

An order in council was passed in 1945 whereby the freedom of movement of people of a certain race was restricted so they were not permitted to go to one province without a permit.

The right of habeas corpus has been denied by order in council in Canada, something that has never been done in that way in Great Britain at any time. When habeas corpus becomes the plaything of the governor in council, then indeed is human freedom in danger.

Several statutes passed by parliament have been amended by order in council without there being any provision in the statute for amendment. One of the recent ones was in connection with the annuities act where the interest was increased to a degree not provided by the law.

The next I might mention is the foreign exchange control act, now no longer law. Provision was made that if any person's rights were interfered with unfairly, unjustly, and illegally, that individual might assert his rights in court and secure an order of the court against the wrongdoer. Until the statute was passed the order in council denied anyone the right, however illegal an order of the administrator might be, of appeal to the courts. When the order in council was translated into statutory form by parliament provision was made for a right of action, but no matter how much a person may have lost in consequence of the illegality he was restricted to nominal damages of $1 with no costs being allowed. There was opportunity for recourse to the courts, but refusing to the person wronged the damages to which he was entitled.

There are several orders in council denying the right of appeal to the courts. In the department of immigration there are regulations that are contrary to law and which are unreviewable in court.

Then there is the regulation with respect to security as applied to the civil service to which the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) directed the attention of the house at the last session of parliament. McCarthyism is dead; at least we hope so. The monstrous burlesque in the United States whereby under the merciless glare of publicity and T.V. persecution achieved its legislative nadir does not exist here, but as far as the civil service are concerned those who are suspect of being dangerous to the state by reason of the opinions that they hold have not the rights that exist in Great Britain, namely, the right to be placed before their accusers or at least to see the evidence upon which the suggestion as to their disloyalty is based.

The age-old excuse of those who remove human freedoms has always been the security of the state. I am not going to mention the provincial ones because we are dealing exclusively with the federal authority.

I come to another example. Under former tariff item 1201 provision is made whereby newspapers, magazines and books may be denied admittance to Canada by an officer of the Department of National Revenue. One of the outstanding speeches ever made in opposition to such a course was made in the other place by Hon. Rupert Davies on December 5, 1949, in which he set out the dangers of an individual acting so as to exclude these things from Canada with the decision not challengeable in the courts.

There are other examples, but the few I have given will indicate something of the trend. There is another manner in which the freedom of speech and of radio is challenged, and that is in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is in the position of being not only a competitor but also a judge. It may be said that the power that is possessed by the C.B.C. is not used against private stations; but, sir, the experience of history has been that the possession of absolute power has great persuasiveness even when it is unused.

How can that be changed? By the simple expedient that we have endeavoured to have parliament accept over the years, namely the setting up of a regulatory power in the nature of the board of transport commissioners. I hope that at this session the government will see fit to bring that about; for, Mr. Speaker, you will have noticed that the Young Liberal Association of Canada has now come out in favour of that which we have been advocating throughout the years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank hon. members very much. I come now to the question as to what should be done. It is often argued—the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has made one or two speeches on the subject—that the passing of a bill of rights would not accomplish that which I have in mind. The Minister of Justice has said that the passing of a bill of rights would display a distrust of parliament; that the inclusion in our constitution or in a statute of our fundamental freedoms would derogate from parliament. We already have a bill of rights, in the British North America Act. As far as the Canadian constitution is concerned, it consists not only of that act but also of 129 statutes which we have inherited from Britain, full reference to which interested parties may find in Maurice Ollivier's work "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty".

We already have in the British North America Act protection for minorities, a bill of rights in which fundamental rights are guaranteed. Section 133 provides for the two official languages; section 93 provides for the school rights of this country, and section 20 for the annual session of parliament. Another section provides for the right to a general election every five years except when parliament by two-thirds majority determines otherwise.

These indeed are fundamental. They are rights guaranteed under the constitution, and they are an answer to those who say that we do not require other fundamental freedoms incorporated into our constitution. There is of course a provision that states that the statutes of Canada and of Quebec are to be printed both in English and in French. There is also the language provision in the legislature of Quebec, in the House of Commons and in the federal courts. All of these things are indeed of the essence of fundamental freedoms and individual rights.

On May 19, 1952, the Ottawa Citizen dealt with a speech made by the Minister of Justice to the University of Manitoba alumni in Ottawa. In that speech the hon. gentleman said:

> The essence of a bill of rights is a distrust of parliament. This rebuke is hardly fair. In these days when governments and bureaucracies have increasing responsibilities, the individual needs more than ever to know his rights and be able to defend them. Moreover all the numerous offences against civil liberty in recent years have mostly involved provincial legislation and matters of civil law. Though Canada is a federal state, surely Canadian citizenship confers common rights that can be explicitly declared.

I come now to the question of what can be done. Are civil liberties a matter of federal or provincial jurisdiction? I have but to ask the question of a lawyer to have the answer as to the tremendous difficulties inherent in arriving at a decision on the basis of the judgments that have been given. Professor Dawson says, in answer to those who say that the British system does not contemplate statutory or constitutional control of parliament:

> The dominion parliament has not at all times proved to be sufficiently zealous in upholding the rights and liberties of the individual. The people of Great Britain have acquired a veneration for statutory and common law rights which is derived from many centuries of constant endeavour and stubborn resistance to abuses and which has made them extremely jealous of any threatened encroachments; but the tradition is not nearly so strong or so deep rooted and hence affords an inadequate safeguard against attack. While it is true that deficiencies in what has been called the constitutional conscience cannot be overcome by mere legal or constitutional enactment the latter can supply a certain valuable definitive support.

I mentioned the judgments of the courts. The first major judgment to which reference has been made on many occasions—

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend give me the citation for the last quotation he used?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not the page number. It is from Dawson. I will let my hon. friend have the page number; I have it in another document. The first leading case on the subject of jurisdiction is the Alberta press case. It is called the accurate news and information act. This is a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada and can be found in the 1938 Supreme Court Reports. I am reading from page 142. It was a bill placed on the statute books of Alberta by the Social Credit government, which was called the press bill. The recital said:

> It is expedient and in the public interest that the newspapers published in the province should furnish to the people of the province statements made by the authority of the government of the province as to the true and exact objects of the policy of the government and as to the hindrances to or difficulties in achieving such objects to the end that the people may be informed with respect thereto.

It provided that any man who published a newspaper in the province would be required from time to time by the chairman of the Social Credit board to publish in the newspaper any statement furnished by the chairman and any release that might be given out, and set out that publication had in fact been made by the consent of the chairman.

That obviously was quite a drastic step in interfering with freedom of the press; for if newspapers were to publish only that which the chairman of a board of the government in power desired them to publish, to say the least freedom of the press would have ceased.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that he has just misrepresented the position taken by the government in Alberta?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member has just misrepresented the position taken by the government in Alberta.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I intend to read from the judgment of Mr. Justice Cannon, whose son, incidentally, is a distinguished member of this house. My hon. friend certainly would not suggest that the judge would misstate the situation. I did not expect to get into a controversy over this matter or I would not have brought it up; but now that I have brought it up, I shall read what the judge said:

> It seems obvious that this kind of credit—

That was "Alberta credit."

> —cannot succeed unless everyone should be induced to believe in it and help it along. The word "credit" comes from the Latin: credere, to believe. It is, therefore, essential to control the sources of information of the people of Alberta, in order to keep them immune from any vacillation in their absolute faith in the plan of the government.

This is the judgment I am reading from. To continue:

> The Social Credit doctrine must become, for the people of Alberta, a sort of religious dogma of which a free and uncontrolled discussion is not permissible. The bill aims to control any statement relating to any policy or activity of the government of the province and declares this object to be a matter of public interest. The bill does not regulate the relations of the newspapers' owners with private individual members of the public, but deals exclusively with expression of opinion by the newspapers concerning government policies and activities. The pith and substance of the bill is to regulate the press of Alberta from the viewpoint of public policy by preventing the public from being misled or deceived as to any policy or activity of the Social Credit government and by reducing any opposition to silence or bring upon it ridicule and public contempt.
> I agree with the submission of the Attorney General for Canada that this bill deals with the regulation of the press of Alberta, . . .

And so on. That was the first case. Two of the judges, namely the former chief justice of Canada, Sir Lyman Duff, and Mr. Justice Cannon, decided that as our constitution carried with it the fact that we built upon British parliamentary procedure, such an interference constituted reduction of the freedom of the press, whereas the public interest would not permit any provincial government to infringe upon it. However, throughout the years cases have come up—

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. gentleman does not want to be responsible for misrepresenting, and that he has no desire to do so. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the honourable judge who made that statement, but I will point out that, if he will read exactly what that press act said, the hon. member will find that there is much misrepresentation not only in the quotation which he read but in his own remarks. There was no desire on the part of those who passed that bill to interfere with the press in any way but to see to it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: I was right there. I know. I have seen the acts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Blackmore: Just a minute. If the hon. member will permit me to do so I should just like to say that the whole object was to see to it that the officials—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize that he must not interrupt the hon. member who has the floor without his consent.

Mr. Blackmore: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I know the hon. member simply does not want to misrepresent—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have listened carefully to the hon. member and I really do not think he has raised a proper question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to enter into a controversy with my hon. friend.

Mr. Blackmore: You had better not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said I was not. I simply rely upon the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada upholding a judge's findings.

I now come to the most recent judgment; that is in the Saumur case, in which the whole question of jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments to deal with matters connected with freedom of religion was canvassed at great length. I am not going into the judgment except to refer to the Queen's Quarterly, winter 1955, in which there is an article by Mr. Bora Laskin, professor of law in Toronto. It deals with the whole subject of civil liberties, and it summarizes the Saumur case in these words:

> Three of the nine judges (Chief Justice Rinfret and Justices Kerwin and Taschereau) appeared to support this position.

That this was a matter of provincial authority.

> Six judges may be said to have adopted this view.

That civil liberties were outside of provincial competence.

> Of these, four (Justices Rand, Kellock, Estey and Locke) took the position that freedom of religious or other expression was outside of provincial power, and of the four, only two (Justices Estey and Locke) made categorical assertions in favour of exclusive federal power; the other two (Justices Rand and Kellock) left open the possibility that perhaps the dominion too could not, in certain circumstances, interfere with civil liberties.

> Two of the six judges (Justices Cartwright and Fauteux) took the position that such freedom (and more particularly freedom of the press) does not belong exclusively either to the dominion or to the provinces.
> This extraordinary division of opinion creates a result which is as curious as it is unsatisfactory. A majority of the court holds that the provinces have some legislative competence in the matter of freedom of religious expression. Two-thirds of the court hold that the provinces do not, at least in some circumstances, have such legislative competence. Only one-third of the court denies federal legislative competence on religious freedom. Yet less than a majority affirmed federal legislative competence on the matter.

I think that indicates exactly how difficult the problem is, Mr. Speaker. Knowing the reliance my friend the Minister of Justice places upon appeals to the privy council, having recently launched one, I express regret that not one judgment on this subject has been handed down by the privy council. However, that is something that is past.

That being so, what can be done? I submit first that a declaration of human freedom, as recommended by the Roebuck committee, could be made by parliament. That was the suggestion as to the first step, as found at page 306 of No. 10 of the proceedings of the Senate committee in 1950:

> Your committee therefore recommends that, as an interim measure, the Canadian parliament adopt a declaration of human rights to be strictly limited to its own legislative jurisdiction. Such a declaration would not invade the provincial legislative authority, but it would nevertheless cover a very wide field.

That is the first suggestion. Second, in order to ensure that the constitutional rights of the provinces will be maintained, I submit that a draft bill of rights such as I have placed before the house should be submitted to the supreme court. I asked the deputy minister of justice in 1947 whether that would not be an effectual way and, as found at page 81 of the proceedings of the committee of June 20, 1947, he agreed with the suggestion. Next, having determined as the result of this submission to the highest court of all what can be embodied in a bill of rights without invading provincial jurisdiction, we should enact such a bill of rights.

Third, we in Canada have fewer rights today, so far as the preservation of our fundamental freedoms is concerned, than we had when we abolished appeals to the privy council. As long as the privy council was our court of last resort, in actuality the foot of the throne, an individual in this country whose fundamental freedoms were interfered with directly or indirectly had a right of appeal to that court. Today there is no right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada when fundamental freedoms are interfered with except through the medium of the criminal law or through the use of habeas corpus.

The joint committee presided over by Chief Justice J. L. Ilsley and Senator Gouin made a recommendation that the appeal provision be extended to the supreme court in order to cover the situation to which I make reference. At page 208 of the proceedings of the joint committee of June 23, 1948, it says:

> In view of the fact that decisions by the Supreme Court of Canada in individual cases would be far more satisfactory than upon a general reference in determining the powers of parliament and the legislatures, your committee gave some consideration to the question as to whether the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada should not be enlarged so that by leave of that court appeals would lie on questions of law in some instances in which there is now no appeal. Your committee is of opinion that the government should give consideration to such an enlargement and so recommends.

Changes were made subsequently, Mr. Speaker, but those changes did not cover that situation. Therefore we in Canada are in the position of having less protection through the courts than have the people of the United Kingdom.

Next, can there be any disagreement that today we should make a declaration preserving our courts as bulwarks from which liberty can be protected, so that henceforth no order in council or statute shall be passed by parliament denying an appeal to the courts by those who are injured in consequence of the application of the statute or order in council?

Finally—and this is not a matter of party consideration whatsoever—in every part of the house members are jealous of the preservation of our fundamental freedoms and view with alarm the continued erosion that is taking place in respect of the rights of the individual. That being so, can there be any serious objection to setting up a committee of the House of Commons and the Senate each year to act as a watchdog over civil rights? We have a permanent committee on the restaurant, but we have no committee on a subject that affects spiritual things, the liberties and the sacred rights of the individual.

Then, wherever discrimination exists in the administration of any of the departments of government, let that discrimination be removed. I am not going into detail at the moment in connection with the department of immigration, but I do point out that a distinguished committee including one member of the house, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Dickey), made a report to the effect that in the administration of the regulations of the department of immigration the authority of the administrator in many cases superseded the authority of statute or the Immigration Act itself.

I believe that today our Indians should no longer be in the position of second-class citizens in the country in which they indeed were the first citizens. The rights of individuals are undermined, I submit, in the commissions that today are hearing evidence at various Indian reserves in this country; and I believe these commissions, which are causing division in the reserves to a degree that few in parliament understand, should cease to operate. Evidence is not the requirement before those commissions. Hearsay is too often accepted.

I conclude by summarizing what I have tried to place before the house. I have made certain recommendations that I believe deserve serious consideration. The resolution should be permitted to come to a vote in which members of the house, without regard to party, may freely express by their votes their viewpoint on this matter. It is as true today as it was more than 80 years ago, when Sir John A. Macdonald used these words—and I just came upon them yesterday—

> The great struggle of today, the struggle of the common man, the battle for rights against privileges, the long, slow striving for government of the people, by the people and for the people—these struggles are the same in Britain, in the United States and in Canada. In outward form there is difference and variety, but at the heart of each there is the old Anglo-Saxon impulse, the passion for freedom, the unquenched loyalty to truth and justice which, the world over and the ages through, marks the men of the Anglo-Saxon breed.

This, Mr. Speaker, is an age of fear. Today freedom everywhere in the world is being weighed in the scales. Many there are who believe in freedom as a theory but are cynical as to whether or not it can be preserved in the tumultuous present. This is an age of the all-powerful state created as the result of war or threatened war. This is an age when short-cuts of political expediency, while effective for the moment in maintaining security, ultimately constitute a mortal threat to freedom. It is the same in all freedom-loving countries. Mr. Justice Douglas of the United States has said:

> History shows that governments bent on a crusade or officials filled with ambitions have usually been inclined to take shortcuts.
> The cause being a noble one (for it always is), the people being filled with alarm (for they usually are), the government being motivated by worthy aims (as it always professes), the demand for quick and easy justice mounts . . . the ends they produce are cumulative, and if they continue unabated they can silently rewrite even the fundamental law of the nation.

I ask this question. Must free nations desert their faith in the fundamentals of freedom? Can freedom-loving nations preserve freedom and defend themselves without destroying it? Do we have to emulate the enemy? I do not think so. I believe, sir, that our ultimate salvation and survival rests on the free world maintaining its unquenchable wells of freedom under the law. The history of the British peoples has been this. The great and abiding achievement in the heritage of common law has been made possible under the rule of law, in the climate of freedom. In that climate free men are able to give full play to their creative genius. Yet often today we are afraid of freedom.

Barbara Ward summarized our fear in these words:

> The crusaders for freedom and progress, for man's ever renewed struggle to build a just and holy society, appear to be on the defensive before those who seek to eliminate human freedom and restore the twin tyrannies of fate and government. The idealists retreat before the materialists . . . indeed the realists seem to have turned themselves into materialists and to fight their war of words in calculations and statistics while their adversaries sing of deserts blooming and spring returning to a resurrected humanity.

I believe, sir, a bill of rights is necessary in our country today to provide a framework for our thinking and to crystallize the spiritual values in the concept of freedom. The situation before 1914—since when there have been two world wars and a cold war—has been proven inadequate today. Our fundamental freedoms were not written into the British North America Act because it was believed at that time by philosophers that never again would those fundamental principles be in danger of being undermined.

We have learned today, with the experience of the years of war and a cold war, that freedom has to be paid for in every generation; that it cannot be purchased at bargain counters; it cannot be purchased on credit with payment to be made in the future. It can only be purchased by action. I ask that the government give consideration, not to the introduction of a bill of rights at this time but to ascertaining first the constitutionality of a bill of rights and then, having so determined, that they ensure the preservation of fundamental freedom in our country, under law and under the constitution.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to congratulate my hon. friend upon his eloquence, which we have learned to expect from him. Inasmuch as I cannot hope to emulate that eloquence I believe that, following out the non-partisan approach the hon. member has recommended, I cannot do better than attempt to examine the methods by which his eloquent suggestions might be carried into effect. For that reason I am glad today to discuss the terms in which, under our constitutional law, the objectives which he has stated would have to be realized.

When I came to Ottawa six years ago, sir, this resolution was on the order paper, where it has remained ever since. It was a matter of very great regret to me that on the only occasion in the interval upon which it was spoken to I happened to be at home ill. I am, therefore, doubly grateful for the privilege of discussing it on the present occasion.

I should like to make it clear, since this is a private member's resolution and not an item of government business, that I have not discussed it with my colleagues and I am not speaking for the government. Indeed, that will be apparent from my remarks as I continue. My effort, as I have stated, will have more to do with the matter of method and will be really an attempt to clarify the true nature of the problem, rather than to suggest immediately any policy which might be considered as a solution to it.

Now, I think we all agree, as the hon. member who has just spoken has said, that this resolution deals with an exceedingly difficult problem. New members have not been in this house very long before they become acquainted with the fact that the mere relationship between the central government and the provincial governments in our Canadian federal system of governments are themselves notoriously difficult. This difficulty is encountered on every occasion on which the powers of government are divided, in a federation, between the central government and the provincial or state governments.

In view of the fact that, as compared to the constitution of the United States, our constitution over the years has occasioned a relatively small amount of litigation, our constitutional law is a little known field. There is, therefore, only a comparatively small group of lawyers in Canada who are very familiar with the problems of constitutional law. I am glad to see the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) shaking his head in assent to this statement. It is into this complex and difficult field of federal-provincial relationships in the field of constitutional law that this, shall I say, emotional and political issue of a bill of rights has been projected. This issue has been created by the thoroughly praiseworthy and Christian aspirations for equal rights and fundamental freedoms for all citizens of Canada, regardless of race, colour, class or creed.

The introduction of this deceptively simple but rather emotional issue into such a complex field creates a problem which, as the hon. member for Prince Albert said, and I agree with him, is an extremely difficult one. It is the problem of superimposing a bill of rights, after the United States fashion, upon the federal constitution of Canada, whose main feature, inherited from the constitution of Great Britain, is the sovereignty of its legislative bodies. The feat of superimposing such a bill of rights upon such a constitution is, at least on its technical side, a very difficult feat indeed.

Now, this feat which is being urged upon us by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and other members, is one which, so far as I know, has never yet been accomplished in any country in the world. I might point out just one of its difficulties. It is one thing to withhold from the provincial legislative bodies legislative powers when the constitution of a country is originally formed. It is quite a different thing to withdraw from the provinces 88 years later provincial legislative powers on the strength of which at least the original provinces could argue that they entered confederation. And that is involved in the issue now before the house.

One of the facts in this connection is that so few advocates of a bill of rights for Canada seem to recognize the difficulty of this task which they suggest we should carry out. We have this long and imposing list my hon. friend has read, consisting of businessmen, journalists, theologians, professors and others, who themselves would regard the views of constitutional lawyers about their specialties of theology, business, journalism and science with impatience, if not with disdain. Yet they show even greater impatience with the humble objections of constitutional lawyers to their idea in the field of constitutional law of superimposing a bill of rights upon the sovereignty of Canadian legislative bodies. They seem to have reached the conclusion that a bill of rights is so obviously a good thing that those who in the slightest degree question its efficacy, or even concern themselves as to the practical methods by which it may be brought about, are hardly on the side of the angels. But, sir, I suggest that the problem is by no means as simple as this virtuous attitude indicates. Indeed there are few fields of public interest and public debate in which it is more necessary for the debaters to know what they are talking about than this one. And because our constitution, as compared with that of the United States of America, for example, as I indicated a moment ago, has produced a very small amount of litigation, the number of those who really do know what they are talking about in this field is very limited indeed.

It is not surprising therefore that much of the discussion about bills of rights could be a good deal more illuminating than it is. For example we have one group in Canada who favour a bill of rights along the lines of that suggested by my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). We have another group who would not favour the bill of rights he advocates, but who do favour a quite different bill of rights, along the lines of that suggested by that great liberal newspaper, the Winnipeg Free Press. And we next have a group urging resolutions and arguments such as those we have heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

These resolutions and arguments purport to support either or perhaps both of these bills of rights to which I have just referred. But I suggest with great respect that they have only occasional and seemingly accidental relevancy to either. For these arguments actually deal with matters which, if they require reforms, can be reformed by simple statutory amendments to our law, without any bill of rights whatsoever.

Now, to take a case at random. My hon. friend referred to the Blair Fraser case. He must remember in the last session of parliament asking across the floor of the house what was to be done to correct what he regarded as an injustice which had arisen as a result of the judgments in that case. I notice that he nods his head indicating that it was he who asked the question. If he will recall, I pointed out to him that inasmuch as the jurisdiction over the subject matter of that case was vested in the British Columbia legislature, if it were thought to be desirable that the effect of those judgments should be changed, it could be done through the introduction and passage of a bill in that legislature.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would he not consider that an act in a legislature that did in fact interfere with freedom of the press would be a matter of federal jurisdiction, in view of the decision in the Alberta press case?

Mr. Garson: Well, my hon. friend is really asking for a legal opinion, which I shall endeavour to give—although I am not accustomed to giving them off the cuff in this way.

He asks this: Is this result in British Columbia in any way affected by the Alberta press case? My answer to the question is No. What was involved in the British Columbia case was a question of libel law, a matter of property and civil rights. Notwithstanding the judgment of the supreme court in the press case to which he refers, in my view it would be quite possible, if thought desirable, for the British Columbia legislature to pass a bill changing the law to which my hon. friend objects, but this has nothing whatsoever to do with a bill of rights.

Our present constitution is not perfect; but there are few if any that are any better. And if we are going to improve it we must have a thorough and accurate understanding of both its virtues and its defects, in order to make sure that the bill of rights proposed would correct those defects without at the same time adversely affecting its virtues. We must be sure that it is technically possible for us to do what no one has yet done in the world, namely superimpose a bill of rights upon the constitution of a federal state, the main feature of which is the sovereignty of its legislative bodies.

And if we decide to attempt this task we should also try to do it in such a way that we can undo it and restore our present constitution, if a bill of rights in Canada is found in practice, as it has been found in every country in which it operates, to work less satisfactorily than the principle of the sovereignty of parliament works in the United Kingdom and in Canada.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, we must understand the nature of this problem. A good place to begin is, first, to understand what is not the problem. In this connection it seems to me the resolution and arguments of the hon. member for Prince Albert are invaluable; for I suggest that what he argues is not the problem. I submit that most of his material is irrelevant and, in due course, I shall offer the proof of this submission.

But, first of all, let me accept and admit the force of his relevant material. And by far the most impressive and most convincing is this list of names of eminent and public-spirited citizens of Canada who, like my hon. friend, are supporting a movement for a bill of rights.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister forgotten that Senator Roebuck and Senator Gouin, distinguished members of the Senate and lawyers, came to the same conclusion, and made the same recommendation?

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend contend that the senators whom he has named came to the same conclusion as he did? If he does, then my hon. friend must pardon me if I do not agree that they did. But, as I have said, this list of names is most impressive. With the exception of the communists, who are very prominent supporters of a bill of rights in Canada, all these men and women are estimable citizens—many of them close personal friends, as a matter of fact—with whom one is reluctant to disagree. Indeed with some of their statements I agree completely. For example, I agree with the members of the civil rights association when they say:

> . . . on the basis of Christian doctrines and the Christian values which have been accepted by our society that we can justify a declaration of human rights against those whose systems of thought and whose policies deny to the individual any rights of his own.

No person in his right mind would dispute that generalization. But against whom are we justifying these rights? Which are the Canadian parties whose policies deny to the individual any rights of his own? Surely no member of this parliament belongs to any such party. Indeed the only party that I know of in Canada which denies human rights to the individual is the communist party. Yet there is no political party or organization in Canada today which is more active than the communist party in its support of a bill of rights. Why? Because I suggest that a Canadian bill of rights would suit the interests and plans of that party.

Another assertion by the civil rights association with which I think we will all agree is that without these elementary rights a man cannot completely use the talents with which God has endowed him and that a recognition of these rights would receive, and indeed does receive, the wholehearted support of the Christian people of Canada.

My submission is that a bill of rights which is advocated in any of these forms which have been suggested is not the most effective form in which the recognition of those rights can take. I suggest to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that there is no country in the world whose constitution includes a bill of rights which recognizes and protects those rights as effectively as they are recognized in the United Kingdom and in this country of Canada. The United Kingdom has no bill of rights in the sense in which the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) use that term as referring to something which they would like to add to our Canadian constitution.

This afternoon the hon. member for Prince Albert stated that there was some agitation going on in the United Kingdom seeking to add to their constitution at this time, in 1955, that which throughout the centuries they have done without and yet managed to achieve the greatest amount of civil liberties of any civilized country on the globe. In the United Kingdom they have their own guarantees of the liberties of their citizens which in actual practice have been more effective than any bill of rights in any country.

Here I would point out to the hon. member for Prince Albert something which I dare say he is probably well aware of already, that in the preamble of the British North America Act we find these words:

> Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

In this Canadian constitution of ours, as I think the hon. member for Prince Albert noted this afternoon, are incorporated all the guarantees of the liberties of the citizens of Canada which are enjoyed by the people of Great Britain including the Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights of 1688. In my submission the real question here is whether we should permit the guarantees of our human rights and fundamental freedoms, which we have inherited from Great Britain and which work very well in actual practice, to be superseded in this country by an American style bill of rights which looks better to some people on paper but which—as my hon. friend in his reference to McCarthyism this afternoon indicated—does not necessarily and automatically protect the civil rights of the people of that country.

I am inclined to think that if many of the advocates of a bill of rights knew that what they were proposing was an exchange of the British type of fundamental freedoms for the American type, they would not be so enthusiastic about their advocacy of this change. I believe the communists know this point; but speaking of the others I cannot believe that many of the other advocates of a Canadian bill of rights believe that respect for civil liberties is greater in the United States of America than it is in either Great Britain or Canada.

"Oh, yes," they may say, "but if we have a bill of rights in Canada our provincial authorities, which under our constitution are charged with responsibility for the administration of justice, would enforce our Canadian bill of rights more strictly than some of the American states enforce their bill of rights." I suggest that this contention would possess validity only to the extent that in the steps which were taken to provide a Canadian bill of rights we did not ride roughshod over existing rights which our constitution gives to the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is perfectly clear; I made that very clear.

Mr. Garson: With great deference, I do not think it was too clear. I am glad to have my hon. friend make his present statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said it three times.

Mr. Garson: I shall refer to this point in somewhat more detail later on in my remarks.

With great deference I would suggest that the extent to which this real issue between the British type of guarantee of human rights and fundamental freedoms and the American type is misunderstood, is nowhere more clearly shown than in the arguments with which the hon. member for Prince Albert has from time to time supported a resolution such as that which we are now discussing.

May I suggest that those arguments at no point actually come to grips with the real issue. For example, the hon. member has argued that we need a bill of rights to correct certain shortcomings in the body of our law. He referred to the Blair Fraser case. He referred to the right of the subject to sue the government. He referred to the fact that there should be an appeal where a newspaper had been convicted of contempt of court.

What have those to do with our constitution or a bill of rights? As my hon. friend himself told us this afternoon, all that is required in any of those cases is to introduce amendments to our existing law. Amendments have already been introduced in connection with the latter two of those three cases. They were introduced by the government, supported by my hon. friend and passed by this parliament. There is no necessity in matters of this kind for a bill of rights. All that is needed is an amendment to the law.

I must say that my hon. friend brought forward some new examples this afternoon which I have not had time to examine with care. However, I examined all the cases he cited in his remarks on this subject matter in the preceding parliament; and I could not find a single case in which the alleged abuses he was complaining about could not be cured by a simple statutory amendment to the existing law, providing of course that my hon. friend could get enough members of parliament to support such an amendment.

Well, supposing he cannot get sufficient support. This is a free country. If my hon. friend does not like the attitude of the present parliament toward his statutory amendments we have, as he pointed out in his remarks, an election at least every five years. At the next election my hon. friend can get together with his friends and try to elect a parliament that will bring in the statutory amendments to our law which he thinks are necessary. All of these things are completely irrelevant to the question of whether or not we should have a bill of rights in this country. As an example of this, he says:

...that no tribunal or commission shall have the power to compel the giving of evidence by anyone who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

Well, my hon. friend can go to the clerk tomorrow and put a notice on the order paper for a bill to provide that no person who is called upon to appear before a tribunal or a commission shall be denied in any case the right to counsel. But this has nothing to do with a constitutional amendment. All these things remind me of the episode in the story of Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn where the two boys wanted to get out of the house they were in. One of them insisted upon pretending that it was a jail. All they needed to do was walk out; but that was not enough. They had to go through the very elaborate process of crawling through a window and using elaborate methods of raising the window and so on, in order to carry out the spirit of the adventure. That is all right in fiction, but when we are dealing with a problem in constitutional law I do not think it is necessary for us to complicate these matters unnecessarily. In order to get an amendment to our statute law, or to the law of the country, surely we do not have to go so far as to amend our constitution by changing what until now has been one of its cardinal principles, namely, the parliamentary sovereignty of the Canadian parliament and provincial legislature, and to attach to our constitution a series of limitations such as are attached by the United States constitution to the powers of the United States congress and the state legislatures of that country.

Let us examine just one of the limitations that he wants to attach. He says in his motion:

...that no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, and in no case by order in council.

I suggest to him—I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—that is the analogue of the due process of law clause in the constitution of the United States of America. Such a clause would limit the sovereignty of the Canadian parliament and of our provincial legislatures in a manner which has been the delight of the corporation lawyers representing the public utility corporations of that country for the last 150 years; and the total cost of the litigation in relation to which the people of the United States, either as consumers or as taxpayers, have had largely to defray.

My hon. friend seriously brings this suggestion forward as a concrete example of what he wants to add to our constitution. Let us see what a prominent United States lawyer, one of the greatest living United States lawyers, thinks about this due process of law clause as applied under more appropriate surroundings in the United States of America itself where parliamentary sovereignty is not involved. The Hon. Mr. Justice Frankfurter in a book of essays entitled, "Law and Politics" published in 1938 and covering his writings from 1913 to 1938, said this concerning the two clauses of the United States constitution which correspond to the four clauses of my hon. friend's resolution:

The due process clause of the fifth amendment, a limitation upon the federal government and the due process of law and the denial of the equal protection of the laws of the fourteenth amendment, limiting state action and subjecting every local act of every state to the scrutiny of the supreme court at Washington—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the fourteenth amendment say?

Mr. Garson: I shall read this again, putting in the sub quotation marks, and my hon. friend will see.

The "due process" clause of the fifth amendment, a limitation upon the federal government, and the "due process of law", and the denial of the "equal protection of the laws" of the fourteenth amendment, limiting state action—

Fifth amendment limiting the federal, fourteenth amendment limiting the state; I continue:

—and subjecting every local act of every state to the scrutiny of the supreme court at Washington . . . these broad guarantees in favour of the individual are expressed in words so undefined, either by their intrinsic meaning, or by history, or by tradition, that they leave the individual justice free, if indeed they do not actually compel him, to fill in the vacuum with his own controlling notions of economic, social and industrial facts with reference to which they are invoked. These judicial judgments are thus bound to be determined by the experience, the environment, the fears, the imagination, of the different justices. For it cannot be too often made clear that the meaning of phrases like "due process of law" and of simple terms like "liberty" and "property", is not revealed within the constitution; their meaning is derived from without. As a great legal scholar has put it, social legislation of the twentieth century is declared unconstitutional by putting eighteenth century Adam Smith into the constitution. As an outstanding and candid member of the federal bench, Judge Charles M. Hough, reminds us, due process of law is a phrase of "convenient vagueness". "Convenient" for whom or to what end?

I now recommend the last paragraph of this same article to the house and particularly to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It reads as follows:

> What is needed is a thorough understanding of our constitutional system in action, as a basis of determining what is the proper scope of judicial control, and what conditions are most likely to insure the exercise of this tremendous power by ordinary mortals, to avoid at once the abuses of tyranny and the timidities of dependence. Particularly does it behoove progressives not to content themselves with mere abuse of abuses, nor to fall back upon mechanical contrivances when dealing with a process where mechanics can play but a very small part. An informed study of the work of the supreme court of the United States will probably lead to the conclusion that no nine men are wise enough and good enough to be entrusted with the power which the unlimited provisions of the due process clauses confer. We have had 50 years of experiment with the fourteenth amendment, and the centralizing authority lodged with the supreme court over the domestic affairs of 48 widely different states is an authority which it simply cannot discharge with safety either to itself or to the states. The due process of law clauses ought to go. It is highly significant that not a single constitution framed for English-speaking countries since the fourteenth amendment has embodied its provisions.

Justice Frankfurter then goes on to say—and I recommend this particularly to my hon. friend:

> One would indeed be lacking in a sense of humour to suggest that life, liberty or property is not amply protected—

In certain countries which he names, and the first of those countries so named is Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was in 1938.

Mr. Garson: It is in the book of essays to which I have referred.

I am sure we all appreciate my hon. friend's anxiety to improve our constitution, but I do submit that we are not likely to improve it by adding to it a clause of this character.

This afternoon my hon. friend said that since this parliament abolished appeals to the privy council, Canadians whose fundamental freedoms were interfered with have no right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada as a final court of appeal for this country such as they formerly had to the privy council. I do not think I should spend a great deal of time upon this particular point because it is a simple point of fact or law. I regret that I must flatly contradict this statement made by my hon. friend by saying that Canadians have now a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada which is just as full and complete as that which they previously had to the privy council itself.

At the time appeals to the privy council were abolished we instructed parliamentary counsel to provide in our legislation here the means of enabling Canadians to have the same kind of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada as they had previously to the privy council. So far as I am aware, these instructions have been carefully followed with the result which I have just stated.

When my hon. friend is urging upon us that we should have a bill of rights in the United States manner, I think it might not be inappropriate if I contrast this unlimited right of appeal to which I have just referred with the appeal provided by the United States bill of rights where the Supreme Court of the United States may summarily, without stated reasons, refuse to review the judgments appealed against. Fowler Harper, professor of law at Yale university, in an article in the Atlantic Monthly for April, 1952, entitled "Decision by Silence" says at page 46 that the Supreme Court of the United States of America—

> . . . exercised its discretion in denying review in a thousand cases last term . . . Therefore, the opinion is offered that of the 1,002 cases which the court summarily and without stated reasons refused to review, there were 31 cases which were of vital interest to the nation and thus merited the attention of its highest tribunal. Of course, 31 cases out of a thousand doesn't sound like much, but if you put it in terms of 31 issues of national importance, it sounds different. For whatever significance it has—and it has great significance—17 of the 31 cases involved some aspect of civil rights.

Is there anything in that item of information that would move us to adopt a bill of rights similar to that of the United States?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Garson: When my hon. friend from Prince Albert was delivering his remarks this afternoon, he was good enough to permit an interruption and to reply to my question as to whether the 11 articles to which he was referring as having come from the Roebuck committee in the senate were the same as those he was mentioning this afternoon and also the same as those which he had mentioned in a previous speech to us in the house. Having considered those articles carefully, I should like to say that in my view there is not one of them that is not amply protected by the existing laws of Canada at the present time, if those laws are properly invoked and administered. I admit that the request for a bill of rights to guarantee these human rights and fundamental freedoms—which I say are now properly protected—implies that these rights are not protected; and I believe that was my hon. friend's argument.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I hesitate to interrupt the minister but it is my duty to inform him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): With the unanimous consent of the house the minister may proceed.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe the minister has unlimited time in replying to a motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I do not think the motion made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was one of non-confidence. I therefore thought it was my duty to advise the minister that his time had expired. However, with the consent of the house he may proceed.

Mr. Coldwell: Why was the hon. member for Prince Albert allowed to go on for an hour and twenty minutes?

An hon. Member: By consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I think that also was with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the reply should be on the same basis.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly, with consent. The hon. member was not here at the time.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, I took it that my hon. friend—and I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—was implying by his reference to these articles that the present law was not in a satisfactory state. From having carefully examined all of these articles I suggest that those who imply this either disregard what the law now is or, it may be, they mistakenly regard as defects in the existing substantive law what are really not substantive defects at all, but merely defects in the administration of that law by the responsible authorities. What we must remember in this context is that all law is as administered by human beings who are fallible, who make mistakes, and who sometimes perhaps have prejudices which they should not have. But the defects in the administration of the law due to human prejudice and fallibility, I suggest, cannot be substantively changed by constitutional amendment or otherwise to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms. Indeed the experience of other countries shows clearly that even if we had a bill of rights in Canada, it might be difficult to secure what some Canadians might regard as a proper administration of the laws with regard to human rights and fundamental freedoms by some authorities who, because they strongly disagreed with certain clauses in the bill of rights, consciously or unconsciously would misinterpret them or improperly or inadequately enforce them. There are many examples of this sort of thing in the other countries which have constitutions and bills of rights which, on their face, are admirable. The hon. member for Prince Albert has made this statement:

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite).]

It—

A bill of rights.

—would give positive evidence that when Canada, at the United Nations assembly two years ago, accepted the universal declaration of human rights, that acceptance was a dedication of the Canadian people not only internationally but nationally as well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. Garson: I am quoting my hon. friend from Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When?

Mr. Garson: The last occasion when this matter was discussed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes.

Mr. Garson: From that remark I inferred that my hon. friend was of the view that Canada's acceptance of the universal declaration of human rights involved us in some changes in our laws within Canada itself as well as internationally.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does my hon. friend not know that the declaration of human rights has never been submitted to the parliament of Canada?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will examine the Hansard record—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does he not know that?

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes; I know it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

Mr. Garson: That does not prevent my hon. friend from arguing—and from his point of view it is probably quite a good argument—that we should do something about it in Canada. I have never thought we needed to amend any law in Canada in order to bring the body of our law into conformity with this declaration of human rights to which we subscribed at the United Nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No one suggested that.

Mr. Garson: When I was at the United Nations assembly in Paris in 1952 I made it my business to confer with a noted Canadian lawyer whom I took to be the highest authority in this field at the United Nations at that time. He confirmed my own opinion that the condition of the Canadian law today is such that Canada does not need to pass a single law of any kind in order to be in complete compliance with the universal declaration of human rights to which Canada subscribed some years ago. This brings me to the text of my hon. friend's resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who was that lawyer?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Humphrey of McGill University, who was seconded there.

This brings me to the text of the resolution moved by my hon. friend and to the arguments by which he has supported it. He wants us, and I quote from his resolution, to submit "for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the degree to which fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are matters of federal or provincial jurisdiction."

Now, sir, with great deference I suggest that we cannot hope to secure a judgment which would be of any value for the hon. member's purposes by an abstract reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of a mixture of subject matters, some of federal jurisdiction, some of provincial jurisdiction, some in one aspect of federal jurisdiction and in another aspect of provincial jurisdiction, and some of mixed jurisdiction. Indeed, I doubt whether the Supreme Court of Canada would even consider a reference in the terms in which the hon. gentleman has suggested it. For I would point out that the words "fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual", taken by themselves and unrelated to any specific piece of legislation, are so abstract that I question whether any kind of useful response could be secured from the Supreme Court of Canada on a reference of that general character.

I am sure the hon. member is aware that when a question of constitutional interpretation comes before the Supreme Court of Canada it usually comes in the form of a federal labour law, for example, that was before the supreme court the other day. We say in effect here is a law which we have passed. We have invoked our jurisdiction. The question is whether the law we have passed is within our powers. In other cases, it may be a provincial law, but it is always something of a concrete nature like that. There is no group of human beings, no matter how subtle their intelligence or how able they may be, who can say that fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are under federal jurisdiction or under provincial jurisdiction.

Take, for example, freedom of the press. It is not a subject which falls completely under federal jurisdiction or even completely under provincial jurisdiction. That abuse of freedom of the press which takes the form of a criminal libel is part of the criminal law and under federal jurisdiction. On the other hand, the laws relating to the bringing of actions against newspapers for damages for libel are provincial laws which deal with property and civil rights.

It is conceivable that either the federal parliament or provincial parliaments by legislating unreasonably could abridge the freedom of the press. In fact, as my hon. friend pointed out this afternoon, one provincial legislature did so. But I think it would be impossible for the Supreme Court of Canada to say that freedom of the press per se or the freedom of speech per se were wholly a matter of federal or provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question there?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does he agree with Senator Roebuck, Senator Gouin who, I think, was on the committee, and several other very distinguished lawyers that a draft such as the one I have placed before the house today should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for its decision?

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Speaker, having regard to the fact there was nothing in my hon. friend's last speech and nothing in his resolution to indicate he was going to submit an argument of this sort, I must say in all candour that I have never considered it. It is a matter upon which I would not want to express an opinion unless I had considered it carefully because I think there is nothing more unhelpful in a matter of this kind than the expression of unconsidered opinions.

My hon. friend, amongst other things, wants an assurance of freedom of religion. I suggest that we have freedom of religion in Canada right now. We have every kind and description of religion. Each sect practises its religion in any way it chooses, and none is barred unless in the course of practising its religion it breaks the law of the land. Let us, for example, take an extreme hypothetical case, and I am taking this case because there are no examples of it. I could take cases of a religion concerning which people who believe in that religion have been found guilty under the Criminal Code of not providing necessaries for those who were dependent upon them, but I am taking this other case because there are no examples of it and therefore it will not give any offence.

Let us take a religion that offered up human sacrifices, which at one time in the world's history was a practice of some religions. I have no doubt that there would be a general desire to have the offering of human sacrifices prohibited by law, not as an interference with freedom of religion but merely to stamp out a practice which was disapproved by an overwhelming majority of Canadian citizens. Now, sir, I know of no constitutional amendment which would protect a Canadian citizen who had, for example, for religious reasons offered a human sacrifice of this sort. There is no protection that would interfere with the visitation of a penalty upon him.

I would point out that all constitutional guarantees must be interpreted by the courts, and the court in this hypothetical case I have mentioned—

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the hypothetical case would not concern freedom. The United States supreme court dealt with the point and said there is no freedom in an action such as the minister contemplates. That is exactly the point.

Mr. Garson: That is right. I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is raising a straw man.

Mr. Garson: In a case of that sort the court would hear the evidence and would have to decide upon the evidence adduced in the case before it whether in substance what the accused had done was to practise freedom of religion or to break the law against human sacrifices. If the courts of any country in which these constitutional guarantees exist find that what has happened is that human sacrifices have been offered, the existence of the constitutional guarantees in favour of religious freedom would not protect the person charged.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would hope not.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend may not agree with the judgments of the courts in certain cases because, like the hon. member, myself and all members of the house, judges are human beings and like all of us they are fallible. That is why we have courts of appeal, and the courts of appeal are also fallible. But does the hon. member think that by a bill of rights we can make judges infallible or that we can protect ourselves against the human fallibility of judges who have to interpret these bills of rights?

My hon. friend mentioned freedom of speech. Well, sir, I should have thought that we have a very great measure of freedom of speech in this country. I can recall my hon. friend's own leader and several of his colleagues, who were very voluble in the former parliament and in the election campaigns of 1949 and 1953, supporting the thesis with resounding eloquence that the communists of this country enjoyed far too much freedom of speech and freedom of the press, and that this government was derelict in its duty for not taking steps to curtail the freedom of speech of these gentlemen, or perhaps to curtail their freedom of movement, or perhaps to curtail their freedom—period. Now at that time my hon. friend's thesis was that there was too much freedom. Today, he says there is too little. His arguments oscillate with time and place.

My hon. friend wants to guarantee freedom of the press. Well, sir, I should like him to tell us, if he will, what freedom of the press it is that is not now available to the newspaper and other publishers of this country. During the last parliament his colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), introduced a bill which we all supported to interfere with the freedom of the press with regard to obscene publications and crime comics. Was it not proper that we should have done so? If we had a constitutional amendment guaranteeing freedom of the press, there might be some question although I think properly interpreted there would not be. But at least I think this is a case in which we can trust the good judgment of parliament.

If my hon. friend can think of any example of a curtailment of the freedom of the press would he not, upon reflection, agree that it could be removed by either a provincial enactment or a federal enactment, depending upon whether the particular case fell under federal or provincial jurisdiction? It is not so very long ago, and the hon. member for Prince Albert brought this matter up this afternoon, when one of the provincial legislatures passed a law which, as we could see this afternoon, offended my hon. friend's views as to the degree of freedom which the press should have in this country. What happened? Action was taken in the courts, the same courts that would be interpreting a bill of rights—

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister would allow me to correct him, I would say that action was not taken. The dominion government was asked to disallow that enactment, but they did not disallow it. It was submitted, then, to the supreme court. No action was taken.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite correct. I was referring to that, improperly, as an action.

The matter came before the court. This was the same court which, now being the final court of appeal, would interpret any bill of rights we would have in this country. It was there held that under the present law of Canada the freedom of the press in that province could not be curtailed in the manner proposed by the legislature of the province. This happened under the present law.

Another point which my hon. friend from Prince Albert makes is that habeas corpus should not be abrogated or suspended except by parliament. I suggest that no one can name a single case in which habeas corpus has been abrogated or suspended in Canada except under the authority of parliament. Under our existing law habeas corpus is available to every subject who wishes to invoke it, and the only way it can be rendered unavailable is by an act of the appropriate legislative body which, in certain cases, is the parliament of Canada and in other cases is the provincial legislature.

When my hon. friend speaks of orders in council having done this or orders in council having done that, surely he must remember that every order in council which is used for any purpose by either the governor in council at Ottawa or by the lieutenant governors in council in the provinces, is open to challenge in the courts of this country. If a lieutenant governor in council or the governor general in council has passed an order in council which is not properly authorized by statute, no action can take place under it and the effect of any such action can be and will be quashed if it is challenged in the courts. So far as the necessity for a bill of rights to protect habeas corpus is concerned, I would submit it is not essential in any respect.

In the third paragraph of his resolution, the hon. member says:

> That no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, and in no case by order in council.

I wonder if my hon. friend realizes the extent to which a literal application of this portion of his resolution would go. Does he mean to say that municipalities could not exercise any of their functions which they exercise under authority delegated to them by provincial legislatures, except by due process of law?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the only way they can act, by due process of law.

Mr. Garson: Quite. My hon. friend does not mean that they should have to have due process of law. Does he mean that we could not use an order in council to affect property? He says, "in no case by order in council". Would he think it was necessary for us in this chamber to pass a statute in every case in which the government of Canada was going to acquire any property? That is what his language states. Surely my hon. friend is quite aware of the fact this government cannot by order in council do any of the things with which my hon. friend charged it in a number of the details he cited this afternoon, except under the authority of some statute of this parliament or, in very exceptional cases, under the royal prerogative. All of those cases which he cited as based on an order in council, and which he seemed to suggest had some measure of illegality or impropriety about them, could be successfully challenged by my hon. friend acting for a client if those orders in council were not properly authorized by a proper statute of parliament.

It is on the basis of such arguments as these that the hon. member wishes us to believe that in 1955 he and others who are again urging this bill of rights have seen a light which Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Cartier, Hon. Edward Blake, Sir Oliver Mowat, Sir John Thompson, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, Sir Allen Aylesworth, Sir Robert Borden, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Sir L. Gouin, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley have all failed to see in their time. Perhaps he is right and they have all been wrong, but for my part I think that is improbable. The fact is, as has been accurately and succinctly stated by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), that the basic freedoms are more highly regarded and more secure to the individual in Canada than in any other country in the world with the possible exception of Great Britain.

Why are they secure? Because they are protected by the British principle of the sovereignty of parliament. It is this British principle which the hon. member for Prince Albert proposes to abridge by attaching constitutional limitations to it in the manner of the bill of rights in the United States constitution.

My hon. friend speaks for the Conservative party in this matter. Why then, may I ask him, do he and his party not believe and advocate that we should conserve what has worked well? Why do they not advocate that we should keep our meddling with the Canadian constitution to an absolute minimum? What kind of conservatism is this? Can the hon. member, looking around the world, name a single country in which a bill of rights such as he advocates has worked as well as the sovereignty of parliament has worked in both the United Kingdom and in Canada? It is a strange kind of conservatism that attempts to discard that which has worked well and to replace it with something which, wherever it has been tried has not worked nearly so well as the principle of the sovereignty of parliament in this country.

I have attempted to discuss all the main arguments of the mover of the resolution. I must say, in all frankness, that if we were going to consider a bill of rights in this country I would prefer at least the language of the proposal made and standing in the name of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I would be glad to discuss the proposal he has suggested and to indicate the methods by which I think it would have to be introduced, if introduced at all. But I would think it would be much preferable to do that after having had the benefit of a fuller expression of his views. For that reason I think I should bring my present remarks to a close.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I approach this particular topic with a good deal of trepidation, stepping in where angels fear to tread. I am not a lawyer. Certainly I am not a constitutional lawyer, and I hope to demonstrate that by speaking more briefly than either of the two hon. gentlemen who have preceded me.

The hon. member for Prince Albert in introducing his motion this afternoon said he hoped there would be an opportunity for a vote on the proposal for the writing into our constitution of a bill of rights. With that of course I want to agree immediately. I did not know, when the hon. member rose to speak, that he was going to incorporate in his speech, though not in his resolution, the points made and the proposals suggested by the committee set up in the other place.

The motion I put on the order paper originally and which the house was good enough to allow me to withdraw this afternoon, spells out what I think should be a satisfactory bill of rights for this country. I am going to say immediately that while that resolution is in my name and was discussed with me very thoroughly, I had some of the best constitutional and legal advice in the country before I drafted it and placed it on the order paper. And I believe that is the kind of thing upon which the vote should be taken. Previous to this afternoon the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) told me that if I moved my resolution he would be glad to let his stand, and would be prepared to second what I had moved. What I am going to do this afternoon is move the substance of my motion as an amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Prince Albert. Then if the hon. member for Spadina will allow me, I shall add his name as seconder of the amendment, despite the reference made by the minister to a statement he made in a previous debate.

If I have that consent—and I understand I have—in a moment I shall move in the form of an amendment the motion which stood in my name. I think the need for explicit amendments was substantiated in several of the instances to which my hon. friend from Prince Albert referred this afternoon. And if I may say so, his reference to the religious case which was before the supreme court, and upon which there was a difference of opinion among the judges, indicates the futility of making a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada such as is suggested in the main motion, without having something far more specific than the motion indicates.

I say further that it is the duty of this parliament, representing all the people of Canada, to decide whether or not we shall have a bill of rights written into our constitution. It is not therefore the function of the supreme court to decide; it is the function of this parliament to decide.

So, as indicated, I move:

That the resolution be amended by striking out all the words after the words "advisability of" in the preamble of the resolution, and substituting therefor the following:

"The taking of whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following headings and sections:

XII HUMAN RIGHTS

148. Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws:

(a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

(b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.

(c) Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.

(d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.

(e) Subjecting any person to arbitrary arrest or detention or denying to any person the right after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against such person and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

(f) Suspending the right to habeas corpus or depriving any person of a fair trial or the right to be represented by counsel.

149. The rights provided in section 148 shall be enjoyed without distinction of race, sex, religion or language and the right to vote in any election of members of the parliament of Canada or the legislative assembly of any province shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, religion, language or sex.

150. The rights conferred by sections 148 and 149 hereof of this act shall not be deemed to abridge any existing right of any person."

May I say that the need for a bill of rights of this description is certainly not of recent origin. In spite of the closing words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), over the years, and during the times of the gentlemen to whom he referred, from time to time there have been serious infringements of individual rights and the securing of justice. For example, there comes to my mind the case of the Winnipeg strike in 1919, when the government of this country by telegram ordered the arrest of certain people in the city of Winnipeg. I believe it instructed that deportation be carried out but my memory is not clear on that point. The telegram said that legislation would be brought down later to validate the arrests or actions or whatever was being undertaken at that time. That was 36 years ago, and during the intervening period there have been many occasions on which interference with fundamental rights has been undertaken by various governments.

As has been said already this afternoon, in 1950 a committee of the other place sat to consider human rights and fundamental freedoms. After hearing many representations it recommended that parliament should adopt a declaration of human rights to be followed by consideration of the writing of a bill of rights so these rights might be embedded in our constitution. Of course since then parliament has done neither the one nor the other, although on occasion we have debated the question in this house.

In order to bring the matter to a head, I make the motion which I am now moving as an amendment to the main motion. I do that so we may take whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act in a manner that will secure without peradventure to every citizen of Canada the common right of individual freedom in this country.

As the hon. member for Prince Albert pointed out this afternoon, we are a signatory to the international declaration of human rights. Canada's signature is attached to that document even though we have not approved it by resolution of this parliament. I point out that under that declaration of human rights—I was representing Canada on the committee that wrote this into the constitution—we pledged ourselves to achieve in co-operation with the United Nations the promotion of universal respect for the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms. That was at Lake Success. We are signatories to that declaration.

Despite what the minister said, it seems to me that we have an obligation to see that we do within our own country what we propose other countries in the world should do. Therefore I think that within our own constitutional rights we should take the necessary action here to fulfil our obligations and pledges.

I want to say further that this parliament speaks for all the citizens of Canada. What I suggest is surely no infringement of provincial rights. Certain areas are suitable for provincial action in the defence of freedom. That is quite true. Certain areas in the defence of freedom may be suitable for municipal action. But the prerogatives of this parliament cover a greater area for our own protection than the area covered by all ten provinces together. This is the place in which our fundamental rights are either protected or not protected, or even interfered with.

As citizens of the whole country we must look to this parliament to protect our human rights as common citizens of a common country we call Canada. We have our act dealing with citizenship. Citizenship is a privilege conferred by this parliament, not by provincial legislatures. Citizenship is the responsibility not of the provinces but of Canada as a whole.

From time to time, as the hon. member for Prince Albert indicated this afternoon, there have been attempted and in some cases carried into effect in various parts of Canada certain limitations and serious infringements on the basic rights of freedom and citizenship in this country. The hon. member this afternoon referred to the Alberta press act of 1937. I am not going to enter into a controversy with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) or anyone else sitting in this house, but I am going to say that the judgment of the supreme court was that it was an infringement of the fundamental rights of the press in this country.

Although it was not mentioned, the padlock law in another province of Canada surely was an infringement of the rights of individuals in that province. In the same province certain legislation limits the right to distribute literature, and even goes so far as to prohibit the posting of posters at election time, providing that all literature shall be submitted to the chief of police of the city by the people who want to post bills or distribute leaflets. They cannot do that without obtaining a licence and getting permission from the city during a federal election.

That I say is a serious interference with the rights of citizens at any time and particularly during an election, when people have the right to all the information that may be available to them in order that they may make up their minds as to how they shall cast their ballots. As I say, there have been these infringements, and I could enumerate others along the same line.

Human Rights

I noticed the Minister of Justice said that there had not been interference with the operation of habeas corpus, that individuals have had access to the courts and so on. I know that the reason for the incarceration of individuals incommunicado in the espionage case has often been said to have been valid and essential to national security. Here we had people incarcerated; their friends did not know where they were; they had no access to counsel, and their individual rights were sadly interfered with. Even if it is argued that the end justified the means I never can believe that the end justifies the means in matters of that description.

The proposals that I seek to place before the house for its consideration, and I hope its support, have been carefully drawn with all these things in mind and, as I said earlier, with the advice and assistance of persons whom I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) respect as competent constitutional lawyers in this country.

The mere adoption of this resolution asking for the consideration of such a bill of rights would not enact that bill of rights but it would clearly indicate our opinion. Enactment of the legislation is something that can only be done with the approval of the government, I take it; so what we might do is make a declaration expressing our belief in the great principles of human freedom which, as the minister said, everybody in this house without distinction, I believe, will profess.

I hold in my hand Professor Scott's brief which he presented to the committee which was established in 1949 and 1950 in the other place. Professor Scott said that principles similar to those I suggest should be written into our constitution. I am going to quote only a few words from the brief. He said this would become a recognized part of public policy, and would thus assist judges in the interpretation of both statutes and private contracts.

It is a well-known principle of law that private agreements cannot violate public policy. If we adopted a declaration of this description it would become public policy, and consequently it could be used for the guidance of the courts and would help in the interpretation of law. He then went on to say—and I am summarizing him now—that embedded in the constitution it would influence the course of future legislation in parliament by inhibiting the adoption of later statutes in conflict with it, although of course there would be no absolute barrier to subsequent amendment of the bill itself. We know that an act can always be amended in this parliament, no matter how well it may be written; but I would remind the house of this. The British bill of rights—and there is a bill of rights there that was adopted in 1688 by, as it then was, the English parliament; it was not a British parliament at that time—has never been interfered with since. Like Magna Carta, it is embedded in the constitution of the United Kingdom; and as a matter of fact these United Kingdom declarations or whatever they are, such as Magna Carta, have had a tremendous influence not only in the commonwealth countries but in countries which have derived their institutions from the United Kingdom, such as the congress of the United States.

While a bill of rights could be amended, it would bind the executive and administrative branches of government at all times to the will of parliament as expressed in the constitution. That expression, that declaration, that bill of rights, would express the will of parliament in the particulars which I have enumerated in the amendment I have moved. If we had such a declaration, no order in council could issue unless a statute giving power to the executive had first been enacted. I go back to the question of the Winnipeg strike and the order in council. The telegram was sent without a statute behind it giving the authority which the government claimed and intended to use.

Of course a bill of rights could be a separate statute instead of being written into the constitution; but I think the protection becomes much more specific if it is written into the constitution itself. It thus becomes much more valuable to the people of Canada, and much more certain. Written into our constitution, the rights and freedoms enumerated would ensure to the people of Canada that temporary legislative majorities—and we may get temporary legislative majorities here and there in this country in the future that would interfere with human rights to a greater extent than those rights have been interfered with in the past—would be prohibited from, or at least, if not prohibited, would find more difficult the setting aside of proper democratic procedures to interfere with our fundamental rights.

The advantage, too, of adopting a constitutional amendment is that it brings together in one place a statement of the rights and the freedoms of Canadians, some of which are already embedded in our constitution. For example, section 133 of the British North America Act relates of course to the use of the two languages in our country. In this parliament of Canada, in the province of Quebec and in the federal courts of Canada, English and French are on equal footing. There is a constitutional right embedded in the constitution. Section 93 of the British North America Act gives the right of separate schools in the provinces where separate schools had existed or where subsequently, as in my own province and in the province of Alberta, the autonomy acts included a provision for those separate schools, just as in other provinces like Manitoba and British Columbia it is within the jurisdiction of the people to decide that they shall have a non-sectarian school system.

Those rights are embedded in our constitution, and as far as I know no one wishes to interfere with either of them. And of course when the matter of taking power to amend our own constitution was before this parliament we in this group were insistent that there should be embedded in the constitution the provision that a general election should be held at least once every five years. In the constitution before that, under section 20, we had the obligation of the government to call parliament together at least once a year, and it so remains.

There are those who say that a bill of rights is unnecessary because the preamble of the British North America Act says that the Canadian constitution—and the minister quoted it this afternoon—shall be similar in principle to that of Great Britain. Only the minority rights that were not a part of British tradition—and I have named them—were mentioned specifically in our constitution, particularly language and education.

Because of the disposition at times since then to infringe upon traditional rights that had been established in the United Kingdom, it is my opinion that it becomes necessary to write them more specifically into our constitution. I could of course have used my own language, but I happen to have here some reflections on a bill of rights by Professor Lower. I am not going to quote it at length, but he quotes at great length the representations that were made in Winnipeg some years ago in connection with a bill of rights.

I am just going to quote one part. It is rather lengthy, but I am going to quote from part of the material which he quotes. The quotation is from the brief submitted to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, Winnipeg, Manitoba, December 8, 1937, by Mr. Justice Coyne, Professor Lower and Professor MacFarlane. I should like to place this on record. Some lengthy quotations have been placed on the record this afternoon, and I am going to do the same thing. After talking about the difference between the British institution of parliament and the United States congressional system they say that the Americans therefore thought it advisable to set out a bill of rights specifically, and they go on to say:

> But the fathers of confederation, in the different circumstances of 1867, did not consider such specific provision to be necessary, especially when disallowance and reservation were there to protect them.

We have disallowance and reservation now, but the government has been loath to use either reservation or disallowance in recent years. I think the most outstanding case of that was when there was such tremendous pressure both in this house and in the country to disallow the padlock law in the province of Quebec, but the government refused to act. They go on to say:

> The necessities of our situation, with nine provinces, imperatively require equality everywhere to some minimum degree—some common rights of Canadian citizenship. Such rights must be beyond provincial interference, whether or not they are embodied in a bill of rights. The British North America Act was a product of its times.

I think everyone will agree with that statement. The year 1867 and the year 1955 are 88 years apart. The times then were very different from the times in which we now live; nor indeed was there such a threat throughout the world to political freedom—and I am speaking about political freedom, because I do not go along with the view that all our freedoms have been restricted over the last few years. As a matter of fact there has been much extension of economic and social freedom at the same time as in some places and under some circumstances there has been restriction of both political and religious freedom.

> Whatever there was of freedom in British institutions in 1867 passed into ours. We, in Canada, were the heirs of all the liberties won in previous centuries. It was inconceivable that the bodies set up for the government of Canada and its provinces, any more than that of Great Britain itself, would betray this fundamental of all British and Canadian life. Had not Creasy just said that Magna Charta had provided freedom to the utmost "for everyone that breathes English air"? To the people of the time, there seemed no more need to recapitulate those rights and incorporate them in an act than there was to incorporate the ten commandments. English liberty was taken for granted. It was basic in our constitution. It may therefore be asserted that in the British North America Act, by the very necessities of its existence, there must be found embodied as rights of Canadians as such, those fundamentals historically known as the liberties of the subject. These liberties are traditional. They are the warp and woof of our way of life, as that of all other English-speaking communities, and a part of the democratic system and philosophy. They are the foundation of our conception of citizenship and of the institutional structure of the dominion and all its provinces, that is to say, of representative and parliamentary government and the reign of law among a free people, as opposed to the conception and exercise of dictatorial will. To the fathers it was unthinkable that they should ever be in danger from any British legislature, for that legislature was simply a manifestation of the free men who stood behind it. These rights, to them, were too plain to need expression, they were underlying, basic, implicit and unchallengeable. The fathers therefore, felt no necessity of especially referring to or safeguarding in express language the traditional and fundamental liberties of the subject from provincial curtailment or annihilation. The spirit of the times has now changed and experience has shown that the liberties of the subject are no longer completely safe in the legislative hands of the provinces.

I think a case was made for that this afternoon. They continue:

What of the dominion? If the legislature represents the "will of the people", recent experience has tended to show that "the will of the people" may not necessarily be in the direction of traditional liberty. But shall established liberty on that account be jettisoned? Liberties sometimes have to be maintained not by, but against, majorities . . . In invading the liberties of the subject, in attempting to curtail the full rights of the citizen of Canada, the province at present professes to act within its own sphere of civil rights. Even if the matter be put on no higher ground than that of preserving uniformity of citizenship throughout the dominion, a superior plane of civil rights must be recognized above the jurisdiction of the provinces, especially dedicated to guardianship of the civil rights of the citizen as a citizen of Canada.

That is precisely what I have in mind in urging the house to support the amendment. I should like to say something more about the amendment after recess. I shall be just a few minutes more. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, kindly to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Philpott: Will the hon. member permit a question before six o'clock, because I should like to hear from him afterward?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Philpott: Is he aware of the effect this would have in case of war, when it is necessary for the government to have power to act quickly?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, naturally. This parliament has declared, as has the government, that in the event of war or apprehended war parliament will be called together and parliament will make a decision as to whether or not this country will issue a declaration of war.

I know of only one instance in recent years when that was not done, and that was the day we declared war on Japan. There had been in this house such unanimity of opinion, regarding Japan's activities before Pearl Harbor that Mr. Mackenzie King telephoned the leaders of the opposition parties and asked for their consent to issue a proclamation on Sunday, December 7, with a very good object in view. The object was that, since the United States had been extremely considerate of our needs prior to her entry into the war against Japan, the government of Canada would like it to be the first country in the world to declare war on Japan. The leaders of the opposition parties in this house agreed and the proclamation was issued that night. That is the only time I can remember when it was not done by parliament assembled.

Mr. Philpott: The hon. member has not quite caught my meaning. I am not talking about the technique of declaring war. I am talking about the necessity for a government, in time of war, to have power to act quickly in such things as the restriction of freedom of speech.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member was not here during the war. Had he been here he would have been aware of and acquainted with the War Measures Act which this house passed years ago and which gave the government all the powers they required to do almost anything they needed to do in wartime.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Would not a bill of rights make it impossible to pass an act like the War Measures Act?

Mr. Coldwell: No, I do not think so.

Mr. Philpott: That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. Coldwell: It must be remembered that a bill of rights is always amendable by parliament. In the event of the outbreak of war, if an amendment were needed to set aside certain aspects of a bill of rights I have no doubt this parliament would give immediate consideration to it and would give the necessary power to the government. I therefore see no objection to it on that score.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude as quickly as possible. Just before the dinner recess the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) asked me if I did not consider that a bill of rights of this description might interfere with Canada taking action on the outbreak of war.

During the dinner recess I looked up the War Measures Act of 1914, brought forward in the revised statutes of 1927 and appearing again as chapter 288 of the revised statutes of 1952. The War Measures Act not only sets aside provincial boundaries of legislation and so on but gives the government very wide powers indeed in the event of apprehended war, civil strife or war itself.

I do not think these powers could be set aside by the enactment of a bill of rights, and if there was any danger of that I have no doubt that parliament itself would soon find a way to give to the government all the powers it needed in the event of such a catastrophe. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) wants to interrupt me.

Mr. Garson: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Is not the point here that a bill of rights in the terms of the amendment of my hon. friend would make it impossible for parliament to pass a war measures act at all?

Mr. Coldwell: I do not think so because in any event the legislation is on the statute books. As I understand it, legislation that we place on the statute books does not become retroactive. Consequently I think the War Measures Act would still be in effect among the revised statutes of Canada and could be proclaimed without any fear of being challenged under a bill of rights. However, as I say I am not a constitutional lawyer, and I am not going to dispute with the minister. I have no doubt that he can find ways and means of getting around a situation of this description if it should prove to be sufficiently important and awkward.

Mr. Fulton: It would have to come before parliament.

Mr. Coldwell: It would have to come before parliament. The minister by order in council could not do it, but I take it that parliament is always supreme and anything parliament does can be undone or amended by parliament. I noted that the committee in the other place stated in its report:

> What is required in Canada is a broad statement of human rights leaving, as did the drafters of the United States bill of rights, the detail of application and the necessary qualifications and exceptions to the courts.

They go on to say:

> Many of the provisions suitable for inclusion in a bill of rights already appear in some portions of our law,—

I pointed that out this afternoon.

> —but they are not always of nation-wide application. Some fundamental rights are already expressed in the constitution. Other provisions of freedom and security are in the statutes and still others in decisions of the courts, together with custom or the commonly accepted way of doing things.

They go on to say, and this is what I have attempted to do and where I agree with them:

> What is required in Canada is one grand and comprehensive affirmation, or reaffirmation, of human rights, equality before the law and of security, as the philosophical foundation of our nationhood, that will assure continually to each Canadian that he is born free and equal in rights and dignity with all other Canadians, that he cannot be held in personal slavery, or arbitrarily arrested, that he will always be presumed innocent of any offence until proven guilty, that he has freedom of thought, conscience, expression and movement, and so on through the universal declaration. Thus will Canadians know of their freedom, exercise it in manly confidence and be proud of their country.

That pretty well sums up the view that is held fairly generally, I think, by those of us who are supporting the passage of such a bill. It is spelled out in the amendment in detail. I have no doubt that further consideration by the government might result in some changes in the phraseology, but since the amendment calls for consideration by this house of such a bill and its preparation, I think that purpose would be served by the adoption of the amendment to the motion.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be associated with the distinguished member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in the amendment he has presented that is now before the house. It is not often I have the privilege of associating with him in the common interest as I can on this occasion, although on many issues we see eye to eye. We had a great afternoon today in that we were privileged to listen to two brilliant constitutional lawyers, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I too am a lawyer, but I am not much of a constitutional lawyer.

I listened very intently to both hon. gentlemen discuss the constitutional issue, and I must admit that it has added to my confusion, which I now share with the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council. I have come to the conclusion that the only ones who are not confused by this issue are the people. They know what they want. They call it a bill of rights. The Minister of Justice said there was a great deal of difference of opinion as to the kind of bill of rights that was wanted. There was one bill of rights wanted by the Winnipeg Free Press, another by the hon. member for Prince Albert, another by other eminent gentlemen and another by recognized organizations.

I am not so much concerned with the differences between these people as I am with the fact that they all agree that there is a need for a bill of rights. When the Minister of Justice tells us that our rights are protected and we do not need a bill, and what we are talking about in effect are defects in administration, I assure him that it is a little deeper than that. I listened very carefully to his presentation, but it left me firm as to purpose and a little uncertain as to method.

At the present time, because the quality of our citizenship is not defined, we are in danger of having ten separate and distinct types of citizenship in Canada, one for each province. It is my view that all freedoms are related. If freedom of the press can be threatened by provincial legislation as it was on one occasion, freedom of conscience and freedom of religion may also be threatened, as has also been the case.

I think we should distinguish between freedom and sovereignty. Sometimes the latter is taken for the former. They are not the same. To give examples of the dangers, there is the Duplessis padlock law which is still the law of one province, the Alberta press act which was disallowed, and the recent amendment by Duplessis of the freedom of worship act which has as its purpose to get around a decision by the supreme court which favoured Jehovah's witnesses. Individual freedoms are not a law of nature but the will of man, and in a fiercely competitive world they cannot be taken for granted.

The desire for a bill of rights arises from a popular determination to be free from the tyranny of states and masters. Some people have expressed the view that a bill of rights is superfluous. They believe that individual freedoms are sufficiently implied in our constitution. That point of view has been expressed in the house. There are others, and they are in very large numbers, who believe that the absence of a bill of rights is an alarming thing. Many people are aware of the perils of the delay in having one written into our constitution. The majority seldom need constitutional justification for their rights. They usually, in some way, get what they want. The laws of arithmetic protect them.

As has already been indicated by one of the speakers, free speech in Canada is guaranteed by no statute. It is tolerated by the courts and it is allowed by the public so long as it does not radically affect public opinion. Duplessis has never been prevented from padlocking newspapers or clamping pamphlet distributors into jail. Freedom of worship is guaranteed by no law on our statute books. At the United Nations we defend freedom of worship, speech, press, religion and freedom from arbitrary arrest; thus we should be pinned down to guarantee them at home.

I suggest it is time we defined these freedoms and protected them by writing them into our constitution. A bill of rights gives the individual citizen the same protection by the courts in maintaining his freedom as the courts afford governments in imposing their will upon individual citizens. I have said before and I repeat now that a bill of rights is not an academic subject, but a real and very live one. It is something that is greatly needed by Canadians today, if only for its moral and ethical force.

There is no fundamental law in Canada guaranteeing civil liberties. There is no fundamental law in Canada forbidding the exercise of power in the denial of civil liberties. Ours is a negative freedom. Free speech is in a position where it is not forbidden, as are the other basic freedoms. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and I urge that there is a need for a formal restatement of the fundamental principles of individual freedom. The people of Canada want to know what are their rights. They have a right to know that.

Let me indicate for a moment some of the things I have in mind for a bill of rights. There are, of course, the racial discrimination cases which are widely reported in the press. There are a great number of cases which do not come to the attention of the public and are unknown except to the parties involved. One of the fundamental freedoms in any bill of rights is the freedom from discrimination on the ground of race, colour or creed. Equally a right is the freedom of the individual to practise his religion according to his beliefs. Any bill of rights must protect these most precious and personal of all freedoms, which cannot be limited or qualified.

In Canada we have no preferential religion. In the eyes of the law and at the bar of justice all religions are valid and deserving of respect. This must be affirmed in a bill of rights so it will be a constant reminder to those who may be tempted to instil intolerance by reason of their numerical or economic superiority. We are a land of minorities, religious as well as racial. The Protestant, the Catholic, the Jew, the Mohammedan—yes, the Jehovah's witness—practises his religion not on sufferance but as of right.

Political freedom is equally important. I referred before to the Duplessis padlock law, which is an abridgement of the right of assembly and which is still part of the law of one of our provinces. I speak of the right of assembly, and that brings to mind old phrases that are well remembered, such as the right to join the union of one's choice; freedom of the press and freedom of communication. I do not suggest that legislation in itself is a complete answer, but it does have the effect of focusing the problem and spotlighting for many citizens the real difficulty. Once awakened to the truth they are ready to take action.

The Minister of Justice quoted part of a speech I made in this house in 1952. I now gladly acknowledge and am quite ready to repeat what I said then. I do so with considerable pride. I said that the basic freedoms are more highly regarded and more secure to the individual in Canada than in any other country in the world, with the possible exception of Great Britain. All I ask is that those basic freedoms be put into writing and written into the constitution. Democracy implies the right of any individual to think differently from the majority. One of the real tests of democratic strength is how well it can stand minority pressures and differences of opinion, yet at the same time defend itself from subversive and destructive forces which would destroy it without employing the methods that are used by totalitarian states.

The purpose of a bill of rights is to guarantee that the basic freedom of the individual will not be violated, while at the same time restricting that freedom which might jeopardize the safety and security of the state. What I ask in a bill of rights is freedom under the law depending on two basic principles: One, that the individual may do and say what he pleases, so long as he does not transgress the substantive law of the land; two, that public authorities may only do those things which are authorized by common law or statute. Within that framework our Canadian bill of rights can be constructed. We have approved the charter of the United Nations and the universal declaration of human rights has been approved by our representatives, though not by this house. As a matter of fact we have been active in promoting both of these. If we fail to embody them in our constitution we say, in effect, that we agree but we are not prepared to put them in writing.

We, as representatives of the people, have no power to invade the rights or trample the liberties of those whom we represent. As a result of our discussion on the bill of rights both in and outside this house, progress has been made in Canada. We have fair employment practice legislation in the federal field and also in a number of the provincial fields. The racial restrictive covenant was declared invalid by the Supreme Court of Canada, and in my own province of Ontario it has been prohibited by law. In recent years there has been a definite increase in the anti-discrimination legislation. Discrimination in advertising has been outlawed in my home province as well as elsewhere. Our labour legislation in general prohibits discrimination in employment and anti-labour activities by employers.

But liberties are in danger, and we must guard against those dangers. They are in danger in two ways; first the direct conflict with a power which does not believe in them and which certainly wants to impose its philosophies on as many of the world's population as it can. And, as a reaction to this danger, there is the widespread distrust of anything in anybody that diverges from the accepted or established viewpoint. In some parts of this country it would take a brave, even a foolhardy man, occupying a white-collar position, who would express openly his belief in socialism, or even his doubts that our present economic system left room for improvement.

Constantly we are being told that democracy is something special, something just for us, and that the rest of the world does not quite seem to understand it. What we call democracy is not limited by any place, race or nation. I believe that men yearn for it and are fitted to work toward it in the east as well as in the west. I share with the house the belief in the good life for everyone. But I believe in concrete ways of making things better, rather than in the magic of an imported slogan.

So, Mr. Speaker, until we are prepared to guarantee the freedom of the individual and place it in a broadly conceived bill of rights, supported by all the ethical and social sanctions our society can command, we will go ill-armed into the great ideological conflict being waged in the world today. It is my belief that there is a great need for a charter of human rights, which should be translated into a bill of rights. The need for it is both overwhelming and self-evident.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising to offer a few comments upon the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I would like to express my appreciation of his action in clarifying what I think is the real issue in this matter, by submitting the type of bill of rights which he has offered in this amendment in, if I may say so, apt and appropriate terms.

My hon. friend's ideas on previous occasions have been the subject of consideration by persons other than myself and I should like to quote, and make my own, some language from an editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press of July 9, 1954, because I think it expresses succinctly exactly what it is this bill of rights, in the form which has been moved, would do. The language of the Free Press is as follows:

> Mr. Coldwell has attempted in fact to graft an American constitutional method to a Canadian constitution, British in origin. The American constitution was carefully designed to curb the powers of government in general, and of the federal government in particular. On the other hand the British constitution, while curbing the powers of the crown under King William's bill of rights, never attempted to curb the powers of parliament. They are absolute and unquestioned.

In his amendment the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says that we should consider taking whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein certain headings and sections—and then he proceeds to set out his bill of rights. I do not know of any better way in which one's co-operation can be shown in respect of a motion of this sort other than to do exactly what the amendment says; that is, to consider the taking of whatever steps are necessary, and to examine just what steps would be necessary. Because I think that those who try to bring this subject down out of the zone of rhetoric into the zone of actuality, by examining what it is that needs to be done, have at least as great a claim upon the approbation of those who seek a bill of rights as others who make speeches but will not take part in an examination of the method by which their speeches can be implemented.

So let us assume that, in defiance of the lessons of history, we are prepared to discard the tried and approved British principle of the sovereignty of parliament, and to substitute for it the by no means as well proven American principle of a bill of rights. In doing so I suggest that as a matter of technical necessity we must make allowance in this country for our Canadian division of legislative powers between the parliament of Canada on the one hand and the legislatures of the provinces on the other.

If to protect human rights we desire to limit the legislative powers of the Canadian parliament, the limitation we devise for this purpose must be considered as dealing with a subject matter which falls within the jurisdiction of this parliament. If on the other hand we desire to limit the legislative powers of provincial legislatures in general, then we are dealing with a matter which would come within the legislative powers of the provinces of Canada.

Why is this so? It is so because, from the time it was passed, the British North America Act gave to the provinces under the first heading of section 92 the power to amend the provincial constitution in any respect in which the provincial legislature desires. And as hon. members who were members of this House of Commons in 1949 will recall, at that time we in parliament took power to amend the Canadian constitution in respect of those matters of purely federal concern. And so far as matters which are of purely provincial concern on the one hand or purely federal concern on the other are concerned, they can be dealt with by the provincial legislatures and by this parliament, respectively, without recourse to any legislative authority outside of Canada.

But as matters now stand when we are attempting to restrict the powers either of parliament or of the provincial legislatures in respect of a matter of joint concern to the federal parliament and to the provincial legislatures, then the present position is that that restriction could only be imposed by the imperial parliament at Westminster to which we would have to go for our amendment. Incidentally if the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) were given effect the resultant constitutional change would limit, not only provincial powers in other respects but it would limit the power which provincial legislatures always have had to amend the constitutions of the provinces, by imposing upon them the restrictions which are outlined in his proposed bill of rights.

It is considerations such as these which make the enactment of a bill of rights in a country like Canada in which the jurisdiction is divided between federal and provincial legislatures so complex and difficult. As I think most hon. members are aware, we have been engaged in the past in conferences with the provinces with a view to devising some method whereby we could amend in Canada those matters of joint concern to parliament and to the provincial legislatures without being under the necessity of having to go to the imperial parliament to secure such amendment.

In my view I think it is the course of prudence that we should postpone the question of securing a bill of rights, even if it were desirable upon other grounds, until we shall have achieved at least in substantial part this constitutional reform of being able to amend our constitution in our own country without recourse to the parliament at Westminster.

There are three reasons for this. In the first place, I think we shall make better progress if we do not consider more than one difficult and complex matter at a time.

Secondly, having regard to the fact that the administration of justice falls within the jurisdiction of provincial governments, and that any new provisions brought into existence in the form of a bill of rights will have to be enforced as part of the law of the land by the provincial authorities, it would seem that a bill of rights would operate much more effectively if it were concurred in by the provincial authorities who will have to play such a large part in its administration.

My third reason is a more difficult one. It has to do with this question of divided jurisdiction in a federal state like Canada. To explain this point involves comparing the British constitution, the United States constitution and the Canadian constitution.

One of the first principles of the constitution of the United Kingdom is that which I have referred to already, the sovereignty of parliament. In the United Kingdom no court may declare any act of parliament ultra vires. Because parliament is supreme in that country that question never arises. No matter to what degree statutes of parliament in the United Kingdom may destroy human rights and the fundamental freedoms of its citizens, they are nevertheless valid as being within the sovereign powers of parliament. The great landmarks of English constitutional development such as Magna Carta, the habeas corpus act and the bill of rights act of 1688 can be repealed or amended by a statute passed by a mere majority in the House of Commons and the House of Lords. These so-called charters of liberty are merely part of the law of the land which parliament can amend at will.

It is true that these charters do protect the citizens against arbitrary action by the crown or by the government, but since these charters are themselves subject to the sovereignty of parliament they cannot protect a citizen against the action of parliament itself. As long as the United Kingdom retains its present constitution, it is impossible from a legal standpoint for the United Kingdom to provide a charter of liberties, a bill of rights, which a subsequent parliament could not change.

