House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable L. Rene Beaudoin

Friday, January 7, 1955

SECOND SESSION—TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the twenty-sixth day of June, 1954, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at two o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the secretary to the Governor General, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at two o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I have received communications from several members notifying me that vacancies had occurred in the representation, as follows:

Of Hon. D. C. Abbott, member for the electoral district of St. Antoine-Westmount, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Hon. Lionel Chevrier, member for the electoral district of Stormont, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Hon. Brooke Claxton, member for the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, by resignation.

Of Rodney Adamson, Esquire, member for the electoral district of York West, by decease.

Of Lionel Conacher, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Trinity, by decease.

Of Robert James Wood, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Selkirk, by decease.

Accordingly I addressed my warrants to the chief electoral officer for the issue of new writs of election for the said electoral districts.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz.:

Of Claude S. Richardson, Esquire, for the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George.

Of Albert Peter Lavigne, Esquire, for the electoral district of Stormont.

Of John Borden Hamilton, Esquire, for the electoral district of York West.

Of Hon. George C. Marler, for the electoral district of St. Antoine-Westmount.

Of Donald D. Carrick, Esquire, for the electoral district of Trinity.

Of William Bryce, Esquire, for the electoral district of Selkirk.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Hon. George C. Marler, member for the electoral district of St. Antoine-Westmount, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

Donald D. Carrick, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Trinity, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. L. B. Pearson.

Albert Peter Lavigne, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Stormont, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. J. J. McCann.

Claude S. Richardson, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. Alcide Cote.

John Borden Hamilton, Esquire, member for the electoral district of York West, introduced by Hon. W. Earl Rowe and Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker.

William Bryce, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Selkirk, introduced by Mr. M. J. Coldwell and Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North).

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO ILLNESS OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that hon. members in every part of this chamber would wish me to say what is in all our minds at this time, and that is how sorry we all are that the Leader of the Opposition, the Hon. George A. Drew, is unable to be present with us at this opening of parliament.

We were all deeply shocked when we heard last November that he had been stricken suddenly by a serious illness. Fortunately after some days of anxiety we were relieved to hear that he had safely passed the critical phase of the malady. Subsequently from time to time we were most grateful to learn that he was making steady progress toward complete recovery although he had to remain in hospital for several weeks.

All of us, his friends in this house—and I am sure this is also true of his hosts of friends outside of this house—sincerely hope that the present rest which his medical advisers have persuaded him to take will enable him to regain completely his strength and that it will not be long before his health and his usual vigour will have been fully restored and that he will be able to be back with us in the house.

Although the request may be somewhat unusual I am sure that every one of us, wherever he sits in the house, would be grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, if you would in the meantime convey to Mr. Drew our most sincere greetings and good wishes.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must take advantage of this opportunity to indicate the keen appreciation of the associates of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on this side of the house of the kind good wishes which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has so generously expressed today. I realize, as do many others, that it is a great tribute to the present-day efficiency of modern medical science that the Leader of the Opposition has been able to get through the very critical days of his illness. However, I am most happy to report, after having visited him yesterday, that he is making a very rapid recovery and indeed his health has been restored to a greater degree than I had expected to find. I feel most confident, and I am sure he does, as well as his doctors, that he will be returned to the health and vigour which the Prime Minister has indicated is his usual state of health.

[Mr. Speaker.]

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It affords me great pleasure to greet you as you resume your parliamentary duties at the beginning of this new year.

Since you last met, the people of Canada have been given an opportunity of extending once more an affectionate welcome to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth, the queen mother. They have also had the pleasure of greeting again the consort of our sovereign, the Duke of Edinburgh, who came to attend the British Empire and Commonwealth games held in Vancouver during the summer and to visit northern parts of Canada.

While there is hopeful evidence that the increasing strength of the free world has lessened the likelihood of aggression, the terrible destruction that war would bring to North America and indeed to all mankind has been magnified by the increase in the number and effectiveness of atomic and thermonuclear weapons and the means of delivering them.

My ministers are convinced that, while the resources of diplomacy must never be neglected in the search for peace, the efforts of the free nations in building their deterrent forces must be maintained. To this end, Canada was represented at the London and Paris conferences which formulated an alternative to the European defence community and provided for the entry of the Federal Republic of Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. You will be asked to approve the agreements reached at those meetings.

Our country continues to give full support to the United Nations. The Canadian delegation took an important part in the deliberations of the recent meeting of the general assembly in New York. It is earnestly hoped that the adoption of the resolution on disarmament introduced in the political committee by the Canadian delegation may lead to agreement on an effective system of international safeguards.

While no final settlement has been reached in Korea, the lessening of the threat of renewed aggression in that area has made possible the withdrawal of a substantial portion of the Canadian forces.

At the invitation of the Geneva conference Canada has accepted the heavy responsibility of serving on the armistice commissions which have been formed to supervise the restoration of peace in the associated states of Indo-China.

Last autumn our nation was the host at the annual meeting of the consultative committee of the Colombo plan. You will be asked to approve Canada's continued participation in the plan as well as in the United Nations' technical assistance program.

A meeting of commonwealth prime ministers will be held in London at the end of this month to consider a number of problems affecting the peoples of this great association of nations. My prime minister plans to attend this conference.

During the summer arrangements were completed to permit the navigational facilities of the St. Lawrence river to be enlarged and a hydroelectric project to be undertaken in the international rapids section.

Work on these two projects has already begun and my ministers are convinced the stimulus to the national economy resulting from their construction will be shared in all parts of the country.

Since you last met, Cape Breton island has been linked with the mainland by the new causeway which will be ready for service as soon as the ship canal has been bridged.

It is expected that, in the course of the coming season, the new ferry between North Sydney and Port aux Basques will be in operation and the ferry service between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor started. Construction of a new ferry to operate between Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island will be undertaken early in the present year.

To improve navigation on the Pacific coast, you will be asked to make provision at this session for the removal of Ripple Rock.

Canadians learned with deep regret of the loss of life and damage to property caused by two severe storms felt heavily in the province of Ontario and the province of Nova Scotia. An agreement has been reached with the province of Ontario to assist those persons whose homes were damaged or destroyed and assistance has been given under the Agricultural Prices Support Act to the producers of apples in Nova Scotia. You will be asked to make the necessary financial provision for these arrangements.

The Disabled Persons Act which you passed at the last session was proclaimed to come into force at the beginning of the present year. The governments of all the provinces have announced their intention to participate in implementing the program to assist those who are totally unable to care for themselves; and my ministers are now in a position to conclude the necessary federal-provincial agreements to bring this humanitarian measure into operation.

Although the national economy is in a generally healthy condition, the relatively poor wheat crop is being reflected by a small decline in the total national income. Some unemployment of a regional and seasonal nature is being experienced. To help meet this situation work on public construction projects already approved is being accelerated and you will be asked to make financial provision for construction in the programs of various departments and agencies on a scale that will make possible a substantial increase in the total expenditures for this purpose.

The government proposes to introduce legislation immediately for the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide for an increase in the duration and scale of supplementary winter benefits. It is also proposing to introduce, during the session, broader amendments designed to make unemployment insurance a more effective instrument in providing financial support to unemployed workers.

The National Housing Act, 1954, enacted early in the last session, which authorized lower down-payments and larger loans, and which enabled the chartered banks for the first time to make loans on the security of residential mortgages, has been an important factor in stimulating the construction of a record number of houses in the past year. The prospects are favourable for a high level of house building in 1955.

It is proposed to bring into general operation on the first of February the provision of the act under which loans may be made for home improvements. In accordance with an undertaking given at the last session, this section was proclaimed for small holders under the Veterans' Land Act with effect from the first of this year.

You will be asked to consider amendments to the Railway Act relating to the elimination of level crossings. The government also hopes to lay before you during the present session a measure to consolidate the legislation affecting the Canadian National Railways.

Amendments to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act and a measure to control works which affect the normal flow of rivers which cross the international boundary will be proposed for the purpose of ensuring that natural resources are developed in the best interests of the Canadian public.

You will be asked to consider a measure to implement a convention between Canada and the United States relating to fisheries research on the great lakes.

You will also be asked to consider legislation to provide facilities for loans to fishermen similar to those provided to farmers by the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The government will submit amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act to raise the basic rates as well as the ceiling on permissible incomes of recipients of allowances.

You will also be asked to consider amendments to the Blind Persons Act, to lower the age of eligibility and raise the income ceilings.

A measure which will provide for amendments to the National Defence Act and the Defence Services Pension Act will be placed before you.

Legislation will be proposed to replace the Meat and Canned Foods Act by measures to provide for the inspection of meat and for the establishment of standards for all agricultural products.

You will be asked to approve a convention signed by the members of the international civil aviation organization which fixes the responsibility for damage caused to third parties by foreign aircraft.

A joint committee of both houses will be proposed to examine, in the light of the Municipal Grants Act and possible amendments thereto, the financial and other relationships of the government and the federal district commission with the city of Ottawa and neighbouring municipalities.

Among other measures you will be asked to consider amendments to the Defence Production Act, the Government Employees Compensation Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Historic Sites and Monuments Act, the Radio Act, the Territorial Lands Act, the Library of Parliament Act, the Canada Grain Act, the Northwest Territories Act, the Yukon Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and to the Municipal Grants Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make provision for the public service for the next fiscal year.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I pray that Divine Providence may guide you in the discharge of your responsibilities.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration later this day, and that this order have precedence over all other business, unless and until otherwise ordered, except introduction of bills and government notices of motions, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

Tributes to Deceased Members

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

THE LATE ROBERT J. WOOD—THE LATE ROBERT FAIR

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since we last met we have received the sad news of the death of two of our colleagues. I refer of course to Mr. Robert J. Wood, who represented the constituency of Selkirk, and Mr. Robert Fair, the member for Battle River-Camrose.

Mr. Wood's death was an unexpected shock to his many friends both within and beyond this chamber. He appeared in excellent health and spirits before he left the capital at the end of June and he was looking forward to the long drive home by automobile.

Mr. Wood was born and raised on his father's farm at Teulon, Manitoba, and he was a resident of that province all his life. In addition to carrying on a successful business he served as reeve in Bifrost municipality at the early age of 31.

Later he was chairman of the Teulon chamber of commerce, and a member of the executive of the Manitoba associated chambers of commerce.

He was first elected to the House of Commons in the general election of 1949, and he was given a renewed vote of confidence by his electors in 1953. Immediately after his arrival in Ottawa Mr. Wood became recognized by his colleagues as an assiduous and friendly member of this house. Although he did not participate frequently in debate, he served conscientiously on several committees and took most seriously his responsibilities to his constituents. Feeling himself very closely associated with them, he endeavoured at all times to be their true representative both in this house and outside.

I am sure I speak for all members of the house in saying that Robert Wood will be remembered with genuine affection and respect by all of us, and in extending sincere sympathy to Mrs. Wood and other members of the family in their bereavement.

Mr. Robert Fair was among the first members of his party to be elected to this house in 1935. Since he first took his seat he gave unstintingly of himself in the service of his constituents. Their appreciation of his efforts was shown by his re-election at each of the four general elections since that date.

Mr. Fair was an active debater and only ill health prevented him from taking his usual part in the deliberations of this house during the last session.

As the representative of a prosperous farming area, Mr. Robert Fair made his principal contribution in the agriculture committee and during the discussions of subjects related to agriculture. He also took a keen and humane interest in legislation concerning war veterans and soldier settlers.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that all members would wish to join with me in expressing sympathy to his leader in the loss of an esteemed colleague, as well as to Mrs. Fair and the other members of the family in their great loss.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and I am sure I speak for all my colleagues on this side of the house when I express keen sympathy at the loss this country has suffered in the death of these two gentlemen.

I did not know Mr. Wood as well as I knew Mr. Fair, but I knew of his long and creditable record in public affairs. I know he was a very kind man and a loyal friend, and I am sure his companionship will be greatly missed by all members of the house. He was elected twice to this parliament, and on several occasions served in other capacities in his native province. I am certain all members will join with me in extending to Mrs. Wood and the family, to his former associates here and in his riding, our keen sympathy and regret.

Mr. Robert Fair was a member of this house for a longer period of time. He was, I believe, elected five times. He was an aggressive member and will be greatly missed by his associates. He was a kind man and yet at the same time he was vigorous and did not hesitate to say where he stood on matters that occupied his keen interest.

I am sure veterans throughout the country will miss Robert Fair's representation in this parliament, and I know that his many friends in his riding will feel his loss very keenly. To his wife and family, on behalf of this group, I extend sincere sympathy.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, for those of us who have been here a long time these occasions of the meeting of parliament are occasions of a happy nature, but unfortunately they are often marred by the loss of one or more members of the house with whom we have been associated over a period of time. This meeting of parliament is no exception.

In the loss of Mr. Wood the government and his friends in his constituency, together with his family, have lost a fine individual. It is true, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said, that he did not take a very great part in the debates in this house, but nonetheless those of us who met him, and knew him, respected him and regret that he has passed away.

We join with the Prime Minister, and the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), in expressing to Mrs. Wood and the family our sincere sympathy in their great personal loss. We also extend to the Prime Minister and his colleagues our sympathy in the loss of one who was a faithful friend and colleague.

Robert Fair came here in 1935, the same year as I, and during that time those of us who knew Robert Fair grew not only to respect him and admire his good qualities, but to like him. We shall miss his rich Irish wit and his brogue, and the soldier settlers in Canada will miss his very warm advocacy of their particular cause.

We wish to record our appreciation of the work he did in this house. Though party lines often divide us, nonetheless we can respect those who with integrity advocate views that are not always consonant with those we hold ourselves. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, to Mrs. Fair and the family, who have watched him suffer over a period of time, and now know that suffering is ended, we wish to extend our sympathy in their loss, and to members of the Social Credit group we extend our sympathy in the loss of a good colleague and advocate of their views throughout the country.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and other hon. members for the kind words they had to utter about our very good friend and colleague, Robert Fair, and at the same time, on behalf of the Social Credit members of parliament, I would like to pay tribute to the sterling qualities of this good man whom we came to know and love through our long years of association with him.

Bob, as he was called by all who knew him, was born in Keelogues, county Mayo, Ireland. He came to Canada in 1914 and settled in the Paradise Valley district about 45 miles southeast of Vermilion, in the province of Alberta, where, by hard work and good management, he was able to build up a very fine farm.

He was intensely proud of his Irish blood, and lost no opportunity to pay tribute to his native land and the good qualities of Irishmen everywhere. But at the same time he had an intense love for Canada and an undivided loyalty to this his adopted land. Throughout his whole life he worked hard to make of Canada a place where every citizen could enjoy freedom, justice, and a good standard of living.

Our friend Bob was mild, but doggedly persistent in everything he undertook to do. He was careful not to hurt those who were in opposition to his ideas, and valued his friends highly. He was devoted to his work in and out of parliament, and to his constituents. He never spared himself in the 19 years that he represented his constituency in this house.

Mr. Fair enjoyed robust health throughout his whole life, never having known a sick day until he was stricken about a year ago with what finally was diagnosed at Rochester as cancer of the pancreas. To all of us who knew how healthy and robust he really was, it was a shock to see how he went down under the onslaught of this terrible affliction. Mr. Fair suffered unusually long with this particular disease, because it usually develops rapidly; but through it all he maintained high morale and a quiet determination to win in the battle for his life. To the very end he looked forward with hope and through it all exhibited unusual courage. These were characteristics of the man in everything that he undertook to do. By those who were with him in his last days I am advised that he had achieved peace of mind which, Mr Speaker, is a great blessing.

Bob had many friends and few, if any, enemies. He was beloved by all who knew him and those of us who are left will miss him sorely. We join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and with the others who have spoken so kindly, in once again expressing to Mrs. Fair, their two sons and the eight grandchildren, our deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

In the second place I should like to join with the Prime Minister and the others who have spoken in paying tribute to our late departed friend, Mr. Wood from Selkirk. I did not, of course, know him as well as I knew Bob Fair, but from what I knew of him I loved him. I had the pleasure of meeting him on many an occasion during the time he was here since 1949. I bowled with him at times on bowling teams. I found him to be a congenial companion and a good sportsman, and I enjoyed being with him. I am sure that we all join in paying our deepest respect to his memory and in paying these tributes to a loyal follower of the Prime Minister, to whom we express our deep sympathy in his loss. To his family and those who are left behind we express our sympathy in the loss of a good husband and father.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those in this house who are fellow members from the province of Manitoba, I should like to express our deep regret on the passing of the late Bert Wood. He was our faithful and just friend and, I think. the faithful and just friend of every person with whom he was on terms of intimacy in this house; certainly he was recognized as such by hundreds of those citizens residing in the interlake area of Manitoba amongst whom he was born, lived a life of service and died. He was not much younger than his province. That means that he was born in that province in a pioneering community and lived the life of a pioneer under pioneer conditions until just recent years. I think it was probably due to that fact that he possessed the endearing qualities of a pioneer, the loyalty to which reference has already been made, and the fair-mindedness of a pioneer; and also those qualities of the pioneer which served him in such good stead as a member of this house: courage, pertinacity and resourcefulness in the discharge of those duties other than making speeches which are such an important part of the work which a member does for his constituency.

We in the west have a term which we apply seriously only to those for whom we have a strong and peculiar combination of love and respect. To us Bert Wood was and always will be remembered as an old-timer. I think the same thing could be said of Robert Fair. He too was an old-timer. There are not too many of them. It is a great tribute to them that we can think of them in these terms.

On behalf of my fellow members from Manitoba I should like to express to the families of both of these gentlemen the heartfelt sympathy which we feel and shall continue to feel for them in their loss.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without saying a brief word. I knew these two members as personal friends. Day in and day out we met. We were like kindred spirits. At the funeral service at Stonewall I was greatly pleased to see present so many members from both sides of the house and of the Senate. That fact told its own story.

I met Bob Fair on the first day he came into the house because I got to know that he was born not far from where I was born; and I knew that we did not have too many Christian Irishmen in the house. I found him to be kind and considerate. Like Mr. Wood, Mr. Fair played the game in the way that it ought to be played. Both men belonged to our bowling league. Both men gave of their best to win; but if they did not win, they were happy to congratulate the man who won. I cannot pay a better tribute to any human mortal than that which I am going to pay to these two fellow members when I say that I found them to be Christian gentlemen in practice.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay a tribute to Robert Fair at this time. I knew him probably more intimately than I knew anyone else in this house. We both were elected in 1935. We came to this house together and we had been roommates every year since that time. For 19 years we roomed together. We were still more closely associated than that because, throughout that entire period, we were deskmates here in this chamber except for part of one parliament.

I know Bob Fair to have had a very mild temperament. In our association we had to deal with problems which arose concerning all parts of the country. There was hardly an occasion on which a problem arose that we did not converse about it one with the other. There was hardly a problem that came before this house, and with which we were connected, that we did not discuss thoroughly in our office before we came down here to the chamber.

I think I can fairly say that everyone who knew him was aware of the fact that he was a confirmed supporter of the farmers of this country. Not only was he concerned about those who lived in his own constituency in his own province but he was concerned greatly about agricultural problems throughout this whole Dominion of Canada. All of us here in this house remember him as a staunch supporter of the old soldier settlers; and I think it will be agreed that had it not been for the persistence that Bob Fair showed in sponsoring the cause of the returned soldier, their condition might not be so good as it is. In fact, he was a staunch supporter of all those who found themselves in less fortunate circumstances than himself. Therefore I should like to express my sincerest sympathy at this time to his wife, Mrs. Fair, and to his two sons, Robin and Lester. I know them personally. They are going to miss him. I am going to miss him a great deal and I am sure that everyone who knew him will also miss him.

Along with the other members of the house, I should like to extend my sympathy on the passing of Bert Wood. I knew him very well. I knew him in sport, in our bowling league, where we became very well acquainted. I knew him as an intimate friend in connection with other phases of the work done by members of the House of Commons. I should like to take this opportunity to express my sympathy to his wife and family and to the government.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Hon. James J. McCann, Minister of National Revenue, the Hon. S. S. Garson, Minister of Justice, the Hon. Hugues Lapointe, Minister of Veterans Affairs, and the Hon. W. E. Harris, Minister of Finance, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes, and under the provisions of the one hundred and forty-third chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, intituled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Harris, Lapointe, Casselman, Knowles and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That Edward T. Applewhaite, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Skeena, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Report of the joint librarians of parliament. —Mr. Speaker.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. YVES LEDUC (VERDUN) AND SECONDED BY MR. DONALD D. CARRICK

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

(Translation):

Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, at the opening of each sitting of this house you follow the pious tradition of praying the Almighty, the only Ruler of princes, to behold and favour our most gracious sovereign, Queen Elizabeth, and to replenish her with the grace of the Holy Spirit.

You also beseech Him to direct and prosper all our country's consultations as well as for the safety, honour and welfare of our sovereign so that all things may be so ordered and settled by these endeavours, upon the best and surest foundations, that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations.

On this memorable occasion of my life, may I be permitted to make mine the text of that elevation of our soul and of our heart so that in what I have to say I may find in Him a source of inspiration worthy not only of the members of the house but also of the work to be done in the matter of good and truth.

At the outset of our deliberations, over which you are presiding ex officio, it is fitting for more than one reason that you should deign to accept my respectful and loyal tribute. Since the days of our youth, I have followed your successful achievements, and it is particularly gratifying for me today to offer you my public congratulations, and to proclaim your tact, your competence, your dignity, your devotion to duty, as well as your sense of justice in the fulfilment of your noble functions.

At the end of the year 1953, my predecessor, Mr. Paul Emile Cote, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), an active member of this house for some 14 years, was appointed to the bench as a puisne judge of the superior court at Montreal. His relatives, his friends and the citizens of Verdun applauded such an official and unequivocal recognition of the dignity of his life, of his probity, of his devotion to duty, of his competence, in a word, of the loyal services he had rendered to the citizens of Verdun and the people of this country.

This appointment proved to be the causa causans of my entry into public life after having practised law actively during more than 20 years.

On March 22 last, my Verdun constituents bestowed upon me the honour and grave responsibility of representing them in this parliament. I hope I will remain worthy of their trust and that I will, in turn, be of service to the Canadian community through devotion to work and study of national and international problems, under the competent direction of my elders and with the kindly co-operation of every member of this house. To them I extend thanks in advance while assuring them of my own willingness to co-operate.

The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), no doubt desirous of honouring the constituency of Verdun and of expressing his indulgent confidence in one of his new colleagues—one who has had the pleasure and privilege of sitting here only for a few months—has asked me to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Tradition requiring that he should be thanked for this, it is with pleasure that I wish to discharge this pleasant duty. I should like to extend to him, at the beginning of this new year, the respectful and grateful good wishes of my constituents, for health, happiness and peace. And to these wishes I also desire to add my own.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity of offering to my dear French and English speaking colleagues, as well as to our assistants in this house my best wishes for a happy new year.

Upon resuming the sittings of this house we pause to deplore certain deaths and departures, and at the same time to take note of the arrival of new figures, some already known, but now covered with glory and greater responsibilities. The grim reaper has cut a swath in our ranks since the first session of this parliament. Even recently his fatal hand has torn two other public figures from the affections of their families, one the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Wood) and the other the Social Credit representative of the constituency of Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair). The former had sat in this house since 1949 and the latter since 1935, so they spent many years in the service of their fellow citizens and their country.

Time did not afford me the opportunity or the pleasure of knowing them intimately or even during the parliamentary debates, but I am aware of the warm memory which they have left in this house. To their respective families, to the leaders of their parties, to their friends and constituents, may I offer in the name of all those present our deepest and most heartfelt sympathy.

It is certainly a great satisfaction to those whose political careers are climaxed by appointments in other fields. However, those who remain find, with a mixture of joy and sadness, that their absence undoubtedly leaves a void. Three former cabinet members in this government are now exercising their talents in other fields. Undoubtedly, this is the result of official recognition of the numerous and eminent services they have rendered this nation. You have no doubt guessed by now that I am referring to the Hon. Brooke Claxton, who put aside the honours of his political activities to accept important responsibilities in the financial world, and to the Hon. D. C. Abbott, who has become a member of the highest court in the country, as well as to the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. To these three great servants of our country may I offer, in the name of all members of this house, additional congratulations to those expressed personally, and also our sincere wishes for their success. As we say on such occasions, ad multos et faustissimos annos.

(Translation):

On behalf of the French-Canadian population especially, I wish to call to mind the moving memories left in this house by the Hon. Lionel Chevrier. What a fine and distinguished personality! I have been in a position to appreciate his excellent formation, his moral and intellectual education, his transcendent talent, his high ability in the fields of politics, eloquence and management. How easy it was for him to state clearly and with urbanity the problems of his department, using one language and then the other as required, the way a ship goes from one port of call to another, from a near shore to a distant one! It is not surprising that the Prime Minister and his colleagues have deemed it advisable to channel his competence and his activities toward the very river along which he has exerted and will exert for a long time his beneficial influence.

But in parliament, as elsewhere, life goes on! In order to fill certain vacancies, the house has acquired new members, for instance my hon. friend and namesake, the member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) who is not unknown here; the member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick), who has the honour of seconding the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne; the member for Stormont (Mr. Lavigne); the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Richardson) and, last but not least, the member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Marler), about whom I shall have something very special to say in a moment.

My hon. friends in the opposition will certainly appreciate my leaving them the chance to be the first to congratulate the new occupants of the seats that had become vacant through the death of some members. May I be permitted to associate myself with their respective leaders in their compliments. The opposition will not be satisfied with that however. They will very likely—it is their right—criticize the various bills and the other government measures they will be asked to consider. They will do so with more or less vehemence or assurance and always for constructive purposes if, as I hope their thoughts, their statements and their attitudes spring from courtesy, straightforwardness, integrity, and from a courage which can reach the level of pride. That is the best way to do something useful, and, according to Sir Richard Southwell, to be of good faith.

I would be angry with myself, Mr. Speaker, for not inviting the members of this house to commend the appointment to the cabinet of my hon. colleague and friend, the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) who, last summer, became a member of Her Majesty's privy council and Secretary of State. At the Montreal University law school, I had the opportunity to appreciate his good humour, his intellectual inquisitiveness, his zeal for work, his marked taste for arts and literature, his thirst for justice, and numerous other qualities. His great culture was soon to find expression in an eloquence not unworthy of Clemenceau himself. His oratorical triumphs are well known to all. Already officially recognized by Washington, they have just been acknowledged by Canada. I pray my hon. friend to accept anew our congratulations and wishes for a successful career.

Finally, the house is proud to welcome the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). His long career as a notary and his concurrent participation in the administration of public affairs, as a member of the Montreal municipal council as well as of the Quebec legislative assembly, of which he was long a member and during the past few years leader of the opposition, have endowed him with the necessary experience, which augurs well for the Canadian nation. An untiring worker, whose courtesy has never defaulted, whose competence has often been hailed even by political opponents, in spite of their complex of superiority, the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount deserves our sincere congratulations and our warmest wishes for success on the federal scene.

In fact, I have today a unique occasion of drawing a parallel which may help foster Canadian unity. The province of Quebec has now the privilege of having in the federal parliament two political figures—and I shall not name any other—of different racial origins, well versed in law and having a wide experience in public administration, one of French origin, the right hon. the Prime Minister, and the other of English origin, the hon. Minister of Transport. Both of them speak with equal fluency the language of "fair France" and of "proud Albion". They have revealed themselves magnificent logicians, combining French dash and British coolness, both traits drawn at the very source of that duality of language and of different civilizations implanted in our country, and which constitute for the Canadian citizen a priceless asset, and, for our country, in the eyes of other international powers, an example likely to increase the power, prestige and cultural as well as economic maturity of the most beautiful country and the one which enjoys the greatest measure of freedom, our Canada.

May the example set by these two outstanding figures in this native land of ours be followed in all spheres of national activity.

The constituency of Verdun, which I have the honour to represent in this house and which I am required, by tradition, to extol, has a population of over 80,000 people, of which 47 per cent are of French origin and 47 per cent of English origin or, at least, English-speaking, the remaining six per cent belonging to various other racial groups.

The name Verdun comes from a part of France called the Ariège, and dates back to 1671, at least. Monsieur de Maisonneuve, before the arrival of the regiment of Carignan, had originally distributed lands in this district to eight freeholders, called by him Argoulets, who were, as a matter of fact, harquebusiers, musketeers, fusiliers, carbineers used as light infantry in fighting the Iroquois. In 1841 the Côte des Argoulets was called Rivière Saint-Pierre at times, and Verdun at others. With the adoption of its incorporating statutes it gradually and definitely became Verdun.

From a geographical point of view Verdun is bounded on the north and west by Montreal, on the south by Ville Lasalle and on the east by the St. Lawrence river, whose beauty is enhanced at that point by St. Paul island.

This electoral district, because of its proximity to the metropolis of Canada, is, on the whole, residential, commercial and industrial. There are, in Verdun, more than 1,200 corporations or private companies. Moreover, it has two hospitals, one Catholic, the other Protestant; it is sprinkled with beautiful churches most of which are under the patronage of the Blessed Virgin, and with spacious, modern schools which are still insufficient to fill the educational needs of the school-age population.

What gives Verdun its charm, besides the moral and civic qualities of its citizens and the perfect understanding between the various language groups making up its population, are its parks, its playgrounds, its fine auditorium, its promenade of more than five miles along the river. I must not forget to mention its outdoor swimming pool, which is highly appreciated by the youth of Verdun and of the whole neighbourhood. This swimming pool is so modern that interprovincial or international swimming and diving competitions are held there annually and there is such a heavy attendance during the hot summer week ends that the courteous and civic-minded people of Verdun are satisfied with merely admiring a part of the population of Montreal.

Verdun lacked only one important federal public service. It was a post office in line with the essential needs of its greatly increased population. Fortunately the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) have realized the urgency and the seriousness of the situation. Plans for extension of the post office are being prepared and carried out, and I would be remiss in my duty if I failed to thank them both for having lent a kind ear to my representations. May I voice the wish that this restoration of the Verdun post office may be worthy of the third French city in America, the fourteenth most important city in Canada, and that it may be extensive enough so that the people of Verdun may get a postal service beyond reproach.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we glance at the modern history of our country, we can readily see that the right hon. the Prime Minister, the leader of the government, that efficient component of society whose duty it is to remove the obstacles which impede the progress of man towards his destiny and the pursuit of his ideal, has become famous for having held on to the course he had set for himself in the political creed which, in his first speech as a member of this house, he put in these words:

> The right of men, rich and poor, to be treated as men; the right of men to make the laws by which they shall be governed; the right of men to work where they will at what they will; the right of womankind to the serenity and sanctity of the home; the right of children to play in safety under peaceful heavens; the right of old men and women to the tranquillity of their sunset; the right to speak the truth in our hearts; the right to worship, in our own way, the God in whom we believe.

Freedom and security; such is the motto of the good father in the managing of the affairs of the state, both internal and external.

The implementation of such a political program was to have considerable and beneficial effects within the nation and beyond the seas. Not only was the prime minister duly acclaimed during his world tour, but he saw with his own eyes the marked progress towards his objective: recognition by the other nations of the globe of our distinctive national identity, of the Canadian citizen's broadmindedness as well as of his wish to fraternize with his fellow men.

There is no reason, then, to be surprised that so many important personalities have visited Canada since the last parliamentary session. There have been, among others: Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother, whose perfect bilingualism delighted and moved her audience; the Duke of Edinburgh; the Duchess of Kent and her daughter Princess Alexandra; His Majesty Haile Selassie, King of Ethiopia; the venerable Sir Winston Churchill, prime minister of the United Kingdom; the dynamic prime minister of the council of the French Republic, Pierre Mendès-France; Mr. Shigeru Yoshida, prime minister of Japan; Sir John Kotelawala, premier of Ceylon; the Right Honourable and Lady Swinton; the Austrian chancellor, Julius Raab, whose justified aim it is to obtain his country's sovereignty and independence; and lastly, that eminent statesman and distinguished scholar, Dr. Radhakrishnan, vice-president of India. Mr. Speaker, a politician's speech, be he the nation's head or a subordinate, should not be only "the adornment of his time, like a lovely lady". His words should be inspired by the social task to be achieved in the service of his people. For the natural tendency of man, in fact one of his permanent needs and ennobling aspirations, is the pursuit if not of perfect happiness, at least of comparative and lasting happiness. This vital instinct cannot be fulfilled without freedom, security, peace of mind and the minimum well-being essential to the development of his personality. Only in a state, or society, based on sound morals and on a legislation that has stood the test of actual experience will the honest citizen open his mind to truth and strengthen his will to serve the common weal. I scarcely need add that a sovereign country like ours will only keep its chances of progress and development if it can permanently enjoy the freedom, stability and national peace that are essential to the people.

That freedom, that security, that moral and economic stability, that national peace, we already have and our government is bending every effort to strengthen them. One has merely to point out the achievements, with far-reaching social and humanitarian effects, brought about during and after the last session of this parliament and about which I would like to say a few words if, by doing so, Mr. Speaker, I do not try your patience and that of our colleagues.

"Laws", said Ozanam, "are the soul of the land." The soul and action of the social legislation enacted by this government are proof of its desire that the science of government should become "the science of peace" and of the harmonious state.

Everyone remembers the amendments made last March to the National Housing Act in order to allow the chartered banks and the savings banks of the province of Quebec to grant mortgage loans for the construction of houses. That new legislation does away, moreover, with the joint loans, replacing them by a system of insured mortgages through which the approved lender provides the whole amount instead of 75 per cent. Also, the maximum loan has been raised and the period of amortization lengthened from 20 to 25 years.

In this same field, we must applaud the conclusion of federal-provincial agreements with seven of the ten provinces, the greatest number of such agreements being with the province of Ontario where, according to a statement made in December last by the hon. Minister of Public Works, a large scale program of slum clearance and reconstruction has helped to change the face of Toronto. May Montreal follow that example and take advantage of that beneficent co-operation in order to overcome its problem of insufficient housing and overpopulated dwellings and to promote the disappearance of that social evil, the slum.

Another measure which has been comforting to many people is the act which has been adopted to help disabled persons and which came into effect on New Year's day. The governments of all provinces have announced their intention to sign an agreement with the federal government in order to improve the lot of this group of unfortunate people. That is another step toward greater co-operation between the federal government and that of my province, and I congratulate both of them. In this connection, it is a very pleasant duty for me to thank the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and my excellent old friend, the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand), for the manner in which they upheld that noble and sympathetic cause.

The house has without doubt learned with marked rejoicing some time ago that during the present session the government intends to help more extensively our veterans through an amendment to the law respecting their allowances and to show a deeper understanding for one of the most unfortunate groups of our society, the blind, in lowering the age at which the allowance is granted and increasing the maximum provided by the act.

With no mental reservation and with no intention to link these last statements with the problem of federal-provincial relations in the matter of taxation, I should be remiss in my duty if I did not express the hope that light may be thrown on the way to a fair settlement that would bring satisfaction to the taxpayers of the province of Quebec as well as to those of the other provinces.

The virtue of charity is not practised only within the borders of the nation. The Canadian government endeavours also to extend it to the international field. In fact, the Canadian contribution to the Colombo plan is intended mainly to help the economic and social improvement of the countries of south and southeast Asia.

To provide these countries with the means of improving and increasing their industrial and agricultural production, of extending their public and social services, of improving their administrative system by supplying them with materials, equipment, technicians, experts and administrators not only constitutes an undertaking of mutual assistance from which our country is the first to benefit in large measure but at the same time, if I am not mistaken, promotes the ideal of the free and democratic countries and increases their cohesive force.

Before concluding my remarks, I do feel compelled to mention the gigantic project undertaken recently, namely the deepening of the St. Lawrence seaway. There is no doubt that this 1,200-mile long seaway will greatly contribute to the economic development of our country. This happy undertaking, like other large public works which the government proposes to undertake, will stimulate industry, business and employment of labour. As a result of the building of canals, locks and even the development of power, our economic development will be much more rapid and unemployment will thereby come to an end. It will then be possible to ship, quickly and economically, to plants in the centre of the continent, millions of tons of ore mined in eastern Canada; it will be easier to move our wheat reserves to the various markets of the world, while decreasing the handling and shipping charges towards the east. The people of Montreal, Verdun and the surrounding communities will rejoice at the increase in business and activity in the harbour of our metropolis; it is said that this harbour will become an even more important link between ocean-going vessels and ships plying the great lakes.

The speech from the throne delivered by the governor general, which announces the introduction of certain bills, reflects the altruism of this government and its concern for its sister nations, the general economy of this country and the needs of all classes of our population. The amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will certainly help those who might not be able to find employment during the winter, and I hope that the benefits will be commensurate to the number of people in the same family, without abuse.

In this respect and, also, in respect to other measures mentioned in the speech from the throne, we may expect some lively debates, but I am confident that the members of this house will show no mercy to false principles and will devote all their efforts to the defence of the sound ones.

The philosophy of laws advises the legislator to recognize the immutable principles based on truth, justice and charity for the common good. These principles must be applied not only in the family, that basic element of our social structure, but also by the state, and even by a community of states. That is why it is wise and desirable for each and every one of us, in public or private life, to see to it that our individual or collective acts are perfected through our attitude and our conduct. The union of the members of our Canadian family will thus be made easier and more efficient. And the same holds true of the various peoples with whom these modern inventions keep us in daily and permanent contact.

Is this not, Mr. Speaker, the surest way to make this Canada of ours a mighty nation? Yes, mighty through the duality of its languages, its cultural heritage and its respect for its traditions. Ours will be a mighty nation since we shall have retained the courage of the pioneer who takes pride in sowing the grain and handling the tools. It will be a mighty nation since, in the light of the directions left for us by the makers of this confederation, we have had the wisdom to institute a healthy and efficient parliamentary system. It will be mighty too through peacetime labour and the sacrifices of two wars, since we have ceased to be as lowly ivy grafted to the trunks of other and more powerful nations to become a noble oak in our own right, a mighty nation, then, since, in the words of my father: "Canada has grown at the call of its own summit and will climb high along the road to the great destinies envisioned by the fathers of Canadian confederation."

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick), I have the honour to move:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, C. H., Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada:

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

(Text):

Mr. Donald D. Carrick (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) upon the very excellent address he has just delivered. He has demonstrated that his reputation as an able speaker is well merited.

May I also thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the cabinet for the honour they have conferred upon the people of Trinity which I represent and upon myself by inviting me to second this motion.

It is a pity that the rules of the house do not permit hon. members to hear at this time the other recently elected members on this side of the house. I am sure they could discharge my pleasant task a good deal more ably than I can. However, hon. members will have the pleasure of hearing from them later on and no doubt it is a good idea to save some of the best things for the last.

My presence here as the member for Trinity will recall to the minds of some of you the late member for that constituency, Lionel Conacher. Lionel will be greatly missed in this house. He was most popular and had a strong feeling of affection for his fellow men. Many of us can recall watching Lionel when he was at the height of his athletic career distinguish himself in one of his many lines of athletic endeavour. What we admired was not so much the success he attained as the spirit and courage behind it. Lionel never quit in anything he did, and when he passed from our presence he was still giving the best that was in him.

When I think of the great men and women who have served this house in the past and their successors present at this time I am deeply conscious of the great honour it is to participate in this great work. A person not familiar with our parliamentary system and not realizing that it contemplates differences of opinion might be somewhat surprised at the sparks, not to use a stronger word, which sometimes fly from the pages of Hansard, but anyone familiar with our system knows that no matter how hon. members may differ in the means of attaining it, the object desired by all is the welfare of Canada.

The hon. member for Verdun has dealt so ably with general economic conditions in Canada and certain internal matters that it would be presumptuous on my part to add anything to what he has said, but there are a few matters in the external field to which I should like to refer briefly.

The speech from the throne says that parliament will be asked for its continued support of the Colombo plan. Hon. members will recall that it was a mixture of political, humanitarian and economic considerations that prompted Canada along with the other participants to embark upon the Colombo plan in 1950. The original members of the plan, the British commonwealth countries and the federation of Malaya, Singapore, North Borneo and Sarawak, were joined by the United States in 1951.

The countries benefiting by the plan occupy one-sixth of the world's land area in south and southeast Asia and comprise about one-quarter of the world's population. The essential object is to help those countries to help themselves by furnishing to them economic aid and technical assistance which they can integrate with their own national programs. To date Canada has made available under the plan $120 million, as well as $5 million in the form of a special grant of wheat at a time of emergency, for which counterpart funds have been created for agreed development purposes. From Canada the recipients to date of both capital aid and technical assistance have been India, Pakistan and Ceylon, while some other countries have received a limited amount of technical assistance.

This year it is proposed to ask parliament to appropriate $26·4 million for the plan, which is $1 million over the appropriation for the current year. The $1 million increase will be used to increase technical assistance and to explore projects worthy of future development. Where projects of this kind are involved there is no question about the support being continued. It is only a question of the maximum this country can afford to provide in view of the difficulty of raising funds and the other pressing demands for expenditure.

The speech from the throne refers to certain responsibilities that are being assumed in Indo-China. Hon. members will recall that at the Geneva conference last year a cease-fire and armistice agreement was brought about. Subsequently Canada, together with India and Poland, was asked to appoint representatives to international commissions for Cambodia, Laos and Viet Nam. With a full recognition of the complexity and magnitude of the tasks involved the Canadian government consented to do this as a contribution to peace in east Asia.

At the present time the commissions are engaged in the military phase of the armistice. Elections are called for in 1956 in Viet Nam, which will elect an all-Viet Nam government, and Canadian services cannot be fully performed until after that date. At the present time there are about 160 Canadian personnel, both military and civil, in the area. These obligations involve financial burdens which Canada is only too glad to assume in pursuance of its policy to promote peace anywhere and at any time.

Reference has also been made in the speech from the throne to the Paris pacts which will come before the house for consideration involving the restoration of sovereignty to West Germany along with limited rearmament. Hon. members will recall that it was sought to bring West Germany into the western collective security system through the medium of the European defence community. The EDC treaty failed of ratification before the French assembly in August of last year. The possibility of the French assembly refusing to ratify the EDC treaty had been foreseen and alternative plans were laid before it came up in the French house, which were consummated in the form of the Paris agreements in October.

The proposal to rearm Germany has caused great concern in the minds of many people. They have not forgotten that Germany has plunged the world into two wars within our generation, and they are asking themselves whether the rearmament of Germany forebodes the revival of the nazi mentality with its theories of racial superiority, militarism, genocide, the concentration camp, and the gas chamber. These are misgivings that any reasonable person might feel.

The problem, however, has to be faced as to what is going to be done with Germany. It must be abundantly clear, at least for the time being, that it is not possible to reach any agreement with Russia. Deadlock was reached in the two conferences of the foreign ministers held in Berlin in 1949 and 1954, and it would appear at the present time that the western powers are obliged to proceed without any agreement with Russia.

The proposal is to restore sovereignty to Germany and to authorize Germany to have a maximum armed force of 500,000 men. This force will be combined with the armed forces of the western countries. A limit is to be placed upon the war potential of western Germany and an agency is to be set up to supervise the limitation placed upon the size of the armed forces and the war potential. Hon. members will await with keen interest the explanation to be given for these developments by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who has done so much for the cause of peace and security in the free world.

Canada has continued its quest for peace through the United Nations. There has probably been no field in which it has been more difficult to reach agreement than in that of disarmament. Russia's intransigence is well known to all hon. members. However, a notable event took place last August when agreement was reached among Canada, the United Kingdom, France, the United States, and the Soviet union to co-sponsor a disarmament resolution in the general assembly of the United Nations. No small part of the credit for this achievement is due to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), in his capacity as vice-chairman of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations. He initiated the resolution and negotiated it through to its conclusion. The resolution, of course, did not solve any of the substantive problems of disarmament, but it did remove what appeared to be an immovable roadblock in the way of further negotiations and discussions on disarmament.

I would now like to make a brief reference to the riding which I represent, Toronto Trinity. There are many things I would like to tell hon. members about my riding but I will keep my remarks very brief in order to fit into the plan of abbreviating the proceedings at the opening of parliament.

The predominant feature of Trinity riding is the mixture of races and peoples living within its boundaries. Up to about 20 years ago the population was composed largely of British families, with a substantial Jewish population, but great changes have taken place in the last 20 years. The main causes for these changes were the upheavals caused by Germany and Russia. People have come from every country in Europe to escape the persecution and mass destruction of the Germans and the tyranny and enslavement of the Russians. They have also come to Trinity riding from some of the free countries of western Europe, hoping to find in Canada economic opportunities and security which they could not find in their own land.

[Mr. Carrick.]

Housing is a pressing problem for the people of Trinity riding. There are, I regret to say, slum conditions and overcrowding, and what this house does on the question of housing will be of vital importance to my constituents.

Full employment is also a matter of considerable importance. Many people in my riding have not been able to put money aside for a period of unemployment. Many of them are newcomers. Though there is a certain amount of seasonal unemployment, it appears to be aggravated to some extent by general conditions. Unemployment insurance has taken care of physical needs, but it is to be hoped that if a person is unemployed through no fault of his own and is unable to receive unemployment insurance, some means will be found to see that neither he nor his dependents are left destitute.

Immigration is also a matter of great concern to the people in my riding. Many have come from the darkness behind the iron curtain into the light in Canada. Others have come from overcrowded countries in Europe. These people are good Canadians with a profound love for Canada. They have not, however, forgotten their loved ones, relatives and friends in the countries of their origin, and their greatest hope is that some day these people may be allowed to come to Canada to breathe the air of freedom and hope.

As indicated in the speech from the throne, parliament will soon be grappling with the tangled problems of welfare benefits, old age pensions, and war pensions, all of which are of great concern to the people in my riding. In addition to the older folk in their own homes, there are three institutions in Toronto Trinity which house about 1,000 people, dependent entirely upon old age or war pensions. Every hon. member in this house is in favour of increasing these pensions if only a way can be found to do so, and the money somehow obtained.

It has been an enriching spiritual experience to represent Trinity riding. On the Sabbath one sees Roman Catholics, Jews and Protestants going to their own churches to worship God in their own way, seeking guidance to live better lives and bear the trials and burdens of the day. One sees men and women of different ethnic groups mingling on terms of tolerance and friendship. The newcomers to Canada are developing a great love for Canada and are making their contribution to those ideals of affection, understanding, and tolerance which inspire most Canadians.

At this juncture, Mr. Speaker, I would like to formally second the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc), but before concluding I would like to make a few remarks with reference to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). All history testifies to the profound influence individuals exercise over human affairs. When the history of the last few years has been written, it will record with gratitude the contribution of wisdom and foresight made to Canada by the Prime Minister. Whether he is at home or abroad in the countries of the world Canadians are proud that Canada has been able to produce a man like him. We value his Christian character, his courtesy, and his wisdom. We rejoice that he is with us in good health and good spirits. May the good Lord preserve him for many years to guide our deliberations.

On motion of Mr. Rowe the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Harris: I move that the house do now adjourn until Monday at 2.30 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.41 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 10, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

ACCESSION OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY TO NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table three copies in English and in French of the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed at Paris, October 23, 1954, and three copies in English and in French of the agreements relating to Germany concluded at Paris on October 23, 1954.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this protocol, I feel, is very important and I wonder if it would be possible to have it printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For protocol above referred to, see appendix, page 59.)

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

MEASURE TO REQUIRE EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to provide equal pay for equal work for women.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERNATIONAL RIVERS

PROVISION REQUIRING LICENCE FROM GOVERNMENT OF CANADA TO CONSTRUCT, OPERATE AND MAINTAIN ANY IMPROVEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This bill will provide that a licence from the government of Canada will be required by anyone who shall construct, operate or maintain any improvement in any river flowing from any place in Canada to any place outside Canada. The definition of the word "improvement" includes a dam, obstruction, canal, reservoir or any other work the purpose of which is to alter the natural flow or to interfere with, alter or affect the actual or potential use of an international river outside Canada.

The provisions of the act apply to the government of Canada, to the government of a province and to any private individual. The bill provides that all international river improvements heretofore or hereafter constructed are declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POWER, FLUIDS AND GAS

LICENSING CONTROL OVER EXPORTATION OF ELECTRIC POWER AND FLUIDS, AND IMPORTATION OF GAS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas.

Mr. Fulton: Explain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This bill revises and consolidates the present Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. It retains licensing control over the exportation of electric power and over the exportation, by pipe lines, of petroleum, natural gas and other fluids. It extends control to the importation of gas. Strict licensing provisions are maintained subject to suitable amendments limiting the revocation of licences to cases in which a licensee refuses or neglects to comply with the terms or conditions of the licence. The bill retains present export duties on exported power and removes the authority to impose similar export duties on petroleum and gas.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INCOME TAX EXEMPTION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Prime Minister of which I have given him notice. The question is as follows: Having regard to the widespread public interest in the negotiations between the dominion government and the province of Quebec in the matter of tax exemption, and to the fact that there was no reference made to it in the speech from the throne, is the Prime Minister prepared to make a statement on the subject?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. member for sending me notice of his question. I regret to have to say that I am not yet prepared to make a statement on the subject matter referred to in the question.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO RATES ON MOVEMENT THROUGH VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he make a statement now with respect to the rates on grain going through the port of Vancouver?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should prefer to take this question as notice and to make a statement at the next sitting.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

STATEMENT ON REPORTED NEAR TRAGEDY AT MOOSE JAW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What explanation does the minister have of the report that, in spite of the tragic accident at Moose Jaw last year, another near-tragedy should have occurred at the same place and under almost identical circumstances? May I ask what steps are being taken to deal with this matter?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, an investigation of the alleged near mid-air collision between an R.C.A.F. Harvard and a T.C.A. North Star in the vicinity of Moose Jaw on 6th January, to which the hon. member has just referred—and I wish to thank him for having given me notice of his question—has been completed by the Department of Transport with representatives of the R.C.A.F. and T.C.A. present, including the pilots of both the aircraft involved. This investigation shows the newspaper and radio reports to be grossly exaggerated and misleading.

The R.C.A.F. Harvard, captained by an experienced flying instructor with some 4,000 flying hours to his credit, was on a navigation training flight with a pupil pilot. The T.C.A. North Star, also with a very experienced captain, was on a scheduled flight from Winnipeg to Calgary. The weather was clear with bright moonlight and good visibility.

The course of the North Star was 250 degrees and that of the Harvard 288 degrees. The aircraft instruments showed both aircraft to be flying level; the North Star at 6,000 feet and the Harvard at 5,500 feet above sea level; with the speed of the North Star being almost twice that of the Harvard.

Thus, at the time of sighting one another the T.C.A. North Star was behind and overtaking the Harvard, with the Harvard slightly to the left ahead and at 500 feet lower altitude, their courses thus crossing on an angle of 38 degrees with a height separation of approximately 500 feet between them. These conditions were in conformity both with the authorized pre-flight plans of the two aircraft and with the air regulations which govern civil and military aircraft.

The navigation lights of both aircraft were flashing normally and the first pilot to sight the other aircraft was the T.C.A. pilot, who was in the overtaking position.

The Harvard captain very shortly thereafter sighted the lights of the other aircraft approaching from his right rear, at which time both pilots, as a precautionary measure, altered course away from the other aircraft and then resumed their original courses after the faster aircraft had passed. The T.C.A. pilot at no time found it necessary to carry out any violent manoeuvre; in fact his turn involved a bank of 35 degrees only and, so far as is known, disturbed none of the passengers. However, one passenger sighted the other aircraft through a window and apparently became unduly alarmed, which may be explained by the fact that it is more difficult to judge distances, angles and relative altitudes at night than in daylight.

In this instance the occurrence was not a near catastrophe, as much of the publicity concerning it would indicate. In fact, both pilots acted in conformity with the air regulations which are designed for such occurrences and which, in fact, proved their practicability in this instance.

The Harvard was crossing the airway along which the T.C.A. aircraft was flying, and existing regulations require height separations at intervals of 500 feet in such circumstances.

The T.C.A. aircraft, in altering course to the right and avoiding passing over or under the Harvard, complied with the air regulations.

It is of course essential that air regulations be maintained constantly up to date and adequate to keep pace with the rapid progress of aviation. To this end the responsible departments of government and the civil agencies concerned will continue to utilize the information obtained from this and all such incidents to determine what further improvements, if any, to air regulations may be required in the interests of safety.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question? Is 500 feet the distance laid down by international regulations or by our own regulations?

Mr. Marler: By our own regulations.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the minister consider 500 feet to be enough if the weather is not good?

Mr. Marler: I consider that 500 feet is quite adequate having regard to the conditions of visibility that were referred to in this instance.

Mr. Coldwell: Under that condition, but what about other conditions?

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO PRIVATE EXPERIMENTAL PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister advise the house whether the government has any plans for Canadian industry similar to those announced by the United States government in Washington yesterday in order to help private industry develop and operate experimental atomic power plants?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has been carrying out a plan similar to that announced in the United States. At the moment some six or eight private industries in Canada have been invited to submit proposals for a joint project of the type mentioned in the article, and it is expected that those proposals will have been submitted by early February. When they are received it is hoped that a joint operation can be carried out between the Chalk River establishment and the selected private firm.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

THEFT OF CHEQUES IN ROWLEY DISTRICT—INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he in a position to say whether the farmers of the Rowley district, whose wheat board cheques, according to a press dispatch, were stolen en route to their destination, will have new cheques issued to them in the near future?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In reply to this question, under date of January 7 the Canadian wheat board issued a press release announcing that certain cheques due producers at Rowley had not been received by the payees. The disappearance of the cheques is under investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The statement goes on to say that several of the cheques have been illegally cashed which would suggest that forgeries have taken place.

In circumstances such as these it is the practice to have the payees sign an affidavit that the cheques have not been received. The wheat board will undertake the necessary steps towards the replacement of the cheques as soon as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO CESSATION OF LAY-OFFS AND REINSTATEMENT OF THOSE ALREADY LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Can the minister give the assurance that we are at the end of lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways? Can he say how soon those laid off in recent months will be reinstated?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I am afraid I shall have to accept the question of the hon. member as notice and attempt to reply at a later date.

TRADE

VISIT OF CERTAIN MINISTERS TO WASHINGTON—UNITED STATES POLICY RE QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he in a position to say anything regarding the visit of three ministers of the government to Washington recently, and whether or not the United States government has given any indication that it intends to discontinue its apparent policy of applying quotas and embargoes against Canadian agricultural products?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Before the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is completed I hope to make a statement on Canadian trade policy which I think will contain the information my hon. friend is seeking. The visit to the United States concerned a number of matters. It would be difficult to answer the hon. member's question categorically, but I think the information will be forthcoming in the next two or three weeks.

SNAGBOAT "SAMSON"

REPLACEMENT FOLLOWING LOSS BY FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, notice of which I sent him earlier. Is the snagboat Samson, recently gutted by fire while in New Westminster harbour, fully covered by the fire losses replacement act?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): My understanding is that the Department of Public Works owns the snagboat referred to. If that department chooses to repair the boat or to replace it, I understand that, with the consent of the treasury board, funds can be used under the act mentioned by the hon. member.

CHEESE

IMPORTATION FROM NEW ZEALAND—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the minister plan to make any change in the regulations that now permit the importation of New Zealand cheese when there is a surplus of cheese and other dairy products in Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is no prohibition on the importing of cheese. There is a duty on cheese, and technically anyone can ship cheese into Canada who can do so over the duty. A verbal arrangement was made with New Zealand at a time when we were having difficulty exporting to the British market. New Zealand was asked not to ship cheese to this market. The circumstances under which the request was made have changed. New Zealand was pressing to be relieved from that verbal arrangement and there seemed to be no very good ground for insisting that it be continued. The shipment of cheese has been made in the ordinary course of business in the same way that anything else is exported to Canada. I suggest it is a mistake to say that we allowed the import. The normal laws of the land were allowed to function in this matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): In order that there will be no misunderstanding, I want it completely understood that I fully agree with what the Department of Trade and Commerce did.

Mr. Knowles: That is one for the record.

Mr. Argue: Who made the verbal agreement?

Mr. Rowe: We are glad to know that.

Mr. Cardiff: Was it not necessary to have a special permit to bring in cheese inasmuch as cheese was a commodity under price support?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): During the war years a permit was required to import cheese, for the reasons stated by my hon. friend, but at the moment cheese is not under price support so far as I am aware.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture of which I have not given him notice? In view of the assurance that he gave a moment ago that he agreed with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture if we have now abandoned the doctrine of cabinet responsibility and whether, when a minister makes a statement, we now have to ask if the other members of the cabinet agree with it?

Mr. Gardiner: I was merely drawing attention to the fact that the hon. member who asked the question did not ask it of the right minister. I did not know exactly what might have been in his mind so I thought it was necessary to say what I did.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUEEN MARY HOSPITAL, MONTREAL—PRESENT EMPLOYMENT OF FORMER DIRECTOR OF NURSING

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address to the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question of which I have given him notice.

Has Miss Henderson, formerly superintendent of nurses at the veterans hospital, Queen Mary road, Montreal, been reappointed by the department? If so, where, in what capacity and at what salary?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Miss Henderson, to whom the hon. member has been referring, has never ceased to be employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs. At the present time, she is superintendent of nurses at the Rideau health and occupational centre where she receives the salary already set for that position by the civil service commission.

Mr. Dufresne: It is definitely paying too much for racial discrimination.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RESIGNATION OF DR. L. B. THOMSON AS DIRECTOR OF P.F.R.A.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the attempted resignation of Dr. L. B. Thomson as director of P.F.R.A. Has there been any change in the precedents heretofore existent whereby civil servants are not allowed to offer tentative resignations to take place only in the event of an uncertain political event turning out in favour of the applicant?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In view of the many qualifications of the hon. member's question, I should like to read it in Hansard before I make an answer.

Mr. Rowe: I do not blame him.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the deeply regretted absence of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) I find it my responsibility today to speak on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. I feel that I speak on their behalf when I congratulate the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) on their first speeches in this house. They were both good speeches and I know that each hon. member was a credit to himself and to his constituents.

They were cautious and careful speeches, and rather complimentary to the government that they support. We certainly wish for them many years of good health and happiness, and a useful career in the Canadian House of Commons.

As has been our time-honoured custom, the speech from the throne was prepared by the advisers of the crown, and this particular one was certainly neatly written. It is conspicuous in many respects, but it is more conspicuous for what is not contained in it than for what is in it. In fact, it is as peaceful as a New Year's greeting, even though conditions throughout the country are not very good. The generalities that do glitter chiefly in the speech from the throne concern the things that were proposed by the members of the opposition on different occasions. The darker spots of our national economy seem to be submerged in a long list of local community projects which we felt should have been accomplished long ago.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is to attend the commonwealth conference towards the end of this month. As members of the opposition, I am sure we are all very glad to find that at last the government is showing some concern at least about such a commonwealth conference, and that in accepting the invitation the Prime Minister is not sending some of his junior cabinet ministers but is going himself. This reminds me that some five years ago I did propose we should have a commonwealth conference, and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) supported that motion. I believe that on another occasion he moved a similar motion. Every year since that time members of the opposition have pressed the government for such a conference, even when members of the cabinet were throwing gibes across the floor as though there was no danger to the country.

I know the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) can recall the witty gibes he used to throw at me, as though there was nothing happening to our markets. On one occasion he said our markets were better than ever, and by 1952 we would be in a stronger position in the British market than we ever had been in history. On different occasions we warned the government that the market was slipping away. We warned them of the danger, Mr. Speaker, when the United Kingdom was negotiating contracts with foreign producers. No heed was taken of our warning. It is said that history repeats itself. I have been in this house long enough to see the party that sits to your right lose the British market on two occasions. Now they have lost it again. I am glad that the Prime Minister at last has said, "I will take hold of this myself; these other boys are not doing very well".

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Here is hoping he can do better.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, the hon. member for Peterborough can say that, but I am afraid his hopes are a little bit late. It is extremely difficult to have much influence at a conference in which you have not taken much interest before.

We wish him good luck, Mr. Speaker. I hope he has a safe voyage, and I hope he has good luck. He is an influential man in Canada, and I hope he is over there as well. Even some of his own followers agree with that. There are matters, I feel, to be considered at this coming conference in connection with the expansion of our trade, not only the sale of our wheat but other farm products as well. In fact, the sale of our other farm products has practically disappeared. We talk about our great advancement. We were told by these travelling salesmen, who have been going all over the world at great expense, that there was no danger of losing that market. We are selling the United Kingdom less mixed farm products than we did 40 years ago; in fact, we are selling practically none. The convertibility of exchange, and other subjects, are vital not only to the Canadian farmer but also to producers generally in Canada.

It seems to me it is about time that these gentlemen who have been going all over the world looking for markets, looked a little more east and west, and realized that our most favourable trade balances throughout the years have come from our trade with the United Kingdom. We would be very much interested, therefore, in knowing what the agenda of this conference is going to be. It seems to me almost contrary to our parliamentary practice to have an important conference such as this coming along when no one in the house really knows the subjects with which the conference is going to deal. In fact, I wonder if the Prime Minister himself knows. I hope that if he does he will let us know something about the agenda before the event is over.

In any event, I do believe that the people of this country expect the Prime Minister of the senior dominion of this great partnership, the British commonwealth, to be the leading influence in strengthening our British relationship and to do everything he can to restore the markets that have been lost under his party's government.

I am sure my colleague the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) will have read the speech from the throne with a little chuckle to himself. He will feel he has been useful here, and he will be glad that at last the government has heeded his plea on behalf of the war veterans, as indicated in the speech. I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) will be happy, because on so many occasions I have heard him trying to blast out that Ripple Rock near Vancouver. I know he will be glad to learn the government has listened to him. No doubt the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) will be disappointed because, after pleading for that Saskatchewan dam for some ten years, he has to reconcile himself to the fact that it will be brought up at the next election campaign.

The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) will be happy, too, when he learns from the speech from the throne that steady progress is being made towards the inauguration of the new ferry service, and that after all his pressure this service is going to be established between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Nova Scotia this summer. These are some of the spots that glitter a little bit.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) will also be happy to observe from the speech from the throne that their sustained pressure has brought some results and that the Unemployment Insurance Act is to be amended by way of increasing the supplementary benefits during the winter months, when it is expected unemployment will be worse than it is at present. On behalf of my colleagues in the official opposition, I thank the government for at long last responding to some of these pressures in connection with these local and municipal problems.

However, the dark realities and the dangerous trends that are stalking before the people of this dominion are all carefully ignored and recklessly disregarded in the speech from the throne. Why, Mr. Speaker, it does not show a fair picture of Canadian conditions at all. Can it be that this government has grown so strong that they think opposition is unnecessary, so strong that they think opposition has very little place in the present trend of events? The government has grown so powerful, so large, so gigantic that it has almost fallen asleep with its own weight.

We see very little in this speech from the throne. Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), who helped to prepare it, now laughs at it. This does not present the picture in Canada at all. To get the true picture one must read editorials, talk to men who are connected with labour, talk to the farmer, talk to the housewives. Let them talk to the housewife who says "Jack is out of work"—and the government holds a mortgage for the next 20 years during which they have to pay for the roof over their heads.

One has only to talk to the labour men throughout the country who stand in need of help because they have lost their jobs and who see no hope of solution. They see no proposal made by this government in any shape or form for their relief.

These are realities that hurt. These are realities that are familiar to the men and women who have little children to care for, men and women who have girls and boys of university age, who want to maintain our high standard of living and who do not want to take their children out of universities merely because they have lost their jobs.

No, they do not want that. Despite the lip service we have heard for such a long time about the great problem of national unity, we see nothing in the speech from the throne—no mention or reference whatever—to the long-awaited dominion-provincial conference. The Prime Minister has said that he will study the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). Well, he has been studying it so long that everybody is wondering whether or not his silence is golden.

There is no mention in the speech from the throne of the increasing unemployment problem. There seems to be no concern whatever about our decreasing export trade. There seems to be no worry at all about the increase in our cost of government and at the same time the decrease in our national revenue. Evidently there is no desire even to study the decline in the markets for farm products and the high cost of production.

On the other hand we are told in this speech from the throne that our national economy is in a very healthy condition. Indeed it is now so healthy that it says it is in a very healthy condition. Well, Mr. Speaker, when His Excellency the Governor General read that he must almost have choked—because I am sure His Excellency reads the newspapers. He must have been greatly surprised when he read in the speech from the throne that unemployment is only regional and seasonal. No wonder the Minister of Finance laughs at that, Mr. Speaker.

Can he rise in his place in this House of Commons and tell me one region in Canada where today there is not serious unemployment? Can any of these cabinet giants rise and tell me now that in his own district there is not serious unemployment? Can any of them rise and tell me that it has not increased?

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Can any of them rise?

Mr. Rowe: I had not thought of that. They do not seem to rise to the occasion when these emergencies develop. But occasionally they rise when everything is bright and cheerful.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are told in one paragraph of the speech from the throne that our national economy is in a healthy condition, and that we have a little unsold wheat. We are told the reason our national revenue is not as high as it was is due to the fact that our wheat crop this year has not been as good. Well, Mr. Speaker, they have not sold last year's wheat—and they have even a large quantity of the wheat harvested the year before. Yet we are told that the reason for the little slump is that we had a poor wheat crop this year. If we had had a good crop they would not know what to do with it, because they have not sold even the good crop we had last year.

Yes, we are told that the unemployment is seasonal and regional. Yet, according to the figures issued by the unemployment commission—to say nothing of the thousands not recorded and the further thousands who are on part-time work, as well as the thousands who will be let out within the next few months, if there is anything to this seasonal feature—there are 40,000 more unemployed today than there were at this time last year. Yes, there are 40,000 more. And if the trend continues even at the same rate as last year—and there is no one who will rise and say that it will not do so—we can anticipate keenly that before 60 days shall have passed 600,000 people in this young country will be unemployed—and perhaps even more than that.

But, no, Mr. Speaker. This is only seasonal; this is only regional. It is just a passing phase, like a shadow in the night. Well, a great friend of this most important element in Canadian society—the workingmen—and a keen student of their problems, Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I should say president of the Canadian Congress of Labour—I am glad my hon. friend knows the difference—has made this statement:

> In domestic affairs, one of the most disturbing factors as we enter the new year is the army of unemployed workers. A slight improvement in employment took place during the summer months, but the situation is again becoming extremely serious, and there is little, if any, prospect of adequate action by various levels of government to bring about an improvement.

Indeed, had these cautious advisers of the crown included that paragraph in the speech from the throne, it would at least have given a touch of reality to the problem itself. Instead we are told by the speech from the throne that it is only regional and seasonal. There is little hope for a sound solution to a problem which the government seems to refuse to see.

I do not know how the speech from the throne is prepared—or at least how recent speeches have been prepared. But it might be well in future, if those who prepare it are so weary as to omit these things, that they should call in some others to give some assistance. Because, really, this speech from the throne is a reflection upon the House of Commons when, at a time like this, the government brings down a document that does not mention these real and serious problems.

Instead of this we are told that everything will be all right. We of the opposition believe, of course, that these more or less local projects proposed for construction this year are well merited. In fact, Mr. Speaker, all of them should have been done before, and we have told the government so, in the House of Commons, on repeated occasions.

However, we do not believe that the Cape Breton causeway or the North Sydney-Port aux Basques ferry, or the Prince Edward Island ferry, or the removal of Ripple Rock, or the development of some historic sites or the placing of a few monuments throughout Canada will solve permanently this unemployment problem. We do not believe that.

No, Mr. Speaker. But the government dare not touch the issue that is staring them in the face. And there are underlying economic reasons for this situation that they refuse to admit. There are relief policies that they seem to be afraid to adopt.

In this day and age, with unprecedented world advancement, Canada's economic progress should not falter at a time like this. We are in the midst of great world advancement. Despite the times and the international conditions which may threaten our security, we must realize that we stand geographically in the centre of that advancement.

Look, Mr. Speaker, at the United Kingdom. I will venture to say that some of my friends to the right, when they hesitated about having conferences with her a few years ago, thought that she had gone broke. But look at the way she is coming back. Look at what is happening in West Germany and in Europe. Look at what is happening to the great republic to the south of us whose population has increased in a time of great prosperity in the last 15 years more than the total population of Canada. Why should we, a young country, falter in advancement at this time? We have no reason for long-term pessimism. When we point out these problems do not let any little squeaky voice from the back benches tell us it is blue ruin. It is blue ruin when you do not face realities whether in your own affairs or in public affairs. When we point out these things we are not preaching blue ruin.

No one within sound of my voice wants a depression in this country. Heaven knows we have been through that problem before. We want to avoid a depression. We do not want a depression in the midst of plenty. We do not want unemployment in a time of world advancement. It is bad enough to have it at a time of world depression, as we had some years ago. Oh, you like to harp on and talk about the 1930's. No one was more responsible for that than those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker. As they left office in 1930 they left every elevator full of unsold wheat, and every lumber yard that had not been burned almost full of unsold lumber.

That condition was brought about through a lack of policy in those days, Mr. Speaker, and it is being brought about through a lack of policy today. We had a British market in 1925. In 1921 we sold 250 million pounds of bacon and 77 million pounds of meat to Great Britain. What do we sell her now? Now we are importing cheese from New Zealand. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) says: "Me too." I say: "Yes, yes."

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who is a shrewd businessman, is too busy to understand agricultural problems, but he must have more encouragement. All he gets from the Minister of Agriculture is: "Me too." That is all right.

Indeed, the richness, vastness, and variety of our potential resources justify our keen national pride and betoken a long-term economic greatness that could well exceed our most optimistic dreams. This country must go ahead; this country has gone ahead. This country will go ahead in spite of the weakness of the policies of the present government. However, we must march and move with the changing times through which we pass.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, conditions change swiftly as the years pass. When I entered this house some few years ago 40 per cent of Canadians worked and toiled in agriculture in Canada. Some 20 per cent worked in industry. Today about 40 per cent are dependent upon industry and about 15 per cent or 16 per cent are employed in agriculture. The revolution of agriculture has advanced all the way along. Who believes that we can put the millions of people that we need in this country and the boys and girls now growing up, the millions that want to come from Europe whose brothers and sisters have made good citizens of Canada, in agriculture? Still we have that antiquated policy that in order to get into this country the individual must be able to farm. Because of government policy there is nothing else to do and there is not much to do on the farms today, because of changing conditions.

During the war and defence boom years, when our resources and industries were needed so vitally, when every bit of energy we could produce was needed and every factory was called upon, with even frame buildings put up for the manufacture of goods, this government took great credit for our expanding economy, full employment and consequent prosperity. Now they write a speech from the throne that does not mention these things. Some $14 billion was poured into the European economy by the United States of America, and Canada under the Marshall plan lent $1¼ billion to enable them to buy our products. That speaks well for the initiative, enterprise and basic strength of this vast and rich young country. The following year, on that account, I believe we sold $650 million worth of our products, much of it agricultural products. The money seems to be running out. Last year we sold just $152 million worth on that account.

In our over-all trade situation conditions have also changed swiftly. We pray and dream of that long-term future when we shall have international good will, when we shall have peace and quiet underlying normal prosperity and progress. Hope springs eternal, of course. As individual freedom will always reign in this land, no other people have more reason to look forward to such an age. Every period of a hot or cold war or hot or cold peace brings new challenges to our initiative and enterprise. Indeed, if we are to be ready for prosperity without either a hot or a cold war boom we must study our national plans to meet that challenge.

The youngest among us cannot recall and the oldest of us are apt to forget when we had normal prosperity and normal progress. For almost half a century no such state of affairs has been our fortune. In less than half a century we have endured two gigantic wars. In that time we have been involved in two world conflicts as well as spending more energy, money, production and all it takes, to prevent a third world war, than was spent in the other two. Under those conditions we have not had business as usual, and as we look forward to that better day of normal peace and business as usual it becomes necessary, especially for the older who forget or for the younger who do not see, to glance back a little bit and find a precedent for policies that may be required to promote the prosperity and progress without which that longed-for peace and prosperity may be pretty cold. For that challenge we must be prepared, Mr. Speaker.

Since the birth of this young nation only two political parties have been so challenged. Others have promised but only the traditional Liberal party, which now governs this country, and we of the Conservative party, who sit to your left, have been called upon to perform. Many others have promised. We have shared, in our plans, policies and contributions, in the great development of this young country. Despite the fact there is a difference in our policies, there has been very little if any difference in our sincerity of purpose even if there is that clear and basic distinction between our background and outlook in our political faith.

As the horizon of normal times comes closer to us, we observe the need of a sound and straightforward approach to our fiscal and taxation problems. Our leader has consistently emphasized the soundness of our traditional fiscal policy to encourage the development of more of our resources within our own country. He has also urged for a dominion-provincial conference to study our whole taxation field. I am amazed that after all that we have heard about national unity, after all we have heard about that problem and the warnings that we could expect a conference sooner than formerly expected, and after all the pressure that has been put on from this side of the house, nothing seems to have been done. We heard nothing about that in the speech from the throne, and I hope the Prime Minister will tell us what he intends to do in that regard.

When I read the speech from the throne I looked in vain for signs of the old slogan of national unity. It has been used for over a quarter of a century in this country during every election campaign. I cannot help wondering where that dusty old slogan has been pigeonholed for the last few years. We do not hear so much about it now.

As we face the future we must pay close attention to the relationship between trade and employment. In the first eight months of this year our export trade alone fell by $235 million, and our unfavourable trade balance stands at over $200 million, while in 1952 the favourable trade balance was $325 million. This difference of over half a billion dollars is of challenging concern, for during the same period 300,000 heads of families lost their jobs in Canada. This situation is not due to any regional condition or seasonal weather. It has developed like Topsy—"it just growed".

All this time the government sit thinking of the good luck they have had for so long and believing they do not need to do anything about it. With our great resources we have enjoyed a period of prosperity in war and in defence boom years, but as we return to more normal trading conditions, Canada needs, if ever she did, a sound fiscal policy.

This government did not require any basic fiscal or trading policies during the years to which I have referred, and it is perhaps fortunate that they did not need such policies because they did not have any. Those who sit on that side of the house, Mr. Speaker, have been fair weather politicians since confederation, and if they ever had any kind of fiscal policy it lasted only for a very short time for they have changed it almost every ten years since confederation.

With the ever-increasing competition we face in world markets, a sound fiscal policy is required more than ever. Last year we imported more goods made by labouring men in foreign countries than Canada produced altogether in 1939. If even these glaring facts do not shock the complacency of a government such as we have today, then there is little wonder that the unemployed worry and look to the future with fear and uncertainty.

I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) as he assumes his new task. He faces tremendous responsibilities. I hope that as these economic problems await solution, and more appear, the minister will be able to give us more distinctive leadership in financial policy than he gave us during his tenure in the department of immigration.

We cannot afford to continue a policy of levying taxes such as are unknown to our foreign competitors. If we are going to keep our factories operating and our people employed it is important that we do not—

An hon. Member: We are now taxed out of employment.

Mr. Rowe: Exactly. I am glad the minister feels, as he recently stated, that taxes are too high. We have been trying to tell the government that for the past five years and I am glad that they are at last beginning to show interest. When people find themselves up against it and things are getting tough they sometimes look around to others for help. I am glad the minister is thinking along these lines. However, I am not sure what he is going to do about it because I observe that he plans to spend $184 million more this year while revenues have fallen by almost $100 million. We are alarmed by the fact that the government have stinted expenditure on defence by an estimated $150 million this year. The minister looks surprised. Perhaps he did not know. Perhaps it is not that much, or perhaps it is more. However, I am trying to be as conservative as I can in these figures. I think it is substantially more than that, but I do not want to exaggerate and I will give them the benefit of the doubt because there is a lot of doubt regarding this government all across the country.

I believe that you can levy taxes until you kill the source of taxation. No one should know that better than the present government, because they had that experience in regard to the tobacco tax two or three years ago. We have had a haphazard policy on fiscal matters and on taxation. I say haphazard advisedly because even today we see 2,500,000 pounds of cheese coming into this country while the farmers of Ontario have 9,000,000 pounds, and they are subsidizing themselves to try to get rid of it. Our taxation and fiscal policies are obviously haphazard when the government imposes a 15 per cent excise tax on tires for trucks to carry these products which are selling at 20 to 40 per cent less than two years ago, while golf balls and jewel cases go tax-free. Perhaps if that policy is continued no one will be able to buy jewel cases except cabinet ministers. These things may not mean much to them but they mean a lot to the farmer who wonders how he is going to meet his obligations, and the worker who wonders why he is losing his job.

The Canadian worker sees electrical, steel and textile products coming in from countries such as Japan while the plants in which his father and grandfather worked are closing down. Then he comes home and asks "Why did I vote Liberal?" We are bringing into this country products made by men who receive less per month than our men demand and should have per week. We boast about our standard of living—

An hon. Member: That is the trouble.

Mr. Rowe: You do not say that on the hustings and only whisper it in parliament. Why are our men unemployed? It is not seasonal; it is not the hot summer sun, or the wet spring rain, or heavy snowdrifts. It is the illogical tariff and fiscal policies introduced by this government, and the haphazard gunshot prescription offered by this government. It is not good enough to whisper in parliament that our workers are getting too much in wages. It is not good enough to tell industrial workers to go out and get another job. It is not good enough to tell company executives to smarten up and modernize their methods, buy new machinery, and get up to date.

The textile industry has spent $400 million during the last five or ten years in modernizing their plants.

Industry generally in Canada has put $2 billion into the modernization and improvement of their plants in order to meet the very competition to which I have referred, so that they can give these men pensions, health insurance, health benefits, hospitalization and other cares and more wages than any other labour men in the world get except those in the United States of America. The men too wonder how that can be maintained. If we have a small market in Canada with only 15 million people, they wonder if we can maintain this standard of living and employ the new people that should be coming into Canada now; but they are not coming in because we have a negative immigration policy that bounces around like a cork just whatever way the fiscal uncertainty goes; and there is so much uncertainty that there is no need of an immigration policy when you have no fiscal policy.

No, Mr. Speaker, you cannot do that; you cannot employ these people if you are going to import into Canada from the mass production in the United States more refrigerators than are made in Canada altogether. You cannot cut a little market in two and keep in competition with this mass production in the United States. You cannot keep your textile plants running and humming unless you face the issue. We have dodged it, Mr. Speaker. I say again that you do not need any fiscal or trade policy when you have the money rolling in as it has been rolling in when you have a hot or cold war and are preparing to prevent another war. Again I say that the youngest in this house have never experienced a trade policy and the oldest in the house may forget when there was one. Some of the older gentlemen were not here then. Many of you have come here when you did not need a trade policy at all. Again I say if you had needed one, you would have to search a long way through the Liberal campaign books to know which one to pick. The fact that you have not used one for a long time is the reason that you are satisfied to continue without one.

Mr. Speaker, as one who has had some experience in industry may I say that I am confident that we have excellent plants and excellent machinery. We have some of the best business and industrial executives in the world. As one who knows a little bit about business let me say this. Having had some responsibility in business for some 15 years or more, I am sure that there is one plant that needs overhauling, new machinery and new executives, namely the present cabinet here in Ottawa. We need a new fiscal machine and we need a new tax calculator. Even though the one we have is new, he belongs to the same old pattern. The farmers of Canada will then have more confidence. They will not have, as the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cardiff) has mentioned, 2,500,000 pounds of cheese dumped on their market overnight. The industrial worker will then have some confidence that his job may be there for more than a few months. He will not expect that the job that he and two or three generations of his family have enjoyed will be closed to him because of the cheap products that come in from foreign countries.

During recent years, Mr. Speaker, we in the opposition have been hoping against hope with regard to what might come forth from the famous GATT. We were hoping that these conferences might bring forth some changes that might stimulate our industrial and national growth. Here in this country there are no signs of it yet. The members of the government are the greatest travelling salesmen that we have had in this country since confederation.

Mr. Fulton: The greatest travellers.

Mr. Rowe: Someone says "travellers". I do not think that is quite fair. They have not had a sales policy but they want to be salesmen. I believe they are sincere in their efforts to try to sell but they have no direction and no policy. They are not just sure how they can proceed, but they have tried. They have travelled great distances. I have often wondered about their safety as they flew through the air across the country. In the long trips they have taken I have hoped nothing might happen to them. Especially do I hope that nothing will happen to the Prime Minister in his trip overseas, because if they lose him they have lost all. They expect to spend about $5 million more in travelling this year. In fact, they are going to spend about $60 million going here and there all over the world. You never know where a cabinet minister is going to turn up.

Mr. Harris: Surely the hon. member does not mean that we are going to spend $60 million on travelling.

Mr. Rowe: On travelling and replacement of the representatives you now have, changing from one place to another, buying new residences for them, new furniture, carpets and so forth. You are going to spend about $60 million on that type of salesmanship.

One of the troubles was that they entered the GATT conferences without any policy. They were poorly prepared. The only thing they had to say to the 31 leading trading nations of the world was that we are the freest traders in the world, that we have the lowest tariff. They boasted about that. From these final big league trade series, these famous commercial globe trotters returned with nothing but a diploma which represented the world's grand championship in free trade. While they did that and while they were achieving that, everybody else went to the conference with higher tariffs. Just imagine anybody who has played poker—and nobody on this side has had time to do so—entering the game with the cards stacked against him like that. We must be the most hopeful party that has ever been in the opposition when we ever had any hope that you would bring back from GATT much more than you have brought back. You are going back again.

While you were achieving this rather strange distinction, thousands and thousands of our people—almost half a million—have lost their jobs in Canada. Mr. Speaker, if I had the responsibility again of running a company, I would not hire any of these salesmen.

The present fiscal uncertainty and instability in this country is only in keeping with the historical record of the party that is now in power. I may be pardoned for looking back a little bit because, as I have mentioned, it is only by looking back beyond the days when we have had hot and cold wars and were preparing for others that we can find the period where we had to apply hard, cold logic to the development of this country. I have no apologies to make when I say that the party I represent today had as much to do with the greatest era of development that we have had in this country and with the sound basis for development as had the party to your right, Mr. Speaker, despite their sincerity of purpose.

The Liberal party has had some great men in the past. In fact there were many who were greater than some of you are now. In 1891 your party fought more or less a rear-guard action for commercial union with the United States of America. But later, in 1907, that great statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier—and he must have been great because almost every Conservative I knew had great respect for him—had something to say. I remember reading something he said in 1907. He had far more interest evidently, as the record shows, in 1898 and other times in the United Kingdom market than this government has shown. He said in 1907, "There will be no more pilgrimages to Washington". He said that we would now look east and west and would develop in the United Kingdom the greatest market for our agricultural products that we have in the world. Therefore it is apparent that, although most policies of trading with the United Kingdom have come from this side of the house, not all were initiated by our party.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, recently we have observed another pilgrimage in great haste to Washington of these three wise men from the cabinet who returned last week empty-handed. They brought home nothing except the uncertainty they took away with them.

Mr. Cardiff: They had a good trip.

Mr. Rowe: That would not be much of a trip for these gentlemen. They have been spoiled. It might have been interesting for farmers like you and me. In 1911 that same party stood for reciprocity with the United States of America. They were going to go all the way, up or down, every way the United States went. There must have been a change even in the mind of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I think he would have been more stable if there had not been so many uncertain fellows around him.

I remember the history of 1921 and 1925, what was said about this great market in the United States, how the Fordney-McCumber tariff and the Hawley-Smoot tariff closed our markets overnight, and how these Liberals, who had looked so happy, looked sadder than they have in twenty years. They had boasted about how trade would be built up and their boasts were shattered like a deck of cards, and we had more unsold cattle than at any previous time before 1930.

Then we come to 1930. They changed their policy again. Some hon. members will remember that they proposed a countervailing fiscal policy. Certainly the farmers and even the smartest executives would not know what was going to take place under it unless they went to Washington. If a certain duty went up in Washington it went up here. If it went down in Washington it went down in Ottawa—a countervailing policy that would countervail and just do that. So they transferred their fiscal policy making to Washington at that time.

Today, Mr. Speaker, one need not wonder. Those of the younger group to whom I have referred know that the government has not needed a sound fiscal policy in their lifetime. The government has been riding the gravy train of world prosperity brought on by the necessities of the wartime boom. It is not surprising that they have not needed to practise sound fiscal policy. They had none in any event. You can understand why we have no definite fiscal policy at Ottawa today and why we are shuttling back and forth accepting a fiscal policy drafted in Geneva and at the same time risking it being amended in Washington.

Today we find that two-thirds of all our trade is with the United States of America and only one-third with the rest of the world. Stop and think of it, Mr. Speaker. No other important trading nation in the world has ever allowed itself to get into that kind of position. Never has any important trading nation been so dependent on another nation as we are on the United States of America. Why, Mr. Speaker, it should even alarm this government, smug and complacent as it is. How can we dare risk that situation? It is just the reverse of what it was 20 years ago. Then we sold about one-third to the United States of America and two-thirds to the rest of the world.

I remember that there was another change in policy. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) will remember this too. We had the situation brought about by the Fordney-McCumber tariff. We were not sure what we should do but we knew we must not provoke the United States of America. Surely it is no provocation to tell them that we are minding our own business. Surely it is no provocation to tell them that unless our dairy products are admitted to their country we will not bring in substitutes for the dairy industry from there.

Surely we could risk having a bold, common-sense and logical approach to the situation when we are now buying from the United States every day the sun rises almost $2 million more than we are selling to them. We had an unfavourable trade balance last year of at least $500 million and it will be the same this year. Yet as far as the United Kingdom market is concerned, even though the government has lost that market for many of our important products, we are still selling the United Kingdom market $200 million more than we are buying from them. Surely it is worth considering.

We of the official opposition believe that we should have some reduction in taxation. We believe we should have more taxpayers and a lower rate of taxation. We believe that is possible. We have every hope for the prosperity of this dominion in the long-term pull. No one can think of the greatness of this young country without visualizing employment not only for those who are idle today but for hundreds, thousands and millions more who should come to this country.

Why, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, your own great esteemed leader, anticipated that by 1930 we would have far more people than we have today, and he expected that by 1950 we would have 50 million. The late Sir John A. Macdonald anticipated the same thing but neither of them expected that there would be a government that would so disguise the country's real problems. They did not expect that there would be a speech from the throne which would hide the real problems of the country. I know that there are difficult problems. The improvement in unemployment insurance benefits will help a little bit. The causeway down east will also help a little bit. A few fellows will have to put up a few monuments and grade a few historical sites in Canada, and I hope you pay them well.

Even the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway will provide some employment, but with the vast machines of today it is not a big factor. You can dip into the treasury and have deficits where you used to have surpluses. You used to have cyclical budgeting but they will now be circle budgets because you are going to have deficits instead of surpluses. You can dig into the treasury and spend some money for temporary relief. It is just like giving a baby cough medicine and leaving the window up. Why, Mr. Speaker, you have not even touched the edge of the problem. You are only giving panaceas. You are only giving a little medicine for the disease your lack of policy has created. These are some of the problems that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), whose absence I regret, and in fact I expect right at this moment the whole house regrets —I know my own party does—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friends laugh, but that is true. I say that because we happen to be so fortunate in having as our parliamentary leader one of the most outstanding and colourful parliamentarians that this country has known. I regret his absence greatly because he could go into these problems much more deeply than I can. When he is fit he has unbounded energy, and his untiring industry has fitted him for the task. He has a background of experience in government, both municipal and provincial, and now in the opposition as well. In fact, one can learn about as much sitting over here and watching the government weaknesses as by performing the functions of government. We miss his experience, ability and energy today. I thank the Prime Minister again for his kind words in this regard, and I know we all hope he will soon return.

These are some of the reasons why, Mr. Speaker, and he would have named many more, last fall he thought we should have had a session of parliament. When he called upon the government to consider convening a session of parliament, I am sure he did not expect that unemployment would be called regional and only seasonal, or that there would be no constructive policy towards the solution of the problem. He did not expect that now, after he had urged the calling of a dominion-provincial conference for so long in order to find a better and more clearly defined division of taxation between federal, provincial and municipal governments, and after hearing the Prime Minister say, even though he did not think there was any need for one during the recess but we might have one sooner than we expect, today the Prime Minister would say he will tell us whether or not he has changed his mind again.

However, I do wish to say that, despite these signs of declining export markets, despite our increasing unemployment, which I hope can be recovered, our decreasing national revenue and our increasing expenditures, I have absolute confidence that with a sound fiscal and taxation policy and the development of our resources in our own country, we shall continue to go forward. By that I do not mean, Mr. Speaker, that all the resources we have must be developed here. We have iron ore that the United States will need in far more volume than she does now, and probably for the next quarter of a century. We have an abundance of raw products to sell.

We would be glad to sell our wheat, whether it is in the form of flour or pancakes. We want to sell it. There are no raw products, of which we have more than we need right now, that we in this party would not be prepared to sell. This should not be misrepresented by those who go out on the highways and byways as meaning that we are a party that believes every pound of our raw resources should be developed in Canada; that has never been our policy, Mr. Speaker. We believe in the development of our resources in this country to give employment to our own people. It is a matter of equalizing conditions, and there are many ways by which that can be brought about.

Our whole taxation structure needs reorganization. The government talks about lowering the costs of industry, and we might do that by lowering the cost of government. You can talk about being competitive, getting out and finding business, but you can help the manufacturer to be more competitive by reducing some of these taxes. You can help the labourer to hold his job, if you look carefully at what is happening. I do believe, Mr. Speaker, that this government and the hon. members who sit to your right who are responsible for the management of our affairs today, in their private thinking and after careful consideration, will look deeper into these matters than the speech from the throne would indicate they have done.

Again I say that we have the potentialities here; we have the resources to create great opportunities for thousands of young Canadians as yet unborn as well as the millions of people who may come here from other lands. We need a fiscal policy that is sound and a taxation policy that will be fair to our different classes. We have to give consideration to the equalization of conditions between us and some of these foreign countries that are producing these cheap products. We should equalize conditions so that the lot of the Canadian farmer will be better. When our population increases as it should increase, then our home market will be worth something to the farmer and to the manufacturer. The mass production to the south should not be allowed to interfere with the market to the degree it has in some cases.

I have no brief for any particular class. Basically, I am a farmer; I believe that the farmers' interests are best served by a sound fiscal policy that will give us a healthy industry and develop our home markets for the farmer. An industrial development will give us thousands more of homes to buy our products. Then, as the units get cheaper we may be able to compete in the markets of the world.

I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), that the following be added to the address:

We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take or to recommend the necessary measures:

(a) to retain and expand Canada's markets abroad for our production, particularly of wheat and other products;

(b) to solve the urgent problem of unemployment;

(c) to relieve Canadian taxpayers from the burden of excessive taxation and thereby enable Canadian producers to lower their cost of production and to meet increasing competition;

(d) to eliminate waste and extravagance in government and improve its efficiency;

(e) to facilitate and encourage the processing of our natural resources in Canada, and thereby increase opportunities and employment for Canadians;

(f) in co-operation with the provinces to develop an effective contributory plan which will assure that every Canadian will have adequate hospital and medical services.

Mr. Speaker: At this time I should like to say that I am somewhat impressed by the length of the amendment. I say this in all seriousness. Hon. members will recall that last year, I think when there was an amendment before the house for the Speaker to leave the chair and the house to go into committee of ways and means, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) had moved an amendment which was also very lengthy. One could argue that there are some paragraphs in the amendment for which one might want to vote, and there are others against which one might want to vote. This becomes what we call a complicated amendment.

Hon. members may wish to have the subjects segregated in order to have a clear-cut expression of the will of the house.

It will be recalled that in the past the vote of thanks on the address was a reply to each paragraph in the speech from the throne. We did away with that a long time ago, and the motion in reply is now only a vote of thanks and the regrets added are usually rather brief.

I say this at the present time to give hon. members an opportunity to consider what I have said. For my part, I shall study the amendment; but I think it might be well for the mover to consider shortening his amendment, for the reasons I have mentioned.

Then there is another reason which I think the hon. member will want to know about, and it is this: If throughout this session on occasions with a view to the airing of grievances he wishes to move amendments to the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair to go into committee of supply, he will be blocked by many of the paragraphs contained in this long amendment. Because the house will have given its judgment; and therefore he will not be able to bring forward many of the important subjects he might wish to discuss later at great length.

Now, having said this, I shall consider the amendment, and I would like my colleagues to do likewise.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the amendment just placed before the house and before dealing with the subject matter of the speech to which we have just listened with keen interest and attention I should like, as did the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in response to the speech from the throne. I think no one will question or will differ from the Acting Leader of the Opposition's appreciation of the interesting speeches made by those two new members, nor in his forecast that it enables us to expect much from them of interest to the house and of value to our parliamentary institutions in their participation in the activities of parliament.

They are both relatively young men, but men who already have had distinguished careers in their respective constituencies, and who have been chosen by their constituents to follow the distinguished representatives of those constituencies who sat in the house before them.

The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) is a jurist of some 20 years or more experience, one who has acted in that capacity as adviser of school boards and of the municipal councils of the city of Verdun, and who has acquired experience, both legal and administrative, in that capacity. I am sure his contributions to our debates will be of value. He is also a professor of social sciences at the University of Montreal, and no doubt his theoretical studies were reflected in the speech he made when moving this address.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) has many qualifications which command our admiration; and the ease and facility with which he acquitted himself in his task also promise much for his future in this House of Commons. He, too, followed in the footsteps of a distinguished predecessor, and has, himself, one of the qualifications which endeared his predecessor to the whole Canadian public. I refer to his prowess in athletics, and his devotion to the development of that side of human activity which has its value in developing the qualities of a nation.

He, too, is a distinguished lawyer with many years' experience, one who has represented this government in important litigation, one who in the course of his distinguished service during the last war headed the legal department of our Canadian forces in Italy. And I am sure that the quality and variety of his experience will also be of value in future debates of this parliament.

To both of them all of us extend not only congratulations but best wishes for the many years during which they may contribute to the administration of the public affairs of this country.

I wish also to thank the Acting Leader of the Opposition for the, well, sometimes qualified compliments addressed to my colleagues and myself. But I do appreciate that his recognition of our devotion to public duty exceeds perhaps his appreciation of our wisdom. Nevertheless that is something which is quite compatible with the full recognition that on both sides of the house we do extend to the honest endeavours of us all to perform for this young and growing country the best services within our respective capacities.

I must say now that I listened very carefully and followed very closely the remarks of the Acting Leader of the Opposition. The picture of the situation of this country that he painted reminded me of similar pictures I have heard painted from year to year by others who have spoken from that side of the house. Whether or not there was a lack of sound fiscal policy—and I shall have to take my understanding of the hon. member's conception of "sound fiscal policy"—fortunately, events turned out fairly satisfactorily.

I think perhaps it is well sometimes to take the objective view of the Canadian scene that is taken by people outside this country. I have here a clipping from the London Times of September 11, 1954, in which, under the title "Young and Lusty", it says:

> The pace of Canadian development during the past decade has been tremendous.

And the following paragraph begins with the words:

> Certainly Canada will be a fortunate country if the past decade does not stand out to some extent in retrospect as a notable period of growth.

And then, after discussing how that may have come about the writer goes on to say:

> No government came anywhere near perfection in running its wartime controls, in curbing inflation, or in managing the return to freedom. But the Canadian government was far more successful than most. Inflation was always less a domestic product than an import from the United States; hence the upward revaluation of the Canadian dollar in 1946 and the adoption of a free exchange rate—with an upward revaluation in the market—in 1950. The return to freedom was steady, with relatively little temporary backsliding.
> The firm and even hand was no doubt itself a symptom of a strong government—strong alike in its political position and its personnel. The government could always act and speak with assurance, and there was always an able and experienced departmental minister to ensure that in any specific matter it spoke and acted wisely.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

I do not want to take too much comfort from that because it is I think in the proper functioning of democratic institutions more important to have the opinion and view of the people of one's own country than those of people of other countries. But I have yet to find that the views expressed by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken represent those of the majority of the people of our own country.

I listened quite carefully to his speech, and though I found frequent recurrence of the words "strong fiscal policy" yet the manner in which it was described and the inconvenience it was supposed to be able to overcome reminded one very much of the pleas that that party used to make for protection, although the word "protection" was carefully avoided.

Here we all feel that expanding trade is desirable. We feel that it is almost necessary to the prosperity of the Canadian people, but we do not feel that it would be by high tariffs that expanding trade could be achieved in this country. It is perhaps unfortunate that the production costs of some of our commodities happen to be greater than those of other commodities from abroad that could be imported into this country. But it is nevertheless quite true that foreign trade must flow in both directions, and that you cannot have high exports unless you have at the same time high imports or extend credit or aid in the form of Canadian currency to enable our domestic producers to receive payment for their exports.

The hon. gentleman has said that Canada has lost the United Kingdom market for the second time in his own period of political experience. There has been no loss of the United Kingdom market. There is no less desire in the United Kingdom to take goods from Canada than there was at any time, but it has so happened that, although the situation of the United Kingdom is improving and has been improving constantly and steadily, there is still a shortage of dollars that limits the quantities of Canadian goods they can import and for which they could provide the currency required.

The hon. gentleman says that our imports from the United Kingdom are insufficient and that the balance of our trade with the United Kingdom is still in our favour. Unless I do not understand what the hon. gentleman means, I take it that we are exporting to them commodities of a greater value than we are importing from them. Well, there are precisely some of the imports that are coming from them that are being sold on this market at prices that, for instance, our own textile producers find it impossible for them to meet.

The hon. gentleman says that so far there have been parties in Canada, other than the ones to which I belong on one side and he belongs on the other side, who have made many promises but have not yet had any test with respect to performance. That is quite true. But it is quite true as well that the parties to which he and I both belong are not socialistic parties. They are parties who believe in free enterprise, and who believe in the greatest degree of freedom for the individual that can be exercised without damage to the welfare of the whole community. Our government, and I am sure the same would be true of any government made up from the hon. gentleman's party, does not attempt to dictate to the Canadian people the sources from which they will take their supplies and does not attempt to dictate to them where they will, if they can, sell those products that they have for export.

We do our best to facilitate external trade, but we do not attempt to handle external trade through any government organization, with the exception of the wheat board, set up at the request of the wheat producers themselves and managed for their benefit and to a large degree under their direction.

The world situation is one over which no strong fiscal policy, as I understood the hon. gentleman to envisage the one he had in mind, to prevent the entering of goods from areas in which they are produced at less cost than they can be produced here, would have very much beneficial effect.

The hon. gentleman says that our party has never been put to the trial and has not had to deal with hard times. Well, that is because when we have been in office there have not been the kind of hard times that occurred, perhaps only coincidentally, with the implementation of the kind of policies about which the hon. gentleman was entertaining us this afternoon.

There is some unemployment in Canada. There has been some unemployment in Canada every year. At the opening of every session of the Canadian parliament for the last three or four years there has been considerable anxiety over the kind and extent of unemployment in Canada. However, because of the resources, material and human, to which the hon. gentleman paid tribute, that situation has eased as the season advanced, and there is reason to expect that it will do so again.