Yet I ask you to note that it is under this principle of the sovereignty of parliament, with no limitations upon the powers of parliament, with no charter of liberties which parliament cannot change or repeal at will that a greater degree of political liberty over a longer period of time has been achieved than in any other nation in human history. In many cases it is in this country where there is no charter of liberties that the nationals of other countries, whose human rights and fundamental liberties are supposed to be guaranteed by constitutional bills of rights, find sanctuary as political refugees. It is under this same principle that in Canada we have found a degree of political freedom throughout our history which is second only to that of the United Kingdom.

On the other hand, in the United States the overriding legal sovereignty is not in congress, nor is it in the state legislatures. At the end of and as a consequence of the successful American revolution the legal sovereignty of that great nation resided in the rebelling citizens themselves. As you will recall, in the beginning of the American declaration of independence we find the words "We the people". Having successfully rebelled they went about the setting up of their own governments. It was they who clothed their congress and their state legislatures with all the legislative powers which they possess. The constitutional restrictions which make up the American bill of rights in the American constitution and which protect American citizens' liberty and property are simply powers which the people of that country withheld from their congress and their state legislatures for themselves, the American people. For example, the due process of law clause to which the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred this afternoon is a restriction upon the legislative powers withheld from the American lawmaking bodies both in the federal and state spheres by the American people.

When Canada, as a newly-created nation, inherited from the United Kingdom its present constitution, it inherited with it this principle of the sovereignty of parliament. The privy council has held that the Canadian parliament, upon the one hand, and the Canadian provincial legislatures, upon the other, are sovereign within their respective jurisdictions and that together they are authorized to exercise the whole field of legislative power.

But because Canada was created as a federal nation made up of the federal government and provincial governments the necessity arose of dividing legislative power between the federal parliament on the one hand, and the provincial legislatures on the other. This division has imported into our constitution two ideas which are in some degree inconsistent with one another and for which we must make allowance in our approach to this problem of a bill of rights.

On the one hand, Canada and the provinces have together inherited the whole sovereignty of the British parliament. On the other hand, this division of legislative power between the parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures has imposed specific limitations on their respective powers. For example, the parliament of Canada cannot legislate with regard to those matters which come under provincial jurisdiction. The provincial legislatures cannot legislate with regard to those matters which come under federal jurisdiction. As regards matters of joint concern to the Canadian parliament and the provincial legislatures of Canada, any restriction upon the legislative powers of the Canadian parliament and the provincial legislatures that might be required by a bill of rights such as that moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar must be provided, as matters now stand, by the parliament of the United Kingdom, the legislative body which enacted the British North America Act in the first place.

Let us suppose that before we can agree with the provinces as to a method of amending our own constitution within Canada in matters of joint concern we ask the British parliament, as we should have to do, to impose upon this federal parliament and upon the provincial legislatures constitutional restrictions similar to the United States bill of rights, or, to be more specific, of the type which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moved in his amendment this afternoon.

What does it mean to impose such constitutional restrictions? It is just another way of saying that we withdraw from our parliament, or the imperial parliament withdraws from our parliament and our legislatures, the lawmaking powers to pass a certain type of law, a law in the terms of my hon. friend's amendment for example:

> Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

When that restriction has been imposed, then from that time on it will not be possible for this parliament or provincial legislatures to pass a law of that kind, and the power to do it in all matters of joint concern will be reserved not in any legislative body in Canada, but in the imperial parliament in England.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a question on that point? Does he think that the parliament at Westminster would pass any legislation of that kind, apart from a request of the Canadian parliament?

Mr. Garson: I do not suggest that it would.

Mr. Knowles: Then it is a meaningless argument, is it not?

Mr. Garson: No, not at all because the difference is this. In the United States they secured the eighteenth amendment to their constitution by a method provided in their constitution for amendments of that kind and withdrew from their legislative bodies the power to pass laws authorizing the sale of spirituous liquors and thereby brought about prohibition in that country. When this prohibition policy proved to be a colossal failure they had in their constitution, already provided for in advance, the means whereby they could repeal the eighteenth amendment and abolish the colossal failure. But in our case, if a corresponding amendment to our constitution had to do with a matter that was of joint concern to the federal parliament and provincial legislatures, the legislative power withdrawn from parliament and our provincial legislatures would then rest in the imperial parliament at Westminster, and we should have to go back later as suppliants and ask them to please repeal that amendment and restore such legislative powers to the parliament and provincial legislatures of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: That is no different from what happened in the United States; they had to go back over the same route.

Mr. Garson: There is this difference. When we shall have taken, as I am confident that ultimately we shall take to ourselves in Canada the power to amend our own constitution and also at the same time to repeal any amendment that we do not wish to maintain, that will be the time when it would be proper to consider the superimposing of a bill of rights upon our constitution.

I said a few moments ago, sir, that our parliament and our provincial legislatures are supreme and sovereign within their respective spheres of jurisdiction. Acts of parliament of Canada can be held to be ultra vires because they deal with matters which come under provincial authority. But they cannot be held to be ultra vires because they may authorize emergency procedures such as those under the War Measures Act, or because they confiscate property without compensation, or because they interfere with private contracts. I must say, with great deference to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that it seems to me that if we had grafted upon our constitution, or I should say superimposed upon our constitution, a bill of rights in the form in which he has suggested, our legislative power to pass an act like the War Measures Act to deal with national emergencies in wartime would be very seriously open to question. Indeed I have suspected that the great zeal and enthusiasm with which the communists have supported the campaign for a bill of rights is because they would like to put us precisely in that position.

We are in a position here in which we have to secure from the parliament of the United Kingdom amendments to our own constitution with respect to all of these matters of joint concern to Canada and the provinces. Thus bill of rights restrictions upon the powers of parliament and provincial legislatures would result in the subject matter of such restrictions resting with the imperial parliament during the interval that the bill of rights restriction continued. My view is that instead of moving into such complications of a bill of rights before we have acquired full powers to amend our constitution in Canada we would be better off to adhere to the principle of the sovereignty of parliament which has served us very well in the past, and has also served the United Kingdom well.

When we look at that country and think that in times of direst national peril elections did not cease to be held, and parliament did not cease to sit and deal with matters in open discussion in the freest possible manner, and that there was a minimum invasion of human rights and liberties even in wartime, it makes one reflect as to whether the sovereignty of parliament is something that we should lightly cast aside in favour, sir, of what? In favour of constitutional guarantees such as the following excellent ones. I should like to read these into the record:

Article 87. All court cases are heard in public and the accused is guaranteed the right to be defended by counsel.

Article 88. Judges are independent and subject only to the law.

Article 94. Citizens have the right to rest and leisure.

Article 100. Citizens are guaranteed by law: (a) freedom of speech; (b) freedom of the press; (c) freedom of assembly, including the holding of mass meetings; (d) freedom of street processions and demonstrations.

Mr. Fulton: Is this the United Nations' declaration?

Mr. Garson: No; I shall tell my hon. friend what it is when I have finished. I continue:

Article 102. Citizens are guaranteed inviolability of the person.

Article 103. The inviolability of the homes of citizens and privacy of correspondence are protected by law.

Article 111. Elections of deputies are equal: each citizen has one vote; all citizens participate in elections on an equal footing.

Article 115. Voting at elections of deputies is secret.

These, sir, are the articles which form part of the constitution of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic of February 19, 1937, as amended and supplemented up to and including July 11, 1947. They are a pretty good example, both in their content and in their operation, of the fact that you do not make a new heaven upon earth by passing a bill of rights.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the choice which faces us here in Canada, and which has been placed before us on the order paper by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, is the choice between placing our faith in the sovereignty of parliament and in the good sense of the Canadian people who elect parliament on the one hand, or in constitutional provisions such as those which I have just read, as interpreted by the courts. If purely as a matter of theory—if words on paper or bills of rights or anything of that sort can in themselves be our salvation—I think you cannot get a much better constitution than the one I have just read.

But when we come to administer any form of bill of rights this question is at once raised: If we are afraid of parliament and of public opinion which elects parliament, what of the courts? Are they completely immune from public opinion? Should they be completely immune from public opinion? We well may wonder whether, in the last analysis, there is much choice between these two alternatives. In a democratic country such as Canada surely, in the last analysis, it is public opinion—that is the contents of the minds of the people, their character and their intelligence—which governs their voting and elects their parliaments. In spite of all the guarantees which may be given in any constitution, I suggest that the experience in many, if not all, of the countries that have constitutional guarantees, is that it is the state of judicial opinion, in the light of the state of public opinion, which determines to what extent constitutional guarantees of human rights and fundamental freedoms are to possess reality and effectiveness.

In the poll tax states, for example, the bill of rights written into the American constitution is what the courts of those states say it is, and persons who are guaranteed the franchise by the constitution do not necessarily get it. The constitutional rights possessed by any people are limited by public opinion and by the remedies which are actually available in the courts to enforce those rights. I think that he would be a most naïve and unobservant man who would compare unfavourably the human rights and fundamental freedoms enjoyed by the people of the United Kingdom or Canada under the system of the sovereignty of parliament with those enjoyed by any other people anywhere in the world under the constitutional guarantees of a bill of rights.

There are some other difficulties in this connection, and I do not think that we are honestly approaching this question if we do not face them. There are some offences or alleged offences against human rights and fundamental freedoms which are not breaches of the law which any bill of rights guarantee can prohibit or prevent. They are breaches of ethical personal conduct in that sphere of one's life which, in a free country, is beyond the reach of the law. Suppose, for example, that an otherwise admirable citizen, who is sufficiently eminent that his approval or disapproval is of some consequence, happens to have strong racial views; and suppose that at a public gathering or otherwise he snubs another man because of his race. The wound here may be infinitely more painful than any from which the law could protect the other man. Yet it is questionable indeed whether any bill of rights could protect against such a wound. Some of the worst cases of discrimination occur in the field of ethics. They are not susceptible to legal solutions, constitutional or otherwise. I suggest that the sooner we recognize them as ethical misdemeanors, the sooner we understand that the only way in which we can cure them is by educational enlightenment and the force of public opinion, the sooner we shall make some real progress in their cure.

Upon the whole, I submit that we have fared rather well in Canada under this inherited principle called the sovereignty of parliament. For a country which, when it began, was a small frontier and an extensive wilderness and is now a larger area of settlement with a large frontier and still quite a large wilderness, the human rights and fundamental freedoms which our people have enjoyed throughout our history, the administration of our justice, the character of our political life, the distribution of our national income even, will compare not unfavourably with those of most other countries in the world. Our treatment of minorities will not compare unfavourably with that of the United Kingdom herself. The law as well as the practice of our federal government and of our provincial governments is democratic. We already enjoy a large measure of political liberty. Ask any Canadian soldier who fought in Europe how we compare in these respects with the nations through which he travelled.

By virtue of the act passed by this government in 1946, Canadian citizenship is now clearly defined; and so far as I know, no race nor creed is barred. Our immigration laws upon the whole are enlightened and just. We have universal franchise for adult men and women, without property requirement of any kind. There is no restriction upon citizens as regards the holding of office. Anyone can start a new political party who can find the people to listen to him and accept his views. There is no limitation upon the views which he may expound. We even permit communists to criticize most severely our own system of government, and some of those who advocate a bill of rights censure us for doing so.

I mention these things, Mr. Speaker, merely to inject a little bit of realism into our consideration of this matter. We certainly should not be smug. Certainly we can improve our position in relation to human rights and fundamental freedoms. I have mentioned these matters because I believe that in a great deal of the discussion which has taken place on this subject, adequate consideration has not been given to the merits of our constitution which is modelled upon that of Great Britain. I suggest that before we change from the British principle of the sovereignty of parliament to a bill of rights similar to that of the United States of America, we must thoroughly understand what we have in order to be very sure that that which we substitute for it is really an improvement.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that for my own part it would require much stronger arguments than those which have so far been brought forward to make me think that the superimposition upon our British constitution of a bill of rights in the form advocated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) would improve the present protection which we now enjoy. But I am only one citizen of Canada. If there is a majority of my fellow citizens who would prefer to have a bill of rights such as that suggested, I still would venture to suggest that there would be much less confusion if, before attempting to secure it, we should first dispose of another major constitutional issue with which this parliament and the provincial legislatures are now concerned, namely that of agreeing upon a method of amending our Canadian constitution in Canada in matters of joint federal and provincial concern.

Moreover, in relation to the actual enactment of a bill of rights, I think it will be necessary and wise for the government of Canada to confer with the governments of the provinces in this matter. A bill of rights will certainly affect (1) matters of joint concern to parliament and the provincial legislatures; (2) matters which come wholly under federal jurisdiction; (3) matters which come wholly under provincial jurisdiction; (4) matters—and there are a number of them—which in some aspects, such as freedom of speech, freedom of the press and the like, are under federal jurisdiction and in other aspects are under provincial jurisdiction. This being the case, it seems to me that the whole question should be considered in consultation with the provincial governments before the Canadian parliament, by a joint address of the Senate and the House of Commons, requests the parliament of the United Kingdom to enact anything approaching a bill of rights.

There are several good reasons for this. Let me mention only two. The first is one to which I have already referred. Since the provinces, under the British North America Act, are responsible for the administration of justice, the operation and enforcement of a bill of rights of the American type would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, without the full co-operation of the provincial authorities. The second reason is that we are not likely to have such provincial co-operation if we in the federal field take the initiative to impose limitations upon provincial rights and powers without consulting the provincial governments. In considering the amendment—

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister leaves that, would he permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Is he in a position to say when it is intended to reconvene the conference of the federal and provincial governments to discuss that very important matter of finding a way to amend our own constitution here in Canada, in all its aspects?

Mr. Garson: No, I am not. I would imagine that there probably would be a consideration of that matter along with the conference on fiscal matters which has been suggested, but I am not in a position to confirm that. That does not come within my sphere of jurisdiction. The amendment of our present British North America Act which has been recommended by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in his amendment would, for example, limit the legislative powers of the provincial legislatures under at least four headings of section 92 of the British North America Act. It would limit their powers under heading No. 1, which is:

> The amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this act, of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of lieutenant-governor.

At the present time this power resides in the provinces. What is proposed by the bill of rights is a series of provisions that would certainly alter the constitution of the provinces. Then it would interfere with heading No. 13, "property and civil rights in the province." It would interfere with heading No. 14, "the administration of justice in the province", and so on, and it would also interfere with heading No. 15, which is as follows:

> The imposition of punishment by fine, penalty, or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section.

In addition, I should think that the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would likewise supersede provincial legislation such as the Saskatchewan bill of rights act and the Ontario fair accommodation practices act of 1954.

While, therefore, it would perhaps be possible—and I think this was the point that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was making—for the parliament of Canada, by a joint address of the House of Commons and Senate, to get the imperial parliament at Westminster to act, by means of that joint address, to impose limitations upon the legislative powers of the parliament of Canada and of the provincial legislatures, I feel certain that such an action would be regarded by the provincial authorities as a federal interference with provincial rights, and that they would certainly feel this way if we were to take that step without any previous consultation with them.

I would suggest that this would be a poor way indeed of securing the necessary co-operation of the provincial authorities in the administration of justice if indeed it did not in other respects set up a regrettable and unnecessary resentment. It is for these reasons that I submit that the steps that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says should be taken to lead up to this bill of rights which he recommends should be steps taken by the federal government in consultation with the provincial governments of Canada.

I certainly wish to thank hon. members, Mr. Speaker, for the patience with which they have listened to me, and I desire to repeat, as I said at the beginning of my remarks this afternoon, that I am not speaking for the government. In my remarks I have attempted to clarify the nature of the problem. If my remarks have contributed to this end, I shall be more than content because that is all that they purport to do.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the first paragraph of the motion refers to freedom of religion, and it reads thus:

> That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing a bill or declaration of rights to assure amongst other rights: 1. Freedom of religion . . .

I am sure that the sponsor of the motion, who is one of our most learned colleagues and one of the ablest lawyers in the house, must know that freedom of religion already exists in this country and has existed for over a century. He must be familiar with the statute 14 and 15 Victoria, chapter 175, passed in 1851, which reads thus:

> Whereas the recognition of legal equality among all religious denominations is an admitted principle of colonial legislation;
> And whereas in the state and condition of this province, to which such a principle is peculiarly applicable, it is desirable that the same should receive the sanction of direct legislative authority, recognizing and declaring the same as a fundamental principle of our civil polity:

Be it therefore declared and enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council and of the legislative assembly of the province of Canada, constituted and assembled by virtue of and under the authority of an act passed in the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and intituled, an act to reunite the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and for the government of Canada, and it is hereby declared and enacted by the authority of the same—

This is the point to which I direct your kind attention.

—that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, so as the same be not made an excuse for acts of licentiousness, or a justification of practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the province, is by the constitution and laws of this province allowed to all Her Majesty's subjects within the same.

My hon. friend and the other hon. members who have spoken unquestionably know that legislation had the sanction of Queen Victoria. Moreover, it was in the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1859, title 7, religious matters, chapter 74, with the following marginal note which speaks for itself: "Freedom of religion guaranteed by law". This was before confederation, but after confederation this legislation was incorporated in the statute books of the province of Quebec. My references are 1877, chapter 214; 1887, chapter 235; 1925, chapter 198; and the revised statutes of 1941, chapter 307. For the province of Ontario the references are 1877, chapter 214 and 1887, chapter 235. I have not found it in the last revised statutes of the province of Ontario. As it was part of the legislation that united Canada before 1867, and as it has been incorporated in the statute books of Quebec and Ontario respectively after confederation, it shows that it is a provincial matter, even if it is not in the latest edition of the revised statutes of Ontario.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman quoted the opinions of the leaders of some churches to the effect that we should have a bill of rights. Probably they had not been informed that such legislation existed, otherwise they would have made their representations to the competent authority which, in this case, is the province of Ontario and the other provinces. A friend of mine told me that similar legislation exists on the statute books of Nova Scotia, but I did not have time to verify that fact. It may be so. This is purely a provincial matter; it is a matter of civil rights.

The matter of religious freedom being established and guaranteed by law, let us look at the other freedoms. The other freedom mentioned by the sponsor of this motion was the freedom of speech. This is a relative matter. What constitutes freedom of speech? My hon. friend has too much experience to contend that freedom of speech is boundless. It is not, because after he had spoken for 40 minutes he was interrupted. The rule prevented him from speaking longer than 40 minutes, but unanimous consent was given to let him proceed further. The same privilege was made available to some other hon. gentlemen.

Now, there are other things, too. One cannot use bad language with regard to Her Majesty or the royal family, or with regard to our colleagues in the house. Sometimes we go to extremes. It is seldom that the freedom of speech of any individual is questioned when he is abiding by the rules. Of course no one ever suffered more than I did, personally, in so far as my fundamental freedoms and human rights were concerned. I thank my friends the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), among others, for offering to come to my rescue in some difficult circumstances. But the hon. member who sponsors this motion concerning freedom of speech did not come to my rescue. I would have been glad to have had his assistance.

I had some difficulties in this house. I was abiding by the law, but the interpretation of the law was different. I thought the hon. member would come to my rescue with his eloquent voice in order to have my rights restored and my fundamental freedoms unimpeached. Unfortunately it did not happen in that way.

Mr. Knowles: We do not have the eloquence, we just love you.

Mr. Pouliot: He was preparing a speech on some other matter which was of more importance to him at that time than the question of freedom of speech.

I have just checked the record, Mr. Speaker, and noted that in the year 1947-1948 there were numerous sittings of the committee on human rights. My hon. friend shone by his presence and was missed very much when he did not attend the sittings. Upon looking at the record for 1947 I find he attended two sittings of the committee and missed six. In 1948 he attended three and missed ten. This is unfortunate, because if he had attended all the sittings of the committee the report would have been much more conclusive as a result of his experience, and perhaps now we would have legislation on human rights and fundamental freedoms. This is a fact.

We have spoken about freedom of speech, and there is freedom of the press. Freedom of the press is another thing that is very interesting. When I was in London in 1937, at the time of the coronation, I recall that the press imposed censorship upon itself on news concerning the Duke of Windsor and his marriage. There was no regulation, but they thought the atmosphere existing at the time did not permit the press to give some of the details about the marriage and wedding trip of the Duke of Windsor. Now, that was a curtailment and it was self-inflicted. Is my hon. friend so sure that the press is free? It is not, and no legislation can change it because the press is the mirror of the views of its owner.

What newspaper is free from its own owner? I ask my hon. friend that question. With his wide experience he knows quite well that if the owner of a newspaper is in favour of a certain thing, that newspaper will not speak against it; otherwise the editor will be fired. He knows it. What law can change it? How can he change the relations that exist between the owner of a newspaper and his editor? Naturally, some owners of newspapers are more broadminded than others. It happens sometimes. There is a time when they may say to the editor, "Stop", or "Go". My hon. friend, with all his learning and with all the fine speeches he has made about freedom of the press, cannot change it.

Now, the press is not free from the advertisers. For instance, an advertiser who pays for a full page daily advertisement deserves recognition by the newspaper that prints his advertisement. Can my hon. friend deny it? Can anyone deny it? This is a tie; this is a string. This string may become a big, strong, powerful cable. Can my hon. friend change it? No, sir, he cannot. And when we begin to analyse his motion we see that while it is wonderful theoretically, in practice it is hard to apply.

And then, as to radio, I happen to be in different places, and on one occasion I attended the silliest thing I have ever seen. It was a conference of the Canadian Bar Association on the uniformity of law. Does my hon. friend know about it? Well, I was there, and all the attorneys general of the provinces were there. Some were asleep; some were awake.

Mr. Knowles: The former were as bright as the latter.

Mr. Pouliot: Their idea was to pass the same resolutions again and again a week before the Canadian Bar Association met. This meant that the attorneys general and the small fry of their departments were to have an extra vacation of one week before the convention to discuss the same matter. Always platitudes. On this occasion, referring to radio, they passed draft legislation of the kind my hon. friend uses in his motion. It was to the effect that when someone speaks over the radio and in doing so is guilty of slander, the one who speaks is not to be held responsible but that the radio station must accept responsibility. That draft legislation was adopted by the committee on the uniformity of law, but it was never passed by any legislative body.

Then, as to habeas corpus, my hon. friend should not be concerned about that. When habeas corpus is abrogated or suspended, otherwise than by immediate legislation, it is in virtue of an act of emergency powers passed by parliament because of particular circumstances, where the state could be in danger. But I will add something to that. I wish to convert my hon. friend to my views. I will tell him honestly that he is such an able lawyer that habeas corpus would have no importance to his clients. There is no one he could not get out of jail, and that would settle the question.

I have taken some notes, one of which relates to the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association. The hon. member for Prince Albert referred to the case of Mr. Blair Fraser, and made a fine dissertation about the examination for discovery. That was a civil case; it was not a criminal case. And as it was a civil case it came under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Ottawa had nothing to do with it, and my hon. friend knows that better than anyone else.

Then he mentioned the names of a few illustrious sponsors of a draft bill of rights. They are great men in this country. Opinions are free; but they spoke like philosophers or dreamers, and they did not mention a fact. They were speaking theoretically and in an academic fashion. My hon. friend, who is realistic and a man of action, took the trouble to transcribe in longhand some of those utterances. I cannot understand them.

Is it true, sir, that we value freedom less than we did 50 years ago? We value it more, because this country has reached the point where there is no other country that offers greater freedom than Canada. But some people speak about more freedom. Where does freedom stop? It would be very interesting to know that; because on the one hand, where freedom is not limited my hon. friend and others who think as he does can rise when they feel like it and speak in support of human rights and fundamental freedoms. But, outside of fair limits, limits sanctioned by law, can they come to the defence of one who has exceeded those limits?

In order to discuss the matter properly my hon. friend should tell us what the limit is. He should tell us where liberty and freedom end and where licence begins. The hon. member was fair in that respect, but he was not clear enough. He said that free speech is not licence, and I agree with him on that. He said that anyone who speaks becomes subject to punishment when his words strike at the security of the state, the rights of others or are blasphemous. And I agree with him on that. But on the other hand this statement is a denial of the first part of his argument.

I would like him to explain—and he can do so—who can complain, if they have struck at the security of the state and the rights of others, or have been blasphemous. It is a very difficult matter, and no one realizes it better than the hon. member.

I took careful note of what he said when he asked this: Who denies the right whereby ideas may be tried before the bar of public opinion? Nobody denies it. My hon. friend is free to say anything he likes to the people. They can listen to him; they can approve of what he says or they can disapprove. They have the same right to be free as he has. When has my hon. friend been prevented from submitting ideas to the bar of public opinion? Never. This is an exaggeration of language.

He said that we already have a bill of rights in the British North America Act. He referred to the Saumur case and quoted Bora Laskin, a professor at the University of Toronto. I am not familiar with the top jurists of the University of Toronto. As I say, my hon. friend referred to the Saumur case and the various opinions expressed by the justices of the supreme court. Mr. Bora Laskin says that this extraordinary division of opinion creates a result that is as curious as it is unsatisfactory.

Then my hon. friend suggests that his draft bill be submitted to the supreme court. How can he suggest that when he quotes and takes as his own an opinion expressed by a Toronto professor to the effect that the decision of the supreme court in a similar case was as curious as it was unsatisfactory. Then he insists upon a parliamentary committee.

I appeared before the parliamentary committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms. Along with two of my colleagues I had been abused. One colleague is still living but the other, my good friend Mr. Church, the hon. member from Toronto, is dead. We were abused because we did not share the views of a certain editor regarding the United Nations. That editor employed language which would have been considered unparliamentary. I appeared before the committee on July 4, 1947, to ask that it redress a wrong and restore my fundamental freedom and give me back my human rights. But I found the committee impotent. They told me their reference from the house did not cover that. I found out that a committee which had been set up by this house was not able to protect the liberty of a member of the house who had been abused by the press. What is the use arguing any longer? That is enough. I am fed up with it. I shall vote against the motion and the amendment.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, there are two things I should like to make abundantly clear right away. First, I would not want to have it construed that our lateness in participating in this debate results from any lack of interest. We had good reason to believe that we would have an opportunity to express our opinion earlier in the day. We feel that in a debate of this kind, particularly where the time is limited, each party in the house should have an opportunity to express its views.

In the second place, I shall not allow myself to be put in a position where it can be said that I talked out the resolution. I shall conclude before ten o'clock even though it means stopping in the middle of a sentence or even in the middle of a word. We are not endeavouring to talk out this resolution. We are interested; we have certain convictions which we are prepared to express, and we are prepared to take a position if and when a decision is rendered by this house on this resolution.

When the house commenced the debate this afternoon we were dealing with resolution No. 8, which is made up of four specific sections. In lines 3 and 4 appear these words: "assure amongst other rights"; and then at the end of the resolution is a paragraph relating to the advisability of submitting for an opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the degree to which fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are matters of federal or provincial jurisdiction.

To us that resolution was all-embracing. However, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moved resolution No. 16 as an amendment to resolution No. 8. Resolution No. 16 in our view is not one whit broader than resolution No. 8. It is couched in slightly different language. It asks for an amendment to the constitution, whereas resolution No. 8 merely calls for the enactment of a bill or declaration of rights. By virtue of his seconding of the amendment to resolution No. 8 the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has agreed in effect that resolution No. 8 as amended contains that which is incorporated in resolution No. 10. So actually and in effect we are dealing with the subject matters as set forth in three resolutions.

We find that there is a very specific difference of opinion in Canada with respect to this particular matter. I am sure there can be no difference among the membership of this house with respect to the desirability of preserving the freedoms as set forth in the resolution or the amendment. I am quite confident that no hon. member of this house is going to object to clause No. 1 which is designed to guarantee freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of radio. I am sure that if a vote were taken and all hon. members of this house were to express themselves they would indicate approval of that section.

Section No. 2 states that habeas corpus shall not be abrogated or suspended except by parliament. I am quite sure that no one will disagree with that.

Then the next paragraph states that no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, and in no case by order in council. I am not going so far as to say they would all agree with that. We have already heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) say in effect that he could not agree with the latter part of it. To me the general principle set forth in that section is one that could be supported.

Then the next paragraph states that no tribunal or commission shall have the power to compel the giving of evidence by anyone who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards. In the amendment we find slightly different language. It states:

(a) abridging freedom of speech and expression or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

I am sure a majority of us, anyway, agree with that clause, and so it goes through the entire amendment; but we find ourselves, interestingly enough, in agreement with a good deal of what was said by the Minister of Justice.

In my own approach to this amended resolution I must ask myself this question: Do you believe in the right of the provinces to exercise their jurisdiction as laid down by the British North America Act? Well, certainly I do, Mr. Speaker, and for the life of me I cannot understand how the government of Canada could bring in legislation and the parliament of Canada approve it and cover all the guarantees set forth in this legislation without invading fields which are set down clearly and definitely today as being, if not in whole in every case, at least in part within the jurisdiction of the provinces. To my mind action of that kind could easily precipitate civil war in the country.

Until such time as a formula is found by which we can amend our own constitution here in this country, this kind of procedure would be extremely dangerous. I can envision what stand many of the provinces of this country would take if such legislation were enacted. In fact, if we have had any difficulties in our relationships prior to this time, certainly we would have real ones if action of this type were taken.

I certainly do not want it thought or said that by virtue of having taken that position one might be in disagreement with certain very desirable objectives in the resolution before us. I for one have examined these resolutions carefully. I have followed them from the time they first appeared on the order paper; I have secured all available information, and certainly feel in the first place that I would agree with the general principles as laid down, if I cannot agree with the method of bringing them about.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I agree with much of what the minister has said. There are many Canadians who feel that our approach should be such as was made in the United States of America. There are other Canadians who feel that the United States of America, with its bill of rights, with certain other constitutional guarantees so-called, is a classic example of where they have altogether too many of the things we are trying to prevent.

As a matter of fact, their bill of rights in the United States has not offered the guarantees of freedoms that so many persons assumed would naturally follow from the passage and implementation of certain legislation. In my opinion it takes far more than legislation. Heritage and tradition play an extremely important part in this field, particularly in relation to the matter of colour, creed and race. I am inclined to the belief that if a person is determined to engage in discrimination on the basis of race, colour or creed, he is going to do it and he is going to get away with it regardless of whatever legislation there may be on the statute books.

By virtue of heritage and tradition, by virtue of good common sense on the part of our people, there has been the minimum of that type of discrimination in this country. I will admit there has been some discrimination, but there are too many persons who are too anxious to magnify it out of all proportion to its importance. As a matter of fact, owing to the publicity that has been given to it, it has actually caused further discrimination that might never have taken place had it not been for the publicity and attention given to it.

Human Rights

We who live in this country are extremely fortunate. We can stand to the rest of the world as a wonderful example of a country in which so many of these freedoms are enjoyed by so many people. It is true that governments have been responsible from time to time for encroaching upon certain freedoms of the people; but, as the minister asserted, we have our parliament and we have public opinion, both of which are very potent factors in a matter of this kind.

After looking at resolution No. 10 on the order paper and noting the reference to the United Nations declaration of human rights, and also the reference made to it by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), and to the fact that Canada actually endorsed it at the United Nations, I am sure it was intended to offer guarantees to the people of other countries to make them feel that there was a future, rather than for our own country and to any need that might exist within it.

We feel that this whole matter could be considered by the federal authorities dealing with the provincial authorities; but personally I would be very much opposed to our trying to do everything by legislation when so much depends upon good sense and the education of our own people. In that connection, very recently I had occasion to offer the suggestion that probably our schools, churches, service clubs and other organizations within the nation could do considerably more than they are doing now or have done in the past to remove any desire on the part of the people to engage in discrimination based on race, colour or creed. As I say, there may be sections in the country where this sort of thing is indulged in to a greater extent than in others, but in my experience there has been an absolute minimum of it.

The minister referred to the fact that they have legislation in the United States. He also referred to the fact that the communist party itself has pressed hard for such legislation. When he said that I was reminded of the fifth amendment. The fifth amendment was designed originally, I presume, to give protection to honest citizens, but we know to what extent it has been used by communists in the United States to serve their own ends and protect themselves while engaged in their nefarious practices. I could not help but recall that at the very moment the minister made his assertion.

I wanted to refer to a number of things, Mr. Speaker. Four or five different speakers have referred today to what they called the press bill or the press act of Alberta. Had time permitted I fully intended to deal with that act, which was not a press act at all or press bill. It was the accurate news and information act of 1937. Because I do not think it has ever been done, I had intended to indicate to the house the exact circumstances under which such legislation had come into being. I intend to do that at a later date, but I could not do it now without being guilty of the very offence that I said I did not want to be guilty of.

Once again, and in conclusion, may I say that we find no fault with this parliament and the provinces of Canada laying down procedures, if they are acting within their own jurisdiction, as a contribution toward the preservation of certain freedoms, or of all freedoms, as a matter of fact. But we cannot agree that the method of procedure should be as set down here, because it would be done in utter defiance of what we have all, I believe, in this house asserted from time to time, namely our conviction that the rights of the provinces as set forth under the constitution should be respected and honoured.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact—as I am sure do all hon. members—that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) has concluded in time for a vote to be taken on this motion. I assure you that I also intend to compress my remarks within a brief compass so as still to leave that time.

I am going to deal with one question only, namely the position in which we find ourselves as a result of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who has in effect eliminated most of the operative words of the motion of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and has substituted therefor the positive proposal to amend the British North America Act by adding three specific sections.

In the past on frequent occasions we have stated our position as being one of respect for the constitution. The hon. member for Prince Albert, who introduced his motion, referred to the difficulties of deciding, particularly in the uncertain state of the jurisprudence on the matter, just what are the rights of the dominion parliament and what are the rights of the provincial legislatures. Therefore as a preliminary step he suggested the reference of the whole matter to the Supreme Court of Canada to decide what parts of his suggestions lay within dominion competence and what lay within provincial competence.

In his amendment the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has eliminated that suggestion. We are therefore placed in the position that in effect we are being asked to decide this matter for ourselves. I fully agree with the hon. member for Red Deer that in any decision of this sort we must respect the position of the provinces. We have therefore decided that we would support the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in a vote, on one understanding and one understanding only. The preliminary words of his amendment make the motion read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of the taking of whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following headings and sections:

And then follow the operative words. We will support his amendment with the reservation that those words will be taken as meaning that the matter will be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for decision and determination by that court, as one of the necessary steps to amend the constitution, of the extent to which the proposed amendment lies within the competence of the dominion parliament. Because we feel in principle that a bill of rights is necessary, we intend to support the amendment; but because we feel that the respective rights of the provinces must be maintained, we say we support it on the condition that one of the necessary steps be the preliminary submission of the whole question to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prevent the vote. I merely say that I do not think it is within the competence of anyone to say that the amendment means something except just exactly what it says. However, I am sure I am speaking for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when I say that he would be perfectly agreeable to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, there cannot be any question of taking the vote tonight, because I have too many things to say on the amendment and on the main motion. One of those things is that I cannot accept a declaration of rights like the one which was contained in the universal declaration of human rights by the United Nations. Article 16 reads as follows:

> Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.

Consequently they accept divorce in their declaration of human rights. That is something I cannot accept. I am asking myself this question.

Mr. Winch: Make sure you get a good answer.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Don't worry; the answer may be as good as any you can give. I ask myself whether it would be infringing upon the rights of the two provinces which do not want any divorce court within their boundaries. I refer to Newfoundland and Quebec. I ask myself whether it would not be infringing on their rights if, by a vote of the federal parliament, we were to impose upon them a divorce court, whether it be the exchequer court or any other court.

Mr. Knowles: That is not included in the motion before the house.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No, but it is a question of human rights just the same. I am asking myself that question, and I have a right to do that. It is a pertinent question to ask.

Mr. Winch: As I expected, you got a foolish answer.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I never thought that my friend was so good a judge of good sense or bad sense.

An hon. Member: He has never proved it.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No, he never did.

An hon. Member: They never do.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I think the declaration made by our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was good when he said this at the United Nations:

> I wish to make it clear here, . . . that, in regard to any rights which are defined in this document,—

That is the declaration of human rights.

> —the federal government of Canada does not intend to invade other rights which are also important to the people of Canada. By this I mean the rights of the provinces under our federal constitution.

I never heard anyone here say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not a man of good sense. The quotation continues:

> We believe that the rights set forth in this declaration are operated and well protected in Canada. We shall continue to develop and maintain these rights, but we shall do so within the framework of our constitution which assigns jurisdiction in regard to a number of important questions to the legislatures of our provinces. Because of these various reservations on details in the draft declaration the Canadian delegation abstained when the declaration as a whole was put to the vote in the committee.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: Saved by the clock.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I can go on if you want me to. Maybe I can speak in French.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock I do leave the chair.

Special Committee on Procedure

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Harris: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may I have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions in order to correct a minor error that was made in a motion some days ago. I have explained it to some of my hon. friends and I think they agree.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: In the motion which was passed on Monday, January 17, constituting the committee on procedure, at that time the following words were omitted: "notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 65". By way of explanation I may say that means that the members who were appointed at that time to sit on the committee were in excess of the 15 provided by that standing order. Therefore I ask leave to move that those words, "notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 65", be added to the motion which was then made by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir).

Mr. Fulton: Retroactive?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Do you not have to give notice of this motion as required by standing order 65?

Mr. Harris: No, I took it for granted my hon. friend would be agreeable on this occasion.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall call the motion in the name of the Prime Minister under government notices of motions with respect to a committee to consider estimates. Then we shall resume debate on the second reading of Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, etc., of river improvements; then Bill No. 4, and then the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to certain amendments to the Canada Grain Act.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned. without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CIVIL DEFENCE

AGREEMENT ON ENLARGED PROGRAM FOR PROVINCE OF ONTARIO

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that agreement has now been reached between the federal government and the province of Ontario which will result in an enlarged and accelerated civil defence program in that province in the coming year. Announcement of this co-operative undertaking is being made simultaneously in Toronto today by the Hon. W. M. Nickle, the provincial secretary and new minister in charge of the province's civil defence preparations.

For some time now financial aid for civil defence purposes has been made available directly by the federal government to assist municipal civil defence organizations in their efforts at the local level. As a result of the agreement now reached with Ontario, provincial as well as federal funds will now be made available to municipal civil defence organizations.

Federal funds under this arrangement, when fully matched by provincial and municipal contributions, will result in a total of approximately $1,200,000 available for civil defence expenditure at the municipal level in the province of Ontario in the coming year.

One-half of this total amount will be provided by the federal government to help finance civil defence undertakings submitted by the municipalities concerned and approved by the appropriate provincial and federal civil defence authorities.

To supplement the federal grants to these undertakings, the province of Ontario, in accordance with the agreement, will contribute to the cost of these same approved civil defence projects submitted by participating municipalities an amount equal to one-half the federal contribution. As a result, for approved municipal defence expenditures, 50 per cent of the costs involved will be contributed by the federal civil defence authority, 25 per cent by the provinces, while the local authorities will be called upon to contribute 25 per cent of the total expenditure.

In addition, further funds are available from the federal government to match provincial civil defence expenditures on the organization of civil defence services at the provincial as distinct from the municipal level. These federal funds, when matched by equivalent provincial contributions, will result in further expenditures in the year to come. Therefore, a total of at least $1,400,000 will be available in Ontario this year for the development of adequate civil defence at the provincial and local levels.

It should, of course, be pointed out that the federal contribution to the development of civil defence in Ontario is substantially greater than the amounts which I have mentioned. These amounts take no account of the million-dollar hose-coupling standardization program, to which the federal government contributes one-third; nor do they include provision for the civil defence compensation agreement, nor for the substantial amounts of equipment and material—fire pumpers, rescue vehicles, and other items—which have been supplied exclusively at federal expense to civil defence authorities in the province. These federal expenditures, including, for example, the moneys spent for medical stockpiling and earmarked for Ontario, are considerably greater than the amounts provided by the provincial and local civil defence authorities from their own budgets.

I should like at this time to express my satisfaction at this important development which is bound to stimulate civil defence activity, not only in the province of Ontario but throughout the whole of Canada.

The present agreement arises out of discussions which I held with Premier Frost of Ontario, whose personal contribution to the successful completion of these arrangements I should like to acknowledge at this time.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if he would clarify a point for me. Do I understand from the announcement that the same arrangement as is now concluded with the province of Ontario will be available, if so desired, for all the other provinces?

Mr. Martin: Every province now has a similar agreement with the federal government except the province of Quebec.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

TABLING OF REPORT OF TARIFF BOARD ON WOOL CLOTH INDUSTRY

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the report of the tariff board with respect to the Canadian wool cloth industry and the record of the proceedings before the board.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER CERTAIN ESTIMATES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee to be designated be appointed to consider such of the estimates as may be referred to it and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that this is the first government motion of its kind which has been made since confederation, and that if it is carried we shall have established a new method of dealing with the estimates as they are submitted in the blue book.

On the other hand, it is not the first time that the subject has been discussed in parliament. I have no doubt that there were discussions in the early days. I find that at least as far back as 1921 a formal motion was presented to the house for a committee of this kind to consider the estimates and that, as one would expect, that motion was made by a member of the party to which I happen to belong. Of course, in the years since the world war there has been repeated discussion on the subject and in each of the committees on procedure which have been set up we have had extensive talks as to the method by which to bring about a better way of dealing with the estimates. If hon. members are interested, they would have noticed that the 1947 committee recommended that we adopt in general terms the system obtaining in the United Kingdom. To adopt any different system from that which has been obtaining in the committee of supply raises serious questions of practice. After all, if parliament meets for one thing only, I think it could be said that that thing would be to vote supply for the purposes of the government for the following year.

Mr. Fulton: Or, in the alternative, to withhold it.

Mr. Harris: Or to withhold it, as my hon. friend says. Lest one should think that I have not other matters in mind, may I say that of course we meet here to preserve the liberty and the freedom of the citizen. Nevertheless, if the government did not have legislation to present to parliament and if you can imagine a state of society in which there would be no other matter to be debated, we would still have to consider the estimates and either vote them or reject them. It therefore might be supposed that the consideration of expenditures in parliament would take a good deal of our time. Over the years I think we have found that we take about one-fifth to one-third of the time of parliament in considering the estimates. This time is spread out in the normal session from early in February until the final day, as a rule, on which we sit.

There has grown up in the country an impression that during the final week, and especially on the final day, it has been our custom to pass large sums of money at a rate which is not in accordance with the seriousness of the subject. To my mind that opinion is false; but unfortunately it is fostered by members in the house who, in my view, do not take the trouble to consider the amount of time we put in on estimates early in the session. I think it is true that in the last week of the session before last we passed about $800 million. It is equally true that we passed all the other expenditures in the preceding eight or nine weeks during which we had been considering them. Both because the facts do not bear out what they say and also because I think it proper that parliament should not depreciate its own value, I suggest to hon. members that we should have a second look at the oft-repeated statement that we put through estimates in a scandalous manner in the last few days of the session.

The arguments that are usually advanced in favour of a different method of dealing with the estimates are these: First, in order to avoid what I have already mentioned is the false impression of the speed with which we deal with these things in the last few days of the session; second, that hon. members do not have in committee of supply sufficient time to cross-examine a minister until they obtain the information they have in mind. I have been spoken to by many members who say they do not feel like monopolizing the time of the minister or of the committee and that they are therefore constrained not to take too long at any one time on a subject in which they are vitally interested. The third reason is—and it is a natural consequence of that—that if there was more time there could be better informed and more critical statements made about government policy and about a particular department in which an hon. member may be interested. I think we all agree as to the desirability of that objective. Government policy will be that much better in proportion to the good criticism which is directed towards it. I do not think any government wants to have passed through this house something in the order of $5 billion without careful scrutiny, careful thought and intelligent criticism. We have had some experience in dealing with expenditures of this order in the recent ten or fifteen years. During the war we had a war expenditures committee; and since the war we have had a number of defence expenditure committees. These committees have served certainly two useful purposes and perhaps more. One on this side of the house cannot help saying that, despite all the sittings and all the work which was done, none of the committees turned up anything which was really detrimental to the manner in which the government had been spending the public money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Because they could not get information.

Mr. Harris: Second, the committees served as a useful warning to those who might take advantage or think they could take advantage of the haste which was a necessary part of government activity in a time of emergency. There are other reasons, of course, and other useful results flowed from those committees. I know that hon. members are well aware of them. But these committees dealt with large sums of money. Even now they deal with almost one-half the budget when they examine the affairs of national defence. We did not think it necessary at that time to consider the ordinary departmental estimates in a committee similar to that which had considered the war expenditures.

The whole question seems to resolve itself into divided opinions as to what the committee would do and what it might add to the deliberations of the committee of supply. Most members start off with the assumption that this committee will be in addition to and not by way of substitution for the committee of supply and will therefore perhaps only be an added burden to the activities of parliament. Even those who do not hold that view think that, whatever the committee does, we could not possibly have in that committee any different position from that which we have in the committee of supply, namely that the minister of a department concerned will be responsible for the conduct of the affairs of his department before that committee.

I think I should say a few words, Mr. Speaker, about the systems in the United Kingdom and in the United States and then indicate in what respect I think we ought to follow them, if at all. In the United Kingdom they have what they call an estimates committee but what, according to my reading of the record, would be something between an estimates committee and a public accounts committee as we understand it in Canada. The committee consists of 36 members, of which only 7 constitute a quorum. But they divide themselves into subcommittees and the subcommittees do the actual preliminary work. The committee examine officials of all departments concerned, but it should be noted that they do not go through the estimates as we understand them. Rather they select one item in the estimates which is a matter of public interest and they prepare a quite comprehensive report about it. I have in mind one of two or three years ago on overseas broadcasting. The item ran, I think, to about four million pounds. The report itself is 27 pages long of printed material and the evidence and the appendices run to another 145 pages. It will be seen that this kind of committee takes far more time to consider estimates than we have in mind in this house. That particular subcommittee, as I remember it, was appointed in November and brought in its report the following July just on one item in the estimates of a particular department and not on any other item in that or any other department. The committee has authority to sit not only when the house is sitting, which is rare in the United Kingdom, but to sit as well when the house is not in session at all. They have even gone as far afield as central Africa on one occasion to examine into a particular matter of concern there.

Looking through the Hansard of the United Kingdom, I found that in the period from 1946 to the end of last session only on three occasions were reports of the estimates committee considered in the committee of supply of the United Kingdom parliament. I realize that the reports would appear in the journals, but the point I am making is that they were not debated in the house except on those occasions I have mentioned. It may be that I missed one in the index but I think I covered them fairly thoroughly. Two of these debates were only side issues, so to speak. Only one of them was a full-dress debate and it concerned school buildings in the United Kingdom and was originated by one of the opposition members at the opening of one of the allotted days for supply. I am not suggesting that the reports are not useful. On the contrary, I am sure they are. I am sure that the committees do put on the record a great deal of useful information. I am sure that the members who serve on the committee are better qualified to deal with the departments when they consider them, and I am also sure that the minister of the department concerned has his mind refreshed on his problems and probably has useful advice and information given to him about the work he should be carrying on. On the other hand, I have stated the position as I see it and I am quite sure that that kind of activity is not what we have in mind in Canada at the moment when we speak of an estimates committee.

In the United States I think hon. members know that the appropriations committees of congress have vested in them authority to deal with appropriations. It is true that the executive makes recommendations to the committees, but I would suggest that over the years that congress has been functioning it is highly unlikely, except on occasions of emergency, that you will find an appropriation bill that was sent to the committees which did not have some change made in it before it became law. The committees, as I say, have this authority vested in them by law, and automatically they examine officials of departments, cabinet ministers and even persons outside the public service.

I mention that only to point out the distinction there and to say that I do not think for one moment that in the parliament of Canada, having in mind our constitutional arrangements, having in mind our belief in the theory of cabinet government supported by a majority in the house and taking responsibility for expenditures, we would want here to devolve into the hands of a committee the sole authority to pass expenditures. Indeed, I think the whole system of our government is based on the theory that the committee of supply consists of every member of the house and that every member has the right to scrutinize and pass on the advisability of every single vote in the blue book. I would go further and say that in addition to that privilege there is a joint responsibility on all of us to scrutinize these items and to pass upon them. It is that responsibility which troubles members who say that under the present system they do not have ample scope to discharge the duty in the way they think they should.

Having pointed out very sketchily the differences I find in other jurisdictions, I think I should indicate what we have in mind ought to be for the moment at least our procedure here. We think that the estimates committee, at least as a preliminary, ought to conduct itself as closely in keeping with the practice in committee of supply as possible. The minister who is in committee of supply is quite often asked a question about his department concerning a detail which no one expects him to carry in his mind, and so he has to have recourse to officials who can provide the information. By long practice these officials sit on the floor of the house but of course they do not take part in the discussion. They do give information, however, to the minister who gives it to the committee, and it is his answer for which he is responsible. We think that this course should be followed in the estimates committee. It will be the responsibility of the minister to conduct the affairs of his department before the committee, and if he chooses to make all the answers himself that would be consistent in our view with the purposes of the committee. If, on the other hand, he thinks it desirable to leave the explanation of details of administration to others, that will also be his responsibility, but if this course is followed it will not be possible for an official or other person to be questioned as to the policy of the government. This must be the responsibility of the government and the minister concerned, and he cannot devolve that responsibility upon an official.

For that reason we hope that on an experimental basis, as I have said, we can do the work of three or four departments in the estimates committee in much the same manner that we do it now in the committee of supply, having in mind, however, that hon. members will want to take more time and will want to obtain more information than they say they have the opportunity to obtain at present. Therefore in the committee we can test the validity of the argument of those who say that this does not add anything to the committee of supply and see if in fact we can do the work in another place when the house is engaged in other business.

I am quite satisfied that there are a number of members who are frankly sceptical of the advantages of what is being proposed, and I think I can safely say that those hon. members are in all parties in the house. But I think we ought to make the experiment to see if in fact an estimates committee can have the advantages that those who sponsor it believe it has. I think all hon. members will agree with me that it would be better to begin cautiously and not make an initial error which might bring about an unsuccessful conclusion to the experiment. For that reason I am recommending a cautious approach to a new system, one which can be tried out without in any way saying that on a future occasion a committee might not decide to recommend to the house a different procedure.

My answer of course to those who say that this might limit the committee initially to the point where it would not be a success is simply that all of us, I think, are prepared to make the experiment. I think all of us are prepared to make it work but that it would be unwise to go beyond what at the moment appears to be possible in order to carry out the objective we have in mind.

The government hopes that the results of the experiment will be twofold at least. It hopes first, as I have said, that there will be more intelligent criticism of government policy based on greater information in the hands of a member who wishes to make a particular study of a subject in which he is interested and, second, that there will be less time taken in committee of supply on the details than there is now taken in that committee. If neither of these results occurred, it would be a matter for consideration whether the experiment had been successful, and at that time those who think that the committee should be formed along the lines of that in the United Kingdom, or any similar committee adapted to Canadian conditions, would be free to say what they think was the cause of the failure of the experiment.

For the present we prefer, as I say, to keep the committee's activities definitely within the scope of the committee of supply so that we can achieve at least the minimum success in doing what members would like to have done. I would therefore ask the house to adopt the motion, even with the limitations I have indicated, to see if the estimates committee can be made to work in the interests of a more expeditious disposal of business and the better consideration of votes totalling about $5 billion.

I should, however, add that there will be certain consequences following from the passage of this motion. In the first place, we shall present to the committee, if established, the estimates of the departments of finance, veterans affairs, citizenship and immigration and northern affairs. In order to do that it will be necessary for hon. members opposite to realize that these estimates cannot go before the estimates committee until we have been moved into supply by a motion that the Speaker do leave the chair. When that motion is carried we shall have to move in supply that these estimates be transferred for consideration of the estimates committee.

As I have indicated on several occasions, though perhaps not in the house, that motion ought not to be debatable. It is not the intention of the government to create an additional debate to those now existing. If the committee is not going to be given the freedom to deal with these items, but rather have the motion create one more debate in committee of supply which we do not now have, then those who think this system will save the time of parliament seem to be misinformed. When the motion for supply is made, therefore, it will be the intention of the government, after that motion is carried, if it is, to call the four departments I have mentioned and one more at least. These items could then be sent to the estimates committee for its immediate consideration, and we would have one more department's estimates to consider in the normal way on Thursdays and Fridays.

I would hope that this procedure would commend itself to hon. members and that the estimates committee could, during the months of February and March, do the work which we have in mind. There is no point, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, in having the estimates committee working much after the end of March or April because members will want to serve on other committees at that time.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have all listened with interest, Mr. Speaker, to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). We all recognize the importance of the proposal which he has put before us. He could not resist one or two opening gambits, which perhaps we should allow him. There was an indication of the impregnable self-satisfaction which we constantly observe in those opposite, and I thought he allowed himself to make a little slip when he forgot that the estimates of the department of immigration, a year or two ago, to all intents and purposes came down on the last day of the session. There may have been some technical reference to them before, but I think we all agree that, to all intents and purposes, they came down on the last day of the session.

I shall not take the time to cover the ground the minister covered in differentiating his proposal from the estimates committee in the British house, though I shall refer to that later, nor shall I disagree with him in his reference to the system in the United States. We do recognize, and have always recognized, the fact that our system of government is different in that it is not merely representative, as in the United States, but it is also responsible. We have never sought to deny that for one moment, indeed we have affirmed and underlined the fact that the government has responsibility. There have been one or two suggestions from quarters which should have known much better that we were trying, by indirection, to introduce the United States method or something like it, but nothing could be farther from the facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a measure seeking to improve the way we spend our money. The minister referred to the fact that in the early days parliament did little, if anything, more than grant money. I propose to read a sentence here to indicate how true that is. This sentence is contained in a writ issued under authority of Henry III in 1254, summoning parliament:

> The sheriff of each county is ordered "to cause to come before the King's council, two good and discreet knights of the shire, whom the men of the county shall have chosen for this purpose in the stead of all and of each of them to consider along with the knights of other shires what aid they will grant the king."

In other words, they were brought together for the purpose of giving the king money.

At the present time the federal government, as we all recall, spends nearly $5 billion or, in the average, not much short of $350 for every man, woman and child. The matter is much in people's minds. I only wish today that our words here could carry far enough to make the citizens of Canada take this as seriously as they should. I quote briefly from the Regina Leader-Post of October last these words:

> Economy in government is as essential to the economic welfare of the country as economy in business is to the health of that business. It is necessary therefore that government scrutinize ordinary peacetime expenditures carefully with a view to keeping them to a minimum, . . .

Later, in the same article, this appears:

> The trouble is, of course, that we forget it's our money the government is spending.

Many Canadians are indifferent about government spending.

> But every citizen should remember that by far the biggest part of the government's income is money that it takes from every citizen in the form of taxes. This is money which we ourselves would be spending, or saving, if the government did not take it in order to spend it, or save it, on our behalf.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said, I wish we could persuade the people of Canada to take the interest in this that they should. Sometimes I feel they have grown to despair about economy and therefore have turned their minds—as was indicated by a recent Gallup poll where only 11 per cent put economy at the top—in many cases towards what more they can get for themselves. If we are not fair with ourselves in scrutinizing the present method of taking care of the expenditure of our money, the discussion is really not worth while. If private business behaved as we do, it would not last any time.

Let us consider what the practice has been. The estimates are brought down early; that is admitted. What are the estimates? Well, the estimates are represented to us as being the result of a hypothetical battle between the treasury board and the various departments. We are asked to believe that there is a terrific battle, and that the treasury board is ever so tough. The late minister of finance used to reassure us on this point. I am not sure that the present Minister of Finance has not, by implication, indicated he thought his predecessor had not done a very good job.

Let us look at what a close and not unfriendly observer thinks about the economy which has been exercised. I am using words which I used previously in this house, and which emanated from the Ottawa correspondent of the Winnipeg Free Press in December last. He said:

> Careful study of the federal civil service indicated that the cause of the hitherto uncontrollable growth was simple. Whenever there was a need for expansion, the departments expanded. They did not search within themselves for surplus personnel and meet the need for expansion by making better use of their existing staff. They invariably added to it.

The same writer says:

> Hitherto, the treasury board has only dealt with proposals for increases. There has never been, until now, a consistent effort made to employ the existing staff more efficiently or to reduce the civil service.

We all know, or all believe we know, that there is carelessness and extravagance. Some time ago the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) said that he knew the Department of National Defence had wasted $300,000 in his riding in the purchase of a swamp that was absolutely useless for the purpose for which it was bought.

I want to ask, what happens when the estimates come into this house? Let us consider the way in which they are adopted. In the first place they are regarded as sacred. In the ten years I have been here, only once has a dollar ever been stricken off. In some cases the estimates, which are all regarded as government measures, are actually used also as government legislation.

I remember on one occasion when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and I argued across the gangway here as to whether there was authority for a certain expenditure, and he brought the argument to a very complete end by saying in effect, "Well, what does it matter? If this resolution passes, does that not settle it?" And of course it did settle it. In other words, you can have indirect legislation by an item being brought into this House of Commons.

Let us again try to describe what happens in committee of the whole. The minister of the department is deeply entrenched with experts in close support. The instructions are that the line must be held at all costs, that there must be no giving way anywhere, that they must hold to the last man—that there shall be no discretion of any kind, that not a dollar must be struck off. Oh no, I am wrong there, because there was a dollar struck off once. There was one case where it was discovered in the Department of Public Works that a certain plan had not been carried out, and the minister of the department struck off a quarter of a million dollars—for which I give him credit.

But of course the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) is different from some of the rest of the ministry. He is an engineer; and engineers have to have regard for figures. I can imagine some others sitting near him, seers such as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who would not have felt it necessary to stand up in the House of Commons and say that a mistake had been made. He would have been able to explain it away, so that in the end the amount would have remained there. And who knows; perhaps it might be used for some other and different purpose about which no one had thought until then.

Meanwhile what are the opposition doing? Well, they are doing their best. They advance against the dug-in minister with his close support; but they are in the open. They have no experts in close support. The minister is well dug in, and nearly always the line holds.

Now, it would not be fair to say that there is no result from that. True, there may be no result at the moment, and there may be no result during the current year; but I like to think, however little the ministers show it, that they do pay some attention to what we say, and that perhaps afterwards they do say to each other, "You know, that was a good point. We got away with it, and we had the answer ready, and the answer was pat. But that question was really a good one, and we must pay some attention to it next year, although without admitting that there was anything wrong."

I think that is a reasonably fair description of what happens. Now comes the idea of a committee. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that this is an experiment, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has pretty well followed that line, too. Of course the idea of a committee is a very attractive one. The newspapers have taken it up. We see that the Globe and Mail says this about the setting up of the committee:

> The only complaints against this innovation are that it is belated and that the scope of the proposed committee is too narrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: Too little and too late.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Macdonnell: Too little and too late, yes. Then it says:

> Having been graciously permitted to set up an estimates committee, they should make sure that it covers the ground. The government's plan, it is unofficially stated, is that the committee should study expenditures of the departments of External Affairs, Citizenship, Finance, the Secretary of State and Veterans Affairs. This is not good enough. The list does not include the big spenders, as that word is generally understood.

Now, it is most natural to think that a small committee can be much better than a committee of the whole house. That argument sounds so convincing. You get a few men around a table in a spirit of intimacy, where they can concentrate better, and where information can easily be got. Indeed I believe the natural tendency is for people to accept that view. But I would suggest to the house that there is another side to the question, and that we need to be on our guard, "Won't you walk into my parlour?", said the spider to the fly.

I do not think we should forget that it is the desire of the ministers to get the estimates through the house with the least wear and tear to themselves, and with the least possible questioning. And it is with that thought in mind that I shall read one or two comments from a very experienced British politician, in which he throws out a word of caution which, I suggest, we would do well to remember. At page 570 of the British parliamentary debates, 5th series, 1953, the Hon. Walter Elliot, a former minister of the crown, has this to say:

> I am very jealous of any projects to take discussion away from the floor of the house. I am uneasy about sending too much to select committees of members specialising on particular matters, such as foreign affairs or colonial affairs or, for that matter, domestic affairs. I will refer in a moment to the committee stage of bills, but I would say that the over-use of the specialised committee is a great danger.

And later on the same page he says—and this I commend to all members of the house who are not ministers, and to the minister as well:

> The only thing, I am sure, of which a minister is frightened is the whole house.

And I would like to think that the ministers here are frightened of the whole house. Of course they would be more frightened if they did not have two-thirds of the members in the house who never frighten them at all. He continues:

> That is when a minister really begins to pay attention to outside opinion, when this place, which has the power, which has the strength, which has the last word, begins to come into play. Then the strongest minister—

And let us remember that the Minister of Finance has been caricatured as Hercules, so we ought to have that in mind when we are considering this—that it is he who is bringing this forward. It continues:

> Then the strongest minister bringing forward, from his point of view, the most important matter, is bound to pay the very closest attention to it. Believe me, he pays much more attention to a debate where the whole weight of the House of Commons is being focused on him, in the hearing of his colleagues, than he does to any amount of expert opinion in a room upstairs, whence he can come out and say, "Well, the boys were rather fussy, but we have got the bill."

Now, I commend that earnestly to every member in the house. And I wish to read a word more from the same source as it appears at page 575—and this is something I think we should remember. The whole genius of this system of ours is that there is struggle going on. Let us be candid about it; there is a struggle for power going on. And this is indicated in what I am about to read:

> The difficulty in which parliament is always placed is that the purpose of parliament is controversy. We come here not to agree but to differ. If we all agree, there is no necessity for our being here. This is the place for argument, where differences of opinion are brought out. What we should consider is, not how differences of opinion can most easily be smoothed away, but how they can be brought fruitfully to conflict.

Well, even a man with pacific tendencies like myself can realize how true that is, and how we should be on our guard against what can be made to appear to us as reasonable, and which can be useful if it is properly used, but which could also be used merely to dig those entrenchments I tried to describe just that much deeper, and to make the gentlemen in close support that much more effective.

Let us remember this, with regard to ourselves in the opposition, that often we call ourselves watchdogs. But watchdogs should be able to growl and to bite. And if we are slipping into a situation where we do not growl and bite so well, then we ought to be very much on our guard, indeed.

An hon. Member: What about barking?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a new set of false teeth.

Mr. Macdonnell: Therefore when they come to us in a very pleasant atmosphere, as the minister did, and they say, "Let us sit down together and we will deal with this pleasantly, so that nothing will ever arise that will jar us in any way, and so that we can come back to the house and the members will feel that the matter has been dealt with, and they will be shy of having anything further to say"—I say when we are put in that position, let us be on our guard. Ministers would not be human if they did not have the hope that this was going to be a softening-up process. Of course, that is what they hope. Why would they not hope it? And certainly it is our duty to be on guard and we are just a lot of nincompoops if we fall easily into a trap. I hope we will not.

That brings me to one or two things that the minister has said. One of them really nearly knocked me flat. As I understand it, when a minister says we are to go into the committee we are to sit around a table, all good fellows together. The civil servants are to be there, all good fellows together too and we are not to follow the common-sense course that everyone would imagine; that is, that we will be able to talk directly to these good fellows. No. The close support is still to be in support. They will not be in the front line and, as I understand it, any questions which are to be asked are to be asked of the minister who will then communicate with his supporters and the answer will be given him in that way.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Macdonnell: Don't make it too hard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is he now arguing for bringing civil servants into politics?

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh, no.

Mr. Rowe: They have already been brought in.

Mr. Fleming: Exhibit A.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think the minister should have left that one alone because I have made it clear already that we understand the principle of responsible government; that we understand we are not to discuss matters of policy with civil servants; that we understand we are there for the purpose of getting information; but, notwithstanding the assault of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, I still submit to this house that there will be something awfully ridiculous in our sitting around the table and asking questions of the minister and then having the minister turn around and ask the close support. We will all be able to hear what is said but we must not question them directly. I hope the minister will not stick to that because I think that bids fair to make the thing rather a farce.

Then the minister said—and here he left it rather at large—that this committee was to conduct itself, mutatis mutandis, in exactly the same way that the committee of the whole house conducts itself. He did not make that very specific. I am not going to go into details on that. I am not just sure how far he takes that. I have one or two substantive comments I wish to make later on the conduct of the committee and therefore I shall leave that for the moment. But I have been disturbed. What the minister said really made me feel that—I will not say it is phony, because the last thing in the world I would ever charge the Minister of Finance with was introducing a phony—I do think he has not really thought the thing through. For us to go into a room together and just try to reproduce the atmosphere of this committee which is carried on in public, which is carried on sometimes with scores of people present, is not very realistic. I hope he will back away from it.

I now come to what seems to me to be essential and to be the only conditions on which we should be asked to consent to this committee; that there will be an opportunity to question civil servants, though of course not on matters of policy. That is understood. Secondly, though I am not going to argue that we should turn ourselves into something like the committee on estimates in Britain, because I realize the force of what the minister said, nevertheless, I do argue that we should have certain rights of questioning within the limits of common sense. For instance, I suppose crown corporations will come up directly or indirectly. There ought to be the right of questioning there. When you come to a subject like trade and commerce, you will find the government is in business in competition directly or indirectly with a lot of private business. And I would think that there ought to be a pretty wide range of questioning there, just as there is in the United Kingdom where, when they consider export credits, for example, they have a wide range of evidence made available to them.

The minister has pointed out the difficulty that that involves and the amount of work involved. I am not suggesting that we in any detail model ourselves on them, but I am suggesting that if these committees are going to be more than a rather poor imitation of the committee of the whole, there has to be some latitude. Let us take the committee on external affairs. My understanding is there has been quite wide latitude there. I am not speaking so much of witnesses who have appeared. I am not familiar with the detail of it, but even a hasty reading of the minutes shows there was a pretty wide range of questioning allowed. When it came to the committee recommendation, again we had the old situation of a government majority and the report was, shall we say, entirely free from criticism.

I want to make the point that there must be complete freedom, just as there has been in respect of the external affairs committee. It seems to me that should be the pattern. There must be the complete right of debate when the occasion arises in the house referring the items to the committee, and equally the right of debate when the report comes back, as there has been in the case of external affairs. That seems to me essential.

Mr. Harris: Why does the hon. member think there ought to be an additional debate on sending the estimates from the committee of supply to the committee on estimates?

Mr. Macdonnell: My understanding is that in the case of external affairs the procedure is exactly as I have stated. There is a debate when the items are sent and there is a debate when the items come back. I did think, perhaps without sufficient warrant, that what we are doing here is to extend the procedure in the external affairs debate, and for my part, while the minister shakes his head, I put myself on record as saying that I see no reason why the practice followed in that connection, or an equivalent practice, should not be followed here. As a matter of fact, when one comes to think of it, are we in this committee of the whole house going to pass this on automatically without any opportunity of debate? Bear in mind—and this is as true as true can be —when the external affairs estimates come back from the external affairs committee it is inevitable that the rest of us in this committee have the feeling—I know I have it myself—that since all these estimates have been gone over by a good committee, to intermeddle in the debate further would be taking oneself too seriously. I do not think that is the right attitude. Somehow or other we must try to prevent that attitude arising because if it does it is lowering the position of this committee; it, in my view, is lowering the position of parliament. If you get to the stage where every committee is dealt with in that way it will have what is to me a very injurious effect on the procedure of this parliament.

In case the minister wants to throw the United Kingdom instance in my face, we should remember that in the United Kingdom they do not have ten provincial parliaments dealing with a lot of the legislation. They have a vast amount of work to do that we do not have to do here, and they are constrained to reduce the amount of time taken on estimates. Moreover, these procedures are not regarded there as party matters.

I understand in the public accounts committee in Britain a member of the opposition is the chairman, and that is something which, so far as I understood the minister, he did not suggest was going to be done in this Canadian House of Commons. Therefore, I say that the rights of debate, just as they have existed in respect of the external affairs committee or the equivalent, should not in any way be curtailed.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this experiment, as I notice the Prime Minister called it and the minister again this afternoon, should be tried, but I wish to repeat that we should be on our guard against its being used as a method to get away from the House of Commons. Ministers being human, do not let us be sentimental enough to believe, as I said a moment ago, that they do not have that in their minds. Of course it is in their minds.

In consenting to this as an experiment, therefore, I believe we should ask that there be freedom of debate on the motion to refer it to committee, and freedom of inquiry in the committee, always excepting matters of policy which we recognize are the responsibility of the government. There should also be freedom of debate when the matter comes back to the committee of the whole.

In winding up my remarks I wish to underline and again read what Mr. Walter Elliot said with respect to the position in which we now find ourselves, and the only position that we should for one moment accept. He said:

> I am very jealous of any projects to take discussion away from the floor of the house.

And then again he said:

> This is the place for argument, where differences of opinion are brought out. What we should consider is, not how differences of opinion can most easily be smoothed away, but how they can be brought fruitfully to conflict.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was brought before the house some years ago, I believe, as the minister said, it was in 1947, this party approved of referring estimates to committee. But in doing so we were not and are not any less suspicious of the government and its intentions than if the estimates were considered on the floor of the house.

I listened carefully to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and though he finally approved of this motion most of his arguments, it seemed to me, were against the motion, though I believe the same arguments could be used against the setting up of any committee for any purpose.

I believe we should try to remember that times change and parliament and legislatures are today being called upon to deal with many more matters of importance than they were even 20 or 25 years ago. For that reason, if for no other, we should try to find ways in which we can deal with these matters expeditiously.

I believe I am just as firm in my resolve as the hon. member for Greenwood that we should not forgo any opportunity for debate in this house on matters of importance. I would add, however, that during the years in considering the estimates in the house a great deal of time has been taken up not so much in dealing with particular items as in dealing with questions of policy or other questions which could not be discussed except on the estimates. I confess I have been as guilty in this respect as many other hon. members. However, one aspect of our parliamentary institution in which I take pride is that there is no question which cannot be discussed here. A private member will have an opportunity to discuss any subject in which he is interested if he watches for that opportunity, and most of us watch for such opportunities during the discussion on the estimates.

I am not sure whether I understood the minister correctly when he said that these estimates would be referred to the committee without debate. If he means that these committees will be brought into supply and no debate will be allowed, then I disagree with him because I am not prepared to sacrifice any opportunities we have for debate on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday.

Mr. Harris: If I might be permitted to clear up any doubt in my hon. friend's mind, my reference to there being no debate was on the formal motion in committee of supply to send these items to the estimates committee.

Mr. Knowles: Does not that take place with Mr. Speaker in the chair?

Mr. Harris: They will have to go into supply before they can go anywhere else.

Mr. Knowles: But have not external affairs estimates been referred to that committee on a motion with Mr. Speaker in the chair?

Mr. MacInnis: I quite agree that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, as far as this particular motion to refer them to committee of supply is concerned, are a little different, because on those occasions the motion was made with Mr. Speaker in the chair. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has a much better memory, but I believe on occasions Mr. Speaker has left the chair. However, the purpose of that debate was to give the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and others in the house an opportunity to discuss external affairs and not necessarily the estimates of that department. If we can be quite sure that there will be no interference with debate in taking these estimates into committee I believe we can get over any other difficulty. I quite agree with the minister in his statement that there is no reason for two debates.

I have been discussing the matter with some of my colleagues and they are concerned as to whether we would have an opportunity to debate these estimates when they come back to the house. My understanding is that we will have such an opportunity, in the same manner as we will have an opportunity for discussing the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

I believe a great deal of good can accrue from referring these estimates to a special committee. I believe everyone who has had the opportunity to serve on the committee for external affairs has found that committee very useful indeed. I can recall outstanding explanations that have been made on the operation of government policy to that committee, and such explanations alone justified any time spent there. We had an extremely useful explanation during last session when Mr. Cavell outlined to us the work being done under the Colombo plan, and I am sure everyone found that information—information we could not get easily in the house—extremely useful. Last year and the year before that we had a most interesting three or four days with Mr. McNaughton who explained to us the workings of the international joint commission. It is questions of how policies are put into operation that take up time on the estimates, and not the scrutinizing of how the money is paid out. For that reason I believe the committee should be set up.

The hon. member for Greenwood mentioned that private business could not possibly carry on its operations in the same manner as we do here. But if private business had 265 members insisting on talking on every matter that was brought under consideration by the president or general manager, and insisting on giving publicity to all that took place, I do not believe private business could handle its affairs as it does now. I am not saying that they handle their affairs particularly well now, but they certainly could not do so under those circumstances. That is what happens in this house. Everything that the government does is supposed to be done in a goldfish bowl. That may be a good thing or it may be a bad thing, but we must realize that that is the way public affairs are carried on. There are some people, I assume, who would like to make the work of these committees a matter of determining particularly whether such and such an expenditure should be made—and I find nothing wrong with that—or whether economies could be made. But in a quarter of a century of experience here, I do not think that I have ever heard of a member complaining—in fact, I am sure I have not—that the appropriation for his constituency was too large and that it ought to be reduced. It is my opinion that until we come to the state of mind that will enable us to criticize appropriations for our own constituencies, it ill behooves us to be too virtuous in our criticism of other estimates.

Over the years I have noticed the two papers here that criticized the government—and particularly one of them—unmercifully. I do not mind that. I think it is a good thing for the government even if the criticism is not always justified; but I think it is justified in most instances. But if you put in the estimates an appropriation for Ottawa, there is no criticism. If there is any criticism at all, it is that the appropriation is not enough, and that a great deal more could very well be spent in the city of Ottawa with good effect.

It seems to me that economy is not so much a matter of the saving of money as it is of the proper expenditure of money, or the getting of proper value for the money that we spend. I do not want to revive another debate, but the other evening someone said that we, in this group, were always ready to spend the other fellow's money. I am not particular whether or not that accusation is made against me, as long as I am trying to save the other fellow's life or to improve his life; and that is what we have been trying to do here with a great deal of the money that the government spends.

As to the matter of economy, I am reminded of a story I heard about a Scotsman, the head of a family. It is rather strange, but the Scots are about the only race left about whom you can have a joke without giving offence. This Scotsman bought a barrel of apples. When he took the lid off the barrel, he found there were a few bad apples on the top. Being thrifty, he insisted that his family consume the bad ones first before they consumed the good ones. But lo and behold, when they had taken off this layer of bad apples those that were previously good had now gone bad, so they had to eat them also. Eventually they consumed the whole barrel of apples but they ate them all in a state of decay, more or less. That is not good economy, in my opinion; it is poor economy indeed. It is that kind of economy that we ought to try to avoid.

I do not know that there is anything more I want to say on this matter. As an experiment, I think this suggestion is worth trying. It is not a matter of policy but rather a matter of procedure. If we can make it work, it will be to the benefit of all of us. But it is an experiment that is not breaking entirely new ground because, as I said before, we have had the external affairs committee for several years and I think no one would wish to abolish that committee.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think that most members in the house will agree that the present method of dealing with the estimates is not a satisfactory one. I think one of the reasons for that situation is that in committee of supply a great many unnecessary questions are asked. I use the word "unnecessary" because, in many cases, the answers to the questions asked can be found in the back of the book of estimates. In the second place, you have members wandering in and out of the house, with the result that members come in late and ask questions that have already been asked and answered. That is something that is happening repeatedly every day while the estimates are under discussion. That sort of thing would not be so likely to happen if the estimates were dealt with by a committee.

We in this group have always favoured a policy under which the estimates of a department might be sent to a committee dealing with matters relating to the department whose estimates are under discussion. For instance, that is done in the matter of external affairs. Officials are present before the committee. Any questions may be asked. As a result of that procedure, I think a great deal of time is saved in the house. The reason that time is saved in the house is that the other members who are not on that committee know that on the committee are members who are especially interested in external affairs and that those members will have made a fairly good job of investigating the estimates. I believe that similar action could be taken in the handling of the estimates of many other departments such as agriculture, veterans affairs, defence and finance. That is, the Department of Agriculture estimates could be sent to the committee on agriculture, the estimates of the veterans affairs department could be sent to the special committee on veterans affairs and the estimates of the finance department could be sent to the banking and commerce committee. On those committees you would have members who were especially interested in those subjects. Hence the rest of the members of the house who are not on those committees would know that those members would be making a fairly good job of investigating the estimates. For that reason, they would not be likely to ask a great number of questions or at least would not be likely to ask as many questions as they would otherwise ask when these estimates were referred back to the committee of supply.

As to the suggestion before us, the minister has stated that some members are sceptical about it. I will admit that I am one of those members who are sceptical for the very reason I have just mentioned, namely that on that committee you are going to have members who will not be especially familiar with the matters referred to it. Consequently, when the estimates of a department are referred back to the committee of supply other members who are interested in it and who have not had a chance to ask questions, are going to start asking questions, I think, to just as great an extent as they would have asked them before the estimates had been referred to that committee.

I think there is a step that could be taken to prevent that happening. If the estimates of a department are dealt with until finished in that committee, then each group could change its representation on that committee before the next department brings its estimates to it. But if you are going to take one department for a few days, then jump to another department, and then come back again, it will be impossible to follow a sequence of that kind, and I think you are going to run into a great deal of trouble. But if you carry the estimates of one department through to a finish and then, before changing to the estimates of the next department, you allow a group to change its membership on this committee so as to have on that committee men who are especially interested in that department, I believe that many of the objections I have raised could be overcome. I hope the minister will say that the procedure I have suggested will be followed and that the groups will be allowed to change their membership on this committee without too much difficulty. The minister has stated that the committee is to be set up as an experiment. We realize that the present system is not satisfactory, and although we would prefer the method to which I have referred, nevertheless I think we are prepared to support the proposal as an experiment and do our best to help to make it succeed.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think I might be less than frank if I did not say something in regard to this subject, for both in the house on various occasions in previous sessions and in the committee on rules for several years I have advocated, though perhaps in somewhat different form, the establishment by the house of a committee on estimates for the purpose of reviewing the estimates of the government submitted in the annual blue book.

I am not going to enlarge at undue length on the subject of the historic responsibility of the elected representatives of the people sitting in the House of Commons to pass on public expenditures, both past public expenditure and contemplated expenditure. There is, both historically and in fact, no higher responsibility resting upon members in any parliament modelled upon the mother of parliaments.

Sir, I have felt as a member of the house over the past ten years that that responsibility is not being adequately discharged. Indeed, I go further and say that under the procedures obtaining in the house today it becomes virtually impossible for the members of the house to discharge that high and important responsibility. How are they to do it? The vehicle is the committee of supply, perhaps the clumsiest of all the elements of parliamentary machinery at Ottawa today. If you wish to make a serious attempt to review proposals for expenditure you do not in the first place send the matter to a body of 265 members. In the second place, you attempt to have some order in the deliberations of the reviewing body. You would not have questions of policy, questions of detail, questions of amount, all mixed up. You would not have questions flying from all parts of the house with little relation to one another, nothing consecutive and very little that is coherent.

This committee of supply, sir, is a clumsy, awkward vehicle for the discharge of an important public responsibility. It takes up a great deal of time. I wish to make it quite clear that in my approach to this problem the saving of time is not the most important element. For me the most important element is the discharge of the public responsibility to review these proposed expenditures. But the saving of time is, I think, one of the results that would follow, not at the expense of efficiency but with an increase in efficiency if a different procedure were adopted.

Another of the patent disadvantages of our present procedure in committee of supply is that any information obtained by members must come through the mouth of the minister. That again is an awkward, time-consuming procedure. The minister very often acts as a fence between the member who is seeking information and the official who has the information, when time would be saved and efficiency would be served by permitting the question to be asked directly of the official. Members very often come into the committee primarily to seek information. Others wish to make speeches in reference to policy. Others have speeches they wish to make depending upon the information they obtain in reply to questions asked for the purpose of eliciting the information that is needed.

On these various counts, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that our present procedure in committee of supply just cannot be permitted to continue in its present form if we are to make any serious pretence at all of discharging this important responsibility. We do spend a great deal of time of the house in committee of supply. For my part I do not begrudge the time that is spent there, but I wish to see it spent in a way that will enable members to reach the meat of the problem and will permit a differentiation in the procedures of the committee between policy on the one hand and questions of detail on the other. At the present time these important questions of policy are confused with the minutiae of questions having to do with detail or questions in regard to amount, questions that have a very limited effect. No one here, I am sure, is going to pretend that when these little questions are mixed up with speeches in regard to important aspects of policy the result is a sensible or coherent procedure.

Now, sir, it is said at times by the government to us in the opposition: Well, these estimates have all been reviewed by the treasury board. In effect they say to us: You do not need to concern yourselves unduly with the details because they have already been combed through by the treasury board. Sir, this House of Commons can never abdicate its responsibility in this matter to the treasury board or any other board. It must assume its responsibility; it must discharge that responsibility. The only way it can discharge that responsibility is by a review of the details of the items that are submitted to it in the blue book.

We are not without experience in this regard in the House of Commons. For the past ten years now, beginning with the appointment of the committee on external affairs in the fall of 1945, the house has every year since followed the practice of referring to that committee the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. I have had the privilege of being a member of that committee since it was first appointed in the fall of 1945. As one who, I think, can say that he has shown some concern about these estimates and the way they are handled, I want to express the very firm opinion that the estimates which have had the best review in the House of Commons in these ten years have been the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

I think the reason is that they have been sent to the committee. In that committee there has been full opportunity to question the officials of the department. The minister has followed the practice of making an introductory statement in the committee, but then the details of the review of the estimates, the answering of questions and the submission of further information, tables and statistical data have been left to the officials of the department. Witnesses have not been confined to officials of the department. We have had men like General McNaughton and Mr. Cavell come before the committee, men associated with particular work, the international joint commission in the case of General McNaughton and the Colombo plan work in the case of Mr. Cavell. We have had other similar witnesses from time to time, sometimes people who are not connected with government at all. There has been freedom there and the estimates have been thoroughly reviewed. I think that the time of the house has been saved at the same time as a more efficient review of the estimates has been achieved.

That was not done, Mr. Speaker, by curtailing debate in the house, and here it seems to me that the minister is proposing today, if I apprehend his thought correctly, a departure from a procedure that has been found to be salutary and effective over this period of years in connection with the estimates of this one department.

When the motion has been made to take the estimates of that department out of the committee of supply and refer them to the select standing committee on external affairs, that motion has been made the occasion of a debate on policy; for, sir, this House of Commons is the place where policy should be discussed. That is the procedure that has been followed there and it has been a very useful procedure. When the estimates of that department have come back to the committee of supply then in some cases where there was need of a general debate on policy that debate has taken place on the first item. But usually where there was not some immediate occasion for a debate on external affairs policy in general, because we all recognize that there must be certain occasions for debate on external affairs from time to time during the session, what we have had has been a very quick review in the committee of supply of the estimates of the department when referred back to that committee. The house, sitting as committee of supply, has known that these items had been reviewed in detail.

Now, there is nothing in the procedure of the house that obstructs any member at that point if he wishes to raise some question or to ask for certain information. I believe it has been the experience of the house, sir, that the questioning in that committee has been quite comprehensive. The information has been obtained and it is in the printed proceedings of the committee. There is no occasion for repeating it in the house. But if something arose in that committee which, in the opinion of any hon. member, called for special comment, there is no reason why that comment should not be made then in committee of supply, and made with the assistance of information. There is no occasion at that stage for speeches going off at tangents based on erroneous information, because that information has been sufficiently elicited in the committee.

I feel, sir, that the experience this house has had now over an extended period of time is an experience which should assist the house greatly in connection with this question, and should be a useful guide to the committee.

We have the proposal that an estimates committee should be established. The estimates committee is not the only committee to which the estimates of any particular department could, or for that matter should, be referred. I trust that because a committee on estimates is to be appointed, there will be no suggestion that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs should not be referred, as in the past, to the select standing committee on external affairs. I would have hoped that having our experience with the external affairs estimates to guide us, some thought could have been given to referring the estimates of some other departments to committees of this house that happen to correspond to those departments.

We do not have committees in every case corresponding to a department of government. There are some and the committee on external affairs is, of course, one obvious example. Another example is the industrial relations committee, to which the estimates of the Department of Labour could be referred. Whenever a special committee on veterans affairs is appointed for a session, it seems to me there is no reason why the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs should not go before such a committee for review and report. Some serious consideration might be given as well, Mr. Speaker, to referring the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to the select standing committee on agriculture for review and report. In this way I believe we would achieve the purpose of having a more thorough review of the proposed expenditures of those departments, and then we would have an intelligent discussion of policy in the house.

During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that this proposal was being put forward by the government at this session as an experiment. Now, that is fair enough. I have been urging in the past that if the government was not prepared to go the full way, at least it might consider experimenting. I am glad that the government is prepared to experiment with this idea. I wish to say, however, that the experiment ought to be conducted on an absolutely fair basis. Apparently we are to have the estimates of four departments referred to that committee. These four departments have already been selected by the government. The opposition has had no voice whatever in the selection of these departments whose estimates are to be referred to the committee—not the slightest voice whatever.

It seems to me, sir, if there is to be a fair experiment on this basis, if we intend to give a fair and reasonable trial to the suggestion that has been seriously put forward in this house over a period of some years, the opposition should have had some voice in the selection of the departments whose estimates are to go to this committee for review. I hope that it is not too late for the government to listen to the voice of the opposition in that respect, because surely no one is going to pretend that the trial is fair if the opposition has not been consulted in any respect in the selection of those departments whose estimates are to be so referred.

I wish also to say a word about the experience in the United Kingdom with the committee on estimates. It is not just a recent experience; it is a very long experience according to our ideas of time in this younger country. It is because there has not always been a clear understanding of the functions of the estimates committee at Westminster that I wish to read to the house several passages from a speech that was made at the commonwealth parliamentary conference at Nairobi, Kenya, last August. At that time one of the main subjects for discussion was the relationship between the executive and legislative branches of government. The question arose there as to how the elected representatives of the people could discharge their fundamental and inescapable responsibilities in controlling public expenditure.

The spokesman for the United Kingdom delegation, Mr. Derek Walker-Smith, M.P., had a word to say about the procedures followed in the United Kingdom with reference to expenditure. I put this before the house and ask the house to follow the difference between the way they have found over a period of years they could best handle this responsibility, and the way in which I understand the minister is proposing that these estimates be handled in the committee on estimates. I am reading from the official record of the conference, and Mr. Walker-Smith proceeds:

> So far as the traditional methods of financial control are concerned we still have in the United Kingdom 26 days set aside under Standing Order 16 for debates on the estimates, known as supply days, but those 26 days on the estimates are not now concerned, or scarcely at all concerned, with the question of a detailed scrutiny of the departmental estimates. On the contrary, they have become over the process of time debates relating to the policy and the administration of the particular departments whose votes are set down for debate on any of these 26 days. Similarly, our consolidated fund and appropriations bills are still, of course, a very vital part of the financial machine; but they are made the occasion not of financial debates but of debates varying over wide points of policy and administration. That being so, it is, I think, clear that the old traditional methods of financial control are not of themselves very effective for that purpose today.
> We have however evolved certain other methods, new methods, in comparatively recent years. When I speak of new methods, one of these methods has been going on since 1861 and the other for 30 or 40 years, but they are comparatively new, speaking against that background of seven centuries of parliamentary government . . .

Then further down he says:

> But in fact we have a dual system, a public accounts committee to make a detailed examination of past spending, and an estimates committee to make a detailed scrutiny of proposed expenditure. So far as the public accounts committee is concerned, that is the one which has existed since 1861. It is composed of 16 members of parliament and always has a prominent opposition member as chairman,—nearly always, in fact, a former financial secretary to the treasury. The public accounts committee has power to send for persons and papers and to call for attendance of senior civil servants for the purpose of examining them, but there are two things that they may not do—they may not call for ministers and cross-examine them and they may not challenge the policy of the government. And so you see the ambit of our public accounts committee is narrower and more functional than the ambit of those exciting congressional committees about which we read in our newspapers.
> So far as the estimates committee is concerned, this is a very useful body, at any rate for us. It has been in existence for about 30 to 40 years and it examines the estimates, that is to say, the proposals for spending money and reports what economies consistent with the policy of government might be effected. This is a rather large body consisting of 36 members of parliament and in this case the chairman is drawn not from the opposition but is a private member of the party supporting the government. It is a very effective body, split into five sub-committees, each of which work on different departmental estimates. Therefore I think it is broadly true to say, Mr. Chairman, that, taken together, the public accounts committee and estimates committee do much of the detailed financial scrutiny which was traditionally done by the house in committee of the whole house and which circumstances have made no longer possible by the traditional machinery.

Now, it seems to me there is much there to which we might hearken today. Nobody has in mind, I am sure, importing anything from the congressional committees system into our system here. But we are actually away behind Westminster in shaping our procedures to accomplish the fundamental purposes of parliamentary government and parliamentary responsibility.

And so, sir, I am glad that a committee on estimates is going to be set up; I am glad that it is going to be experimented with. I wish to see that system given a fair trial. And I do not think if the government is going to have the exclusive voice in selecting the work for that committee the trial will be altogether fair.

I come now—and I shall be brief—to what I conceive to be a departure in the recommendation of the minister from what it seems to me has been sound policy in the House of Commons, in the light of its experience with the external affairs committee, and the experience of the United Kingdom.

The minister said, in effect, "We are going to make the estimates committee a little committee of supply, a committee of supply in miniature." As I understood him, that committee is going to start its review of the estimates of a particular department with the kind of discussion of a general nature that we have in the house, in committee of supply. And then, as I understood him, the estimates committee will go on with the same mixture —the same baffling mixture—of detail and policy, amounts and policy, administration and policy, all mixed up, from which we suffer now in trying to bring any order out of the chaos which exists in the deliberations of the committee of supply.

It seems to me that that is just deluding ourselves, inviting confusion in this experiment. What we ought to do, as a house, is to discuss questions of policy in the house, sitting in committee of supply. This is the place to do that. The House of Commons, sitting in one of the committees of the whole, is the place where policy ought to be discussed. A select committee is no place to discuss policy.

Similarly the committee of the whole house, such as a committee of supply, is no place to discuss detail. The select committee is the place to discuss that. If I followed him correctly, the minister seems to propose that the committee of estimates be made a sort of committee of supply in miniature, with questions of policy and questions of detail all mixed up.

The minister has said, "We do not want any discussion on the motion to refer the estimates of a particular department, or to take those estimates out of the hands of the committee of supply and to refer them to the committee on estimates." It seems to me we are only stultifying ourselves if we follow that proposal. Surely what ought to be done in this situation is to invite on such a motion a general discussion on policy in relation to that department, such as normally we now have on the first item. Have that general discussion of policy here in the House of Commons, a discussion that would not consider detail, and after that discussion of policy send the estimates for the department to the committee on estimates for detailed review. In the committee there would be the detailed review, but there would not be discussions of policy.

The next fact that I think ought to be kept in mind in this regard is that in the committee, in seeking full information, and in discharging that particular responsibility to get information with regard to amounts, and to seek economies, there should be complete freedom not only to send for papers but to send for persons; and such persons should not be confined simply to those in the government service, if there is good reason to send for persons outside. This afternoon the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) referred to a case where, in relation to the review of a department under whose jurisdiction fall, we will say, crown corporations, there should be power to seek intelligent advice from other sources as well.

The next point I should like to make is that when the review of the estimates of a particular department has been concluded by the committee on estimates, it should then be reported back to the house. There should be no thought of holding back a report on the review of estimates until the committee has reviewed the estimates of all the departments referred to it. It ought to complete its work as far as possible on any particular department, and then send its report back to the House of Commons on that department and its estimates.

The subject of rotation of personnel was mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). It seems to me that only time and experience will bring the house to a right decision as to whether it is better to follow the method in the United Kingdom, that of having subcommittees, or to follow the system which I believe is in the mind of the minister when making his proposal, that the committee should function as a unit and that, if necessary, when the estimates of a particular department have been reviewed, then by decision of the house the personnel of the committee could be changed so as to bring into it some others who would be more particularly concerned with or more expert in the affairs of the next department to be considered. I do not think we ought now to arrive at a final conclusion in either respect, but that we should keep an open mind and should be guided by the results of our experience.

Finally, I do not think we are doing any offence to our respect for parliament or the value we attach to traditions with which not only the powers but so many of the procedures of parliament are attended, by conducting the type of experiment we are proposing here today. Mention was made of the fact that at Westminster they have had a committee such as that now proposed—speaking generally—for the last 30 or 40 years. When the House of Commons becomes so large and when its business becomes so involved that existing procedures are not adequate to enable members to discharge their duty, then it seems to me there is a responsibility incumbent upon the house to search for such procedures as will enable it to become more efficient, while at the same time retaining and performing the traditional duties and responsibilities that attach to it under our system.

Therefore, sir, in what we are proposing here today it seems to me we are simply trying to find a method by which we may better adapt the procedures of this house to the discharge of our duties. And while the motion before us provides simply for the setting up of the committee, and there is no motion yet before us to refer the estimates of any particular department to that committee for review, I hope that in the interval, before such latter motion is put before the house, the government will give consideration to the suggestions made here today—suggestions which I think, if given effect, will offer a much better opportunity for giving a fair trial to this suggestion and experiment which has in it very great promise of usefulness if given a fair trial.

Mr. Dickey: I have two questions I should like to ask the hon. gentleman. I understand he quoted with approval the rather lengthy passage that he read from the proceedings of the British commonwealth parliamentary association. In dealing with the debate on the motion to refer the estimates of the departments to this proposed committee, did I understand him to mean that the debate on policy would be a substitute for the debate on the first item that we now normally have, and that there would be no debate of a general nature on the first item when the estimates came back?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, on the first question, I read this somewhat lengthy quotation from this interesting and quite authoritative speech of Mr. Derek Walker-Smith, M.P., because I thought it was highly instructive. We have not in Canada quite the same situation, as I sought to make clear in my following remarks. The type of committee on estimates that is proposed by the government is not precisely the same as they have in the United Kingdom. But what I was trying to draw from the remarks of Mr. Derek Walker-Smith was this twofold instruction. First of all, their committee on estimates has been found, over a lengthy period of time, to be a very useful committee in relation to the discharge of the duty of control of public expenditure; and in the second place, to make clear, as he did, that that committee concerns itself with detail, and that in the committee of supply, according to the prevailing British system, the discussion is confined to policy. That is what seems to me a sound differentiation between the function of the house in the committee of the whole and one of those select committees. Let us discuss policy in the house but not detail and in the committee let us discuss detail but not policy.

The second question that my hon. friend asks is as to the status of item No. 1, following the general discussion. He will recall that, according to our procedures in the house today, in committee of supply, on the first item of general administration in every department we have first of all a general discussion. That is a policy discussion, and then after that there is, if anyone is concerned with the details of the item of general administration, an opportunity to go into them.

It seems to me that the proper course to follow is that when the general discussion on policy is concluded that is the point at which the estimates should be referred to the committee. You have had your general discussion on policy. Now, in committee, item No. 1 is not approved nor is the committee debarred from reviewing such details of the estimates of the item of general administration as may be required. My hon. friend will recall, for instance, in some departments there is very little outside the general administration item. Take the Department of National Revenue. There are only a couple of items in each branch of that department, including general administration. Therefore, if the general administration item were carried in the house there would be very little for the committee on estimates to deal with. If, for instance, any department's estimates were referred, what that committee should do is to go into the detail of the item of general administration, the money amount, if they have any questions then remaining that they wish to ask on that item. My impression is that the bulk of the discussion in the committee on estimates on most departments would not revolve around the item of general administration. It would revolve around the later items in many of the departments, certainly in the departments which have a great many items. We have some departments which have scores and scores of items.

I have done my best to answer my hon. friend. It may be in his mind that there is going to be some duplication in discussion. I do not think so for one minute. That certainly has not been our experience with external affairs. We have had the general discussion here, and when the items have come back to the house, in some years we have gone through those items in a matter of minutes in committee of the whole when they have been referred back to it.

Hon. C. G. Power (Quebec South): As one who for many years has been urging that estimates be sent to a committee, I rather welcomed the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) this afternoon and the discussion which has taken place; but I do believe that there are some things which arise out of the discussion and some perhaps have not been mentioned, which should be clarified by the minister before we finally adopt with enthusiasm his suggestion.

I am somewhat confused as to just what the procedure is to be in the special committee on estimates. I think I should say it would appear that in the minds of many speed is the requirement and speed is what we should be aiming at. I would suggest that really time is not the important element in this as much as efficiency.

With respect to the procedure in the committee, it would appear that all parties seem to be in agreement on one thing anyway, namely, that policy is the business of the government and the responsibility of the minister, and that officers of the department should not properly be questioned on matters of policy. I do not think anyone will deny that under our system of government the minister is responsible for all the details of his administration. He cannot foist on the shoulders of his officers the responsibility for his administration any more than the responsibility for the policies that he advocates.

Now, coming to the procedure in the committee, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that the business of carrying on by whispering or sotto voce suggestions will be impracticable if not futile in the narrow confines of a committee room. Pretty nearly all the members of the committee will hear the replies that the deputy minister whispers to his minister and naturally the members of the committee will say: "Well, Mr. Minister, ask him this or ask him that", which would be a sort of three-handed form of questioning which would finally finish up by being a bit ridiculous.

I would say that there should be nothing in the order of reference nor in the intentions of the government to preclude officers of the department from being examined and cross-examined. But I would say this: If any minister believes that he on his own can answer all the questions which an ingenious opposition can put to him, well, then, let him try it.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): He would have to be good.

Mr. Power (Quebec South): He would have to be good. I do not know whether the question arises or not, but out of these circumstances it would appear to me that inevitably the questioning would be addressed to the officers of the department. In any case, I would suggest to the minister that he make it perfectly clear to the house there will be no prohibition on officers being asked questions if the minister cannot reply to them himself.

I am not quite sure whether the order of reference should not be altered to meet those conditions. Perhaps, as has already been said, when the individual estimates are referred, the ministry may adopt the idea of stating in the order of reference that matters of policy are not to be discussed in the committee, but I do not think I would go as far as the hon. member who last spoke. I would suggest that matters of policy could be discussed in this special committee, and that questions respecting policy should be addressed only to the minister and not to his officials.

If the order of reference is not wide enough and does not go far enough I suggest to the minister that it should be widened. This is something new; it is an experiment. If in the government's mind it is a reform let us treat it as a reform and see that it is properly framed so that it operates. If it is only a concession to my hon. friends of the opposition then let us make our concession freely and willingly, not grudgingly.

Reference has been made to the United States system of committees, and to the British system. With respect to the system in the United States it should be quite clear to all of us that on account of the differences in our parliamentary and constitutional practices it would not be easy and indeed might be very difficult for us to adopt anything like the United States system.

In the first place, in so far as I am able to judge their system does not carry any ministerial responsibility. The ministers are not even in the house. There does not appear to be any governmental responsibility for appropriations since any member of congress may move to add additional expenditure to appropriations. One reads of dozens if not hundreds of bills being introduced by private members for the purpose of giving pensions to worthy soldiers or civil servants. One also hears a great deal of the practice known as log-rolling, whereby certain members of congress agree with certain other members to obtain larger expenditures in their particular regions of the country. In view of these things any attempt to import the United States system would, I believe, be useless in this country.

With respect to the British system, it is worthy I believe of consultation and should perhaps be consulted, but I am reminded of a book I read recently with reference to the British House of Commons. It is a house, as we all know, replete with respect for customs, usages, and tradition. But something like 100 years ago they had to alter the rules of that house very radically indeed. Up to that time it had been known as an English gentlemen's club. Unfortunately, a large group of Irish arrived. The Irish were not Englishmen, and they had no ambitions whatsoever to be gentlemen.

With respect to us, we are not Englishmen either. We have our own traditions and 80 or 90 years of parliamentary government. Surely with these traditions back of us we can feel a way or invent a way whereby we can make our parliamentary system work without slavishly following that of any other country.

Going back to the story I mentioned, with respect to the Irishmen—though perhaps I had better not make any invidious comparisons in connection with the second qualification. However, I should say that owing to our own hypersensitivity with respect to the language used in the house, and owing to the decisions of successive Speakers, we have to some extent lost the flavour and saltiness of the forthright language of our pioneer forebears, and in our attempts to become gentlemen quite a number of us have become little Lords Fauntleroy minus the lace collar and well brushed curls.

However, and be that as it may, I should say there are very great advantages in referring estimates to a special committee. These advantages have been enumerated by hon. members on all sides of the house, though I confess I was a little surprised that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) did not appear to share the enthusiasm of his neighbour who last spoke and favoured referring these estimates to the committee.

Nevertheless the control, criticism, and scrutiny of the estimates is one of the bulwarks of the opposition. The opposition should, if it is doing its duty, take every possible step to see to it that these expenditures are appropriate and in the interests of the country. May I say as one who enjoyed being in the opposition for two parliaments that I have great sympathy for the opposition, and believe it is the duty of the government and the house to give the opposition every opportunity to scrutinize these estimates.

With respect to hon. members on the government side, perhaps it should be said that there is no constitutional or legal bar to their scrutinizing the estimates also. Such scrutiny is not by law, practice, or the constitution the sole prerogative of members of the opposition. I suggest to many hon. members on the government side that they too would learn a great deal about the function of government, they would learn a lot about the inner workings of departments, if they would take the time and trouble to scrutinize the manner in which estimates are prepared and brought to this house.

From the standpoint of the government I can think of no better procedure than to have deputy ministers appear before parliamentary committees. Anyone who has been in the government must be aware of the almost intolerable pressure brought upon ministers to increase the estimates of the departments. Whether it be the natural tendency to empire-building which exists in all departments and which is very difficult to control; whether it be the pressure to have new gadgets in departmental offices; or whether it be only keeping up with the Jones's in some other department, the ministers have only one way of protecting themselves against this pressure from their officials and that is to be able to say, "No, I cannot get by with this in the House of Commons." If the departmental officers are brought face to face with members of the house and made to understand the reluctance of members to give in to their whims and fancies, then perhaps the minister would have a much easier time with his department. Without being derogatory in any way to our civil service, I think it would be a good idea to match bureaucracy face to face with democracy as represented by the members of this house.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this subject has now been thoroughly discussed, and I do not intend to take time rehashing the arguments that have been made. However, I rise to support this resolution enthusiastically. No matter how badly this experiment may turn out, it cannot result in a situation worse than what we have today. Every hon. member, I think, realizes that members of parliament simply are not in a position to properly examine our estimates under the present system. All they can do is a superficial job. I am hopeful that when this committee is set up we can do much more effective work.

Speaking personally, I am going to judge the success or failure of this committee by whether or not we are able to save the taxpayer any money. Some hon. members seem to look upon speeches advocating economy as a kind of joke. They do not seem to be much interested in saving the taxpayer's money. I was rather surprised to hear a Scotsman rise in his place this afternoon and take such an attitude. I always thought most Scotsmen watch their money carefully; and if they watch their own money carefully, I think it is fair to expect them to watch just as carefully the money of the people they represent. As I say, I think this committee will be judged, at least in part, by the amount of money we can save the taxpayer.

I think this may be a task at which many backbenchers can make themselves useful. Early in the session there is usually a period of about two months when there is not too much work at hand. I think that backbenchers can be particularly useful on this committee. We can go into these estimates in some detail, and give them a thorough examination.

The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) made some reference to the United States system. There may be some features of the United States system that we do not like, but there is at least one practice that appeals to me. As I understand it, in their committees the opposition are given experts or paid officials who can help them go into the matters being discussed in detail. If, as the hon. member for Quebec South suggested, the government are anxious to help the opposition with their task, I suggest they copy this United States practice. If we are discussing the Department of Finance, for example, may I suggest to the minister that he should give us two or three of his officials, tell them that whatever they do or suggest will not be held against them, and let them help the opposition examine and criticize the finance department's estimates. My understanding is that in the United States that is done, and I think it is sound.

There is one other point I should like to make. The minister today named four departments which would be referred. It seems to me it might be better if the estimates committee met and then themselves chose the department they were going to call. In that way the particular department would not be all ready; they would not be prepared, and you might get a more effective examination.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that government is the biggest business we have in Canada. We are spending about $5 billion. In that expenditure there surely must be many places where we can save the taxpayer money. I am hopeful that this estimates committee will be a real step in the right direction. I say again that I heartily support the setting up of the committee.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members listened with attention to the words of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) as he gave to the house his experience that goes back over more than 38 years, during which time he was not only a member of the opposition for two parliaments, as he said, but was also a minister of the crown.

As I listened to him I could not but recall an incident that took place I think it was in 1941, when I was a member of the war expenditures committee. At that time the hon. member was the minister of national defence for air. I spoke one evening and offered strong criticism against the training of air personnel by civilian authorities, indicating that in my opinion profit was being made at the expense of the state of war.

I was young in the house in those days, and I received a castigation from the hon. member for Quebec South. Next morning he called me on the telephone and told me—and in saying this I do not believe I betray any personal confidence—that he had found that the remarks I had made were in accordance with fact. That afternoon he rose in the house and stated that he had made an error the night before in his criticism of my criticism, and in effect said, "This thing will be ended once and for all", and it was ended. To me that was an example of what can be achieved when ministers of the crown have some regard for the criticism offered conscientiously and seriously by members of the opposition.

The Minister of Finance, with some suggestion of pride, referred to the fact that in 1921 there had been before the House of Commons a motion to provide for the setting up of a committee somewhat analogous to the one envisioned by the motion now before the house. It is interesting to go back and to read that motion, which was moved by a distinguished predecessor of yourself, Mr. Speaker, the late Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux. The resolution read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in order to co-ordinate and expedite the business of parliament in a more intelligent and practical way, the estimates of the various departments should, before being laid on the table, be scrutinized by a special committee of the house, where officers would be summoned to appear with plans and reports bearing on each appropriation.

Among those who participated in the debate was the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Mackenzie King, who gave considerable support to the views then expressed. The members of the government who spoke in the debate took the stand that a committee such as that which was asked for by Mr. Lemieux might invade the prerogatives of the cabinet inherent in our constitutional system. That committee would have had much wider powers than the one now contemplated.

As one looks back over the years one cannot but see that, year in and year out, less and less often is there a careful, penetrating examination of expenditure. A few moments ago my friend the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) expressed the hope that a committee such as that which is contemplated by this resolution may be able to help discharge a needed responsibility in the examination of expenditures and expressed the hope that something in the nature of the practice followed in the United States congress would be adopted here.

I hope not. Committees in the United States congress, as the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has pointed out, are not similar to ours. Indeed, one of the major criticisms of the system in the United States is that while partisan politics are forgotten in committee there is grave danger of log-rolling, resulting in expenditures that otherwise would not be made. Members of the committee separate themselves from their political parties and, voting either one way or the other regardless of any party considerations, do on occasion advance their own ideas for their own pet expenditures by supporting the pet ideas of other members of the committee. The result is not control of expenditures but additional expenditures.

Under the United States system there is of course no control by the legislature over the expenditures made. Our controls over expenditure as I understand them are as follows; first by the cabinet, and then through the treasury board. Then when grants are sought from parliament discussion takes place and in theory at least an examination is made of the expenditures that are asked for by the government. There is criticism in the committee of supply but, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) said a moment ago, seldom if ever is there any reduction. I know of only one instance in the last 15 years, and I think there was one other case between 1935 and 1940. But, generally speaking, after the criticism is over the item goes through either by virtue of the majority or by reason of the exhaustion of the opposition.

There is one further protection, and that is in the report of the Auditor General. All the expenditures of parliament, except a very limited number, are audited by him. During recent years—and the trend has been an accelerating one—more and more crown corporations have been established. In my opinion there is no proper examination possible in parliament of overexpenditure by crown corporations. They enjoy a peculiarly isolated protection from examination by parliament.

There are two examples I might bring to the attention of the house to indicate the degree to which the difficulty of careful examination of crown corporations has been shown. One has to do with the Auditor General's report of last November in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Auditor General pointed out that he had made certain criticisms of expenditures of the C.B.C. in previous reports but apparently no attention was paid by the C.B.C. to the criticisms offered. His report read:

> Still applicable is the comment in previous reports to the effect that the appropriateness of the accumulated allowance for depreciation and obsolescence is open to question for the reason that the rates used through the years have never been scientifically established or consistently applied.
> Weaknesses having been noted in the accounts, this office wrote to the chairman of the board of governors on October 23, 1952, with supporting details . . .

The words he used were:

> . . . it is suggested that the system be carefully reviewed, and appropriately revised and co-ordinated so that there may be no need to qualify the audit certificate in this regard.

That was proper criticism. What did the C.B.C. do? It simply ignored it. I say that as far as crown corporations and emanations of the crown are concerned there is need for an examination to take place in parliament. I mention something that took place yesterday, not for the purpose of discussing the decision made but to indicate just how far removed these institutions are from the control of parliament and responsibility to parliament. Whenever they need money they come to parliament, but whenever we endeavour to ascertain whether they have overexpended or recklessly wasted, then they hide behind the fiction that parliament has no right to know.

Yesterday I made a motion for the production of all letters and communications that had passed between the Department of Transport and the C.N.R. respecting the lease of the Queen Elizabeth hotel in the city of Montreal to the Hilton interests. The answer was that it was not in the public interest to produce the correspondence. The $20 million for the construction of the hotel came from the Canadian people, Mr. Speaker; and it seems passing strange that with such an expenditure, and having in mind that parliament will ultimately have to put up any deficits on the railroad, parliament should have no opportunity of controlling expenditures made by this and other crown corporations and emanations except as now provided for in a limited manner.

Mr. Speaker: As it is five o'clock, the house will now consider private and public bills.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any length in proposing the second reading of Bill No. 7. My reason for such self-denial is that I am sure hon. members will agree that just about everything that can possibly be said about the voluntary revocable check-off, both for and against, has been said during the debates that have taken place over the last number of years. But, Mr. Speaker, even in the breast of an opposition member hope springs eternal, and I dare to believe that one of these times—it might be this year—we will reach the point when the government will decide that the time has come to implement its own promise in connection with this matter as set out in the Liberal platform adopted at the Liberal party's last national convention, which was held in 1948.

I remind hon. members who belong to that party that in their convention of that year they went on record as favouring legislation providing at least some form of union security. I remind them too that when they adopted that plank at their national convention in 1948 it was only a few months after a concrete proposal for union security in the form of the check-off had been dealt with here in parliament.

The concrete proposal was the amendment to the then new federal labour code which was moved in the industrial relations committee by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). Every year since then the wording of that amendment has been the basis of a bill which has been presented to the house in my name. As for what happened in 1948, the amendment was written into the labour code in the industrial relations committee on the motion of the hon. member for Spadina, but when the bill came back to the committee of the whole house, on motion of another Liberal member the voluntary revocable check-off was deleted from that bill. We have had a difficult time ever since trying to get the proposal back into the legislation.

I have mentioned what happened in 1948 so as to remind Liberal members in particular that when they decided at their national convention in the latter part of 1948 that they stood for union security, it was in the light of the proposal to that effect which had been made in parliament by one of their own members. So I say, Mr. Speaker, I dare to hope that this year the government might have reached the decision that it is time to implement a promise made in 1948. I realize this is only 1955, only seven years since that promise was made, and that would be lightning speed for the Liberals; but who knows, such a thing might happen once in a while.

Another hope I have, Mr. Speaker, is that by now something might have developed as the result of a report that was made to the House of Commons in 1953. In the session of that year this same bill of mine was before the house, and on the motion for second reading the minister moved an amendment that the bill be not then read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations. After considerable study that committee made a report to the house in which it said this:

> Your committee endorses the principle of Bill No. 2—

I interject to say that Bill No. 2 of 1953 was identical with Bill No. 7, which is now before us.

> —and recommends that the principle of the said bill, together with the submissions included in the printed minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on the subject matter of this bill, be considered by the government in its review and proposed revision of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which the committee is informed is now under study.

That report was made by the industrial relations committee on Tuesday, April 28, 1953. On May 5, 1953, on the motion of the then chairman of the committee, this house concurred in the report of the committee and made that recommendation its own. As I say, that is another reason for the eternal hope that springs within me that one of these days this measure will be accepted by the government and will become law.

Despite the fact that full details are on the record as to what this bill calls for, perhaps I should take just a moment to spell it out. It asks for what is known as the voluntary revocable check-off. It asks for a provision to be written into the federal labour code making it the law that if a union which is certified under the provisions of that code wishes to have the check-off on a voluntary and revocable basis, it shall be given that check-off on that basis, as a matter of right. Even after that right has been given to a union, under the provisions of this bill it becomes necessary for each individual member of the union who wishes to have his dues deducted and paid over to the union to sign a card to that effect. Even after that, each such member has the right under the provisions of this bill to revoke that request if he wishes to do so. In other words, Mr. Speaker, this is the minimum of what is known as union security that any legislation could possibly provide.

I point out that the railway workers of this country, who are the largest single group to come under federal labour jurisdiction at the moment, have more than this. They have the Rand formula, which is an even more far-reaching form of union security. I point out that legislation similar to the bill now before us is on the statute books of a number of provinces in this country. Therefore this is not legislation that is very radical in character. I point out as well that this has been requested repeatedly by the major labour congresses of this country. I would remind the house also that more Liberal members have voted for this bill than for any other opposition motion or bill that has been before the house for a long time. In other words it is quite clear that there is a strong sentiment for this kind of legislation when a dozen or more Liberals, on occasion, can stand up and vote for a measure of this kind, despite the fact that up to the present the government has not seen fit to endorse it.

As I said at the outset, I feel that on this occasion it is not necessary to speak at length on this measure. It is well known and almost everything that could be said either for or against it has been said, and said a good many times. I suppose if the government is not prepared to accept this bill, the debate may continue. It could be subjected once again to the talking-out process, and I imagine in that case certain members on the other side will make the same speeches they have made before. If the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) for example makes his speech, which I know so well, no doubt I shall make the same interruptions at the same points. We have been through it over and over again

Surely the time has come when the government should accept this measure on its merits. It is, I submit, a gesture to labour in recognition of the extremely important role that labour plays in our economy.

I have pleasure once again, Mr. Speaker, in proposing second reading of this bill for the voluntary revocable check-off, and I hope this time it will be accepted by the house.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend has been commendably brief this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, in presenting the motion for second reading of this bill. I suppose he would include me amongst those who will give the well known speech and cover the well worn ground. I shall be commendably brief too, I hope, but I think I should refer to the fact that the meat of the recommendation of the standing committee of 1953 to which he referred was to the effect that the principle of this bill, together with the submissions included in the printed minutes of proceedings and evidence, be considered by the government in its review and proposed revision of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

The committee had been informed this act was under study. I indicated to the house on February 23 last that the study recommended by the standing committee was going forward. I indicated at the same time that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act was not a very old act and that the officials of my department wanted to take time to review the amendments that were based on very useful years of experience. I made no apology then for going slow and I make none again this afternoon.

Following the discussion of the bill last year came the vote on second reading. I watched the result of that vote with interest, because it was the first opportunity on which the twenty-second parliament of Canada had a chance to express itself on this particular legislation. As my hon. friend said, there were members from all parties in the house who voted for the bill, but the fact that the total vote showed 107 against and 51 for did not indicate that the house as a whole was, at least then, in favour of this particular bill. I think it would be worth while to let the house know that I have had a survey made concerning the incidence of the check-off in all its various forms in industrial establishments which come under the federal jurisdiction. Figures showing the number of employees in crown companies and in industries under federal jurisdiction who were covered by collective agreements providing for a voluntary revocable check-off, or some other form of check-off of trade union dues, revealed that the question of the check-off has become, in truth, a common subject for collective bargaining in those activities under federal labour laws. This of course is where my predecessor in this department, and I, have stated from time to time the present government feels this matter of check-off really should be decided, namely by collective bargaining.

It appeared to me that members of the house might like to have the general picture of how the unions under federal jurisdiction appear to view this alleged boon, the voluntary revocable check-off. The author of the bill has constantly called it the "very minimum of union security". I think we have a right to infer from his speeches that there must be a very great many workers under our jurisdiction deprived of something that we should see that they have, as a minimum of union security.

Well, I was very curious, and set in motion a survey designed to find out just exactly how the situation stood. If I have your permission, sir, I should like to place on Hansard the schedule I have prepared, and in doing so I shall indicate what it contains. This schedule bears the heading "Employees Under Federal Jurisdiction". It has four subheadings, the first of which sets out the total employees under federal jurisdiction; the second shows total employees under agreement; the third shows total employees under agreement providing for check-off of some kind, and the fourth shows total employees under agreement providing for voluntary revocable check-off. Then down the left side are set out the various activities coming under the federal labour laws. The total of those in the first column, namely, the total employees under federal jurisdiction, is given as 392,500; the total of the second column, showing the total employees under agreement, is set out at 277,800; the total in the third column, the total employees under agreement providing for check-off is shown as 223,400, and the total in the fourth column in which are shown the total employees under agreement providing for voluntary revocable check-off is shown as 35,488. I am giving all these totals in round figures.

If I have permission I should like to place the complete table on Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gregg: It is as follows:

(a) Estimated.
(b) Insofar as some longshore workers move from summer to winter ports, they may be counted twice as employees under agreement.
(c) Number under agreement; total figure for employment would be somewhat higher.
(d) Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia only.
(e) Includes Canadian Arsenals Ltd.
(f) Figures in column IV are also included in figures shown in column III.

Now let us look at the prevalence of the check-off in relation to the estimated total of 392,500 persons who are employed in industries which come under federal jurisdiction. That, incidentally, includes crown companies. To begin with, this total of 392,500 employees should be reduced by an estimated total of 39,250 persons employed in a managerial or supervisory capacity, who are outside the scope of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Further it should be reduced by 47,100 employed in banks, and by 11,700 employed in other government enterprises who are not organized and are not covered by collective agreements.

Of the remaining 294,450 employees who are employed in industries under federal jurisdiction, in areas of employment where there is an established pattern of organized bargaining, the survey revealed that 277,800 are actually covered by collective agreements, and that 223,400 are subject to some form of the check-off. That means that slightly more than 80 per cent of the employees who are covered by collective agreements already enjoy the check-off, if one may use that expression, in some form or other. In every case it was gained by collective bargaining.

In his remarks this afternoon the hon. member referred to the manifesto of the Liberal party at its 1948 convention. He said, and truly, that the Liberal party had indicated that it stood for union security. I would point out to him, however, that the Liberal party at that time did not indicate that it favoured this particular bill. I would also say that if the check-off is, in truth, the great boon to union security that he indicates, then the figures I have quoted show that 80 per cent of the workers of Canada coming under federal jurisdiction have, in the intervening years, gained that great boon by collective bargaining.

The survey is even more revealing in regard to the type of union security contained in the check-off provision I have mentioned. Of the 223,400 employees who are subject to some form of the check-off, only 35,488 come under the voluntary revocable check-off, the form which the author of the bill under consideration has called "the very minimum of union security". As against this 35,488 having the minimum of union security, the remaining 187,912 employees have some form of check-off which from the point of view of the trade unions must be more advantageous and desirable than the voluntary revocable check-off. In fact, the survey shows that in relation to 166,433 of the employees in question, the check-off is compulsory for all workers affected by the collective agreement, although the condition of union membership is not compulsory.

I would suggest, too, that if the check-off is a matter concerning which there is such a widespread habit of collective bargaining, as I have mentioned, then it is a matter which should be left to the parties to deal with.

Further, if parliament did legislate in this matter it would seem for the first time, as I have mentioned before, to be legislating in favour of one side in the field of laws relating to the conduct of industrial relations between management and labour. This would be contrary to the general principles now embodied in our industrial relations legislation. The concept of that act is that there should be voluntary agreement by management and labour upon the terms of the contract that would bind both parties.

The act is now free from coercive features relating to the substantive provisions of collective agreements, with the single exception of the requirement that every agreement shall contain a provision for the final settlement of differences as to the meaning or violation of the agreement. Of course that provision applies to both parties concerned. This freedom should be maintained; and it should not be forgotten that collective bargaining rights exist for the employer as well as for organized groups of employees.

The bill proposed by the hon. member would apply specifically in the case of "a trade union entitled to bargain collectively" under the act. The check-off provision is thus tied in with the exercise of collective bargaining rights. From our survey of collective agreements in the federal field of jurisdiction it is abundantly clear that the unions, acting as collective bargaining agents, have been able to make arrangements which, in many instances, go substantially beyond the provision for a voluntary revocable check-off and which, from their point of view, are more adequate and beneficial.

On the principle of the check-off, the attitude of the federal government is revealed by the check-off provisions which have been made in numerous collective agreements entered into by crown companies. This has been left to collective bargaining by those responsible for the management of crown companies. It is significant that in many instances, covering a very large number of employees of crown companies, bargaining has resulted in provisions for various types of the check-off of union dues in favour of the unions representing the employees.

The hon. member referred in passing to the fact that it had been suggested by the standing committee on industrial relations that the principle of this matter be carried along in conjunction with other amendments that it was indicated the department was bringing forward. The other day in the house, in response to a question, I stated that we were not for the present recommending those other amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act for two reasons. One of them was the case which is now before the supreme court, which I mentioned at that time. The other is this. Last summer there were some very serious discussions surrounding a dispute between the representatives of labour and management of our railways. By that time the dispute had gone through all the processes of the conciliation machinery provided by the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Finally both parties consented to agree to the decisions of an arbitrator to be appointed by the government on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. The arbitrator made his findings which have been accepted as the basis for a new agreement, which is now practically completed.

Since the first of this year the same committee representing the non-operating unions of the railways has been discussing a broader question looking toward the future of collective bargaining in railway disputes generally. It has been reported that these discussions have touched upon the effectiveness or otherwise of certain features of our Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It has been reported also that later discussions may be conducted on the same question between the union committee and the railway management. If, as time goes on, suggestions are put forward to improve the usefulness of the act, we shall be glad to give those suggestions consideration. In the meantime I think we might postpone opening up the act for these other amendments that I referred to a moment ago.

As for myself, Mr. Speaker, I shall once more find it necessary to vote against this bill.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to say a word on this bill. This is not the first occasion that we have had this particular measure before us, and it is not the first occasion on which I have expressed my views in regard to it. The minister and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have gone into the details of the bill quite sufficiently; therefore it is not my intention to deal with that part of it.

I want to speak more particularly with regard to the principle of the bill. We as a party have always maintained that we would do everything within reason to see to it that the workingmen of this country enjoy the greatest possible security in the field of trade unions, and the highest possible standard of living which they can attain. We have taken the stand that the voluntary revocable check-off is something the unions should have. As I have indicated on other occasions, we in Alberta have taken the lead in this country. Therefore we are just following the pattern which we have set in that particular legislation.

I recognize immediately, Mr. Speaker, the importance of having this legislation in the form of an amendment to the act itself, because it has been the experience of almost everyone who has had anything to do with labour organizations that some workers who enjoy the benefits that have been derived from the efforts of unions will take no part in financing the obligations of those unions. That is wrong. Anybody engaged in industrial labour should pay his fair share of the expenses incurred in getting the advantages. We know that from an industrial and economic point of view our whole national economy is dependent upon the amount of money which the labouring people, the agriculturists and others have to spend. If they have not the money to spend, then of course the whole economy of the country is wrecked.

We recognize that immediately, Mr. Speaker, but I must point out, as I did on another occasion, one of the great objections I have to this type of legislation. I should not say "to this type of legislation", but more properly to the abuses to which it may lead. It is true that there are branches of labour organizations in this country who subscribe to the aims and policies of a political organization. I am not going to beat about the bush. The C.C.L. do subscribe to the political views of the C.C.F., and they have made the C.C.F. their political action arm. They may think that is proper.

I have always supported labour organizations, and they have always had my sympathy. Generally speaking, the people across this country are sympathetic to labour's aims, and they see the advantages of having a proper industrial organization in Canada; but at the same time a great many people object strongly to the unions siding with any political party. I have said without hesitation on occasions in my own riding, in the Drumheller valley and in East Calgary when that was part of my riding, both highly industrialized sections, that I would not want the unions to come out and support our organization as a political unit.

It is wrong. Every individual member of a union should have the privilege of supporting any political party he desires to support.

When you find some unions subscribing from $100,000 to $200,000 for political purposes during election periods then it is a bit out of reason. Some people say the money is not from such sources. However, I would maintain that if unions have that much money to put up for political purposes they do not have to extract such large amounts from the membership in the form of dues and in other ways.

I wish to make it quite plain that I am in wholehearted sympathy with workingmen. I want to see the unions progress. I want to see them with very strong labour union representation, and I want to see the voluntary revocable check-off instituted in law. I believe it is a good thing. But I would say this to unions. I believe it is unfair to the membership of the union and it does not serve a good practical purpose for any union to sponsor any political party.

Having said that may I say again that I am going to support this measure.

Mr. Speaker: The business reserved for this hour having been dealt with, the house will now revert to the business with which it was dealing prior to five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SELECT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER CERTAIN ESTIMATES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

That a select committee to be designated be appointed to consider such of the estimates as may be referred to it and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing in general with the expenditures of crown corporations and their immunity from serious examination by parliament. They finance through parliament, but their responsibility to account for the moneys they receive and the manner in which they dispose of them is, to all intents and purposes, above consideration by parliament. There is, in truth, a committee on broadcasting to examine the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and a sessional committee on railways to consider the auditors' report on the Canadian National Railways, but the examination made is ineffective and largely perfunctory.

I had referred to the request for information regarding the Queen Elizabeth hotel in the city of Montreal, a matter that is very much in the minds of the Canadian people. It seems difficult for those with even a modicum of business experience to understand why a fabulous sum of money should be expended on the construction of a hotel by a public corporation which, instead of operating the hotel after completion, turns it over under lease to another company. I prefer to call it a lease, although the minister referred to it as simply a contract for operation.

Mr. Marler: For management, I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. I did not have the exact nomenclature in my mind, but to me it is a lease. It is a difficult thing for people to understand the reason for the change of front. Certainly the hotel could not have been in its original concept simply a building to turn over on a management lease or a contract to a company outside of Canada, or indeed to any company in Canada. When a request was made for the production of the documents one would have thought that the minister responsible to parliament would have shown alacrity in giving the information. The minister, however, relied on the defensive stand that it was not in the public interest, and that the course of not revealing such matters which had been followed in the past was being followed in this case.

I am not dealing in any way with the decision that was made by the house yesterday, but I simply point out this, sir. If, indeed, that is the general regulation affecting parliament, then all I can say is that parliament pays the piper for some of these crown corporations, but they are able to dance to whatever tune they feel like dancing to, regardless of the attitude of the piper. To carry it a little further, the refusal in the public interest to answer a question such as this is tantamount to drawing the blind of secrecy in order to exclude the searchlight of full disclosure to parliament.

However estimable a minister of the crown may be, human nature being what it is there would be considerable temptation for the minister to take this stand when questions might be politically embarrassing. After all, if that power rests in a minister of the crown there is no question that could be brought before the House of Commons upon which the minister, so long as his party stood with him, would not be able to deny information by the simple expedient of saying it was not in the public interest.

So far as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is concerned, two years ago they defied the Auditor General, who said their system of bookkeeping was wrong and did not properly reveal the position of their affairs. They paid no attention to him. Last November he repeated his criticisms, and since then the broadcasting corporation has decided to pay attention to the recommendations that were made. If the Auditor General, who is the watchdog above all watchdogs over expenditures, may be defied by any emanation of the crown, then indeed his operations are restricted, especially if the experience of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is repeated in other departments.

Several years ago, I think it was in 1951, there was another example at the time the Ford hotel in Montreal was purchased. It was only upon examination by the Auditor General that it was revealed the building had not been purchased by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It was purchased by the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which service occupied only a small portion of the building while the remainder was rented to the corporation. It is that sort of thing that arouses the interest and the proper criticism of parliament. The Auditor General pointed out that it seemed strange to him that such an irregular course should be followed. In reality, in his eyes, it seemed to imply that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was being indirectly subsidized out of the money provided for the international service.

I mention these two examples simply for the purpose of indicating that if, under our present system, when a minister of the crown may say it is not in the public interest to answer questions dealing with these matters he is fortified by precedent, then it is time in the interests of the public in general and a proper examination of the vast expenditures being made by these crown corporations that such a rule should be changed. Such a rule may have had its place 50, 75 or 100 years ago, or even up to 25 years ago when the state was not in public business to the degree it is today. Such a rule, however, applied to the conditions of today can only operate to shackle parliament in investigating expenditures and controlling waste.

So far as the motion before the house is concerned, it is an experiment. I am not optimistic about its success; for the committee system being what it is, with the committees having an overwhelming majority of representatives of the government, there is no real incentive on the part of the majority in a committee to permit matters to be brought before it that may be injurious to the government and the party to which they belong.

Human nature being what it is, I am not saying the situation would be any different under another government; but the fact remains that in endeavouring to apply, even in a modified form, the American committee system to the British system of constitutional government, there has never been any great success. Endeavours to make it successful have reduced the dangers of the present situation, but have not materially improved it.

In Great Britain, as the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out today, one of the committees has as chairman a member of the opposition. If that system were followed in any of the committees of this house it might bring about at least a degree of interest in the activities of committees, and there would be hope for greater success than has been the general experience in the operation of committees during the time I have been a member of this house.

I do not desire to dash the hopes expressed that the committee will achieve what other committees have not achieved. It is an experiment and I hope it will succeed, because it would provide an opportunity for examination that the committee of the whole cannot provide, in view of the numbers constituting that committee. I do hope it succeeds; but I believe first and foremost, before the committee is set up, when the house moves to go into committee of supply there should be no endeavour to stifle discussion, or to deny to the opposition the opportunity to consider policy and offer such criticisms as in the opinion of the opposition are necessary at this time.

I mention but one department the estimates of which are to be submitted to this committee, that of immigration and citizenship. Mr. Speaker, there is a department that deserves examination and criticism in the house before the committee is set up, and it is but one of several that could be mentioned. I do not single it out for special attention. But I do say that when the committee is set up unless an opportunity is given to make suggestions and criticisms, the examination cannot but be perfunctorily confined to the various items, and the criticism of policy which is so necessary will be denied.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, quite a bit has been said with regard to this motion before us, to the effect that the appointment of a committee on estimates will be an experiment. I think when an experiment is being undertaken all the evidence of previous experiments along that line should be carefully examined, and care should be taken to see that the benefit of earlier experience is made available to us so we will not repeat errors that may have been made by other parliaments, or other houses of commons, in dealing with this problem.

There has been plenty of criticism of the method of procedure in committee of supply, not only here but in the house at Westminster. People have pointed out the defects in connection with that particular problem which parliament faces each year. Now that we have reached this stage, when a committee on estimates is about to be appointed, it is worth while for us to consider all aspects of the matter and continue to make suggestions to the Minister of Finance so that he might modify the proposals he has presented to us, or take into consideration some points he may have overlooked.

In the first instance, what is the purpose of a committee of supply? Some people have said, and we also read in the newspapers, that the committee of supply exists to pass estimates each year. Well, that is so; but in actual practice what occurs? In May's Parliamentary Practice, fifteenth edition, where he deals with the committee of supply as it operates at Westminster, he points out that in the eighties of the last century the opportunities for a general debate when the house went into committee of supply were limited to four occasions. He says that in 1947 this restriction was removed, and that 26 days are now permitted for consideration of supply. Then he adds this sentence at page 705 which, I suggest, is worthy of note:

> It was intended that facilities for the criticism of departmental administration (now recognized as the real business of supply) should be available throughout the session, not merely during the period when there were estimates before the house.

It is not possible to underline sentences in Hansard, but the words to which I want to draw attention are those in brackets, "now recognized as the real business of supply"—namely the criticism of departmental administration.

That is a different concept from the prevailing opinion that in committee of supply our main business is to examine the figures placed before us, and to vote on them as we reach the end of the discussion of the estimates of a department. I realize there has been a considerable volume of criticism across the country with regard to committee of supply, and the statement is frequently made that at the last moment millions of dollars are voted without careful consideration. I am not at all sure that criticism is going to be met by the proposal now before us.

We have had our attention drawn to the work of the external affairs committee over the years. Those who have been on that standing committee of the house have indicated to us that that is a good method of dealing with estimates. They have the advantage of experience on that committee, which I have not had; but for the last two years, though I have not taken the opportunity here in the house to express it, I have been objecting to that method of dealing with estimates in the committee on external affairs, for this reason. Those of us who are not on that committee never have the opportunity to examine the external affairs estimates here in the House of Commons. We have no opportunity of putting questions to the minister. That is all done in committee.

I am told "If you are not informed, read the reports of the committee on external affairs". We have so many reports of various committees to read that it is very difficult to keep abreast of what is going on, and some committee reports are not published very quickly. They do not appear, as Hansard does, the following morning. Therefore I have been suggesting that the external affairs estimates might very well be considered in the committee of the whole.

It might be said, "Well, you would not want to do that all the time". Perhaps not, but once in a while let them come forward here, let the whole house have a go at those estimates, let the whole house interrogate the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Why should he be relieved of questioning in the house on the ground that there has been an opportunity to debate external affairs on the first item and again when the report of that committee comes to the house? There would be no particular harm in subjecting the minister of that department to the same system of interrogation that other ministers have to experience in getting their estimates through the house, and we would all have an opportunity to learn some of the details of that department. That is a contrary point of view to that which has been presented up to date, but it happens to be my opinion.

It is on the basis of the experience of the external affairs committee that the proposal has been brought forward that other departments be examined in the same way. Several references have been made to the experience in the House of Commons at Westminster. I would like to add a little to those references and point out one or two things which seem to indicate that even there the committee on estimates has not been an unqualified success. I shall quote three or four short passages from that excellent standard work called "Parliament", of which the author is W. Ivor Jennings. On page 259 he says this:

> The function of the committee of supply is to examine and consent to the estimates. In practice it is impossible for a committee of 614 members to do anything of the kind. Indeed, it is impossible for a small committee to consider them with any degree of success, even if they are all prepared to study 1,500 pages of figures and explanations and to undertake the long preliminary study which is essential.

Then he deals with the actual work of the committee of supply in the house, and quotes various people who had long experience in the House of Commons at Westminster. On page 298 I find this:

> The debate is technically a discussion on proposed expenditure. Its purpose is sometimes said to be to induce economy in the government; though, as Mr. Lloyd George has said, "it generally ends in a demand that you should spend more money for something or other".

There is a notation at the bottom of that page. He says:

> Compare Mr. Gladstone's statement: "It is more difficult to save a shilling than to spend a million."

The problem was acute even as long ago as Mr. Gladstone's time. Further on Mr. Jennings goes on to say:

> For all these reasons debates in supply are often criticized. Lord Eustace Percy once called them "the most discursive and futile of all our proceedings."

With that some of us here would be in agreement. I continue:

> On the other hand, Sir Austen Chamberlain said: I think they (supply days) are admirable. With the additional occasional vote of censure, they give the private member of the opposition sufficient opportunities for discussing policy, and I do not believe that you can do more in the House of Commons. I do not think that in these days the House of Commons will ever control the details of expenditure. You have to rely for those upon the departments whose business it is to control them. The more opportunities you give to the House of Commons to discuss supply, the more pressure is put upon ministers to spend money.

Then on page 303 he deals with the actual work of the estimates committee, and points out that proposals to establish an estimates committee were made in the house at Westminster from 1880 on, and at various times committees were set up. Reports were brought in suggesting changes and alterations. They had considerable difficulty in determining just what the committee on estimates might do. On page 303 Mr. Jennings says this:

> At no time since 1902 has it been suggested that the committee of supply has been an effective means of controlling expenditure, or even a body concerned primarily with expenditures.

Hence the necessity of having a committee on estimates to look after the detail, letting the committee of the whole house deal with questions of administration and policy. Then he considers the success or failure of the committee on estimates in that house over a period of years, and quotes from the comptroller and auditor general, who, in 1931, was

Sir Malcolm Ramsay. This is what the auditor general said at that time:

> The estimates committee has, I am afraid, failed to realize the expectations of those who advocated its establishment. It is true that it has helped to secure certain useful improvements, generally of a minor order, but it has effected no substantial economies and its results have surely been achieved by disproportionate expenditure of time and labour by members and witnesses, and some at any rate of the matters on which it has made recommendations might equally well have been handled by the public accounts committee (e.g. the re-grouping of the estimates, or the financial control of the empire marketing board).

The last quotation I shall read is simply this, and it is the opinion of Mr. Jennings after his lengthy examination of the work of the estimates committee in the British House of Commons. At page 312 he says:

> The estimates committee is not completely useless. It was particularly useful in re-establishing and reinforcing treasury control after 1920. For the most part, however, it duplicates work done more effectively by the public accounts committee.

Then he goes on to show that the public accounts committee has advantages that the estimates committee does not enjoy. For one thing, the chairman of the public accounts committee is the choice of the opposition; for another, it has the auditor general and various people to assist, whereas the estimates committee has not that assistance granted to it.

The weaknesses of the present plan must be obvious after the speeches we have heard on this subject, and I hope the Minister of Finance will take careful note of the various suggestions that have been made. It is rather a mistake to think that we can effectively control the expenditures that come to us outlining government policy. Every item in the estimates is a government measure; it is not possible to have an item reduced except with the consent of the government, nor is it possible to have items voted down without the government being called upon to resign. Therefore everything that comes before us is actually a government measure presented to us, and it is difficult for us to deal with those estimates from the standpoint of people who are anxious to effect economy. Yet parliament gets the blame for passing enormous sums of money in a few moments at the close of the session, as though we were all to blame for what is going on.

Surely we of the opposition cannot be blamed for what is actually in effect government policy. Our course is to attempt to indicate to the government that their expenditure is wrong, that there should be economies effected, or that there has been waste and extravagance in certain fields. But we as an opposition cannot effect economies which are in reality in the hands of the government. We can talk and vote against the government's declared policy, and they stand or fall by the acceptance or rejection of their policy.

The present proposal does not in my opinion hold out any great hope of a change in that situation. I would have been prepared to accept the proposal in a more cheerful spirit had the minister not hedged it around with certain restrictions. The restriction to which I object is the one to the effect—if I understood the minister correctly—that we would not be able to have a debate on the administration and general policy of a department if the estimates of that particular department were transferred to this committee on the estimates.

Mr. Harris: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. Churchill: I said I might have misunderstood the minister.

Mr. Harris: You did.

Mr. Churchill: I am happy to have his correction. If we in the House of Commons can still have a debate on any of these departments before they are dealt with by the estimates committee, or after they return from that committee, then I believe that is a proper safeguard. However, I am not sure that is what the house gathered from the minister's earlier statements. I believe the minister said the committee on estimates was going to conduct its proceedings after the fashion of the committee of the whole house, and that on the first item that committee would discuss administrative policy and subsequently ask the minister questions. If we in this house can retain the right and opportunity to criticize the minister's administration and the policy of the government, then that is a real safeguard, and under such circumstances I might be inclined to support this proposed experiment.

But we want to be fairly certain that this is going to be the case because, as others have already pointed out, it is here in this House of Commons that the effective work of parliament is done. There is a great deal of work done in committee, but committees do not have public opinion focused upon them as is the case in the house; and I for one would not be in favour of a great deal of the work of the house being done in committee. I know there are opportunities in some committees to make a more detailed analysis of various matters that come within the scope of investigation, and that officials and other people may come before such committees and give evidence. Nevertheless, the work of committees does not receive the same attention by the press or the public as the work that is done here in the house, and I would not care to release any minister from his duty to rise in the house in the glare of public opinion and state his case with regard to his department.

I shall conclude with this observation. I believe it would be a mistake—and again the minister may correct me if I misunderstood him—to have a committee of supply examining departmental estimates in this chamber and at the same time a committee on estimates examining some other department in some other part of this building. We would have the main House of Commons and a minor house of commons operating at one and the same time. It seems to me that would detract from one or the other and my preference is to retain the discussion here in the House of Commons.

If the minister is prepared to modify his proposal, outline the safeguards and make certain we have every opportunity of interrogating ministers on administrative policy, I would say he might go ahead with this experiment. But I hope no one is going to be carried away by the expectation that large economies will be effected or that the house is going to gain greater control over the expenditure of money by parliament. It must be emphasized that these are government measures under government control. That, Mr. Speaker, concludes my observations with regard to this particular matter.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister and the house are not feeling too impatient at this moment, because the minister himself referred to the fact that a motion was made in 1921 for the setting up of a committee on estimates. I have read the debates of that day and the marginal notations as to the time the debate occupied, and I would point out that the debate occupied two hours and 40 minutes, at the end of which the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Knowles: The same thing might happen today.

Mr. Fulton: Therefore in 1921 they were discussing an entirely academic question. I might point out in addition that the time was mainly occupied by speakers sitting in opposition to the government. Tonight, however, we are discussing a proposal which is far from academic and which, if adopted, will become the pattern for the conduct of the discussion of this house for a good many years to come. I say this is far more than an academic discussion because the motion was spoken to by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and it obviously carries all the considered opinion and weight of the government majority behind it.

[Mr. Churchill.]

It is perhaps odd to note that the time taken on this debate up to this moment is exactly two hours and 40 minutes, and I hope the minister will not become impatient if we wish to express our views on the proposal now before us. I feel that a proposal for an experiment such as this is one which we as interested commoners should be ready to support. I have been a member of the committee which with Your Honour has been considering possible revision of the rules of the house, and I have in a general way expressed support for a proposal of this sort in that committee.

I am not going to back away from that position, though I confess I was disturbed by the minister's approach to this problem of setting up this committee when he spoke this afternoon, because I do feel if I understood him correctly that his proposal falls considerably short of the sort of committee we had under consideration, and which we had considered adopting as an experiment.

In my approach to this whole problem I want to say at the outset—and I know I share the views of all other hon. members here—that I get a little bit tired sometimes when I hear people criticize members for taking time in parliament. Parliament is the place where we are supposed to talk about the affairs of the nation, and particularly it is the place where we are supposed to discuss the spending of the money of the people who make up this nation.

I believe in parliament as an institution where we should discuss intelligently the affairs of the nation but where, it is quite true, we should not waste our time or the time of others by discussing them unintelligently, that we should not use our time inefficiently. I agree with the other opinion that has been expressed—I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) and others in my own party expressed it, and also the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)—that the mere desire to cut down the time expended is not necessarily conducive to the more efficient conduct of the business of parliament.

I believe in parliament as an institution. I believe that parliament will work only as well as its members make it work. This proposed committee will therefore work only if its members—and they will be the same people who are members of the House of Commons—will make that committee work. They can make it work, in my submission, only if they approach their task in an attitude of mind in which they recognize that they are members of the House of Commons, and that their job is not to expedite the passing of estimates but rather to examine closely whether or not the estimates are justified. If that committee approaches its work in the sense that it is a committee to get the estimates through more quickly I venture to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it will not be doing the work of the House of Commons, and that it will not be really in a true sense expediting the work of the House of Commons.

I am not an expert in this field. I have not been here very long. However, I have tried to do some reading and to absorb some feeling of what it is to be a member of the House of Commons and of what the House of Commons means. All my reading has convinced me that a member will not really advance the affairs of the nation as a member of parliament unless he as an individual is convinced of the importance of being a member of parliament; and being a member of parliament should mean the same on both sides of the house. If you go back to the old days in history you will find that the ordinary commoner, the member of parliament, was a person whose will and wishes were opposed to the will of the executive; and his job as a commoner was to seek to make certain that the will of the executive was not imposed upon the people contrary to the wishes of the people. It is in that sense that I feel we fall down in our approach to the task of being members of the House of Commons today.

I am not going into a lengthy criticism of the party system, but I am going to say this. I think that to too great an extent we are divided into members who support the government whether the government is right or not, and members who criticize the government whether the government is right or not. I believe what we should try to do is instil into members of this house a sense of being commoners, representatives of the people as opposed to the executive who are seeking—for motives of convenience, ease and expediency —to circumvent, if you like, the House of Commons.

It therefore seems to me that the job of the committee on estimates, whether it be the committee of the whole house, the committee of supply or the special committee now contemplated, should be to examine the estimates in a common spirit, not as members of the government trying to get them through more quickly or as members of the opposition trying to stop them from going through. It seems to me that we should examine the estimates as members of the House of Commons trying to see collectively whether the expenditures proposed by the government are justified and are in the best interests of the people.

Unless this committee when constituted approaches its work in that spirit I believe it will not in fact expedite the work of the house or increase the prestige of the house, but rather will in fact make it more convenient for the government to get its estimates through with rather less trouble even than it had before.

I looked with some interest at the debate referred to by the minister in introducing this motion. There are some extremely interesting quotations in that debate. I start with the quotation by the hon. member who introduced the motion, namely Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux who read—and this I want to lay before the house for its consideration in setting up this committee—a passage from Bagehot on the English constitution, as follows. I am reading now from page 2193 of Hansard of 1921. He said this:

> The House of Commons—now that it is the true sovereign and appoints the real executive—has long since ceased to be the checking, sparing, economical body it once was. It now is more apt to spend money than the minister of the day. I have heard a very experienced financier say: "If you want to raise a certain cheer in the House of Commons, make a general panegyric on economy; if you want to invite a sure defeat, propose a particular saving."

That, of course, is the task which confronts all of us. It is the task with which we are all faced as members of the House of Commons. No one knows it better than the Minister of Finance, and there is no one who, when he stops to consider it, knows it better than the private member on the government side. As I see it, this is a collective task we have to do in setting up a committee that will approach its work in a spirit in which—perhaps because it operates with a little less publicity than does the committee of the whole house—they will say to themselves not "How will this look in my own riding?" or "How will this look in my own province?" but rather "We in the committee are all members of the House of Commons; we are all commoners, and here we have presented to us the proposals of the executive to spend the money of our people, the common people, the people we represent. Let us all go to work on them".

If we approach the matter with that attitude, remembering that even in the House of Commons it is perhaps more apt to invite defeat than to invite success to suggest a saving, because of the party lines that are drawn here, then perhaps in the committee that is to be set up we may be able to circumvent that tendency which I have outlined.

No House of Commons in the committee of the whole, or no special committee of the house, will work unless we have a sense of our position as members of the house and a sense of our responsibilities as commoners in relation to the proposals placed before us by the executive. I think it is interesting that this proposal comes before us at this time, spoken to by the new Minister of Finance who has just recently taken over his portfolio. When I learned of his new appointment, Mr. Speaker, I wrote him a personal letter of congratulation and good wishes for success in his task. Therefore I can say what I have to say by way of public criticism in the knowledge that he has my good will as a fellow member of the house, and one who is entrusted with a very important portfolio of government in this country.

But I might then perhaps be permitted to express the hope that in introducing this motion to set up a committee he is not just looking for a whitewash, just seeking to constitute a body which will make it easier for him to get his estimates through, a body to which he can point and say, "Well, look; the estimates committee approved these things. What are you people doing criticizing them out on the platform?" I hope he is not trying to constitute a body which will be dominated by the government majority but that it will be, as I say, a body which will approach its task in the spirit I have tried, in a very imperfect way, to indicate I think it should be approached, namely in the spirit of commoners, of members of the House of Commons together.

Incidentally, I hope too that if the experiment should fall short of the hopes which we in the opposition, and I am sure members on the government side, have for it and, therefore, we are compelled on some later occasion to say that we do not like your estimates committee any more, the minister will not say, "But you approved the motion unanimously in the house." I admit, even while sounding these words of caution, that I am prepared to support the motion because I hope the experiment will work, but I am going to do as other members have done and suggest some positive changes in the approach to the committee differing from those which were suggested by the minister. Therefore I say again that I hope the minister is not just looking for ways, as it were, of making his extractions more painless. I hope the minister has not taken a course in painless dentistry.

I want to refer the minister to some other words uttered in the course of the debate to which he himself referred, as found at page 2201 of Hansard of April 18, 1921. It is true that the hon. gentleman, Mr. Michael Clark, then member for Red Deer, covered quite a wide field and discussed various types of taxation which I know will be of interest to the Minister of Finance, but I think what he had to say is perhaps applicable tonight in the circumstances in which we find ourselves. He was discussing a motion to set up a committee on estimates, and said:

> I venture to think that well as my hon. friend the minister of finance is shaping in his new office, at the present time he is looking anxiously for some method by which he may pluck the goose without making her squawk. Well, I trust he will not be too successful in his researches in that direction but will assume an attitude of stern public morality and seek out methods of taxation which will be righteous and just methods, and that he will not care whether the application of them is accompanied by considerable squawking on the part of the goose. As a matter of fact, it is only when you make the electors complain that you make them understand what your policy has cost them, in whatsoever line that policy may show its activities.

So I hope the minister, in introducing the motion to set up a committee, is not just seeking a more painless method of dealing with the estimates. I think the estimates should be a very painful subject of consideration in the House of Commons. I think we should make them a painful subject for the ministers who bring their estimates before us, because I think only in that way will we in fact be doing our collective duty as members of the House of Commons.

I should like to echo the words of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), trying not to adopt a tone of lecturing or moral rectitude, and suggest in all sincerity and in a spirit of comradeship to members on the opposite side that if they will join us in examining and cross-examining the government in the house and in the estimates committee not only will we welcome their help but they will find it a rewarding and, indeed, a rather enjoyable task. I hope they will approach the proposed committee on estimates in that spirit, and not try to make it easier for the ministers and the departmental experts who appear before the committee to get away with their proposals for expenditure.

I shall conclude in a few words by suggesting a different approach to the committee from that which I understood to be outlined by the Minister of Finance today. I do not consider that the committee on estimates should be modelled on the committee of supply. I think rather that the committee should concern itself with dollars and cents exclusively. I think the committee should have before it all the departmental officials who are responsible for the expenditure and administration of the items of the departments which come under the scrutiny of that committee. I think these experts should answer directly to the committee.

I believe it would be a great mistake to repeat in the committee on estimates the process we see here in the house where a member asks a question of the minister, the minister leans over the desk and listens to the departmental experts, quite often misunderstands them or fails to hear them because there is a buzz of conversation behind him or on this side, and then gives an answer. Then you see the deputy tugging the minister's sleeve, the minister leaning over again and then saying, "I am sorry, I misunderstood my hon. friend's question", when in fact he has misunderstood his deputy's answer, and corrects himself in what he has just said.

I quite agree that on the floor of the house—it can only happen when we are in committee—the minister must answer. Civil servants cannot speak here, and that procedure is proper even though cumbersome. But if we are going to set up a committee on estimates it will negate the whole purpose of the committee if we have to go through that procedure. I think the committee must have the right to question departmental officials directly, because they are the ones who are going to spend the money.

Also, approaching it in the spirit that the committee will work within the confines of government policy, I think we should be entitled to say to the deputy minister or associate deputy or head of a branch: This government policy says you shall have so many offices, let us say, where immigrants will be admitted, and you are admitting so many immigrants a year. Why do you need X thousand dollars to do it? How do you propose to spend those thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars?

That is the sort of work with which the committee should be concerned, and it is the sort of questioning which I do not think should be conducted through the indirect channel of a question to the minister, back to the deputy, back to the minister and then back to the member asking the question. It would take too much time in the first place, and I do not think you get sufficiently direct answers or a sufficiently complete process of examination and cross-examination.

That being the approach I should like to see followed, without laying down a blueprint I think a measure of consultation with the opposition should be recognized as to which departments should be referred to the committee. I know the government has to exercise responsibility and I am not seeking to deprive it of that responsibility because I expect, hope and intend to hold it responsible for all its acts; but when it comes to this business of the House of Commons examining the activities of the government I think there should be a measure of consultation between the government and the opposition as to which departments it will be most appropriate in the public interest to place before the estimates committee. The government of course, I admit, would have to reserve, as it always must do, its right of final decision, if you like. I am only asking for a pattern to be established, that we should not be confronted at the outset with a decision that these are the departments that are going to go before the committee. Let us have at least a measure of consultation before that decision is made.

In that light I make this suggestion. The one department which this year should not go to the committee on estimates is the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. There are several departments, I feel, on which a discussion of policy is required. I see the minister smiling. I am not going to read anything into his smile. I was going to say this even before he smiled. I believe he will agree with me that it has been several years since we have had a real opportunity to discuss the policy of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in committee of supply.

Taking the approach I do that a committee on estimates should be a committee on dollars and cents and not on policy, I feel that one of the departments which should not at this time be referred to the committee on estimates is the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I would hate to see an attempt made to discuss policy in the house here and have the government say we should not discuss policy on the motion to refer the estimates, we should wait until the estimates come back from the committee on estimates. Then in the committee on estimates they would say, "This is not a suitable place for a discussion of policy; wait until this committee reports to the committee of supply." The report of the committee of supply is made on the last day of the session, and we would be placed in the same situation in which we were placed by the minister last year, when we had about seven and one-half hours on the last day of the session to discuss the policy of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

These are the main suggestions I have to make with regard to this committee. Before the government lays before us a final decision as to how this committee should operate I believe there must be a good deal more discussion in the committee on rules, which is now meeting with Your Honour, as to the pattern which should be followed; as to whether that committee should be a dollars and cents committee, a mixed dollars and cents and policy committee or a policy committee; whether we should have a discussion on policy when the motion is made to refer the estimates of the department, or whether that discussion should take place when the estimates committee reports back to the house. The last thing I want to see is a discussion of policy thwarted because the estimates of the department are being referred to the committee, then have the estimates committee report back to the house on the last day of the session and have us find we are deprived of the right to discuss policy.

These are the dangers. I admit I am drawing attention to the dangers. I am doing so because I approach this subject in the spirit that the government has asked us to embark on an experiment. I am prepared to embark on the experiment, but I am not prepared to support that experiment for one day longer if I become convinced this is becoming, intentionally or otherwise, one more tactic for making it easier for the government to impose its will on the house.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): When I was considerably younger than I am now, Mr. Speaker, I heard Admiral Beatty refer to the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States to settle the war debt, and his remark was that if it cost so much to win a war, what would it cost to lose one? I have been reminded of that today because I thought I was introducing a motion which had been requested on innumerable occasions in this house by the opposition. I wondered, in fact, if my senses had left me, and if I had not heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on many occasions in the past six or seven years say that if only we had an estimates committee we would save a lot of time in this house; we would have a better discussion, and the constitution would be saved rather than ruined as some hon. members across the way would indicate now.

Mr. Fulton: You made it too conditional.

Mr. Harris: Yes, I suppose we have to have conditions in the House of Commons; we have to lay down rules to carry out the business of the house. I am particularly glad that I did lay down some rules with respect to this committee in my opening remarks, because it is quite evident that if I had not the opposition would not be able to agree on a single thing the committee ought to do when it meets.

Just to be very brief about it, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) indicated that his group would support this measure and asked one specific question which I should answer. He requested that there might be a change in the personnel of the committee from time to time because the opposition, and presumably the government side, would be desirous of taking care of those who had an interest in one department and not in another. I do not believe the government has ever refused to change the name of anyone on a committee if a party desired to have a change made, and that will continue to be the case. I would hope that in this way we would have the best possible experience brought to bear on the estimates from time to time in the estimates committee.

The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) said he approved of the proposal, and wanted it made clear that there would be an opportunity in the committee to hear from officials of the departments for the purpose of eliciting information. He rather indicated that he thought the only way to do that would be to have the officials there, and not have an examination of the minister intervening. Now, I have not the blue sheets of what I said, but at that point I read very carefully the notes I have in front of me and I am going to reread the point I made, and which he must have overlooked in his remarks. I said this:

> Each minister would be responsible for the conduct of the affairs of his department before the committee, and if he chooses to make all the answers himself, that would be consistent in our view with the purposes of the committee. If, on the other hand, he thinks it desirable to leave the explanation of the details of administration to others, that will also be his responsibility, but if this course is followed it will not be possible for an official or other person to be questioned as to the policy of the government. This must be the responsibility of the government and the minister concerned, and he cannot devolve that responsibility upon an official.

I take that to mean, Mr. Speaker, that in all probability ministers will prefer to have officials, from time to time, speak directly to the committee. But I repeat that is a matter of choice for the minister as to how he conducts his affairs before that committee. I cannot conceive of that committee having any greater authority than the committee of supply. I tried to make that point throughout everything I said.

The hon. member for Eglinton raised a number of questions, and in particular he seems to have taken objection to the thought that there would not be a debate on policy on the motion to send these estimates to the estimates committee. He pointed out that there had been debates on policy with respect to external affairs when we sent the estimates of that department to the standing committee on external affairs. It is quite true that in recent years we have followed that course, particularly because there has been some anxiety in the house about external affairs matters during the last four or five years.

I should like to point out that it is only a practice which has grown up. We did not always follow it. In the first three years, 1946, 1947 and 1948, there was no debate on the motion to refer the estimates to the standing committee, and in 1952 there was no debate. Of the six or seven times we have followed this practice, there has been just about an even division as between debate or no debate.

The government has always acceded to the request of the opposition for a debate on external affairs. On occasion we have resorted to the device of moving the adjournment of the house to permit that debate. In my view that system, that practice, can be followed on any future occasion when there is an obvious need for debate on external affairs. But the point I wished to make—and I am sure the point was made clearly, though I understand I did not make myself clear to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill)—was this, that if there is any advantage whatever in a discussion of these estimates in a room other than this one, surely the opposition would not expect the government to follow their wishes in that respect and, in so doing, take more time in this room in a debate on policy.

Now, I said that a motion to refer these estimates to the estimates committee should not be debatable. That was all I said. I did not say—and I am sure no one else understood me to say—that that would preclude debate in the committee of supply itself. I think it is perfectly obvious from the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) why I went no further than that.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to when you can have a policy debate to the best advantage. One argument which has been advanced on innumerable occasions by the Leader of the Opposition was that if we only had an intimate, detailed discussion of the estimates first, we could have a better debate on policy afterward. So, as I conceive the practice here, we intend to send these estimates to the estimates committee. Hon. members will there be able to ask all the questions which they say they have not a chance to ask in committee of supply, or that they do not feel like asking because they appear to be trivial and they do not want to hold up the house. They can ask all these questions and get the information they want, then when the item comes back to committee of supply we will have, as we always intended to have, a debate on item 1, such as we have always had; and that debate may very well be longer and more specific and better informed because of the preliminary discussions in the estimates committee.

That I thought was one of the most telling arguments in favour of this practice. Now we find that the opposition is hopelessly divided as to whether that ought to be done. The hon. member for Prince Albert for example wants to have the policy debate before these items go to the estimates committee. Well, if he has the debate before, I am sure he need not have one after. At any rate it is not the intention of the government to extend the time for consideration of the estimates.

The hon. member for Greenwood was less than enthusiastic about what we were proposing to do, as I understand him. In fact, if I were to judge his position—

Mr. Macdonnell: Hopeful.

Mr. Harris: —it would be that he had some genuine doubts as to the usefulness of the estimates committee or, alternatively, that he was afraid that ultimately this would lead to a diminution of the responsibilities of the committee of supply. If he did not think those things, there was no point in quoting Walter Elliot, who expressed great concern about the difference in the consideration of the estimates in the House of Commons at Westminster at the time he was speaking, and what it had been on former occasions. I would suppose that the hon. member for Greenwood does not share the view that this committee can add very much to the usefulness of the committee of supply. We all hope it will; we think it will. But I want to assure him, and I want to assure all hon. members—because I was surprised by the suspicions which appeared to be in their minds about our motives—that this motion is as a direct consequence of our repeated discussions on this subject of aiding in the consideration of the estimates, and in the work of the committee of supply.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister permit a question? Does he think it unnatural and unreasonable that on this side we should have thought, as I did, that the general pattern would be that which was followed with regard to external affairs? That was what I understood, and I would like to ask the minister if he thinks that was an unnatural and unreasonable understanding.

Mr. Harris: The estimates of the Department of External Affairs have been referred to the standing committee since the immediate post-war years. At that time it was the intention and the hope—and I think in the main the hope has been realized—that external affairs would remain an all-party consideration. That was the reason in the first instance it was possible to adopt the practice of sending those items on external affairs to the standing committee for further consideration. It was felt that external affairs, as a policy, was something that all parties ought to be involved in to the greatest possible extent, and that that in itself would lead to the committee extending its influence over matters of external affairs. But it was not considered at that time that a reference of the items to the standing committee would have any particular influence over the actions of the committee of supply. It was not requested that we should do what has been done for the purpose of simplifying debate in the House of Commons, in committee of supply, on external affairs estimates. It was for the purpose of a more general understanding of the policies of external affairs.

Now, over the course of two or three sessions, or perhaps three or four, one would suppose that he would get around to all the departments in the estimates committee. That is the intention, and I agree that hon. members opposite might find it convenient to consider a particular department next year or the year after which they would not want to have this year. I have no reason to suppose we shall not consult them about their convenience in this as we have in other matters.

However, as the hon. member for Kamloops indicated, we felt we were under an obligation to lay down a practice for this year by selecting the particular departments that have been mentioned. And just one word about that. We find the extraordinary situation of the hon. member for Prince Albert wanting to discuss the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and wanting to discuss it before it goes to the estimates committee and when it comes back, and the hon. member for Kamloops saying that is the one department that should not go to that committee.

It would not be confessing anything that is not known to the house if I pointed out that I was responsible for the policy of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration until recently. I am not unaware of the fact that the opposition, through the leader of that party, has demanded a royal commission with respect to immigration. And this government has no intention of granting that request. On the other hand it did seem to us that by offering this department to the estimates committee for the kind of consideration they say they have not been able to give it in committee of supply, we were doing everything short of that in accommodating them.

Mr. Churchill: It was just because of the lack of time in committee of supply. It was brought up on the last day.

Mr. Harris: I am prepared to speak about that, too, if my hon. friend wishes. It was not the last day; it was the last two days my hon. friends debated citizenship and immigration last summer.

Mr. Fulton: No, no.

Mr. Harris: Yes, yes.

Mr. Fulton: The Governor General's car was practically outside the door when you brought on your estimates.

Mr. Harris: We began our estimates Friday afternoon and completed them Saturday night, or perhaps it was Thursday afternoon and Friday night; I have forgotten which. And, Mr. Speaker, while I do not mean to go far afield in the matter of citizenship and immigration, I should point out that we have just gone through a long debate on the address, and I do not think there has been any reference of any significance to that department in any of the speeches made by my hon. friends opposite. However, it is the desire—it is my desire, and one can understand why it should be—that that department should go before the estimates committee for consideration, so we shall not have any further reference to my having left that department to the last two days of the last session for consideration.

I always like to listen to the hon. member for Prince Albert, and long ago I made up my mind I would not intervene when he was out of order because eventually he does come back to the point. He did speak at some length about the Auditor General and his comments in the public accounts report about some of our past activities. He made a great point of the fact that the C.B.C. had, as he said, defied the Auditor General in connection with a certain bookkeeping method. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what defiance is in his parlance, but the fact of the matter is that the Auditor General did make comments. It is true that those comments were not acted upon immediately, but I for one would expect that I should have time to consider a report of the Auditor General and devise something within the complaint he makes and within the administrative problems that I have to face. As the hon. member finally admitted, the wrong that he claims was done has now been rectified, and we need not be concerned about that in the future.

He also pointed out, and I think in a manner that would leave the impression that something wrong was being done, that the Auditor General had made certain other observations about practices in the C.B.C. and other crown companies. The very recitation of those things is an indication that no information has been withheld from the opposition. I have been astonished to find almost every speaker in the opposition suggesting that the purpose of the estimates committee which we are recommending to the house is a somewhat devious one on my part to bring about an easier passing of the estimates for which I am responsible.

I cannot imagine any sensible person believing them when they say that. I should have thought that if they complained that the present practice has worked to their disadvantage, the government, if it wanted it that way, would continue the present practice. On the other hand, as I said in my opening statement no government should ask parliament to pass almost $5 billion without the most careful scrutiny, consideration and intelligent criticism which can be given to it. In my capacity as Minister of Finance I think everyone will appreciate that if they could find a way of reducing the estimates, I would be particularly happy.

On that point, I notice the hon. member for Quebec South is not with us at the moment.

Some hon. Members: Yes, he is.

Mr. Harris: I beg your pardon. He was modest enough not to make any reference to his past, and of course I should not either; but I would like to point out that hon. members have not followed his practice very much in recent years, perhaps for reasons of their own. Some years ago the hon. member for Quebec South had occasion to move in the house that an item of the estimates be reduced. My recollection is that he carried that against the government of the day. That was the kind of activity which he considered at that time a private member ought to undertake in order to save the minister of finance something for his next budget.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister permit a question? Does the minister recall an occasion some five years ago when I did the same thing in connection with an item in the estimates of the Minister of Transport, and the Minister of Transport said it was a vote of non-confidence in the government? The whip was cracked and all hon. members opposite came in and voted down the reduction.

Mr. Harris: The house knows perfectly well my views about party activity in this house. It is the duty of the government to carry on the business of the country. It is the duty of the opposition to do their best to indicate the weaknesses in the policies being followed by the government; and if in accordance with that duty they can make motions in this house which would topple the government, then I think it is their duty to take that step.

On the other hand, my hon. friend asked me whether I am aware of what he tried to do. I confess I am. I recall the occasion, and certainly I would not suggest that he should not follow that course. If he tries to do it on my own estimates I shall try to defeat him, but I would be the first to admit his right to take the action he has indicated.

Mr. Fulton: Would the government regard it as a vote of non-confidence? There is not much chance of saving money if the government takes that attitude.

Mr. Harris: I think I have answered all the direct questions. However, I should comment on what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops. It will be noted that his opinion about the nature of this committee differs radically from that of others in his own party. He thinks in terms of a committee—and I understand the hon. member for Greenwood shares this view—economy-minded in the sense of trying to cut down the estimates by showing that all the money is not needed. On the other hand, I take it that other members of his party think not so much in terms of an economy measure as of an exploratory measure which would arm them with better information to debate policy. I am not going to say which of the two will result, because I am quite sure the committee will find by experience what is the best course to follow.