When one looks at the Canadian situation and that of our neighbours to the south, Canadians have no reason to feel that we are not as well off as they are there, or that the improved trend that has become manifest there is not also being manifested in the Canadian economy.

That does not mean that for those who are unemployed—and there are large numbers—unemployment is not a deplorable thing, and that we should not do everything within our power to lessen its effects. But, as the hon. gentleman has said, there is not very much that can be accomplished through the expenditure of public funds on public undertakings. What is required is something that stimulates the economy generally and does not to any unnecessary degree interfere with the display by our Canadian citizens of their own initiative and skills.

In that connection perhaps the hon. gentleman saw the report of an appraisal of the Canadian situation made by the president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce at the eightieth annual meeting of the shareholders of the bank. The president faced the situation objectively, and his conclusion was that if it were possible to draw up a balance sheet of the Canadian condition it would show a substantial surplus on the favourable side.

That does not mean that there will not be some unfavourable factors; it does not mean that those unfavourable factors are of no consequence. But it does mean, in terms of accountancy, that the balance sheet would show on the whole a substantial surplus on the favourable side. Our economy is subject to world conditions. All we can hope for is to have a substantial surplus on the favourable side, while we do our best to improve that surplus and remove to the extent to which that is possible the unfavourable factors which enter into the establishment of the balance.

There will be opportunities for the hon. gentleman and his colleagues to enlighten us further as to the strong fiscal and tax policies that in their opinion would remove the unfavourable factors which now enter into the accounting, and which nevertheless leave a substantially favourable balance.

The amendment submitted expresses regret that His Excellency's advisers have failed to retain and expand Canadian markets abroad for our production, particularly of wheat and other products. With respect to wheat and the products thereof the proportion of sales made by Canada is greater than of those made by any other country except Argentina and Australia. We have sold a better proportion of our crop than that disposed of by our neighbours to the south, and the figures show an actual improvement over what was possible in the corresponding months of the previous year.

Now, what more we can do to expand our markets abroad for our production is something which we would be glad to have pointed out to us by the hon. gentleman or any of his friends.

It is, I think, more important to the health of the Canadian economy to have things done than it is to discuss in this house who has been the promoter of what happens to have turned out to be the right thing. The genuine welfare of the country is or should be of more concern to all of us than the party political advantage of attributing blame or praise to any of us.

However, I can assure the hon. gentleman that though it is perhaps somewhat of an exaggeration to suggest that anything of which we are supposed to be boasting as an achievement is due to the pressure put upon us by suggestions from the other side of the house, nevertheless we will be only too happy to give serious consideration to any constructive suggestion whatever its source. I might add, though, that we in this party will not be disposed to feel, without stronger arguments than we have yet heard, that a high protection policy would help us expand our markets or cure the unemployment which exists in respect of some of our industries.

The hon. gentleman expresses pleasure at the fact that I will be attending a meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers in London, and he suggested I was personally taking hold of the problem of increasing our trade with the United Kingdom. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not expect that Sir Winston Churchill and I, in any of the conversations we will have, can hope to do very much to further the progress of the United Kingdom toward convertibility of its currency, which will be required for any substantial expansion of its trade with Canada. Those are not things which can be achieved by agreement between any two individuals. They are things that must be the result of the operation of economic factors that depend upon a multiplicity of different shaping trends. From having attended some conferences and from having watched what took place following them, I am confident that they are useful and that they serve to assist in the growth of healthier trade relations. But that is something that cannot be looked for as an overnight result of the conferences themselves.

Then it is regretted that His Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary measures to relieve Canadian taxpayers of the burden of excessive taxation and thereby enable Canadian producers to lower their cost of production and meet increasing competition. May I say that the scale and rates of taxation have had to be high in order to enable this government to meet its obligations to its own people and, as a consequence of its obligations to its own people, to perform its share in what is being done by itself and its allies for the safety of the free nations themselves. I feel that I am getting on to dangerous ground and that I should not attempt to forecast what may at some time be a proper taxation policy in order to meet a situation that might be different. But up to the present time I am convinced that the Canadian public have felt that it was the right thing to pay as you go. That policy is one which has helped to keep Canada in the stable situation in which it has been for the last several years.

The next paragraph expresses regret that His Excellency's advisers have failed to eliminate waste and extravagance in government and improve its efficiency. That is a fairly general condemnation of the manner in which we have been administering the affairs of the country. In that respect I am sure that the hon. gentleman, though he perhaps does not think much of our wisdom, will give us credit for doing our best.

With respect to the paragraph referring to the encouragement of the processing of our natural resources in Canada, thereby increasing opportunities and employment for Canadians, may I say that I am sure that in principle we are all agreed as to how far that can and should be done. I noted with appreciation the applause all over the house when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) explained the bills which received first reading earlier this afternoon.

I must confess that the last paragraph of the amendment, which speaks of the failure of His Excellency's advisers in co-operation with the provinces to develop an effective contributory plan which will assure that every Canadian will have adequate hospital and medical services, is something new in the formal amendments submitted from that side of the house. It certainly is something that is highly desirable. It is something that we would all like to see done. However, our progress in the development of welfare services in Canada has been fairly rapid over the last few years. Any further implementation would require the spending, through government agencies, of a larger portion of the incomes of individuals. That is something which will come, but the timing of it will depend upon the circumstances of the Canadian economy generally.

We shall have many debates in which we shall hear repetitions of the matters touched upon by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe). We shall hear discussion from various angles as to just how dark are the unemployment clouds, but I think we shall have to look at them in an unemotional fashion and appraise them as to their real significance. It will require that everything possible be done to relieve the situation and that something be done at once for the immediate relief of those who are suffering from unemployment. In the speech from the throne hon. gentlemen will have noticed the announcement that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) will have two bills to submit at the earliest possible moment, the first to provide immediately an extension of supplementary benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I understand that this matter has been discussed with members of all groups in the house and that immediate action will be possible to deal with that special measure.

Hon. gentlemen will have noticed that there is ready for consideration by parliament a much larger volume of business proposed by the government than has been ready at this stage in any previous session. On the order paper at the present time there are notices of resolutions for fifteen government measures which require to be preceded by resolution and there were two which, not requiring resolutions, received first reading today. There is a third which is already on the order paper. Five government measures have been sent to the clerk of the other place for introduction there. One was introduced on the opening day and the four others are to be introduced immediately for consideration. That is a very large volume of business ready for consideration.

Traditionally the debate on the address has occupied many days at the opening of a session. There have been suggestions that that was because there was no business in which members were really interested ready for their consideration, and that instead of leaving them in a position where they felt that their views had to be expressed on the address or else there would be no opportunity for expressing them, it would be helpful if they could have in advance an indication of what was coming up for discussion so they might then reserve their speeches for the debates on those different measures.

We are endeavouring to meet the suggestions that have been made from time to time to overcome this feeling that the business of parliament is not properly organized and not handled in a businesslike way. During the opening days of the last session the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), in supporting a motion for the immediate establishment of a committee, said, as appears at page 397 of Hansard of November 27, 1953:

> . . . the expeditious handling of business will not be related nearly so much to any limitation of time on speeches or anything of that kind as it will to some orderly method of presenting business and setting up committees at the earliest possible stage . . .

We are presenting the business at the earliest possible stage and we will be glad of the opportunity to set up some committees at the earliest possible stage. We propose to suggest, as an experiment for this session, that there be set up an estimates committee to which the estimates of several departments could be referred for detailed consideration before coming before the committee of supply of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Prime Minister in a position to say which departments?

Mr. St. Laurent: There will be five or six which will be referred consecutively to this committee so we can have a serious experiment made as to the effect it will have upon securing better consideration of the estimates than is sometimes possible toward the end of the session, in the case of those that have not been studied before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which departments did the Prime Minister have in mind?

Mr. St. Laurent: At this time I would not like to make any definite statement, but we will try to make the kind of experiment that will give satisfaction to the members of the house generally and will enable them to determine from their own experience whether or not it would be desirable to expand the system and try to arrive at something like that which now prevails in the United Kingdom.

We would like to have the committee on the rules set up at as early a date as possible. Without doing what the Leader of the Opposition had in mind in his statement of last November, without doing much in the way of limiting the time of speeches or anything of that kind, we feel there are many improvements that can be made that would avoid some of the time required under the present rules to deal with the matters on the order paper. For instance, these resolutions preparatory to the introduction of bills, under the rules, have to be called on a government day. When they are first called nothing more can be done than declare to the house that they are recommended by His Excellency the Governor General, and they have to go over to another day.

There are certain of these phases which, if not eliminated, can certainly be streamlined so the business can be proceeded with in a more expeditious fashion and so there may not be this feeling that during the first weeks of a session there is lots of time and much of it can be taken for speeches in the house that might otherwise be directed towards the furthering of these stages of items of legislation.

Many years ago I received from Lord Dunedin, out of the wealth of his experience, a bit of advice. It was that when one attempted to make a speech he should sit down immediately after having said everything he had to say. I think I have said everything I had to say, and I will now make room for other members of the house who, in accordance with these old traditions of our practice, are expected to follow at this time.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for his gracious invitation to speak. I am going to accept that invitation. It is customary for speakers in this debate to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am afraid that sometimes it is a rather perfunctory sort of business, but on Friday I listened to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) and I was impressed with what they did. I join with the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) and the Prime Minister in expressing to them the hope that they will have the health and the strength and the will to take part in the debates of the house as long as they are here. I am not going to say, as has been said, that I wish them to remain here forever because of course it is the duty of the opposition to try to displace even those who move and second addresses in reply to the speech from the throne.

I also want to take this opportunity to say that we were in full agreement with what the Prime Minister said on Friday regarding the absence of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I sincerely hope that he will be restored to full strength and will be able to resume his seat in the house in the not far distant future.

This afternoon I listened attentively, of course, to the speech of the Acting Leader of the Opposition. He has a unique way of handling the subjects with which he deals, and he always provides us with a pleasant hour when he rises to speak on any topic in this house. This afternoon he did not fail us in our anticipation. I found it very difficult, however, to follow some of the points he made. Indeed, at one time I thought the speech was reminiscent of speeches made by some of the Liberals between 1930 and 1935. At one stage I thought when I rose I might suggest that this time the opposition speakers in the Conservative party might read some of Mr. King's speeches to the house in criticism of the Conservative party, and that the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side might dig up Mr. Bennett's speeches and read them in defence of the present government. After all, that was the way it sounded to me. It was reminiscent of those days before 1935.

I, too, want to say something about the amendment, Mr. Speaker. I agree with you. What has happened in the amendment that has been moved by the official opposition is this. Because of the number of topics covered it has, in effect, blocked the way of the entire opposition from moving, from time to time in this house, amendments on going into supply that might embarrass the government and lead to votes on various matters.

Someone says to read it. Just take a look at it. It refers to the failure to solve the urgent problem of unemployment. Suppose we want to move a resolution on unemployment. I would argue that this does not block the way, but on the other hand I think it is quite conceivable it might be argued that it does. There is mention of action to relieve the Canadian taxpayers of their burden and concerning the elimination of waste and extravagance. That is so wide that we might be prevented from censuring the present government, because all of us on this side of the house are convinced that there is waste and extravagance on the part of the government in the administration of its affairs. I think that is normal in opposition at all times.

Mr. Harris: Even if untrue.

Mr. Coldwell: There is mention of facilitating and encouraging the processing of products. Paragraph (f) of the amendment reads:

> in co-operation with the provinces to develop an effective contributory plan which will assure that every Canadian will have adequate hospital and medical services.

How happy I am to see that included in an amendment moved by the official opposition. I only hope that the government of one of the larger provinces of this country, which is of the same stripe as the opposition, will immediately take steps to implement such a program. I am convinced that since British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta have hospital plans at the present time, if one of the two central provinces of Canada, plus perhaps one of the maritime provinces, showed some interest in this proposal we should have a national health insurance plan rather quickly. Consequently I say to my hon. friends that if they really want to see this done, as urgently as we want to see it done, then with their influence in Ontario and in New Brunswick they could materially assist in getting such legislation on the statute books, even by a Liberal government which promised such a measure in 1919, 36 years ago. In any event I hope that in the lifetime of this parliament we shall see such a measure placed on our statute books.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) took a great deal of comfort from the article in the London Times. I want to say to the government that the progress of Canada has been unquestioned ever since the war broke out. Prior to the war the same government was in power. No one can say that in those years from 1935 to 1938, at least until we began rearmament, there were any signs of progress in this country. Indeed, we continued in the slough of despondency in which we were when the Liberal party took power in 1935. It was preparation for war and our very favourable geographical position that enabled such an article to be written about the government. I am not detracting at all from the tremendous progress that has been made in this country over the last ten or more years. I only hope that progress will be continued.

A few moments ago the Prime Minister gave a rather strange definition of free enterprise. As I understood him, he said free enterprise enabled everyone to follow his own devices provided he did not do anything that interfered with the rights of others. That is not free enterprise. Our statute books are cluttered with legislation preventing individuals from following their own devices. We have had to limit individuals. As for the inference that democratic socialists are in favour of restricting individual liberty, look at the record. The legislation that has been placed on the statute books of all the democratic countries guaranteeing the social rights of individuals and social justice for individuals was placed there, not always by socialist governments of course, but at the insistence of men and women who followed socialist philosophy.

In this house between 1921 and 1942, until he was removed by death from his seat in this house, who was it who brought the wrongs of the Canadian people to the floor of this parliament, and fought for the rights of the individual and for social justice? It was a predecessor of mine as leader of this group in the house, the late J. S. Woodsworth. I want to say that I hope we shall continue to struggle in that same tradition and after the same pattern we followed at that time.

I want to join in the criticism of the government for not having called parliament together earlier. The Prime Minister has said that now a great deal of legislation is ready, and that debate may be limited because we know what we are going to do in this session of parliament. I do not think that is any answer. If we had met in November, legislation might have been ready and we might have been informed as to what that legislation would be. Last autumn there were problems in this country which needed the attention of parliament, and not the attention of the government only. I might name two of them, the decline in farm income—let me say at once, not due to the bad crop in western Canada because that crop has not yet entered into the picture so far as marketing is concerned—and the grave concern about mounting unemployment. Earlier in the year when we dared to say that this winter we were going to be faced with a larger job-seeking list than we had a year ago, we were told that was very unlikely. But we have found that unemployment has mounted.

A third matter which should have been discussed in this parliament in the autumn was the international situation. I am not going to discuss that international situation today, Mr. Speaker, because I understand the protocol relating to NATO will be introduced, as well as other agreements. We shall have an opportunity then of hearing the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) explain the protocol and the agreements, and we shall have an opportunity of discussing those agreements on their merits at that time. I shall not deal with those now.

Before I make any criticisms I want to say that there are some welcome announcements in the speech. I am very happy to learn that at this session some further provision will be made for improvement in the War Veterans Allowance Act. I think that is overdue, as I am sure many members of this house do.

Again, I am not going to take credit for this party or give it to that party; but I say there are hon. gentlemen in their seats in all parts of the house who will be very happy to see this piece of legislation brought down, because from all quarters of the house it has been advocated from time to time.

Then, of course, something in which I have always been particularly interested is the welfare of the blind. Personally I am glad, and of course as a party we are glad—and I presume this feeling is shared by hon. members in all parts of the house—to know that the age of eligibility for the receipt of blind pensions is to be lowered, and the ceiling raised.

Of course we agree with the statement in the speech from the throne that the bringing into force of the Disabled Persons Act brings into operation in this country a great humanitarian measure. Unfortunately the government discovered that this was a great humanitarian measure long after we thought the discovery should have been made. We have felt that the act should have been brought in much earlier.

As we shall indicate by our votes on the amendment, we are disappointed—and I shall put it that way—that no further steps have been taken toward a national health plan. No such steps are indicated in the speech from the throne this year. The time is long overdue when Canada should have such a plan. After all, we are one of the only two large democratic countries in the world without some sort of national health plan to cover all the people, under a state system. The other country is the United States.

I was in Great Britain and other places this summer. While I shall not say much about it just now, although I may later, I found wherever I went that perhaps the most popular thing ever done in Great Britain was the placing on the statute books of their national health plan. And let it be known that I did not move only or even to a large extent among people who shared my philosophy. I could not help noticing that the policies followed there—rationing, yes; control of prices, yes, and so on—in the last 15 years or so, as well as the health plan, have had a great beneficial effect on the physical appearance and the obvious welfare of the boys and girls of the United Kingdom. When, as I did, leaving London around four o'clock to avoid the rush hours, one sees them getting on the trains after leaving their schools, he could not help noticing their fine physique and, incidentally, their excellent behaviour. These were things which pleased me very much indeed.

So it is that we are disappointed because we are not progressing faster toward this great humanitarian measure. Day by day we see in the newspapers stories of hardship because people are unable to afford the kind of medical and health care they need. I know it is said that anyone who needs the services of a doctor can get them, and in what I say I am not criticizing the medical profession at all. But I do say that many people will not go soon enough to be examined, at the onset of a disease, because they fear the expense—the doctor's fee, the hospitalization charges, and all the rest of it. It seems to me that here is a great advance in social security this country should make without delay.

I said a moment ago that there are two problems, other than the international problem, which should have received attention long ago. Those two problems are urgent and are before us at the present time. They are of course the decline in farm income and increased unemployment among industrial and other workers throughout the country.

Of course these two conditions are closely related. The decline in farm income is felt immediately in the industrial centres, and the lack of purchasing power in the industrial centres is felt in the farm areas. Because if the workers in the cities cannot buy quantities of meat, of eggs, of butter and the like, then of course surpluses ensue and farm prices fall.

So we see the two are interrelated. Net farm income has declined about 40 per cent in the last three years, according to the figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics. Unemployment has risen each year as farm income has declined. Let us look at recent farm statistics, and again the authority is the dominion bureau of statistics, referring particularly to figures for comparable periods. I shall refer to the figures for 1953 and 1954, and in particular to two columns found in the outline issued by the bureau. These are the figures for the period January to September, 1953, and January to September, 1954.

In 1953 the cash income is given as $1,938 million whereas in 1954, during the same months, it was $1,686 million, or a drop of some $252 million in farm income and farm purchasing power.

I said earlier that to a large extent this decline is not a reflection of the crop failure in western Canada last summer. Rather it is due mainly to our failure to sell some of our farm commodities, notably grains—wheat—which have piled up. It is true that some farm products other than grain showed some increase in returns, due to an increase in farmers' marketings. I am thinking for example of calves. More calves went on the market, as did also more of some other types of produce. But the returns per unit of production in most instances were not higher. Although the aggregate amount was greater, the return per unit was not.

We find now that our own Department of Agriculture, expressing its opinion at the federal-provincial conference with respect to 1955, holds the view that, assuming an average crop this year—and we all hope that we may have an average crop; it may be that we deserve something above average, because of the failure last year—net farm income will be approximately the same as in 1954. If that is so it will not be satisfactory.

In the light of the squeeze that has occurred in connection with those engaged in agriculture, we must have something better. That squeeze has developed because while returns have been reduced over this period of time, costs have tended to rise. Marketings may improve, but I do not think this will compensate for the decline in income and the rise in farm costs. The farmer is caught in a price squeeze. Where farm returns from some commodities increase in the aggregate, production costs increase even more, and that lowers the return for the amount of labour expended in producing these commodities. It is this sort of thing which should have compelled the attention of parliament last autumn and should compel the attention of parliament this session.

What we think is this. In order to meet the problems that are arising and will continue to arise more acutely as time goes on we have consciously and deliberately to plan our economy so that various types of producers may receive the proper compensation for their toil on the basis—I will use the term so often used—of something like parity. We believe that is essential in a modern state, and more and more we shall have to move in that direction.

Indeed our whole social security system, of which we are justly proud and which we have always supported, depends upon stability in the economy. If we have not a stable economic basis for our social security program, then with drastic declines in returns in industry, in agriculture and so on, we are apt to jeopardize the whole structure we have so laboriously built up. With a serious decline in the returns and in the economy the ability of our people to meet certain obligations would very seriously affect our social security program. Consequently we have to find ways and means of stabilizing the base, strengthening it so that we may carry the load of both the modern industrialism and the social security program.

In agriculture we of the C.C.F. have argued and suggested, both here and in the country, that we should have a forward pricing system so that when the farmer sets out to produce a steer two years or three years hence he will know approximately the minimum price he will receive for that steer at that time. It is being done in other countries and it could be done here. What I have said about forward pricing in the case of a steer is equally true of many of our farm commodities.

I have emphasized that farm purchasing power is of tremendous interest to people in industrial centres. As a matter of fact I noticed how that was illustrated this very morning on the financial page of the Montreal Gazette, which I usually read before I come down to the house in the morning. The headline this morning said: "Loss is shown by Cockshutt. Sales off 38 per cent." And I add these words: "in the last fiscal year." Let me repeat it: "Loss is shown by Cockshutt. Sales off 38 per cent." This indicates very clearly that because the farmers have lost their purchasing power the Cockshutt implement company, on which people depend in parts of the Ottawa valley, have sustained losses and their sales are down. What is true of declining sales in this industry is true of many other industries.

As I listened to the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) complaining this afternoon about the loss of trade, the loss of markets, unemployment and so on, I thought he was advocating some form of protective tariff to keep the products of what he called the low wage countries out of our country. Just before that he had been insisting that we had to trade more with the United Kingdom, that a conference should be held to give us more commonwealth trade. Yet, if I read the newspapers aright, some of our industries have demanded and received protection against products coming from the United Kingdom. We all remember what happened two or three years ago when the dumping act was used to reduce the sending of small British automobiles to this country.

Only by planning our trade and commerce within a planning of the economy can we meet such a situation. Monkeying with the tariffs will be of no avail. Indeed, when you raise a tariff you erect a wall against your own income. That is what you do. The erection of tariffs in the past has shown that they fail to achieve the objective which a good many working men and women are being told today they can achieve. Always they have resulted in a more privileged position for the manufacturer in that industry and, until the workers were unionized, the more privileged the industry, the more privileged the manufacturer, often the worse the condition of the workers in the industry. That was true of the textile industry in the 1920's and the 1930's, as speeches in this house will clearly indicate. I remember that the late Mr. Raymond put a well documented speech proving that very point on the records of this house some years ago.

We all know that was true until the automobile industry was thoroughly organized, when a change took place. Therefore I say that we, the workers, the farmers or any of us, cannot look for any hope of better things simply by playing with tariff walls. In many instances today tariff walls are giving protection to all kinds of industries.

I bought a small gadget in connection with another little thing I bought in the United States when I was down at the United Nations meeting. Incidentally I declared it and paid duty on it when I came in because I had entered Canada at Halifax a short time before. I wanted another of these little gadgets and I phoned a store here and asked if they had it. They said they had. I asked how much it was, and they said $3.75. I paid $1.60 in the United States. These are some of the things that need investigation. That is the kind of thing you breed in a country behind a tariff wall. Therefore I can see no hope in tariffs, because they would further decrease our trade overseas. They would be walls against our income, because if overseas customers cannot buy from us we cannot sell to them.

When I hear discussions on convertibility I remind myself that convertibility can only come about when the sterling countries, we will say, can earn dollars with which to make their currency convertible. The only way they can do that is by sending to the dollar countries some of the things they produce. Until we in North America are prepared to make some arrangement so they can do that, convertibility will be a long way off.

What does the government propose to meet the mounting unemployment? Well, increases in unemployment insurance benefits. That is good; but it is like locking the stable door after the horse is gone. It is like the Acting Leader of the Opposition said, a palliative; it does not get to the root of the thing. However, we welcome it because it mitigates the suffering of certain groups of people who are unemployed and can come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. But it is a palliative, not a cure.

I notice that the Prime Minister, speaking at an apparently new Reform Club in Quebec on September 19, 1954, recognized the responsibility of the government, and that responsibility I wish to underline because the government has not assumed it. The Montreal Gazette report reads:

> Mr. St. Laurent said the government's job is to find work for all.

With that we agree.

> The government could not guarantee work that would meet the tastes of all but could guarantee enough work to be able to say that all could have jobs.

If the guarantee could be given why was it not undertaken? The Prime Minister continued:

> "We have a country where there should be work for everybody and if we are not smart enough to organize the economy of the nation to provide work for everybody we are incompetent."

Note the words "organize the economy". I take it if you are going to organize you are going to plan, because you cannot organize without some kind of planning. The quotation continues:

> I cannot give details but I am convinced that if my colleagues and I cannot organize economic controls in such a way that there will not be any long periods of loss of work for those who want to work, then throw us out and put in our place people who can do better.

I should be fair to the Prime Minister and add his next few words:

> "Although," Mr. St. Laurent added, "I don't think you can find any."

That is the Prime Minister's opinion, but I think we should keep his remarks in mind when we are discussing the current unemployment situation and the necessity for organizing economic controls to ensure that everybody who wants to work shall have an opportunity of doing so. That, I think, is sound economic common sense, and I am sorry the government does not seem to possess the kind of common sense for which the Prime Minister gave it credit.

From the time that speech was made, and earlier, unemployment and distress increased in this country. What was the government doing to carry out the Prime Minister's suggestion? There are thousands of unemployed all over the country, and unemployment is particularly acute in Vancouver. When I was a child in Britain my parents, if they wanted to placate me, often gave me a very nice stick of candy called Edinburgh rock. I imagine on the same principle the government is giving Ripple Rock to the people of Vancouver, but that is about the only thing in the speech from the throne for the people of British Columbia. I imagine the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) wanted to get something in there to balance the well-deserved advances being given to the maritime provinces so they gave the people of Vancouver a piece of Ripple Rock.

I am told they have been blasting that for years. Why it should be in the speech from the throne, I do not know. Probably I have given the correct explanation. Something had to go in for the Pacific coast; Ripple Rock presented the least difficulty, and can go in again on future occasions if necessary.

Another thing we have been asked by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) is why the provinces do not do more in the building of the trans-Canada highway.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree, but what is the federal government doing on the highways. All the federal government is doing for one highway is to pay 50 per cent of the cost. But in a newspaper this morning I noticed that the Eisenhower administration in the United States is appropriating an additional one hundred billion dollars for highway construction over the next ten years. Incidentally, the main highways of the United States are paid for by the federal government and the states and municipalities receive federal grants for state and county roads. All we are told is that some of the provinces which already have relief payments to make should get along with the building of the trans-Canada highway. I hope they will. I think in my own province they have gone further with the trans-Canada highway than most of the other provinces, but in any event that seems to be a very small amount of work in relation to what has to be done in this country.

I am very glad to see we are going to do something about the elimination of grade crossings. Many of us suggested that during the days of the depression, and if it had been done in a big way—although we do not know if it is now going to be done in a big way—many hundreds of lives would have been saved. However, I want to say that a substantial appropriation to assist the grade crossing fund will receive the wholehearted support of this party.

I do not propose to belabour these points but I should like to emphasize that throughout the autumn labour organizations, the mayors of municipalities, and social workers pointed out that unemployment was once again upon us and that steps should be taken to provide ways and means of enabling Canada to do what the Prime Minister said it was the responsibility of the government to do, namely provide everybody with the opportunity of taking jobs, even though the jobs were not always to their liking, so they could earn a decent living.

The unemployment insurance fund is a palliative, but even men who are entitled to relief from that fund wish they did not have to accept it. They do not like taking anything of that sort if they can avoid it. Consequently I say that the warnings given to the government throughout the autumn should have been heeded and parliament should have been recalled to discuss this problem. It is primarily a federal responsibility and the situation today is largely due to federal inaction.

I therefore think hon. members have no option but to vote for an amendment expressing lack of confidence in the government. Of course the present amendment is not altogether satisfactory to us because it says so much that we cannot quite understand, but at least we do understand most of the clauses and we are, in the main, in agreement with them.

However, I think we need something inserted which will give more punch to this and put the situation more constructively before the house and the country. I am therefore going to move that the amendment be amended. I am sorry that, in doing this, I am obliged to put more words into it. Under the rules of the house I cannot do what I wanted to do and suggested I should do until I was advised that I could not do it, namely strike out most of it and substitute something fresh. Apparently we are not allowed to do that, so I must use some more words. I therefore move:

> That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "Your Excellency's advisers" the following words:
> "have deliberately returned to the policy of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise which resulted in the depression and unemployment of the pre-war years, and that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to undertake the economic planning necessary to cope with the serious problems now facing the Canadian people, and"

I am not going to read it all to show how those words would fit in. I am just going to read the first sentence:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers—
> Then insert the amending words—
> —have failed to take or to recommend the necessary measures . . .

—and so on. With that I leave the matter before the house. As I say, some other matters of great interest will be the subject of discussion, and we shall take the opportunity of expressing our views at those times. In the meantime I regret indeed that parliament has met in January instead of in November. I may say that I came back from overseas because I thought parliament was meeting about November 8 or 9. I arrived back on November 9 because I thought that parliament would be meeting. I am not sorry I did so because, I may say, I had the opportunity afterward of going to the meetings of the United Nations Organization. I greatly appreciated the opportunity, and found the meetings exceedingly interesting this year.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is presumed that I am now speaking to the subamendment. If what Your Honour said about the amendment introduced by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) was true, then I suppose it would also be true to say that the subamendment has greatly complicated an already highly complicated amendment. I suppose it is a good thing that the rules of the house forbid the introduction of a third amendment. That being the case, I think perhaps I had better give both the subamendment and the amendment some careful study before committing myself with respect to them because I am frank to admit that it is difficult, without some careful study, to know what they mean. I shall therefore withhold any comment on the subamendment or the amendment and will give the matter careful study, with perhaps the possibility of saying something on them at a later stage.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like to cut speeches in two any more than does any other hon. member. To start to deal with the speech from the throne at fifteen minutes to six does not leave much chance to get far, at any rate, before the house normally adjourns for the dinner hour. However, if it is the desire of the house that I shall continue and use those fifteen minutes, I shall be glad to do so. On the other hand, it would be better if Your Honour would allow me to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, I think it would have been a good thing if during the dinner hour Your Honour had had time to give full consideration to the two amendments before the house and had felt disposed at this time to declare them both out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I might clarify my position now. What I said when I received the amendment was merely by way of warning. I remarked that over the last seven or eight years amendments to the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne have had a tendency to become longer than they used to be. If hon. members will look at Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, page 96, they will see what the practice was at that time with respect to amendments to the address in reply. There is a footnote at the bottom of page 98 of that edition of Bourinot which reads:

> Between 1878 and 1899 only two amendments were moved to the address, viz.: in 1893 and 1899. In 1878 a lengthy debate took place on the address although no amendment was moved. The tariff was one of the principal topics of discussion, and the inconvenience of discussing it at that stage was evident from the fact that the same subject came up again on the budget. From 1879 to 1890 the debate commenced and ended on the same day, generally before six o'clock p.m. In 1891 the debate on the address was continued from Friday to Monday when it ended before six p.m. In 1897 the debate lasted for a week in the Commons and for two days longer in the Senate, though no amendment was proposed. In 1899 it was prolonged from the 20th of March to the 18th of April in consequence of an amendment having been proposed with respect to the administration of affairs in the Yukon. Between 1900 and 1906 no amendment was moved. Amendments were moved, however, in the session of 1907-8, 1910-11 and in the session of 1914.

In the wealth of information which is at the disposal of the Speaker I found a very carefully prepared memorandum by the Journals branch under the direction of the Clerk which reviews the situation since 1940. There we find that in 1940 and 1945, the first session, no amendments were moved, and that 1945 and 1947 are the only two occasions where amendments as lengthy as that which now has been proposed can be found.

As hon. members know, during the session when a motion is made for the house to go into supply members sometimes wish to move amendments to bring about a debate on a certain topic. If a vote on a similar subject matter has been held in the house prior to the discussion of the new amendment on the motion to go into supply, it is my unpleasant task to remind the house that, the matter having been decided, it cannot be discussed again, and to declare such amendments out of order.

Hon. members will recall that I had that sad experience last year. Therefore when I saw this lengthy amendment today I thought it was my duty to warn those responsible about what may have to happen during the course of the session which has only begun. Having issued that warning, I think it is up to them to secure the necessary consent and take the necessary steps to amend their amendments if they so choose.

Of course the amendment is in the hands of the house. It has been proposed from the chair and now a subamendment has been added to it. Having done what I believe was my duty toward the opposition, I think we will let matters stand. I will accept the amendment as it is and also the subamendment. The position having been clarified, the hon. member may resume his speech.

Mr. Low: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne are to be congratulated for the very fine efforts they made in this debate on Friday. I do so now sincerely, and express the hope that in debates in the years ahead while they are in parliament we will hear from them often because I am sure they will make worth-while contributions to the discussions that will take place here.

I should also like it to be known that we join heartily in what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said on Friday when he expressed regret on behalf of the members of the house that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was not able to be with us at the opening of the session, and the hope that he would be fully recovered and able to be here soon. I also want to congratulate the Prime Minister and the government at this time on the appearance of the order paper and the number of matters that are already indicated as coming up for discussion. The number of government notices of motions on the order paper would indicate that we should have no real excuse for not making good progress this session. I think it was a good plan to get this much government business before the house at this early stage, and I hope we will be able to cut down the multiplicity of debates and make it possible for us to get the business of the country done with something like reasonable dispatch.

I could not help thinking, however, while the leader of the C.C.F. party was speaking, of something the Prime Minister said in Saskatchewan some years ago when he was trying to persuade the people of that province to vote Liberal. If I am informed correctly he said, "You must remember that the C.C.F.'ers are only Liberals in a hurry". I listened today to the recounting of a speech made by the Prime Minister last September in which he indicated some things which made me believe that I am quite correct in deducing that if the C.C.F.'ers are Liberals in a hurry, then certainly the Liberals are socialists in low gear. I think I could be excused for drawing such an inference.

In my opinion it is always dangerous to include only one branch of the house when speaking of those who are the champions of liberty. I want to tell the Prime Minister that the party I represent is determined that the Canadian people shall be just as free as it is humanly possible for people to be in a well ordered economy, a well ordered state. I do not mean to say, either, that they should not be ordered; but I will say that we stand for the absolute minimum of regulation of the people of this country and the absolute minimum of regulation of the economy, because we believe that men do their best work when they are free. I wanted him to know that it is not only the Liberals and Conservatives who stand for liberty and freedom; not at all. I place my party squarely with those who are champions of individual liberty.

Before I consider the matters raised in His Excellency's address, I should also like to offer my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) upon his appointment to that very important ministry, and also to those ministers who have undertaken larger responsibilities in the government since the house adjourned last June. I should also like to congratulate all the new members who were introduced in the house on Friday. It is my sincere hope that every one of them will have cause to feel that their parliamentary experience has been fruitful of good for their constituents and all of Canada. No matter how long they may sit here, I want it known that we have nothing but good will toward them and toward every member of the house. We want to express that good will on every possible occasion. If we are critical, as we sometimes are—and that is our duty—I want it known that it is not through lack of personal good will to the members of the government or the members of any other party.

I want the Prime Minister to know that he has our good will and our very best wishes when he goes to attend the conference of commonwealth prime ministers later this month. We wish him nothing but the very best on his journey and good results through his efforts at that conference.

Since the close of the last session it has been my privilege to travel a good deal, particularly as one of the delegates from this parliament to the conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association held in Kenya in British East Africa. I was very grateful for that privilege, and I must say that we made many fine friends during the long journey and in the course of the conference. I am sure that commonwealth relations were more firmly cemented and much improved as a consequence of what everyone described as the very best conference the association has ever had.

The sessions were all so interesting I felt I could not afford to miss a single minute, for indeed hardly a minute passed without something being said or done that helped to enlarge our understanding of commonwealth affairs and of the problems faced by the various countries of the commonwealth. I have only high praise for the leadership of the Canadian delegation, as well as for the very effective part that was played by each of my colleagues on the delegation.

After the conference at Nairobi closed I had the very great pleasure of visiting and travelling through the state of Israel. The government of that country afforded me every opportunity of seeing all that I wanted to see, and to become as thoroughly acquainted with their problems and conditions as I could become in the limited time I had to spend in the country. My young Jewish guides and travelling companions gave me a most concentrated course of instruction in Israeli affairs. They introduced me to some of the tremendous problems faced by that young state in a very old country. I was able to get some idea of the complication of Middle Eastern problems and the dangers for which solutions must soon be found if justice is to be done to the peoples of these countries, and if real trouble is to be averted in that part of the world.

I came away with great respect for the many outstanding things which have been and are being accomplished by the ingathering exiles. I feel much sympathy for the people of Israel who are forced to fight for their very lives with one hand, and with the other tackle the prodigious problems of rehabilitation and reclamation of a country once productive and latterly fallen into almost complete desolation from gross neglect and abuse. Every day I was there I saw prophecy being fulfilled.

Of course after having travelled like that, and especially after having seen something of the affairs of other countries—because I visited Britain, for example, for some time and was able to take a look at things in France—it is something of a temptation to talk about my impressions and experiences. I believe this is not the proper occasion to do so, however. I am sure another opportunity will occur, perhaps in the debate on external affairs that will probably come at an early date.

At this time I do want to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the foreign office in Britain for what they did to make it possible for me to get into the Arab state of Jordan. I was fortunate in this, I feel, because of late years many applications for visas for travel into Arab territories have been denied. But somehow or other I was fortunate in being able to go there and hold discussions with a great number of people, both on the street and in official positions, so that I got some idea of the feelings of the people in that country toward other parts of the Middle East.

His Excellency's address, Mr. Speaker, did contain a great variety of subjects upon which I should like to have time to comment in this debate. Opportunities for full discussion of some of these matters will be provided when the individual proposals are placed before the house in the form of resolutions or bills. I shall, therefore, follow the good example that has been set by those who spoke before me in this debate and choose only a few things for attention at this time.

I note that we are being asked to approve the agreements reached at the London and Paris conferences relative to the entry of the Federal Republic of Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Inasmuch as I understand these agreements will be coming up for discussion by parliament within a very few days I shall not say anything about them now except this. We will make clear our position on the proposition when we are asked to approve the agreements. At the moment we are giving earnest study to the implications of all that was proposed both at London and Paris and all that is contained in the protocols, and we will be prepared to express our views fully when the debate occurs.

I should like to speak briefly on that part of His Excellency's address having to do with the Colombo plan and the United Nations technical assistance program. In my judgment both these programs have been amongst the finest things the western world has ever done to help the less fortunate peoples of the world and to bring development to the underdeveloped countries. Canada's contribution for the past four years has been a modest $25 million a year. There is evidence that what we have given has been appreciated as well as effective in helping Pakistan, Ceylon and India in particular. But when the consultative committee of the Colombo plan met in Ottawa this past autumn many of us hoped Canada would accede to the request for a substantial increase in her yearly contribution under these schemes.

These plans were conceived for the purpose, amongst others, of course, of trying to save 600 million people from gravitating into the communist orbit out of sheer desperation. There was also the thought that the commonwealth might be strengthened and brought more into unity through the economic help made available under the plans. Just a little thought, it seems to me, would reveal that our contribution is pitifully small and inadequate if the original purposes of the plans are to be achieved. Let us always bear in mind that overriding communist global strategy seeks to bring under communist domination great masses of people. Imperialist communist strategists know that they do not now enjoy, nor indeed can hope in the foreseeable future to enjoy, parity of industrial strength and armament output with the free western world. What they lack in industrial capacity they hope and confidently expect they will be able to make up in manpower. Consequently every step they take or move they make is designed to bring into their orbit and under their control huge masses of people whom they will throw at the western nations in a most prodigal fashion whenever it suits their purpose to start the struggle. To them people are expendable in hundreds of millions if necessary to achieve their objective of world domination.

Against that background of communist global strategy it seems to me we ought to consider the sober truth, that the so-called Christian and other enlightened free nations of the world have not yet had the courage or ability to make an honest effort to solve the two problems that have plagued humanity for hundreds of years. I refer to the problems of distribution and war. Also, we ought to realize that it is no longer possible to condemn half the world to perpetual poverty in the interests of the favoured half. To my mind that has never been any better than a callous indifference to the sufferings of our fellow men, a dog-eat-dog policy. Surely we ought to remember with thanksgiving that we belong to the favoured half of the world. We have been richly blessed by divine Providence. I believe it is our obligation to share our good fortune with those of our brothers who are less fortunate in other parts of the world.

For some centuries now countless millions of human beings in other lands have languished in ignorance and unbelievable poverty. I saw some of that poverty this summer, and it is very difficult to get a picture of it over to the people who live in this land. But let us never forget for one moment that modern communication and transportation services have made known far and wide the advantages the favoured half of the world enjoys. The backward peoples have awakened. There is a widespread impulse amongst them toward nationalism and economic independence which is bound to wreck all our hopes for international peace if we in the rich and favoured areas of the world do not step forward and help them to rise above their poverty, and above even a subsistence standard of living.

There has to be something better than that. And remember that many millions of people in very large parts of the world have been captured by imperialist bolshevism simply because the communists have jumped on the nationalistic bandwagon and persuaded the unfortunate and hopeless masses that the best friends of nationalism are the communists. They have been able to get that idea over somehow. We in the favoured nations are just now waking up to the fact that one of the evils for which our nations in this generation may have to pay dearly is our determination in the past to compel the weak and the poor to accept continuously the race against the rich and favoured nations on terms dictated by the rich.

I have in mind, when I say that, such things as the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in trade treaties imposed by the United States upon all nations which trade with her. Unfortunately Canada has been dabbling in such things herself in late years. The international gold standard of Bretton Woods is another example. I could go on naming them, but that will do for the moment. The great problem we must solve is that of making available to the areas of the world that need it the surpluses of wealth produced by the richer countries, such as Canada and the United States, which are working under an incentive system. And we must do it without reducing the independence of the people we help, and certainly without killing or discouraging their struggling industries. These things can be done; they are not impossible.

An international commodities clearing house such as we have proposed from time to time would help very greatly, and great help would also come through the expansion of the idea of technical assistance for backward areas, under the Colombo plan. But let me say that it would have to be a big expansion, not just a miserable million dollars a year. It would have to be a big expansion of these ideas; and there will have to be a most unselfish approach to the whole problem if it is to be solved.

This year Canada increased her contribution to the Colombo plan by $1 million. Mr. Speaker, I do not have to say that was niggardly and that it was not at all representative of the wishes of an unselfish Canadian people, generally. You know, the government of Canada and that of the United States —particularly that of the United States—have been crediting themselves with some unusual virtues for doing in just a small way under the Colombo plan and the Point Four program the things that have actually been necessary for their own survival. The United States has proved conclusively that the huge gifts to other countries, gifts running to scores of billions of dollars since 1945, did not hurt her economy in any way, nor did it reduce the standard of living of the American people. Rather it kept employment and economic activity in that country at a very high level. And these huge gifts, one might say, did not alter or change in any way the basic economic structure of the United States—nor that of Canada, so far as we have gone. It is interesting, however, to note that the attempt of the United States about a year and a half ago to cut down their overflow of gifts to other countries under these plans did bring about in that country a recession that threatened to bog down into a real depression.

Now, with the wonderful scientific resources at our disposal the possibilities for the production of new wealth are almost limitless. I think it is a sad commentary on our so-called enlightenment that we have let our political and economic systems and our standards of morality lag far behind, to the great disservice of humankind the world over. Our country, and the world today, is faced with the greatest challenge of all times. We are challenged to work out new ideas—and they must be new—and new techniques to guide the free part of the world through what I conceive as an era of unparalleled expansion and development, which I think could be realized all over the world if we could only achieve a real change of heart, get down to business and solve first the problem of distribution and then the problem of war. Solving the first—that is the problem of distribution—certainly would contribute to a great extent to the solution of the second, which is war.

I am not suggesting that we should suddenly begin giving billions to the Colombo plan, but surely we must appear ridiculous and parsimonious to the world when we grudgingly increase our contribution by a million dollars a year. India herself can use much more than she is getting through the plan; and there is some reason, it seems to me, for urgency in bringing more help to India's teeming millions through the Colombo plan and the Point Four program. Russia sees the immense advantage of making an offer of substantial economic assistance to India—or at least promising it—because recently she promised or offered to build a steel plant for that country with a capacity of a million tons a year. That sort of thing is something which arouses the imagination of the people of India.

My reason, Mr. Speaker, for taking as much time as I have on this matter tonight is the hope that the government will re-examine its proposals and bring in provision for an increase of more than a paltry million dollars over last year's contribution. Such an increase would demonstrate our thankfulness to a provident Creator and demonstrate the kind of love for our fellow men that Christian nations should be demonstrating in times like these. It would demonstrate our political sagacity in a world of conflicting ideological manoeuvres and would demonstrate our economic good sense, because the contributions we might make would reflect themselves in increased economic activity and employment in our own country.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the agricultural situation in Canada. The speech from the throne painted a rosy picture of general conditions in Canada. It says nothing, however, about the real condition of agriculture. I would like to point out that the farmers of Canada have just passed through a most difficult year, not only because of the low yield of wheat in the west but because of the weather conditions. Harvesting weather was poor in many places. Not only that; they are still caught firmly in the price-cost squeeze. That price-cost squeeze has been getting worse continually since 1951. The spread between the prices obtained by the farmers for their products and the cost of production is today the widest it has been for many, many years. There seems to be every prospect, too, that it may widen even more. The price of cattle and hogs is not expected to improve at all this year. Experts I have heard speak just recently suggest that those prices probably will decline to some extent.

Everybody knows that 1951 was a good year for the farmers, for in that year price and cost levels were about the same. But immediately after 1951 there was a strong downward movement of farm prices, while costs of production have remained almost exactly the same as they were in 1951. Retail prices of food have not followed the downward trend of farm prices, which leads a great many uninformed people to blame the farmers for the high retail prices of many food items.

It is claimed that with the recent wheat movements into Europe, and with the generally reduced yields in western Canada, the wheat outlook is somewhat improved. But it is mighty hard to convince the farmers—the farmer, for instance, who has not yet been able to deliver even his first quota—that the situation has improved.

Something was said about cheese. Two and a half million pounds of cheese are coming into Canada from New Zealand. Just yesterday I heard one of the agricultural experts of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture state that the reason given by officials for allowing that cheese to come into Canada was to assist New Zealand to balance or come near to balancing an unbalanced trade with Canada. Now, if that is the case—I am not saying it is, but I heard it yesterday afternoon over television—then one can justifiably say that what we are trying to do is make the cheese producers, the milk producers of Canada, subsidize the industrial production of Canada for export to another land. That subsidization business has been done before. The farmers have been asked on occasion to subsidize the whole of the Canadian people, to bear the whole cost of cheap bread, and they certainly subsidized the people of Britain under the British wheat agreement. This subsidization business piled on the shoulders of the farmers of Canada has gone just too far in many instances.

The farmers of Canada today are operating under quite a number of serious handicaps in addition to those I have already mentioned. I could mention that the Canadian dollar remains at a premium over that of the United States. It has varied in the past year at rates up to 4 per cent. The government of course says that the strong position of the Canadian dollar is an indication of how strong the Liberal party has made the Canadian economy. Well, from the farmers' point of view and that of all other exporters, it was a very sorry day when the Minister of Finance removed the peg on the rate of exchange of the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar. The present premium position of the Canadian dollar does mean a difference of 6 or 7 cents a bushel to the Canadian wheat farmer, and more than that if you consider the discount position of the Canadian dollar not so long ago.

Let me mention another handicap. Some time ago the United States adopted a policy of disposing of surpluses of food by accepting the currencies of the buying or importing countries in payment. There was a limit of $200 million set on such transactions in the beginning, but according to the U.S. News and World Report the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, recently said that the limit had been increased to a billion dollars. That puts the Canadian farmers under pretty serious handicaps. This government of course closed its mind to any such suggestion as accepting at least some sterling in settlement of our trade balances with Britain.

Last year you will recall that this group moved an amendment calling on the government to seek to restore and maintain our traditional markets for farm products by agreeing to accept some currencies of the importing countries, at least to the extent which we could easily finance internally. At that time the claim was made by the government that Britain did not want to do that kind of business. Unfortunately that claim was also made by other people. I did not believe it at the time, and I do not believe it yet. I had the opportunity of talking about it with several quite prominent members of parliament at Westminster during this past summer, and without a single exception they thought the proposal was good and worth while, and that it offered no unsurmountable problem to the United Kingdom. One of those to whom I talked was the son-in-law of the British Prime Minister. As a result of this government's lack of foresight and courage to take effective action and face up to the realities of world problems, our farmers find themselves under very serious handicaps in comparison with the farmers of other countries, notably those of the United States.

A third handicap is that there is strong opposition in the government to the adoption of really effective price supports. As a result we in Canada have very few of them, and the consequence is that there is a very wide spread between what the farmer has to pay, his costs, and what he receives for his hard work. Opposition to support prices for farm products is not confined to the government. I have seen various biased and uninformed interests, in eastern Canada especially, who take a violent stand against support prices. I notice, for instance, that Toronto Saturday Night, in its last issue, devoted its front page editorial to a tirade against support prices for farm products. All the opponents of the idea used the experience of the United States as evidence that price supports are bound to induce huge unsaleable surpluses of food products.

There is some argument, in my judgment, against the use of rigid supports based on a high percentage of parity, such as has been used in the United States. From the farmer's point of view, of course, the argument is mainly for such rigid supports. But from the point of view of the nation as a whole and world trade, a rigid system of price supports can cause great difficulties, indeed has caused great difficulties. We realize that; but the same cannot be said about a flexible system of price supports. There is a very good case that can be made in favour of the adoption of such a flexible system here in Canada, the percentage of parity that is used of course to depend upon the amount of incentive which ought to be provided to achieve the amount of production that is required to meet the need.

The farmers of Canada have every right to expect this government to introduce a system of flexible price supports for farm products, at least as long as the government maintains protective tariffs on industrial products, tariffs which are, as everybody should know, a form of subsidized support prices. If everything were free to be influenced by the law of supply and demand it would be difficult to argue for support for farm prices, flexible or otherwise. But things which the farmer has to buy and which enter into his costs of production are not free. That is the rub. We never hear the opponents of farm support prices putting up any arguments against protective tariffs that are aimed at supporting our industries against the competition of foreign industry, but they will argue and argue against the adoption of flexible farm support prices.

The problem we face in this country is to adopt some policy and some technique which will guarantee the farmers their fair share of the national income. The figures will bear out what I say. The farmers, who make up approximately 20 per cent of the population of Canada, received in 1953 only 9·9 per cent of the national income. I am speaking here of course of income originating in agriculture. We have to allow for the fact that some farmers do get income from other sources, but even allowing for that the percentage would certainly be no more than about 11 per cent.

I say the problem to be faced in a country like Canada is to adopt a policy which will guarantee the farmers a fair share of the national income. It would be only just and right if the farmers as a class make up 20 per cent of the total population of our country that they should receive something like 20 per cent of the national income. There has hardly been a time in the history of this country when this has been the case.

Some means will have to be found to help our farmers, under the archaic policy this government persists in following, to receive a just and fair return on their capital investment, their hard work and their managerial skill.

I point out that it is going to be pretty difficult for young people to start in farming. In these days it requires a pile of money to get started in the farming business. If we do not take every measure that is possible to help to make our farming population prosperous, then there can be no hope that the rest of us can ever enjoy any measure of continued prosperity. There is a relationship, as has already been pointed out this afternoon, between declining farm income and the growing unemployment in Canada.

In concluding this part of what I have to say, Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter I should like to mention. One hears a good deal of unfair criticism of the farmers, and particularly of the prairie provinces, in connection with the price feeders in the east and in British Columbia have to pay for their feed grain. It is not the fault of the farmers at all, although they are too often given the blame.

I think there is a situation here in Ontario that should be thoroughly investigated. Feeders often order feed of a specific grade—say grade five or six—and they are charged prices on the basis of those grades. When they receive the feed the farmers often find that somewhere along the line, after the grain has been shipped out of the prairie provinces, dealers have mixed into it a grossly inferior quality with the result that the feeders do not get the grades they order and are made to pay for.

The Canadian wheat board claim this is outside their jurisdiction and that they cannot do anything about it. Well, somebody should be in a position to investigate it and take corrective action. I say this government is in a position to do so, especially since it is subsidizing freight costs of much of the feed shipped into eastern Canada from the west.

I think, too, that the recent Stephen F. Murphy case points up the need for a very careful examination of some of the Canadian wheat board practices in connection with the shipment, or attempted shipment, of feed grains from the prairies into British Columbia. It should not be beyond the abilities of the members of the wheat board and of the board of grain commissioners to work out some method whereby individual feeders of poultry or livestock can buy and ship their own feed grain supplies without the interference or silly regulations of the wheat board.

All these things, and more I could mention, lead the farmers of Canada to feel that this government has failed them very badly. Taken as a whole the farmers in western Canada, at least, feel they are looked upon by the government as second-class citizens, and something will have to be done to correct this situation.

An eye should also be kept on the Crowsnest freight rate. There are forces seeking to cancel this freight rate, and they should not be allowed to do so until such time as the freight rates generally have been equalized, and until we are certain that through the equalization principle justice will be meted out to western Canadian farmers.

There are other things on which I would like to have spoken, but I see my time has now expired and I certainly do not wish to go beyond it even by a minute.

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate at this time one would have thought by now we would have learned something from the opposition and from those who wish certain changes to be made before the final adoption of the address, so ably moved by my two colleagues the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick). To the congratulations already offered them I add mine, and also my good wishes for their success in this house.

It is too bad, Mr. Speaker, but the confusion which seemed to arise from the nature of the amendment would lead one to suppose the opposition has found very little fault with the contents of the address. What they have to suggest are additions rather than changes.

As to the proposed program of the government, it seems to me to be comprehensive and to provide for all the inadequacies of previous legislation. The program, I suggest, is a broad one, and when fully implemented will give general satisfaction. On the domestic scene there seems to be something for everyone who has a just and reasonable claim for government assistance. Once again our security program is well balanced and integrated.

Further afield it may be noted that the government continues to take a firm stand, along with other free nations in the world, with respect to our commitments as a member of the United Nations Organization, and also in connection with the vexed question of the inclusion of Germany in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

While I have no intention of singing the praise of the government for all the measures proposed in the address, I do wish to comment on one or two of them. One is the question of the rearmament of Germany. In common with all hon. members in this house I am opposed to the rearmament of Germany or any other nation, including ourselves. Any sensible person who has any knowledge of war and its consequences can take no other stand. But I do believe that if we are looking toward the perfect world envisioned by the Saviour, then it must be reached by progressive steps; and one of those steps is to make sure that those who do not agree with our point of view are prevented from taking any aggressive measure which would negate the progress which has already been made.

In my view there is justification for the calculated risk; and under the present circumstances, having calculated the risk, I feel we have no alternative but to accept the view of the government, in concert with our western allies, and agree to what appears to be the lesser risk by including West Germany in the defensive alliance.

I have mentioned the progress already made. In this connection I wish to emphasize the great and growing influence of Canada as a world power. This is really a unique position for a country so young as ours and one which is due, I think, to the confidence other nations have in the government of this country and its great leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

If I may indulge in a little flattery and select one of his cabinet ministers I would mention our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). How he manages to carry the great burdens of his office and still maintain such a buoyant personality is beyond me, but I have no doubt he draws on the Prime Minister's inexhaustible store of energy. In any event I am sure they have not only the admiration but the gratitude of all Canadians.

We have also been served very well this summer at the United Nations by our delegation. To his well known gift of persuasive and polished speech the vice-chairman of that delegation added a remarkable skill in the drafting of difficult resolutions, and I am sure the prestige of Canada did not suffer by the contribution of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

In turning to one or two of the items mentioned in the address, may I say I am delighted to learn that the act concerning disabled persons has been proclaimed. It remains only for the provinces to arrange administrative machinery at the local level to make effective this most desirable and helpful measure.

Now I come to a very vexed question. I wonder whether I dare mention war veterans allowances, because I am considered somewhat of a rebel in this regard. It might be thought appropriate if the discussion on this question were deferred until the amendments are brought before the house by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) but I am going to mention it now because I have some suggestions to make. Furthermore, I suspect that there will be many members of this house who will wish to put in a claim for the credit for what is to be done. In fact, we have had many of them named already, and I do not want to appear to be one of them.

A great deal of nonsense has been talked about war veterans allowances. The fact that it is an allowance for assistance and not a pension for a disability has seemingly been obscured and lost sight of. Originally the scheme was based upon the implied and, to me, unwarranted assumption that all those who served in an actual battle area were ipso facto prematurely aged by ten years. Veterans, and particularly those of the first war, know that simply is not true. Certainly I will not accept it as a fact.

I was going to ask the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) to allow me to use him as an example. He is not in his seat, and I regret that fact, but I am going to use him anyway because I am sure he will not object. One has only to look at my good friend the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich to doubt the statement that a man with battle service is prematurely aged by ten years. If anybody had front-line service, he certainly had it and in good measure. But I doubt that he would be flattered by the thought that his chronological age is not a true measure of either his appearance or his vigour. If anybody likes to tell me that I look to be 77, I will argue it out with him.

Nevertheless, it is perfectly true that there are some amongst the recipients of war veterans allowance whose experiences were such as to take a heavy toll of their strength. I am thinking particularly of the man of the first war who experienced long periods of extreme fatigue during the trench warfare days, followed by exhausting battle experiences in the prolonged and grim struggles toward the end of that war. Also I am thinking of the prisoners of war who, after those experiences I have just described, had the added agonies of being treated inhumanely in prisoner of war camps. That point need not be elaborated. I can agree, and even assert, that such men have suffered to the extent that their ability to become rehabilitated in civilian life has been impaired and that they suffer disability despite the fact that their medical history sheets do not show it.

I wonder if I may speak to the veterans in this house. How many of us remember having a medical examination immediately prior to discharge? I do not. Yet I must have had one because I was discharged as A-1. I suspect, though, that the boys of the second war were wiser or perhaps better advised, because I rather fancy they see to it that they get everything on their medical history sheets.

As a means of settling this disturbing question of war veterans allowance, my suggestion to the minister is this. Surely the experience of his medical advisers, of himself and of the fine men who administer the affairs of the veterans affairs department is such that, in the light of their present knowledge, they can devise some formula or criterion to be applied to the recipients of war veterans allowance in order to determine whether in fact their experiences during the war were such as to impair their physical or mental capacities. If that can be shown, perhaps by examination of their battle records, then I say that these men should be granted the disability pension. Such injuries are real and can be as devastating, I am quite sure, as an actual gunshot wound. Their names could be removed from these long lists of recipients of war veterans allowance. Surely nowadays we know that all hurts are not measured in medical terms.

I have such great confidence in the ability of the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs that I feel sure they could come up with some formula or plan such as I suggest and eliminate these people who have a just claim for injury although it is not shown on the medical history sheets. This would leave all those who should be assisted as recipients of straightforward assistance without any implication of reward for service or pension or anything else. I know it is a difficult job, but I do not think it is beyond the ability of the officials.

To conclude this harangue on war veterans allowance may I say this. In my view, to increase payments as is now proposed is good and desirable, but it is not the complete answer because, as somebody has said, once you grant assistance you create a pressure group, and so long as the group about which I have been speaking is included, there will continue to be further pressure. If I may coin a phrase, it would be to say this: Sufficient is not always enough.

This being the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, it is traditional that one should say something about his own province and his own constituency. In my case these are British Columbia and the capital city, Victoria. When I first spoke in this house, on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in the first session, I stressed the importance of transportation and stated that transportation facilities are essential to the development of my province and, indeed, of all provinces.

Here I am going to parallel something that was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party because in the press I notice that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) has urged the provinces to "get on with it" in connection with the building of the trans-Canada highway. I am not facetious when I say that I hope the eyebrows of the Minister of Public Works will not rise too high when I suggest that if he expects the trans-Canada highway to be completed in a reasonable number of years, he had better do it himself; and if he ever gives it a thought, he might consider asking his colleagues to consent to his asking this house for funds to do it as a federal venture.

I am one of those who believe that before too many years, with the development of transportation and freight on the highways, we shall have to have some form of federal highway authority, charged with responsibility for the construction and maintenance of highways which can truly be said to be interprovincial, perhaps traversing or connecting two or three provinces. That may be a long way off. The seed I am casting may fall on stony ground, but seeds have been known to sprout in unlikely places.

It was my intention, Mr. Speaker, to confine my remarks on transportation to a serious situation which confronts my own constituency, the city of Victoria, Esquimalt and the surrounding area. I say this seriously because the transportation facilities by sea between the lower end of Vancouver island and the mainland city of Vancouver are worse now than they have ever been in my lifetime. It is my hope that I may be permitted to lay detailed suggestions before the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). I sometimes wish that more members from the eastern provinces would follow the example of the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) who made his initial visit to the Pacific coast this past summer. They then would perhaps be able to follow me more clearly and understand the problem which confronts us.

For 50 years the British Columbia coast service of the Canadian Pacific Railway provided a first-class steamship service between Victoria and Vancouver and other ports, a service which could only be described as luxurious, with fine, fast ships beautifully kept and operated with high efficiency. In fact that line was the pride of the coast. Then the war took its toll of those ships. In the meantime new and faster methods of transportation, such as aircraft, skimmed the cream off the passenger traffic between Vancouver and Victoria except during the tourist season. When you realize that Trans-Canada Air Lines operate fourteen flights a day each way even in the winter—of course we do not have any winter in Victoria—you can realize how many passengers are lost to the steamship service. The result is that it is not profitable for the Canadian Pacific Railway to continue the former boat service.

While the competition for passenger traffic has been the major factor in the deterioration of the service, the failure to replace obsolescent ships with modern ferries has also been a contributing factor. The great development in the northern end of Vancouver island, where the establishment of new pulp mills and plywood plants seems almost a daily occurrence, makes it imperative that the port of Nanaimo be fully and adequately developed. That has been done by the C.P.R. They have provided modern vessels, new ferries able to handle fast, heavy, freight trucks.

Mr. Speaker, what I shall further say is intended in no sense to detract from the importance of Nanaimo, nor is it in any sense our intention to put Victoria in competition with the northern part of the island. Nanaimo serves the northern part of the island and Victoria the southern part. What we are demanding is a separate service which, with the assured growth of the northern part of the island and a like development in the south, will be to the benefit of the whole province and the whole country.

Be it remembered that 52 per cent of the population of Vancouver island reside south of the height of land known as the Malahat, and that Victoria and vicinity contain over 135,000 persons. Whatever happens elsewhere, Nanaimo is ideally situated to serve the central and northern portion of the island but it cannot, because of the distance, adequately satisfy the needs of the south. Yet that is what we are asked to put up with. Passenger service by sea from Victoria to Vancouver is provided by obsolete ships running on a schedule which makes no attempt to connect with the transcontinental railways. It may surprise hon. members to know that in order to catch the train leaving Vancouver at 7.30 in the evening one has to leave Victoria the night before and stay over in Vancouver for a complete day.

An hon. Member: You are lucky.

Mr. Fairey: Moreover, the distance is too great and the voyage too long to appeal to ordinary businessmen. It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that freight now moves chiefly on wheels by means of large, heavy trucks, and Victorians are asked to be satisfied with, and to pay the additional costs for, a freight haul first from Vancouver to Nanaimo and then 70 miles to Victoria over a highway not suited for the traffic.

What is the remedy? It seems remarkable to me that a company that has enjoyed a monopoly of traffic for many years, and which has given good service, cannot see that there is a remedy easily available. No one expects the company to continue to operate this service at a loss. Therefore I make the suggestion that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), after examining the details, consent to having a proper engineering examination made of the whole of the Saanich peninsula. There are at least three sites on the Saanich peninsula, one of them being Sidney, which can be developed into year-round, every day of the year ports to which fast, modern ships could sail from Vancouver or Steveston, thereby reducing the sea voyage to a distance comparable with that between Vancouver and Nanaimo. The advantage to the southern end of the island would be that the freight haul on land would be 18 miles as against 70 miles from Nanaimo.

I have brought this matter before the house knowing full well that many members are not particularly interested and perhaps not particularly concerned, but it is a matter of importance for Victoria, a capital city, which is being left to stagnate while other parts of the country are growing by leaps and bounds.

I am deliberately trying to reduce the length of my remarks because I know it is the intention of all of us to have this debate concluded as soon as possible, but I wish to mention one other matter.

So far, with the exception of my remarks on transportation, I have contented myself with discussing matters that are referred to in the speech from the throne. There were one or two points, however, that I hoped would be mentioned but which were not. There is no reference to the possibility of the establishment of a Canada council as recommended by the royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences. I mention this first of all because of a fairly recent article in a periodical which delights in finding fault with anything that the government proposes. The article referred sarcastically to this recommendation of the commission as asking for the appointment of an expensive body to do a job which the universities can do without further advice.

In the second place, because for many years I have personally championed vocational and technical education, I have been accused in my own province of not being interested in the arts or the humanities. Why is it, Mr. Speaker, that we always seem to be faced with a choice? We are either one thing or the other. We never seem to be given credit for being interested in two things at the same time. It is my experience that most people with competence in the technical field are a good deal more interested in the arts and humanities than many who pose as intellectuals. It seems to me that we have been subsidizing industry in many ways for the production of articles and tangible things. Why should we not now subsidize in some way those capable Canadians who are able and willing, with help, to produce those intangibles which we all really crave?

We boast proudly of our stature as a nation and our position in the councils of the world. As members of parliament we content ourselves with spending our time in dealing with things and not with people. It seems to me that we should now devise some form of subsidy to encourage capable Canadians in the production of those things which we crave, and thus provide for the rest of us an opportunity to grow in mental stature and appreciation of those intangibles, the enjoyment of which brings to man his fullest development. It would be my hope that before this session ends the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might find it possible to make an announcement with regard to this important matter.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): At the very outset I want to convey my congratulations in the traditional way to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Also at this time I should congratulate the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) upon his wonderful contribution to the debate this afternoon. To the new members of the house I want to say a word of welcome and congratulations, and to add that they will find the other members tolerant and friendly people.

Since I am speaking tonight on the amendment to the amendment, I believe I should read it. It reads as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "Your Excellency's advisers" the following words:
> "have deliberately returned to the policy of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise which resulted in the depression and unemployment of the pre-war years, and that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to undertake the economic planning necessary to cope with the serious problems now facing the Canadian people, and".

The British people, Mr. Speaker, repudiated such a program a few years ago and have demonstrated that the policy they are now following has lifted them out of a desperate situation. It would be folly of the worst kind, I feel, for us to accept the suggestions in the amendment to the amendment put forward by the socialists in this house.

Now, referring to the speech from the throne itself, I personally feel that it is the greatest disappointment I have experienced in the 12 or 13 sessions I have attended. It is a record of history instead of a call to action. When labour, fiscal and trade problems are uppermost in the minds of most of our citizens I believe one may aptly say of the throne speech, "They asked for bread and received a stone." I just want to contrast that with President Eisenhower's state of the union message delivered a day or so ago. There was not a word of the past in it, but it was full of hope, work and direction for the future. This year the President was concerned with a world half slave and half free.

Just while I am dwelling on that I want to mention a name probably forgotten by many; that is Clarence Darrow. He said that he who admits of a changing world admits the theory of evolution. In spite of all our beliefs, we must admit that this is a changing world; no one can deny it. The fault I see with the throne speech and with the government is that they have hitched their trading and fiscal policies to an inflexible system or plan, supervised and ruled from outside our shores. This same government has made or tried to make a fetish of everything Canadian, and has severed every possible connection with commonwealth countries in an economic way. They have tied our trade system to international control.

I believe we all admit that the theory of GATT is probably an ideal in today's unsettled world, but we, along with our United States friends, are a practical people. Being practical, how can we tolerate a trade policy that fails to take into consideration our inflated economy, a 48-cent dollar, our high prices and high standard of living with consequent high production costs as compared with many of the other countries competing in the markets of the world with our Canadian products? Labour, may I suggest, is fully aware of the fact that tariffs protect not only industry but the labourers in industry. I need refer to only one industry in our economy in that connection, the textile industry. Just here I might interpose the question, does Canada want a textile industry?

The government has continued to ignore the Canadian producer in deference to the consumer cost of living index. In other words, they are more interested in cheap consumer goods than in employment. I make reference here to just two items, textiles and cheese. When I speak of cheese I am bound to ask what has become of the much vaunted price support program that the party in power has told us about throughout these years? Now that the farmers are in difficulty the government has sabotaged our great basic dairy industry. I want to ask, of what advantage is it to the housewife to have cheap consumer goods if her husband is unemployed and she has not the wherewithal to buy them? What benefit is it to thousands of Canadian farmers who have had extremely poor crops this year and are not in a position to purchase these so-called cheap goods?

In my area of southwestern Ontario there are hundreds and hundreds of acres of white beans under the snow that are unharvested and never will be harvested. They will be a total loss. There are thousands of acres of soybeans as yet unharvested, and there are many thousands of acres that never will be harvested. This applies to corn as well. I assure the government that the purchasing power of agriculture in southwestern Ontario has been severely reduced.

I want to mention also that, necessary as it is, the tinkering with unemployment insurance payments will never cure the causes of unemployment. Again in the speech from the throne the unemployment problem has been soft-pedalled and underestimated. Many hon. members recall the slogans of the Liberal party in the days of Mackenzie King, the full dinner pail and later on full employment. Apparently the government has forgotten about that. Canada, with her vast natural resources which my leader so aptly mentioned this afternoon, is the last country in the world that should be suffering from unemployment. If we would just process and market the natural resources of our country instead of importing employment from abroad, we would provide work for our people. What we actually need is a revised fiscal and trade policy.

I am just going to mention here that what we need is a policy designed, as was Sir John A. Macdonald's, on the basis of tariffs for the protection of labour and industry, not a tariff for government income as exists today. Many tariff items should and could be reduced if it were not for the government's failure to put their house in order and practise economy.

I just want to say a word here to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). I sympathize with him, as did my leader this afternoon, in the difficult task he has undertaken. This year the city of London is celebrating its centennial year. Some time ago it was mooted that London would issue wooden nickels, and there was a suggestion to the effect that this would not be allowed. Anyway, they have issued the wooden nickels; and I would point out to the minister that no longer can Canadians demand gold for the dollar bill, which is also made of wood. When I think of the resources in the city of London I believe I would just as soon have their wooden nickels, because they are convertible in that city, and that is where I purchase most of the things I buy.

Last week we observed a triumvirate of the cabinet going, hats in hands, to Washington to, let us say, get a better deal, or a new deal, or some kind of deal over there, but coming back empty-handed. Canadians have been led to believe that an aura of infallibility surrounds cabinet ministers, but I think what we have seen happening in the last few months has destroyed that state of mind, and that it will never be believed again. Their very purpose in going to Washington was to avert the catastrophe that we in the opposition have been pointing out to them for many years, when we said that they have been putting their trade eggs all in the American basket. History has shown over the years that the United States is not a dependable market.

There is also the question of the resignation of Mr. Graham Towers, hailed in this country as a financial wizard who could not be wrong. Does his resignation presage some change not altogether welcomed by him or by the government? There is more than appears on the surface, in my estimation.

One of the achievements of the former minister of finance, aided and abetted by the governor of the bank, was this 48-cent dollar, brought about in 16 years. Indirectly this has robbed the people who have saved for their old age. They have been deprived of 50 per cent of their savings, and it made penurious those on fixed incomes.

Canadians never again will indulge in the luxury of believing that the cabinet cannot be wrong. These men are mortal, just like the rest of us. Thousands of my constituents could give the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) a few pointers on deficit financing. Never since the thirties have so many people been in the same predicament as the government, with insufficient money to pay the bills. I suggest to the minister that he should be forced to do what they will have to do; first of all curtail or eliminate unnecessary expenditures, go without luxuries, and work at those enterprises giving the greatest hope for the production of new wealth.

I would remind the minister that thousands of Canadians who paid income tax last year will not be contributors in 1955. I would remind him that the 10 per cent sales tax will bear more heavily than ever on those who are least able to pay. I would remind him that the income from that source will likely diminish. I would remind him that individuals and industry alike, so far as taxation is concerned, are now bearing all that the traffic will bear. I would remind him again that our customs and excise structure is out of date. I would remind him also that tariff for revenue is excessive, and is not serving its original purpose. I would remind him that any increase in taxation is out of the question, and that the burden on the municipalities of caring for the unemployed is absolutely wrong, because from these very same people this government has taken in income tax almost a third of their earned income. It has taken in sales tax 10 per cent of the cost of most purchases; it has taken customs and excise duties on imported goods; and on some goods manufactured in this country it has imposed a tariff giving greater protection than necessary to the industry. And there is not much hope, because election year is too far away, to expect any tax reductions. None of us has forgotten that the stamp tax on cheques was removed, and that only a few months later postage rates were increased. People will not forget those things.

There is one further way, although perhaps a small one, in which the minister could reduce expenses. I would suggest that he fire the man who is responsible for the caricature of the Queen on our dollar bills.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

Most Canadians welcome assistance for the Colombo plan. The leader of the Social Credit party spoke about it tonight, and I listened to him with considerable interest. But I would remind the minister responsible for that department that Canadians are not pleased with the very limited purchases of Canadian technical and agricultural equipment, which limitation is greatly to the detriment of Canadian labour. Purchases are made in the United States, while Canadian labourers manufacturing farm machinery in Brantford, Toronto and Hamilton have been idle.

Canadians do not like that. They believe it is a good thing to assist in the Colombo plan, but they like to see the dollars spent in Canada, and I do not blame them. Let us spend as large a percentage as possible for the purchase of Canadian goods.

Then to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I wish to say a word or two about the window dressing in the province of Quebec. Between sessions there have been many items in the press regarding the difficulties of federal and provincial taxation. I believe all people in Canada watched with interest the progress of negotiations that were taking place. Though the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) during three or four sessions of parliament had pressed upon the government the need for a dominion-provincial conference to discuss taxation and other matters, this procedure was not deemed necessary by the government. But when the premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada got together they decided that was the right thing to do. Now Canadians are wondering about the silence on this subject in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Dufresne: Some members of the cabinet do not want any agreement with Quebec.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I think the Prime Minister owes an explanation to the country regarding his talks with the premier of Quebec. For years Liberals have talked about the unholy alliance between Drew and Duplessis, but now they find themselves in the same boat. If ever there were two men who should be able to resolve the difficulty and come out of it with national unity, certainly they are the men; and we are looking to them for an explanation.

With all the problems facing Canadians at this time I am alarmed to think that probably within the next two or three days there will be interruptions in the debate on the speech from the throne drawing the attention of the people away from the pressing problems of the day and from the pressure on the government, and directing their thoughts along other lines. If there was such haste about this the government could have called a session in the fall, as was suggested by my leader, and there would not have been this unseemly haste at this particular time.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in rising in this, the second session of this parliament, to take part in the throne speech debate, perhaps I shall open up on a different basis from the previous speakers. It is not my intention to offer any congratulations whatsoever to the government on the throne speech. They are not entitled to any congratulations whatsoever. A great many words were taken up in the speech from the throne in telling the members of the House of Commons, in telling the members of the other place and in telling the people of Canada, what they already knew very well, of their own knowledge and through the medium of the press, of visits of royalty and certain honourable people to our country. Many words were used in telling us of legislation that was passed at the last session which we all knew about because we voted on it.

A very few words in the speech from the throne were devoted to telling us of the government's plans. Yes, they told us in a very few words of some legislation that we are going to have to deal with in the House of Commons: changes in unemployment insurance, in blind pensions, and in other matters. Most certainly, Mr. Speaker, we welcome the notification that this is going to be done. But, sir, it is not a matter for congratulation, although it is welcome, that at long last the government is going to do at this session what it should have done last session and sessions before that.

The major reason I cannot offer congratulations on the message we had at the opening of this session is that the speech from the throne will go down in Canada as notable for what it did not say, not what it said. Today Canada is facing a great many serious economic problems, and we cannot find anywhere what the intentions of this government are; we cannot find anyone to give any advice to the House of Commons as to how the government is going to tackle the major economic problems that are facing our Dominion of Canada; how they are going to tackle the serious agricultural problems of our nation; how, outside of public works, they are going to tackle the over-all problem of full employment in our country. No word has been given to us as to the meaning of the hush-hush meetings between the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the premier of Quebec on a financial agreement, instead of calling, as has been demanded all across Canada, a meeting of all the provinces and the federal government on dominion-provincial financial relations.

On none of these things do we find any word of advice or prognostication, if I can put it that way, as to the government's approach to and study of these fundamental matters in the economy and politics of this dominion. It is because that is how I feel that I can appreciate very fully what the government are doing. They know very well that it is impossible to sell Canada on the government's record of accomplishment, of understanding or of vision, and on this I want to congratulate the government.

I do not know who the government's public relations officer is; but whoever he is, he is worth whatever he is paid, because when a government cannot stand on its record, or on its proposals, at the opening of parliament, there is one good thing to do, namely hide everything by building up an individual. In that respect, I want to congratulate the government. They are doing an excellent job. It is almost impossible to pick up a paper without finding not a government proposal but stories on "Uncle Louie".

I have had the privilege in the past year or so of meeting the Prime Minister for a matter of about only 30 seconds, but I have seen him often across the floor of the house and I honestly admit that I like him very much; I think he is a nice chap. But being a nice chap and the man we like, and seeing him in the papers with family groups, kissing babies, picking up a crying child in the station, is no answer at all to the problems of the Dominion of Canada. The answer is not in building up a man whom we adore as "Uncle Louie". It is in the government, in the speech from the throne and on the floor of this legislature, tackling the problems of the Dominion of Canada through the medium of policies and legislation.

In the weeks and months that lie before us we shall have the opportunity of speaking on numerous occasions; therefore on this occasion I am going to speak on only two or three aspects of our economy which I think are of importance. Admittedly they may seem a little repetitious but, sir, if repetition is required to get action, then it will have to be repetition. There is, without doubt, an unemployment situation in Canada. There are, without doubt, a number of unemployed who have no protection under municipal, provincial or federal law. I spoke on this last session and I am going to speak on it again. It is my humble opinion that the federal government is derelict in its responsibility to many in Canada who are without means at the present time.

Not so long ago the Prime Minister received a request for assistance for employable unemployed. If press reports are correct he turned it back as a responsibility of the provincial government. We all know the history of militaristic Germany, as far as treaties were concerned; they were scraps of paper.

An hon. Member: Don't forget Russia.

Mr. Winch: All right; include Russia if you like. We know their position as far as treaties were concerned. They were scraps of paper to be torn up any time they desired to do so. Morally and ethically this and previous Liberal governments are no better whatsoever. Promises are meaningless words to be forgotten when it is expedient to do so.

In British Columbia we face the problem of unemployment. It is not just our own unemployment for, because of our mild climate on the coast, we are left with the problem of unemployment from all across the Dominion of Canada. I never hope to see again the situation we had not many years ago when because of unemployment across Canada and on the mainland of British Columbia a Liberal premier at Ottawa turned the police loose with tear gas and batons on the unemployed, and when a Liberal premier in British Columbia, under federal authority, turned the police loose. That was the occasion on which a Liberal mayor of Vancouver read the riot act to men and women able to work, desirous of work, but denied the opportunity and denied the sustenance of life.

That happened under Liberal governments, municipal, provincial, and federal. Now we have the same situation in Vancouver today and this government refuses to accept the responsibility. I wish that we who are well fed, especially on the other side of the house, would have to join the line-ups at the soup kitchens established in Vancouver by the Salvation Army, the United Church and the central city mission, all of which turn away more than they can feed, even with soup. Only three weeks ago I saw people sleeping underneath the viaducts in Vancouver. These people had nowhere to go and no one would accept the responsibility.

It may be repetitious but I wish now to come back, as I did last session, to the commitment given by the Liberal government in 1945. The record clearly demonstrates the extent of the commitment made at that time by the then prime minister, Mackenzie King, and also clearly demonstrates the understanding of that commitment by the premier and minister of finance of the province of British Columbia. In the published proposals of the government of Canada for 1945 at page 26 the government stated:

> In the inter-war years, particularly in the 1930's, the public investment expenditures of provincial and municipal governments were much larger than those of the dominion government. It is highly desirable that other governments agree to accept similar timing policies to those that the dominion proposes for its own program. The dominion proposes to give positive encouragement to provincial and municipal governments to follow these practices. Encouragement to prior planning will be offered by—

Then it deals with the method by which this will be offered. On the same page we find the following:

> In the timing of projects the dominion would concern itself only with employment considerations, leaving to the provincial and municipal governments the direction of their own investments, subject to the dominion having discretion to determine in any one year the total value of projects, if any, on which it would pay timing grants within any province. It would also of course authorize the grant for projects whose execution would extend over several years.

On page 42 we find the following:

> As a part of the general arrangement with the provincial governments, the dominion government now proposes to establish a practicable and comprehensive system of assistance to able-bodied unemployed persons as soon as possible, rather than waiting until the need for it actually arises.

Later it adds:

> The dominion is therefore accompanying its proposal for general acceptance of responsibility with a concrete plan for its implementation in the field of assistance for employable unemployed persons.

Now, what was the understanding of the provinces when they signed the taxation agreement? I can speak only for British Columbia. These are the official records of what was understood by the government of British Columbia as to the acceptance of responsibility for employable unemployed by the federal government, and that was the acceptance of responsibility for a 20 per cent grant on municipal and provincial public projects to be undertaken in time of unemployment.

I do not wish to quote at length, but here is a statement of government policy by the Hon. John Hart, a former premier of British Columbia, made on February 17, 1947, on the floor of the legislature. He stated:

> Coupled with the financial plan were certain social security proposals in which the dominion agreed among other things:—
> (1) To accept full financial and administrative responsibility for the relief of employable unemployed . . .
> In addition, the dominion outlined a public investment program designed to maintain high-level employment. Under this plan, the dominion government offered to share in the cost of planning acceptable provincial or municipal projects and to pay a grant of 20 per cent of the actual cost of construction of these projects if they were executed at a time designated by the dominion.

That statement was by a Liberal premier who was at the conference. Now we have the statement of the Hon. Byron I. Johnson, another Liberal premier of British Columbia, who had this to say on government policy on March 5, 1948:

Only part of this program has been put into effect. That is to say, seven of the nine provinces have entered into tax agreements with the dominion, but are waiting for a completion of the arrangement which can only be considered final when the social security measures have been instituted.

Then we have the speech of the then minister of finance for British Columbia on March 17, 1948, when he stated:

In outlining the general situation to us the then premier commented on the original dominion proposals as presented to the dominion-provincial conference in August, 1945, which coupled with the financial plan certain social security proposals in which the dominion agreed, among other things:—

(1) To accept full financial responsibility for the relief of the employable unemployed.

And then—

(5) A public investment program in which they would pay a grant of 20 per cent of the actual cost of construction of certain projects if they were undertaken at a time to which the dominion concurred.

We signed again, but in 1950 we find the minister of finance had this to say at page 55 of his budget speech:

The negotiations with the federal government originated from certain proposals made by that government in 1945, when it offered to make itself responsible for a vast number of social services and other beneficial fiscal changes which finally were to become known as the "green book" proposals. It was assumed by the provinces who signed the existing tax agreements that the "green book" proposals would be implemented when a majority of the provinces signed the new agreement. I think I am quite right in saying that everybody thought that—

Then on the following page we find this:

When the tax agreement was entered into last year, assurances were given by Prime Minister Mackenzie King that these proposals would be implemented when a sufficient number of provinces had signed agreements. He did not say that all provinces had to agree; he simply stated a sufficient number. It is the contention of this government that the time has arrived when social security proposals should be discussed with the dominion government.

That is the record. I sincerely hope that the Prime Minister is not going to allow Canada, through its government, to reach a position where its word does not mean any more than a German treaty. Here is where the responsibility lies. British Columbia should not be held responsible for its employable unemployed and, in particular, for those who come in from other provinces.

I often heard quoted on the floor of this house in the past session the number of unemployed. But, Mr. Speaker, the number of unemployed is of no importance at all when it comes to the matter of sustenance. If I am hungry, it makes no difference whether there are ten thousand unemployed or one million unemployed. Surely after the New Year's message of the Prime Minister—"Uncle Louie"—about Canada, as the head of this government it is his responsibility to see to it that nobody in the Dominion of Canada shall be hungry if he is able and willing to work but cannot get it. Whether the number is one or a million, as long as somebody is hungry it is our responsibility as legislators to see that, municipally, provincially or federally there is a security program to look after them.

I do not want to say any more about that matter at the moment but I wish to carry on and to speak of one other phase which has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey), namely the matter of highways and road construction. Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I say to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and to the cabinet that I find it difficult to understand why a progressive country like Canada is in one respect so far behind a country like the United States. If we can go by the Globe and Mail of this morning, the President of the United States announced that there was to be a ten-year plan under which the federal government was going to spend $101 billion on the modernization of highways in the United States; that already they admit a responsibility in the ratio of 60-40, federal and state, in respect of the financial costs of major roads; and that on the new plan to the extent of $24 billion they would accept the complete responsibility for highway construction or for major improvements. But in the preamble of their draft there is, I think, a significant statement which is as follows:

It is a key network from the standpoint of federal interest in productivity and civil defence.

I want to say that in our Canadian economy we have reached the time when the federal government should recognize its financial interest in the major roads of all provinces of the Dominion of Canada and in particular of the province of British Columbia, where we face a problem. Our province, north and south, is broken up by four mountain ranges. On the prairies I understand that the average cost is $40,000 a mile for first-class roads. But in British Columbia the cost is $240,000 a mile on the average, and we have even spent a million dollars a mile on many of our roads. You cannot just build one highway in British Columbia and serve the province.

The federal government, through the medium of roads, reaps the major benefit in income and corporation taxes on new industrial development and in the development of new natural resources. As they can be opened up only by major highway construction, surely this government should lay down a policy of financial responsibility.

I read in the press in the past few weeks some criticism by the Minister of Public Works in Ottawa to the effect that the provinces, including British Columbia, were not meeting their obligations in connection with the trans-Canada highway. Of course we are not doing so in British Columbia. It is impossible to spend all the money on that one road. We must open up the other major highways in our province. If this government had any vision at all and recognized just what it means in federal revenue to have first-class major highways in the provinces they would be investing now and not just doing as they are, namely contributing only 50 per cent on one highway through each province.

It is my considered opinion that it would be one of the finest investments the federal government could make if they would accept the major responsibility for the cost of construction of all major highways in the provinces of Canada, and let the provinces and the municipalities have the responsibility for the roads connecting the major highways. I think that would give a great impetus toward the solution of our unemployment problem, and that it would give an impetus to our provincial and our municipal governments to tackle the problem in a more effective manner.

I see that it is now almost ten o'clock. My time has only three minutes to run. Although I had more to say I shall leave it until a later date, because it would be wrong if I adjourned the debate with only three minutes to go. However, I want to conclude by saying through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister, and to the cabinet that they definitely made promises in 1945. We ask them to fulfil those promises. They can do a great deal more than the throne speech has stated. If they do not do so, the throne speech will go down as one of the most puerile things ever known in the history of the House of Commons.

On motion of Mr. Balcom the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: As the Prime Minister pointed out this afternoon, on the order paper there are 15 resolutions preceding money bills. I wonder if we could agree that tomorrow we might ask the Prime Minister to signify His Excellency's consent to all 15 resolutions rather than have 15 different ministers do so?

Mr. Knowles: Has he agreed?

Mr. Harris: The purpose of our understanding is that we shall deal with amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, taking the resolution and carrying it through to first reading of the bill. I should also like to announce that it has been agreed that we shall begin discussion of the protocol with respect to the North Atlantic treaty on Thursday, the 20th of January.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

PROTOCOL TO THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ON THE ACCESSION OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY, SIGNED AT PARIS, OCTOBER 23, 1954

The parties to the North Atlantic treaty signed at Washington on 4th April, 1949,

Being satisfied that the security of the north Atlantic area will be enhanced by the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to that treaty, and

Having noted that the Federal Republic of Germany has by a declaration dated 3rd October, 1954, accepted the obligations set forth in article 2 of the charter of the United Nations and has undertaken upon its accession to the North Atlantic treaty to refrain from any action inconsistent with the strictly defensive character of that treaty, and

Having further noted that all member governments have associated themselves with the declaration also made on 3rd October, 1954, by the governments of the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the French Republic in connection with the aforesaid declaration of the Federal Republic of Germany,

Article I

Upon the entry into force of the present protocol, the government of the United States of America shall on behalf of all the parties communicate to the government of the Federal Republic of Germany an invitation to accede to the North Atlantic treaty. Thereafter the Federal Republic of Germany shall become a party to that treaty on the date when it deposits its instruments of accession with the government of the United States of America in accordance with article 10 of that treaty.

Article II

The present protocol shall enter into force, when (a) each of the parties to the North Atlantic treaty has notified to the government of the United States of America its acceptance thereof, (b) all instruments of ratification of the protocol modifying and completing the Brussels treaty have been deposited with the Belgian government, and (c) all instruments of ratification or approval of the convention on the presence of foreign forces in the Federal Republic of Germany have been deposited with the government of the Federal Republic of Germany. The government of the United States of America shall inform the other parties to the North Atlantic treaty of the date of the receipt of each notification of acceptance of the present protocol and of the date of the entry into force of the present protocol.

Article III

The present protocol, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof shall be transmitted by that government to the governments of the other parties to the North Atlantic treaty.

In witness whereof, the undersigned representatives, duly authorized thereto by their respective governments, have signed the present protocol.

Signed at Paris, the twenty-third day of October, nineteen hundred and fifty-four.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 11, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

INCREASE IN AMOUNT THAT MAY BE EXPENDED ON MINISTERIAL AUTHORITY

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Gardiner: The purpose of the amendment is to make the act consistent with existing ministerial authority to enter into contracts for sums up to $15,000 as contained in the Financial Administration Act and regulations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIVING ALLOWANCE AND ATTENDANCE OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Yukon Act to increase the indemnity and the living allowance to be paid to members of the Yukon council while in attendance at a session of the council and to provide that under certain conditions a member shall be deemed to be in attendance at a session.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

INCREASE IN INDEMNITY OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Northwest Territories Act to increase the sessional indemnity of elected members of the Northwest Territories council.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

INCREASE IN ANNUAL APPROPRIATION TO GRADE CROSSING FUND

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Railway Act following the "Report on the Railway-Highway Crossing Problem in Canada", made by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to provide for an increase in the annual appropriation to the railway grade crossing fund from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000 and for certain changes in connection with the administration of the fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SALARY OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Financial Administration Act to provide that the Auditor General shall out of the consolidated revenue fund be paid a salary of twenty thousand dollars per annum with effect from July 1, 1954.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARY OF MINISTER AND EXPIRY OF ACT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Defence Production Act to increase the salary of the Minister of Defence Production from ten thousand dollars per annum to fifteen thousand and to repeal section 41 which provided for the expiry of the act on July 31, 1956.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS AND CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act to extend the benefits and the application of the act, and to provide further for certain changes in consequence thereof and also in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS AND CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act to extend the benefits of the act to certain persons in the service of Her Majesty who are not paid a direct wage or salary and to persons locally engaged outside of Canada; to provide for additional benefits where an employee dies as the result of an accident while absent on duty from his usual place of employment; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AND DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the Canadian forces to amend the National Defence Act to provide for the reinstatement under certain circumstances of a member of the Canadian forces who has been released, to place members of the Canadian forces in the same position as civilians in respect of judicial process, and to make certain other amendments to the act; also to amend the Defence Services Pension Act with respect to the payment to women of pensions or gratuities under certain circumstances, to extend the provisions relating to the augmentation of pension on re-enrolment, to extend the time within which an election may be made to count prior service, and to make certain other amendments to the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act to amplify the definition of "historic place", to change slightly the representation of the board, and to provide further for changes in the method and amount of payments to members appointed by the governor in council, of living and travelling expenses and to provide for the payment of stenographic allowances.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act to provide that a withdrawal allowance payable under the act will include certain of the interest that has been paid on contributions and to provide further that where a member or a former member dies certain of the amounts which he may owe under the act will not be recovered.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ORDER IN WHICH ITEMS OF BUSINESS TO BE CONSIDERED

Mr. Speaker: By agreement announced last night by the acting leader of the house, it was agreed that today we would take up the first resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour in committee of the whole. Is it agreed that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole?

Mr. Fulton: Could we have orders of the day?

Mr. Harris: We might consider it as a government order and postpone it until orders of the day have been called.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REFERENCE TO REPORTS OF NEAR ACCIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has received the report or has had his attention drawn to reports to the effect that pilots of T.C.A. have reported a large number of near accidents of a nature similar to that which was reported at Moose Jaw recently.

If so, has the hon. gentleman anything he would care to add to the statement he made yesterday?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I may say that we have received none of the complaints to which the hon. member has alluded. If complaints are made by responsible individuals, we shall be glad to investigate them.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF CANADA COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to address to the Prime Minister a question of which I think he will not require notice. Has the government decided upon the setting up of the Canada Council as envisaged by the Massey report? If so, what progress has been made in that direction?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government has not yet decided the question referred to by my hon. friend.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—CONFERENCES BETWEEN DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river is again at full height, is the minister in a position to advise what happened during the conferences between the dominion government and the provincial governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and also whether the people living on the North Saskatchewan river can expect any legislation at this session to make it an offence to cause wrongful pollution of interprovincial streams?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): With regard to the first part of my hon. friend's question the answer is yes. With regard to the second part, no decision has been reached as regards such legislation at this session.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RIGHT OF RAILWAY WORKERS TO STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister been made aware of the concern felt by the railway workers of Canada over the loss of their right to strike? Is the government taking steps either to assure these workers that they still have that right or to establish a satisfactory alternative?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): This question, I think, divides itself into two parts. In the first place the Minister of Labour has been made aware of the concern which would be felt by the non-operating unions of the railways in the event they were deprived of the right to strike. In the second place I am sure my hon. friend has noted that the general conference committee of the non-operating unions of the railways have been meeting in Montreal recently and are discussing questions directly related to the second part of his question. In due course the Minister of Labour would expect to be told about the conclusions reached at these discussions and I do not think that in the meantime the Minister of Labour should anticipate these reports.

WATER RESOURCES

REPORTED CONSTRUCTION OF DAM ON ARROW LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has any minister of the government of British Columbia informed the minister, or any minister of the government of Canada, of the details of the proposed agreement between the government of British Columbia and the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation for the construction of a dam on the Arrow lakes?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. As far as I am concerned, the answer is in the negative. As for my colleagues, I have inquired and as far as I can ascertain the answer is also in the negative.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister tell the house if the Canadian section of the international joint commission has received any information as to the details of this proposed agreement?

Mr. Lesage: According to my information the chairman of the Canadian section of the international joint commission, General McNaughton, received a telegram dated September 17, 1954, from Mr. Sommers, minister of lands and forests of British Columbia. It was sent in the afternoon and reads as follows:

Government of British Columbia proposes to enter into agreement with Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation allowing said company to erect dam on lower Arrow lakes to store 3 million acre feet of water. Payment for same to be 20 per cent of power generated on American side delivered free to British Columbia.

According to my information, General McNaughton answered this telegram on the morning of the 18th and suggested that no action be taken before the British Columbia government receives a copy of the report of new topographical studies of the Columbia system which were being made. The very same day Mr. Sommers answered General McNaughton by telegram telling him that British Columbia and Kaiser had already executed the agreement. I think that was the wording.

GRAIN

FINAL PAYMENT ON 1953-54 WHEAT POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say whether, as a method of helping to relieve the critical cash shortage amongst western farmers, the final payment on the 1953-54 wheat pool will be made at an early date?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Final settlement will be made when the wheat from that crop is sold. I cannot give the date of the final sale of that crop but I assure the hon. member that no time will be lost when the sale of the crop is completed.

RATES ON MOVEMENTS THROUGH VANCOUVER AND OTHER PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) asked me to make a statement about the pricing of wheat as between various Canadian ports and I am now prepared to do so. On February 16, 1954, the wheat board announced a new pricing policy which involved quoting separate prices daily for wheat in store Pacific coast ports, in store Fort William-Port Arthur and in store Churchill. At that time the board described its new policy as follows:

As a measure to establish more equality in wheat shipments from various parts of the prairie provinces, the board, for such period of time as may be necessary, is adopting a policy of making board wheat generally competitive in overseas markets irrespective of the port of shipment. Pursuant to this objective the board will take into account not only internal costs of moving wheat to seaboard positions but also the various ocean freight rates involved and such variations in the foregoing costs as may occur from time to time.

Pursuant to the new policy, on February 16, 1954, the price of wheat in store Fort William-Port Arthur was lowered by 7 cents per bushel under the price for wheat in store Vancouver. It was obviously not the intention of the wheat board at that time to establish a fixed differential between Fort William-Port Arthur and Vancouver. The purposes of the revised pricing system would have been absolutely defeated by such a policy. Actually the price relationship between board selling prices for wheat in store Fort William-Port Arthur and in store Vancouver has materially changed since February 16, 1954. Fort William-Port Arthur prices have been increased and Vancouver prices have been decreased, the result being that at the present time the in store Fort William price is only one cent a bushel below the in store Vancouver price on grades 1 to 4 northern and is identical with Vancouver on No. 5 wheat, No. 6 wheat and feed wheat.

In my opinion the board has been carrying out the policy enunciated last February of endeavouring to keep Canadian wheat generally competitive in overseas markets irrespective of the port of shipment. Daily price comparisons are made. The last comparison I have is for January 6. On that date No. 1 northern in store Fort William was $1.72 and in store Vancouver $1.74, a two cent spread as of that day. However, based on the cost of ocean freight that day the price of No. 1 northern shipped from Vancouver and landed in the United Kingdom would be $2.21 a bushel whereas the same grain shipped from eastern ports would be $2.22⅜ a bushel. On that particular day there was obviously a price advantage out of Vancouver. This does not necessarily mean that all purchasers would buy their wheat from Vancouver because there are other problems such as time of delivery and ability to find vessels willing to make the long voyage from Vancouver to the United Kingdom with wheat when just now higher revenues can be earned on shorter hauls. In order to keep rail freights on grain to a minimum it is necessary to keep all Canadian ports reasonably competitive in our principal European markets. Obviously, for shipments to Japan or South Africa or South America, Vancouver has a natural advantage that eastern ports cannot touch.

Let us look at the figures. During the current crop year from August 1 to December 29, of all Canadian wheat shipped to overseas destinations 33·6 per cent was shipped from Vancouver-New Westminster, ·7 per cent from other Pacific ports, 12·7 per cent from Churchill, 49·4 per cent from St. Lawrence ports and 3·6 per cent from Atlantic ports. It must be remembered that during the next few months the Vancouver and Atlantic percentages will rise since St. Lawrence navigation is now closed until late April. Obviously, too, the Churchill percentage of 12·7 will go down steadily since there can be no further shipments from that port until navigation opens there again late next July.

These figures follow the normal pattern of distribution between Canadian ports. For the crop year 1952-53, 32·6 per cent of the movement was from the west coast and 51 per cent from St. Lawrence ports. The three crop years prior to 1952-53 show much the same comparison. The crop year 1953-54 was abnormal because it took a good part of the crop year to clear up the aftermath of the long Vancouver strike of grain handlers which had occurred the previous spring, and because Vancouver prices were temporarily out of line with eastern seaboard prices on account of abnormally low ocean freight rates.

The wheat board is charged with the duty of marketing all prairie wheat to best advantage for the producer. Obviously all prairie wheat cannot be moved to advantage through either a western port or an eastern port. Internal freight charges can quickly offset any advantages gained by lower selling prices at any one port. The purpose of the board must be at all times to see that returns to the producer for prairie grain are the maximum obtainable.

My own opinion is that the Canadian wheat board is succeeding very well in keeping prices competitive between our ocean ports. Proof of this is the percentage of the business which is presently moving from our various ports.

[Later:]

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a supplementary question on the statement he read? I was wondering if his reference to eastern Canadian ports included the Atlantic ports or merely the great lakes ports. Could he, at some later date, make available the comparative figures for Halifax and Saint John which he gave earlier in his statement for Vancouver?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The only Atlantic ports, for the period I mentioned, are the ports of Halifax and Saint John. I think if the hon. member will read my answer in Hansard he will find the comparison I gave for January 6 is the comparison for which he is asking.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister referred to eastern Canadian ports at one time and Atlantic ports at another, and I was not sure what the differentiation was.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

INCOME TAX APPEAL BOARD—REFERENCE TO ENTERTAINMENT OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if a recent decision of the income tax appeal board has been brought to his attention concerning expenditures in improving a certain residence that is reported to be used to entertain certain government officials during contract negotiations? Has the Prime Minister a statement to make on this subject? Can he tell us what steps have been taken by the government to investigate the use made of such a place in relation to this purpose? If no investigation has yet been made, does the Prime Minister not think it a proper matter for inquiry by a committee of this house?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): This morning I did see a report of a decision rendered by the income tax appeal board which very much surprised me in the statements that it contained. I have never heard any suggestion that it was considered to be necessary by anyone to have a residence to entertain government officials.

The report I saw seemed to indicate that this was the parent company of a concern that tendered for construction work for both government and private enterprises, and that this parent company had asked to have deducted from its income expenditures made on a place said to have been used for the purpose of entertaining prospective clients. I believe that the hon. gentleman is quite within the bounds of propriety in suggesting there should be some inquiry made as to how this came about. I gathered from the report it was something that went back to 1950 or 1951, but I think it is something that should be looked into.

I shall endeavour to have it looked into, first of all by ascertaining just what was disclosed before this income tax appeal board, and whether or not that would indicate that any officials of this government were being entertained in that way.

STORMS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTS OF DAMAGE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister a report to make on the severe storm damage to harbour installations, fishing vessels, etc., in Newfoundland last night, and will the government promise emergency assistance to get the harbours back into full operation as quickly as possible?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I have no report to make on the subject of storm damage in Newfoundland because the Department of Transport, up to now, has received no notification of damage to aids to navigation in St. John's harbour or any other part of that province. The hon. member, I am sure, will appreciate that I can answer only for the facilities that come under the jurisdiction of my department.

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Has the minister, since he took over his new and important portfolio, received representations asking for increases in the pensions of superannuated civil servants, particularly for those whose pensions are in the lower and middle brackets? Has the minister given consideration to these representations?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): The answer is, yes, I did receive a few representations. When I heard my hon. friend was going to ask the question today I read some of his remarks, not all, on the subject and felt I could not add very much to what the minister of finance at that time said in answer to the hon. member—that was on March 2, 1954.

Mr. Knowles: Then the new minister is no better than the other one was.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA FOR CONFERENCE OF PRIME MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is able to say anything further as to the precise agenda to come before the conference of commonwealth prime ministers at London at the end of the month?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RESIGNATION OF DR. L. B. THOMSON AS DIRECTOR OF P.F.R.A.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Is the Prime Minister in a position to give an answer now regarding the resignation of Mr. Thomson and also whether a civil servant appointed under an order in council is in a different position from one appointed under the civil service commission in so far as his rights are concerned?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No; I have not yet obtained all the information I am seeking to obtain.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to raise the rates of supplementary benefit to the present rates of regular benefit and to provide a minimum of sixty days' supplementary benefit to those who qualify.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Gregg: I am grateful to the members on all sides of the house, Mr. Chairman, for giving the right of way to this resolution today. The resolution itself, as it appears on the order paper, is practically self-explanatory so I am going to be quite brief. The purpose of it, of course, is to help to mitigate some of the hardships caused by winter unemployment. If we are to judge by last year's experience, this revision of the supplementary benefits will help a good deal.

Back in the early winter of 1950 my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), then temporarily acting as minister of labour, introduced for the first time these supplementary benefits, which came into effect in the late part of that winter. At that time the amount of supplementary benefits was approximately 80 per cent of the regular benefits. Then, in the early part of the year 1952, I introduced to the house a number of general amendments to the act, and included in those amendments were some increases to the regular benefits. At that time I did not recommend any increase in the supplementary benefits because we had had such a very short period of experience with the supplementary benefits, namely only the winter of 1950-51. Since 1952 the supplementary benefits have averaged approximately 70 per cent of the main benefits. Under this resolution it is proposed to increase that to 100 per cent.

The other object of the resolution is to raise the minimum supplementary period to 60 days. That is of course within the limits of the general period of January 1 to April 15. At the present time the minimum would be somewhere about 18 days. The general period under this recommendation will remain the same, namely from January 1 to April 15.

The reason for asking that this small bill be introduced early is so that these new benefits may take effect right away, or as soon as the bill receives royal assent, to be dated from the Monday of the week in which royal assent is given. Then later on—and not too much later—I intend to bring in amendments with wider implications to the Unemployment Insurance Act. When they come forward these amendments will absorb automatically the ones I am proposing today. So there will be the advantage, if it is desired at that time, of having further discussion with respect to all these things which I am now proposing shall take effect immediately.

I am sure hon. members will feel the wider amendment that will come later should receive very careful study both in the House of Commons and in the standing committee on industrial relations. This I shall suggest.

Since these supplementary benefits were established in 1950 they have been very helpful indeed in our winter period of unemployment; and I am confident that with this improvement they will be very much more so during the remainder of this present winter.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, before I embark upon the comments I wish to make concerning this resolution I think it might be of interest to the house to know that today, January 11, is the 140th anniversary of the birthday of that great Canadian statesman, Sir John A. Macdonald—a statesman, I might add, who took a lead in recognizing the rights of workers of this nation. It is most appropriate that improvements in labour legislation should be introduced on this date. No doubt the Minister of Labour had that in mind when doing so.

Mr. Chairman, the raising of the rates of supplementary benefits to those of regular benefits will remove the disparity which has existed heretofore. In the original instance the rates may have been calculated on the same percentage basis, but with the changes which have taken place, and to which the minister has referred, the percentage of benefits paid has now varied to the extent that they range all the way from 67·5 per cent to 81·25 per cent of the regular benefits, depending upon the classification into which one happens to fall.

As will be seen from the report for the year ending March 31, 1954, supplementary benefits form a very small part of the total benefits paid, and the increase from approximately 80 per cent to 100 per cent of the benefit rates will not affect the fund substantially.

We on this side of the house have asked on several occasions for an increase in these benefits. Two years ago last July, when the regular benefits were raised, several members, not only in this but in other parties, asked that the supplementary benefits should be raised accordingly. Of course that was not done. It is interesting to note however that the reason given at that time and subsequently for not raising the supplementary benefits was that the beneficiary who received the benefits should be the same as the person making the contribution. I believe at one stage in the debate I remarked on what a ridiculous argument that was.

Today I have taken the trouble to make some calculations. I am sure hon. members will recall that when the supplementary benefits were introduced contributions were increased by one cent per day for the employee, and a similar amount by the employer, making a total increase of two cents per contribution. I find from available statistics that as of October 1, 1954, there were 3,219,000 persons insured; and on the basis of 300 contributions per year at this rate of one cent from the employee and one from the employer we arrive at the total amount of $19,314,000 paid into the fund to defray the expenses of supplementary benefits. Last year, when the heaviest strain developed on the fund for the purposes of supplementary benefits, according to the report which just came to hand yesterday the total amount paid out was $12,234,281. So the fund has been benefiting by more than 50 per cent in excess of the payments made to workers by way of supplementary benefits.

If any further proof were needed as to the justification for our claim, I am sure it could be found in the further figures or calculations which could be made to a more exact figure in connection with the sums received and the sums expended.

The minister has said that there will be further amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. These were indicated in the speech from the throne. He has said that the bill will be introduced shortly, and will be discussed in the house at an early date. As a matter of fact the newspapers are already making what might be termed informed guesses as to the contents of that measure. But I should like to remark that if the House of Commons had been called to meet last autumn, as the leader of this party asked, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act could have been incorporated in one bill, brought down at one time and considered carefully weeks in advance of the time when the supplementary benefits would become effective. In this way the house would have had a better picture of the over-all effect of any amendments to the act. As it is, even the minister admits that if and when further amendments to the act come down we may wish to change the bill which will be placed before the house in the course of a couple of days. It seems to me that this is ample evidence that the Hon. George Drew was right in the first place when he indicated that there were certain things which should have been discussed in the autumn of last year, rather than waiting to throw them into debate in the first days of a session after the beginning of the year—and then on the ground that they are of such urgency that they must be dealt with immediately.

Certainly, they are urgent; certainly, they should be dealt with immediately. They should have been dealt with last October or November. Certain it is that welcome though increases may be, Mr. Chairman, they do not solve the distress among the unemployed persons of this nation.

I was interested in the remarks of the Prime Minister yesterday when he admitted there is some unemployment in Canada. He said, at page 33 of Hansard:

> There is some unemployment in Canada. There has been some unemployment in Canada every year. At the opening of every session of the Canadian parliament for the last three or four years there has been considerable anxiety over the kind and extent of unemployment in Canada.

That is true, Mr. Chairman, because unemployment has been increasing every year for the last four or five years. The Prime Minister then goes on to say:

> That situation has eased as the season advanced, and there is reason to expect that it will do so again.

I might remark, Mr. Chairman, that there is reason also to expect that we shall have serious unemployment again this year before the season advances far enough to ease the situation. I hope that in presenting his bill the minister will have more to offer to this house than the bland assurance that if we can sit the thing out everybody will eventually get a job.

I noticed in the last report, which has come jointly from the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics, that the increase in unemployment as at November 18 last, the period for which figures are available, was, in the province of Ontario, 23 per cent over the year before. In the city of Hamilton, my own city, which is an industrial centre, it was 26 per cent higher. It is true that if you take the nation as a whole the increase in unemployment over the year before was 11 per cent. If my memory serves me well we got dangerously close to the 600,000 mark last year. Therefore, even if it is 11 per cent more, taking the average over the nation as a whole, it is an extremely serious situation. I am sure that despite supplementary benefits or any other stopgap that may be brought in by the government, it must look like a long bleak winter to those without jobs, and this little sop of 25 per cent increase, while welcomed, will not supply what the workers want most, namely, jobs; nor will it solve the problem of those who are unemployed and do not receive benefits, those who have been in uninsurable employment, those who have insufficient contributions, those who have taken ill and were forced to leave jobs on that account, and other classifications. I might say, last and by no means least, it will not solve the problem of the municipalities who have for far too long now borne the weight of welfare costs for those who are classed as employables.

I speak for my colleagues in this house when I say we welcome any legislation which is going to ease this situation, no matter how slightly. We shall be interested to see this bill when it is available for distribution and we hope that it will have some effect in alleviation of distress of our workers. We still say the government has not gone nearly far enough in trying to supply what the workers want most, namely, not unemployment relief but jobs.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, there is not much one can say in regard to this bill, as it is not before us. We do not know just what is involved in it, but from the information we have we must welcome the measure. But, as the last speaker said, it will fail even to relieve, to any considerable extent, the situation with which we are now confronted.

I have attended meetings called by labour organizations in my own city, and this is one of the things that I find. Today we have people who have been unemployed for over a year. Once you have in this country two or three hundred thousand workers unemployed you are bound to have some of the workers unemployed for long periods. You are not going to have one lot of workers unemployed for a few months this winter and another different lot unemployed next winter. Seasonal workers are seasonal workers for years. They do nothing else but seasonal work. I am not saying that all the unemployment we have had during the last year and more is seasonal unemployment. In my own province there is considerable seasonal unemployment. But until last fall and winter we were taking that seasonal unemployment pretty well in our stride because the workers had sufficient to carry them over from one season to the next. Where they did not have that, the unemployment insurance helped. But we should remember that unemployment insurance is not a cure for unemployment.

I was in the house when the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed in 1940 and it was clearly understood that its purpose was to carry a person from the time he left one job until he got another one. Because of that, the weekly insurance payments provided were very small. You cannot expect anyone with a family in this time of high prices even to attempt to live on the amount provided by unemployment insurance, even at the higher levels of today.

While we welcome this—it is needed and it will help in some cases—if it is all that the government has to offer for unemployment then the people of this country—I attended a meeting where a man was unemployed for 15 months—have very little to look forward to.

I understand that the province of British Columbia offered to go 50-50 with the federal government in providing for unemployed workers in that province and that offer was turned down. The result is that the city of Vancouver and the other municipalities and the province of British Columbia are providing on a 20-80 basis to people who are resident and have been resident in the various municipalities. But unfortunately, in my province, and particularly in the coast section of the province, we get every winter a large number of people who come to the province because of a somewhat better climate and who add to the unemployed. It seems to me that when the federal government amended the British North America Act in 1940 to enable it to enact unemployment insurance it assumed responsibility for all unemployment.

It appears now as if the government is running away from that position; it is not meeting its responsibilities. I suggest to them that we should not today, after so many years of prosperity, prosperity for which the government took credit—I shall have something more to say about that at a later time—accept that as a reason why more should not be done to relieve the unemployment situation than seems to be proposed in this measure.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this subject. I think we all agree that the government should have brought down legislation such as this long ago, but nevertheless I think we are all agreed that it will be welcome to the workingmen to have some form of relief coming through. The other day I was reading a brief which had been presented to the government in November by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. In referring to this particular subject they mention the very things which the government is now bringing forward in this amendment. They say:

> That supplementary benefits be increased and the period in which they are payable be extended.

Then the next submission along this line was:

> That supplementary benefits be paid to those who have exhausted their regular benefits, and in the prairie region this to continue until May 1.

I am not sure whether that had any bearing on the government's decision to amend this legislation at this time, but certainly that was foremost in the thoughts of the trade union people when they presented their briefs to the government. It has been said here, and rightly so, that members of all parties in this house, even some members on the government side, have brought this matter to the attention of the government on other occasions. We recognize that while this measure is going to be of assistance to people who are going to receive these benefits it will not be a cure-all by any means.

I do not think a year has passed, particularly during the last three or four years, during which the attention of the government has not been brought most strongly to this particular matter. It has been pointed out to the government that the unemployment problem was a continually increasing one and that unless we took some definite action in regard to the policies which are being put forth to solve this problem it would continue to get worse. That is what has happened.

I think the government has been most reluctant to admit that there has been any substantial increase in unemployment. However, they have had to recognize this on this occasion and now they have brought in this amendment.

I remember that last session the Minister of Labour went to great lengths to disprove the statements made by some of the labour unions in this country as to the extent of unemployment. He questioned the figures which they had used and gave his own particular figures in an effort to point out that the unemployment problem was not as serious as some of us were trying to indicate. Certainly this is an admission on the government's part that the unemployment problem is becoming serious. Believe me it is becoming serious for that portion of our population which is affected.

As I said a moment ago, this increase in the supplementary benefits will be some improvement but it will help only those who are qualified to receive regular benefits. As the last speaker pointed out, there are a great many people in this country who are seasonally unemployed and who have exhausted their unemployment relief payments. It is true that there is going to be a minimum period of 60 days during which they can receive supplementary benefits and this is something new in this type of legislation. While this 60-day provision will be of assistance it certainly will not take care of the problem of feeding the families of the unemployed after that period has expired.

This will be only a palliative. It will not be a solution to the problem. The Canadian Congress of Labour recognized that quite fully in November when they made their presentation to the government with regard to unemployment. They stated in their brief:

> What we ought to do is put money into the hands of people who will buy what we can already make and can't sell.

It seems to me that in that instance labour hit the nail on the head.

An hon. Member: They usually do.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, they usually do, but unfortunately the government never seems to give too much consideration to the worth-while suggestions which are made to them.

Mr. Knowles: Even when they are hit on the head.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): This is one of the real needs to be considered. Our problem should be not merely to amend the legislation to get these people over a difficult period; the policy of this country should be changed in such a way as to eliminate unemployment if possible, or, if not to eliminate it, to reduce it most substantially.

When the Canadian Congress of Labour suggests that we should put money into the hands of those who need it so that they can buy the goods that we are producing but cannot sell they are in fact suggesting the very thing that Social Credit members have suggested and contended for some years past. If we would supply our people with the required purchasing power to buy those goods which we are now making and cannot sell—let me emphasize that—if we then would go further and provide employment by additional public works, if we would increase the purchasing power of the people by a reduction in taxation, then we would be doing something to help these people to help themselves.

No one in this country wants to receive unemployment insurance: there is nobody in this country who wants to receive supplementary benefits unless it is absolutely necessary. They would far rather have an opportunity to earn a livelihood. That is what the Canadian Congress of Labour meant when they said that what we should be doing is to put purchasing power in the hands of these people so that they could buy the goods that we make but cannot sell.

We have only to look around us to see that we are producing goods that cannot be sold. It is true that something better than 8 million is going to be spent in the form of these special benefits in addition to what has been spent already. That will be of some assistance, but when that has been spent we will be right back to where we were before. I think the government should come to the conclusion that this is not just a seasonal occurrence, that conditions point very clearly to the fact that it is a much bigger problem. Just before I came down to this house I was reading the Calgary Herald of Monday, December 20, 1954, and this is what they had to say:

> U.S. production next year should run two to five per cent ahead of 1954 but nevertheless joblessness may increase, the U.S. chamber of commerce forecast Saturday.

And again:

> But Dr. Schmidt told reporters the production gains in prospect would be insufficient to prevent some increase in unemployment next year due to population gains and rising output per worker.

It is clear that because of the industry of the worker himself and because of our efficient way of producing goods, we are doing exactly as the Canadian Congress of Labour said: we are producing goods that we cannot sell. That is the problem we must solve in this country. We must make it possible for working people and others as well to get sufficient purchasing power, by some means or other, so that they are able to buy the goods we are making now but cannot sell and thus increase employment and do away with the necessity for these so-called supplementary payments.

We agree that under the circumstances there is every reason to pass this bill with haste so that these people may enjoy the further supplementary payments, particularly those who have already exhausted their regular unemployment insurance payments, because they must be in a terrible position. But we say also that this should be a reminder to everyone, and particularly to the supporters of the government, that the time has come—and through this legislation the government recognizes it—when we must provide policies which are going to create jobs and thus increase purchasing power for the people who need it, and that will solve our problem. We would hope then that there would not be the necessity on another occasion for these so-called supplementary benefits. We support this legislation and we shall be glad to see the amendments which the government intends to bring down to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will still further assist the workers of this country.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that, as we have not this bill before us, we cannot discuss it as well as we might. I do not think we should enter into a general discussion on unemployment insurance. That is something that will come on later. Neither should we discuss the big question of unemployment now. We should send this bill to the committee on industrial relations at once. The committee then will discuss it thoroughly. Then when it comes back to us we can speak intelligently.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, we have noted with real gratification the unanimous approval which greeted the proposal made to us yesterday evening with a view to suspending the debate on the address today in order to discuss the matter now before the house. This satisfaction is not only felt here, by the members of this honourable house, but is certainly shared by the working people of this country. It must after all be admitted that for many years now our people have been subjected to what I might call the canker of seasonal or regional unemployment. Things had reached such a point that in the fall of each year and throughout a long winter stretching well into spring, thousands upon thousands of people were left without employment, of which several thousand again were even deprived of those unemployment insurance benefits to which they had nevertheless contributed, not having worked long enough during the summer to earn a right to them.

Members from this side of the house, as well as representatives of every labour union in this country, have asked that the government set this matter right. But the government have never deigned to listen to these representations. A while ago we were shown figures which, in this very house, were said to be exaggerated. And yet these figures are provided by the government themselves since now, as always, the only ones used are those that come from official sources. Now the unemployment figures given by the government are taken from the reports made to them by the various unemployment insurance offices and include only those people receiving benefits, whereas, in most cases, in the different parts of this country, we know that thousands more are not in a position to enjoy these benefits.

In the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and which is essentially a working class district, we have a certain type of worker known as a labourer. For a number of years, these labourers have been unable to find the work necessary to enable them to support themselves and their families except in the case of a few during the summer. It means then that, at the moment of leaving their work, these people suddenly find themselves in the most pressing need, not having earned enough money to accumulate some savings.

I remember that last year, in this very house, I put a question to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). I asked him if it would not be possible to do something immediately for the 22,000 people who were then jobless in the Quebec area. It was suggested that the figures I had quoted were highly exaggerated. However, it appears that the following week statistics showed the number of jobless to be smaller by a few hundred only, and these statistics were not for the whole Quebec district but for the cities of Quebec and Levis only.

Mr. Speaker, labour unions all over the country have been stirred more than once by the constant rise of unemployment, which is no longer seasonal or regional but has become in most instances permanent unemployment. It is permanent undoubtedly because of poor administration on the part of the government now in power. However, I am happy to note that, following numerous protests and representations, the government finally decided to bring some help to those who, at the present time, are most in need.

I wish to point out, however, that this measure is not in the nature of a permanent cure for the canker I spoke of a while ago. It is a mere poultice applied over a gaping wound, a poultice that will not heal the sore but will merely lighten the pain.

What our workers want, what they are asking and have never ceased to ask the government to do is to give them work. I know that the people I have the honour of representing have inherited if not material wealth, at least the will to work and the love for work of their forbears. They want to have the satisfaction of earning their daily bread by the sweat of their brows, as stated in the Scriptures.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the resolution now before the house will be of some help to people in need. However, I deem it my duty to say that the people of Canada and more particularly the workers of the constituency of Quebec West have not and never had the intention of begging anything from the government. What they are clamouring for is work because they want to keep up their reputation as work-loving people. In other words, what they want is sufficient work to enable them to provide for their families and meet their obligations.

Mr. Chairman, judging from what has been said in the speech from the throne, it seems that the government intends to spend more to help the unemployed and give them work.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the projects undertaken will not consist in repair or construction work given to contractors here and there, which can be undertaken by these contractors with the workers already on their payrolls. What we need is an extensive public works program which would provide employment for hundreds and thousands of workers. That is the only way of putting an end to the increasing wave of unemployment which is the cause of so much grief and sorrow in Canadian homes.

As far as the city of Quebec is concerned, Mr. Chairman, I have already had the opportunity on several occasions of asking the house to undertake the projects I deemed necessary to the welfare of our people. I intend to repeat my requests from time to time. For the present, I shall content myself with asking that the unemployment benefits mentioned in the motion now before the house be extended at least until May 1.

I mentioned a moment ago a group of workers known as day labourers. You undoubtedly know that in areas where winter lingers on it is not always possible to undertake any extensive work before spring. This happens very often where large numbers of workers, more particularly day labourers, cannot start working before the sunny days of spring. I therefore suggest that the proposed date, April 15, be extended to May 1, as a much greater number of people would benefit from the measure.

Another reason why we must press for work, jobs and employment for our people is that there is a constant influx of immigrants into this country. If we are now unable to give work to those who are commonly known as the native sons of Canada, why should we seek abroad other employees, when we cannot feed those who are already here. Perhaps, this government would, therefore, be well advised in taking the necessary steps to ensure that Canadians be supplied with the food and the clothing they need, and that our workers enjoy at home a certain measure of prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, those are the few comments I wanted to make on the proposed resolution. Needless to say that I am supporting the principle of the resolution and the bill, and that I intend in due course to ask the government to increase the benefits. However, I wish to repeat that we cannot cure a canker by simply applying a poultice, and the extension of unemployment insurance benefits is a mere poultice applied to the present situation.

Let us give jobs, and, I repeat it once more, the work-loving people of my constituency will see to it that this love of work is handed down to future generations.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, as my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, has already pointed out, we welcome this little bill but we cannot get very excited about it. It does seem to us to be very typical of the way in which the present government approaches serious problems when our people are in need. The fact of the matter is, as I understand it, that no person who does not already qualify for regular benefits and supplementary benefits as well will qualify as a result of this measure. All the measure will do is to increase the amount of the supplementary benefits in the case of those who are already qualified for it and extend the period during which they can receive that benefit. In the light of the unemployment problem facing us at the present time we feel that this is a picayune answer. We welcome the measure but we hope that before the session goes very far something far more effective as an answer to the unemployment problem will be presented to parliament by the government across the way.

There is one assurance of perhaps a technical nature which I hope the Minister of Labour will be able to give us before the debate at this stage closes. He may recall, although he was not minister of labour at the time but was rather minister of veterans affairs, that when the bill establishing supplementary benefits in the Unemployment Insurance Act was introduced in 1950 it too was brought in in the very early days of the session and put through parliament in somewhat of a hurry. We understood before the bill was brought in that all it was to contain was simply the provision for supplementary benefits, but when we got the bill, without very much notice, we found that it had a lot of other items in it as well. Some of them were good and some of them we did not like. I refer, for example, to the provision making a difference in the case of married women which was tucked into that bill at that time. I hope the minister can assure us that so far as the bill to be based on this resolution is concerned there is nothing tucked into it apart from what is referred to specifically in the resolution.

I should like to say just one other word because, as all members realize, there will be an opportunity to discuss unemployment insurance generally later in the session and other opportunities to discuss unemployment itself. However, the word I should like to say at this time is this. Last session we learned that at the request of the national advisory council on manpower a study was being made by the national employment committee of the question of seasonal unemployment in Canada. Some of us liked the statements made by the Minister of Labour at that time to the effect that Canada should not accept the difficulty of seasonal unemployment as a permanent one. His approach, as I understood it, was that we should try to keep away from the permanence of seasonal unemployment, and I for one dared to hope that when that report was made it would indicate that something was being done to alter the situation.

It is a very attractive report. I received it first in mimeographed form and later in a printed booklet. But as one goes through it it is not very encouraging. Really all it is is an analysis of the situation as it is. When one finds in a dozen places throughout the booklet the heading "remedies" he hopes that he will find some recommendations that may be acted upon. But such is not the case. These so-called remedies are simply reports from the various industries concerned as to what they are doing, successfully or otherwise, to try to minimize seasonal unemployment. I suggest that so far as this report is concerned it is merely an analysis of the picture as it exists. It does not represent that concerted attack on the problem of seasonal unemployment which I felt the minister was anxious to make. I raise that matter at this time because it seems to me it is closely related to this question of supplementary unemployment insurance benefits which, after all, are for a period of seasonal unemployment. I hope the minister will pursue that important question with real vigour.

Mr. Hahn: I am somewhat concerned over the anxiety of the government, Mr. Chairman, that we should hurry this resolution through because I feel the government should have thought of that last fall and probably should have brought us into session at that time. This would have given us ample opportunity to discuss these problems fully as they merit. This model government has once again shown its hindsight is much better than its foresight.

As I see it there are two parts to the resolution. The first part mentions the raising of the rates of supplementary benefits to the present rates of regular benefits and the second part mentions providing a minimum of 60 days' supplementary benefits to those who qualify. Both of these objectives are commendable, and they are both needed at present. However, they are both worth more careful consideration. They are both right and will, therefore, meet with the approval of every member in this house.

However, I believe we should keep in mind that this is an insurance measure, and not a handout. The recipients of these insurance benefits are not so anxious to receive the benefits as they are to have a job. I am pleased that the government has recognized that it costs the unemployed as much to live after their insurance benefits run out as it did before their regular insurance benefits ran out. Certainly I would say these people require 100 per cent of the benefit and not just 70 per cent. I would, therefore, be ready to agree to the second part of the resolution. These men, however, probably find that their financial resources are completely depleted by this time, and therefore they require much more help. Possibly it might be desirable to increase their benefits so that they would have something worth living for.

The purpose of unemployment insurance, as I understand it, is to tide people over that short period between jobs when they are unemployed. The second half of the resolution is proof that the government now recognizes this problem is no longer a transitional one. There is no longer that short period when a man gives up a job to seek another. Today he finds himself in the awkward position of having no work. He cannot find a job. He has given up his former position, so he soon uses up his unemployment insurance benefits. This resolution is a recognition by the government that the problem is no longer a transitional one, nor is it a seasonal one. We have the continually growing problem of unemployment.

The need for assistance is not so much a need of financial assistance on a long-term basis as it is a need for the establishment of jobs. I wish, therefore, to heartily endorse what the hon. member for Bow River suggested when he said that these people require work. Now, morally and physically it is an obligation of this government to make jobs available by the adoption of an economic system based on a common-sense approach. We have the men, we have the materials and we have the means of transporting those men and materials. We have the money available. However, for some reason or other unknown to me we do not seem to be able to bring these groups together.

I would suggest to the government that they give consideration to an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act whereby it would be possible to utilize, let us say, $100 million of the fund to set up a revolving self-liquidating fund to be used only at times when such conditions as we find today are present. I would say that the purpose of setting up such a fund would be to make money immediately available to get the men, materials and transportation together to create jobs for these individuals. That is what they want. The creation of these jobs would take goods off the shelf, about which we hear our distressed merchants speaking so frequently.

These jobs might be created by building projects that the government had not seen fit to put in its estimates. In that respect, if the Minister of National Defence were here I would propose an armoury for the city of New Westminster. Such a project might well put a good number of men to work. One could think of the erection of hospitals, schools and other public utilities such as sewage and water plants for the smaller municipalities. These are the things that need to be done in this country. We have the money, we have the material and we have the men, but this government has not the ability to put them together. Therefore, while I am heartily in agreement with this particular resolution at this time I would urge the minister to consider introducing further legislation to set up such a fund with that purpose in mind.

Mr. Hees: This measure is aimed at helping winter unemployment and seasonal unemployment; but as has been said by a number of speakers this afternoon, a great deal of the unemployment in Canada today is not of a seasonal nature. It is becoming permanent or semi-permanent in some areas. What I am interested in finding out from the minister, and I hope he will tell us when he introduces his bill on Thursday, is what the government expects people to do when their unemployment insurance credits expire before they are eligible for these extra benefits.

Now, as has been pointed out, these people have to eat, they have to feed their families and clothe themselves and their families, pay rent and so on. I want to know from the government what they expect the people to do, whose credits have expired early in the season, or because they have not contributed sufficiently long to become eligible for these supplementary benefits. This summer I found some communities where unemployment is certainly not seasonal. The first one I am going to mention is well known to the minister because it is in his own province. I know he has visited the community, and I know he is concerned about it, but being concerned and doing something about it are two different things. To be quite honest, I think the minister would like to do a great deal more than has been possible so far. I believe he has a genuine feeling of sympathy for the people concerned.

I am speaking of the people who live in Marysville, New Brunswick, where the whole community depends on one large textile mill.

As all of you know, I am sure, having read about it in the newspapers, a year ago in December this mill closed down. I visited that town this summer and talked to a lot of the residents. Frankly, these people are bewildered. It just breaks your heart to talk to them. They do not know what to do or what the future holds. It is all very well for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to tell the farm implement machinery workers, as he did about a year ago, "If you have not got a job, just pick up and go somewhere else." But you cannot do that. If you are a family man with six or seven children, with your house in a certain community, and the only trade you know is the one at which you have always worked, then you simply cannot just pick up and move. The people I spoke to in Marysville at that time—and I suppose it is even worse now—were in a bewildered and distraught state.

I would be interested some time to learn what the government has done and what effort it has made—I hope it has made some, and that it will reach a successful conclusion —to attract other industries to take over that mill and get that community on its feet again.

I also visited the community of New Glasgow in Nova Scotia and went down the Drummond mine, which is a very large coal mine in that province. The mine was due to close down permanently in October, so far as they could see. I was there in the latter part of July. It is hard to understand the feelings of those people unless one talks to them, because they just do not know what they are going to do. They are bewildered. They look at a future which, for them, does not exist. They are familiar only with the mining of coal, and they do not know where else to go to mine it. They know that unemployment insurance benefits are going to run out. This is the kind of future Canadians should not be asked to face. The people in these communities are good people. They want to work. They want nothing more than to work and to earn their own living so as to keep their heads above water. But, through no fault of their own, they are denied this, and to my mind it is a disastrous and worrying situation.

Surely someone must face up to responsibilities in cases like this, where unemployment is not seasonal. Quite demonstrably it is unseasonal; indeed, perhaps it is permanent. Certainly it is semi-permanent. I should like to quote briefly what was said by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King with respect to this whole matter, when he was speaking before the dominion-provincial conference in 1951:

> The transfer to the federal government of the whole cost of relief for the employable unemployed and their dependents is the logical outcome of the experience of the past. It would prevent a repetition of the confusion, the inefficiency, the waste, the delay and the inequalities that have admittedly prevailed in relief since 1930.

When we see families who cannot get work, but who must go on living, families composed of good Canadians—good human beings—then I say somebody must take the responsibility for them. The municipalities simply cannot do it. They do not have the sources of revenue. Because we all know that year after year the annual conference of mayors and reeves makes it clear to the federal government that they simply cannot look after the people who are unemployed in their communities and who, through no fault of their own, are unable to find work.

I believe the opinion expressed by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King is accepted on almost all occasions by this government as being the gospel truth. On this particular occasion, however, it seems strange that the government ignores completely what their late leader advised them to do, and said should be done without any equivocation. The government has disregarded that advice.

The opinion expressed by the late Mr. Mackenzie King is also that expressed by other authorities who have examined the matter. I have in mind particularly the Sirois report, the Marsh report, and the findings of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945—all of which come to exactly the same conclusion on this question of looking after the needs of people who want to work but who, through no fault of their own, are not permitted to do so. All agree that this is the responsibility of the federal government. That has been the opinion of all who have made a study of this matter.

Despite this evidence however the government seems to persist—well, it does not "seem"; it persists—simply to duck its responsibilities in this matter, so far as the citizens of Canada are concerned.

I hope that when the minister deals with his bill later on he will explain some of these things to us, because we want to hear about them. The Canadian people want to hear. We want to know the attitude of the government toward these people. Let us remember that they are good Canadians, good citizens, human beings. They have the same needs as you and I: they need clothing; they need food; they need shelter. They have families. They are good people. They simply must not be cast adrift and be expected in some way or another to get along in some miraculous fashion.

As others have said, we welcome this measure as a partial move toward relieving distress caused by winter unemployment. But this measure does not go nearly far enough, because there are many people it does not help at all. And those people are worthy and deserving of help. I hope the minister will consider this matter seriously, and when on Thursday he speaks on his main measure, I hope he will give the house some indication of the government's attitude in this whole matter.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I hope before the discussion of this resolution is concluded the minister will give some statement as to what consideration has been given, if any, to the matter of the extension of the period of duration of supplementary benefits. It seems to me there are at least three main aspects to be considered when the matter of supplementary benefits is under review. One of these is the amount of benefits to be paid; another is the period under which those benefits will be available to persons qualifying; and the third is the duration of time during which the possibility of receiving those benefits will be in effect.

Only two of these matters is mentioned in the resolution before us. I for one feel that the other consideration is one of major importance as well. I would have hoped that when this measure was introduced at least some consideration would have been given to an extension of the duration of time in which supplementary benefits would be in effect.

To illustrate my point I shall mention briefly one important class of workers in British Columbia, namely the loggers. These workers are often subject to what one might describe as a dual period of seasonality in respect of their employment. In some years loggers in British Columbia are subject to long periods of lay-off during the summer because of dry weather and the possibility of fires; and in such times they exhaust their rights to regular benefits under the act. Then, if it so happens that early in the year winter conditions develop, in many cases they find themselves unemployed prior to the Christmas period and prior to the end of the year, and thus ineligible to collect regular benefits. Undoubtedly it would be greatly beneficial to that group of workers if the period of supplementary benefits were advanced so as to commence at least as early as the middle of December.

On the other hand, reference was made by one hon. member to a suggestion in one of the labour organization briefs to the effect that in certain parts of Canada there was need for an extension of that period at least to May 1.

I believe we must recognize that there are regional climatic differences in Canada, and that in so far as unemployment is due to climatic conditions, and in so far as the application of supplementary benefits can be designed to cope with those conditions, the act should be designed so as to cover these periods of seasonality in unemployment resulting from climatic conditions. I can see no obstacle to an extension of benefits which would be related to regional climatic conditions. If it is desirable to extend the period in the prairie region so that it would apply to May 1, this might not be necessary in British Columbia or in the coastal area where, perhaps, the period of benefits might commence on December 15 and go through to the present termination date of April 15.

I would hope that the minister would indicate that such an extension is to be included in the bill that he proposes to introduce, following this resolution. I would hope that he would give us some explanation as to what consideration has been given to this important aspect of the application of supplementary benefits.

Mr. Pearkes: I will delay the passing of this resolution by no more than a minute but I should like to ask the minister whether consideration has been given to extending these benefits so that fishermen, and men who are connected with the fishing industry but who are not perhaps actual fishermen, may receive coverage. As the minister knows, there are certain companies which are engaged in the fishing industry and which employ a large number of men who are not actual fishermen in that they are not employed in the catching of fish but they are connected with the lifting of fish from various fish traps which are established legally in the strait of Juan de Fuca. I refer particularly to men who are employed in such companies as the Sooke Harbour Fishing and Packing Company as pile drivers, and men who are employed in the repair of the leads which guide the fish into their traps. These men are not fishermen in the ordinary sense of the word. They do not go out in boats to catch fish. They are employed in the fishing industry but they are very definitely tradesmen of another classification.

As I say, there are men who act as pile drivers. These men, working alongside the pile driver hired from another company that is covered, find that they are not covered by this insurance. Has further consideration been given to extending the coverage to this class of employees?

Mr. Starr: I fully realize that at this stage of the resolution to increase supplementary benefits a full-dress debate is not acceptable, and I do not intend to debate this matter fully. But as I read the resolution a doubt arises in my mind that I would convey to the Minister of Labour to see whether it can be clarified. There is no doubt that this is only a portion of the many submissions that were made in respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act by the Trades and Labour Congress, the Canadian Congress of Labour and hon. members during the last session of parliament, urging the government to make some changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to make more benefits available to the working people of this country. An increase in supplementary benefits was only one of these, and it is certainly most welcome. It is our hope that the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will bring some benefit when they are introduced in the house.

There is also no question of the urgency of this matter. That is borne out by the fact that the government has broken into the debate on the speech from the throne in order to introduce this resolution and the amendment itself, which leads me to believe that because of the urgency of the matter it should have been brought in at the last session of parliament so that the people who are sorely in need of assistance at this time would have received it by now.

The resolution and its contents are most acceptable. As I read the resolution, I find it suggests that the supplementary benefits be increased to the present rates of regular benefits. The present rates are as outlined in the act. Over the last number of years we have been urging this government to close up the gap between the supplementary benefits and the regular benefits, so that there would be no variation, since a person out of work certainly needs as much money in supplementary benefits as he would receive in regular benefits.

The doubt in my mind at the present time has to do with amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. When they are brought in will they include certain changes in the regular benefits? If so, after this resolution is passed and the supplementary benefits are raised to the present rate of the regular benefits, will there again be that variation between the increased regular benefits and the supplementary benefits as amended? If so, I do not think that the discrepancy should exist. The supplementary benefits should be again brought up to whatever increase is made in the regular benefits.

The period of time from January 1 to April 15 has proven to be of short duration. It is not sufficient to take care of the people out of work during that period of time. As an example, we in Oshawa found last year that when the rolls showed a decrease in the number of registered unemployed of something like 600 or 700 they were the people who on April 15 were cut off supplementary benefits, but work was still not available. Contracting work was not in progress and construction had not started. Therefore, those people were left stranded without any financial assistance whatever from April 15 to some time toward the end of May. I strongly urge that the Minister of Labour consider the extension of time for supplementary benefits beyond April 15; my suggestion would be to May 15.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I was quite interested to hear the comments of the previous speakers on this particular measure. Like, I suppose, every other hon. member in this house, I welcome this very belated action on the part of the government, but I welcome it, Mr. Chairman, in the same spirit in which I receive gratefully an aspirin when I have a headache, being under no illusions whatsoever that it is going to cure the cause of the headache.

I must say I got a certain sardonic entertainment out of listening to the exponents of free enterprise standing on their feet here demanding that the government depart from the true milk of the word, of the religion of free enterprise. When I heard the hon. member for Broadview quoting the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King I thought it was a very risky thing for him to do because of course somebody could get up and quote the late Lord Bennett on the same problem of unemployment.

I think, sir, we shall have to recognize that we are now entering a period of history when these problems are going to continue and are going to become more and more acute, and we are going to have to do something else than merely provide bigger and better aspirins for the headaches that are going to afflict our economy in the future. It is like most of the measures of this very old Dickensian government; it is a Micawber-like measure. It is going to extend the benefits of unemployment insurance in the hope that something will turn up before the new extensions are exhausted. But no one suggests what is likely to turn up; no one suggests that anything should turn up; no one suggests that we have any reason to believe that this condition will improve by itself.

Like the hon. member for Broadview, I should like also to quote a departed Canadian statesman, another Liberal statesman, who expressed a view that, like the late Hon. Norman Rogers, there is no cure for this problem except socialism.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee would want me to refer —

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member for Macleod might be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Hansell: I was going to ask a question. Perhaps the minister will answer it when he replies. I might say that I was perhaps fortunate—that may not be the right word to use—in being on the committee of this house which was responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Act when it first became law in 1940. That was some years ago and I can recall the meetings of the committee and the investigations which were carried out. Particular attention was paid to the actuarial soundness of the unemployment insurance fund. We had departmental as well as other actuaries who were purposely employed to study the matter.

The actuaries considered that the fund would be actuarially sound. The committee finished its work and I can recall the then minister of labour calling us together—we actually had our pictures taken—and saying that the bill would go down in the history of Canada. At that time it was hailed as a great advancement in legislation of this country.

As I say, a measure of full employment was realized and it continued over the war years. Naturally the fund became pretty healthy as it was a case of all the money coming in and not a great deal going out. But perhaps the picture is beginning to change. I should like to ask a question which the minister can answer now or when the bill comes down. I think we should know the exact state of the fund and what it has been over the years. Those figures must be somewhere. What was the income? What were the expenditures?

The government has decided that the present period of unemployment must be cared for in some fashion. The government must assume a measure of responsibility for the economic condition of the country. If there is a period of unemployment there must be some reason for it. There must be some background or some cause. I think we can conclude that the financial policy of the government is the reason. Financial policies govern the destinies of a nation, at least industrially.

A period of unemployment is now upon us. Previous speakers have said already that the solution of the problem is not to be found in the payment of unemployment insurance but in the establishment of full employment. That full employment depends on industry, and whether industry is continuing to function as it should. If it is not, then I claim it is because the government is pursuing wrong financial policies.

I rose not only to ask some questions but to indicate that this is not really something that the government is doing for anybody. The government has taken great pride in bringing in a measure concerning unemployment insurance, which measure has helped the worker when he has not been employed. But what it actually amounts to is nothing more or less than giving back to the worker that which in large measure belongs to him. He has been contributing to the fund for a good many years along with industry which employs him. But that part of the cost is not paid by industry in the final analysis; it is absorbed and paid for in higher prices to the consumer. That must be recognized.

When the worker pays into the fund he has not as much money to spend on his own livelihood. It is the consumer plus the worker who is paying for unemployment insurance. All the government is doing is to appraise the situation and decide how much he should have of his own money and when he can have it. That is really what is happening.

That is all I want to say. Once more I reiterate that this does not solve the unemployment problem. It will not be solved until the government pursues proper financial policies.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I shall confine my remarks to those words which have been directed toward this resolution rather than those which have been directed toward the unemployment situation generally. The hon. member for Hamilton West stated that this bill should have been brought in earlier at a fall session as part of the larger bill. Regardless of the merits of calling a fall session, I can assure her that if this particular little bill had been brought in in November as part of a larger one which I propose to bring in very soon I am doubtful whether or not its advantages could have been made to accrue to workers this winter.

The hon. member referred to the amount of supplementary benefits that would be paid out this winter.

As she correctly stated, in the last year the amount was approximately $12 million. The best actuarial estimate that we can get on this would indicate that if the number of workers drawing supplementary benefits this winter should be about the same as last winter then the total amount paid out this winter in supplementary benefits will be in the vicinity of $22 million, or an additional $10 million over last winter.

The hon. member for New Westminster referred to this as being charity. I protest that it is not charity at all. As two other speakers have pointed out since, this plan was devised as an insurance plan just like fire or automobile insurance. The good risks pay for the poor risks. The benefits accruing to the insured are legitimate benefits and in no sense are they charity or handouts.

The hon. member for Quebec West referred to the official figures on unemployed workers as being those in receipt of benefits. I am sure he has made an error there. The official figures quoted by the bureau of statistics and the Department of Labour do not refer to total numbers in receipt of benefits.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has asked for assurance that there is nothing in the bill except the two items mentioned in the resolution. I can assure him that in the bill which will be distributed shortly there is nothing of any substance that is not indicated in the resolution. There will be minor things such as the date of proclamation and the probable dropping of a spent clause, but there is nothing of any substance in the bill except these two matters.

Mr. Knowles: No jokers?

Mr. Harris: There never is in anything the government does.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gregg: He also referred to the fact that he would like to have more information regarding what I had discussed last year on seasonal unemployment. I will grant that it is related to this bill in that it is hoped that it might work for greater stability amongst wage earners during the winter months. I can assure him that, following that report, in my opinion very good progress—even though it may be considered as modest—has been made. I am planning to bring in that report at an earlier period during another debate rather than during this one.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggested the extension of the duration of the whole period. That matter was mentioned also by the hon. member for Ontario. It is difficult to make it apply to every region. I think there must be standardization. I should like to point out that this question was given the most exhaustive study, but it is not incorporated in this legislation. The matter of the soundness of the fund, of course, enters into it. At any rate, for the purpose of this bill we are sticking to the period from January 1 to April 15.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich suggested the point which he brings up from time to time with regard to fishermen and near-fishermen. While the general revision or planning has been under way, I can assure him that study of the matter affecting fishermen proper has been continuing with good hope that some results might accrue from it. I think I know what he means by near-fishermen; and that is something that is being studied as a side issue by the commission.

As to the hon. member for Macleod, I should like to congratulate him as one of the pioneers, who was here when this extremely useful act came into being. It has served and is serving a useful purpose. I should like to reassure him, as far as we can do so, that the fund is, in our opinion, still actuarially sound. It is our intention to keep it so. The figures he wants are readily available. I did not think that for this bill it might be necessary to put them on record. If other hon. members would like to have them, when the bill comes up for second reading or in committee after second reading I shall be glad to present them. In any case, the figures up to the end of the fiscal year 1954 are available and also the interim figures since then.

There is just one other point I wish to mention. It is something which I forgot to include in my first remarks. This bill has been submitted to the unemployment insurance advisory committee which is provided for under the act, and has been approved by them. Very shortly, of course, the larger bill will also be submitted to them.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I feel highly honoured in following so closely the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) and the leaders of the other parties. I should like to join them in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure the people at home must feel extremely proud of these two members.

I enter this debate because I consider that, representing as I do a large constituency and one of the two dual ridings in Canada, I should bring to the attention of hon. members the general situation as it now exists in Halifax.

Mr. Speaker, for those who want to see, there is in the speech from the throne much good material and advanced legislation. I should like to commend the proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. They will be widely acclaimed. The supplementary benefit program under which unemployment insurance is payable on easier terms in the winter months goes a long way to mitigate the effects of seasonal unemployment. This program is a desirable supplement to the ordinary unemployment insurance because of the nature of our climate and industrial development.

In Nova Scotia our primary industries, which are unavoidably subject to the weather and the seasons, are extremely important to our economy. It is unfair that the workers in such industries should bear the whole burden of the seasonal drop in employment. It is also unfair to expect the municipalities in which these industries are concentrated to pay unemployment assistance on a large scale. The federal government's contributions to the supplementary benefit fund are a most welcome "assist" to the municipalities in their welfare policies.

The government is to be congratulated for the leadership given in the efforts to lessen seasonal unemployment where this is possible. Needless to say, it is far better for people to have the opportunity to work than to have the opportunity to draw unemployment assistance; it is far better for the worker and it is less costly to the country. While the direct effect of government policy may not cover a large group of workers, it is a forward step and may well encourage action by industry on a wider scale.

Some reduction in winter unemployment is hoped for as a result of this campaign. This will benefit Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces, but where the primary industries predominate there are limitations that cannot be removed by planning. The real answer lies in a greater diversification of industry; more manufacturing, which is not affected by the seasons. This is an oft-stated objective and its achievement calls for an attack on basic factors such as problems of transportation, tariffs, marketing, and power, to name a few of the more important ones.

In this connection I should like to refer to an item which appeared in our local press last December. It was, to be sure, a rather disturbing item to Nova Scotians. The headline was "No Bank Aid to Province", referring to the province of Nova Scotia. On further perusal one learned that only two provinces, namely Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, did not receive any financial assistance from the industrial development bank in the year ended September 30, 1954; and that the loans made to concerns in New Brunswick and Newfoundland were negligible in total. Of the money loaned in the fiscal year just past, close to 70 per cent went to enterprises in Ontario and Quebec.

Let me hasten to say that this is not a criticism of the industrial development bank as such. What concerns me is the fact that industry in Nova Scotia and in the Atlantic provinces generally has not called upon the credit facilities of the bank for development purposes. It suggests that the development which the government hoped to encourage through this additional source of credit may not be taking place in the areas where it is most needed.

The annual report referred to marked the first decade of the bank's operations. The industrial development bank was set up in the first place because the government recognized that smaller industrial firms had difficulty in obtaining money on a medium or long-term basis to finance plant and equipment they needed either to commence or expand operations. After ten years of operation the success of the bank has been acclaimed. In expressing his views on its work Mr. Graham Towers, then governor of the Bank of Canada, used these words:

> . . . and if you believe, as I do, that the successful evolution of new enterprises is the very backbone of sound economic growth, you will understand my satisfaction over the experience of the industrial development bank.

If the use of these loan facilities is a barometer of sound growth, where do we in the Atlantic provinces fit into the picture? Concern over the situation revealed by this and other signs has prompted the formation of the Atlantic provinces economic council. This, as some of you know, is a council initiated, organized and financed by private enterprise, business and industry, to promote the economic well-being of the Atlantic region. I mention it here because it reinforces a conviction which has been growing in my mind for some time, a conviction that the federal government might have an agency whose primary and principal interest would be the regional problems of the Atlantic provinces. Spokesmen for other areas where a similar need may exist can present their own cases much better than I.

Four years ago, during my first session in the house, I tabled a question concerning the St. Lawrence seaway and its probable economic effects, with particular reference to the industries of the maritimes. The information or answers were not available at that time, and I understood why they could not be supplied. Doubtless it is much easier to give information on a definite engineering project than on the economic aspects of such an undertaking. Perhaps even 25 years from now conclusive answers on some of its results will still be lacking, but that does not say we should not be looking for them now and doing it with all the talent and energy we can muster. An informed policy can then be developed and corrective action taken before it is too late.

In the past, when general conditions or particular problems reached a critical stage, royal commissions have been appointed. At other times interdepartmental committees or interested persons have concerned themselves with regional problems. But these have been lacking in continuity. Their usefulness in solving or anticipating problems has been minimized by their transitory nature. It is my conviction that the federal government ought to make provision for a development unit in the Atlantic region either through the Bank of Canada or the industrial development bank, or as a joint operation of the two. The unit should be located in the area and staffed by people who have a continuing interest in the development of these provinces. The Bank of Canada's research department has an enviable reputation. Undoubtedly it has regional specialists who have a real understanding of area problems. The industrial development bank has industry specialists. I suggest that the government make provision for the systematic use of these facilities for regional development.

One immediate purpose that can be served is the provision of research facilities to provide some of the answers for the Atlantic provinces economic council. Such services would be a very useful complement to the promotional work of the Atlantic provinces economic council and of provincial departments concerned with industry and tourist development.

[Mr. Balcom.]

Second, and most important in the long-term, the constant scrutiny of national policies and programs from the point of view of their regional consequences is becoming increasingly necessary. The growing disparity among the provinces is painfully apparent, but the causes and the desirable remedies are not so easily seen. The problem of freight rates, to mention only one, is staggering in its complexity and magnitude. To those who think this would be just another expensive federal bureau I suggest that they examine the costs of the many royal commissions that have been appointed, and the results achieved. A report is filed, then the valuable experience and knowledge built up in the course of the inquiry are dispersed to the far parts of the country and forgotten.

I should like to refer now to the matter of immigration, which has also concerned me for some time. Being of the opinion that Canada's absorptive capacity in this regard is not as great as many people suppose, I would urge upon the government a cautious policy as to numbers, and certainly a highly selective one. I realize that such a stand leaves one open to charges of selfishness and lack of concern for people living under less favourable conditions than our own. But before anyone becomes too righteously indignant let him ask himself whether he would urge large-scale immigration from countries where population pressure is the greatest, the Far East, for example, where language, customs, religion and standard of living are very different from our own.

The arguments on this subject are varied. Those who favour large-scale immigration usually argue that more people mean a larger labour force and a larger market. But when unemployment befalls large numbers of the new workers the only place they can turn for help is the government. Yet the government is frequently assailed by these same proponents of large-scale immigration for the ever-increasing expenditures on welfare.

There is very strong argument, too, that it ill behooves a country of Canada's size and population to deny entry to those seeking a better life in the new world. Let me assure you that I do not deny the validity of this contention. In the present state of the world some movement of people is necessary and some immigration to Canada is desirable. I do not pretend to know how much nor do I know the answers to all the questions involved, but certain important things should be considered.

First, it must be remembered that Canada is not a homogeneous unit with a long history of strong attachment to a single national authority. The formation of the Dominion of Canada was in many ways an act of faith. The political and ethnic balance which now prevails has given us a good foundation for growth, but I fear that the spectacular expansion of the past 15 years has given us delusions of grandeur. Many Canadians and many outside Canada seem to have become mesmerized by the idea of bigness. We tend to overlook the nature of our growth, with a thin line of people stretched across a continent and large concentrations of population only in a relatively few centres. Many forget that there are reasons for this sparse settlement. Perhaps I should qualify this by saying that we who live in the coastal provinces are keenly aware of some of the costs of nationhood. The problem of transportation alone is almost overwhelming.

To get back to the main point, suppose business conditions should take a sudden turn for the worse? Suppose United States capital stopped flowing into the development of Canadian resources? How would we keep up our standard of living? The truth is that as a trading nation we are very vulnerable. Our exports are still largely primary products, with a few commodities making up the bulk of the value. Our population is scattered and already divided into two major language groups. Can we risk the addition of a large number of citizens with quite different backgrounds and loyalties from our two major groups? The existence of pockets of people whose Canadianism has not had a chance to take root and mature could be a grave threat to our political stability in time of emergency, either domestic or external. What is more, I question whether we are entitled to tackle with such wild abandon the development of our resources.

We think of Canada as a very large country, and so it is; but the supply of arable land, for example, is not inexhaustible. In fact we are told by our agricultural scientists that Canada will soon be importing more food products than she has exported. This day will be hastened if immigration and natural increase continue at the same high rate.

As to our mineral resources, may I refer you to the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy. The retiring president, Dean A. E. Flynn of the Nova Scotia Technical College told the engineers in attendance that they had a stewardship to protect the country's natural resources and the time was right now. I agree wholeheartedly with that. These facts suggest that the conservation of our resources should be receiving very serious study. It should certainly be taken into account in determining a desirable level of immigration for Canada.

There are other ways in which we can help to relieve the pressure of population on other areas. Canada has made a creditable contribution to the Colombo plan. The announcement regarding the proposed increase in our contribution will be welcome, and we should perhaps extend ourselves further in this program. To assist in the creation and enlargement of productive capacity in countries less developed than our own will accomplish more in the long term to raise the standard of living of the world's needy people than immigration can.

Another avenue we can pursue is in the direction of freer trade. Led by an able and farsighted Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), Canadian delegations have worked hard for the removal of trade restrictions. We have responsibilities in this regard, and the government is to be commended for its resistance to the special interests which from time to time seek increased protection from foreign competition. We have too much at stake in the enlargement of world trade to risk such action. Our fish, iron ore, lumber and wheat must be sold on the world market, and we must buy on that market if it is to remain strong and flexible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one subject which is close to my heart and that is housing. As we look forward into 1955 there are many encouraging things to think about. One of the most gratifying signs of progress in the current business picture is the increase in home building. I am sorry to say, though, that according to reports in our local press, the Halifax Mail-Star, dwelling construction in Halifax in 1954 was considerably below that of 1953, although the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been most cooperative in promoting the construction of homes.

It was only through the good offices of our own Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) in starting the new federal building for Halifax late in December that our construction figures kept even close to those of the previous year. I am not satisfied that all is being done that can be done, particularly by the municipalities. Quite apart from the significance of the increase in home building as a sign of prosperity is its meaning in terms of the well-being of our people, and there is still a great gap to be filled.

At the last census the average earnings of male wage and salary workers in Halifax county were between $2,000 and $2,500 a year.

Applying the standard used by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, we find that the average worker should pay from $38 to $48 per month for housing, that is assuming that 23 per cent of earnings should go for rent. That, Mr. Speaker, is what the man with average earnings could afford to pay for rent. What about the large number of workers who earn less than $2,000 a year? Where can they look for adequate housing at the price they can pay? We all know that in most communities it just is not available.

Halifax is an area in which there are many old wooden buildings that are fire traps, lacking in sanitary facilities and improperly heated. Worse still, there are many areas where the children have no place to play except the dangerous streets or dark alleys. How can people maintain their self-respect in surroundings such as these? The wonder of it is that out of these surroundings have come many first class soldiers, sailors, and airmen. I realize that this is a many-sided problem, but we must face the fact that a man earning $100 or $150 per month cannot afford to pay half of it for rent. Somehow we must find a way to provide suitable housing for as little as $25 to $30 per month, not as a give-away but on an economic basis.

The federal government cannot solve this problem alone. Local governments must play their part as well and, most important, the construction and related industries as well as labour must recognize the challenge. Surely an industrial society which can produce so many things cheaply and efficiently can fill this most vital need at a reasonable price. Probably we need to change our ideas on design and purpose. We cannot expect to rent a $15,000 house for $35 a month. Perhaps our sights have been trained too high. When one considers the advances in technology in the past century, the design and production of suitable low cost housing does not seem an overwhelming problem. But whatever the division of responsibility as between governments or as among government, private industry and individuals, we must all stand together at the bar of history. It is not too much to say that our unfinished housing business, the existence of slums in the midst of plenty, is an indictment of our society.

Another aspect of public welfare which is a very real credit to the government is the progress made under our national health program. We are now on what might be called our second five-year plan. The results of the first five years amply justify an extension of the system of grants which has done so much to build up hospital and health facilities, to provide trained workers, to advance research and to improve the care of children and the mentally ill. This work in the promotion of health and the prevention of disease is most important. The build-up of facilities and personnel is essential and a prerequisite of a nation-wide system of health insurance. Let us remember that these steps, in the words of the late prime minister, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, represent the first stages in the development of a comprehensive health insurance plan for all Canada.

It is true that in our federal system the provinces must participate in the administration of any such scheme. But the existence of federalism does not gainsay the essential soundness of prepayment for medical care any more than for any other form of insurance. Health insurance schemes have proved satisfactory to patients and doctors in many other countries. Can Canada with its abounding riches afford to withhold from many citizens the benefits of medical science?

While on the subject of medical care, may I draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) several items which merit consideration in relation to the Income Tax Act. The first is the treatment for polio and other crippling diseases, which requires the use of expensive drugs during the life of the patient. They are merely palliatives and not cures. Many of these treatments are very costly and while some, such as insulin for diabetes, have been specified as allowable deductions from taxable income, the coverage of this provision is in my opinion not broad enough.

Another cause of very real hardship which warrants consideration also is the complete invalidity of a spouse. Often in such a case the breadwinner must employ a housekeeper to take care of the invalid. I would strongly recommend that the cost of maintaining such housekeeper, at least the wages, be allowed as a deduction from taxable income. This would provide some measure of relief in what are at best most difficult circumstances.

To all our ministers we owe a debt of gratitude for the interest they have taken in our constituency, but I particularly wish to commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) for his action in making the Halifax airport a near reality, and for the great improvements being made in the Halifax harbour facilities. And I would like to mention here the splendid work accomplished over the years by the retiring chairman of the national harbours board, Mr. R. K. Smith, Q.C. We would also commend the farsightedness of the government in appointing as his successor the former vice-chairman, Mr. B. J. Roberts. The members of the national harbours board have vision and are very conscious that our national harbours, and particularly the great port of Halifax, should be ready not only in war but in peace to meet any emergency or any business that may offer.

The speech from the throne gives us hope that the elimination of level crossings will be widened in scope to include provision for the removal of underpasses. In Halifax we have the Fairview bottleneck, a menace to the safety of our people. This is in part caused by the Canadian National Railways, but while I admit that the initiative for the removal of this bottleneck lies with the city of Halifax itself, I nevertheless believe it is of sufficient importance that the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence should also look into the matter of finding a remedy for this condition. While this dangerous exit from the city exists, all efforts of our civil defence organization are practically nullified. There could be no mass evacuation from the city under present conditions. So, Mr. Speaker, I express the hope and urge that necessary changes will be made to alleviate such problems.

It is a source of great satisfaction to the people of Nova Scotia, Mr. Speaker, that the Angus L. Macdonald bridge linking Halifax and Dartmouth is about ready to open, and that the Canso causeway connecting Cape Breton island with Nova Scotia is in itself completed but will not be opened until the canal and locks are ready for use, perhaps in a year. These two projects show, sir, what can be done when the several governments concerned work together.

Would it be too much to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when the time comes for the official opening of the Canso causeway the House of Commons, if it is sitting, adjourn, or at least that a strong delegation go to Nova Scotia where we will be led across the strait by a noble band of 100 pipers.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the announcement in the speech from the throne that the government is going to give consideration to paying municipal grants on the basis of value is very comforting to the municipalities of Halifax-Dartmouth and Halifax county. Halifax is very conscious of how dependent we are on the federal authority for our economy, and it is most gratifying to know that the federal government, in turn, is also conscious of the part they must play in the equalization of taxation.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I hope that after the numerous compliments and bouquets tendered by the last speaker to those on the government benches, hon. members opposite will not be disappointed if my remarks are not exactly in the same tenor.

Coming as I do from a constituency where dairy farming is the principal industry, I feel I cannot let pass unnoticed the fact that 2,250,000 pounds of cheese are expected to arrive from New Zealand in a very short time. I recall that during the last election campaign the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) informed the dairy farmers in my part of the country that they could eat their own cheese. Now he adds injury to insult when, in effect, he advises them that they will have to eat New Zealand cheese as well. I do not think that is a suitable arrangement.

I should like to refer briefly to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). At page 20 the minister is reported as follows:

> A verbal arrangement was made with New Zealand at a time when we were having difficulty exporting to the British market. New Zealand was asked not to ship cheese to this market. The circumstances under which the request was made have changed. New Zealand was pressing to be relieved from that verbal arrangement and there seemed to be no very good ground for insisting that it be continued.

Of course this whole attitude reflects a complete lack of consistent trade policy on the part of the present government—sometimes tariffs; sometimes no tariffs: sometimes verbal agreements to let products in; sometimes no verbal agreements. At the present time I believe there are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 46 million pounds of cheese in storage in Canada, which is about a million pounds more than at this time last year.

I fail to understand how the Minister of Trade and Commerce can say that the situation has changed, or how he can intimate, as obviously he seeks to do, that the farmers are having no trouble in selling cheese in the British market at the present time. I think everybody in the house is or should be aware of the situation with respect to the export of cheese. In 1953 the Ontario cheese producers' association was able, through its own efforts, to sell 10 million pounds of cheese to Great Britain. I understand it was hoped some would be sold in 1954 but, so far as I have been able to learn—and certainly I have made inquiries—none has been sold yet. So I have great difficulty understanding the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he says that the circumstances under which the request was made have changed.

I cannot understand why the importation of this cheese, apparently by the Kraft company, was allowed under the present circumstances, when there are such great surpluses of cheese in this country. What affects cheese is bound to affect all other milk products, in the long run; it cannot help it. I fully realize that we may very well have to import a number of things from New Zealand because of the delicate question of balance of payments. We are all aware that that is a highly delicate situation. But surely the government could have been more careful than to permit the importation of cheese at the present time and allow this verbal arrangement with New Zealand to be ended. There are many other things that New Zealand exports which I am sure might well be purchased by private persons in Canada, such as wool, chilled meats, frozen meats, lamb and so on. Of course, if no person was prepared to purchase anything from New Zealand, and the balance of payments had to be maintained, it might have been less damaging if the government had purchased something itself.

If the government felt it really necessary to purchase something from New Zealand to keep up the balance of payments and nothing but cheese was going to be purchased by private Canadian firms, possibly the government could have purchased something else. I notice that there is some possibility of the implementation of the Massey report, which may provide an aquarium in Toronto. Toronto also has a couple of fine zoos. I understand that other cities have them also. The government might very well have purchased some kiwis from New Zealand to put in those zoos. They might have paid $72,000 each for them, as they did for those old pictures last year. If they did not care to do that they could purchase some tree ferns from New Zealand and put them in the conservatory in Rideau Hall where we could see them once a year at the garden party. I have no doubt that they are fairly expensive. If those were not satisfactory I suggest the government might very well purchase one of the live volcanoes on New Zealand's north island and, Mr. Speaker, I have a good suggestion as to where it might be put—right in the government lobby, because it might get a little action on some of the present problems such as unemployment and tariff policies.

I am sorry to see that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) has left the chamber. He has been here all afternoon. I should like to make some remarks at the present time that I hope he will take into consideration in the future. We have a problem on some of the great lakes at the present time. I refer to lake Erie and also lake Ontario and lake Huron. A very serious situation has arisen there in the last few years. During the summer months there are thousands of small boats on these lakes. Canada has no coast guard service on the great lakes. There have been numerous unpleasant accidents and drownings on the great lakes. I do not wish to go into a recital of these accidents, but last summer a number of boy scouts and a scoutmaster from Oakville were drowned in lake Ontario. At Port Rowan on lake Erie a number of people from Hamilton were drowned, and the year before a person from Woodstock was drowned in lake Erie.

There are no storm signals to warn of impending storms on the great lakes, which become very rough very quickly since they are not as large bodies of water as the ocean. In addition, if there is an accident, or if there is some difficulty or people get lost, no one knows whom to go to or whom to get in touch with to do something about it. My understanding is that after the drowning of the boy scouts at Oakville last year no one could be contacted to do anything about rescue work. Nobody could be found to take any responsibility. There was no person to get in touch with to send any boats out. It was a very unfortunate situation.

I am not as familiar with the situation on lake Ontario or lake Huron as I am with the situation on lake Erie. Boats operate from Port Dover and Port Rowan and Turkey Point. There are hundreds of small boats on lake Erie operating from these ports. During the four months of June, July, August and September these boats go out all the time and it is only a miracle that there have not been more drownings and accidents. I hope the Minister of Transport will explore the situation and look into the possibility of trying to provide some sort of protection for people who use those boats. Perhaps it was not important a few years ago, but certainly it is now because of the number of small boats using the lakes. I am sorry I am not able to give any actual figures of the number of small boats on those lakes. There is no source of information from which to obtain those figures because boats are registered at different places, and move from one port of ownership to another.

The United States has excellent coast guard facilities on the great lakes. When Canadian boats are in United States waters they are adequately looked after if a storm is imminent. The coast guard does not allow boats to go out if a storm is impending, and if people are caught out in a storm which arises suddenly the coast guard goes after them and takes them to a United States port. Canada has not the wealth or resources of the United States, and at the present time we cannot afford to have such an elaborate system as they have. But I feel that we can afford to have some sort of system during those four summer months when there are so many small boats out on the lakes. It would not be difficult.

I have a suggestion to offer to the Minister of Transport which I should like him to explore. Use could be made of fishing tugs. They have diesel engines and are of modern construction. They have ship-to-shore radios and their captains know the waters. During the summer some arrangements should be made with them to take turns as "duty boat" and some sort of meteorological service should be made available to them. This is a situation that is quite serious and is likely to become worse rather than improve, because people who live in the inland towns and cities of western Ontario are using boats more and more on the great lakes. Often their knowledge of navigation and seamanship is bad, and they should have some supervision and should be looked after by some type of coast guard service.

The last thing I should like to deal with is the amendment of the leader of the C.C.F. party, which reads as follows:

> . . . have deliberately returned to the policy of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise which resulted in the depression and unemployment of the pre-war years, and that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to undertake the economic planning necessary to cope with the serious problems now facing the Canadian people.

I suppose that at the present time the biggest problem that faces everybody in the world is, what is the role of government? That is the basic problem. Is the government to be allowed to decide what we shall do; the goods that shall be manufactured, who shall distribute them, and so forth; or is the role of the government to be drawn from the philosophy of the nineteenth century, that of an arbitrator, the personage who regulates and keeps the various pressure groups in the country from becoming too powerful and facilitates the development of free human beings? Perhaps that is not expressed too well but it is basically the argument that we have in the world at the present time.

There are many, and particularly those to your left, Mr. Speaker, who are always advocating that the government should decide what is good for people, what remedies they should receive, if times are not good, and what should be done for them. But I still insist, Mr. Speaker, that provided the government makes facilities available, it is much better that when the need arises people should look after themselves in their own way; because in circumstances such as these it is a question of what people realize they need themselves and not a question of what someone else thinks they need.

I refer particularly to the subject matter of credit unions. We often hear talk about capitalism and free enterprise. Unfortunately capitalism or free enterprise is usually personified as having a large fat stomach, striped trousers and a silk hat. Some people wish to personify capitalism in that way because it suits their purpose. I am afraid that sometimes this picture has gone over with the general public, but there are many facets and different aspects to capitalism. Sometimes we have capitalism that is not dressed up in a silk hat and striped pants, but in overalls. I think the credit union movement in this country is probably one of the best examples of capitalism in overalls.

Credit unions have arisen because of a need. The need was to obtain small loans at low rates of interest. Normally the people who need small loans are those who can least afford to pay high rates of interest. This is much the same as the mutual insurance companies. When the straight line insurance companies would not insure farm property the farmers' mutuals came into being because of the need. Credit unions arose much in the same way.

It is true there are loan companies, but they charge very high rates of interest. I do not blame them entirely as they have a heavy overhead, big staffs to keep up and so on. They have to make a profit. But the credit union movement grew as a result of this condition. Funds were made available for small loans at reasonable rates of interest. Credit unions charge the borrower a maximum of one per cent per month on the unpaid balance on a day to day basis with no extras. Many credit unions charge less than this. They are able to do so because the work of the credit union is done on a voluntary basis, and there is no overhead to pay.

Credit unions as we know them today started in Canada in the 1930's, although a similar organization known as the caisse populaire existed in Quebec prior to that time. At the present time there are about 3,000 credit unions in Canada and about 1,000 caisses populaires in Quebec. The latter are set up on a parish or geographical basis, rather than an industrial or functional basis as the credit unions are. At the present time there are about 1,200,000 credit union members in Canada, while there are about 300,000 members in caisses populaires. The credit unions are regulated by provincial credit union acts, and most provinces have legislation of this type.

Credit unions have often been misunderstood and I think this is a great pity, because they perform a great service to the people of this country. Loans extended by credit unions are based on the character of the person who is borrowing. Since the credit unions are normally not too large the committee which extends credit knows the people personally to whom money is being lent. This is an advantage which the other lending institutions simply do not have.

People often say that there is no control over the credit unions, that anyone can take the money. That is not so, because the officers are bonded and reserves are set up to offset bad loans. The voluntary assignment of wages required by law when a person is given a line of credit is seldom used, as loans made by the credit union are made on a character basis. In the event of the death of a borrower whose loan is still outstanding the loan is paid off by an insurance company and not by the estate of the deceased. That is most important when a person of little means dies and the loan does not have to be paid either by his widow or his family.

The investments of a credit union are mostly in the form of loans to members, but credit unions can invest their surplus funds in securities approved under the Trustee Act of Ontario or the trustee acts of other provinces. Credit unions have been most successful in Canada, as only approximately one-tenth of one per cent of the loans extended have resulted in bad debts. This does not even approach the reserves which are required by law to be set up for bad debts.

Before I close I should like to touch briefly upon the benefits of credit unions. Whom do they benefit? They certainly benefit the persons who borrow money, because they are able to obtain small loans at low rates of interest without being badgered afterward by a sheriff or bailiff or officers of a finance company. Loans are granted to people who have real need of money. They may want to pay medical bills and so on; loans are granted "for any useful purpose". It has been the experience of credit unions that people who belong to this organization learn through budgeting to manage their affairs much better. It has been the experience that the biggest borrowers often become the biggest savers at later periods.

There are advantages that accrue to other people than those who borrow money. Advantages accrue to industry from the credit union movement. This movement reduces the financial worries of employees, which in turn increases the efficiency of a plant. I have spoken to several business executives who tell me that this movement has been of great assistance in solving personnel problems in their plants. There has been a great deal of co-operation between management and the credit union movement, because it has been found that this results in a reduction in the number of garnishees of workers' wages and the number of requests for pay advances by employees. As a result the book work of a plant is reduced tremendously.

What about the credit unions and the banks? I have heard people say that the banks do not approve of the credit unions. That is not so. Credit unions do not compete with the commercial banks. They deal only in small loans. I have it on fairly good authority that small personal savings accounts are uneconomic as far as the banks are concerned. A bank will look after such accounts as a matter of public service and because it is obliged to do so, but they are more of a nuisance than anything else. The credit union collects and consolidates its small deposits and puts them in the bank as one large deposit. Therefore the banks are saved needless book work. All credit unions deposit their funds in the chartered banks. The credit unions supplement the services of the banks in the personal loan field.

The credit unions are of one other indirect benefit to the country. In times of business recession, or business depression as some people prefer to call it, the credit unions do not curtail the extension of credit as do the commercial banks. The credit unions extend credit just the same in bad times as they do in good times. This cannot help but buoy up the general economy of the country.

In my own county of Oxford there are more credit unions than anywhere else in Canada. We have a good stable type of economy in that county. Three out of five workers in the county belong to credit unions. The success of this movement is largely due to the efforts of a businessman in Woodstock by the name of Earle Reed. He has done a great deal of work in this connection and his name is known from one part of the country to the other wherever the credit union movement exists.

In conclusion I would say I have gone to great lengths to deal with the credit union movement because I feel it illustrates, as I have pointed out before, what people can do on their own without the help of any paternalistic government. The great success of the credit union movement has been achieved without the interference of government agencies. When people to my left get up and say that everything must be under government auspices I would refer them to the credit union movement as a glowing example of what people in Canada can do on their own without government assistance or interference.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of a recent issue of a daily newspaper published not far from here which contains what I regard as a very delightful human interest story. This was written by one of the members of the press gallery, Mr. Gerald Waring, who writes a column under the caption "Capital Comment". This is a story of how we finally got pensions for disabled persons. It is not my purpose at this point to rehash the debate we had on that question last session, but if hon. members have not had this article by Gerald Waring drawn to their attention I believe they will be interested in hearing its details.

According to this columnist there is a young woman about twenty-two years of age, whose name we do not yet know, who lives in Sherbrooke, Quebec, to whom considerable credit should be given. It appears that in July, 1953—when most of us were extremely busy, as hon. members will recall if they think back to that time—the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was in the midst of his election campaign. He visited Sherbrooke and spoke there at what I am sure was a large and enthusiastic meeting. The parents of this young woman to whom I have referred attended the meeting and, according to Mr. Gerald Waring, in order to break the monotony of their daughter's day—for she is tied to a wheelchair, being disabled with a spinal ailment—they took her to the meeting; and he says, if I may quote him in part:

> She was intensely interested in what the great French-Canadian leader had to say.

Mr. Gerald Waring points out that the theme of the Prime Minister's speech had been the Liberals' record in the field of welfare legislation. As this young woman listened to the Prime Minister's glowing reports of what the Liberal party had done, she wondered why this government had not done something for people like her. According to the story as set out in this column, the idea stuck in her mind for several weeks, and shortly after the election on August 10 was over, she decided to do something about it, so she wrote a letter to the Prime Minister.

There is nothing unique about that procedure. Many people write letters to the Prime Minister, and many more would like to do so. Indeed, this columnist says there is no question but that many letters have been written to the Prime Minister across the years asking that something be done in the direction of pensions for disabled persons. But most of those letters had been intercepted, apparently, by the Prime Minister's efficient secretarial staff, and in the past the routine was that those letters were sent over to the Department of National Health and Welfare where, for many years, the stock answer was sent out that, although the people at Ottawa were interested, this was really a provincial matter.

But this young woman whose name we do not know, instead of writing to the Prime Minister here at Ottawa—apparently she knew that he was having a little holiday after the strain of the election campaign—addressed her letter to him at his summer home at St. Patrick in the province of Quebec. It appears, therefore, that this young woman's letter, stating her plight and her view that, if the Liberal party believed in a program of human welfare, something should be done for disabled persons, came to the Prime Minister's personal attention.

As I go on and read the story I find that the Prime Minister was greatly impressed by this young woman's letter to him and accordingly, so Gerald Waring says, he wrote back to the young lady assuring her that the government would bring in disability allowances legislation at the next session of parliament. Then this columnist goes on to say that, on the Prime Minister's personal instructions, legislation was hastily prepared, presented to parliament and enacted.

As we also recall, when this legislation was before us last session the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) paid a tribute to the Prime Minister's personal interest in this question. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that interest was indicated to him in a letter which the Prime Minister wrote to the Minister of National Health and Welfare shortly after the election of August 10, 1953.

Whether or not this story is apocryphal, I do not know. It certainly has the ring of validity about it. As I said in my opening remarks, I regard it as a delightful human interest story. This columnist to whom I have already referred says that he made strenuous efforts to ascertain the name of this young woman. He even went down to Sherbrooke and interviewed a number of people, but he has been unable to learn her name. In his column he expresses the hope that sooner or later the Prime Minister will dig out that letter and let us know the name. I agree with Gerald Waring. I think this young woman should be given credit for having written the final letter, the one that did the trick.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, that was an extremely interesting routine that was pursued, and we are all delighted that at long last the efforts of many other people to get something for disabled persons bore fruit because of the writing of this letter by this young lady.

I think hon. members will realize that there is in my mind a question. I should like to know who could write the Prime Minister a letter asking for health insurance that would do the trick. Apparently the Prime Minister is a human being. Apparently when the plight of people is really presented to him in a way that impresses itself upon him, he uses his authority as Prime Minister to say "Something must be done about this". Apparently the appeals of members of parliament on the floor of the House of Commons and the appeals expressed in motions that have been made across the years by this party—and which are now made by the Progressive Conservative party—do not have the effect on the Prime Minister that we think they should have. I hope my having told this story of a letter from a young woman in Sherbrooke that did the trick with regard to disability pensions will have the result that someone in this country who feels personally the need for a national health insurance program will write to the Prime Minister personally the kind of letter that he will see and that will do the trick.

Mr. Blair: You write it.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Lanark suggests that I myself write the letter. I should be glad—

Mr. Rowe: Let the same girl write it.

Mr. Knowles: It does not matter who writes the letter. What we want is to get action on this important question.

I congratulate our friends to the right, the members of the Progressive Conservative party, on having added a nation-wide program of health insurance to their amendment which they presented to the house yesterday. Despite the fact that in the past they voted sometimes one way and sometimes the other on this question, I dare to hope that this time they will vote for it and that that will impress upon the government the fact that there is in this country a growing feeling that the time has come to have a nation-wide program of health insurance.

I noticed the answer the Prime Minister made to this request yesterday. It is the same answer he has made on a number of occasions. Referring to health insurance as requested in the amendment before the house, as reported on page 34 of Hansard he said this:

> It certainly is something that is highly desirable. It is something that we would all like to see done. However, our progress in the development of welfare services in Canada has been fairly rapid over the last few years.

That is his view, not mine. It seems to me that it has taken a long while to get such progress as we have achieved. The Prime Minister continued:

> Any further implementation would require the spending, through government agencies, of a larger portion of the incomes of individuals. That is something which will come, but the timing of it will depend upon the circumstances of the Canadian economy generally.

Mr. Speaker, I think it has been demonstrated by those who have gone into this question—it was brought out in the report of our old age security committee of 1950, and you can find it in material that has been produced on this subject by the Department of National Health and Welfare—that if you establish a nation-wide program of health insurance you are not going to spend much more money in the total than is now being spent on the health of our people, but rather that you are going to spend it in a fairer and more logical manner, and that you are going to see to it that people get health care according to their need for it rather than according to the state of their purses.

I suggest that if the Prime Minister can say as he did yesterday, with regard to a plan that will bring health services and hospital care to all Canadians, that it is something that is highly desirable; if he can say it is something we would all like to see done, he is the same man who, when he received the letter from this young woman in Sherbrooke, realized he could do something about that problem. He can do something about a nation-wide program of health insurance this session, and I call upon him to do so, certainly in the life of this parliament.

I make once again the appeal that many of us have been making in the house, that we in this group have been making persistently throughout the years, that this is the step in the field of welfare legislation that must next be taken; and that if we are going to claim to be a modern, progressive, civilized country it should be taken without further delay. I congratulate the Prime Minister on his response to the appeal that came to him in the letter from that young woman in Sherbrooke. I hope he will realize that there are thousands of Canadians who are looking to him to do something about this important question of health insurance, and on their behalf I call upon him to do something about it at this session of parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I seem to be picking up newspapers today, and I have another one in my hand. This is the issue of December 31, 1954, of the Winnipeg Tribune, a newspaper published in my own city. There is something on the front page, again of a human interest nature, which I enjoyed reading as I am sure all did who saw it when it was published on New Year's eve. The Winnipeg Tribune has followed the practice in recent years of inviting its readers to send in nominations as to who should be given the fictional title of "citizen of the year for Winnipeg". For several years they have been carrying on the practice and various people have been named. The newspaper has simply followed the practice of awarding that title to the person whose name is sent in by the largest number of its readers.

This year the title of citizen of the year was given by the Winnipeg Tribune to a very good friend of mine, a chap with whom I went to college years ago, the Rev. Fred Douglas, minister of old St. Andrew's United church on Elgin avenue in the heart of the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre. This minister of the United Church is indeed a very fine chap in every way; and in his own right, being the kind of person he is, and in view of the kind of service he renders, he deserved beyond question the honour which was accorded to him not just by the Tribune but by the readers of that paper. I think hon. members will be interested to know why the Rev. Fred Douglas was awarded the title of Winnipeg's citizen of the year. It was because of something he organized, something he did for old age pensioners.

Two and a half years ago a few little homes for old age pensioners were built under his leadership where couples who had nothing else on which to live but their $80 a month—in that case it was always a couple that had to go into the quarters—could find a place to live. It took a good deal of hard work on his part, a good deal of going around to people who had a bit of money, to get them to help him out. He was able to get other people to donate various services—and they, too, deserve credit—and he was successful at that time in getting that first project under way. It was recognized by everyone as such a good move, drop in the bucket though it was, that Mr. Douglas was encouraged to go on and do something more.

During 1954 he was successful in opening another of these projects near the church of which he is minister, right in the heart of my constituency. This time he was able to build two rows of houses that are joined together to provide accommodation for twelve single old age pensioners and also adjoining quarters in which a married couple live who look after the premises generally. In addition there is a common room where the people who live in the individual units can get together. The arrangement is that only people who have nothing but their old age pension to live on are given an opportunity to live in these homes. Single persons pay just $12 a month but, in view of what has been put into the project, that covers the cost of maintaining these homes.

I will not take further time to give additional details so far as the homes are concerned. What I think is interesting is that this service to old age pensioners, this attempt to provide homes for these people, was so widely recognized in Winnipeg as one of the finest pieces of work done by anyone in our city in 1954; hence the overwhelming number of those who took the trouble to write the Winnipeg Tribune as to who should be citizen of the year said that this was the man, this friend of the pensioners, this man who did something to make life a little better for at least a few of Winnipeg's older citizens.

I want to pay my personal tribute to what Fred Douglas has done, and I pay a similar tribute to other individuals and organizations in Manitoba and other parts of the country who, here and there, have done something to provide homes for senior citizens. I know of other projects in Manitoba. I know of a project in Vancouver and of one in Windsor. No doubt there are others, though they do not come to my mind at this moment.

The point that impresses itself upon me is that citizens generally like to see something done for old age pensioners. What a fight we have had across the years to try to get the old age pension in the first place, to get the means test abolished, to get the amount up to $40 a month and to get something paid at age 65. This government acts as though the people of Canada did not want their money spent in that way, but in that view the government is wrong.

I say these letters of tribute to Fred Douglas show that the people of Winnipeg feel that something should be done for old age pensioners, and I am satisfied that the people of Winnipeg are no different from the people of Canada from one end of the country to the other. I say to the government that I feel it is not responding to the good will of the Canadian people. It is not aware of what is in the hearts of the Canadian people when it sits back and thinks it does not need to do anything more about old age pensioners, and can just let things remain as they are. The only word about old age pensions we see in the newspapers is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is wrestling with the question of whether or not he should increase the rate of the old age security tax. There is no suggestion in such stories of what is really needed, namely an increase in the pension itself.

It is a fact that stories are published in financial papers about the old age security fund being in the red, but nothing is said about what some other services may be costing. Any other item of expense, whether it is on defence, public works, harbours or what have you, is a cost. There just does not happen to be any tax that is particularly earmarked for these expenditures, so the figures are not set side by side. In this case there happens to be what is called an earmarked tax, but it does not mean that the country is in the red because it is paying old age pensions. Not at all. So long as there is money available in the treasury, so long as there is available out of the gross national product of the country money that could improve the lot of old age pensioners, we are not in the red because we do something for our senior citizens.

I insist, as I have in other sessions, particularly since 1949 and 1950 when the figure was set at $40 a month, that we are not playing fair with our senior citizens and we are not playing fair with ourselves as Canadian citizens if we leave the pension at $40 a month. It should now be raised to not less than $60 a month. I call upon the government to shake off its lethargy, its indifference, to shake off the notion that they solved this problem years ago. They only took a step. The problem is still there. If we regard ourselves as a civilized people we have to do more than we have done thus far for our senior citizens. I urge that something be done about that question at this session of parliament.

Like other members who have spoken thus far in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I too welcome most heartily the announcement in the speech from the throne that there will be legislation amending the War Veterans Allowance Act. I welcome in particular the precise information that whatever amendments are brought in they will do at least two things, increase the basic rates of the allowance and raise the level of permissible income. I am not going to get mixed up in the argument that has already taken place as to who is responsible for this action. Perhaps some veteran somewhere wrote a letter to the Prime Minister that really reached him, like the letter from the young lady in Sherbrooke which was sent to him at St. Patrick in 1953.

We do not worry about that. What I do hope, Mr. Speaker, is that when this legislation is brought down it will not be a disappointment. In my view, as has been stated by members on all sides of this house in the last year or two, the Canadian Legion has been very responsible, very conservative in its requests. It has asked that the war veterans allowance be raised to not less than $60 per month single and $120 per month married. It has asked that the ceiling on permissible income be raised to not less than $1,200 single and $2,000 per year married. I call upon the government, when it introduces that legislation, not to fall below those reasonable requests of the Canadian Legion.

I suggest that the Liberal members in particular, who are happy to stand up and welcome the announcement in the speech from the throne, might well try to get the ear of the members of the government and make it clear to them that they will have to change their tune if, when that legislation is introduced, it provides anything less than has been asked for by the Canadian Legion. In my view their request on behalf of these burnt-out pensioners is legitimate and reasonable. I hope it will be met to the letter.

As one who thinks we can get along with 30-minute rather than 40-minute speeches, Mr. Speaker, I am going to conclude before six o'clock. I am glad I said something that received the approval of those on the opposite side. I shall eliminate some of the notes which I have before me so I can conclude by the adjournment hour.

As others have been pointing out, one of the most serious problems facing the country at the moment is that of unemployment. I, for one, feel that the government just is not conscious of how serious this matter is to the people whom it affects. The government seems to be able to see these things only in terms of statistics; that is all they are, figures on a sheet.

I come back to where I started, Mr. Speaker. I suppose once again somebody had better write the Prime Minister a letter. The Prime Minister's secretaries had better be away on a holiday or having a coffee break so the letter will go in to the Prime Minister himself. Perhaps he should see a letter from an unemployed person whose family is suffering because, in this great country of ours, with all the needs we have, there is no work.

I was disappointed yesterday that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) felt it necessary to take as notice the question I asked him concerning the lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways. It is quite true that I did not send him notice of the question, but we had an exchange of telegrams and letters about this matter a few weeks ago. I thought it would be one of the matters on top of his desk, the way large numbers of employees have been laid off in recent months by the Canadian National Railways. About a year ago when we were here, on two or three occasions I asked the then minister of transport, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, if we were at the end of the lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways. Every time I did so he expressed the hope we were. Every time he expressed the hope that there would be no more lay-offs, more lay-offs came.

Surely this is one field in which the government, since it owns the Canadian National Railways, can take steps to see that the unemployment situation is not worsened by the action of the railway. I am satisfied from conversations I have had with some of the employees themselves that there is work to be done, on the basis of which some of those laid off could be put back to work.

There are other fields in which employment certainly could be provided. I congratulate the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) upon his remarks today on the question of housing. I do not necessarily agree with all the details of what he said, but I certainly agree with his contention that we have not solved the problem of housing until we have made homes available at rental rates that can be afforded by those whose incomes are in the middle and lower brackets. This calls for the building of still far more homes than we have in this country, and as long as homes need to be built, as long as homes need to be provided, with all the facilities and conveniences that are necessary in the modern home, it is utterly ridiculous that we should have an unemployment situation.

Unemployment seems to suggest there is nothing needed. This country is full of needs for our people, very real, human needs such as homes, furnishings, equipment, roads, hospitals and all the rest. We are in tremendous need of the production of wealth to provide an adequate base for a proper, full-fledged social security program. Unemployment does not make sense, Mr. Speaker. If it does not make sense it is certainly nonsensical for the government to sit over there and do nothing about it. I challenge this government to shake off the lethargy that has been revealed from the time this session began and do something without delay about these very serious and important problems now facing the people of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, before coming to the substance of my remarks I should like to associate myself with all those who have complimented the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the excellence of their speeches. I should like also to take this opportunity to extend to all my constituents my best wishes for a very happy and prosperous 1955.

The year that recently ended proved to be much better than had been generally expected. In spite of the slight economic recession, with the attendant increased unemployment and the poor wheat harvest, 1954 still turned out to be one of the most prosperous years in our history. Unfortunately this prosperity was not uniform throughout the whole country and in some sections our people are still experiencing severe economic hardship. This is particularly true of a large majority of the people whom I have the honour to represent. For although Newfoundland as a province enjoyed unprecedented prosperity during 1954, this prosperity was not shared equally throughout the province. Many of the dark spots in the picture of our provincial economy are to be found along the southwest coast, and particularly in my own riding.

Burin-Burgeo is one of the poorest ridings in all Newfoundland, because it is almost completely dependent upon the fisheries. And while in some sections the fisheries have been very good indeed, in others they have been very poor; and the western half of my riding is fast becoming a depressed area.

The southwest coast of Newfoundland is the only part of the province where all commercial varieties of fish are available and can be caught the whole year round. But, so far as the fisheries development program is concerned, it appears to be a forgotten area. Not a single experimental station has been established along the entire coast, and no plan has been announced either for the development of its fisheries or for the solution of its problems.

If hon. members will cast their minds back to the Christmas just past they will recall pleasant and happy memories of plenty of good things to eat and to drink, plenty of toys for the children, and plenty of good things to enjoy. For many of the fishermen in my riding this Christmas was a cheerless one indeed—no toys for the children, nothing special to eat, only the bare necessities of life. And now they can look forward to a bleak and hungry winter alleviated only by family allowances and provincial welfare payments. Apart from employment at the Canadian National Railways terminal at Port aux Basques and the fluorspar mines at St. Lawrence, the only bright spots in my riding are to be found in six or seven communities where fresh fish plants are in operation. Fresh fish plants are indispensable to the development of our fisheries and the rehabilitation of our fishermen, but they must not be regarded as the whole answer. The salt fish industry is equally essential to the prosperity of our fishermen and to the economy of our province; and it must be kept alive at all costs.

It is imperative that we find more and more remunerative markets for our salt cod, because the economic well-being and the prosperity of our fishermen depend to a very large extent upon competition between the fresh and salt fish industries. My own constituents, as well as fishermen in all parts of Canada, will be pleased to learn from the speech from the throne that loans, similar to prairie farm improvement loans, will be made available to them. This is a move in the right direction, and one that has been long overdue.

Our means of production are in great need of modernization, but on the other hand there is little point in catching fish that cannot be sold. The most urgent need of our fishermen is a variety of competitive outlets for their fish, because even with their present methods and means of production they can still produce much more than they are producing. There is no incentive for fishermen to produce fish unless they can sell their catch at a profit. What point is there in a fisherman toiling from early morn until late at night, day after day, only to find at the end of the year that he has barely met his cost of production?

For these reasons it is hoped that our Department of Trade and Commerce will continue their efforts to expand the markets for all our fisheries products, our salt fish as well as our fresh fish. We also need most urgently more research into the possibilities of the herring fisheries. The tinning of fresh fish, fish tongues, fish cakes and fish roes also deserves far more attention than it has received up to now.

It will be a sad day for Newfoundland when our salt fish industry disappears. But not only will it disappear; the fresh fish industry too will be seriously affected unless unemployment insurance benefits are extended to our fishermen without further delay.

In many settlements today the fishermen actively engaged in the fisheries are all over 50 years of age. When they can carry on no longer there will be no one to take their places in the fishing boats, because all the younger generation are forsaking the fisheries for other forms of employment which carry with them unemployment insurance benefits. And who can blame them?

We are all happy to learn from the speech from the throne that war veterans allowances and blind pensions are to be increased. This will meet with universal approval throughout the whole nation, for no two groups among us have a better claim to a greater share in the growing prosperity of this country.

The speech from the throne also indicates that unemployment insurance benefits are to be extended. This will be welcomed by all, and it is hoped that the proposed changes will include the extension of these benefits to our fishermen, because this is absolutely essential to the survival of our fisheries.

While I am dealing with matters affecting fishermen I know my constituents would never forgive me if I failed to mention one matter that concerns them very much, namely the restriction on the shooting of turrs. Hon. members who were present in this house on March 14, 1951, which was a private members' day, will recall that the whole sitting was devoted to the discussion of this problem, when Mr. Gordon Higgins, who then represented St. John's East, introduced an amendment to the Migratory Birds Convention Act with the object of having these restrictions relaxed. Both the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), who was then minister of resources and development, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) took part in that debate and indicated by their remarks a sympathetic attitude toward this problem, as can be seen by a reference to pages 1260 and 1261 of Hansard of that day.

Following that debate the restrictions on the shooting of turrs were relaxed and continued relaxed until last fall when, without warning, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police began rigidly to enforce them once more. This is very difficult to understand, because no warning was given and no public announcement or statement with reference to the matter was made by anyone in authority. To add to the confusion, there are rumours that restrictions are being rigidly enforced in some sections of our province and not in others.

As far as my own riding is concerned, the situation now is even worse than it was in 1951. I have already described the desperate condition under which many of my people are trying to exist. This Christmas they were not permitted even to enjoy a meal of turrs. These restrictions are causing them a very severe hardship and adding to their misery, because they are being deprived of the only source of fresh meat that is available to them. I therefore bring this problem again to the attention of the ministers concerned and urge them to effect a speedy, satisfactory and permanent solution.

There is one other matter of great importance to my constituents that I must bring to the attention of this house because, after five years of fruitless effort, all other means of dealing with it have been exhausted. I refer to the Canadian National telegraph service to the small outport communities of Newfoundland. Prior to confederation the postal and telegraph services were combined under a single department of the Newfoundland government and had been built up to a high peak of efficiency within the limits of the financial resources at the government's disposal. After confederation this sensible and efficient organization, which had been created through a process of trial and error to meet the special needs and conditions of Newfoundland, was destroyed. It was split up. The postal services were taken over by the federal Post Office Department, and the telegraph services were transferred to the Canadian National Telegraphs.

It was expected that the Canadian National Telegraphs, with their greater financial resources, would implement the plans which even in 1949 the Newfoundland government had under consideration for the improvement and the expansion of those services. Instead, the service has steadily deteriorated until now it is little better than the Indian smoke signals or the African tom-toms, and it has about the same degree of privacy. Land line telephones are housed in wooden booths which, instead of being soundproof, amplify the voice so that it is clearly audible to everyone standing in the office lobby. Messages being transmitted and received over the wireless telephone can be picked up by anyone within a radius of 20 or 30 miles who cares to turn on his radio. In some areas the local Canadian National Telegraphs telephone has a greater listening audience than "Ma Perkins" or many of the soap operas. It is seldom possible for more than four or five people to listen in on a rural telephone line, but the audience of the Canadian National telephone is limited only by the number of radios within range. Consequently businessmen are forced to carry their messages by boat to the nearest Morse operator, in order to prevent confidential information being overheard by their competitors.

If one is travelling along the coast by boat it is an absolute waste of money to send a telegram on ahead. I proved this for myself over and over again as I travelled through my riding. Day after day, before leaving port in the morning, I would send a telegram to the place where I planned to spend the night, and then after travelling all day at 8 knots speed against wind and tide I would invariably arrive at my destination ahead of the telegram.

This situation is due partly to obsolete equipment which had been in use for about 20 years or longer prior to confederation, and partly to the stupidity of Canadian National Telegraphs policies and regulations. Although present facilities are not adequate to handle even normal day traffic, the Canadian National Telegraphs insist on cluttering it up still further by accepting long night letters for offices which have no night operators and which therefore must be transmitted only by day. The effect is the same as giving a reduced rate, but if that is the object the sensible thing to do is reduce the rate on normal telegrams and thus speed up the traffic.