The point I am making is this. I am glad we circumscribed the activities of the committee in the first instance, so that it would know what to do. If hon. members choose to work in the committee, as I think they will, with the objectives in view that have been discussed today, they will find, after some time, what are the limits and what are the advantages of the committee, and they will be able to report to the house on details of the estimates in such a manner that the two main results I have mentioned will probably occur.

I would point out that at no time did I place the saving of time first. I said that the committee would give members, both on the committee and off the committee, more information so there would be more intelligent discussion in the committee of supply. When the estimates come back from the estimates committee it may well be that we shall not have the detailed cross-examination about a particular item, but that we shall have a longer policy debate than has been the case up to the present time. Most members of the opposition have expressed the desire that that should be so; that we should not waste the time of the committee of the whole on details.

I leave it to the committee, Mr. Speaker, to work it out. I think we should give them all the encouragement we can, and I hope that after not necessarily one year, but perhaps two or three years, we shall find that this committee is in fact functioning to the advantage of the taxpayers of Canada, both with respect to economy and greater criticism of policy which will be possible in the committee of supply.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit one question?

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister a question? The present resolution makes no reference, as do most similar resolutions and as the one above it on the order paper does, to further powers of the committee; for instance, that the committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to print from day to day its minutes of proceedings and evidence. Is it the thought of the minister that the committee shall or shall not have either or both of those powers?

Mr. Knowles: I was going to ask the same question.

Mr. Harris: I am glad to see there is some unanimity in the opposition. It is not the intention at this stage to give the committee power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Knowles: Why?

Mr. Harris: I have indicated the limits which I think ought to be observed for the time being as an experiment. With respect to the printing of the proceedings, of course if the committee recommends that to the house I am sure the house should carry it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fulton: With reservations.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REFERENCE TO REPORT OF NEAR ACCIDENT AT MOOSE JAW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the report of yet another incident near the Moose Jaw area on Friday last involving an R.C.A.F. Harvard and a late-flying Trans-Canada Air Lines plane, what steps, if any, has the department taken to try to avoid similar incidents in the future?

[Mr. Harris.]

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a report has been received by my department concerning an incident over the Moose Jaw area on Friday last, and it has been turned over to the R.C.A.F. which I understand has investigated the matter. I should like to add that I am hoping in the very near future to make a complete statement on the subject of safety in the air and the measures which my department has taken in this connection.

FLOODS

HUMBER VALLEY AUTHORITY—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister had an opportunity to study the urgent brief presented to him on January 31 by the Humber valley conservation authority arising chiefly as a result of "Hurricane Hazel", and could he inform the house approximately when the government might be in a position to indicate whether it is willing to participate in the plan proposed by the authority, and to what extent?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on January 31 I received a delegation from the Humber valley authority, from the Upper Thames authority, and from the Moira river authority. It was a joint delegation. They were accompanied by the chief engineer of the department of development of the government of Ontario. The three delegations made representations requesting federal government assistance under the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act. In the course of the discussion I asked for further data from the three delegations, which I have not yet received.

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORTED SALE OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE AIRLINES—RECOVERY OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) asked this question:

> Is the minister aware that Queen Charlotte Airlines of Vancouver has received an offer or offers of purchase substantially in excess of the asset value of the company, and is it the government's intention to attempt to recover part or all of the quarter of a million dollar subsidy paid to the said company in the last two years if the sale transaction is consummated?

I am informed that only after the interests concerned have reached agreement are arrangements for sale or purchase of airline companies submitted to the air transport board for approval. In the case of Queen Charlotte Airlines, no such agreement has been submitted and therefore I am not able to comment on the matter.

As far as the second part of the hon. member's question is concerned, the financial assistance granted to Queen Charlotte Airlines earlier was a subsidy and not a loan.

INQUIRY AS TO FLIGHTS FROM WINNIPEG TO COPENHAGEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In answer to a recent question of mine the minister indicated that the reason passengers for Copenhagen are not allowed to embark at Winnipeg via Scandinavian Airlines is because there are no reciprocal arrangements with Scandinavian Airlines. Can the minister now say why such reciprocal arrangements cannot be negotiated when the convenience and financial interest of Canadians resident in the mid-west might be advanced thereby?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I suggest the hon. member might put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I understand it is the wish that this question be put on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INTERNATIONAL RIVERS

PROVISION REQUIRING LICENCE FROM GOVERNMENT OF CANADA TO CONSTRUCT, OPERATE AND MAINTAIN ANY IMPROVEMENT

The house resumed, from Friday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in continuing this debate I wish to refer for a moment to a speech made in this house by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and some of the statements contained therein. I have since had an opportunity to read this speech, and I have found in his remarks things I did not expect to find from a speaker from the socialist ranks. However, in a report of a meeting which he attended in the city of Revelstoke on the night of January 5 I found a very good indication of what might be the socialist stand, and I would like to quote from the report of that speech:

> The Kaiser dam would yield the B.C. government a million dollars a year for 50 years, plus some percentage of power developed. The C.C.F. party objected to the Kaiser company having this right, because it was a private company.

That is the kind of statement I expect to hear from a socialist, and I respect any socialist who stands up for his convictions and expresses what he actually believes. But I was certainly disappointed when the hon. member made no reference whatsoever in this house to this attitude and, in fact, I have come to the conclusion that he made a statement here that might well have come from the other side of the house. However, there is one statement he made in Revelstoke with which I am in full agreement. The report reads as follows:

> "What is needed," Mr. Herridge said, "is a meeting of minds of the federal and provincial governments on this matter."

I agree with that 100 per cent, Mr. Speaker.

I now turn to the main features of this bill and some of the political aspects attributed to it in the press throughout the country. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver Province carrying the headline "Ottawa Will Stop It". Then follows the subheading "B.C.'s Kaiser Dam Project 'Cock-Eyed', says Howe". The report goes on to say:

> Trade minister C. D. Howe described the agreement between the B.C. government and the Kaiser interests in the United States for a storage dam without on-site power on the Arrow lakes as "a cock-eyed and improvement deal."

I do not like that word "improvement", and I believe possibly they mean "improvident"; but I am not going to correct the press, though it does not sound right. Nevertheless I cannot help but like that word "cockeyed". It shows that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is quite a human fellow after all, and that off the record and possibly on the spur of the moment he made this very human statement. However, I cannot agree with the thoughts behind that statement.

A little further on, discussing development projects in Canada with a newspaper man, he made it plain that this was one project which would not be realized in its present form if the federal government had anything to do with it. He also made it plain that Ottawa had a lot to do with it, and was confident that legislation now being drafted would block the Kaiser dam plan. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is definite proof of the claim I made that this bill is nothing more or less than a political measure.

I am also going to put on record a couple of cases which I think are similar, and in which the action was not questioned, or disallowed. In fact there seemed to be no reason why any action should have been taken by the federal government toward the British Columbia government of that day. When the West Kootenay Power and Light Company made application for additional storage of water at Kootenay lake, a part of the Columbia river system, the international joint commission agreed that this was desirable in order to firm up power downstream. In this case "downstream", of course, is in Idaho in the United States of America. In this instance the federal government, knowing full well that the province of British Columbia would get no financial return for the extra storage, —and I would ask hon. members to remember that; no financial return—endorsed the plan.

Mr. Byrne: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Let him finish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. McLeod: The federal government endorsed the plan. With the Kaiser dam, built for the same purposes, British Columbia will be recompensed. Yet the federal government reverses its stand and says that British Columbia is "giving away her water resources".

There was yet another instance, Mr. Speaker. In the case of the Skagit river development for the benefit of the people of Seattle, also across the line, the international joint commission approved the flooding of British Columbia territory. The attitude of the international joint commission was to the effect that the Skagit project was desirable, subject to mutual agreement arranged and approved by the province of British Columbia and the city of Seattle, the only two parties at that time figuring in the transaction. According to the dominion government, as there was no objection they were the only two parties that had the right to take part in this transaction. Again it should be noted that the province of British Columbia received no material benefit from this development.

I can see no difference between the storage that will take place as a result of this Kaiser dam or Castlegar dam, call it what you will, and these two cases that I have mentioned. Therefore the only thing I can do is to ask this question: Why has this government reversed its stand on this particular occasion? Why are they objecting to a storage dam or to the raising of water for use downstream across the line in this particular instance while they have been letting it go by and taking no action whatever in past years?

Since coming into this house this session—to deal a little bit more with the political build-up—I have noticed quite a few questions on the order paper seeking information as to correspondence and so on that has passed between the British Columbia government and the federal government in this connection. The whole idea seems to be to place the provincial government in a rather poor light. They are being put on the defensive. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that had there been any legislation making it necessary for the British Columbia government to come to Ottawa for consent before taking on this project the need for this bill would not exist. I am therefore making the statement that there was no reason for the British Columbia government to ask the government of Canada if they could do this because there was no legislation to prevent it, and because they had a precedent in these two other cases I have mentioned.

There is one other point that concerns me possibly more than this one. That is the matter of interference with provincial rights. In my estimation, Mr. Speaker, this is a further step in the centralization in the government at Ottawa of power and control over the destinies of the Canadian people from one side of Canada to the other. In this case it is true that it refers to only one natural resource. Many hon. members may wonder when we speak of water as being a natural resource, but in the case of British Columbia it is certainly our greatest natural resource. If we have a federal government that can interfere with a resource of this nature, which we believe is entirely the property of the people of the province of British Columbia and therefore entirely within the jurisdiction of the government put into Victoria by the people of British Columbia, let us just stop and think what further action could be taken at any time this central government should see fit to take it.

I maintain that the people of British Columbia are well able to look after their own affairs. They have proved it in the past. Governments have been toppled and governments again may be toppled, but I am going to say this: I believe that the place to fight out the merits or demerits of the Kaiser dam is in the province of British Columbia; and I believe that the fighting should be done by the people of British Columbia, not by any citizens down here in Ottawa.

I am strongly in favour of the settlement of disputes by conference. I mentioned that fact in an earlier debate in this house, and

I can only reiterate it at this time. In order to avoid this head-on collision which I mentioned here on Friday and which was prophesied by a minister of the crown, why is it not a logical thing for the representatives of the province of British Columbia and the representatives of the Dominion of Canada to get together and discuss this matter around the conference table? What I say is this. Forget political affairs. Divorce politics entirely from the question and put it on nothing more or less than a straight business basis.

In the past there have been difficulties over this matter of federal-provincial relations. We have an outstanding dispute going on at the present time. I am not going to interfere in that dispute because, as I said on that question a year ago, I believe the dispute between the province of Quebec and the government of Canada is strictly a family affair and it is up to the rest of Canada to keep out of it. I will say the same thing with regard to this particular dispute. I say that it is between the government of the province of British Columbia, administering the affairs of that province in the interests of its people, and the government of Canada; and I say that it is up to these two disputants to get together and iron out their difficulties.

As I said on Friday night—and I repeat it—I am positive that the premier of our province and his advisers would be glad to come to Ottawa. I do not think they would ask that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) come to a city in British Columbia. I am satisfied that they would come to Ottawa to discuss this problem in order to arrive at an amicable solution.

I think it was yesterday—I had been out of the house for a few minutes—when on coming in I found that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had the floor speaking in another debate. Honestly, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that he was presenting a much better argument against interference with provincial rights than I could, but I was rather surprised to find that he was not dealing with Bill No. 3 at all. However, I am going to quote a few of the remarks made in that debate by the Minister of Justice. As found at page 904 of Hansard of February 7 he said:

> New members have not been in this house very long before they become acquainted with the fact that the mere relationship between the central government and the provincial governments in our Canadian federal system of governments are themselves notoriously difficult.

He was referring to the problem of superimposing a bill of rights and so on; and then, in speaking of the set-up that has been inherited from the constitution of Great Britain, he said that its main feature was the sovereignty of its legislative bodies. He was referring to the provincial governments. I would respectfully request that the Minister of Justice take the rest of the cabinet ministers to one side and expound to them very thoroughly and clearly some of the statements he made in the house in favour of provincial autonomy and the sovereignty of provincial governments. Hon. members will recall that the motion then before the house was talked out, but I could not help but notice the words spoken by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) near the end of the discussion. These are the words—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member intending to refer to a debate which was concluded yesterday or the day before?

Mr. McLeod: I should like to quote these words—

Mr. Blackmore: It is not yet concluded.

Mr. Low: It is not concluded.

Mr. McLeod: —uttered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when speaking at the United Nations. He said:

> I wish to make it clear here . . . that, in regard to any rights which are defined in this document, the federal government of Canada does not intend to invade other rights which are also important to the people of Canada. By this I mean the rights of the provinces under our federal constitution.

In a few words our Secretary of State for External Affairs put forward as plain an argument as can be put, and I refer particularly to his words:

> By this I mean the rights of the provinces under our federal constitution.

All I am asking is that the government take these words to heart and, before there is too much conflict of interest and ill will created over this flagrant invasion of provincial rights, do something to see that a serious head-on collision does not take place.

I should also like to say a word or two to every member of the house. This bill is more important than a lot of us think, and its tentacles are more far-reaching than any of us may envision. I ask every member of the house, regardless of party affiliation, to study the bill carefully, for I say it is the thin edge of a wedge that can be used in many ways to interfere in the internal economy of any province of Canada at any time the central government sees fit to do so. I would urge that that feature be given very careful consideration.

Finally I wish to refer to another statement that has been made with respect to this legislation. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) referred to this proposed legislation as a club at the head of the British Columbia government. A club in the hands of an adversary, Mr. Speaker, is a fair weapon. It is a weapon you can see, a weapon you can protect yourself against, a weapon you can do something about. But what can you do when the government of this country, setting itself up as the supreme authority, takes political action and endeavours to pass legislation that will take away from a province rights which we believe we are entitled to under the British North America Act?

This is something worse than a club. It is a political weapon—and I cannot help repeating that because it is so very important—being forged by the government to thwart the British Columbia government in the administration of its affairs and embarrass it in the conduct of its business. It is a direct infringement of the rights of the sovereign legislative body of the province of British Columbia.

I am not going into the mechanics of the proposed Kaiser dam, which has been mentioned in the debate so often. I can only say, as I said before, that I am satisfied that the people of British Columbia are able to judge the merits of matters that relate to them and to them only; and I believe if any government, whether it be Social Credit, Liberal or C.C.F., at any time thwarts the will of the people of British Columbia it will receive the same treatment which the late Liberal government of that province received in 1952.

On motion of Mr. Byrne the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow of course is private members' day. On Thursday we shall continue this debate, then take Bill No. 4, and then the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the Canada Grain Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 9, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

HEALTH GRANTS, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte):

Has any assistance been given to the province of New Brunswick under the national health grants program to provide for expanded laboratory services for the testing of public supplies of milk and water?

Mr. Robertson:

Yes. As a part of the over-all program for the support of expanded laboratory services in New Brunswick, federal assistance has been given under the national health grants program for public health laboratory services in the established laboratories of the province where the testing of public supplies of milk and water is being carried out.

The latest project approved was in January, 1955, when $4,471 was approved to assist in the further extension of laboratory services for the testing of public supplies of milk and water.

LUMBER TRANSPORT LICENCES, BANFF NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Johnston (Bow River):

1. How many licences or permits have been issued during 1954 and 1955, to (a) residents living between Donald station and Wasa station; (b) non-residents living between Donald station and Wasa station, of the Columbia river valley in British Columbia, and others, for the purpose of transporting lumber over highways in Banff national park?
2. To whom were such licences or permits issued?

Mr. Lesage:

1. (a) Approximately 225; (b) nil.

2. No record available.

Note: Under order in council P.C. 1953-1612 of October 21, 1953, authority was granted for the issuance of transient motor licences for trucks owned by residents of the Columbia river valley between Donald station and Wasa station, B.C., for the purpose of carrying lumber and other produce from the said area across the trans-Canada highway in Banff and Yoho national parks and the Banff-Windermere highway in Kootenay national park during the months of November and December 1953 and January, February and March 1954. Similar authority for November and December 1954 and January, February and March 1955 was granted by P.C. 1954-1591 of October 19, 1954.

National parks records have not separated the trucks carrying lumber from those carrying other produce and the figures for licences given in answer to question 1 (a) is therefore an estimate. Almost all of these licences covered single return trips and it is probable that not more than about 25 different persons or firms were involved. The total number of licences issued under authority of the two orders in council during January, February and March, November and December of 1954, and up to January 24, 1955 was 362 which covered both lumber and other produce. During the period in question no records were kept of the names of those persons to whom licences were issued. They were issued to drivers of trucks by park authorities on production of satisfactory evidence that the trucks were owned by residents or established firms in the area.

DEFENCE CONTRACTS BY PROVINCES

Mr. Hahn:

What were the totals of all defence contracts let in each province in Canada, during each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954?

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with this question orally, if I may. At various times in the past questions such as this have been placed on the order paper by hon. members, and the minister, the former parliamentary assistant, and I have explained to the house why it is not feasible to table an answer. The most recent statement of this position was made on January 28, 1953, and appears at page 1397 of Hansard when I quoted from a previous statement of the minister as follows:

> A question has been raised as to why we do not publish figures showing the value of projects placed in the various provinces. The simple answer, which I have given on several occasions, is that we see no value in giving such figures inasmuch as they in no way reflect the impact of the defence program on the various sectors of the country. They do not take into account the large proportion of subcontracting which is inherent in this type of work. They make no allowance for the source of raw materials going into the contracts, and in many cases they are misleading because contracts placed at head offices in Ottawa or Montreal are often carried out in company plants which may be located as far away as the east coast or the west coast.

This explanation applies directly to the present question. I should also point out that full information regarding the letting of unclassified contracts over $10,000 is made public by the publication every two weeks of complete lists of contracts awarded. This information is, of course, available to all hon. members.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—MEAT

Mr. Fulton:

1. What was the total cost of meat and meat products contracted for by the Department of Defence Production, during the fiscal years 1953-54 and 1954-55 to date?

2. What are the names of the firms to whom these contracts were let, and the total value of the purchases from each, in these years?

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I ask that this question be dropped without prejudice to the right to replace it at a later date in a somewhat different form?

Mr. Speaker: Question dropped.

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ON FEED GRAINS

Mr. Pommer:

What were the amounts paid out by the federal treasury on freight assistance on western feed grains shipped to (a) British Columbia; (b) Ontario; (c) Quebec; (d) maritime provinces, for each of the years from October 1, 1941 to 1954 inclusive?

Mr. McCubbin:

Amounts paid out in freight assistance on western feed grains for each year from October 1941 to December 31, 1954.

Year	British Columbia	Ontario	Quebec	Maritime Provinces
1941	$ 135,096.06	$ 764,302.50	$ 720,721.68	$ 289,413.10
1942	996,218.08	3,319,231.50	3,851,573.60	1,824,159.00
1943	1,432,696.28	6,518,142.00	5,523,277.30	2,767,969.70
1944	1,722,957.08	5,862,208.50	5,926,703.44	2,667,629.80
1945	1,758,328.51	6,191,145.00	6,117,941.48	2,758,782.30
1946	2,017,065.28	6,738,853.50	7,025,075.96	3,223,229.50
1947	2,182,894.98	7,446,339.00	7,314,739.32	3,096,645.30
1948	1,806,918.91	6,445,528.15	7,055,225.10	3,019,535.90
1949	1,503,139.89	5,419,655.16	6,591,132.47	2,734,637.04
1950	1,296,189.28	4,785,376.52	6,845,156.36	2,986,867.68
1951	1,567,955.83	4,374,333.27	7,191,326.67	3,107,528.25

CANCER RESEARCH

Mrs. Shipley:

Aside from the assistance given under the national health grants program, is the Department of National Health and Welfare engaged at the present time or is it planning to engage in any aspects of cancer research?

Mr. Robertson: Yes. Two years ago the Department of National Health and Welfare established at its laboratory of hygiene a tissue culture section, with the objective of studying the growth of normal and cancer cells outside the body. It was felt that such a program would help to fill the need, expressed by many investigators, for more specific knowledge on the growth and behaviour of body cells. Cancer is considered to be some form of abnormal cell growth and so it was felt that by undertaking these studies new facts might be discovered and thus provide new clues for other investigators in the cancer field. Since this type of research is of a long-term nature it can well be undertaken in the laboratories of the Department of National Health and Welfare in order to provide stability and continuity to the study. This program is now proceeding satisfactorily, and it is expected that it will prove to be a useful contribution on the part of the department to the conquering of this disease.

CROWN COMPANIES

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many crown companies are operated by the government?
2. What are their names?
3. Where is each located?
4. What was the indebtedness of each on December 31, 1954?

Mr. Pinard: If I may, I should like to answer this question orally. I should like to inform the hon. gentleman that this information is contained in volume II of the Public Accounts of Canada as issued by the Department of Finance, which contains the financial statements of all the crown corporations.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

Mr. Fulton:

1. Does the dominion government have any information with regard to the proposal for a conference to be held in Ottawa in May, 1955, by the Canadian good roads association on the general subject of highway safety?

2. If so, has the government or any department or agency thereof been invited to attend or to send a representative to the conference, and if so, is it planned to attend accordingly?

3. Is the dominion government or any department or agency thereof actively assisting in preparations for this conference, and if so, in what way?

4. If the government is not participating in any way in the conference, what steps does it propose to take, in conjunction with the provinces and/or other interested organizations, with respect to promoting a campaign for increasing safety on Canadian highways?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Yes, there has been informal liaison between the Canadian Good Roads Association and the Minister of Public Works.

2. Yes.

3. The Canadian Good Roads Association has been informed that representatives of the Department of Public Works will participate in preparing the agenda and will attend the conference.

4. Answered by No. 3.

CIVIL SERVICE—SUGGESTION AWARD PLAN

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Since the "suggestion award plan" for the civil service was adopted November 28, 1952, how many suggestions for making savings or improving efficiency have been received?

2. What is the amount of money actually saved, so far, as a result of these proposals?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. 5,800.

2. While a number of suggestions are still under investigation, 243 suggestions have been implemented which have resulted in an estimated savings of $71,649.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—VIRUS LABORATORY

Mr. Studer:

What are the major functions of the new virus laboratory of the Department of National Health and Welfare which was recently opened in Ottawa?

Mr. Robertson:

The new virus laboratory will serve as—(a) a centre for the provincial departments of health in providing their laboratories with standardized reagents for the diagnosis of virus diseases in man; (b) a reference laboratory to the provinces, for the identification of uncommon strains of viruses, for which difficult technical procedures are required; (c) a regional centre for the world health organization and in this connection will carry out identification of virus strains from current virus epidemics, such as influenza and poliomyelitis; (d) a training centre for members of provincial laboratories who wish to specialize in virus diagnostic methods.

The virus laboratory will also provide facilities for the testing and control of materials in the virus field under the terms of the Food and Drugs Act. For example, the poliomyelitis vaccine now being produced at the Connaught medical research laboratories is being retested in the virus laboratory as a means of re-ensuring the safety of the product.

QUEBEC INCOME TAX

Mr. Argue:

1. What is the estimated revenue for 1954 resulting from the personal income tax levied by the province of Quebec?

2. What is the estimated loss of revenue represented by a 10 per cent reduction in federal income tax in (a) Quebec; (b) each of the other provinces?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. The minister of finance for the province of Quebec, in his budget speech given on February 3, 1955, estimated the personal income tax levied by the province of Quebec would yield $25 million in the fiscal year 1954-55.

2. On the basis of collections of personal income tax in 1953-54, the last year for which collection statistics are available, a 10 per cent reduction in federal income tax would result in a revenue loss as follows: (a) $28·4 million; (b) Newfoundland, $1·2 million; Prince Edward Island, $0·2 million; Nova Scotia, $2·1 million; New Brunswick, $1·9 million; Ontario, $62·3 million; Manitoba, $6·0 million; Saskatchewan, $4·7 million; Alberta, $8·1 million; British Columbia, $12·7 million.

CEREBRAL PALSY

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf):

Is any assistance being given by the federal government towards the care of children with cerebral palsy?

Mr. Robertson:

Yes. Last year the national health grants program provided $150,000 under the crippled children's grant to assist in the provision of treatment services for children with cerebral palsy in Quebec, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

An additional $110,000 was given under the same grant to assist centres in Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia in treating children with cerebral palsy and with other crippling conditions.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—SAFETY MEASURES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Do Trans-Canada Air Lines planes approaching the Moose Jaw area normally contact the Royal Canadian Air Force station control tower, in order to permit the authorities to alert military planes?

2. Do Trans-Canada Air Lines delayed flights approaching the Moose Jaw area notify the Royal Canadian Air Force station control tower?

3. If not, has such a step been considered as a safety measure to prevent future air collisions?
4. Have the responsible authorities considered requesting Trans-Canada Air Lines planes to increase their altitude from 6,000 feet to 7,000 or 8,000 feet over training areas, where Harvard or similar planes ordinarily would not be flying?
5. Have the authorities considered asking Trans-Canada Air Lines to illuminate the exterior of their planes more clearly on night flights, as a safety measure?

Mr. Pinard: Return tabled.

INCOME TAX BRANCH—CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many chartered accountants are employed by the government in the income tax department?
2. Who are they and where are they located?

STRIKES AND SICKNESS—DAYS LOST

Mr. Boisvert:

How many working days were lost in Canada in 1952, 1953 and 1954 on account of (a) strikes; (b) sickness?

REMISSION OF TAXES

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Did any of the following firms receive remission of taxes in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954: (a) Aluminum Company of Canada Limited; (b) Gatineau Power Company; (c) Saguenay Power Company Limited; (d) the Bell Telephone Company?
2. If so, what was the amount in each case?
3. What was the reason for the remission in each case?
4. Under what authority were these remissions made?

REMISSIONS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Did the following firms receive any remissions of customs and excise duties and taxes, during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954: (a) Atlantic Sugar Refineries Limited, Montreal; (b) Caland Ore Company Limited, Steep Rock, Ontario; (c) Ford Motor Company of Canada; (d) Iron Ore Company of Canada, Montreal; (e) Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company, Toronto?
2. If so, what was the amount in each case?
3. What was the reason for the remission in each case?
4. Under what authority were these remissions made?

MENTAL HEALTH GRANTS

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What is the total amount of federal grants made available for mental health activities in Canada?
2. How is this money distributed between the various provinces?
3. What is the total cost of mental health programs in Canada?
4. What is the breakdown in the expenditure of this money as between (a) provincial hospitals; (b) psychiatric clinics (private and public); (c) rest homes; (d) preventive work?

[Mr. Thatcher.]

DIETHYLSTILBESTROL

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Is the importation into Canada of diethylstilbestrol in any form permitted?
2. If so, what quantities have been imported since January 1, 1953?
3. By whom were the imports made, and under whose authority were permits issued?

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD

Mr. Pommer:

1. By years and by provinces since 1950, how many loans were made by the Canadian farm loan board?
2. In this period how many loans were paid up?
3. How many are outstanding?

Mr. Benidickson: Return tabled.

P.F.R.A.-P.F.A.A. EMPLOYEES, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Argue:

1. What are the names and addresses of all persons employed in Saskatchewan in 1954 under (a) the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; (b) the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?
2. What sum of money was paid to each of these persons as (a) salary or wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

QUEEN ELIZABETH HOTEL, MONTREAL

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any communications, memoranda or briefs received by the government, dated at any time since August 1, 1954, from or on behalf of any organizations, relating to the proposal to lease the new Queen Elizabeth hotel, in Montreal, to the Hilton Hotel chain of the United States.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—BUILDING SUPPLIES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memos of telephone conversations, in connection with the purchase of lumber and building material and supplies required by the Indian affairs branch in the city of Prince Albert and northern Saskatchewan, in the areas comprised in the federal constituencies of The Battlefords, Meadow Lake and Humboldt-Melfort, during the year 1954, and in particular, a copy of all letters sent to lumber or supply companies, wherein an opportunity to tender was given, and a copy of all tenders or contract offers for lumber and building material and supplies that were made to the department.

Mr. Pickersgill: This motion quite obviously asks for all letters, telegrams, memos of telephone conversations and so forth which, if they existed, would in most cases be documents passing between members of the department which are always understood to be privileged documents. There could of course be no objection to going through all the files and looking for any letters from outsiders addressed to the department and no objection to producing them if the hon. member insists upon it. There would be no objection to providing a copy of all letters sent to lumber or supply companies if the hon. gentleman insists, though it might take some considerable time to look through the various files to make sure they were all covered. Of course we would be very glad to provide a copy of all successful tenders. If, with suitable modifications such as I have suggested, I could meet the hon. member's wishes, I should be very glad to do so, but if there were any insistence upon privileged documents being produced I am afraid the motion would have to be opposed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is carried subject to the reservation made by the minister.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MARKING OF TOYS WITH NAME OF COUNTRY OF ORIGIN

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor) raised a question with respect to the marking of imported toys with the country of origin and asked whether I had received complaints from Canadian toy manufacturers that the marking regulations were not being observed. In reply I should like to inform the hon. member that there is at present no marking requirement with respect to imported toys.

Representations have been received periodically for the application of marking regulations to toys, but it is quite a complicated matter because of the extensive variety of toys capable of importation, at least some of which could be practically prohibited importation because of insistence upon this requirement. The department already has the matter under study and it will continue to receive most careful consideration.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO ENABLE ALL QUALIFIED ELECTORS TO USE FRANCHISE

On the order:

Mr. McIvor—The following proposed resolution —That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the elections act so as to enable all qualified electors to use their franchise in federal elections.

Mr. Speaker: I see that there is a resolution on the order paper preceding a bill to be introduced by the Secretary of State having to do with what is contemplated in this motion. Therefore the motion will have to be withdrawn from the order paper.

Education

EDUCATION

EQUALIZING OF OPPORTUNITY—ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of taking steps to relieve the financial crisis in education, without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I need not attempt to impress upon the house the importance of education nor need I attempt to impress upon the house the need of having a high standard of education in Canada. Neither shall I attempt in my own words to define education, but I should like to quote the words of the essayist, Joseph Addison, who defined education in this way:

Education is a companion which no misfortune can depress, no crisis can destroy, no enemy can alienate, no despotism can enslave. At home a friend, abroad an introduction; in solitude a solace and in society an ornament. It chastens vice, it guides virtue, it gives, at once, grace and government to genius. Without it, what is man? A splendid slave, a reasoning savage.

These words were written about 1700, but I submit that they apply equally well today. This is not the first time that I have debated such a resolution as this in the house, but I intend today to use a somewhat different approach because what I have said before has been recorded many times in the records and it is there for anyone who cares to read.

Let me say at the outset that I advocate nothing here today which would in any way interfere with provincial jurisdiction over the administration or curriculum of education within the provinces. Let me say emphatically that I believe in complete control over education by the provinces, that each province shall set up within its own boundaries such a system of education as its people desire, and that it shall administer it in terms of the constitution without interference from outside. Believing this, and making a plea for federal aid, I have inserted in the body of the resolution itself the words, "without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field." With respect to previous debates I should like to give a quotation or two.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member allow me to interrupt him in order to ask all hon. members to remain as silent as possible. It is very difficult for a member to speak to his resolution when there is so much noise in the house. I am sure that hon. members will want to co-operate.

Education

Mr. Knight: The first extract is one taken from a speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on October 19, 1949, as found at page 946 of Hansard, in which he said:

> I am sure all hon. members have welcomed this opportunity of focusing their attention upon this assertion, one which certainly appeals to each and every one of us, that there should be across Canada the greatest possible degree of equality of opportunity for the education of our young Canadians, the Canadians of the next generation.

Since I am making this plea, in the nature of things, Mr. Speaker, to a Liberal government, I should like to use as my next quotation one from a speech by a distinguished member of the Liberal party, no less a person than the premier of Manitoba, Hon. Douglas Campbell, when speaking at the federal-provincial conference in 1950. He said:

> Education is a subject which is of fundamental national concern because it far transcends the interest of any local community that the utmost use should be made of all our human resources, and that no child should be penalized as to the education which is available to him merely because he happens to live in one part of Canada rather than another. We therefore strongly advocate that the federal government should accept responsibility for a substantial part of the cost of education.

If I may, in all humility, add my own words to those of greater men, may I say that the birthright of every child is a minimum standard of education, based not upon the wealth of the parent or the local school district or even of the province but upon the wealth and resources of the whole nation. I hope, sir, and I believe that we are entering upon an era of peace. Even if we are not to be engaged in active war, even if we may be able to make some rents in the "curtains" that divide the peoples of the world and permit again free intercommunication and perhaps some trade, we shall be involved in a struggle of ideas. In that struggle the quality and universality of education in our own country may be an important factor. Given that, and given time, I think the ideas of freedom and democracy will ultimately prevail.

Perhaps we should consider education for a moment from that point of view. Such an examination will not justify any smugness upon our part. In my opinion we are falling steadily behind some of the other countries in the commonwealth of nations. Comparatively speaking, we have created no great Canadian literature, nor indeed are we a nation of great readers. Smugness might incline us to think that perhaps those with whom we differ ideologically are illiterate.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I refer you now to a startling article by Mr. Burke Stannard in the Financial Post of December 18 in which he says:

> In 1918 Russia had one university for every 1½ millions of its population, Canada had one for every 315,000. Today—

Not very many years afterwards.

> —Russia has one university student for every 150 population; Canada has one for every 250. We might well inquire as to just what is holding up Canadian progress.

He answers his own question by saying, and I quote in part:

> Personally, I believe the financial barrier to be the one which keeps the enrolment low.

Then he says the significant fact is that government support is not rising as rapidly as university costs. Two educators were asked to make some comment on this particular article. One was Dr. R. C. Wallace, whose recent decease has been such a loss to education and indeed to this country generally. The opening words of his comment were, and I quote:

> The situation calls for additional scholarship assistance as well as additional grants to the universities.

Dr. F. Cyril James, the principal of McGill University, while advocating the need for scholarships said it would be necessary for each scholarship to carry with it the payment to the university attended by the student of a supplementary grant. These men speak from the university viewpoint. Since in this resolution I am rather considering the quality of education for the great masses of the public, my first plea to the government would be for the provision of a more generous scale of scholarships from national funds. Personally, I would request that in the granting a greater emphasis should be laid on the humanities. I contend, with all due deference to the technical and scientific specialists, that such studies in the humanities are the basis and foundation of any liberal education.

I am going to make another suggestion in the interests of education. Perhaps it is less important and perhaps I should not spend the time on it, but it is this idea. I heard of an unfortunate case where some applicants for posts, perhaps administrative, in the civil service were turned down with a great deal of scorn by certain members of the employing agency—I do not know whether or not it was the civil service commission—and were told that was not the type of education needed for this job. I am going to suggest to the government that, in the employment of civil servants, and goodness knows there is no place in the country where we can better use well educated men, they keep a long list of young men trained in the humanities.

The names for such a list could be obtained through competitive examination or from the heads of universities. The government could enable these men to proceed further with their education through government scholarships so that they could qualify themselves for the particular jobs for which the government needed them.

From my early youth, I recall there were appointments to be made to the consular service in Britain. A competitive examination was set up open to all students within the British Empire of a certain age. The top half dozen candidates in this examination were selected for a two-year scholarship at Cambridge to continue their studies, largely in the languages but generally in the subjects which they would need. I would suggest to the government that would be a good method to adopt here and might give us some of the best brains in the country, whose training would have been in the humanities rather than in the sciences, and who might with further training fit into a niche suitable to themselves and with benefit to the country as a whole.

For a long time Britain has recognized the need of such scholarships. Mr. Kenneth Lindsay, who was parliamentary secretary to the board of education in Britain from 1937 to 1940, a man with a long career in both government and education, stated recently as reported in Saturday Night of January 22:

> At the university level we have a system of grants so extensive that there is nothing like it anywhere else.

He was referring, of course, to Britain. He stated that 75 per cent of the university students there are receiving grants from the state. The basis of entrance is entirely on merit, a fact which keeps down wastage. We all know there is no point in training people if they have not the ability to absorb such training. I quote again from Mr. Lindsay:

> About 60 per cent of all British universities' money comes from the state through the university grants committee which gives something like 20 million pounds per year, with no questions asked.

My next plea to the government in the interests of education is that it proceed forthwith to set up the Canada Council, as recommended by the Massey commission. Not long ago the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke in this city to a group of educators interested in the humanities. I was fortunate enough to receive an invitation to attend the meetings. In a very fine speech during one of our evening sessions the Prime Minister, with his usual caution, the caution which one can understand since it is the corollary of responsibility, did not commit himself to the setting up of that council but he did by his speech inspire hope in the breasts of those who heard him that such action would be taken at this session. Certainly those who were interested were keenly disappointed to learn there was no mention of it in the speech from the throne.

I do not know whether or not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) had anything to do with putting the brake on the wheels of progress in that particular case, but he can answer for himself or to his own conscience. Canada is slowly and gradually emerging, Mr. Speaker, from the feeling of inferiority which has always bedevilled us in literature and the other arts. Perhaps our pioneer preoccupation with primitive things, or perhaps our progress towards our own independence and our progress in material wealth, has been so swift that our appreciation of Canada's greatness and the capabilities of her people has not kept pace. We, ourselves, are at last discovering that there is as much drama in the lives of native Canadians as a basis for literature as there is in other people's lives.

Our artists are beginning at last to realize that there is as much beauty in a prairie sunset or in the Quebec woods as there is in a European scene which it was once conventional to portray upon a canvas. And I pay my tribute here to the great advance made by French-Canadian culture. Investments in the promotion of Canadian arts, such as I suggest, would add to the enjoyment, the education and the culture of all Canadian people.

And now I come to my third request—and it is really the meat of my resolution. I had thought once of spending my whole time upon it, because I am well aware that there are a good many new members who have come to the house since I last spoke on the subject and since the last debate upon it occurred. But I would tell them that it is all on Hansard—and that it has been there for the last six or eight years. While I have not time to go into it in too much detail today, I shall take whatever time Mr. Speaker will allow me.

My request is for more support from the consolidated revenue fund of this country to the provinces for the support of such programs in general education as the provinces themselves desire to maintain. There should be some degree of equality of opportunity in education for all Canadian children, irrespective of the province from which they come, and irrespective of the economic status of their parents—and the last is very important. We know that high school education, while free in the sense that people do not have to pay fees for it, is not in fact free. There are such things as clothes and books, and members of large families who must go out to support others who are younger than themselves, and who are growing up.

There are many children who, through circumstances over which they have no control, are underprivileged in the matter of education. In the financial educational structure of Canada we want stability. When economic disaster comes in the form of a failure in the wheat crop, or floods, or any other circumstances of that kind, we do not want education to be the first casualty, as it usually is. And that is certainly true in times of war.

And may I say to some of my friends who like to turn this into a political dispute, who sneer and ask questions about the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan, and all that sort of thing, that sincerely, so far as I am concerned, there is no political element whatsoever in this resolution. I move it simply in what I believe to be the interests of Canadian children. And I have not in mind the children in my own province any more than I have in mind the children of New Brunswick, Quebec, Alberta, or whatever province one may choose.

In view of the history of this country one can understand the fears held by some that federal aid might somehow imply or involve federal control. Well, one can understand that view; and one can understand, too, how politicians could have some success in promoting that fear for their own purposes. But for such fear in my opinion there is not the slightest shred of justification. The technique of federal grants in aid, without federal control, has already been well established. Consider the Agricultural Instruction Act, the Technical Education Act, the Youth Training Act, the Vocational Training Coordination Act, all providing financial assistance for education, without any control. Is there anyone in this house bold enough to get up and say that any federal control has been exerted in any of these spheres?

And then there are national research scholarships, D.V.A. university grants, direct grants to universities, grants to the research council for university research, the training of cadets at colleges, the maintenance of the education board of the bureau of statistics. And, by the way, while we are talking about constitutional matters, how about federal aid in matters of provincial control for family allowances, or the national health program? I am not objecting to it, and I do not think anybody else is.

Perhaps I should explain what I mean by equality of educational opportunity. I remember one hon. member in one of the debates who certainly did not understand it. I suppose it is easier to say what it is not than to say what it is. It is not in any degree equality of education. It is not uniformity or standardization of education—for the first is impossible, human nature being what it is, and the second would certainly be undesirable and, if possible, would imply a control to which I personally, and everyone I know, would be opposed.

The idea of equality of opportunity is simply an attempt to give every Canadian child as good a chance to obtain an education as any other Canadian child. In my opinion that is his birthright in a civilized and democratic country.

It is not equality but inequality which prevails now, and its cause is almost entirely financial. The financial problem manifests itself in many ways, among others a shortage of teachers—and we see this all around us —inadequately trained teachers, which we see in evidence everywhere, the lowering of standards, the lack of buildings and equipment, overcrowded classrooms, lack of transportation in outlying districts, unequal distribution of wealth as between provinces and districts and, in some places, a complete lack of educational facilities.

I have tried to avoid using statistics in this speech, but I would recommend for the reading of members in the house two reports which are the result of intensive research into this whole matter, and where comparisons as between province and province may be found. I refer to one report compiled by the Canadian teachers federation in December 1953, entitled "Educational Finance in Canada", and a report prepared by Dr. LaZerte under the sponsorship of the Canadian school trustees association, a body which I may add is completely in favour of federal aid.

We have reached almost an impasse in education in Canada. Education has always been almost entirely a charge upon real property. Well, I submit that cow has been milked dry. The municipalities, in desperation for funds, turn to the provinces, some of which at least have increased their grants, and most of which have reached the end of their ability to pay more.

The basis of taxation for general education must be broadened. I have seldom heard of bachelors or childless couples complaining about assessments for purposes of education of the children of others. And I have a better opinion of my fellow Canadians than to think that the wealthier provinces would complain if some of the funds they contribute to the consolidated revenue fund were used for grants to ensure education for the underprivileged children in other and less fortunate provinces.

This is a matter of vital public concern. Hundreds of organizations throughout the country have endorsed federal aid. I have not time to list them, but I do have a list a foot high. The only difficulty opposed to it is a political one, and that is based upon an unreasoning fear that somehow federal aid would imply federal control, and might involve interference with provincial jurisdiction or minority rights, a supposition I emphatically deny. However, I have already dealt with that phase of the subject.

The press of the country is full of articles setting out the difficulties faced in the educational system. I have before me a dozen or more clippings taken from the press in the last week or two. I find in one, for instance, that we are unable to train a sufficient number of Canadian teachers. I find that Ontario and Saskatchewan—and there may be other provinces—have actually been importing teachers from Great Britain. There may be good features in that. I know I favour the idea of exchange of teachers as between provinces and countries, but here is a compulsory one. While it may have its good features, I suggest to you that it is a sad commentary on our own system of training our teachers. What a blow to our national pride! This great country is looked up to for its wealth, but we cannot train our own school teachers. We have not the money to do it, so we take the ad hoc business of going out and grabbing them here and there wherever we can.

Here are a few pertinent things I picked up in the press recently. From the Globe and Mail I picked out the following:

> Secondary school enrolment will increase in Ontario by more than 100,000 pupils in the next ten years and the province will require 4,000 more teachers.

This is a statement by Dr. Sidney Smith, president of the University of Toronto, as quoted in the paper I have mentioned. Here is another one:

> In 1952-53 Canada had many unqualified persons substituting as teachers. Of these, 5,100 had no professional training, 3,700 had partial training and other thousands had poor qualifications.

Dr. LaZerte in The Listening Post, as a result of a study he made of the situation for a full year, said this:

> In 1951-52 the amount per pupil spent on a British Columbia child was over three times as high as in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

Well, sir, these little children are there. Is that justice? Surely it is for us to do something for them. The sum of $3 is spent in British Columbia on the education of a child, and the little child, because he has the fortune or misfortune—I leave it to the members from those provinces, I dare not express an opinion on it—to be born in Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island, has $1 spent on him. I am asking you if that is justice. The child, of course, is not in a position to do anything about it, but I suggest to you, sir, that you and I ought to, and the government should, do something.

I picked another one from Le Nouvelliste of Three Rivers. The article pointed out the number of teachers working without teaching certificates or diplomas. It said:

> Schools in rural areas have two choices, close down completely or employ untrained teachers.

We have substandard teachers in my own province and in Manitoba. As a matter of fact there are some in almost all the provinces. We ought to be ashamed. I saw another headline in a paper. Mr. Parker, a member of the Northwest Territories government, said that education is the territories' chief problem. It is one of Canada's chief problems. Education in Canada is big business and we should be concerned to see that we are getting value for our own money. I found statistics for 1953 which show that the percentage of teachers with university degrees is 24·6 in Ontario; 19·3 in Nova Scotia; 11·5 in New Brunswick; 5·1 in Prince Edward Island and 4·5 in Newfoundland. I am glad to be able to report that that is much better than it was at the last time a similar survey was made. We are making progress in that direction.

I have another heading which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen a few days ago as follows:

> Soaring enrolment poses problem.

The article proceeds to discuss overcrowding in schools and shows it is a major problem in all provinces.

Then, Mr. J. Roger Pichette says that in his constituency of Restigouche county 1,600 school-age children "are not attending any school or at best attending one or two months a year". I do not know as to these facts. I am quoting them from what I consider to be reliable papers. This paper which states that to be a fact also makes the comment that the federal tax system's purpose is to make it financially possible for all the provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation. I am suggesting that the burden of taxation on the municipalities and on many of the provinces of this country in respect of education is in fact abnormal.

A Canadian Press dispatch from the Vancouver Sun reports under this big headline: "Teachers blast Alberta scheme":

> Dr. L. P. Patterson of Montreal speaking said it was a retrograde step of the worst kind.

I presume Dr. Patterson was a special speaker out there. When he said it was "a retrograde step" he was describing a plan to allow unmatriculated, grade 12 students, to go out and teach schools in the province of Alberta.

In picking out these press items, I have made no reflection upon any of the provinces, nor do I make any reflection on the school boards or on the teachers. They are caught up in the web of an impossible educational financial situation. The fact that there are 40 per cent of the teachers in one province with no professional qualifications or with less than the minimum requirements is no reflection on those people who day by day have to go into their school rooms and work in the face of those problems, sometimes for very small rewards, though I am pleased to note that that reward is now greater. But I say this: you can build a million dollar school with all the gimmicks—I hate that word, although I have used it—but if that school has not the prop of teachers of scholarship, ability, character and qualities of leadership, the whole edifice might as well educationally tumble down about your ears. Such people must be adequately trained and adequately paid, and their work must be adequately recognized. Sir, we do not submit the bodies of sick children to untrained or unskilled doctors. Is it not more important that we should make sure that we are not submitting their minds over a twelve-year period to unskilled, low-paid and inexperienced mentors?

The solution for this teacher problem, like others I have mentioned, is simply federal aid to education. True, education in its administration and curriculum is and must be, I insist, a provincial problem, but its results are national, especially in these days of easy communication, of quick transportation, of resettling as from one province to another, of Saskatchewan people moving to the Pacific coast to live in British Columbia, of Quebec people moving into Ontario and occupying lands and working in Ontario where they come under a different provincial jurisdiction. The education given in one province permeates the nation. As an instance of that, I would ask you to remember the great debt that we have owed for the last 50 years to educators from the maritimes who have come out to the west and assisted us with our teaching problems there.

In conclusion, let me return to my original theme, the building of a great and an educated nation. Our young men and women, as they traverse the world, will not be regarded as the products educationally of any particular province, but as products of this great free land, which is Canada. Let us use every means in our power to see to it that it also becomes an enlightened land.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to oppose this motion. Before I state the grounds for my opposition to it, I should like for a minute or two to indicate to you, sir, and to the house that in opposing the motion I am not and I do not want myself to be the cause of being represented as being opposed to many of the objectives outlined by the hon. member for Saskatoon.

I took a few notes while he was speaking. I doubt if there are any hon. members in this house who are so reactionary that they would quarrel with his view that it should be the desire of the Canadian nation to have as close an approach as we can get to equality of opportunity for the children of this country. If I were not restrained by the restraint shown by the hon. member, I would even go so far as to say that probably no government had done more toward achieving those objectives than the government which is now occupying the rather depleted treasury benches. I am going to state precisely why I have expressed that view.

In the days when I was making what I hope even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will admit was an honest living as a teacher—and may I say that I am not pretending for a minute that I am a teacher any more—

Mr. Macdonnell: What about an honest living?

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope it is honest. In those days, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows, as everyone knows who comes from Manitoba where he and I were brought up, indeed as anyone who comes from any one of the western provinces or from any of the Atlantic provinces knows, in those years we really did have a financial crisis about education in this country. We had a financial crisis about everything else the municipal and provincial governments had to do with. By the end of that period it was so great that it had affected even the wealthiest of the provinces.

Nothing that has been done since confederation has done so much to bring about equality of opportunity, or the possibility of equality of opportunity, for the children of this country as the policy of redistributing a portion of the national revenues so that the provincial governments will be in position to carry out their constitutional functions for themselves. That policy was recommended by the Rowell-Sirois commission, which as everyone knows was appointed in the summer of 1937 and made its report early in the years of the war. Despite a good deal of opposition from some prominent members of certain parties on the other side of the house, that policy was translated into an offer by which every provincial government was free to accept a tax rental agreement which would put it in a position to carry out its educational functions, which in my view is the most important of all its functions, for itself.

If the amount which the provinces receive under the tax rental agreements is not sufficient to enable the provincial and local authorities between them to provide equality of opportunity in the field of education, then I say right away that could be remedied through a redistribution of the national revenues so that might be possible. My own view is that the present tax rental agreements do redistribute the revenues of this country in such a fashion that it is quite possible in every province, I do not say to provide the kind of education all of us would like to see but to provide a real approximation to equality in all the provinces, provided the people of a province want it enough to elect the kind of provincial government that will insist upon providing it.

Mr. Knowles: Tell us about Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will tell you about Newfoundland. As a matter of fact that is why I intervened so early in this debate. I did want to say something about the particular relationship of Newfoundland to this motion.

Mr. Coldwell: Has the hon. gentleman not thought that the present suggestions regarding tax agreements might undermine them seriously and prevent a further possibility of the provinces carrying out their responsibilities in this regard?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am pleased that the hon. gentleman has given me an excuse to say something which I rather hesitated to say. I was afraid that if I brought up that subject I would be accused by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), who clothed himself in a non-partisan cloak, of introducing a partisan note. I do not think that anything will be found anywhere in any utterance from this side of the house that suggests that. It seems to me that the assurance which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave in the letter which he addressed to the provincial governments, an assurance which he has given repeatedly in public, is the most complete answer to that.

It does seem to me that those people who are taking exception to the efforts which we are making to see that undue burdens are not placed upon one group of Canadian taxpayers because they happen to live in a province whose government does not want to have a tax rental agreement; it does seem to me that the continued attacks which are made upon these efforts to provide a reasonable equality for these Canadian citizens, are not helping to ensure the stability of this system.

If I may continue with the thought that I had started with, I am not saying that this redistribution must be done by means of tax rental agreements. Perhaps I had better quote from the letter which the Prime Minister addressed to all the premiers except the premier of Quebec, and something similar to the paragraph I intend to read was in the letter to that premier. The passage I have in mind will be found on page 281 of Hansard of January 17, 1955, and reads:

> We did indicate, however, that the federal government was not wedded to the principle of tax rental agreements to the exclusion of any better alternative arrangement if one could be found. At the same time, we made it clear that the present government had no intention of abandoning the objective of the tax rental agreements which is to make it financially possible for all the provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said, that is the foundation of the policy of the federal government. I am going to make the statement right now, Mr. Speaker, that so long as I am a member of the government that is going to continue to be the foundation of the policy of the government.

Mr. Knowles: You might find yourself incompetent one of these days.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite so. That is possible. We have a democratic system and some day, I suppose, the people of Canada will get tired of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I do not think that day is dawning just yet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: In a couple of years.

Mr. Knowles: It is obvious you need to get back to education.

Mr. Pickersgill: It perhaps would be prudent for me to keep my hand in. Next to the tax rental agreements or the principle of the tax rental agreements to which I have just alluded, I do not think that any other measure that has ever been enacted by this parliament or by any provincial legislature has done more to bring about equality of opportunity for the children of this country than has the family allowance legislation which was introduced by my old chief, Mr. Mackenzie King. Of all his many achievements, it may be the one which will have been of the most enduring value.

There are many other ways in which the federal government can—as it has and as I hope it will continue to do—advance in a general sort of way the cause of education in this country. The hon. member for Saskatoon referred to several of these things. One could refer to a good many others such as the university grants, the scholarships provided by the research council, some of the appropriations provided by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), some by my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and a host of other particular things. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) does a good deal of this sort of thing. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) does something.

Mr. Coldwell: What about defence?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose half the departments of government do something of that sort. But that is not what the hon. member for Saskatoon really means by this motion.

Mr. Knowles: Your own department does some of it too.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor is that what I mean when I oppose this motion. This is not strictly relevant, Mr. Speaker; in fact, I think it is strictly irrelevant, and if you call me to order I will not persist.

Mr. Nowlan: We should appreciate that.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman referred to the proposed Canada Council. I think he did a bad day's work for that project by his intervention in this debate today. I know that what he did was quite inadvertent, but there is no consideration that is more apt to make this or any other government prudent about establishing a body like the Canada Council than to have it labelled as "educational" and to have it suggested that it is an intrusion into the field of education which, by the constitution—as the hon. gentleman pointed out four or five times in his remarks—is reserved to the provinces. I do not conceive of the Canada Council as recommended in the Massey commission's report as being in any sense—except the sense in which all life is education—an educational body at all. I do not think the establishment of such a body would be an intrusion in any way whatsoever into the field of education as defined in the British North America Act as a field of jurisdiction for the provinces. But when it is advocated in these terms misleading views are developed and disseminated and circulated.

As every hon. member knows, we in this house have to live or, as I have been reminded several times already, die by the votes that are cast by the electors. In other words, all of us here depend on public opinion. If it is established in the minds of the public that the Canada Council is primarily as an educational agency, I doubt if any government will ever establish it. That is all I intend to say about that subject now because I want to go on and deal with what the hon. gentleman himself said was the real point of this motion.

As I took down his words, he said that what he was really advocating was more support from the consolidated revenue for the provinces for education. If I have misrepresented his stand in any way I should be glad to be corrected before I proceed with my argument. He said this was necessary in order to provide stability in education. Then he went on to say that many people fear that federal aid of this description might involve federal control. I happen to be one of those many. I think any member of the House of Commons who would vote federal money to be spent by the provincial governments for education in general, without any kind of control upon the spending of that money or the use to which it was put, would be false to the trust that we have here as members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Now who is doing a bad day's work?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is my opinion. This is a free country and anybody who wishes to do so is at liberty to differ with me.

Mr. Nowlan: We do it every day in the week.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure I will have one supporter in this house in the person of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) because he, like me, believes that there should be some control of the way in which the taxpayers' money that we raise is spent; and he thinks it is our duty to control it. He said so yesterday in terms that I thought were quite eloquent and that were echoed, rather less eloquently I thought, by quite a number of other hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Coldwell: What about the money that is now paid under the tax rental agreements or the numerous grants we make to voluntary organizations across the country? What about those?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely the point I am coming to.

Mr. Coldwell: What about the tax rental agreements?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely the point I am coming to and if I may be permitted to proceed—

Mr. Nowlan: What about the grants to universities?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would like me to answer that question, I will answer it; but that will make my remarks a little bit longer. However, I think I would rather first make my main point and deal directly with the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) because, in my view, it is the nub of the whole matter and it is the point on which the hon. member for Saskatoon and I really differ. Just so that we may look at it I am going to read his resolution and from it I think I will be able to make quite clear the point of difference between us. It reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of the house,—

That is common coin.

—the government should take into consideration the advisability of taking steps to relieve the financial crisis in education,—

In the first place, I do not admit that there is a financial crisis in education, but that is another matter.

Mr. Knight: Read it all.

Mr. Pickersgill: There may be individual financial crises in many places but I do not think there is a national financial crisis in education at all. The resolution continues:

—without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada.

Now, I say, sir, that the motion is a contradiction in terms. Let me deal with the way in which it differs from tax transfer payments or tax rental payments. Whichever hon. members prefer to call them, it seems to me there is not a great deal of difference between the two conceptions. They go right back to confederation. As every hon. member knows, though some people outside the house seem to have forgotten it, there would have been no confederation at all if there had not been subsidies paid to all the provinces in lieu of the revenues that those provinces received before confederation from customs duties and other forms of indirect taxes. Those subsidies were insisted upon by practically all the fathers of confederation from all the provinces but one, and of course, as everyone knows, George Brown was strongly opposed to these subsidies because he said that the jurisdiction that spends the money should raise it.

That is a fine principle, and I would agree with that if the wealth of the country were today or had been in 1867 uniformly spread across the country. But we all know it is not and that to have a united country, to have union in the first place, and to maintain it ever since, it has been absolutely imperative for the federal treasury to collect more money than the federal services require and to pay some of it to the provinces for their free and unfettered use for provincial purposes, and then to leave it to the provincial legislatures to decide how that money shall be used.

That is the system I am in favour of because it seems to me it is the only system that safeguards provincial autonomy. It leaves it to the people of the provinces to decide for themselves whether they want to spend that money for education, which is their responsibility, or for roads, which are their responsibility, or for any of the other provincial services. On the other hand, what the hon. gentleman is suggesting here is either one of two things. He is either suggesting that we just add to these tax transfer payments an additional sum, and if that is all he means I think it would be more honest to say so in plain language that would not permit of misunderstanding, or if that is not all he means, if he means we are going to pay this money over to the provinces and insist upon its being spent for education, then if that is not control by us of how the money is spent I do not know what it is. If that is not infringement of provincial autonomy, I do not know what would be infringement of provincial autonomy.

Mr. Coldwell: That is stretching the point.

Education

Mr. Pickersgill: In a great many provinces, the one I represent in particular—and I leave it for members from other provinces to speak for themselves—that is why propositions such as this are viewed with such great suspicion. It is thought that behind these proposals lies some hidden design to take away the control from the people of these provinces and put it here in a place where some of us are supposed to think we know so much better than the people in these provinces how their affairs should be managed. I am not one of the people who think that.

As a matter of fact, it is only five and a half years since the province, a part of which has honoured me by electing me to this house, became a part of Canada. The province of Newfoundland—and I use the word "peculiar" in no invidious sense—has a peculiar educational system. It is peculiar in one sense only, in that it is different from the educational systems in all the other provinces. I am not going to say, because it is not my business to do so—I was not elected for the purpose; the members of the legislative assembly were elected for the purpose—whether I think that system is better than or as good or not as good as the system in any other province. But it is the system that up to now the people of Newfoundland have indicated they want to have. As most hon. members know, it is a denominational system with four different sets of schools, and the people have not indicated that they want to change that system.

I am not saying that for us to put a certain sum of money into the treasury of Newfoundland would necessarily change that system at all, but I am saying that I think it would not be a responsible thing for us simply to pay over that money without laying down certain conditions, and first of all the condition that it must be spent exclusively on education. That would be the first thing. May I say that I think some of the speeches made already in debates this session, speeches which have not contributed much to national unity, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and some people around him know very well, indicate what a dangerous thing it is for us here to be tampering with things which are not our constitutional business.

Mr. Coldwell: Just a moment. The minister speaks of people sitting around the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but will he not agree that some of the people who sit around him have not been immune from raising difficulties in the same direction?

An hon. Member: More so.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not admit it, but if it is true it only adds force to my argument that we should not be debating education in this house at all.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question on the point he has been discussing?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: He knows of course that through the Department of National Defence federal money has been made available for the building of at least one school in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, quite.

Mr. Knowles: The money was turned over to the school board of Winnipeg for the purpose of building a school, and it has happened in other places too. Does that interfere in any way whatsoever with the complete control of the province of Manitoba over education within that province?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I do not think it does.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it interfered with the complete control of the government of Ontario over education when my own department provided money to build two extra rooms on one of the schools in the city of Sarnia so that Indian children could attend the ordinary school to which other children go. I do not think it interferes with education when we provide anything for a specific limited purpose that is agreed to with the province in advance and where we retain control of the purpose for which it is used. Nor does it contribute to the objective of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). He said his objective was equality of opportunity, not meeting particular situations.

To get any approach to equality of opportunity surely we have got to say that the money should be used not just anywhere but where it is needed to create that equality of opportunity. We know that there are greater inequalities within provinces than there are between one province and another. If we are going to try to get a better approach to equality of opportunity through the spending of federal money, if that is what we are really going to do, then we have got to say that it must be spent in the poorer parts of the provinces or in the parts that lack educational facilities or for some specific purpose. The moment we start doing that we interfere with education.

Mr. Macdonnell: What if it were for the children of the men of the forces, which you have done?

Mr. Pickersgill: For children of the members of the forces or for the children of Indians or when the federal government interferes with the normal course of activities or when it has a responsibility of its own, it seems to me it is not unreasonable for it to make a contribution just as we make a contribution to the finances of the city of Ottawa because we require so much of their services.

Mr. Knowles: That does not give you control over Charlotte Whitton, does it?

Mr. Pickersgill: That really has nothing to do with this issue at all. I did not catch the hon. member's remark.

Mr. Knowles: That does not give you control over Charlotte Whitton, does it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it might be, sir, that despite the omnicompetence of parliament we here cannot perform miracles.

Mrs. Fairclough: You have not enough money, either.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not insult the lady that way. If I might return again to the motion and my objection to it, it is this. A grant for education may not accomplish its purpose unless we do exercise control over the spending of the money.

I should like to take the most extreme case. I do not know whether the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) mentioned just how much he thought these grants should be, but let us assume that in the province of Nova Scotia—I take that province particularly because the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) has shown interest in this subject—the amount of money spent by the provincial treasurer on education is matched by a federal grant. Would we say that the grant was conditional upon Nova Scotia continuing to spend the amount of provincial funds it is now spending or would we not? If we did, we would be interfering with provincial autonomy; and if we did not, we would be leaving the provincial treasurer of that province, were he so minded, free to cut out the provincial appropriation and the cause of education would not be helped at all.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the dominion not state now, in connection with the health grants, that the federal grant should be matched by the province? Is that not exactly what you do?

Mr. Pickersgill: Precisely; and in my opinion, to the extent that these conditions are accepted we exercise control. If the hon. gentleman thinks that health is exclusively within provincial jurisdiction, then these conditions may be an infringement upon that jurisdiction.

Mr. Coldwell: Of course I do not.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is certainly an intervention into the field of health.

Mr. Coldwell: To the benefit of the Canadian people generally?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: Would it be an infringement of provincial autonomy if the federal government said that if the province reduced the amount spent on education the federal government would reduce its grant accordingly? Would that be an infringement of provincial autonomy?

Mr. Pickersgill: I really value the hon. gentleman's question. I think it is a very serious one. I feel it would be productive, perhaps, of more disunity than anything else I could possibly think of. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings raises a very serious point. I am going to answer him, but a bit indirectly at first. I am going to say this. I do not believe there is anyone in this house who does not feel that the situation which has existed for the last few years, whereby we collect the same taxes right across this country, and where one provincial government for reasons of its own did not take advantage of the tax rentals available in that situation, has not contributed to the unity in the country.

It seems to me that if we started to make these so-called unconditional grants—I took down the words used by the hon. member for Saskatoon and he said that nothing should interfere with the administration or curriculum; he favoured complete control by the province. He said it three or four times. What I am saying is this. If you say that if the provincial government reduces its appropriation we will reduce the federal appropriation accordingly, and if that happens in two or three provinces and does not happen in others, if the federal grants are proportionately much higher in provinces like Nova Scotia and Manitoba—I am just taking them at random—than in provinces like New Brunswick and Saskatchewan, is that result going to contribute either to equality of opportunity or to unity in the country?

It does not seem to me it is going to contribute to anything but a feeling, first of all that we are interfering with provincial matters and, second, that we are favouring provinces whose governments do things we want them to do and discriminating against provinces whose governments do not behave in the way we think is appropriate. In other words, we would be attempting indirectly to dictate the provincial budgets for education. For that reason, sir, I simply cannot support this motion.

Now, if the hon. gentleman instead had made a perfectly simple, honest and straightforward motion—

Mr. Coldwell: Well, he did; it is honest. I object. I do not think the minister has a right to describe it as not an honest motion. Surely that is not correct. I do not think the minister meant what he said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I meant precisely what I said.

Mr. Knight: I ask that this statement to the effect that in moving this motion I have been in any way dishonest should be withdrawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the first place, I did not say the hon. gentleman was dishonest.

Mr. Macdonnell: By implication, yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The motion, I said, was dishonest, and I repeat it was dishonest.

Mr. Knight: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I listened carefully to the words which were used by the minister. He said that "if the hon. member had made an honest and straightforward resolution or motion"—I forget whether he used the word "resolution" or "motion"—and I do not think there was any implication against—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think there was any implication against the hon. member who proposed the motion. If there was any implication against the hon. member who proposed the motion, then I must ask the minister to withdraw it. If there was no implication, then the remark need not be withdrawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, sir—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite willing to say, and I say without hesitation, that I do not think there was anything dishonest about the motives of the hon. member in putting this motion. But I do think, and I repeat—if the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) were here now he would agree with me, judging by what he said yesterday—that hon. members are becoming a little squeamish when they object to the suggestion that motions which they may make in good faith are, nonetheless, misleading.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, that is different.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I certainly think this motion is misleading. Indeed, I think this motion is a fraud.

Mr. Knowles: Is this the expert who is talking?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. gentleman is versed in the English language, and when he says that a motion is a fraud, he is going beyond what should be said in this house about any motion that is moved.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall withdraw the word "fraud", sir.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister let me tell him what the word "fraud" means?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Pickersgill: He has my consent, sir.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I wish to make it clear that the hon. minister, who has the floor, cannot impute motives to the proposer of the resolution, and it was to that aspect of the matter I directed my attention a few moments ago. I understood the minister's remarks to be directed to the resolution and to its wording. I could not find any objection to that. I understand the minister has withdrawn the word "fraud" so surely we can take the matter as being at an end.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I can confer in private with the hon. member for Greenwood and thereby improve my own education—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —because some day, as hon. members opposite have pointed out, I may need it.

However, I think no exception was taken to my statement that in my opinion this resolution is misleading; and I want to say why I think it is misleading. I think it is misleading because it recommends, to use the hon. member's own words, "more support from the consolidated revenue fund for the provinces". I do not think you could be sure of having in every province more support from the consolidated revenue fund for the provinces for purposes of education, unless you stipulated that the provinces had to continue to spend the amount they are spending now, and that whatever was contributed must be added to it.

I think the moment you did that you would be transgressing the other part of the resolution, which says that you must not interfere with provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Even after granting a generous allowance to the minister for the time consumed by myself in discussing points of order, I must advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Coldwell: Finish it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is unanimous consent the minister may proceed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the house for its indulgence. I was hoping, Mr. Speaker, to have finished in about two more sentences, but it may take three or four to get back to the thread of what I was saying.

The point I was really making was this; that it seems to me, as I said earlier, that in this motion we have a contradiction in terms. If, instead, the hon. member had moved a simple resolution—

Mr. Knowles: You would have opposed it anyway.

Mr. Pickersgill: —in which he said that because of the financial crisis in education—and I would not have agreed with him, but I would not have quarrelled with that phrase in the motion—the tax rental payments to the provinces should be increased so the provincial governments would be in a position to discharge their responsibilities properly, I would have thought that was a perfectly proper kind of suggestion for a member of parliament to make.

But when we try to make people think we are voting for more aid for education, when we have no way of making sure, if we did it, that it would go for education, then I think it is—I see the hon. member for Greenwood looking at me, and I am trying to think of a synonym for the word he and I cannot use—I think it is very misleading to the public.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to answer the arguments of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), or to attempt to meet the variations and changes in his viewpoint from paragraph to paragraph.

The issue before the house is important, and I compliment the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) for having brought it to the attention of hon. members. I am sure he is conscious of the constitutional difficulties, but at least he has brought before us a problem that is close to the hearts of all Canadians today. I was somewhat interested in the speech just delivered by the minister. I listened, too, to the hon. member for Saskatoon. There is no doubt that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, while perhaps he did not intend to, could have provoked an interesting debate on many points if he had been permitted to deviate that far from the subject matter of the resolution.

However, I was glad to learn that the minister and the late Hon. George Brown were in agreement, even if each believed that he should not give any subsidies without having control; and yet we know that both did it. I do not see the great danger the minister has mentioned of infringing provincial rights. He says the only procedure would be by means of a redistribution of national revenue, but he says this could not be done unless it were followed up with controllers to look after it. The minister says it is all right to give aid to education to children in one district, because there has been common agreement in advance, but that it could not be granted in another district because control would be required. It seems to me that what he said could be summed up in this way. The minister seemed to say that what we want to do we can do constitutionally, but what we do not want to do we are afraid might not be constitutional.

I must say I am not a lawyer, nor have I ever taught school. But if I had been a school teacher and had offered the arguments he has offered concerning education I would be afraid that my students would doubt me. It is not my intention to get into any controversy with the minister, because he is still a young man. He says he has been in the House of Commons only about a year and a half, and I know he is associated with men who have had wide experience. We know, too, that the minister has had a colourful career in the civil service, and I hope his career in the House of Commons is equally colourful, even if I cannot understand exactly the direction in which he is going.

I do not wish to take up much time in this discussion because I know there are others in the house today who are keenly interested in this matter and who would not take kindly to my encroaching upon their time. Therefore I shall not repeat many of the statements that have been made. It will be recalled, however, that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in 1952 and 1953, as well as on other occasions, emphasized where he stood on this issue, and pointed out the difficulties the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration touched upon today, and how they might be met. No one realized more than he did, when he was minister of education in Ontario, the importance of this growing problem, the education of our youth. But I submit that today it is even more vital, and that it grows more important as the years pass. As our national progress is more affected by scientific and industrial advance, and a change in the tempo of our times, the education of our youth becomes more vital.

I have had some little experience in provincial affairs. I realize that this is a provincial matter constitutionally, and that it would be easy for us more or less to dodge the issue. I do not mean to imply that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was dodging it; I think probably he did not feel too kindly about the way in which the subject was presented by the hon. member for Saskatoon. But I would not want to be unfair to him and say that he was dodging it. He was probably mixing it up a little bit.

One cannot help but realize that this is a real problem. Every taxpayer in Canada who pays into the dominion treasury also pays into the provincial treasury and into the municipal treasury. The cost of education today is colossal. It is increasing at such a rate that we can scarcely comprehend the obligations that are thrust upon the weaker municipalities.

If you want to put the problem on this basis, I know of no better national asset than the educated youth of this young country. I know we are all in agreement that we are very short of trained personnel in this dominion. It is estimated that at the present time we are short 10,000 scientific, engineering and professional personnel. That is a tremendous handicap to a young and growing country like Canada. It is estimated that if students continue to be graduated in engineering and science at the present rate, by 1965 we shall be 190,000 short. If we fail to keep pace with our present progress that will be our position at that time.

Just stop and think of that, Mr. Speaker, what it means and how it might retard our otherwise much faster tempo of development. No one will fail to realize that we need well qualified and well trained men and women in all our different industrial activities, and even in defence itself in this day and age when not only our prosperity and progress depend on it, but our very survival.

It has been said that there is no real financial crisis in education but may I remind the minister that the cost of education has been increasing by about 10 per cent every year. Last year it was $515 million across Canada. That is rising. The cost per student is also rising about 10 per cent annually. We must realize that in every province of this dominion today there is a shortage of schoolrooms and of schoolteachers. This question far transcends politics. I am not going to argue that because the leader of this party has made excellent speeches on this very subject, or that because he did a great service to the province of Ontario as minister of education, this party is trying to do something that the government is refusing to do. Because it is a national problem we must think of it as public men, to see whether we have the authority to deal with it here.

I say that we have the authority to deal with it in another way. We know there is a shortage of teachers. I am not going to go into that, but I believe from 25,000 to 50,000 additional teachers could be used in this dominion. We do know that right now there are over 8,000 classrooms for which there are no teachers, and there are 12,000 more schoolrooms in which classes are taught by teachers, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Saskatoon, who are not up to the standard required by the respective provincial departments of education. These things are alarming. I am going to touch on them only briefly.

Appeals have been made by universities and by student groups suggesting that the government should give special grants. I might also remind the minister that he surely does not propose to control universities, though grants are given to them by the government. These universities are asking for grants to provide 10,000 additional scholarships. There is hardly a university in Canada that has not young people standing at the door waiting to get in. There is a large element of our people who cannot afford to send their children to university at all, and there is a large group who cannot even give their children a sufficient primary education.

In my opinion the strength of this whole country depends more on the education of our children than on almost any other single factor. In fact it is the greatest resource of all. There is nothing more important in the sound development of national character in this dominion, with the exception of religious teaching in the church of God, than our educational system. We are short of teachers, and we must face up to it. I mention that in passing because I am going to leave time for others who I am sure want to speak on this question. I do suggest that this is another glaring reason why we should have had a dominion-provincial conference some time ago.

It is not good enough for the minister to tell us that so long as he is a member of the government he is not going to do this or that. He is still adhering to the old, sound doctrine of Hon. George Brown. He is going to stick to it rigidly. He is not going to give a dollar unless it pleases him or unless there is agreement beforehand. He says that even if it is agreed to beforehand we cannot control it; but if we have to agree tomorrow he will not like it because we cannot give it unless we control it.

I do say seriously that when we see the situation getting 10 per cent worse every year, the problem increasing to that extent, with the municipalities and the provinces failing every year to keep pace with the general advancement of our country to the extent I have mentioned in engineering and scientific personnel, something should be done about it. We find that there are school children in the different provinces in this dominion for whom there is no room in the schools, and there is a shortage of teachers for those who are in the schools. I say that this should be the principal item on the agenda of the next dominion-provincial conference. This has been going on for about ten years. The cost of education in the provinces has increased by about 100 per cent since the last dominion-provincial conference.

This is another clear-cut spectacle of what is happening in this dominion. If ever there was a plea for a dominion-provincial conference in a hurry it was made this afternoon by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Even if he is one of the junior members of the cabinet I believe he expressed the opinion of the government. If he did, then surely they must realize that they cannot continue giving a handout here only where they control it and say they cannot give a handout some place else because they cannot control it, a gunshot prescription such as they are giving here for avoiding a dominion-provincial conference. Why have they been afraid to call a dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. Pickersgill: One has been called.

Mr. Rowe: I am glad to know that. We have been pressing for it for four or five years. We have not had one for some years. I am glad to know that, and I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will be glad to learn when he returns that somebody has announced it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read the Prime Minister's letter.

Mr. Rowe: If you can give us the date, we shall be glad to know it.

Mr. Pickersgill: You will find it in Hansard of January 17.

Mr. McCann: It was mentioned in that letter.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): When is it to be held?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, this is a clear-cut example that has developed steadily. I think it only fair to say that failure to co-operate with the provinces has already created a lack of educational facilities. The inability of the municipalities to meet this educational challenge already has had a serious effect upon the education of our youth in this country. Education should be advancing like everything else, but it is not advancing today because we are short of classrooms, we are short of teachers, and there are hundreds of children who are not getting a fair chance and opportunity in education.

I would urge the government to keep it upon their agenda, to not continue making the excuse that they cannot relieve the situation but give us some idea how the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion can sit down and revamp an outmoded taxation system so we can meet this situation because as I say even though we are members of this house we are all taxpayers whether municipally, provincially or federally. It is a problem which everybody must face, and it is something which far transcends politics. It is an issue upon which the whole life of this country depends.

We shall be no stronger, in the years that lie ahead, no matter how great may be our resources about which we boast, than the intelligent application of sound principles to our everyday affairs by educated scientists and educated leaders in church, school and society.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. member and the party for which he speaks in favour of making grants to the provinces for education?

Mr. Rowe: I said I was not going to take up too much of the time of the house, and I do not propose to take up time by answering questions which I have answered already. At the beginning of my remarks I pointed out the constitutional difficulty, and even the hon. member for Saskatoon has referred to that. Over the years the Leader of the Opposition has spoken on this matter and emphasized this problem. I say again that it could be handled by a dominion-provincial conference where everyone would sit around the table. In the meantime, whether controlled or uncontrolled, if the government is going to go through another period without dealing with this issue at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference then we should approve grants in aid to the provinces and not seek to control them.

I am more concerned about the education of the children of this province than I am about the constitutionality of the matter or any precedent that might be established. I do not believe that one dollar should be granted by this government that has not provincial jurisdiction. The provinces must have full jurisdiction over their educational system. It is not our business, it is not our function to administer educational expenditures in the provinces. At the same time I think this can be worked out by a dominion-provincial conference; but in the interval, particularly in view of your delay in calling a dominion-provincial conference for the five years in which we have been pressing for it, this situation has developed to where it is now a serious national problem concerning the mothers and fathers in almost every home in this dominion.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house sets before us an important proposition in clear and understandable language. Its meaning is simple. It asks that the government should take steps to relieve the financial crisis in education by granting financial relief to the provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunities. But it goes further and places emphasis on the fact that this should be accomplished without interference with the administration of education in the provinces. I wish to commend the hon. member for Saskatoon for moving this resolution. It is not the first time that he has sponsored a similar motion. In the face of considerable discouragement he has continued to press his point, and he has certainly had our support from the beginning.

I should like to make one or two points clear. I am sure the hon. member did not intend to leave an incorrect impression, but he referred to certain persons teaching school in Alberta as unmatriculated grade 12 students. He left it at that, suggesting that those persons were going forth to teach school without being given a certain amount of training. True, it is not very much, but they do get some training, and then they must come back during succeeding years and bring up their qualifications to acceptable standards.

I am not going to take up any time defending that particular action. Something was necessary under the circumstances to meet a shortage of teachers. It meant that either such persons were to teach or supervisors would be placed in the schools—persons without any teacher training whatsoever—or that the schools would be closed and correspondence courses only made available to the students.

Mr. Coldwell: I think there is something similar in my own province.

Mr. Shaw: There is something similar in Saskatchewan. It is merely a stop-gap action.

As a former teacher I certainly regret that it seemed to be necessary, but certainly it is only temporary.

I listened carefully to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. On the basis of what he said I could cast aside all I had intended saying and spend a delightful 40 minutes analysing his remarks. However, I am just going to make one or two observations. He amazed me. If he did nothing else he displayed a superb skill in building up straw men and then knocking them down, in building up arguments and then almost immediately thereafter completely demolishing them. I suggest to the minister that some of the things he said in that speech of his today are going to come back to haunt him, not once or twice but many times. If I can help play the part of the ghost in the months ahead I shall probably do so.

I can say to the minister that had the government come forward with a proposition under which they would make available money under the terms and conditions as set forth in this resolution and for the same purpose, he could advance stronger arguments in support of it—and they would not have to be very strong to be better. He made reference to the foolhardiness of the federal government raising money and then handing it back to the provinces without conditions attached. He then turned around and put up the defence he did of the tax transfer agreements. To me it was completely ridiculous, regardless of how the minister may try to explain it away.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member does not want to misrepresent me. I never said I thought it was foolhardy to make unconditional grants to the provinces. I think it is essential, and I defend them to the limit.

Mr. Shaw: The minister seems to have misunderstood me as he did the hon. member's resolution. He advanced the argument, and he did not try to justify it in the light of anything else, that if the government were going to collect money through taxation then they would have to have some control over how that money was spent. He can read his own speech tomorrow and I am sure he will find that. Then with respect to the grants to the provinces under the tax transfer agreements he shifted his position and in my opinion advanced an entirely different set of arguments.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is not the money that is paid to the provinces under the tax rental agreements voted by this parliament precisely for that purpose and, therefore, is not that a controlled expenditure in precisely the sense I was arguing?

Mr. Shaw: As far as I am concerned the question is wholly irrelevant. As a matter of fact the minister seems to be trying to explain away some of his own observations made during the course of his speech. I am suggesting to the minister that where the government of Canada—this government—has made it a matter of policy to make unconditional payments, they have always been able to find mighty good reasons for doing so. Minister after minister and private member after private member have managed to stand on the floor of this house and defend the action. All I am saying is that if they were to accept a proposition of this kind, the same strong arguments would be advanced.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I was interrupted a number of times and perhaps he would not mind.

Mr. Shaw: I hope you do not take that as a precedent.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the hon. member to name one other unconditional grant voted by this parliament except a few grants to voluntary organizations; one other unconditional grant to a provincial government except the tax transfer payments or statutory subsidies. I should like to ask him to name just one.

Mr. Shaw: I would say that in itself is sufficient, if you want a precedent. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but when reference was made to moneys expended for the construction of a school in the city of Winnipeg, or for the construction of two classrooms in Sarnia, the minister was able to spring to his feet and advance very sound arguments.

Mr. Pickersgill: Those were conditional grants.

Mr. Shaw: They were conditional only in that they were for educational purposes. In this resolution we are not suggesting that grants advanced to the provinces to enable them to bring about a condition of equality of educational opportunity should be unconditional. It would be specified that they were educational grants. To that extent they are conditional grants, if the minister wants to carry the argument that far.

Mr. Speaker, I was intensely interested in some of the statistics brought forward today by the hon. member for Saskatoon. I too have a copy of the publication put out by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities in which there is a report of an address which Dr. M. E. LaZerte, research director for the Canadian school trustees association, delivered in the city of Windsor at the conference of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. Among other things he stated this:

> In 1951-52 the cost of educating 2,481,018 enrolled pupils was $432,824,000—87 cents per day per pupil enrolled or about one dollar per day per pupil in average daily attendance—cost here covering operation and maintenance, debt retirement charges and capital expenditures paid from current revenue.

Further on in this report Dr. LaZerte pointed out:

> Education at 87 cents per pupil per day may be expensive if there are 35, 40 or 45 pupils per classroom, if schools are not suitably equipped and if the staff consists in large part of grade X, XI or XII youngsters with whatever professional training may be acquired in one or two summer sessions.
> On the other hand, education at 87 cents per pupil per day would be surprisingly cheap if at that cost classes were small enough to permit teachers to direct and supervise the learning of individual pupils, if buildings and equipment met satisfactory standards and school boards engaged only educated teachers, preferably university graduates, whose mastery of subject matter is so thorough that they can use it to illustrate, teach and clarify the great truths buried in text books and courses of study.

Further on in this report he says:

> In over 8,000 classrooms there were so many pupils that highly efficient teaching and supervision were impossible.