Canadian National Telegraphs regulations give priority to stock market quotations, and as a result urgent telegrams, which should have been delivered the day before, or the day before that, are delayed still further while the local operator in the tiny village is kept occupied copying down lengthy stock market reports which are not of the slightest interest to anyone, and least of all to the poor fishermen.

I bring this matter to the attention of the house, because if the Canadian National Telegraphs persist in pursuing their present policy the time is not far distant when the whole telegraph service in Newfoundland is going to collapse for lack of qualified Morse operators. Before confederation every Morse operator trained his children and his relatives to transmit and receive Morse messages. The treatment they have received at the hands of Canadian National Telegraphs has sickened them so much that they do that no longer. As a result combined offices, where the postmaster is also the telegrapher, are now often closed down for a week at a time while a frantic search is conducted to find a qualified Morse operator.

Before long the scarcity of Morse operators will have a serious effect upon the postal services. In order to keep these services in operation it will be necessary to separate the duties of the postmaster and the telegrapher and appoint a separate individual to each job. This will result in the collapse of both services because the salary paid for the combined duties averages only about $2,000 a year, and when that is divided between two people it will not be sufficient to attract competent and responsible persons. The alternative will be to either increase both salaries or close down both services.

The officials of Canadian National Telegraphs are fully aware of this situation, because they have been informed of it on many occasions. Recommendations and suggestions are treated with such haughty indifference that one can only assume they are not wanted. My own personal experiences have convinced me that it is a useless waste of time and effort.

The situation is going from bad to worse and will soon become hopeless. It is now apparent to everyone that a mistake was made when the Newfoundland organization that existed before confederation was split up and destroyed. The only solution is to retrace the step taken at confederation and transfer the telegraph services back either to the post office or the Department of Transport.

Rapid communications are a vital necessity to the development of any area. In regions where there are no road communications and where the mail service is of nine-day frequency by coastal boat the people are far more dependent upon telegraphic services than the people in those areas which are fortunate enough to enjoy other means of communication. Therefore I urge the government to give early attention to this most important matter.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the debate so far has brought to the attention of parliament, rather forcibly, I believe, the fact that there is definitely a recession in our economic situation. We sometimes refer to this as a depression, but I have found that people occasionally take offence when we speak of a depression. They seem to think that "recession" is a more polite term for the situation. I do not know that there is any difference. As an hon. member pointed out in the past, a recession is when your neighbour loses his job, but when you lose your job it is a depression. We are somewhere in between those two definitions.

It has become abundantly clear that there has been a serious falling off in agricultural income. Unemployment is higher than it was at this time last year, and retail trade has been falling off. This is a natural consequence of the first two factors.

This evening I am not going to go into the question of unemployment to any extent, because my colleagues will deal with that much more thoroughly than I could; but I should like to devote a little time to the question of an agricultural policy for Canada. I am glad that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is in his seat tonight, because most of what I shall have to say will refer to his department as well as to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

First of all I should like to say that I believe every member of this house subscribes to the proposition which has been stated here and elsewhere so often by members of all parties that agriculture is entitled to its fair share of the national income. What I have to propose will not be in the nature of asking this parliament to hand out anything or to give preferred treatment to this basic industry which perhaps of all industries in Canada deserves preferred treatment. Rather my object will be to outline a policy which will, as near as it is possible to do so, bring to agriculture its fair share of the national income.

I should like to begin by quoting a resolution passed at a recent convention of the Manitoba farmers' union. A number of resolutions were passed dealing with agriculture, all of them of some importance, but I believe this one is the hub of all the resolutions, perhaps the basic resolution. I quote:

> Whereas the price of farm products and farm income is constantly dropping while farmers' cost of production is increasing and there are no signs of parity between what the farmers earn and what they must pay for what they buy, and agriculture has therefore reached a most unstable position in comparison with other industries;
> Therefore be it resolved that we, the Manitoba farmers' union, strongly urge our federal government to establish a policy of forward pricing on all agricultural commodities, which would bear a 95 per cent parity relationship to other goods and services, thus bringing about stability in agriculture and strengthen our whole economy.

I say that resolution is basic because if it were carried out it would involve the putting into effect of a number of supplementary policies which possibly would help to bring about the objective I have stated, that is a fair share of the national income to agriculture. Before I go on to outline the proposals I am going to make I want to say that I do not consider them to be either conclusive or exhaustive. I should like to hear proposals from all sides of the house so the government might summarize them, take from them what they believe to be constructive and practical and then come back to this house with a policy for agriculture which would bring about some stability and future for that great industry.

As part of that policy I should like to see a system of marketing boards. It is true that there are some marketing boards in existence.

In his speech yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to one of them, the one which perhaps stands out above all others, the Canadian wheat board. This board has been one of the most successful in the history of marketing in this country. However, there are many other types of marketing boards needed if we are to attain that orderly marketing which I believe was the objective of all hon. members of this house in 1945 and the post-war years; at least hon. members from all sides of the house seemed to agree with that objective.

As one of the steps toward it I would suggest that every effort be made to assist those provinces which are now trying to organize livestock marketing boards. The Minister of Agriculture well knows that in the prairie provinces at least some definite steps have been taken. A great deal of planning has gone into the proposed establishment of marketing boards for livestock. In recent months other provinces have shown an interest in that project. As I read the press and according to what I hear from the agricultural organizations, the most recent development is the idea that if enough of the provinces show an interest in setting up livestock marketing boards, then the federal government can come to their assistance by co-ordinating their efforts through a national livestock marketing board and in that way establish a policy of orderly marketing from coast to coast. That is something that would also be necessary in connection with interprovincial and international trade in livestock and livestock products.

But perhaps the most important thing towards which the farm organizations are looking, so far as this house is concerned, is the establishment of floor prices for livestock products. Obviously it would be beyond the financial possibilities of any one province, and particularly of the prairie provinces whose revenue is very unstable as recent years have shown, to take the financial responsibility of establishing floor prices for livestock commodities within their own borders. The provinces can and no doubt will help in the organization, regulation and administration of livestock marketing boards within their own borders, but when it comes to the question of guaranteeing a floor under which the price will not be allowed to drop, it is only at the federal level that this financial responsibility can be carried. I hope that, as part of an over-all marketing policy, the government will consider helping the provincial farm organizations which have done a great deal of important preliminary spade work. A great deal of information has been elicited in connection with these boards. The federal government can help them to co-ordinate their efforts through a national livestock marketing board.

I should also like the government and this house to give some attention to the proposal that has been made by various farm organizations of a two-price system for Canadian wheat. It has been proposed that on the domestic market—that is, for that portion of the wheat which is sold for Canadian consumption—a price should be set which should bear a relationship to other prices. It has been pointed out, and I think with some authenticity, that it would not be a departure from regular practices so far as business is concerned. I am informed that it is standard practice. The figures I am going to use were given to me. I have not checked them for accuracy. For example, as to the automobile industry, when they sell automobiles in Canada at wholesale for about $1,400 it is not unusual for them to offer those same automobiles in Europe for $700 and in some cases for less than that in countries like Australia and New Zealand.

An hon. Member: Have you any evidence to that effect?

Mr. Zaplitny: I have just said that these figures were given to me and that I have not checked them for accuracy. If my hon. friend has evidence to the contrary, I should like to hear it. I will say this without any hesitation. It is the practice of Canadian manufacturers to offer their goods in other countries at prices lower than the prices at which they offer them in Canada. That is the price system which is used for the purpose of meeting competition. In other words the automobile industry as an example, because it enjoys a rather unusual degree of protection in this country, is in a position to sell its products in Canada at prices higher than those at which they are offered elsewhere.

Certainly there is every justification for the grain producers in Canada to request that their product in Canada, for Canadian consumption, command a price which will bear a relationship to other commodity prices within this country. If it is necessary, as a matter of staying in the world market, to offer that same product at a slightly lower price elsewhere, then that is something that may have to be done. But there can be no real argument why the Canadian grain producer should have to offer his product in Canada, for domestic consumption, at a price less than it is worth in relation to other goods and services.

I should also like the government to take into consideration at an early date the question of an investigation into price spreads.

It is about 20 years—in fact it was a little more than 20 years ago—since there was carried out in Canada a price spreads investigation. It was one of the highlights, perhaps, of the economic history of this country. Those who have read the results of that investigation in the report, which is still available, have found a wealth of information. Not all the recommendations that emanated from the report were acted upon, it is true, perhaps because of the rather unfortunate time at which it was published. But the very fact that the price spreads investigation was made, and that it received fairly wide publicity in this country, had its beneficial effect by focusing the attention of the public and of this house on the exploitation, the unfair trade practices and the many other deficiencies in our economic and so-called competitive system. Almost 21 years have gone by, and I think it is high time a similar investigation was made, as thoroughly as it is humanly possible to make it, in order to find out and to let the public know just what is happening to our price system.

I have, for example, a few figures which I obtained from a farmer who took some time off this winter and studied the price spreads in three of the basic grains produced. This material has been carefully checked, and this was the result of his investigation. For example, taking wheat, he discovered that a bushel of top-grade Canadian wheat produced approximately 72·2 per cent of flour and that at current prices the farmer would receive, if you break that down into pounds, anywhere from 1¾ to 2¼ cents per pound for his wheat, depending on the grade, the time at which it was sold and so on. When that wheat is milled into flour, that flour immediately retails at a price of 5¾ cents a pound. Made into bread it immediately brings a price of 13 cents a pound. In other words 100 pounds of flour, which make 129 loaves of bread, would bring this result if it were sold at the regular price. For the bushel of wheat the farmer sold he would receive about 96 cents to $1.25, depending on the grade; but the bread made from that wheat would sell at $7.28.

Even allowing for processing, handling, storing, selling and all other costs involved, that indicates a terrific spread, and an inquiry should be made into it so the producer and the consumer may both know just where the consumer dollar is going and to what extent the producer is receiving the proceeds of his product.

Then he went on to deal with oats and he produced these figures. On the oat prices quoted the farmer may receive anywhere from three-quarters of a cent to a cent for each pound of oats marketed, depending again on the grade and other factors. It is estimated that 55·3 per cent of the content of oats can be turned into what we call rolled oats which are sold for human consumption. That product immediately sells for 19 cents a pound. The farmer receives anywhere from 20 to 52 cents per bushel for his oats, but when they are turned into rolled oats they sell for $3.62 a bushel. This is an enormous spread, and even making allowance for all necessary costs it gives rise to doubts as to whether it is normal procedure.

Then we come to barley, and on the basis of prices as they were at that time it was found that the farmer receives from 50 to 92 cents a bushel for his barley. It is estimated that about 36 pounds of dry malt can be made out of approximately 42 pounds of barley. Immediately the dry malt is worth 12 cents a pound, or a bushel of dry malt would be worth $4.32. If it is turned into liquid malt it is worth $9 instead of $4.32.

An hon. Member: How much of that is taxes?

Mr. Zaplitny: Someone says, "How much of that is taxes?" As I have said, we have to make allowance for all costs that enter into the transaction and we would certainly make allowance for taxes. But having made these allowances, I still think it is a matter which needs some investigation. These figures deal only with three of the grains that are produced. The same thing can be said of a great many other products which seem to become unduly inflated in price somewhere along the line between the time they leave the hands of the producer and the time the consumer receives the benefit of them. I believe it would serve a useful purpose to have a full-scale inquiry into the costs of handling, selling and processing. In other words, we should find out what makes up the price spread between the producer and the consumer. If it is found that there are undue price spreads or that there is undue exploitation, then steps can be taken to correct the situation. I think that in itself would be of great benefit to the producer.

Then there is the question of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. When I saw on the order paper that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was introducing a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act I hoped that it would be something fairly comprehensive. I now find that it is a minor amendment. Perhaps the minister has in mind bringing in another bill later this session. Certainly it is time something should be done to accede to the joint request of the four western provinces. As the Minister of Agriculture well knows, as recently as last year the ministers of agriculture of those provinces had a conference and made a joint request to have the operations of the act extended to cover all agricultural areas in the four western provinces.

I do not want to weary the house by reciting the many difficulties that have been created in the prairie provinces by the last two unusually wet years. Most of us are already aware of them. The minister himself had occasion not many months ago to attend a farmers' meeting in a part of my province where I understood the farmers presented their problems most vividly and at great length. I believe it is time for a move to bring all agricultural areas of the four western provinces under the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

It is true that to date the operations under the act have been chiefly concerned with soil and water conservation and related matters; but I think it has been amply proved by experience that there are many other problems, such as drainage, which are getting to the point where they are beyond the capacity of these provinces to handle by themselves. I believe it would greatly assist the prairie farmers if the designated area under the act were extended so the federal Department of Agriculture could undertake the construction of dams, proper drainage systems and other related works which would not only protect land that is normally cultivated but could reclaim much of the land that has been put out of production in recent years due to wet weather.

As part of our agricultural policy I should also like to see the greatest possible effort made to remove trade restrictions. A great deal has been said in this debate about the necessity for international trade. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), replying to some of the proposals made by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), had this to say as appears at page 32 of Hansard of yesterday:

> Here we all feel that expanding trade is desirable. We feel that it is almost necessary to the prosperity of the Canadian people, but we do not feel that it would be by high tariffs that expanding trade could be achieved in this country.

I agree thoroughly with that statement, but it does not seem to lie well side by side with some of the actions taken by this very government. For example, only last year a bill was passed amending the Customs Act under which a very deliberate attempt was made to restrict imports coming into Canada. I believe that some of the recent difficulties which have arisen between the United States and Canada in relation to trade—difficulties which made it necessary for three of our senior ministers to make a hurried trip to Washington not long ago, the results of which we still have to hear—have arisen by reason of the provocation caused by that very legislation.

That legislation was ostensibly brought into the house as a measure of assistance to the textile industry, which had complained that it was losing much of its trade because of the interference of cheaper goods coming in from other countries. But it became clear very early in the operation of that legislation that it was not particularly aimed at keeping out textile imports. It was an instrument used to raise arbitrarily the invoice value of any manufactured goods which in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue were or could be considered to be unfair competition for Canadian goods of the same nature. The effect of that has been to create a great deal of uncertainty on both sides of the border. In fact, I would say almost on all sides because, although affecting the United States particularly, it has affected other countries as well. It has created a problem both for the Canadian importer and the United States exporter.

In the past, under the legislation which existed before the amendment, an importer could, by looking at the various tariff schedules of duties, calculate pretty closely what it was going to cost him to bring in goods from the United States. But since that amendment went through and since the Minister of National Revenue was given practically dictatorial powers to arbitrarily set the invoice price of goods which he deemed, in his wisdom, to be in unfair competition with Canadian goods, the Canadian importer as well as the United States exporter has been left in the most unenviable position of not knowing at any time what price they can quote. It has been left to the whim and fancy of the minister, his deputy or his deputy's deputy or some fifteenth assistant in the department to endorse the invoice. That is not a way in which we can promote trade relations with other countries.

I agree thoroughly with the Prime Minister when he said that expanding trade is not going to be accomplished by raising tariffs, but the effect of what the government has done under that legislation has been exactly the opposite, apparently, of what the Prime Minister himself advocated. I am looking forward, Mr. Speaker, to seeing this government change that legislation and go back to the normal procedure under which those who carry on trade may be able to read the act and follow its implications with some accuracy, rather than be left to the whim or fancy of some official who may have his own ideas.

Now, having said that, I want at this point to say that in order to implement practically all the things I have so far discussed, it seems to me it would be necessary for this government to enter into a certain amount of economic planning. The other day my leader advocated economic planning for this country. It could be seen that hon. members in other parts of the house did not agree. It seems rather strange to me that successful business people, as well as many professional people, who enter into undertakings admitting very freely and very quickly that the greatest degree of planning is necessary in order to be successful, seem to take the opposite attitude when it comes to planning on a national level.

Surely if we are going to carry out those requests which have been made by members speaking from the opposition side of the house, to say nothing of the requests of members speaking from the government side, certainly that will involve economic planning. I believe it should be accepted by this house as an economic fact that in the times in which we live, our problems in the immediate future are not going to be lessened by the fact that we are entering each day farther and farther into the field of technological development and discovery.

The other day I read an article in Maclean's magazine, as no doubt many of you did also, dealing with atomic development in Canada. I was astounded, even though I thought I had been following atomic developments in this country fairly closely, to learn how much quiet and unpublicized progress had been made in that field, not only here but in the United States as well. This is true to perhaps an even greater degree in Great Britain, where it is now within the realm of possibility that atomic energy can be used as a source of power for vehicles and in many other ways. We are now entering into a field which could create another industrial revolution in Canada, yet there are those who suggest that we go blindly into that situation without any economic planning at all. They say, leave it to free enterprise.

I am not opposed to free enterprise, and I do not believe anybody in this house really is, within the field in which it can make its greatest contribution. But if this nation has any foresight and vision and wants to take advantage of the latest developments, discoveries and techniques, then certainly we should not make a fetish out of free enterprise and deny ourselves the benefits that can accrue from a little national planning.

In this respect, I should like to refer to a speech made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard), who happened to pay our province a visit last year at the time of the by-election —I beg your pardon; I meant the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill). I was referring to him by his former portfolio; perhaps I liked him better in that portfolio.

In any event, he took part in the by-election in Manitoba and in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 6, 1954, is reported as having said:

> The phrase "private enterprise" was a "Tory trademark" and Liberals should never use it.

Then he went on to say:

> Private enterprise and public enterprise were both good, "and this country needs a lot of them."

It is this second paragraph with which I agree quite thoroughly. I am not going to comment on the first one because I do not want to enter into a dispute as to who owns the trade mark "private enterprise". Perhaps the most interesting paragraph is the third one, in which he says:

> But the trade mark of the party I belong to is human welfare and without working for this we do not deserve the power of office.

If one were to take those statements together, then I would be inclined to think that certainly at least a portion of the government is not sold altogether on what is commonly known as "private enterprise" and sometimes referred to as free enterprise. It appears that it was a good thing for him to be in rural Manitoba where we are a little more forward looking, perhaps, than some other parts of Canada, and the minister has come to the conclusion that perhaps a little public enterprise is a good thing for Canada too. I congratulate him on it.

As a matter of fact I pointed that out in my letter to the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, and contrasted it with something that was said by the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) only a few days later. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration seemed to resent it. He apparently thought I was trying to take advantage of what he had said. He did admit in his reply to the newspaper that I did not misquote him. We did agree on that.

The point I am trying to make is this. I believe the old battle that has been going on for quite a long time in Canada as to which "enterprise" is the real enterprise is getting pretty well shopworn and out of date. Let us have enterprise; let us have national enterprise. Let some of it be private enterprise and some public enterprise. Let us not get bogged down in an argument trying to prove there is only one kind of enterprise that can do anything in this country. Let the government, in order to carry out their policies, use the organized finances and the organized know-how which are available to it, and in co-operation with the provinces work out a system of developing our national resources that will provide the best possible form of social security. After all, that is the hallmark of civilization in any country.

Let us above all develop a certain amount of national pride in accomplishment, not in the narrow jingoistic sense that we feel we are better than any other people on earth, but a real, genuine love of the Canadian soil, an appreciation of the possibilities in our country and a full knowledge that we, as a nation, can go on to greater things regardless of whether they are done on the one hand through public enterprise or on the other hand through private enterprise, so long as they are done for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I add my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Listening yesterday to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and noting the ease with which he switched from his native tongue, French, to English, I thought of what I had noted in my first year in the House of Commons; that is, the innate courtesy of those who have been born to the French language. I wondered just how different the proceedings of the House of Commons would be if we, who have been born to the English language, were forced either by the rules or by courtesy to carry on the great bulk of our thinking and of our business in the house in a language different from that to which we were born. So may I add my sincere appreciation not only to the hon. member for Verdun but to all his compatriots in the House of Commons for their unfailing courtesy to us of another tongue.

I rise tonight to speak almost entirely on the question of war veterans allowances. I am not trying to gloss over the importance of unemployment in this country, because I do believe it is a serious matter. It is a matter about which every intelligent person in this whole country should feel deep concern, and I know that deep concern is felt most certainly by every member on this side of the house. However, I intend to reserve anything I have to say on that subject until we have before us the actual and final proposals of the government to deal with that particular question.

I want to speak tonight about war veterans allowances particularly because on the last day I was here last spring I had to express in the most forthright terms of which I was capable my disappointment because we did not get at the last session of parliament an increase in the war veterans alowances along the general lines that had been recommended in the Canadian Legion brief, and which had been advocated in this house, as was so well pointed out by the gracious lady who decorates the house in more ways than one, namely the hon. member for Halton (Miss Bennett). She described how all members of all parties in the house had given her a thrill by standing up to advocate a fair deal for those people receiving war veterans allowances, and it certainly was an inspiration for me last year to see how party lines were forgotten.

I think the hon. member who had the honour of first speaking out on this subject was my very good and old friend, the smiling member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). And I know very well, as the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) said yesterday, that the veteran member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) waged a doughty battle on that subject last year. The same is true of members from all parties, including the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), as well as a great many members on this side of the house.

I was doubly thrilled because one of the reasons I had to leave the house a few days before the end of the last session was to go home to attend, shall we say, an indignation meeting of about six or seven hundred irate veterans—and irate veterans' wives, who are doubly irate—who were very much concerned about this matter of war veterans allowances and what they thought was an undue delay on the part of the government in giving them what they considered was their due. I had to do some very frank talking. I had to tell them that, so far as we on this side of the house were concerned—and I was sure it was also true of others in all parts of the house—we would continue to do our level best to see that those in Canada entitled to war veterans allowances got their just due at the earliest possible moment.

But I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been doubly thrilled by recent developments. During the summer months it became clear that the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) would not have available to him this year the comfortable surplus that has enabled this government to pay off over two billion dollars of our national debt in the last seven years. It became clear that for the first time in many years the minister would be faced with a deficit. In the light of these circumstances it gave me a double thrill to note that, notwithstanding these facts, the government yielded to the strong representations made to it from all sides of the house, and we are now assured that the war veterans of Canada are going to get their due by way of increased war veterans allowances and raised ceilings.

I am glad to see, too, that at last we have abandoned what I thought was a very foolish argument, namely that the war veterans allowance is just another type of old age pension. We know perfectly well that during the course of debate, when people are fighting for some great social reform, all sorts of arguments are advanced from all sides of the house, and they are advanced to achieve certain results. But it seems to me it would be a most unsound principle permanently to tie war veterans allowances to the general old age security and old age assistance scheme in Canada. Certainly if we believe in honouring our debts—and I believe every member in the house would honour his debts—we must look with great disfavour on any repudiation of any of the debts of Canada. And surely the debt we should honour most is the debt to our own war veterans, who bore the brunt for this country in time of need.

I received an extra thrill this year in seeing Canada step once again into the forefront in the matter of veterans' welfare legislation. It was one of my responsibilities this past summer, as I have no doubt it was the responsibility of many other members, to take up certain pension complaint cases with the British ministry of pensions. When I have had occasion to look into the British veterans' legislation I have been more impressed than ever with the fact that Canada's veterans welfare legislation is the finest in the world, and that we take second seat to none. And, due to the fact that it has received constant support from all sides of the house all down through the years, once again we take our position in the front rank in our treatment of those who stood in the front line for us in time of need.

This afternoon we had a little bit of advice from my good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about how we should talk to our Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe)—if necessary, behind the curtains—if what was going to be done was not all we had hoped it would be. Well, of course, we have no way of knowing from the cabinet what is going to be done. I remember Lloyd George once said that there were never any cabinet secrets, because every cabinet minister he had ever known, except one, told the cabinet secrets to his wife, and the one exception told them to other men's wives. So it was suggested that the way to find out any cabinet secret was to send your wife around to the wife of a cabinet minister, and you would soon find out what happened.

But I am afraid we have a very clammy lot in our cabinet. We cannot find out a single, solitary secret. But may I tell my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre that, far from having to take the Minister of Veterans Affairs behind the curtains to prod him on to greater efforts for the war veterans of Canada, the shoe is very definitely on the other foot. When the time comes to reveal the story of the fight for fairness to the war veterans of Canada, far from having the present Minister of Veterans Affairs lag in that regard, we will find that he has been in the very front rank of the fight from first to last.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have had many great ministers of veterans affairs in this country from the days when we first got the war veterans allowance. We had that beloved dean of the house, the present hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), a great friend of the war veterans of Canada. Later on we had that great Scotsman, who stood up like a great highland granite mountain in his championship of the rights of the veterans of Canada. Still later we had our present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), who I sometimes think might even wish that he was back where he was before, but who takes second place to none in his steadfast championship of the rights of the veterans of Canada. May I say, Mr. Speaker, never within my knowledge or within my lifetime has there been a greater champion of the rights of the veterans of Canada than the present Minister of Veterans Affairs.

I think I am a pretty good-natured person. I was brought up in a family of 13 children, so I had to learn to be good-natured at a very early age and I hardly ever get really mad. But when I went home at one time this year I shall confess that I got really mad, and that was when some of my own compatriots from British Columbia said they were going to walk out of a certain convention because the Minister of Veterans Affairs had not championed the rights of the veterans with sufficient aggressiveness in the house. That really did burn me up, because I knew the true story of the fight he had waged at times when it was most difficult to wage it.

If you will forgive me, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. It is sometimes not an unmixed blessing to be the son of a very great personage. Sometimes when one is the son of a very great personage people are inclined to attribute his good qualities entirely to heredity. May I say that for my part, as one who has long been concerned about the welfare of the veterans in Canada I honour the present Minister of Veterans Affairs because he is the son of a very great Liberal statesman; but may I say with even more emphasis that I honour the present Minister of Veterans Affairs because of his own personality and because of the fact that in the truest sense of the word he has won his own spurs without help from anyone.

May I just tidy up that part of my speech by saying that while I did go home last year feeling a very real disappointment because we had not been able to get through an increase in the war veterans allowance and the lifting of the ceiling at the last session, I feel doubly gratified now.

While I am passing out compliments, for just a minute may I offer an especial compliment to the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), for his truly remarkable performance of yesterday. I must say that for very many years I have had a warm spot in my heart for the present Acting Leader of the Opposition, because I was born and brought up in the heart of old Tory Ontario, and I have a great, deep and abiding respect for a real, good old-fashioned Ontario Tory. I always know exactly where a real, good, old Ontario Tory stands; so I was not the least bit surprised yesterday when he gave this house that hour of, shall I say, education, mixed with amusement, because our friend the Acting Leader of the Opposition has that great attribute, that great quality of character. He is able to get us all laughing with him, and he is a big enough man to laugh with us all and at times even to laugh at himself and enjoy the laugh, and that is one of my measurements of a big man.

But much to my astonishment the pièce de résistance of the speech of the Acting Leader of the Opposition came yesterday not, shall I say, in the characteristic form that one might expect from a good old-fashioned Ontario Tory, an expert on horses; it came in the form that I have been led to expect sometimes even in letters from my wife. I always find in letters from my wife there may be one or two pages; and then at the end there will be a p.s., and the whole thing she had to say in the letter was said in that last p.s. Therefore much to my astonishment yesterday, after I had listened to an hour of mixed enlightenment and amusement from the Acting Leader of the Opposition, I heard him read out the six points in the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. I found a real bombshell in point No. 6. Without any notification whatsoever to the good old Conservative party of Canada the Acting Leader of the Opposition of the day committed his party, on the spur of the moment in the last point, point six, the p.s., to national health insurance. When I heard that my heart beat with joy, my cup of jubilation really ran over.

I remember Adlai Stevenson's witty wisecrack in the last election. He was talking about General Eisenhower attempting to drag the Republicans screaming into the twentieth century. The Acting Leader of the Opposition very clearly did not attempt to drag the Conservative party of Canada screaming into the second half of the twentieth century because he very astutely did not give them any advance notice of what was going to be in point six, or the p.s., of his amendment.

When I saw his remarkable feat of agility, for some reason or other I had to think of the last time I was at the circus. I thought our friend gave an even more remarkable performance than the high diver I saw there. When I went to the circus I saw the performer walk up to that little pint-sized swimming pool. He looked at the big ladder and started to climb it. He climbed hundreds of feet and stood on a little board and dived and came right down into the swimming pool.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Acting Leader of the Opposition gave an even more remarkable performance. He landed in the swimming pool with the whole Conservative party, but he did not climb the ladder and therefore no one had a chance to see what was coming off.

May I say also that when I heard the mixed laughter and cheers I felt just a wee bit sorry for my good friend the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) because he seemed to me for just a moment to be like one of those fellows who went to swim in English bay at Vancouver on New Year's day. As he was just about to take the plunge somebody got away with his swimming trunks and for a moment he was in a rather embarrassing predicament. So for a moment yesterday the leader of the C.C.F. party seemed to be in just a little bit of an embarrassing predicament for fear the Tories had at last got away with his swimming trunks, and he was not just quite sure how to proceed.

May I say without any attempt at being facetious or witty just how glad all of us are on this side of the house who have always believed in the principle of national health insurance and who also believe in the principle of "not swift nor slow to change but in its season to bring the law". May I express the true hope that the smiling, genial, and highly respected Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) will still be around when our Prime Minister rounds out the final blueprint which was laid down in 1919 by the great Mackenzie King and we finally wind up the finest welfare state on earth with a national health insurance scheme. I am quite sure that the day after the Prime Minister brings in our national health insurance scheme we will all be ready to give a share of the credit to the Acting Leader of the Opposition for having seen the light in 1955.

Mr. A. M. Fraser (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first of all to avail myself of the opportunity of congratulating most heartily the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick), the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure that all hon. members of the house were impressed with the excellence of their speeches. I believe you will agree with me that as long as young men of their calibre continue to offer themselves for election to this house, parliamentary democracy in Canada is assured.

I should like also to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister and the government upon the farsighted and comprehensive policies, both domestic and foreign, which they have outlined in the speech from the throne. First of all I should like to reflect for a moment or two upon some of the aspects of external policy there envisaged.

I am sure the house will agree that in the realm of external policy paramount importance must be attached to the government's decision to ask parliament to ratify the Paris and London agreements. I am well aware that these agreements are to come up for debate in about a week's time and many of us are looking forward to participating in that debate. However, I urge the great importance of these agreements as a reason why I cannot refrain from addressing myself to them to some extent this evening.

As the house knows, these agreements provide for the restoration of sovereignty to West Germany, for the rearming of West Germany, and for her inclusion in both the west European union and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We are aware also that the chief architect of these agreements was Sir Anthony Eden, the British foreign secretary. When the EDC project collapsed as a result of the failure of the French national assembly to ratify the EDC treaty it was he who found a workable substitute. He found it, as it were, in a wedding of the Brussels treaty with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I feel that the free world owes a great debt to his brilliant initiative and superb statesmanship.

Like every hon. member of the house, I am sure, I approach the subject of German rearmament with very mixed feelings. This is a subject which arouses in every one of us grave misgivings. I think we can understand only too well the attitude of France. We know that France rejected the EDC treaty and showed a great deal of reluctance to agree to the inclusion of Germany in NATO. This is readily understandable. As we know, France has suffered the humiliation of German occupation three times in the course of the last 80 years or so, and each of those occupations was more humiliating than the previous one. Yet the French national assembly has decided to ratify that treaty.

The choice with which we are faced is not, I think, between a Germany rearmed and a Germany disarmed. The real choice is between a Germany rearmed within an international framework of control as proposed in these agreements and a Germany rearmed without controls.

Along with other hon. members I am looking forward to the statement we shall hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when he expounds these agreements to the house. We know we will find a great deal of assistance and guidance in that exposition and in the skill and knowledge which he has brought to this and other subjects, both here and abroad at international conferences where he has represented Canada with such distinction and has added great lustre to the prestige of this country.

I turn now to the internal features of the speech from the throne. We are all much concerned with the problem of unemployment. Many speakers have referred to this serious situation, and I am glad to note that in the speech from the throne the government has put forward proposals to deal with this situation. I find in the speech from the throne a constructive and positive approach to that problem. It is a twofold approach.

First of all there is proposed an expanded public works program, designed to take up the slack in private industry. I note with satisfaction that it is the intention of the government to apply this program in all ten provinces. It will be welcomed in my own province of Newfoundland and in the riding of St. John's East, which I have the honour to represent. There, as in other constituencies right across this great country, there are opportunities for the useful expenditure of public funds on practical objectives which will not only assist in coping with the problem of unemployment but will provide public works of permanent value to the communities concerned. There are several which I may suggest need to be attended to in my own riding of St. John's East. The federal departments in St. John's are seriously congested. Their present space is inadequate and there is an urgent need there for the construction of a new federal building to house the customs and various other departments. I would offer as a constructive suggestion that this might well form one of the projects of a public works program.

On an earlier occasion I referred in this house to the great need for an armoury at St. John's one which would be worthy of the great traditions and the splendid renown of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, which traditions have been proudly maintained by the 59th regiment and the 166th regiment in the second world war and by the other fighting forces from Newfoundland.

I should also like to refer to the situation which at present exists at Torbay airport near St. John's. Torbay is the eastern terminal of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I regret to say that the terminal facilities there have become inadequate to cope with the growing volume of traffic which uses these facilities. There is need for enlargement of the terminal building, and in particular there is need for the inclusion in the plans of a canteen which will provide meals for passengers, many of whom arrive on flights at a late hour at night or in the early hours of the morning. The vagaries of climate in Newfoundland often lead to cancellation and postponement of flights, and this situation in turn aggravates the congestion of the terminal facilities at Torbay. There have been cases where passengers have not even had standing room in the terminal. I would therefore respectfully urge that attention be given to this matter. I am glad to note that it is the intention to proceed, as soon as possible in the spring, with the paving of the road connecting the provincial highway with the airport itself.

While I am on the subject of air facilities permit me to refer to the need for an air strip on Bell island. Bell island requires an air strip particularly in winter and early spring because it is frequently isolated then, by heavy seas and ice conditions, from Portugal Cove on the mainland of the Avalon peninsula. Moreover, an air strip on Bell island would form a most useful alternate for the terminal at Torbay in an emergency.

I should like to mention also the great advantages that would be derived from accepting the offer of the provincial government to establish the Signal Hill area at St. John's as a national historic park, but since this is the subject of a notice of motion which I have tabled I shall reserve my detailed remarks on that matter until later.

In my riding, as in all ridings in Newfoundland, there is need for marine works. I would refer particularly to the request which has been made to me for new wharves at Holyrood and Collier's. These are some of the fields in which, I think, the government would find opportunities to develop its policy of extension of public works projects and at the same time provide services of permanent usefulness to the communities in question. This is one angle from which the government proposes to deal with the problem of unemployment.

The other part of the approach, or the other line of main attack, is the proposal to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. Like all other members of the house, I heartily endorse this forward-looking measure. In doing so, may I be allowed to express the hope that when amendments are introduced to the Unemployment Insurance Act, its scope may be broadened sufficiently to include all classes of fishermen. Many of our fishermen in Newfoundland, and I expect in other provinces as well, are in a special category not only because their employment is so largely seasonal but partly because in Newfoundland, at any rate, so many of them are self-employed. As such they are not eligible under the present scheme, and the situation arises where those in one section of the population engaged in the fishing industry, namely those in the processing plants, are employed and receive wages while others, namely the men who go down to the sea in ships and face the hazards of wind and wave, are not eligible. Those are great hazards, as we have been reminded by two events very recently, the loss of the Newfoundland fishing vessel Student Prince and the terrible storms—the worst storms on record—which have been lashing the shores of Newfoundland for the last day or two, especially in my own riding of St. John's and many parts of Conception bay. I should like to take this opportunity to express my sincere sympathy to those who have lost valuable property in those heavy seas.

As I was saying, there is this unhappy contrast between those two classes engaged in the production of fish, namely those on land in the processing plants who are therefore eligible for unemployment insurance, and those fishermen who are self-employed and who go down to the sea and fish, and who are not eligible. That seems to me an anomaly which cries out for correction. I know it is a matter which is being given serious and sympathetic study by the government and by various departments. Although I know the very real difficulties of the problem, I trust that some method will be found of broadening the scope of the act so as to provide for the inclusion of the fishermen. This is a very important matter to us in all parts of the island, for anything which benefits our fishermen benefits all of us.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the measures the government has forecast in the speech from the throne will enable us to meet the problems which this great nation faces, both at home and abroad, with greater strength and a greater chance of success. Finally, I should like to emphasize once again how confident I am that this great country will go on from strength to strength.

On motion of Mr. Croll the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) the house adjourned at 9.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 12, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

DISABLED PERSONS

ALLEGED DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING APPLICATION FORMS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware that some persons in British Columbia are complaining that they cannot yet obtain the application forms for disabled persons' pensions from the offices of the government of British Columbia? Has the minister received any word from the government of British Columbia as to when application forms will be issued, and is the situation in British Columbia in this regard different from that prevailing in the rest of the country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of his intention to ask pretty much the question which he has now put. On November 18 a draft agreement under the Disabled Persons Act was sent to the province of British Columbia and the agreement has not yet been returned. As soon as it is we will give the matter our immediate attention and the province will be in a position, in accordance with its own law, to carry out the act in such a manner as to provide pensions under this act for the citizens of British Columbia.

Mr. Low: How many provinces thus far have returned the draft agreement?

Mr. Martin: As of this date only one agreement has been completed, that with the province of New Brunswick. The provinces of Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and Alberta have signed agreements. These are now being processed at this end, and in a very few days they should be completed. In the case of Prince Edward Island an interim form of agreement has been signed and returned by the provincial minister. The government of Prince Edward Island proposes to pass legislation at the forthcoming session of the legislature to make this agreement effective. In the meantime we have asked for its proposed scheme of administration, which is necessary under the act.

In the case of the provinces of Newfoundland, Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia draft agreements were sent on November 18, as I indicated a moment ago in the case of British Columbia. The replies have not all reached us yet. In the case of the province of Quebec a draft agreement was sent to the provincial government on November 18. We are now awaiting the return of the signed agreement from this province.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CESSATION OF LAY-OFFS AND REINSTATEMENT OF THOSE ALREADY LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): On Monday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked whether I could give the assurance that we are at the end of lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways, and if I could say how soon those laid off in recent months would be reinstated. I should like to reply to the hon. member. The management of the railway informs me that reductions in working forces have been a necessary consequence of the general decline in traffic and that the volume of traffic determines in a very large measure how many persons the railway can employ. Because a general increase in traffic depends on such economic factors as industrial production and trade, it is not possible to say when an improvement in traffic conditions will justify the reinstatement of those whom it has been necessary to lay off.

PROPOSED LEASE OF NEW HOTEL IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister or any of his colleagues received a protest from the hotel association of Canada respecting the proposed lease of the new Canadian National Railways hotel in Montreal?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to take the hon. gentleman's question as notice because I do not think I have received any, but his question goes farther than that. I shall have to make inquiries.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REFERENCE TO REPORTS OF NEAR ACCIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on reading in Hansard the question asked me yesterday by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) I noted that my reply to him might be misunderstood. I thought that he was referring to complaints of the Canadian air pilots association recently mentioned in the press, but I now note that he was referring to reports made by pilots of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I should like to add that on making further inquiries I have learned that reports from Trans-Canada Air Lines pilots and other pilots, both civil and military, have been received from time to time and in each case have been promptly investigated by the department or agency concerned.

[Later:]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a further question with reference to the matters to which he referred just now and that is whether, in the light of what he has said, namely that these incidents have been reported, and in the light of a report of a statement by an official of his own department which appeared in a Canadian Press dispatch yesterday, the minister will make a statement concerning the adequacy of the present regulations to be followed by R.C.A.F. planes where they are located in proximity to commercial air lines?

Mr. Marler: I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be inopportune for me to make such a statement at this time. I had thought that possibly the question might be reviewed more fully and discussed when the estimates of my department came before the house, but I shall be glad to consider the desirability of making an earlier statement on the subject.

WOVEN WOOLLEN GOODS

TARIFF BOARD INVESTIGATION —INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received the report of the tariff board following its inquiry into woven woollen goods coming under tariff item 554b?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received the report. I understand it will be a matter of three or four weeks yet before it is available.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

STORMS

GOVERNMENT ACTION IN CONNECTION WITH DAMAGE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Power (St. John's West): Will the Minister of Public Works say what steps will be taken to repair the damage caused by a recent severe storm in Newfoundland?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I understand, Mr. Speaker, that most of the damage caused was by the action of the sea in this recent storm. We are in touch with our district engineer, and any damage to federal properties will be repaired as quickly as possible. To the best of my knowledge no detailed reports of damage to private property have been received by the federal government. I would think that they would be considered locally in the first instance. If and when they reach the federal government they will be given every consideration.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): May I first join in congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address. They are both young men of great promise who acquitted themselves well and made a great impression in the house. In time they will, I believe, leave their mark on Canadian public life.

The speech from the throne has in it one paragraph of particular interest to the Canadian people, which should be discussed at some length. I have reference to the following, and I quote:

> The National Housing Act, 1954, enacted early in the last session, which authorized lower down-payments and larger loans, and which enabled the chartered banks for the first time to make loans on the security of residential mortgages, has been an important factor in stimulating the construction of a record number of houses in the past year. The prospects are favourable for a high level of house building in 1955.

Originally I had intended to speak of the great achievement of the department, but the full statistics are not yet available. If other members do not exhaust this subject during the course of the debate I intend later to latch on to the omnibus amendment and review the accomplishments indicated in that particular part of the address.

There is another part of the address which is of immediate concern and will be of benefit to the Canadian people. It reads as follows:

It is proposed to bring into general operation on the first of February the provision of the act under which loans may be made for home improvements. In accordance with an undertaking given at the last session, this section was proclaimed for small holders under the Veterans' Land Act with effect from the first of this year.

The proclamation of the home improvement section of the housing act on the first of February is indeed a commendable step, and particularly welcome at this time when it is more likely to be fruitful by reason of the participation of the banks in making funds available. This section could lead to opportunities for the improvement and modernization of homes all across Canada. I take this first opportunity to emphasize that the Canadian people are initially and vitally concerned with the number of new homes erected rather than with those that have new bathtubs or new garages, important as they certainly are. The emphasis must remain on new homes. We cannot afford to be diverted from our ultimate objective to continue to set housing records year after year. I just indicate to the house that loans under the home improvement section will carry a government insurance guarantee to the banks and other approved lenders, and the borrower will pay a 1 per cent premium.

Today I intend to direct my remarks to what I consider to be an inequality which now exists under the act and which, in my view, should be corrected at a very early date. Those who are intimately acquainted with the National Housing Act will know that it was based on one primary assumption, that it is in the public interest for as many Canadians as possible in the middle and lower income groups to own their own homes. The act is not very much concerned with people who can go out and buy their homes in the open market, make a large down payment and arrange their own financing privately. It is primarily designed to help the 52 per cent of Canadians who, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, earn less than $3,000 a year.

The National Housing Act has encouraged the building and owning of lower cost homes by the following method: Lower interest rates and subsidization; lower down payments and longer amortization periods; standardization of design in order to reduce costs; making mortgage money easily available. As a direct result of the housing legislation passed at the last session of parliament mortgage money has become available at every whistle stop in Canada wherever the banks have outlets, and there are more than 4,000 of them. Indeed, this particular act has made it possible for more Canadians than ever to own their own homes. It has succeeded where private industry has failed. I think it is important that we do not let the act rest on its laurels. It must be continually revised and improved in the light of changing conditions.

One revision which I believe should be seriously considered now is a means whereby the home owner's basic equity, and by that I mean his down payment, can be protected against personal reverses. Let me elaborate for a moment. Let us consider the position of the average prospective home owner under the National Housing Act. He is a worker who, on the national average, is earning about $3,000 a year. Depending upon where he is living, he may be earning slightly more or slightly less than that amount. In my own province of Ontario he is earning $62.58 a week or just over $3,300, which is just above the minimum requirements under the present act.

In order to buy a home under the National Housing Act this average Canadian must make a down payment of at least $1,500, or one-half of his annual income. I am using the $10,000 home as an example, but there are homes being built in Ontario under the National Housing Act for less than $10,000—and they are being sold for less than that.

Mr. Fleming: Mostly more than that.

Mr. Croll: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: In most cases the cost is more than that.

Mr. Croll: If the owner has been lucky he may have been able to save the amount of the down payment out of his earnings. Chances are that he may have to go out and borrow some of the money from his friends in order to make the down payment. In many instances that down payment represents the family savings. In any case it is probably all the money he has in the world, and he is investing in the biggest and most important purchase in all his life.

Let us not underestimate the seriousness of the step that man is taking. We can be sure that he is carefully considering all the probabilities. He will consider that he is investing his life savings in a new home, and he will realize that, later, if some unexpected contingency should arise he will have no reserves with which to meet the occasion. That is something that makes him stop and think. He will consider whether his present and his potential earnings are adequate to carry the mortgage of $8,500 or more, together with taxes, heating, and all the upkeep of a home, including furnishings. He will give consideration to what might happen if he should become sick or unemployed, or if he should die before the mortgage obligation is fully discharged. Naturally he will want desperately to be able to pay off his home, and he expects that he will do so. But at the same time he must consider what is going to happen if he fails to keep up his payments. If he is over 40 he will remember the foreclosures and the tax sales of the thirties, and he will wonder whether it cannot happen again.

These are surely some of the thoughts that will run through his mind as he prepares to invest his hard-earned $1,500 or more in a home. He hopes he will be able to protect his investment. He hopes he will be able to make his payments, and he wonders what will happen if he cannot.

I believe it is the duty of the government, which is encouraging him to invest his all in a national housing home, to offer him a measure of protection. At the present time the government is protecting lending institutions by insuring the amount of the mortgage. With that I am in full accord and agreement. You can believe me that the lending institution, with its funds spread over thousands of investments, and secured in each case by property, is far less in need of protection than the national housing owner, who has all his eggs in one basket.

At the present time, and quite properly, the government protects the national housing mortgagee, and it is my view that it should protect the national housing owner, at least to the extent of his initial down payment. Every owner is far more vulnerable than the lending institution. No matter what happens the lending institution cannot lose. In the event of a foreclosure it will look first to the property, and then to the government for repayment. But the owner may very well be wiped out.

That is the situation that needs a remedy. Under the act the owner should be assured that if he is unable to keep up his payments, his basic equity of $1,500 or more, which is his down payment, will be protected under all circumstances, including the mortgage covenant, subject to certain limitations.

So far as the mechanics are concerned, it is no more difficult to strike a premium rate for the down payment, which I call equity insurance, than it was to strike a premium rate for the mortgage insurance. We had no previous experience when we fixed the 2 per cent premium rate on the mortgage. I am sure the same actuaries who fixed the rate on the guaranteed mortgages could fix the rate on equity insurance. It should be 2 per cent, the same rate that applies to the mortgage.

I informed the house earlier that the rate was 1 per cent on home improvement loans made without mortgage security. If we used the 2 per cent figure—and it could be somewhat higher, or possibly lower—it would mean that for a premium of $30 on a down payment of $1,500 or $40 on a down payment of $2,000 the owner's equity would be fully insured. Then, in the event of default under the mortgage resulting in a foreclosure, the owner would have his basic equity returned —instead of being frozen out, as would most likely happen in the case of a foreclosure.

Obviously there would have to be safeguards against fraud and bad faith. The purpose of basic equity insurance would be to protect the owner, if he found it impossible to carry on. It would not be intended to let him skin out of a deal the next day simply because he changed his mind.

Government departments have had considerable experience in the insurance field, and I would expect regulations imposing conditions having regard to the element of time, the possibility of the death of the owner, of transferability, as well as a limit of the liability in the early stages. But if an owner meets these conditions and cannot keep up his payments, and foreclosure follows, he would be entitled then to the return of his basic equity, which was his original down payment, for which he has already paid an insurance premium. I strongly urge the government to introduce an amendment to cover such a situation.

It will first and foremost give security to the person who needs it most, namely, the home owner, who has a small equity and a good sized mortgage.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Does the hon. member recall the answer the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) gave to the question I asked along that line last year? He said that he would give sympathetic consideration, but sympathy will not pay the owner.

Mr. Croll: I am hoping for better luck than the hon. member had.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I hope you get it. You are on the other side of the house; you may get it.

Mr. Croll: Don't try to get into this act; make your own speech.

As I have said, it seems highly incongruous to protect the lending institutions and not protect the owner. Both are making an investment in the same property at the same time. If one is insured the other should be insured also. Under the act the owner pays a premium for the mortgage insurance. I see no reason why we should not extend the same protection to the home owner that we are prepared to give, and actually do give as a matter of course, to the lending institution. Both make an investment. One is protected fully, the other is not. I think it is no more than justice that the protection that we give to our lending institutions should be extended in a limited and a substantial form to the Canadians who make purchases under the National Housing Act.

It will not cost the Canadian taxpayers a penny, but it would encourage home ownership and possibly bring about larger down payments. It would remove the hazard to which too many of our people have been vulnerable in the past. I am convinced that such a plan would greatly stimulate national house building and home ownership, and avoid future bitterness.

Mortgage insurance removed the very last reluctance of the lending institutions to advance money on national housing mortgages. Equity insurance would have the same effect on the prospective owner. If both the lending institutions and the owner are to be insured against loss within the limits I have suggested, or within other reasonable limits, then I anticipate an immediate upswing in construction, with attendant benefits throughout our economy, with particular emphasis on employment, and, what is equally important, home ownership.

Equity insurance would put the little home owner on the same footing as the lending institutions, and it would give him protection and security at a price he can afford to pay. It would keep the little man from being seriously hurt in any economic squeeze play. He would know that no matter what happened to him the original stake would be secure. This an economic hurricane could not wash away. He asks the right to share the economic umbrella which he is now providing for the lending institutions.

Let there be no misunderstanding about one thing. I am not suggesting that the government should give anybody a handout. What I am proposing is a proper insurance scheme based on sound actuarial principles, as sound as those applied when they fixed the premium rate of 2 per cent on the mortgage. I am expecting that the owner will pay for his own protection.

By paying a premium into a government fund he could provide that protection, as he does now for the lending institutions, without benefit of government subsidy. His down payment on his home could never be lost through foreclosure. Nor am I anticipating for one moment that we are going to see a spate of foreclosures in the future. I sincerely believe that our economy is basically sound enough to weather whatever may be ahead. But in the lifetime of most of us in this house we have seen thousands of our citizens lose everything they have put into a house. The great depression of the 1930's forced us to realize that ownership of a home had in it an element of gamble; that a man and his family could find themselves on the street without a cent to show for years of saving.

It may be that what I propose and call equity insurance will remain a protection against a danger that may never occur. That is the way we would all want it to be. But we do not know. The storekeeper who protects his plate glass window by insurance does not expect it to be broken. Should it happen, it becomes little more than a temporary inconvenience. I feel it is a wise and prudent thing to insure against the possibility of loss. We would be more than foolish to bury our heads in the sand and leave the future to chance, when we do not need to do so. That is one of the reasons we established an unemployment insurance fund back in 1941. We were not expecting unemployment within the forseeable future. We did feel that in any economy there is always the possibility of some unemployment, and we set out to insure against that.

I want this house to believe that I am not attempting to sell the government a bill of goods. You know, I have not been very good at that. Nor am I enticing them down a blind alley. That would not be wise or politically profitable. I am suggesting that in line with the undertakings in the public interest, which the government has so well assumed and carried out in the past in the field of insurance, they might very well apply their experience and knowledge to this problem.

It would be profitable if I enumerated some of the insurance undertakings of this government. I have already spoken of unemployment insurance. It has been very successful. We have export credit insurance. Some members may know about that. They are doing a land office business. Their purpose is:

> The corporation may, for the purpose of facilitating and developing trade between Canada and any other country, enter into a contract of insurance with an exporter to insure him against any risk of loss in connection with the export or an agreement for the export of goods by reason of the failure of the exporter, for any cause not avoidable by the exporter, to recover the selling price of the goods.

Hon. members will recall that at the last session we increased the capitalization of the export credit insurance corporation from $5 million to $15 million. We have the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which, though limited in scope, is insurance against the hazard of drought. Last session we passed the National Housing Act, which provided insurance for mortgages and rental insurance. I am sure the house will be interested to know that the banks have loaned nearly $115 million in less than six months. We have had proclaimed the home improvement section, which also has in it an element of insurance. I am sure no hon. member has forgotten the Public Service Insurance Act with which we grappled last session and which provided for certain death benefits. This act affects thousands of civil servants.

Hon. members may be less aware that we are also in the marine insurance business. The very able and energetic minister did not let grass grow under his feet when he took over the ministry of fisheries. As early as July, 1953, provision was made for the insuring of fishing vessels valued at from $250 to $7,500. A total of 1,200 policies were purchased in Newfoundland, 250 in Quebec and 351 in British Columbia, covering 2,300 boats with a value of over $3,500,000. This is the result of the last eighteen months' operation and it is expected that this total will increase to $10,000,000. The insurance provides full coverage, but what is more interesting is that this insurance provided by the Department of Fisheries costs only 1·6 per cent as against the commercial rate of 5 per cent and up. I say that in praise of the minister but also to indicate to the house that we are not novices in this sort of thing that I am talking about.

All I am proposing is that we deal in the very same way with the problem of equity insurance because it is inevitable that some home owners will fall by the wayside in the foreseeable future and the only sensible thing to do is to spread the loss across the board by an insurance scheme. In that way no one will be hurt by circumstances beyond his control, and home ownership will be encouraged. Mortgage insurance is now compulsory under the act. Equity insurance would have to be compulsory also, since it could not work otherwise.

I do not make this proposal lightly. I realize that there are a great number of administrative difficulties. It may be the course of wisdom at the beginning not to insure the full down payment. In some circumstances that could be interpreted as insuring the owner against his own folly. Serious consideration would have to be given to a time lapse to avoid fraud and bad faith.

There will be other questions that will arise in your minds, but I suggest that it is administratively possible to draw up regulations to meet all conditions. This government has wrestled with far more difficult problems and has solved them to the lasting benefit of the Canadian people. I ask that the government give consideration to this problem and accept in principle what I have suggested. We can wait for improvements and refinements at a later date.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in my opinion has one great value. It has many others, but it has at least the value that it enables members from different parts of our nation to explain to their fellow members the problems that are worrying the people of their constituencies. This is particularly important for those of us who come from British Columbia because that province is farther away from the centre of Canada than any other. Its resources and economy are different from those of the other provinces.

During the time that we are at home we find it difficult to follow closely what is taking place in the rest of Canada and I believe that the rest of Canada gets a great deal less news about British Columbia than we on the west coast get about what is happening east of the Rocky mountains. I have been pleased to note that already three hon. members from our province have participated in this debate and I hope that all the other members will express their views on the problems that are worrying our people at the present time.

I propose today to place before the cabinet and the house six different problems which in my opinion are of concern to the people on the west coast. The first is the question of unemployment.

We regret, as I am sure hon. members from other parts of Canada also regret, that unemployment has again become a serious problem in this nation. I think the speech from the throne dealt with it rather lightly. The only reference is contained in this one sentence:

> Some unemployment of a regional and seasonal nature is being experienced.

I have no idea of the position with regard to unemployment in other parts of Canada, but certainly in British Columbia it is such that it merits far more serious consideration than is implied by that sentence. In Vancouver private agencies such as the Salvation Army and others, and the various churches, have found the situation such that they have felt it necessary to step in and provide relief for the destitute. That has not been done to any extent in my city for quite a few years.

The city of Vancouver itself is also much concerned. The city council have been worrying about this problem and decided about three weeks ago that they would institute relief payments. The mayor summed up the attitude of the council very well, and I quote:

> At the same time, Mayor Hume called for action on a national policy to handle the unemployment problem.
> "I hope the Prime Minister and the premier will wake up", he declared.

He was referring to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) and the premier of the province. He went on to say:

> There are a lot of people who can't find jobs—personally I don't know of one job in the city today.

About the same time our provincial premier wired the Prime Minister about this problem and made this recommendation:

> After due consideration of all factors this government urges strongly that, with respect to unemployed employables, adequate relief be extended, and that the cost thereof be shared to the extent of 40 per cent by the government of Canada, 40 per cent by the government of this province and 20 per cent by the municipalities. Immediate attention to this problem is urged by this government.

To my amazement that suggestion received rather brusque treatment by the Prime Minister of Canada. Two days later the following press report appeared:

> In a statement in Ottawa, Prime Minister St. Laurent said he had no evidence that B.C. was unable to bear the financial responsibility of providing relief for those unemployed who are able to work.

In other words, if the province can pay the relief, then it must do so. The dominion will accept no responsibility. That, Mr. Speaker, is an evasion of responsibility by this government. Furthermore, it is a complete about-face from the stand taken by this very government in the year 1945, when it brought down what are known as the "green book" proposals.

I turn to these proposals and find this on page 42:

> Over the past seven or eight years there have been recommendations by the national employment commission, the Sirois commission and others, that the dominion should assume responsibility for necessary relief to the employable unemployed.

That, I would point out, is the group about which Premier Bennett wired:

> It has been generally suggested that the dominion should accept this obligation as part of any general settlement with the provinces.

The dominion has come to a settlement with all the provinces with the exception of Quebec, and apparently there is about to be some settlement with that province.

The "green book" proposals went on:

> As a part of the general arrangement with the provincial governments, the dominion government now proposes to establish a practicable and comprehensive system of assistance to able-bodied unemployed persons as soon as possible, rather than waiting until the need for it actually arises.

This, remember, was in 1945:

> It is thought necessary not to permit the recurrence of the problems of administration being separated from financial responsibility, and to avoid the makeshift arrangements and controversy with provincial governments which otherwise would be almost certain to recur under the old methods of providing relief even though the number of persons involved were small.

I would point out that we are now having this very controversy which the dominion suggested in 1945 should be avoided. The proposals go on:

> The dominion is therefore accompanying its proposal for general acceptance of responsibility with a concrete plan for its implementation in the field of assistance for employable unemployed persons.

One further paragraph of significance to be found on page 43 reads as follows:

> The plan proposes acceptance of dominion responsibility for unemployed employables, and provincial and local responsibility for unemployables.

This government is today repudiating the stand it took in 1945. This federal government has an obligation with regard to the employable unemployed. In the case of British Columbia most of them come from outside the province. As a result of the refusal of the Prime Minister to accept any responsibility, the premier of British Columbia has stated, "All right, we will pay 80 per cent of the relief. The city can pay the other 20 per cent, but it will be paid only to those recipients who have established residence of one year in the province of British Columbia". All the rest are thrown on the charitable organizations. I suggest the time has come for this government to accept its responsibility in this regard. This trouble will probably arise every year, and this is only the start of it. Sooner or later the problem will have to be faced by the dominion government. Now is the time to take action.

The second question has to do with Columbia river power. There is a reference to that in the speech from the throne, although it does not mention the Columbia river. I refer to the paragraph which reads as follows:

> Amendments to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act and a measure to control works which affect the normal flow of rivers which cross the international boundary will be proposed for the purpose of ensuring that natural resources are developed in the best interests of the Canadian public.

The very last line of that paragraph seems to indicate that the government has now adopted a Canada-first policy. If that were the whole story I would approve, and I am very glad that at last the government seems to be moving in the direction of adopting our Canada-first policy.

Hon. members will recall how in recent years we have had to hammer this government night in and night out, during private members' hour, to prevent it from supporting a proposal to build a natural gas pipe line from southern Alberta down into the United States at the nearest point to serve the great cities of Washington and Oregon, with only a stub line up to Vancouver and possibly one to Trail. As a result of a filibuster staged largely by this party, with the help of the C.C.F., and the former Liberal member for Fraser Valley, George Cruickshank, the government was eventually convinced that a Canada-first policy was advisable. Just a few weeks ago we had an announcement that natural gas is to be piped from the Peace river country down through the centre of the province of British Columbia to serve practically all the cities in that province, with the surplus going into the United States. We also had some trouble with regard to a natural gas pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada, and it took quite a lot of pressure and argument to convince the government this should be an all-Canadian line. However, it finally adopted that policy.

In so far as the plans of the government with regard to the Columbia river system are concerned, we approve of anything which means the use of Canadian resources by the Canadian people. But I am afraid the story is not quite that simple. I believe this proposal is also designed as a club with which to beat the government of the province of British Columbia. That government, rightly or wrongly, has come to an agreement with the Kaiser interests in the United States under which there is to be a dam constructed across the foot of the Arrow lakes so that water will be stored in the Arrow lakes as a result of which more power will be available for United States plants south of the line.

The dominion government has taken objection to this plan, and we now have the picture of the two governments through their respective ministers calling each other names. For example, I have here the Vancouver Sun for November 25, 1954, carrying the headline: "Ottawa Dam Stand called 'Cheap Trick'." That is a statement by Premier Bennett. Then we have a statement by his minister of lands on November 30. The report of his speech carries the heading: "Opponents of Dam 'Lack Information'." It adds: "Lands Minister Charges Ottawa Veto would be 'Denial of Rights' of B.C."

Then we have Ottawa moving into the picture. I have here a dispatch dated November 22, 1954, from Warren Baldwin, who we all know is one of the most responsible newspapermen in Canada. The heading reads, "Ottawa Moves to Block B.C.-Kaiser Power Deal" with the subheading "New Statute Being Drafted to Provide Authority."

Finally we have the old master, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), turning all his guns on the government of British Columbia in a statement dated December 30, 1954. It reads: "B.C.'s Kaiser Dam Project 'Cockeyed' says Howe." This is another dispatch from Ottawa by Mr. Baldwin:

> Trade Minister C. D. Howe Wednesday described the agreement between the B.C. government and the Kaiser interests in the United States for a storage dam without on-site power on the Arrow lakes as "a cockeyed and improvident deal."

A war in print has been waged in the press between the two governments. The premier of British Columbia is sitting there ready to go to the courts about this issue and Ottawa is prepared to beat him into submission. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that power on the Columbia river system in Canada can only be developed by co-operation between the two governments. The main source of power is to be a dam at Mica creek up above Revelstoke on the Big Bend. That is certainly in British Columbia and the provincial government will certainly be the authority to deal with that dam.

The same British Columbia government has dealt with the huge project at Kitimat. That was not the business of the federal government at all. There must be co-operation between the two governments. I believe that both sides are sincere. The premier of British Columbia believes that he is making a deal which is for the benefit of his province and is doing no harm to the rest of Canada. The ministers here believe that the deal is not a good one and that it should be stopped. Let us admit that there is sincerity on both sides. All I wish to emphasize is that this fighting attitude is helping no one and is only going to make it more difficult to have the Columbia river system properly developed in so far as power is concerned.

Our main responsibility in this House of Commons is to see where parliament fits into the picture. So far we have only had newspaper reports. We have had shots from both sides. With the exception of the St. Lawrence, the Columbia river is the most important river in this country so far as power is concerned. In fact I believe that the two river systems have about the same potential. This is an extremely important problem for the Canadian people and for their parliament. It involves not only the Arrow lakes in West Kootenay but also the Kootenay river in East Kootenay and the Mica creek dam. It involves the whole question of downstream benefits and what is to be paid by the United States interests for storage of water on the system in Canada.

It may also involve the Fraser river. The suggestion has been made by federal ministers that they are going to divert some of the Columbia river water into the Fraser river. That may be a good idea but I point out that just six years ago we had terrible floods on the Fraser, and the people living in the delta of that river are very much concerned about what is going to happen to them if a lot of Columbia river water is diverted into the Fraser.

I suggest that the way for parliament to handle the question is to have it considered by the external affairs committee. In each of the last two sessions that committee has heard evidence on the Columbia river system from General McNaughton, and very interesting and useful evidence it was. If that committee is allowed to deal with the question this year before the proposed legislation becomes law, then General McNaughton can be called to explain the whole story. We can have representatives from the British Columbia government attend. We can cross-examine officials from the different federal government departments who have been studying the Columbia river system, and we might even have representatives from the Kaiser interests who could tell their side of the story.

My point is that this is the kind of problem that should be carefully studied by the private members of the house. It should not be left to one or two ministers to make a decision which will affect Canadians on the west coast for generations to come. If the government does not wish to refer the matter to the standing committee on external affairs, a special committee could be set up or a new committee could be set up to deal with all questions of power.

I was very much interested in an article in the Financial Post of October 23 last by Michael Barkway, another distinguished member of the press gallery, in which he advocated a national energy policy for Canada. He advocated that all questions concerning power, whether it be power generated from water, atomic energy or in any other way, be dealt with together. I think his plan was excellent. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) promised that during this session there would be a committee on atomic energy. It might be possible to have a committee of that kind also consider the Columbia river situation.

My third subject has to do with the price of wheat in store at Vancouver. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced yesterday, the government adopted a new policy on February 16 of last year under which the Canadian wheat board varied the price of wheat as between Vancouver and Fort William-Port Arthur with the objective of making these centres competitive. That was a departure from the policy that had been followed from 1943, a policy under which prices were the same at the west coast and the lakehead. When changing the policy the minister dropped the price of wheat at Fort William-Port Arthur by 7 cents. One result of this change in policy has been that shipments of wheat out of Vancouver dropped 40 per cent during the last four months of last year compared with the same four months in 1953.

Vigorous protests have been made by a joint committee of the international longshoremen's and warehousemen's union and the grain workers' union in Vancouver. Incidentally, they have given splendid leadership on this matter. They have been supported by groups all over the city, by the city council, by the provincial government and by all of the papers. For example, I have here an editorial from the Vancouver Sun, which is a supporter of the government. The heading is, "Facts for Mr. Howe, All Port Interests Suffer as Grain Trade Declines". The editorial, published on December 22 last, reads:

> There is a simple way for trade minister Howe to convince himself that the wheat board grain price juggling in favour of eastern ports is truly damaging Vancouver and citizens' wage packets. From Vancouver merchants exchange, national harbours board, shipping federation, stevedoring firms and waterfront unions, and ship supply, chandlery and repair firms, he will learn that fewer vessels are coming here to take grain. When year end figures are officially prepared they will show a decrease between July 31—end of the crop year—and December, 1954, compared with the same period 1953.

The Vancouver Province of January 7, five days ago, had an editorial headed "An Urgent Job for Vancouver M.P.'s" which reads in part as follows:

> Vancouver members of parliament have a job to do at the session opening this week. They should make it their business to speak and work to end the federal discrimination against wheat shipments through this port.

The Vancouver Herald of January 3 this year had an editorial headed, "Let Mr. Howe now heed his own advice 'to keep all ports competitive' ".

The fact is that the wheat board in changing prices has always been one step behind. Ocean freight rates go up but the price does not drop as fast as these rates go up. The result has been that shipments of wheat through the port have fallen. Even with the removal of this difference in price, Vancouver would have great difficulty in meeting the Atlantic price, I believe. For one reason, it is a far longer voyage; it takes far longer for the wheat to get to the United Kingdom from the west coast. Shipping is not as plentiful as it is on the east coast. We believe that this policy, which the minister announced yesterday is to be permanent, is a wrong policy. It sets off Vancouver against the lakehead. Buyers take advantage of that fact. They wonder why there are two prices. When the price is dropped at Vancouver they wait to see if the price will not drop at Fort William.

This new control imposed by this free enterprise Minister of Trade and Commerce is unwise. I even took from his statement yesterday that he believes the west coast should sell its wheat in Japan and South America, around the Pacific, and not worry about the United Kingdom market. We are just as much concerned about the United Kingdom market as are the centres in other parts of Canada. I believe that in the long run the old policy would be far better, both for Vancouver and for Fort William-Port Arthur. We on the west coast demand that this discrimination be ended without further delay.

This question brings up my fourth point. The drop in shipping coming into Vancouver harbour for grain has meant fewer ships in that port to carry other commodities. We are now in the position where it is a great problem to get ships to carry our pulp. People who must ship these products abroad are finding it increasingly difficult to get bottoms. Canada has no deep sea dry cargo fleet. On the west coast there is not one ship left under Canadian registry. We are dependent on foreign ships to carry our goods. Here we are, the nation which per capita has to ship more of its goods than any other nation, left in a position where, on the west coast—it is almost as bad on the east coast—all these goods have to be carried in foreign vessels.

If there were Canadian ships, we would have some measure of control over the goods that were carried. It would be that much easier to get our own products carried abroad. It would be in the best interests of the nation as a whole. There may come a time, Mr. Speaker, when this government will even have to subsidize foreign vessels to come to our ports to carry Canadian goods abroad.

The figures on the merchant navy have made very sad reading for several years. They are growing steadily worse. I have here the seventh report of the Canadian maritime commission, dated June 24, 1954. We find at page 15 that in the year 1952 Canadian vessels carried only 6·4 per cent of Canada's trade; that was down from 20·2 per cent in 1947. United Kingdom vessels were carrying 35·4 per cent in 1952, which was down from 45·2 per cent in 1947. Other ships were carrying 58·2 per cent of our trade, whereas in 1947 they only carried 34·6 per cent. For 1953 the figures were worse. Then we only carried 4·3 per cent of our goods; the British carried 34 per cent and other vessels 61·7 per cent. I am sure that the figures for 1954, which have not yet been released, will be very much worse again.

We are down to the position where Canadian vessels are carrying practically none of Canada's products. The deep sea dry cargo fleet under the Canadian flag is practically gone. As I said, there are none left on the west coast. On January 1, 1948, there were 145 dry cargo vessels under Canadian registry. On December 31 of last year, there were only 15, two of them 10,000-tonners built during the war. One of these is Italian owned and operates out of ports in Italy. I believe it has not been in Canada for many years. There were seven 4,700-tonners, of which five belong to Canadian National Steamships and two are in the paper trade out of Newfoundland. Of the six others, three belong to the Canadian National Steamships and three are engaged in the coastal trade out of Newfoundland. Our gross tonnage has dropped from 928,598 tons on January 1, 1948, to 68,936 tons on December 31, 1954, the lowest point in 35 years. There are only about 500 Canadian merchant seamen. Almost every other nation has gone in the opposite direction.

I know there are certain ships under United Kingdom registry which are owned by Canadians but they are under United Kingdom direction and manned by United Kingdom sailors. They mean little to Canada and they are all old. Government policy is such that it prevents them from being modernized. We are told that Canada should rely on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization shipping pool for its shipping; that if there is a war we will be served by that pool. There is no such pool in operation, and I understand that the United States is holding back; she has not agreed to come into the pool. If war were to come, Canada would have to start building all over again. There would be a great delay. There would be time required to train seamen, and a tremendous expenditure. It would probably be too late.

The government has had recommendation after recommendation from its own maritime commission and other officials that there should be a nucleus of approximately 50 modern fast vessels maintained for a Canadian merchant navy. But the policy adopted or the refusal to adopt any policy has resulted in this being one of the most dismal failures of the present government. I believe that even yet a bold policy could save the situation. I regret there is nothing about it in the speech from the throne.

My next subject concerns the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), who is a very good friend of mine and a minister for whom I have great admiration. Last session we asked if the government would help in the construction of the Marpole bridge over the north arm of the Fraser. I have not time to quote the Hansards; they are all here. I will not embarrass the minister by reading them. First he said no. Of course, the plea for help is based on the fact that this bridge is the only means of access to the Vancouver airport, which is the airport doing the most business in Canada. We pointed out that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had said yes a few years ago. Eventually the Minister of Public Works, somewhat reluctantly, agreed that the government would pay $400,000.

That figure was reached on the basis of an estimate made some years ago that the way to repair this bridge was to put in a new span. The 6,000-odd vessels which go through every year would still be going through, and the span would still have to be opened for them. This government favoured improving the span, so he took the estimate of $1,200,000 for that job and said the government would pay one-third because it had been admitted that the dominion should pay one-third. We pointed out that was useless because there had to be a high level bridge. However, the minister would not raise the offer.

Finally on June 25 his parliamentary assistant had this to say in response to a question by myself, as reported on page 6774 of Hansard for that date:

Mr. Bourget: I think the amount of $400,000 has been offered to the province to build the Marpole bridge, but I am informed that they want to build the bridge at Oak street.

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Bourget: So far, I do not think—

Mr. Green: Does that mean then that unless the provincial government agrees to this ridiculous scheme of simply putting a lift on the old Marpole bridge, the dominion government will not make any contribution at all?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that they will probably make the same offer for the Oak street bridge.

Mr. Green: The dominion government will pay $400,000 on a new bridge on Oak street?

Mr. Bourget: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Subsequently we had the provincial government taking steps to build this high level bridge, and saying quite frankly months ago that if the dominion did not contribute its share tolls would be placed on the traffic over the bridge until its cost had been met.

And now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) takes this position—and the date is December 11, 1954—as set out in a press dispatch bearing the heading "Withdraw $400,000 Offer":

Ottawa won't pay a cent on new Marpole bridge plan.

Then follows the dispatch by Mr. Warren Baldwin, stating:

The federal government considers itself out of the picture as far as the Marpole bridge is concerned. . . . "Under some circumstances," said Mr. Winters, "we might still have been ready to contribute the $400,000 to the larger project planned by the province but we obviously can't contribute to a revenue producing project."

Mr. Rowe: Was that before the election?

Mr. Green: No, that is after the election. Now, the bridge is not a revenue producing project; it will have to be a toll bridge, simply to pay the cost. I believe this is a case in which there still is an obligation on the dominion. The airport business is growing all the time; more money is to be spent on it by the dominion all the time. And the decision announced the other day by the minister should be changed.

Finally I had meant to say a word in support of the establishment of the Canada council, but I do not have time to do so.

In closing may I give a friendly warning to the government. The Liberal party has been in office nearly twenty years, in five succeeding parliaments. In four of those parliaments that party has had an overwhelming majority. I am sure everyone here today who served in those five parliaments will agree that the one in which the sides were more evenly balanced was a far stronger parliament than any of the other four.

Watching those five governments, one can clearly see the government steadily growing more arrogant, with less and less reason. Today we have sign after sign that this government places very little importance on parliament, and more and more importance on the government itself. I suggest that we have, right here in this Liberal government—and not only among the cabinet ministers but also the private members—the greatest self-admiration society in the whole country.

Mr. Rowe: In the whole world.

Mr. Green: The manner in which the government has dealt with the questions to which I have referred this afternoon—unemployment, the Columbia river development, the price of wheat at Vancouver, the merchant navy and the Marpole bridge—and the reaction of the ministers when anyone dares to raise these questions, indicates clearly that their attitude is now becoming one of contempt for all contrary opinions.

Mind you, it is only human nature that when one has been in power, has been in command for such a long time, he thinks he is very good indeed. That is a natural human reaction. I can understand why members of the cabinet have that reaction—although I have noticed that while the older ones, who had some justification for it, go to jobs in different parts of the country, or retire, or go to the Senate, the younger ones who have just come up have the same sense of self-satisfaction that was held by men who really had some ground for it. That is one of the unfortunate features of the situation.

In any event, this government has been in power for a very long time. It would be a good thing for the country if there were a change. I merely point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that if there is a continuation of the attitude to which I have referred, then in the long run it will defeat the government. And, worse than that, it will result, as I believe it has already resulted, in the people of this country being given leadership which is far less efficient and far less democratic than they deserve.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, from the observations we have heard in the debate it would seem to be customary to hand out a lot of bouquets and congratulations when one rises to speak. However, I must say that I do not consider that in any way as part of my responsibility. I do not go even as far as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) when, in his closing remarks, he said that he wanted to offer some friendly advice to the government. My advice is designed deliberately to help the people of Canada get rid of what I consider has been the most reactionary government Canada has had since 1935. Therefore I have very few, if any, congratulations to offer.

The only congratulation I would extend would be to ask Mr. Deputy Speaker to transmit to Mr. Speaker our appreciation of the manner in which he has fulfilled his heavy responsibilities. Unlike the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), I can say honestly that in the province of British Columbia the man of French-Canadian descent from east of the Ottawa river who is considered most famous is the Speaker of the House of Commons, and not the gentleman who was referred to as "Uncle Louie". I might add that the prestige of the so-called "Uncle Louie" in British Columbia is very low, indeed.

It is often said in the house that this or that is the privilege of the opposition. That is a wrong process of thinking—very wrong. The opposition in the House of Commons has a responsibility, not a privilege. Whether we sit on the government or on the opposition side, we have the same privilege. Government members have one responsibility, that of governing the country according to their lights; and we definitely have the responsibility of seeing to it that, in face of the government majority, the people of Canada get the best possible government.

I am very pleased to speak in support of the amendment to the amendment of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I cannot see at all how the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) draws the conclusion that the leader of the C.C.F. was caught without his swimming trunks when the Progressive Conservative amendment was offered. That amendment follows the pattern of which we, in past years, may have been guilty—that of picking little individual items and castigating the government for not implementing them. Next year we have found they would implement them, and we would have to think of something new.

The time has arrived in the Canadian economic scene when little bits here and little remedies there are no longer sufficient. I agree wholeheartedly with my leader when he maintains that there is plenty of evidence to show that, by deliberate design, this government is turning itself from a genuinely Liberal government into a genuinely Conservative government.

I noticed that also in the address by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe). In years gone by it was the C.C.F. who told the government, "You are doing this and this. These are the things we have been asking for." This winter the C.C.F. are not going to be telling the government that they are doing the things we have been asking for. This winter, as we have already heard in this house, the Acting Leader of the Opposition is going to be telling the government, "You are now intending to do the things the Conservative party of Canada has been advocating."

If you will look over the legislation that is proposed you will see that the Acting Leader of the Opposition has grounds for making that statement, and for claiming for the Tory party some of the credit. The time has arrived when a challenge is arising to the reactionary Liberal government headed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The times are not too different from the years preceding the hungry 1930's. At that time the Canadian public was well aware that a complete switch in government policy was necessary. The only thing that was open to the Canadian public was to turn to the only alternative, the Conservative party. Now they have, under the guise of the Liberal party, a Conservative government, and this time there is an alternative available. From one end of Canada to the other, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, there is a genuine farmer-labour people's party that will be ready to take on the government of the country when an election again rolls around.

This government, in my opinion—and I think the speech from the throne shows plenty of evidence of that—is concerned only with the welfare of the Liberal party, and it is not doing very well at that. I notice that fewer than 14 per cent of the Canadian people have a Liberal party in office on the provincial level. Only the relatively smaller provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Manitoba have Liberal regimes. Their fortunes are at a low ebb indeed.

When I was elected to this parliament one of the first things I made up my mind about was that I was going to get to know more about the country in which I live. I regret very much that the tour of the members of parliament to the province of British Columbia planned for last fall had to be postponed. I hope it has not been postponed for long, because I feel it is a great thing to be able to see how other people in Canada, thousands of miles away from us, live. I therefore spent a good deal of my summer and fall visiting other parts of Canada.

I should say the oftener I travel in Canada, the prouder I am of Canada. We have a wonderful nation, the most marvellous of all the nations of the world, and we have the most aggressive and progressive population. However, another impression I gathered that you cannot fail to notice is the vast potential, the vast possibilities that are open to the people of Canada. When one contemplates that one gets a certain feeling of humbleness and at times even of shame, when one sees all those natural resources and realizes how aggressive and sturdy the people are who are living here. That is particularly true when you realize we have such things as housing shortages, unemployment, lack of educational facilities, and so forth. The lack of aggressive action on the part of the Liberal government since 1935 in that respect has had a good deal to do with it.

I was in the maritimes, and I should like to congratulate the people there on having finally decided that their hope for help from a federal government that might be interested in the welfare of the whole nation was groundless. To look for help from such a federal government under this Liberal cabinet that we now have is to look in vain indeed; therefore these people have decided that they are going to see what they can do to help themselves. I welcome most heartily their formation of an interprovincial development council. I have not the exact name of it at my fingertips; however, I wish them well, and I hope this federal government may yet see fit to lend a hand, first of all in a reassessment, followed by a rehabilitation of the economic life of the whole of the maritimes.

The need to help themselves has of course long been evident in the province of Nova Scotia, where the people long ago realized that to look to the two old political parties for help in their difficulties was useless. They have led the whole of the maritime region in the formation of co-operatives and credit unions. However, in other parts of the maritimes I find that the people do not even realize what they have missed. They do not even seem to grasp the fact that the people of Canada are no longer living in the hungry thirties. When you see a new house in certain parts of New Brunswick you really lift up your head to look because it is something new, whereas in other parts of Canada new houses are a thing of almost everyday occurrence. If we could only take the people of New Brunswick on a tour from one end of Canada to the other; if they could see what is going on and how the people in Ontario, in Saskatchewan, in Alberta and in British Columbia are living, their high standard of living, I am sure they would decide that they had had enough of both Liberals and Conservatives.

Mr. Gregg: May I ask my hon. friend when he last visited New Brunswick?

Mr. Regier: I visited New Brunswick in the summer of 1954.

Mr. Gregg: Personally?

Mr. Regier: I also spent a fair amount of time in the province of Quebec. This province seems to be the sore spot in the matter of Canadian unity. I was raised in the west. For years the late Mackenzie King told us how he was building national unity, and for years most of us believed him. "Yes, that is the man to build national unity." How is it, Mr. Speaker, if the late Mackenzie King was really and truly building national unity that, after such a long premiership, almost the moment he disappears from the scene we have less national unity than we have had in Canada for ages and ages?

One plea that I should like to make to the Prime Minister of Canada is this. I hope this house and the other house also will no longer be plagued with the necessity of sitting in a judicial capacity. We are here to legislate. I feel that a great opportunity may be missed if the present Prime Minister should want to resign, or because of circumstances of age or health have to resign, before this matter is settled. We do not want to handle divorce cases in the parliament of Canada.

At none of my meetings from one end of Canada to the other did I mention the subject of divorce; yet invariably, as soon as I sat down, the first thing I was asked was, "What about this question of divorce?" The people of Canada are getting sick and tired of it. There is one man who can help us out of this situation and that is the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I feel that if he does not do so he will have failed in one of his greater responsibilities.

It may interest my good Liberal friends who are hon. members of this house and who represent ridings in the province of Quebec to learn that when I came quite unannounced into the city of Montreal one day two clergymen of the Catholic faith, who somehow or other or by some unknown route had found out I was in Montreal, phoned me to ask for appointments. That was amazing to me. What did they want appointments for? They wanted to know the story from other than Liberal sources for a change. They wanted to get at the root of the difficulty and the dissatisfaction. Not only that; one of them referred a number of cases to me and pleaded with me to take up the fight on behalf of people whom he felt might be injured. I assured him that I hoped not to have to do that and that a solution would be found to remove this business from parliament.

I have received numerous letters from outside Quebec. I have received letters from the Riviera and the Scandinavian countries, from former Canadians whose lives had been so messed up by their cases having been handled in the houses of parliament of Canada that they felt obligated to remove themselves from Canada and spend the rest of their lives elsewhere. I think it is a shame that we are not able to end this matter once and for all. At this time I make this plea to the Prime Minister, that he do what he can. If he cannot do anything I doubt whether there is any future Liberal prime minister who will be able to do anything. He would have to be a resident of Ontario, because such a man could not possibly come from western Canada.

Another matter that worries the people of Canada a great deal, and that excites a lot of interest, is this knight in shining armour who was once and for all going to rid the political scene of Canada of a certain man. He was to rid us of him politically speaking; we wish him well personally. I am referring to the premier of Quebec. I am told that assurance was given last winter to the Liberal members of parliament from Quebec somewhat along these lines: "Now, boys, you stay with me in this fight. When it is over and we have won our fight in the house I will put on this armour and go out and do personal battle, and we will end up on top."

The guns were fired, but what happened? I wonder how those Liberal members of parliament who put their faith in the Prime Minister feel about it now. They must be most humiliated indeed, because from all appearances the premier of Quebec seems to have won a complete victory. All he did was this. When he got a slap on one cheek he turned the other cheek, and the Prime Minister of Canada had to humiliate the whole nation by boarding a train to go to meet the master of that other nation in a hotel room in Montreal.

Mr. Martin: Does the hon. member know of any declaration made by the head of any government in this country which was more widely approved or more universally commended throughout Canada than the speech made by the Prime Minister of Canada at the Reform club in Quebec?

Mr. Regier: That is exactly what I am saying. All Canada looked forward with great anticipation, the progressive people in the province of Quebec looked forward with great anticipation to the political battle which was shaping up on the Canadian scene. Then there was the utter humiliation and shame that all of us felt when it ended up in a complete turnabout in this hotel room in Montreal.

The people of Quebec are going to wake up. There are enough of them to turn the tide. My forecast is that when that tide turns in the province of Quebec it is going to turn mighty fast. My greatest concern is that it may turn to the communist party. I contend that there is no part of Canada that is as ripe for advances by the communist party as the province of Quebec. In the city of Montreal the communist party polled about as many votes as the C.C.F.

Mr. Boisvert: How many days did the hon. member spend in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Regier: I think I am safe in saying that I have spent more days in the province of Quebec than any six members of parliament from Quebec taken together have spent in British Columbia.

Mr. Boisvert: I should like the hon. member to answer that question. How many days did he spend in the province of Quebec when he went there last summer?

Mr. Regier: I have not added them up; I do not know the number of days I was there last summer. The people of Quebec are suffering. They are subjected to double taxation and they are not enjoying the facilities in the field of education which they would like to have, which they ought to have and which they deserve as Canadian citizens. They are not receiving adequate health services to which they are entitled. I was amazed to learn that it was many years after the rest of Canada was enjoying old age pensions before Quebec was granted this privilege. One reason for this was that when the late Mr. Mackenzie King, while leader of the Liberal party, was preaching national unity, on the other side of the Ottawa river he was telling the people of Quebec, "You are something apart; you are something different; you must have special consideration."

I regret to admit that all the political parties of Canada represented in the province of Quebec are of one accord. They are all supporters, consciously or otherwise, of the basic philosophy of the premier of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Wishful thinking.

Mr. Regier: It is not wishful thinking. I have seen resolutions passed by the Quebec branches of various political parties. I have said to the people of Montreal, and they applauded me when I said it, that unity in Canada cannot be based on anything except the needs of the people. Human beings in Montreal are the same as human beings in Winnipeg or in any other Canadian city. The people of Canada want decent housing and decent food. They want employment. They want health services. We all want these things whether we live in one part of Canada or another. There is your basis of unity for the Canadian people. The C.C.F. is the only party which has arisen out of the needs of the people of Canada and is therefore able to tell the same story in all parts of Canada.

If hon. members do not like what I have been saying about the province of Quebec we will go to the next province, the province of Ontario. In the province of Ontario I found widespread complaints about the administration of the Department of National Revenue. I was told by civil servants that it is the worst administered department of the government of Canada. The customs officers along the line do not seem to know where they are at. One makes one ruling one day and another one comes in the next day and overrules that, making a different regulation. I think it is time for a complete overhaul, and I say this in all kindness to the minister for I believe he should do this before he leaves that department, possibly to take on another. He should order a complete reassessment such as we had with the Criminal Code last year. I believe it is time the regulations of the Department of National Revenue were consolidated and the difficulties ironed out. However, we will have more of that later in the session.

There is a great housing shortage, and in this regard I was interested to hear the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) state that N.H.A. houses are being built for $10,000. The hon. member mentioned a down payment of $1,500, and I earnestly hope homes are available at that figure. However, I would like to be reassured on that point and know for certain that the people of Toronto who are eligible for N.H.A. homes can buy a $10,000 home for a down payment of $1,500.

The people of Ontario are worried about the question of immigration, especially as it relates to unemployment. We fail to understand how so many individual applicants for immigration into Canada can be turned down, yet wherever we go in the major centres of Canada there seem to be hundreds of single immigrants who have come into this country and are now without employment. It has long been suspected that the department of immigration, either deliberately or through lack of planning and direction, is allowing thousands of single workers into Canada, people with no contacts in Canada and possibly only the promise of short-time employment, while keeping out others whom we ought to welcome into our country. I shall not go into detail on that because of lack of time.

In the province of Manitoba the record speaks for itself. I was amazed at the efforts the Liberal party made to win the Selkirk by-election. I understand one cabinet minister was sent in for a repeat performance. If he had been sent in once more the Liberal candidate might actually have lost his deposit. I also understand that 48 hours before the voters went to the polls they were told that the so-called payment on wheat would be 10 cents a bushel, and it would be paid out shortly after the by-election.

I would like to congratulate whoever is in charge of the Liberal party organization in Canada, for under his guidance the party made a tremendous effort to bolster their rapidly sinking prestige in the province of Manitoba. However, Manitoba is a little more progressive than a great many other parts of Canada. To the Liberal party I would say, "Your cause in Manitoba is completely hopeless. In addition, it will require another five to ten years before you begin to grow again in British Columbia, while in Alberta there is no hope for you at all, and even less in Saskatchewan. Your efforts to hold Manitoba will be completely fruitless."

I spent a good deal of time in Saskatchewan, and I found the people there taking this terrible trimming over the crop failure in their usual manner. However, they are bitterly disappointed over the failure of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to come through with the dam. The yarn going around Saskatchewan is that the Minister of Agriculture has made up his mind that before he leaves the political scene he is going to do everything he can to obtain the dam, and thus not go down in history as a political failure. In fact, we are told in Saskatchewan that at every cabinet meeting all the Minister of Agriculture speaks about is the dam, and the other cabinet ministers are getting to the point where they say, "Damn the Minister of Agriculture, damn the dam, and damn all Saskatchewan anyhow".

Then we come to the province of Alberta, and there we find a rather fluid situation in regard to political life. The people there are rapidly becoming disillusioned with their present government, particularly when they see a clergyman, a humble servant of the people, placed in charge of one of the most important government departments and end up, after leaving the political scene, as the head of a company which threatens to become one of the biggest private utility companies in Canada. When they see that they begin to wonder.

The government there promised to do away with all tax on land, but taxes on land have been gradually rising despite the fact that hundreds of millions of dollars of oil revenue has gone into the provincial coffers. In the light of these facts the people cannot understand why their taxes continue to increase.

We have not a Liberal organization in Alberta worthy of the name. We have some Liberal members in the legislature, but they have no organization behind them. I would point out, though, that the C.C.F. in Alberta has a vital, wide-awake, active organization, and the leader of the Social Credit party might get the shock of his life before six more months have passed. In fact, we might have to rearrange the seating in this house before very long.

Coming now to the province of British Columbia, which might be described as the garden of Eden—I had "paradise" in my notes but I had to change that because of our present government there and because I remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the garden of Eden was not a perfect place; there was an influence there. However, coming back to British Columbia I believe that politically it has made greater advances than any other province in Canada in that we have finally consolidated a two-party system. Hon. members might take a look at today's Hansard and read how the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) made a powerful plea on behalf of the rights of the provincial government in British Columbia. His was nothing more than an attempt to get that government off the hook in its fight over power with the federal government, which it is rapidly losing.

They were elected as the free enterprise party. They told the farmers there that the reason they were not getting more for their milk was because the government was intervening in the milk situation. They told people in the urban areas, "You are paying too much for your milk. Take the government out of the milk business. Government in business is a bad thing. It is Marxian and basically bad." The farmers and the urban dwellers fell for it, but I am still paying 22 cents per quart for my milk. Farmers in the Fraser valley of British Columbia have lost untold hundreds of thousands of dollars as a result of this policy, and now they are beginning to worry about it. They have managed to get a commission appointed and the "Socreds" are worrying about how they can save face and again sneak back into the milk business.

I was pleased to note that apparently the leader of the Social Credit party pleaded yesterday for orderly marketing for farm produce. Last year I was also pleased to hear him speak in favour of abolishing tolls on bridges. I hope that he can somehow exercise some restraint and stop the wild antics of those who are nothing but smart-aleck politicians, who lead a rather reluctant Social Credit group in the house in Victoria.

Then we have the new Conservative party there, and it has a most useful role to play. I have no objection to the Conservative party. I have every admiration for it. It has a necessary part to play in a democracy. It is the party of consolidation, while the C.C.F. party is the party of progress. Let the Conservative party now call itself "Socred" or even "Union Nationale". It is immaterial, and it is all right with me. It has a political function to perform. However, what I do object to is this Liberal party that is neither here nor there, that is not a free enterprise party and is not socialistically inclined. It is based on nothing, I repeat, except the welfare of the Liberal party. That will come to an end when economic circumstances change and the people demand a government that believes in action. They will either elect the right wing or the left wing, and I can forecast a split right down the middle in the membership across the way.

Who the new leader of the right wing will be I do not know. I hear that sparring for the position is going on, and that a number of very aggressive and fairly young individuals are concerned. It is my firm conviction that the Liberal party in British Columbia has disappeared as a political force. The main reason, I am verily beginning to believe, is that the bottom of the Fraser river is paved with the gold and studded with the diamonds of Liberal political patronage. We had a Fraser river gold rush many years ago, and it is said that history has a way of repeating itself. This patronage and pork barrel politics were the main reason for the wiping out of the Liberal government in Saskatchewan, and this also holds true for the province of British Columbia. There is an answer to the situation. The people do not know what is going on and the opposition, apparently, has no place in government. I sometimes wonder if we have any place. I sometimes even wonder why the private Liberal members of parliament sitting around and behind the cabinet ministers are here at all. They have no influence on the government, and I do not know why they are here.

This Canada of ours is definitely ruled by a cabinet that has all the facilities at its command to defend its position, right or wrong. I fully endorse the plea made by the Conservatives some time ago, about which I read in the newspapers, that greater facilities be made available to the opposition members so they can do their work properly. When I referred to the Fraser river you might think that I exaggerated. Maybe I did, but how am I to know? What means are available to me to find out whether or not the half a million dollars for this project and the $2 million for that project are a waste of money?

When the cabinet wants to defend its position with regard to expenditures on certain public works it has all research facilities available. The matter has become so serious that after the last election there were articles in certain newspapers pointing out that Canada was beginning to have a one-party government. To anyone who has sat in the galleries of the house over a period of years I think it must be very obvious that we are rapidly approaching the day, if this situation carries on much longer and opposition members are unable to do too much about it, when not only will we have a bipartisan foreign policy, as we sometimes do, but all our policies will be bipartisan, and that would be a sad day for the cause of democracy.

I should like to endorse what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) with regard to the trans-Canada highway and the assumption of responsibility by the federal government for all major highways in Canada. I think the time is long overdue when municipal and provincial taxpayers should be afforded some measure of relief from the burden of taxation brought about by road construction and maintenance. Money is so urgently needed for municipal development that we cannot longer afford to see so much of the income of the lower levels of government being used for road building.

I should like also to advocate that a committee of the house be established, or even a royal commission, to investigate all expenditures of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production since the end of the war. I think the most amazing information would be revealed. That is another place where the opposition is handicapped. I would say that even the Liberal members who are not in the cabinet are severely handicapped in fulfilling their function in the house. I know that the Department of National Defence has wasted $300,000 in my riding in the purchase of a swamp, land that is absolutely useless for the purpose for which it was bought. Somebody made a mistake. I am not saying that the government must necessarily be condemned for a mistake, but they spent $300,000 for land on which to build an army supply depot, and the land turned out to have no bottom to it. At least, no bottom has been found so far, and the land is most unsuited for that purpose.

Mr. Argue: No horses on the payroll.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Regier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Castleden: They sank the horses in the middle of the swamp.

Mr. Argue: What's a million dollars?

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in rising on this occasion to speak on behalf of my constituents I am sure they would want me to convey to you and to the members of the house their best wishes for the coming year. I should also like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I also congratulate the new members of parliament for giving up all those things with which they were occupied previous to coming here and giving of themselves to the nation's business.

Naturally there were some disappointments last year, but as we look back we have reason to believe that there was much for which to be thankful. Many of our disappointments were brought about by things beyond our control. Weather conditions in the part of my riding where I live were very bad so far as the production of logs and lumber is concerned. Across Canada we find that conditions for agriculture were anything but good.

Dealing with British Columbia, and more particularly with the riding of Cariboo in which I am most interested, we find it is expected that tenders will be called for the Dawson Creek federal building early this year. For a good many years we have been looking forward to the construction of this building, and I am certain that the people of that area appreciate a great deal the action that is being taken this year.

Whilst speaking in connection with the Dawson Creek area, I should like to mention that we are pleased to hear that the telephone situation will be cleared up within the next 18 months, and that a dial system will be introduced in Dawson Creek. I should like to recommend at this time, in connection with improvements in the Dawson Creek area, that an unattended automatic set-up for Pouce Coupe be considered, which would give a 24-hour service from that town into the central point of Dawson Creek.

I should like to congratulate the government on the appointment of the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) because I believe that, as well as having great ability, he has many other admirable qualities. We are looking forward to seeing some good results from his department.

The provincial government of British Columbia has contributed a great deal to the welfare of our people. Among the things that interest me most is the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern from Squamish to Vancouver. This extension, as you perhaps know, is well under way. It is expected that the extension from Prince George to Fort St. John will be under way next year. I understand that tenders for the construction of the first 65 miles will be called some time early in February.

As a result of the confidence in the British Columbia government there has been a great deal of private investment throughout the whole province. This sometimes brings with it circumstances which cause the government a bit of concern. Because of the rapid expansion, the educational facilities in the province, as elsewhere in Canada, can hardly keep pace with the growth in population.

In the northern part of my constituency there is an increased interest in gas and oil exploration. The proposed gas line from Fort St. John to Vancouver and to the inland empire of the Pacific northwest in the United States brings a great deal of hope for our people throughout the length and breadth of the Cariboo riding because we expect many new secondary industries will be brought into being.

I noticed that in the Vancouver Sun of January 3, in speaking about this development, Frank Walden, who is a staff writer for the Vancouver Sun had this to say:

> The year 1954 was as action-packed from a Social Credit government's point of view, as the violent election years of 1952 and 1953. The shouting was not perhaps as loud, but more, in fact a good deal, was accomplished.

Again on the economic side, I may say that British Columbia bonds sold for the highest price ever in the eastern money markets. Frobisher posted with the government a colossal $2,500,000 bond and prepared to build an immense hydrochemical empire in the northern section of British Columbia. Alcan announced another $45 million expansion program ahead of schedule. There is every reason for the people of British Columbia to be optimistic, and we expect that as time goes on a much greater development will take place within the province.

The point I should like to make at this time is that all these developments are going to add substantially to the federal government's revenues. Under the tax agreements we find that the greater the development, naturally the more money the federal government is going to collect. We feel, therefore, that there are certain responsibilities the federal government must meet in connection with collecting that additional revenue from British Columbia. We would expect the federal government to take steps to assist the province to continue this rapid development in order that the people of Canada including those of British Columbia may enjoy a higher standard of living and a greater Canada.

The people of British Columbia are active and enterprising, and are much encouraged by the sound policy of the British Columbia government, which is noted for being a government that talks less and does more. That this feeling of optimism is growing there is no doubt. We do feel that there should be no encroachment upon provincial rights by the federal government in anything that is done.

Speaking last session regarding transportation facilities I mentioned the highway problem, as recorded at page 180 of Hansard for November 19, 1953. But before dealing with the problem of highways, I should like to mention one matter of interest not only to the people in that part of British Columbia from which I come but also to all the people of Canada. We find we have a situation in which there are two large Canadian railroads being subsidized by the taxpayers of Canada. These subsidies put the railways in a position where they can set rates without regard to whether or not they lose money. As long as the railways are being subsidized, there is no reason why the railway company could not carry freight for nothing in order to meet competition.

The trucking problem has been brought to my attention, and the position of the trucking company is becoming hopeless. It might be said by some that the trucking business is being subsidized, but I think that is a long way from the truth. The trucking industry pays a tax of 10 cents per gallon on gasoline and licence fees for the use of the highways. These highways are needed for the lighter traffic as well as for heavy loads on the short hauls on which the railways are not able to give service.

I should like to quote some figures which are very revealing in connection with freight rates and agreed charges. I find that according to the Canadian freight classification there is a fourth class rate of $2.98 against an agreed charge of $2.09, which is being charged for first class freight. I see that the first class freight rate is $5.04, according to the Canadian freight classification. These figures speak for themselves. Again referring to the figures we see that from Edmonton to McBride, a distance of 350 miles, the second class freight rate is $2.26. From Vancouver to Dawson Creek, a distance of 1,400 miles, the first class freight rate under agreed charges is $2.09, or 17 cents less to bring freight 1,400 miles than to take the same freight 350 miles, where there is no trucking competition. I think this situation is grossly unfair and demands the immediate attention of the government.

The whole rate problem must be brought under review. There is no doubt in the world that in a pioneering country especially—and perhaps I need not say "especially"—this is necessary. I am familiar particularly with that part of the trucking industry which serves the constituency of Cariboo. I know that many hundreds of miles of that constituency are served only by trucking. If we have a situation where subsidized railways can cut the rates and take the long hauls away from that trucking industry, it will throw it into a position where it cannot take care of local freight, either. We need the trucking industry, and we must do something to protect it from the ravages of subsidized railways that can cut rates down to nothing, if necessary—because it makes no difference to them, so long as the taxpayer is going to meet the difference, in the final analysis.

I come now to a matter which has been discussed by at least four members so far at this session, and that is the question of federal participation in the construction of arterial highways. I believe that so long as the federal government is collecting the bulk of the taxes from the people in the provinces of Canada, more should be done in connection with the highways. As I said before, this could be linked with the defence program. I believe the time has come when the government should take a close look at the highway situation in Canada, particularly in the light of what is going on in our neighbouring country to the south. We find that United States expenditures planned for the next number of years amount to more than $100 billion. In addition they have planned for $8 billion to be spent on toll roads for the northern and central parts of that country.

In view of the great extension of the roads they already have in that country—and the roads now going to be built are termed as necessary, I understand, under the defence program—we in Canada must surely realize that we are falling far behind in our program of road building. I noticed in an editorial in the Edmonton Journal of November 3, 1954, a heading "Military Loads and Roads." One paragraph in the editorial states:

> Last year, provincial highways minister Gordon Taylor requested federal aid in the construction of what would be military traffic arteries in this province. He said that the provinces should not be expected to build highways which would carry heavy military traffic in the event of an attack on this country. Such traffic would require roads of a very high standard of construction to ensure mobility. The federal government rejected this request when it was made in concert by the western provinces. Nevertheless, it has been apprised of the situation in warnings by Colonel J. R. B. Jones, chief engineer of the Canadian army, of the general inadequacy of Canadian highways for military requirements.

Hon. George Prudham is opposed to construction of military highways outward from Edmonton as he does not think they will ever be needed for such use. It would be well for him to seek instruction from experts of the defence department on this vital subject.

I would not feel justified in stressing the need for highways so much were it not for the fact that we realize the development of any country depends upon its highway and transportation facilities. I would urge this government to take another look at the whole highways situation with a view to providing more aid to the provinces in that regard.

In this connection we do not advocate an increase in the national debt to do the job. I believe the Bank of Canada could be made a bank of issue; and the Bank of Canada as a bank of issue could monetize our national liquid assets, part of the difference between national income and national production. By so doing, without increasing the national debt and without necessarily paying any interest on the money issued, it could bring about a situation where surplus consumer goods not being bought today could be put into the hands of the unemployed. Those people could be set to work to build these badly needed highways. In this way there would be no increase in the national debt. We would only be using liquid assets we already have in the form of consumer goods.

This could apply, of course, to many other phases of government. At the moment I think particularly of our senior citizens and all the other recipients of social assistance who are so badly in need of help, which situation we all recognize.

We have heard a good deal about the unemployment situation, and I am not going to say much about it. However, I do go along with those who advocate bringing about a situation in Canada where we do not have to give out supplementary benefits, but who urge rather that we have a situation under which those who want to work would have the opportunity to do so. We know this is a young country and that there is much to do. We know we have the machines to do it; we have the manpower. Therefore there is no reason in the world why, with the manpower and the machines, the work could not be done, since we have the liquid assets in the form of consumer goods that need to be consumed.

[Mr. Leboe.]

The government of British Columbia took action in connection with the unemployment situation in that province, taking the position that if the federal government was not going to give assistance, then the provincial government would not see the people left without the means of livelihood.

One feature that affects my constituency particularly is that contracts for part of the construction on the Pacific Great Eastern Railway have been brought forward three or four months so that by the spring break-up in the lumbering industry in the Prince George area the work will be getting under way, so as to relieve the unemployment situation during the spring lay-off period. These are situations in which the government is active in looking after its people, and I feel very certain that they are going a long way in their policies to bring about better federal and provincial relations.

We must give more autonomy to the provinces rather than putting the autonomy all in the federal government. We must get back to bringing the government closer to the people so the people of this land will have a closer contact with the government, and therefore be able to let their voices be heard much more often than in the past. We must get back to the position where people can get their needs before the government. The further away we get from the municipal and provincial level the harder it is going to be for the people of Canada to get any action on problems that require government attention.

I do not want to speak too long. In closing I wish to say that I was interested to note that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) was attempting to pick to pieces, as it were, the British Columbia government. I should like to remind him that for 17 years or so the C.C.F. were in opposition, but the people of British Columbia turned them down at the polls when the time came to elect a government other than the Liberal government that was in power at that time.

Mr. Castleden: On the transferable vote.

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I too want to congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) and to add my welcome to the new members who were elected at the by-elections last fall.

I of course am a member from what the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) described as a backward province, namely New Brunswick, in which he said a new house was a rarity. I am sure the places he visited would not be at all pleased to hear him say that today; and I can assure him, even without visiting his riding, that we have more new houses in Westmorland county than he has in his riding, because last year he rose in his place in this house during a debate on housing and said that many people in his riding were living in tarpaper shacks, to which at the time the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) objected.

I had intended to say something during my speech about the dredging of a harbour down in New Brunswick, Pointe du Chene harbour, which is part of my responsibility. However, the hon. member, who conducted one of the quickest national surveys I have ever heard of, took it upon himself to take an interest in that harbour in Westmorland county, New Brunswick. I should like to read an extract from the Moncton Transcript of June 23, 1954:

> Erhart Regier, C.C.F. member of parliament for Burnaby-Coquitlam, British Columbia, in a two-day speaking tour of Westmorland county was critical of the Liberal government and what he calls "their do-nothing" attitude.
> Speaking last night at Sackville and the evening before at Petitcodiac Mr. Regier referred to the needed dredging of Point du Chene channel and charged that the government would do nothing until pressed by united action from several directions.

I have pressed for the dredging of that channel from one direction. That is all I can do. I was looking forward at this session to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam pressing for it from several directions; but apparently since leaving Westmorland he has lost interest in the dredging of this channel. The newspaper report of his speech goes on to say:

> He said that the people of British Columbia would be pleased to see federal funds spent on the rehabilitation of the maritime economic life as they realize that the prosperity of Canada as a whole depended on the well-being of all parts of the nation.

In that regard he apparently is speaking for the government of British Columbia. Today he was not a bit satisfied with the way the government of British Columbia was running that province. I was startled to hear him pick apart the Social Credit government, particularly after speaking for them. I can also tell him that in New Brunswick the people sometimes do change their minds politically. They did that a year or two ago and elected a Progressive Conservative government. However, since the C.C.F. party was organized in New Brunswick their vote has steadily declined. In Westmorland county the last candidate received about half as many votes as he did four years previously. Socialism in Westmorland county is definitely on its way out.

An hon. Member: As it is everywhere else.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I tell the house that there is no ground at all for the hon. member's remark to the effect that the people of New Brunswick would support a socialist government or a socialist party. My advice to him, to paraphrase an old saying, would be: Stay west, young man, stay west.

I would like to bring greetings to the house from Westmorland county and tell the hon. members that a new star is rising in the east in the person of the newly elected leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Taylor, about whom you will hear more in a few years when he becomes premier of our province.

Mr. Brooks: A pretty dim star.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): At the last session I spoke on the Chignecto canal, or the eastern extension of the St. Lawrence seaway. As has been suggested, it can be properly called the eastern passage. I intend to deal with this matter again today, but before I do so I should like to mention other matters which as the representative of Westmorland county I have been asked to bring to the attention of the house.

Firstly, in the centre of Westmorland county is the largest railway centre east of Montreal. It is the headquarters for the Atlantic division, and it is where the repair shops are located. The economic life of my district reacts quickly to any changes in the Canadian National Railways, that is to say, any increase or decrease in the staff of the Canadian National Railways, Atlantic division. To us in New Brunswick this transportation system is more than a business to be run on a profit and loss basis as private enterprise. Separated as we are from the rest of Canada by the state of Maine, it means that we have to travel through an entire state of a foreign country, or around it, to do business with the rest of the Dominion of Canada.

The Canadian National Railways is a public utility, and therefore cannot be considered in relation to the province of New Brunswick in the same light as a private enterprise. The repair shops in Moncton repair and manufacture parts for the entire system, and for a number of years the entire economy of my constituency has been built around these shops. It is most unfair to reduce the staff because of a change-over from steam locomotives to diesels. These tradesmen have been put out of work, and there is no other industry in that locality to which they can turn for employment.

I have been asked by the union representatives in Moncton to protest the lay-offs in the Atlantic region. This request has been made also by the Canadian National war veterans' association. I am more than pleased to endorse their stand. I suggest that there should be an investigation into the Atlantic region of the Canadian National Railways in an effort to find a means of providing full employment for the railway workers in the maritimes.

Since I spoke last in this house urging the construction of a Chignecto canal or eastern passage, many organizations and citizens have asked that the construction of this canal be started at once. Last summer the maritimes marine workmen's federation, meeting in Sydney, adopted a resolution calling upon the governments of the four Atlantic provinces to demand that the federal government make an immediate start on the construction of a Chignecto canal across the isthmus between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Last summer the New Brunswick federation of labour, meeting in Bathurst, New Brunswick, asked for the immediate construction of this isthmus project. The union of municipalities, representing every city, town and county in the entire province of New Brunswick, unanimously supported by resolution the construction of a Chignecto canal. In addition to the groups I have mentioned there are 80-odd other organizations which have endorsed this project.

In September, 1954, the Maritime Advocate published an article which would seem to be a boiling down of the sentiments of the citizens of the district in relation to the construction of a Chignecto canal. This reads:

> It strikes me that it is now or never so far as the Chignecto canal is concerned. The St. Lawrence seaway, which will undoubtedly be detrimental to the Atlantic provinces, is going ahead no matter what happens. It is up to the federal government to construct the Chignecto canal which will do a great deal to allay the fears of maritime people that the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway will prove a big setback for the Atlantic provinces. Now is the time for all the federal members from Atlantic provinces to stand together, irrespective of party politics. It is now or never. If there is not concerted action in favour of the construction of the Chignecto canal now then we in the Atlantic provinces may as well give up the fight and stand with our hands out, praying for a few nickels from the wealthy tables of the central provinces.

In addition I have been sent a copy of a resolution adopted at the 54th annual meeting of the maritime provinces board of trade, reading as follows:

> Whereas, during the last session, the Minister of Transport of the federal government expressed his views in the House of Commons that a study should be made into the feasibility of the construction of the Chignecto canal; and
> Whereas, it is considered that the construction of the Chignecto canal could be linked with the development of electric power through utilization of bay of Fundy tides and that this development could produce abundant low cost power which would greatly enhance the opportunity of attracting industries to these maritime provinces,
> Therefore, be it resolved: that the maritime provinces board of trade, assembled in session at Halifax, Nova Scotia, this 4th day of October, 1954, urge the government of Canada to investigate at the earliest possible moment the feasibility of the construction of the Chignecto canal, at the same time keeping in mind the possibility of power development as an allied phase of any such construction.

Also in the same month the Atlantic regional employment committee of the unemployment insurance commission is reported in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of August 29 as having passed a resolution in connection with the Chignecto canal, reading as follows:

> The second resolution pointed out that a canal through the isthmus of Chignecto would prove "highly beneficial" to the maritime provinces and greatly expanding national economy.
> Benefits of such a canal would be toward greater national defence, faster ocean communication and speedier means of shipping, the resolution continued.
> "Creation of a canal piercing the Chignecto isthmus would seem complementary to the St. Lawrence and great lakes development now being undertaken by the federal government", the resolution said.
> Points in favour of the canal are, according to the resolution, possibility of a number of starting points for convoys, greater ability on the part of the "western allies" to dispatch convoys from different points on the eastern Canadian coast, and effective deterrent to aggression and inevitable influence to Canadian and American industry by the mineral discoveries of the Ungava peninsula and Bathurst area.
> The resolution declared also that advocates in the United States of the Passamaquoddy power development "have definitely maintained for some time that a Chignecto canal would have influence on industrial development in the Atlantic coast section of New England."

Last year I traced the history of the Chignecto canal back over a period of about 300 years. I pointed out that promises had been made by former governments. There had been times in our history when the construction of the Chignecto canal seemed to be very certain, but in the past not too much has been said about the power aspects of the Chignecto canal. It might be likened to the St. Lawrence seaway which is said to be a water route from central Canada to other countries of the world; but the consequent development of power which would be available to the central provinces is most important.

We in New Brunswick need cheap power. I believe a by-product of the construction of a Chignecto canal, if properly planned, would be a block of power which would improve the economic condition of our area. There have been many routes suggested for the canal, all of which are practical, but I am not concerned so much with the route as with the acceptance of the principle of the construction of a canal to pierce the isthmus.

The construction of this canal would provide a short route in sheltered waters to the trading points in the bay of Fundy and in New England for the products of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. It would increase coastwise shipping between the gulf of St. Lawrence, the bay of Chaleur, Northumberland strait and the bay of Fundy. It would increase regular steamship sailings between the Atlantic provinces and central Canada. A Chignecto canal would make it convenient for vessels plying between Montreal and points on the Atlantic seaboard to call at ports not only in the bay of Fundy but in northern Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and northern New Brunswick, and enable them to load or discharge cargoes and passengers. It would revive native industries which flourished years ago, and it would create a new economy in the Atlantic provinces.

It may surprise many residents of Canada to know that four years after confederation the percentage of population employed in industry in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, was almost equal to the percentage of population similarly employed in Quebec and Ontario. Seventy-five years later, however, a tremendous change took place. Ontario and Quebec had been steadily enriched and their industrial employment average rose. In the Atlantic provinces there had not been an increase but a devastating decline. Incidentally, in that period New Brunswick dropped from first place to fourth among the five provinces.

Prior to confederation the maritime provinces were regarded as the most prosperous in British North America. New Brunswick, on a per capita basis, was the most industrialized of any of the provinces then comprising Canada. The lack of a Chignecto canal is one of the reasons our prosperity and industrial development have lagged far behind Quebec and Ontario. In 1871, of every five Canadian industrial workers, one was employed in the maritimes. In 1946 the ratio had dropped to one out of every 17. Again, in 1871 the industrial wage paid to the worker in New Brunswick was the highest in Canada. In 1946 that province had almost the lowest wage rate in Canada.

Besides the tremendous saving in shipping distances, the building of the canal would mean that many of the present small ports would be developed to carry on both a coastwise and an ocean-going business. The time then has come, after many attempts over the past 300 years, for the government to fulfil its confederation promise and build the Chignecto canal.

Before closing there is one other matter I would like to bring to the attention of the house, for it is a matter of serious concern to us in New Brunswick. That is the plight of our farmers. It is true that we have many successful farmers outside our larger towns and cities, most of them specializing in daily farm products such as liquid milk for the supply of these centres. But if you drive through Westmorland county and some of the adjoining counties you will see many abandoned farms with windows in the houses boarded up and the place left to rot. That is a terrible situation, and I would like to know of some way in which to remedy it. We have, of course, a Canadian farm loan board, but apparently that was designed more to assist the farmers of western and central Canada, and in my opinion it is not suited to the purpose of assisting the farmers in New Brunswick. To the best of my knowledge there was only one Canadian farm loan board application granted in Westmorland county last year. I may be wrong, but certainly there were not more than three or four.

In this connection I would like to point out, and it should be recognized in the regulations, that there are other types of farming in addition to those known in central and western Canada. In New Brunswick a man could have a farm close to the sea and during a few weeks of the year he could go down to the shore line and fish. This would provide him with a small cash income. In another district a farmer may have a wood lot at the back of his farm from which he cuts a certain amount of wood each year, in fact probably the same amount as his father and grandfather cut in their day. Out of that small supply of wood he makes another small cash income. In addition, part of his farm may be composed of rocky land on which nothing grows very well except small spruce and fir trees. Each year in the fall he thins them out for the Christmas tree trade. In fact in New Brunswick this has become quite an industry, and I am told that last fall nearly 10 million trees were shipped from that province.

The point I wish to make is that a farmer may farm his wood lot, he may farm his spruce and fir trees for the Christmas trade, or he may fish along the edge of his farm, but it appears that this type of farming is not to be recognized under the regulations of the Canadian farm loan board. The regulations should be broadened so that greater assistance may be given to the farmers in Westmorland county and all New Brunswick, and so drafted that it will be much easier than it is now for such farmers to obtain loans.

I shall not take up the time of the house to mention the many benefits we have received which have been provided by the Liberal party for the people of New Brunswick, but I do want to mention in closing that we are not as poor or as hard up as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made out earlier today.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, not because it has become a customary practice to do so, but because of the excellent manner in which they acquitted themselves on Friday last.

We have been told that the hon. member for Verdun has an outstanding background as a scholar and a jurist in his native province. Those of us who come from the province of Ontario know the member for Trinity as a prominent athlete, an outstanding scholar and a notable member of the bar of this province. I am sure that both these members will represent the people of their constituencies in a manner that will do credit to themselves and to the provinces from which they come.

The past twelve months have brought many new obligations to Canada in the sphere of international affairs. Canada has assumed the responsibility of endeavouring to work out a satisfactory armistice in Indo-China during the past six months. Our representatives have attended conferences in London and Paris in order to bring about a European alliance and unite the countries of western Europe. We in Canada endeavoured to be a genial host to representatives who came to this country in connection with the Colombo plan conference. In all these projects our delegations have contributed their sincere and faithful efforts to maintain peace among men of good will.

It is traditional that representatives who come here and the people of Canada generally think very much alike as to what our position should be in the matter of international affairs. During the past summer I had the honour of being one of the delegation that attended the commonwealth parliamentary conference in Nairobi. One of the things noticeable there was that our delegates, regardless of their political affiliations in Canada, all thought alike as far as the fundamentals of freedom, security and humanity were concerned. The Canadian people expect us to show the same united front in opposition to tyranny, oppression and aggression in dealing with international matters in this house. Canada is united at the present time as never before in her history in those things which are most important to the people of this country. This state of union in our country reflects credit on the wisdom, foresight and veracity of our national leaders both past and present.

The present administration has been responsible in the past for many measures of social reform, so it is not surprising to me to see reflected in the speech from the throne certain refinements to many of these social reforms. We must admit that there are certain patches of unemployment throughout the country. These matters require attention, and the people of Canada will be glad to know that amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act are being introduced this session at the earliest possible moment. These amendments will provide a measure of relief for those people who are unemployed. The scale of supplementary payments will be placed on a par with regular payments. Labour organizations throughout the country are looking forward to a general overhaul, as forecast, of the Unemployment Insurance Act itself.

As one of the members of the veterans affairs committee of this house, I was proud to learn that certain amendments were being introduced at this session dealing with the war veterans allowance. Veterans' groups throughout the country will welcome these proposed amendments. With the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), I attended meetings of veterans' groups in the Niagara peninsula before coming here. I am sure these groups are not asking for the ultimate and that they will be satisfied with the increase in basic rates and the raising of the ceiling on permissible incomes which will be provided in the amendments to be submitted by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe).

I am pleased to note that some amendments will be made to the Blind Persons Act. I cannot think of a greater handicap any person can have than blindness. These blind persons bear their burdens cheerfully and admirably. During the past three months I have had occasion to visit the blind persons of our community. Many of them said to me that they find it most difficult to provide a normal existence for themselves. I should like to congratulate the Canadian National Institute for the Blind on providing some education for leaders whose duty it is to supervise the activities of blind people and to plan entertainment and recreational facilities for them. Training courses in arts and crafts enable the blind to supplement their small pensions. We provide for them the opportunity to conduct curio booths and newsstands in our public buildings, railway depots and hospital foyers.

If these people have the industry, initiative and courage to develop their talents, and if they have the perseverance and ability to earn small incomes, I believe they should be given some special preferment in the matter of their earnings. Although it may not be provided in the present amendments, I look forward to the day when blind persons may be able to accept pensions without the imposition of a means test at all.

I was happy to note that the administration intends to embark on a satisfactory policy of public works. The people of St. Catharines, whom I have the honour to represent, are gratified that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) has seen fit to provide a federal public building in that city. This accommodation is greatly needed in a community that has shown unusual expansion in the past decade. There is a great need for proper accommodation for federal offices in our community.

We feel that we have another public works project in our area that requires immediate attention. I refer to the clean-up of the old Welland canal. Three canals have been built across the face of the Niagara peninsula by federal governments during the past century. These canals were built to provide a more expeditious route for shipping to avoid the natural barrier at Niagara Falls. The unused Welland canal, which passes through Thorold, Merritton, St. Catharines and Port Dalhousie, has become an unsightly, pestilential cesspool. The municipal governments in the area have come to an agreement as to the method that should be followed in cleaning up this unsightly mess. They have decided to remove the locks, fill in the banks and narrow the channel.

I say the municipalities have come to an agreement. They have agreed on the method of construction. They have not agreed as to the proportion of cost, and it is hoped that the Department of Transport will be generous to these municipalities in its contribution toward the cost of construction. In addition to improving the general contour of the area, the project will provide useful employment for residents of the adjoining municipalities.

I should like also to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) a difficulty which has arisen near the Welland canal. The present Welland ship canal is crossed by the Queen Elizabeth way in the township of Grantham at Homer. By reason of the fact that the bridge must be raised and lowered many times during the shipping season, frequent interruptions have caused great delay and confusion in the traffic which travels along the Queen Elizabeth way. I hope that engineers of the Department of Transport and the Ontario department of highways may devise some method which will relieve this confusion and avoid the bottleneck that now exists. It is a matter that requires the co-operation of the two levels of government. An early meeting, I hope, will be held when some of the residents of our area will discuss the matter in a more elaborate way with the Minister of Transport.

This is not a problem which concerns only the residents of my constituency, although they are directly affected. It is of indirect concern to the travelling public of many provinces of Canada, and many of our guests who come from several of the states of the union to the south.

During the past six weeks Canadian ministers of the crown have been engaged in endeavouring to get the United States of America and the United Kingdom to agree to certain provisions for the overhaul of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Great efforts have been made by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who has attended negotiations in London, Washington and Geneva. While the efforts he has made have not met with the success we would like, I am convinced that the situation will clarify itself. Present reports coming from Washington indicate that the President and congress may be more amenable in the future. It was encouraging to hear the minister say that further efforts would be made to see if this agreement could be carried out. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been quoted as saying that "the collapse of GATT would be the worst possible thing that could happen; it would be a catastrophe to the free world." It is our hope that an agreement may still be reached which will be mutually advantageous to ourselves and to all other member nations.

I should not allow this opportunity to pass without saying something about the proposal to amend the rules of this house. We heard the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) say yesterday that this subject would be handed to a special committee for discussion during this session. I am sure that the amendment of our rules would do much to expedite the conduct of business here. The Prime Minister endeavoured to give us some idea of his thinking in the matter when he arranged that the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne would speak on the same day as the address itself was delivered. This would indicate to me a desire on his part that we should make better use of the time at our disposal here.

It is my opinion that the speeches of private members should be limited to 20 minutes. I believe the proposal would be to limit speeches to 30 minutes.

An hon. Member: You have spoken for 25 minutes now.

Mr. Cavers: I believe I have spoken for about 18 minutes. The Prime Minister and members of the cabinet, the leader and certain designated members of the opposition, the leader of the C.C.F. group and the leader of the Social Credit group might be given 40 minutes. It seems to me that the average member in this house could very well clarify his thoughts and present them within a period of 20 minutes. I believe also that a limited time could be allocated for the speech from the throne and the budget debate. This would not deprive any member of the opportunity to speak, but it would improve the quality of debate and shorten the length of the session.

I have addressed groups throughout my constituency on this subject in order to gain some idea of how our constituents feel about the matter. I have talked with others in private conversation. The Canadian people do not wish to lose respect for parliament, but they do feel we should conduct the affairs of the nation in a businesslike and efficient manner and with reasonable dispatch. They ask us to give them an honest and conscientious administration of affairs. We can do this without long, laboured addresses in this chamber. When these amendments are presented, I feel it will be a step in the right direction, and the measure should receive support from all parts of the house.

I have been reminded that I have spoken for some time. I think I have now completed 20 minutes, so I thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. Hees: As it is now ten minutes of six, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreeable to hon. members?

Mr. Harris: I have no particular objection, Mr. Speaker, but we have been wasting a lot of time adjourning before the hour. I think five minutes ought to be agreeable but when it is ten I think we ought to have the advantage of hearing what the hon. member would like to say.

Mr. Rowe: It is Wednesday night.

On motion of Mr. Hees the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow, after orders of the day, we shall take second reading of the bill with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and then revert to this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 13, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RIPPLE ROCK

TABLING OF REPORT ON REMOVAL

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I beg leave to table a report, prepared at the request of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on the removal of Ripple Rock, which is a submerged navigational hazard in Seymour narrows, about 100 miles north of Vancouver. This report has been prepared by the associate committee for navigational facilities on the west coast, established by the national research council to study this project.

This committee was established after two previous attempts to remove the rock by surface methods, using techniques then known, were unsuccessful. This report concludes that the rock can be successfully removed either by surface operations, using present-day techniques, or by tunnelling. It recommends in favour of the latter as being the more positive approach.

I have asked Mr. Victor Dolmage, an eminent consulting geologist, who has had wide experience on the Kitimat project and other undertakings of this general nature, to indicate whether, in his opinion, this report could be translated into an engineering approach to the problem complete with plans and specifications.

Mr. Dolmage has now reported that in his opinion this is entirely practical, and he has been retained to prepare the required plans and specifications. It is anticipated that tenders will be called and that the work will be done under Mr. Dolmage's general supervision, on behalf of the Department of Public Works.

It is estimated that it will require some six months to prepare plans and specifications and that the rock can be removed within a space of two years after the contract is awarded. It is estimated that the total cost involved will be in the vicinity of $2·5 million. Funds will be sought in the supplementary estimates for the next fiscal year in an appropriate amount to cover expenditures incurred in 1955-56.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works arising out of his statement. Can the minister give assurance to the house that the government will take all necessary steps to protect the residents in the vicinity of Ripple Rock against any possible loss or damage to property arising out of the blasting of the rock.

Mr. Winters: I can say that is one of the factors that have been taken into consideration.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (for the Minister of Finance): On behalf of the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the public accounts and the report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31, 1954.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED LEASE OF NEW HOTEL IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Oxford asked me if any protests had been received from the hotel association of Canada in connection with the administration of the proposed Canadian National hotel in Montreal. I told him that I did not think I had received any, but over the week end a letter had been received from Mr. Caswell, executive chairman of that organization, containing a resolution which I think does amount to a protest in that connection and which asks for reconsideration of the matter.

Yesterday or this morning, I am not sure which, a letter was received from the Alberta hotel association, enclosing a copy of a resolution which seems to be in the same terms as the other resolution. I am informed that similar letters were addressed to my colleague the Minister of Transport, and that the resolution has been referred to the authorities of the Canadian National Railways.

SALE OF HOTELS—PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister give the house any information about the sale of Canadian National hotels, with particular reference to the safeguarding of the rights of the employees concerned?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I may say that I received notice of this question just a few minutes ago. I shall endeavour to answer it on the earliest possible occasion.

BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE

SECOND WORLD WAR—PROBABLE DATE OF COMPLETION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Will the Minister of Veterans Affairs say whether the government has yet decided about the placing of the second world war book of remembrance? If so, when will the book be placed in its permanent home?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This matter is under active consideration at the present time. For the information of my hon. friend and members of the house I may say the book of remembrance for world war II, which was expected to be ready at the end of 1955, might not be completed until a later date.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. What is the present position of negotiations that have been going on between the Saskatchewan government and the federal government with regard to the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project? Is it a fact that a tentative agreement has been arrived at as the basis of a distribution of costs as between the federal and provincial governments?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been no tentative agreement arrived at, Mr. Speaker, as the basis of a distribution of costs because there has not yet been any decision by the federal government that it could take the responsibility of recommending this project to parliament as one that would be in the national interests of Canada generally.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask an additional question? Is it not a fact that the federal government has submitted to the government of Saskatchewan some tentative agreement?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I would not say it is a fact that the government of Canada has submitted to the government of Saskatchewan a tentative agreement. I understand officials of the P.F.R.A. have been discussing with officials of the Saskatchewan government what terms might be acceptable to the government of Saskatchewan if a decision were made. And I understand that my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has had some interviews, discussing the draft that has been prepared by the officials with the premier and members of the Saskatchewan government. But that is as far as the negotiations have reached at this time.

I have seen this draft that was prepared, and there were provisions in it which I feel quite sure we would not be prepared to recommend to parliament. That is where the matter stands at the present time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was that the provincial draft, sir?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, I cannot say that it is a provincial draft. I am rather under the impression it is a draft that was prepared by officials of the P.F.R.A., who have always been convinced that it was a project that should be proceeded with.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question. Are we to understand that the Minister of Agriculture in these negotiations has been negotiating on his own?

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, no.

Mr. Coldwell: Because the Saskatchewan government is under the impression that the latest proposal is sent from the government of Canada to the government of Saskatchewan. That is the way it has been put to me.

Mr. St. Laurent: The minister has not been negotiating on his own. But if there is any impression that this is a proposal for the carrying out of the project by the government of Canada, it is a misapprehension; I think they are well aware that there has been no decision made yet to go ahead with the project at this time.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

LOSS LEADERS—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. When does he expect to receive the report of the restrictive trade practices commission following its investigation into the whole practice of loss leader selling?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I should think, Mr. Speaker, within about two months.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is not our purpose to deal at length with this bill because, as was stated when the resolution was discussed, the bill is pretty much in line with that resolution. However, there are one or two things I would like to say.

I would refer first to a technical matter. I notice that in deleting subsection 1 of section 93 no provision has been made for renumbering the other sections. I believe that will have to be accounted for in some way. We now have subsection 2 as the first subsection in section 93, and no mention is made in the bill of renumbering the sections.

Then with regard to the table of rates, as I said the other day members in the official opposition as well as other members in the house have spoken at different times with respect to adjusting the rates of supplementary benefits since the rates of regular benefits were raised. I cannot help wondering just how the department got around the fact that despite subsection 1, which is now to be repealed, and which says that the rates of supplementary benefit shall be 80 per cent, during the period of time since the regular rates of benefit have been raised the rates of supplementary benefit have not been anything like 80 per cent.

As a matter of fact in some cases, notably in the lower rates, they ran about 80 per cent; but the higher the rate of daily contribution ran, the lower proportionately has been the rate of supplementary benefit which was paid. In the top class, for a person with dependents the amount paid was just 70 per cent, despite the fact that the act says the supplementary benefits shall be 80 per cent. I also note that apparently those persons without dependents have fared much better, in ratio, than those who had dependents; because even in the top bracket they managed to get 75·44 per cent whereas persons with dependents received only 70 per cent.

Probably the minister will explain that when he speaks. Now that the act is to be amended I mention this only as a matter of interest, but it has been a fact that people have been deprived of their just rights under this section.

Then with regard to section 94, last year when the season was well advanced we asked on two or three different occasions whether any plans were made, because of the urgency of the situation, to extend the period for the payment of supplementary benefits beyond April 15. The answer we received was that the matter was under consideration and, finally, that no action would be taken.

And so, Mr. Speaker, to support the remarks which were made in the house during the course of the debate on the resolution the other day, and at other times, and in order to bring this matter to a head I should move an amendment to clause 2. Shall I move it now or wait until the section is before the committee? Perhaps I should wait, and when clause 2 is before the committee of the whole I shall offer my amendment.

With those remarks, we are satisfied.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, there is not much one needs to say with regard to this bill more than was said when the resolution was before the committee of the whole house a few days ago. But I wish to emphasize by just how much this measure, useful though it may be, fails to meet the unemployment situation, at least in my part of the country. Before leaving home to come to Ottawa for this session I had more calls in regard to unemployment than at any time, I believe, since the winter of 1938-39.

I appreciate the value of this so far as it goes. The labour organizations have been asking for it for a long time. The bill does two things. It extends the period in which supplementary benefits may be paid, and it raises the amount of the supplementary payments to that of the regular payments under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I was again interested in seeing the benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, which will now be the supplementary benefits as well as the regular ones, and noting the very little difference between the weekly benefits of a person without a dependent in the first category, who has contributed, and a person with a dependent. Under the act an unmarried person without a dependent now receives a weekly benefit, whether regular or supplementary, of $4.20. If he is a married man and has a wife and, say, one child he gets weekly benefits of $4.80, which is 60 cents more than he would receive if he were a single person. Then the amounts go up a little bit but, if we take the next category, it is $6 for the person without a dependent and $7.50 for a person with dependents.

What is required here is the raising of the amount of the benefit in all categories. I believe for some time at least these amounts could be raised without any change in the contribution. Because of the increases in the cost of living since the rates were established, those rates now provided are no longer adequate. The more unemployed we have, and the longer the period during which people are unemployed, the more inadequate the rates will become.

While there is no intention on our part to delay this measure in any way—as a matter of fact we wish to hurry it along as much as possible—we wish to say that as far as we are concerned it is very definitely an instalment, and a very small instalment, of what must be done for the unemployed if we are to enable them to live as citizens of this wealthy country should live.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): It is not my intention to hold up this bill at all. We all had a chance the other day to say what we had to say with respect to the general principle of the bill, and everyone agreed that action should be taken immediately.

When I was speaking the other day, I said in a general way that this was not going to be a cure-all for the problem of unemployment. I recalled vividly the situation that exists in my own constituency and in Drumheller, where the coal mining industry is practically a thing of the past. In fact it got to be so bad that the provincial government had to allot, I think it was, $100,000 in order to move the miners out of that district entirely, because they could see that the coal mining industry, as far as western Canada is concerned, is getting worse rather than better.

Of course part of the blame can be laid on this government because of their policy in regard to the importation of foreign coal. But as I see it, the benefits from unemployment insurance are certainly not going to help in the Drumheller district. That is what I am concerned about. What are we going to do with these people after this legislation is in force and they have exhausted their 60-day minimum payments? That is the question that is bothering the working people of the day.

This is going to be of assistance. It introduces an increase in the amount of supplementary benefits, and it also introduces a new principle, in that we are now going to establish a 60-day minimum period during which supplementary benefits may be received. That is all to the good, but it is not in any way going to solve the problem of unemployment. I know that the minister will say right away that it was never intended to solve the problem of unemployment. But if things are going to continue to get worse, as they have in the past—and we must acknowledge that; I think the minister himself acknowledges that now—in the employment field, then what is going to happen after the supplementary payments have been exhausted?

This is only a palliative, and it is a mighty small one at that. It is going to be gratefully received; it is something the workers are entitled to. Hon. members and the minister should be greatly concerned; and he should bring down amendments, which he has already indicated he intends to do, that will materially assist in meeting the unemployment problem until such time as the workers are re-employed, not until such time as the 60-day period has elapsed. That is the responsibility of this government, and that is something we have to do.

Any further remarks I have to make, Mr. Speaker, I shall make when we come to the sections of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Lionel Bertrand (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, the measure introduced by the government is highly satisfactory to me and I wish to say how much I am gratified by it. In the first place it is not to be denied that extra winter benefits have been and continue to be of very great value to workers faced with seasonal unemployment. The government must be commended for their decision in making these benefits equal to ordinary benefits.

The people of my constituency are kept very busy during the summer months in the building trade and other related fields. But during the winter they have more difficulty in finding employment of a permanent nature. I support this measure without any reservation whatsoever.

I understand, of course, that it is not calculated to strike directly at the unemployment situation in our area, a situation which at times, during 1954, has been a source of very real concern, to say the least. A number of industries in my constituency have had to face competition from foreign products. Goods manufactured abroad where labour is paid at ridiculously low rates have been flooding this country, selling at prices which our own businessmen are unable to match since they have to keep on paying salaries designed to maintain the high standard of living of which we are so proud. That is why the government should be careful in advocating certain types of trade, even though trade may be generally advisable and even necessary to our national economy. They must do everything in their power to protect the interests of our own Canadian firms, such as the Dominion Rubber located in St. Jerome, or the Regent Knitting Mills of the same city, both of which are indispensable to local progress and employment. And if, through our trade policies, some plants or companies happen to be harder hit than others, the government must show them special consideration when it comes to letting contracts; such action will be appreciated by all.

Canada must trade with all the countries in the world and this trade, which is bound to be bilateral, is not without causing some unfavourable or irksome reactions here and there, in various spheres of our national economy. It therefore behooves the government to compensate, in one way or another, the business enterprises which, with a view to ensuring the progress of the community, make more personal sacrifices than others.

Along with the government I believe that Canada is going through a transition period and I hope to witness in 1955 the levelling-off of a situation which at times, in the last few months, has caused great concern to the people. Some of our bank presidents, in their annual speeches, remain optimistic about the future. According to yesterday's papers, the president of the Banque Canadienne Nationale, Mr. Charles St. Pierre, in his address to the directors on the occasion of the 80th annual meeting, made the following statement which is worth quoting:

> The levelling off which was experienced last year was not unexpected. It is easy to realize that Canada cannot advance by leaps and bounds indefinitely without interruption. Periods of readjustment are indispensable to assure a sound economic development. The year 1954 was one of those stabilization periods. When it is looked at in its proper perspective, it will doubtless appear as a milestone in the expansion of our country.
> Canada is a new country, a country in full growth, and, however great are its riches and however brilliant its future, it cannot escape the impact of the world's economic fluctuations. All the less so because, being a great exporting country, its prosperity is linked up with foreign markets. The business trend in the United States, the slowing down of which has had repercussions on our own economy, has again improved during the last months of the year. There is therefore reason to believe that our trade with our chief market will recover the lost ground.
> However, Canada must also reckon with the other countries. Now the development of production in the world as a whole and the resumption of international competition resulting therefrom indicate that the post-war period is at an end. Already there are signs that the return to a more normal order of things is giving rise to problems which demand efforts at readaptation. The necessary readjustments which have already begun will have to be pursued in several fields, and we are justified in hoping that they will be successfully achieved in the near future.
> If a survey of the present situation may incline one to be prudent, none the less a sober optimism is justified at the beginning of this new year.

I have faith in my country, with its boundless resources and its promising future; it is far from having attained the maximum development. And the responsibility of this government, the duty of this parliament is to find the best way to make our Canadian homes safe from unemployment and insecurity.

The government intends to bring down more elaborate amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Personally I would have preferred the supplementary benefits to be paid from December 15 to April 1, instead of from January 1 to April 15. If the supplementary benefits were paid in December those entitled to them would get them during the Christmas season. That, to my mind, would make the act more humane still at a time when, for a lot of people, the end of the year is not so much a halt as a hope of better days.

And I have another suggestion to put before the government. I think the Unemployment Insurance Act could be amended so that the women who get married may recover the amount they have paid into the unemployment insurance fund. Such amount could be paid to them in a lump sum upon proof of marriage; should they seek employment later on, they would have to qualify again in order to be entitled to the benefits.

My county has three unemployment insurance offices. I want to pay a tribute to the personnel of those offices, to the way they receive the public and help them. They perform a task which is often thankless and always ticklish. They serve their country, they are the distributors of the wealth of a community during the all too numerous periods of hardship, and they are also the administrators of a great act which, 15 years after it was put in our statutes, proves how farsighted was the party to which we are indebted for it. The Unemployment Insurance Act has proven indispensable. If ever health insurance is added to unemployment insurance, the two words most dreaded by those who have to toil and moil every day of their life, unemployment and sickness, will make way for security. Security means peace for those who strive.

(Text):

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, as has been said by earlier speakers, this bill does two things; it increases the rate of supplementary benefits and it increases the minimum number of days from 18 to 60. As the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has said, our party has no fault to find in regard to these details. For several years we have been urging the government to do this sort of thing, and we are now glad to see that they have made it a reality. However, the bill specifies that the supplementary benefits can be paid only during the period January 1 to April 15. I contend that these benefits should be paid during other periods as well, and that is what I want to speak about this afternoon.

This bill is designed to alleviate hardship which would otherwise be experienced by people whose unemployment insurance credits have expired during the winter months. The government has learned at long last, after it has been pointed out to it during the past two or three years by the opposition, that people cannot live on 80 per cent of their unemployment insurance benefits. We are very glad to see that they have learned at last that—

Mrs. Fairclough: They cannot live even on 100 per cent.

Mr. Hees: As the hon. member for Hamilton West says, they cannot live on even 100 per cent. I think that is so true. In refusing to pay these supplementary benefits until January 1, the government is assuming that people whose credits have expired before that date can in some miraculous fashion go into hibernation until the first of the year, and that they and their families are not going to require food, clothing and shelter until that time.

If it is necessary, and it most certainly is necessary, to increase these supplementary benefits from 80 per cent to 100 per cent of the regular benefits, then how much more necessary it is to increase the supplementary benefits from zero to 100 per cent during the months, say, of October, November and December! Hunger and hardship just do not understand this government's timetable. You can be just as cold, just as hungry and just as sick during the month of November as you can in the month of February.

If a man or woman is willing and anxious to work, and through no fault of his or her own cannot find work during the months preceding the first of the year, then somebody must assume responsibility for that person and his family. The municipalities have no funds to do it; the provinces have no funds to do it. For some years past it has been the overwhelming opinion of all people who have made studies of this problem that this is a federal responsibility. They have urged the federal government to assume its responsibility in this matter. However, despite this overwhelming body of opinion, this government has continued to duck its responsibility, and I believe that by so doing it is showing a shocking lack of concern for the people for whom it has a primary responsibility.

This matter must be faced up to, and I think the time is long overdue for the government to come to grips with the problem and tell the Canadian people what it is going to do. For two or three years past I have asked the minister to tell the country what his views are on this problem, and the minister on behalf of the government has refused. I am going to ask him again today. I hope he will give us an answer, because the country is waiting for that answer.

I would like to cite a few opinions expressed on this matter by bodies set up by the government. First of all we have the Sirois report, which contains these two major points:

(a) Responsibility for all unemployed employables rests with the federal government;
(b) Responsibility for all other persons requiring public assistance rests with the provincial and municipal governments.

On page 42 of book II of the recommendations, the report states:

Unemployment relief should be a dominion function and provincial responsibility for other welfare services should continue . . .

As I stated on Tuesday, the late Prime Minister Mackenzie King, at the dominion-provincial conference of 1941, expressed his opinion forcibly, and because they are short I will repeat his remarks today because I think they are vitally important. They may be found at page 12 of the report:

The transfer to the federal government of the whole cost of relief for the employable unemployed and their dependents is the logical outcome of the experience of the past. It would prevent a repetition of the confusion, the inefficiency, the waste, the delay and the inequalities that have admittedly prevailed in relief since 1930 . . .

Another important opinion on this problem may be found at page 49 of the Marsh report prepared in 1943 at the request of this government. The report has this to say:

The logical location for the service . . . is the dominion employment service, or some branch of it. The service that the local offices—

That is the offices of the unemployment insurance commission.

—would have to perform would be:
(1) To register those applying for unemployment assistance.
(2) To decide . . . whether a person should receive assistance; in what amounts; and for how long a period; and,
(3) To issue the cheques or vouchers.

At the dominion-provincial conference of 1945, convened by this government, the following proposals were put forward by the government, and are found at pages 42 and 43:

As a part of the general arrangement with the provincial governments, the dominion government now proposes to establish a practicable and comprehensive system of assistance to able-bodied unemployed persons as soon as possible, rather than waiting until the need for it actually arises.

I would emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that these views were expressed nine years ago. The report continues:

Such a plan must fit into and make the maximum use of the structure and machinery of the existing unemployment insurance system. It would not be sensible to set up a different system requiring a different kind of administrative machinery. The plan proposes acceptance of dominion responsibility for unemployed employables, and provincial and local responsibility for unemployables.

Those were the suggestions put forward by the present government, and we are still waiting for their implementation. I would like to cite one more opinion, namely that expressed by the association of Canadian mayors and reeves. This important body meets annually, and on November 26 they submitted a brief to the dominion government in which they set forth the following:

The provision of financial assistance to a growing number of unemployed employable persons can constitute a severe drain on the fiscal resources of an urban community. Moreover, as the experience of the depression of the thirties indicates, an adequate program of unemployment assistance is beyond the capacity of a municipality to provide. In a federal country the responsibility for developing such a program must necessarily be assigned to the federal authority. Indeed, studies of this problem have consistently recommended that the federal government should assume responsibility for an adequate relief program for the employable unemployed.

This body comprises people who come in close contact with the problem of unemployment, and who look after the provision of funds to provide assistance. They are the ones who know most about it, and for years they have been urging the federal government to accept its responsibility, as in 1941 and in 1945 it agreed it would. The association of mayors and reeves is simply saying to this federal government, "Carry out the pledge you gave at two dominion-provincial conferences. You should accept your responsibility, and now is the time to do it".

The association has made its plea on four grounds: First, that the economy of the country is guided to a large extent by the fiscal policies of the federal government, and they in turn have an important bearing on employment as a whole. Second, they have pointed out that the municipalities simply do not have the sources of revenue necessary to meet the financial drain entailed. When this problem arises in a community it must be met. If the funds are not available it cannot be met. Third, the federal government is the only level of government capable of financing such a program. In this connection I would like to remind the house that the unemployment insurance fund amounts to nearly $1 billion and continues to grow each day. The fourth reason they have put forward is that the federal government is the only level of government which has the machinery necessary to administer such a program.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think any logical and fair-minded person would agree that the reasons advanced by the mayors and reeves of this country are cogent and worthy of consideration. Their plea has been put forward on logical grounds, and I believe every hon. member, no matter in what part of the house he sits, would agree that something should be done to assist those who are suffering because of lack of funds with which to buy food and clothing. That can best be done by the government now accepting its responsibility. The acceptance of that responsibility is long overdue, and the government should now get on with the job.

Today at a later stage of the bill I am going to ask the minister once again if he will please tell this house what the attitude of this government is towards this problem. Do they agree with the opinions of the government in 1941 and 1945, or do they disagree? Let us have it one way or the other. Let us get down to cases. Let us know where we stand. Let us stop this shadow boxing, this shilly-shallying. Let us come out in the open and declare our hand. Let us get down to cases and try to solve this extremely important problem.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Before the debate is closed there are one or two remarks I should like to make. As I understand it—and I know the minister will correct me if I am wrong in this regard—when a plant is strike-bound and the strike is settled, some of the employees are not called back for days in some cases and for weeks in others. When these men apply for unemployment insurance, because of the fact that the plant has been strike-bound they find they are not entitled to it and consequently find themselves in rather serious circumstances. In my riding I have had come to me two or three men who have been out of work for weeks because of slowness in calling the men back, and consequently a serious situation has developed.

I wanted to ask the minister if there are in contemplation any changes that would take that situation into consideration. When he is closing the debate I would ask him if he would just comment on that matter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I did not make any statement on the motion for second reading because the bill is so short that anything I might have said in a general way would have been likely to overlap what I said the day before yesterday. However, I should like to comment on some of the things that have been said during the last few minutes.

As to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West, may I say that the renumbering she spoke of will be mopped up in the larger amendment that is to come forward shortly. In the meantime it will not have any effect.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is a matter of tidying up.

Mr. Gregg: On the second point, I will admit at once that the amendment of the 80 per cent, when there was an increase in the main benefits and no increase in the supplementary benefits, was nothing short of an oversight. That is something that will, of course, be corrected.

Mrs. Fairclough: It was a rather serious oversight for the people who are benefiting.

Mr. Gregg: The fact that they did state 80 per cent did not mean that the intention was changed. As I said yesterday, it was the intention that there should not be any increase in the supplementary benefits until we had a chance to see the results of the 1952 amendment.

With regard to her remarks, which were referred to by a number of other members, as to the period over which the supplementary benefits extend, may I say that last year that matter was brought out clearly. I told the house that I was greatly concerned about it, as were other hon. members. We did not do anything about it at the time, but as the result of the serious situation last winter we carried out a careful investigation at the time and afterward. As will be recalled, there were rather severe climatic conditions last spring, and work did not start very early. It will also be remembered that there were a large number in receipt of supplementary benefits in the middle of April when these formally ceased.

The unemployment insurance commission undertook and carried out a special survey of those who were drawing supplementary benefits in the week of April 15. They found that by the end of May more than half had either left the labour market or were working full time or part time, and that the proportions were something like this: working full or part time, 42 per cent of those who had been on supplementary benefits; retired or keeping house—the latter would apply mostly to women—15 per cent; and unemployed, 43 per cent.

That is a large percentage. But they took that 43 per cent, and they found that about 88 per cent of that 43 per cent had not kept alive their registration for work at the commission's local offices, and that only 3 per cent reported that they needed to get some outside assistance from other agencies. I am not at all understating the importance of that 3 per cent, but I am stating that by retaining the cut-off date at April 15 it is enabling us, under these amendments, to make that amount of money that will be spent effective in the cold, hard part of the winter rather than in the days when we always expect it to be warmer.

The hon. member for Kindersley referred to coal in his province.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Gregg: I am not touching on the employment situation today. I shall defer that discussion, because it applies also to the eastern part of the country. With him and with the other members who have said it, I will admit that this bill is not a cure-all for unemployment in any sense of the word. As Minister of Labour I am charged by this house and by parliament with certain responsibilities. I will admit at once that the responsibilities I have the honour to carry out in the Department of Labour are mainly defensive rather than offensive, such as conciliation and trying to keep peace in the industrial family; and, in administering this act, to try to mop up where unemployment breaks out.

There will be an opportunity later to discuss this matter of unemployment. The hon. member for Broadview has made a speech on it, and I suppose he will make one on the speech from the throne, based on the lack of confidence motion of his party. But I say that the bringing about of improvement with respect to this problem of unemployment—something which we all want so much—is not going to be effected by some minister waving a wand and passing one single piece of legislation. It is not going to be done in that way at all. It is going to be done by means of a great many things carried out conscientiously and effectively not only by this government but in relation to other levels of government. While the hon. member for Broadview quoted quite correctly the representations that were made to us by the association of municipalities, nevertheless I am sure he would be the first to admit that this government should not go over the head of the minister of municipal affairs in the province of Ontario—his own province—in order to do things in the municipalities without approval, co-operation and plans that should be worked out jointly between those two levels of government.

With regard to the comments made by my friend the hon. member for Terrebonne, may I say this. He also said that this bill was no cure-all and in turn expressed the wish that, instead of there being extension at the other end of the period, there be extension at this end, namely in the period before Christmas. In reality we do not get a great deal of abnormal seasonal unemployment before the Christmas holidays begin. While in some sections of the country it might be preferable to have more time at the beginning and perhaps less time at the end, on the whole we feel, from our experience up to the moment, that the present period is about right considering our limitations on money.

Mr. Brooks: Is it not a fact that there was considerable unemployment this year in the lumbering industry, for instance, because of wet weather?

Mr. Gregg: That is true, Mr. Chairman; there was. Again I say that was because of wet weather, and you cannot very well provide for that in a cross-country plan.

The hon. member also spoke about women in this connection. I hope that problem might be deferred until we come to the larger bill.

The hon. member for Middlesex East asked me to define more clearly the awarding of benefits in strike-bound plants. If it is not a matter that is of urgency today, rather than give an off the cuff definition of that I should like, because it is so delicate a subject, to give him a thoughtfully worked out memorandum on the question. It is something that is very important in his province now. I should be glad to do that.

The other day I promised the hon. member for Macleod that I would give the pertinent figures concerning the total supplementary benefits paid, and I think this will answer his purpose. From the fiscal year which ended March 31, 1950, to the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954, the total paid in supplementary benefits was $29,763,819.57. So that my hon. friend might have a point of comparison I will give alongside that the grand total of all benefits paid during that same period, from 1941 to 1954. The total, including the supplementary benefits, was $754,159,070.53. For the remaining period from April 1 to November 1, 1954, the total supplementary benefits paid amounted to $4,844,867.62, and the grand total of the regular benefits and supplementary benefits for that same period was $129,547,428.73. I hope that answers the question.

Mr. Knowles: While the minister is giving these figures, I wonder if the sheet he has in front of him would indicate the amount that has been paid into the fund in respect of supplementary benefits since 1950? I have in mind the fact that the rates of contribution were increased slightly at the time supplementary benefits were established.

Mr. Gregg: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Would the hon. member like me to give those figures divided as between employer, employee and the government?

Mr. Knowles: The total.

Mr. Gregg: The way I have them here is for the period 1941 to 1954, employer and employee; if you want to get each one you divide it in two. The grand total up to March 31 last year was $1,241,276,310.43; that is the total of employer-employee. The government contribution for the same period was $248,262,043.87.

Mr. Knowles: I am afraid I did not make myself clear. I was asking not for the grand total paid into the fund but rather for the amount paid in respect of supplementary benefits. The minister will recall that in 1950, when supplementary benefits were established, the rate of contribution was increased slightly to cover the cost of paying supplementary benefits. I should like a figure to set against the $29 million that has been paid out in supplementary benefits in the four years.

Mr. Gregg: In that regard I should like to tell my hon. friend that I have it from 1941 up to November 30, 1953*. I think he is probably only interested in the total. For the period from 1941 to November 30, 1953*, there was paid in under this special one cent increase that was introduced in 1950 when the act was amended, a total of $59,456,034 earmarked especially for supplementary benefits.

*See correction of year on page 144, column 1.

Mr. Knowles: Does that mean that the fund has $30 million left out of that?

Mr. Gregg: I was going to give the benefits paid out of that during the same period, which was $34,608,762, leaving a balance, if you look upon that as a special fund—we keep the records separately, but we do not keep it as a separate fund—of $24,847,272. It would be from that, of course, that what I estimated the other day as the $12 million additional cost arising out of this legislation would come.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow one question in order to complete the picture? What was the cost of administration each year during those four years?

Mr. Gregg: I am sorry I have not that in detail for my hon. friend, but you can take the figures I have quoted and it works out in an interesting fashion in this way. If you take the amount paid by employers, the amount paid by employees and the amount paid into the fund which I have already given and add to it the cost of administration, it works out to roughly 33⅓ per cent each. I believe before the committee rises I could get that figure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister say the cost of administration is approximately one-third?

Mr. Gregg: No; the cost of administration plus the amount which the federal government puts into the fund is approximately one-third.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Can the minister give the figures before we get to third reading?

Mr. Gregg: I shall try to do so. There was one other point of which I made a note.

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister leaves these figures would he clear up one point that is bothering some of us down here? As I understood it, when he answered the hon. member for Macleod he said the total amount paid out in supplementary benefits for the four-year period was some $29 million. Then when I asked him for the amount paid in as a result of the one cent increase he said the figure was $59 million, out of which $34 million was paid. If I have the figures correct as the minister gave them, can he reconcile the figure of $29 million which he gave the hon. member for Macleod and the figure of $34 million which he gave to me? After all, I would not claim to be worth $5 million more than the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Gregg: My second set of figures went only to November 30, 1953*, whereas my figures to the hon. member for Macleod went to March 31, 1954.

Mr. Knowles: That is even worse.

Mr. Gregg: No.

Mr. Rowe: This sounds like funny money.

Mr. Hansell: Figures are very confusing when they are given in this way. I think perhaps we might ask the minister at some future date a very definite question in respect to these figures, or perhaps I could place it on the order paper.

When I spoke the other day I was particularly interested in the actuarial soundness of the fund, and what I really wanted was not merely the information as to how much had been paid into the fund and how much paid out of it. Rather I wanted comparative figures from year to year to discover whether or not, if there should be an extended period of unemployment, the fund would be depleted so that over a long period of years it would not be actuarially sound. The only indication we can get is by comparative figures from year to year.

I am not insisting upon getting the information at the moment. If it will help the minister I shall place a definite question on the order paper setting out what I want.

Mr. Gregg: I thank the hon. member. And if he does not wish to put his question on the order paper, I am sure he will find those figures readily available when we come to the larger amendments. But I can assure him, as a member of the original committee, that the actuarial officials of the unemployment insurance branch have studied this matter in relation to the larger measure which is to come, with the intention of making sure that it is actuarially sound.

While I am getting the other figures sorted out I should like to refer to the question raised first, I believe, by the hon. member for Hamilton West, as to the difference between the amount payable in supplementary benefits to single persons as compared with the amounts payable to workers with dependents, in the low wage categories. Our records indicate that 80 per cent of all the claims are in the class of $21 to $24, and that the rest are mostly unmarried persons. An effort will be made to make sure that it is relatively fair to all concerned, in working out the scale under the new legislation. And I think it will be understood that in the lowest scale of wages there are not very many workers with dependents.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, in answering me, the minister gave, I think, one of the most fantastic explanations I have heard, even for this government, when he tried to explain why this government is ducking its responsibility with respect to looking after the unemployed employables in Ontario. He said that the government had some reticence about stepping on the toes of the Ontario minister of municipal affairs.

I want to assure him that there is nothing to be feared in that regard. The Frost government is very, very anxious for this government to assume its full responsibilities, as it said it would do in 1941 and 1945. So I would suggest to the minister that he climb out from behind that shield, because it is full of holes. I would advise him just to forget that explanation completely.

Now I would like to ask the minister if he would tell me plainly and simply what is the attitude of the government toward people whose unemployment insurance credits expired months prior to January 1. What is the government's attitude towards those people? Can the minister give me the government's answer?

Mr. Gregg: As Minister of Labour my attitude toward them is to see to it that any of the facilities and the assistance we can provide is made available to them, and to see that the assistance given by this parliament is carried out, by way of finding jobs and making available to them any insurance to which they are entitled.

Mr. Hees: If your department, your unemployment insurance officers, cannot find that man or woman work, and he or she is anxious and willing to take work, and their unemployment insurance credits have expired, then what is this government going to do with regard to those people? Is it going to abandon them for those months until the 1st of January, or what is it going to do? That is a very simple question, and I would ask the minister on behalf of the government to give a simple answer.

Mr. Gregg: I cannot accept the word "abandon" as it is used by my hon. friend. It is the wrong word entirely. We shall continue to do anything for which the federal government has authority.

Mr. Hees: Well, the federal government can extend the period, just as it is making a change now in the Unemployment Insurance Act. The federal government can extend this measure to include other months as well. I say you can become just as cold, just as hungry and just as sick in October, November and December as you can in January, February, March and the first two weeks in April. It is within the government's power to do something. Is the government willing to do it, or is it willing to abandon these people and expect them to go into some kind of hibernation where they can do without the necessary things of life? If not, what does the government expect them to do?

There is no use in the minister saying the government is doing everything it can. I say that everything you can do is not being done. You are trying to find them jobs, but you cannot find them jobs. A man finds himself without credits and without a job. He has a family and he has to eat, and so does his family. What are you going to do for him? I want to know that.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Hees: No. Then I assume, if the minister persists in remaining in his seat and not answering, that this government—

An hon. Member: He answered.

Mr. Hees: He did not answer the last question. The Minister of Labour, by sitting and not answering, is giving tacit approval to the government being quite willing to see people go without the necessities of life during the months prior to January 1, because it is unwilling to take any steps to provide for them, as it agreed to do in 1941 and 1945.

The minister still sits there and says nothing. Therefore he is agreeing with what I am saying when I charge the government with being callous and cold, and with being far more interested in balance sheets than it is in human beings. All this talk about its great interest in human welfare is a lot of nonsense. There is no human welfare when there is not enough clothing and shelter, when you are out of work and have not enough to live on. This government is quite willing to allow people to continue in that state until some mysterious date—January 1—when, in its great wisdom, it says to all the unemployed to come out of hibernation. "Now you can come out; now you can warm up and start living again." Let us not have so much talk on platforms—

An hon. Member: May I ask a question?

Mr. Hees: No question at all. You can make your speech after. Is this the same Liberal government which does things for the people and cares for the people? I say that, by the minister sitting there and being afraid to stand up and say on behalf of the government what it is going to do, it proves that it is not interested in human beings.

Mr. Gregg: I do hope that when my hon. friend gets back from his third trip across Canada he will bring to this house a greater tolerance and a greater recognition of the fact that his fellow members also are concerned about the welfare of their fellow Canadians. He knows as well as I do that the question he has posed on this bill is an impossible one to answer at this time. I deny outright his statement that the minister, or this government, are not concerned about the welfare of their fellow Canadians. Furthermore, rather than have him stand in his place and direct generalities at this government or at the Minister of Labour, I would be much more impressed if he were prepared to place before me instances in his own city of men and women, unemployed employables, who are seeking unemployment relief this day, January 13, 1955.

He has made these statements here. I have been in my office ever since this house opened and not on one occasion, either by letter or personally, has he indicated to me that this problem in his province is greater than his province is able to meet.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should indicate at this time that we are discussing clause 1 of a bill respecting supplementary benefits. I assure the hon. member for Broadview that I could not allow him to answer the questions which were posed by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. McIvor: I rise because I think the statement was out of order when the hon. member said the Minister of Labour was afraid to stand up, a man who has received the Victoria Cross. That statement should be taken back.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I can now make myself an honest man with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is nice to be able to blame mistakes on typographical errors, and in this case it is so on the sheet I have in my hand. When I said so carefully, "the 30th day of November, 1953", it should have been the 30th day of November, 1954. That makes it right.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: Perhaps the discussion which has just taken place has carried us a little off the track. Since the hon. member for Broadview was permitted to continue with his remarks, I think he merited an answer from the minister. With that remark I am going to be satisfied. If the remarks were out of order, the Chair should have called him to order in the first place. We are all interested in that particular phase, and we can discuss it at great length when the other bill comes down to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

With regard to the amount of benefits paid, it would look very much as though my guess of Tuesday of this week at the resolution stage was pretty close, because I was merely taking the number of people who were insured and multiplying it by the contributions which I knew they must have made. I came to a surplus of $7,100,000, on the average, per year for the last four years. The minister's average is a little better than $6 million per year for the four years.

I am also interested in the statement that 80 per cent of the benefits paid were in the $21 to $24 a week class because this, in my opinion, leaves the government in a very peculiar position indeed in regard to the payment of those supplementary benefits. As I mentioned before, the act under which they are operating very clearly sets out 80 per cent, and the $21 to $24 a week class consists of the very persons who were not getting 80 per cent of the benefits at all but were getting 70 per cent.

With regard to the minister's other statement, I shall make some further remarks on clause 2. I wonder just where the department stands with regard to the poor administration of its own act over the last three or four years.

Mr. Hansell: Before this clause passes I should like to make a little correction, not of a typographical error in Hansard in the debate the other day but rather of an error I made. I said I was on the committee that originally brought in the bill. I said the bill was brought in before the war. I was trusting to my memory. I was speaking extemporaneously. The bill was brought in in 1940. The correction can be made now.

I should like to comment on one or two of the minister's remarks this afternoon. He indicated that in reality his responsibility was not to provide work for the people of Canada, and I agree with him. I do not think the minister's responsibility is to provide work at all. I do not believe it is actually even the government's responsibility to provide work, but it is the government's responsibility to so formulate policies as to keep industry producing at full capacity, no matter whether it is secondary industry or primary industry. If they are failing there, then they are failing in their over-all policy.

The minister recognizes that, because in another remark he made he said that in considering this whole matter there are a lot of things that must be conscientiously studied and made effective, or words to that effect. Yes, there are a lot of things; but I do want to say to the minister this one thing. While there may be a lot of things, nothing else will operate unless one thing is studied and made to operate effectively; and that is financial policy.

The Minister of Finance is sitting in his seat with his head on one hand as though he is deeply in thought.

Mr. Harris: Listening to the hon. member.

Mr. Hansell: Without a proper financial policy of course everything else will fail. That financial policy should be one to keep industry working at full capacity; and when industry has produced goods for the welfare of the people of Canada, then it is the responsibility of government to see that that production is distributed to the people so they may receive the benefit of the work of their own hands.

So far as the government's responsibility to provide work is concerned, we have to do a lot of re-thinking on that. I believe the government is just as interested in this country as we are. I do not agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Broadview a little while ago. Of course we have to excuse him. He has been out on the hustings, and he has got into the habit of talking that way. This is the House of Commons and he has to get over that habit when he is here. Of course we are all interested in human welfare; but we have to do a lot of re-thinking along this line.

The other day the Minister of Transport was asked a question by an hon. member with respect to whether or not the Canadian National Railways was doing anything to keep a certain number of men employed. I have forgotten the exact terms of the question, but the minister rose in his place and said the government was doing everything possible to keep those men employed.

That is where we have to do a little revision of our thinking. We must not assume that we have a railroad for the purpose of employing people. If that is the purpose of the railroad, then let us build a dozen more railroads or let the railroad run a dozen more trains. Whether or not there are passengers does not make any difference so long as it provides work. Railroads are operating to transport people and materials across the country. In the final analysis it is not necessarily a problem of providing work, it is a problem of getting the benefits of industry to the people after they have produced and done their job.

I read a statement the other day by a top ranking atomic energy scientist in the United States, who stated that if President Eisenhower gave the green light to a peacetime atomic energy program it would revolutionize everything overnight, and within five years we would perhaps have more unemployment than we have ever had as well as the greatest production we have ever had. The desert would blossom like the rose and there would be food aplenty for every living soul on the globe. We have to adjust our thinking and adjust our policy to a different age.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Duration of supplementary benefit.

Mrs. Fairclough: Under clause 2 we have for consideration the period during which the supplementary benefit would be paid. I am sure there are many hon. members of this house other than those on this side who would agree with the hon. member for Broadview, even though they are not outspoken in their agreement, that there are periods of the year other than the period January 1 to April 15 when people suffer because of the expiration of their benefit period. As far as the present season is concerned the period up to December 31 has passed, and we are now in a period during which the supplementary benefit would be paid. We hope that the bill dealing with a further revision of the act which the minister has said he will bring down will be before us before this session is much older, and for that reason I do not propose to word an amendment at this stage to include the period mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview. At the present time I think it would be quite sufficient to deal with the remainder of the current season; therefore I should like to make a few remarks in support of the amendment which I shall offer to extend that period.

Then a word with respect to the minister's figures of those who have benefited in the past. He said that as of April 15 last year it had been found that 42 per cent of those who had benefited by the supplementary benefits had secured work, either full or part time, and that some 15 per cent had retired. He admitted that 43 per cent of them were still unemployed and that 88 per cent of those 43 per cent had not kept their applications alive. I submit that the reason for that was that they lost heart.

Even if all that was left was 12 per cent I am sure that 12 per cent would be composed almost entirely of married men with families who needed every last cent that they could lay their hands on to keep their families alive. It does not matter to me what the volume is of those who would benefit under any extension; the fact that any portion of those insured and eligible for benefits should suffer hardship is quite sufficient. I feel that we cannot wait until spring is upon us to find out whether or not there is any need. Now that we are considering an amendment to this particular section I believe the matter should be settled at this time at least for this season.

When April 15 comes along each year there is usually an entirely different outlook on the part of the department and even in the press as to the employment situation. Hon. members of this committee who have followed employment statistics year after year will recall that in late April, during May and even into June we begin to get reports that the employment situation is much better because there are fewer applications for benefits. Of course there are fewer applications for benefits after April 15, because those who have been receiving supplementary benefits find that there is no use applying for benefits. They are not going up to the employment offices more than once after April 15; when they have been told they are no longer eligible they just do not go any more.

The fact that they no longer apply is taken as an indication of increasing employment when very often it is nothing of the sort. Their benefits have run out; their supplementary benefits have run out, and because they are no longer eligible for benefits of any sort the news which goes out from the various offices across the country is interpreted by the Department of Labour as an indication of increasing employment. For all of these reasons I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne):

That clause 2 be amended by deleting the word "April" in line seven and substituting therefor the word "May".

The Chairman: After having read the hon. member's amendment, may I indicate some doubt as to whether it is in order, for reasons which I shall be glad to explain. However, if any hon. member has any observations to make on the question of whether or not this amendment is in order I shall be glad to hear him.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I fail to understand what your reason is for considering this amendment to be out of order.

The Chairman: Hon. members will recall that the resolution which preceded this bill reads as follows:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to raise the rates of supplementary benefit to the present rates of regular benefit and to provide a minimum of sixty days' supplementary benefit to those who qualify.

The bill is apparently a money bill based on that resolution. I would draw the attention of hon. members to May, fifteenth edition, page 678, where the following quotation will be found:

The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand or recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications, expressed in the communication by which the crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

I think this principle is well known to all hon. members, but perhaps I may also cite Beauchesne's third edition. Citation 486 reads as follows:

Reductions can be made in committee on the bill, but no grant can be increased except upon recommendation of the crown.

It seems to me that an amendment which substitutes the word "May" for the word "April" would increase benefits under the bill; would increase the financial obligations of the crown; and therefore would be out of order.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not profess to be an expert on parliamentary procedure, but it seems to me that these are scarcely government funds. Contributions to these funds are made by workers and employers.

Mr. Harris: And the government.

Mr. Gregg: I might point out that 20 per cent is provided by the government. However, I rose because of two questions I left unanswered.

Mr. Fleming: Dispose of the point.

An hon. Member: He has.

Mr. Gregg: In reply to the hon. member for Prince Albert I would state that the cost of administration for the unemployment insurance commission up to the year ending March 31, 1954, amounted to $26,096,722. I will carry out my promise to give the hon. member for Middlesex East a reply in full later, but in brief I would state that upon a general resumption of work any man not immediately called back will be paid benefits from the date of the reopening of the plant.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, now that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West has been ruled out of order, I think we will probably have to approach the matter in another way if we wish to get something done.

I sometimes wonder if hon. members are as confused about the rules of order as they appear. I came into the house with the intention of making a speech almost identical to that made by the hon. member for Broadview, but I was afraid I would be stopped by Mr. Speaker; and having due regard for the propriety of parliamentary procedure I refrained from making that kind of speech. I think probably the house and the country missed a very good speech.

Since it is not competent for a private member to introduce an amendment that would involve the expenditure of money, that must not be taken to mean that it is against the rules of the house to urge the minister to introduce such an amendment, and quite frankly I see no reason why the minister cannot get one of his colleagues to move that the word "May" be inserted in this paragraph instead of "April".

There is no magic in the date of April 15 as far as the provision of work is concerned. The person who is unemployed on April 15 will very likely find himself still unemployed on April 16, and he has to eat on both days. Unless the government has some alternative means of providing persons referred to as employable unemployed with an income of at least as much as is provided under the Unemployment Insurance Act, it seems to me that this date should be extended.

All parts of the country are not in the same position with regard to the resumption of work disrupted by winter weather. Spring comes much later in some parts of the country than in others. By April 15, particularly in the southern part of my own province, there is a general resumption of work. But I was born in the maritimes, and work there may not commence until very much later. The advance in the season does not even permit the general resumption of agricultural work until later. Therefore persons in the maritime provinces, and this would apply also to a great part of Quebec, will be no better off as far as work is concerned on April 16 than they were on April 15.

I would suggest that the minister give consideration to this matter immediately, and introduce an amendment from April to May. I think it should be changed in any case so that every person who requires and has been receiving supplementary insurance can continue to do so for a minimum of 60 days. If such a person cannot find work, if there is no work for him, and if the government has no other method of providing for him, then his supplementary benefits should be extended until he has found work or for the 60-day period.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I was not going to suggest any amendment to this legislation, but since an amendment has been proposed I find myself in full agreement with it. During my remarks a short time ago I pointed out that as soon as supplementary benefits expire the unemployed will find themselves in a very awkward position. The suggested amendment would go a long way toward relieving that situation by providing them with assistance over a longer period; and our group, I am certain, would support such a measure.

Mr. Gregg: In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway I would say that searching consideration has already been given to his proposal. I would add that if we accepted his suggestion it would mean taking the funds from some other source. That is the long and short of it.

I am going to say this. It does not help the situation very much but it overcomes my hon. friend's question about what he is going to do on the 16th, the 17th and the 18th. In actual practice, of course, it turns out—and that is due to the unavoidable time lag, no matter how effective our local offices may be, in getting the payments out—that the worker whose supplementary benefits expire on April 15 is in receipt of payments fairly well to the end of that month. Of course that means that he has not had them at the beginning.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): According to what the minister has said, there is great concern about keeping the fund sound. That is probably a good idea, but I am more concerned about keeping families sound. Yet you cannot keep families sound when there is no income coming in. This fund has shown that it can carry the burden which has been placed upon it. I sincerely hope that the minister and the government will give some consideration in the near future—much more consideration than they have given in the past—to keeping families sound. The fund can be kept sound with some help from the Minister of Finance.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to add a last word—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think that is my prerogative.

Mr. Knowles: What about that equal rights idea?

Mrs. Fairclough: By the minister's own calculation, according to the figures which are available to him there remain on April 15 only about 12 per cent of the supplementary beneficiaries. It would therefore seem to me that his point about the soundness of the fund is a little bit exaggerated. Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, now that the amendment itself has been ruled out of order I ask the minister once more if he will not give consideration to making this amendment himself.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I should have permitted the hon. member for Hamilton West to have the last word. However, she will no doubt take advantage of the situation later if I speak out of turn now. I was interested in what the minister said in answer to a previous question, namely that already careful study had been given to this proposal that the time be extended to May.

The suggestion was made that in view of the fact that private members cannot alter a money bill, the minister might in his turn make the alteration. The minister's reply was one I have heard quite frequently in the House of Commons, yet it is not expanded at all. The ministers frequently say that a matter has been given the most careful consideration, and then we are left at that point. Nothing is said to us as to what points were considered, what arguments were advanced and why they were rejected.

From the minister's remarks I take it that some of those with whom he consulted suggested an extension from April to May. If so, the idea has been in the minds of others. Why was it rejected? Surely not just because of the solvency of the fund. It has just now been pointed out, using the minister's own words, that not many people are affected in that particular period. Will the minister elaborate a little and tell us some of the suggestions that were made or that he himself proposed, and the arguments that were used by others with whom he consulted as to why this bill should not be altered in accordance with the amendment proposed by my colleague?

Mr. Gregg: I should be glad to do so, Mr. Chairman. I hardly think that my hon. friend would want me to go into great detail on this point.

Mr. Churchill: Quite a bit.

Mr. Gregg: I shall be happy to do so when we come to discuss the matter in committee on the larger bill that is coming forward. But I can tell my hon. friend now that a year ago, in March and April, I was just as strong a proponent as he was of the extension of the supplementary period. I would not have gone for the whole four weeks, but I would have gone for two weeks. But after the matter had been carefully considered, resulting in much more detail than I gave a little while ago, I was convinced that the benefits that can be made available by the same amount of money spent in other ways were more valuable than having them tacked on at the end of the supplementary period. Later on I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the reasoning behind that opinion.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to add just a brief word. I think anyone will admit that the Minister of Labour has taken an outstanding interest in the unemployed people in this country. Otherwise he would not have broken in on the debate on the speech from the throne in order to put through this legislation. He might have been criticized for being in a hurry. My reason for rising was that I was hurt. I am not going to allow anybody to stand up in the House of Commons and say that the Minister of Labour is afraid to stand up and have his say. He is not afraid to do so.

Mr. MacInnis: To put the hon. member for Fort William at ease, let me say at once that I am not going to make any attacks on the Minister of Labour. But whether or not he is doing the best that can be done for the unemployed under the circumstances is something that cannot be settled just by the opinion of the hon. member for Fort William. It would be necessary to get the opinion of the unemployed on that matter, because they are the people who are hungry and cold.

It seems to me that when it comes to dealing with the unemployed—and I have felt this way for many years; I am not making an accusation against the Minister of Labour—we deal with the matter in a very uncivilized way. If there were as many people unemployed in April as there are in January or February, we would extend unemployment insurance in order to take care of them. The way we have looked after the unemployed in this country for years has always depended on how many were unemployed. If there were 10,000, 15,000, 20,000 or some number like that unemployed and hungry, they could starve. No one would take notice of them. But if we had 500,000 unemployed something would then be done about it, because it would be dangerous to have that many unemployed and going hungry. For our own safety we would do something for them. That is an unChristian and uncivilized way of dealing with a problem of this kind.

I suggest that we cannot think of the unemployed merely as a statistic, as I have heard them considered here in the House of Commons where it has been said, "Oh, yes; there are so many unemployed, but think of the number who are employed". The number who are employed are of no benefit to those who are unemployed unless they are getting something because others are employed.

Let us think of this question as it affects the individual and the family. When men are unemployed it does not mean that just those men alone are affected. It also means that wives and children are affected. Let us not be quite so smug about the matter and say that it is important to keep the fund sound. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, it is much easier to make sound a fund that has become unsound than it is to make a family sound after it has become unsound through trials and tribulations beyond its ability to bear.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Gregg moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We do not object to the bill being read the third time today, Mr. Speaker, so that the benefits contained therein can be on the statute books just as soon as possible. However, I think the government should realize from the debate that has taken place today that, although we approve of the bill as far as it goes, we are not satisfied with the extent to which it goes. We appeal to the minister to consider, when he prepares the larger bill he is going to introduce, the points in relation to supplementary benefits that have been raised, particularly the points that have been stressed by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) and others.

We want him to realize that, so far as we are concerned, the passing of this bill does not mean we are finally satisfied with the supplementary benefit aspect of it, let alone the other shortcomings of the government in so far as the unemployment situation is concerned. We urge him to introduce that other bill at the earliest possible date. I can tell him, as I can tell the leader of the house, that the names of the members of our group who will serve on the committee on industrial relations have already been handed to the chief government whip. We are prepared to go to work on the larger bill at the earliest possible date.

We are serving notice on him, too, that we feel that even that larger bill, along with this one, must not be regarded by the government as a sufficient answer in this session to the serious problem of unemployment. We are prepared to let this bill have third reading today, but we want further and more effective action at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I, too, wish to say just a word before the third reading of the bill. I am surprised and disappointed that the appeals that have been heard this afternoon for an extension of time to May 15 in clause 2 of the bill have not been considered any more carefully than they have been. I believe, Mr. Speaker, there is great merit in them, but that is not what I wanted to say at the moment.

I hope the government will not look upon the passing of this bill, if third reading is given today, as any complete treatment of the unemployment problem at this time. The government has to get down to something more fundamental than mere changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. They have to introduce a policy designed to quickly alleviate the situation for all unemployed, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) has so well said. We have to put this thing on an individual basis. If there is one person unemployed in the country it is a serious thing for his family. That is the outlook we have to have as legislators.

I say again that I hope the government will not consider this is the end of their responsibility towards the unemployed at this time. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I seem to remember that when I first came here—I am sure those who came earlier than I can recall—even though a bill was considered to be in the nature of an emergency measure, very rarely have we been asked to put through third reading on the same day as the committee stage.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps at this moment I might comment on this because the hon. member seems to think that the course I am following is unusual. If he looks at standing order No. 77, he will see that when a bill has passed through committee of the whole and has been reported without amendment, standing order 77 says:

> But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

I know that sometimes by mistake I have said, in similar circumstances, "By leave, shall this bill be read a third time?" I was reminded by hon. members of this house, some of whom are well aware of the rules, that I did not need leave, and that is the position. Should the house prefer to have it read at another time, it can always be read at another time. Since there was no expression to the contrary, it is put now.

Mr. Knowles: Do not forget standing order No. 73.

Mr. Speaker: Its provisions were waived.

Mr. Harris: I think it would be the desire of the house to give it third reading, although we recognize the objections in connection with certain matters. There is an urgency in the matter and if it could pass through both houses of parliament quickly I think all members would like to have that done.

Mr. Low: I did not have a chance to finish what I started to say with regard to third reading. I was not objecting to having third reading today. I merely wanted the house to be aware of the fact that we are, as a practice, resorting more and more to third readings on the same day as the other stages of the bill. I felt that under the circumstances we should draw attention to the fact, so we would not get into the habit of doing that on all occasions.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I should like to express my very sincere thanks to all members of the house for giving this bill the priority it has received. I can assure hon. members that all points that have been made in this excellent discussion today and on Tuesday will be given careful study. If it is possible for the other place to deal with this bill immediately and for royal assent to be received before tomorrow night, it will be possible for all of the unemployment insurance offices across Canada to begin payments under the amendment as from last Monday.

The new and larger bill will be brought in at an early date. I hope to have it on the order paper at the latest by February, and we will welcome the utmost study of that bill at all stages. I want to thank all hon. members for their co-operation at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): It is an agreeable duty, Mr. Speaker, to undertake some review of the speech from the throne and make certain comments on the problems laid squarely before the house by the amendments which have been introduced.

Realism is a desirable quality in a speech from the throne. If one is to judge by what this speech from the throne has to say about the nature of unemployment in Canada, it is a document hopelessly lacking in realism. We read this sentence in it:

> Some unemployment of a regional and seasonal nature is being experienced.

What a monstrous understatement, Mr. Speaker! It is no wonder that what the speech from the throne proposes in the way of legislative and other remedies is very fragmentary and of the nature that it is, based upon an approach so hopelessly lacking in realism to a national problem. I should like to hear some hon. members opposite comment freely and candidly on that statement as applied to the unemployment situation in Canada. I should like to hear the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), for example, make his comments upon it. I should like to hear some other hon. members in the house who sit opposite, who apparently are closer to the unemployment conditions than are those who wrote this speech from the throne. I should like to hear their comments upon a description of that kind.

There have been some remarks from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) concerning the business of the house and the way it is to be transacted at this session. I am glad to see an indication that more of the government business is appearing on the order paper at this stage of the session, so much earlier than has been the practice in the past.

For my part, and I speak as an individual, I am glad to know from the Prime Minister's remarks that he has acceded to the suggestion I have made for some time that we should experiment with the appointment of a committee on estimates. I wish the Prime Minister would indicate what are the five or six departments whose estimates he proposes to have referred to that committee. It would be of assistance to us in this part of the house, and I think of interest to all members in the house, to know what those departments are to be. I would ask, for instance, whether the Department of National Defence is to be one of those departments. Is the Department of Defence Production one of the departments the estimates of which are to be referred to that committee on estimates?

I hope that at an early date steps will be taken to set up the special committee to review the activities and finances and the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. At the last session of parliament when this question was raised the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) indicated that the government would be favourable to the appointment of such a committee at this present session; and I hope steps will be taken to have that committee appointed and launched on its labours at an early date.

Something has been said about the length of the amendment introduced on behalf of the official opposition by the acting leader. We have no apology to make for the length of that amendment or for the number of problems we have found it our duty to lay before the house in the terms of the amendment.

What is the great variety of subjects raised there? There is the fact that our trade has fallen, that the government has failed so badly in the marketing of our wheat surplus, that unemployment has grown to the point where it is a serious and urgent problem, that taxes are very high, that high costs are pricing many Canadian products out of the market, that waste and extravagance do exist in the government service and that the government has shown no willingness to grapple with them, that there is much need of greater processing of the natural resources of this country within Canada in order to provide more employment for Canadian workmen, and then there is the paragraph dealing with the provision of health and hospital services in Canada for those who need them.

Mr. Speaker, if the government had not neglected and ignored so many urgent Canadian problems it would not be necessary for us of the official opposition to introduce so lengthy an amendment in condemnation of the government for its failure to take resolute measures to cope with these problems. We have not catalogued all the government's failures in the amendment, but we have catalogued some of them. But these do offer basic considerations, and they are our conception of what is needed immediately by way of a government program. And to that extent they are an expression of our want of confidence in this government.

Sir, the first of the subjects dealt with in our amendment relates to trade. As we point out in the amendment, there has been a serious failure in that respect on the part of the government, and we express our regret that His Excellency's advisers——have failed to take or to recommend the necessary measures:

(a) to retain and expand Canada's markets abroad for our production, particularly of wheat and other products.

Canada's international transactions on current account resulted in the year 1953 in a deficit of $439 million, as compared with a surplus on current transactions in 1952 amounting to $164 million. The figures are not yet complete for 1954, but the deficit on current transactions for the first ten months of the calendar year 1954 was $330 million. This therefore is a serious problem, and must engage the attention of all hon. members.

In the first place, sir, there has been a serious decline in our commodity trade. Taking the first ten months of 1954—because the figures are complete only to October 31, 1954—our imports as compared with the same ten months in 1953 showed a reduction of 8 per cent. Our imports from the United States were down by 11 per cent, and from the United Kingdom 9 per cent.

Now let us look at the export figures. For those same ten months, as compared with the corresponding ten months of 1953, our total Canadian exports showed a reduction of 8·2 per cent. Our exports to the United States were down 5·5 per cent, our exports to the United Kingdom were down 10 per cent and those to other countries of the commonwealth were down 20 per cent.

The main factor in the over-all decline in our exports has been the decrease in our exports of wheat, wheat flour and other grains. The decline in our trade is serious. The decline in these ten months followed a similar decline which has been going on now for some two years, and it is serious enough both in dollar figures and in volume figures to demand the attention of the government.

There is another serious factor in our trading position—and we do not raise it now for the first time. It is the extent to which our trading eggs have been disproportionately and dangerously placed in one basket. In these ten months of which we are speaking, namely the first ten months of 1954, our exports to the United States were 60·4 per cent of our total exports. And if you will look at the corresponding figures for the first ten months of 1953 you will find a similar situation. Indeed, looking at our total trade with the United States, both export and import, we will see that the proportion or percentage has remained constant. In the first ten months of 1953 and the first ten months of 1954, alike 67 per cent of our total trade, both import and export, was done with the United States.

Again we draw the attention of the government to this dangerous situation—not that we want to curtail exports to the United States, but we want to see much more energetic and aggressive measures used to expand our exports elsewhere. And, above all, we want the government to come to grips with the essence of the Canadian trade problem, which has been featured by a decline in Canadian trade with the United Kingdom.

Sir, this must be said about our trade with the United States, that our exports to that country are largely of Canadian raw materials, materials drawn from our soil, and which in very substantial measure are sent abroad to be processed in the United States. We in Canada should be seeking more effective methods of processing more of our raw materials at home. One of the best examples of what has been accomplished in that regard is to be found in the pulp and paper industry. Had it not been for the firm action of some provincial governments, notably that of Ontario, led by the Hon. George Drew, and others—and the province of Quebec is also a very good example—we would still be exporting our forest products in their original form. Cutting regulations of the provincial governments have assisted greatly in the development of this industry here at home, and it has provided needed employment for Canadians.

But, sir, lest any think that this pattern or picture of decline in Canadian trade is part of a world-wide pattern, let us take a corrective look at the figures. The figures I now give the house are figures of world trade drawn from international monetary fund publications. They are figures of total world trade, that is to say of the non-communist world. These figures have all been placed on a common basis and are expressed in United States dollars. Necessary adjustments are made in these statistics for purposes of reaching a common basis; and Canadian trade figures, like those of other countries, have been converted for that purpose. When I speak about quarterly statistics, it will be understood that these figures are designed to express the annual rate as the inference may be drawn from the quarterly figures.

What has been the trend in world trade in the last two years? Sir, these figures show unmistakably that the world trade trend has been upward in this period while Canadian trade has been going downward. In 1953 the total annual volume of world trade, both export and import, expressed in figures for the first quarter, amounted to $146 billion. The figure for the corresponding first quarter of 1954 was $148 billion, indicating an increase of $2 billion. In the second quarter of 1954 the increase was from the annual rate of $153 billion of world trade in the second quarter of 1953 to $158·7 billion. Unmistakably, Mr. Speaker, the volume and the dollar value of world trade have both been rising. Against that, Canada's figures show a decline.

Canada's percentage of the total of world trade is likewise declining. In 1953, Canada's percentage of the total world trade, both export and import, was 6·2 per cent. In the first half of 1954, which takes us to the last date for which figures are available, it has dropped to something like 5·5 per cent. It is a significant decrease, one that should command attention and concern.

But, sir, let us look further at the figures of British trade, and our trade with the United Kingdom. In his speech on Monday, even in its most soothing tones, there was a gloomy, an unmistakably gloomy, note in the Prime Minister's remarks when he came to the subject of our trade with the United Kingdom. It was indeed the gloomiest and most futile part of his entire speech. While Canada's trade has been going back, the trade of the United Kingdom has been increasing. British exports in 1953—these are again expressed in terms of United States dollars—aggregated $7,525,000,000 United States dollars. The figures are not complete for 1954 but they indicate—those figures that were available up to the end of the third quarter of 1954—that British export trade will probably rise to $8 billion United States dollars, an increase over 1953 of about 7 per cent in value.

We are perhaps more concerned with British imports, especially our proportion of Britain's imports from abroad. In 1953, Britain's imports totalled $9,366,000,000 United States dollars. The figures are complete only to the end of the third quarter of 1954, but they indicate that we may expect they will aggregate about $9,500,000,000. There is an increase of something like 2 per cent in British imports in 1954 over 1953. But what about Canada's proportion of this increased British trade, this trade that we so badly need, this British market that has been our traditional market, our best market, our most stable and most dependable market, particularly for the large agricultural surpluses of this country? What do the figures show about our proportion of the British trade? Here is the proportion of British exports to Canada: In 1938, 4·4 per cent; in 1953, 6 per cent; in 1954, for the first eleven months, our proportion has dropped to 4·9 per cent. A very significant drop from the 6 per cent of 1953! But let us look then at the British imports from Canada. In 1938 British imports from Canada amounted to 8·6 per cent of British total imports. In 1953 they amounted to 9·1 per cent. In 1954, for the first eleven months, that had dropped to 7·8 per cent, a very serious decrease, Mr. Speaker.

I mentioned earlier that much of the drop in our trade, particularly export trade, has been traceable to the substantial reduction in our export of wheat, wheat flour and grain. Why has this special significance? The reasons are twofold, sir. In the first place, wheat is a government monopoly as to its marketing and export; but there is another reason. Wheat plays an almost unique part in the health and strength of the Canadian economy. What has been this country's record in the export of wheat? Well, for the crop year that ended on July 31, 1953, we exported a total of 385·5 million bushels. For the crop year ended July 31, 1954, that figure had dropped to 255·1 million bushels, a drop, sir, of 35 per cent. For the crop year ended July 31, 1953, our exports of wheat and wheat flour to the United Kingdom aggregated 122·9 million bushels. In the crop year ended July 31, 1954, that export total had dropped to 82 million bushels, a drop of one-third, sir, as compared with the previous year. Is it any wonder, sir, that we draw the attention of the house, with a very urgent degree of concern, to this lamentable drop in Canadian wheat exports?

If you look further, sir, at the drop in the income of the farmers of Canada and consider that farm income in Canada has now dropped to the lowest point in seven years, that for the past several years we have witnessed year by year a drop that has averaged about 11 or 12 per cent as compared with the previous year, you begin to have some appreciation of how serious is the problem confronting the basic element of agriculture in the Canadian economy.

What have we heard from the government? It was a pathetic thing we heard in the speech of the Prime Minister on Monday when, in relation to the export of Canadian wheat, he took comfort out of the fact that our proportion of British imports of wheat had dropped less than the United States but more than the Argentine and Australia. Well, sir, there are only four of these great wheat exporting countries. The other three countries are our competitors. The two that the Prime Minister concedes as having a better record than ours are not countries that have anything like the amount of wheat to export that we have. Why should Canada not be in first place in the proportion of the exports that are going to the United Kingdom market that Canadian exporters enjoyed? Why should we be satisfied with third place, in terms of holding our proportion, as the Prime Minister apparently is? Has the agricultural economy of this country not come to a pretty pass; has the marketing of wheat under the government's monopolistic control not come to a pretty pass in Canada when we have to depend upon adverse climatic conditions to contribute a solution to the problem of the Canadian wheat surplus that this government proved itself incapable of solving? The sigh of relief, the political sigh of relief, from the government opposite when the promising wheat crop of the west turned into a failure last summer could have been heard almost around the world.

Mr. Rowe: They almost prayed for bad weather.

Mr. Fleming: It has been a poor performance on the part of the government in marketing Canadian wheat. They have been far too confident, far too cocksure, far too arrogant, and the pity of it all is, sir, that the burden of all this is going to rest upon the Canadian farmer. The responsibility rests upon the government but it is the farmer who has to bear the burden.

There is to be a prime ministers' conference in London later this month. That conference, sir, we in this party regard as of very high importance; at least it is a conference which could have very high importance if the government would indicate it is prepared to take it seriously and exploit the opportunities that it offers.

First of all, sir, what of the agenda of that conference? Sir Winston Churchill has said that any subject may be raised there, that any delegation may raise any subject. Mr. Menzies, the Prime Minister of Australia, has indicated that two of the subjects that he proposes to raise are trade and finance.

What country represented at that conference has a greater concern over trade than has Canada? Yet the Prime Minister has not a word to say in this house, even in response to questions, about the agenda of that conference. Where is all the talk about Canadian sovereignty? We have as much right to raise questions at that conference and to say what should be the agenda subjects to come before the conference as any other nation of the commonwealth. Trade should be given a place of first importance in the discussions of the prime ministers at that conference. But, no. I asked the Prime Minister the day before yesterday if he could say anything about the agenda of the conference, and what did we get in return? We had just the lame statement that nothing could be said on the subject.

Mr. Dupuis: Blast our way into the markets.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. gentleman can go on living in the distant past as long as he wishes. It is about time he and his party came up to date and faced realistically problems that are not 25 years removed but are right on the doorstep of the Canadian people today.

If parliamentary institutions enjoyed here in Ottawa the health that they ought to enjoy, no Canadian prime minister would go to an important commonwealth conference without having first invited a discussion in parliament on the position that he was going to take on behalf of his country in the deliberations of that conference. But such is the treatment that this government metes out to our Canadian parliament, such is the conspiracy of silence of this government on important national issues, such apparently is the minimum importance that this government attaches to this commonwealth prime ministers' conference, there is not to be a word said in this house even on the subject of the agenda. A fine demonstration of contempt for the parliament of Canada!

Mr. Rowe: He will tell us when he comes back.

Mr. Fleming: We might at least have had a debate on the subject, but apparently we are not going to have, even during the course of this discursive debate on the address, any statement of the position the Prime Minister is going to take in London. During the course of his speech on Monday we heard on this subject nothing but words of amiable futility, remote unconcern and gloomy despondency.

We have not forgotten that when the Prime Minister returned from his commonwealth tour on March 18, 1954, a tour undertaken with the good wishes of all the parties in this house, a tour to which we had attached such high hopes, he did not during the course of his long report say one good word for that important institution, the British commonwealth of nations—not a word.

We in this part of the house think it is about time there was some indication from the government that it attaches not only political but economic importance to this institution, this commonwealth of nations. When Canada is represented at a conference of that kind, if Canada means to make that conference effective, Canada should exploit to the limit the importance of increased trade within the commonwealth.

While I am speaking of conferences I should like to renew the demand that this party has made times without number for a dominion-provincial conference. The need for such a conference is greater today than it was when this subject was last raised during the 1954 session. Since the last session some remarkable things have happened. Last September the Prime Minister girded on his armour and launched a carefully calculated and planned attack on the policies of Quebec. He succeeded in arousing feelings against his own province. It was no contribution to national unity that he made. But let us pass on.

Where is this issue today? Somehow or other on the field of battle, that field of the Prime Minister's choosing, there suddenly descended a lull. The Prime Minister called off the crusade, he broke off the engagement. There were some talks, but following the talks there has been again complete silence. There would have been no necessity or occasion for talks between the Prime Minister of Canada and the premier of Quebec if the proper policy which we have advocated had been followed before, namely, the calling of a general dominion-provincial conference. This is something of concern to all Canada; it concerns all the provinces of Canada. It is not just an issue between Ottawa and Quebec. It is small wonder then that with this further conspiracy of silence the suspicions of the other provinces have been aroused.

What has happened? Why this silence? Mr. Duplessis has made it known that his proposals were placed in the hands of the federal government many weeks ago and apparently action has been awaited on the part of the government opposite. What are they waiting for? In the name of parliament we demand a report and we demand the calling of a dominion-provincial conference, the place where matters of this kind ought to be discussed.

We have asked in our amendment for some relief for the Canadian taxpayer from the heavy burden of taxation. We have asked for this in the name of the Canadian producer and in the name of the Canadian consumer. We are in an era of competition. Jobs of Canadians are at stake. The health of the Canadian economy is under assault. In the face of the kind of competition which Canadian producers are having to meet today the government must do more than preach the virtues of increasing our imports, as they are apparently content to do, judging from the speeches made during the course of this debate.

We should tell the government, and we should tell the C.C.F. as well, that exports are a good deal more than a mere by-product of imports. The Canadian producers, in facing the kind of competition they are confronted with now, must have material assistance in reducing their costs of production if they are going to meet this competition and continue to provide jobs for Canadian workmen.

This government, which is taking virtually half of the income of every Canadian corporation, which is levying heavy sales and excise taxes, must take this problem seriously and meet its responsibility by reducing this heavy load which is hampering the Canadian producer today and which is costing the jobs of Canadian workmen.

We have asked as well for an end of government waste and extravagance. We have asked that the government dedicate its efforts to increasing efficiency because that efficiency will create economy. But the government continues to be impervious to appeals of this kind. They turn a deaf ear when appeals come from this side of the house for elimination of waste and extravagance and the reduction of taxation. They have thwarted persistently every effort that has been made in this house to inquire into the degree of efficiency in the government service with a view to improving it. Where reports have been made before on conditions in the government service, exposing inefficiency and other things there, the government has resorted to every stratagem and every resource to prevent the conditions disclosed in such reports from becoming known in this house and to the Canadian people.