In dealing with the amounts spent in the provinces on education, the hon. member referred to the great spread between the minimum and the maximum. Dr. LaZerte has this to say with respect to that matter; and incidentally may I say that I thought the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was going to put up a much stronger defence than he did of the amount per pupil being spent in his own province for educational purposes. Dr. LaZerte said:

> In 1951-52 per pupil costs in British Columbia were over three times as high as in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island; costs in the five provinces from Ontario west were, on a per pupil basis, 52 per cent higher than in the five provinces in the east. The median of provincial costs per classroom was $4,245 but in Alberta and British Columbia the average cost per classroom was 70 per cent higher than this, while in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick it was 11 per cent lower; in Newfoundland and New Brunswick 62 per cent lower. Per capita costs varied from $16.84 in one province to $45.34 in another . . . in one province society will spend 43 cents per pupil per day; in another province $1.46.

I doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether one would require more evidence than that to convince him of the inequality in educational opportunity if the problem is considered from the national point of view.

One may argue that the federal authorities have no responsibility in this field. However, for several extremely important reasons I think they have a responsibility. In the first place we have the general problem arising from the fact that immigration comes under the federal government; that is non-British immigration, at least. Only today I was reading that, on the basis of the number of immigrants who came to Canada in 1951 alone, by 1960 there will be 10,000 additional students to be educated in Canada; that is just based on that one year and that one source. In the twelve-year period from 1948 to 1960, in secondary schools alone the population will increase from 305,200 students to 611,475. That is, I would say, a very accurate estimate since it originates with the national bureau of statistics.

As I said earlier, two major problems result as a consequence of this heavy influx into schools which, already so heavily crowded, will be literally swamped within a period of ten years. The teacher shortage, which is already extremely serious, will most certainly become critical, provided that certain definite steps are not taken.

Let us go back to our municipalities and our provinces. We might ask ourselves this question. Is there a desire on the part of a municipality—a school district, if you like; and most of them, in the west anyway, acquire their finances from the municipality —to provide a highly equalized system of education to the children of these areas? My answer is definitely yes; but they have gone just about as far as they are able to go in imposing taxes on the real estate to be found within their specific areas. Have the provinces assumed their responsibilities? Of course that is always a point that can be argued, but it cannot be argued that the provinces have closed their eyes to the problem. For example, I know that in my own province where many, of course, think more money should be devoted to educational purposes, the amount being paid today exceeds the total of the Alberta budget of 1935. Between 22 and 23 per cent of all revenues are going for educational purposes. I am sure that if you examine the budgets of the other provinces of Canada you will find that an extremely substantial proportion of their revenues is being made available for educational purposes.

But in spite of all that the problem is still not being solved. I think there are certain things beyond the control of the provinces themselves. We feel that national policy has had a lot to do with the creation of the problem which they face. In the first place, an extremely high level of national taxation naturally makes it more difficult for municipalities and provinces to secure adequate revenues, taxing within their own specific fields of jurisdiction. I would say that the difficulty which they encounter is in direct proportion to the weight of the federal tax burden.

Second, we must never forget that federal taxation policy has in several other ways contributed toward the very high cost of education. Books and school supplies are 10 per cent higher in cost, and have been over the years, as a consequence of the imposition upon them of the federal sales tax. What has it meant to the school districts and divisions which in a great many cases today operate a number of buses to bring the children to the schools? The federal government has for a lengthy period of time imposed the sales tax upon these motor vehicles. I was reading only recently that a protest was made at the convention of the Canadian federation of school trustees about the federal income tax regulations with respect to those who purchase school bonds and debentures. The cost to the school board is very much higher as a consequence of the position in which purchasers are placed under the federal Income Tax Act. One could go on and give a good many illustrations to indicate why federal policy has made it more difficult for school boards to meet their financial obligations, and why it is absolutely necessary for the federal authorities to make grants without interfering with the administration of education within the provinces.

There were quite a number of other things which I had hoped to deal with, but previous speakers have indicated their desire to let as many as possible take part in the debate. We shall co-operate with hon. members and refrain from utilizing the time which one would normally be entitled to so that other hon. members may have an opportunity of expressing themselves.

We favour the resolution. We have heard nothing today which would change the views we have held for a long time. We think direct grants to the provinces for this purpose are necessary, desirable and possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Shaw: We feel that there need not be any interference in the administration of education within the provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Shaw: Perhaps I could.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member think the government of Alberta needs a financial grant for this purpose at this time, in view of its present budget?

Mr. Wylie: You are being silly.

Mr. Blackmore: Surely it does.

Mr. Shaw: I am always pleased to hear references to the province of Alberta, because I am sure the minister is one of those who have not contributed too much toward painting as bright a picture as should be painted of what has gone on in that province. What we are very anxious to have is equality of educational opportunity. If it is found upon examination that we have the highest desirable level of opportunity within the nation, then possibly more attention could be given to bringing others up to our level in that field.

I only offer that as a suggestion. I am not setting forth any formula at all, as the minister will understand. It is merely a matter of principle. We realize full well that a good deal of negotiation would have to be carried on in order to strike a formula, let us say, that might be satisfactory to all. But we must face up to the fact that we are not even approaching a condition of equality of educational opportunity. Certainly I think it is the desire of all hon. members to have that, even though we may disagree as to the method by which it can be accomplished. Various school trustee organizations across Canada have supported the proposition. Certainly the school teachers' organizations have supported it, and I believe that on a free vote in the house somebody would be absolutely amazed at how many hon. members would support the proposition.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, an English-speaking member having said recently that he would like to hear more speeches in French in the house, it is partly in deference to his wish that I do so now, in dealing with the motion under review.

I shall try to avoid controversial matters, because I neither want nor wish to raise any controversy. I shall try to be as objective as possible while speaking quite frankly.

Whenever grants to the provinces are mentioned in order to increase educational facilities, we Quebec people inevitably ask ourselves to what kind of education those grants could or should be applied. We respect —as we always did and always will—the rights of the provinces in that field. There can therefore be no controversy about our idea of provincial autonomy in the field of education.

I just said what we have in mind when we hear about grants to the provinces to promote education within their borders. We have a right to ask ourselves whether such grants to the provinces will be used, in this or that province in particular, or in the provinces in general, for the purpose of teaching in those schools a respect for minorities, as we have done and are still doing consistently in the province of Quebec.

We are wondering, and rightfully so, whether grants will be used for the purpose for which they are earmarked, that is, teaching the young people in other provinces who do not speak our language or profess our religious creed to respect minorities within the limits of their provinces.

While I was travelling through the dark continent with some of my friends from the House of Commons, it was always a real pleasure for me—and I could hardly repress a blush of pride—whenever someone, on seeing my badge, would say to me: "You are from Canada? A great country! A prosperous country! The land of freedom par excellence!" I used to answer: "That is true, it is in every sense of the word a land of freedom." And, rather than make mental reservations, as far as some zones of bigotry here and there were concerned, in my country, I added, quite frankly: "Apart from those small zones, in Canada, we do enjoy a liberty which can be held up as an example to every country in the world."

I will mention no place names in particular since I have said that I do not wish to raise any controversy, in the course of these remarks. I will say, though, as has already been said here, that I wonder how it is that in certain provinces there still is a lack of respect for the rights of minorities? It would seem to me that the example set by Quebec, in the field of education, is sufficiently fine and enduring to be followed everywhere in this country.

When we hear talk of federal grants to the provinces to increase educational facilities, we might also ask ourselves whether these grants will help to propagate free thinking, for instance.

Will those schools, that will benefit from federal moneys voted by representatives of all provinces, teach that the word broadmindedness or tolerance means the abandonment of our privileges and, particularly, the abandonment of the natural right of parents to have their children educated in their own language and in the religious principles of their own creed?

We have the right to ask that question. In 1950, I read in the Ensign an article signed by Miss Helen L. Todd, stating that if Catholic parents would only agree to yield to the will of others—that "others" was implied —and if this Catholic minority would only take advantage of the invaluable benefit of undenominational schools, we could cultivate in the minds of our youth the understanding and the tolerance with which we could build up this youth.

In short, the veiled meaning of these words is that Catholics should attend undenominational schools, whatever directives they receive from their spiritual leaders.

I mentioned just now the natural right of parents to have their children educated according to their own religious principles. That natural right cannot be denied in any province of this country.

I understand that outside of the province of Quebec certain provinces allow them more or less freedom to build schools and to apply part of public funds and taxes to the maintenance of their schools, and that goes for denominational schools as well. I think I am right in saying that such is the case, for instance, in the province of Saskatchewan. However, Mr. Speaker, coming back once more to that thought which is uppermost in our minds whenever grants are mentioned, I wish, if I may digress for a moment, to say something about our neighbours to the south who are faced with the same educational problem and who are certainly short of teachers in their schools, as shown by their statistics.

Two years ago, the Toronto Star published the report of a survey made in the United States on the moral and religious side of the young people. The investigator found out that 20 per cent of the young people had a thorough education, whereas only 20 per cent had any religious principles.

The survey also showed that, far from being radical the young people seemed to be little inclined to give their opinion; they were mainly, to a certain extent—and in a broad sense—conservative with regard to the principles that might help them to decide on the questions asked in the survey. The report says that less than 20 per cent of those questioned, or 1,935 teenagers from 18 to 19 years old, answered that they took little guidance from religion when they had to choose their way of life or the political principles they would adopt, for instance, in respect of interracial relations. The survey does not indicate that those who believe in God would be more tolerant of other races.

I cannot share the sentiments expressed in the findings of this survey since I am convinced that any faith which recognizes universality and respect due to the human being undoubtedly does far more and cannot fail to recognize that the colour of the skin of any man cannot alter the fact that he has been created in the image of his Creator and endowed with a body and a soul.

I do not know who carried out this survey, but, in any event, I cannot share those feelings.

I repeat that I have no desire to enter into a controversy, but I would like to say just a word on the struggle which has been going on in the province of Quebec as far as federal grants to the universities of that province are concerned. I want to quote three different opinions from newspapers of my province, in order to put them on the record.

Le Devoir, as reported in the August 21, 1952, issue of Le Soleil, of Quebec, has this to say:

> If the province does not want colleges to accept federal aid, it must immediately revise its grant system and adapt it to the new situation. Colleges, like everybody else, need money; whether they be directed by lay or religious teachers the government will soon have to help them more than it does now.

I understand that the government of my province have given grants to universities, grants provided by taxes paid by the taxpayers of the province of Quebec. I have no doubt that it was due to the fine example given one year by the federal government, an example that was followed by the premier and the provincial government when they gave our universities exclusively provincial grants.

The Sherbrooke Tribune went even further than Le Devoir and had this to say about rural schools:

> Rural schools, like the large educational institutions in the cities, will soon reopen their doors, but it so happens that in fairly numerous places there is a shortage of female teachers. Such a shortage would certainly not be felt if certain rural districts were not so reluctant to pay adequate salaries to young women who, by inclination and training, had been thinking of taking up teaching as a career.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of this house for the last twenty years, after having been eight years a member of the legislative assembly, and I am happy to say—and this will show that I am not playing politics—that since I left the provincial legislature, the salaries of our men and women teachers in the province of Quebec have gone up considerably. I hope that they will go even higher because I know that many members who are listening to me are aware of the value of our teachers for the educational needs of our children.

Le Nouvelliste of Three Rivers wrote, somewhat along the same line:

> Many of those who would have remained in the (teaching) profession hasten to leave it when offered better paid jobs.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that, as a result of salary increases, fewer teachers, in recent years, gave up the profession in favour of better paid jobs.

I could give other opinions showing that the situation also prevails in the province of Quebec, as far as our teachers are concerned. If we could pay higher salaries to those people who devote themselves to our children, they would not quit their jobs. Nevertheless, there has been a great improvement in our province and it is to the credit of the government, whatever its political trend.

A question rises in my mind when I look at the motion moved this afternoon, which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of taking steps to relieve the financial crisis in education, without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada.

I don't know whether I should vote in favour of this motion, because, as stated by several members who spoke before me, it is a difficult and indeed a thorny matter to embark upon such a debate to decide how far those provincial rights go, and how far the federal rights can go without prejudicing the former. Secondly, I have a right to ask myself: How many provinces have made official requests to the federal government for one or more grants to increase the educational budget in those respective provinces? I would also like to know if other provinces have made similar requests, and, if so, how many? If the provinces have made no such requests, it means that they are able to provide for their own educational needs. However, if some requests have been made by the provinces, my mind is stirred and I wonder if they have specified the purpose for which those grants must be used, because I am of the opinion that all Canadians should be taught to respect minorities within the limits of their respective provinces.

If I often come back to this question of minorities, it is because we, in the province of Quebec, are in a good position to talk about it. In fact, we respect minorities, and have been doing it for a long time now.

We have no ulterior motive, we are not going backwards, we do not let "the madcap in the house", as imagination is called in literature, run around and find reasons, very often bitter, that could make us go in the opposite direction.

We forget everything and we respect the minorities in our province. The natural right of parents is respected by the government and by the people. We would like all provinces to follow this example.

If someone came to me one day and told me that the grants given by the federal government to each province would bring about the disappearance of these small areas of bigotry that still exist though in very reduced numbers and quality, and if I could be assured that outside the country and particularly inside the country there would be regard for the privileges and rights of all, at the risk of being thought of as a more or less hardened autonomist, I would vote for this motion.

Still, before doing so, I shall have to wait until years and experience have shown me that federal grants would wipe out those few small areas of bigoted thinking, which, unless they soon disappear, will be regarded as oddities.

I do not wish unduly to extol my own province, but when education is being discussed and we see what is going on, we have a right to tell the other provinces: "There is an example which is easy to imitate. All you need is a little good will and true broadmindedness. Go ahead, we will be the first to approve!"

(Text):

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only a few moments of the time of the house to discuss this very important matter. I do not intend to deal with it from the constitutional standpoint, because that has already been discussed this afternoon.

I should like to point out the great need that exists for assistance to the different provinces. May I congratulate the hon. member for Saskatoon upon having brought this matter to the attention of the house. I realize, as was pointed out by the minister this afternoon, that under the constitution of our country education is within the provincial field. I do not believe, however, that giving financial assistance to the provinces to assist directly in education would necessitate taking the control of education from them. Section 93 of the British North America Act says that—

> In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education.

I do not think for one moment that the federal government could or would interfere with laws made by the provinces concerning education. It is my belief, however, that this provision in the British North America Act is concerned chiefly with the curriculum and administration of the schools. We can still give financial aid and in no way interfere with the administration of the laws of the provinces.

Perhaps in 1867 education was not the burning problem it is today, because in those days the situation was entirely different. At that time perhaps only one out of four or five children went to school. As a matter of fact I do not think the adults saw the need of educating all the children as we see it today. Somewhat later in the development of our country the teaching of the three R's was stressed, and that was considered the ideal in education.

Today, however, the boy or girl who does not have at least a high school education does not seem to fit into the general economy of the country. It has been pointed out this afternoon that the federal government has already assumed responsibilities in education, and I do not believe this has interfered in any way with the responsibilities of the provinces. It has also been said that the need for greater education exists right across Canada.

I wish to refer particularly to the need in my own province, and in the maritime provinces in general. I was not able to follow what was said by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) who immediately preceded me in the debate and is a member from the province of Quebec. But Quebec is considered as one of the richer provinces, and I doubt very much whether one would find there the great need for assistance to education that would be found, for instance, in New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Nowlan: Or Nova Scotia.

Mr. Brooks: Yes, or Nova Scotia; in fact any of the maritime provinces. Quebec has a per capita debt of around $92·24; New Brunswick, $256·62, according to the last report I saw. I have not seen the most recent report. Nova Scotia's per capita debt is around $200. These figures show the difference in the burden which is carried by the different provinces.

The minister asked the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), who made an excellent speech, whether or not Alberta would need the grant. The hon. member replied that Alberta would need the grant as would the other provinces, but perhaps not as much. The debt charges of Alberta as a percentage of revenue amount to 6.6 per cent. In my own province it is 23.8 per cent. Hon. members can see the great difference, and the need in these smaller provinces for more money in order to have what is known as equalization of educational opportunity.

As far as our maritime provinces are concerned, we have endeavoured within our limited means—and I think we have succeeded—to see that our children receive opportunities in education equal to those of the richer parts of this dominion. In the maritime provinces we have been education-conscious for a great many years, but this does not mean that we do not need more assistance at the present time. I feel that we are, to use a common expression, at the end of our tether as far as the maintenance of the standard of education that we desire in our schools is concerned.

I should like to read part of a letter I received in January of last year with reference to this matter from the chairman of the New Brunswick teachers' association. In speaking of the situation in New Brunswick he said:

> During the last decade, the people of New Brunswick have made great progress in education. New buildings, a modernized curriculum, and a secondary training available to every child—all have placed our province in the forefront educationally. These necessary advances have added a great deal to the public debt, both provincially and at the local level; and the burden on property owners has now reached a point where, if federal assistance is not obtained, both our province and its municipalities will be faced with the grim necessity of curtailing their educational programs at a time when we are still lagging behind the wealthier areas of Canada and paying to educate a New Brunswick boy or girl less than half the amount some provinces are able to afford.

That explains in concise terms what the situation is in New Brunswick and what the great need is. The problem is there. I do not care what sort of specious argument any minister makes in this house, the great problem we have in Canada today is the education of our children. No argument by any minister is going to make me or the great majority of the people of Canada believe that there is not some responsibility placed upon the richer areas of this great country of ours. The crisis is very real.

Then there is the matter of teachers. One of the far-reaching results of this financial embarrassment is the fact that we cannot get teachers for our schools. That point was emphasized by different speakers this afternoon. In New Brunswick it is a known fact that 60 per cent of the teachers in some areas are married women. The young men and young women are not going to our normal schools to take up the teaching profession because the salaries are not sufficient inducement for them to do so. Mention was made of the fact that hundreds of young boys and girls are taken out of school without any technical training at all and placed in charge of schools in the different provinces of Canada. That is a serious situation, and this government cannot wash its hands of all responsibility.

As I said before, the federal government has responsibilities. I do not use this as a strong argument, but during the war many boys came up for enlistment, and one of the great reasons they could not serve their country at that time was that their educational standard was so low that they were not qualified to do so. This country of ours employs many thousands of civil servants taken from all across Canada. The better education we can give the boys and girls who apply for positions as civil servants in Canada, the better that service will be.

I could go on and give many arguments which I believe would be pertinent to this question. The hon. member for Saskatoon mentioned scholarships this afternoon. I agree entirely with what he said about scholarships, and I would support any program which was initiated for further scholarships in this country; but I do not think that is the great problem. The great problem is assistance for elementary schools.

Mention was made of more help for universities. That also is one of the concurrent problems of education. Again I repeat, that is not the great problem in Canada today. The great problem is in the elementary schools. Someone mentioned the fact that 160 schools were closed in the county of Restigouche in New Brunswick. I did not know there were so many; but think of the hundreds of children who are not getting even an elementary education in a section like that, and that situation could be found also in many parts of this country. That figure of 160 schools seems to be pretty high. Perhaps it was 160 teachers; but if it is 160 or only 6, it is too many. So long as a situation like that persists, so long will there be a reflection upon the people of this country.

Mr. Gregg: Would my hon. friend permit a comment? I would like to point out that that situation exists in only one county in New Brunswick.

Mr. Brooks: I thank the minister for making that comment. I would not say it exists in only one county. I would say it exists only in one section. I take my own constituency of Royal. I am very proud of it. The minister knows it very well. In my own town of Sussex we take second place to none in this country as far as education is concerned. We have one of the finest schools to be found in any town of its size anywhere across Canada, and the same is true of other sections. We have more consolidated schools in my constituency than in any other constituency in the maritime provinces. We have rural high schools, and the situation is good as far as facilities for education are concerned. But when it comes to financing that is our problem. When it comes to supplying teachers for the schools, as someone said this afternoon, no matter what kind of school you have—you may have a million dollar school —if you have not well-qualified teachers in that school you will not get good education.

I do not think I should take any more of the time of the house this afternoon. This is a problem which is on the shoulders not only of the people of the provinces but of the whole dominion, because the people of the provinces are the people of the dominion. This is the sixth or seventh year that the hon. member has brought this question before the house. The people of my province believe that something should be done, and I hope this government will take the opportunity to do something which will be of great and lasting benefit to the people of this country.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in view of the general desire of hon. members to have a decision today on this resolution I shall speak for only a brief time.

I would not like to let this opportunity go by without congratulating the hon. member for Saskatoon upon putting up what is in my opinion a splendid case for federal aid to education. It was my privilege to have a resolution somewhat the same in principle in my name before this house some nine years ago. At that time the debate was quite interesting, but it could not compare with what we have heard today. I feel that very definite progress has been made in favour of this proposition since it first came to the attention of the house.

At the outset I want to say that I do not view the proposal for federal aid to education primarily as an added expense, but rather as a shrewd investment. I doubt if we could make a better investment for the future of this country than to make sure that no stone is left unturned to provide the greatest opportunity for education to all children, regardless of where they may live.

Progress has been made in other directions. I can recall speaking to a similar resolution about eight years ago and making the suggestion that we would live to see the day when television would provide one of the means of education in our schools. At that time television was in its tiny infancy and there were some smiles around me as certain hon. members probably thought I was too visionary in expressing that opinion. I am gratified to learn, as no doubt other hon. members have noted, that in many schools in this province television is being used as one of the mediums of visual education. This simply indicates that we cannot estimate the speed with which progress can be made provided we are prepared to help it along financially, as this resolution calls for.

I need not traverse the same ground which has been covered by several hon. members. I think it has been made sufficiently clear by the mover of this resolution and by several other hon. members that there is no intention, in fact no possibility, of interfering with the jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education. There are splendid opportunities to assist the provinces in connection with education without in any way interfering with the curricula or the manner in which education is carried on.

To give only a few examples I would refer to the great need of greater facilities for education, better buildings and better equipment. There are many schools in every province in this country which should be rebuilt. All kinds of grants could be made to assist in providing facilities and physical equipment. Surely that would not interfere in any way with what was done in the schools.

In my opinion the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) made a good case when he pointed out the great burden which must be carried by the municipal governments. In my own province a great number of representations have been made and are still being made by municipalities to the provincial government in an effort to get a greater share of the tax dollar in order to relieve the burden which now falls upon real property. I am sure that is not exceptional; it is probably the general rule across Canada. I think the municipalities have done about as much as it is physically and financially possible for them to do in order to make their contribution to better education. It is not too much to ask that this parliament and this government, which control the lion's share of taxes of the Canadian people, make its contribution to meet that great need.

I could not overlook some of the comments made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. His argument was very strange to us. He started off by expressing smug complacency about the situation, and then out of hand he denied that there was anything like a financial crisis in education in Canada. He then went on to set out what he termed was the government's policy. After he had finished I must confess that his interpretation of government policy on this question was not any clearer to me than was his policy on immigration, and that is certainly far from being crystal clear.

To me his argument was a curious combination of complacency and deliberate pettifogging. In discussing the resolution before the house he dragged in all sorts of irrelevancies, and then proceeded to show why this could not be done and that could not be done unless and until the government thought it should be done. There appeared to be no difficulty at all so far as the constitutional position was concerned if the government was inclined to do it, but if the government was not inclined to do it then of course he dragged in the British North America Act and all the other side arguments to prove why it should not be done.

Mr. Pickersgill: My hon. friend keeps saying "to do it". What is "it"? What is it that he says I said the government could do if it wanted?

Mr. Zaplitny: I thought that by this time the minister was aware of what we were discussing, but he still seems to be in a fog.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am in a complete fog about the hon. gentleman's point.

Mr. Zaplitny: The resolution refers to federal grants in aid to be made to the provinces for the purposes of assisting in education. The minister gave his version of why in his opinion it could not or should not be done.

Mr. Pickersgill: Should not.

Mr. Zaplitny: The minister qualifies it by saying "should not". To me it is just like putting the whole government policy in one sentence. I think it can be described as saying that it is a policy of taking the line of least assistance. If any further argument is necessary to completely reply to what the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration attempted to describe today as government policy I should like to quote only one paragraph from a speech delivered in this house on February 24, 1937, in connection with scholarships. I quote from page 1190 of Hansard of that date:

> It is true, as I said a moment ago, that education under the British North America Act was specifically and exclusively reserved to the provinces; but the term "exclusively" surely does not mean that the federal arm of government cannot extend to the provinces, by way of supplemental assistance, measures which properly come within the provincial sphere. If there should be disagreement with that statement, we have the precedent of our national research council scholarships, and if we want a further precedent, we have the grants in aid in respect of technical education, pursuant to the Technical Education Act of 1919. I am not particularly concerned in what form the federal government assists in furthering this proposal, but I am interested in having substantially the desired results, and if they are to be brought about by grants in aid to the provinces, definitely earmarked for that purpose. I do not see that there will be much to object to in the method.

Mr. Pickersgill: I completely agree with the views which have just been read by the hon. gentleman. If they are specific grants for a specific purpose, I do not see any objection to them at all. It is this suggestion of a general grant without any control that I object to.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am pleased to note that the minister is now willing to recant.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was what I said in the first place.

Mr. Martin: Those words are so interesting and so well chosen that I suspect they are my own.

Mr. Zaplitny: The minister's suspicions are quite well founded because they are his words, or they were his words at the time. Of course at that time he was only the hon. member for Essex East. He is now the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: And still the member for Essex East.

Mr. Zaplitny: And still, of course, the member for Essex East. But that process of coming up into the cabinet, into that rarefied atmosphere, quite often seems to affect the thinking and opinions of members on the opposite side of the house. I am therefore not prepared to say that that is still the opinion of the hon. member for Essex East. However, it may be. Certainly that statement sets out the position quite clearly. This motion is not attempting to impose anything upon anyone. It simply indicates recognition of a need and the willingness to take some action to provide a solution to that problem.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Red Deer put the case admirably for Social Credit. I crave a few moments of the time of the house to say one or two things which I believe need to be said in addition to what he said.

In the first place I believe that much must be done on behalf of those who are attempting to go to university. We are giving far too little attention to that matter. I have an idea that is one reason we are having a teacher shortage. The cost of going to university is simply so great that, except in cases where a student's parents live in a university city, they are prohibitive, or except in the case of families which are in good financial circumstances; whereas in many cases the very ones who would go to university and qualify for training come from the poorer families, as was so well shown when we started to educate the boys who served in the forces by giving them an opportunity to go to university. We saw what happened there, how many of them qualified and how well they did.

From the national federation of Canadian university students I have a communication which was sent to me after this session began. I should like to draw the attention of the house and the country to some of the facts that are set forth in division 6 of their letter:

> A survey recently conducted by the national federation of Canadian university students committee at the University of Alberta shows that the average university male student is able to earn only 51 per cent of the cost of his university year during the summer months;

As hon. members will realize, that is an extremely serious situation. The cost of going to university today is high. Everything is high. Rent is high. Food is high. Laundry is high. Clothing is high. In addition to that, the universities are charging much higher fees than they used to charge. That is true not only with regard to the general fee but with regard to the special fees attached to various courses. This statement then becomes extremely serious. It is based on a survey of the students consulted in the city of Edmonton. The statement goes on to say that female students were able to earn only 40 per cent of the cost of the university year during the holidays. What does that mean? It means that, as far as people coming from humble homes are concerned, a university course is simply unattainable.

There are a good many other statements which these people set forth in their letter to me but which I am not going to tell the house about. I believe that alone is sufficient to show that it is extremely important that we devise some way or other of assisting students to go through our universities. In his excellent talk the hon. member for Saskatoon mentioned the number of university students in Britain who receive assistance, and even referred to the assistance given to university students in Russia, all of which reflects no credit upon us.

I think I should give just a little bit of attention to one remark which was made or implied in a question by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. As I recall it, he asked the hon. member for Red Deer if he thought Alberta required any assistance for her schools. The answer is undoubtedly that Alberta requires a tremendous amount of assistance for her schools. These figures to which I have just referred apply to Alberta. It is supposed generally by most people that just because the province of Alberta has been particularly successful in making money and has been blessed with a good deal of income from the sale of oil and gas leases, the province should just go on a spending spree and spend that money as fast as it gets it. I am sure any thoughtful person would not agree that that ought to be done.

Mr. Pickersgill: Should the federal government do that?

Mr. Blackmore: The federal government is in a different position because the federal government has unlimited access to the means of financing through use of the national credit. Let me repeat once more, for the benefit of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and every other minister, that there is only one government in the Dominion of Canada that has the power to monetize goods and services in this country; and that is the all-important power in respect of financing.

Certainly what the Dominion of Canada can do for its university students ought to depend directly on the goods and services which the Dominion of Canada can produce, and not on the amount of money that can be wrung from the taxpayers. The sooner the members of the house and the people in the country generally get that idea embedded in their thinking, the sooner they will be in a position to face the responsibilities which rest upon them in the matter of financing our various activities in this dominion. The Dominion of Canada has the power to monetize the goods and services produced in the Dominion of Canada; and certainly the only limit to the capacity of the Dominion of Canada to find money in that respect is the amount of goods and services we produce or can produce. The provinces have access to no such sources of revenue as that. Their revenues are distinctly limited.

I wish to say just a word along the line which I had indicated before I was interrupted by the hon. member. Anybody who looks at conditions as they are today in a realistic manner must realize that unless we have another war or unless we are scared into much more costly preparations for war than we are making right now, this country is headed straight downward into a depression. There can be no question about that whatsoever. The fact that agricultural prices are falling as they are is one of the surest indications of that fact. If a depression comes on and a tremendous burden of unemployment is caused to rest upon the provinces, where are they going to get the money with which to finance relief comparable to the relief we had to finance during the thirties? Any realistic and responsible body of provincial officials certainly must be having that matter in mind.

Would the members of this house or would the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration suggest that the Alberta government should take all the money that comes into their hands from the various sources with which they are fairly well blessed and spend it on education, and have nothing left to cushion them against the contingencies of a depression? Surely we must be realistic in this matter. I hope the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration does not ask any more irresponsible questions like that in this house. He is young. We will allow for that fact, but we expect him to mature a little bit faster than he is maturing.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer and it is this. In respect of any province, the people of the province have a way of demanding services in relation to the income which the province has available to it. Here are some of the services which provinces must give. They have to service the debt. When the Social Credit government took over in Alberta we found that we had to pay 49 cents out of every dollar of revenue for interest on our debt. That is an important matter to bear in mind. The remarks of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) indicate how serious an item is the matter of servicing the debt for his province of New Brunswick. The cost of roads has to be taken care of, and people simply demand roads. If there is anything like a reasonably good income available to the province, the people simply insist that roads be built. Public welfare is exceedingly costly. Health is extremely costly. Agricultural improvement is also extremely costly.

Education is only one of all the various things for which the provinces require to make provision. There are such things as forest conservation and conservation generally, public works and many other matters which the provinces have to take care of. In the light of all these things I hope the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and all the other members of the cabinet do some good serious thinking for about three or four weeks and adopt a realistic attitude to the educational situation which faces the people of Canada.

How should the money granted provinces for aid to education be extended to the provinces? Of course there is considerable discussion concerning that matter. I agree there should be no means whereby the dominion government could even attempt to influence policy in respect of education in the provinces, but there are ways of getting around that difficulty. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration seems to feel that just to make a grant to the provinces in a general sort of way is quite unsound. That kind of thinking is typical of Rhodes scholars. It is typical of these bureaucrats whom we have in such great numbers—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, I am not and never was a Rhodes scholar.

Mr. Blackmore: I have given the minister the opportunity to make a statement which has released him from a good deal of suspicion, because he certainly has acted like an Oxford graduate, a Rhodes scholar. Generally speaking, men who have graduated from some of these universities, particularly from the London school of economics, have the idea in their narrow minds that they can tell anybody on the face of the earth how to live, that they know all about it and consequently we cannot have a country like Canada soundly governed unless all power centres right here in Ottawa where you can put these graduates of the London school of economics at work doing the job.

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. friend permit an interruption?

Mr. Blackmore: Very well.

Mr. Martin: It is very kind of him to suggest that my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, was a Rhodes scholar. He is not a Rhodes scholar, but in fairness to him I think I should say that he enjoyed a scholarship provided by the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire. I am sure my hon. friend would not want to make any disparaging remarks in view of this information.

Mr. Blackmore: My remarks were not intended to disparage the source from which a man gets the money with which he goes to university, but to disparage the attitude which men are likely to acquire in some of the universities of Great Britain. One of them is Oxford, another is Cambridge and another is the London school of economics. Generally speaking, when a man has graduated from any one of these he is a socialist in his ideas; he is a centralizer; he thinks nobody in the world knows how to govern a country except his own particular class, and that the provinces cannot possibly produce people capable of governing.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, I am not nor have I ever been a socialist. I am not a centralizer. I was arguing all afternoon against centralization, and the hon. member is now arguing for centralization.

Mr. Martin: I think too in fairness—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: —to the hon. member for Greenwood, who is not in the house, that I should say that he is a graduate of Oxford university—

Mr. Pickersgill: And a Rhodes scholar.

Mr. Martin: And a Rhodes scholar; and no one can call the hon. member for Greenwood a socialist.

Mr. Blackmore: I will grant that there are exceptions to every rule, but once more I am glad I gave the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the chance to clear his name of a suspicion which lurks in many places.

Mr. Ellis: You are opposed to people going to university?

Mr. Blackmore: That is just another foolish question like the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) always asks. He seems to have his mind short-circuited. He never can ask an intelligent question on the floor of the house and has not done so since coming here. I had been discussing and urging the advisability of helping people to become university graduates. I was at the moment, however, mentioning graduates of certain universities who are trained to believe in socialist thinking. You will find it manifested in everything they undertake to do.

As to how the money is to be given to the provinces, personally I think that a grant based upon need, population and various other factors which I will not go into at the present time, is probably the best way of approaching the problem; and then the provinces should be free to spend this money in the way they see fit. Let the people of the provinces hold their governments responsible for the way in which they spend the money, just as they do with respect to the revenues that the provinces have at the present time.

So I do not hesitate to urge that the federal government take steps at the very earliest moment to provide assistance to the provinces, every one of them, on a basis which will give the less favoured provinces such as New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and the others an opportunity to give their boys and girls something like a similar chance for education to that which the boys and girls of other provinces enjoy. I urge upon the government that they take that step, and I urge that we do not have to have another debate on this question of assistance to education but that something be done about it soon.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the constitutional aspect of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). I shall readily show that although the resolution now before the house seems to overcome the obstacle of provincial autonomy, it does not do so at all, and that we must oppose the resolution to safeguard provincial rights in matters of education.

Last year, during debates on constitutional matters, I held that the federal government and the provincial governments should stick to their constitutional rights. I added that although some of my compatriots in the province of Quebec had taken a different position on this problem, I deemed it my duty, as a member of parliament, to defend the rights of the federal government when they were attacked; I now feel I must defend provincial rights when they are attacked.

I am of the opinion that the province of Quebec has shown in the past, and will continue to show, that it is willing to co-operate with the federal government in solving many problems. As regards the tax problem, so much discussed in our province and in all others in the past few months, I feel that Quebec is like any other province, but that it is altogether different from an educational point of view. And this point of view must be respected.

Mr. Speaker, section 91 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

In other words, it will be possible for the federal government to legislate in the above mentioned fields which are not specifically reserved.

Section 93, on the other hand, reads as follows:

> . . . the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions.

As drafted, this resolution would have us understand that in calling upon the federal government to make unconditional grants for educational purposes, it would not cause it to infringe upon provincial rights in this field. But this is counter to section 92 of the British North America Act, which states:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

Please note the expression "may exclusively make laws". Then, in paragraph 2:

> Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

Therefore, if the federal government were to use its revenue and redistribute part of it to the provinces, under the pretence of assistance to education, it is my opinion that the moneys thus raised within the provinces would be collected against the rights of the provinces to raise by themselves the revenue required for provincial purposes. The federal government would therefore infringe directly upon provincial rights. Consequently, the province of Quebec has the right to cling to this prerogative, for the reason which in fact directed the preparation of the Canadian constitution in the form of a federation is precisely the point of view of education. Other provinces also insist that their rights in the field of education be respected, as has been seen recently in this house, in debates dealing with the problem of minorities.

True it is that the problem of minorities is not one to be dealt with by the constitution but by principles which are the foundation of democracy, principles which need not be expressed in a bill of rights, because they are respected quite naturally by those who believe in liberty, in equality and in everything that makes a democratic constitution today.

But that, Mr. Speaker, is not quite the point that was brought up today. I realize that a motion of a general character has been used to try to get around the constitution which guards the infrangible rights of the province of Quebec. If constitutional amendments were moved in other fields—and I believe there are many fields where the constitution of 1867 should be changed for it is out of date—the province of Quebec would readily endorse such changes.

Amendments are needed in the fiscal field as well as in the highway and the public health fields. We find a juxtaposition of new problems which have come up since the last two wars and which conflict with our rigid constitution; these problems call for amendments which could be supported by the province of Quebec. But, in the matter of education, I know that the province of Quebec will always be opposed to it.

When I heard the honourable representative of the Conservative party say that a dominion-provincial conference should be called in order to study the problem of educational grants, I thought it would be useless to hold such a conference, because the province of Quebec will always be formally opposed to such an idea.

Though we are willing to co-operate with every political party in view of Canadian unity, especially in the taxation field, we do not, where education is concerned, want to witness the disappearance of our own particular ways, nor do we want to see them attacked. And if the provinces were subsidized with regard to elementary and higher education, there would naturally be some conditions attached to the grants, so that there should be no more obstacles to a uniform standard of education.

This is precisely the reason why, at the time the Canadian constitution was drafted, the province of Quebec asked that a federal system be provided in preference to a unitary system.

That is all I wanted to say in opposition to those who are inclined to think that the constitution can be circumvented by more or less elastic means and that it is possible to tamper with the inviolability of provincial rights in the field of education. Those who represent the province of Quebec and who believe that a Canadian confederation is a necessity must safeguard our special way of life, so that we may develop in variety and diversity.

(Text):

Mr. Knight: Is there still time for me to close the debate, Mr. Speaker, and suggest that we might have a vote at this time?

Mr. Habel: I had in mind taking part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, but since it is six o'clock I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Habel the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 10, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know I speak on behalf of the official opposition and also, I am sure, on behalf of everyone else at this time when I welcome the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on their safe return from their short visit overseas. I hope that today or some time in the near future the Prime Minister will give the house a statement as to the success of that important trip.

QUESTIONS

RYE AND FLAX PRODUCTION

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What has been the annual production of rye, by provinces, since 1940?
2. What has been the annual production of flax, by provinces, since 1940?
3. What has been the high and low price of rye and flax for each year since 1940?

Mr. Dickey:

Production of rye

1954	3.24⅝	2.53⅛	1.47½	.85

(a) Guaranteed price to producers.

(b) Includes retroactive payment of 50 cents per bushel on 1947-48 crop-year marketings as authorized February 26, 1948.

TAXATION PROPOSALS—PROVINCIAL CONSULTATION

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Were any provincial governments or provincial premiers consulted prior to the announcement regarding the new taxation proposals for the province of Quebec?

2. If so, what governments and what premiers were consulted?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

MARGARINE

Mr. Pommer:

1. How many pounds of margarine were produced in Canada during the calendar year 1954?

2. What quantities of raw materials used in the manufacture of margarine were imported, during the same period, such as (a) oils; (b) seeds; (c) other materials?

3. How many pounds of margarine were in storage on the 31st of December last?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Production of margarine during the calendar year 1954 was 115,868,000 pounds.

2. (a), (b), and (c). The kinds and quantities of oils and fats used in the manufacture of margarine in Canada during the calendar year 1954 are shown below. While no breakdown for "domestic" and "imported" is available, it is apparent that all of the coconut, cottonseed and palm oil is imported, whether as oil or as seeds which are crushed in Canada.

Consumption of Oils and Fats in Margarine
Calendar Year 1954

Vegetable oils	Pounds
Coconut	10,303,000
Cottonseed	19,881,000
Palm (1)	14,311,000
Soybean	33,827,000
Sunflowerseed	(2)
Other	16,000
Total	78,338,000
Marine and fish oils	15,783,000
Animal oils	30,000
Grand total	94,151,000

(1) Includes palm kernel.

(2) Included with other vegetable oils.

3. Stocks of margarine held by manufacturers, wholesalers and other warehouses on January 1, 1955, totalled 3,337,000 pounds.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

COLOMBO PLAN

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How much was contributed to and for the Colombo plan by Canada in each of the years 1953 and 1954?

2. Of such amounts how much was (a) expended in Canada; (b) outside of Canada, for (i) administration costs; (ii) salaries of technical experts; (iii) scientific and technical apparatus; (iv) agriculture machinery; (v) other kinds of machinery?

3. How many technical and scientific persons were employed in each of the years 1953 and 1954, and what were total (a) salaries; (b) expenses or other allowances paid to such persons?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF MEETING SUGGESTED BY SOVIET SUPREME COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the novel and challenging suggestion made yesterday by the Soviet supreme council to the effect that in the interests of peace, members of representative institutions both inside and outside of the iron curtain might with value meet in order to discuss problems of peace. Does the Prime Minister consider that the suggestion is one of merit and worthy of consideration and acceptance in order to indicate the attitude of Canada generally toward doing anything that will bring about better relationships?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all hon. members know that it would be both their desire and the desire of the members of the government to do anything and everything that would bring about better relations. The suggestion that has been reported will no doubt come to us in some more official manner than merely this report in the newspapers, and it will certainly be given careful consideration. I think the situation is such that we should all do our best to take advantage of any suggestion that might bring about an easing of the tension in the world.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Will the minister inform the house as to what methods the government is using to secure personnel for employment on the St. Lawrence seaway? Second, has the minister's attention been drawn to the fact that a private organization, with headquarters in Cornwall, Ontario, is sending out circulars asking the unemployed to make application for employment on the seaway and to send $1 back to them with the application?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I am grateful to my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South for giving me notice of his question, and I am glad to have an opportunity to reply to it.

The officials of the unemployment insurance commission have reported to me information regarding two private organizations such as that to which my hon. friend has referred. One of them goes under the name of "Seaway Opportunities" which asks for a fee of $1 to accompany the application for a job, and that I know is the one to which my hon. friend refers. The second one goes under the name of "International Recruiting Agency" which asks for a fee of $3. Both of these organizations give Cornwall post office addresses.

I have answered the last part of my hon. friend's question first. As to the first part of his question, concerning the method the government is using in helping to secure personnel for employment on the projects associated with both Ontario hydro and the federal seaway on the St. Lawrence, may I say that ever since the beginning our labour and national employment service officials have participated in the planning with regard to all matters related to future employment on both these projects. I believe that good methods have been worked out both as as they apply to the recruitment of workers within Canada and also to simplifying the movement of workers to and fro across the international border to ensure the maximum employment for Canadians and to best serve the changing needs of these great developments.

The St. Lawrence seaway authority in a press release yesterday stated that no outside organization had been authorized to indicate that they were acting as an agent for the seaway, and I have been assured by Mr. Chevrier that at one of its recent meetings the authority had approved the recommendation that the national employment service undertake recruiting for the seaway project. The local offices of the national employment service have been asked to advise all applicants in their areas who apply for positions on the seaway to register at their local office, and not to leave for a project until they are sure that work is available. These registrations will be passed on to a control office in the seaway area, and as contractors require workers applicants who meet the requirements of a particular job will be so advised and will then proceed to the project. Preference will be given to local residents if they are otherwise qualified.

At the present time, with the co-operation of the Ontario hydro commission, a refresher course is being conducted at Cornwall to bring national employment officers up to date on the requirements of the heavy construction industry. This program of training will be extended as the need for workers and the field for recruitment grows.

A moment ago I referred to the co-operation provided by Mr. Chevrier and the seaway authority. Here I should like to pay warm tribute to the valuable co-operation given to my officials and myself by the late Bob Saunders in planning this employment program, and for the continuing help of the Ontario hydro officials.

Through the courtesy of the Post Office Department, the national employment service is arranging to have posted in post offices throughout the country notices advising job seekers to check with their local employment office before proceeding to points where projects are contemplated.

The unemployment insurance commission will release to the press, trade journals and other publications, information covering the arrangements they have made to serve the needs of the seaway and power projects. The commission will continue to urge workers to see their local offices before they leave their home areas for any project, in order that they may be assured that work is available when they arrive there. I should like to underline the fact that the facilities of the national employment service are available to both workers and employers at no charge to them. It is, of course, the policy of the national employment service to give equal attention to the applications of workers whether or not they are covered by unemployment insurance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to press releases and other publicity on this matter during recent weeks, our national employment service has sent very specific instructions through the five regional offices to all the approximately 200 local offices across the country. If I may, since it is not too long, I should like to quote the exact words of that directive dated January 20 last, entitled "Recruitment for St. Lawrence Seaway and Hydro Project". It is signed by the director of employment services in Ottawa. This is the text:

> Arrangements have been completed for us to do the recruiting for the above-mentioned projects. Details of procedure, etc., have not yet been completed but they will be sent out to the field in due course.
> It is intended that we will have a central control office at Cornwall where the needs of the employers will be registered and requests will be made to our local offices for help as the occasion arises.
>
> In so far as the hydro project is concerned, they are committed to the hiring of Ontario residents and particularly local residents in the area of the project, if these workers are suitable.
> The seaway authorities tell us that they will give preference to local residents if they are suitable.
>
> In order to be sure that the towns and cities where the projects are located are not swamped with people coming to look for a job, we have agreed to do everything possible to stop this.
> Will you please, therefore, advise all offices in your region to post notices to the effect that residents are warned not to proceed to the seaway or hydro projects on the St. Lawrence without first being advised by our local offices. Any local publicity that can be given in this regard in the meantime would be beneficial.
> Applications at our local offices should be carefully taken on a 701, obtaining all the information possible regarding the applicant, and these 701's should be kept readily available in the local office and the applicant advised not to proceed to the area until told to do so.
> We hope to get out early next week a national news release outlining this arrangement. In the meantime, it is important that our offices at least be advised of what is being considered.

That is the end of the directive. I have taken the time of the house to answer this question fully because I know all members of the house are as anxious as the hon. member for Cape Breton South or the Minister of Labour about this matter. I express the hope that the answer I have made be given wide publicity so that unemployed people in any part of the country might not be misled on the one hand or miss any real opportunity for employment on the other.

[Mr. Gregg.]

POSTAL SERVICE

SEVEN ISLANDS—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, of which I have given notice, or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. Has the Postmaster General received a brief from the Seven Islands chamber of commerce requesting improvement in both the summer and winter mail services to Seven Islands and that part of Saguenay between Baie Comeau and Blanc Sablon? If so, what measures will be taken to remedy the situation?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): May I thank the hon. member for giving notice of his question. The answer is yes; a brief has been received, and the matter of conveying all classes of mail to these points will be reviewed at the conclusion of the winter season, as this service is performed under contract at the present time.

POULTRY

ALLEGED DUMPING OF UNITED STATES PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Will the Minister of Agriculture say whether the Department of Agriculture has given any consideration to the dumping of United States fowl and poultry meat on the Canadian markets? I understand one firm alone received a single order of over 100,000 pounds, because of the fact that feed and brooder costs are higher in Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am not sure whether my hon. friend intends me to consider the term "dumping" as it is related to customs duties in general or if he simply means that—

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It is coming in.

Mr. Gardiner: —it is coming in. I assume it is. I have had complaints from time to time that certain of our poultry products are being sent to the United States to be treated under a system they have over there, and then returned here. We have been asked to take action in regard to that, but I have not heard of any undue shipping of turkey or anything like that into Canada that does not come within the law.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I understand there have been only about 8,000 pounds shipped to the United States but they have shipped over 360,000 pounds here.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHANGE IN TREATMENT REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): In the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant which he can take as notice. Telegrams received from veterans' organizations in British Columbia indicate they are concerned about amendments to the veterans' treatment regulations made by order in council 1955/102, passed on January 20. Would the minister make a statement that would indicate what change has been made from the previous order regarding the burial of persons who die while receiving treatment?

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): As the hon. member has suggested, I shall take his question as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CIVILIAN USE OF LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the metro chairman in Toronto has received no official answer to his letter regarding the availability of the Long Branch rifle range for metropolitan purposes, would the minister say what is the decision of his department in this matter?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of her question. When I made the statement in the house last week concerning the Long Branch rifle range I indicated that until we could find a suitable location to which we could transfer our activities we could not relinquish Long Branch. I also said that we are now considering the possibility of removal to Camp Borden. When we have canvassed that possibility, which we are doing actively now, and have come to a decision, it would be some months at least before suitable accommodation could be provided at Camp Borden if we should decide to go there. Meantime I have not been able to give a decision, and that is why the gentleman to whom the hon. member referred has not received it. And that is also why I cannot give a decision today.

FISHERIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF FISH MEAL PLANT—APPLICATION BY GERMAN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) or, in his absence, his parliamentary assistant. Can the parliamentary assistant inform the house if it is a fact that the application of a German firm for a permit to operate a fish meal plant and affiliated industries at Louisburg, Nova Scotia, was refused by the Department of Fisheries? If so, what was the reason?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): The Minister of Fisheries had intended to answer this question today, but unfortunately he cannot be here at this time. He will give the hon. member an answer tomorrow.

GRAIN

PAYMENT OF TAX WHEN SELLING TO ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Will he tell the house if farmers growing grain for sale outside the P.F.A.A. districts are paying the 1 per cent tax when selling their grain to an elevator?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. I find it a little ambiguous but, having said that, I shall answer it. I was advised about 33 years ago when I first went into a government never to give a legal opinion, but to advise the inquirer to consult a lawyer. Probably that would be a good thing to do on this occasion. However, I shall answer it as best I can.

The question is whether the minister will tell the house if farmers growing grain for sale outside the P.F.A.A. districts do certain things. Well, the ambiguous part of it is that I am not so sure whether it is the farmer who grows the grain outside the district, or the farmer growing it inside the district and selling it outside; both interpretations could be placed upon it.

Then the question continues by asking whether they are paying the 1 per cent tax when selling their grain to an elevator. I think it would be best if I were to read the section of the act which says:

"Spring wheat area" means the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Peace river district of British Columbia.

That is the area covered by the act. Then the section which deals with the collection of the 1 per cent is section 11, which goes on to say that the elevators taking delivery of wheat—and I presume within the spring wheat area—must collect 1 per cent on the grain they take in.

Mr. Bryce: Then they are paying for a service they do not get.

GRAIN COMMISSION—WHEAT BOARD—REFERENCE OF REPORTS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as to when members may expect to receive the annual reports of the board of grain commissioners and of the Canadian wheat board, and whether these reports will be referred to the standing committee on agriculture.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The annual report of the board of grain commissioners is now in the hands of the queen's printer and will be distributed as soon as it is received from the printer. The report of the wheat board is also in the hands of a printer and will be tabled when it is received. I anticipate that the usual practice will be followed of referring these reports to the committee on agriculture.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING FUTURE PURCHASES OF URANIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he is now in a position to answer the question I asked on February 4, reported at page 848 of Hansard, as to whether Mr. W. J. Bennett, president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, was stating government policy in his speech in Toronto concerning the future purchases of uranium by the government.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have now read the statement Mr. Bennett made, and it is government policy. In fact it is exactly as stated in the annual report of the Eldorado company tabled in the house a few days ago.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Fleming: May I ask, if it is government policy, why it was not enunciated by the minister rather than by an official.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is the policy of the Eldorado company, approved by the government. The report of the Eldorado company contains the statement of its policy, and it was tabled in the house before the speech was made in Toronto. If my hon. friend does not read those documents, I cannot help it.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister if he will answer my question as to why, if this was a statement of government policy, it was not made by the minister and not by an official.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The purchase of uranium is the function of the Eldorado company, and the minister saw no purpose in interfering with the statement of company policy coming from the authority which actually does the purchasing.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED DESIGNING OF FLAG BY DEFENCE RESEARCH BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the defence research board is designing its own flag and, if so, for what purpose.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

CONFERENCE OF PRIME MINISTERS—TABLING OF COMMUNIQUES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) has suggested that I might wish to make a statement in reference to the commonwealth conference, and I have said that I shall do so on Monday. In the meantime communiques evidently have been published by the newspapers, and perhaps it would be convenient to have them available as a matter of record. If I may revert to the order for motions so I might table them at this time, I would be glad to do so.

Mr. Rowe: Would they be printed in today's Hansard?

Mr. St. Laurent: If it is desired that they should be, I think it would be wise to have them printed so they could be a matter of record, and we would not have to look them up in the files of newspapers.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed to have these documents printed in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Then it is agreed that they will be printed in Hansard.

(For text of communiques above referred to, see appendix A and appendix B, pages 1062-4.)

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if, in view of the fact that he is making his statement on Monday, he will allow us an opportunity to discuss the statement at a later date, dealing with foreign and external affairs in general?

Mr. St. Laurent: There will certainly be an opportunity for further discussion on external affairs; and if at that time hon. gentlemen wish to raise any questions with respect to the commonwealth conference I think certainly it would not be our desire to prevent its being done. I hope it can be arranged, in conformity with the rules of the house.

INTERNATIONAL RIVERS

PROVISION REQUIRING LICENCE FROM GOVERNMENT OF CANADA TO CONSTRUCT, OPERATE AND MAINTAIN ANY IMPROVEMENT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): The chief opposition to this bill respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements seems to revolve around a specific project, the Kaiser dam. In the words of the spokesman of the Social Credit party, their opposition has a political basis, together with the assertion that it is an infringement on the rights of the provinces. The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) said, as reported at page 886 of Hansard:

> I am going to refer to the political aspects of the bill. My great opposition to the bill is that I believe it is nothing more or less than a political instrument used by the government of Canada to thwart the province of British Columbia in a development which the people have a right to expect.

Any act passed in this house, Mr. Speaker, naturally is a political act. I cannot see how it can be otherwise. It is an act of parliament and cannot be divorced from the question of politics. It seems to me that the art of government can be defined as political.

The Social Credit party seems to be very sensitive when it comes to the question of political criticism. If any criticism is directed toward that party they immediately imply that it is a smear, or mud-slinging, and so on. It seems they can even change toothpaste into mud and imply that it has been thrown at some politician or other. I simply refer to the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke and his statement at page 886. He took exception to the fact that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) mentioned the bright smile of the premier of British Columbia. I cannot see that there was any smearing done there. I warn the hon. member, who seems to feel injured and is jealous of the shiny, bright smile of the premier of British Columbia, that bright and shiny teeth are no facade for a virtuous personality. I need only refer him to the fable of Little Red Riding Hood.

It seems that the Conservative party, or at least the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), has in some way or other also developed the smear psychosis of the Social Credit party. In his inconsistent statement respecting this matter the hon. member said, on the one hand, that it was a political club to be used by the federal government to beat the provincial government of British Columbia, and on the other hand that he believed both parties were well-meaning and that their intentions were sincere. He cannot have it both ways. Therefore I think we can just disregard the official opposition and simply say that so far they are on the fence and are not taking any particular position at this time.

In his speech on Friday, which he concluded on Tuesday, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke spoke, I presume, on behalf of the Social Credit party. I am concerned, as a matter of fact, over the hon. member's appalling ignorance of the facts respecting the Columbia river basin and the geography of British Columbia in general. For him to have drawn the conclusion that this is a political bill introduced for the purpose of injuring another party, when he has so little knowledge of the facts, is just beyond my comprehension.

It would be well to review some of the facts with respect to international treaties. I refer specifically to the treaty that was signed in 1909 between Canada and the United States. It was a treaty between His Majesty and the United States of America, signed on January 11, 1909. Under article 9 of that treaty the international joint commission was given specific authority to deal with major questions arising in boundary disputes between the two great countries. Subsequently, in June, 1944, I believe, the matter of the development of the Columbia basin was referred to this commission. In a statement to the house at that time the late Right. Hon. Mackenzie King had this to say with respect to the reference as reported in Hansard of March 9, 1944, at page 1292:

As questions concerning the Columbia river basin are of great interest to the province of British Columbia, the government of that province has been consulted at all stages in the drafting of this reference.

Of course, such reference was to determine the best method of employing the water resources of the Columbia basin. There has been close co-operation between the federal authorities and the provincial governments in all phases of the investigation, at least up to the present moment. One of the first projects on which there was sufficient information available to proceed with was the Libby dam in Montana. While the investigation was not completed, the international joint commission was prepared to recommend the construction of the Libby dam which would build up one million kilowatts of on-site power with about 6 million kilowatts of energy in the combined on-site and downstream benefits. There was no decision, however, as to the benefits which would be paid to Canada in compensation for flooding north of the boundary in the area known as the Newgate district. About 42 miles of Canadian soil would be flooded and a considerable dislocation of residents would ensue. The United States section of the joint commission agreed only to $7 million in compensation, without any power in return. That is, there was to be no block of power which the Canadian section of the international joint commission felt should be returnable to Canada in perpetuity.

All the information available was given to the provincial authorities, but no decision was arrived at. Of course that recommendation had to be turned down as improper compensation for the use of our resources and storage space. As a result of the investigation by the Canadian section of the international joint commission they became convinced that Canada should be paid on a 50-50 basis for all downstream benefits from water stored in Canada. As was pointed out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he opened this debate, that 50-50 basis is considered fair in that there must be flow as well as head, Canada providing the flow. I believe he is perfectly correct. The international joint commission's recommendation, we suggest, could be followed advisedly by all Canadian authorities.

Mr. Hahn: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Byrne: I think it will take me 40 minutes to put the record straight, so to speak. If the house is then prepared to give unanimous consent I will answer any and all questions the hon. member may have.

Mr. Hahn: I just wanted to know, in the discussion of the agreement as to the Libby dam, how much Canada requested in return for that storage?

Mr. Byrne: I am coming to that. If the hon. member will just be patient he will find that most of his questions will be answered. I am coming to the geographical questions that have arisen in the course of this debate. I have said that it has become a principle that we should expect a 50-50 return from all downstream benefits from water stored in Canada. I said earlier that the international joint commission have had absolute co-operation from the provincial authorities on all these matters up to the present time. The provincial government was not prepared to recommend the Libby dam project under the terms proposed, and the application was withdrawn.

I believe that the United States section of the international joint commission, or at least the United States authorities, still are not prepared to go along with our ideas on this matter and are inclined to the opinion that no matter how much water we store, at some time or other it must be released for power purposes, thereby giving them downstream benefits in any case and without compensation.

A full investigation of the Columbia basin has shown that it is a feasible and financial possibility, and indeed a good business proposition to divert the excess flow of the Columbia river to the Fraser river by a tunnel about 15 miles in length.

Mr. McLeod: You need more water down there.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member's interjection indicates that he is just as confused as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) in this respect. This would be flood water held under control and released only when the river was at its minimum flow. It would cause no damage whatsoever in the lower Fraser by way of flooding. It has been ascertained by the Department of Fisheries and the international commission on fisheries, or whatever it is called, that there would be no damage to the fishing industry, that as a matter of fact it would be helpful to the industry.

The Arrow lakes storage would provide a return to Canada of about 42,000 kilowatts of power, with a value of $840,000. Of course there would be other compensating factors in the way of taxes and so on. It has been ascertained that the diversion to the Fraser river would provide between two and three million kilowatts of on-site power and downstream benefits, which at the rate of $20 per kilowatt would total some $50 million as an annual return.

This is not to say that at some time or other, in years of excessive run-off, there may not be sufficient water to fill the storage at Mica creek as well as the storage in the Arrow lakes. Engineering studies have shown that it would be doubtful that there would be sufficient water for both these storage areas. If the lower one on the Arrow lakes is built first it would naturally have priority and would endanger the economics of the Mica creek project. What is even more important, it seems to me, is that the Mica creek diversion to the Fraser has become of great interest to electrical companies in Canada. The very fact that United States interests realize that we may use this surplus water in Canada gives them a different outlook when we are negotiating for downstream benefits.

Only yesterday I received a copy of the agreement between the Kaiser Aluminum company and the government of British Columbia. I cannot say that it is absolutely wrong that such an agreement should be drawn. I am not making that assertion. But certainly any 80-20 split is not what has been anticipated by those studying the project, and therefore in that regard alone it does not seem to be a satisfactory agreement even for 3 million acre feet under storage.

In searching through the agreement I am unable to find any reference whatsoever to any firm commitment between the Bonneville Power Corporation, which is the wholesaler of the power, and the Kaiser Aluminum company which has made an agreement with the province of British Columbia. That may be an oversight. I am not a lawyer, but I have drawn up an occasional agreement, and if I were responsible for drawing up a wage agreement I would certainly want it set out fairly clearly who was going to pay the wages or who has the responsibility of seeing to it that this block of power be retained in perpetuity? A company might well go bankrupt, and it seems to me that the word or seal of the United States government or one of its corporations would be essential to such an agreement.

The entire undertaking seems to undermine the far greater interests of the people in the Columbia basin. I have already pointed out that the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke was not too clear in his understanding of the topography of British Columbia. The hon. member made special reference to the application of the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, I believe in 1938, to the international joint commission for permission to store six feet of water in Kootenay lake. Perhaps I should quote the hon. member's own words, but before doing so I would remind him I endeavoured to question him and put the record straight so this would not appear in Hansard. However, here it is as reported at page 978 of Hansard for February 8:

> In this case "downstream", of course, is in Idaho in the United States of America.

I happen to live in the area where the Kootenay river leaves Canada, flows into Montana, through Idaho, back into Canada, and into Kootenay lake, where it is stored, and where the West Kootenay Power company have framed a great amount of power. The water flows into the lower Kootenay, where it is gathered in a series of dams, one providing power for the city of Nelson and I believe owned by that city, and the others being utilized by the West Kootenay Power company. Oddly enough, this water flows into the Kootenay river just about the spot where the Kaiser Aluminum corporation proposes to build a dam on the Columbia. From there it flows into the United States through Washington and of course into Bonneville project, the Grand Coulee dam.

The hon. member stated that this was comparable to the Kaiser deal. But this application to which I have referred was made by the West Kootenay Power company during the days of the depression, when there was an abundance of power in the United States. At that time there was no thought of downstream benefits. Perhaps I should add, without reflecting on the earlier chairman, that we did not then have General McNaughton representing Canadian interests on the international joint commission.

However, during those depression years there was no demand for storage in Canada and, as a matter of fact, the West Kootenay Power and Light Company were required to pay damages to people living in the Bonners Ferry area in Idaho because the development slightly increased the danger of flooding in that district. In addition, it was not for the purpose of providing a head of water in the United States but to provide extra power for the city of Nelson and the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, a Canadian corporation paying Canadian taxes and developing Canadian industry.

The hon. member also referred to the Skagit development. I am not too familiar with that development because it is farther along and several mountain ranges intervene. However, in the Skagit development the dam was being built in the United States along lines similar to the Libby dam project. The Seattle Power Corporation, or whichever United States company was implicated, was sufficiently provident to come on the Canadian side and buy up all the property that would be flooded. There was no crown land involved and no individual objection. The water was framed up for this corporation but it had little land value, and as I understand it there was no possible storage in Canada.

To say therefore that these developments are comparable is to demonstrate that the hon. member has no appreciation of the existing facts. I find it difficult to understand how he could have arrived at the conclusion that this was a measure to be used for political advantage.

It has also been claimed that this is an infringement on provincial rights. But I would like to know since when the present provincial government became so touchy about provincial rights. I have in my hand a brief prepared by Mr. Carl Goldenberg, Q.C., special counsel, and entitled "A Brief Submitted to the Government of Canada by the Government of British Columbia on Federal-Provincial Co-operation in Economic Development." It is signed by Hon. W. A. C. Bennett, Hon. Einar M. Gunderson, and Hon. R. Bonner, and throughout that brief they request financial assistance and co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. They plead for economic growth and development; they want assistance for highways, which is a provincial matter; they want assistance in the conservation of forest resources, and they want assistance in the conservation of water, which apparently up to now is entirely a provincial matter.

I am not going to quote at length from this brief but I have underlined numerous instances in which they ask for general co-operation between the federal and provincial governments on a political and financial basis.

Mr. Hahn: On a fair share basis.

Mr. Low: What do you mean by "on a political basis"?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Byrne: When I say on a political basis, Mr. Speaker, I am referring to co-operation between the two governments to which I have referred.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should not allow the hon. member to answer a question of that kind, because it seems to me we are departing from the principle of this bill.

Mr. Byrne: As I have said, this is a request in every respect for co-operation. I have said before, Mr. Speaker, that there has been the very best co-operation between the federal government and the provincial government. In the survey that has been made the federal government has spent some $4 million. They have been a partner. That is what this brief requests, a "partnership in the development". We have been a partner. The federal officials have been a partner with the provincial authorities in making a survey to discover just how the Columbia basin may be used to the advantage of British Columbia and Canada.

Mr. Hansell: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Byrne: It is hard to understand how they can expect co-operation in other fields if this is the type of co-operation we are to get. After we have proceeded with our investigations to the point where we are in a position to say to our friends on the other side of the line: "Now we are prepared to sit down and talk; we think we have a reasonable case; we are prepared to use this water in Canada or we are prepared to give it to you on a reciprocal basis", the one partner in this Canadian provincial-dominion co-operation goes out and makes a back-door agreement which puts in jeopardy the whole Columbia basin survey and its development for Canadian use.

As to provincial rights, while water resources are provincial responsibilities I think it is correct to say that if power is to be exported out of Canada, a permit must be obtained from the federal government. With regard to natural gas a permit must be obtained. Why should there be so much misunderstanding or why should the provincial government object so strongly—if they do; and it appears that they do, from the words of the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke.

Mr. Wylie: They certainly do.

Mr. Byrne: Why should they feel so strongly about this one particular phase of our development and control of natural resources? I do not think provincial rights should be stressed to such a point that a private company may come in and make a deal that, from my observation of the agreement and the entire summary of the position, is nothing short of pillage.

When the Social Credit government was in its youth in British Columbia the minister of lands and forests was reported to have said that he was in a great international poker game with the United States in dealing with natural gas and water resources. It seems to me that the minister must have won several good hands, but he has here lost an extremely important jackpot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wylie: What do you know about it?

Mr. Low: Are you suggesting that they are going to lose?

Mr. Byrne: From time to time we hear Canadians referred to as hewers of wood and drawers of water. Is the next stage of our development to mean that Canadians will be simply hewers of wood and storers of water? I think the passing of this bill will assure that such will not be the case.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, there can be no question but that the house is discussing an extremely important bill which contains an extremely important principle. It is one which should be considered and discussed quietly on a rational basis. I greatly regret that the first speaker for the Social Credit group had to spend his 40 minutes mainly in trying to attack this government on the ground that they were motivated by political bias in the introduction of this bill. Although I may at times think they might be so motivated, I do not think that is the situation at the present time.

Mr. Sinclair: Very rarely.

Mr. Winch: I think we must take as a basis the fact that both governments are sincere in what they are doing or in the position which they are taking. One of them must be wrong. It is our responsibility to find out which one is right.

Although the bill is of a general nature, as has already been pointed out there cannot be any question but that it has been introduced at this time because of a particular situation in British Columbia. For a period of about two months before this house met it was obvious from reading the press that a major fight was developing between the government of British Columbia and the government here at Ottawa on this matter of the damming of the Columbia river approximately six miles from the city of Castlegar.

It is unfortunate the way this conflict developed in the press war. I think it was a little bit stupid or even arrogant on the part of the government of British Columbia that they should sign an agreement with the Kaiser corporation on September 17, 1954, the same day on which they notified General McNaughton that they had this purpose in view. I also think there is a certain amount of condemnation due the federal government in that, when they disagreed and thought it was wrong, they started a verbal war, maintaining that the British Columbia government was cockeyed, that they did not know what they were talking about, that it was an improvident agreement and so on.

Mr. Sinclair: All true.

Mr. Winch: Even if those things were correct, I think we could have got further if the federal government had said to the British Columbia government: We cannot see eye to eye with you; how about coming down, talking this thing over and seeing what we can arrive at?

Mr. Sinclair: But the deal was signed.

Mr. Winch: I know the deal was signed. But instead of carrying on a war and saying that when the house meets in January we are going to bring in legislation and you are not going to get away with this, why not call them in, have talks and see if you cannot work out an understanding, an agreement, an arrangement? However, that was something that did not happen.

We all knew the government was going to introduce legislation at this session. I think the reason this matter has been raised now, because of the development in British Columbia, is that for the first time in the history of our dominion a province has challenged what the federal government apparently took to be a right. Therefore they have found out that even under their existing legislation they need either clarification or additional power. Knowing that this matter was to be raised; knowing that I would get the viewpoint, the facts and the reasoning of the federal government as to why they brought in this legislation, I felt it was my duty as a member of the House of Commons from the province of British Columbia to go over to Victoria and point out to the government that, as a British Columbia M.P., when I arrived down here and heard the story of the federal government I should also have the facts and the point of view of the provincial government, and that if I did not get that information I would be placed in a most invidious position.

I went to see the premier of British Columbia and explained the situation. He said he would make an appointment for me with the minister of lands and forests. I had a long interview with Mr. Sommers, the minister of lands and forests, and I now feel I have the picture. I should like to outline it very briefly, because it is important and because it definitely emphasizes the viewpoint of the provincial government, a different party from my own, which gives rise to what may be a constitutional problem.

As I have already stated British Columbia, for reasons best known to that government, signed an agreement with the Kaiser corporation on September 17, 1954. Under the terms of this agreement the corporation had to post $125,000 as a guarantee that they would proceed with all the test borings and so on. They were committed to spending not less than $100,000 before March 1 of this year, only some two and one-half weeks away. If, as a result of those borings, it was found feasible to establish a dam approximately six miles from Castlegar, then the corporation agreed to establish a Canadian corporation which would apply for a conditional water licence. If they got the conditional licence they would post an additional bond of $125,000. They would start construction of the dam on or before August 1, 1956 and would complete it by August 1, 1959.

By following through on this agreement the province of British Columbia would have built a dam financed by the Kaiser corporation at a cost somewhere between $25 million and $30 million. The province would receive 20 per cent of the power output delivered anywhere on the international border that the British Columbia government requested. The provincial government would receive annual taxes on the dam in the amount of approximately $275,000.

Now, at this point I asked the minister a question. May I say that I am not divulging any confidences; I went there officially as an M.P. from British Columbia, and in all the discussion I was told only once that something was in confidence. What I was told in confidence I cannot and will not disclose. There were no limitations placed on me concerning anything else I was told. One of the first questions I asked was the matter raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) a few moments ago. What is the relationship in this matter with the Bonneville power authority? The minister told me they had seen the agreement signed between the Kaiser corporation and the Bonneville power interests. Although there is no mention of that in the contract, such an agreement is in existence.

Having been told that this was the purpose of the original agreement, I then stated that the government at Ottawa said the province would not be allowed to carry out this agreement. What was the position of the province? I want to convey to you the information I received because I think it is of interest and of concern. The answer was, "We have a plan B, and if we cannot proceed with plan A because of the action of the federal government we will proceed with plan B." What is plan B? Plan B is that instead of the Kaiser corporation building the dam it will be built by the British Columbia power commission, which will borrow money under its government guarantee.

I cannot give you the exact amount, because the minister of lands and forests has mentioned three different figures in the last two months. He told me they would borrow at 3·75 per cent, but I noticed last week in his speech in the British Columbia legislature he said they would borrow at 4·2 per cent. If they borrow at 4·2 per cent, I believe they have an agreement with the Kaiser people that they will be paid back at the rate of 6·275 per cent. In other words, according to the minister of lands and forests, under plan B the provincial government would be making an additional gain because they would get the difference between 4·2 per cent and 6·275 per cent, at which rate they would be repaid by the Kaiser corporation. In addition, they would still get their 20 per cent of the power; they would still get their $275,000 in taxes, even although the dam would not be owned by Kaiser. Kaiser would make the province an annual grant of $275,000 as though the corporation owned it. In addition, the Kaiser people would make the provincial government a grant of somewhere between $250,000 and $350,000 annually to take care of the maintenance and improvements required on the dam owned by the British Columbia power commission.

That was plan B, which I understand they still intend to put into effect. This gave rise, sir, to the next question: If Ottawa passes an act to the effect that you have not the constitutional power, what are you going to do about it? The answer I received, and the answer I have read in the newspapers, is that the provincial government will challenge the authority of the federal government and will proceed with the dam.

On what basis is it maintained that the British Columbia government cannot be stopped? They say on this basis: How can the crown, in the right of the dominion, get a judgment or issue an injunction against the crown in the right of the province? Constitutionally and legally, how can you do it?

Mr. Knowles: "Howe"—it is all in how you spell "how".

Mr. Winch: There is no "e" on that how. I am not a lawyer nor a constitutional authority, although I am very interested in that subject. I have been trying to find out just how—without the "e"—the crown in the right of the dominion can sue the crown in the right of the province. I am told it is most difficult. I have not been able to run it down, but I was told by a very eminent judge in this dominion that there is a precedent in Canada. Although it is most difficult for the federal authorities to sue the provincial authorities, I am told it is possible to sue a cabinet minister, as an individual, for doing something illegally.

Mr. Knowles: Page the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Winch: I understand there is a precedent for that in Canada.

Then that raised the next question. Suppose some method is found for getting an injunction against the provincial government. The provincial government says it is going to go ahead no matter what the dominion parliament says. How are you going to serve such an injunction? It will have to be served by the sheriff. What is he going to do with it? Is he going to say the dominion government takes this position and you have to stop? I am afraid it would not work. Are you going to put the minister of lands and forests in jail?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are worrying about someone else's trouble.

Mr. Winch: You are not going to stop the gravel trucks from dumping gravel at the Kaiser dam. There are some very interesting and intriguing angles, not only interesting and intriguing but of the utmost importance. I believe this is something we have to try to settle reasonably and rationally. I do not believe it will be in the best interests of Canada if we have one government versus the other government, or one threatening to take the other into court and the provincial government saying, "Go ahead, take me to court; I will not obey it anyway." I believe that would give rise to a situation in Canada that we would all deplore. So, sir, no matter who is right, I do feel that to a great extent this matter boils down to the constitutional issue.

I noticed that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), speaking on this matter the other day, said this phase could and would be discussed when the bill was referred to the committee on external affairs. We were all very glad to hear that; but because of the importance of the issue I do feel that members in the House of Commons have a right to expect that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) would give us some insight into the constitutional angle, and as to why this government maintains it is within its rights.

My reason for thinking that important is this. I am convinced that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not have introduced this bill if he had not received advice from the Attorney General and his legal advisers to the effect that he had power to do this. But when I attended the meeting in Victoria I asked the Social Credit premier and his minister of lands and forests this question. "Have you received legal advice?" He said, "We have had the best legal advice we can get. We have consulted our own attorney general's department, and they say we have the power to go ahead and do what we are doing, irrespective of what is said by Ottawa and the House of Commons". So we have one attorney general's department saying, "You have the power to go ahead" and another attorney general's department saying, "You have not the power to go ahead." Quite obviously there has to be a meeting of minds on this issue, because it is a prime issue and has to be settled.

Mr. Sinclair: How long since the attorney general in British Columbia left law school?

Mr. Winch: I have not the faintest idea; but this I do know, that you cannot always judge ability by age. Whether he is accepted as a brilliant lawyer, constitutionally, I do not know. But I do know that the minister always obtains the advice of those who are under him, of men who are in the civil service because of their ability and their brains.

Mr. Sinclair: Do you think they take the advice?

Mr. Winch: All I know is that in Victoria they have received legal advice, and I am not questioning their statement, nor do I question their integrity or sincerity. Neither do I challenge the sincerity, the integrity nor the ability of those who have advised this government in a different way. But surely it must be obvious that, two governments and two departments being at opposite poles, there must be a constitutional issue in some way.

Mr. Knowles: There must be Rhodes scholars on both sides.

Mr. Winch: I am not a constitutional lawyer.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is why we have the supreme court.

Mr. Winch: I was coming to that. If I had time I could make a pretty good speech proving the constitutional powers of the dominion.

Mr. Sinclair: It would be the first good speech you had made in the house, then.

Mr. Winch: And I could make a pretty good speech on the opposite side of the picture as well. I heard what the minister said. I was not going to comment upon it, but the only time he does not think I make a good speech is when he does not like what I am saying but does not know how to disagree with it.

If we look at section 92 of the British North America Act we can have no doubt whatsoever that matters such as we are now discussing come within the jurisdiction of the dominion government. We find that subsection 10(c) is as follows:

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:
> (a) Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

That is pretty clear. It states that the province does not have jurisdiction if the federal parliament declares a work inside a province to be for the general good of Canada or of two or more of the provinces. But, sir, I was most interested to note that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke the other day he made reference to the treaty of 1909, which has been quoted by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). Although the hon. member quoted article 9 the Minister of Trade and Commerce quoted article 2. I may have misunderstood the minister, but I cannot interpret article 2 as giving exclusive power to the dominion government on international waters.

Mr. Low: That is what he said.

Mr. Winch: That was the way I heard it, but if I am wrong I stand to be corrected. The minister made specific reference to article 2 which states this, very definitely:

> Each of the high contracting parties reserves to itself, or to the several state governments on the one side and the dominion or provincial governments on the other—

And so on. I am not going to read all of it, but article 2 in the treaty of 1909, which is found in the statutes of 1911, does make reference to the provinces as well as to the dominion.

Now, British Columbia has been exercising powers in respect of international rivers for a good many years, under the authority of an act of the legislature. That authority is the water act of British Columbia, which has been on the statute books of the province since 1897. It was never yet been challenged, nor has there been any challenge of the authority exercised under it. To the best of my knowledge British Columbia is now exercising a right it has always had, or that it has had since 1897.

But, sir, until now the federal government has never obstructed or objected to the use of that power. We are now discussing a general bill which, actually, has only one specific application at the moment, and that is to the Kaiser dam. It must be kept in mind, however, that the Columbia river takes in not only the Columbia river proper but takes in also all its tributaries and the lakes which go to make up the Columbia river basin. This takes in the Okanagan lakes, the Arrow lakes and the Kootenay lakes as well as numerous rivers and hundreds of creeks. And, sir, the Columbia river basin already has numerous dams, used not only for the purpose of generating power but for water storage and the water is stored not only for the benefit of British Columbia but for that of the United States. Objection has not been raised in the past; therefore I think it is understandable why confusion has now developed with the introduction of this bill, at a time when one more dam is going in.

I am trying only to give an outline of the picture as I see it. I believe a major constitutional issue is involved, or at least that the matter is in need of clarification. I am convinced we are not going to be able to settle the problem here or in Victoria. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has in mind, I do believe that it will have to be referred to the supreme court. It might be a good idea if that announcement were made now so we could have a finding and an authoritative decision as to the constitutional rights, the position of the province and the dominion, and the distribution of authority between those two legislative bodies. It is necessary, because there does need to be clarification of the terminology of the constitution itself.

Under the British North America Act the province has control of its own natural resources. It is thought by many—I think I can say by most—that water is a natural resource of the province, and as long as the province deals only with that water inside its own borders it is a matter for provincial jurisdiction. The water actually does not come up for export until it leaves the province. The water eventually has to leave the province. Is the province therefore interfering with the export of water because it is on a controlled basis?

Until now the government has not taken the position that it now desires to take. Until now, as I understand it, the federal government has taken the position that where the export comes in is not on the natural resource of water but on the export of power produced by the water inside the provincial boundary. That is quite obvious if you recall that not so long ago the government at Ottawa raised no objection—at least it must have agreed—to the West Kootenay Power and Light installation at Waneta; but when after completion it was found that in south-eastern British Columbia there was a 75,000 kilowatt surplus of power, the government stepped in and refused the right to export that power to the United States.

Is there a line of demarcation between the resource of water and the resource of electrical energy, or are they one and the same because water is the raw material of hydro-electric energy? Sir, I sincerely hope that I have not made confusion worse confounded. I have tried to raise some of the problems as I see them, and to give my honest interpretation of what is in the mind of the provincial government after my talk with the premier and the minister of lands and forests of that province.

I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying, Mr. Speaker, that I am 100 per cent in support of the principle of the bill we are now discussing. I believe it is high time there was a greater understanding on the part of the federal government and a greater interest in the development of local resources for the national good; that there was a greater interest not only in the protection of our resources but also a greater interest in the development of our resources in the various provinces of Canada. It is because I am so much in support of what I am convinced is the purpose behind this bill that I would hate to see it bog down and the issue become even more confused. Because these present difficulties, problems and misunderstandings, perhaps, have not been cleared away I sincerely hope that we shall hear from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) before this bill leaves this house on second reading, so he can clarify a number of the problems and points I have brought up.

In conclusion may I say I feel that both governments have been wrong in carrying on a press warfare. I hope, and I think we will all agree, that in the future, instead of going after each other hammer and tongs we shall make an effort to get together and talk things over and see if provincially and nationally we cannot get together in the interests not only of our province, its industries and its resources, but the general good of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to commend the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) and also the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) on the approach which they have adopted in this dangerous situation. The remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East must have impressed even the most hotheaded among the bureaucrats in Ottawa that it is a good thing to be just a little cautious, and that you cannot override the provinces. Of course the Dominion of Canada, with all its might, could override the provinces, but in so doing it would destroy the Dominion of Canada, which is a very serious matter and should give pause for a great deal of thought.

I will just say this in leaving the hon. member for Vancouver East. He spoke just as I would expect him to speak, as a socialist, in favour of this bill. I, as a Social Crediter, will oppose the bill and the principle of the bill, because I believe that the hon. member for Vancouver East had just as much sense about how to govern British Columbia when he was in the British Columbia legislature as he has now when he is in the House of Commons at Ottawa. Consequently, he could have governed in British Columbia just as well as he can possibly do in Ottawa.

Why then take the power and authority away from the province, which will do the job well, and put it in the hands of the dominion which may or may not do the job well? That is the great point that has to be dealt with. I referred to that last night to some extent in my little discursions into Rhodes scholarships and the like.

The cause of Bill No. 3, which is before the house at the present time, would strongly appear to be the Castlegar dam project proposed by British Columbia. I desire to get away entirely from political considerations and try to shed light and not heat on the situation. It will be my endeavour in this speech to present to the house and to Canadians all across our country a readily understandable picture of the Castlegar dam, sometimes called the Kaiser dam project. What is the nature of it? What is the purpose of it? What are the motives behind the proposal of it?

Details in my remarks will be based upon the plan as outlined by Mr. R. E. Sommers, British Columbia minister of lands and forests and minister of mines in his radio address over radio station CBU Vancouver on November 29, 1954. By doing that, I shall be able to keep away from all these extraneous things which the hon. member for Vancouver East injected into the discussion, thereby causing confusion. My object is to keep the issues clear.