It is true that one report did escape outside the government's iron curtain, the Currie report of two years ago, but we may be sure, and we have seen abundant evidence of this, that the government intends that no other fugitive shall escape outside that government iron curtain. Indeed they made the most strenuous and sedulous efforts to round up that fugitive and get him back behind the iron curtain after he escaped.

Throughout the government has shown the most blatant contempt for the institution of parliament. Upon the shoulders of every government supporter in this house rests the unhappy responsibility of bearing whatever part he has played in allowing the government to impose this iron curtain that has denied to parliament and to the Canadian people information that ought to have been laid before them. Yes, government supporters by their docility and submissiveness have assumed their share of the responsibility for what has happened.

When the government is preaching to Canadian producers that they must be efficient and competitive, and eliminate waste and extravagance, let them begin at home and start by cleaning their own house.

In that regard I come now—and I wish I had time to dwell on this subject—to something that has come to light within the past four or five days.

I refer to the decision of the income tax appeal board in the case of No. 227, appellant v. the Minister of National Revenue. This particular appeal was heard by Mr. Commissioner Fisher and his reasons for judgment were, apparently, handed down last Saturday.

I have endeavoured to find out when the case was heard. Today I telephoned the income tax appeal board for that purpose because evidently Mr. Commissioner Fisher heard the case some time ago. I was told that the file is in the hands of the chairman of the board, and instructions have been issued that no information is to be handed out with reference to this case. I was not asking any improper question. I was not asking the name of the appellant. I was simply asking the date on which the commissioner heard the case.

Mr. McCann: I can give you that.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister do so?

Mr. McCann: November.

Mr. Fleming: Last November?

Mr. McCann: Yes, about November 8 or 10.

Mr. Fleming: Then judgment on this case has been reserved for two months. The evidence referred to in the course of the reasons for judgment must have been given at least two months ago, but judgment was not written until—

Mr. McCann: I did not say written, I said heard.

Mr. Fleming: I said the judgment was only handed down Saturday.

Mr. McCann: You said the judgment was given two months ago.

Mr. Fleming: I did not. I think we will have to ask the minister to have something done about his hearing. I said this judgment was handed down last Saturday. I asked when the case was heard and the minister said two months ago. He has given us information in that regard that I was not able to obtain. The decision was handed down last Saturday, and I say that now for the third or fourth time.

It will be observed in the reasons for judgment that the case was heard in camera at the request of the appellant. I am not interested today in discussing the merits of the legal question under appeal. The question turned on whether certain expenditures made in the improvement of a property were in their nature capital, or whether the expenditures were allowable as deduction under section 12 of the Income Tax Act as expenditures laid out for the purpose of earning the income of the corporation. We do not know who the appellant was, but I will read a few sentences from the reasons for judgment. Here is one paragraph:

> In the year 1951, the appellant company decided that it should purchase a property which could be used for entertainment purposes.

May I point out that it was the income of this company for 1951 that was under consideration. The paragraph continues:

> Apparently the appellant was convinced that it was necessary to have a private country residence where officials and officers of the various governmental bodies could be entertained prior to the negotiation of government contracts, and a property was found which it was felt would be suitable for this purpose.

Then we are told that the expenditures in that year in improving this property were as follows:

Buildings:
Painting	$6,500.00
Roof	478.78
Plumbing and heating	947.54
Electric wiring, etc.	2,389.73
Floor cleaning	352.00
Repairs—wood, cement, etc.	1,119.91

And then, sir, what about landscaping? Listen to this.

Landscaping
Paving and grading	$ 4,000.00
Trees	663.00
Lawn	11,338.06

The total expenditure amounted to $27,789.02. The commissioner, in further reference to this expenditure, states:

These expenditures were made for repairs and improvements to the property, which was used, to some extent at least, for entertainment purposes during the latter months of the year.

That year was 1951, more than three years ago, and there has been no suggestion yet that the building has since been used for any different purpose.

Now, sir, it is evident that this matter was news to the Prime Minister's ears when this decision was handed down. But we have been told in a Canadian Press dispatch something about the nature of this Shangri-La. We have been told that the Canadian Press has learned from reliable sources that the entire property is protected by a formidable fence, the only entrance being a guarded gateway. Visitors had to be vouched for at the main lodge before being admitted. This quotation then follows:

"Accommodation and entertainment is provided on a most lavish scale, with every convenience for the official being romanced. Greenhouses provide fresh flowers in profusion; and the entire establishment is air-conditioned."

Sir, it would need to be air-conditioned because this thing smells to high heaven. The quotation proceeds:

"It is staffed by an impressive array of servants, from butlers to handymen. Not one of them will discuss anything that transpires inside the fence, but stories of some of the parties there have been fabulous."

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are told that this is not very far from Ottawa. It is close enough to Ottawa to make it quite convenient. It is not the officials of some distant municipality or province they are concerned in entertaining or, as the report puts it, romancing. No one wishes to impose a Spartan existence upon federal government officials. But, sir, the people of this country are entitled to feel that those who are awarded federal government contracts obtain them strictly on their merits, and not because they have some inside track.

Mr. McCann: Is this where the Ontario road contractors were entertained?

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) should know that the Ontario government has taken firm and resolute measures to deal with the situation the minister mentioned. I think the minister is the person best qualified in this house to supply an answer to this question because this is something that arose within his department, and his officers were acquainted with it two months ago, but apparently the evidence in this case fell on deaf ears.

If the minister is looking for Ontario precedents he might well conclude that his responsibility in matters of this kind is such that he ought to consider submitting his resignation to His Excellency over what has happened here.

The walls referred to were there for a purpose. Is it not significant, Mr. Speaker, and is it not as eloquent as anything that has yet happened in this house, that the minister and those who support this government greet this report with laughter and levity? What better example could be found of the utter irresponsibility of this government and those who support it in the face of something that has all the earmarks of a major scandal, and certainly a scandal that deserves investigation? Indeed, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) acknowledged only two days ago that this matter ought to be very carefully investigated.

If it comes to an investigation, we want something better than the kind of investigation we have had in the past; the hole-and-corner investigation, the results of which have never leaked out to the public. But this has leaked out to the public, and in the name of the public we demand that this investigation be made public. If the Prime Minister is not prepared to have the proper public kind of investigation, then we demand that the matter be investigated by a special committee of this house and that we be allowed to subpoena all who are concerned in this case. We intend to make it our business to get to the bottom of the matter and see that the Canadian public is permitted to know everything they should know, and that means everything in relation to the use of this property. What officials used it? For what purpose? Who were entertained? Who did the entertaining? We want to know the answer to those and a thousand more questions. With nothing short of a full, complete and searching investigation of this kind—yes, and a public investigation with the most complete public disclosure of the contents, with full opportunity in this house to go into this matter and into every detail of it —will we be satisfied in the name of the Canadian people.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring the subject matter for the time being to something else not quite so exciting and perhaps not quite so controversial. I think that a great number of hon. members were as interested as was I when they saw in this morning's Montreal Gazette the report that perhaps a tax rental agreement had been arrived at between the government of Canada and the province of Quebec. I hope that is so. I hope it is so on a fair and equitable basis to all concerned. I should like to see every province within this agreement, believing as I do that when every province is in it, then Canada as a nation will be so much stronger.

We in the C.C.F. want to see this agreement and we hope it will be achieved on the fairest terms to all. We say again, as we have said in the past, that we insist without any qualification on the right of the people of Quebec to their constitutional rights as well as the unwritten ones which are accepted in civilized society, just as we on the other hand ask for reciprocity and insist that we also have rights. But there is this one thing that I must point out. There is one price that we will not pay for Quebec participation and that is the wrecking of the tax agreements. I do not know what the facts are. I do not know whether or not the report was accurate or inaccurate. I therefore intend to leave the situation at that point, hoping that an agreement has been arrived at and hoping that the agreement will be good for Canada. If that is so then certainly we welcome such an agreement.

I want to say a few words about the unemployment situation. The other night my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), speaking in this debate, pointed out the masterly job which either the Liberal apologists or Liberal publicity men had achieved in selling the people of Canada the concept of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as "Uncle Louie", an appellation which indicates affection. It is perhaps arguable that the Canadian people have no great regard for a paternal society and that therefore their desire is all for an avuncular one. But the pity of it today is that this government, under the present avuncular society, is nevertheless making tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Canadians cry "uncle". I am talking about those Canadians today who, through no fault of their own, are unemployed, who cannot get work and who want to work. This government is apparently doing nothing about the situation. Last year it was obvious, from looking at the treasury benches, that there was a degree of lethargy and apathy which I thought could not have been increased. But this year it is even worse, with one exception. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) has not yet been contaminated with the lethargy which afflicts the rest of his colleagues and I hope for his sake that such a thing never happens.

I remember reading a description of a British government some years ago. It was described as a government of exhausted volcanoes. Nobody would suggest that this government was a government of exhausted volcanoes because there would be no excuse for such an exaggeration. To describe it as a government of exhausted molehills might be more accurate; and I am convinced that is what a great number of Canadians today think this government is. Not only is it apathetic and lethargic in the face of present social problems but it is self-satisfied. What is even worse, as we have been told by an excellent witness, it is incompetent. I am not advancing my own concept of incompetence. I call upon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who knows his colleagues much better than I do. Let me quote from page 40 of Hansard where my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) read this extract from a speech of the Prime Minister:

> "We have a country where there should be work for everybody and if we are not smart enough to organize the economy of the nation to provide work for everybody we are incompetent."

Manifestly the government is not smart enough to organize work for everybody. Therefore, by definition, the government is incompetent; and when the Prime Minister himself makes that assertion, who am I to disagree with him?

Not only have we unemployment today but it is increasing and it is going to get worse. There is no plan or project that we have seen except the blasting of Ripple Rock out of the water. What is that going to do from the point of view of unemployment? What help is being given to men whose lives are being squandered in idleness? That is the problem which faces this house and that is what this government must answer for because within a few months there are going to be over a million people close to relief. That is not to say that there will be a million people unemployed but many of those who today are unemployed have dependents; they have wives and children and they are going to be close to relief unless the government takes action to help them.

I cannot altogether agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) when he regards his position in such a circumscribed way as he did this afternoon. I can perhaps agree that unemployment cannot be cured by legislation. However, unemployment can be greatly alleviated by sensible and reasonable fiscal policies which this government has not yet disclosed to us.

I see this situation in my own city of Winnipeg where we are dependent for our prosperity on the well-being of the farmers. When the farmer's income has been cut, as it has been this year, we in the city are going to suffer. If you cut down the farmer's income, you cut down what he spends in the city. And if you cut down what he spends in the city, you create unemployment or you create short-time employment and you have a demand for lower wages. Do that, and once again we are in the spiral of depression.

I might give the house a case in point. Before I left Winnipeg a couple of weeks ago I was talking to the bargaining committee of a union which has been conducting negotiations with a particular employer. The employer in Winnipeg took this stand: In your last contract your starting wage was $1.22 an hour. It is now going to be $1 and if you do not like it, I can get all the men I want for 85 cents. I do not think he could get all the men he wanted for 85 cents but he certainly could get some. I cite that instance in order to show the dangerous situation which is prevailing where employers are deliberately, as a matter of policy, cutting down purchasing power still further.

It is necessary that the government see that, as far as possible, purchasing power is restored in the widest possible way. But the government says: We have another method; when times get tough, we must go in for economizing. One of the aspects of economizing which they introduce is that teams are apparently sent through each department and a little clerk is hoofed out here and another little clerk is booted out there, and economizing is the word used for that procedure. But there is no economy. There is no economizing going on when there are almost 300,000 people unemployed and human resources are being wasted. It is to that aspect of economy that I should like to see this government devote its time. There is a loss in income which can never be replaced. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) ought to have some appreciation for this argument because, with unemployment as it is now, there must be a loss in national income per week of at least $12 million, and within a few months' time it is going to be double that amount. Yet we have these hundreds of thousands unemployed, with little hope for them. What would the supporters of free enterprise in this house say if they saw capital being destroyed? I refer to capital either in the shape of finance or capital in the shape of things like machines, implements or buildings. They would be howling murder about it. Yet you are destroying the capital of men when you destroy the time they might be working. A man can never get back the hours which he has lost. A man can never regain the days he was unemployed; his capital is being destroyed.

There is another aspect to it. How are we going to approach this problem of the worker in industry and the owner of industry? Today, by and large, in corporate industry the owner is one who lends his money to industry. He can get that money back whenever he wants through the medium of the stock exchange. The owner lends his money, but the worker gives his life. Who then has the greater claim, morally or any other way, on the proceeds of industry? We in the C.C.F. say without question, the one who has the greater claim is the one who is doing the fundamental job of producing wealth. Yet we have not been able to sell that idea far enough, not only in this house but throughout Canada.

The situation in the future is going to be aggravated. It is going to become much more acute than it has been in the past, and for this reason. There is a new word being coined. It is coming into the English language, and it is called automation. I do not like these new words, but I do not know what other substitute there could be for this situation in which machines are displacing men. This is not new in industrial history. There has been progress because machines displaced men, although it should be noted that the progress was always at the expense of one group in the community, that group which could not protect itself.

Now, machines are displacing men at a rapidly accelerated rate. Automation is occurring far faster than was the case in the past. Let me give you one example, and there are many others which we could find if we were to look at industry. This is a situation which existed at the Chrysler plant in Detroit. There was an operation for the making of rocker arm supports, an operation which included drilling, reaming and cutting. Five men were employed on two machines in this particular phase of the operation. These five men and two machines were able to produce 38 pieces an hour. Another machine has been brought in, so that one man and one machine can now manufacture 750 pieces an hour. In other words, a bank of the old machines could be rendered useless and 80 men could become unemployed because of this new piece of equipment and a social problem created.

Today we have to find the answer. The situation is more serious in the United States just now than it is here, but it is going to visit us in Canada. We cannot avoid it because there has to be progress. We may perhaps have to consider carefully how rapidly we progress, and in what way. If automation becomes more prevalent than it is today, the unions are going to find themselves in a position where seniority will count for nothing. The unions are going to find that job classification will go out the window because there will be no such thing in a mechanized society. Automation will certainly be here in our own lifetime. If this occurs the older worker, and by that I mean the man of 45 and over, is going to be unemployed. He is not going to be able to find work unless the fiscal policy of the government is such that, in some way or other, work is provided. There are, therefore, startling dangers ahead of us, and they are dangers because our political and economic thinking still lags lamentably behind the technology of the age. This thinking has to be brought up to date.

There may be an answer, perhaps, in the union request for a guaranteed annual wage. I certainly support the idea. I have heard it argued, on the other hand, that the guaranteed annual wage would be most unfair to management because management would be compelled to keep workers on their staff when no work was available. I should like to see management acting as bird dogs for a change. I am not altogether impressed with the quality or calibre of management in Canada. It is time they went out and did some rustling, not only to get orders but to make sure the men who are in the plants are being given employment.

Furthermore, a guaranteed annual wage may at last bring home to industry the responsibility it has to society. It is regarded as right, proper and prudent for industry to create a depreciation reserve for its fixed assets. Why is it not equally proper, prudent and wise to create a depreciation reserve for the human assets who are producing the wealth in the various plants throughout Canada? It is starting. We see signs of it here and there, but not in adequate quantities. Industry has to take a greater social responsibility for the men whom it employs. If the government, through its injurious fiscal policies, creates unemployment the government representing society as a whole has to take responsibility for that.

There should be none of this nonsense of striking a man off unemployment benefits because he has been unemployed too long and there is still no work for him. I am not suggesting the guaranteed annual wage is the complete answer because I do not believe it is. I hope, however, the Department of Labour is considering this problem which is arising, and will meet with the unions and management in this country as soon as possible to try to devise some answer.

There is one other matter about which I want to speak, and one about which every member of the house feels quite as strongly as I. I am not quite certain yet about the members of the cabinet. I am thinking about the plight of the burnt-out veterans. I suppose other members had the same experience I had when I was home in that I was asked on a number of occasions to meet the Canadian Legion and say what I thought of the situation. I may as well say here what I thought. I thought the government's conduct was shoddy and shabby. I said it and I still believe it. I am prepared to withdraw those words when I see the new legislation introduced.

I think the conduct of the Canadian people, also, may have been shoddy and shabby when we consider their responsibility, because these were men who volunteered to fight to keep the skins of the Canadian people intact. We were in danger, so we would pay anything for our safety. Of course, once we became safe, we forgot about our moral obligation to those who had suffered for us. I hope the government is going to turn that moral obligation into hard dollars and cents when the new legislation comes down. All these people are asking for is justice; they are not asking for too much because I have said in the past, and I say again, the briefs of the Canadian Legion have been exemplary in the sense that they have asked for what was fair and nothing more.

Another thing: I hope this legislation will include some provision whereby the burnt-out pensioner is not, in effect, denied the old age pension when he achieves the age of 70. It can be said he is not denied the old age pension, he gets it. He has a right to it, certainly, but his pension is cut down by the amount he gets and his total income is not one iota greater afterwards than before. While technically he gets the old age pension, in effect he sees nothing of it. I hope the government will not be so miserable as to keep that regulation in force.

I should like to read a letter which I received. I have a great number of them, and I picked this one at random out of the file. It expresses very adequately what these old veterans feel. It is from 769 Atlantic avenue, Winnipeg, and reads:

Sir,

The veterans are making a most justifiable appeal to the government of Canada, to seriously consider their appeal for an increase in their allowance and I am asking you being our member of parliament to give it your full support and consideration.

I most assuredly do.

The amount received is not sufficient for our expenses, having to meet the increased costs on all sides. Also hospitals and doctors if our wives are ill, more or less as the case may be, making a serious demand on the allowance. It is very reasonable that a married man receiving a veteran's allowance should be able to bring his income to $2,000 per year.

That is a most reasonable request. This next sentence is one which has a sting in it for all of us.

This is not too much to ask of a government who now pensions its M.P.'s at $3,000 per year.

The government of Canada recognizes that an income of $2,000 per year is too low for a married man to pay income tax.

I therefore feel that this figure is the lowest reasonable figure to ask as an income for the veteran who is no longer able to perform steady employment.

Your support in this matter is solicited with deep sincerity. Anything you can do to bring the government recognition of its responsibility to the class of veterans affected will bring you the thanks and appreciation of all veterans.

I would be very happy to see this appreciation transferred to the shoulders of the government; and it can be easily transferred by bringing in the sort of legislation which has been asked for by veterans and which has been asked for by members on all sides of the house. And if the government is prepared to do it, then I for one, and for a very brief time, am prepared to forgive the government for some of its obvious inadequacies.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, rising to participate in this debate, may I forgo the usual custom of long and flowery congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick). May I say simply to them and to the other new members introduced on Friday last that it is gratifying to know that the membership of this House of Commons, with its unrivalled opportunity for service, continues to attract Canadians of ability and integrity.

Before dealing directly with the speech from the throne I would like to comment on one piece of government business at our last session. I refer to legislation that made the lending facilities of our chartered banks available for home construction. I have always taken a keen interest in housing. Being a firm believer in the advantages of home ownership, I was naturally interested in this new legislation.

In our last session I was surprised and disappointed with the opposition in some quarters to this move. Some rather prominent members of the opposition expressed their doubts as to the advisability of having our banks participate in this field, and I seem to recall the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) in particular advising the nation that Canada's banks would not be able to provide funds for home construction and at the same time perform their regular functions. How wrong he was!

An examination of the financial statements of Canada's banks, and recent figures from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, reveal that the banks have made loans in this new field amounting to some $170 million. This is a remarkable performance when one remembers that the legislation was only in effect for a few months of the banks' fiscal year; and, what is more important, more housing units were completed in the year just ended than ever before in our history. Now Canadians will welcome the reference in the throne speech indicating the government's intention to bring into operation, at the beginning of February, those provisions of the National Housing Act in which loans may be made for home improvements. It is evident to most that this proposed legislation will substantially improve housing conditions in this country.

Mr. Speaker, there is another matter of national importance and of special interest to the people I represent and to northern Ontario generally, and that is the trans-Canada highway. A survey of the progress of this important project in northern Ontario is not impressive. I recognize the magnitude of this development and can understand the pressures and needs from the more densely populated areas of southern Ontario for a larger share of the highway dollar. I also recognize the difficulties the Ontario government has been having with their highways department, and I do hope that now, since the premier of our province has apparently found it necessary to intervene personally in this department, we can properly expect more emphasis on construction in northern Ontario. Our people expect and need this fine project completed as soon as possible. The continued development of northern Ontario is dependent on this road.

The further expansion of our tourist industry, the opening up of new areas giving transportation facilities to new mining and lumbering developments both present and future, point up the need for the early completion of the trans-Canada highway through northern Ontario. May I remind the house that the agreements with the provinces were signed back in April, 1950, and are due to expire December 9, 1956. This leaves less than two years, and it is my sincere wish that every possible priority be given this important project by the government of Ontario and, indeed, all the provinces. After all, the federal treasury is paying 50 per cent of the costs, and the Canadian people expect action. If the necessary co-operation is not immediately forthcoming, I would suggest the federal government taking a firmer attitude with the provinces.

Another matter of concern is the early construction of a natural gas pipe line through northern Ontario. We are pleased to learn from the press recently that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited now plan a more northern route to serve northern municipalities, with a spur line from North Bay to other important northern Ontario centres. Anything this house does to expedite this matter will be appreciated by northern Ontario.

There is another subject, Mr. Speaker, of direct concern to the people of Nipissing, that needs the attention of our Department of Public Works, and I take advantage of the opportunity afforded members in this debate to discuss local matters. I refer now to the docking facilities at North Bay and Sturgeon Falls. I am not going to remind this house that the district of Nipissing is truly a tourists' paradise—this is already well known. I need scarcely remind hon. members of the excellent facilities throughout our district. The Ontario Northland Boat Lines operate an excellent boat, the Chief Commanda, daily during the navigation season, from the North Bay wharf. The rapid expansion of the tourist industry in Nipissing is causing an ever-increasing flow of traffic over the present facilities.

Important mining activities on the islands of lake Nipissing have further increased the flow of traffic. I have been successful in having repairs of a temporary nature done to both docks, and appreciate the co-operation received from the department. However, the time has come for extensive repairs to make sure that these important facilities are adequate for present-day traffic requirements.

It is not my intention to deal with many of the subjects contained in the speech from the throne. Most Canadians will approve the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act immediately to assist our citizens who, through no fault of their own, may be unemployed this winter. And I am pleased this legislation is now under way. Canadians generally will approve the government's intention to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, to raise the basic rates as well as the ceiling on permissible incomes of allowance recipients.

There will be general approval of the government's proposal to lower the age of eligibility and raise the income ceilings of Canada's blind citizens. Canadians will now have the right to expect humanitarian treatment for her disabled citizens. Too long, now, has this been a dark chapter in our program of social welfare.

Located as we are in Nipissing, so close to the gold mining country, and dependent on it for a substantial share of our economic well-being, we are anticipating continued support to that important industry through the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Further, I am sure all those interested in municipal affairs will await with keen interest the proposed amendments to the Municipal Grants Act.

I am not unmindful of Canada's activities and our responsibilities abroad in the fields of diplomacy, co-operative defence and assistance to underprivileged areas, plus a genuine desire and need further to promote freer world trade. Our government is keenly aware of these tremendously important problems and I can see no useful purpose in my discussing them at this time.

During the next several days we will undoubtedly hear much criticism of the speech from the throne, and that is as it should be in a democracy. Our socialist friends will argue that the benefits forecast in the speech are thoroughly inadequate. They will undoubtedly urge the launching of a huge program of public works, as though the benefits come automatically with the spending of public money. This seems to be the socialists' chief answer to current unemployment.

Our Progressive Conservative friends, on the other hand, will, as usual, talk about what it does not contain, and will no doubt take the position that spending of the kind recommended by the socialists will not correct the employment situation, and will only add to the already high prices of goods and services which the Progressive Conservatives claim is the real problem in the Canadian economy.

Sir, as a "middle of the roader", if such an expression is permissible, I suggest the answer, as is so often the case, lies somewhere between these two points of view. The spending of public money on well-planned and urgently needed public projects and services is necessary, and can make an important contribution to our economy. But I suggest that this parliament approach our problems at this time calmly and confidently. Let us not be pushed into hastily conceived schemes. May I suggest that while this is not a time for complacency, neither is there any justification for gloom-peddling or any artificial pump-priming of our economy, or special preferred attention to a selected few.

In my opinion, our economy withstood the shocks of 1954 in surprisingly good fashion. The market for our staple wheat exports suffered a real slump. The United States experienced a sizeable recession that quite naturally took the edge off our prosperity here. There was a poor wheat crop in the west. These unfavourable circumstances were quite beyond the control of Canadians, yet we find new investment continuing at a high level. Our exports were reduced only by about the equivalent of the drop in wheat sales. Our other exports were just about maintained. In spite of the normal difficulties of Canadian exporters, a more favourable balance between exports and imports was achieved in 1954 than in 1953. This result, in my opinion, makes nonsense of all the clamour we hear that high Canadian costs are pricing us out of world markets.

Perhaps "makes nonsense" is rather strong language. Perhaps I should say that it punches plenty of holes in the sweeping charge that high Canadian costs are pricing us out of world markets. Let us remember that costs are only one factor that go into a sale. Let us remember that there are others. There is the question of availability. There is the question of quality and the question of aggressive sales approach. In the case of appliances and machinery there is the question of a good service organization behind an aggressive sales organization.

I am not suggesting that these factors do not exist, but one should not accept the general statement that high costs are our only problem in trade. Let us not forget that also in the late 1940's and the early 1950's we enjoyed markets that had never been traditionally ours, and it is only natural that since these countries have come back from the devastation of war they are going to be able to supply the products that they normally supplied. While we shall lose some markets, it is true, we are going to gain others and this is particularly true of our forest products in many countries of Europe. It is particularly true of base metals in many countries in Europe. I believe there are figures showing that the exports of these two commodities I have mentioned have increased in some months during the past year to as high as 30 per cent or 35 per cent over the corresponding months of 1953.

Let us look for just a moment at the future. This Liberal government should seek to improve the already excellent relationship between business and government in Canada, and should continue to offer every possible incentive to new and existing business, as it is only through steady expansion of our free enterprise system that we can continue to improve the living standards of our people.

At the same time, we must recognize that at this halfway mark in the century we have reached the stage of development where those that have must share a part of their good fortune with those less fortunate, so that all of us may have more of the good things of life.

I suggest we have reached this stage in our international thinking as well as at home. Such a policy is reasonable and right, and is bound to find favour with free, fair-minded people everywhere. Such a policy I will continue to support in the firm belief that Canada can move forward to an even brighter future.

This policy of freedom for business, and social security for our people, has been inconsistent with Tory and socialist thinking alike, down through the years. To them, such a policy of co-existence could only be tolerated in cases of extreme emergency. To me, this combination of free enterprise and social welfare is the very cornerstone of the Liberal approach, and that is why the Liberal party continues to enjoy the confidence of fairminded Canadians everywhere.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, January 13, 1955

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 13th January, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to a certain bill.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General (Administrative)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, in spite of all its carefully chosen words and limited demands, the speech from the throne could hardly be expected to suppress the fact that there is mounting unemployment at the present time in Canada. This is an ugly fact that stares us all in the face. It is a condition of our national economy that in my judgment will not be remedied by the building of ferries, the construction of an odd harbour, the removal of Ripple Rock, the building of historic sites and monuments and the like.

I think it is high time that we as members of parliament addressed ourselves seriously to the problems facing Canada with respect to production and trade. As that is going to be a most important subject during this particular session, I would like to go back and review a little bit of historical background relative to trade and tariffs.

The year 1914 closed an era. One world then died and another is still struggling to be born. That old world was dominated by one great country that had coal, limestone, ore and other basic resources close to the seaboard, and these provided the sound basis for an industrial economy which spread itself throughout the agricultural and raw material areas of the world.

The central fact about Britain's industrial economy was that she was first in the field and thus able to develop a tremendous lead over all possible rivals. In fact until the very latter part of the nineteenth century she had no industrial rivals at all. The British made money, therefore, by buying raw materials as cheaply as possible and selling against all comers in free markets, the countries to whom they were selling not having the facilities to manufacture industrial goods.

Today the industrial centres of production cannot be counted on the fingers of one hand. Two-thirds of the population of the world still remains peasant and poor, but in the other third industrial development in most cases has changed and is changing the social pattern of life, and has rescued and is rescuing nations from poverty in constantly widening areas.

People ask the question: Why should we have agricultural surpluses when so many are in need of food? The simple answer is that these countries in need of food have not yet been able to organize their resources and their political systems so as to be in a position to buy food. As you know, we do have the Colombo plan.

It is a truism that predominantly agricultural nations are poor. It is almost now a platitude to say that it is research and the industrial improvements that follow that transform our agriculture, our forest and mining industries into enterprises that provide more profitable occupations. Industrial development keeps our economies in a constant state of peaceful revolutionary change, and thereby provides better working conditions and better real incomes for all the individuals and families of our population.

Today we should have a searching look at our Canadian economy. That means we should glance backward and look forward. It is by looking at the wake of a ship that you can best discern the direction in which the ship is going. It is by taking a look at Canada back to the time of confederation that we are able to see the course on which our national economy was set some 85 years ago.

The first prime minister of Canada was Sir John A. Macdonald. Following confederation there was a brief period of political consolidation, but in 1888 Sir John realized the lonely isolated economic position into which our economy was drifting. We had enjoyed very valuable preferences in agriculture and in shipping in the British market, to which our timber products at that time were making great contributions. But between 1846 and 1870 Britain had transformed herself into a free market economy and we were on the same basis in that market as all other countries of the world.

The United States had fought the Civil War and thereby swung the southern states into the industrial orbit of the north. Reciprocity, which we had enjoyed with them, was abrogated. We were on our own. We had no real chance to develop native industries because of the much superior technological ability to produce possessed by other countries, especially the United States. Difficulties were on the horizon everywhere facing our producers of farm and other raw materials. In these circumstances Sir John A. Macdonald moved his now famous resolution in the House of Commons on March 12, 1878, on going into committee of supply, and this I will read:

This house is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing, and other interests of the dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen who are now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home; will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed; will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market; will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade; and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

Note the last part of the resolution, which may appear today to have been brave words at the time. Sir John's resolution clearly implied we cannot have reciprocity with the United States until we set our own house in order; until we got into the habit of processing our own industrial and raw materials, and until in time we will be able to meet the United States on some reasonable ground of nearly equal competitive terms.

Thus we had, particularly in these two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the beginnings of what are now vast industries that can compete on nearly equal terms with any other country in the world. Most of our long-established industries can produce goods, pay salaries almost as high as anywhere else—I think as high as anywhere else with the possible exception of the United States—and put our goods on the world markets just as efficiently as other industrial countries.

The Conservatives were called upon to quit in 1896 and the Liberals, under the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier, took over until the year 1911. The Liberal party came into power on a trade platform which threatened to sweep away protection in Canada by promising to restore free trade on the model of industrial Britain. But when they came into power they became realists. It is true that they gave a voluntary preference to Britain, but Britain was not the great industrial threat to our native industry. It was the United States. At all events the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald was so well safeguarded by the Liberals in power that the tariff structure which they left behind them in 1911 remained unchanged through the administrations of Borden and Meighen. There were some special war duties, but they were repealed as soon as the war ended.

If you compare the actual tariff exactions levied during the Laurier regime and the later regimes of Borden and Meighen, you will find that taken as percentage totals of all imports they vary by less than a fraction of one per cent, and generally speaking the same tariff which was accepted by the Laurier government in 1896, maintained by the Borden and Meighen governments from 1911 to 1922, was still good enough to survive the verbal onslaught of the Liberal leader who was prime minister of this country for over 20 years. So the Macdonald policy, in developing industry, became and remained the cornerstone of Canadian economic policy.

Up until the war of 1914 the development of industries and courageous immigration policies in our country and others maintained a healthy demand for primary products, and an especially wholesome demand for farm products. There were no difficulties in finding markets for farm products up until a year or two following world war I. But, of course, inevitably the war geared agricultural production to a point that could not be sustained in the face of the shrinking demand for agricultural products that followed the war.

The United States took swift action to protect its agricultural industry. In the early twenties we had the Fordney-McCumber tariff which disastrously cut the volume of our farm and fish exports. A post-war depression in those days seemed to be taken for granted, and in the middle twenties, after an industrial shakedown and temporary unemployment, Britain returned to the gold standard and the industrial process was again in healthy and rampant stride.

For reasons I do not wish to go into now at length this world economy which was promising so much, particularly to those optimists who were investing in the stock market—and weren't we all—collapsed in 1929. The United States congress again acted promptly. They enacted the Hawley-Smoot tariff which all but obliterated what remained of our farm export market. They followed this in 1932 with a special revenue act putting specific tariff duties against such metals as copper and such other primary products as lumber.

Mr. R. B. Bennett was then prime minister of Canada and, in different and even more difficult circumstances, he faced the same problem as Sir John A. Macdonald.

Canada was refused entry into the United States of her agricultural surpluses and her metals and lumber, and Britain, with the exception of some 100 special and not very high duties imposed during the war and post-war period, was operating on a free trade basis.

Mr. Bennett invited the nations of the commonwealth and empire to a conference in Ottawa. In the meantime Britain was forced off the gold standard and reverted to a substantial tariff structure ranging on industrial products from 10 to 33 and in some cases up to 50 per cent.

Most of the discussion about the empire agreements at that time centred on the secure and sheltered market we were guaranteed for portions of our agricultural products in Britain, but, as I see it now, the great gain that flowed from these agreements was the stimulus it gave to Canadian manufacturing industries.

As I pointed out, the British tariff on manufactured goods ranged from 10 to 33 and even up to 50 per cent, and as a result of the empire agreements our manufactured products were admitted into that country free.

What did this mean? It meant that United States industry selling to Britain would have to pay these rates I have just mentioned, whereas, if they moved their plants into Canada, or established branches in Canada, the products of these plants entered Britain mainly free of duty. You can go through Ontario or elsewhere in Canada today and you will see industry after industry which obtained a footing in this way and as a result of this development are now flourishing and supplying markets at home and abroad.

What we should all try to escape from is the state of academic anaemia in which our discussions on trade policy are conducted. In face of the record I have mentioned, what is the use of discussing free trade as a practical political proposition? All such discussion does not alter the fact that there is no genuine free trade party in Canada and there never was.

Since we have a tariff for protection, why not be fair and reasonable about its application? Why should industries which have entered Canada at the request of the government to supply vitally needed war materials, and which now employ many thousands of Canadian workers at the best prevailing rates of pay, be made the victims of hypocritical trade philosophy? That is the trouble about this double-talk regarding protection for industry.

The industries which can exert effective political pressure on the government are able to break through the sound barrier erected by the alleged free traders. Industries that are anxious to get on with their business and take fair and equitable treatment for granted are sacrificed on the altar set up by the academic free traders.

Because of our recent discoveries in natural resources, including gas and oil, we are in the process of developing a huge chemical empire in this country. This chemical industry has already been highly developed in the United States. Some products of these and other industries are admitted into Canada free from the United States, and similar products going from Canada to the United States are subjected to substantial customs tariff rates.

When a given product is produced both in Canada and in the United States, and the government across the border levies customs duties and other imposts much in excess of ours, such a situation should become a matter for adjustment between the two countries. Canada's exports are fettered by foreign tariff regulations while, on the other hand, Canadian industry is exposed to damaging competition.

After the war we had visions of drawing all the nations of the world into various forms of collective action which were to be the sure road to a political world paradise. All nations banded together were to be as happy and peaceful as a basket of kittens. We now know that some of the kittens turned out to have long claws.

Let us not despair in the task of finding real avenues to a restored world order. But let us work with practical means towards practical ends. We are standing by the general agreement on tariffs and trade, while others are not. Our dairy products are subject to quota and our coarse grain products are either placed under quota or subjected to voluntary quota agreements. Devices are found within the terms of the agreements to protect domestic manufacturers. We take no advantage of such, while others do.

The ideological struggle between communism and democracy has led to the popular use of the expression "co-existence". In my opinion Canada should seek a revision of the Geneva trade agreement on the basis of Canadian industrial co-existence. By that I mean that out of an appreciation of a definite national purpose we should look to the recasting of our trade agreements to the degree that Canadian industry is allowed the right to live, even as our trading partners will seek the same right for their industries.

This, in essence, is what I mean by co-existence: the safeguarding and successful existence of Canadian industries which must, of necessity, compete with foreign industries which perhaps have advantages of labour, wage rates, and many other considerations.

We cannot pursue an inflexible policy which stifles industry and denies labour an opportunity of steady employment. Foreign exporters to Canada and Canadian industries cannot expect to sell much to unemployed Canadians.

Our domestic producers pay an excise tax of up to 15 per cent, and on top of that a further sales tax of 10 per cent. The Canadian manufacturer of automobiles pays excise and sales taxes totalling 25 per cent, against the manufacturers across the line who pay an excise tax of 7 per cent. It is no wonder automobiles are cheaper in the United States.

We have an unemployment problem that will not be cured by public works or by subscribing to some bogus theory of free trade. It will be solved by giving good sound industrial enterprises a chance to compete on fair terms with industries abroad. In other words, an opportunity of co-existence.

A policy which levies excessive taxation on industry prices its products out of the market, adds new burdens to the cost of living, causes unemployment in Canada, and is obviously not good enough.

Japan and Germany are rising out of the ashes of defeat. Their standards of pay are not such as our workers will accept, and we do not want them to accept such standards. India looms across the horizon. What we need urgently now is a reappraisal of our national policy which has been accepted by all political faiths.

The general agreement on tariffs and trade is now up for revision. We are now in a position to make a reappraisal of its benefits and disadvantages to Canada.

Formerly we got on pretty well by making agreements with individual nations. In each case the effects of the agreements could be fairly forecast by the interested parties, by our trade experts, and by those who speak for the consumers at large.

Admittedly, GATT, which represents a general trade device that ties us all to a theory that does not always work out in practice, presents vastly new problems for our experts who advise the government in such matters.

Many members of the house were disturbed by the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) after his return from Geneva. He seemed to think that the end of the world had come, in so far as international trade on a broad scale is concerned.

Let me say at once that we believe that the most earnest efforts should be made by this government to maintain the general structure of tariffs and trade agreements that were worked out in the first instance at Geneva, and which are now generally known as GATT. We, like most other signatories to this agreement, have two objects in mind. We want reasonably legitimate competitive safeguards for industries that are established in this country, and for industries, although now in their initial stages of development, that give real promise of becoming the means for profitable employment in this country. And we want markets for our surplus products.

[Mr. Murphy (Lambton West).]

The United States is now concerned about the problem of assuring itself of an adequate supply of key materials, especially minerals, and these at the lowest possible cost consistent with security factors.

Many of their needed products are produced in abundance in Canada. The United States more and more will become dependent on our imports of copper, lead, zinc, and iron ore. We, in the meantime, are dependent on them for coal and for citrus fruits. The coal problem is somewhat mitigated by the development of our oil and gas resources. We need their cotton. But in this day of substitution, we do not know how long that need, based on United States production, will last. One certain thing is that we were selling them large quantities of iron ore and we were buying from them large quantities of steel in the form of ingots and finished goods. They will continue to rely on us for supplies of nickel, asbestos and tin. Canada has the materials the United States needs. Canada has the basic materials, aluminum, iron ore, uranium, pulp, paper and lumber.

Our location gives us a major advantage in competing with the United States, and from a security point of view we are considered their best source of supply. We enjoy their confidence. Their investments in Canada have been richly rewarded over the years.

With the United States, and more particularly with our sister nations of the commonwealth, and in co-operation with the free nations of the world today, we must seek to re-establish orderly trade. Nationalism is still the most potent force in the world and what we must do is seek the great objectives of world security on the basis of enlightened self-interest. We shall not be true to the trust that is ours if we do not continue to process greater percentages of our base metals in Canada. We cannot be content to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. We can do as others do—and what is today the accepted basis of trade—namely, appraise our strength as a trader and obtain markets for these surpluses—especially in agricultural products—which we cannot use, and admit articles on a basis that does not destroy our standards of wage payments and our standard of living.

Finally, let me say this. We shall be false to our trust, and false to the best interests of Canada, if we continue to invite useful industries into Canada and then, for no good practical reason, have them slaughtered on the altar of an academic free trade policy.

If the dour predictions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce prove to be correct, we will be on the verge of a jungle war in international trade, and the people of this country will expect the government to work out plans with the commonwealth, with the United States, and with as many of the free nations of the world as possible to regain our lost markets for our surplus products in this country.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, there are a few comments that I should like to make at this time because I feel that this debate should play an extremely valuable role since it provides members on all sides of the house with an opportunity of turning the spotlight on what they consider to be the most important issues in their respective constituencies.

After having read carefully the speech from the throne, I fail to see where the government has given consideration to what I believe to be the most pressing problems facing the Canadian people at the present time. The government apparently has chosen to ignore the basic economic problems and is hoping that, by giving a few pieces of worthwhile legislation of a minor character—that is in terms of the whole economic picture—the people of the country will be satisfied. I suggest that in the government's approach to its legislative program this year they have given us no reason to believe that they are going to make any frontal attack on the most important problems which we face at the present time.

I feel a debate of this kind gives members an opportunity of expressing something of their basic philosophy and of their over-all approach to the problems of the government. One or two other members who have spoken in this debate have referred in a brief manner to this important aspect, namely the whole attitude of the government towards the legislation and its whole attitude towards the role of government in society.

There are in this country those who believe that the activities of the government should be restricted to an extremely narrow sphere. There are those who believe that the less the government has to do, in so far as the economy is concerned, the better off the Canadian people are. I find it difficult to understand why those who champion the cause of free enterprise deem it necessary to support such things as the anti-combines legislation and all sorts of government legislation which was placed on the statute books for the particular purpose of defending the people of Canada against the big business interests of this country. Indeed, if the champions of free enterprise were to follow their own belief to a logical conclusion, then I am sure that the people of this country would find themselves in a much more serious position than that in which they find themselves today. Indeed in a democratic society the people have a right to look to the government not only for protection against economic interests over which they have little or no control, but also to give them some direction, some leadership, in the solution of economic problems. This concept of government is not new. Abraham Lincoln once described the government's role to be one of doing for the people what they were unable to do for themselves. As time goes on and our society becomes more complex, I believe the need for the continued attention of the government is self-evident. If you were to ask a man who is unemployed today, and who has done his level best to find employment, what he thinks of that concept of government, I am quite certain he would say, "I have done all I can for myself and must look to the government for some help to obtain employment". I think that is the logical and sensible way of viewing the activities of government today.

Now, we in this movement believe that in a democratic society the government which represents the people has a duty and responsibility to care for the interests of the people as a whole. The other day some hon. members referred to the credit union movement. I as a member of the co-operative movement, and as a member for some years of a credit union, wholeheartedly agree. There is a case where people, realizing that in our vicious economic system it is necessary to band together for mutual self-protection, are doing just that in a limited manner. What we in this movement argue is that the same principle applies to the economic machinery of this country as a whole. What we want in democratic society is a greater measure of democratic control of the economy.

There is planning in this country. Hon. members talk about the dangers of planning. It would be impossible to carry on a modern government without a great degree of planning. Our whole economic machinery in this country is planning. The big question is not whether or not we are going to have planning; the question is who is going to do the planning and on whose behalf. We argue that whatever planning is done should be done in the interests of the people of this country, not planning by corporations designed to enhance the fortunes of this or that particular group of companies. We know that in this complex society in which we live there has to be planning. We in this movement insist it should be democratic planning by a democratic government in the interests of all the people of the country.

Earlier I mentioned that in my opinion the government has completely ignored the basic economic difficulties facing the people of this country. I want to refer to just two or three signs of that unwillingness to face up to reality. Coming as I do from a constituency which depends entirely on the prosperity of the surrounding agricultural area, I am very much alarmed by the falling off of our external trade and the serious decline in net farm income. I cannot view with anything but seriousness the fact that in the past year our exports of Canadian wheat and other coarse grains has declined by some 40 per cent. When you translate that fact into its broader implications throughout Canada it is easy to understand why there have been widespread lay-offs in the farm machinery industry, why industrial activity is down, and why we find many industrial workers unemployed.

In addition to the falling off of agricultural exports we know that for the first ten months of last year there was a decline in the value of merchandise exports by approximately 8 per cent. These are signs which the government ought to take into consideration. The government should realize they are danger signs which must be faced if we are to avert an even more serious economic condition in this country. I can recall attending political meetings in my own province where the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and Liberal spokesmen have answered the question of the lost British markets by saying, "Look at our trade position; we are doing wonderfully well." They completely ignored the fact that our trade position was based on the fact we were exporting agricultural commodities to the United States.

Anyone who wanted to view the situation objectively would know that the United States has never been, and will never be, a dependable market for farm products. I believe it was the editor of the Montreal Star who last week, speaking over the air, described the United States market as something like a water tap. If the United States producers were not able to meet the requirements of the domestic market and export trade, the government would turn on the tap and allow our Canadian products to enter the United States. But just as soon as the United States production was sufficient to meet the domestic requirements of that country and to take care of their export requirements, then of course the government would turn off the tap. Anyone who wanted to use a little bit of foresight and plain common sense could have seen that development coming.

Apparently this government, when it lost the British market, said, "Look, we have given you markets in the United States." They must have known we could not hope to keep those markets indefinitely. This is not without its serious effects on the economy of this country.

With respect to the falling net farm income we find that 1954 was the third successive year in which there has been a substantial drop in net farm income. During that period net farm income dropped from $2,115 million to $1,200 million, a drop of some 44 per cent. One cannot stress too strongly the seriousness of this disastrous drop in income, because the farmer plays a unique role in our economy. The farmer is not merely a producer of consumer goods, he is also the owner and operator of a relatively highly capitalized small business. In that dual role he is purchasing farm machinery and other capital goods. No survey has been made in this country to reveal the extent to which that is carried on, but research surveys have been made in the United States which indicate that the average farmer will purchase 2·4 times as much per capita as the consumer in the city.

Thus we find this disastrous drop in net farm income has a very serious effect on employment in the industrial areas of Canada. One cannot stress too strongly the interdependence of those who work the soil and those who work in our factories, offices and other places of employment.

This brings me to the third aspect, and one with which I should like to deal in a little more detail, the question of unemployment in Canada. One of the most discouraging features of the speech from the throne is the refusal to face up to the unemployment problem as it exists. The government tries to create the impression that unemployment does not exist in Canada. When they are placed in the position of having to defend themselves they say there is a little unemployment but it is only seasonal or only regional. They will try to pass it off as being of little consequence. Perhaps as supporters of the free enterprise system they believe a little unemployment is inevitable. Perhaps they take the attitude of some businessmen that not only is a certain percentage of unemployment inevitable under our system but that it is desirable. I do not know whether that is the thinking of the members of the government, but at any rate they do not seem to pay very much attention to the fact that some 500,000 or more—this year likely closer to 600,000—Canadians will be out of work.

The government does not consider that serious enough. Just how serious does the unemployment situation have to become before the government recognizes it exists? Are they going to wait until there are 800,000 unemployed, one million unemployed or 1·5 million? Just where are they going to draw the line between concern and lack of concern? They have argued that unemployment is regional, that it is seasonal. We know that according to the national employment service last winter there were some 569,000 Canadians out of work. Last fall the Canadian Congress of Labour estimated that this winter there would be in excess of 600,000 persons in Canada out of employment. Yet the government feels that this is not serious enough to give closer attention to in its legislative program this year. We know that this unemployment is not concentrated in any one particular area, because we find unemployment in all parts of Canada. I have talked to members of the House of Commons from all parts of the country and I have heard the same story—"Unemployment is bad in my city"; "Unemployment is bad in our part of the country."

I say that some of the members on the government side of the house who get up and pat the government on the back ought to ask themselves the question as to how serious unemployment is in their own community. I would like to know how many government supporters are prepared to get up and say that there is no unemployment in their constituencies. I doubt if one of them can get up in this House of Commons and say that the unemployment situation is not serious in his area.

I would welcome the assurance to the house by the government supporters on this unemployment question, but we do know this, that we have the facts regarding unemployment. We know that unemployment has increased in the following industries: non-ferrous metal products, mining, shipbuilding, machinery, aircraft and parts, sawmills, construction, logging, clothing, railroad equipment, automobiles and parts, iron and steel, textiles and farm machinery. These are the basic industries of this country—particularly the steel industry.

As I say, these are the basic industries of Canada. There is mounting unemployment in these industries; yet the government feels that it is not important enough to make a frontal attack on the problem. With respect to the farm machinery industry, which is a striking example, there has been such a fall in net farm income that the farmers cannot buy new machinery. The result is that we find widespread unemployment in the farm machinery industry. We know that since 1952 there has been a reduction in farm machinery production to the extent of some 34 per cent.

Once again, the attitude of the government seems difficult to understand—this willingness on their part to ignore the seriousness of unemployment in this country. And with respect to the argument that unemployment is regional, as I have already pointed out, if anyone will make a survey of the country he will find unemployment right across Canada.

Just look at the records of the employment offices and they will indicate that unemployment is widespread from one part of Canada to the other.

And then, in connection with seasonal employment: of course we have always had seasonal employment in this country. And yet it is only in the last couple of years that we have had such great numbers of unemployed as we now have in the winter months.

Then, of course, just because a man gets a few months' work in the summer months is not an answer to the employment problem. I am sure that those men who are looking for employment want year-round employment. They want some measure of job security with decent working conditions and good wages. The government cannot take satisfaction from the fact that the unemployment figures might be a little higher in the winter than they are in the summer. What we want is employment all the year round; and in those areas where such employment is not available there should be other employment made available so that those who are doing seasonal work can take on other work in the off-season.

These are questions to which the government must give serious consideration. Then, with regard to the government's attitude concerning unemployment, I wonder why they refuse to admit the seriousness of the problem. I suggest the reason the government is not willing to face up to the unemployment problem is the simple fact that they have no plan or no solution for the problem; and they hope that by ignoring it they can muddle through, and that something will come along to pull them out of the economic swamp in which they find themselves at the present time.

Now, with respect to the official opposition, it was quite interesting last Monday to hear the speech of the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) and to remember that he alone, among the present members of his party in the House of Commons, was a cabinet minister in the government of the late R. B. Bennett. I do not think our memories are so short that we cannot cast our minds back over that period, during which time we had a Conservative government in this country. I believe the late Mr. Bennett went out to seek election and in a public meeting in Regina promised to end unemployment in 60 days, I believe it was, or 90 days—some such time, anyway.

An hon. Member: Ninety days.

Mr. Ellis: Ninety days, was it? Well, he was going to end unemployment in ninety days.

An hon. Member: And he did.

Mr. Ellis: Someone in the official opposition says that Mr. Bennett did end unemployment in 90 days. Well, I do not know whether he thinks that the relief camps were a solution to the unemployment problem of that time. But we do know that apparently that was the Conservative party's answer to unemployment: "Let us herd all the single unemployed into relief camps and get them out of the way, into the bush country. Let us remove them from their homes and put them in relief camps, in enforced idleness."

That was regimentation, if there ever was regimentation in this country. Hon. members who talk about regimentation in society must know that we had the greatest regimentation during the time of the relief camps under the government of the late R. B. Bennett.

Then we had a change of government in 1935 when the Liberals took office. Well, they muddled along in 1936, 1937 and 1938, and nothing was done about the unemployment problem. It is true that they did away with the relief camps, but in place of those relief camps the young men were hounded about the country, driven from one city to another, kept one jump ahead of the vagrancy laws. Those who were fortunate enough to get direct relief got 50 cents a day, out of which they were supposed to house, feed and clothe themselves—all on 50 cents a day relief. And that was the Liberal party's answer to unemployment at that time.

Then the war came along, and apparently that granted a reprieve. The great development in the industrial machinery of this country in connection with the prosecution of the war brought about a period for which they now take credit, and describe as a great period of prosperity. And then after the war, when the leading economists, when the spokesmen for the chambers of commerce and the various banks, along with members of the C.C.F., predicted that when the war ended and a transformation from a wartime to a peacetime economy had taken place we would be faced with a recession, and an inevitable depression, the evil hour was put off. This was done first of all by the repairing of the ravages of war, indirectly by exports in connection with the Marshall plan, and so on, and then later through the development of the cold war followed by the great rearmament program and then Korea. All of these were artificial stimulants to the economy which managed to maintain a relatively high level of employment in this country.

But now, in spite of all that, in spite of the tremendous defence program, we are now faced with the fact that we have over half a million unemployed in Canada. And the government chooses to do nothing about it.

Now, with respect to the government's attitude toward the unemployed—

An hon. Member: Take care of the Socreds now.

Mr. Ellis: Someone says to take care of the Socreds. I have not mentioned them because, by their own choice, they have aligned themselves with our friends across the chamber, and with our Progressive Conservative friends to the right. They are the most vociferous element of free enterprise, and consequently have completely removed any possibility of attaining anything so far as reform is concerned.

I believe during the time that the late Mr. Bennett and the late Mr. Mackenzie King were wrestling with the unemployment problem in the thirties, in their own hearts they desired to see the end of unemployment. But they failed because their parties were committed to maintain the free enterprise system. And because they were tied to that system they found themselves powerless to grapple with the forces produced by it.

I hear some interruptions to my right, Mr. Speaker, but I have not been able to hear them clearly. I wish I could, and I would answer.

I suggest the reason the government has not been able to grapple with the problem today is that they are committed to the defence of the free enterprise system. We know that the Prime Minister quite rightly reminded the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) that they too were committed to a defence of the free enterprise system; and therefore offered no alternative. Concerning the economic problems faced by the people of this country, the failure of the government to deal with them would be matched by the failure of the official opposition to deal with them and the failure of the Socreds to deal with them, because any party which commits itself to a defence of free enterprise finds itself unable to deal with the problems facing the country at the present time.

Sir William Beveridge, in a study of the post-war situation in Great Britain, came to roughly the same conclusion, that within the narrow framework of free enterprise no solution was possible to our major economic difficulties. We in our group believe the health and the prosperity of the people of Canada to be more important than a slavish adherence to an outworn economic system. Because we believe that, we are in a position to offer policies that will tackle and overcome the problems facing Canada at the present time.

I realize it would be too much to expect the government to adopt our policies. That is too much to expect. I realize that after we have championed a cause for some considerable length of time and it grows in popularity with the Canadian people, when it reaches a certain stage then they are quite apt to reach out and embrace our program and our policies. We have even gone one step further. We have got to the stage where even the Conservatives are willing to reach out and embrace our policies. I believe the most interesting feature of the amendment offered by the Acting Leader of the Opposition was the fact that they now appear to be in favour of health insurance.

Mr. Blair: We have been for years.

Mr. Ellis: We have been arguing for health insurance up and down this country for years. The Liberals promised health insurance in 1919. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) reminded us of that fact the other day. I presume we will wait an equally long period of time for fulfilment of programs which they have not as yet announced regarding health insurance.

The Acting Leader of the Opposition has submitted an amendment in which he placed the official opposition in favour of health insurance. In these circumstances it seems very difficult to understand why, with the government apparently in favour of health insurance—around election times they certainly are—and with the official opposition in favour of health insurance—the C.C.F. has always been in favour of health insurance—we have not got it.

If the Conservatives are now in favour of health insurance, and if, as the hon. member suggests, they have been in favour of it all those years, the amazing thing is why have they not a hospitalization plan in Ontario where they have been in power for quite a few years. Saskatchewan instituted a hospitalization plan. A hospitalization plan was instituted in Alberta and in British Columbia. What about Ontario? Why have they not a hospitalization plan? If the Conservatives are serious in their support of health insurance, then I suggest they bear their weight of pressure on the premier of Ontario to get him immediately to implement at least a provincial hospitalization scheme in this province.

A question of immediate need is before us at the present time, and what is going to be done about it? We have a problem which the government, though it refuses to admit it, will not be able longer to evade. It appears that the government should now give some assurance to the people of Canada that they are willing first of all to accept the fact that unemployment does exist in Canada. It will be a big step forward if we can get them to admit that. Then, after having admitted we have a serious unemployment problem in Canada, they should do something about it, undertake some immediate program. First of all, I would suggest that the government offer to the provinces that they will undertake complete responsibility for all employable unemployed in Canada. They promised that prior to 1945. At the present time unemployment is a national problem, which can only be met on the national level. The government should reassure the people of Canada by coming out now and agreeing that their responsibility lies in taking full responsibility for all employable unemployed in Canada.

The federal government should be prepared immediately to undertake a public investment program in order not only to provide employment for the trades, but also to put into circulation purchasing power which of course would be diffused throughout the entire economy and would assist the businessmen and others than those directly employed in industry or in the construction industry. I think it is agreed that today we are living in an age when construction jobs are not carried on by scrapers and horses any more. There are very few pick and shovel construction jobs today. Construction in the country today involves not merely the payment of wages to those directly employed. There is also the purchase of machinery which provides employment for machine manufacturers and industry in various parts of Canada, and particularly in Ontario and Quebec where the industries are mainly located. The government could go a long way toward alleviating the unemployment problem if they were to undertake such a measure. I want to emphasize that this is a part of a public investment program and not a relief measure. There is great need for development of our resources in all parts of this country.

One of my colleagues mentioned also the South Saskatchewan dam. I can think of no better example of a type of project that should be commenced at the present time than the South Saskatchewan river dam. I mentioned a moment ago that in a public works project only a small percentage in some instances of the actual money involved goes into the area in which the construction project is taking place. In any great construction project there is a great leakage; that is, in the purchase of machinery, the capital goods that are required to carry out the project. A great deal of the money spent on that project will be spent in buying machinery, in buying supplies in all parts of Canada.

With respect to the South Saskatchewan river dam, there are those who feel that the benefits of that would accrue only to the people of Saskatchewan. Such an idea of course completely flouts economic facts. In order to build that dam it will be necessary to purchase a great deal of heavy machinery. Where would that machinery come from? It will come from the industrial areas of Ontario and Quebec. Certainly that is going to be of great assistance to the industrial workers in those parts of the country. There are going to be all sorts of raw materials that will come from various parts of the country. Admittedly some of these raw materials will be purchased in the United States and perhaps in other countries, but the bulk of these purchases will be made in Canada, and the amount of money spent on that dam will be spread throughout the country to the benefit of the entire dominion, not of one particular area of the country.

Apart from the South Saskatchewan dam, there are many other projects that could be carried on at the present time. Someone in the official opposition said something about highways. I think we realize that in the United States all the main highways have been built by the federal government. Today we in Canada have a situation where highways are of national importance, and yet the contribution the federal government has seen fit to make to the construction of highways is its share of the trans-Canada highway, which is very inadequate. What the federal government should do is to undertake to be responsible for building the main highways across Canada, the main international and interprovincial highways in this country, thus relieving the provinces of great financial burdens in building and maintaining highways, particularly in those parts of Canada that are sparsely settled.

Then of course there is the question of railway level crossings. That is a matter that should certainly receive the attention of the government. I know in my own city there is quite a number of extremely dangerous railway crossings and particularly along the main line of the railroad where there are double tracks.

These are some of the things which the government could be doing, but apparently they are prepared to sit back and do nothing and allow the situation to become progressively worse. My suggestion is that it is easier to deal with a problem now than a year hence or two years hence. What is needed now is a little bit of constructive planning, a little foresight which the government up to the present time has not shown. There are many others that could be suggested. Surely the government is in a position to know what the needs are in regard to public works projects across the country.

They could for example provide employment for a great many by the production of low rental housing units in various parts of Canada where the housing situation is most serious. There are many other worthwhile projects which could be undertaken by the government at this time if they were prepared to admit the seriousness of the unemployment problem. If they are not prepared to admit the problem exists, then it means that we in the opposition have to keep insisting that the government realizes the extent and the seriousness of the problem.

My closing suggestion to the government is once again that they offer some hope and assurance to the people of Canada that they are prepared to face up to the economic problems confronting the country at this time through a system of forward pricing, by some effort to provide parity prices for our farm commodities and by seeking through the means of public works projects to alleviate the immediate problem of unemployment where it exists in Canada.

The main thing is to agree now to assume responsibility for the employable unemployed in this country. No one province in this country is in a position to effectively tackle the problem on its own. Unemployment is a national problem. Indeed, one might argue that it is an international problem. Certainly it can be argued that it is an international problem in countries whose economies are as closely related as are those of the United States and Canada.

It is a national problem which must be met at the national level. I hope the government will not resort to its time-honoured strategy of passing the buck to the provinces and saying, "We will get together with the provinces and talk it over." They have talked it over for a couple of years and in the meantime a great many Canadians are in want, without employment and unable to maintain a decent standard of living.

Once again I suggest that the federal government must take upon its own shoulders responsibility for the condition in which we find ourselves today. Before the last election they were running around the country saying, "You have never had it so good. What a beneficent government we have down at Ottawa." You have never had it so good. Try telling one of the 600,000 unemployed that he has never had it so good. Try telling the farmers of this country who have been losing their markets that they have never had it so good. I am sure you will come in for a very rude awakening if you do.

In closing, I simply want to impress upon the government the necessity for immediate attention to these most serious problems. The people of Canada will await with a great deal of anticipation the activities of the government in this respect.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, frankly I was intrigued although amazed at certain statements made by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) during his address. He told us, by inference at least, that Abraham Lincoln was a socialist. It is rather surprising and amazing that it takes but one short speech to completely alter the facts of history.

I listened with a great deal of amusement while he was damning the Liberals and Conservatives and assuring the house and the country that they offered no hope and in the same breath asserting that they had stolen practically all that was good in the C.C.F. program. We are personally convinced that by virtue of that theft, if for no other reason, they offer little hope.

The speech of the hon. member reminded me of one that was delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), who took us into New Brunswick, then into Quebec and then back to British Columbia. Then in his spare time he commented on other things. I was reminded while listening to the hon. member's speech, and wanting to believe some of it, of last July when I was in Vancouver sitting in my car with the radio on. I had noted there was to be a program "Town Meeting in Canada" on the air, the subject to be discussed being co-existence, which of course embraced the general theme of whether it is possible for us to live in peace in the same world with the communists. During that program I heard the hon. member say that one of the Social Credit leaders in Ottawa had stated, I assume in this house, that he wanted war. Remembering that, I could not take him seriously yesterday, nor could I believe very much of what he said.

I hope in my approach to current issues at this time I may be realistic, objective and fair. At least that is my desire. An examination of the speech from the throne does indicate certain bright spots. There is no question about that, and I would be the first to admit it. Reference was made to the Disabled Persons Act having been proclaimed to go into effect on January 1 of this year. We welcomed that act last spring and were glad to see it proclaimed. We are pleased to note that all the provinces of Canada have agreed to enter into agreements with the federal government.

However, I am extremely disappointed in one respect. I have been compelled to conclude that when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) made so certain last spring that he would give only the minimum of information to the house, there was a reason for it. We questioned him —I did myself—with respect to the regulations which might be passed. Once again, I did not secure very much information. I find now that the regulations are so narrow and restrictive in character that were the government in my own province to drop its own act and operate only under the joint act 50 per cent of the people now receiving disability pensions in Alberta would be dropped completely from the rolls. That indicates how much more restrictive this new act is than the one which we have had in operation in Alberta for more than a year and a half. I regret that very much, because I had personal reasons to believe that in some respects our own provincial act was too restrictive in character.

The speech from the throne referred also to something with which we have dealt already, namely, certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am not going to talk about them, since we have already expressed our views.

One thing that does concern us is that the government has taken the position that unemployment is only seasonal and regional in character. Is it the intention of the government to broaden its public works program only in those areas where the condition is known to be extremely serious? I trust that that will not be their approach to this problem.

For years we have pressed, as have the Legion, for amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. We are pleased to note that this act is to be amended, that the rates are to be increased, and that the amount of permissive income will also be increased. However, I think I should serve notice now that it is going to be extremely difficult for us to be satisfied with anything less than the recommendations submitted by the Canadian Legion, because there is every reason to believe that their recommendations are realistic and are designed to meet current conditions.

We are also interested in noting that there are to be amendments to the Blind Persons Act. We understand the object of the amendments will be to lower the age of eligibility and raise the allowable income ceiling. We are in favour of this contemplated action, though I would not suggest at the moment that we are going to commit ourselves with respect to all the aspects of the amendments which the government may at a later date bring down. However, we approve of them in general.

We note that a joint committee is to be set up for the purpose of studying the Municipal Grants Act. Personally I am quite dissatisfied with the act as it now stands. Altogether too many deserving communities have been left out in the cold, and we trust that the committee may see fit to recommend a broadening of the base of this act so that it may go far beyond its present scope. In fact, I think good arguments could be advanced in support of the contention that it should cut completely across the board and cover all federal government installations within municipalities. I might well be asked whether I believe in the same thing from a provincial point of view; personally I do.

Those are not all the bright spots in the speech from the throne, but they are the only ones to which I will refer for the moment. Yesterday the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) made a plea for an extension of loans under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. He asked for a broadening of the regulations so that the act might apply within the province of New Brunswick. I have had some experience with the application of that act throughout Canada generally, and I believe there are certain very serious weaknesses. One is that the government, or the board charged with the operation of the act, in making its assessment of a farmer's land and chattels, seems to work on the theory that some time hence there is going to be a serious depression and that values will therefore be at a low level. Therefore, in assessing a farmer's property today for the purpose of determining whether they should authorize a loan they apply this fantastically low level of values. I am not blaming the persons who administer the act, because they are governed by the terms of the act itself and its resulting regulations. But I have looked over certain applications and I am utterly amazed to see the low values being placed on land and chattels, the result being that hundreds if not thousands of Canadians are prevented from securing assistance under this act.

In fact, I have been compelled to come to the conclusion that the act was not designed to assist people who really require help, because in most of the cases I have examined I have come to the conclusion that those who should qualify could have got along very nicely without any assistance whatsoever. I mention that only in passing because, while I do not know anything about the New Brunswick situation, and I am not referring to that situation in particular, the hon. member's reference to this matter brought my own experiences to mind. I might add that the limited number of loans that have been made, and the small amount which has been made available through various loans, would indicate that there seems to be something seriously wrong with the operations of the act.

I wish to come back now to the question of unemployment. In the speech from the throne the government contended that it is seasonal and regional. As far as I am concerned I believe that that is the master understatement of the year. There is a certain amount of seasonal unemployment, it is true, and there is a certain amount of regional unemployment. There is some which one might designate as transitional unemployment, but there are strong indications that over and above this we are faced with a situation where altogether too many Canadians are unemployed and many of them see no hope in the foreseeable future.

The government has stated that there are approximately 300,000 registered unemployed in this country. But it has been pointed out more than once in this house that there are also probably an equal number who, for some reason or other, have never registered at all, and reliable statistics seem to bear that out. There are indications at the present time, and I shall elaborate upon this in a moment, that certain of our important industries have either collapsed or are in the process of so doing. I believe the coal mining industry is a pertinent example, and I will also refer to that later on.

In this regard I would refer to the very noticeable, marked decline in net farm income. I think it was my leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who referred to this as the price cost squeeze. He was referring on the one hand to higher operation costs, and lower returns on the other. This has caused a very uneasy feeling among the farmers of western Canada, and I am sure among farmers in other provinces as well. We also have a feeling of uneasiness resulting from the continuation of the unreasonably heavy burden of taxation which is certainly aggravating the situation.

The people of my constituency read with a good deal of interest the reported remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) with respect to this matter. I cannot quote his words exactly but he did indicate that he was experiencing some concern on this matter, especially with that aspect of it dealing with sales and excise taxes.

In my part of western Canada we faced a rather difficult period last year, and as far as agriculture is concerned it was possibly a bit more difficult than is normally the case. These difficulties, in major parts, resulted from matters over which we have no control. For example, we had extremely wet weather, unusually heavy hail, and frost which struck the crops down prior to harvesting. But even worse, the frost came before the crops had ripened. Fortunately, while the picture looked extremely bleak around early October, the weather later changed and we were able to acquire the feed which is such an extremely important commodity in our mixed farming areas. The losses which have resulted have once again brought our farmers into direct conflict, if I may use the word in that sense, with our Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

A year or two ago I took a full 40 minutes to point out what I considered to be the existing weaknesses in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, particularly as it applies to the non-drought areas of western Canada. That act is just not realistic in any sense at all. It fails utterly to do the job which I think it should be designed to do in that area. As I said before, I cannot think of one single, solitary thing that has caused more bitter comment with respect to this government than has that same Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Before many more months go by I hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) may see fit to refer this act to the committee on agriculture with one important idea in mind, namely that of making it apply with some sense and reason to non-drought areas. I know that act must be a headache to all the men who try to administer it. I offer no criticism whatsoever of those men. I know many of them. They are trying desperately to do a good job, but they are trying desperately to do the impossible; and how frustrating that attempt must become. I say again to the Minister of Agriculture: For goodness' sake refer that act to the committee on agriculture and try to straighten out certain of those things.

Speaking of unemployment and speaking of the collapse of industry, I am compelled to make reference to one rather tragic happening in my own constituency. Located about 120 miles west of Red Deer is a town called Nordegg; and located at Nordegg are the great Brazeau collieries, one of the most modern mines in western Canada. Following a disastrous fire about five years ago the above-ground installations were completely modernized and one of the finest briquetting plants was installed. It cannot be said by anyone that the mine has not operated efficiently either as a consequence of poor management or as a consequence of failure to modernize. It is modern and it has been managed well. In that community have lived more than 1,000 people. The coal produced in that area was a weather-resistant coal used for domestic heating, railway fuel and steam-raising in general. I do not know whether or not I have already mentioned this fact, but the capital value of the installation there is about $1,500,000.

This mine supplied fuel for the Canadian National Railways. Later it was reduced merely to providing station coal. In April of 1954, 200 men were laid off. Newspaper reports indicate that next Sunday the mine will close down, with another 150 miners becoming unemployed. As I say, you cannot blame the operators. Over the past year production there has been declining by 20,000 tons per month. Whether or not the mine will be opened again will naturally depend upon a number of things. With those miners laid off at Nordegg and with the closing of that mine, it looks as though a ghost town is going to develop. It is true that there is a certain amount of logging and lumbering in that area but it is not an industry of sufficient size to maintain that town. Not only is it a tragedy from the standpoint of miners and their dependents but personally I think it is a tragedy from the standpoint of the national welfare and safety. Within the last four years about 2,000 miners have lost their jobs out there as a consequence of mines closing.

Mr. Speaker, I approach this subject not with the idea of criticizing anybody but with the idea of trying to point out the necessity of speeding up our efforts to keep this industry alive. We know what have been the causes for the deterioration in that industry in Canada. There has been the loss of markets because of competitive fuels. There has been the replacement of railway locomotives by diesel units and conversion of coal-burning locomotives to oil burners. We know that oil and gas progressively have eliminated coal from our local and our industrial markets.

We also know that excessive transportation costs have made almost impossible the capture and the retention of eastern Canadian markets for Alberta coal. We know also that the heavy importation of United States coal into central Canada has had a disastrous effect. More United States coal is imported into central and eastern Canada than is produced in western Canada. Production in 1953 alone in our Canadian coal industry was 1¼ million tons less than it was during the previous year, and recent statistics indicate further substantial decreases. If we are satisfied to let our coal industry fall into decay, all well and good; we are doing the right thing. But if we as Canadians believe that the future may demand an adequate coal supply—and certainly that is what I believe—we should keep our miners where they can continue in the only work which they are used to. If it is our desire to do that, then certainly we cannot allow that industry to fall apart.

We know that we have the dominion coal board. We know of the objectives which they set up in 1947; and those were good objectives. They were going to maintain an adequate supply of coal for all of our national requirements. Of course, it may be said that we have sufficient for our national requirements. They were going to support a sound and healthy coal-producing industry in Canada. Of course we have not just accomplished that objective. One of their purposes was the development of a steady and adequate market for the output of Canadian mines. We have not been able to do that. There was to be provision for fair wages and reasonably full employment for Canadian miners. Of course when we have had 2,000 of them become permanently unemployed out there, I believe, as far as miners are concerned, within the last four years, certainly we have not been able to maintain reasonably full employment. Then of course the board had as another objective, I believe, the extension of our markets for Canadian coal with the resultant saving of foreign exchange. Of course, instead of our finding extended markets for our western Canadian coal, we are losing markets. I am not blaming the dominion coal board at all. I am just trying to point out for our own benefit that while in 1947 we had five good objectives, with the exception of one we have just missed our mark completely. Personally I feel that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) is concerned about this matter. He is an Albertan. This matter falls within his department. I know that his department, in co-operation with the Alberta government, has been doing certain things. The federal government has its subvention program. The Alberta government, for example, has its fund for the rehabilitation of these men, among other things. We understand that the two are co-operating from a scientific point of view in an effort to find new uses, and consequently new markets, for this product. I have read the minister's statement, and I read all the debate which took place last June. I know from the statement of the minister that he feels, so he has said, that with a population of approximately 22 million at some future date, this country is going to need every source of fuel—I believe he said even firewood.

Anyone who understands the coal mining industry must realize that you cannot close these mines for long periods of time without serious deterioration, and in some cases they may become completely valueless and useless. If these experienced miners are to be removed and re-established in other lines of activity, it is highly possible that they will never go back to mining. Certainly, there is not very much chance of their sons ever taking up mining. Therefore, if what the minister states is true, that some time hence we will undoubtedly require all this fuel, it is going to be a very bleak picture if our mines cannot be put into operation because of deterioration and if we have to start to train miners, which is a long and hard process.

Now, when the gold mining industry in Canada showed some signs of deterioration and when the members from those areas spoke of the ghost towns that would develop, there was no hesitation on the part of this parliament in granting subsidies of $80 million, I believe. The united mine workers out there I believe asked the federal government to consider this question. They asked also that the federal government consider the question of restricting coal imports from the United States. I understand from a press report that a commission is presumably studying these two aspects of the problem.

I should like to know what developments have taken place up to date. Are there likely to be subsidies? Is the government likely to restrict the importation of coal from the United States? I understand also that a conference was held here last fall. I believe the miners themselves were represented, the operators were represented, the provincial government and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I understand this whole matter was gone into rather thoroughly, and I should like to know what has resulted from that conference. I should like to know what has been done as a consequence of that conference. Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I am not trying to place the blame. I know the provincial government has a responsibility in this field. I know that the federal government has a responsibility in this field. I am not trying to place the responsibility. I am trying to emphasize the urgency of preserving this industry and of preserving the way of life of so many of these miners and their dependents. As I say, they have been added to this unemployment roll.

We have had some question raised as to whose responsibility the employable unemployed are. If someone were to ask me whose responsibility the employable unemployed are, I would give my answer. I would not find it difficult to agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) who, in one of his columns which appeared in the Red Deer Advocate of December 1, 1954, had this to say:

> It seems to me that there is one point on which nobody in Canada should quibble. The federal government is primarily responsible for full employment or non-full employment.
> It is the federal authority, and only the federal authority, which has the necessary control over exports and imports, as well as over interprovincial trade. It is the federal authority alone which has the necessary power over taxes, money and credit.

Then he goes on:

> Nobody in any political party has challenged the above principle for at least 20 or 25 years past.

Then he adds this:

> It is a disgrace in this day and age that any decent citizen of Canada should be forced to choose between a soup kitchen and starvation.
> Vancouver and other great cities of Canada have every right to demand that the federal government should stand behind them when it is necessary to give financial assistance to unemployed not eligible for unemployment insurance.

Now, I hope that the hon. member for Vancouver South will be able to sell this to all of his colleagues on the other side of the house. I find no cause to disagree with him, although I would probably be a bit more realistic and say I do believe the provinces and municipalities bear some responsibility too. We should not be so concerned about trying to pin down responsibility as we should be about getting all to assume full responsibility and to bring a solution to a problem that is certainly most serious.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as one who is firmly convinced that all speeches should be cut to about 30 minutes, possibly I should set a fairly reasonable example.

(Translation):

Mr. Arthur Masse (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of each term, I usually speak thus to the students of Laval University: Whilst you are duty-bound by the university to attend my lectures, it is my duty to teach to the best of my ability, to be of service to you and the community at large.

Today, I find myself in the same position as far as my electors are concerned, because they have entrusted me with the task of making their feelings of loyalty known to the government of Canada. It is also my duty to bring their requests, their aspirations and their wishes to the attention of the government.

I must also congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, because they have been a credit to the electoral districts they represent and I am happy to offer them my sincere congratulations. They have faithfully served their respective constituencies.

Mr. Speaker, in the exercise of my profession, I have made it a point to examine loyally and dispassionately all situations and resolved never to form an opinion before giving the matter full consideration. I have been well served by this practice in the exercise of my profession, and I am happy to say that I have endeavoured to follow the same tactics in the discharge of my political duties. I might have been late to embark upon a political career. Yet, I feel happy about it, because I was thus enabled to acquire an experience of facts and deeds of which I would have been otherwise deprived and of which I may now avail myself in numerous circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, I will not delay any longer than necessary the hon. members, because I intend, during my speech, to discuss agriculture in particular, which is, with lumbering, the main industry in the county of Kamouraska. Besides, when speaking about agriculture in lower Quebec, it is logical to associate it to the lumbering industry.

It is becoming, at the outset of a new year, to a good head of family or a good company accountant, to review the developments, good or bad, that occurred during the past year, in order to be able to alter one's stand, if need be. The government's achievements, during the year, have been relatively satisfactory. I well realize, however, that it is difficult for any government to satisfy each and every citizen of this country but I am confident that the government of Canada, during this past year, have acted in no partisan fashion, that they have not attempted to serve one man, one province, one municipality or one party, but have tried to stabilize the economy of the nation as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, the year began auspiciously with the Prime Minister's trip around the world.

It is important that a country like Canada be able to communicate to such distant areas the feelings it nurses for those who cannot have the same ideas or the same mentality, but who are all filled with the same spirit of mutual co-operation, for the purpose of promoting their own interests.

I was somewhat surprised by the statements made on the other side of the house yesterday and today. If account is taken of the ten by-elections held since the last general elections, in which by-elections the Liberal party carried six seats, the Progressive Conservative party three, and the C.C.F. party one only, the statements made by some prophets are somewhat surprising and there is no doubt that the Liberal party still has the confidence of the public.

In the course of the same year, the disabled persons of Canada were fully satisfied with the attitude taken by the government of the country in its endeavours to help these less fortunate ones. Consequently, it is my opinion that the Canadian government served the country very well.

I had intended at the beginning of my remarks to speak mainly of agriculture, and I must confine myself to that subject since agriculture is the main industry in Kamouraska county.

There is no doubt that revenues were not as large last year as they had been during the preceding four years. But our Quebec farmers do not lose hope. They are not unduly optimistic but, on the other hand, they do not lean to pessimism, which no brave soul should feel.

Weather conditions were bad from early spring to the fall; farmers had a hard time seeding their fields and taking in their crop. In certain areas the crops were very good but they were not so good in other areas, and I am afraid that in some parts of my county seed grain will be less plentiful next season.

However, as lumbering is the essential complement of agriculture in my constituency, I was glad to note the good will shown by the right hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in connection with wooded lots. For many years, I have insisted on the establishment of wooded lots on illustration stations, particularly at the Ste. Anne de la Pocatière experimental station, for the benefit of the farmers visiting that district. I am glad today to congratulate and thank the hon. minister for this project is being implemented.

To realize how much our forests contribute to agriculture in the lower Quebec area, one need only read publication No. 890 of the federal Department of Agriculture. This pamphlet deals with wooded lots on Ontario farms and, at page 22, it is indicated that on the 162 farms which were thoroughly investigated, production reached a total value of $516 per farm.

That is indisputable proof that lumbering plays a capital role together with agriculture in regions such as ours, where forests cover about 75 per cent of the land, only 22 per cent being suitable for cultivation.

Those experiments have been conducted in the province of Ontario with the co-operation of the federal Department of Agriculture and of the Ontario government. I hope similar experiments will be undertaken in my province to show how necessary it is to complement farming through the use of a wooded lot in most regions.

On behalf of the farmers of my county and a number of co-operative societies, namely the U.C.C., I ask the Minister of Agriculture to maintain in operation the Agricultural Prices Support Act, especially with respect to butter. The average farm in our province covers from 80 to 100 "arpents" and earned for its owner, last year, from $1,400 to $1,500. However, after the farmer has paid his municipal taxes, amounting to around $100, provided for the maintenance of his buildings, valued at some $8,000 or $10,000, and for a family of five or six children, his income is practically all spent. I therefore believe it is in the government's interest to maintain the stand it has taken regarding the support of farm prices.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to say a few words on the problem of unemployment, but I am rather pleased with the government's stand on the matter. In the past there was no unemployment among our Quebec farmers, but today modern ideas have somewhat changed the attitude or thinking of our young men.

I think it is time for all workers, whether they be on farms or elsewhere, to contribute to and enjoy unemployment insurance benefits in order that in circumstances which are entirely beyond their control they may be in a position to meet the situation.

I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill). As it happens my remarks have been misinterpreted in this house, so much so that I am believed to be opposed to immigration, which is not the case. As regards my own constituency more particularly, I believe that the available space is rather restricted. Would it not be possible to restrict immigration during the winter months, that is from November to March, taking into account the rigours of our climate and the situation with which the new Canadian is faced on his arrival? I believe that that would help to make the future home of newcomers more pleasant.

On motion of Mr. Masse the debate was adjourned.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

The Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will take up the resolutions under government notices of motions, dealing with the resolution having to do with the appointment of a rules committee and the resolution having to do with the appointment of the Criminal Code committee. I understand that there will be some discussion on these but probably not a prolonged debate. We will then come back to this present debate.

Mr. Low: May I ask the house leader if it is the intention to sit tomorrow night?

Mr. Harris: It did not occur to anyone on this side as far as I know not to sit tomorrow night.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if it is the intention to call the two resolutions in that order, the one dealing with the rules committee first?

Mr. Harris: The first motion is the one having to do with NATO which is going to stand. The second in order is the one having to do with the rules committee.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 14, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee to be designated be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that there was a committee on procedure established during the last session of parliament which held meetings up to very near the end of the session, and which brought in a report recommending that a committee be set up again at this session, at an early date. The purpose of this motion is to ask the house to act in conformity with the recommendation contained in that report.

I think it is recognized by all members of the house that an effort should be made to bring about a more orderly manner of handling the business of the house, and that it should be possible to do that without in any way curbing unduly or limiting unduly the freedom of speech and discussion in matters concerning the country's business.

There have been various ways suggested. One of the minor ways was an improvement in the manner of handling resolutions respecting the introduction of bills with monetary applications; and I think we were all very pleased the other day when it was possible to deal with the formalities of fifteen resolutions in a matter of only two or three minutes, instead of fifteen times that amount of time which would have been required had those formalities been carried out in the usual fashion.

I do not think anyone would seek the elimination of the traditional formalities that have their place in the proper handling of the business of the house; but I think hon. members in all parts of the house would wish to have that done in a manner which would leave as much time as possible for the consideration of the less formal aspects of the business of the house.

I understand it is by general agreement that this motion is placed before Your Honour today and that, though there are varying views as to the advisability of some of the amendments to the rules that were considered last year, there is the general feeling that an attempt should be made to improve those rules and that the matter should be disposed of as expeditiously as the proper consideration of it will permit.

I do not think I can add anything more because the terms of the resolution in themselves appear to be terms that should commend themselves to the judgment of the house: "for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business."

I think that is the goal each and every one of us would have in mind—but only such changes as "may be desirable." I believe we would agree that it is not desirable to have rules that permit of obstruction, but neither is it desirable to have rules that interfere with the proper exercise of the responsibilities of each of us to discuss those matters that are properly before the house.

I would hope that the committee could be set up at an early date and that it would, as I am sure it will, envisage its responsibilities in the light of the dignity of parliament and the great price we all attach to free democratic processes in dealing with public affairs.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt the present resolution will receive the unanimous support of the house. May I express my own pleasure at seeing the motion brought on early, because I think it is helpful that this committee should be set up at an early date.

The terms of reference are identical with those that have been approved by the house now on three previous occasions. Actually the committee is now in the course of being appointed for the fourth consecutive session. That is not to say that the committee has been dilatory in its work in the past; I do not think that can be fairly said. But the task is not an easy one, and the committee has, I think, taken a fairly comprehensive view of its responsibilities. With the proposal that effort be made to expedite the transaction of public business in this house, I am sure there will be agreement. Certainly, those who sit in this part of the house will give every co-operation to any sound method for transacting the business of Canada in this place in a proper and expeditious manner, provided that it is done in keeping with the essential rights of members of this house, all of them, and with due regard for the dignity and decorum which ought to characterize the transaction of the business of this country.

May I say also that I am glad to see on the order paper, in response to suggestions that have come from us in this part of the house in the past, and notably from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), a greater volume of government business than has appeared on the order paper at this stage in past sessions. I think that is an indication of desire on the part of the government to help all in this house to contribute on their part to expediting the business of the house.

Now, sir, there is one matter that does not require more than casual mention. When this committee was set up two years ago, in January, 1953, I raised the point that occasion might arise for widening somewhat the terms of reference. The Prime Minister at that time said that if any such occasion arose he would see to it that the matter was brought before the house and every assistance given to the committee in making sure its terms of reference were wide enough to do whatever it thought necessary in the way of review of the rules. Actually, in the discussion in the committee, it has not yet been found necessary to ask the house for any widening of terms; but I presume if such a situation should arise the Prime Minister would be good enough to indicate that co-operation will be given in bringing that matter before the house as soon as possible.

Sir, I do not know whether, when the committee makes its report—and I have no doubt it will make its final report at this session—it will be possible for the house to receive the report with the same unanimity that has characterized the proceedings of the house today; but certainly as to the setting up of this committee I am sure there will be general agreement in the house.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too welcome the proposal that this committee on procedure be established at an early date, and we shall be glad to place our members on the committee and give the question of house business our very serious consideration. However, I feel that once again I must make the point which we feel very strongly, namely, that the rules of the house are the possession of the whole house. They are the rules of parliament across the years, not the rules of any one session of parliament, or of any parliament between two elections. I realize the problem that that creates, because we are in a democracy in which the majority governs. But I suggest that with respect to the rules of parliament particular care has to be taken that a government majority does not use that majority to make rules which unduly, if I may use the Prime Minister's words, interfere with the freedom of speech and the rights of all of us who are here.

I remind hon. members that it is a long time, 28 years, I believe, since the last general revision of the rules of this house was made. That means that the members of parliament in 1927 were making rules not just for themselves but for a good many parliaments that have followed. We shall have to take that approach in this committee, and I urge very strongly that it be recognized right from the start, not that unanimity must be required for any change, but that there be pretty general agreement amongst the representatives of both sides of the house, amongst representatives of all parties, before any very serious changes are made.

Just to make it crystal clear, Mr. Speaker, that I do not mean by that that I am opposed to any changes that interfere with any of our existing practices, I want to repeat what I have already said in public and in this session, that I think we can well afford, on a fair basis to everybody, without unduly interfering with the rights of free speech, to cut the 40-minute limit on speeches down to 30 minutes. There is objection to that from some quarters, I have no doubt, but I want to make it clear that in asking for general agreement to be the basis of any change, it is not simply a case of my objecting to any and all changes, because there is this change I have suggested to which I am prepared to agree, and there are others as well.

It seems to me the principle should be, is the change fair to all members of the house, or is it a change that interferes with the rights of any particular section of the house? We have to be particularly careful that the majority does not use its power to interfere with the rights of the minority. In that vein I mention in particular the long-established traditional rights that belong to all private members respecting the raising of grievances and the discussing of expenditures of public moneys. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that when it comes to any changes affecting the right to raise grievances on going into supply, when it comes to limiting discussion of expenditure of public funds, I think those on the committee from the other side know that they will find in us on this side a certain degree of obstinacy.

We feel that these traditional rights should be protected very carefully, and the responsibility for that protection rests just as much on those who constitute the majority in this house as it does on those of us who are in the minority. I say again I am glad to have this committee established, and I am glad it is being established early. We shall give the work of that committee our best and most serious attention in the hope that some changes in the rules that will help to expedite the business of the house can be made at this session. But let us remember that, through all of this, what we are dealing with is not the rules for one session or for one parliament. They are the rules of parliament as a whole across the years.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I might say that we in this group are also glad that this motion to set up a committee on procedure has been brought on in the early days of the session. We believe it is possible to take steps to expedite the business and efficiency of the house without seriously impairing the privileges and the rights of the members, and we certainly believe that it would be of importance to cut the length of speeches from 40 minutes to 30 minutes. We believe that by so doing we would be improving the speeches because so often a lot of padding is put in a speech in order to fill out the 40 minutes.

We trust that it will be possible at this session for this committee to make greater progress than it has been able to do in the past.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, as has been said, I do not wish unduly to delay the passing of this resolution, but I have the conviction that we shall have considerable discussion in this house if any report is brought back from the committee, and perhaps it would be better to have a little of that discussion before we go into committee so that we shall have some idea of where we stand. I have to say that I have noticed recently a feeling that the time of parliament in session should be cut down. That seems strange after the action we took last year to see that we were fairly well remunerated for the time we were here. I have seen throughout the press during the recess expressions of opinion in regard to parliament that did neither credit to the institution of parliament itself nor to the newspapers but was apt, in my opinion, to raise doubts in the minds of people as regards parliament's value. Now perhaps we could shorten the time we are here by hurrying up the procedure and by rushing things through. I believe that in the Soviet union they get away with one-day sessions. Possibly those who are impatient of the time the members hold up the house would not go that far, but that is a target that we could have in mind.

Let me draw to the attention of the house the purpose for which the rules as they are have been made, as expressed by one Hatsell who dealt with precedents on proceedings in the House of Commons quite a while ago in 1818. We find that citation 900, in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, states:

> So far the maxim is certainly true and founded on good sense that as it is always in the power of the majority by their numbers to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapon by which the minority can defend themselves from similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules and proceedings which have been found necessary from time to time and are become the standing orders of the house, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can alone be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

I hope the large and successful majorities in this house will restrain themselves somewhat and in their own interests be sure that the minority has all the time and all the opportunity which is available to them to express themselves in this house.

I have served on most of the committees on procedure that have been set up since I came here, with the exception of one session when through illness I was not able to serve, and I hope I can be on the committee this year when it is set up. I am sure we can come to some understanding as to the recommendations to be made to this house to better streamline the procedure, provided of course that the government members are not too impatient with those of us who are anxious to maintain those privileges which we have.

I remember when serving on the committee last year that the leader of the house asked the opposition members, and perhaps he asked all of the members, at the conclusion of the committee's deliberations, if they had any further suggestions to make as to how the rules could be improved. I recall telling him that I was not going to make any suggestions as to how my own abilities, if that is the proper word to use, to criticize the government might be curtailed, but I told him that I was willing if we got something in exchange.

Joint Committee on Criminal Law

I heard over the radio last Sunday night a comment attributed to Sir John A. Macdonald concerning horse-trading. If I might paraphrase this I would say I think we will stand solidly on fundamentals but we will horse-trade on details.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): As a relatively young man in terms of service as far as this house is concerned, I am a little reluctant to offer advice but I certainly welcome the proposed setting up of this committee because I believe very deeply in this matter—that the great strength of our system of parliament is due to the fact that it is made up of a great cross-section of all types of people in this country.

There are some of us who are not professional politicians and there are some of us who do not want to sit here all the time, nor should this become a place for those who have already made their mark in the business field and are looking for what little bit of honour may be attached to this place. I think that we can keep our system strong only if this house continues to attract to it a broad cross-section of people in this country.

I just wanted to say that at this time, and I am looking forward to some tangible results from this committee.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

JOINT COMMITTEE TO REPORT ON SPECIFIC MATTERS RELATED TO THE CRIMINAL LAW

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent;

That 17 members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the house at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this house; that the quorum of the said committee be nine members thereof; and that standing order 65 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while the house is sitting and to report from time to time;

That the minutes of the proceedings and the evidence of the special committee appointed last session to inquire into and report upon the foregoing questions, together with all papers and records laid before it, be referred to the said committee;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and of parliament, and that standing order 64 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee have power to engage the services of counsel;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

He said: All of the hon. members are aware that at the last sitting of parliament a reference was made to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, and (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent. Certainly those who served upon the committee will recall working very assiduously on that, in co-operation with representatives appointed by the other place; and that very considerable progress was made. On June 15 the committee made its final report in which it said this:

The committee finds that it will not be able to complete at the current session of this parliament its inquiries into the matters referred to it for report and, accordingly, recommends:

1. That a corresponding committee be established and appointed early in the next session of this parliament to resume the studies and continue the inquiries initiated by this committee.

The purpose of the present resolution is to do just that. Hon. members will see upon reading the terms of the resolution that they are all the same with the exception of the following, namely:

That the minutes of the proceedings and the evidence of the special committee appointed last session to inquire into and report upon the foregoing questions, together with all papers and records laid before it, be referred to the said committee.

The reason for the inclusion of this last-quoted clause is self-evident. I do not think there is anything more to be said and I am sure that members of the committee will be anxious to have it re-established as soon as possible in order that they may continue with their work.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

ACTION WITH RESPECT TO EXPORT OF STRATEGIC GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) based on a report in the Montreal Gazette this morning under the caption,

"U.K. plugs leaks in export of strategic goods to reds". Would the Prime Minister inform the house as to whether or not any further action is being contemplated by the government in this matter as it affects Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I did not see this report in the Montreal Gazette to which the hon. gentleman refers. We have not found that there was any leakage of strategic goods from Canada to the reds. It may be there is information in the United Kingdom which would indicate that strategic goods from some sources may be leaking through to the reds, but I have no doubt that if that is so it will be one of the matters that will be brought to our attention at the London conference, and I can assure the hon. member and the house that we are most anxious there should be no such leakage. If there is any indication that further action by us would be useful it certainly will be considered and proper measures taken.

HIGHWAYS

POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF NORTHWEST HIGHWAY FROM DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any decision has been taken to transfer responsibility for the northwest highway from the Department of National Defence to some other department? If so, what is the decision and when would any such proposed transfer be made?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my memory is not sufficiently reliable to allow me to make a positive answer to the hon. member's question without having looked at the record. I will take his question as notice and will have the records looked up.

CIVIL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO SHARING OF COST IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the statement by Mr. Fred Gardiner, chairman of the metropolitan Toronto council, appearing in the January 12 issue of the Globe and Mail, and I quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member put his question without quoting from a newspaper.

Mr. Enfield: The chairman of that council mentioned that arrangements would soon be made—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Enfield: In view of the reference to sharing the cost of civil defence made by the chairman of that council, can the minister say if any agreement has been entered into by the federal government and the province of Ontario providing for the sharing of the cost of civil defence on a basis similar to that contained in arrangements made with other provinces?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of his intention to ask this question. I can say that following the conferences I have had with the premier of Ontario and the head of the metropolitan governing body in Toronto, I am hopeful it will be possible for an announcement along these lines to be made about the middle of February.

FARM LOANS

REQUEST FOR LENIENCY IN MAKING COLLECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister give an assurance that during the present financial emergency the utmost leniency will be exercised in the matter of collections from western farmers who have borrowed under the Farm Improvement Loans Act or the farm loan board?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of there being any complaints about the manner in which these collections are made, but I can assure the hon. member that the officials who administer the acts will bear in mind the terms of the acts and the spirit parliament had in mind in passing them.

(Translation):

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY INTO TRAGEDY AT STE. FOY HOSPITAL, QUEBEC CITY

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to put to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), of which I have already given him notice.

Is the minister aware of the fact that a tragedy has only very recently taken place in the veterans hospital, Laurier boulevard and Ste. Foy road, in Quebec city, where one of the patients, a member of the armed forces, was found hanging by the neck? If the minister does know about this incident, will he say whether an inquiry has been instituted and what have been its findings?

Has the minister given instructions so that more adequate supervision may be exercised in order to avert repetition of such a tragedy?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was informed of the tragic accident to which the hon. member refers. An inquiry has been held. It has revealed that there was nothing to indicate that such an accident was about to take place. As a matter of fact the provincial police have conducted an investigation into the matter and the coroner's verdict was that it was a case of "suicide while temporarily insane," death "not being attributable to negligence on anybody's part".

I can assure my hon. friend that all D.V.A. hospitals are instructed to take proper precautions at all times.

BUTTER

SUPPORT PRICE—INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Agriculture say whether the present support price for butter will be continued as requested by the Quebec section of the farmers' union and other farm organizations?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The present support price for butter will be continued until May 1. It is not customary for the government to make decisions with regard to the future this far in advance.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED STATEMENT AS TO FUTURE REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration based on a report carried yesterday in the Calgary Albertan quoting Mr. J. D. McFarlane of Ottawa, chief inspector of immigration, as stating that immigration will be reduced in future.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nickle: The question is, sir, was Mr. McFarlane speaking on behalf of the government in making this statement?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did not see the quotation to which reference has been made and I think I had better have a look at it before making any statement.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

INCOME TAX APPEAL BOARD—REFERENCE TO ENTERTAINMENT OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister yet in a position to report to the house as to the results of his inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the income tax appeal board's rejection of a claim relating to a certain plush residence, and can he tell the house the name of the firm which made the application in question?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am not yet in a position to say to what extent one can go in view of the fact that under the act an appellant from an income tax assessment can ask for a hearing in camera. That is a right it is not within the discretion of the board to refuse and the practice of the board, about which I have not yet sufficient legal advice, is that when such an application is made there is no disclosure made about the identity of the appellant.

Mr. Knowles: Then may I ask a supplementary question either of the Prime Minister or of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris)? In view of the public interest in this matter, is consideration being given to amending the necessary legislation so as to remove this cloak of secrecy from practices of this kind?

Mr. St. Laurent: Up to the present time there has been no positive advice given us to the effect that an amendment would be necessary. If it appears that nothing can be done without amendment, then of course consideration will be given to whether and in what form an amendment should be brought before the house.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF ACT TO COVER FLOODED ACREAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the government at this session of parliament give consideration to amending the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to provide that flooded acreage the farmer intended to seed be, for the purpose of the act, considered seeded acreage?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I would like to read to the house the section of the act which would have to be amended if the suggested action were undertaken:

(d) "cultivated land" means land that in the year of award was seeded to crop or in summer fallow and includes land seeded to grass in any year if the productivity thereof was maintained in the year of award;

With regard to the phrase in the question "intended to be seeded", I do not know of any way in which we can amend the act in order to make it possible to have a provision of that kind. If we were going to amend the act it would have to take under consideration the fact that what is being pressed upon us at this time is something entirely different from anything we had in mind when the act was passed. The act was passed to take care of drought and the terms of it are sufficiently loose that we have been able to apply it to flooded areas under certain circumstances.