The proposed Castlegar dam is to be located at the outlet of Arrow lakes, British Columbia. The general idea behind the project may be briefly stated thus: The British Columbia government, through the use of this dam, proposes to store 3 million acre feet of high water in the Columbia river and let that water down the Columbia into the United States in times of low water to help maintain production in certain United States hydroelectric plants, and to receive, as compensation, power to the value of some $840,000 per year for 50 years. In effect it means the saving of the 3 million acre feet of water normally running to waste, and selling that water to the United States people for at least $840,000 to help pay off British Columbia's heavy provincial debt.

The Arrow lakes constitute a hundred mile long enlargement of the gigantic Columbia river in the interior of British Columbia. At the outlet of the Arrow lakes is the town of Castlegar, located on the banks of the Columbia river near what are known as the Castlegar narrows. Past Castlegar there flows each year through these narrows down to the United States border, a distance of some 25 to 30 miles, a huge volume of Canadian water which is running to waste as far as Canada is concerned, a waste of water to Canada, a waste of hydroelectric power, too. If that water comes down in times of high water the United States cannot use it, and it is then a waste to the United States and to the whole North American continent. I hope that matter will be borne strictly in mind by all people dealing with this matter.

What can the British Columbia government do? What could any group of people in the house do? What could you do? What would you do? What can the British Columbia government do to salvage some of this waste water? Could that government build a dam at Castlegar or further down, generate electric power and use it in those parts of the province? The facts available to the British Columbia government seem to prove that the terrain at Castlegar is not stable enough to support a high crest dam. This seems to be a fact that most people who talk about this project too hastily do not know.

Can nothing be done about this waste? The British Columbia government think that something might be done. If a low-level dam could safely be built at Castlegar and it was high enough and strong enough, then the water in the Arrow lakes could be backed up and the level raised high enough to store an estimated 3 million acre feet of water to be held there to be let run downriver in times of low water. If this can be done then perhaps that stored-up water which is running to waste now could be backed up to supply hydroelectric generating plants downriver in the United States at periods when they need that water in order to keep those plants running at the most profitable rate. The return to British Columbia for that water under this proposal is that the United States shall grant British Columbia payment in terms of power and not money.

The British Columbia government believes, and has believed, that the evidence available justifies them in exploring the possibility. I hope it is not unconstitutional to explore possibilities! In order to find the most satisfactory and economical way in which to get the necessary exploring done, they studied the matter for some time. Finally a United States company offered to undertake the job of exploring on what looked like rather attractive terms. This company is the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation.

This United States corporation, after lengthy negotiations with the British Columbia government—as all negotiations in connection with this project have been lengthy and careful; as careful as would have been the case with any dominion government group, notwithstanding the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) with all his wisdom—this Kaiser company after lengthy negotiations finally arrived at an agreement with the British Columbia provincial government.

The company finally agreed, first, to explore the physical and economic feasibility of building such a low-level dam at Castlegar narrows at the outlet of the Arrow lakes and second, in case the exploration satisfied both the province and the company as to the feasibility of the project, to construct at Castlegar a low-level dam. There are two distinct phases to the contract, two distinct kinds of jobs to be done: First, exploring, and second, constructing.

The corporation agreed to explore on the following terms—may I draw attention to the great care which the British Columbia government has exercised in that agreement. They got an agreement just as good as the Minister of Fisheries could get: First, the corporation would post a bond of $125,000. Second, they would proceed immediately with test borings, geological surveys, field engineering and other engineering work for the purpose of determining the feasibility of the project.

Third, they would spend not less than $100,000 before March 1, 1955—I understand there has been a change in that date because of circumstances over which no one had any control—or a proportionate amount of the $100,000 if the project were deemed unfeasible before March 1. Fourth, they would furnish to the province a certified statement containing a complete record of all expenditures. Fifth, they would forfeit the corporation's $125,000 bond if they failed to comply with all the provisions of the agreement. Even a Rhodes scholar could not do any better than that!

The agreement to explore was signed on September 17, 1954. Note that it is an agreement only to explore. All the silly outbursts that have been heard from various members of this government occurred after this agreement to explore, not construct, had been signed. I do not recall in the history of Canada such recklessness in pronouncements by ministers of the crown. The British Columbia government did not go so far as has been contended in signing that agreement on September 17.

The corporation, if it were judged feasible by both principals, agreed to construct the Castlegar dam on the following terms: First, the corporation would incorporate a Canadian company under the laws of British Columbia. Second, it would obligate its Canadian company to make application for a licence under the provisions of the water act, to which reference has already been made today, it being recognized that such licence if granted would permit construction of the works. Third, it would at the time of the application recognize entitlement to be heard to all those whose rights would be affected and to anyone representing public interests. Fourth, in case the licence is granted to and accepted by the Canadian company, then the Canadian company or the corporation will be committed to deposit forthwith a further sum of $125,000 as a performance bond. There is caution. There is nothing there to get awfully excited about, to call it cockeyed and that kind of thing. Fifth, it would commence the construction of the Castlegar dam on or before August 1, 1956; sixth, complete the dam on or before August 1, 1959. An orderly development all the way through! No minister of fisheries nor any other person in this parliament could do any better.

The province of British Columbia agreed that when the storage dam is completed, under the provisions of the water act they will issue a final licence to the company covering a term of 50 years. See how carefully everything has been done. There is provision for renewal of such term for such period and subject to such conditions as the province and the company may agree upon. A person would think that the government out there had bartered away half of British Columbia to hear some of these reckless people talk.

These conditions would also be included in any conditional licence issued. You will notice that there is no loophole anywhere. In return for these rights the company agrees: First, to deliver to the province energy to the amount of 20 per cent of the kilowatt hours which could be generated at downstream plants of the federal government of the United States from the net storage waters created by the storage dam. That is specific, is it not? This 20 per cent is calculated to be some 42,000 kilowatt hours annually.

Second, the company agrees to deliver to the province of British Columbia 20 per cent of all energy that might from the net storage of water rendered possible by the dam be generated in such additional dams with generating facilities as may be constructed downstream, the marketing agency for the energy generated by which is the Bonneville power administration. As has been brought out this afternoon that agreement is absolutely ironclad. The figure of 20 per cent is not final, but it demonstrates how carefully everything was planned in British Columbia. The government is free to negotiate further before agreeing to a final figure. Everything has been done to protect the interests of the people of British Columbia.

There are indications that further benefits might accrue to British Columbia beyond the 42,000 kilowatts. There is a strong possibility that British Columbia might obtain a 60 to 70 per cent load factor on the 42,000 kilowatts delivered, in any agreed period. Based upon the 70 per cent load factor this would give British Columbia an additional 18,000 kilowatts.

What are the financial advantages to British Columbia? First there is the value of the kilowatts. We have 42,000 kilowatts at $20 per kilowatt—which is a conservative figure—which would amount to $840,000. Second, there are the taxes on the dam which are estimated to amount to $275,000 a year. That would provide a clear profit annually of at least $1 million for the province of British Columbia.

This is the kind of management that enables a Social Credit government to get out of debt! It is reported that the federal government—and I emphasize this is a report—has advanced a proposal known as a 50-50 agreement between the province and the Kaiser corporation. The minister is here and he can correct me if I make any mistakes.

I am not sure I have all the facts here, but I have made some progress since I started a week ago. To return to this reported arrangement, I believe any such 50-50 arrangement with the province of British Columbia would mean that the province or the storer would have to build and maintain the dam, a fact which not so very many people recognize. The Kaiser corporation would pay the province compensation for the stored water, and that compensation would amount to 50 per cent of the power generated with that water.

Mr. Lesage: What if the Kaiser corporation obtains no power at all?

Mr. Blackmore: Well, it is just like a farmer planting his crop. He may not get a crop this year. There have been such things as crop failures.

Mr. Lesage: That is not an answer.

Mr. Blackmore: There must be give and take. If nothing is done with this water it will continue to pour down there for the next 100 years as far as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) is concerned, and without any advantage to the people. But I would rather people would ask me questions when I have completed my remarks. I wish to put all these facts where they can be readily available, and if there is anything wrong I am quite prepared to answer questions afterward.

Now, what would the federal government's proposal result in? In this case the British Columbia government would first of all have to build the dam. That would cost $30 million at an interest of 5½ per cent, which would amount to $1,650,000.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have no wish to interrupt the hon. member, but he is suggesting I said that power should be divided 50-50 between the province of British Columbia and the Kaiser corporation. I wish to assure him that I said nothing of the kind. I cannot think of a more improvident arrangement. The hon. member is therefore dealing with a suggestion which certainly did not come from me.

Mr. Blackmore: I appreciate the minister's intervention, and I am anxious to obtain all the information I can get. This is a very serious question, and I have no desire to make any mistakes. I do not want to have the same ghastly record as that built up by some members of the cabinet over the past three months. However, I have already pointed out that it had been reported that the federal government has advanced this proposition, and I am dealing with this proposition. If there is no such proposal then my remarks are naturally cancelled out.

Now, I will just repeat what I have said so everyone will get it straight. In the case of the 50-50 proposition, as I understand it, British Columbia would pay $30 million for building the dam. That money at interest of 5½ per cent would cost $1,650,000 a year. Operation and maintenance of the dam would cost $350,000 a year. The annual cost to the province at that rate would be $2 million a year, going on and on. This would be a demonstration of how governments, other than Social Credit governments, get into debt.

On the basis that 20 per cent of the power generated would be 42,000 kilowatts, the province receiving 50 per cent of the power generated would get 105,000 kilowatts per year. At $20 per kilowatt this would give 105,000 x $20 or $2,100,000 annually; but the annual cost to the province would be $2 million. Thus the net financial return to the province would be only $100,000. But if the Kaiser corporation built the dam the province would have collected $275,000 as taxes. Such taxes would be lost if the province owned the dam. Thus by using the 50-50 device reported proposed by Ottawa the province would sustain a net loss of $175,000 per year, and at the end of 50 years would still be in debt for the $30 million estimated capital cost of the dam.

It will therefore be seen that there is no need to bring in control from Ottawa in order to have good management of the province's affairs.

Some important questions have arisen out of the controversy which has taken place on this question. The first is, will this Castlegar or Kaiser low-level dam upset the present economy of Arrow lakes? British Columbia's official answer to this is:

> Water will be stored only at such heights as will not damage existing communities, farm areas, and land transportation.

This argument has been advanced by many people, though I am not going to refer to any individual in particular. I am trying to keep names out of this except, of course, for that of the Minister of Fisheries and I am quite happy to mention him because I understand he is a Rhodes scholar.

The second question is, will the application of the principle involved in this Kaiser dam project tend to establish a vested interest in the United States? It is recognized that the dominion government always has to be careful to see to it that a vested interest is not established in the United States because of possible complications in the future. But is there that danger of establishing a vested interest with regard to water or power in this instance? The answer is no. The water concerned is already running into the United States and going to waste. How can we establish a vested interest when the U.S. already are getting all the water?

Power is not going to be exported. The hon. member for Vancouver East, although he displayed a fine knowledge of the matter, still seemed to have the idea that power was going to be generated in British Columbia and exported to the United States. Such is not the case. The water is to be allowed to go downriver and the power is to be generated in the United States and probably sold there, because there is little likelihood of it being sold in British Columbia for the simple reason that British Columbia could not at the present time absorb that power in that particular area. There is no chance of establishing a vested interest with respect to water and power which could be of any real danger.

Furthermore the entire agreement will be terminated at the end of 50 years, at which time the province will be completely free to renegotiate; and that again obviates the possibility of there being any vested interest. I hope that at the end of this period the province of British Columbia will be still running its own affairs and will be guided by men just as wise as those who are guiding its policies today.

The third problem is, should British Columbia develop the Kaiser corporation project of storing water in the Arrow lakes before certain other projects for producing power in that particular area of British Columbia? For example, such projects as Waneta dam No. 1 and Waneta dam No. 2, Murphy creek, and Mica creek. There is much talk about the advisability of developing one or other of those projects. Let us examine them. The answer is no in each case. Waneta No. 1, capable of greatly increased power production, has not been further developed because there is not in that area enough market for power to justify the expansion of the plant or of its production. That just punctures some balloons of imagination quite thoroughly.

Waneta No. 2 cannot possibly be developed until after Waneta No. 1 attains full development. That spoils the fun again for a lot of the boys, does it not? As to Murphy creek: from the hydro engineers' standpoint, Murphy creek should be developed only after Waneta 1 and Waneta 2 have been developed to full realization of their potential, and their resultant power shall have been purchased in British Columbia. It cannot be purchased outside because the dominion government prohibits the export of electricity. Just look at the corner that puts a lot of the wise boys at Ottawa in!

At the present time there is already in that area of British Columbia—as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) said—a surplus of 75,000 kilowatts that cannot as yet be marketed. Then how could you conceivably develop Waneta No. 2 or Waneta No. 1 with that surplus of power already in the general district? The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) points out that the wise boys here are allowing that 75,000 kilowatts to go to waste.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Peace River seems to be a little bit doubtful as the hon. member speaks.

Mr. Low: No, not at all.

Mr. Blackmore: No. The hon. member for Peace River was a member of that clear-eyed, bright brained group of young men that put Alberta on a paying basis.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member for Lethbridge permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes; if it is not too long.

Mr. Herridge: Will he tell the house where Waneta No. 1 is located and Waneta No. 2?

Mr. Blackmore: That is not a question at all. The power that would come from them would probably be sold in the central area of British Columbia, as I understand it. I would prefer not to have questions asked now. May I ask that at the end of my talk questions be asked and I will deal with them then. If I cannot do so, there are some British Columbia men here who can.

Other reasons for deferring the development of the Murphy creek dam are as follows. First, a high crest dam which would be required to generate the electricity at Murphy creek would create a reservoir that would reduce the generating capacity of the present dam at Brilliant.

Mr. Fulton: This is out of order.

Mr. Blackmore: No; it is not out of order. Do not let Rhodes scholars try to stop me in that way. These are matters that are pertinent to this thing. Very well. As I was saying, a high crest dam at Murphy creek would create a reservoir that would reduce the generating capacity of the present dam at Brilliant. That is an important matter. Second, such a Murphy creek dam would adversely affect existing settlements at the junction of the Columbia and Kootenay rivers. Third, such a Murphy creek dam would disrupt present transportation and communication in that section of the Kootenays which links Trail with Nelson.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member tell us which paths of communication it would obstruct?

Mr. Blackmore: Ask me questions at the end of my speech.

Fourth, such a Murphy creek dam would create a reservoir that would distress the presently expanding settlements and industries in the vicinity of Castlegar. Those are enough considerations to make a person a little bit hesitant about advocating the Murphy creek dam too energetically.

It is agreed by British Columbia authorities that the Murphy creek project is one that ought to be constructed when market conditions in British Columbia warrant it and not until then, but that at present Murphy creek dam should be deferred. When and if the Murphy creek dam is built it is suggested that a low crest Murphy creek dam be used with upstream storage in Arrow lakes and at other points on the Columbia to provide regular flow. Such a low crest or perhaps medium crest elevation dam would avoid flooding out a portion of the head at Brilliant, and would avoid, in considerable measure, adversely affecting existing settlements at the junction of the Kootenay and the Columbia; it would avoid disrupting transportation, etc., between Trail and Nelson; and it would avoid distressing areas in the vicinity of Castlegar. So it sounds a little bit more attractive perhaps as a practical proposition to be deferred and probably built at a later time.

As to the gigantic Mica creek hydro power development, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) the other day said the brilliant men who were at that meeting—

Mr. Herridge: They know more about it than you do.

Mr. Blackmore: We will see how much they know. If they do not know more than the C.C.F. do, I am not much concerned.

Mr. Herridge: Tell us what communications between Trail and Castlegar will be interrupted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: The British Columbia official statement says this. I presume it was prepared by the very best engineers that can be obtained out in that country. The statement says:

> It appears that it will take several years yet until the problems associated with Mica creek and other upstream regulations have been analysed thoroughly.

It sounds just exactly reasonable. Meanwhile if we wait until the Mica creek dam is built or until the time comes to develop it, that 3 million acre feet of water is running away and going down the drain with the complete approval of many of the wise men in the country.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Will the development of the Castlegar dam project mar the feasibility of other projects presently in operation, presently under construction or presently being contemplated? Will it tend in any way to interfere with the ultimate over-all maximum potentiality of the development of the Columbia river system in its entirety relative to, first, power production and employment and, second, water conservation and use?

Hon. Robert Sommers said in his radio broadcast on November 29, 1954:

> There are those who say the Castlegar proposal will endanger the over-all power plan for the development of the Columbia river. Nothing could be further from the truth.

No doubt he had behind him the very best engineering skill in British Columbia, and that is fairly good.

In an official statement given out on the matter of the proposed low dam by the British Columbia government appear these words:

> Storage on lower Arrow lake, on the other hand, guarantees a high and steady revenue for the next fifty years, without prejudice to major development that lies ahead for that part of the Columbia river upstream in Canadian territory.

Has the British Columbia government proceeded with appropriate care in connection with this Castlegar project? Yes. General A. G. L. McNaughton some time ago made a suggestion. This is something that some of the people will want to know. It will be good for their souls to hear it. General A. G. L. McNaughton some time ago suggested that the British Columbia Social Credit government set up a Columbia river basin development advisory committee to review the Castlegar dam project in relation to the development of the Columbia river in its other hydro power development phases. The present British Columbia government accepted that suggestion. General McNaughton made definite recommendations as to personnel. Again his recommendations were accepted. That shows that these Social Crediters out there are quite ready to listen to reason as long as it is reason.

The committee was set up in 1953. Its members are: Hon. R. E. Sommers; Hon. W. K. Kiernan; Hon. W. D. Black; Hon. T. H. Crosby—all members of the British Columbia cabinet—Mr. R. G. Anderson, vice-president, West Kootenay Power and Light Company—and he ought to know something about it—

Mr. Herridge: He is against the project.

Mr. Blackmore: Just a minute. I would ask the hon. member to control himself. I think I have talked just about as fast as I can. If you just give me a little bit more time I will cover the whole thing. The other members were Mr. T. Ingledow, vice-president of the British Columbia Electric Company Limited, and Mr. Gordon J. A. Kidd, project engineer, department of lands, secretary. That sounds like a fairly sensible selection, does it not? It is also General McNaughton's suggestion.

Was the Castlegar dam approved by the committee? That is the next thing. Yes.

Mr. Herridge: With Mr. Anderson objecting.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes. I will give that if the hon. member will control himself. If he will just hold on to himself for a minute I will come to it. I cannot say everything at once. I am sure that if the hon. member allows me to say it, the situation will be clearer than the way it is now. Was it approved by the committee? Yes; on November 26, 1954. The only member voting against the motion to endorse the agreement was Mr. R. G. Anderson, vice-president of the West Kootenay Power and Light Company!

Mr. Herridge: With the majority present cabinet ministers.

Mr. Blackmore: All those details can be ironed out. But the information I am giving here is information which was given in the throne speech made by Hon. Robert Sommers. I take it to be absolutely accurate. Until it is proved to be inaccurate, I will accept his word ahead of that of any man in this house.

Is there any particular urgency about proceeding with the Castlegar project as soon as practicable? Yes. First, the states just across the border greatly need power right now, not when the Mica creek dam or the Murphy creek dam or any other dam can be constructed. Secondly, if they do not get such power from British Columbia now they will take steps to obtain power elsewhere. If British Columbia refuses to help them when such help can be so easily afforded, that fact will be considered by them as somewhat less than a good neighbourly gesture. Fourth, British Columbia greatly needs the $1 million a year to reduce further her public debt.

Mr. Herridge: Peanuts.

Mr. Blackmore: There is a socialist talking again.

How can Bill No. 3 be justified? First, British Columbia, as a sovereign province of Canada, owns her natural resources and must continue to own them, otherwise she cannot possibly carry on as a province. Only 3 per cent of the land in British Columbia is arable.

Mr. Herridge: That is why we should not flood it.

Mr. Blackmore: It is not easy to run a province under such conditions as those. Provincial expenses are heavy. Think of the heavy costs British Columbia has incurred in building her roads. She particularly needs the resources she does have, and one of these is water. The present government of British Columbia has made good progress in administering the affairs of the province, paying off $50 million of the over $191 million of debt which existed on February 14, 1952.

Mr. Herridge: Left in the pot by a Liberal government.

Mr. Blackmore: British Columbia has always been keenly alert to the need for the wisest possible development of her water resources, and I presume she will continue to be if she is left to go on and do the work the way she wants to do it.

The federal government has introduced Bill No. 3 on the plea that it wants to see the Columbia river developed in an orderly manner.

Mr. Herridge: That is right.

Mr. Blackmore: The implication is that the province could not do it. How foolish some of these centralizers can be! The federal government says that under article 2 of the boundary waters treaty of 1909, the federal government has complete control over the Columbia river, since it is a river that rises in Canada and flows across the border into the United States. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) just exploded that theory by reading into the record a statement from the international boundary waters treaty.

The introductory speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) misinterprets article 2 of the boundary waters treaty of 1909. It misrepresents that article, it misapplies that article. That is more than serious for a man in the position this man occupies.

For the introduction of Bill No. 3, the federal government can find no possible justification constitutionally, legally, economically, morally or ethically. I suggest that the only genuinely becoming thing for the minister to do is to withdraw Bill No. 3, and to apologize to British Columbia and the other provinces. Then, he should arrange to meet the British Columbia government in some city in British Columbia and enter into a most thoroughgoing negotiation to determine in what ways the federal government can most acceptably and efficiently co-operate with British Columbia in working for the most advantageous development of the Columbia river. We are not asking for anything more than was accorded Mr. Duplessis within the last six months.

Mr. Herridge: That is not what the people of Kootenay think.

Mr. Blackmore: I am making this speech, and the least the hon. member can do is to listen to it.

Mr. Herridge: We believe in democracy.

Mr. Blackmore: You do not sound like it. Any group of people that stands up here and says that the control of the resources of British Columbia should reside in Ottawa does not believe in democracy for British Columbia.

Mr. Herridge: We did not claim that.

Mr. Blackmore: Everything that has been said thus far indicates that rather strongly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him his time has just expired.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, to deal at length with the contentious discussion that has been going on about the building of the proposed dam near Castlegar in British Columbia. However, I might mention that I have already given the reasons why I am of the opinion that the building of that dam at this time would not be good business for British Columbia or for Canada as a whole.

On January 4 last I addressed a letter to Mr. Crowder, the secretary-treasury of the Trail chamber of commerce, in which I detailed the reasons for my opinion. I do not have to repeat those reasons this afternoon because, on Friday night last, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) mentioned them in this house. The reasons I gave at that time were based on the radio speech made by the minister of lands and forests of British Columbia, just as the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was based on that radio talk. I agree that the letter to Mr. Crowder contains a few things that are not exactly accurate because, as I say, at that time I did not have the opportunity to take cognizance of the agreement between the Kaiser company and the British Columbia government signed on September 17, 1954, a copy of which I have with me now.

Apart from a very few minor amendments which do not affect the substance of that letter, I may say that the letter stands as it is and that the reasons given in that letter for my opposition stand today. I am not going back to them. The only thing I want to say on that subject now is that I was rather surprised that a man of vision like the hon. member for Lethbridge—

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Speaker, would the minister care to table the letter so we can have a copy of it?

Mr. Lesage: I have no objection to tabling a copy of the letter. If there is unanimous consent I shall table it tomorrow. I am in the hands of the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not understand the request of the hon. member.

Mr. Hahn: I referred to the letter mentioned by the minister with respect to the Kaiser people; the Crowder letter.

Mr. Lesage: I shall send the hon. member a copy.

As I was saying, I had always thought of the hon. member for Lethbridge as a man of vision, but this afternoon it seemed to me when he was speaking about huge surpluses of power in British Columbia at this time he was forgetting what had happened in other provinces of Canada. Not so many years ago some people in authority in Ontario were claiming the right to export power to the United States. They based their demand on the fact that there was a huge surplus of power in their province, a surplus which would exist for generations. The hon. member for Lethbridge was making the same plea this afternoon. Only 20 years later—

Mr. Blackmore: On a question of privilege, I would like to mention that I said 75,000 which, I understand, is not a very large amount; and yet it is enough to spoil the market.

Mr. Lesage: Seventy-five thousand what?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Kilowatts.

Mr. Lesage: Well, I believe it is exactly the same situation. Today Ontario is in a position where her last source of power is the St. Lawrence seaway development; and after that there is nothing else. And when we think how young our country is it will be realized that I am using the right expression when I say that a deal like the Kaiser one is equivalent to selling down the river or giving down the river the possibilities of power development in this country at this time. Future generations, or even ourselves, would regret it—and in a very few years' time.

There is no doubt that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) advocates the export of our natural resources because when he gave the reasons for the building of the Castlegar dam at this time, the first reason he mentioned was that it would provide electricity which is badly needed—badly needed not in Canada but in the United States. That was the first reason he gave.

I do not believe that the needs of the United States should be our criterion when we decide what we are going to do with our natural resources. Of course the hon. member for Lethbridge said in his speech that he was basing his talk on the radio speech of Mr. Sommers to the effect that British Columbia would get 20 per cent of the additional power that would be generated downstream in the United States by the storage of the water, and also 20 per cent of the additional power which would be generated by any future installations.

Well, I have now in my hand the text of the agreement entered into by the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation and the government of British Columbia on September 17, 1954.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister table that document, please? All of us do not have it.

Mr. Lesage: I have no objection.

Mr. Herridge: It is historic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is the hon. member asking that the document be tabled, or that it be printed as an appendix to the minister's speech?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Tabled.

Mr. Pearkes: It would be better as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not think we would be warranted in publishing it as an appendix to Hansard, but I do not see any reason why it could not be tabled. Perhaps at the proper time it could be laid on the table.

Mr. Fulton: What is the objection to having it as an appendix?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The document will be tabled.

Mr. Fulton: The minister could read it all, and then it would be on Hansard.

Mr. Lesage: I might say that I am also going to table the second agreement dated January 14, 1955, amending the first one, and between the same parties. I shall table both documents after I have finished speaking this afternoon.

Mr. Herridge: There is another one since then.

Mr. Lesage: I have the original agreement of September 17, with its annexes, and the amendment of January 14, 1955. That is all I have in hand at the moment. I understand these documents were tabled in the provincial legislature by Mr. Sommers two weeks ago tomorrow.

The sections I want to quote, and which I believe are the important ones, are as follows:

8. Her Majesty in the right of the province of British Columbia agrees that upon completion by the Canadian company—

And the Canadian company is the Canadian company to be formed by the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation.

—of the storage dam hereinbefore referred to, Her Majesty will cause to be issued to the Canadian company a final licence under the provisions of the Water Act upon terms conforming to this agreement for a term of 50 years with provision for renewal of such term for such period and subject to such conditions as Her Majesty and the Canadian company may agree upon.

9. The licence issued pursuant to paragraph 8—

Which I have just read.

—shall provide that, commencing September 1, following completion of the project to operating condition as determined under sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 7, and in lieu of any other fees, rental or charges under the Water Act the Canadian company will cause to be delivered, without charge to Her Majesty or to Her Majesty's nominee, at a point or points on the system of the Bonneville Power Administration at the boundary between Canada and the United States of America electrical energy equal to 20 per cent of the kilowatt hours which could be generated at downstream plants of the federal government of the United States from the net storage created by the dam; the amount of net storage and the quantity of firm power to be delivered shall be determined as set forth in the schedule attached as schedule 2.

Which I shall also table.

In the event additional dams with generating facilities for which the Bonneville Power Administration is the marketing agent are constructed downstream, electrical energy equal to 20 per cent of the kilowatt hours which could be generated by such additional facilities from the net storage created by the dam will be delivered on the conditions stated above, but not more than an amount equal to 50 per cent of such portion of the kilowatt hours which could be generated by additional facilities from the net storage created by the dam as Bonneville agrees—

I repeat "as Bonneville agrees."

—to make available for the combined use of the company and Her Majesty.

And, Mr. Speaker, the Bonneville authority, which is a United States federal agency, is not even a party to this agreement.

Mr. Herridge: That is the point.

Mr. Lesage: It is not even a party to this deal. Here the Kaiser company guarantees to the British Columbia government that the British Columbia government will get 20 per cent of the additional power generated by storage, but it will get it from the Bonneville power authority, which is a federal agency, and that federal agency is not a party to the deal. And moreover there is no agreement referred to here between Bonneville and Kaiser.

What is the guarantee? Where is the guarantee? Where do we go? The whole thing is up in the air. I never saw anything so childish; there is no guarantee at all. And, moreover, supposing Bonneville decides to provide 10 per cent of the power to Kaiser, the only amount Kaiser is obligated to supply is 50 per cent of that 10 per cent, which is 5 per cent.

Moreover this 20 per cent, which is supposed to come from Bonneville, would be an export of power from the United States to Canada. What would happen if the federal power commission refused a licence to export that 20 per cent from the United States to Canada? Where does the British Columbia government stand on that deal? Nowhere. The only guarantee it has is a guarantee of moneys. It is selling down the river, for peanuts, the most valuable resource of British Columbia, which is water power. And, Mr. Speaker, the "peanuts" are not even guaranteed. Now I will quote the rest of article 9:

> In the event that the Canadian company is unable by reason of any law or by reason of any order or decree of any administrative body or official having jurisdiction in the premises, to deliver the power to Her Majesty, then during such period the Canadian company shall pay to Her Majesty monthly in lieu of the delivery of such power an amount equal to the value of the power not delivered in such month; the value of such power shall be determined at the current rate then charged by Bonneville Power Administration for similar service.

Therefore, really it is a case where the return of power is far from being guaranteed, and what we might expect is a small payment in money.

And, Mr. Speaker, as for additional energy that may be created by additional generating facilities which would be built by other companies or agencies than Bonneville, or any other federal agency, here is the wording:

Let me quote article 10:

> In the event that additional dams or generating facilities are built by the federal government of the United States for which the Bonneville Power Administration is not the marketing agent, or in the event other dams or generating facilities are constructed by non-federal government agencies downstream, the Canadian company will endeavour to obtain as nearly the same conditions as obtained from the Bonneville Power Administration as possible.

That is all the guarantee: the Kaiser company will do its best. There is no guarantee at all for the British Columbia government.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): How do you like my definition?

Mr. Lesage: I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, that I did not intend to go into the details of this deal, which is not a deal but is a "fire sale", as we say in French.

Mr. Sinclair: A robbery.

Mr. Lesage: A steal, or a selling-out. After listening to the hon. member for Lethbridge this afternoon, who read a statement by the government of British Columbia, or the party who is at the head of the government of British Columbia, I could not help but say what I had in mind. I still believe, however, that this whole question, as was suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, could be more properly and easily dealt with in the committee, where we shall have all the experts to explain all the reasons why this is a bad deal.

Other questions have been raised. The constitutional question with respect to this bill has been raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke and this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry to interrupt. I wonder whether the minister would read the final sentence of article 10 which he has been quoting. I think it has some bearing on what he has already read.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

> The amount of power to be supplied to Her Majesty in such cases will be worked out on a basis consistent with paragraph 9.

As much as possible.

Mr. Pearkes: It does not say "as much as possible".

Mr. Lesage: "Will endeavour to obtain", and it would be on the same basis as paragraph 9, so certainly it would not go any farther, but it might be very much less or even nothing, if the endeavours are not successful.

Mr. Green: May I ask a question? Are the contracts to which the minister just referred made between the British Columbia government and the Kaiser corporation in the United States, or merely a Canadian subsidiary of the Kaiser corporation?

Mr. Lesage: It is between the British Columbia government and the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of Delaware. They state later that whenever they refer to the Canadian company it is the Canadian company that the Kaiser Aluminum undertakes to incorporate in Canada.

I should like to say a few words about the constitutional angle. I will not deal with it exhaustively but I might, in the few moments that are left to me, say a few words about it.

Again I think that the detailed exposition of the legal and constitutional questions could be more satisfactorily dealt with when specific clauses of the bill are studied in committee. But I believe it is desirable to deal with a few general points, since a number of remarks relating to the constitutional position have been made this afternoon. The hon. member for Vancouver East dealt with the question to a certain extent, and I shall come back to what he said.

Last Friday night the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke referred to the bill as an "invasion of provincial rights" and this afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge spoke in the same terms. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said, at page 875 of Hansard:

> Another reason the bill should be considered by the committee is that it involves very grave constitutional questions. The provinces of Canada have always been very jealous of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights, and that is one reason the government of British Columbia is so concerned about this measure.

I agree entirely that consideration in committee will help clarify the position, but this is an important aspect of the question and it might be useful if I made a few remarks about the constitutional question at this time.

I believe it is generally recognized, sir, that water and all its uses are of tremendous importance in a country. One of its important uses is for the production of hydroelectric power. That is the most obvious use. I might mention the shortage of good and cheap sources of waterpower in Canada. I might mention its enormous value in industrial growth wherever it is available. I might mention also, in spite of what the hon. member for Lethbridge said this afternoon, the constantly increasing requirements, both in Canada and in the United States, for water power. Because of such importance, it is obvious that any water in a river that crosses an international boundary may be of great interest to countries on both sides of the boundary. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other night when he spoke on the question.

The boundary waters treaty of 1909 dealt with certain aspects of waters of an international character. It dealt mainly, though, with boundary water. It also dealt with anything that could affect the level of a river where it crosses a boundary. That is article 4 of the treaty. It also deals with the possibilities of damage to downstream interests in another country. That is article 2. In short, I believe the fact that water crossing a boundary may be of interest on both sides of the boundary has been recognized for over 40 years under that treaty.

The boundary waters treaty did not deal with matters relating to the division of jurisdiction in Canada as between provincial and federal governments. I hope this will satisfy the hon. member for Lethbridge. The fact that it was based on the recognition of the broad national and international importance, not only of boundary waters but of waters crossing a boundary, seems to me to be relevant in considering any argument that the waters in such rivers are purely a matter of provincial concern.

It is perfectly clear that an action that affects the flow of water downstream in another country cannot possibly be a matter of purely provincial jurisdiction. When it affects the waters on the other side of the boundary, how can it be solely a matter of provincial jurisdiction? It is surely a matter of international importance and it is clearly a matter of national concern since it has consequences, as I said, not only inside the country, but outside the country.

I come now to the bill itself, Mr. Speaker. I wish to draw the attention of the house to an important point that could cause misunderstanding and which has caused misunderstanding. I realize it is really a case of misunderstanding after listening to the hon. member for Lethbridge. I believe that misunderstanding may have been created by the short title of the bill which is "International Rivers Act". It might give the implication that the legislation applies to all aspects of international rivers. That might be the reason why the hon. member for Lethbridge asked this afternoon if the federal government was going to have jurisdiction over all our international rivers. That is not what this bill is for. Perhaps I had better read the bill slowly so that hon. members may understand it.

Mr. Fulton: You would be out of order.

Mr. Lesage: Then I will not do it. The hon. member for Lethbridge said that this bill asserts general jurisdiction with regard to rivers as such and covers all works on any international river. An examination of the bill—I shall not read it—will make clear that that is not the case. The bill does not confer jurisdiction with regard to any and all works on any and all international rivers. It covers only a certain limited type of work on such rivers.

It covers works that do both of two things; first, that increase, decrease or alter the natural flow of an international river, and—note that the word is "and" not "or"—second, interfere with, alter or affect the actual or potential use of the international rivers outside Canada. In short, the bill does not deal with international rivers as such; it does not deal with all works, it deals only with works that alter the flow of the river and also affect the use of the river outside of Canada. Those are two conditions which have to be in existence in order that we have jurisdiction under Bill No. 3.

If a work does not have consequences outside of Canada it is not covered by the bill. The Saint John river was mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). Let us suppose that a dam were to be built at Beechwood, New Brunswick, to produce power: that dam would not be covered by the bill because it would not affect the use of the river outside of Canada. Consequences of the works outside of Canada are essential before any work becomes subject to the bill.

It seems to me that works of a character referred to in the bill are obviously of national importance and interest. The British North America Act recognizes that there can be works of such character and it makes specific provision for them. I should like to refer to section 92 which was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch).

Section 92 (10) assigns local works and undertakings to provincial jurisdiction. It reads:

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:—
> c. Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

What has been done in this present bill has been to apply the provisions of section 92 (10) (c) to the category of works which are clearly for the general advantage of Canada. Such declaration is contained in the legislation. I think it is clear that there can be no doubt as to the constitutional validity of the bill. What it does is to apply the specific provisions of the British North America Act to the category of work that by definition must have consequences that are of national concern.

While the constitutional position is thus unassailable, to my mind it can be argued that the works involved have important effects outside of Canada and thus they cannot be said to be of a local character.

To my mind it can be argued that the works involved in the legislation and the purpose toward which the legislation is directed are by their very nature outside of provincial jurisdiction. Not only are they under federal jurisdiction because section 92 (10) (c) is applied to this bill, I will go as far as to say that because of their character and purpose the works provided for under the bill are not of a provincial character. The works involved in the legislation and the purposes toward which the legislation is directed are by their very nature outside of provincial jurisdiction and within federal jurisdiction.

As to the works, I have pointed out already that they must have consequences outside of Canada; not just outside the province, but outside of Canada. As I said, such works cannot by definition be local works and undertakings. They cannot possibly be deemed to fall within the limits of property and civil rights in a province, because they affect property and civil rights, not only outside a province but outside of Canada. In short, I believe that the works covered by the bill are not things that are local or provincial in character.

Mr. Green: Before the minister goes on to his next point may I ask him whether it is considered that the dam at Mica creek, a work upon the Columbia river, would come under the terms of this bill? As the minister knows, that dam will be a main source of power on the Columbia river in British Columbia. It is the most important work in the whole development of the river in Canada.

Mr. Lesage: That work will have an effect on the level and use of the Columbia river outside of Canada.

Mr. Green: The minister and his officials must have considered that point. Is it the intention that the Mica creek dam will be subject to the terms of this bill?

Mr. Lesage: It certainly would by the definition I have just given. The water might however be diverted into the Fraser.

Mr. Green: I would like to hear something about that too.

Mr. Fulton: Over my dead body.

Mr. Lesage: I believe I have exhausted my time. General McNaughton, my officials and I will be available before the committee and the question that has just been asked can be discussed.

Mr. Hahn: Would not the damming of any small creek or stream flowing into the Columbia river affect that river downstream and be subject to the act? I cannot quite understand how you can cut off a stream that runs into the Columbia and say that that does not affect the level of the Columbia river.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Before the minister replies, may I presume to suggest to the house that we are in grave danger of anticipating the committee stage of the bill. I think any questions which go to the principle of the bill or are properly the result of interpretation of the bill by the minister would be fair, but I ask hon. members not to interrupt any hon. member who has the floor just to ask questions which perhaps would be more properly put in the committee.

Mr. Lesage: Looking beyond the works themselves, the purposes toward which the legislation is directed are obviously national in character. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to this last Friday, and I should like to quote from page 875 of Hansard as follows:

> I believe the whole foundation of the bill is contained in the words—I cannot refer to a section, Mr. Speaker, but these words are used—"developing the water resources in the national interest". That is what this bill aims to do, develop the water resources of Canada in the national interest.

The hon. member was entirely correct. That is the purpose of the bill, namely, to develop and utilize the resources of Canada in the national interest. That purpose will be the test of the measures taken under this legislation. That purpose is obviously a national purpose and is not a local or provincial one.

In short, sir, the works covered by the legislation are works that are national in interest and character and the purposes behind the legislation are purposes in the national interest. I do not wish to go into the legal aspects of the matter more fully at this time but I think it is clear beyond doubt that the character, scope and purpose of this legislation come entirely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. That legislation does not in any way infringe upon or invade any area that is properly of provincial jurisdiction.

The introduction of this bill marks to my mind a forward step in recognition of our water resources and the necessity for safeguarding them in the same manner as was envisioned by the United States, first, in the appointment of its federal power commission which, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has already mentioned, holds authority over the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements in that country; and secondly, in the formation of the Columbia interstate compact commission by which the individual states in the basin have united to gain the greatest over-all benefit from the water resources of this river system.

In order that no sacrifice of our all-important water resources may be made through too much emphasis being given to a short-range view, such as advocated by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) this afternoon, rather than the farsighted appraisal submitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I cannot emphasize too strongly the immediate need for this house to give its favourable consideration to Bill No. 3, which is designed to afford to the water resources of Canada a measure of protection similar to that now given the water resources of the United States.

I would now ask permission, Mr. Speaker, to revert to motions in order to table certain documents the nature of which I indicated during the course of my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Has the minister unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I would first like to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as to the purpose of this bill and which is reported at page 870 of Hansard for February 4 as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to enable the Canadian government to ensure that the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements are carried out in an orderly manner and in the national interest.

But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that is the aim of all provincial governments in Canada. I submit also that the people of Canada under provincial governments are quite willing and able to develop their natural resources in the best interests not only of their own provinces but of Canada as a whole.

I would not for one moment suggest that wisdom and ability are concentrated in the federal cabinet or government. There is no evidence whatsoever of any unwillingness on the part of any provincial government to carry out the avowed purpose of this measure as outlined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

That leads me to the conclusion that I must look beyond the remarks of the minister to find out the exact purpose behind this measure. It has already been stated here that there is a certain political flavour to this measure due to the difference in political thought between the provincial and federal governments. In this regard I would refer to the remarks of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage). The minister referred to the "party of the province of British Columbia" when he corrected himself, having said, "the government of British Columbia". That would indicate to me that he himself believes this is more a political battle and has less to do with the protection of our resources throughout Canada so that they be developed "in an orderly manner and in the national interest."

I agree the minister has some reason for his statement, and justification may be found in some of the press reports which have been quoted in this house. But in regard to the willingness or lack thereof of the provincial government to develop natural resources in the best interests of all Canadians, I think it is worth bringing to the attention of this house again the fact that General McNaughton himself suggested that a committee should be set up to investigate the Columbia river basin and its power potential. The provincial government agreed to do so and also agreed to put on that committee the men recommended by General McNaughton.

It might also be worth recalling that the provincial government carried out the recommendation for a joint project by provincial and federal authorities to investigate the Columbia river basin. It seems to me that the province of British Columbia has co-operated to the fullest extent with regard to this matter.

I understand the Mica creek proposition is possibly 10 or 15 years away. What is the Mica creek dam going to do to rivers across the border? By looking at the map and obtaining some figures on the rate of flow that reaches Columbia river below the Mica creek dam it is evident that the Mica creek dam is going to do exactly what the proposed Kaiser dam will do, and that is regulate the flow.

Mr. Herridge: Without flooding people out.

Mr. Leboe: We have no farms in that part of the country which are in danger of flooding. I do not know how many people there are but I understand the lake will not be raised above the previous known flood levels. Realizing that it is the desire of the provinces to carry on and to develop their natural resources in the national interest, I think it becomes apparent that we must look further afield than we have looked so far for the reasons for bringing in this bill. On the matter of provincial rights, I think we can agree that the province of Quebec put the federal government into a neutral corner, and the federal government is not going to come out of that neutral corner until they have a dominion-provincial conference. I sincerely believe that that is the place to which this whole question should have been brought. I cannot see any reason for rushing into this thing. We have a memorandum of agreement which was tabled by the minister in this house. That is all it is. It is a memorandum of agreement with a great many "ifs" and "buts" in it. It is not watertight in that respect. It is just a memorandum of agreement.

Mr. Herridge: Your minister has told the people that construction will start next spring.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): So what? That is business.

Mr. Leboe: When these fellows get through talking, Mr. Speaker, I will commence again.

Mr. Low: That is right. Wait till they stop interrupting.

Mr. Leboe: I know I am not alone in this opinion. There are many people throughout the whole of the Dominion of Canada who, if they were asked today whether this thing should be brought before a dominion-provincial conference and ironed out around a conference table, would say yes. People all across the country know—and this government should know it as well—that the place to iron these things out is around the conference table. One should not start a shooting war, as it were, with respect to these things. This thing means a great deal to the people of British Columbia. If they get around the conference table they will find out whether or not they are wrong. We have the committee of the house investigating this matter, it is true; but that is a long way from having a dominion-provincial conference which brings all the provinces into the picture; because actually, this is a matter of national interest.

In looking further afield, I should like to quote from Western Business magazine for October, 1954, at pages 42 and 44, where I read as follows:

> One feature of the present expansion program which is cause for conjecture is the tremendous increase of electrical power now available to the company from Waneta.
> Total rated capacity of the four hydro plants on the Kootenay river is 329,000 h.p. Waneta can now produce 240,000 h.p.—a 73 per cent increase over former installation. A further increase of another 240,000 h.p. is readily available from Waneta.
> But what does the company plan to do with all this power? Surely, present installations and recent expansions could not absorb more than a small fraction of this new power plant which, combined with the rest of Cominco power, is greater than that used in the whole of the lower mainland of British Columbia and Vancouver island combined. The past gradual growth pattern of the Kootenay country provides no answer to this industrial detective mystery.

If that is true, we have 75,000 surplus horsepower in that area now. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) pointed out that we are bound at the moment to 500 miles maximum. I am not saying we shall not be able to find different ways and means of transmitting power over longer distances but he said we were bound at the moment to 500 miles. This statement says that the past gradual growth pattern of the Kootenay country provides no answer to this industrial detective mystery.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is quoting. I should like to know whether it is an editorial he is quoting from or whether it is the writing of someone who has contributed an article to Western Business. I think I am within my rights in wanting to know whom he is quoting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I think the hon. member who has the floor has indicated from what he is reading. I think he has satisfied the rules of the house in that respect.

Mr. Leboe: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find that if the Kaiser dam were built, it would produce another 45,000 horsepower of electricity in that area. That would give a surplus of 360,000 horsepower in that area. It is agreed that we cannot just export electricity out of box cars or from aeroplanes or some such way. We have to run it out through wires and we have been limited as to how far we can get it out over those wires. It therefore means that the Kootenay country is destined to become one of the great industrial empires, perhaps, in Canada. We feel that is bound to come but I do not think it is going to come in the immediate future. We have to build for it. We have to build towards it. We have to find ways and means of using the power that is at present available to the people in that district. If there is a surplus of power in that area and if the Mica creek dam is going to control the water within a few years up above and will provide further horsepower, I do not know why we are worrying about electrical horsepower at this moment in that area.

From the proposal I understand that the British Columbia government has the possibility of getting a cash reward for the power that we have developed below the boundary. If we have more power than we will use for perhaps the next 30 or 40 years I cannot see any reason why we should not be getting a cash reward for that power. I would say that that 360,000 horsepower is 25 per cent of Canada's share of the initial development of the St. Lawrence seaway about which we hear so much. If any of the members want to speak about flooding, let us look at the St. Lawrence seaway and see what they are going to do down there.

Mr. Herridge: In Canadian interests; not in United States interest.

Mr. Thomas: You had better read that St. Lawrence seaway contract.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Leboe: We should look into this proposition to find out exactly what effect this Kaiser dam is going to have on the existing power supply of that district. I find that the West Kootenay Power and Light Company is part of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada and I find that 51 per cent of the common stock of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada is controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I can see where this bill could protect a monopoly in that area in electrical power from any competition whatsoever by the British Columbia government in supplying power in that district. I may be wrong but in this I can see a possibility that we have here a third answer, and maybe the most important one, as to why this bill is being brought in. If we have a surplus of 360,000 horsepower available to us there from existing installations and the construction of the Kaiser dam, that represents a great deal of power. As was pointed out in the article that I just read, it is far more than they have in the lower mainland and Vancouver island combined as of the present date.

I do not want to dwell too much longer on this question but I should like to say again that it is of significance—and I should like to emphasize this—that General McNaughton recommended certain things to the British Columbia government and they accepted or followed out his recommendation. We now find that this bill is being brought in to block the Kaiser dam proposal. There is no question about that in my mind. I should like to say again and to emphasize that this thing should be brought before a dominion-provincial conference and should be settled around a conference table. It is something which will have far-reaching effects into the future for many generations. I can see no reason for holding a club over the head of anybody who is doing the job that he is supposed to do.

If British Columbia or any other province is developing their natural resources in the best interests of the Canadian people, why do we have to stand over them with a club and embarrass provincial governments that are performing these functions? Quite sincerely, I would say this. In looking over the recommendations of the men who are on that committee I find that Mr. Anderson, of the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, was the only one who voted against the proposed dam. Why would he not vote against it?

Mr. Herridge: The union of workingmen is also opposed to it.

Mr. Leboe: I just want to point out that this man is vice-president of the West Kootenay Power and Light Company. Why should not a man in that position vote against it? I am using only reason. Why should he not vote against it? This extra electrical power that is supposed to be developed for British Columbia is going to be in competition with power developed by the company of which he is vice-president.

I think we have to look at all sides of these questions when we are bringing them before the people of this country. I can see no better way of doing it than through the dominion-provincial conference which is going to be called anyway. We might as well extend it a little bit and have these things ironed out in the interests of all the provinces, and not just one or two. I think this procedure would serve us better than firing brickbats at one another.

Mr. Byrne: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Leboe: Sure, I can answer any question you ask, and if not the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) can help me.

Mr. Byrne: I am asking the hon. member if the Columbia basin advisory board set up by the provincial government gave their consent and their wholehearted agreement to this arrangement before the agreement was signed?

Mr. Leboe: General McNaughton was on that, was he not?

Mr. Byrne: No, he was not a member.

Mr. Leboe: To which board are you referring?

Mr. Byrne: The board set up by the provincial government; did they sanction this agreement before it was signed by the Kaiser Aluminum company and the Hon. Mr. Sommers?

Mr. Leboe: I think possibly, as Mr. Speaker pointed out, some of these questions can be best answered in the committee.

Mr. Herridge: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston)—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Herridge: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Bow River has just said that my election expenses were paid by the president of the West Kootenay Power and Light Company.

[Mr. Leboe.]

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I said no such thing. Since you have brought it up, how much did he contribute?

Mr. Herridge: I want that withdrawn at once.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I did not make such a statement. I might just ask him now, since he brought it up, how much did he contribute?

Mr. Herridge: I want the inference withdrawn.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): You created an inference.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The hon. member for Bow River has just said he did not make that suggestion. The hon. member for Kootenay West will have to accept the explanation offered by the hon. member for Bow River. I must confess that at this distance I heard nothing at all from the hon. member for Bow River. I, therefore, must also accept his denial that he made such a statement.

Has the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) completed the answer to that question?

Mr. Leboe: I believe the agreement was signed on November 17.

Mr. Byrne: No, September 17.

Mr. Hansell: It does not make any difference.

Mr. Leboe: As I pointed out in my speech, there was a memorandum of agreement between the people and the recommendation was carried, not unanimously, but with only one dissenting.

Mr. Dickey: May I ask the hon. member a question? What does he understand by a memorandum of agreement?

Mr. Leboe: Pardon?

Mr. Dickey: What does the hon. member understand a memorandum of agreement to be?

Mr. Leboe: I think I can answer that question because I have been mixed up in more than one of them. That is a preparation for a final draft, and you work on that basis; is that not right?

Mr. Dickey: No, a memorandum of agreement is the final agreement.

Mr. Leboe: I know it is not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order; the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Other members who have already spoken in this debate, Mr. Speaker, have emphasized the far-reaching implications of the particular bill that is before us. I might say that I am in full agreement with those statements concerning the wide implications of this measure. We are all aware, I think, of the importance of water resources to the economy of our nation. I believe we are all desirous that those resources be developed in the best interests of the people of Canada as a whole. When we consider this bill before us, therefore, I feel we can at least credit ourselves with sincerity of purpose and consider the matter as it is presented to us.

I believe the importance of this measure is emphasized by the fact that the government has seen fit to place it in a top priority position on the agenda of the house. We could possibly feign innocence and ask why the measure was placed there, but I do not believe anyone is under any illusion as to the purpose in introducing it now. The hon. members for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) have presented the situation to us. There has been no attempt on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to prove that the purpose of the measure was not to block construction of the Kaiser dam.

I believe there is one phase of the problem that is now before us that is of special interest, and I want to deal with it now. I refer to the hydroelectric potential of the province of British Columbia. We have had a great many submissions in regard to the development of power, but reading from "Water Powers of British Columbia", which is published by the department of lands and forests, I find the following on page 9:

> With the establishment and growth of industries in British Columbia came concurrent need and demand for development of power. From 1910 to 1920 the amount of developed horse power rose from 65,000 to 310,000. During the next 10 years, by 1930, the figure had more than doubled to 630,000 horse power, and, despite the depression years, had risen to 789,000 in 1941.

I continue to quote:

> The 5 years since 1947 have resulted in the most spectacular growth in the province's history, with an increase from 864,000 horse power to 1,390,000 horse power. Developments already under construction will provide an additional 2 million horse power, emphasizing the important part being played by water power on the economy of the province.

I understand that at the present time the production of power stands at approximately 2,173,000 horsepower. And so, as we consider this, and as we think of the developments in British Columbia, we can understand how important and how significant this bill is in our particular situation. We think of the tremendous possibilities of the Columbia system. We find that figures are given to us indicating that the Waneta No. 1 dam can be brought up to its full capacity of 500,000 horsepower, that Waneta No. 2 can be developed giving an additional 500,000 horsepower, that the potential Mica at-site power is 800,000 horsepower, that the Downie creek at-site potential is 500,000 horsepower, and so on. There are several other developments all of which greatly increase the power development in that particular area.

And, in connection with development, I have here an article from the Montreal Gazette of January 12, 1954, which states:

> British Columbia's undeveloped hydro potential is about as large as the total hydro power now developed in Canada, Dr. Albert E. Grauer, president of the British Columbia Power Corporation Ltd., said here yesterday.

Of course this was said about a year ago. It continues:

> Dr. Grauer told the Canadian Club of Montreal that the Columbia river in the southeastern part of the province and in the United States "permits perhaps the world's outstanding hydro development."
> This project, he said, has "an eventual installed capacity of close to 50,000,000 horsepower."

And then again, in the Ottawa Journal of March 1 of last year we have reference to the construction of the proposed Mica creek development, where it says:

> The British Columbia scheme envisions a dam on the upper Kootenay river to back part of its water across a narrow gap into the Columbia river watershed. This would increase the flow on the Columbia river, where the main dam would be constructed. The estimated power development is 40,000,000,000 kilowatt hours annually, compared with the estimated 12,600,000,000 kilowatt hours annually to be secured from the St. Lawrence power project at Barnhart island.

And it goes on to say:

> General A. G. L. McNaughton, chairman of the international joint commission Canadian section, supports the Canadian development as desirable for this country, and believes that the federal and provincial governments could work out arrangements for financing.

This was in connection with the Mica creek development. As we continue to consider the potential of British Columbia in the matter of hydroelectric development we think of the potential of the Fraser river. We have not heard much about it up to the present time, but there is a tremendous power potential on that river.

I have here an article headed "The Fraser River Project" from the Fraser Valley Record of December 9, 1953—which is a little outdated, perhaps. However, it says:

> "As a source of energy the Fraser river must be considered the mainspring of British Columbia. Its wise exploitation represents one of the greatest and most thrilling hazards that lie ahead." These are the words of Dr. Harry V. Warren, professor of mineralogy and petrology, U.B.C., as reported by R. A. Francis writing in "Canadian Business" for October.

International Rivers

Three main dams would be the basis of the project, at Lillooet (130 feet), Moran (750 feet) and Cottonwood (250 feet). It is estimated that the Moran dam alone could develop up to 25 per cent of the total hydro power now developed in Canada. The site at Moran, according to Dr. Warren, could develop one-quarter of the capacity of all hydro plants installed in the United States between 1930 and 1950. The installed capacity of the Moran plant would be of the order of 3 million horsepower compared with 2·2 million horsepower estimated for the St. Lawrence seaway.

I should like also to call attention to a very interesting publication called A Plan for Tomorrow, issued by the dominion-provincial board of the Fraser river basin. The article is headed "Flood Control and Water Power" and states:

The Fraser is a Canadian river. Although a small portion (177 square miles) of its drainage area of 89,487 square miles lies in the United States, the Fraser river itself is contained entirely within British Columbia and, with its tributaries, comprises the greatest potential source of power in the province. Estimates of the total hydro-electric potential of the Fraser have been steadily revised upward as more and more specific information is gathered. At the present stage of investigations it appears not unreasonable to expect the total potential to approach 10,000,000 horsepower.

It goes on to designate the various areas where that power can be generated. This shows something of the potential of the Fraser river in British Columbia.

Would you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, during this debate we have been hearing a great deal about the facts in connection with the Columbia river development. Of course, as we know, that is the project that comes into this particular debate in a very real sense. Just prior to the dinner hour I was bragging a little bit about the power potential of the Fraser river. I referred to the fact that the potential had been estimated at 10 million horsepower. We have referred to these two, and then we think of other tremendous developments in the province of British Columbia. We have all heard of the Kitimat development. I understand that the power output there at the present time is around 450,000 horsepower, but the potential is 2,240,000 horsepower. There is also the Frobisher possible development in the northern section. We find that in the first stage of that development they expect the power production to be around 880,000 horsepower and by the time they reach the third stage in that project it will be 2,800,000 horsepower. Right on the coast there is another project that is being contemplated. Then there are the Waddington plans. If the Waddington Mining Corporation is granted a permit they will proceed with a great power development by the construction of dams at the Chilko lake, and the development will produce 500,000 horsepower. These are just illustrations of the great power potential of the province of British Columbia.

In a table prepared by the bureau of economics and statistics of the department of trade and industry of the province of British Columbia we find that the province is divided into ten regions, giving the developed horsepower and also the undeveloped possibilities. In the East Kootenay the developed power at the present time is 27,700 and the undeveloped 295,700.

Mr. Winch: Of what?

Mr. Patterson: Horsepower. These are the developments and also the undeveloped capacity of those areas. All of these figures represent horsepower. On the West Kootenay, which takes in the Columbia, 678,370 horsepower is developed at the present time and the undeveloped is around 10 million horsepower.

Mr. Winch: Kilowatts or horsepower?

Mr. Patterson: Horsepower.

Mr. Winch: It makes a big difference.

Mr. Patterson: These figures are all horsepower. On the Okanagan 7,800 developed and 2,000 plus, undeveloped; on the lower mainland, 445,450 developed, and 543,500 undeveloped. I will leave out Vancouver island. On Kamloops-Lillooet, developed 248,000; undeveloped, 2,178,370.

Mr. Winch: Still horsepower?

Mr. Patterson: Yes. In the central mainland coast area, 88,100 developed, 1,276,000 undeveloped; central British Columbia, undeveloped, 1,102,400; northwest British Columbia, in which we find the Kitimat project, 427,650 developed; undeveloped, 5,312,520. Data have not been prepared for the Peace river but I understand there are tremendous possibilities on the Peace for the development of hydroelectric energy. Therefore, we find that the developed horsepower totals 2,173,620 and the undeveloped 22,759,600, plus the capacity of some of those that have already been developed to bring them up to capacity, which would increase it by 2,450,400, making a total of 4,624,020 developed. By adding these two figures together we see the possibilities of hydro-electric development in British Columbia. I might say that there are vast possibilities that have not even been surveyed up to the present time.

When we think of the relative position of this Kaiser project and when we think of the potential of British Columbia, it seems to me that it is just a comparatively small link in the development of the tremendous power potential of the province that will assist rather than defeat the goal of optimum development of our natural resources.

What the Kaiser corporation gains under the proposed deal would eventually, as we have been told this afternoon, be obtained by the construction of the Mica creek dam; but they are prepared to make this investment for speedier attainment under controlled flow. In the meantime, British Columbia is going to reap the benefits of over $1 million in financial and power returns. We are also reminded of the fact that the whole plan can be renegotiated at the end of 50 years and other arrangements made, if desired.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), as reported in the Province of November 8, is supposed to have said that the Social Credit party was a new government and Ottawa let them feel their way, but he said that the time has come to answer Mr. Bennett. That is, shall I say, a very paternal attitude for the minister to take in regard to the province of British Columbia. But may I suggest that in the two and a half years or so that the British Columbia government has been in office it has felt its way farther along the path of progressive, sane and sensible government than the previous government did in 22½ years.

Mr. Byrne: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Patterson: I feel that the provincial government is better qualified to handle this proposition and handle its own affairs than any aggregation of politicians 3,000 miles away.

This afternoon the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources generated a lot of heat but no power or light. Referring to the fact that this bill was going to be handed over to the committee, he said we would be able to get a lot of answers. If I took his words down correctly—I do not write shorthand; sometimes I wish I did—he said something like this: there the experts will describe why this is a bad deal, in my opinion. Apparently he is going to have the experts present his opinion. Anyway, that is the way it looks.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That will be some help.

Mr. Patterson: When the hon. member for Lethbridge referred to the possibility of the United States receiving some benefits from this particular project, again the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources spoke out and said, "That is it; that is it." I did not know just how to take that. I was not sure how I should take it at that time, but it seems to me that he was implying that we should not do it because it was going to help out somebody else.

We have heard a lot about developing natural resources in the best interests of Canada. We have heard about our international obligations, how we have to get along with our friends to the south; and I do not think we should take, shall I say, a dog in the manger attitude and say, "We won't need this power just now, we do not need it ourselves, but we are certainly not going to let other fellows benefit".

I am sorry the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Fairey) is not in his place tonight. He was in my riding some time ago, late in November, because I have here a report which appeared in the Abbotsford, Sumas and Matsqui News of December 1. This is the report:

> Liberal government in Ottawa will block the Kaiser dam deal proposed by British Columbia's Social Credit administration, because Liberal policy will always oppose "giving away any natural resources that are needed for development in Canada, in order that our youth may benefit from that resource."

I would like to ask the hon. member, Who is giving away what? Without jeopardizing future developments British Columbia is allowing the Kaiser corporation to erect a low-level dam to regulate the flow of water that goes over the border anyway. Without the investment of a dollar they will receive in return power and payments amounting to over $1 million. So I say, who is giving away what in that deal?

The hon. member for Victoria, B.C., referred to the fact that our youth might benefit from that resource. I should like to ask what the youth of Canada have reaped from 20 years of Liberal rule—unemployment, lost markets and taxation. I think our national debt now requires an annual payment of $500 million in interest. I was reading somewhere the other day that across the border someone said that if they passed along their national debt to the oncoming generation it would mean the end of ancestor worship as we know it. That is true, not only across the border but here in Canada.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Patterson: I hear some strange sounds from over there. Some hon. member is mumbling in his beard. I believe that this bill is intended to wrest from the province of British Columbia powers which rightly belong to it. This bill is designed to discredit the Social Credit government of British Columbia by blocking plans for progress and development which it is proposing. This bill is the fulfilment of threats made by federal cabinet ministers and others that the federal government would introduce legislation to block this particular deal.

I feel that this bill is an insult to the government of British Columbia and an insult to the people who elected them by charging them with incompetence, lack of concern for the national and provincial interests and with submitting proposals to sell out the resources of the province to others.

I feel that this matter should be considered most carefully. I believe the government ought to give further consideration to this and withdraw the bill. I know that it is going to make them more unpopular across the country than they are at the present time, and in the province of British Columbia they are not very popular. So I would suggest that the whole matter be reconsidered and the bill withdrawn.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I think I must be getting soft in my old age, or perhaps it is the fact that there arrived today at my daughter's house in Vancouver our first grandson. Then again it may be the double peacemaking effect of the return of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I am going to try my very best tonight to do a little bit of peacemaking. I think the vein which this debate has taken is a bad thing for Canada, is a bad thing for British Columbia, and is a bad thing for this house.

I believe that we are dealing with very serious issues. I cannot refrain from saying that perhaps I am slipping a bit when I see the smiling face of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I have been waiting around for two whole years to make a speech on Social Credit, but I have not yet found one Social Crediter who is willing to make a speech on Social Credit. They are all ready to speak on anything under the sun but Social Credit. And so my speech is there waiting for that time when they dust it off and bring it out.

I am beginning to believe that there is only one real Social Crediter in the whole Social Credit group in this house and that is the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), for whom I have found a soft spot in my heart although I am a bit confused. A couple of years ago he used to be talking about the international bankers, then a year later it was the Turko-Mongolians, and now it is the Rhodes scholars. I have a bit of trouble keeping up.

When I hear my hon. friends of the Social Credit party waxing so deeply and religiously indignant about the iniquitous Liberal party trying to play politics over this Kaiser dam, my thoughts go back to my boyhood days. I was raised in a family of 13 children, eight boys and five girls, which made it about equal. I always found that when it came to an argument with a sister I never could win. I am reminded very much of Social Credit. When a fight would start my sister would run upon me like a little hell cat; she would raise her arm like this and bring the point of her elbow down on my cranium with a resounding crack, and the minute I drew my fist back to do something about it she would raise her hand and say, "Don't you dare hit a girl, you coward," and she would make her getaway.

What we are dealing with here is not the Kaiser dam but a very important national responsibility. I have heard hon. members of the group in the extreme right of the house say that what we should have is the dominion government sitting down with the government of British Columbia. I would have you remember, and I am sure the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) remembers it very well, because he sat in on three meetings of the committee, that the committee on external affairs met last year on May 12 and 13.

We had before us to give evidence that great business statesman General McNaughton. Whatever our opinions on party politics may be, every Canadian of every age and political persuasion should be glad that we have such a competent man representing us in the deliberations of the international joint commission. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) was asking the general about this business of the province perhaps going ahead and doing something which the international joint commission might not want them to do. Here is the general's answer as reported on page 174 of the evidence:

> Q. The dominion government would take no part in the construction of these developments?
> A. The federal government of Canada has the over-all responsibility of negotiations with the United States. It is very essential that the negotiations in regard to the benefits that come from the regulated water and controlled flow, and so on, should be settled and will have to be settled before it would be wise for the provincial government to authorize someone to go ahead and build it.

I would ask any hon. gentleman opposite whether that is a fair statement, and whether that was the framework on which we should have proceeded. That fitted in with federal and provincial views in the over-all plan which was being conducted by our representatives at the international joint commission.

Here is an extract I would particularly draw to the attention of hon. members.

By Mr. Green:

Q. I have seen a newspaper report to the effect that the Kaiser company of the United States is planning to dam the Arrow lakes at some point. What are the actual facts about that proposal?

A. I cannot give you a great deal of information on that subject. A report came out in the newspaper under date of February 22, 1954. I had been the previous day in British Columbia for consultation with the British Columbia committee on the Columbia. I had a very bad cold and I went up north to try to shake it. I did not know about these conversations until I got back to Ottawa. Whatever announcement has been made, has been made by authority of the British Columbia government.

I would simply point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members that within one day of the time General McNaughton specifically went to British Columbia for the exact purpose of concluding these plans—and there was none of the conflict which some hon. members now say exists—an announcement was made through newspapers in British Columbia that this deal was under way.

I would further draw your attention to page 188 of that same evidence where General McNaughton made it very clear that the representatives of Canada on that international joint commission were and still are engaged in the most delicate kind of negotiation with their opposite numbers in the United States. This is his evidence as reported at page 188:

That is a contention which neither the Canadian members of the commission, the government of Alberta nor the government of Canada, speaking through their counsel, are prepared to accept. The result of that was that when this matter for the third time was put before the commission at our meeting in April (1954) in Washington, and after a very heated discussion, we indicated that we were prepared to close the reference . . .

I have read that, Mr. Speaker, simply to remind hon. members that this parliament of Canada and this government of Canada, which is the servant of parliament, has for close to 50 years had a treaty governing boundary waters, and that we have set up as our servant a Canadian section of the international joint commission.

In addition, for over ten years—I believe from 1943—that international joint commission has been studying the entire question of waterpower development on the upper Columbia and Kootenay river, and these negotiations at this very moment are at a most delicate stage, and a stage at which the slightest upset can destroy the work Canada has been doing for many years.

I cannot stretch my imagination to the extent displayed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) the other day when he foresaw a second string Conservative party coming in to substitute for the older Conservative party. I frankly confess I cannot foresee the day when a Social Credit government will take power in Canada, though I frankly confess I did not foresee it taking power in British Columbia.

However, I would simply point out to Social Credit members that if the day ever came when they would take power in Canada they themselves would require the very legislation we are asking this house to pass tonight, because we are dealing with a very serious issue indeed and we require the protection this bill is designed to provide.

The issue is quite simple and it is that when we set up a Canadian section of the international joint commission to represent Canada we sought to represent not the British Columbia government, certainly not the Social Credit party; not the government of Canada as it happens to exist at the moment, but the Canada of today, the Canada of tomorrow, and the Canada for all time to come. The preservation and protection of the natural resources of Canada is our most sacred obligation and should be the primary concern of this house.

I am a little disappointed in most of my hon. friends opposite with the exception of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who is a congenital optimist. As regards the others, I was disappointed because of the deep strain of blue-ruin pessimism which seemed to pervade their thinking.

What is the truth about British Columbia? The truth is that in British Columbia—that last best west—we have the greatest unharnessed horsepower in the entire world. Far be it from me to get into the statistical tangle indulged in by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson), because I confess that after hearing him I thought he was talking about the A plus B theorem of Social Credit or something equally complicated or abstruse. I will simply content myself with the assertion that in British Columbia we have the greatest block of unharnessed horsepower in the entire world.

Any student of economics who studies the plain development of the past half century, or even reads the speeches of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), will readily see that in 1920 we had developed only 5·6 billion kilowatt hours, and that this has now gone up to 70 billion. Despite this massive power many hon. members, including the hon. member for Lethbridge, adopt a defeatist attitude and decline to recognize the facts. They ask, "What can we do with all this power?" And reply, "Let us sell it at bargain basement rates to Mr. Henry Kaiser in the United States, or anyone else who will take it off our hands."

This attitude is beyond comprehension. Any student of economics who has studied the history of this century knows that industry goes to power. You do not take power to industry. My hon. friends then say that we cannot develop power in Canada for the benefit of Canada until we have a market in Canada for all that power.

But is it or is it not a fact that we did not have a single market in Canada large enough to absorb the enormous Kitimat development? What we did was to take industry to the power. I will make a prediction for my hon. friends and it is that, regardless of what party is in power in Ottawa, and regardless of what party stays in power in British Columbia, the time will come when we will require every kilowatt hour, every single horsepower, and all of our energy, and we will require it in Canada and in British Columbia for the benefit of British Columbia and for the benefit of Canada.

I can recall—and this makes me remember how old I am now getting—doing my little bit to bring the Liberal government into power in Ontario 22 or 23 years ago. That Liberal government of Ontario made a tremendous mistake because it thought it had too much power on hand and it took steps to get rid of the power they had on hand. Before many years were out it would have paid a king's ransom to get back that power which the provincial government so foolishly sacrificed. I therefore make the prediction that the time will come when we shall want all of our power. The best economic thinkers say that you can develop $100 worth of value and one hundred times the jobs for every one of your harnessed horsepower. The time will come when we shall need this great block of undeveloped power on the upper reaches of the mighty river Columbia which starts in Canada, then flows north in the form of a huge question mark and finally goes down into the United States. The time will come when we shall be glad to have every horsepower of that power, and every horsepower will be giving jobs in industry in this great Dominion of Canada.

To the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) I would say that I am astonished to hear him say that all we can do is to ship it 50 miles away across the border into the United States. He should think of that beautiful little city of Revelstoke and those beautiful cities of his in the upper Okanagan valley. Every one of them should have secondary industries in them with cheap power. Cheap power is the greatest factor in getting your secondary industries located. When it comes to the matter of power, I believe in Canada for Canadians. I believe that this bill makes it absolutely certain that the rug is not pulled from under General McNaughton and the international joint commission. When we send General McNaughton and the other Canadian members to the international joint commission I believe we should see that they have the tools to do a proper job for Canada and that nobody cuts the ground from under their feet or undoes their work behind their backs.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this subject tonight but in view of the fact that the Columbia basin covers the Okanagan valley, of which I am the representative, I think I should say a few words although already all the speeches that have been made have disclosed to the house the vital necessity of the development of the Columbia river basin. I think the members who have spoken have done an excellent job of showing the house what the scheme means to Canada and also what it means to British Columbia. But to my mind there are several questions which are still unanswered.

One of them is the constitutional question posed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). I think that probably is the most serious one. Do we or do we not have the power to impose this bill on the province of British Columbia? I feel that the matter should either be referred to the supreme court for judgment or that the attorneys general of the various provinces should be called before the committee to disclose their point of view and the government should have their attorney general there at the same time. I think that is the only fair way to deal with the subject. Obviously there is a conflict of view or a doubt as to the legality of this bill in the minds of many members of this house.

The other question that I feel is still left unanswered is this. Why produce the bill at all at this present time, at this particular moment when British Columbia is starting to carry on its own development? I should also like to know what is the status of those projects already completed and operating in British Columbia. I would refer to irrigation projects and power projects. This bill is retroactive and can deal with them, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) pointed out. What is to be their status in the future when this bill is passed? That is something that I should like to know. I hope the committee will be told exactly of any dangers that may face them or any proposed changes in the operation of those projects, or what control is going to be exercised over these projects that up until now have lacked that control and have, to my mind, done a fairly good job. I refer especially to the irrigation projects. I feel that this bill should have been introduced a long time ago. If there was something lacking in the laws of Canada, then somebody has been slack on the job in not finding it out before now.

I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) the other night bringing in politics. As reported at page 886 of Hansard he said:

> My great opposition to the bill is that I believe it is nothing more or less than a political instrument used by the government to thwart the province of British Columbia in a development which the people have a right to expect.

Mr. Speaker, I would hate to think that assumption is correct. It is true that the production of the bill now gives ground for that assumption and possibly the present government is to blame for it. It is something that should have been settled, as I pointed out, years ago. Then this assumption would not be made at the present time because it coincides with the efforts of the British Columbia government to develop this particular project.

To my mind it is too vital and important a subject to play politics with. I do not feel that the Social Credit government should take umbrage at the action of this government because they are not the first government of British Columbia that have been turned down on an application for a similar project. There was an instance some years ago and it was not a Social Credit government.

We in the Okanagan valley are greatly interested in this matter. We know the value of water. As a matter of fact, we live in an area that would be a wilderness but for the control of water for irrigation and we know what more water and more conservation could still do for us. We could easily double the acreage that we now have under fruit and vegetables. We are anxious to know what is going to happen to the water reserves of our province because with double the water used in the Okanagan we would have little surplus left for export—that is from the Okanagan river and the Similkameen river—to any state in the union.

I would point out to the house—and I should like to compliment the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) for it—the letter he sent explaining the government point of view. It is completely opposed to the view placed before the house by our Social Credit friends. I think it is only fair to place it on the record. He explains the matter in five points. The first one is this:

> Construction should not be planned until completion of the current survey of the Columbia river.

I think that is a fairly reasonable suggestion, Mr. Speaker, because for the last ten years the government have been making an excellent and laborious survey of the whole area and it takes in thousands of square miles; and it will probably be two more years before that work will be completed. It seems to me that if the twelve years' work carried out by this group of engineers is to be discarded entirely, we are at fault and we have been wasting money. The other point he made is this:

> The so-called Kaiser dam will be only a minimum project and will preclude a more extensive development of the most natural storage reservoir in the whole Columbia basin.

That point is a most excellent one. I should like to know from our Social Credit friends whether this particular individual project fits in with the over-all plan envisioned by the joint commission or is it going to be a thorn in the flesh for all time to come with respect to the greater development envisioned by the joint commission?

Mr. Blackmore: It fits in all right.

Mr. Jones: I am glad to hear the hon. member say that.

Mr. Blackmore: It does no harm.

Mr. Jones: The next point is:

> It will endanger the much larger Mica creek development on the Big Bend because the two dams will compete against each other to meet the same demands for power.

Mr. Blackmore: He cannot prove that. He does not prove it.

Mr. Jones: I cannot. He goes on as follows:

> It will have an unfavourable effect upon the Canadian aluminium industry, including Kitimat, because it will make power available from Canadian storage for use by industry in another country at a price little more than half what it costs a Canadian producer.

If that is correct, and I presume the minister has studied the subject, then it seems to me that someone is breaking faith with the company now operating at Kitimat and making it possible for a competitor to get cheaper power, thus cutting the price in a market which will eventually be served by both companies.

I continue the quotation:

> Instead of the proposed 20 per cent B.C. should receive about 50 per cent of power generated through water stored in Canada according to the precedent set in negotiations between individual states south of the border.

The minister explained that this afternoon, so I have nothing to add to what he said. I thought he made a logical case. If we supply the water, we are entitled to more than 20 per cent. There may be difficulty in getting that 20 per cent exported in the form of power to Canada without a licence from the United States.

I should like to point out that the Columbia river is the fourth largest river in North America. In its basin lies possibly the greatest undeveloped potential for power in either North or South America. The Columbia river discharges 180 million acre feet annually into the Pacific. For comparison, the St. Lawrence river empties 220 million acre feet into the Atlantic. Now, I am going to quote General McNaughton on this comparison:

Head and flow combined give power, and on this aspect of comparison it is now estimated that the Columbia in Canada and the United States may eventually have an installed capacity in excess of 34 million kilowatts not including pumping power for irrigation, as compared to the St. Lawrence eventually at Sault Ste. Marie, Niagara, Barnhart, Beauharnois and Lachine, all taken together, of about 7½ million.

We are just awakening in British Columbia and possibly in Canada to the fact we have a vast storage of undeveloped power in the Columbia basin. I am glad that efforts are being made to develop that power. I had hoped that there would be greater co-operation between our province and the federal government to get the most satisfactory development possible. It is for that reason I am glad this bill is to be referred to a committee where we shall have the views of expert engineers, and I hope legal experts on the legality of the proposed measure. I believe we should hear too from representatives of provincial governments, including British Columbia. In discussion we are apt to overlook the fact that other provinces are involved. I feel that British Columbia in particular should be invited to attend to give evidence, and possibly have the attorney general state their case.

It seems this dispute between British Columbia and Ottawa arose possibly through the failure of the British Columbia government to co-operate with the international joint commission. Whether it was done deliberately or thoughtlessly I do not know, but apparently that was the start of the dispute. I believe the international joint commission is operating in the best interests of the federal and provincial governments of Canada, possibly in the best interests of all Canadians. If the proposal of British Columbia to develop this dam at Castlegar fits into the over-all planning, there is no reason to block the arrangement for the development by the Kaiser interests. If, on the other hand, these plans are not in the best interests of Canada as a whole or are a breach of the over-all scheme to develop the Columbia river area, then the joint commission or the government should step in.

I feel the commission is operated on that basis, to assist the provincial governments and not thwart them. I would hate to regard the commission as a political instrument. In support of the objective of the joint commission, I should like to quote from a speech made recently by the chairman, General McNaughton, in Montreal:

Meanwhile, it will be well to remember the vastness of the issues which are being determined in the Columbia basin and the vital consequences which the decisions will have on the future of industrial development and its placement, whether in Canada or the United States. It will be well also not to forget article 2 of the treaty of 1909 and the physical fact that natural topographical advantages for the storage of water are assets just as real as are the minerals from the mines and the products of the fields and forests. Actually storage for water is far more precious than the most precious of mines, for the reason that the flow of water will go on for ever whereas minerals are a wasting asset, used up in being put to use.

Another quotation from the same speech, again bearing out the plans this body has in the interests of the whole dominion, is as follows:

In the course of my remarks—

General McNaughton says—

—I have mentioned some rather large figures of power to be generated and made available, and there is much more also at sites along the boundary at places which I have not had time to describe to you today. But, please do not think that this means there is going to be power in Canada which will be surplus and to spare. This is certainly not the case, for the most carefully made predictions show that only a comparatively short time remains until we may expect that all our economically available hydro power will be in use.

As I have indicated, much of the hydroelectric power of North America is on rivers which constitute the boundary or flow across the boundary, and so the development of this power is the concern of the international joint commission. I assure you that it is the purpose of the commission to effect arrangements between the two countries which are not only equitable but which we hope will be recognized as such by the peoples of the two countries.

Finally, he says this:

Even more important, this treaty—

Referring to the boundary waters treaty of 1909.

—seeks also for the future to dispel trouble and prevent disputes. This it does by providing, in the international joint commission, a continuing mechanism with a comprehensive set of agreed principles of general application through which any problem along the boundary, of whatever sort, not only of water, can be brought under review at its inception and, we hope, before danger might arise that the problem might magnify and enlarge through controversy to an extent which would create issues and disputes to alarm and embitter public opinion in either country, thus making eventual solution increasingly difficult.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is the role of the international joint commission at the moment. They should take this problem under their wing, study it carefully as to the legal and other implications, and advise what is in the best interests of the people. I would ask our friends to the left for the co-operation of the British Columbia government with the federal government in developing their joint interests. These interests are joint. Both governments are responsible for taking care of our vast inheritance of natural resources. They are both equally responsible to the future generations of this country for seeing that these resources are not wasted in any way. This calls for national planning, not localized planning or the hit and run method we have known in the past years in connection with our natural resources, chiefly pulp and paper and, I am afraid, some waterways as well.

In conclusion, I hope the bill will be given the respect it deserves in committee by inviting all the people from every province who might be concerned, and by getting the best possible legal advice to serve the committee. It should also have the benefit of the presence of General McNaughton himself, to answer some of the very interesting questions that remain unanswered.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take very long in this debate, because I do not want to become involved in any dispute between parties sitting to my left and the government. I am not particularly concerned whether or not a dam is built on the Columbia river—although thus far the debate has been directed to that one province.

There is something however that is causing me some concern. When outlining the objects of the bill the minister said it did not apply to the Saint John river in New Brunswick, and he implied further that it did not apply to any other rivers, except, I believe, the Milk river. I cannot say whether that is in British Columbia or not.

An hon. Member: In Alberta.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, may I correct the hon. member. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) never said that it would apply only to the Columbia river and the Milk river. As a matter of fact there are in Canada about 20 rivers which would be affected by the bill, under the conditions set out therein. But as I said this afternoon, the Saint John river could not be affected.

Mr. Montgomery: I was attending the sitting of a committee, and was unable to be in the house this afternoon, so that if this was pointed out I did not hear it.

But even if that was said, I am still uneasy. I do not accept the interpretation offered us when the bill was introduced, and I wish to put my objections on record in the hope that when the bill goes to the committee it will be framed in more specific language. I want it plainly understood that I am not objecting to the principle involved. However, I think it will be found by anyone who reads Hansard that when the minister outlined the objects of the bill he said that so far as he knew it did not apply to the Saint John river.

Anyone reading the measure will see that it refers to water running from a point in Canada to a point outside Canada. Part of the headwaters of the Saint John river rises in Quebec, and flows into the state of Maine, thence northward joining waters that form the international boundary. Is it considered that when water forms part of an international boundary it is not water flowing out of Canada?

The minister may not intend that this measure should apply, and no doubt it would not be made to apply; but if the measure reaches the statute books in its present form I am afraid that it could be so interpreted. Therefore when the bill is in the committee stage I suggest that it should be made more specific, and the interpretation of what constitutes an international river should be set out more clearly, so that there could be no doubt about it. It would be preferable to have rivers like the Saint John and the St. Croix listed as exceptions.

This is the point I wished to bring to the attention of those hon. members who will serve on the committee. If it is not the intention to have the measure apply to the Saint John or the St. Croix rivers, then action should be taken to ensure that it shall not apply.

The St. Croix is a small river forming the international boundary between New Brunswick and Maine, but most of the water forming the river rises in Canada and flows into the Chiputneticook lakes. At the mouth of the river is the St. Croix Paper Company operating a large plant in the state of Maine. They depend upon this river for their water power. The cotton mill located nearby in Canada is in the same position. There are five dams on the river, and I point out that under this measure there would be power to destroy those dams.

As I say, the uncertainty should be taken out; people are uneasy about it. The St. Croix Paper Company have four dams located at Woodlawn, Sprague Falls, Vanceboro, and Forest City. They have paid large sums of money to residents on the Canadian side for flowage rights. I do not think the minister had any intention to destroy the dams. Nevertheless we are about to pass a measure which may have unfortunate results in years to come because of these weaknesses I have drawn to the attention of the house. Provision should be made in committee whereby there would be no possibility of destroying those dams on rivers such as the St. Croix which, I presume, under the treaty of 1909 were permitted by the international joint commission and with the approval of the provincial and the federal governments.

I think it is only fair that this matter receive careful perusal, so that these industries would have some assurance. I see the minister nodding his head; does he wish to ask a question or make a statement?

Mr. Lesage: I was just about to point out that the bill provides that it operates only when works in Canada have effect on the use of water outside of Canada, and that the dams the hon. member has mentioned have no effect on the use of the water outside of Canada.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I should say that the St. Croix river is in exactly the same position as the St. Lawrence river. I said that this bill does not apply to the St. Lawrence. The St. Croix is a boundary water between two countries. As such it comes under the jurisdiction of the international joint commission, and not under this bill.

Mr. Montgomery: I have had the opinion of a very good international lawyer who feels that it could come under this bill. All I am asking is that the bill be made to state that it does not. Apparently it is not the minister's intention to have it apply, and I would like to see that made certain in committee. That is my reason for speaking at this time. I have not a word to say as to the legality of the measure. I am not saying that I support the bill as it is, but I do support the principle. I think it is only proper that the Dominion of Canada should have the right to control her resources, and it is our duty in the House of Commons to protect those resources. However, in cases where there is any doubt I should like to have the language of the bill clarified.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Perhaps I am the last person who should speak in this house on the legality of this measure. I speak only because I realize that sometimes out of the mouths of babes and sucklings cometh wisdom. As I listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the other night I was convinced of the soundness of his argument. I have checked, double-checked and rechecked because for some 24 hours I had some hesitancy with regard to the complete correctness of his statement. During the intervening days, like the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, who, in his famous statement spoke of toil, sweat and tears, I experienced toil and perspiration but not tears. In addition, I have received some extremely sound legal advice on the basis of article 2 of the waterways treaty.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, it was signed in 1909, and was a treaty between Great Britain and the United States. It has been revised on several occasions since, the last revision taking place in 1952, but article 2 has not been revised.

Under the British North America Act the dominion has jurisdiction to implement by statute all treaties made by the imperial parliament with any foreign country. In entering this debate I should like to state specifically that I am not going to deal with the multitudinous aspects that have been dealt with by speakers from the government and opposition benches with reference to power and the utilization of power. Where you have power establishments you eventually have primary and secondary industries. I am not pinpointing in any manner or form the question of the Kaiser dam. There is no doubt in the minds of many people, and particularly those of us from British Columbia, that this is the nearest thing to our hearts so far as this bill is concerned. We are concerned about the future disposition of water power in the province of British Columbia.

In the United States a treaty may be ratified by the Senate, and then it becomes a part of the law of the land; but in Canada treaties do not become law until they are ratified by statute.

We are concerned, and I particularly, as I said, with the legality of this measure. Perhaps I am simplifying this more than I should, but to me it is a problem identical with the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. They are absolutely identical. To my knowledge we have never had a protest from the province of Alberta when the question of the export of fluids and electricity has been discussed in this house. If I am right in assuming that the problems are identical, then I think it is fair to say that since the dominion government has jurisdiction with respect to the export of fluids and electricity, it also has jurisdiction with respect to the export of the commodity which we are now discussing.

Chapter 28 of the statutes of 1911 was passed on the basis of the British North America Act. Since it is an act of the federal parliament, it may be repealed by the same authority, namely, this parliament, of which we are members. I might point out that such repeal could create difficulties—I say "could" not "would"—with the nation to the south. However, if it did, according to the information I have received, it could terminate the treaty under article 4 by giving 12 months' written notice. Although it is an imperial treaty, it is the treaty under which article 2 operates.

I presume that, since the Statute of Westminster, Canada could declare itself not bound by the treaty by giving 12 months' written notice. It therefore seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the real point that we have to deal with arises out of article 2. That is the point that the Acting Prime Minister emphasized during his speech the other evening.

Under the provision of article 2 the imperial parliament reserved to Canada and to the provinces jurisdiction and control over all territorial waters on their own side of the border. This provision does not create jurisdiction in the provinces; it reserves existing jurisdictions and rights.

As I have already stated, there have been no objections to the authority of the federal parliament to issue permits for the export of fluids and electricity. If I am right in saying that they are practically Siamese twins, then under no circumstances should there be any objection whatsoever from any province in Canada to the passage of this bill that the Acting Prime Minister introduced when he spoke last to the house. Therefore, it seems clear to me that the jurisdiction over the control of international rivers is definitely vested within the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament.

I hope that when this question comes before the committee on external affairs the best legal minds will be available to that committee. Neither the province of British Columbia nor the dominion parliament wants to have come out of this debate the wrong kind of legislation. Although the province of British Columbia has a different political idea of administration from what I have, I think it is fair to state that they are primarily interested in the development of the country. They may be wrong in their attitude and approach, and certainly as far as I am concerned they are wrong, in this matter.

As I understand it now the agreement would give 80 per cent of the benefit to the external country with only 20 per cent to the ownership country. I think all hon. members of this house will agree that that is not a sound type of agreement. It does not conform to the usual type of enactment under the international joint commission.

I do not want to rehash any of the many statements that have been made. When this act was passed in 1909, we were then more or less a colony. That continued so until 1931 when the Statute of Westminster was passed under which we assumed co-authority with the United Kingdom parliament, equal in all things, subordinate in none.

As far as this legislation is concerned I submit that we are on sane, sound legal ground. Probably the advice the British Columbia government is receiving has not been legally sound and I am sure that they will be sufficiently good Canadians to recognize the supremacy of the dominion parliament. In fact a hint has already been given that that will be the case. Not so many days ago the provincial minister of public works stated that regardless of what the outcome might be with respect to this so-called fight between the province and the dominion—in my opinion it is not a fight, it is just a disagreement—as a good Canadian he would have to go along with the act as set down by the dominion parliament.

I think that is a tip-off we can all take with a great deal of sincerity. I think our sole purpose individually and collectively in this house is to do the best we humanly can for the Dominion of Canada. With this situation being focused as it is, we will be good Canadians first and good British Columbians second.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I was happy to hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) indicate that there is some doubt even in the illustrious Liberal party as to the legality of this particular bill. However, study will have to be made of this constitutional question to decide whether or not he is right and who has jurisdiction. I was also interested in what the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) had to say with respect to the effect that this bill might have upon New Brunswick. The reason I say I was interested is that he indicated that he lost all interest the moment he found that New Brunswick was not to be affected. I wonder what point of view he would have taken as a citizen of that province if he had discovered that one of their rivers was to be affected and they were to lose certain authority in a provincial way because of this bill.

The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) has said that British Columbia has just now discovered the value of its water power. It is only natural that we are discovering things every day, now that we have good government in British Columbia, and this is no exception to the rule. The hon. member also spoke about co-operation by his friends to his left. We are only too willing to co-operate, but co-operation is a two-way street.

I have heard a lot about what British Columbia was going to do after they had the dam built with the revenue they would receive, but I have yet to hear what the Dominion of Canada is going to give British Columbia if this bill becomes law. I think that the people of British Columbia have every right to know that.

The hon. and respected member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) is always most interesting to listen to. He said that British Columbia has the greatest block of unharnessed horsepower in the world. I agree with that statement and I feel sure that every Social Crediter in this house and every British Columbian will also. I believe he said that we had adopted a defeatist policy. He said that you do not take power to industry, you usually take industry to the power. If that is so, why are we bringing gas from Alberta all the way to Toronto and Montreal? Being the type of orator he is, he speaks in superlatives. He says the Liberal party has the greatest and the mostest of everything.

Cheap power is a great factor in bringing industry into an area. The hon. member should not forget that there are two other factors required as well; one happens to be markets and the other transportation.

An hon. Member: And raw materials.

Mr. Hahn: Of course, raw material is most essential; but if you have transportation you can bring it to the power.

An hon. Member: If it is not too far.

Mr. Hahn: This afternoon the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) spoke for a while and I began to think that we would not need any of this power in British Columbia. He almost blew a fuse. We could probably light all the bulbs in this chamber and keep them going for the next few days if we could only harness the human horsepower we have here that is going to waste from time to time. I am sure we could use it to advantage.

I take issue with this bill for a number of reasons. The first is that the bill is directed at one province only. We can talk all we want to about the Milk river in southern Alberta, but that river practically does not run in Alberta. If it had not been for the grace of God and a couple of hills in the way it would have run down through the United States. Even that river will not come under this bill.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources said that there were 20 rivers that would be affected. I am satisfied that every hon. member in this house has the right to know the names of the rivers that are to be affected.

I take issue with the bill because it is an infringement of provincial rights set forth in the constitution. Of course that is a matter of opinion, as some individuals in the house seem to think that it comes under federal jurisdiction while others think it is a matter of provincial rights.

The third reason is that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in the course of the debate, proposed what I would call a "cockeyed" scheme which might well result in unlimited damage to both the internal and the external relations of this country, and might particularly affect the province of British Columbia. I will deal with that at greater length later on.

I believe it was the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) who raised the question as to the status of this project over the other projects which have already been built. It is important that this should be outlined very clearly.

I detest legislation born of expediency, and this I believe is that type of legislation. But I do not intend to develop each of these issues with respect to this bill. There are, however, one or two observations I would like to draw to the attention of the house.

The merit of this Castlegar scheme has already been outlined and I am not going to subject the house to a further discourse in that regard. Several hon. members have already devoted much time to explaining in great detail exactly what was involved, and what British Columbia could expect if she were given the authority to go ahead with the development of this project. I must confess I have as yet heard no other alternative except that suggested by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who said that he had written to the board of trade in Trail some time ago. I cannot of course criticize any such proposal until I have seen it.

However, I do not believe we should be asked to agree to a second reading of this bill until we discover what protection is offered to the people of British Columbia. That is a vitally important question. Up until this time the British Columbia government has apparently had the authority to carry on such development and a couple of projects have already been undertaken without any governmental interference. Now it becomes expedient to stop a particular project and that is going to cost the people of British Columbia between $1 and $2 million per year unless this government comes out with a specific proposal to reimburse the British Columbia government in some particular manner.

We have heard a great deal about orderly development in the national interest. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has already admitted that the main part of the Columbia river would be affected. I am quite satisfied that it will be affected, but how about the little streams that run into this particular river? This is an important question for the people who live along those little streams.

For example, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked whether it would affect the Mica creek dam and apparently the answer is in the affirmative. The particular location of that dam up around the top of the Big Bend is certainly some distance from the boundary itself, and the water is not running across the boundary as does the main stream of the Columbia. There are other rivers running into the dam which will naturally have some effect upon the flow of the water at the international boundary, and it is important that we discover whether they are to be affected.

We would also like to know when we are going to develop this Mica creek power plant. Are we going to wait until the federal government comes to an agreement with the United States on a 50-50 basis, as has been suggested? A 50-50 basis, as in the case of the St. Lawrence seaway project, apparently means that we get 50 per cent and the United States gets 50 per cent, but we spend $6 for every one dollar spent by the United States. To my mind this is a different type of project and it should be dealt with differently.

I would like to know who is going to issue licences and who will receive the resulting revenue. The people of Canada have a right to know. If this government is to issue licences then I imagine the fees would go to the federal authorities. But that would not make British Columbia very happy.

I am quite satisfied the people of British Columbia will feel they are being gypped out of well over $1 million if this bill comes into effect unless they get something back in return. I would ask the minister to indicate clearly at this time, before we pass this bill, whether the people of British Columbia are going to be guaranteed an amount equal to the 20 per cent plus the $275,000 in taxes and other financial returns they could normally expect if the dam were built. That province and hon. members in this house have a right to be told before a vote is taken upon this measure. I will go as far as to say that I am determined not to support this bill unless I have an answer to a few of these questions, and I would like this one answered in particular before I am called upon to vote.

There are even more important aspects of the bill than this particular economic issue, and the most significant of these, to my mind, is the question of economic nationalism as opposed to economic internationalism. In deciding whether we are going to adopt a measure of this type, which is in opposition to an agreement already drawn between a provincial authority and a company in the United States, we must bear in mind that we might possibly disrupt an economic deal between the two parties involved.

The president of the Royal Bank of Canada at a NATO meeting today had this to say: "A return to economic nationalism is a real danger." In this instance it is possibly more dangerous than most of us realize.

I know there are many hon. members inside this house and out who are not too interested in this bill because it does not affect their particular regions, but I believe this measure is vitally important to all of us and I would urge upon them the importance of studying it closely. This is not a matter of provincialism. It is a matter of internationalism and it can well affect the relations between the two countries. The late Mackenzie King had this to say. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) earlier today quoted from Hansard of March 9, 1944. I believe he said he was reading what Mr. Mackenzie King had to say in respect of the setting up of the international joint commission. He also had this to say which the hon. member did not read:

> The Columbia is a truly international river. Any development, and particularly any power development, of the resources of the river on one side of the boundary is certain to have an effect in the other country. For this reason it is necessary that the plans for development of the river basin in one country should be adapted to those in the other.

Mr. Speaker, the Columbia river primarily affects the states of Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana, and the province of British Columbia. In the Pacific northwest, however, there is an economic block made up of British Columbia, Alberta, Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon and northern California. You will notice how closely those two are integrated; that is, the very fact that this Columbia river so materially affects the states and the provinces involved and the fact that the natural terrain in that area is of such a nature that it would be a natural form of development to develop the whole area as an economic unit, should play a most important part in our decision as to whether or not we should go ahead and adopt this measure at this time. As yet we have no assurance that this government, if the bill is passed, will go ahead and permit that development on an international basis. We hear other stories. We have certain clippings from newspaper articles. Unfortunately the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources did not earlier today have the information tabled so that we could discover for ourselves what he told the people of Trail. But I think we can take some of that from the newspaper and deal with it at a later time. One of the things I believe he mentioned was this matter of diversion. On the matter of diversion the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had this to say when he spoke on February 4 as reported at page 871 of Hansard:

> . . . the government of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction and control of the use of all waters within Canada, which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary, and has the right to divert and use these waters within Canada. The United States has the same rights south of the boundary.

That is a most important statement that the minister made, when he said that the United States has the same authority south of the boundary as we happen to have north of it. Diversion is like co-operation. It is a two-way street. I have certain maps here. Unfortunately some of these things cannot be put on Hansard, but on checking the map of that particular area I find that there are two most important dams to which we have heard considerable reference in today's debate. One is Waneta No. 1 and the other is Waneta No. 2. Both of these, as the map would indicate, are on the Pend d'Oreille river just north of the boundary. There is a drop in that river of some 700 feet from the point at which the dams are constructed down to the main stream.

I wonder—I do not know—whether we have examined closely into the possibility that the Americans may, because they are so short of power, decide to dig a tunnel from that river into the main stream just south of the border. It is only a matter of 14 miles or 15 miles. We have a million horsepower in that particular area. I do not know whether it is possible from an engineering point of view. We have not been told. The only place we can probably get that information is in the committee to which I understand this bill is going later. However, that is one of the questions that should be dealt with because that would automatically mean that my good friend the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) would be most unhappy because he would not have power in the Waneta dam for his use up at Trail. We have an excess of 75,000 horsepower there now, we were told earlier. Of course we have no market for it but we are told that we should not accept a sale of a commodity down south of the border even though we could well use the finances that might come from such a sale.

I maintain that from the viewpoint of public relations it is more important that we should have good international relations as far as keeping this a sound economic block is concerned, than just to go ahead and stop the building of a reserve lake as would happen here, for instance, either, for purposes of political expediency as has been charged or for other reasons. The whole thing should be examined by engineers most closely with the view of considering not just ourselves but the whole power situation on the American side as well.

With regard to that matter, I have here from the New York Times of February 5—and I find it to be a fairly reliable newspaper—an article in which Henry C. Alexander, president of J. P. Morgan and Company, addressed the annual dinner of the Canadian Society in New York. This is quite recent. It was February 5. I read from this article the following:

> Mr. Alexander said Canada-United States relations were good. But, he added, the emerging position of both countries as world leaders make it vital that they work harder than ever at the job of being good neighbours.

But I heard the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources say, "I am going to divert the Columbia river into the Fraser river". I wonder just how much of good public relations that means between the people of the United States and Canada.

Mr. Lesage: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I never said that the waters of the Columbia river were going to be diverted to the Fraser river. The only thing that was announced was that a survey would be made about the possibility of a diversion.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Why would you make a survey if you did not intend to do it?

An hon. Member: Your intentions are good, anyway.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Liberal policy.

Mr. Hahn: The policy apparently is to survey with no ulterior motive in mind. I do not want to read anything into the minister's mind or into his words. I just view it as a matter of fact that when you take a survey or when you perhaps suggest something, there must be a reason for the suggestion.

Mr. Byrne: Divert the flood waters; not the normal flow.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is an afterthought.

Mr. Hahn: I am pleased to hear that because I want to know—and maybe the minister can tell us later—what they are going to do with the water that has been flowing over this same area for thousands and thousands of years. Because if they are just taking that little bit of flood water—it is not a little bit—

Mr. Lesage: It is approximately 12 million acre feet; that is what you call a little bit of water.

Mr. Hahn: That is a tremendous amount of water. I am pleased that the minister has quoted the figure. Now we know. There are 12 million acre feet of this flood water that is being diverted for power purposes, I believe. Now, coming back to this quotation:

> Differences do exist, he said. It would be unfortunate—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hahn: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) would be well advised to listen. This man, Mr. Alexander, who happens to be the president of J. P. Morgan and Company in the United States, is well worth listening to. He is even as important as some of the august members across the way. I shall reread this phrase, Mr. Speaker.

> Differences do exist, he said. It would be unfortunate, he added, if a "velvet curtain" were to be woven out of a wishful pretence that there were no conflicts of interest. He named as "sources of tension" the tariff problem, commercial rivalry, differences in matters of global policy and disagreement over how to deal with subversion.

He did not name the Castlegar scheme, Mr. Speaker, because it had not become such a national problem in Canada as it has today, otherwise he would have included it. Perhaps I should refer to it as the proposed diversion of the Columbia river into the Fraser. The article continues:

> The head of the Morgan bank said there was need for co-ordination between the two countries along "rational rather than narrowly national" lines. He expressed that view in connection with the development of water power, oil and gas and other sources of energy.
> "It so happens," he said, "that the providence which so generously blessed our two countries with these gifts of nature located many of them in such a way that, if each of us is to get the maximum benefit from them, they will have to be developed by our people either jointly or in close co-ordination."

Our good friends across the way need to realize that it is important to develop these things jointly and co-operatively.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hahn: Now, you had your chance, and while what you said possibly satisfied you, I cannot say it was completely satisfactory to me.

An hon. Member: You are very charitable, George.

Mr. Hahn: I can afford to be charitable. They changed me from a Liberal to a good Social Crediter.

The next question is, where will the federal government sell this excess power? We are told by the government, and by the authorities in command in British Columbia, that there is no sale for the surplus 75,000 kilowatts produced by Waneta No. 1. The point is, if we get this additional power that the United States interests are going to give us—we should remember that this is not power the people of British Columbia are making available, it is power that is going to be made in the United States and British Columbia is to get 20 per cent of it. We cannot find a market for the 75,000 kilowatts we have at Waneta No. 1; we have another half million kilowatts available in Waneta No. 2; we have another 250,000 kilowatts in Waneta No. 1 if we want to develop it. We have no place to sell it today. Will this government, that has said we must keep the power for our national interests because we might want to put an industry in that area, announce to the government of British Columbia today that they have an industry they are going to put in that area? Then, we could say to the people of British Columbia, there is the reason for keeping it. That is the vital factor in this whole question. The people of British Columbia are being asked today to give up rights which they normally enjoyed under a former Liberal administration and coalition administration in that province. They are being asked to do this without even any assurance in return that there will be an industry put into that area.

Our premier in British Columbia has done an excellent job in getting industry into that province, but he can only do a certain amount. We cannot expect him to undo everything that this government is trying to do now.

The next question is, is it in the national interest to let the water go to waste? I would say, Mr. Speaker, that is what has happened for centuries. If this bill becomes law, unless this government does as the British Columbia government has proposed to do, then we will not do any more than continue wasting that water for the next century or so if we happen to be, I was almost going to say, blessed with a further Liberal administration, but it would not be a blessing.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) mentioned that we must look to the ramifications in terms of energy. On page 872 of Hansard for February 4, 1955, he said:

> We must be prepared to look beyond the basins themselves to the ramifications in terms of energy, and the facilities for its effective use, before determining the effect that a specific project may have on the Canadian economy as a whole.

We have millions and millions of horsepower available in British Columbia if we want to develop it. This particular project is not going to make one iota of difference to the availability of horsepower in the province. The project is concerned merely with the creation of a storage lake. In return, we are going to receive some power from the United States. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what he is going to suggest we do with our electrical power if and when atomic energy is used instead of electrical energy. This is an important factor, especially when we read that the United States has floated the atomic-powered submarine Nautilus. This source of power must be kept in mind.

I am fully aware that the minister will say we use electrical power in the development of atomic energy, but it is true, Mr. Speaker, that besides using electrical power developed from water power we have other means and we have millions of additional horsepower available. We have these resources which this so-called fine administration has not developed. Now that we have an opportunity of doing so, and of helping the province out of debt, this government wants to block us. This government is not going to be responsible for anything that Premier Bennett or his cabinet happens to do in making a deal with anyone. They need not be too concerned about it.

Apparently this is a change in policy. We have the Libby and later the Kootenay projects which this government decided they would not allow to be carried through. In respect of that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to an article from the Vancouver Sun dated November 12, 1954. It is interesting to note in this respect that the date is November 12, 1954, not a few years ago but just last year. The article reads:

> British Columbia cabinet ministers can see nothing but politics in Ottawa's move to kill the proposed Kaiser aluminum dam on Arrow lakes in southeastern B.C.
> Their suspicions were bolstered today when it was reported from Ottawa that federal officials have rejected Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company's application to export surplus power to the U.S., a deal that has had federal approval up to now.
>
> B.C. officials see it as a tidying up—

I like that phrase.

> —process by Ottawa to build solid ground for the move against the Kaiser's dam plan.

And this is very important, Mr. Speaker, because it says here:

> This policy won federal approval in 1949.
> B.C. cabinet ministers consider Ottawa's rejection of the plan now is aimed solely at killing the Kaiser deal.

I am not a constitutional lawyer, and cannot discuss the constitutional aspect of the matter to the same degree as some hon. members have. However, I have been interested in what has been said about this part of the problem. I am satisfied it will have further consideration from other members in this group who will discuss the matter from the standpoint of its constitutionality.

I notice my time has almost expired, and that I shall not have time to discuss the other points I had in mind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time will expire at 9.57.

Mr. Hahn: Very well. At page 873 of Hansard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said this, when introducing the measure:

> The actual proportion of the power benefits received by the upstream and downstream countries will depend on the merits of each case; but there is little doubt that both countries will expect to get a reasonable share of the power developed as a result of joint efforts.

What share will British Columbia get? I ask that question because the minister has said that the two contracting parties, namely the governments of Canada and of the United States, will receive their shares. I want to know what the British Columbia share will be because, after all, that is the only province affected by this bill. The minister has said that 20 rivers are affected, but I am satisfied there are more than that in British Columbia alone.

To quote further from the minister in the same address:

In guarding the national interest, we must be sure that any arrangements between Canadian and American interests are concluded at arm's length; that they are bound up in long-term contracts between responsible utilities; and that the recompense in power or cash for the resultant benefits in the downstream country bears a close relationship to a fair market price of the electricity so generated, as well as to the value to Canada of alternative water resource developments solely in this country.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is, I am sure, Canada's greatest merchant.

An hon. Member: Be careful.

Mr. Hahn: Well, he deals in all of our goods, and is giving some of them away.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): He is giving British Columbia's away.

Mr. Argue: What's a million dollars?

Mr. Hahn: The point is this: I want to know how much electricity is worth at the border today, when there are 75,000 kilowatts nobody wants to buy. How much will we get for the balance of what he proposes to sell?

And then he says:

For example, unless the cost of electricity to the beneficiaries in the United States is comparable with that of the best alternative project within their own control, we would have good reason to be sceptical.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him his time has expired.

On motion of Mr. Holowach the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I assume it will be a continuation of this debate.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX A

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

Communique

The governments of the member nations of the commonwealth are resolved to do their utmost to ease international strain. It is their aim, not only to bring any open hostilities to an end, but to promote conditions in which real peace can grow and thrive so that freedom and plenty may be enjoyed by all peoples.

Since the last meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in 1953, agreements have been reached in various parts of the world which have had the effect of removing differences and widening the area of understanding among governments and peoples. The prime ministers welcomed the settlement of the Trieste dispute. They recorded their satisfaction that, in the Middle East, the United Kingdom's differences with Egypt and Iran had been resolved. They looked forward to closer collaboration between all the countries of that area so that its economic development and the welfare of its peoples could be advanced. They welcomed, in southeast Asia, the end of hostilities in Indo-China and stressed the need for strict adherence to the conditions of the Geneva agreement and for increased welfare and stability in that area.

The prime ministers were informed that the commonwealth countries associated with the North Atlantic treaty were convinced that the early ratification of the agreements reached in London and Paris and the acceptance of federal Germany into the community of the western nations would mark an important advance towards the security and cohesion of western Europe.

The prime ministers met at a time of tension in the Far East. In view of developments which occurred during their meeting, their discussions of this problem assumed a special significance. They were united in their conviction that it was necessary that incidents should be avoided while means were sought for a peaceful outcome. They were confident that the intimate and personal discussions which they had held at this meeting would be a valuable foundation for future consultations, with one another and with other countries directly concerned, and for the development of their policies on this question.

The prime ministers noted the improvement in the outlook for world trade and prosperity which had taken place since the commonwealth finance ministers met at Sydney in January, 1954. They recognized that commonwealth countries had made a substantial contribution to this by maintaining the stability of their currencies, by continuing their development programs, in which the Colombo plan had played its part, and by expanding their production. They had also continued their progressive approach towards the widest practicable system of trade and payments, which best serves the interest of the sterling area and Canada.

The prime ministers affirmed their determination to continue these policies of economic progress. They agreed, in particular, that all commonwealth countries should strive to develop further their resources and their earning power. By these means they could best consolidate their strength and make an increased contribution to economic stability throughout the world.

The prime ministers gave anxious thought to the problems of nucleur energy. The latest discoveries confront humanity with a force which is almost beyond the capacity of man's brain to comprehend or measure. They present a choice and a challenge. Is this vast power to be developed for the benefit of man, or is it to be used to bring ruin upon the human race?

The prime ministers once again declare that their countries will never embark upon aggression. Indeed, it is their hope that, when the peoples of the world understand the magnitude of the disaster which world war would bring, all nations will shrink from violence and follow peaceful means of settling their differences. The annihilating power of the new weapons renders it imperative that sanity should prevail and that war should be prevented.

It is the aim of the commonwealth countries to work for a disarmament agreement which includes forces and weapons of all kinds and is both comprehensive and effective. Commonwealth governments have already devoted much time and thought to producing and furthering practical plans to achieve this purpose, and two of the commonwealth countries are members of the subcommittee of the United Nations disarmament commission.

With international accord on disarmament, it would become possible to turn the vast resources of atomic energy increasingly into channels which benefit mankind. The prime ministers were informed of the progress made by the United Kingdom government in the use of atomic energy for industrial and other peaceful purposes. They looked forward to the prospects of continued close co-operation between the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries in the development of the civil uses of atomic energy.

In the course of the meeting, the Prime Minister of Pakistan informed the other prime ministers that Pakistan was about to adopt a republican form of constitution but desired to remain a member of the commonwealth. They were assured that the people of Pakistan were resolved to maintain, despite this constitutional change, their steadfast adherence to the commonwealth and their recognition of the crown as the symbol of the free association of its sovereign members. In a declaration issued on February 4 they signified their agreement that Pakistan should continue on this basis to be a full member of the commonwealth after becoming a republic. All the prime ministers reaffirmed that their countries would remain united as free and equal members of the commonwealth, freely co-operating in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress.

The commonwealth is a unique association. Its countries contain a fourth of the world's population, embracing people of many races and religions. Among its members are countries of importance in all quarters of the globe. Its strength and influence in the world today are derived from this and from a common outlook which, in spite of differences of geography, religion and race, evokes a broadly similar response to most international problems of the day.

The commonwealth countries do not pursue any selfish purpose. They seek no aggrandisement and will always oppose aggression. In concert with all who share their ideals, they are resolved to do their utmost to further the cause of peace throughout the world.

APPENDIX B

REGIONAL DEFENCE DISCUSSIONS

While the commonwealth prime ministers were in London the opportunity was taken to hold a series of additional meetings on regional defence problems. These meetings covered the main areas in which the forces of commonwealth countries may have to be deployed in the event of war. Each was attended by representatives of those commonwealth countries whose forces might in war be operating in the particular area under discussion. Their purpose was to enable the representatives of those countries to join together in reviewing the plans for the defence of each area.

The representatives of the commonwealth countries concerned with these regional defence plans recognized that the advent of thermonuclear weapons involves fundamental changes in the strategic approach to defence problems. They agreed that the overwhelming superiority of the western powers in nuclear weapons offers at the present time the most effective and practical assurance that world peace will not be disturbed by any deliberate act of aggression. They agreed that their defence policies should be founded on the principle that world war can be prevented if the free democracies are resolved to maintain in readiness forces sufficiently strong to deter any potential aggressor.

In Europe great progress has already been made in building up the defensive shield provided by the forces of the North Atlantic treaty powers; and the commonwealth representatives who took part in these discussions welcomed the steps which are being taken to increase the strength of those forces by a military contribution from western Germany. The defence problems of the Middle East were reviewed in the light of recent developments and agreement was reached on the basis for a new approach to defence planning in this area. Discussion of the defence problems of southeast Asia covered plans to help the countries in that area, not only to resist aggression, but also to strengthen their internal security. The four commonwealth countries which are signatories of the Manila treaty took this opportunity of reviewing, in preparation for the forthcoming conference at Bangkok, progress in making that treaty an effective instrument for these purposes.

The opportunity was taken to discuss, as one element in the defence of the Manila treaty area, the security of Malaya, which is regarded by the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand as of vital importance. The strategic position of the area was clarified by these discussions and it was considered that, in future, joint planning among the three governments and discussions with other participants in the Manila treaty would go forward effectively.

Throughout these regional defence discussions it was accepted that military plans must be concerted with other countries involved in the defence of these areas. The commonwealth countries concerned also recognized the need for the closest association with the United States in all defence measures. They agreed that on this basis regional defence planning can afford a solid foundation for the preservation of peace.

Bill No. 92, for the relief of Rotha Dodgson Webb.—Mr. Hunter.

IMMIGRATION

HAROLD C. BANKS—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "MACLEAN'S" MAGAZINE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the answers which I received at page 891 of Hansard relative to questions asked with respect to the application for landing of one Harold C. Banks, is the minister aware that the information contained in an article in Maclean's magazine by Sidney Katz is directly opposite to the answers I received and that that information was obtained from an official of his department?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, I am not aware of any information obtained by any writer for a magazine from officials in my department. I do not know how I could be aware of it unless they happened to report it to me. I doubt very much if this information was received from any official of my department, and in any case it does not happen to be true.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Will the minister investigate this matter because the information on which I based my question—

An hon. Member: Order; this is a speech.

Mrs. Fairclough: —was apparently secured in front of witnesses?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I do not think I should make any investigation beyond what I have already made. I sent for the application form that was filled out by Mr. Banks and I examined it myself. As a matter of fact, it is just an accident that I do not happen to have it right here in the house now. For the hon. lady's benefit, and for the benefit of anyone else who is interested, the way this mistake arose on the part of the writer of what I thought was otherwise a very good article was that question 17 on form 1000 at the time Mr. Banks was landed was an entirely different question. Some months later or perhaps a year later form 1000 was altered to include this question which had never previously been asked of anyone. No doubt it was a misapprehension of those facts that occasioned the inaccurate statement appearing in Maclean's magazine.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO SOUTHERN ONTARIO CABINET REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is there anything in the rumour that has been circulated recently to the effect that the Prime Minister is planning soon to give the great industrial area of southern Ontario cabinet representation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I know nothing whatever of these rumours. If there is any change in the cabinet the house will be duly notified.

TRADE

REPORTED AGREEMENT ON RENEWAL OF GATT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce state whether or not it is a fact that in the negotiations at Geneva agreement has been reached for the renewal of the general agreement on tariffs and trade?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The negotiations have not yet reached that stage, Mr. Speaker. I am told that it will be another three weeks before a final conclusion is reached. However, action has been taken to rebind the duties that apply in the present agreement. They have been rebound for a further period.

[Later:]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should like to correct an answer to a question of the hon. member for Eglinton that I gave before three o'clock. I said at that time that steps had been taken at GATT to rebind the schedule of tariffs. I got that impression from a rather hasty reading of a letter from Geneva this morning. I am told that while progress has been made in that direction, the actual binding has not taken place and may not take place until the end of the session some two or three weeks hence. I should like to make that correction because I would not like to take responsibility for giving out wrong information on this particular subject.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister in position to say what if anything has been reached by way of agreement? I understood there was some agreement that had been reached over there somewhat along the line indicated.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They are moving toward agreement, but no agreement is reached or is final until it is completed. The agreement is under negotiation and many factors are still open for discussion. All I can say is that progress is being made.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

WORKING HOURS OF CARRIERS IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) or, in his absence, the minister acting on his behalf. Are letter carriers operating out of a number of the postal stations in the city of Montreal being required to work a six-day week, despite their opposition to such a practice? Could a statement be made In connection with this matter?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): No, there is no such intention on the part of the government.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC CITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received a request from the comité conjoint d'étude des problèmes économiques du Québec métropolitain, of which I have a copy, concerning the alarming situation of unemployment in the metropolitan area of the city of Quebec? If so, has the minister taken any steps toward the immediate solution offered in the communication of the comité conjoint d'étude des problèmes économiques du Québec métropolitain?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): With respect to the first part of the question, the answer is yes. I received a telegram dated February 4.

In reply to the second part I might say that in so far as the question applies to public works, I answered on the same date, February 4, stating that a reference to the estimates for 1955-56 would reveal that the Quebec area had not been overlooked when planning our program of public projects. We are endeavouring to implement our program, having in mind the situation prevailing in the Quebec area.

Mr. Dufresne: May I ask a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the minister to make available other public works to take care of the alarming situation of unemployment in the metropolitan area of Quebec, in addition to the sums mentioned in the estimates?

Mr. Winters: All I can say is that the situation is clearly in mind, and will be given every consideration when the supplementary estimates are prepared. Beyond that I cannot commit the government at the moment.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHANGE IN TREATMENT REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he is now prepared to answer the question I drew to his attention yesterday.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was just waiting until hon. members opposite had completed asking their questions, at the conclusion of which I was prepared to answer the question asked yesterday. I might add that this matter was also drawn to my attention by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green).

The answer is that, other than the upward revision in the maximum amounts payable to funeral directors, the new regulations as covered by order in council P.C. 1955-102, dated January 20, 1955, did not change the administrative policy of the department as covered by instructions over a lengthy period. However, due to difference in interpreting the instructions in some districts, it was considered advisable when the regulations dealing with the increased rate were being amended to incorporate some of these instructions in the regulations.

The department has always stressed the point that those entitled in the case of a death which occurred in a department hospital had the right to make such arrangements for the funeral and burial as they wished. Furthermore, the department would not undertake the funeral and burial arrangements unless specifically requested to do so when there was a next of kin or other person competent and willing to make such arrangements. This practice is now incorporated in the regulations.

The new regulations make it quite clear that the maximum amounts will be paid in every case where a veteran dies while on departmental treatment strength if in receipt of treatment for his service disability. In all other cases, that is, those receiving domiciliary care or treatment for a non-service related condition, the regulations only permit payments of or towards the funeral and burial expenses where, in the opinion of the department, the estate and the resources of a surviving spouse, where applicable, are insufficient.

This has been the administrative policy of the department over an extended period, although departmental officials in certain instances in the past may have improperly relieved the next of kin of making the funeral and burial arrangements, thus making it necessary for the department to advance payments to cover the charges and subsequently originate claims against estates in certain cases.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF CUSTOMS APPRAISER AT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Have representations been received from the Hudson Bay route association, or other interested bodies, for the appointment of a customs appraiser at the port of Churchill, to the end that expedition in clearances may be achieved there? What is the attitude of the government in this matter?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The Hudson Bay route association, with the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver), appealed to the departmental officials on Tuesday of this week, and the answer was given to the delegation that the matter was under consideration, that up to date it has not been finalized, but that it is being further considered.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF OFFICE AT BRANDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware of the need for a permanent income tax office in the city of Brandon to serve the rural population of that area? Is it the intention of the minister to establish such an office?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that this is the kind of question that could be asked when the estimates of the Department of National Revenue are being studied in committee of supply. I think the hon. member should be patient enough to wait until committee of supply is studying the estimates of the Department of National Revenue, at which time his question could be asked.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was anticipating the end of the fiscal year, which more or less makes it matter of urgency.

FISHERIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF FISH MEAL PLANT—APPLICATION BY GERMAN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked whether the federal Department of Fisheries had refused a permit to a German firm to operate a fish meal plant at Louisburg, Nova Scotia. This inquiry arises out of a letter sent to me by the Sydney board of trade, of which copies were sent to him and to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) and the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Buchanan).

The answer is no; the federal government does not license shore plants. That is done by the provincial authorities.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Might I follow that up by asking the minister a supplementary question, because his answer is incomplete. Did the minister's department refuse a permit to that firm to bring a certain number of trawlers into that area, which refusal in turn prevented the establishment of that plant?

Mr. Sinclair: Of course that was not the question the hon. member asked yesterday. There has been no refusal from Ottawa. If a plant is established in Canada, that firm would have exactly the same rights as any other Canadian firm to import used trawlers in keeping with our Canadian trawlers policy.

Mr. Gillis: Would the minister tell us what that policy is?

Mr. Sinclair: Every fish plant can import one used trawler. If they need more than that, they would have to build a new one in Canada, and then they would be given a permit to import another used trawler. But we certainly do not want 22 used trawlers brought into Canada to serve one fish meal plant.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DUFRESNE—WINNER OF INTERNATIONAL DOG DERBY

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have no doubt that the house will allow me to refer to a sporting event of the greatest national and international importance, which took place yesterday in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I think hon. members will have to learn through the newspapers about the sporting event to which our hon. friend wishes to make reference. I have no doubt that they will share his satisfaction in this regard.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I simply meant to point out that the champion, Mr. Narcisse Dompierre, is present in the gallery.

MARGARINE

SUGGESTED CORRECTION IN ANSWER TO QUESTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Pommer (Lisgar): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On page 1016 of Hansard there appears an answer to a question of mine having to do with the production of margarine during the calendar year 1954. The answer given is that the production of margarine was 115,868 pounds. I ask the parliamentary assistant whether that should not be millions, because in the answer to the second question he gives a total of 94,151,000 pounds as having gone into the production of margarine.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to go over the question with the hon. member and clarify it.

INTERNATIONAL RIVERS

PROVISION REQUIRING LICENCE FROM GOVERNMENT OF CANADA TO CONSTRUCT, OPERATE AND MAINTAIN ANY IMPROVEMENT

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, from 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon to ten o'clock in the evening this house heard eloquent words from able and learned hon. members respecting the guarding and maintaining of human and individual rights, provincial rights and the rights of this Canadian parliament. At that time we may have had our differences of opinion as to the best way to guard those rights. However, I feel certain that all of us will agree with the principle that they can best be maintained if we have greater and greater decentralization and diffusion of administrative power. Although that debate was thought-provoking and timely, the message seems to have been already lost, as is indicated by the bill which we are asked to consider at this time. Therefore, as I sat in my chair yesterday and listened to the debate and the arguments presented, one of the questions that I thought should be answered is, why in heaven's name has this government not practised what it so honestly professes to believe?

I should like to say at the very beginning that I am moved to take part in this debate by reason of the fact that Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements, is not only ill-advised, but was engineered for only one purpose. Unless we hear from the government members more forceful arguments than have been presented up to this time that purpose is purely a political one. Behind this bill is a picture which indicates the present unco-operative attitude of the federal government in their relations with the sister province of British Columbia. In plain language this bill is being introduced by the Liberal government to handcuff the Social Credit government of British Columbia from going ahead with its proposed Castlegar dam proposition. That project is obviously not to the liking of the Liberal party, but I believe it is generally thought of as being in the best interests of the people of British Columbia in the proper economic development of that region.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in his opening remarks on the bill, made little reference to the dispute between the government of British Columbia and the federal government on the Castlegar proposition. However, the show was given away when he assured the house at that time that for the present no other area was affected except the Columbia river and the Milk river, which we all know flow through British Columbia and Alberta.

This dispute was succinctly pointed out in a radio address by the Hon. R. E. Sommers, minister of lands and forests in the British Columbia government, when he spoke over radio station CBU, Vancouver, Monday, November 29, 1954, at which time he said:

> Under the federal proposal, we of British Columbia would have to pay out $2 million per year for fifty years for an annual net return of only $111,700. Under your government's proposal, British Columbia would pay out not one red cent for a minimum net return of new electric power worth well over $1 million annually while being secured in the knowledge—

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in this country there are some freedoms that are very valuable. One of them is freedom of speech, but certainly there ought to be freedom to listen as well. Hon. members are making so much noise that it is impossible to hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Dickey: Read it in last night's Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I appreciate what the hon. member for Peace River has just said. Hon. members will agree that immediately after the orders of the day are called each day there is usually some disturbance in the house, and I think this would be an appropriate opportunity to ask the co-operation of hon. members in giving the hon. member who has the floor as much silence as possible.

Mr. Byrne: Is he making a speech or reading one?

Mr. Holowach: To continue the speech of the minister:

> Under your government's proposal, British Columbia would pay out not one red cent for a minimum net return of new electric power worth well over $1 million annually while being secured in the knowledge that your water resources and their vast potential in hydroelectric power are not in any way jeopardized.

To substantiate my charge that there is an unco-operative attitude by the federal government in relation to the provincial government, may I quote from the remarks of the Hon. R. E. Sommers during his address on the throne speech in the British Columbia legislature last month:

> I hasten to say that this is not the only example of federal nonco-operation at the present time and in a moment I would like to give you a second current example. First, however, I would like to emphasize that previous to the assumption of control of the province of British Columbia's affairs by your present government, the federal government did not interfere in water resource arrangements being made by the province of British Columbia and other parties.
> When the West Kootenay Power and Light Company made application for additional storage of waters on Kootenay lake (a part of the Columbia river system), the international joint commission agreed that this was desirable in order to firm up power downstream. The government of Canada endorsed this viewpoint, in the full knowledge that the province of British Columbia received no financial return from this additional storage being created on Kootenay lake. Yet, in the present instance, with equally full knowledge that the province is to obtain a large revenue annually from storage on Arrow lakes, a strong threat of denial of the rights of the provinces is voiced at the Canadian federal level. In the case of this extra water storage in Kootenay lake, it should be noted that the Washington state power groups received the benefits of regulation to the extent of about 35,000 h.p. There was no Canadian federal interference on this use of the waters of B.C. There was no Canadian federal claim in this instance that B.C. was "giving away her water resources". Yet the view taken at Ottawa seems to be an entirely opposite one in the case of the proposed low dam, despite the fact that important power and cash benefits ensue to British Columbia upon the completion of the project.

I submit that this bill would never have been introduced if it affected the provinces of Ontario or Quebec or if a Liberal administration were still at the helm in British Columbia. I mention the provinces of Ontario and Quebec because the people there are concerned about their provincial rights and if this bill had concerned them they would have insisted upon every member of this house irrespective of his political affiliation rising in his place to voice a protest at this type of legislation.

I would like to remind the members of this house that the people of British Columbia and Alberta take a back seat to no one in the matter of protecting their provincial rights. Therefore we call upon all hon. members in this house to voice a protest against this bill, as it is the most compelling responsibility of every alert and intelligent citizen of this country to do so.

We should bear in mind the spirit in which this bill has been conceived. If the bill is passed let me assure the house that it will have far-reaching effect, much more so than many of its supporters presently think. Without even considering the financial merits of the proposition as submitted by the government of British Columbia, this bill will bring still greater centralization, regimentation, red tape and injustices to the provinces. This bill will create a precedent and a further basis for the invalidation of provincial jurisdiction. By this edict the government could well seize existing plants and embark still further on enterprises financed by the already overstrained taxpayers of our country. There is already too much government interference and government monopoly in fields which could well be serviced by private enterprise and without costing the taxpayers of this country one cent.

This bill will discourage the formation and flow of new outside capital to our country, upon which the progress of our country depends to such a great extent. To continue to discourage little by little the invitation of outside capital to share in the development of our great country means a forward step for socialism, which if left unchecked may well mean that while in the international field we may be able to stem communism, in domestic affairs we may well have a socialist state.

Last but not least, this bill may alienate friends and bring controversy, misunderstanding and harmful counter-measures from our great neighbours to the south. As was emphasized yesterday, the atmosphere in which the international joint commission meets is quite delicate. What more harmful act could be done at this time than to introduce a bill which will produce nothing positive but which will damage further the negotiations which are being carried on.

To understand the problem completely we must know what is being attempted. It goes without saying that no fair-minded member of this house should possibly quarrel with the objectives of this bill unless he knows what are the implications of this bill. I refer hon. members of this house to the statements made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) as well as quotations made by men well versed in the details of the dispute.

In introducing this bill the minister took up three and a half pages of Hansard in arguing long but not well the reasons for the bill. What the house should know are the real facts which at this late date spark this bill. I would like to quote what the minister said as reported on page 871 of Hansard of February 4, 1955:

> Obviously it would be a short-sighted policy indeed that would jeopardize the power resources of Canada for a short-term advantage, or for an inadequate return.

That is sound theory, but what are the facts? May I again quote Mr. Sommers, who should know. He stated in his radio address:

> Southern British Columbia now has ample power available to it for the maintenance of existing industry. Southeastern British Columbia has a tremendous potential of power from the Columbia river system that can supply our needs for the foreseeable future. At the present time we have available 75,000 kilowatts of power surplus to our needs in the area. Furthermore, there are several very attractive sites for future development when the need arises.

Other speakers have given a vivid picture of the untold potential in the matter of water power that exists in British Columbia. If we couple that information with the fact that we are making tremendous scientific advances in the field of atomic energy, then I believe that the argument that we will be power hungry in a few years is absolutely unfounded. The possibility of building atomic plants to generate power is even now before us. To illustrate my point may I read an article by the Associated Press from Halifax dated Saturday, February 5, 1955:

> Nova Scotia Weighs Atomic Power Plant
>
> The Nova Scotia Light and Power Company said it is studying the possibility of building an atomic plant to generate electric power.
>
> The disclosure followed a statement by Premier Henry Hicks in Ottawa that the provincial power commission has been invited to consider building such a plant.
>
> The company said preliminary discussions have been held with Atomic Energy of Canada agency at Ottawa.
> It added that the discussions led to Nova Scotia Light and Power proposing to Atomic Energy of Canada that the two join in constructing an atomic-energy power producer of about 20,000 kilowatts in this province.
> Premier Hicks, who also is chairman of the Nova Scotia Power Commission, said the commission had been invited by Atomic Energy of Canada to take part in the construction of a prototype reactor capable of generating 20,000 kilowatts of power.

A more recent example of additional sources of electric energy and projected plants to feed electric energy into power-hungry places appears in the New York Times of February 11, 1955. I quote:

> Edison Will Build Atom Power Plant
> Reactor near Peekskill, first privately financed, will supply city electricity.
>
> The country's first private atomic electric power plant will be built near New York city.
> He said the company hoped to apply for a licence from the Atomic Energy Commission before April 1. Consolidated Edison is the first utility company to tell Congress it is ready to go ahead, without government aid, since the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 opened the door to private industry for peaceful uses of the atom.

It seems to me science may yet find ways to crack the energy problems in the future by the utilization of other metals, and new scientific vistas will open an enormous area of possibility. This, in addition to the already outlined future potential of British Columbia water power, would indicate that there need be little concern over any possible shortage of energy in the foreseeable future.

As regards compensation, what more sensible arrangement could have been advanced than that outlined by the government of British Columbia? Mr. Sommers indicated the generous terms of compensation. I should once again like to quote from his radio address respecting this very point. He said:

> Now what do we receive in a tangible return for permitting the storage of our surplus water?
> This province will have delivered to it, entirely free of charge, 20 per cent of the amount of power generated at American plants on the lower Columbia river available from the net storage of some three million acre feet of water held by this new dam. This 20 per cent will amount to not less than 42,000 kilowatts annually available for the development and expansion of industry in those areas of the province where there is a need for power, or for sale elsewhere at the highest possible rate. There is also an agreement that if a heavier delivery of power is needed over any specified period, this extra power will be forthcoming.
> What does 42,000 kilowatts mean in the way of financial return? Using a very conservative figure of $20 per kilowatt year, it means more than $800,000 annually. Add to this the annual taxes accruing to the province from this project of $275,000 and we see a minimum annual income of over $1 million guaranteed for 50 years.

We have heard arguments regarding the damage which will be caused by flooding, but extensive damage could not be done by a low level dam at this point. It is possible that a high level dam might create some damage, but I understand that after extensive research and test borings in the area there is no possibility of a high level dam being built and thus very little possibility of any serious damage to agricultural and community property.

Mr. Sommers, in his radio address over CBU on November 29, 1954, stated:

> Such a dam will not cause flooding of the Arrow lakes area as the water level will be held where it will not in any way damage existing communities, farm areas or transportation facilities.

In a letter dated January 4, 1955, from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) to Mr. W. D. Crowder, secretary-treasurer of the Trail chamber of commerce, the following appears, and I quote from page 3 of the letter:

> It is estimated that as much as 4 million acre-feet could be stored without damage to agricultural land and that five to six million acre-feet could be made available without any serious flooding costs being incurred.

Mr. Speaker, let us now proceed to page 873 of Hansard, dated February 4, in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is reported as follows:

> In guarding the national interest, we must be sure that any arrangements between Canadian and American interests are concluded at arm's length; that they are bound up in long-term contracts between responsible utilities; and that the recompense in power or cash for the resultant benefits in the downstream country bears a close relationship to a fair market price of the electricity so generated, as well as to the value to Canada of alternative water resource developments solely in this country.

In reply I should like to point out that this is precisely the motive behind the proposition advanced by the Social Credit government of British Columbia. On page 874 of Hansard for the same date the minister is reported as follows:

> In conclusion, I would like to emphasize again that the authority asked for in this bill will enable the Canadian government to ensure that development and utilization of Canadian water resources covered by this legislation will be carried out in an efficient manner, thus protecting the national interests of this and future generations.

Hon. members will have noticed that international law and international practice have had much to do with the drafting of this bill.

One would think from the minister's remarks that the federal government alone is concerned in protecting the national interest of this and future generations. As a matter of fact, the inference is that the government of British Columbia is not so concerned. But surely the Liberal federal government is not claiming that it has a monopoly of wisdom, because if it is then I would like to know where one could find a better example of political society steeped in self-admiration.

Surely the people of Canada and the elected representatives of the government of British Columbia deserve some credit for foresight, and this government cannot alone insist, as seems to be the case, that it is not only the judge but the jury and policeman in deciding what is good for the people of that area.

The reference to international law and international practice is not important in regard to this measure. The important question is whether this parliament should have the authority to write domestic laws through international treaties which nullify provincial laws and the wishes of the people involved. What is the point of electing men to legislatures and then having this parliament nullify decisions which they make on matters purely local?

Surely this thought must have disturbed the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when, speaking at the United Nations, he said:

I wish to make it clear here . . . that, in regard to any rights which are defined in this document, the federal government of Canada does not intend to invade other rights which are also important to the people of Canada. By this I mean the rights of the provinces under our federal constitution.

I feel certain the people of British Columbia and of Canada as a whole will see through this high sounding reference to international law and practice. As a matter of fact, this entire dispute reminds me of an incident that took place in Alberta not long ago during the last provincial election. At that time the Social Credit government of Alberta insisted that if they were again elected they would adopt an export policy under which the great surpluses of natural gas in that province would be shared with the rest of Canada. At that time the Liberal politicians ran up and down our province crying the blues and telling the people what a great calamity would take place, and that we were bartering our rightful heritage. As soon as the election was over and the Social Credit government of Alberta was returned stronger than ever, the provincial Liberals hung their heads in shame, while their federal counterparts went around the country insisting they were for the export of gas from the very beginning. Just how inconsistent can people be?

Let me inform this house that that very inconsistency on the part of the Liberal politicians was responsible for uniting the people of Alberta. I maintain that this same Liberal inconsistency will result in the people of British Columbia rallying to the cause of the Social Credit movement more strongly than ever. This inconsistency was referred to by Mr. Sommers in his remarks in the speech from the throne debate as well, and at page 24 of his address there are these very pertinent remarks:

Again I feel I cannot let this opportunity pass without mention of the inconsistency of federal authority thinking as between recent authorization of export of natural gas and oil from Canada to the United States and this matter of water. Surely these decisions must have been predicated on the assumption that provincial needs would be filled first and the balance that was not required locally would be available for export. This is a reasonable approach with which we have no argument, but we do suggest that the policies relative to export on one natural resource should extend to another, as in this case, water.

We have an immediate potential of 2,730,000 horsepower on the Columbia river alone which would meet all local power needs of that area for 50 years by conservative estimate. Yet we are faced with the threat of a federal veto. Surely this would seem to be a case of the federal authority being entirely willing to approve export of a non-renewable resource yet attempting to place obstacles in the development of an otherwise wasted renewable resource such as is involved in the proposed Arrow lakes development.

It is in the light of these examples of recent, yet apparently now bygone, federal policy of non-interference in domestic affairs that this government is surprised, to say the least, to find that the federal government, on questions of water resource development in B.C., has changed its hitherto consistent policy to an active one of non-co-operation.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the real cause of this dispute is a very simple one. It involves a story of one federal minister voicing objection to the British Columbia proposal, then running to Ottawa to rally the support of yet another minister who, we all know, packs a heavier punch, who in turn rallies the support of the well-disciplined, solid majority on the government side of the house to veto the lawful and thoughtful actions of the elected representatives of the people of British Columbia.

As I listened to the support that was being given the bill by certain individuals in the socialist ranks, it seemed to me that it focused our attention on yet another great problem in our country, a problem that was probably the result of the war years. I refer to the problem of centralization and bureaucratic control. It is obvious that the socialists are justified in supporting the bill because, after all, it does cut down on the rights of the provinces.

Let me draw the attention of hon. members in the C.C.F. party to this point. While some of them may be supporting the bill because of socialist principles, it seems to me that the wool has been pulled over their eyes because there is a very strong possibility that the bill was introduced to protect vested interests in the province of British Columbia. In the same letter to the Trail chamber of commerce, dated January 4, 1955, one of the arguments advanced by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is:

> The terms of the agreement proposed by the B.C. government will have an unfavourable effect on the Canadian aluminum industry, particularly in British Columbia.

While it is certainly my wish that every industry in British Columbia prosper, are we to take it that the interests of one particular industry are more important than and overshadow the interests of the people of British Columbia? As Social Crediters, we will fight this bill in order to prevent the curtailment of a province's rights, because our concepts and political beliefs with respect to life and government call for greater and greater decentralization of power which is the only way to preserve the rights of the provinces and the worth and dignity of every individual in these respective communities.

Until better arguments are advanced by the government side, I am sorry to say that it is my view that the bill is intended for only one purpose, to bully the province of British Columbia into submission to federal dictates in a matter primarily local in character. While we Social Crediters are men of peace and harmony, we will fight because we certainly dislike bullies, especially if they are political ones.

I trust that the hearings and submissions before the external affairs committee, to which the bill is being referred, will indicate that the bill is not another classic example of the Liberals, assisted by their socialist C.C.F. midwife, giving birth to illegitimate and prejudicial legislation. I know of no other time when fuller and freer discussion was more necessary on an important matter.

The most effective contribution which hon. members can make to the cause of maintaining provincial rights and harmony in our nation depends upon a clear exposition of the nature of the dispute which prompted this measure and the high-handed methods of the government in dealing with one of the great provinces of this country. We of course are opposed to the bill first of all because it is contrary to the best interests of the people of British Columbia. We are opposed to it because the bill is against the proper economic development of that province and against the best interests of a united Canada. The only interests which the bill seems to favour are the best interests of a few politicians and the Liberal party which seems to be more interested in perpetuating itself in office than in having concern for the little people of the country.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to enter this debate at all because I am of the opinion that unless you know something about constitutional law or are an engineer you should wait until you hear the facts in the external affairs committee.

Mr. Blackmore: Too late then.

Mr. Goode: May I give my young friend, the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach), a little friendly advice. He has only been here for a very short time, but he will find that the external affairs committee consists of rather important members of the house who take their work most seriously. I think he will also find that his leader will make sure that the evidence brought out before that committee is to the point and not irrelevant.

My hon. friend brought me into this debate because he founded his speech upon a talk made over radio station CBU, Vancouver, on November 29 by the Hon. Mr. Sommers. I understand that he was making use of free political time on the air. The speech was considered both by listeners and by the Social Credit party as being a political speech. It was a good speech. I gave the Hon. Mr. Sommers full marks for it. It presented the provincial government's view on this matter but it presented it as a Social Credit political idea. No one will argue about that, certainly not my hon. friends opposite. The speech went on to attack the federal government with respect to a supposed veto. Undoubtedly a minister of the provincial government of British Columbia has that right when making use of that type of radio time, but it was a political speech.

Two days later the speech, printed by the queen's printer in Victoria on the order of the minister who had made the speech, was issued to every elementary school in my riding. It was sent under the stamp of the queen's printer and mailed to these schools for the extension of that information to the pupils there. I resent most highly, Mr. Speaker, as I am quite sure my hon. friends of the Social Credit party sitting in this house resent methods of that kind. When we have a political matter to debate, my hon. friends and I will fight it out in this house and we will not use school children in the riding for political purposes.

Mr. Hansell: Might I ask one question at this point? Do the cabinet members of the various provinces enjoy franking privileges? Because, if they do not, the member has left the impression that this material may have been sent out by members in this house.

Mr. Goode: May I clear that up? That is a good question. This speech I have on my desk was received from the principal of one of my schools. While I was in his office the mail arrived and that letter was stamped by the queen's printer's meter, and the hon. member will accept my word, I am sure, and will investigate that in my riding. This was sent from the queen's printer, Victoria, and if it was sent on the order of the provincial minister then I feel the matter was handled in a most despicable manner. If it was paid for by the Social Credit party for mailing and printing, then the matter is much more serious because it was sent for motives that I certainly will not impute to my hon. friends across the chamber.

Now, we have got to the position, Mr. Speaker, of taking matters of this kind, which are most important to this country and very important to British Columbia, to each and every kiddy in my schools with only one purpose and that is the support of the Social Credit government in British Columbia. In view of this fact, I must rise in my place and make the protest that I have made.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): This Bill No. 3 which we have before us, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion is one of the most transparent outrages that has ever been perpetrated against the provincial governments of this country. It is nothing more or less than an attempt to crack the whip and beat one of these provincial governments into submission. I am going to point out to the government that their whip-cracking tactics will not do a bit of good because we Social Crediters have developed beyond the ox-cart type of government they apparently think we are, so a whip will not have any effect on the streamlined, mechanized type of government we Social Crediters have. This government tried that a few years ago against the province of Alberta, and they failed miserably because Alberta bucked them every step of the way. I might as well serve notice now that the Liberal machine, in spite of all the tactics they adopt, will never stop the march of Social Credit across this country.

The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) based quite an argument the other day on the serious damage that might be done the economy of British Columbia and of Canada through the export of water. Then we listened to the eloquent and passionate appeals of the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) against the export of power and of water. They mentioned the fact that future generations might be affected by the action of this generation. Let me just quote from the minister's speech at page 1036 of Hansard for February 10, 1955. He said:

> As I was saying, I had always thought of the hon. member for Lethbridge as a man of vision, but this afternoon it seemed to me when he was speaking about huge surpluses of power in British Columbia at this time he was forgetting what had happened in other provinces of Canada. Not so many years ago some people in authority in Ontario were claiming the right to export power to the United States. They based their demand on the fact that there was a huge surplus of power in their province, a surplus which would exist for generations. The hon. member for Lethbridge was making the same plea this afternoon. Only 20 years later—

The minister was interrupted at that point by a question of privilege by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). It was answered, and then he goes on to say:

> Well, I believe it is exactly the same situation. Today Ontario is in a position where her last source of power is the St. Lawrence seaway development; and after that there is nothing else. And when we think how young our country is it will be realized that I am using the right expression when I say that a deal like the Kaiser one is equivalent to selling down the river or giving down the river the possibilities of power development in this country at this time. Future generations, or even ourselves, would regret it—and in a very few years' time.

Then he goes on to say, on the next page:

> I do not believe that the needs of the United States should be our criterion when we decide what we are going to do with our natural resources. Of course, the hon. member for Lethbridge said in his speech that he was basing his talk on the radio speech of Mr. Sommers to the effect that British Columbia would get 20 per cent of the additional power that would be generated downstream in the United States by the storage of the water, and also 20 per cent of the additional power which would be generated by any future installations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that statement is nothing less than a distortion and a misrepresentation. There is not going to be any exportation of power into the United States, and there is not going to be any exportation of water into the United States. In addition, this scheme does not in any way affect any present or future power potential in that section of the country. I want to make that absolutely clear. As a matter of fact, in his address in reply to the speech from the throne Mr. Sommers had this to say about these developments. He was referring to a map which had been placed in front of the members, and he said:

> The map before you shows the location of known major potential power sites and developments in the Columbia basin in British Columbia as well as the hydro-power installations which have been constructed. The at-site power development should be in an orderly sequence following creation of the necessary storage and regulated flow. Such storage can be adequately provided in the Arrow lakes and behind the proposed Mica dam. The orderly sequence of at-site power development may then be undertaken in the following order, and in point of fact in some instances could be developed concurrently:

This is the order that was laid down:

> 1. Bring Waneta No. 1 up to its full capacity of 500,000 h.p. by the installation of two additional generators.
> 2. Waneta No. 2 to be developed giving an additional 500,000 h.p.
> 3. Mica at-site power 800,000 h.p.
> 4. Downie creek at-site power 500,000 h.p.
> 5. Little Dalles at-site power 300,000 h.p.

This is an interesting and important fact.

> 6. Murphy creek, valueless without the Mica and Arrow lakes storage, however with this storage it will give at-site power of 130,000 h.p. without any loss of head at Brilliant.

So that, far from endangering any future power developments this low-level dam on the Arrow lakes can ensure future power developments below that site which they could not possibly have otherwise—or without installations at Mica creek, one or the other.

So, in spite of the assertions of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) and the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), this thing can be of tremendous value, so far as future installations are concerned. And I think that is a fairly important consideration.

Those who are opposed to our view, those who favour the bill, have mentioned without exception what would happen if the federal government in the United States refused to export power into British Columbia. It would be simply this: If the United States government refused to allow the export of power into British Columbia, then the British Columbia government could take cash.

And that brings up another point. Speaking on this subject yesterday the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources said this, as reported at page 1038 of Hansard:

> Moreover this 20 per cent, which is supposed to come from Bonneville, would be an export of power from the United States to Canada. What would happen if the federal power commission refused a licence to export that 20 per cent from the United States to Canada? Where does the British Columbia government stand on that deal? Nowhere. The only guarantee it has is a guarantee of moneys.

And that brings up an interesting point. What does it bring into British Columbia?—nothing but money! That is a typical Liberal outlook on money. They have no realization of the value of money put into provincial or federal coffers, unless it comes from taxation. But we certainly have. And it is high time the government of Canada came to realize that we can get money for the welfare of the people without taxing the daylights out of them. And this is one way in which the British Columbia government is going to obtain a million dollars a year or a little more, without adding to the taxation carried by the people of that province. And they are not losing anything by it.

What kind of thinking can the members of this government and their back-slapping backbenchers be doing when they think that the only place money can be obtained is out of the pockets of the taxpayers?

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Thomas: It is just the same as if the Imperial Oil company were to say that the only place they can get gasoline is out of the gasoline tanks of the consuming public.

And I quite understand, too, the hon. member for Kootenay East interjecting so often, because he feels that his speech yesterday in support of the bill was so weak that he has to get in his afterthoughts by way of interjections during the speeches of other members.

Mr. Byrne: After all, I had only 40 minutes.

Mr. Hansell: And you did not take all of it.

Mr. Thomas: Probably he gave up because he realized he did not have much of a case, and that in that respect he was in the same position as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The only way he had of supporting his stand in the matter was by bringing in misrepresentations.

Mr. Byrne: Who is she?

Mr. Thomas: I will give you her phone number after I have finished.

Mr. Fulton: What a high-level debate!

Mr. Thomas: At no time has any of the members who have spoken in favour of the bill considered the fact that water is going through that area anyway, and that probably it always will. The Social Credit government in British Columbia is the only government, not only in the history of British Columbia but also of Canada, that has realized the value that can be derived from the flow of that water.

Mr. Byrne: How much money have they put into the Columbia basin survey?

Mr. Hansell: You would not know; you tell us.

Mr. Byrne: The federal government put in $4 million for study.

Mr. Thomas: That is fine, and it shows once more the common sense of the British Columbia government; because they have been using the surveys carried out by the federal government to give themselves a source of revenue that otherwise they would not have had. They are simply taking advantage of the $4 million that the hon. member says the federal government has spent. And do not think we do not appreciate the fact that they did spend it. But what is the use of having a survey, if you do not take advantage of it? And that is exactly what the British Columbia government is doing.

And you should remember this, too, that when the Mica creek project is carried out at some time in the future—probably it will not be for another 10 or 15 years at least—the need for the low-level dam at Castlegar will be ended. But we still have a 50-year contract worth a million dollars a year because the Kaiser corporation needs the power now. And if we are going to sit back and wait for the Mica creek project to become a reality, we are going to lose several millions of dollars during that period of waiting.

But apparently that is what the federal government wants. Yesterday the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources denied that there was any political interference; and then he spent about 15 minutes—ineffectually I might say—in an attempt to tear down the British Columbia government, at the same time making what I considered was an inconsistent and emotional appeal, rather than one stating facts.

Mr. Byrne: What about the Social Crediters in the House of Commons?

Mr. Thomas: Apparently the Social Crediters in the House of Commons have you tied up so badly that you have to interject all the time. You could not prove your point yesterday.

Mr. Byrne: You are not proving it today.

Mr. Thomas: And you cannot prove it now.

An hon. Member: He can't prove anything.

Mr. Thomas: Now we come to the main point, where the government says that anything in the national interest is going to be protected by the federal government. Well, I have heard that so often it is quite apparent to me that what they consider to be in the national interest is something that would be in the interests of the government of Canada, and more particularly of the Liberal party. It has nothing to do with the welfare of Canada, at all. If this project is of such great national importance, as indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), then why have the only members taking part in the debate been those from British Columbia and Alberta—that is, with the exception of one weak and faint-hearted effort by an hon. member from New Brunswick.

The government says: Oh, we are unwilling to give any grants for educational aid to the provinces because in some small way we might interfere with provincial autonomy. That is a weak argument—when they are willing to walk all over a province in order to do something to justify their own desires. They are afraid that the Social Credit government of British Columbia might be given credit for making a good deal with the Kaiser corporation, and they are trying to prevent the province from getting that credit. This government tried the same tactics in Alberta, but it failed.

Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) accused us of talking blue ruin all the time. Well, the Liberal party in Alberta has been yelling blue ruin for 20 years. In spite of all these yells of blue ruin in Alberta we have progressed to the point, through the policies of the provincial government, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in another debate the other day rose in his place and asked whether the provincial government of Alberta would be in need of this assistance from the federal government. Apparently he thought we were too well off to need that assistance. That is how far we have gone behind, and it shows the absolute untruth of the cries of blue ruin and lack of integrity and the lack of ability of the Social Credit government, that they have not been able to succeed and they will not be able to succeed in British Columbia.

In speaking on this measure the other day, the Minister of Trade and Commerce named specifically the Columbia river basin and the Milk river in Alberta. When questioned he said he did not think the Saint John river was applicable to this legislation. Apparently, the minister is not too familiar with his geography, because he forgets that the west branch of the Saint John river rises in the province of Quebec, flows through the state of Maine and back up into the east branch of the Saint John to form the international boundary between Maine and New Brunswick. Therefore, there definitely is an application so far as the Saint John river is concerned. I am saying this for the benefit of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton.

Mr. Montgomery: He already knew that and spoke of it himself.

Mr. Thomas: I am glad the hon. member said that because I am absolutely amazed at the statement he made in the house last night and I am going to read from his speech.

Mr. Fulton: It will be a damn sight better than the one you are making yourself.

Mr. Thomas: That is your judgment, but it will not get you anywhere. Here is what the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton said, as reported at page 1053 of Hansard:

> I am not going to take very long in this debate, because I do not want to become involved in any dispute between parties sitting to my left and the government. I am not particularly concerned whether or not a dam is built on the Columbia river—although thus far the debate has been directed to that one province.

He went on to say:

> The minister may not intend that this measure should apply,—

He was referring to the Saint John river. I continue:

> —and no doubt it would not be made to apply; but if the measure reaches the statute books in its present form I am afraid that it could be so interpreted. Therefore when the bill is in the committee stage I suggest that it should be made more specific, and the interpretation of what constitutes an international river should be set out more clearly, so that there could be no doubt about it. It would be preferable to have rivers like the Saint John and the St. Croix listed as exceptions.

In the closing paragraph of his speech he said this:

> I am not saying that I support the bill as it is, but I do support the principle.

If the application of this bill could prove to be damaging to the people of New Brunswick, if it is made to apply to the Saint John and the St. Croix rivers, then it is equally damaging to the people of British Columbia, as far as the Columbia river basin is concerned.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Not in his judgment, though.

Mr. Thomas: How in the name of heaven can an hon. member rise in his place in this house and say: I do not care how much it damages other people so long as it does not apply to me personally or the people I represent. I wonder what the hon. member would say if he introduced legislation to help the potato growers of his riding, and we said: we are not interested in the potato growers because it is not of local interest; throw it out. We are just as interested in the people of New Brunswick in this regard as we are in the people of Alberta and of British Columbia, and if it is dangerous to us, then it is dangerous to them. If it had no application to either one of those provinces and applied only to New Brunswick, if we thought it was an infringement upon the rights of the province of New Brunswick, we would certainly back it up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thomas: We would certainly vote against it, and strike it down, if at all possible, and I would expect the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton to take the same stand on something that he does not want for his own constituents.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): He never thought of that.

Mr. Montgomery: The only thing is, you are a little previous. We have not come to a decision to know where we stand on that yet.

Mr. Thomas: The hon. member made it perfectly clear that he did not know whether he wanted to support the bill as it stood, but he was in favour of the principle.

Mr. Montgomery: Certainly.

Mr. Thomas: In spite of the fact that he did not want it to apply to his own people. It is all right if they clamp down on British Columbia so long as they do not touch New Brunswick. That is not an attitude that an hon. member should take in this house on a bill of this magnitude.

Mr. Montgomery: That is only your opinion.

Mr. Thomas: Talk so we can hear you. It is on Hansard, and I quoted it.

Mr. Montgomery: That is all right; that is only your opinion of my stand.

Mr. Thomas: There can be no mistake so far as the interpretation of that statement is concerned.

As was mentioned before, the whole argument of those speaking in favour of the bill seems to be that British Columbia is exporting water, or power, or both. They are not exporting anything, Mr. Speaker. When he spoke yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) said that this agreement could well upset the delicate plans of negotiations of the international joint commission; that he regretted very much that this thing was pushed in at this time because of the nature of the negotiations, and that we might throw everything that we have ever done out the window.

Mr. Byrne: That is precisely the argument.

Mr. Thomas: Precisely the argument of the hon. member for Kootenay East. I wonder what could be more damaging to the negotiations now under way, and what could be more damaging as far as the attitude of the United States is concerned, than to pass a bill that is going to stop the province of British Columbia from storing water within British Columbia so that the United States can make an orderly use of that water and get a better development out of that water than they are able to do now.

Mr. Blackmore: It is like a dog-in-the-manger attitude.

Mr. Thomas: It is amazing.

Mr. Low: Co-operative effort!

Mr. Thomas: It is amazing how utterly ridiculous some of these statements can be. On the one hand they say we have to protect our resources; we cannot give United States anything if it is going to endanger ourselves. I quite agree with these things. The fact remains that we are not exporting power; we are not exporting water; we are not losing anything.

Mr. Hahn: We are exporting good will.

Mr. Thomas: As the hon. member for New Westminster just said, we are exporting good will, and the Kaiser company is quite willing to pay handsomely for that export.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) said: "What is money?" What is a million dollars? I can understand that attitude when they are bleeding the people of this country as long as they have been without any regard whatsoever for saving money or cutting down expenses. What do we care? All we have to do is slap on another tax and the people will pay it. That is the attitude of the Liberal government, and always has been. As long as we can bleed the money out of the people, we do not have to care about money, and why should the province of British Columbia worry about money? I can tell you why they should. They have a deep-down heartfelt feeling for the welfare of the people within that province.

Two or three times during this debate there has been talk of a 50-50 basis. It makes me think of a sandwich that I once bought in a restaurant where it said on the menu under "Sandwiches" that the sandwich was half beef and half chicken. Upon opening up the sandwich I could find only one small sliver of chicken, the rest was all beef. I said, "I thought this was supposed to be half beef and half chicken". They said, "It is half a beef and half a chicken". That is exactly like the 50-50 proposition that this government has been getting out of all international negotiations. In anything they have carried out so far that is about all they got out of it. The St. Lawrence seaway is supposed to be for the welfare of the people of Canada but this government is outpaying the United States 6 to 1 in order to get a 50-50 proposition.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is for the benefit of the people of Ontario mainly, don't forget that.

Mr. Thomas: As a matter of fact I cannot think of one instance in their dealings with any other country that this government has ever driven a good bargain. For some reason or another they always come out second best.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Thomas: The hon. member says, "Prove it". I cannot think of a better example than the British wheat agreement where about $450 million was lost to the farmers of this country. Just to stick on this same subject of rivers, in negotiating the boundary with the United States between Maine and New Brunswick, when it was decided that the boundary would be the Saint John river they took the east branch and let the state of Maine get all in between the east and the west branches, approximately 20,000 to 25,000 acres being given away. Just big fellows.

An hon. Member: We will get it back.

Mr. Thomas: You will get it back all right. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones), when he was speaking yesterday, seemed to think that the trouble arose out of the failure of the British Columbia government to co-operate with the international joint commission. Nothing could be further from the truth. On the contrary, they set up the very commission with the personnel recommended by General McNaughton. How much more could they co-operate?

The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary said that the British Columbia government should give in on this thing and come to the federal government to make peace. No provincial government in Canada has yet come to the federal government asking permission to carry out a project which is of strictly provincial concern, and they are not going to. It is ridiculous to have that sort of reasoning by a member of parliament. Just let the federal government pull in their horns, withdraw this bill and ask the British Columbia government to get together for a conference on this thing and I think you will find the British Columbia government will be only too ready to co-operate.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has told us how he is concerned about the exportation of water, the exportation of electricity, the exportation of gas or oil; that we must conserve all these for the Canadian people. I agree entirely, but while he is saying this the Department of Trade and Commerce is exporting atomic materials which could be used for the production of power. Let us not forget that the radioactive substances which are being exported are extremely expendable. It is quite conceivable that we could exhaust our radioactive materials within a reasonably short time. Yet we are exporting these and nothing is said.

The minister gets up and with a great flourish talks about conserving our water resources. How are we going to hold this water back until somebody gets ready to develop it? It is going down across the border now. We are not exporting any water. As I mentioned a moment ago, we could be exporting a lot of good will by allowing the United States government to take advantage of the storage of water in British Columbia to enable them to make a more advantageous use of the waters of that river for down-river power expansion.

I cannot think of anything which would be a greater gesture of good will toward the people to the south than to do that very thing. Yet the government says that it cannot be done. The only reason that they have given so far is that there is a Social Credit government in British Columbia. That is cockeyed reasoning. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had better revise his thinking as far as his cockeyed expressions are concerned.

We are certainly going to vote against this and fight against this. This indicates the most flagrant disregard for provincial autonomy that has ever been perpetrated within this country.

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words in this debate and to support the Social Credit party in its protest against this attack upon provincial rights. I do this because I consider it to be my duty as a member from Quebec to state that whenever there is an attack on provincial rights in Quebec or in British Columbia every member should fight to protect the plurality of governments which is the basis of our constitution.

Last year when the tax agreement problem was before us we members from Quebec rose to speak not because we were nationalists, not because it was a local question, as suggested by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod), because it was a matter affecting the rights of the provinces.

I shall not attempt to indicate approval or disapproval of the selling of power to the Kaiser corporation since that is a decision which must be taken by the British Columbia government. That is their own business. But I do oppose centralization. Centralization is as dangerous in British Columbia as it is in Quebec or any other place in the country.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the point at issue at this moment concerns natural resources in a province whose provincial rights will be infringed upon. Little by little the federal government continue their centralizing activities. They wish to extend their control in this field as they have already done in the field of education by offering university grants while recognizing that this is a provincial responsibility. The same holds true in the fields of transportation, taxation, health, and many others.

That is why I felt it to be my duty to rise and support the Social Credit members who rightfully insist that provincial governments be left free to decide those questions which fall within their jurisdiction.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the longer this debate continues the more obvious it becomes that this is a political measure.

We have heard a great deal from speakers on the government side of the house with respect to their desire to protect the national interest. But it has already been pointed out by previous speakers that the premiers of the provinces of Canada are just as good Canadians and just as patriotic as any member of the government which sits in this house.

Furthermore, I might add that you cannot have any national interest without safeguarding the welfare of the provinces. I would like to know how the action of the British Columbia government with respect to this Kaiser power deal is going to depreciate in any way the interests or the welfare of any other province in Canada. That is a point those on the government side of the house, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage), have failed to answer despite their declared interest in the nation and their desire to introduce legislation to guard provincial powers in the national interest.

I cannot emphasize any more strongly than speakers who have preceded me that there is another motive in presenting this bill and it is a purely political motive. The arguments presented throughout this debate and as they can be read in Hansard will leave no question in the minds of the people of Canada that there has been nothing said that could possibly contradict the contention that this move now being made by the federal government is for a political purpose. That political purpose is to discredit the Social Credit government of British Columbia.

But I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that in the long run it will not do so, and I predict that this measure is going to backfire. I have no authority to say this and indeed it is only within the power of the premier of British Columbia to take this action, but I am quite certain that if the government of British Columbia called an election on this issue they would wipe the slate clean of any Liberals now sitting in that legislature. I do not suppose this government here would wish the British Columbia government to do that, and indeed I do not suppose the provincial government would go to the polls on that issue, for they would rather rely on their record, but I do not believe there is any doubt as to what the result would be if that action were taken.

I have some responsibility for keeping my fingers on the pulse of the political situation in Canada and I am quite certain this federal government would not wish to face an election of that sort in British Columbia.

I have listened carefully to previous speakers and with particular interest to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). The hon. member started his speech, as reported at page 1048 of yesterday's Hansard, by referring to the vein which this debate had taken. I would like to quote a sentence or two. The hon. member said:

> I am going to try my very best tonight to do a little bit of peacemaking. I think the vein which this debate has taken is a bad thing for Canada, is a bad thing for British Columbia, and is a bad thing for this house.

Later on he said:

> What we are dealing with here is not the Kaiser dam but a very important national responsibility.

If the vein of the debate ran such a course as to bring up the matter of the Kaiser dam, I would like to know who set the pattern for that type of debate.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore).

Mr. Hansell: The pattern was set a long time ago when responsible cabinet ministers went out to British Columbia and shot off their mouths. That was when the pattern was set. My leader says: "Irresponsible cabinet ministers". Well, they certainly were irresponsible in their actions at that time. I am not a psychologist or one who is particularly expert in diagnosing human frailties, but I will say that their statements out in British Columbia reflected the frustration of the politician. They were frustrated because they had been swept out of office in British Columbia and did not know which way to turn to gain recognition and favour with the people so that they might get back into office. They were frustrated, and they are today, and they said to themselves: "We are out to destroy the Social Credit government and we will kill anything they do if we can find any grounds upon which to do so".

Why did not these responsible ministers, responsible at least to the country and to parliament, get together if they recognized a danger in putting over a deal of this kind and say: Now, listen, this is a very bad thing; we will have to have a conference with the British Columbia government and see if we cannot persuade them that this thing is not in the national interest? Oh no, they did not do that—no, no. Their frustration led them to say: We will kill it even if we have got to tunnel through some mountains and divert the flow of the water of this river into the Fraser river.

Mr. Low: Silly.

Mr. Hansell: Silly. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources looks up. Yes, sir, we say that is silly.

Mr. Lesage: I had not known you were a water resources engineer.

Mr. Hansell: What I am going to say is—

Mr. Byrne: How many engineers do you have over there?

Mr. Dickey: They are always engineering something.

Mr. Hansell: If the government thinks that it is ever going to do that, I should like to know where it gets the authority to divert the water of a river through a mountain tunnel into a river that is not an international river.

An hon. Member: Pass legislation, I suppose.