There is some question as to the manner in which it would be amended if it were decided to do so and it is of course a matter which will be given consideration. But I would like to point out that that was not the intention of the act when placed on the statute book.

CHEESE

REPORTED RUMOURS OF FURTHER LARGE SHIPMENTS INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) a question. I think he needs no notice of it. In view of the grave concern expressed by the dairymen throughout Canada with regard to rumours that other large shipments of cheese are to be expected in Canada, can the minister say whether he or the government expects increased shipments in the next month or so?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps I could answer that question, Mr. Speaker. We do not expect any further substantial shipments of cheese from any source for at least six months and probably at least nine months.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RESIGNATION OF DR. L. B. THOMSON AS DIRECTOR OF P.F.R.A.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The other day the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me a question about the resignation of Dr. L. B. Thomson. It was a question that had been fairly carefully framed and I asked for time to see it in Hansard before attempting to answer it. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for his patience in waiting until my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was in his seat to make a further answer. I suggested to him that there might be some supplementary question that I would not be in a position to answer from my own memory.

In elaborating his question the hon. member referred to "tentative resignations". My information is that there was nothing tentative about Dr. Thomson's resignation. It was a resignation submitted to the responsible minister for such action as the governor in council might see fit to take. There does not appear to be any legal requirement for such a resignation. The resignation was evidently submitted as a matter of propriety.

No action with respect to the resignation was taken before the date of the "uncertain political event" to which the hon. member referred; and subsequent to that event the minister responsible recommended that, as no other person was available for appointment to the post of director of P.F.R.A. with qualifications comparable with Dr. Thomson's—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Did he not recommend his son?

Mr. St. Laurent: —and as Dr. Thomson was not embarking on a political career, his resignation should not be accepted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was disembarking at that time.

Mr. Rowe: Very convenient.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SALE OF HOTELS—PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and his parliamentary assistant, perhaps I might be permitted to answer on behalf of the minister the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) which reads as follows:

Can the minister give the house any information about the sale of Canadian National hotels, with particular reference to the safeguarding of the rights of the employees concerned?

The management of the Canadian National Railways advise that they have accepted an offer from a Canadian syndicate headed by Mr. Walter F. Thorn, of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, to purchase the Prince Arthur hotel, Port Arthur; the Prince Edward hotel, Brandon; and two summer resorts, Minaki lodge and Pictou lodge.

Some months ago an unsolicited offer was received by the railway, and subsequently the management published a series of advertisements inviting interested parties, particularly local community interests, to submit other offers.

Only one all-inclusive offer was made, which was from the individual originally interested.

Before the properties are transferred as going concerns, which will be March 1, officials of the Canadian National Railways will visit Port Arthur and Brandon to interview the staffs of the hotels.

The two resort hotels are, of course, serviced almost entirely by temporary employees.

The management advise it is the policy of the new owners to maintain the hotels' traditional high standard of service and efficiency. The syndicate have stated that in line with this policy a program of capital expenditures has been planned for all four hotels to begin early in 1955.

With regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, the management advise that those employees eligible to exercise their seniority rights in accordance with the wage agreements will be able to transfer to other Canadian National hotels if they wish to do so.

I might add that the management are making a press announcement today substantially along the above lines.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Apparently some of the employees are to be permitted to transfer to other hotels. Is employment available for them in these other hotels?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am simply conveying a message from my colleague the Minister of Transport. I shall be glad to refer my hon. friend's question to the minister.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Was the sale of these publicly-owned hotels to private interests approved by the government?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): As I say, I should not be answering supplementary questions. I may say quite frankly that I do not know too much about the matter. I have no recollection of approval by the government. As far as I know it is within the competence of the management of the railway to undertake a transaction of this kind.

Mr. Knowles: Could they sell the whole railway without consulting the government?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I rather think so, if they got a good price for it.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. Arthur Masse (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when dealing with agricultural matters in my constituency, I said it was urgent that the government maintain the support of farm prices, especially as far as butter is concerned, as it is one of the main sources of income for the majority of our Quebec farmers.

I also stated that because lumbering and farming are the two sources of adequate income, it is urgent and necessary that they receive the same attention from our governments.

I also mentioned that 75 per cent of my constituency is made up of wooded lots, three-quarters of which are but some 50 years old and that during the past 10 years privately-owned timber limits have been worked beyond their possibilities.

I would like to say something to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) about his appreciation of the province of Quebec, my province. I listened closely to some of the things he had to say, and I read the whole of his unbecoming statement on the residents of my province. I believe I am warranted in saying that I know that province from east to west and from north to south, having travelled through it on several occasions in the course of my professional duties. When the hon. member asserts that it is ripe for communism, it is a pleasure for me to take it up and say, as an answer, that as long as no socialist party succeeds in taking root in Quebec, communism is not to be feared. I am also under the impression that the information made available to him came from certain groups of unsuccessful socialists who carry no weight with the authorities of my province.

Moreover, with respect to his statement in which he mentioned his meeting with two Catholic priests, I would advise him, if opportunity offers again, to go to the ecclesiastical authorities and ask them what they think of the people under their jurisdiction.

Mr. Dufresne: He gave no names though.

Mr. Masse: The province of Quebec, like every other province, for that matter, has contributed to the development and expansion of this nation of ours. When one is aware of the spirit of tradition in the parishes of Quebec province, where the land has been cleared by families established there for three hundred years and who have been there ever since, settled on the property of their ancestors, it is not difficult to understand the feelings of my fellow citizens. When we really understand how these people are attached to their family and their parish and how good their relations are with the established authority, we need have no fear of communism there.

I am by no means happy to have to make remarks such as these which may seem to be a reflection upon another hon. member, but I feel it is my duty to protest and to defend the honour of my constituents.

I am not particularly surprised by some remarks coming from members on the opposite side, who would have us believe that everything is wrong with the administration of this country. Those are the same complaints that we hear every year. I want these members to know that I am a Liberal by principle, that I believe the Liberal party has done more than any other for the development of Canada in the past fifty years. It was the Liberal party, headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which contributed most to the expansion of Canada, through the establishment of the transcontinental railway and through its efforts to unite provinces having different mental habits and speaking different languages. It was another Liberal leader, the Righ Hon. Mackenzie King, who for the first time concerned himself with the welfare of big families by the adoption of family allowances and of the first legislation to better the condition of labour. And, in these days, it is not a mere result of circumstances if our Canadian economy is undergoing such extensive development. It is due to the foresight of the present Prime Minister. I am convinced that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is entitled to his share of credit for the rapid expansion of our natural resources in general. It is because this party's membership includes men who, looking to the future, have succeeded in convincing the most brilliant graduates of our universities to contribute to the development of Canada.

With a Liberal government such as we have today, the youth of my province and of the whole of my country can look forward to the future with confidence, provided they properly fertilize the furrows so finely traced for them.

(Text):

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that a manner of saving the time of the house would be to discontinue the repetition of the congratulations that are invariably extended to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think those congratulations may be taken for granted after they have been extended by the leaders of the respective parties.

I am going to deal with a number of matters this afternoon that I believe are of interest to the people of Canada as a whole. However, before doing so, may I say this is the first opportunity I have had to deal with a situation that I have brought before parliament on previous occasions, namely, the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river and the need of immediate action being taken to meet the situation that again prevails on that river this year. Within the last few days pollution has again attacked the water supply of the cities of Prince Albert and North Battleford. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) have been communicated with and, without going into detail on this occasion, I believe that the time has come, and is long overdue, when action should be taken with regard to the question of interprovincial rivers to the end that pollution of these rivers by industry or by any body or individual whatsoever shall not be permitted.

Last session I endeavoured on a number of occasions to secure an amendment to the Criminal Code making it an offence punishable with serious penalties to allow pollution to take place at any place where the water supply of any town or city is interfered with. I again repeat that suggestion. Indeed, I understand that the mayor of Prince Albert, Mr. David Stuart, has appealed within the last two or three days on behalf of the city council of the city of Prince Albert for assistance and has asked for effective action to permit of the control of interprovincial streams, particularly such streams as are used as a source of a domestic water supply.

The situation is a serious one for those cities. The council of Prince Albert at a meeting held a day or so ago placed the responsibility upon the federal government, and I believe that one of the major ways in which that responsibility can be discharged is by placing a section in the Criminal Code to cover the offence. I would like to see set up an interprovincial board on water pollution, a board similar to the board of transport commissioners, which would have power to recommend what is necessary to preserve interprovincial waters for the Canadian people, rather than permit them to be detrimentally affected by the wrongful action of individuals or corporations in another province.

The speech from the throne is an interesting document. The government is a changed one. I doubt whether in your experience in this house, Mr. Speaker, you have ever seen a more subdued government, as they face up to conditions that prevail in this country. The Prime Minister spoke with urbanity and a brilliant lack of promises of action regarding these problems. Mr. King said on occasion that speeches from the throne were to conceal rather than to reveal. On that basis this is indeed a masterpiece.

I must mention another question while the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is in the house. A few minutes ago the long expected answer to the attempted resignation by Mr. Thomson was given. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) says in effect that the resignation was not to be effective until November 30, or in other words until after the Liberal convention in the province of Saskatchewan had taken place and when it was over it was found necessary to keep him in the public service, because there was no one else who could fill the position of director of P.F.R.A. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine what a catastrophe would have occurred had he been chosen as Liberal leader in the province of Saskatchewan!

Playing ball with a position in any department of government in that manner is not conducive to keeping organizations headed by such a person, however eminent he may be, from being touched by the suggestion of political partisanship. I believe everyone in the public service—and I have taken this stand on previous occasions—may remove himself from the public service if he desires to take public office.

But does that justify a resignation that simply is postponed until the outcome of an uncertain event? I think one of the reasons for the success of the convention—and it was a successful convention, based upon numbers present—was the fact that there was free discussion. People tell me that the reason for the success of the convention measured by numbers present was the fact that Simmie and "Jimmie" and "Gimmie" Thomson were engaged in controversy before the convention: "Give me the leadership or give me my job back."

What did Mr. Simmie say? Are there politics in P.F.R.A.? Many persons in the organization are doing their best, and resent what has taken place in this case. What did Mr. Simmie say regarding P.F.R.A. and, in general, the attempt on the part of Mr. Thomson to play ball with a position of responsibility in the service of the crown? He said this:

> It seems I did not make myself clear. I believe that Mr. Gardiner is in control of a political machine, and that he is using or causing P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. to be used for political purposes, and that constitutes unwarranted interference with the leadership race.

And on another occasion, setting out his views of the situation, he said this:

> I am saying there is something wrong in Saskatchewan. I say it with all my heart, that Mr. Gardiner does not know what is going on. The P.F.R.A. and the P.F.A.A. are being used as a political arm for somebody. I am saying that if Mr. Gardiner knew it he would not allow it.

Mr. Speaker, this type of thing is detrimental to the preservation of a non-political civil service. It is the kind of thing which endangers the inviolability of the civil service. There is no justification for a government's receiving a resignation which is dependent for its determination upon a contingent result, and then restoring that person to his position in the civil service after he has participated in a political manner and for political purposes during the interval before his resignation is considered.

The speech from the throne reveals but little. The Prime Minister is about to leave for Great Britain, there to represent Canada. While in England he is to receive the honour of the freedom of the city of London. What is he going to do when he is over there? What stand does he intend to take before that conference of commonwealth prime ministers? How will he speak for Canada? That we do not know. Of that we have no knowledge. We do know one thing, that if anybody suggests to him that he or his government has done anything to separate the links between Canada and the commonwealth, he will be able to answer.

You will remember that in 1949 appeals to the privy council were abolished, except for actions then in the course of being proceeded with in the courts. Do you remember the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) as he clothed his words in lachrymose tones describing the appeal to the privy council as this "badge of colonialism", and contending that it "was unworthy of the sacrifices and the efforts of our fellow Canadians, and undeserving of the bounty which Providence has bestowed upon our country" to have appeals to the privy council. In other words, to appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada was to undermine the sacred prestige of that body.

In the last few weeks this government, dissatisfied with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on a tax case, is taking one of the last of the appeals to the privy council. The Prime Minister when he goes to the United Kingdom will be able to say that there is one link the government is going to maintain to the last—and that is the right to use the facilities of appeal in any case of a decision in our own court, with all its prestige, with all its power, and all its ability, with which the government disagrees.

Mr. Speaker, what manner of consistency is this?

In the last ten days, three of the senior ministers went to Washington, namely, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), to do what they should have been doing for the last several years, protesting against the gutting of GATT by the United States, the policy of the United States in recent years in interfering with our right to export farm products into that country. That right should not have been interfered with. Are we not all together endeavouring to achieve freedom? Does the United States not require our great mineral resources for the preservation of the legions of freedom? What happened on that trip? We do not know, Mr. Speaker. Their trip was just as revealing as the speech from the throne. But there is one thing that annoyed Canadians when they read of it in the press and that was that when those ministers arrived there was nobody from the United States state department at the airport to welcome them. It came over the radio that they had been snubbed. Canadians resented that. The next day it was cleared up by a Canadian spokesman in the state department who said: "Not snubbed, just forgotten". Placing quotas and embargoes should not be expected at any time, much less at this time, having regard to the international problems which we face together.

I am not going to traverse ground that has already been covered. I am going to deal first with the C.C.F. subamendment. This is the first time that the C.C.F. has come out from under the barn and revealed that it intends to have planners to plan for Canada the way they planned for Saskatchewan. I can tell you this, as far as Saskatchewan is concerned—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): No Tory party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The planners have been bunglers in practically everything they have undertaken in connection with industrial development. I believe in private enterprise. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other day that he believed in it. I was a little surprised at that because after all the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), who in some ways has become political mentor to the senior members of the government, made a speech only recently, and it is reported on November 6, when he said:

> The phrase "private enterprise" was a "Tory trademark" and Liberals should never use it.

I would like to hear what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will say to the political philosopher when he reads that ejaculation. Then he goes on to say:

> The trademark of the party I belong to is "human welfare", and without working for this we do not deserve the power of office.

Having regard to some of the legislation setting up these national government crown corporations or state monopolies, one may wonder whether the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration does not in truth represent the viewpoint of the government. Mr. Speaker, over the years the C.C.F. has been producing a rolled-up subamendment with everything in it—socialism hidden in one of the subsections—and when you voted against it they said you were voting against something in that subamendment that you should have been in favour of. That is all over now.

In the subamendment hon. members are asked to vote for the adoption of socialism, to vote for the planners. The theories of the planners of 1944 in the province of Saskatchewan have been dissipated in the light of experience. They promised social security without anybody paying for it. They promised to set up corporations because business means profit. They went into industry after industry. The wreckage of their abortive venture is strewn over Saskatchewan, as examples: a shoe factory, a tannery, a woollen mill. These things blossomed, Mr. Speaker, and then withered, and the leading planners, too.

They were costly ventures. A box factory in Prince Albert is still operating. Men have been put out of work, laid off in recent months and advised that if they raise any objection the factory will be closed. There is a labour act in effect in Saskatchewan that demands arbitration. The government has refused arbitration to employees of government corporations. The plans of the planners have been dissipated in the solid school of experience.

Mr. Nicholson: How many Tories have you elected in Saskatchewan since 1933?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend interrupts, but his interruption has no reference to what I am dealing with. Will he say that the myth which is essential to the socialist philosophy, the superiority of government over private enterprise, has been proven or established in Saskatchewan? Venture capital has been kept out. The planners used to say that the state would take over the natural resources. They planned, and when Saskatchewan found itself at the end of the western parade in development the premier of the province laid out the red carpet for the great capitalists of New York.

They are always contending that they indeed are the custodians of the privileges of labour. What have they done in Saskatchewan? Some of the employees of the crown corporations in Saskatchewan asked for wage increases and were refused. Mr. Douglas said that "under present conditions no group of the community is entitled to a larger share of a smaller cake". Where is the philosophy of 1944—production for use and not for profit? We have got neither. The premier goes on to say, "When crop conditions return to normal we shall endeavour to see that those employed in government agencies get any increases which economic conditions permit." Yes, in the light of experience has come profound wisdom to the planners of Saskatchewan.

They talk about raising wages, but adopt a wage freeze in the province of Saskatchewan. I could go on. I think I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, so that you will realize that I intend to vote against the subamendment.

Having dealt with the subamendment I come now to the national situation. What are conditions today? I know that my friends to the left have been predicting depressions and recessions since 1940. As a Canadian I view with great alarm some of the economic conditions with which we in this country find ourselves faced today, but I do not believe in gloating over them. Since as far back as 1950 the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), with his experience and knowledge of public affairs, agriculture and business, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) as well, have been pointing out the danger signals. This government did not see them. They did not see the clouds over Washington. These three wise men did not see these things until the other day.

We have been pointing out the danger to our trade for the last seven or eight years. We expressed it when we said we were losing trade in Canada, and that we were losing the British markets. The answer was that we had not lost it, it was still over there. We do not have it. If you know where a thing is you have not lost it.

In 1954 we had the largest unfavourable balance of trade in Canada's history. This is a serious condition. What is being done to meet it? There was a silent, secret pilgrimage to Washington. Where are the policies in the speech from the throne which will meet this situation?

As to agriculture, the farmers are caught between rising costs and falling farm prices. The United States are closing out our barley and oats under quotas, and are threatening to hit our seed growers, and they are now threatening to close out red fescue seed, which is so necessary in parts of western Canada to the agricultural economy. Clover has been closed out, and dairy products. The cost of living is so high today that it makes wheat which is worth $1.40 a bushel at Fort William worth only 53·23 cents a bushel on the farms of western Canada.

Retail sales are going down. In the first ten months of 1954 retail sales were $200 million less. The drop of 14·2 per cent in Saskatchewan sales is caused in part by the serious crop failure there. In Alberta there has been a drop of 7·6 per cent; in Manitoba 4·2 per cent; in Ontario ·5 per cent; in Quebec ·4 per cent; in British Columbia ·4 per cent. The only part of Canada in which retail sales have increased is the maritimes, where there has been an increase of ·2 per cent.

What are we doing to meet the situation? What is the reason for it? We have said that over the years Canadians were being taxed out of the markets of the world and taxed out of their jobs. I know they used to say you could make jobs without profits. We have learned differently in Saskatchewan with the disappearance of the mirage of 1944.

What about hidden taxes? The average automobile has a hidden tax of $400. This government in its wisdom has decreed a high cost structure in the last few years. It has isolated our trade. It has started the march of unemployment. I believe that Canada's industry must be revitalized by giving tax relief at once. The government must act and act now.

It is interesting to read the mental peregrinations taken by some of the ministers of the crown with reference to this subject. In September the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said "I can tell you this; taxes won't go up". Then on September 4, 1954, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) said, "I don't think they will go down". As an indication that Saul's change of mind was an amateur performance the Minister of Finance stated on November 15, 1954:

I confess myself concerned about tax rates under which the government takes away half or more of the rewards of hard work which leads to promotion.

I confess myself concerned. Where has he been in recent years? Was he in the department of immigration looking after the shocking practices that were referred to by Mr. McDonald, who was the candidate against the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in the last federal election? He went on to say this:

There is so much to be gained if we can preserve initiative and enterprise.

He had better talk to the minister of immigration, his successor.

It would be most unfortunate if prospects in this land of opportunity were dimmed by unwise government demands on the fruits of success in business and professional life—indeed in any gainful employment.

That is what we have been saying for long years during which we have had unnecessary taxation. These statements raised hopes. They hinted at tax cuts. They went further than a hint; the people were built up to expectations. Then he went on to say:

From what I have said up to now of my first impressions you might be inclined to infer that I think it is rather a bad show. This is not correct. True, it is awfully large, rates are pretty high, and it is extremely complicated, but withal it appears to me to be a very sensible, well-balanced and flexible tax system.

You just pay your money and you take your choice.

I wish now to speak about the effects of those loose statements. They have had an intense effect on the buying of the Canadian people. In relation to those commodities on which there are excise or other taxes they are postponing purchases. They have done this ever since November. They are waiting. These statements have created uncertainty and instability in a chaotic retail market at a time when retail purchases are falling anyway.

How can it be removed? As I see it, it should be removed at the earliest possible date, by having the budget brought down much earlier than usual. Delay means continued uncertainty such as has prevailed to date, which in turn spells economic instability. The sentiments were laudable, but the time at which the statements were made was unfortunate. The result has been serious to the Canadian economy. We hope that the government this session, realizing what the Minister of Finance has at last realized, that high taxation is sapping the power and initiative of the Canadian people, will even at this time do something.

What about the farmers? The agricultural situation in Saskatchewan today is worse than in any other province because of crop failure. The Canadian farmer is caught in a vise-like squeeze between rising prices of what he must buy and falling returns for what he has to sell. In the year 1952-53 our farm prices according to FAO fell by 23 per cent, and retail prices by only 8 per cent. The fall in farm prices has not been transferred to the consumer. Too much of the consumer's dollar finds its way into places other than the farmer's pocket. In the United States in 1951 out of every dollar the farmer received 51 cents. In 1953 he received only 45 cents. My computation makes the Canadian figures even lower than that. Making all allowances for processing, packaging, and things of that sort which are necessary in our modern economy, I come to the conclusion that there is still too great a difference between the price the farmer receives for his commodities and the price paid by the consumer.

What can be done about this? I believe the time has come and indeed is long overdue to investigate this spread, to the end that if there is wrongdoing it will be revealed and punished and if there is not the people of Canada will know the situation.

In the United States the farmer receives 17 per cent of the retail price of tomatoes; 35 per cent of the retail price of potatoes, and 15 per cent of the price of bread. He receives 66 per cent of the price of beef and butter, and 74 per cent of the price of eggs. These percentages are generally duplicated in our country.

The United States has been interfering with our oats and barley market in the U.S.A. I believe the strongest protest should be made to the United States, but not the kind of protest made under the table. I recall one occasion about two years ago when I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) what was being done about it and he said in effect: "We wrote them two letters." I asked, "What was the reply?" He said, in effect: "Why, there was nothing in the letters that demanded a reply."

The United States must realize—and I recognize the tremendous contribution that country is making to the preservation of freedom throughout the world—that it is absolutely necessary that Canada preserve its agricultural productive machine in its present efficiency, and that that can only be attained provided we can export our agricultural products to their country.

Parliament should have an opportunity of making its views clear to the United States. Government ministers trailing to Washington is not enough. They went in silence; they were heard in silence; and they returned in silence. And while this goes on our farm markets are disappearing and our basic industry is fighting a challenge to its very existence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to make one or two suggestions with regard to agriculture and relative to matters that have been brought before parliament on previous occasions. First, I would emphasize that at no time will the people of western Canada allow interference with the Crowsnest rates. Let that be quite clear. What did the government do in this regard? They appointed Chief Justice Sloan, an old friend of theirs and former attorney general of the province of British Columbia. He brought forth the suggestion that these rates were out of date. But no one asked him to do that, unless he was asked in the same secret manner in which our ministers approach the authorities in Washington. I would tell the government that any interference in this connection will be resisted by the western provinces with all the power they command. That agreement was made as a bond; that bond must be maintained.

Our agricultural situation is serious. Our farmers are in a difficult position. I believe the government must bring about a system of cash advances based on a system of wheat storage on the farm. In this regard there is no danger of loss. You will have observed, Mr. Speaker, that in recent years there has been no thefts of wheat in western Canada. Wheat was stolen at one time but now you cannot get a quota book on stolen wheat and therefore that problem has vanished.

Additionally, I believe increased use must be made of the Agricultural Prices Support Act so as to provide adequate support for those commodities to which the act applies. There are support prices on certain commodities but whom do they preserve and protect? They have a peculiar capacity for protecting the packer. In this regard I would again emphasize the suggestion I made a moment ago that a royal commission should be set up to investigate the price spread between what the farmer receives and the consumer pays.

The next question is: What is to be done about markets? We have embassies all over the world. The United States is selling many of its farm products through the medium of agriculture market officials attached to their embassies. Since we have officials and commissioners stationed all over the world, let us now use them, if we have not already done so, so that it will be their responsibility to carry out the very same tasks United States officials assume and thereby secure a greater share of the markets of the world.

Next, I would call for the establishment of customs facilities at Churchill during that period of the year when the harbour is open so as to encourage the use of the Hudson Bay route.

Finally, I must again urge the government to commence the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project. We were promised it—I think the word was "immediately"—in 1945. The definition of the word "immediately" in so far as the Saskatchewan dam project is concerned closely resembles our understanding of the meaning of eternity. We have waited a long time. We now find that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has been out in western Canada with a draft agreement that has not been accepted by the government. A P.F.R.A. drafted agreement has been shown to the government of Saskatchewan. The Prime Minister says it has no final authority. It is merely the expression of the officials. As a fellow member of the bar, Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a responsible person carrying an agreement around on behalf of somebody else whose authority he has not obtained and the terms of which have not been accepted by the principal? That is exactly the situation here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As a fellow member of the bar, the hon. member will realize that it is now my duty to advise him that his time has expired.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for 40 minutes we have been listening to an address by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In that address he has dealt with a number of different subjects. He opened up with the question of the activities of the government, and of myself as the minister responsible, in relation to Mr. Thomson. I also shall open on the same subject.

Before doing so, however, I want to join with the hon. member for Prince Albert in saying that it has not been my custom, in the many years that I have been here, to spend much time dealing with congratulations to those who have gone before but on each occasion I have taken the opportunity to say to new members who have come into the house and who have addressed the house that I greatly appreciated their remarks and the manner in which they addressed the house. I only wish to say at this time that in the approximately 25 sessions that I have been here I have not heard two new members perform to better advantage than did the two we heard this year. Having said that, I should like to comment upon Mr. Thomson.

The hon. member for Prince Albert suggested that it had been said that there was no other person who could be secured to fill the position. I have not before me the exact words of the statement but I listened to it at the same time as the hon. member was listening to it and I think it has been suggested that there is no person available who could fill the position to better advantage than Mr. Thomson.

Mr. Harkness: What would you have done if he had been elected?

Mr. Gardiner: In that case, of course, we would have taken the second best, as we quite often have to do. But that does not change the position at all. One of the reasons why some people thought that Mr. Thomson would make a good leader for the Liberal party was that he had always been a good director of P.F.R.A. But we were not the first people to realize that Mr. Thomson is an extremely capable individual. It is true that a Liberal government was in power in 1926 when he was first employed by the civil service commission. But in 1934 I had the privilege of forming a government in the province of Saskatchewan after an election in which my hon. friend from Prince Albert took part on the other side. At that time we wanted a minister of agriculture.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the minister tell us how many of the hon. member's party were elected in 1934?

Mr. Gardiner: There were not any. On that occasion, Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of selecting a minister of agriculture and I took the gentleman who had been in charge of the experimental farm at Swift Current, leaving a vacancy at the Swift Current experimental farm. It was a good Tory government that was in power at Ottawa at that time,—

An hon. Member: Good?

Mr. Gardiner: —and whom did they select to take the place of the gentleman who had been taken out of that position to become minister of agriculture? They selected Mr. Thomson. He was then in the province of Alberta functioning in connection with this Department of Agriculture, and the Conservative government of that day selected him as the ablest man in the service capable of carrying on at Swift Current.

But that is not the only time that the Conservative party recognized Dr. Thomson as an extremely efficient individual. A few years ago they selected Mr. Bracken to be the leader of the Conservative party; and the party then took on a new name, the Progressive Conservative party, as a result of having selected the new leader. He was given the task of winning agriculture in Canada over to the Conservative party. The first thing he did was to go out and look for bright young men to help him. He selected Mr. Ramsay from the University of Saskatchewan, with whom he had been associated previously while he was at that university, to lead the party in Saskatchewan. He took Mr. Hope from the University of Saskatchewan, and he asked Mr. Thomson to join the other two and become one of the three bright agricultural young men that were going to win agriculture of this country over to the Conservative party. Our Conservative friends seem to have the same opinion that I have with regard to Mr. Thomson, namely that he is an extremely able individual. I think he is a gentleman who might have made a good leader for the Liberal party, although I had nothing to do with asking him to try to become one.

Mr. Ellis: Will the minister suggest that the party got the second choice in the leadership race?

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, I will say something to please the hon. member after a little while. Mr. Thomson was recognized by everyone down to that time as one of the ablest agriculturalists in the country. Up to that time I had no reason for believing that he was a Liberal. He was promoted by the Conservatives. He was offered a position in their party by the Conservatives. When it came time to select someone to take over the position which he now holds, in spite of the fact that I did not know what his politics happened to be and in spite of the fact that the Conservatives had done everything they possibly could to convince me that he was a Conservative, I asked him to take on the job that he now has as director of P.F.R.A.

What happened in this house? I know that our friends in the C.C.F. party will not deny the attitude which they took. I know that the Social Credit group over on the other side will not deny the position which they took. Immediately I announced our intention of asking Dr. Thomson to take the position leaders of both groups rose and stated that there was no better man for it in Canada. I was not surprised at that. But the then hon. member for Souris rose in his place in this house and said more in favour of Dr. Thomson than the representative of either the C.C.F. party or the Social Credit party had said; and he said that an abler man than Dr. Thomson could not be found in the Dominion of Canada to hold that position.

All that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said today was that the Minister of Agriculture agrees with them all and that he thinks that there is not any better man in this country to hold that position. At the same time I should like to say that I was a little bit surprised at the hon. member for Prince Albert for not having examined a bit more closely into the articles he was going to read to us about the Liberal convention. He had Mr. Simmie contradict himself. He first says that P.F.R.A. is a political machine run by Mr. Gardiner, and then he says that Mr. Gardiner did not know what was going on or he would have stopped it. Well, both things cannot be right.

Mr. Knowles: You don't know Jimmie.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, the statements that Mr. Simmie was making were not being made in my interests. They were not being made particularly in the interests of the Liberal party, and the Liberal party pretty well indicated that they took them for what they were worth when he only got 16 votes out of 749.

An hon. Member: Is he still in the party?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not worrying very much about whether he is or is not because anyone who does not get any more votes than that is not going to affect you very much whether he is in or out. But the fact that my hon. friend gets up and quotes two statements like that, one of which refutes the other, makes it unnecessary for me to say very much more about it.

Mr. Cardiff: A good idea.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I am sure my friend will feel much easier if there is not much more said about it, because a lot more could be said. The fact of the matter is that in so far as Dr. Thomson is concerned he did, as the Prime Minister said, put in his resignation. He did not ask for any conditions. He did say, however, that he was quite prepared to carry on and do the work that had to be done until someone could be secured to take over the job. He did carry on. He got leave of absence for the time of the convention, went to the convention, and that was his only political activity. After the convention was over he was not the leader. I heard the speech he made. There are other men sitting in this house who heard the speech he made. No one would have said that it was the kind of speech to which exception would have been taken by anyone who is associated with P.F.R.A. or expecting advantages from it. After it was all over and he was not the leader, it was my opinion that he was still the best man to carry on as director of P.F.R.A., and there he is.

All I want to say with regard to it is that I have not heard from any person, nor have I seen in the editorials of any newspaper in this country, statements to the effect that he is not the best man that we have in Canada to carry on that job. They have said that Mr. Gardiner had no right to do this or had no right to do that. Many of the things they said I did not have a right to do I did not do. But they have not said that Mr. Thomson was not the best man for the position that could be found anywhere in Canada, and few if any of them have said that he should not be continued in the position. As far as I am concerned, I wish to leave the matter there.

But there was another subject which was discussed by the hon. member for Prince Albert that I think I should say something about. The hon. member for Prince Albert is not the only one who has discussed it since this debate began. I refer to the position of agriculture and the effect of floor prices on prices in Canada. Some have suggested that we should adopt the system which they have had for a number of years in the United States based upon parity. I was not in the house yesterday or the day before because I was in the state of Kansas, in the very heart of the agricultural area in the United States, speaking to the Kansas state board of agriculture. All the agricultural officials of the state of agriculture were at the meeting.

An hon. Member: State of agriculture?

Mr. Gardiner: Of the state of Kansas. I might as well have left it "state of agriculture" because in many respects it is the greatest agricultural state in the United States. We discussed the activities of that state. When I lived across the boundary from that state when I was a boy, the crop in Kansas was corn and the crop in Nebraska was corn, but the largest crop today in Kansas is wheat. Kansas grows 25 per cent of all the wheat grown in the United States. Since in the United States of America they grow about double what we grow in Canada, and since we in the province of Saskatchewan produce over half the wheat grown in Canada, the state of Kansas produces just about the same amount of wheat year by year that we produce in the province of Saskatchewan.

So I was invited there, coming as I do from the wheat province of Canada, to meet with them at their agricultural board meeting which is somewhat similar to the meeting we have here each December. The only difference is that our meeting covers all Canada whereas their meeting only covers one state. I was invited to discuss their problems with them. When I was there I found out a few things related to the discussions that are going on in this house. For example, just before noon yesterday I was at the television station in Topeka answering some questions, and immediately I finished a gentleman, seated at a table just about six feet away from me, proceeded with the task of announcing market prices.

The very first price he announced was the price for a product that we have been dealing with in the house. He said, "The price of eggs is 29 cents". I thought to myself that the floor price that had been put on eggs in Canada recently was 38 cents. Then I remembered that when we were putting that form of floor price into effect our friends in the opposition were saying to us that we should have adopted the United States system. Well, the United States system has gone through a course which now causes us all to conclude that it was not as sound as it appeared. They first filled up all the storages in the country, and storages that were not suitable for the storage of eggs were filled with eggs. Then they had to get rid of the system and start over again. The final result is that parity has been dropped and the wholesale price of eggs in Topeka, in a state which carries on to a considerable extent the same kind of agricultural activity as is carried on in the province from which I come, is 29 cents.

I went right from there to a dinner given by a gentleman who used to work for the Winnipeg Tribune when I was a student in Winnipeg. I did not know this gentleman before, but I was sitting between him and one of the egg producers in the western part of the state of Kansas. I said to the farmer from the western part of the state, "I presume that you keep some chickens". He said, "Yes, as a matter of fact I have one of the best flocks of egg layers to be found in the state of Kansas." I said that I had just been at the television station and had heard the announcement that eggs were 29 cents a dozen. He said, "Yes, wholesale, but I am delivering my eggs day by day at 20 cents a dozen". I said, "Well, are they A large?" He said that their grading system was not the same as ours but went on to say that they were the best eggs produced in Kansas or as good as any, and the price was 20 cents a dozen.

All I am going to say to hon. members, inasmuch as we have been told ever since this debate began that we ought to be able to do at least as well for our farmers as is being done for the farmers of the United States, is that on that commodity at any rate we are doing at least as well and perhaps better.

Mr. Brooks: How about potatoes?

Mr. Gardiner: Then again, Mr. Speaker, I was flying home last night, and as I flew over Chicago I heard the prices again. Prices are naturally a little higher in Chicago than they are at Topeka, and they gave the price of eggs as 32 cents, 3 cents higher than at Topeka. They gave the price of butter as 56 cents, and our floor price on butter in this country is 58 cents.

So I say to the hon. member for Prince Albert that when he was saying a few minutes ago that the margin between the prices that are paid for farm products to the producers and the prices that are paid by the consumers when they buy are probably about the same in Canada as they are in the United States—they were United States figures he quoted—probably that is so. Because the margin, as you will note, between the wholesale price in Topeka and the farmer's price for eggs is a margin of 9 cents. In this country the margin which is allowed, if the farmers are just outside the cities of Toronto or Montreal, is 6 cents, and up in some sections of Ontario they want 7 cents. When you get farther out into the west they want 8 or 9 cents, about the same as they have out in Kansas. So it appears that probably the margins are about the same as between the prices the consumers pay and the prices that the farmers get.

But I can go further than that. I was in Denmark a few years ago. People in this house get up and refer to Denmark as the ideal to be copied by farmers everywhere in the world. I was out looking at some of these plants where they produce butter and cheese, and take in eggs. I asked the price of eggs at that plant, which was just ten miles out of Copenhagen. They said that the price was 32 cents. Well, I was flying over to Ireland—

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner:—that is, to the place where my old friend used to live, Belfast. I had a friend there who I thought, or at least Mrs. Gardiner thought, might like some eggs from Denmark. We went into the same co-operative in Copenhagen that operated the plant we had visited to get the eggs we were to take over to Belfast, and we paid 67 cents a dozen for them. They were 32 cents at the plant, and they told me they were not higher at any time than 38 cents during that period. What were these margins? There was the margin for the wholesaler and the retailer, and so on, until eggs which had been secured from the farmers at from 32 to 38 cents were actually selling ten miles away in Copenhagen at 67 cents.

I am not going to attempt to tell this house why all that is so, or why that was so. I am not going to try, as the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) did, to indicate to the house why it is that there are certain margins between farmer's prices and the price the retailer finally pays. But I will tell you this, that so far as butter is concerned, which is under price control in this country, and in so far as eggs are concerned, which are more or less under price control in this country, we do know what the divisions are. We do know what the margins are. We do say to those who are dealing in those products that unless the margin is maintained, a margin sufficiently close to what we think it ought to be, support will not apply.

Now, my friend has just picked up something he heard in the country, and he wants to satisfy all the people he can when he says that the money goes to the packer. That is a very popular thing to say out in the country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say that. I said no such thing.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend did say in my hearing, and it will be found in Hansard, that the people who are getting the support were not the producers, in many of these price support undertakings, but that it was the packer. I would like him to show any place where the packer has the advantage of the floor prices that are being established on farm products in this country. It cannot be shown; because when that is shown to be the case, the support prices do not operate. Our support prices are put on in such a manner that the individual who draws that support must be able to show that the money is going to the farmer.

My friends from Nova Scotia will remember that when their apples were blown off the trees we went down there and made arrangements to take care of those apples. The arrangement was based on the fact that the farmers got the money. No apple packer got it. No trader in apples got that money. The money which was paid was paid to the farmers who grew the apples. And if there were any bills owing to others with whom they had been dealing, then the individual who was in business, whether he sold them boxes or whether he sold them spray or fertilizer for their trees, or whatever it was, had to go and collect his money from the farmer who had the money in his hand, and was in a position to make payment.

So in all these agreements for support, payments were made out of these funds which were set up for the purpose of maintaining price returns to the farmers across Canada. Support under all those plans is based upon the idea that the farmer gets the money. Maybe he does not get as much as he thinks he ought to have. Maybe we are not able to get him as much as we think he ought to have, but we do check before our payments are made to see to it that everyone who is interested in the transaction is getting what was intended.

The result of all this is shown in the incomes of the farmers themselves. The hon. member for Prince Albert was very careful not to give the figures, but to just make general statements with regard to farm income. He said, "Oh, I know that the farmers out in Saskatchewan are worse off than the others, because they have not had a good crop this last year." Then he goes on to try to show that everybody else is hard up, for other reasons, though they did not also have crop failures.

What is the situation? Well, I have said in this house on many occasions that it is not a safe thing to take any one year in connection with an agricultural product and compare it with any other one year, and to try to arrive at a proper conclusion. But despite the fact that this has been said many times there are members on the other side of the house who keep on doing it. The other day I listened to one of the leaders directly opposite making a statement based upon the first nine months of 1953 and the first nine months of 1954. Well, if there is anything worse than taking one year and comparing it with the year before, it is to take part of one year and compare it with part of another year and try to arrive at any sound conclusion.

The whole argument put forward in this debate was based upon that sort of thing. Well, I have here in my hand figures showing the cash income return, and I also have net income return figures. For the time being, however, I shall deal only with cash income returns. These apply to all the provinces of Canada with the exception of Newfoundland. It is not yet on the list and, so far as agriculture is concerned, is not as big a producer as any of the other provinces. But I have here the figures for Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia from the year 1926 to the year 1954. I shall not give all the figures.

An hon. Member: Give us the figures for 1954.

Mr. Gardiner: I have them. They are not final; they will have to be finalized later, but I have the figures now available for 1954. I am doing again what I did last year and what I have done before, in that I am taking three years and I am examining the returns for those three years. Our system differs from that in the United States in that they take more than three years. I believe they take four years, away back before the last war began; as a matter of fact before the first war began. They take those figures as a basis for parity, and make a comparison as they go along. At the end of the war, when we set up the Agricultural Prices Support Act, we took the last three years of the war, 1943, 1944 and 1945. Up to that time every farm organization in this country said that was the best condition the farmers had ever lived under up until then. So we took that period and said, "We shall try and maintain the same relationship between costs, as nearly as possible when you take all the products into consideration, as existed in the last three years of the war, not for any one-year period but for the three-year period."

Therefore I am taking the last three years of this period in the sheet I have here. What do I find? I find that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was right when he said that Saskatchewan had less income from its farms because of crop failure. He might have included Alberta and Manitoba, and probably intended to, because these are the three wheat growing provinces that were affected by rust.

What is the reduction in income in these three provinces because of wheat reduction in 1954 compared with the top year in that three year period? Well, in Manitoba it is $83·9 million; in Saskatchewan it is $244·5 million; in Alberta it is $112·4 million. All told it is $440,900,000. That is the loss that has taken place in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba because of the fact that they had poor crops last year and low returns because of rust and low quality wheat.

The total cash income in all the provinces of Canada in 1954 was $2,408 million, and when you add to that the $441 million which the three wheat provinces lost last year because their crop was down and of a poor grade, you get a net return of $2,849 million. That is what the income would have been if they had had a good wheat delivery year and that is $23 million more than the farmers of this country ever had in any one year. All that means is that when you put all the other provinces together, their income is not down as compared with the years that have gone before; their income is very nearly the same as in their top year.

Mr. Quelch: Will the minister estimate what the income will be; because they have not sold the crops for the last year yet?

Mr. Gardiner: That is one of the weaknesses in most of the arguments that my hon. friends are putting up. They are talking of the calendar year, and it does involve the losses that were taken in those last two years because of the lower return that has been taken in resulting from the fact that elevators are filled.

I should like to ask my hon. friend how he accounts for the fact that in Ontario the return was $741·9 million, and the highest other year in this previous three-year period was $719 million. In Ontario it was higher than in the highest year of the last three years, higher in the last year. When you go through the whole sheet and find that you have to go to the three western provinces in order to get a reduction in income at all, I am saying to you that it is not fair to say that the income is down on all the farms all the way across Canada, nor is it down in all provinces all the way across Canada. As a matter of fact in the province of Nova Scotia, where they lost the greater part of their apple crop this year, their cash income in 1954 is $42·9 million; last year it was $40·6 million, and the year before it was $39·8 million.

I am just pointing out to the house that some of the statements that are made from time to time are not based upon facts. Simply taking the total figures, as covering the whole country, leaves out of consideration what my hon. friend protected himself against by mentioning without going into details, namely that he knew the returns were down in Saskatchewan. Even my friend to whom he refers in such critical terms, the minister of the treasury in the province of Saskatchewan, does not do that; neither does the premier of the province of Saskatchewan.

When we had a conference here in Ottawa the minister of agriculture of the Saskatchewan government rose and brought out the very fact I am bringing out now, and he added this statement: "If we get an average crop next year our income will be back to where it was last year", that is, 1953. These are not my words; they are his. They can be found in his speech which was delivered to the conference here in December. I agree with him. All that is necessary to put the incomes back to where they were is not all this planning and all those ideas that have been mentioned here. What is necessary is to have another good wheat crop out there.

When they get a good wheat crop out there of average quality it seems to have the effect of raising the income of all farmers in Canada, according to the reasoning that is carried on in this house; of course that is not true. But whether it does have that effect or not, it does have the effect of increasing the purchasing power that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was talking about; it makes it possible for them to buy farm implements and put people to work producing them. It makes it possible for them to buy other commodities that are required on the farms. Thus the whole country benefits from the fact that there is a crop, and the whole country is injured by the fact that there was not as good a crop in the west in 1954 as there sometimes is. I wanted to say that with regard to these incomes in order to answer some of the things that had been said not only by the hon. member for Prince Albert but by some others.

There was one thing the hon. member for Prince Albert got very much worked up about. He was telling our C.C.F. friends what a miserable job they have made of developing industry in Saskatchewan, and I agree with him in everything he said. But there is one thing I should like to point out to him. There is no man in the province of Saskatchewan, excepting Tommy Douglas, who is more responsible for the C.C.F. still being in power in that province than the hon. member for Prince Albert. Why do I say that? Well, when the last provincial election campaign was on he went up and down through Saskatchewan, but not condemning the C.C.F. He did not make a speech in that campaign like the one he made here this afternoon. He made speeches condemning the Liberal party, and condemning me as Minister of Agriculture in the Dominion of Canada because of the things I had or had not done. His main discussion was on the fighting of foot-and-mouth disease. It is recognized by everybody that the best job done anywhere in the world in fighting foot-and-mouth disease was done in Canada. Still that was his plea.

You know, even that would not have won the election for the C.C.F.; but when it came to nomination day the Conservatives put only seven candidates in the field, and he went right on talking against the Liberals. He did not talk against the C.C.F. I am not blaming the C.C.F. I suppose if we had been in power in Saskatchewan we probably would have tried to get him to do the same thing to them, but the fact is that the C.C.F. were in power.

Mr. Argue: What did the Liberals do in Souris-Estevan?

Mr. Gardiner: The fact is that in that election the hon. member for Prince Albert did everything he possibly could to see to it that the C.C.F. got back into power, and they did. For him to rise in the house now and make this speech is not nearly as effective in slaughtering C.C.F.'ers as it would have been had he made it then. Then he would have been rid of those socialists he talks about now, because they have not got very far anywhere except in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: And Selkirk.

Mr. Gardiner: If he would just help get them out instead of helping keep them in he would get rid of all those troubles he was talking about a little while ago. I thought I should say that much in regard to it.

There is one other thing I wish to speak about, and that is the Crowsnest rates. The hon. member says we appointed Chief Justice Sloan of British Columbia, who is a good friend of ours, to conduct an inquiry, and he said something about the Crowsnest pass rates. Has he forgotten what the Tories said about the Crowsnest pass rates? They were brought in, as everyone in the country knows, by Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he was in power. He made a deal with the C.P.R. under which the Crowsnest pass rates were established for all time, and his end of the deal has been carried out by succeeding Liberal governments.

When we came to the end of the first war, at which time the Conservatives were in power, what did they do? They moved to do away with the Crowsnest pass agreement, and they would have been successful in doing this had it not been for that chamber which some people criticize so much. That is one time they did a good job if they never did another one, but I think they do many good jobs.

On that occasion when the members of this house had not been here for a sufficient length of time to remember all that is attached to the Crowsnest pass agreement, the then prime minister, the leader of the Conservative party, who was a member from the province of Manitoba which has gained as much from this Crowsnest pass agreement as any other province, said he was going to do away with the agreement. When the bill went to the Senate one of the senators —I suppose he was put there because he was a Liberal at the time he was selected—because he was a Liberal remembered why we had the Crowsnest pass rates, and he stood up in that house and objected to what was being done. In spite of what he did, in spite of the objections he raised and in spite of the objections raised right across the country, actions were taken which did away with much of the effectiveness of the Crowsnest rates.

What happened? When the Liberals came back into power in 1921 they appointed a commission, such as the one my hon. friend has been asking us to appoint for other reasons now, and had them look into the whole thing. As a result of the activities of that commission in 1927, you still have the Crowsnest rates and had your maritime rates established. Why? As an alternative to the Crowsnest pass rates on our grain being shipped through. I am satisfied that if we were to get up in this house and argue in favour of taking off the Crowsnest pass rates, at the same time we would be asking to take off the special rates that have been given in connection with maritime freight.

Any group attempting to do that, I do not care whether they sat over there or over here, would not be here after the next election. Therefore when my hon. friend points his long finger at us and indicates what we ought to do, he should read about what his own party has done. If he has any appeals to make on that question he should make them to the men who are sitting behind him, not to the men sitting over here. I would suggest that so far as that question is concerned there are certain things which can and will be said as we go along and discuss the question from time to time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Go on.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the right hon. minister unanimous consent to continue?

Mr. Nicholson: I think the minister, being the first to reply to an amendment, has unlimited time.

Mr. Gardiner: I think that is true, but I am not going to take very much time. The suggestion was made that we ought to get along with the South Saskatchewan river dam. I would have been very disappointed if the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had not mentioned it, as he did in the last sentence or two of his address.

He did not, however, say some of the things which I know are on his mind because he has said them elsewhere. It has been said that this government built a causeway across from an island to the mainland down in the maritimes. Then they say we have done something else along the St. Lawrence, and it will be a very big job. I said last session that it took the Tories 50 years to decide whether or not they were going to start it, and they never did. This party took about the same time considering it and eventually did start it.

My hon. friend says we have not yet started the South Saskatchewan project. The hon. member says that I was out in Saskatchewan considering something or other. I was out in Saskatchewan. I am going to say this right from the start, that in my negotiations with the government of Saskatchewan I have found them most reasonable and easy to deal with in discussing the matter. We did not have any controversies when we were discussing it as are sometimes claimed in the press later; and I notice that not even the premier of Saskatchewan indicated that I was discussing government policy when I was there. Some hon. members on the other side get some of those ideas and try to leave that impression.

We have been discussing this matter for some time. Any hon. member can go back and look up Hansard if he is interested, and find out that at one stage we said there were four things yet to be settled. I shall mention but two of them because there are only two left, the others having been cleared away in these discussions.

One of them was whether or not the subsidization of power by the federal government has been entirely removed. That question has not yet been discussed from a standpoint which everybody agrees has removed entirely the possible subsidization of power in the province of Saskatchewan if the dam is gone ahead with.

The other one was as to whether it was in the national interest; and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made it very clear in answering a question yesterday that that question has not yet been determined. I am going to say that it cannot be determined until the other one is out of the way, and the other one still has to be got out of the way.

Then there is the question of what is to be included in the agreement. What is being discussed is not similar to a hard and fast agreement such as lawyers draw up concerning the sale of one person's property to some other person. The hon. member recited such a case to illustrate how foolish this arrangement is. We sat down and discussed the matter.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Was the same consideration given in connection with the St. Lawrence project that Ontario—

Mr. Gardiner: The only difference between the St. Lawrence project and this one is that it took more than 50 years to get to the end of discussions with regard to the St. Lawrence. Power is eliminated in connection with that in so far as this government is concerned. In connection with this dam the discussions have been going on more or less since 1946, and we have not yet arrived at a conclusion. I am satisfied that a conclusion is going to be arrived at sooner or later. I am satisfied that some day some two governments are going to build the South Saskatchewan river project—the government of Saskatchewan and the government of Canada. As the Prime Minister has said, we are not yet in position to say that a decision has been reached that we are prepared to recommend to the house the amount that will be required in order to carry this out.

I am going to say to you that we do not know yet what the amount is that will have to be recommended to this house. We cannot arrive at what the amount will be until we have reached an understanding as to what part of the construction will be associated with power and therefore be taken care of by the province, and what part will not be associated with power and therefore be taken care of by the dominion, if it is decided to be in the national interest to recommend it to the house. However, what I was going to point out—and I wish to say this now because I probably shall not speak again on this question—is that what I am saying indicates there is a very good reason why this was not included in the speech from the throne.

The suggestion was that since we have built a causeway in the eastern provinces, and since we have undertaken and are now engaged in the St. Lawrence waterway project—because we have announced our intention to remove Ripple Rock at Vancouver, and because we are building the trans-Canada highway across the eastern provinces and the prairies—this South Saskatchewan river dam project might have been included also in the speech from the throne. As a matter of fact, the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) raised this question the other day, and he even went further by suggesting that this government has not done anything for western Canada comparable to what was done in other parts of Canada.

When the hon. member makes a statement of that kind I think I should place on the record exactly what we have done. In so far as relief is concerned, the amount which applies to the areas in the three western provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta is $74 million since we came into office.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): How much for other parts of Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: It is very high. Just wait until I get through with the figures and you will have no more questions to ask. Then there is the matter of prairie farm assistance. The net amount which has been spent, after collections from the farmers, is $86 million. There is the amount spent under P.F.R.A. Some of that amount was used in exploring the possibility of building a dam on the South Saskatchewan river, but it was only a comparatively small part. The total amount is $92 million. That is the amount that has been spent on projects over the years to assist in maintaining the farmers on their farms. But the total amount stands at $252 million, or approximately $14 million per year.

I will repeat what I said before, namely there is no one in this house or outside who is more anxious than I to get the South Saskatchewan river dam started. But if anyone goes out to Saskatchewan and states that this government has not been doing what ought to be done in the interests of the western people, and particularly the western farmers, then I wish to state that the figures I have given contradict that assertion. In so far as the government is concerned, and in so far as the house from which all financial proposals originate is concerned, we can substantiate every single dollar of expenditure that has been made. I am quite satisfied that in due course there will be support for further amounts, and all I am asking at the moment is that we exercise a little patience.

It has been suggested that we have already shown enough patience, but I would point out that everyone in this house is agreed on this project, and I have never known a project which had the unanimous support of the house which was not eventually undertaken. I would therefore suggest to hon. members that when they speak on this topic they make it plain to the people of Canada that we are fully aware of the need for this dam. Let it not be suggested that the government is not going to do it and that it should therefore be forgotten. Let us get busy at the task of proving why we want this dam and why it will be good for Canada as a whole.

Let us not suggest, as did the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) a few moments ago, that this is merely an irrigation scheme. No government could possibly build a dam at such a cost merely for the purpose of irrigating 400,000 acres of land. In addition, that sort of appeal will not weigh with the people in eastern Canada, or even in central Canada. The water at the dam will be 185 feet deep, and in actual fact the top ten feet of that water can be run off by gravity in order to irrigate the 400,000 acres of land and affect the income on millions of acres. The people should also know that once the dam is put there we will have a lake 145 miles long, or three-quarters of the length of lake Erie or lake Ontario. The water behind that dam will not only irrigate the land but will create a huge head of power which can be used right across the province of Saskatchewan and if necessary on into other provinces both east and west.

This same problem was dealt with yesterday at a meeting in Kansas. I heard a gentleman get up and tell the people that they had to conserve their water, and they had to make greater use of their available streams than they were doing at the present time. On my flight across the state of Missouri afterward I saw dugouts on every farm, the same kind of thing we have out in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. When we view that sort of situation we should remember that as a result of the building of this dam we are going to provide many benefits for western communities, including water for industries. There will be water supply for scores of towns which are below the level of the dam.

In conclusion I would say to hon. members of this house that if they get that idea over to the Canadian people, then there is no doubt in my mind as to what eventually will be done.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that after listening to the last two speeches I am a little bit confused. First of all the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), as I understood him, blames the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) for assisting in the election of a C.C.F. member in a certain constituency in Saskatchewan. On the other hand, it seems obvious to everyone that the Liberals elected John Diefenbaker in Prince Albert. In view of that I cannot understand the great concern shown by the hon. member for Prince Albert in regard to political planning.

Mr. Gardiner: He elected twelve times as many as we did.

Mr. Argue: What about Kohaly in Souris-Estevan?

Mr. Bryson: Certainly any planning the Conservative party ever did in Saskatchewan has been a horrible experience, and I was surprised the hon. member did not admit that he was to all intents and purposes a voice crying in the wilderness as far as that party in Saskatchewan is concerned.

We have heard many speeches over the past few days, and in most cases the speakers have voiced the opinion that the speech from the throne provides hon. members with an opportunity of bringing to the attention of parliament those matters which are of the greatest concern to their own constituents. I think that is understandable, but I also believe that if we are going to discharge our duties as members of parliament we must not forget that we represent all the people of Canada. I know it is hard to see the other fellow's point of view; it is hard to see the other fellow's problems. But if we are going to properly assess our own problems in our own areas, I am convinced that we must have a fairly good working knowledge of the many and varied types of occupations and industries in this country. I think more people than ever before realize that we must have a good working knowledge of all phases of endeavour in this vast country of ours. If I speak, as I probably shall this afternoon, with respect to agriculture in this country, I do so with the idea of trying to relate it to the whole Canadian economy.

Last summer I took the opportunity of visiting for a month or six weeks in eastern Canada, the maritimes and, I may say for the benefit of my French-Canadian friends across the way, the province of Quebec. It was a wonderful experience. I gained a great deal of knowledge as to the difficulties and the problems that are being faced in other parts of Canada. I should like to take this opportunity of inviting members from eastern Canada and the maritimes who have not recently visited western Canada to go out there and see at first hand some of the difficulties and problems with which we are faced.

We hear a great deal, Mr. Speaker, about the proposition of one world; we hear a great deal about a world community. In the minds of most people I think it means something more than just a geographical proposition. I think it means the peoples of all countries living together in a sort of brotherhood based on the principles laid down in the Atlantic charter. I will be the first to admit that when we look at the situation that exists in the world today, it does not sound too realistic. However, I am convinced that it is the goal toward which we must all strive. I am convinced that we have no choice but to accept that principle.

If we are going to condition our thinking to this idea of one world, I think the best thing we can do is to start at home, because Canada also has become a very small community, as will be acknowledged by anybody who takes a look at our transportation system or our communications system and who gives any consideration to the economy of this country.

More people than ever before realize that in any small community such as Canada has become, you cannot have one segment of our economy depressed and another segment of it fairly prosperous. Nor can you have one section of our people unemployed and on relief and another section of our people enjoying comparative prosperity. Those two conditions cannot exist in a community.

They cannot exist in Canada for another reason, too. We cannot afford to have conditions such as those I have outlined if we are going to attempt to set an example to the hundreds of millions of people in other parts of the world who are looking around, standing in the shadow, trying to make up their minds as to just what their choice is going to be as between the two dominant political philosophies that we find in the world today.

These conditions do exist in this country, Mr. Speaker, as is quite evident. Daily it is becoming increasingly more difficult for workers to exchange the product of their labour and their ingenuity for a better standard of living; and by the same token it is becoming increasingly more difficult for agricultural producers to market the food which they produce. I contend that food is the most important commodity on earth.

If we are going to consider this Canadian agricultural scene, I believe it is time we faced up to a few of the hard facts of life in connection with it. I think it is time we believed that Canadian agriculture, in so far as the welfare of the Canadian people is concerned, is the greatest industry we have. I believe it is one of the greatest industries we have because so many other industries are dependent on it.

In the corridor here the other day a member of the house said to me: "Yes, I will admit that the farm machinery industry is suffering a mild recession. I will even go so far as to admit that there are production slow-downs. I will even go so far as to say there are work stoppages; but you are not going to condemn the system just on the ground that one industry in this vast country is suffering economic distress." But what my hon. friend did not realize was the fact that the farm machinery industry in this country does not produce a finished machine. What about the workers in the rubber industry, who put the tires on these implements? What about the people engaged in the manufacture of batteries? What about the people who manufacture bearings, paint, ignition systems, generators, starters, spark plugs and lighting equipment? When you have a production slow-down or work stoppage in this important industry, you have a corresponding work stoppage and production slow-down in a great many other industries. The same thing applies also to the automotive industry.

I think we in Canada are stuck with this agricultural industry. I think we are stuck with it because of our large amount of arable land, because of our climate and because of our people. By people in other parts of the world we are going to be looked upon as one of the greatest food producers, in so far as our export is concerned, in the world. In all probability we are destined to play that important role, just as we have played it in the past. Therefore we must make up our minds as to what kind of agricultural industry we want in this country. Do we want an industry like the one we had in the thirties, a sort of twentieth century peasantry? Or do we want in this country an agricultural industry that is prosperous, one that will make for general prosperity not only among our own people but which, if it is properly distributed, will provide for the world food which in my opinion is still the greatest force mankind has ever invented to ensure the peace of the world.

In spite of the things we have heard from the Minister of Agriculture let us not delude ourselves that agriculture is in a healthy position. It must be admitted that western Canada suffered a tremendous crop failure in 1954. That crop represents only a fraction of the normal. As far as Saskatchewan is concerned, it is estimated that our income will be reduced by $250 million this year. This means that the purchasing power of the people of the province will be reduced by approximately 45 per cent as compared with last year, and in some parts of my constituency the figure will run as high as 80 per cent. But once again let us not forget that in the last three years the farmers of western Canada have grown five crops. Let nobody say that the economic distress western Canada is now experiencing is the result of the short and disastrous crop we had last summer, because we in western Canada have grown five normal crops in three years.

Many people say, "If you have done this, how is it that you find yourselves in this position today?" According to dominion bureau of statistics figures, since 1951 the prices that farmers throughout Canada have received for what they sold have gone down eight points while their costs have risen 14 points. In my own province farmers' costs have risen 16 points, which means that so far as their net income is concerned they are 24 points worse off than they were three years ago.

I wonder how many other Canadian businesses could remain solvent faced with this kind of thing. Yet the farmers are asked and expected to go on producing under these conditions. They are even told now that in all probability their net income will be further reduced next year. Of course this evil day has only been postponed because of the fact that we have grown five crops in three years, yet many people will try to make themselves believe that other factors are responsible.

A great deal has been said about unemployment, but I do not intend to say too much about it. Some say that in the next month or two there will be 600,000 unemployed. Some go so far as to say that there will be 750,000. This condition has arisen because of the loss of purchasing power of the primary producer. The primary producer is not buying as many goods and services as he formerly did because he does not have the purchasing power to do so. When he does not purchase the manufacturer slows down production. When he slows down production he lays off men. When he lays off men their incomes are not as large as they were, so they do not buy as many consumer goods as they did. This brings about a further slow-down of production with a further lay-off of workers. So you have the whole process repeated over and over again.

I think it is time we stopped trying to make ourselves believe that the situation will cure itself if we give it enough time. There are a great many things that I believe we could do. The Minister of Agriculture has told us over and over again that the people of Canada provide the best market for the things produced in Canada. Let us take a look at that statement. Maybe he has something there. We have 600,000 unemployed. One does not have to be much of a mathematician to realize that 600,000 unemployed could represent about a million and a half people in Canada who are not eating quite as much as they did before, who are not purchasing quite as many clothes as they did before. Why not take a look at this potential market? Let us put these people to work.

As far as markets are concerned, I saw a report the other day that the Soviet union is going to import 240 million pounds of meat products this year. Last year Canada Packers made a deal to sell pork to Russia, and got an export permit from the government. I cannot see any difference in the government making a deal to sell meat to Russia this year. I believe that market should be investigated.

But I think the crux of the situation lies in the fact that the government should do what they had in mind in 1945 when they called the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. At that time they had in mind that if and when unemployment or a depression appeared in Canada they would undertake a public works and public investment program. Of course such a public investment program was contingent on a designated number of provinces signing a dominion-provincial tax agreement. That has happened. The way is clear.

I maintain, as other members have emphasized in previous speeches, that this is the time for the government of Canada to undertake a public works program. Once they have done so it is my view that they should call a dominion-provincial conference to decide where these public works projects should be built to produce the best results. As was pointed out yesterday, as far as anything built in western Canada is concerned 75 per cent of the money involved in the cost of such projects will accrue to interests in eastern Canada and 25 per cent will remain in the west.

I believe, too, that the South Saskatchewan river dam should be constructed. I think that is one of the more important public investments that could be made. Somebody said they believed that the Minister of Agriculture wants the dam. I honestly believe he wants the dam. For all I know it may be that he is a captive of the Liberal party, but I should like him to come out of that captivity and build the dam. I am sure that if the dam is built we will all be happy, and in all probability we will call it the Gardiner dam.

I said we should put people to work on public projects. If war came tomorrow we would put these people to work. There is no question but that we need many things in Canada. We need more hospitals. We need a road-building program of the type indicated the other evening by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). All these things would in themselves be wealth-creating and largely self-liquidating. In my opinion such a program is the only thing that would approach a solution to this problem. Such a program is being sought by a great many responsible organizations in Canada. It is being requested by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities and by labour organizations. It is even being asked for by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

I should like to spend a few minutes discussing a problem about which I am very much concerned and have been very much concerned for a long time. I refer to the problem of Indian affairs. One does not have to study the Indian affairs branch long before it becomes pretty obvious that the same kind of bungling goes on in that department that goes on in a great many other government departments. It is my sincere hope that the new Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, whose department deals with Indian affairs, will give a great deal of serious consideration to the problem, and will show much more enthusiasm in an attempt to come up with solutions to a few of these Indian problems than any of his predecessors have shown in the past. I have to admit that many procedures have become so well established in that branch that I doubt if even the new minister will have very much success in finding a solution. But there are a great many urgent problems to be solved.

Before mentioning some of them I should like for a moment to take a look at the reserves system. About 70 years ago the government of Canada undertook to place the Indians on reserves. I assume that in the back of their minds they believed that this system of reserves would be a means to an end, and I hope the end was assimilation. I believe that is correct. And I also believe that the reserves system was the most infamous and most immoral thing any one group of people ever imposed upon another group. We who profess freedom in this country, and laud to high heaven the dignity of man, rounded up these primitive people and put them in compounds with just about as much compunction as we do the buffalo. We denied them the white man's privileges. And while we restricted their association with white people we exploited them at every turn, inflicting upon these comparatively happy and self-sufficient people all the vices and diseases of the white man, until in the majority of cases we have completely demoralized them.

In other words we used just about every conceivable device to guarantee the failure of assimilation. And after 50 years of experience this government is now contemplating setting up more of these infamous reserves. Yes, it is going out and buying land for that purpose. I read a report—I hope it is not true, because I am not prepared to believe it—that they are even considering setting up some kind of reserves system for the metis people in this country. God forbid!

I should like to tell a story about what is going on in one reserve in my constituency, and there are others in a similar position. There is no Indian agent within a hundred miles. If one of these Indians wants to sell a cord of wood, a bushel of wheat or a few fence posts he has to hitch-hike a hundred miles there and a hundred miles home to obtain written permission from the Indian agent to dispose of that product. The obvious result is that he does not do this.

About a month ago the local papers throughout the area were circulating a request for clothing and food to alleviate what they described as a deplorable condition among the Indians. I hope the minister is going to investigate that very serious situation. I would like to bring to his attention the serious position of the northern Indians in this country and suggest to him—I am sorry he is not in his seat—that he make a very careful examination of the personnel working in the field for the Indian affairs branch. I will be the first to admit that a great many of them have all the outward appearances of possessing the qualifications necessary for their work, but there are factors involved with many of them, factors which I do not wish to put on Hansard because some of these people are friends of mine, which render them utterly useless in the job they are now doing.

An hon. Member: Are they Liberals?

Mr. Bryson: No, they are not Liberals. I would be happy to give the minister in private what I refrain from saying in the house respecting these people.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has gone into the north country, augmented by the health services of the different provinces, and has brought about a situation under which the Indian population is increasing rapidly. I find that in one area the infant mortality rate has dropped from eighteen to three per thousand of population. That is a wonderful improvement. But here you have the perfectly silly situation of spending the taxpayers' money in providing a service and at the same time allowing conditions to exist which make these people the complete and absolute wards of the government, in a most disgraceful manner.

Let me illustrate. We still believe we are going to be able to assimilate these people, so we say they have to go to school; and here is where I say the department falls down in its administration. They pay the Indians family allowances—and I hope no one will get the impression that I am opposed to family allowances, because I am not. I would like to see everybody, including the Indians, get family allowances. But I certainly take objection to the administration of those payments.

Here is what happens; here is why I say the men in the field are inefficient. They are paying these Indians family allowances, but at the same time they say, "In order to collect your family allowance cheques you have to send your children to school." What does that mean? If these men knew their business they would know that was not a proper thing to do. An Indian family is a unit. If one member goes, they all go. They sit around the posts now, collecting their family allowances. The cheques are taken in to the Hudson's Bay Company—these exploiters who have learned well their trade over two hundred years—and do the Indians buy essentials with these family allowance cheques? No, they do not. These are primitive people; they are buying ribbons and Mickey Mouse watches, and the Hudson's Bay Company could not care less. Why should they? They are in business. Free enterprise!

So, Mr. Speaker, the end result, with one exception which I shall mention later, is that the Indians are not going out on the trapping grounds in the winter nor are they going out fishing in the summer. They cannot, because the Indian woman has to stay and look after the children. They have to go to school if the Indian family is to receive the family allowance payments. And the Indian man cannot go out and do anything without the woman, because she does the work.

Let us get down to the facts. I say there is something desperately wrong with the administration of that department when conditions like that are allowed to exist. But there is one exception. Some bright boy on the Indian field staff came up with this idea. The trapping season starts on December 15, so we will let these Indians go out on the trap lines between December 15 and March 15. How utterly stupid are those people. Anyone who has had experience in the north country knows that trapping is a quite considerable business. You cannot say, "I am going out to trap tomorrow." You have to say about the middle of August that you are going out to trap, and you get ready for December 15. Again this is a sample of maladministration.

I say the government of Canada is spending the taxpayers' money to create a condition whereby the Indian population is increasing, and at the same time it is allowing a condition to develop under which these people are becoming wards of the government. I would suggest that the government establish trading stores in the north. Let us forget about this Hudson's Bay Company. Let the government provide trading stores in the north where they will sell essential things to the Indians in exchange for the family allowance.

That may be a kind of shock treatment, but the government is using a little bit of shock treatment on these people now, and I condone it. I believe the government was completely justified last year when it took a team of X-ray specialists into that country. To the Indians, of course, that was a kind of bogeyman. They did not want to be X-rayed. So the specialist said, "All right; no X-ray, no treaty." That is what I call the shock treatment. I think it was all right. In that particular respect the means justified the end. I suggest they set up government stores in the north where those Indians can buy essentials, flour instead of ribbons and sugar instead of Mickey Mouse watches.

Mr. Harris: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that one of the few popular things I did in the house was to announce that those cheques were to be sent to those people without restriction? That statement was applauded by the party to which he belongs.

Mr. Bryson: That may be true.

Mr. Harris: It is true.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is in a position to do a lot of popular things now.

Mr. Bryson: I maintain that the welfare of the Indians of this country rests primarily on the people who are administering family allowances.

I almost hesitate to do this, but I am going to commend the government on setting up locker plants in the north where the Indians can store meat against hard times, with Indian participation financially. Of course I hope we never again have a repetition of what happened last summer at one place in the north where, after the meat was stored in the plant and the summer came along, with Indians all around the post—they cannot go away; if they do they do not collect the family allowance, so they stay at the post—the man in charge of the locker plant decided he was going on a two months' holiday and took the key with him, leaving the Indians in a state of complete panic and near famine. I hope that will be investigated by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I hope they set up more of these lockers.

I have a suggestion now for the minister that I believe will bring about a solution, possibly more rapidly than anything else I know of. I urge the government to call a dominion-provincial conference at the earliest possible moment in an effort to work out a long-term financial agreement with the provinces, so the provinces may take over the administration of Indian affairs in this country. I believe that would be a step in the right direction, on the ground that the provinces individually would be much better able to cope with this situation.

Those closely associated with Indians believe that is the ultimate solution. The present policy is inadequate, and what is more important it is completely unrealistic. Certainly we as a people who profess all the Christian ethics associated with a free people in a democracy can no longer go around shutting our eyes and turning our backs on these unfortunate people who, through no fault of their own, have become the victims of our refusal to accept and treat them as deserving citizens within our country.

I think, after what I have said, Mr. Speaker, you will agree that I do not intend to support the motion.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is generally agreed among authorities that mankind has solved the problem of production, but that mankind has not solved the problem of distribution. It is not, perhaps, adequately realized and appreciated that in this age of machines and wonder-working skills man must solve the problem of distribution or face probable extinction from the earth. One of the amazing things to me is that for years and years now our government has done nothing, so far as I can see, to develop or discover a method of distribution any different from what their forefathers were using in 1895.

For freedom-loving men the only potentially satisfactory method of distribution is the financial philosophy and mechanism of Social Credit. What mankind must have is the means whereby men can make what is physically possible financially possible. As the clearest evidence that we have not yet accomplished that objective, it is well known to everyone that just as soon as we develop more of a particular kind of goods than the people are buying, the price of those goods goes down and down and the people producing those goods are worse off than they were when there was a scarcity of goods, which shows quite clearly that up to the present time we have nothing even resembling a scientific method of distribution or a scientific method of making that which is physically possible financially possible.

The financial technique of Social Credit provides a means whereby man can make what is physically possible financially possible, not only in producing goods from the resources available but in consuming the goods already produced.

The Social Credit financial technique comprises three elements. These elements are: one, the free flow of credit; two, the just price; three, a national dividend to be paid to every qualified member of the community or society. Regardless, Mr. Speaker, of what mischievous organs like the Winnipeg Free Press and others are endeavouring to mislead the people into believing as being what Social Credit advocates, the statements which I have made here are correct.

May we briefly consider each of these three elements. Let us take first the free flow of credit. Through establishing and maintaining a free flow of credit a society or state, without increase of debt, of taxation or of prices, is able to make available to itself whatever money is necessary to bring about and sustain whatever measure or degree of prosperity its resources render possible, avoiding both depressions and undesirable booms; depressions, as we know, resulting from too little money coming into the markets to buy goods offered for sale; booms or inflationary periods resulting from too much money coming into the markets to buy such goods.

Now, where is it supposed a government in a Social Credit society is to obtain the money required to establish and maintain this free flow of credit? It is a certain thing that no government we have ever had in Ottawa, in the Dominion of Canada, and no government they have had in Washington in the United States, has ever been able to establish a free flow of credit with the devices they have used.

Now to explain where the money could come from. Let us recall that the constitutions of both Canada and the United States empower the government to create the nation's money just as actually the royal mint at Ottawa stamps out Canadian coins, nickels, dimes, quarters and fifty cent pieces. The Canadian constitution, the British North America Act, under section 91 gives the parliament of Canada exclusive legislative jurisdiction over, first, currency and coinage under subsection 14; second, banking, the incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money under subsection 15; and third, legal tender under subsection 20. These three powers are all that are required to enable the government of Canada to create in Canada all the money which the resources and the production of Canada will justify.

The United States constitution, article I, section 8, paragraph 5, states in part:

> Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

What use has Canada made of this constitutional power thus vested in her federal government? We have had two or three cases in which successful attempts have been made. Under the Finance Act of 1914 the Canadian minister of finance, Sir Thomas White, created scores and even hundreds of millions of Canadian dollars. In the period from 1914 to 1917 he created $26 million Canadian and spent them in the conduct of the war. They were not funny money either, nor rubber dollars. We will find the record of what I have just said on page 22 of the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, published in 1933.

In 1917 Sir Thomas White created $50 million and used it to buy Canadian grain and other products for Britain, those dollars being backed up by imperial treasury bills. An account of this transaction will be found at page 22 of the report to which I have referred already. Altogether he created more than $1,200 million Canadian during world war I and advanced it to Britain to purchase in Canada foodstuffs, munitions and other products for the conduct of world war I. This will be found recorded at page 85 of the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada.

Sir Thomas White, in his memorandum of dissent signed at Ottawa on October 3, 1933, as reported at page 85 of the report, positively declared.

> But there was on the part of the government no "policy of inflation."

It is a favourite lie used by Liberals and Conservatives all over Canada to speak of Social Credit and its use of government money as inflation. I suppose the C.C.F. do a similar thing because they do not hesitate to do all the things the other two parties do. A Social Credit government in Canada could, and most likely would, obtain money to maintain the free flow of credit from exactly the same sources that supplied Sir Thomas White with much of the money with which he financed Canada's relatively colossal war effort in world war I.

Canada's finance minister, Sir Thomas White, through the use of a specialized financial agency entitled the Finance Act of 1914, created the Canadian dollars he needed, first, to stimulate the development of Canadian production of goods and services and, second, to market those goods and services to advantage. A Social Credit government in Canada, likewise through the use of a specialized financial agency, a national monetary commission, would create the Canadian dollars needed, first, to stimulate Canadian production in accordance with the desires of Canadians; second, to enable Canadian producers to market their production and, third, to enable Canadian consumers to obtain and enjoy that production, attaining an ever and ever higher standard of living and of security.

Everyone today is wondering about the tremendous impact which the discovery and employment of atomic power is going to have on the production of goods. Everyone is realizing the almost appalling efficiency of great modern machines such as those described, if I remember rightly, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) last night. Surely everyone must be concerned about what is going to happen as a result of the enormous increase in production unless some means are developed whereby the people will be able to partake of the production after it is brought into existence.

Anyone who takes the time to be realistic at all knows that it will be utterly impossible to obtain money by taxation with which to enable the people to buy the goods produced by these great machines and through these remarkable technological skills. We might just as well face that fact and be honest. Every one of us should remember that when he is out on the platform talking to the people. The time has come when the people of Canada have a right to be told the truth, no matter what it is, by the man standing on the platform.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, before the house took recess I was discussing the Social Credit free flow of credit proposal, and how money would be obtained with which to support the free flow of credit. I pointed out that the method whereby Social Crediters would obtain money would closely resemble the method whereby Sir Thomas White obtained millions of dollars through the application of the Finance Act of 1914 in conducting world war I. I pointed out there need be no more question of the soundness of Social Credit money than there was concerning the money which Sir Thomas White used on that occasion.

Opponents of Social Credit contend that a Social Credit government's money would be unsound. "Funny money," they like to call it. But would they dare to suggest that the dollars issued under the Finance Act of 1914 were unsound? Would they suggest those dollars were funny? I think not.

What makes the Canadian dollar sound inside Canada? Is it gold? Many people think so, but it is not. It is goods and services backed by Canadian resources, material and human, standing ready to produce and to deliver more goods and services. An excellent working definition of the dollar is this; "a dollar is a ticket to goods." Such being the case, the number of dollars the Minister of Finance could safely issue within the Canadian economy would be roughly related to the amount of goods offered for sale within Canadian markets.

Another helpful definition of a dollar is that "a dollar is a medium of exchange." Bearing this definition in mind we must recognize that the number of dollars going into Canadian markets ought to be related to the number of exchanges Canadians would be able and willing to make with each other.

These two considerations enable anyone who desires to do so to form a concrete means of judging whether there might be too much money within an economy at any given time. Sir Thomas White's Finance Act dollars were unquestionably sound because their number was consciously geared to Canadian goods and services available for the exchanges Canadians wished to make.

Opponents of Social Credit argue that under a Social Credit administration there would be issued too many dollars; "turning on the printing presses", they derisively call it. But the Social Crediters would exercise adequate caution in issuing currency and credit, both debt money to be loaned into circulation and debt-free money to be spent. Social Crediters know the fundamental facts about money, just as did Sir Thomas White. Would any informed and honest man disparagingly accuse Sir Thomas White of "turning on the printing presses"? I do not believe that expression was used in Canada until it became in the interests of certain political people to discredit Social Credit.

Opponents of Social Credit have always endeavoured to show that it would establish a dictatorship. But quite the contrary is the case. Social Credit would establish the freest state and the most fully democratic government the mind of man can conceive. Did Sir Thomas White establish a dictatorship in developing and employing the Finance Act of 1914? Even to ask that question is to be unfair to his memory and to shock almost any hon. member into serious thought.

The opponents of Social Credit will ask: "How could prices be maintained without iron controls?" I think it was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), speaking some time ago in connection with Social Credit, who asked that question. The answer is that prices on the whole would be maintained by a scientific use of the law of supply and demand. It is the law of supply and demand that is supposed to affect prices today. By having and exercising ready, effective control over financial policy the Minister of Finance would be readily able to increase the supply of almost any commodity in Canada, thereby dealing with the tendency of prices to rise.

Some will ask, "But how could he increase the supply quickly enough to offset an inflationary tendency?" After a Social Credit government had been in operation for a certain length of time we would find that it would probably have on hand a considerable supply of many commodities, just as we find today the dominion government of Canada has on hand a considerable supply of butter, eggs, and other commodities.

I have stated several times in this house that it would be greatly in the interests of this nation to store up a good supply of different kinds of grain, sugar, honey, and other commodities of that nature so there would be reserves available in case a need arises to free certain commodities upon the market when there appears to be sufficient shortage to cause a price rise.

The Minister of Finance could manage tendencies toward falling prices by a policy of price support wherever necessary, much as we are doing in Canada today through the agricultural prices support program. He could buy and take temporary control of and withdraw from the market all unmanageable surpluses, especially of non-perishable goods such as wheat, sugar, and so forth. As I have already indicated, we have followed such a policy in Canada, and in fact we are doing so now. We had a number of similar policies during world war II. However, the device has not been used, shall I say, wholesale or all across the board, or in a general way for the purpose of being able to control prices in this country.

No one would speak of devices such as I have indicated as being "iron controls" unless he was having a nightmare. Depressions and booms could be controlled and practically eliminated by the use of Social Credit financial measures. To go into sufficient detail to establish that thesis would, of course, require far more time than is available either to anyone speaking in this house or to hon. members listening. One has simply to study the whole science of Social Credit with a desire to learn the truth concerning it.

At the same time these measures I have indicated would be used, there would be, as potent aids to the Minister of Finance in his endeavour to control prices both deflationary and inflationary, two other Social Credit financial devices, namely the just price and the national dividend. The just price is obtained or determined quite scientifically by reference to two considerations. The first is that the aim would be to give the producer the cost of production plus a just profit. The other would be to use what is called the just price factor. I have not time to go into the details pertaining to that matter, but it is fully understood by those who endeavour to learn. The just price factor would enable those managing the economy to determine what should be the compensated discount on prices to bring them down to the place where they ought to be. There would be no dictatorship, no iron controls involved. In fact I think we would find that a large percentage of the control would be exercised by the various elements in society itself.

The labour unions are exercising more and more influence in the conduct of the affairs of the nation, and they are going to do so in the days to come. As they realize that they have more and more responsibility for their own well-being as well as for the well-being of all other members of the state, we shall find that they will become far more enlightened and purposeful in all their moves. They will play a considerable part, I believe, in determining economic policy, much as they are doing today.

The Canadian Manufacturers Association are also exercising a potent influence. Other elements of society will exercise a potent influence too, and in due time they will find that, rather than fighting each other, it will be greatly to their advantage to sit around a council table, talk matters over and decide how big the pie is that is to be divided up and how large a part each of them ought to have, and proceed to determine a means whereby each can obtain his equitable share. This is not at all beyond the realm of possibility. In fact even today proposals are being made which are rather far-reaching. One of them was referred to last night by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart).

The national dividend is a means of introducing into the economy of the nation enough purchasing power to enable the people consuming to buy the produce which is on the market. That is, if it is discovered that there is a surplus, issuing the national dividend would be another means of absorbing that surplus and preventing it from causing a fall in prices. Surely anyone who desires to face facts—as I am sure every member of this house today realizes we must—ought to be able to see that there is no element of dictatorship in all of those measures.

Opponents of Social Credit will object that Sir Thomas White's dollars under the Finance Act of 1914 were backed by gold, while Social Credit dollars would appear not to be backed by gold.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): What are they backed by?

Mr. Blackmore: The goods and services of the country. That is what they are backed by now. Why do you not listen to what I say?

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I listened but I do not understand it.

Mr. Blackmore: Then why do you not pay attention? You never will understand it when you do not get all the particulars. I have just told you that the backing for money today is goods and services. How long will the value of the dollar be maintained, we will say, in buying potatoes if we run short of potatoes? How long will the value of the dollar be maintained in respect of apples if we have a shortage of apples, or how long will the value of the dollar be maintained if we have a great surplus of potatoes or a great surplus of apples? That consideration alone is enough to show that the thing that gives the dollar value is the goods and services available to buy with the dollar; that and the price structure, which of course we have been discussing the means of maintaining in the part of my speech which I have just recently finished giving.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I missed it.

Mr. Blackmore: You just missed it. I am glad you admit that. It is not easy to get these things. I realize that fact. I had to learn these things. It is just about as difficult to learn the fundamentals of Social Credit as it is to learn trigonometry. A person does not learn trigonometry in class by just going and sitting there, especially if he makes up his mind that he is not going to learn it.

Opponents who feel that Sir Thomas White's dollars were all backed by gold will do well to turn to the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, published in 1933, to which I have already referred. If they will turn to page 21 and read paragraph 46 they will learn that even in 1913, before the introduction of the Finance Act of 1914, the men of those times considered it safe to permit the minister of finance to issue $30 million of notes under the Dominion Notes Act with a backing of accepted guaranteed debentures.

This fact shows quite clearly that they saw that gold was not necessary to support the value of a dollar, even back there before they suspended the gold redemption clause in 1933. Those who think that Sir Thomas White's dollars were backed by gold will also do well to read in the report of the royal commission an item to be found at page 22, dealing with the issue of the $50 million to buy goods for Britain. Those $50 million, it was specifically stated in the report, were backed by British treasury bills. Certainly those British treasury bills by no stretch of the imagination meant gold. Britain might have seen fit to clear them off with gold, but generally speaking those treasury bills meant goods and services to be delivered at a later time.

Let those who still think that possibly there was a gold consideration quite prominent in the support of Sir Thomas White's dollars remember that the Bank of Canada's dollars can be supported with bonds just as with gold.

Mr. Low: And are.

Mr. Blackmore: And are, as the hon. member for Peace River says. When we begin to consider all matters of this kind we shall find that Social Credit is not nearly as hare-brained as a good many of its ardent opponents would have people believe. The simple fact is that Social Credit means the scientific solution of the difficulty we are in. It is well for us to know that. It just happens that the men who are guiding the propaganda machine in the Dominion of Canada do not want the people to get to understand Social Credit, because they know that if Social Credit is introduced they will no longer be able to exercise the control they now exercise over the destinies of Canada. Incidentally, they are exactly the same gentlemen who are the originators of communism.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course there were times when I was sufficiently uninformed to think in that way also, but you grow wiser if you study in the right places. The trouble with a number of us youngsters is this. We do not know very much about who are behind communism. Just let us get to work and find out. We shall be quite astonished.

I am sure every member in the house has been rendered really unhappy in the last few days by the number of things we have run up against for which we need a great deal of money which the treasury board says we do not have. There is no one in the house who is not in favour of the introduction of a nation-wide housing plan which would probably produce houses three or four times as quickly and at one-third the cost of the houses we are now building in Canada. But we do not see where the money is going to come from to build houses as numerous and as cheaply. There is no one in the house who would not favour the introduction of a national hospitalization and health scheme but, while some men will rise and talk enthusiastically for political purposes for the sake of the folks back home, when such a scheme is proposed and comes to a vote they very quietly withhold their support because they just cannot see from where the money is going to come.

As far as a national health scheme is concerned, we have or soon could have all the doctors we need. There is no difficulty in training enough girls to be nurses. There certainly is no lack of materials with which to build hospitals. There is no lack of food and all the other things necessary to improve the health of our people. Why should we say we cannot have a national health scheme? The only reason is we have not the tickets for the goods. That is all. The goods and services are there but we have not the tickets. Who is to say we cannot create the tickets when we have the goods? Some time ago I said that a good definition for a dollar is a ticket to goods.

Mr. Hanna: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Gladly.

Mr. Hanna: Will he please explain what effect the Social Credit technique would have on taxation?

Mr. Blackmore: In the first place I would say that it would so greatly increase the well-being of the nation that the tax burden we are now bearing would seem to be relatively easier. Everyone knows that in times of buoyant revenues, buoyant incomes and so forth, as at the peak of prosperity in the war, it was easier to bear taxation. But the answer I would give, without going into too much detail, is that Social Credit is opposed to high taxation and would endeavour, just as rapidly as the goods and services produced in the country would justify, to remove the debt. The debt can be easily paid off. Sir Thomas White could have used any $100 million that he created to pay off $100 million in bonds just as easily as he could have used the money to buy $100 million worth of wheat and other commodities in the war.

The result is that if the time came when a Social Credit administration felt that the wisest use to be made of a given amount of money obtained from monetizing goods and services was to pay off the debt, then by degrees it could do so by simply monetizing, as Sir Thomas White did, the goods and services of the country and paying off the debt. Taxes would thereby slowly be reduced until the time would come—I will not say how many years it would take; it would depend on conditions, but I would say within a rather comfortable period—when taxation could be abolished entirely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: That may sound very glowing.

Mr. Byrne: Fantastic.

Mr. Blackmore: But when you remember the tremendous increases in machines and technological skills, the tremendous wealth there is in their output, the tremendous amount of services that are becoming available and will become available; when you remember that you can pay off the debt with goods and services, hon. members must realize that in a nation so bountifully endowed as Canada is with resources of all kinds it is quite ridiculous to think of having a perpetual debt and heavy taxation. The hon. member probably has part of the answer there, so perhaps I might go on to another point. If he wants to ask me another question I will be pleased to answer it.

Everyone in Canada would like to have fine roads. Probably there is no country that needs roads more than we do, or more of them. We have everything necessary for the construction of roads. We can manufacture the machinery. We have all the materials and every single thing that is necessary to make first class roads. The only thing we lack is these tickets, and Sir Thomas White showed quite clearly in the Finance Act of 1914 that they could be made and that as long as their number was kept reasonably within the amount of goods and services available they would cause no inconvenience at all.

Everyone would like to have more irrigation. Everyone would like to have the means to support the unemployed. But though we have all the goods and services necessary, food, clothing, shelter, everything you can name, to support the people in a high degree of comfort, yet we say we have not the money. I should think that would make anyone who came here from Mars or some other place, where they are not hypnotized the way we are, laugh until he was almost beyond self-control.

Let us bear in mind that up to the present time there has not been advanced in this house a hint of a solution of the problem. Two or three of our good C.C.F. friends have held forth in the most impressive terms about the difficulties confronting us. They have pointed out that the Liberals have no solution and the Conservatives have no solution. They have let us assume that they have a solution, but they have not shown how their ideas would provide a solution to the difficulties. Suppose we take the great machine the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) was talking about yesterday. Suppose it becomes many times greater, throwing people out of work by the thousands and increasing the productive capacity of industry many times so that the people could not get nearly enough work to obtain wages with which to buy the products of the machine. Suppose the government took over that machine. Would that help to put more men to work? Would it help to put any more money into their hands? Would it help to create and sell more goods?

That is the only solution the C.C.F. have, just government ownership. Surely we must expect these earnest men in the C.C.F.—and they are earnest men—to be quite realistic and up to date in their thinking, and not expect us to believe things which they have not proved.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Gladly. I shall be delighted to have my hon. friend ask questions.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member suggests that the C.C.F. should not be expected to try to make him believe things that have not been proved. Does that apply to what he has said tonight?—because it certainly has not been proved.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder whether the hon. member came in too late—

Mr. MacInnis: Oh, no; I was here all the time.

Mr. Blackmore: —to hear what I said about the Finance Act of 1914. Here is a fine little book which I suggest the hon. member should read. This little book is the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada. It gives all the information necessary for a man of half the intelligence of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) to understand what I have said.

Mr. MacInnis: Is it easier than trigonometry?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, it is easier than trigonometry. Otherwise I am sure I would not suggest it to the hon. member.

Mr. MacDougall: You asked for it, Angus. You have got to read it now.

Mr. Blackmore: I hope to come back later and say a little more about this subject. I think that is probably enough for one lesson.

(Translation):

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer you my best wishes at the beginning of this new year and to tell you how much I admire your industry, your authority, your impartiality and your thorough knowledge of parliamentary procedure.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. His speech was remarkable and has ranked him among the most eloquent speakers of this house. And I wish, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the hon. member for Trinity on the able speech he delivered in this house when seconding the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I also wish to point out the important role played by my predecessor, Mr. J. C. Nadon, in this house and more particularly the numerous services he rendered to the county of Gatineau, as member of the legislature and as mayor of the village of Maniwaki, which office he held with great ability and initiative during many years. His memory will live forever among his constituents.

I also wish to congratulate Notary Leon J. Raymond who succeeded me as member for Gatineau in 1945 and who now occupies the important position of Clerk of the House of Commons. This is an honour which reflects not only on him and his family, but also upon the riding which elected him as its representative.

I also wish to congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the excellent appointments he made when he chose the Hon. George Marler as Minister of Transport and the Hon. Roch Pinard as Secretary of State. They are both men of great ability, and I wish them the success they deserve in the fulfilment of their duties.

I wish to thank particularly the voters of the county of Gatineau who have done me the honour of electing me to represent them in this house. This is a great honour, because the county of Gatineau is one of the most beautiful in this country, and an important part of this riding is included in the national capital area. Two-thirds of its population is composed of Canadians of French extraction, and one-third of citizens of English origin. It is a hard-working, intelligent and progressive population, composed mainly of farmers, settlers, lumbermen, civil servants, technicians, teachers, tradesmen, industrialists, etc. Bonne entente and harmony exist between the various racial groups, and they are all justly proud to live in the beautiful county of Gatineau.

My riding is bounded on the west by the Ottawa river and extends to the limits of the counties of Pontiac and Montcalm. To the east lies the county of Labelle, and to the south the county of Hull. Agriculture, forestry, the tourist industry, mining, hydro-electric developments and small industries constitute the main sources of revenue of the inhabitants of this county.

In the southern district of my riding, agriculture is prosperous and farmers enjoy good markets for their produce. In the upper regions and along the Lievre, farmers are organized in agricultural co-operatives, but as they are farther away from large centres, their agricultural industry is less profitable. The farmer, however, appreciates the endeavours of the Canadian government to assist agriculture, and agricultural price support is a great help to farmers.

The farmers in my county are not exclusively interested in agriculture; particularly during the winter months they engage in commercial lumbering on the farms. Lumber and plywood are the most remunerative because the market prices for these are high and there is a great demand for those products; but I cannot say the same concerning the sale of pulpwood, namely spruce, fir and poplar, which are purchased by the large pulp and paper firms. Three large companies purchase pulpwood from farmers and settlers in my county, the E. B. Eddy, of Hull, the Canadian International Paper whose mill is at Gatineau Mills, and the James Maclaren Company's pulpmill at Masson. The price which these companies pay for pulpwood is ridiculous when compared to the price of newsprint and other paper and of building materials made of pulp which are sold by those companies. Such low prices are paid to farmers and settlers because there exists a combine between these companies which exploit the farmers and the settlers to their advantage, and unfortunately this combine has been going on too long.

The Catholic farmers federation of my riding and the representatives of the agricultural co-operatives of the northern section of my county have asked me to condemn this combine so that they may obtain a fair and equitable price for the pulpwood which they sell yearly to those companies and which amounts to an average of one hundred thousand cords per year.

It is my duty, as a member of parliament, to protect and defend the interests of my constituents, and it is particularly my duty to protect the weak and the poor against those wealthy companies which are necessary and to which the province of Quebec has granted very generous forest and hydroelectric concessions so that they may help lumbermen, settlers and farmers, and not exploit them solely to their own benefit.

I would like the essential role played by the lumbermen in the important wood industry to be better known and appreciated. Most of these woodsmen are sons of farmers and settlers in my riding. They are proud people, gay, courageous, intelligent, dexterous and gifted with a surprising physical strength. The woodsman is an untiring worker. He leaves his family and home during weeks and months for the exile of the forest, and he works hard, not eight hours a day, but from morn until night, six days a week. The woodsmen work often under very difficult circumstances, in rain, snow, mud, etc., and they are often exposed to fatal accidents in the performance of their daily duties. They have no union and they are not paid the salary which they deserve for the important work they perform. They are the ones who, in the forest, supply raw materials to the factories. They deserve our highest admiration. They deserve higher wages and it is about time that the large paper companies should understand the importance and the social role of these honest people and pay them fair wages.

I hold no grudge or personal spite against these companies and even less against their employees, particularly those of the Maniwaki office of the Canadian International Paper, whom I know personally and who are honourable citizens and devoted servants of their company. I am in favour of private enterprise, but I am against abuse by capitalists, and it is the duty of governments to curb the infringements of certain large corporations who are only interested in making profits without bothering about social justice.

The prices paid to farmers and settlers for spruce and fir—$13.50 per cord delivered on the Gatineau or Lievre rivers, the greatest part of those companies' lumber being floated on those two rivers down to the mill—are lower than the prices paid by the same companies to contractors who cut wood on the forest reserves of these companies. Some contractors of the Canadian International Paper and the James Maclaren Company on the Lievre river receive much higher prices to cut the wood on the reserves of those companies. If, to the prices paid the contractors to cut pulpwood on the company reserves, you add stumpage dues, protection against forest fires and general overhead expenses, you obtain an amount far above $20 a cord; and yet, the companies agree to give only $13.50 to settlers and farmers for their wood.

I know that these same companies purchase every year in my county over one hundred thousand cords of pulpwood from settlers and farmers, and were they to pay the price which they should equitably pay, the settlers and farmers would receive each year hundreds of thousands of dollars more.

There is one brutal fact to be noted: the higher the prices received by the companies for their newsprint, the less they pay settlers and farmers for pulpwood. The following figures are supplied by the federal bureau of statistics to support those statements:

Year	Price per cord (fir and spruce on the Gatineau and Lievre)	Average value of a ton of paper at mill
1951	$15.00	$101.48
1952	14.50	105.22
1953	13.50	110.05
1954	13.50	110.03

Hardly surprising, then, that these poor settlers and farmers, when they realize that they are being exploited every year and that they have not the necessary means to fight adequately such a monopoly, become disheartened and abandon their farms.

Fortunately, there is a federal law, the Combines Investigation Act, which was introduced and passed by the Liberals and which protects the weak against exploitation by monopolies.

This is why I am asking the Minister of Justice to start an investigation immediately, under the Combines Investigation Act, on the operations of the three above-mentioned companies.

(Text):

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, according to the latest figures produced jointly by the dominion bureau of statistics and the federal Department of Labour, unemployment in November last was 42 per cent greater than in November of the year before. Each month in the past year we have seen a very marked increase in unemployment over the corresponding month of the year before; but, hard as it is to believe, despite these facts there is no indication whatsoever in the speech from the throne that this government has any plans for correcting the basic causes of unemployment.

In the speech from the throne suggestions are made that changes will be made in the Unemployment Insurance Act, and in fact yesterday we passed a bill which made some necessary changes, which have been suggested for two or three years past by the official opposition, increasing the rates of supplementary benefits and extending the minimum period of payment.

The government also suggested in the speech from the throne that the public works program would be accelerated; but, as I have said, despite the fact that in every month of the past year unemployment was a great deal higher than in the corresponding month of the year before, there appears to be no indication whatsoever of any plans which this government has for correcting the basic causes of unemployment. It seems that this government intends to persist in its policy of "hope and grope" for the answers which it never does seem to find.

We must ask ourselves whether we are going to look at this thing constructively. What are the reasons we are experiencing considerably more unemployment than a year ago? I believe there are two main reasons. First of all, we may as well face the fact that producers in other countries are beating Canadian producers in price or design or both. They are moving into our domestic and export markets, and their products are receiving ready acceptance among buyers who formerly were quite content to buy Canadian products.

I believe the second reason is the high taxes we are paying. These have added considerably to the selling price of the goods we produce, and are helping very materially to price our goods out of both the domestic and the export market. In addition to the high commodity taxes, the high income taxes that we are all required to pay are making it increasingly difficult for people to buy the goods we are offering for sale. Tonight I should like to examine each of these causes in turn.