Mr. Hansell: Well, they would have to pass legislation to thwart provincial autonomy. If they ever did that I wonder what the British Columbia government would do. You see, that shows the thinking of the federal government—if we want to do anything we will go ahead and do it regardless. What do we care what British Columbia thinks about it? That is their thinking. That is their style.

I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). It was a very good speech, and a very sane type of approach. He may not agree with us in everything; he may even join some of his colleagues and vote for the bill. I do not know what he will do, but when he knew this thing was in the air did he shoot off his mouth? I do not say he has never before shot off his mouth, but this time he did not. He did the reasonable thing. He even went to Victoria and spoke to the premier of the province and the minister of lands and forests. He said that he went there to get their view of the situation. Then he investigated the other side of the picture.

He is a private member of the house. What he did was what the federal government should have done. The hon. member urged that a conference should have been held and should be held today to see whether these differences cannot be ironed out if there is such danger. That is the sane approach to take to the thing. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) did not go to Victoria but he looked at the matter in what I thought was a reasonable fashion.

Mr. Blackmore: Rather statesmanlike.

Mr. Hansell: Rather statesmanlike. That is the thing to do when we have to deal with a measure that affects provincial autonomy. I listened to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). It is a little hard for me to listen to him but I exercised some degree of self-control. When he talked about co-operation he lifted in the air a document that was supposed to have come from the British Columbia government. He showed how he had interleafed the document to indicate where they were talking about co-operation and so forth, and he urged co-operation. Let me ask him: Does this bill savour of co-operation?

Mr. Byrne: Yes.

Mr. Hansell: In what respect does this bill talk of co-operation?

An hon. Member: Give him a minute to answer.

Mr. Hansell: I cannot afford a minute, but silence reigns. Let me ask him: Has he analysed the speech of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) yesterday? Let me ask him how that speech can ever give any indication of co-operation.

Mr. Blackmore: Silence again.

Mr. Hansell: Silence again. The minister when speaking yesterday—

Mr. Byrne: May I answer now?

Mr. Hansell:—attempted to reply to some of the arguments of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). I am not going to dwell too much on this point because the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas), who preceded me, dealt admirably with it. As found at page 1036 of Hansard yesterday, the minister had this to say:

> And when we think how young our country is it will be realized that I am using the right expression when I say that a deal like the Kaiser one is equivalent to selling down the river or giving down the river the possibilities of power development in this country at this time.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin has already challenged the minister to say what we are giving down the river. How can we be giving something down the river when the dam is to be built to hold the water back? It is a storage dam for the purpose of regulating the flow so that the water is not lost at flood season.

Mr. Lesage: To the United States.

Mr. Hansell: Of course, to the United States, where it would flow anyway.

Mr. Low: It is flowing.

Mr. Hansell: It is flowing there right now.

Mr. Thomas: And has done so for centuries.

Mr. Hansell: And has done so for centuries. When the flood tide comes it will still flow in abundance. What the government of British Columbia is doing is preventing it from flowing so fast at flood time. That is all they are doing. The minister also said, as found at page 1041 of Hansard of yesterday:

> In order that no sacrifice of our all important water resources may be made through too much emphasis being given to a short range view, such as advocated by the hon. member for Lethbridge . . .

I ask the minister to say in what way are we sacrificing our all important water resources when the dam is to be built to hold the water back?

Mr. Blackmore: Silence again.

Mr. Hansell: Silence again. There is a lot of silence when they are challenged to come up with the real argument and the real evidence. What power would we lose, what water would we lose when we will hold back by means of the dam some three million acre feet of water in this country?

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources spent a good deal of time talking about the deal that has been made. He spent more than half his time dealing with whether or not the present agreement reached between the Kaiser interests and the British Columbia government was a good deal. As he tried to prove that it was a bad deal he waved his hands in the air like an old clucking hen in a chicken coop.

Mr. Lesage: I thought you were going to say an old preacher.

Mr. Hansell: "Peanuts" he said. I think the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) was the first one who said "peanuts", and the clucking hen immediately cackled "peanuts". I am not going to argue whether or not it is peanuts. It is a million dollars a year or $50 million over 50 years; it may be $2 million. He may say it is peanuts, but we have not yet heard what kind of a deal he wants. We have not heard yet what kind of a deal would satisfy this government. I say again that throughout more than half his speech he dealt with the fact this was not a good deal. This appears to be the main reason this bill is being offered to us today, and the basis upon which we are asked to pass it.

If that is so, let me ask this. Does the government set itself up as the referee or as the dictator of provincial deals? If that is so, then we have here a glaring example of the continual centralization of authoritative power in the hands of the dictators here in Ottawa. The other day the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) gave an excellent speech on the trend toward centralizing power in this government. Here is an example. Let me ask, is this to be regarded as a precedent for any future deals or contracts that provincial governments may wish to make? I ask the question because this move can be interpreted as that. I should like to ask that question of all those who come from the province of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage). I wonder if his province will countenance a precedent like this, with this government setting itself up as the one to say whether a provincial deal is good or bad.

I do not believe that the deal is peanuts, but supposing it is; what has that to do with this government? I believe even provincial governments, because of their provincial autonomy, have a right to drive a bad bargain is they so desire. That is their own responsibility. We do not believe this is a bad bargain, but this bill would indicate this government thinks it is. My leader says the government has not proven as yet that it is a bad deal, even though the minister spent most of his time emphasizing that that was the basic reason for the bill.

He went further and said he hoped that when the bill went to committee we could have experts testify as to whether this is a good or bad bill. Now, can you beat that? They are saying they want a parliamentary committee set up to decide whether or not a provincial deal is a good deal. Can you beat that? That comes from the mouth of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I claim, Mr. Speaker, this bill is a declaration of war on provincial rights; that is what it is. I am reminded by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) has stated already that it is a declaration of war.

I want to deal with one other matter. It is a matter that I do not want to slip by without some notice. It needs more notice than perhaps this house has paid to it, and that is the point that was brought out by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) yesterday. When he was bringing out this point I noticed the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) with his head buried in some book or something. It may have been Hansard or it may have been a contract with some other government, I do not know. There he was, with his head buried, reading. I could not see whether or not his eyes were moving, but don't ever think his ear was not tuned to what the member was saying.

What was he saying? Well, I should like to put it in my own words. He went out to the back yard, and he said, "What is it that smells around here? It is something pretty bad." He traced the smell to the garage, opened the door and said, "My, something is wrong here." By lifting up a few loose boards, he dragged out what was smelling and said, "Here it is." I do not know how many noticed it. What did he say? I shall not read his speech, but he told the house that if this deal were completed British Columbia was likely to get cheaper power which would be in competition with power from the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, a subsidiary of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, 51 per cent of the stock of which is owned by the Canadian Pacific. What this bill does—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend mentioned my name in connection with that matter. I believe he mentioned the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Just what did I have to do with the contents of that statement?

Mr. Hansell: You would have nothing to do with that statement.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Thank you very much.

Mr. Hansell: You did not have anything to do with my hon. friend's speech. I am simply saying that when he gave it you were reading, but I think your ear was tuned to his speech. That is where I brought the minister into this, and I am saying—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I claim the right to listen to nonsense and read something else at the same time.

Mr. Hansell: Let me ask the minister this. Is it nonsense to say that West Kootenay Power and Light Company is a subsidiary of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and that 51 per cent of their stock is held by the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, connect it up with the bill under discussion.

Mr. Hansell: That certainly is not nonsense. One of the purposes of this bill is to protect that vested interest. There has been no valid argument to the contrary, so what can we conclude? The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), granting that he has some personal interest in this matter, has fallen victim to this thing. He is going to vote for something that is going to protect the vested interest of a private enterprise venture; that is exactly the position in which he is. He has swallowed it hook, line and sinker. He has been taken for a ride. The wool has been pulled over his eyes. I believe this bill is an attempt to pull the wool over all our eyes. The hon. member for Cariboo has scratched off a little of the wool. That appears to me to be the purpose of the bill. If it is not, government speakers will have to give some more valid reason than they have given so far. Those on the government side of the house who have spoken have failed miserably to make out a case.

I do not wish to reach a sort of anticlimax, but one of my colleagues sitting behind me has passed me a note, and it refers to a matter which I believe I should mention. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) contributed something to the debate; I do not know how valuable it was—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not very.

Mr. Hansell: I cannot quite let what was said go by, because he left at least the impression that the British Columbia government were circularizing all the school children of British Columbia through the mails. He may not have intended to leave that impression, but he certainly did indicate that the provincial government was using the franking privilege—I suppose it is a privilege authorized by the queen's printer—in mailing government material to the people, and that this material had been sent to every school child in that province.

I do not think that is so. If any material was sent out—and I will take my hon. friend's word for it—I would say it was sent to school principals. That is quite possible. Frankly I see no reason why a government should not be able to put out the truth of a situation and place it before the school children, through their principals.

Mr. Byrne: Truth or propaganda, which?

Mr. Hansell: The principal may use it, but he does not have to; it is up to him. And when my hon. friend talks about propaganda being sent through the mails, or with the authority of the queen's printer, let me tell him, and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, that no greater volume of propaganda goes out under the franking privilege anywhere in the world than goes out from this government.

Mr. Dickey: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Hansell: I am speaking for myself.

Mr. Dickey: Good.

Mr. Hansell: I do not mind saying that I mail my speeches under the franking privilege, and I do not care whether it is called propaganda or not. Everything is propaganda. Everything you mail out is propaganda; it cannot be anything else. All the health magazines that go out, and all the stuff on foreign relations—and believe me I have seen some of it—is propaganda. I have seen it, because I have children going to high school who are studying international affairs, and they come home with literature received from departments of this government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member who has the floor will agree that he is now wandering a little far afield.

Mr. Martin: I would say so.

Mr. Hansell: I must agree that you are right, Mr. Speaker; but I got off on this tangent because the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond happened to bring that point up. All I say is that the impression should be corrected, and that the British Columbia government is not mailing this stuff to every student in that province. They may mail it to the school principals, and that is their business. The principals may use it or may not use it, as they choose. That may be the situation.

I say once again that the government should face up to its responsibility here, and that it should not strain relationships between itself and any provincial government. Why provoke strained relations, when there may be another way around? Why not withdraw the bill temporarily and say, "We will defer the matter until we get together with the British Columbia government and see if we cannot come to a settlement." If they think it is so serious, why not do it that way? That is the way they do most things; why not do this that way? I urge the government to withdraw the bill temporarily, until it can get together with the government of British Columbia.

International Rivers

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I shall not have much time to discuss the bill before we reach the hour for private members' legislation. However, I think I should take advantage of every minute afforded me, and I should not waste any of that time.

I am one who believes Bill No. 3, that we are now discussing, is one of the most important and far-reaching matters to come before this house in a good many years. I said "one of the most important", and I am sincere and earnest when I make that statement. There are those who seem to believe that we Social Crediters are putting up a battle against this bill simply to support the government of British Columbia, which happens to be a Social Credit government, and that we are doing this whether that government is right or wrong.

I do not deny for one second that to a certain degree we are influenced—and I said "to a certain degree"—by our desire to see that justice is done to a government in which we have more than ordinary interest, especially since the Liberal ministers from the provinces of western Canada over the years and at the present time have given and now give every evidence of believing that their main purpose in being here in this House of Commons is to malign and libel their own provinces. That has been done on so many different occasions, and I can point them out if I am challenged. I say this because the ministers, or some of them—not all—have given every evidence that that is the way they think, that they have a divine injunction to be down here for that one purpose of maligning, libelling and putting blocks in the way of their own provinces.

I think, however, that we in this group over the years have given ample evidence, plenty of evidence, that we are always ready to put up a fight to ensure that justice is meted out to every province in Canada, irrespective of its political stripe, or to any group or any individual in our country. Anyone who will go back through the records of the House of Commons will find that on several occasions the Social Credit group in this house have actually put up a stronger battle for another province than members who came from that province on matters involving provincial jurisdiction. I can bring evidence to show that that is true, too.

In the debate thus far on Bill No. 3, the Social Credit group has put up a strong battle against the growing arrogance of the Liberal party and its increasing indifference to the rights of the smaller provinces and of individuals, a government which has become old in power and smug and indifferent through its long years in office with a big majority. That is what we have been fighting against, and it is most important that the people of this country know what it is we are driving at.

I cannot help wondering—and I know there are many hon. members in this house who also wonder—just how different the government's action would have been if it had been the government of Quebec that negotiated the agreement with some United States corporation for the storage of 3 million acre feet of water in a corner of Quebec for the purpose of preventing waste of water by turning it to use for downstream generation of electric power, a part of which electricity would come back into Canada.

Let that soak in. I am quite prepared to say with full responsibility that the situation would have been very different. There might have been a show of throwing down the gauntlet, just exactly as there was a show on the part of the Prime Minister in throwing down the gauntlet when Mr. Duplessis defied him with respect to the taxation agreement. But what happened? He went down to Quebec and sat down with Mr. Duplessis and attempted to work out a satisfactory conclusion to this difficult situation, a step which I thought was right. It should have been done in the first place. I say this. How much different this situation would have been if instead of British Columbia it had been Quebec.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They have more Liberal seats in Quebec.

Mr. Low: I am quite sure the same arrogance and downright indifference to local rights, shown in the present situation, would have been totally absent if the province concerned had been Quebec or even Manitoba or Newfoundland. The amount of just consideration for a province's rights which can be expected from this government seems to be directly proportional to the number of votes the Liberals got in that province in the last elections, provincial and federal.

The province of Alberta, from which I come, has had more experience with the federal government in connection with the development of water resources than any province in Canada. Some of us in this group have had a reserved seat from which we could watch the show at close range. I am one of those. It has been my observation over the past 20 years that I have been engaged in an effort to help my country in public life—and ten of these years, by the way, were spent on the provincial side—that there has been a growing arrogance on the part of this government in dealing with the provinces, especially those governed by other than the Liberal party.

Alberta has had many and varied relations with the Ottawa government in connection with the conservation and development of water resources. As far back as 1937, when the government at Ottawa wanted to move people out of certain drought-stricken areas onto irrigated lands in Alberta, we got a taste of what the exercise of power does to people when they get to Ottawa and begin to feel that there are really no limitations whatsoever to what they can do. We felt that, and I remember it very poignantly. In that particular instance to which I refer, moving people out of drought-stricken areas of Saskatchewan into Alberta, and in many others I could name that developed over the years, we saw arrogance displayed, Mr. Speaker, but we never at any time saw arrogance anything like what is being displayed at this time. It simply could not compare with the present instance at all. We are protesting against the attitude of a government and a party that have become power-drunk and crazy indifferent. We are only doing our duty by the Canadian people, who are now becoming aroused to this whole sorry situation as the facts are made known to them.

I made brief reference, Mr. Speaker, to Alberta's experience and observations over the years. If we had not fought hard against injustice during those years of the 1930's and up until the outbreak of world war II Ottawa would have wiped their feet on us with growing impunity. They tried hard enough; but finally, Mr. Speaker, be it said to the credit of both sides, good sense came to prevail, especially when the Liberal party came to understand that they were faced by a united and determined people in our province, determined to preserve their autonomy and their rights.

Mr. Blackmore: An enlightened and intelligent people, too.

Mr. Low: Consequently, Mr. Speaker, an inclination to co-operate was distilled into the hearts of the bureaucrats and the politicians down here, and we began a new relationship which I also saw and experienced and of which I was a part.

I am stating nothing but facts, Mr. Speaker, when I say that Ottawa has had no better co-operation in the various developments in the national interest than she has had from Social Credit Alberta. I am going to go further and say that she would have no better co-operation anywhere than she would have from the Social Credit government of British Columbia if she had the slightest inclination to go and seek it.

I mention several of Canada's biggest irrigation projects when I speak on Alberta and our relationship with the federal government in the development of water projects, because in Alberta we do have several of the largest irrigation projects in the whole of Canada. I speak of the many prairie farm assistance projects as well, and the preservation of the tremendously valuable and important east slope of the Rockies watershed. I also speak of the exploration and development of oil and natural gas resources for the benefit of all Canada. I say that, in all of these things, the Social Credit government of Alberta is working in close harmony and the fullest co-operation with Ottawa, in the national interest.

I could mention also the effective and close co-operation with the international joint commission in their efforts to negotiate settlement of the Milk river, the St. Mary river and the Waterton-Belly river references. We have given General McNaughton, who heads the Canadian section of the international joint commission, full and complete co-operation; and we want it known, Mr. Speaker, that we appreciate the splendid job this man has done for Canada and our province. We have nothing but respect for the splendid way he has stood up to what he has had to do. We want it known at the same time that General McNaughton has not been trying to play base politics with his important responsibilities. That is something that needs to be said as well.

I am perfectly sure, I repeat, that British Columbia, if their co-operation were sought in this matter, would be prepared to sit down and give that co-operation; but no effort has been made to get co-operation, no effort has been made to go out and sit down with them and to get information about what they are trying to do.

Mr. Speaker: Since it is five o'clock the house will now proceed to private and public bills.

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

MEASURE TO REQUIRE EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to provide equal pay for equal work for women.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take very long today on the discussion of this bill, because this is the third time it has been presented to the house and the second time for it to be debated. In presenting the bill last year I produced certain arguments, and those arguments stand today as well as they did a year ago. Very little has happened in the meantime to change the picture, but I am hoping that what little has happened may have influenced certain members of the house in general and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) in particular.

Last year while speaking I quoted certain statistics from the publications of the dominion bureau of statistics, and some of these have changed slightly. One change that has occurred since last year is that in January of this year the government of the United Kingdom gave to its women employees legislation which would provide them with equal pay for equal work, the system of implementing that legislation being a graduated scale which in a few years will result in complete equality for these women.

Another thing has happened since last year. In replying to my remarks on the introduction of the bill last year the Minister of Labour had the temerity to announce to the house that no representations had been made to him by the National Council of Women. I am sure the Minister of Labour has about as close a connection with that body as any member in the house, and he should have known that was likely to call forth an immediate response. In any event, he had his answer during the year. The National Council of Women have presented him with their request that this legislation should be supported by the government and later, in a brief which they presented to the government, they reiterated that request.

Since I spoke last year there has been a slight change in the size of the labour force and the number of women who compose a part of it. As of December 12, 1954, the latest figures available, the labour force was 5,414,000 of which men comprised 4,179,000 and women 1,235,000, or about 23 per cent. This is a larger percentage of the labour force than last year when the figure quoted was 22·2 per cent. It is interesting to note that in the period of almost a year which has elapsed the increase in the number of men in the labour force has been 13,000, whereas an additional 50,000 women have entered the labour force. These figures are significant.

Another significant factor is the number of women who pay taxes in this country. Inasmuch as these figures differ slightly from those which I quoted last year I should like to place on the record of the house the corrected statistics. According to the 1954 tax statistics the number of single women with no dependents paying taxes was 651,130, compared with 736,020 single men paying taxes. In other words, single women paying taxes comprise about five-sixths of the number of single men who paid taxes. With these statistics before us it seems odd that there should be any difference at all in the wages they earn for similar jobs.

Because of the short time available for this debate today, Mr. Speaker, and because I am anxious that some conclusion should be reached, I am going to rest my case very much on the argument I made last year. But I should like to reiterate the words of Mr. Kaiser, the United States government delegate to the international labour organization conference, which I quoted last year and which are found on page 40 of the seventh report of the committee on equal pay for equal work for women. Mr. Kaiser said:

> The experience of the United States showed that the principle could be accepted alike by workers and employers; that it could be translated into practice; and that its application protected established wage rates against undercutting.

I think the latter part of Mr. Kaiser's remarks are significant, and I should like to repeat them—"that its application protected established wage rates against undercutting".

The bill before us, Mr. Speaker, covers only workers under federal jurisdiction. It proposes an accepted principle which is found in the laws of many lands and in numerous states of the United States of America, as well as three provinces of Canada. Without further remarks, Mr. Speaker, I recommend the measure to the consideration of the house.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have again listened to my hon. friend with interest. I congratulate her on her presentation today which has been very brief, and I shall endeavour to follow her example as far as I can.

Last year she described the proposed law as "a progressive type of legislation that fits well into the changed employment conditions of our time". With this, as with many other things she said last year and has said today, I agree, for the increasing number of women in our labour force in Canada has brought the issue of women's wages to public attention in a very emphatic way, as never before in this country.

But the question is not one alone of equal pay for equal work. To my mind it involves the larger problem of women's wages in general. These are at a considerably lower level, certainly relatively, than the wages paid to men. I think any survey indicates that. This basic inequality is due to many factors, not the least of which is the customary practice of establishing the rates for jobs, in the traditional occupations of women, at lower levels than those authorized for the jobs for which men are hired. It is a situation about which we need to have more exact information, one for which equal pay legislation does not provide a remedy.

The whole question of women's earnings in Canada, including the various factors involved in their determination, is one of the subjects that our new women's bureau has set itself to study. I know my hon. friend looks upon me with a sceptical eye when I talk about civil servants and departmental committees studying various things, but in this case I think she will agree there has been some evidence that a serious study has at least been started.

I should like to emphasize the importance of the establishment of our women's bureau. In the past my department has given a good deal of consideration to the special problems of women in employment. We are now equipped, I think, to do quite a bit more in this regard. We expect that the studies and research of the new bureau, and the availability of the results of that work to all women in Canada, will make possible the spreading of information in regard to women's work, and equally important, if not more so, an analysis of the urgent problems that are involved. These activities, we believe, will be an important means of strengthening their economic status, and of obtaining proper recognition of the contribution they make to our labour force.

With respect to the hon. member's bill, from one point of view the question at issue is not the principle of equal pay for equal work. Acceptance of that principle as a standard for the community is, I believe, essential to social recognition of the value of women's work and the important part they play. My question is, without greater clarity as to the extent of the problem would legislation at the federal level contribute to the solution of the larger problem of women's economic position throughout the nation? It is my conviction that legislation designed to implement a broad principle is most effective when it is applied to a problem the elements of which are clearly defined. I am going to contend that this problem has not all those factors clearly defined. I hope we can get them so without too much delay.

My hon. friend will recall I said last year that while I was in agreement with the underlying principle of the proposal, until we had investigated further I was not prepared to support the legislation. Since that time the Department of Labour has made a study of the comparative wages of men and women in the same or similar job classifications in enterprises which come under federal jurisdiction. As members of the house are aware, in our civil service the salaries within any particular classification are exactly the same, whether for men or women. With respect to those working for the federal government at prevailing rates, it is the practice of my department to recommend that the rate for a classification be the same regardless of whether the work is performed by a man or a woman under the same job title. Taking these things together, I think I can say that this government and my department certainly do stand for the principle here enunciated.

Collective agreements and wage schedules in industries under federal jurisdiction in most cases establish the rate for the job. There do remain, however, a few schedules in which a differential occurs, but it does not necessarily follow that in such instances the principle of equal pay for equal work is always disregarded. To know exactly what the situation is would require further analysis and, in some cases, even field inquiries which are within our facilities to conduct. This work is going on now. At the present time the lack of precise definition of the content of a job within the same classification makes it impossible to reach reliable conclusions as to the basis of the differential where it does exist. In some instances it may be related to the sex of the worker, but in many cases other factors enter, principally the nature of the duties involved in the work.

This whole matter of the content of the job has a bearing upon the question of equal pay legislation. Effective application of the principle in fact depends upon adequate machinery for the appraisal of a job. The fact that three provinces have passed legislation, as my hon. friend has said, requiring equal pay for equal work has been brought forward as a reason why the same thing should be done by the federal parliament. Although the three provinces have set an example, if you like, this is an argument that is not completely convincing because of the fact that the field of employment for which the parliament of Canada legislates concerning labour matters is quite different from that under provincial jurisdiction.

Consider the industries listed in the bill. I cannot refer to the bill in detail, Mr. Speaker, but everyone in the house knows the industries that are listed there as coming under federal jurisdiction. These are large undertakings, very highly organized undertakings, in which the practice of collective bargaining is feasible and in fact is now quite widespread. Of the slightly less than 400,000 employees in industries under federal jurisdiction, some 70 per cent are now under collective agreements.

This fact presents a situation in clear contrast to that which exists in the widely diversified and smaller industries coming under provincial jurisdiction. There are of course a large number of great and highly organized undertakings under provincial laws but there are at the same time a large number of small enterprises in which collective bargaining has not become the standard operational procedure.

This fact presents a situation in clear contrast to that which exists in those industries which come under federal jurisdiction. In those activities which do come within the provincial field, only some 32 per cent of the employees are under collective agreements. Of course the women within those activities would work out to approximately the same percentage. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it certainly does not follow that if legislation at the federal level were considered essential it should follow in detail or even in some of its general features, a pattern that is appropriate to a province of Canada or a state in the United States. Nor does it follow that the same methods should be used to ensure adoption of improved labour standards, including this matter of equal pay for equal work.

Within the federal field of jurisdiction, where for some years collective bargaining has been the accepted means of getting disputes settled, the legislation that is proposed in this bill could introduce unnecessary interference with normal processes of negotiation between management and labour. I do not point that out, Mr. Speaker, as an insurmountable obstacle to such legislation, but I point it out as a warning that in preparing federal legislation that factor should be kept in mind.

It is widely recognized that the enactment of a law is by no means the only method of ensuring the application of the principle of equal pay for equal work. There are other ways in which progress can be made in that direction. The convention for equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value adopted in 1951 by the international labour organization, which my hon. friend mentioned in another connection, recognized other methods of implementation. One of these was "collective agreements between employers and employees".

Mrs. Fairclough: That convention has never been presented to this parliament.

Mr. Gregg: The convention has never been presented to this parliament because it was pointed out by Canada's representative at the international labour organization, as my hon. friend knows, that in Canada this subject comes partly under federal jurisdiction and partly under provincial jurisdiction. Because of this our representative of necessity abstained from voting for the whole recommendation when it was put forward at the international labour organization. In these major areas of employment under federal jurisdiction it appears that the principle of equal pay is being observed. I appreciate the fact that there remain a small but nevertheless very important number of women under our federal jurisdiction who are unrecognized.

The investigation of all available wage data has shown that the extent of the problem is not definable without recourse to additional information. And here again I come back to those good words "study and research". This we are on the way to secure. As a matter of fact the house will recall that at the last session of parliament I said, when responding to my hon. friend's presentation of a similar bill, that it did seem strange that only recently we had received delegations from leading women's organizations, none of whom had raised this point in their presentations. I can see that the hon. member has been very busy since that time, because the situation is not the same this year.

The groups that have been making these presentations constitute a very important element of public opinion, and their representations have carried weight. I for one welcome such representations. But I would add this year, quite as bravely as last year, that not one of the groups making representations has brought forward relevant information regarding the nature and extent of the problem as they see it, nor has any of them outlined its position with respect to the substance of the legislation sought. In other words there has been no suggestion as to how we should go about introducing legislation in the federal field. This I feel sure they must be prepared to do when they ask that a law be enacted, because I believe the enactment of a law can be justified only in relation to some clearly defined problem that exists somewhere within our society, whether it applies to women or to men.

In the absence of clear evidence of a problem under federal jurisdiction that warrants this type of action, I am not prepared to support this proposal for legislation at this time. But let me add quickly that I am fully prepared to provide the means for receiving representations as to the need, and how it is felt by those making the representations that a federal law might meet that need. I shall go further and say that I extended to the delegation which met with representatives of the government the other day an invitation to have their representations as to how legislation could best be worked out brought to the attention of the head of our women's bureau, sitting as chairman of the committee looking into this matter.

While my present position in respect to equal pay legislation for federal industries is based upon the considerations I have just outlined, there are one or two things I should like to say about this particular bill. In its main provision it is like several bills that have been introduced in the United States congress, but that body has not yet seen fit to pass any of them.

This bill declares it to be an unfair wage practice for an employer to discriminate between sexes in the payment of wages by paying wages to any female employee at a rate less than the rate at which he pays wages to male employees—and I wish to stress this—for work of comparable character on jobs the performance of which requires comparable skills. There I pause because, without wishing to be disrespectful, I suggest that these words are vague when regulating the payment of wages. I would ask this. What is comparable work? And what are comparable skills? And, perhaps more important, who is going to decide what is comparable work and what are comparable skills?

Surely these words are open to very wide interpretation. Yet this bill would leave to a commission to be appointed by the minister the task of trying to place a reasonable interpretation on them in any given case, and finally would empower the Minister of Labour to make any order he deems necessary to carry out the recommendation of the commission.

I know that under the rules one must not refer to an earlier debate in the session, but I would call to mind what happened within the last few days, and I would wonder if this uncontrolled power which my hon. friend would place in the hands of the minister of labour, whether in this or any future governments, jibes with the stand so often taken, for instance, by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). There is no appeal whatsoever from the minister's order, and it is a punishable offence not to comply with it. In our act to avoid discrimination in matters of race, religion or colour we have gone to great lengths to see that checks are made, both before and after the matter is brought to the attention of the minister, and that those allegedly aggrieved persons once again have a chance for appeal. This combination of wide administrative discretion, together with vagueness in expression of the intention of parliament as set out in the bill, hardly seems in keeping with some of the discussion in the house regarding a right to appeal from a minister's decision.

For the reasons I have mentioned, I do not consider a reasonable case has been made to demonstrate the necessity or advisability for this particular bill in the federal field at this time. And I am very specific about those words. I appreciate that there is provincial legislation of a similar nature; but in view of the very limited experience they have had—and my hon. friend who no doubt has investigated this would agree, I am sure that that experience has been very limited—it is not possible to assess its usefulness with any degree of accuracy.

I think it is a reasonable position to take when we say that we should follow the operation of provincial legislation very closely. But until the extent of the problem under federal jurisdiction is more clearly defined, as I hope it soon will be, we should not take premature action which might be regarded in some quarters as simply for the purpose of impinging upon provincial responsibility in this field.

I wish to repeat that I support fully the principle of equal remuneration for equal work, and all reasonable and practical measures for the extension of the application of the principle in this country. Since the recent establishment and organization of our women's bureau the department has done a good deal in this regard. It is the view of those who have engaged in this study that further investigation is desirable before final conclusions are reached as to the kind of legislative action in the federal field. I wish to assure my hon. friend that this investigation will be carried forward quickly to completion. And in doing so there will be opportunity for all private organizations and groups who have expressed general views in support of the legislative approach to confer with my department and produce relevant data in support of their views. That we will warmly welcome.

I hope that in view of what I have said, and after a discussion of this matter, the sponsor of this bill will not wish to press it to a vote but will feel that she has accomplished her purpose. If she finds that is not possible, it will be clear from what I have said that while I am not denying the good principle involved here, I shall have to vote against second reading of this particular bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house, I would like to ask you to call it six o'clock and I move the adjournment of the debate.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member would like to move the adjournment of the debate because he does not wish to commence his speech so close to six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Speaker: There is a motion for the adjournment of the debate. Either we call it six o'clock or the hon. member moves the adjournment.

Mr. Fleming: Or goes on speaking.

Mr. Speaker: Are the hon. members prepared to call it six o'clock at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Dupuis the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL RIVERS

PROVISION REQUIRING LICENCE FROM GOVERNMENT OF CANADA TO CONSTRUCT, OPERATE AND MAINTAIN ANY IMPROVEMENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner hour I had laid down the general proposition that over the last 20 years I had personally witnessed a growing arrogance on the part of federal governments, particularly the one now in office, which had inspired them to assume powers which in many instances it was not thought they should ever have attempted to assume. I believe I closed on the note that we wondered at this time where this arrogance and hunger for unchecked power is going to end. That is a very serious consideration for every Canadian worthy of the name.

For example, what foolish things might this government or perhaps some other government be led to do in the years ahead if this Liberal government can get away with what they are trying to get away with in connection with this bill? Under these circumstances what provincial rights will ever be safe, especially those which are in the twilight zone that prevails in connection with unallocated powers under the constitution? That is the question.

I listened most carefully to what the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources had to say. I intend to quote briefly from his speech, beginning on page 1037 of Hansard, where the hon. gentleman made reference to clause 9 of the agreement between the Kaiser corporation and the province of British Columbia. After quoting part of clause 9 which refers to the licence issued pursuant to paragraph 8, he had this to say in reference to the Bonneville authority:

> And, Mr. Speaker, the Bonneville authority, which is a United States federal agency, is not even a party to this agreement.
> Mr. Herridge: That is the point.
> Mr. Lesage: It is not even a party to this deal. Here the Kaiser company guarantees to the British Columbia government that the British Columbia government will get 20 per cent of the additional power generated by storage, but it will get it from the Bonneville authority, which is a federal agency, and that federal agency is not a party to the deal. And moreover there is no agreement referred to here between Bonneville and Kaiser.

What is the guarantee? Where is the guarantee? Where do we go? The whole thing is up in the air. I never saw anything so childish: there is no guarantee at all. And, moreover, supposing Bonneville decides to provide 10 per cent of the power to Kaiser, the only amount Kaiser is obligated to supply is 50 per cent of that 10 per cent, which is 5 per cent.

It is perfectly evident that the minister did not have the detailed information that he could have had if he had been willing to negotiate on a reasonable basis with the British Columbia government. He did not even try to get information which would have enabled him to make accurate statements, both in his speech last night and in his letter. In both instances there are serious errors of omission.

Here are some of the things the minister could have found out if he had made the slightest effort to put himself on speaking terms with the British Columbia administration, which he did not. As the minister knows, the present Kaiser agreement is mainly exploratory. It does not pretend to be final in all respects. Before it is finalized there will be a contract between Kaiser and Bonneville which will be assigned to the government of the province of British Columbia. Guarantees with respect to the delivery of power, and the posting of the performance bond to guarantee delivery, are all part and parcel of a conditional water licence which can contain any terms and conditions which the province may wish to impose.

The performance bond will be issued by a reliable bonding company and will guarantee either the delivery of the stipulated amount of power in British Columbia or, in case of bankruptcy or failure of the company, a cash payment equal to the value of the electricity over the entire 50 years.

The minister knew there must be something of that kind; yet he stood up here and attempted to belittle and ridicule rather than try to get information. That information was available. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) was able to see for himself when he went into the office of the minister of mines in Victoria evidence of a contract of that kind. He mentioned it in his speech yesterday—a very fair speech, by the way. The minister could not understand. That is something for which the minister is going to have to answer, the fact that he would make statements without any foundation whatsoever because he did not go and try to get information directly from the government concerned.

In the debate thus far hon. members on the government side of the house have offered severe criticism of the Kaiser deal, but up to this time not one of them has come up with a better proposal for an agreement. We have heard about a 50-50 deal. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says he did not say that. I have heard mention of a 50-50 deal.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): When did I say that I did not mention a 50-50 deal?

Mr. Low: You said that yesterday.

Mr. Quelch: Read Hansard.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I recall what I said. If one party furnishes the flow and somebody else furnishes the head it rather suggests a 50-50 split of the benefit.

Mr. Low: I think the minister did say that he did not mention a 50-50 deal. Even if he did I point out to him that a 50-50 deal would not give the province of British Columbia anything like the net return the present deal will give. I say that if they sit back and criticize and belittle and ridicule a deal which the government of the province of British Columbia has made and then fail to come up with a better proposal, then by George I think they should either put up or shut up.

Mr. Blackmore: They have no proposal at all.

Mr. Low: They have no proposal at all. This matter cannot just be laughed off or ridiculed away, because it is too serious. The government ought to begin to learn that that is true. I should like to stress that. I think this thing can easily be proved. I stress the fact that the only way the water at the point involved in this matter, at the Arrow lakes on the Columbia system, will ever be used for any purpose will be by way of United States generation of power. Laying down that general proposition, I should like to have one minister get up and debate it and show that it is not true. They cannot. Under those circumstances the only conclusion anyone can reach who looks at this thing in all seriousness is that they are prepared to let this water go to waste for generations rather than have it made use of.

Liberal spokesmen have used scare tactics and extravagant statements to try to convince the people of British Columbia and other parts of Canada that if the Kaiser deal is consummated it will place a serious restraint or perhaps at worst have a destructive effect on the eventual full development of the Columbia river system. I say that Liberal spokesmen who make that claim cannot possibly bring evidence to support it.

While they talk that way in an effort to bolster the flimsy arguments they have to put forth in support of this bill, they ignore completely the fact that if the bill is passed it could very well hold up indefinitely the Frobisher development on the Taku river in northern British Columbia. That possibility should be thoroughly investigated before this bill is allowed to proceed past second reading. That is a proposition which we are prepared to debate. Another reason we are fighting this bill is that it is just one more indication of the utter inconsistency of the government, especially with respect to energy and the export of energy. I want to point out some inconsistencies in connection with their policy in that regard, if one can call it a policy. Let us take oil, for example. Canada is not yet self-sufficient in oil. We have been trying our level best to become self-sufficient, but there have been times when we have had to draw heavily on the United States, and even though they were not self-sufficient and had to draw it from the east they were good enough to let us have their oil.

We are exporting oil today, and there has been no problem in connection with that. That oil is being exported into the midwestern United States by way of Gretna, Manitoba. I would point out that that is a wasting asset, but what we are talking about now is a renewable asset and comes into a different category altogether. Let me illustrate the point with respect to gas. At the present time gas is being exported under licence from a very isolated section of southern Alberta where there is no concentration of industry. That is being exported to the Anaconda Copper company at Anaconda, Montana, and no one is raising a hurrah about that. Why did the Liberals not come in and raise the dickens because Alberta was making a deal with the Anaconda company?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That deal was proposed by the federal government and recommended to Alberta, which province approved and implemented the proposal; and the gas is now being exported under federal licence.

Mr. Low: May I point out that in taking the stand they did they were showing their inconsistency. Furthermore, the province of Alberta gave them every co-operation in what they were doing. What else could we do? We did not have to give them the gas. We had control of that supply within the province, and no Liberal government could have objected to that. Not only that, but at the present time plans are being made for the export of natural gas from Alberta down into eastern Canada and concurrently into the midwestern United States. Where is the consistency in this policy?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Who asked us to arrange that?

Mr. Low: Yes, we asked you, but we asked for something more than that. We asked for a policy that would make it possible for us to export that gas and guarantee to the producers in our province a decent well-head price. I am not at all convinced as to the sagacity of the minister or the government in the way they arranged that whole deal.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are very capable of shifting your ground.

Mr. Low: We are not shifting ground. I have already pointed out the utter inconsistency of the whole policy. Let us now deal for a moment with electricity. I have pointed out that already some electricity is being exported into a northwest power pool from British Columbia.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): On a temporary basis.

Mr. Low: It does not make any difference whether it is temporary or not. The important thing is that it is being exported, and if there is danger of building up a vested interest on the other side there is just as much danger in this present export instance as there would be in regard to the proposal we are now discussing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Rave on.

Mr. Low: Let us use a little logic and reasoning instead of a lot of hooey. The minister's own atomic energy committee is manufacturing plutonium and other derivatives of uranium at Chalk River and exporting them to the United States. I believe a good case could be made out to show that these fissionable derivatives of uranium could be far more important to Canada in future years than the comparatively small amount of water power involved in the Kaiser proposition could ever be. Yet we do not hear the Liberals working up much hysteria about that.

Bill No. 3 should be withdrawn and put into cold storage until this government has the good sense to sit down with the provinces and work out a satisfactory and comprehensive natural energy policy which will be in the best interests of the whole of the country. When they do that it may be that legislation such as Bill No. 3 might be needed as part of an over-all policy. If so, then I imagine sensible people everywhere will realize it and give their co-operation in trying to get such legislation. But let us have it introduced in a sensible manner, as part of a comprehensive natural energy and fuel policy.

It is awkward at any time to try to debate the merits of a bill by tying it to a single transaction or project. The whole effort of those who are trying to get Bill No. 3 through this house has been directed toward obscuring the real principle of the bill by constant reference to the Kaiser dam and the Columbia river development program. The Liberal party have played so much very questionable politics in this whole business that many of them are confused about the real intent and purpose of the legislation. For that reason, before I close I would like to bring the debate back to the real principle of the bill itself.

Mr. Byrne: Your party took it away.

Mr. Low: What is the principle involved in this legislation? The minister who introduced the bill, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) who spoke for the Conservative party, and indeed several others appear to believe that the principle is provision for the development of Canada's water resources in the national interest. But I maintain that is not the real principle at all. The development of Canada's water resources in the national interest may have been the hope in the mind of the minister. It may even be one of his sincere desires. I am not going to claim, and I never have, that the minister is insincere. I have a great respect for him. Sometimes I differ sternly with him and I shall continue to do so if I feel that is warranted. But if that is one of his sincere desires then I say it is also the sincere hope and desire of every Canadian worthy of the name. We all want to see the water resources of the country developed in the national interest, and that certainly is the hope and desire of the government of British Columbia. I talked to members of that government about this project, and I gathered from them their complete sincerity of purpose and desire to do the right thing. Certainly every one of the Social Credit members of this house wishes to do his utmost to bring this hope to a full and glorious realization.

However, I say that is not the real purpose of the bill itself. The real purpose is to try to establish the federal government in complete and exclusive control of every body of water which rises in Canada and any part of which flows across the boundary line between Canada and the United States, together with all works and improvements that are now in existence or may be brought into existence along these rivers. I am referring to works which may cause a rise or fall in the level of the water at the boundary.

Mr. Lesage: There is more in it than that.

Mr. Low: Yes, I believe there is, but that is certainly enough.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. Lesage: I would ask the hon. member if, after reading this bill, he does not agree that it does not apply unless the works alter the use of water outside of Canada?

Mr. Low: That may be.

Mr. Lesage: It is written in the bill.

Mr. Low: I do not think the bill makes that too clear. At any rate, by far the most serious aspect of this legislation is what looks like an attempt by the government to bring about an important change in the constitution by the simple process of passing an obstructive bill through this house.

That brings me to something I would like to say about the constitutional aspects of this whole thing. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources last night went to some lengths in his speech to show that the bill is entirely within the competence of the federal government because it comes under section 92, subsection 10, of the British North America Act. The British North America Act was devised by men of vision, men who were, I think, quite earnest and who did a good job. I have always felt that the division of powers as arranged in the British North America Act was sound, good and wise.

Section 91 sets out those subjects which are of exclusive federal jurisdiction. Section 92 sets out those matters which are of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. But there is another group, namely those powers that are in the twilight zone, not specifically allocated either to the one or the other. In this present instance the federal government has invoked the most invidious section of the British North America Act, section 92, subsection 10, and has used it as the constitutional basis for this bill. I say the section is invidious for the reason that every time it has been invoked it has engendered ill will and disunity in this country.

In the second place, that is a section which the framers of the British North America Act felt should be and would be used sparingly, because it involves the most sweeping powers. A government that was anxious to be fair and just and to promote national unity would be extremely careful in invoking that section of the British North America Act, especially in cases where for many years a province has been exercising rights under their own legislation without challenge, rights which are bound to be interfered with by the federal action now contemplated in Bill No. 3. When I say legislation which has remained unchallenged for many years, I refer to the legislation referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver East, the water act of British Columbia of 1897. Governments of that province have been operating all these years under the powers given them by that act, which has never been challenged. The present government thought they had the authority under that act to go ahead, and in sincerity they went ahead to arrange a deal with the Kaiser interests for the development of water power which is now going to waste.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it becomes a most serious matter if the constitution can in effect be changed as easily as by passing this bill. What rights of any of the provinces could possibly ever be safe from an arrogant federal government which cared nothing for the feelings of those people who do not belong to the same political party as they do? I refer to the fact that the Canada Shipping Act was based on that very clause, section 92, subsection 10, of the British North America Act; and since that clause was invoked it has been used to make every grain elevator in my constituency, even down to the smallest one, a work for the general good of Canada.

That is how far you can go with this thing. I wonder how many barber shops could not be brought under this provision as works for the general good of Canada, and how many schools in this country. If a reckless government ever took the thought into their heads to go ahead and do it there is nothing could stop them if they had the gall to try to do it. I say that becomes a very serious matter to be considered by every Canadian.

Finally, Bill No. 3 is clearly an obstructive bill. It is perfectly clear from what has been said both outside and inside the house that the main purpose of the bill is to prevent the consummation of an agreement which is being negotiated by one of our provincial governments. That is a bad reason for any legislation, because there are other and much better ways of safeguarding the national interest. Second, the bill is punitive. It provides power to punish a province, and I think that is a bad principle ever to be established in legislation in this house. Third, it is presumptive. It is based upon the presumption that all the federal government needs to do to provide itself with powers to invade provincial rights is to invoke section 92, subsection 10, of the British North America Act.

For the reasons I have mentioned I am opposed to the second reading of the bill, and I move, seconded by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell):

That all the words after "That" in the motion for second reading of Bill No. 3 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"the further consideration of this bill be deferred until the principle thereof has been referred to a dominion-provincial conference and considered by such conference".

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River. Although he is entitled to ask that further investigation be made of a certain problem contemplated by the bill, the motion must be that the subject matter thereof be referred to an existing body, either to a standing committee or to a commission such as the board of transport commissioners or some other such organization. Otherwise where would the bill stand if nobody called a dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. Fulton: Ask the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member realizes that unless he amends his amendment I will not be able to accept it. If he will look at citation 657 of Beauchesne, third edition, he will see that the latter part thereof says:

. . . or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

By "committees, commissioners" what is referred to is the board of transport commissioners, for example, or committees that are in existence under standing order 63. Would the hon. member like to explain what his purpose was?

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, I gave considerable thought to the procedure by which second reading could be prevented at this time in order to afford us a chance to give the matter further consideration, because I knew that if we were to allow second reading to pass the house would be agreeing to the principle of the bill, and the principle having been adopted certainly the important reason for debate would no longer exist. I have looked at Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, 1943, and at page 337 under "amendments" I discovered that there are two different ways by which an amendment can be moved. The first is by moving that the measure be given the six months' hoist. The second is as follows:

The question being proposed "That Bill No.—

In this case, it is Bill No. 3.

—intituled an act . . . be now read a second time"; Mr. . . . moves in amendment thereto, seconded by Mr. . . . , that all the words after "That" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"The further consideration of this bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada".

This evidently was something that was used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier at some time in the past, and is cited here as one means by which an amendment can be made. I took it to mean that it could be used as the basis for our amendment.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member looks at citation 657, which is a résumé of the forms which an amendment may take, he will see that there is a footnote, May 390. If he looks at May 390, he will see that in addition to the three methods that are provided by citation 657, there are two or three other methods that have been deleted by Bourinot in his fourth edition and which do not appear in the 1943 edition of Beauchesne. This is because a practice has evolved, and previous Speakers' rulings make it so now, that what is understood by the reference of the subject matter of a bill to a committee must be to an existing committee or an existing commission.

Now, if the amendment were to read that the subject matter of the bill be referred to a standing committee or an existing commission, that would be in order.

Mr. Low: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact it appears that my amendment is out of order, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell):

That the word "now" be left out, and the words "this day six months" added at the end of the question.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to another point of order. It is a very technical one, I admit, but we might as well keep things straight and I am sure hon. members to my left can take care of it. I believe the hon. member for Macleod has already spoken and therefore cannot be the seconder of this amendment. The hon. member for Peace River will have to find someone else.

Mr. Low: I shall find someone else. I shall say the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch).

Mr. Speaker: This point is one which is technical, but sometimes we must take care of these little technicalities before they become serious offences. Therefore the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) moves, seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), that this bill be not now read a second time but this day six months hence. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Hahn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; it was the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) who moved the amendment, not the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Speaker: If the house, by consent, is willing to cure the technical difficulty raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), then perhaps we could consider the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River, seconded by the hon. member for Acadia. Is the house ready for the question?

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Before the question is put I desire to make several comments which I feel are necessary. In the first place, may I draw to the attention of the people in the country, as well as the members in this house, how serious it is for this house to give a bill second reading. Once this bill is given second reading the House of Commons of Canada puts its seal of approval on the principle of the bill.

As the hon. member for Peace River has pointed out, it is not at all certain what the principle of the bill is. The bill is like a wolf in sheep's clothing. The sheep's clothing does not look too bad, but the wolf underneath does look bad. Now, the wolf that is underneath is the power to enter into the province of British Columbia and dictate policy in respect to the whole of the Columbia river. The general principle of the bill is to amend the Canadian constitution, the British North America Act, by an act of this parliament, and to base that act and its constitutionality upon the international joint commission and the boundary waters treaty of 1909.

I do not believe there is a member in this house or a responsible person in Canada who would be willing to base an amendment of the Canadian constitution on the boundary waters treaty of 1909 between the United States and Canada, in respect of international waters. Certainly I do not think there is a responsible person in this country over 18 years of age who would be willing to have the constitution of Canada amended by an act of this parliament, without any restraint whatever. This is the act of a power-hungry party that has been re-elected time and time again, sometimes by a minority of the votes in the country, but in such a way that it has so many members in the house it is impossible for the opposition to do a thing. The party in power has no opposition and can work its evil will, no matter how evil that will may happen to be.

Mr. Byrne: We may have the support of the Conservatives on this.

Mr. Blackmore: I will just leave that language as it is. I said "evil will", but I am not saying any member of the house is particularly evil. I am suggesting the people who are back behind the Liberal party are evil, and that they are aiming at the destruction of freedom on the North American continent. I do not hesitate a minute to suggest that. This bill is one of the very best evidences of that fact, for I do not think any individual or any department whatever that was not under sinister pressure from someone behind the scenes would try to pass a bill of that kind.

Mr. Hardie: Do you believe in ghosts?

Mr. Blackmore: Did you get what I said?

Mr. Hardie: I did.

Mr. Blackmore: Now, it is just as serious as that, sir. If this house puts its seal of approval on the wolf that is down under the sheep's clothing, it is a serious matter.

Many members in this house have served on committees, and may know that just as soon as a bill is given second reading and goes to a committee, the chairman of the committee generally says, "Now, gentlemen, the house has already settled the principle of this bill; this committee has no competence whatever to deal with the principle." What have we to deal with under the terms of reference? We begin to single out the various clauses, and in the case of most parliamentary committees the procedure is disappointing, if not farcical. I have been on enough committees to know how that works out.

Generally speaking, a committee—and this is too bad—before ever it sits is told pretty well by the government what it is to report. The report could be written pretty well before the committee has its hearing. I have been on committees long enough to know that is the case, and it is very much the same with royal commissions. The royal commissioners are told what they are supposed to find before they ever have a hearing.

Mr. Dickey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Blackmore: I know that sounds strange.

Mr. Dickey: I rise on a point of order—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Dickey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member could indicate just how a discussion of the procedure of committees and royal commissions is relevant to the amendment that has been moved, or to the principle of the bill?

Mr. Blackmore: I am thankful for the interruption, because the hon. member has given me an opportunity to repeat my statement for the benefit of those who were too busy reading newspapers to get it. The matter arose from a statement I made which implied that back behind a government like this are probably a number who contributed to the campaign funds to elect it.

Mr. Dickey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that what he has said is relevant to the matter under discussion in this house.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, because I was pointing out how serious it is that the house should give approval to the principle of this bill by giving it second reading, especially when the house knows so very little about the things involved in making up one's mind as to whether or not the bill might properly be passed.

Mr. Dickey: The hon. member should speak for himself, not for other members in the house.

Mr. Blackmore: That is just a silly and childish remark. This hon. member is speaking for himself, and is quite prepared to take the responsibility for everything he says.

Then I go on from what I was saying. I do not hesitate to repeat that there is in this bill not only the sheep's clothing principle of the bill but also the wolf principle that is under the sheep's clothing. We can easily give approval to the wolf principle of the bill, thinking we are merely giving approval to the sheep's clothing principle that is covering up the wolf. Now, that is a terribly serious matter, and I propose to go on from there.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: And if you just keep your ears and eyes open you will learn something. In the course of 19 or 20 years in public life one can learn much if he keeps alert. I feel we should do something which would give the country as a whole, and the members of parliament as well as the members of the provincial legislature, a chance to cool down and get all the facts, and then make a sober and sound decision in respect of this matter.

There is no urgency about passing this bill at all. This country will not disintegrate if we do not pass this bill for six months or a year. No harm will be done. We could very easily do what the hon. member for Peace River has suggested, both in his first and in his second amendments; because if we give six months' hoist to the bill it means simply that we take six months to think it over. And we can very easily afford to do that, considering all that is involved.

I wish to say just a word or two to show how much at sea the ordinary person will be in approaching the principle, or the facts which underlie the position, let us say, of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. First of all I wish to say a word or two with respect to that minister. I think this young man is one of the most promising young men who ever came into parliament.

Mr. Fulton: That is probably how he is elected, by promising.

Mr. Blackmore: I think, everything being considered, that this young man already has distinguished himself greatly both before the House of Commons and before the country.

Anything I say concerning the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is not meant in any way to reflect upon him. He is merely the minister in charge of the department, a department which has before it an enormous number of responsibilities. He depends upon public servants whose business it is to give him advice. Wellnigh unquestionably almost anything he says comes right from what his advisers tell him to say. So he is not altogether responsible for everything said by him in that respect. I want to make that perfectly clear, because there is no doubt—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that although the remarks he has made were made with a certain amount of levity, that fact does not appear in Hansard. Anyone who is not here this evening and may read Hansard tomorrow would infer from what the hon. member said that the minister is not responsible for what he says in the house. I think the hon. member would not want to leave that in Hansard, that whatever the minister has said has been dictated to him by his advisers.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, in a moment or two I would have gone on to qualify that statement so as to make it perfectly clear. It is my desire to have the whole thing perfectly clear, and generally I succeed in at least some measure in that respect.

A minister in any government, in large measure, must rely for advice upon the experts in his department, and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is no exception. Being a young man filled with energy and activity, and with many responsibilities—

An hon. Member: He has a Rhodes scholar for a deputy, too.

Mr. Blackmore: Probably more than one Rhodes scholar, and probably a good many graduates of the London school of economics, too. Some hon. members do not take the London school of economics very seriously, but I could give them information which would sober them down, I will tell you, on that subject.

Just to show how insecure the position of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is—and I do not include the minister in this at all—I would refer the house to the minister's letter, which of course he had to sign as the responsible minister, dated January 24, 1955, and addressed to J. W. Bailey, secretary of the meeting committee, Nakusp, British Columbia. I turn to page 2 of that letter and place on record some of the statements made therein, where the minister begins to give his reasons for opposing the Castlegar dam. These have been referred to before, but I wish to discuss them. This is No. 1:

> It would be unwise to proceed with this project at this time.

Period.

> The power potentialities of the Columbia river basin are still under investigation.

They might be under investigation for another 15 years, for all we know. Meantime the water is running to waste and nothing is being done about it. Meantime people across the boundary line of British Columbia are going without power which they could generate with that water. To go on with the letter:

> Once the potential of this river system has been assessed—

He does not say by whom, but presumably by the all-wise Ottawa people.

> —and recommendations have been made as to the carrying out of specific projects, both the United States and Canada will be free to exercise, commonly or separately, the rights retained and guaranteed under the boundary waters treaty of 1909. For instance, should Canada find it in its interests to do so, the flood waters of the Upper Kootenay river could be diverted through canal flats into the Columbia. They could then be utilized for power development through the full head of the Columbia river in Canada. These and other flood waters could then be fully utilized for stream regulation, power and other purposes in Canada. If these projects prove to be economically possible, they will change very considerably the planning of the development of the whole Columbia river basin.

How much more do we know about why this project should not be proceeded with, after reading all that? He says, "It would be unwise to proceed with this project at this time". I have read you the reason he gives; and it is so vague, so incomprehensible, so intangible that there is nothing substantial connected with it at all. I think all hon. members must recognize that.

Now, there is one of the main pillars upon which the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and I suppose the Minister of Trade and Commerce, rest their case! Let us see how powerful the next reason is. It says:

> No. 2. According to what is presently known, the project does not provide for the maximum use of the storage potential at the Arrow lakes and of the power potential on the Columbia.

Well, nobody said it did. Certainly British Columbia did not say it did. And why in the world British Columbia should know all that before it could agree to a simple little project such as would be involved in the building of a low-level dam at the outlet of the Arrow lakes, and agreeing with the United States that it could take 3 million acre feet stored up behind that dam and use it to firm up their power production—I say why in the world they would have to go into all that is something that I think is quite beyond the ability of anyone to understand. Well, that is the support behind the second great pillar upon which rests the whole position of the government. Here is another classical paragraph. Probably this letter was written for the minister by some of the London school of economics experts in his department. I continue to read under No. 2:

There is another and even more important aspect to this question. The fall from the Castlegar site to Murphy creek above the city of Trail is about 40 feet.

What on earth would that have to do with it? I continue:

At the latter point, there are possibilities of dam sites.

When I spoke yesterday I spoke on two or three dam sites. I pointed out that it would be idle to contemplate the development of those sites until Waneta No. 1 and Waneta No. 2 were developed to the limit and electricity generated therefrom sold to British Columbia. Therefore to talk about Murphy creek in relation to the construction of the Castlegar dam site is just nonsense.

Mr. Lesage: Does the hon. member know where that creek is?

Mr. Blackmore: There is enough right here.

Mr. Lesage: Does the hon. member know where it is?

Mr. Blackmore: The Murphy creek site is in southeast British Columbia. That is about all we need to know. I could give more details but I have more important things to talk about. I read on under point No. 2.

At the latter point there are possibilities of dam sites.

I ask what conceivable bearing would that have on the building of the Castlegar dam? The letter goes on with No. 2:

The available head taken alone may not warrant a power development. If it is combined with the head at Castlegar, it would afford an opportunity to add 250,000 kilowatts of on-site power in British Columbia—

There is no sale for it in British Columbia at the present time because they already have a surplus of 75,000 kilowatts. I continue:

—while permitting the same or more production of downstream power as the Arrow lake storage project.

Maybe I ought to stop right here.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member read the next sentence? Since a letter which has been written and signed by me is being read in this house, I believe the house is entitled to have the whole of the argumentation. The next sentence of the letter is obviously the most important part of that paragraph and I am afraid that is why the hon. member does not wish to read it.

Mr. Blackmore: I intend to read it. It is too rich for me to leave out. Every statement in this letter is an accumulation effecting a climax which is not good for the bill. Now, before I read on I just want to stop and explain why there is a great difference between a dam site which is built for the generation of power and a dam site which has to be built—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: We will leave off the "site". The dam—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: There is a great difference between a dam which is constructed for the generation of electricity and a dam which is constructed purely for the storage of water. This dam which is contemplated at Castlegar is to be constructed purely for the storage of water, not for the generation of electricity in Canada whatsoever, which puts the two types of dams in altogether different categories. Now, a dam which was constructed in this area for the purpose of generating electricity would be supported by nobody while the Waneta No. 1 site is not developed and the Waneta No. 2 is not developed at all, and there are 75,000 kilowatts of power surplus in the area. Surely it must be clear that there is a tremendous difference between a purely storage dam and a power generation dam and that has a tremendous bearing upon one's conclusions.

Let me go on to what the minister wanted me to read. I am happy to do it. I proceed with point No. 2:

According to expert advice, however, the realization of this last project may make the Murphy creek development economically unfeasible which would mean that 250,000 kilowatts of on-site power would be lost for British Columbia.

Note carefully how it is worded:

According to expert advice, however, the realization of this last project may make the Murphy creek development economically unfeasible . . .

The information I gave in my talk yesterday showed that when the potential production of Waneta No. 1 and Waneta No. 2 was achieved and the power all sold, and the time came for the development of the Murphy creek project, then the Castlegar dam site and the Arrow lake could be made to supplement the head of Murphy creek to the extent that Murphy creek would become much more effective as a producer of power.

I went into that yesterday; I shall not go into it again. I thought I explained it so that anyone who runs can understand it.

All of this material in the letter is supposed to be a reason why British Columbia would be foolish to allow an American company to come in and build a low-level dam, pay every cent for it and put in a service; why British Columbia would be foolish to allow them to store 3 million acre feet of water in the Arrow lakes and allow the water to go down into the United States to firm up their productive capacity in their plants. How can these reasons have any conceivable bearing on the wisdom or nonwisdom of what the British Columbia government proposes to do in relation to Castlegar? That must be quite clear.

The Murphy creek site is presently under investigation by federal authorities under the Columbia river reference.

There is no evidence that the matter will be thoroughly investigated in less than six or seven years. According to the British Columbia plan, if we allow them to go on with the Castlegar project they will have made about $3 million by that time to pay off $3 million of the great debt the Liberals created and left to them, and that is very important. I know this $1 million is just peanuts; but it was not peanuts when an Alberta bond issue of $1 million came due and was defaulted, and it would not be peanuts if British Columbia defaulted on a $1 million bond issue. It would be a mighty serious thing then to any responsible government.

British Columbia must be looking to these matters because, as I pointed out before, that was not so long ago. We have no assurance that we are not going into a depression; and if we go into a depression I will wager that the federal government at Ottawa would be meticulously careful that they did not infringe on provincial responsibility to look after unemployment. That will be the responsibility of British Columbia then. They left all the burden they possibly could on the other provinces. They left debt that was accumulated in Alberta by reason of the depression, just about $67 million as a result of the depression alone. Seemingly that could easily happen in British Columbia. Surely any responsible government should be looking for means to guard against that, to accumulate money to pay off the provincial debt and save interest which they could use for building roads and for other desirable things.

We now come to pillar No. 3. I think I have shown that there is not very much substance in the two pillars thus far considered. Let us take the third pillar which is offered by the department in their approach to this bill. I read from No. 3:

The carrying out of the Arrow lakes project at this stage might delay . . .

There is no proof. Why, dear me, the sun might not rise a year from today, for all I know. I continue:

. . . might delay for quite a number of years the realization of other alternative projects—

What ones?

—more important to British Columbia and Canada.

What ones, for example? In my speech yesterday I dealt with Waneta No. 1, Waneta No. 2, Murphy creek and Mica creek, but not one of these is in the same class as this dam, because they are proposed to be power-generating dams, while this one is merely a water-storing dam with the object of firming up power generated in the United States. Therefore this statement is just pure childish nonsense in its application to this project at Castlegar. Now, see the powerful reasoning that this bit of nonsense is supported by. I read on under No. 3:

It has been asserted that the Arrow lakes storage reservoir would not affect the development of the Mica creek project.

Yes, you can hear that bright young thing right out in British Columbia:

This assertion should be treated with considerable reservation—

Pretty nearly any assertion needs to be.

—since under operating conditions it is doubtful that the most effective use of the proposed Mica creek development, of the proposed Arrow lakes storage and of the Grand Coulee project could be made without interference between them.

All vague. No evidence to support them whatsoever. No sign of any evidence. As matters stand at the present time it is the proposal of this government to get this house to endorse this bill, to put its rubber stamp on it before the house gets a chance to learn any of the underlying facts at all. That is pretty clever strategy, is it not? It sounds very much like the strategy that was worked on us in connection with Bretton Woods.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The same kind of filibuster.

Mr. Blackmore: Just the same high-sounding, beautiful phrases that we had before. People believed them and were lulled off to sleep.

Careful co-ordination might minimize this interference but the last project in would have the lowest priority.

How do we know? There is no evidence. One purpose we had in making this motion was to give the minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce a chance to come and share their knowledge with this house, to bring in their experts. We might move another motion so they can go into it further, and another motion, and still another motion for the same purpose. There is plenty of time. I am sure the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) will also co-operate. They can come in here and use all the time necessary to tell the whole house all these facts. Let us not vote on a pig in a poke. That is what we are doing if we vote now on this Bill No. 3.

An hon. Member: We know what we are doing.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course you know. These are the brilliant little fellows who do not know shucks about most things, who have been here hardly long enough to get themselves dry behind the ears; yet they know everything about how to run the country.

Mr. Knowles: Too much water around here.

Mr. Blackmore: I have lost my place here. I wanted to develop this matter in an orderly fashion. I read on:

> Moreover it must not be forgotten that economically, those projects, at a given period of time, are alternatives—

There is nothing alternative about any one of these power-producing projects to this water storage project at Castlegar. There is no possibility that it can be. Just listen to the whole of this beautiful sentence by these graduates of the London school of economics. They must have been well trained in English.

> Moreover it must not be forgotten that economically, those projects, at a given period of time, are alternatives and compete against one another to meet the same demand for power.

It does not say what projects there are. Nobody knows. All right, we can vote on this and nobody knows what will happen. The Castlegar project does not create power at all. It does not compete with any of the power-generating projects. Note how completely misleading that statement is. I notice the Minister of Trade and Commerce is enjoying himself and showing some signs of hilarity. I would appreciate it if he would tell us all the facts. Meanwhile we have to go by what we know of it.

> For instance, it is highly probable that the Arrow lakes project would interfere with any arrangement being worked out with United States interests and the Bonneville power authority for 10·5 million acre feet of storage at the Mica dam site.

We already have evidence adduced in this debate to show that the Mica creek dam might not be developed for 10 or 15 years. Meanwhile all possibility of giving the United States the use of 3 million acre feet of stored water in the Arrow lakes every year, the possibility of the United States having the advantage of that water, will go over the dam. There will be nothing to it. The $1 million per year that the British Columbia government would get and could use for all sorts of purposes will be lost. Just listen to the sound of this most impressive language. It is highly probable; we do not know who thinks that or why. Then we have all these wonderful paragraphs:

> The first storage built will have a first call on idle equipment in the downstream power plants and will firm up a greater number of kilowatts per million acre feet.

Is it proposed ultimately to use the Mica creek project to supply the United States with water with which to firm up their power production? If so, then it is proposed to create exactly the same position as that prevailing in connection with the construction of the Castlegar dam. If it is dangerous for Canada to be "throwing away" its electricity or water it may be equally dangerous when these projects including Mica creek are in action:

> The first storage built will have a first call on idle equipment in the downstream power plants and will firm up a greater number of kilowatts per million acre feet.

Not the slightest hint of explanation. Not an authority quoted. I read on:

> The project that is going to be most advantageous for British Columbia and Canada should be supported.

Of course it should be, but that is no indication that the Castlegar dam is not exactly that project. Not the slightest bit of evidence has been adduced. The Castlegar dam project will begin to get results in three years, but it will be more than three years before they can start work on the others, as far as a person can judge.

> It is far from being evident that the Arrow lakes reservoir is the one which will best serve the Canadian interests at this time.

Comforting, vague, uncertain. It sounds just like a composition you would expect to be written by graduates of the London school of economics. Just listen to these inspiring words. I read No. 4:

> The terms of the agreement proposed by the B.C. government will have an unfavourable effect on the Canadian aluminum industry, particularly in British Columbia.

No evidence to prove that. No evidence to show that it would make any serious difference if it did, or to whom it would make a difference.

> The future of this industry lies in its ability to export to American and world markets. While the cost of power at Kitimat may ultimately be around 3 mills, today with the development only partially completed and many of the capital outlays already made, it is more in the order of 7 or 8 mills. The reduction in cost will result from greater production and depends largely on increased exports to the United States. This situation must, obviously, be considered most carefully before an arrangement is permitted which would allow a project in Canada to make power available from Canadian storage for use by industry in another country at a price little more than half what it costs to a competing Canadian producer.

You would think from that statement that they were going to create the most colossal amount of power. But what would be created is the number of kilowatts of which 42,000 is 20 per cent. That would not be enough to seriously disrupt any production here. What evidence have we that when this power is developed in the United States it will be used for the production of aluminum? There is not the slightest chance of that happening. That is just as false a bit of sophistry as you could read. This is a learned letter from one of the big departments at Ottawa where the wise men all live.

The terms of the agreement are bad for B.C. and Canada.

There is not a bit of proof advanced or a bit of evidence adduced to support that bald statement, which is as foolish, insubstantial and unsatisfying as the rest of that letter. But it continues:

If the negotiations between individual states in the United States can be used as a criterion, Canada should receive about 50 per cent of the total downstream power generated in the United States by the use of Columbia river water stored within her boundaries.

That is the first part. Apparently there are plans in operation in those states, but we do not know the facts about them. Now, are those plans or the dams involved to be built by an outside interest? And are they to be built free for the states concerned, in the manner in which this Castlegar one is to be built? Let us remember that a United States interest, the Kaiser corporation, is going to build this Castlegar dam free. It will not cost British Columbia a cent to build it, nor will it cost them a cent to maintain it. If a similar condition does not obtain in those states referred to in regard to their projects this conclusion about 50 per cent has no relation whatever to the evidence adduced. But let us continue:

For the more economic projects, the ratio could be expected to run somewhat higher in Canada's favour. The Arrow lakes provide one of the most "natural" and economic reservoirs in the Columbia basin, and yet apparently Canada would get a share of 20 per cent only of the downstream power available at Grand Coulee.

The force of that statement or lack of force depends entirely on whether a United States company has come to Canada, built a dam, paid for it, supported and maintained the dam every year, and is satisfied to give 20 per cent of the power for the use of the water; or whether the province of British Columbia build the dam at a cost of $30 million bearing interest at 5½ per cent, which would amount to $165,000 per year.

If the government of British Columbia built that dam you justifiably would expect it to get 50 per cent of the power; but when a United States company builds the dam, pays for it, maintains it, receives the water which is stored and uses it to generate electricity and then gives British Columbia 20 per cent of that power, it might be giving a really good deal. It will therefore be seen that there is confusion in that statement I have just read, confusion which is worse confounded, and no substance of reason at all.

The next pillar is No. 6. I am sorry my time is running out, but this is the last point with which I wish to deal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall come back and entertain the house again if I am given another opportunity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the main motion carry?

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): It is conceivable that under normal circumstances a bill such as Bill No. 3 would not have engendered such protracted debate, nor would such strong differences of opinion have been expressed. However, it certainly cannot be said that the circumstances surrounding Bill No. 3 are in any sense normal. We have had a definite lack of information, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Peace River as well as by the hon. member for Lethbridge and others. We are still of the opinion, and thoroughly convinced, that before Bill No. 3 is given second reading the information which has been requested should be made available.

I refer at this moment only to the letter written by the Minister for Northern Affairs and National Resources, and referred to by the hon. member for Lethbridge. In sentence after sentence, paragraph after paragraph, we are faced with the indefinite, the opinion, the maybe, the suppose, but there was nothing substantial to back up either the observations or the opinions contained in that letter. In my opinion that is the most disturbing aspect of this whole thing, especially when the letter went out over the signature of a responsible minister.

It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the government of British Columbia, a duly elected government responsible to the people of British Columbia, engaged in extensive consultation and utilized every means at its disposal to acquire all necessary information, following which it proposed to negotiate an agreement which, in the opinion of that government, was in the best interests of British Columbia. If that were true it would naturally, I believe, be in the best interests of Canada. It is impossible for me to conceive of anyone here or elsewhere assuming that the government of a province would not or could not or did not have in mind the welfare of the nation of which that province is a part. I feel that anyone who would suggest otherwise would not only be most unfair to the province, but would be doing a disservice to the people of Canada.

It has been pointed out in this house, again only a moment ago, that the Kaiser corporation would spend in British Columbia on the Castlegar dam the sum of $30 million. Moreover, the corporation would pay to the province of British Columbia $275,000 a year, and would make available each year an amount of electricity which based on a value of $20 per kilowatt hour would be worth in the neighbourhood of an additional $800,000 per year. Now, Mr. Speaker, if that is not a good deal from that specific point of view, why in the world does not some minister stand and say why not? At the same time he could follow up by offering a proposition which might be considered better.

Mr. Blackmore: Or as good.

Mr. Shaw: Well, yes, or as good. We are waiting for some minister to do just that. I repeat that whether you like the government of British Columbia or whether you do not, it is still reasonable to assume that the government is going to have in mind the best interests of the province of British Columbia and, I would declare it therefore follows, the best interests of Canada. Surely no responsible person is going to assume that a government, any provincial government in Canada, is going to sell out the interests of the province; yet that expression has been bandied about.

Mr. Blackmore: By irresponsible men.

Mr. Shaw: I would certainly call it an irresponsible position for men to take. Then, of course, you can follow it from there if you like, to determine the type of person who would likely do such a thing.

The federal authorities apparently did not, and do not now, consider this a good proposition. I checked the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce rather carefully. I do not remember the number of times that he used the expression "in the national interest" or something comparable to it. From the number of references I cannot help but conclude that he must construe some proposition, and I do not know of any proposition which he may have in mind other than the one in British Columbia, to be opposed to the national interest. I repeat that we have not had placed before us sound arguments to substantiate that position. We are still waiting for them.

The minister also has referred to the undesirability, if there is such a word, of the short-term benefits. No one has established the fact as yet that these benefits may be short-term. I see substantial benefits over a considerable period of time. If my understanding of the proposed agreement is correct, after a specified period of time the works become the property of British Columbia. The minister used the term now and again, "inconsistent with the longer national view". I should like to know what he considers to be inconsistent. He used a broad, general expression which might refer to one thing or everything. If he believes that the Kaiser proposition is inconsistent with the longer national view, then I would suggest the minister is under an obligation to show us wherein it is not in the interests of Canada for the indefinite future.

The minister also has used the expression in his speech, "not the most advantageous development of a water system." We have not yet been given any clear-cut definition of what he means by the so-called advantageous development of the water system. Reference is made in the bill itself to this expression. I should like to know just exactly the type of proposition that the minister would lay alongside the Kaiser dam proposition which would be a more advantageous system for British Columbia and for Canada. It may be, but I want to hear what it is. We have not yet heard that.

The minister also referred to any scheme having to fit in with the general picture of water and power requirements in Canada. Well, the hon. member for Peace River asked the minister to give us the picture of the over-all national policy in this field. Until we do have such a picture it is virtually impossible for anyone, including the minister, to say that a certain proposed project does or does not fit into the so-called national picture of water and power requirements in Canada.

The minister also referred in his speech to certain works which do not include appropriate safeguards to protect the national interest. That expression also cropped up. But did he or did anyone point to this project and establish the fact that it does not include appropriate safeguards to protect the national interest? During the course of this debate I have heard no one undertake that.

What exactly is required by way of safeguards? We are waiting for an announcement concerning those safeguards. In what way and to what extent does the proposed project in British Columbia not fit into such a pattern? If it does not fit into such a specific pattern it is because of the fact that no pattern exists at this time.

The minister also referred to the fact that the rights of individuals in both countries must be protected. In what way and to what extent does this proposed project fail to protect individual rights? If it does not give that protection, then I am waiting to hear someone point out wherein it fails to do so. I understand—and I refer to what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge)—that where damage may be done to property along the Arrow lakes, and where flooding may be caused, compensation is provided, as it is provided in all such projects. I took it from what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West that if any project in Canada interfered in any way with one house or one acre of land, then a project such as that should be damned and not proceeded with. And I am not using that word in the sense of the holding back of water.

Mr. Herridge: That is not only the opinion of the hon. member for Kootenay West; it is the opinion of people in the Arrow lakes district.

Mr. Shaw: I would assume that the hon. member was quoting with approval. I could not help understanding, from his observations, that he was in agreement. Certainly he did not say, "My people say this, but I disagree with them".

Mr. Herridge: I am representing my people.

Mr. Shaw: I think it is assumed that if I rise in the House of Commons and advocate a certain proposal, either I am in agreement with it myself or I make it clear that I am not.

The minister brought out a number of points with which I should like to deal. However, I have an amendment, and I am sure the house would like to hear it before ten o'clock so that hon. members may reflect upon it over the week end.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston):

That Bill No. 3 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

There has been evidence throughout this debate that a good deal of additional information is required. I, for one, cannot support the second reading of a bill unless I am satisfied in my own mind that I have all the information necessary to render a proper decision. And it is to the principle of the bill I am speaking at the moment. If we are asked to endorse the principle of the bill, as we are now asked, then all I can assume is that there will be a great many members in the house who are in a fog or a haze with respect to the actual principle at the time they cast their votes. Certainly I would find it extremely difficult to sleep tonight if I were to give approval to the second reading of this bill, in the light of the very scanty information we have concerning certain vital aspects of this whole matter.

My amendment simply means that we do not have to accept the principle of the bill at the moment, but rather that the subject matter thereof be referred to the committee on external affairs so that all information necessary could be acquired, and all hon. members in that committee would be in possession of that necessary information and could either approve or disapprove of the bill. It would then come back to the house and hon. members would then be able to face a vote on second reading and assert conscientiously that they were fully conscious of the implications involved. That is the position we find it necessary to take at this time.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if this amendment passes it kills the bill for this session, because the amendment is that the bill be not read a second time.

I wonder why everyone is so frightened of the bill. What is the purpose of the bill? Well, the purpose is to require the federal government to agree with the province that this is a desirable project. If we so agree a licence is issued and the work proceeds. We have had the same situation with permits under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, and that act has expressed the accepted policy of this government since 1907. I have heard some great debates on this question.

My hon. friend says that this is legislation aimed against British Columbia. Well, if so the same principle has been aimed against other provinces in the past. I recall that one of the great debates of my first session of parliament was as to whether a licence should be issued to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company to export 40,000 kilowatts of power from its Cedars plant on the St. Lawrence river to the Aluminum Company of America at Massena, New York. That was really a debate. This echoes that debate; "the water is running down river anyway; why not use it?" That was the principal keynote. We have the members of the Social Credit party saying, "The water is running down the river, let us use it now. Never mind the future." That has been the keynote of this argument from that section of the house.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We have been told several times that there are 75,000 kilowatts of unsold power in that area; "Therefore never mind the rest of it. That 75,000 kilowatts is a lot of unsold power. Let the rest of it go to the United States."

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I did not interrupt you. Then there was the great debate between the Ontario government and the federal government about the export of surplus power from Ontario.

Mr. Fleming: An Ontario Liberal government.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): An Ontario Liberal government and a federal Liberal government at Ottawa. The two arguments were used there; well, the water is running down the river anyway; we have the unsold power being generated, why not export? Fortunately this parliament decided not to export that power and today, as I said earlier in the debate, the province of Ontario is developing its last hydroelectric power. The province of Quebec, instead of sending power down to make aluminum at Massena, New York, is using that power to make aluminum in Canada. We were then making it at a plant in the province of Quebec that was less than one-twentieth the size it is today. If we had been willing to send that power over the line the plant at Massena would have been a big plant today, and the plant on the Saguenay would not be the size it is today.

I point out that I said nothing that could be construed as being of a political nature in explaining the purpose of this bill. The purpose of this bill is simply to require, in connection with international streams, that we pass on the desirability of the export of regulated water in the same manner as we do for electricity and natural gas. If the application will stand examination a licence may well be granted. We do not know too much about this proposal. We have been told a lot about it in this debate. All I have seen is the contract that has been tabled, but I am told by the leader of the Social Credit party that there is much more to it than that. There is to be a supplementary agreement with the Bonneville power authority that is going to become a part of the contract. Well, perhaps that makes the arrangement enforceable, for in my opinion the contract certainly is not enforceable in the form that has been tabled in this house. The hon. member says it is going to be made possible to export British Columbia's share of the power from the United States into Canada, that export is going to be assured. Well, that may change the whole complexion. The purpose of this bill is to make sure that we get information such as may enable us to join with the province in working out a solution that is acceptable in the national interest.

I point out that we think we have a national interest in the power resources of British Columbia. To date the Canadian section of the international joint commission has expended $2,781,000 in investigations and study of the best use of the water resources of the Columbia river. We have in the estimates that are before the house at the present time a further sum of $641,360 to be spent during the next fiscal year in continuing the study of the best use of the Columbia river system.

Strangely enough, General McNaughton has not been consulted by the province of British Columbia about this transaction. He tells me that he was in Victoria on the day this contract was signed, and that he did not hear about the agreement until two or three weeks later. I may say that the most disturbed man about this situation is General McNaughton. He sees several years of work thrown away; he sees the program that he hoped to carry out for the Columbia river system made unworkable.

The Arrow lakes are the great natural reservoir of the Columbia river in British Columbia. As I read the contract, it provides that the Kaiser company, an American company that operates an aluminum plant in Seattle, is to have the complete regulation of the water levels in the Arrow lakes. This company has the privilege of storing the water in periods of high water and holding that high water as long as it likes and releasing it as it likes to make up deficiencies in the flow of the Columbia river system below the border.

Mr. Blackmore: To the extent of 3 million acre feet.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Three million acre feet of water happens to be all the water there is in the Arrow lakes that will be controlled by this dam. It must be remembered that this is not a temporary arrangement; it is for 50 years, and renewable after that.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

In other words the Kaiser company will regulate the water levels and storage capacity in the Arrow lakes for 50 years and beyond. What can you do with the Columbia river if you have regulation of the Arrow lakes tied up by a corporation outside of Canada?

Frankly, if I wanted to play politics with this matter, which I do not; if I were to forget that I am a member of a government that is responsible for all of Canada, I would not introduce this bill. I would not say a word; I would let the government of British Columbia turn over the Arrow lakes lock, stock and barrel to the Kaiser company of Wilmington, Delaware, for their use and regulation. That would be playing politics. What we are trying to do is prevent a situation that we think is destructive of the best interests of the water resources of British Columbia and of Canada, for British Columbia is a part of the Dominion of Canada.

As I say, if examination proves that we are wrong, what happens? Well, we issue a permit; but we believe that this project is wrong. General McNaughton believes that this is wrong and contrary to the best interests of British Columbia and of Canada. Surely the Canadian section of the international joint commission, which has spent a great deal of money and three or four years of time in studying the possibilities of the Columbia system, have a right to know what the deal is and what effect it will have on the work they have planned for that area. Surely the federal government as a whole should be entitled to see the details of a contract made between Her Majesty's government in British Columbia and a company in the United States of America dealing with the use of a storage basin in Canada; for if there is any recourse for the United States for damage or nonperformance that recourse is not going to be against the province of British Columbia, it is going to be against the Dominion of Canada. If there are any claims from outside Canada they will not be filed with the government of British Columbia, they will be filed with the government of Canada.

It seems to me that a great deal of heat has been generated about a bill that simply asks that the information be laid on the table; that evidence be given that this is a prudent contract. We assume that if it can be shown it is not a prudent contract, the British Columbia government would be just as willing to abrogate it as we would be anxious to have it abrogated. If it could be shown that it is a prudent contract, of course a permit would be issued. It is just as simple as that.

Why all the speeches about the waters flowing anyway? Why not sell any power rights we cannot use immediately? We have heard that argument in every debate on hydroelectric power export that has occurred in this house. Therefore let us not have any more of that. We know now, and we are quite prepared to quote back to any hon. member in that corner, the views he has already expressed in this debate bearing on the export of waterpower resources of Canada. To be sure of their views may be of some value to others in the long pull, but not to me. This debate has been almost entirely away from the point and has covered matters not discussed on the introduction of the bill, and not referred to in the bill itself.

On motion of Mr. MacInnis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Monday, of course, is private members' day, but all hon. members know that the Prime Minister intends to make a statement at the beginning of the day. On Tuesday we shall have a motion to go into supply.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

END OF VOLUME I