First of all, let us have a look at what other countries are doing to lower their costs and improve their designs so that their steadily increasing sales make it possible for them to take advantage of mass production methods, which in turn lead to lower costs and enable them to sell more and more goods in competition with us in both our domestic and our export markets. These increasing sales of other countries are the main reason Canadian workmen are being laid off and going on short time.

In order to get some idea of what other countries are actually doing, it is only necessary to take a look at their production figures. Take, for instance, Britain. Despite the fact that Great Britain had to make a complete conversion from wartime to peacetime production, Great Britain is turning out 175 per cent of her production in 1938. Despite the fact that West Germany had to rebuild from the rubble of 1945, today that country is producing 170 per cent of the total production of all Germany in 1938. That will give the house some idea of the kind of production effort that is going on in Europe today. The same story is true in varying degrees in France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium and Holland, and it gives us some idea of the kind of competition we are up against.

Because of the need for those countries to replace a great deal of their industrial plant, they have had of necessity to put in a great many new machine tools. Thus they are able to produce a wide variety of new designs in almost every type of production they have embarked upon. Their almost unbelievable urge to rebuild and produce at the same time has made them willing to work long hours and increase their efficiency to a point where their costs, in almost every instance, are well below ours.

One of the main factors, Mr. Speaker, in this tremendous industrial progress in Europe, in fact also in Japan and in the United States, has been industrial research, aimed at discovering new products and developing new designs and more efficient methods of production. These industrial research programs which have been carried on in these countries have been undertaken on a very large and important scale, and I think it is obvious to every one of us that if we here in Canada are going to keep pace with our competitors, we must embark on a research program of a comparable nature.

It was with this in mind that, at the last session, the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) introduced a resolution urging this government to set up a committee which would include representatives of management, labour and the educational institutions, and would examine the possibilities, and best means of operation, of a greatly expanded industrial research program. In its work this committee would be guided very largely by the experience in Great Britain and the United States in setting up similar committees, and developing similar programs. But though this suggestion was favourably commented upon by newspapers of every political leaning in almost every part of this country, and though it was favourably commented upon by industrial and labour leaders from coast to coast, this government turned it down.

It did it by very skilfully seeing to it that on a certain day, at a certain time when this measure was to come up for discussion, private members' bills and resolutions were cut off just before this resolution was due to come forward. This was not just by chance. It was, I believe, because this government knew this resolution was something it could not afford to vote against, and it simply could not bear to see a good and a very much needed measure brought in by the opposition with the opposition receiving credit for it. So, despite the fact that this measure was badly needed, the government, I believe, saw to it that it could not be brought forward.

This year the hon. member for Lambton West has introduced the same resolution; and though I am sorry to see that the government did not have the good sense to introduce this as a measure of its own in the speech from the throne, I hope they will at least allow this measure to come forward this year, and will vote for and adopt it.

The second matter with which I would like to deal tonight is the question of high taxes which are making it very difficult, if not impossible, for certain of our products to be sold both in the domestic and the export markets. This government has always taken the attitude that if you reduce taxes you will lose tax revenue. I say that is by no means necessarily correct, and a very good example of this was shown in the case of the cigarette tax a couple of years ago. The government materially raised the tax, and the consumption of cigarettes dropped off so badly that the total tax revenue decreased to such an extent that the government had to lower the tax again. Then the consumption of cigarettes went up again and the tax intake was restored. If this government will adopt a sensible policy of reducing commodity taxes materially, more of these commodities will be sold, and I believe the total tax revenue will very likely be as great as, or perhaps even greater, than it was before.

Another thing which this government can do is to materially reduce the income tax, because a reduction in the income tax will make it possible for more people to buy more goods. Because of the increased consumption of goods, I believe the loss in tax revenue can easily be made up by more people being employed in producing goods and thereby earning incomes on which they will pay tax, instead of drawing on the government in the form of unemployment insurance benefits. I believe these tax reductions will make it possible to sell more products both in the domestic and the export markets, and will go a long way toward putting a great many of our workmen back at work.

And now, I would like to give an example of how I think industrial research can help establish a new industry. I am going to speak tonight about the potential oil and gas industry in western Canada. We all know that in Alberta, and to a lesser extent in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, we have enormous reserves of gas and oil. In recent years more than $5 billion worth of these reserves have been proved, and we know these are only a small fraction of the reserves which are confidently believed to be present in these areas.

If the incentive for exploration is continued by opening up additional markets, and if that expansion is accompanied by a comprehensive and continued program of industrial research to develop better techniques for processing oil and gas products, I believe we can develop a by-product industry which will be of tremendous importance to western Canada. This will lead to the building of literally dozens of sulphur, chemical, and petrochemical plants, which will require hundreds of millions of dollars worth of capital investment, and will create employment for many, many thousands of Canadians.

In addition to this by-product industry, this would lead to the development in western Canada of a very important steel industry which would use Canadian iron ore as well as coal and gas, and could produce steel pipe and steel casings to be used in thousands of miles of Canadian oil lines across the prairie provinces, and in many Canadian oil wells.

Another example of what research might do to lead to the greater utilization of raw materials would be the development of a more efficient method of producing by-products and hydroelectric power from coal. This could prove very important to Nova Scotia and to western Canada, where our deposits of coal are extremely important indeed. The production of cheap electric power from coal will attract industries to those areas, where industries are badly needed. We all know that industry goes to power; and if we can produce cheap power in those areas, industries will go there, because it is advantageous to them to locate in areas of that kind. Plants which are producing in central Canada at the present time will find it advantageous to put branch plants in the west and the maritimes because their cost of distribution of goods in those areas will be far less than if the goods are produced in central Canada and they have to pay the long freight haul to the maritimes and the west. If we can produce cheap by-products from coal, this will lead to the building up of important by-product industries in those areas, and they in turn will diversify the economy in those areas and make them less dependent on the primary products they produce.

We have another example of what worthwhile research can do in a large industry, in the development of new textile fabrics which would create additional sales for an industry which is hard-pressed at the present time. If, in addition to new textile fabrics, more efficient methods of production were developed, then we could lower our costs and regain our foothold in the competitive textile market.

We have here in Canada an ideal opportunity for tremendous industrial expansion which staggers the imagination. We have almost unlimited supplies of practically every raw material required in industry. We have almost unlimited sources, and potential sources, of hydroelectric power and almost every mineral one can think of, and we can produce enough food in this country to feed several times our present population. We have the capital, and we have proved we have the ability to attract more from outside, without which it would be extremely difficult to carry out large scale expansion. But even more important we have in Canada the brains which are necessary to carry out an expansion of this kind.

This expansion would be greatly aided, I believe, if we did some of the things I have mentioned. We should first of all set up a parliamentary committee to examine the possibility and best means of operating a greatly expanded research program. Second, we should reduce the high taxation which makes it very difficult to sell our products competitively in world markets. If we reduce these taxes we can thereby attract capital for new industry, bearing in mind that unless capital is attracted these new industries simply will not get started.

I would therefore urge this government to stop thinking of curing unemployment merely by making adjustments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and accelerating our public works program, necessary though those measures may be. The problem we are facing requires far sterner measures. Unemployment is the barometer of economic progress within a country, and when it increases by anywhere from 40 to 100 per cent over the corresponding figures for last year it demonstrates that we are not nearly as healthy economically as we should be. Our exports are down; our domestic sales are down. Any businessman will tell you what difficult competitive conditions he has to face.

This government owes it to the country to give a lead in overcoming the basic causes of unemployment. I have suggested two measures the government could readily adopt. I sincerely hope the government will take some heed of what I have said, and give the measures I have suggested some very serious consideration. We in opposition, however, are well aware that this government finds it difficult to accept our suggestions and get moving.

In dealing with the worrying question of unemployment, I think the government should make quite certain that the money it spends in providing employment, and which it has indicated it is going to spend on increased public works, is spent wisely and productively. I believe the government would do well to study the program about to be undertaken by the government of the United States, which is a very large road-building program. I can think of no kind of public work which is more necessary in terms of expansion and development than a well conducted road-building program, because highways play a vitally important part in industrial growth.

I am not suggesting for one moment that the government should embark upon a highway building program. That, as we all know, is the function of the provinces. But the government could place a large proportion of the money it intends to spend on public works in the hands of the provinces, to enable them to undertake a large scale road-building program. Such a program would provide jobs for tomorrow as well as for today, and it would also provide constructive and profitable employment.

The government could also provide employment for many thousands of Canadians for several years ahead by making it possible for more people to buy new houses. The high rate of down payment and high interest charges have today put new houses right out of the reach of the average Canadian. If the government will reduce the down payment to a flat 10 per cent, instead of the present 15 per cent required on the cheapest N.H.A. home, it will make it possible for the average Canadian to make a down payment on a new house. The government should also reduce the interest rate and bring it closer to the rate it pays the people of Canada for the use of their money. People might then be able to afford the carrying charges on new homes.

The suggestions I have put forward would not cost the taxpayers of this country one single cent, and their implementation would mean the provision of useful and constructive employment for thousands of Canadians. It would also enable the builders of this country to construct thousands of additional homes which are very much needed. I might add in conclusion that the construction of new highways and new homes would provide us with useful national assets for the future, and I would urge the government to give this serious consideration.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, before I came to Ottawa I listened to a number of throne speeches, and having listened to two in Ottawa I am struck by the fact that they have one thing in common. That is that they tend to devote a great deal of their time to telling us what we have already read in the newspapers. One might also imagine the assumption was that members of parliament not merely look but actually are illiterate.

For instance, we were told that we were hosts here in Ottawa to the Colombo plan consultative committee. Most of us, I think, were already well aware of that fact. But I was interested in noting that the government did not have the temerity to put in His Excellency's mouth the information that we were going to increase our grant by the magnificent sum of $1 million. Possibly the luncheon cheque for the consultative committee that the government presumably picked up was too high to allow us to do anything more generous than increase it by $1 million.

Of course, we hear rumours as to why our contribution to that plan is being held within such strict limits. A very well known Canadian editor suggested a few weeks ago that there were elements within the Liberal cabinet which were anxious to deal perhaps more practically and generously with this problem of the development of Asia than certain other members of the cabinet. In fact, it was suggested in that broadcast that a certain well known avuncular figure in this country was actually the Mr. Scrooge who prevented Canada from contributing more generously.

When I heard that broadcast I was reminded of the fact that we in Canada have had a considerable amount of debunking of legendary figures. We had Dr. Brock Chisholm, of course, who got into trouble in debunking Santa Claus. Now we have editors and parliamentary critics pulling the whiskers aside from Santa Claus and showing behind them a much sterner and less benevolent figure than is usually presented to the public of Canada. All in all, if this goes on Canada is going to be in a bad way for fairy tales. We shall have no avuncular figure, no Santa Claus; we shall have just hard, cold, cruel facts in a hard, cold, cruel political world.

Before the throne speech was finished, after going half-way through telling us what we already knew, it began to embark on mild prophecies for the future. It starts first of all with the government's projected increase in the war veterans allowance. I suppose everyone in this chamber was greatly relieved to hear that. But do you remember, Mr. Speaker, the number of speeches made in this chamber urging this very same government—and it is the same government, except for a few defections in the meantime—to implement some improvements to the War Veterans Allowance Act, and how we were told it could not be done? I wonder whether our new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) would care to stand up in the house and tell us that we can afford it this year but we could not afford it last year? Or is the explanation perhaps a rather grimmer one? Is it that the problem of war veterans year by year becomes a less expensive financial proposition for the Canadian people to carry? If that is the case, all I can say is that the government should be consistent and go on refusing, and the problem will solve itself.

Again, of course, one heard last year that the same restraining force operated in the cabinet to prevent that generous action which is now being taken. It may or it may not be true. However, we know that many of those who would have benefited last year if this government had taken this action will not be with us this year to benefit from it. That is something I think every member of the Liberal party should search his conscience about. Every member of the Liberal party should bear in mind the fact that there were many veterans who would have benefited last year but who are now no longer with us to take advantage of this proposal.

We have another prophecy of action on the part of our government in the future, which action we have already taken in this chamber. That is, of course, the improvement to the Unemployment Insurance Act, if indeed "improvement" is the word we should use. There has been a slight relaxation of the terms of that act in order to deal, over a short period, with the problems it is meant to cope with.

Again we have a strange spectacle, Mr. Speaker. I also remember the number of speeches that were made last year in this chamber urging this self-same government to take this action at that time. One can only conclude that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) was correct the other day when he suggested that the reason the government has now decided that something must be done is that there are more voices raised in protest this year than there were last year; and of course the more voices that are raised in protest, the more political danger there is for our government. So again we have a question of the government being pushed after delaying for one year, and offering no logical explanation now for dealing with this problem that was also with us last year.

When I see the way in which they deal with the unemployment problem I am rather reminded of the old gag they used to have about the Russians who were being pursued. This was in the days before the bolsheviks, in the days of the grand dukes and the troikas. You remember they were being pursued by wolves and the watchword was "throw out another baby". Of course, eventually they came to the end of the babies and the wolves were snapping at their heels. In spite of all the mild palliatives in the Unemployment Insurance Act, I suggest that the wolves of economic depression will still be snapping at our heels next year or in fact before next year rolls around.

During the course of this debate one suggestion was made which interested me greatly. That was the suggestion by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) to the effect that we should depart from the policy pursued by this government in this matter of housing and protect not only the lending institutions but those who make down payments on buildings under the National Housing Act. I am glad to offer my voice in support of that suggestion, although I would remind the house, and those who were members of the banking and commerce committee last year, that we raised the question in the committee last year but neither the hon. member for Spadina nor any of his Liberal colleagues thought that it was a good idea at that time. I can see no particular technical difficulties involved in ensuring that the person who purchases a house under the National Housing Act shall be assured of retaining his equity or at least his equity minus some possible deductions for rental for any term of occupancy he may have had with regard to the premises. Personally I think that can be done. But, as with all the other measures this government introduces for the benefit of the people of Canada, I suppose we shall have to wait at least twelve months before they get around to doing it.

So much for what is in the throne speech. I want to spend a few moments before I sit down on a matter that I think perhaps is of more fundamental importance to us than even these serious questions of unemployment, the plight of the war veterans and the problem of housing in Canada. Some while ago I noticed an article in a periodical for which I have not a particularly high regard, but the article was of such striking importance that I did some investigation on it in order to find out whether or not it was merely, shall we say, some loose talking by Time magazine.

Some hon. members have probably read the article to which I refer. It appeared last month. It was a rather disturbing article describing a paper that was read before the French Academy of Sciences by a young physicist by the name of Charles Noel Martin, sponsored by a man who is probably the leading physicist in Europe and a Nobel prize winner, namely Prince Louis de Broglie. In this paper this young man charged that there was a conspiracy of silence throughout the world as to the possible and probable results of continued experimentation with H-bombs in the world. He suggested that there were a number of extremely dangerous possibilities.

The first one he listed was the danger of permanent and deleterious effects on our climate. When I read that suggestion I remembered that just before I left England in November of last year Professor Frederick Soddy, another Nobel prize winner, had a letter in the London Times, in which he denounced as irresponsible those scientists who were claiming that there was no possible connection between our rather deplorable climatic conditions that have obtained over the last twelve months or so and these heavy thermonuclear explosions in different parts of the world. Professor Soddy pointed out that by means of those explosions we are doing on a gigantic scale the sort of thing that so-called rainmakers do on a small scale with their limited facilities.

This young man who presented the paper to the French Academy of Sciences pointed out that in the last two years there have been approximately ten hydrogen bombs exploded in different parts of the world, each of which is equal to from 1,000 to 2,500 times the strength of the A-bomb dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The most important danger foreseen by this young man, supported by Prince Louis de Broglie and other scientific experts, has been the danger of long-continuing or in fact permanent damage to the genetic inheritance of human beings.

Today, right here in the city of Ottawa, I was talking to a young man who is a survivor of the bombing of Hiroshima. This young man tells me that even now, ten years after the bombing, he has to report once a week for a medical check-up and a blood count. When I was speaking to him today he told me of the number of people who have died many years after that explosion, of children who were born, in some cases some years after the explosion, who have not lived to survive, perhaps mercifully, because they probably would have survived as extremely defective human beings.

I received from the Japanese embassy a document that has just been produced by the atomic bomb injuries investigating committee on the case history of one of the Japanese fishermen who was dusted, as they call it, with atomic fall-out from the Bikini trials of March 1 of last year. This man, Aikichi Kuboyama, died in September, and this document says in part:

> A series of announcements have been made from time to time by the authorities concerned regarding the incident and the unfortunate victims. Kuboyama's death, however, gave rise to a wave of charges and counter-charges, of rumours and speculations, over the treatment of the affected fishermen and the probable cause of the Kuboyama demise.
> There is need to clear the air of misunderstanding, and a summary of the medical facts known to date of the twenty-three victims should serve that end.

Here is what they found when they examined them, and these were examinations conducted by both Japanese and American medical men. They found that the disease was acute radiation sickness, that such external injuries as depilation—hairlessness—dermatitis, skin ulcers, pustules, blisters and necrosis were noticeable on the head and the upper part of the bodies of all patients at the time they were hospitalized.

I see some hon. members smiling over this. To me it is quite shocking that anyone can consider these appalling dangers as in any way amusing. As a matter of fact there is no one in this chamber with the knowledge to deny the actuality of these dangers. Yet throughout the world people are turning a deaf ear to those who can tell us of the grave dangers of permanent genetic damage to the human race. That to my mind, Mr. Speaker, is the ultimate blasphemy.

Men have destroyed themselves and each other with varying degrees of cruelty all through recorded history, but it has been left for this age and this generation to destroy generations yet unborn, to condemn them to being born defective physically, mentally, or both. These are real dangers, so those who know tell us.

I would not have brought up this matter if I had not had some idea of a practical suggestion for dealing with the question. I am not going to suggest anything so naïve as begging the three culprit nations to desist. The United States, the Soviet union and Great Britain can only be described as culprit nations who are persisting in these unnecessary and dangerous experiments. I am, however, taking a leaf out of the book of Bertrand, Lord Russell, the famous scientist and philosopher of Great Britain, who not long ago, you may remember, wrote an article in which he suggested a method by which the final descent into atomic war might be prevented. He suggested the appointment of a committee of scientists to draw up an objective statement of the results of atomic war.

I wish the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) were here, because I think perhaps one should occasionally wound his feelings as we did last year. I am suggesting that here is something Canada can do to retrieve Canada's rather inglorious record in international affairs in the last ten years. Here is something practical our delegates to the United Nations can do. They can move for the setting up of a committee of competent scientists, physicists, biologists, psychologists and medical men to give us a report on the probable, possible and certain results of the continued explosion of hydrogen bombs in the world.

It may be objected that we cannot find out exactly what strength of bomb has been used or is going to be used. I do not believe that for one moment. I have not the slightest doubt that every person in the world who is competent to understand—and it is a very small number of people—is fully aware of the magnitude of the explosions that have taken place in the Soviet union, in Australia and in the south Pacific. They know, at least within near enough limits, what forces they have to examine the results. I would suggest that if our delegates at the United Nations would call for the appointment of such a committee, and if such a committee were to present its report to the world, then no government would dare to continue with these experiments, which are unnecessary from the point of view of proving the efficacy of this devilish weapon whose dangers, according to those people who know, may very well result in the complete degeneration of the human species.

I think if our delegates at the United Nations were to do that it might well be that Canada's place in the niche of history would be a more resplendent one than it has been to date or will be by burying our heads in the sand and pretending that these dangers do not exist. I offer that as a very serious suggestion to our government before the next meeting of the United Nations in New York.

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, like other members who have spoken before me I too should like to offer congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for the very fine job they have done.

At the outset I should like to make a brief reference to some events connected with the province, and particularly the city, from which I come and which I have the honour to represent. During the past year both the province of Alberta and the city of Edmonton have continued to grow and develop at a steadily accelerating pace. In every branch of that growth and development that I can think of new records have been set. The population is still growing in both Edmonton and Alberta generally, and industrialization is increasing very rapidly and along the soundest possible lines.

This gives us a growing sense of pride in our city and our province, not only because we like our community to grow and prosper but more especially because of the effect these conditions are bound to have on the economy of the whole Canadian nation. A strong and growing Edmonton and a strong and growing Alberta make for a strong and growing Canada.

These conditions of progress which we are experiencing in full measure in Alberta are, fortunately for all of us, fairly general throughout the whole of Canada. Small wonder then that we Canadians sing with justifiable and ever-increasing pride:

> With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
> The true north, strong and free.

Last fall Edmonton celebrated its golden jubilee as a city. The occasion was marked by a pageant, which gave a stirring review of the events of the past fifty years and the role of the many pioneers who have carried the city of Edmonton forward to her present greatness. To further accentuate the keynote of progress, work has commenced on the erection of a new city hall which will be a structure appropriate to the greatness of the city. I was glad that on the occasion of the dedication of the site for the new city hall two federal ministers of the crown were present, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), together with provincial and civic representatives. The presence of two federal cabinet ministers there on that occasion helped to emphasize what I have in mind, namely that progress in any or all the different parts of Canada is an enhancement of the nation as a whole.

During the present year the province of Alberta will celebrate its golden jubilee, and once again the occasion will be suitably observed. Her sister province of Saskatchewan, another gem in the illustrious array of the ten provinces of Canada, will likewise celebrate its fiftieth anniversary. Both these provinces were brought into being by the federal Liberal government in 1905, and both have achieved remarkable progress in the past 50 years. It can, I believe, be truly said of the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as it was said of the original fathers of confederation: Divine Providence being their guide, they builded better than they knew.

While there is not time for me to mention, much less to enlarge upon, all the particular items which have contributed to Alberta's prosperity, I think it is only right for me to say that the greatest of these developments has been the vast petrochemical industry, which is located in the federal riding of Edmonton-Strathcona.

I believe I would be pardoned if I made reference to the well known fact that Edmonton is now the home of the famous and much sought after Grey cup. Other hon. members, particularly those from the east, may be interested in learning that all possible precautions are being taken to keep it there. Personally I can think of no finer setting for such an outstanding trophy of sport. We won it in 1954 to celebrate Edmonton's golden jubilee and we hope to win it again in 1955 to celebrate Alberta's golden jubilee.

Another outstanding event scheduled for 1955 is the completion of arrangements to bring Alberta natural gas to the cities of eastern Canada, as well as to the west coast. Both east and west already are enjoying the benefits of Alberta oil. We are glad that both will soon enjoy the incomparable service of Alberta natural gas.

And so, Mr. Speaker, the Grey cup moves west and Alberta oil and gas go east. What more tangible evidence could there be of our growing national strength in all parts of the country? What better demonstration could we have of our ever-growing national unity? This is the sort of thing which adds immensely to the strengthening of our national ties, which all true Canadians so ardently desire.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne gives promise of many things that are dear to the hearts of Canadians. It makes reference to peace, progress and humanity, all of which the government will endeavour to promote further during this session of parliament. I was particularly gratified to hear that measures are being taken to relieve the necessitous circumstances in which many of our older veterans and widows of veterans find themselves. Veterans' organizations, such as the Canadian Legion, are to be commended for keeping the plight of these people to the fore, and the government is to be congratulated on its recognition that there is need for some improvement in their situation. I am sure all hon. members will look forward with keen interest to the detailed proposals which will be brought forward later on in the matter of the war veterans allowance.

Likewise the government is to be very highly commended for its proposed amendments to the Blind Persons Act. The amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which we have just passed are most timely. Various measures placed on the statute books by this government for the relief of need and suffering are models of humanitarianism, and as such are strongly supported by the majority of Canadians.

Along humanitarian lines, too, is the proposal to increase aid under the Colombo plan. I find Canadians everywhere full of enthusiasm for this splendid program which our government helped bring into existence. To lend a helping hand to those in need is always worth while. To show less fortunate peoples a better way than communism is, I am sure, in our best interests as well as theirs.

I believe that all hon. members, especially those who have had some direct association with municipal affairs, will welcome the proposals to re-examine the Municipal Grants Act. Our growing development, and indeed prosperity, in Canada have produced some very acute problems for our municipal governments. Because our municipalities render services to federal government property, I have long felt that they are in justice entitled to adequate payment for those services.

Grants in lieu of full taxation on federal property would be a blessing to many municipalities which are heavily burdened with the rising costs of education. I realize that constitutionally education is a provincial problem, but I am most anxious that the federal government make some contribution to help the hard pressed municipalities of this country. I believe the real soluton to the problems of all three levels of government is to place all three of them in a financial position to discharge their responsibilities. Unfortunately for our municipal governments they seem to be the ones in the most difficult position financially, and they are least able of the three to correct the situation.

Likewise, those Canadians responsible for our municipal government will be relieved to learn of the proposal to increase the grade crossing fund. The slowing up of our commerce because of grade crossings, and the rising toll of accidents at them, gives this problem a top priority. As Canada grows the grade crossing problem also grows. I am confident that this house will act swiftly to translate proposals along this line into action. More separated grade crossings will not only reduce accidents but will give employment as well. I will admit frankly that we need more separated grade crossings at Edmonton, and we need them immediately.

As an Albertan I would like to say that we rejoice in the steps that have been taken to make the St. Lawrence seaway a reality. It may, we hope, help us with our freight rate problem, which we in the west feel very keenly. But apart from that we are convinced that this great project is in the best interests of the Canadian nation as a whole, and what helps Canada forward will surely and inevitably help Alberta, just as truly as what helps Alberta also helps Canada. Being good Canadians, Albertans encourage and support any measure that helps build a greater and a better Canada.

I would like to digress for a moment to express appreciation to two departments of the government that have recently made announcements of particular interest to my constituency. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) has recently announced, in conjunction with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), a decision that will give Edmonton a new major civilian airport. Some hon. members may be surprised to hear this, since the existing Edmonton airport has become justly famous both far and wide. But things happen fast in Edmonton these days. And so it is that just as surely as we have lived up to our slogan, "Aerial Crossroads of the World", inevitably, the increasing air traffic has outgrown the crossroads. In order to maintain her role in the national economy Edmonton's famous airport finds it necessary to move to a new and larger site, just as many prosperous businesses are doing all over the country. Air transport is developing so rapidly that I respectfully urge the minister to take all possible measures to arrange for the new location as soon as possible. I urge this matter not only in the interests of the city but in the national interest as well.

The other minister whom I would like to compliment is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), who recently announced that the thriving town of Fort Saskatchewan is to have a proper post office. The thousands of people whom this new post office will serve will be most grateful for this development.

This evening we have all enjoyed, because some hon. members gave evidence of it, the exposition of the Social Credit technique by the financial spokesman for the Social Credit party. I think we can take it that the views expressed by the hon. member for Lethbridge represent the official views of the Social Credit party, since I have never heard any of their members deny those particular views that were outlined this evening. I wonder how the party leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), reconciles the views we heard this evening with his statement the other day that his party is the real free enterprise party. How can he reconcile a government-dictated price structure with free enterprise? I should like to hear him deal with that subject. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he can only have a government-dictated price system under a dictatorship.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Give us the page and then we can read it at our leisure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hanna: The theory outlined by the hon. member could only be made to work under a dictatorship.

We heard a great deal this evening about tickets, and that there were not enough tickets to go around. I should like to display a real Social Credit ticket, Mr. Speaker. It is called a prosperity certificate. These prosperity certificates, so-called, were issued by the Social Credit government of Alberta. This one is dated August 5, 1936. I should like to read into the record what it says on its face:

> The provincial treasurer will pay to the bearer the sum of one dollar on the expiration of two years from date of issue hereof upon presentation hereof provided there are then attached to the back hereof one hundred and four one cent certificate stamps.

On the back there are 104 spaces dated for the 104 stamps.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Perhaps you would not know it, but it fed a lot of hungry people in those days.

Mr. Hanna: There is only one stamp on this one, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the owner got discouraged after putting on one stamp, and he kept it as a souvenir and treasures it very much at the present time.

I think it will be apparent to most hon. members that it was really a gigantic taxation scheme. These prosperity certificates were used to pay civil servants. You gave a dollar's worth of service and you got one of these; and then, according to the face of it, you got a dollar when you had paid 104 cents over a two-year period. Needless to say these were not in circulation for the expected two-year period. They were rejected entirely by the people of Alberta, Social Credit and non-Social Credit alike.

Mr. Hansell: To make the matter clear, would my hon. friend care to tell the house whether any of these certificates were presented for payment and not redeemed?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): He would not know that.

Mr. Hanna: I would like to complete my speech; then the hon. member for Macleod can continue and tell the house the rest of the story, if I have omitted anything about the Social Credit certificates.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What page are you on?

Mr. Hanna: Much is being said these days about the level of taxation. Most of us on this side of the house at any rate realize that if the government is to keep up its social service program and in fact keep increasing it in response to so many demands, it simply has to be paid for. I am not one of those who like my Social Credit colleagues across the way, think all we have to do is print the money.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand that the hon. member for Bow River is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is it permissible for hon. members to read their speeches? If the hon. member is reading his, would you be kind enough to direct him not to do so? I am asking for a ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All hon. members know that it is not permissible to read speeches in the house. All hon. members also realize that from this distance it is impossible for me to ascertain whether an hon. member is reading his speech. I must rely on the hon. member who has the floor, and I am sure if he continues he will have given me his assurance that he is not reading his speech.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am sure he would never tell you he was reading it.

Mr. Hanna: If we can with safety spend less on national defence, or if through increased efficiency we can lower the cost of government, or if by any other reasonable means taxation can be lowered, then I am all for it.

I would like to congratulate the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) on his appointment. I am sure all hon. members earnestly wish him much success in the very difficult job he has in hand. The hon. member for Lethbridge certainly made it look easy for him this evening. We would print enough money to pay off the national debt, and we would eventually abolish taxation. It is a neat trick if it can be done.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that the speech from the throne gives no encouragement to the prophets of gloom who somehow or other always manage to see troublous times ahead. We have a lot of these people forecasting blue ruin for us today. The opposition parties seem to be always speaking in that vein, both in the chamber and out of it; but in spite of what they say Canada has prospered mightily during the last 20 years of Liberal government. This government, under the inspiring leadership of our great Prime Minister, is solidly based in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people. I venture to predict it will stay there as long as the opposition parties have nothing better to offer the Canadian people than gloomy forebodings of the future, or some government-dictated economic system that would inevitably and certainly deprive us of our freedom.

(Translation):

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention during this session to shirk my duty any more than I did during the first session of this twenty-second parliament. My colleagues of the house may rest assured that I shall take part in the debates whenever, in my humble opinion, I should do so in the interest of Canada, of my province, and more particularly of my constituency and of my city. I shall always do so with the same feeling of pride; I will thus fulfil the only promise I ever made to the electors of my constituency, namely that I would give them a yearly report—in keeping with the excellent tradition I have set—on the mandate they so generously gave me on August 10, 1953.

At the end of the current session I shall feel deeply confident that I have shown once again to the electors of Quebec West that I have not been unworthy of their confidence, since I will again have had the opportunity of proving that I have conscientiously defended their interests in Canada's parliament. As in the past, I will then have the great and noble satisfaction of having done my duty. May I be allowed to extend to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne my sincere congratulations on their magnificent and successful oratorical effort. Both of them, in a very audible voice and with a good delivery, succeeded, though they had very little to speak about, in sustaining our interest for quite some time. Needless to say that their skill resided mainly in the compliments they chose to pay to those who, regarding themselves as gods, worthy of worship because they are in power, contributed largely to their ascension in this house.

I would like also to extend to Mr. Speaker, whose absence from the chair I regret, my most sincere congratulations on the various improvements which have been brought about and which will henceforth benefit all members of this parliament. Our offices are spotlessly clean. Thanks to Mr. Speaker, nobody will be able to seek an excuse for his indifference and his laxity, as our bright quarters are for us an inspiration to work. I must also mention the true improvement represented by the new parliamentary post office, in respect to which Mr. Speaker has attended to the least detail. Finally, it is with immense satisfaction that I mention the perfectly bilingual signs which are a credit to him, and reflect the spirit of understanding which characterizes him. His intention, no doubt, in doing so, was to stress the bilingual character of this parliament and of his country. Once again, my warmest congratulations to Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, so far as the acting leader of the official opposition, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), is concerned, the press throughout Canada has acknowledged his ability to carry out his duties. I agree with them. The results of his long experience are already evident, as well as his sincerity and desire to serve and the true interest he brings to the problems of this country. Those of us who have the privilege of knowing him realize more and more what an asset he is to the Canadian nation at this time, and the contribution he is making to our party as acting leader.

There is no member of this house, no matter what his political affiliation may be, who would care to be accused of ingratitude. We say that ingratitude is the monopoly of children. I do hope that everyone in this house has attained his maturity. I have been deeply affected by the serious illness of my respected and venerated leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). All the members of our party deeply deplore the necessity for the absence of that great statesman whose generous contribution and service to our nation has always been a great inspiration to all of us. I feel that there is an emptiness in this house which will be filled only on that day which we all hope is near at hand when with restored health and full vigour the Leader of the Opposition again takes his seat in this house.

I want to take advantage of this occasion to state my full appreciation of the kindness, concern and generosity of the Leader of the Opposition when tragedy struck my home last winter. I humbly acknowledge that without the prayers of the people of my riding, without the help of medical science that came from many parts of the country, and without the advice and help of my chief my wife would not have survived. Since the day on which my chief was so suddenly stricken my wife and I have never ceased to send to heaven our humble prayers asking Providence to bring him back to complete recovery.

The magnificent work he has begun is by no means ended, and the role he presently plays and will be called upon to play in Canadian and international fields must not end. We are happy to learn of his recovery and we express our wishes for his early return.

If no one has any objection I can keep on, but if there is objection from any part of the house I can move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Harris: I understand that my hon. friend will complete his remarks shortly.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, with no further ado, I wish to state my opinion on this long, interminable pièce de résistance which Her Majesty's representative was forced to read to us and which is called the speech from the throne. On close and repeated examination it reveals itself as what it really is, that is to say, a flood of words in a desert of ideas, and nothing else.

A group of men who believe themselves to be serious, who make up the Canadian cabinet and upon whom devolves the responsibility for drafting this speech have nothing to offer but this endless avalanche of words containing no new ideas except those borrowed from representations and suggestions put forward by Progressive Conservative members in the course of previous sessions. Looking directly at the Liberal members across the way I do feel moved to exclaim: All's quiet on the horizon!

Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of making a very modest but sincere contribution to the debate at the resolution stage of legislation designed to extend the period for payment of insurance benefits to those who have a legal right to receive such benefits. I said then, and I repeat it now, that those workers who have had to suffer, over the years, from the running sore of unemployment—not regional nor seasonal, but permanent—are not satisfied with the application of this innocuous poultice to a gaping wound.

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member is referring to a bill which was passed last night.

Mr. Dufresne: We spoke only on the resolution. I am just referring to my own speech, and there is no rule of the house which would prevent me from doing that.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member was not here when the bill was passed last night.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: I am of course speaking of unemployment and I must say that, in view of its disquieting spread, the application of a poultice has now become insufficient. The government is ill-advised to bring but slight relief.

In order to create a feeling of satisfaction, which will only be temporary, in order to give hope to those who, with their family, experience great hardships at this time because of unemployment, the speech from the throne proposes that an increased subsidy be voted to the departments concerned for use in more elaborate public works.

What will be the nature of these works? No one knows and the speech from the throne casts no light on the matter. Aware of the constant policy of inaction of the Liberal party, I believe I am not mistaken in stating that these works will consist, as always, in contracts being awarded to certain contractors.

There is nothing in all that, Mr. Speaker, to remedy the alarming conditions which must face the workers who are presently living a life of anxiety that one can easily imagine.

This Liberal government is the one responsible for the economic depression we are now going through and it must not shirk the responsibility which rests upon it to check that depression as soon as possible. Now more than ever is the time to give up its policy of inaction which traditionally has been that of the Liberal party and to replace it with a policy fitted to the urgent needs of the day, or to leave the economic recovery of our country to those who are better disposed to remedy such ills.

The public works program must be national in scope since we find that unemployment is at the epidemic stage all over the country. As far as my county and the city of Quebec are concerned, the needs have been obvious for a number of years and the Liberal politicians have always failed to resort to the solution which had been requested earnestly and very often by every important public body in the old capital city.

To my mind—and I am voicing here the general opinion of the people of Quebec—the deepening of the St. Charles river, the works to prevent the pollution of the Lairet river, and the removing of railway crossings are the only projects which could bring relief to those who seek work.

However, I warn the government against political discrimination which, much too often, comes into the picture when those works are undertaken. All allegiances must be put aside in order to give employment to those who have an absolute need of it. I never heard it said that distress and hunger had a particular political colour.

I take the liberty of submitting to the house that at Christmastime, all public men in my county, putting aside political affiliations, acted together in order to provide many needy families with the food they required to spend a cheerful Christmas. Our only concern then was to feed those who were really in need. Such an example should inspire in the future those who sit on the other side.

It is very interesting to note the amount the government will spend for the unemployed in the form of public works. Will that amount be sufficient to deal satisfactorily with the problem or so insignificant that only a few will be prevented from dying of hunger?

I am expecting the answer that will be forthcoming from the government after a while, that they were unable to do better, because the appropriations did not allow for such a large expenditure.

I dare hope that the colossal joke of 1939 will not be repeated in 1955; nobody would take it seriously anyway.

I cannot forget this absurd answer made by the late Mackenzie King, then Liberal prime minister of Canada, to the then government of Quebec, which was asking, and quite legitimately so, for a $30 million grant to check prevailing unemployment, which brought so much distress to the homes and souls of our workers.

The authorities of the government of Quebec got a definite no, as an answer, and the prime minister added: "We have no money".

However, hardly two months later, Canada hastened to declare war on Germany. And what happened then? The federal government opened wide the treasury and millions and billions of dollars were spent with that well known prodigality. We were told that we had to set up a powerful army that would fight on the battlefields of Europe in the defence of Christianity and civilization. Mr. Speaker, civilization was already threatened at home. Our people had been going hungry for a long time through lack of employment. Civilization had lost its true meaning because in a country like ours, possessing unlimited resources, a terrible depression had fallen upon us in the manner of plagues and calamities.

Government-controlled war plants mushroomed and munition manufacturers rejoiced at the thought of making enormous sums of money at the expense of our sons' blood.

Our lavishness went as far as making loans of billions of dollars to other countries, without interest, while the debtor nations lost no time in lending that money to other far-away countries, but with interest.

You must have noted, Mr. Speaker, that two months previously, a few millions could not be found to undertake, in Quebec, public works which would have taken us out of the misery in which the poor administration of the government had thrown thousands of families. The working people of Quebec were not then asking for charity, through the government of their province, any more than they are begging for it now; all they wanted was to earn the income necessary and essential to provide for themselves and their families.

We did not have a few million dollars for living works, but we were throwing away countless billions to propagate death. Nevertheless I must state unequivocally, though regretfully, that the only times during which our people have known any kind of prosperity, even of the most fictitious sort, were those during which nations were at each other's throats and Canada was sacrificing on the battlefields a part, the best part I should say, of that youth upon which we had laid our fondest hopes for the future.

That is a nonsensical situation. It is our duty to put an end to this as soon as possible. Consciously or not we are rushing headlong into tragedy, or else we are quickly moving towards a damnable ideology which on the other hand we would be prepared, possibly, to fight at the cost of heavy sacrifice. Since the government seem to believe that unemployment is entirely within their jurisdiction, I will say to them, with that frankness which is a characteristic of mine: "All right, mind your own business, but do mind it seriously!"

The speech from the throne announces that amendments will be made to the War Veterans Allowance Act in order to raise the basic rates as well as the ceiling on permissible incomes of recipients of allowances. It has finally dawned upon the government, Mr. Speaker, that it was time to improve the fate of those who, having left behind country, home, folks and friends, besides risking their lives for the protection of Canada, came back crippled in one way or another or in failing health. This government cannot claim credit for this increase, for I know that the war veterans will prove their gratitude to the Progressive Conservative party. If at last they are given a recognition which will never equal the sacrifices they have made, they will owe it to all of those who, on this side of the house, have never ceased to plead in their behalf.

I should also like to speak on behalf of the veterans of the first world war who today, having reached a certain age, deserve as much consideration, since they made the same sacrifices in 1914-18. I therefore hope that they will not be forgotten.

It might be in order to remind the minister concerned that the humane thing to do would be to order that these veterans of the 1914-18 war, whose pension is insufficient, or those who get no pension at all, be employed in the corps of commissionaires or at any other such work. I would be the first to congratulate him for such a move if he were to agree to my suggestion.

Mr. Speaker, all the people in the province of Quebec regret that the government has seen fit not to mention in the speech from the throne the possibility—

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: I object to continuing after this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the minister is rising on a point of order. It leaves me in considerable difficulty in that at ten o'clock, when I attempted to put the motion of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) adjourning the debate, unanimous consent was apparently given to his continuing. I understood that to mean consent to his continuing until he finished. As hon. members will recall, he had given the assurance that he would be finished in a few minutes. Therefore, it leaves me in considerable difficulty as to how long was intended by the house. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might be willing at this time to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Dufresne: If it is the wish of the house I can keep on; but if there is any objection, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

On motion of Mr. Dufresne the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue on Monday with this debate. I would hope that we might find it possible to wind up this debate some time next week.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.14 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 17, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE DEDUCTION IN RESPECT OF PROVINCIAL TAX

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement about the developments resulting from the imposition of a provincial income tax in the province of Quebec.

As all hon. members are aware, I had a meeting with the premier of Quebec, at his request, on October 5 last in Montreal. Mr. Duplessis indicated, at that time, that he was considering proposing certain amendments to the provincial income tax law which he hoped might make possible some temporary agreement which would give both governments a further opportunity to arrive at more satisfactory permanent arrangements. He undertook, at that time, to write to me indicating the nature of the changes it was proposed to make in the provincial income tax and to suggest a basis for a temporary agreement.

In a letter dated November 1, he indicated the changes he was prepared to make in order to reach an agreement for the deduction of the provincial tax from the federal tax.

Since the receipt of his letter, my colleagues and I have been giving the most careful consideration to the problem and during the course of that consideration it was arranged by the two governments that some of our officials would visit Quebec to secure certain factual information without which it was not possible to have a complete picture of what, I am sure all hon. members will agree, are some of the most difficult and complex problems we face in the practical working of our Canadian confederation, namely, the appropriate fiscal relationships between the federal and provincial governments.

The problem of finding any basis for a temporary agreement was complicated by the fact that the Quebec income tax act provided different exemptions and a different apportionment from the federal Income Tax Act. The more we studied the problem the clearer it became that if, as always has been our policy, the same treatment in respect of federal taxes was to be available to Canadian taxpayers in whatever province they lived, we could not agree to the deduction from the federal tax of the tax imposed in one province unless in similar circumstances and without too seriously affecting federal revenues we could agree to the deduction of a similar tax imposed in any other province.

Mr. Duplessis had, however, indicated in his letter that the probable yield from the provincial tax was equal to about 10 per cent of the total of the federal income tax collected in the province of Quebec. This statement led us to consider whether, in some way which could be applied in any province, it would be possible to make room for the collection of a provincial tax which would yield 10 per cent of the federal tax in that province, without the necessity of any taxpayer in the province having to pay a higher tax that he would have to pay on the same income in any other province.

The estimated figures of tax yields in all the provinces for 1954 were carefully scrutinized and it appeared from these figures that it would be possible to reduce the federal tax by 10 per cent in any province which preferred not to have a tax rental agreement, and still safeguard the revenues necessary to meet our irreducible national responsibilities.

The estimates of the yields for 1954 and figures for previous years were carefully examined to see whether a greater reduction, which would have to be available to any province, would be possible. In the light of our responsibilities to the whole Canadian people we reached the conclusion that we could not, at this time, recommend any reduction greater than 10 per cent of the federal tax in a province which did not have a tax rental agreement.

At the present time a taxpayer having to pay a provincial income tax may claim a deduction up to 5 per cent of his federal tax. There are administrative difficulties and complications for taxpayers in deducting a portion of one tax from another, but what is even more serious, this method makes the real incidence of the provincial tax depend on the terms of the federal law and makes the total amount deducted from the federal tax depend on the terms of the provincial law. We feel that it would be more satisfactory to reduce the federal income tax by a fixed percentage in any province which imposes and collects a provincial tax and thereby let both federal and provincial taxes stand on their own feet without either government having to provide for a deduction of one tax from the other.

I have, accordingly, advised the premiers of all the provinces that we propose, pending the results of a new federal-provincial conference, to ask parliament to amend the federal income tax law in order to make a reduction of 10 per cent for all taxpayers of any province where a provincial income tax is levied on income for the years 1955 and 1956. At the same time we will ask parliament to release from its present tax rental agreement any province which would prefer the new arrangement.

We also intend to propose that income tax payers who have actually paid a provincial income tax on their 1954 income be allowed a deduction up to 10 per cent of their federal tax. In practice, of course, this higher deduction for 1954 will be applicable only to taxpayers who have paid the Quebec income tax because no other province had a provincial income tax in operation in 1954.

In any case the figures already available make it clear that the rentals for the personal and corporation income tax fields in every province for 1954 will be greater than the amount the provincial governments could have raised from a 7 per cent tax on corporation incomes and a personal income tax equal to 10 per cent of the federal tax.

These proposed amendments are intended only as a stopgap arrangement pending the conclusion of any long term arrangements for the period following the expiry of the present tax rental agreements.

As hon. members know it had always been understood that it would be necessary to hold a federal-provincial conference before the end of 1955 to discuss fiscal arrangements for the years which will follow.

In the light of the recent developments, it may be the desire of the provincial governments to have this conference held at an earlier date. I have addressed letters to the premiers of all the provinces outlining the proposal I have just mentioned and inviting the nine provinces which have tax rental agreements to indicate whether they would prefer to take advantage of the proposed new arrangement. In these letters I have indicated that shortly after my return from the commonwealth prime ministers' meeting in London I shall communicate with them further with the view to working out arrangements for a conference at a time which will be satisfactory to all governments concerned.

I should like now to table the letters I have exchanged with the premier of Quebec and the letter I addressed to the premiers of the other nine provinces.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have little comment to make on the report of the proposed action by the government given by the Prime Minister, with the accompanying letters, but I would hope that he might indicate to the house how soon this conference will be held. We on this side are very glad that a dominion-provincial conference is now in the offing.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, as I have just stated, as soon as I get back from the London conference I intend to communicate with the provincial premiers to arrange a date for the next federal-provincial conference which will be satisfactory to all governments.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Could the letters which the Prime Minister has tabled be printed as an appendix to Hansard for today by consent?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the unanimous wish of hon. members that this be done?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence above referred to, see appendix, pages 277 to 282.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Parliamentary Assistant to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on Friday last, I move:

That Messrs. Applewhaite, Benidickson, Boisvert, Brooks, Brown (Essex West), Churchill, Fleming, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Harris, Hellyer, Hunter, Knowles, Lapointe, MacInnis, MacNaught, Quelch, Stuart (Charlotte), Tucker and Weir constitute the special committee appointed January 14, 1955 to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that an explanation be given?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: Apparently the house knows what this bill contains.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LAY-OFFS AT AVRO AIRCRAFT LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received any communication from the Ontario federation of labour, Trades and Labour Congress, regarding the alleged lay-off of 1,100 workers by Avro Aircraft Limited and will the minister inform the house regarding the employment situation at that plant?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have received a communication from the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, Mr. Claude Jodoin, on his behalf and on behalf of officers of his affiliated organizations in Ontario asking to see the right hon. Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) and myself on the subject matter of this question, and we have agreed to see them next Thursday. After that meeting has been held, if there is any point in doing it I shall be glad to make a report to the house on the employment situation at the Avro plant.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST TO HAVE NOTICES OF MOTIONS AND QUESTIONS DEALT WITH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to take up in the near future before the orders of the day notices of motions for the production of papers and routine questions as they are on the order paper.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter has not yet been considered, but I know that when the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne lasts many days it has been the practice in the past to arrange for an interruption for the purpose of having questions and notices of motions for the production of papers disposed of. I think the same arrangement can be made along those lines.

CHEESE

INQUIRY AS TO PREVENTING FURTHER IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Has the government any available means of preventing further shipments of cheese into Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the duty on cheese is placed on that commodity in the same manner in which duties are placed on other commodities and that is the only government regulation affecting the import of cheese at the moment.

Mr. Rowe: In view of the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day to the effect that we might assume that in perhaps six months there might be other shipments of cheese, has the government given any consideration to making the import of cheese into Canada subject to permit under the Export and Import Permits Act, which governs the import of butter?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the two situations are not parallel because cheese does not qualify under the legislation which governs the Export and Import Permits Act.

FREIGHT RATES

CROWSNEST PASS—REFERENCE TO CONTEMPLATED CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister assure the house that no changes are contemplated in the Crowsnest pass freight rates on grain?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): In reply, Mr. Speaker, I would say that no consideration is being given to changes in the Crowsnest pass rates.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION IN ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact, as reported by the Associated Press from Washington on January 16, that President Eisenhower's budget to congress will contain an item of $1 million for a survey to determine the economic feasibility of the proposed Passamaquoddy bay tidal power project between Maine and New Brunswick, is it the intention of the Canadian government to join in this survey if it is undertaken?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question, and also the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), who indicated he was going to ask a similar question. Perhaps my answer will deal with his question also.

The proposed economic survey of the Passamaquoddy bay tidal power project is, of course, not a new proposal. It was indicated in the report to the international joint commission dated October 20, 1950, that a full scale survey of this nature will be necessary if the feasibility of this project was to be determined. A resolution requesting the international joint commission to undertake such an economic feasibility survey was passed in the United States Senate in 1954, but did not receive final approval before the adjournment of the eighty-third congress in Washington.

It has already been suggested to United States officials, and that information, I believe, was made available to the house last session, that if as a result of the passage of this resolution the United States government wishes to request the international joint commission to undertake this survey it would be appropriate for a joint reference to be made to the commission by both governments, and that we, the Canadian government, would be prepared to give sympathetic consideration to a proposal for such a joint reference.

Mr. Brooks: Could the minister say whether any joint reference has been made to the international joint commission by the Canadian government?

Mr. Pearson: No, because a joint reference has to be made by both governments; but if the United States government asked us to participate in such a joint reference we would be very glad to give sympathetic consideration to that proposal.

Mr. Brooks: They have not requested it so far?

Mr. Pearson: No.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF AGENDA FOR CONFERENCE OF PRIME MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would he consider setting aside a day for the purpose of discussing some of the matters that might be presented before the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London so as to enable hon. members to know in general what views the Prime Minister will express on behalf of the Dominion of Canada? I would also ask whether he will place before the house the agenda of that conference which apparently has been referred to in London and is not concealed there. I am sure hon. members would wish to know what views the Prime Minister intends to present on behalf of this country.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I could say to the house what views I will be expressing in the course of the discussions that may take place in London, but I would, of course, be glad to hear views expressed in the house as to what would be the appropriate attitude to take there.

The conference has been called for the discussion of both political and economic problems, and I know there have been some indications of the general line the agenda is apt to follow. However, the agenda is usually settled at the opening meeting of the conference because it has always been the practice to recognize that those attending are, at least as far as status is concerned, of equal rank and that each would have the same right to indicate what he felt it would be proper to have the conference deal with. I think it would be advisable to see just what further course this debate on the address takes. It is understood that on Thursday, January 20, there will be an interruption of the debate, if not concluded by that time, in order to deal with external affairs, and we will see then what can be done to meet the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I may ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question, in view of his statement that each of the component parts of the commonwealth makes its own submissions, would the Prime Minister say what particular matters Canada is taking a definite stand on and intends to have placed before the conference? Secondly, there was reference in the British press recently to the question of the admission of communist China to the United Nations and the suggestion was that that would be discussed at the conference. We would like to know what attitude the Prime Minister will take on a matter such as this.

Mr. St. Laurent: I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Prime Minister will not attempt to do more than ascertain what others may feel about the admission of the government of mainland China to the United Nations at this time. The purpose of the conference is to endeavour to work together toward peace and not to stress, as I understand it, attitudes that might further complicate the very complicated international situation that already exists.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. He seemed to indicate that when the conference opens the agenda will come under consideration. I would ask him whether it is or is not a fact that communications, and I would hope very far-reaching communications, have already been exchanged between our own departments and the departments of the other members of the commonwealth preparatory to this conference?

Mr. St. Laurent: To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, the only communications between this government and another government have been communications with the commonwealth relations office in London.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask a further question of the Prime Minister? Have none of these communications touched on the matter of the agenda?

Mr. St. Laurent: Our position is that we do not wish to publicize any documents that come to us marked "secret". That is the only limitation that we are up against. I should be only too happy to put before the house all these communications. It may be that some of them can be put before the house. I will look at them again, in the light of the desire expressed by members on the other side of the house to have them made public, and see what can be done without discourtesy to those from whom we have received them.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Are we to understand that it is not the intention of the government to reveal to the house any of their policies with regard to anything they think is going to come up for discussion in the conference, any more than he has already told us?

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, no, Mr. Speaker. It is the intention of the government to reveal to the house everything that can properly be revealed to the house. But this is to be a conference which, like the other conferences, is to be held in camera. We must fit our disclosures into what is generally acceptable to those who will attend the conference. That is the only reason I have not been in a position to state fully the contents of the communications we have received.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to ask one further supplementary question. One has always been told that in these international conferences—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Macdonnell: —success depends entirely upon preliminary work. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether I am wrong in having taken from his answer the feeling that no intensive preliminary work has been done?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, Mr. Speaker; the hon. member would be wrong in thinking that no intensive preparatory work has been done. I have been in constant contact with the Department of External Affairs with regard to the preparation of memoranda that might have a bearing on any of the subjects that have been suggested as possible subjects for discussion.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SALE OF HOTELS—PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position to make a more definite statement than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was able to make on Friday with regard to the sale by the Canadian National Railways of certain publicly-owned hotels and resorts to private interests? My question on Friday was this: Was this sale approved by the government? Could the minister say whether, if any further such sales are contemplated, parliament will be advised in advance?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): In reply to the first part of my hon. friend's question, with regard to whether the sale of the four Canadian National hotels was approved by the government, I might say that the government was aware that the management of the Canadian National were considering the sale of the four hotels, but the decision to dispose of them was the management's.

To answer the second part of his question, I do not think it is proposed that there should be any change made in the statute governing Canadian National Railways which permits them to dispose of properties of the railway in accordance with the statute.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Does the minister know whether the sale of any other hotels is being contemplated?

Mr. Marler: The answer to that question is no. I know of no other sales.

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport, although I am sure he will not need notice of it. Does he agree with the legal opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that the directors of the Canadian National Railways could sell the whole railway without consulting the government?

Mr. Marler: Despite the intelligence attributed to me by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I would not be able to answer that question without much notice.

[Later:]

Mr. Marler: I should like to reply to a question asked last Friday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). With regard to the sale of four Canadian National hotels as announced by the management, the hon. member asked if employment in other hotels would be available for the staffs. The management advises that representatives of the Canadian National and of the purchasers are commencing this week to hold personal interviews with all employees concerned with respect to future employment. Such employees as have seniority rights at other Canadian National hotels will have the opportunity of exercising those rights in conformity with the provisions of the union agreements under which such seniority was acquired and of assuming positions for which those seniority rights qualify them.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF FINANCIAL SUPPORT BY MONTREAL AND VICTORIA, B.C., CITY COUNCILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the withdrawal of financial support for civil defence by the Montreal city council and somewhat similar action by Victoria, British Columbia, about three months ago, has the minister any plans to prevent the disappearance of civil defence measures in those populous areas and the strong possibility of the same sort of thing happening in other cities following their example?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did not give me any notice of his question, but I am able to deal with it. In the first place I may say to him that the city council of Montreal has not made a decision to vacate the civil defence field. The executive committee of the governing body of the city of Montreal has made a recommendation to that effect, to become effective on May 1. As soon as I heard of this particular intention I had the civil defence co-ordinator, after consultation with the provincial authorities who are interested in the matter of civil defence, enter into negotiations with officials of the executive body to which I have made reference. Those negotiations are going on and, as a result of representations that are being made to that body indicating in particular that now for the first time funds are available from the federal government directly to the municipalities concerned, I have every hope that the governing body in that particular community will want to reverse its position. In any event, the decision is one that does not rest alone with that body but with the whole metropolitan area in the city of Montreal.

It is true that the city of Victoria made a similar decision but I am happy to say that, as a result of the negotiations carried on by the civil defence co-ordinator and the municipal government in Victoria, the latter reversed its position. I sincerely hope that will be the case in the city of Montreal.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin: I am sure the house would want me to extend courtesy, particularly to a new member. When I made my reply to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) I neglected to say that this question had been asked of me this morning by the new member in this house representing the riding of St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Richardson).

Mr. Rowe: At what session was that?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

H.M.C. DOCKYARD, ESQUIMALT—RETIREMENT AGE OF CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is it the policy of H.M.C. Dockyard, Esquimalt, B.C., to discharge all employees when they reach the age of 65 years, irrespective of their length of service or their ability to perform satisfactorily the services they have been performing in connection with the job they have been working upon?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I must thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. H.M.C. Dockyard, Esquimalt, follows the same policy with regard to retirement age of its civilian employees as do other establishments operated by the Department of National Defence. The normal retirement age for civilian employees of the department is, of course, 65; but in suitable circumstances, after investigation, there are quite a number of cases where civilian employees are being retained beyond the age of 65.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to ask one supplementary question. Is the minister aware of the fact that over 100 employees have recently received notice that their services will be terminated in the near future because they are reaching the age of 65, and that no other reason is given?

Mr. Campney: No, Mr. Speaker; I was not aware of the number.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the minister be so kind as to look into the matter?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

COASTAL SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I ask the Minister of Transport when we can expect an announcement with regard to the appointment of the proposed royal commission on coastal shipping?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I hope it will be possible to make an announcement at an early date on the subject referred to by the hon. member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO MEMBER FOR PICTOU ON HIS RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it gives us on this side of the house thrilling pleasure to welcome back the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch). He was greatly missed. We welcome him back now in fine fettle to preside over one of the leading committees of the house.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED STATEMENT AS TO FUTURE REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): On Friday last the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) mentioned a reference in the Calgary Albertan to an official of my department, and asked whether this official was speaking on behalf of the government. The hon. member was kind enough, after the orders of the day, to arrange to let me see the clipping. I find that what it contains is what the reporter said some private citizen in Calgary said an official of my department said. I do not think there is any point in making any further inquiries because that is not the way we get people to speak on behalf of the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POOLING OF RESOURCES FOR ARMS PRODUCTION, WESTERN EUROPEAN UNION—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In the light of what the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has just said, possibly we can find out how the government does speak. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether we have any officials representing Canada at the meeting beginning today of the western European nations who are meeting in connection with the pooling of resources. What is the attitude of Canada toward the suggestion that in so far as grants of arms from Canada or the United States are concerned they should be required to pass through any pooling organization that is set up?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the meeting in question is a meeting of the countries with membership in the proposed western European union. Canada is not one of those countries and would not, therefore, normally be invited or expect to be invited to this particular meeting. We have been kept informed of the subject matter, a very important one, which is to be discussed, namely the pooling of arms among the countries of the western European union. We do not expect to attend but we do expect to be kept informed of what goes on at the meeting. In so far as the question of policy is concerned, that may be one of the matters which we will have an opportunity to discuss in the debate commencing on Thursday of this week.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker I have been listening with attention and a great deal of interest to the important statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has just made to the house with regard to fiscal relations between the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec. At this stage I have no comment to offer. I do reserve the right, however, to draw my own conclusions in due course.

When I had the advantage and privilege of rising in this house for the first time, in November 1953, I stated, as will be found in Hansard:

> It is all good and well to praise and appreciate the highly social legislation on family allowances, which was adopted by the parliament of Canada, some years ago. It has contributed substantially in raising the standard of living of our large families, even if today, due to the constant rise in the cost of living and to overtaxation, it no longer achieves its original purpose.

Today, more than ever, family allowances are insufficient, since they represent hardly half the value they had when they were first initiated. I am not speaking for any political group in particular, but I defer willingly to the wishes and to the repeated requests of all the large families of my constituency, to whom I have promised my support. I therefore, on their behalf, request the government to raise these allowances appreciably in order to give these families the advantage of greater purchasing power, which is the only guarantee of economic prosperity. Up to what level should these allowances be raised? Here is a question, it seems to me, to which the answer is easily found.

If parliament, last year, deemed it advisable to double parliamentary indemnities, the government being of the opinion that the expenses of members had increased in that same proportion, I consider that such is the case with Canadian families, which must, the same as we, buy the necessities of life. I can anticipate the following question: Where can we get the money to bring a greater measure of welfare into our homes? Here again the answer is very simple. We can get the money from the savings that can be made in the different departments of the government and especially the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production.

We want to ward off and curb unemployment. The means to that end do not seem very complicated to me. Let us start by reducing personal income taxes, thus putting more buying power in the hands of the Canadian people. Let us reduce corporation taxes, and we shall have greater investments for the development of our great resources. On that score I endorse this statement of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce:

> Taxes should never become excessive to the point of taking away from industry the stimulus of a reasonable profit and from the individual the possibility of saving some money. In a growing country over-taxation affects the system which makes possible our development and our progress in the field of social welfare. Any trend towards a reduction of profits through taxation is a trend towards instability in the field of business. Every enterprise should be allowed to keep enough of its profits to enable it to develop on a solid basis in an expanding economy and to face the hazards of competition.

(Text):

All members of the house will certainly agree, Mr. Speaker, that so far I have never been afraid to express my convictions, not only political but religious and patriotic as well. Personally I have great admiration for those who are not afraid to state in the house what they are and what they think. I have no hesitation at all in replying to the fiery and bitter statements directed against my province in this house by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). In order to be understood by him and that small number who may share his opinions, I will speak in his own language. Will the member permit me to inform him that by his foolish speech he has earned for himself the unenviable honour of being the most narrow-minded Canadian I have ever met. The hon. member was not afraid to demonstrate his gift for fanaticism. In doing so he has endeavoured, in a few minutes, to do more to raise the race cry and to disunite the country than has been accomplished since confederation.

Mr. Dupuis: That is good.

Mr. Dufresne: That is the first time the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) has agreed with the hon. member for Quebec West. In the few minutes he has spent in Quebec, which no doubt he was visiting for the first time, to his great astonishment he found that we were not like others; that our language and our faith were not that of the majority. Furthermore, he found out that our educational system was different from that of the other provinces. In other words he found that we rightly retained rights and characteristics which will not be given up, no matter how much the party to which he belongs would like to see them disappear. As his leader has not denounced these words, we take for granted that our way of life in Quebec, our liberties, our habits and our attributes have always been and will always be an obstacle to the success of that party in our province.

The hon. member has spoken of Quebec as another nation. He has classified the valiant and distinguished premier as the master of this other nation. If by that term he intended to insult one who will go down in history as having been the greatest premier that province has ever known, and for whom we in Quebec have great admiration and respect, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that that sort of insult will never achieve what he has in mind. No doubt the hon. member forgets his history, and it may be well to remind him of it. The French-speaking Canadians are no strangers to Canadian soil. It was our ancestors who were the first pioneers in this land; they were also the first to contribute to make Canada what it is today. The contribution the people of our province have made to the development of Canada is an immense one, and more than once our English-speaking compatriots have paid tribute to this contribution.

We have generously put to the service of Canada our French culture. Does the hon. member reproach us for keeping intact our language, our faith, our habits and our attachment to our institutions, and to those who see to it that these things are maintained? We shall not abandon our prerogatives, first because we are faithfully and religiously attached to them, and secondly because the fathers of confederation, who possessed a much broader mind than that of the hon. member, have guaranteed those prerogatives to us by a contract. It is not merely a sheet of paper, and it is called the British North America Act. May God preserve us from ever having a socialist government. Under a socialist regime, with policies such as the hon. member advocates, we would see the end of our constitutional liberty. It would mean anarchy and disunity. In one word, we would be powerlessly watching the funeral of our democratic rights.

He said that for many years the people of Quebec did not get the old age pension benefits enjoyed by other provinces. We had to get rid of the Liberal government in our province, Mr. Speaker, in order that that social measure would be applied. We did get those benefits on the day the present premier took power in our province. How many battles did he conduct from his seat in the opposition on this very subject? Never in all its history has the province of Quebec known such expansion in its economy. Never have our immense resources been so generously used for the benefit of our people. Our thanks for this are due to the premier of the province, whom I am not afraid to name, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis.

So far as the amazing statement of the hon. member is concerned, that in Quebec we are ready for communism, he has shown his complete ignorance of our conditions and has made himself an object of ridicule. The hon. member need not worry. With the strength of our religious convictions, with the honour and respect we have for our clergy to whom we owe in great measure our survival as an ethnic group, and bearing in mind the glorious past of our ancestors, with the love we have for democracy, we are as solid as the fortifications of Quebec against that evil ideology. Even if the rest of the country ever fell into the hands of the masters of the Kremlin, which is absurd to contemplate, Canada would still have a bastion that would guard and keep the standard of liberty and democracy—Quebec.

Liberty in Quebec not being a synonym for either licence or abuse, I was happy to read in last week's press that according to our premier the law protecting against the spread of subversive ideas in our province, known as the padlock law, will never be revoked. Socialism being the twin brother of communism, the hon. member should not be surprised if in certain areas in Quebec the C.C.F. candidates do not receive more votes than those who would favour a totalitarian state in Canada.

To revert, however, to the subject of education—

Mr. Regier: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member must admit that at no time during the course of my speech on Wednesday of last week did I refer either to the French racial origin, to the language of the people of Quebec, to the religious faith of the people of Quebec or—

Mr. Dufresne: I will not allow the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, to make a speech during my speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dufresne: He had time enough to insult my province, and I will take time enough to answer.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam reads standing order No. 43 he will see that when the hon. member who is speaking has concluded his speech, he will be allowed to clarify a point which has been misunderstood by the member who is speaking. He may do so at the end of the hon. member's address. When the hon. member rose I believe the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) thought he was going to ask him a question, and probably that is why he took his seat. Noticing the hon. member wanted to clarify a point he objected, I think strenuously, and I believe the hon. member can try to clarify his point when the hon. member for Quebec West has concluded his speech.

Mr. Dufresne: If he does clarify it, I will have another opportunity to come back and tell him what I think.

To revert to the subject of education, Mr. Speaker, may I say that had the hon. member been given the opportunity to stay long enough in our province he would have found that nowhere in the world are the minorities better treated. Had he known this, as he should have, he would have cited our province in that respect and our compatriots from Maillardville would have greatly benefited from this gesture. Unfortunately they have to be represented in this house by someone who, as far as I am concerned, has never known the definition of national unity.

(Translation):

In conclusion may I, Mr. Speaker, reassert here that my only wish, as member of parliament, is to do my humble share to protect first the best interests of the people I have the honour to represent, and, also, those of the Canadian community as a whole.

I am deeply convinced that I have expressed the feelings of all those who did me the honour of sending me here to speak on their behalf. In so doing, I play the role which has been assigned to me as a result of the last general election. May Providence keep me in good health and inspire me to work hard enough so that I may fulfil my mandate faithfully, thus helping Canada to become the outstanding nation of the free world.

(Text):

Mr. Regier: I should like to clarify a point, Mr. Speaker. I believe the hon. member who has just taken his seat—

Mr. Dufresne: On a point of order, I think the hon. member has taken all the time allowed him by the rules of the house to make a speech. I do not think the rules of the house permit him to make another speech in reply to me. He will have some other opportunity in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might clarify the position. Standing order 43 reads as follows:

(1) No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter, and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I think the hon. member for Quebec West will agree with me that so far he has not heard enough of the hon. member's explanation to tell whether he is making another speech or merely giving an explanation, as provided for by standing order 43.

Mr. Dufresne: I have not yet.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we can hear the hon. member, and if he does go beyond the limits provided by this standing order, I am sure the hon. member for Quebec West and I will stop him.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, the point I wish to make is that the hon. member insinuated that on Wednesday last I had offended the religion, the language, the traditions and the culture of the people of Quebec. I believe that if he will carefully reread what I did say in this house he will find that I did no such thing in any way, shape or form. I have the highest regard for the things he mentioned, their religion, their language, their heritage and their culture.

Mr. Dupuis: You insulted the whole province of Quebec.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak at this time. I came to the second session of the twenty-second parliament with a good deal of concern about the economic conditions in Canada, and indeed the financial position and economic conditions of many of our people. I am sorry that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is not in his seat. I see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is still in the house, and in the course of my remarks I shall make some reference to what he said with respect to the agricultural picture in Canada.

I first wish to say that my concern is over the fact that in this rich country of Canada we have upwards of half a million people unemployed. I do not think it is possible properly to assess the total number of people who are unemployed, but I am quite certain that hon. members will agree that there are well over half a million. When one considers that, and also the number of dependents who must look to the breadwinner for sustenance, then he can understand the serious plight of hundreds of thousands of our people in this rich country.

Mr. Studer: Who made it rich?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I realize that when we come back and hear government spokesmen, such as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, we hear the same old story that we have heard from 1945 to the present time. Many of the conditions that existed then are still plaguing the Canadian economy. We have unemployment; we have farm people who are losing their equity in their farms. We have foreclosures and all the other things which do bring hardships to many of our people.

When I hear the expression "You have never had it better" I try to find out where the ministers and others from the government side of the house get such assurance that everything is all right. I come from an agricultural area where we have had the worst crop failure in the last ten years. One cannot but be concerned; but when he turns to some other parts of our economy he gets the reassurance that some people in Canada are in a very good financial position.

I went to the library and brought back the "Financial Post Survey of Industrials" in Canada for the year 1954. I quite agree with hon. members on the government side of the house and those who take a philosophical attitude toward conditions in Canada at the present time, I agree, indeed, that many of the bigger corporations are in a healthy financial position. I shall read a short paragraph indicating that some of these companies have a buoyant income. This survey states:

> Based on an analysis by the Financial Post of the latest published annual reports, the combined net profit of 326 companies in 1953 was 3 per cent ahead of the 1952 level. Earnings before depreciation, interest and taxes were 2 per cent below the previous year.

The report goes on to say:

> Percentage return on combined net assets continued in its downward trend of recent years,—

But this is the point; the profit return amounted to 10·04 per cent. So far as these 326 industrials in Canada are concerned, they are still in a buoyant financial position and are receiving very good returns. However, the picture is not so happy when one turns to the farming people of Canada. Before I go into that I wish to say that, according to the speech from the throne, we can look for a little alleviation of the hardships of some of our people. I welcome the fact that there is to be an increase in the war veterans allowance; but I say here and now that it is long overdue. The move should have been made long before this. The cost of living has gone up steadily since 1945, and nothing has been done to help these war veterans. When the government bring in the measure, I hope they will accept the suggestion of the Legion, who are asking that the allowance be raised to $60 for single veterans and $120 for married couples.

In addition, I welcome the disability pension that the government has seen fit to enact. On looking over the proposals, it occurred to me that they are too rigid and too strict. There are far too many people who cannot earn a living and who are dependent upon others who will not be able to qualify. I hope the government will see fit to make the regulations less stringent. Also the government has brought in a meagre program of public works suggesting that Ripple Rock be removed and a few other public works projects. I want to say here and now I do not think that will meet the great need we have in Canada for a real public works program by which we can put our unemployed back to work. As I recall, last February the unemployment insurance benefits paid out of the public treasury to the unemployed was in excess of $28 million and so I say that in this rich country we should have a program which will meet the developments and the needs of our people.

Now I wish to discuss the farm picture and to discredit, I think, the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and in this regard I want first to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Estevan, Saskatchewan, Mercury dated December 23, 1954. This paper is published in my own constituency and in respect to the farm income for the coming year it says, and I quote:

> The growing threat of a world-wide economic recession has been removed by an upsurge in business conditions in most countries that are Canada's customers for wheat.

Before continuing I want to say that the editor must be misinformed because, as everyone knows, the reason there is a demand for Canadian wheat in these countries where we normally market our wheat is the fact that those countries have suffered crop failures this past year. More particularly I want to stress this, and again I quote:

> In this regard the poor wheat crop in Canada has been a blessing in disguise.

As far as I am concerned that is nothing short of capitalist mental neurosis. I think that when we have in this country people who can produce for a hungry world and we have an editorial which says that the crop failure which we have suffered this year in western Canada is a blessing in disguise there is something wrong with the thinking of those people. I think it can be attributed to the capitalist psychology all the way down the line because the capitalist society has never been able to take care of abundance at any time. Perhaps hon. members on the other side of the house and the right hon. Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will perhaps now be chuckling deep down in their collars that once again nature has pulled us out of a task which cannot be accomplished in a capitalist set-up, such as we have today, in spite of the fact that we on this side of the house have pleaded with the government to undertake a program for agriculture under which when through the bounty of Providence we have in this country an abundance of wheat, we can store it for the lean years.

I need not repeat what I said in the past that this was done in Egypt over two thousand years ago. In the years of plenty they stored for the years of scarcity. There is no one single thing which could injure the western hemisphere more than a continued crop failure which could put the balance of negotiations and what have you on the side of the iron curtain. Yet in this country, where we have steel and concrete and where we could store our wheat for the years of scarcity which might come, there is no program. The only way that the government has got out from under it is by a widespread crop failure in western Canada.

What is the situation in respect to farm income in western Canada? Quite briefly we have had the most serious decline in the last twenty years. According to dominion bureau of statistics figures net farm income was as follows:

1952		1,949,900,000
1953		1,667,000,000
1954	(estimate)	1,200,000,000

This represents a three-year decline of one-half of the 1951 net farm income. In Saskatchewan, the province whence I come, we will have a net income this year of $250 million less than in 1953, or a drop of approximately 46 per cent.

I want to carry the same argument through to show the condition of agriculture in Canada. Taking the period from 1935 to 1939 as the base period, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, from July 1951 to October 1953, manufactured goods in Canada declined 15·6 points. But farm products, that is, the wholesale price index of farm products, dropped 68·6, a difference of 53 points. There is a decline to 1954 and today western farmers are finding themselves in a definite price squeeze. Their costs are up and their income is going down.

What does this mean to the purchasing power of the farmer? According to the dominion bureau of statistics report again, we have the index of commodities and services used by farmers, taking again the base period from 1935 to 1939, standing at 225—these are the things which are used by farmers in the production of the various farm commodities—an increase of 125 points since 1939.

What does this mean to the farmer in relation to the money with which he can purchase these commodities? As an example let us consider wheat. No. 1 is now $1.72 f.o.b. Fort William, and in terms of 1935-1939 purchasing power it is worth only 76 cents. That is the problem facing western Canada today and I think this government should take cognizance of that fact. This condition affects the whole economy. I am not here to plead for the farmers of western Canada particularly but for every last citizen who has to earn his bread and butter in Canada and maintain a home and provide for his children.

Concerning retail sales in Canada there was a drop of $214 million in the first nine months of 1954. According to the unemployment figures again there are 18,000 unemployed as of November 1954 in Winnipeg, 20,000 in Vancouver; and in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, a very small city, the registered unemployed figure has increased by 70 per cent from the previous year.

Again I have indicated that some of the companies in Canada are still making hay. I remember the story that was told in this house, I think by the premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Thomas Douglas, when he was indicating that the fun which the big corporations have can perhaps be compared to the elephant who dances around in the chicken house. It is fine fun for the elephant but it is pretty tough on the chickens.

I am saying that the little enterprise, the small businessman, the small enterpriser is being driven to the wall in many cases. According to the dominion bureau of statistics figures commercial failures for the first nine months of 1954 rose to 1,684 from 1,127 in the preceding year.

I would like to turn to the statement made in this house on January 10 by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when, in reply to the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), he stated, as reported at page 32 of Hansard:

> The hon. gentleman has said that Canada has lost the United Kingdom market for the second time in his own period of political experience. There has been no loss of the United Kingdom market.

I think it is quite unnecessary for me to again put on record the figures I gave last year dealing with exports from this country to the United Kingdom from 1939 to 1953, the latest date for which figures were then available. But I would like to give comparative figures for farming commodities exported to the United Kingdom, and as will be found in the dominion bureau of statistics return dated March 18, 1954. The figures are given in hundredweights. In 1945, of beef and veal Canada shipped 1,843,777 and in 1953 the amount fell to 64,501 cwt. In 1946 we shipped 103,243 cwt. of fresh lamb and mutton and in 1953 not a single pound. In 1943 we shipped 149,124 cwt. of fresh pork and in 1953 no shipments at all. In 1947 we shipped 120,988 cwt. of poultry and in 1953 again nothing. In 1944 we shipped 6,923,103 cwt. of bacon and hams to Britain and in 1953 nothing. In canned meats we shipped 338,378 cwt. in 1944 and in 1953 only 27. We shipped 142,300 cwt. of edible offal in 1944 and in 1953 not a single pound. As regards "other meats", we shipped 1,995 cwt. in 1946 and 10 cwt. in 1953.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the hon. member a question? Will my hon. friend put on the record the amount of surplus we had in each of these products at that period and which we might have sent to Britain?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): That is a good question. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) comes out west and makes speeches and it seems to me he has one for every occasion. Now he is asking me to put the surplus figures on record. I do not know what these figures were, but I would say that it is directly due to the agricultural policy of this government that we were unable to maintain our production figures.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member is unable to put these figures on the record, I would like to suggest to him that the products were sold during that period and the only reason we did not send them to Britain was that we obtained higher prices elsewhere.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the minister that in this country we have never yet reached maximum production in any one of those commodities. I dislike introducing my own personal experience, but I would like to point out that in 1951, just before the $3 subsidy was removed from hogs, there was no guarantee, no market, and no assurance that the farmer would get a proper return.

Mr. Gardiner: Everyone who got rid of his hogs lost money and everyone who kept them made more money than ever before.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I have some good Liberal friends out west and they always tell me, "When the Minister of Agriculture comes out with a policy I always do the opposite." Apparently they have been very successful. In any event, the minister has told the western farmers that if they wish to retain these markets they will have to maintain production. Is he now prepared to get up and say that the farmers failed to provide sufficient quantities in order to supply these markets?

Mr. Gardiner: I have never made a statement of that kind. I keep hogs myself and I have made more on hogs since 1951 than I have ever made at any other time.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I would like to draw the minister's attention to something he said the other day, on his return from the United States, with respect to the support prices we have on some Canadian commodities. The minister seems quite satisfied with these support prices, particularly with reference to the poultry producers in this country. I do not know where he gets his information but I do know that a few of my acquaintances are not satisfied with the proposition. They feel they are not getting a fair deal, and that the support price is too high in relation to what they get. I had a conversation recently with a local storekeeper who takes eggs from the farms and ships them to the packing houses, and two years ago they were paying around 21 cents a dozen for mixed eggs. I asked the dealer how he came out, and where the principle of support price entered into the transaction. He showed me a return on 24 dozen crates of eggs and it proved that he had lost $4 on that quantity. I asked him whether he got any return from the packers, and he said, "No, that is all I get." What in effect was happening was that they were handling them as a service.

In this regard I would point out that despite that situation the minister indicated the other day that in Canada the support price for eggs and for poultry was working out satisfactorily.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, I said no such thing. I said that my hon. friends opposite were claiming the United States system was better than ours, and I pointed out to the house that we were getting more for our eggs and butter at present than the farmers were in the United States.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): What the minister did say was rather ambiguous. I have here the poultry products market report for December 31, 1954, and according to this report the price of eggs to the producer as of December 28, 1954, was 30 cents. At the same time the price to the consumer in Winnipeg was 48 cents, or a difference of 18 cents. How can the minister claim that it is working out satisfactorily? There is obviously too great a spread between what the producer gets and the consumer pays. I see the minister shrugging his shoulders.

Mr. Gardiner: You are switching your ground. It was price to the producer and wholesale price I quoted.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I do not wish to encroach upon the time of other hon. members, and in the few minutes at my disposal I want to make five suggestions which might help us to combat the economic difficulties now facing the nation.

I believe the greatest challenge to the western democracies is that of putting their own house in order and providing the people with security and a decent standard of living. With regard to unemployment the federal government in 1945 committed itself to complete responsibility for all unemployed employables in Canada in lieu of the provinces giving up certain taxation rights. I want to say to the government that it is high time they took that responsibility and, if necessary, called another reconstruction conference and get down to business with the provinces. I do not think there is one single province that would hesitate to meet with the government. If it undertook its responsibility in respect of the unemployed in Canada, I think the provinces would do their part. I know my own province of Saskatchewan is quite ready to take on responsibility for the disabled and those who are unemployable. That is one thing. Coupled with that matter, we should have some vision in the matter of a public works project across Canada, worked out with the provinces and the municipalities, whereby we may have social projects which will benefit them and which will put our people to work on a work and wages basis.

As I say—and I referred to this matter in the earlier part of my speech—this government should look after those who are war veterans under the war veterans allowance and immediately increase that allowance as requested by the Legion up to $60 for a single person or $120 for married couples. This government should undertake immediately what this party has always asked, namely a health insurance program for every citizen in Canada. It is something which the government is going to have to give some thought to. Unless action is taken quickly, you will have to find new ground and new data which will make it possible that, when you make up your mind—if and when you do so—you can undertake it with some success and assure that it will have the necessary personnel, the necessary hospitals and other things in order to put it into operation. I urge the government to bring in a national health program for the people. It is long overdue. We need it right now. This government should undertake now to start training girls in the nursing profession. They could undertake to help the provinces. Up to this time they have not done so. I realize that assistance is given for the construction of hospitals, but this government should take a real lead in having each of the provinces bring their hospitals up to the maximum necessary to give adequate hospitalization under a national hospitalization scheme because there will be many more people who will then have an opportunity to go to hospital but who now, through the hit or miss program of personal hospitalization, are not able to get the health care they need.

In conclusion I want to deal with the farm program. As I said before, this is not a selfish approach because I come from a predominantly agricultural province but rather because I think it would be for the welfare of all of Canada. First of all I think this government should do something seriously about its trade policies. I think the government should get these trade envoys, the people who are out trying to sell Canadian products, to get off their soft chairs and get out and do something about this matter so that Canadian markets will be extended so that we shall have a marked step in the direction of freer trade.

Then in respect of our domestically consumed farm products, may I say that I think the government should establish a national livestock marketing board; and under that board they should set prices for agricultural commodities—that is livestock products and dairy products—which will give the cost of production. In that formula there should be forward pricing by which the producer would know, for two or three years, the minimum amount he is going to get for his products. To date the Agricultural Prices Support Act has been used in some cases to support agricultural products, but to date only in the neighbourhood of $80 million has been used under this fund. The minister shakes his head. He can perhaps give the house other figures. That is my figure and I went and looked it up. The figure I have is $80 million whereas, on the other hand, we find that $60 million has been paid in subsidies to the gold mining industry. I am not trying to make an issue of that or any comparison; but surely the agricultural welfare of this country is worth more than $80 million. I therefore say that through a national livestock marketing board we should have this guaranteed price which will give the cost of production to our farm people and tend to give equilibrium to all our economy because, as I have said before, when the farm economy is in the doldrums then you have your dependent industries such as the farm machinery industry and the others in a depressed condition.

Then again I have spoken about dairy products. They too should be under the same system of forward pricing, with guaranteed prices over a period of years. Another thing which could be done is the institution of a crop insurance program. Speaking the other day the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) outlined something in that regard. I am not going to go into it other than to say this. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act there is not sufficient coverage and guarantee that the farmer who loses his crop, through drought, hail or flooding, can receive a proper income or any assistance under that act. There is therefore a great need there. In asking this I do not think that I am being unreasonable. Protection is given to every other industry in Canada. We are just asking that, for the sake of the welfare of the whole economy, something substantial be done in order to prevent the fluctuations which we find in the agricultural picture.

In conclusion I just want to say this. Unless this government is ready to come out of its hiding and do something for the Canadian people I think—and quite justly so—that there will be an aroused public and that the people of this country who are without jobs and the farmers who are losing their equity in their land and are having their farm machinery repossessed, are going to rise up in wrath which is quite justifiable.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few minutes in this debate. First, I should like you to know that I agree most heartily with the congratulations that have been extended to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) for their splendid contributions to this debate.

I listened closely to the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) when he set forth the policies of his party. I was hoping to hear some constructive suggestions as to what the government should do and what this once great party would do if they were sitting in the seats of government. I was glad to hear that the Acting Leader of the Opposition has committed his followers to a program of national contributory health insurance in co-operation with the provinces. I was somewhat amused at the reaction of our socialist friends to this announcement. They have always tried to steal the limelight by laying claim to originating and forcing the government to take action in connection with all the matters of social welfare legislation that have been put on the statute books.

I think it would be well for us all to bear in mind the fact that the Canadian people are a humanitarian race and like to alleviate suffering and misery wherever it may be found. But I can assure you that they do not like to have it done under state control or under too much regimentation. I also noticed that part of the subamendment to the speech from the throne where the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) inserts the words "have deliberately returned to the policy of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise".

We in this corner of the house had begun to fear, as our leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), said the other day, that the Liberals were socialists in low gear. However, we are glad to learn now that they have returned to the fold of free enterprise. I make no apology for claiming that our group since its inception has continuously and unwaveringly supported the system of free enterprise. We have stood by this policy throughout the years and while we admit that limited controls may sometimes be necessary we will oppose any move by this or any other government to place the affairs of the Canadian people under state control or to regiment our way of life.

Since neither the amendment nor the subamendment offers anything concrete, we may as well consider the speech from the throne itself. We are glad to note that the international situation has improved. While the peace in Korea may be an uneasy one, the bloodshed has at least ceased. There is a possibility that affairs in Indo-China may be stabilized and I trust that the Canadian members of the commission that has been given the tremendous task of overseeing the carrying out of plans in that part of the world will, with the other members of the commission, work towards ultimate success, stabilize affairs in that country and bring about lasting peace.

In a few days we shall be debating in the house the London and Paris agreements. I think we should all remember the steadfast leadership of Sir Anthony Eden who is so greatly responsible for bringing these agreements out of what seemed total failure. I know that the problem of the admission of Germany to NATO causes much concern, but we trust that it will be given very careful consideration in the house and throughout the country and that by our actions we will contribute something towards the removal of this stumbling block to world peace which exists in Europe today. All in all, international conditions are more settled than for some time. World leaders predict an era of peace. I wonder whether we are ready for it. That is a terrible question to ask but I am sincere. Are we ready for peace?

In our lifetime we have noticed that good times and bad times have coincided with war and peace. Under the stimulus and demands of war, either for industry or for the armed services, the energy of every one of our citizens is required, and so we have full employment. The resulting increase in wages and income places in the hands of our people a supply of purchasing power so that they can buy the goods and services required for daily living. Then we have good times. Good times, Mr. Speaker, but under the stress and worry of war we are not able to enjoy them.

After the demands of war are satisfied and we return to a peacetime economy we then find that the demands of industry for labour gradually taper off and we have lessened wages and income with lessened purchasing power in the hands of our people. Then we have bad times. I do not think I need elaborate further. We have all witnessed the cycle, good times and bad times, war and peace, boom and bust. The solution is sustained production, production that will supply the materials for roads, bridges, houses for our people, public buildings for educational and health services, land clearing, natural resources development. I could continue. These must replace wartime production. The program is unlimited but leadership must come from the government and the finances for the program must be supplied by the government on a non-interest bearing basis by the issuance of currency and credit through our own institution, the Bank of Canada.

I am not pessimistic about our economic problems, Mr. Speaker. I have wonderful faith in the resources of our country and in the ability of our people to work and to produce. We are now entering an era of peace and it is the duty of the government to give the necessary leadership to see that we are not entering an era of depression. We are finding it difficult to employ all our workers. We have surpluses of agricultural products. We have our warehouses filled with goods that our people and the peoples of the world need badly. We have idle factories. These are signs we must heed. These things create problems that we must face instead of sitting back and hoping that something will happen to pull us out of the mess.

I am glad that such prompt action has been taken to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to alleviate the condition of our unemployed, but this is only a stopgap. It is not a cure for unemployment. I note that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will attend a conference of commonwealth prime ministers in London shortly. I trust that he will have constructive ideas to place before the conference for improving trade with these countries. I hope he is successful, for it is very essential that we have increased two-way trade within the commonwealth, especially with Great Britain. I trust that our trade emissaries trying to bolster GATT will meet with ultimate success.

I have heard the more or less humorous criticism of the cabinet that they are commercial travellers. I should like to commend the government for the leadership it is giving in trying to open outlets for our goods in the world markets. I think we are all agreed that in this era of highly competitive trade personal contact is the better way to sell goods. Not only are these travellers selling goods but we hope they are selling Canada. Even if the bill is $60 million it is not too much to pay for good will. A few days ago the phrase "peace and good will" was on everyone's lips. We are spending about $2 billion a year to promote and preserve peace. Surely $60 million is not too high a price for good will.

I should like to devote a few minutes now to local affairs. Last summer I was glad to have the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), who is present in the house, and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) visit my riding. I say "riding", Mr. Speaker. I did not have the privilege of seeing them. I was glad to note that the Minister of Fisheries had set the minds of the people of Vernon at rest with regard to the new federal building in that city. I had advised them earlier that the Department of Public Works would proceed with the building in 1955 and it was nice to have this confirmed on the spot by a cabinet minister.

I should like to assure the Minister of Public Works that the need for more post office space and for centralized government offices is becoming more urgent in Vernon. This year we are suffering a recession in our two great industries, farming and lumbering, and government projects to provide extra jobs and extra purchasing power are badly needed. Some of you do not seem to realize that we have an agricultural industry in British Columbia. I do not blame you, for so many members of the house would have you believe that agriculture starts at the Manitoba boundary and ends at the British Columbia line.

Despite the fact that we have a good agricultural industry, we have our troubles as well. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) champion the cause of New Brunswick farmers a few days ago. I was pleased also to hear him take the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) to task for some of the statements he had made following a brief visit to that province. In this case I believe we would do well to recall the old saying, "A man usually finds what he is looking for."

I should like the hon. member for Westmorland to know that I spent several days in his province last spring. I, too, was on a speaking tour, covering parts of Kings, Queens, Victoria and Carleton counties. I was delighted with the country and with the people. The only thing I could not understand was how they were able to drive such fine cars, to have such good homes, wear such good clothes and enjoy such good food—I did enjoy that sea food—on what we in British Columbia would call a very low income. However, they seem to be able to do it, and they deserve credit for it. I believe the people, though, are awakening to the fact that development is badly needed. I believe they feel the government should give and must give more active leadership and direction, so they can develop their wonderful resources and enjoy the benefit of all the good things that are there in such abundance.

I have digressed from my subject. I was going to tell you that in British Columbia we have a very important agricultural industry and, in my riding, we take a back seat to none. A rancher from the Oyama district took a few of his Herefords to the Toronto fair and came back with the championship for fat steers. The 4-H clubs from Armstrong sent contestants to the same fair and came back with the trophy for swine judging. Early in December the co-operative creamery in Vernon processed their millionth pound of butter during the past year. These facts, Mr. Speaker, will show we have a progressive group of farmers.

We have our troubles, too. I was pleased to hear our leader, the hon. member for Peace River, state in this debate a few days ago that we need a plan of flexible—I emphasize that word "flexible"—price supports for basic farm products. I am glad to see that the government is spending millions under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I hope Saskatchewan gets its dam. You know we have dam troubles in British Columbia too. I still maintain, though, that our province is being discriminated against in that the full provisions of the act are not applicable to us.

I support every vote for funds for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and yet I realize that many changes are necessary to make the assistance fair and equitable. I commend the government for their prompt action in giving financial assistance to the apple growers of Nova Scotia when they suffered such grievous losses last summer. At the same time I condemn the government for their failure to listen to the plea of the Okanagan fruit growers when their orchards and crops were so badly damaged by frost last spring.

I mentioned that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) was in my riding. From all reports he was highly pleased with his reception in Revelstoke, with the tourist attractions and with the possibility for development that exists there. I can assure the minister that he made a good impression there, too. I am hoping that his promises and proposals for expanding the Revelstoke and Glacier national parks, and improving the facilities for tourists, will be carried out. I think, though, the clear pure air of the district must have gone to his head, for he has since made fantastic proposals that concern us very much. These envision a tunnel to divert part of the water from the great Columbia river into the Fraser watershed.

We in the interior look upon the Columbia as our greatest asset. In fact, we understand that it ranks second to the St. Lawrence itself in power potential. We are anxious to see this great waterway developed. We especially urge that every effort should be made to speed work on the very important Mica creek project, with a progressive plan for other developments. We are suspicious of some of the proposals emanating from Ottawa in recent weeks. We regard this great waterway as a natural resource that belongs, first and last, to the people of the interior of British Columbia. We look upon this as ours, and we look with suspicion on any movement by the federal government to interfere politically with any development that we, the people of British Columbia, feel is in our own best interests.

We have heard much about provincial relations and provincial autonomy in this and the last session. The need for a federal-provincial conference is long overdue. I would urge that before this government takes any action leading to further interference in provincial rights, the whole matter should be earnestly and quietly discussed around the conference table.

We have heard pleas for greater assistance to road construction. I made such a plea last session, but on this occasion I can do no better than to endorse the words used by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) in this house a few days ago. The trans-Canada highway is of great importance in my constituency and I am anxious to have it completed. I could also talk about assistance for railroads. Despite the fact that this government has turned down every plea for assistance to extend the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, I am glad to see that our provincial government has sufficient courage and initiative to proceed with this great artery into the inland empire of British Columbia and Alberta.

The story of 1954 in British Columbia has been a story of one great achievement after another. I am not narrow enough to place all the credit for this at the feet of the Victoria government, but I will say when encouragement and assistance were needed, and where leadership was required, that government was ready and willing to help out. In spite of the great expenditures for development, the welfare of the people is not being neglected.

When the unemployment problem became serious at the coast, a plea for help was made to Ottawa. I am sorry to say that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) politely told the premier of British Columbia that the province was financially able to look after its own unemployed. Perhaps that is right. We can take care of our own unemployed, but those who flock to the coastal areas, feeling that if they have to go hungry it is the nicest place in Canada in which to be hungry, create a problem that should not be left at the doorstep of charitable organizations or the British Columbia government. I was going to put on the record for this house the words written by the noted columnist the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) dealing with the problem. This was so ably done by my colleague the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) the other day that I shall not repeat it. I can only echo his wish that the hon. member for Vancouver South is able to sell his splendid ideas to his government colleagues.

I trust that this government will yet assume their just responsibility toward our unemployed and formulate some plan to remove the problem from our way of life. I would also repeat my plea that this government and the government of British Columbia get together around the conference table and give the leadership that our people would like to have in developing our resources for the betterment of our province and for Canada as a whole.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): In rising to participate in this debate may I be permitted to join with previous speakers in congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both these newly elected members excelled in their difficult task and offer great promise for the future.

Unlike the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) I was pleased to be reminded in the speech from the throne of the opportunity which was given to the people of Canada of once more extending an affectionate welcome to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother. I was also pleased to hear mentioned the visit of the consort of our sovereign, the Duke of Edinburgh.

Notwithstanding the statements made by numerous speakers from the opposition side of the house, I feel that if one wishes carefully to scrutinize the contents of the speech from the throne he will find concrete evidence of the sound policies of the present government.

In listening to the arguments evolving from some opposition members one would be led to believe that it was the duty of the present government to provide a perpetual scheme of unemployment insurance which, if applied, could easily create a complete disruption in the labour forces of this country. The bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide for an increase in the duration and scale of winter supplementary benefits will be most welcomed by the labour classes of my constituency, where a large proportion of the employment is seasonal. We are given to understand that later on this session a further amendment will be considered, designed to make unemployment insurance a more effective instrument for providing financial support to unemployed workers.

Fishing operations in my constituency are purely of a seasonal nature. It is true that a number of fishermen are owners of their fishing vessels, and it may be a rather difficult problem to have them qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. A larger number, however, are either fishing on wages or are sharing in the gross revenue of their landings. These men are engaged in fishing when employment is available during the summer period. After November 15, or at the latest December 1, fishing operations are curtailed by ice formations along our shores. At such a time it is almost impossible for any of these fishermen to secure employment for the winter period. If we are to maintain a flourishing fishing industry, if we want to keep our younger generation interested in following the steps of their forefathers, it is essential that amendments designed to include those fishermen under unemployment benefits be considered at the earliest possible date.

Amendments to the National Housing Act, providing for loans for home improvements, will stimulate further the construction program. I say, Mr. Speaker, at this point that the opening of a Central Mortgage office in the town of Bathurst in my constituency in the spring of 1954 has been most beneficial. From this office alone loans amounting to well over $500,000 have been approved in the first six months of operation. This statement might be a revelation to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) who stated in this house, a few days ago, as reported at page 119 of Hansard:

> When you see a new house in certain parts of New Brunswick you really lift up your head to look because it is something new, whereas in other parts of Canada new houses are a thing of almost everyday occurrence.

If the hon. member visited New Brunswick with the same perception with which he glanced at Montreal and the province of Quebec, no wonder he is concerned with a possibility which could more readily apply to his own district. It is rather difficult for anyone to reconcile the garden of Eden described by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam with the plea for assistance to unemployment presented on the same day by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green).

The introduction of amendments to accelerate the elimination of level crossings will provide additional employment and create further safety measures for our fast growing population.

Legislation providing facilities for loans to fishermen similar to those provided to farmers by the Farm Improvement Loans Act will no doubt create further interest among our fishermen. This legislation, when approved, may not meet with the full approbation or satisfaction of all fishermen; nevertheless I am confident that its application will relieve hardship and provide to a large number a purchasing power which will result in increased efficiency and subsequently in additional earnings.

Reports from a recent fisheries research board annual meeting held in Ottawa indicated the discovery of substantial scallop beds in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Fishermen from my constituency have reported in the last few fishing seasons the appearance of scallops along the bay of Chaleur coast and in the proximity of Miscou island. The development of this type of fishery would mean additional revenue to our fishermen and I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that during the 1955 season every effort be undertaken by the fisheries research board to carry on investigations and surveys in the area just mentioned.

The oyster production in New Brunswick reached a record of 37,000 barrels in 1949. Since then this most important fishery has been gradually decreasing from year to year, and when the figures for 1954 are published, I am afraid they will show a further reduction of this variety of shellfish. Oysters are found in the sheltered waters of the southern part of the gulf of St. Lawrence, and only during half the year is the water warm enough for feeding, which causes a slow growth and a limited and uncertain reproduction. It is generally recognized that the natural production of oysters in Canadian waters is not sufficient to meet the demand. It is also an admitted fact that restrictions on the fishing season, on sizes and on the gear to be used do not provide adequate protection for this luxurious shellfish.

Gloucester county is one of the larger oyster producing areas in eastern Canada. Our Shippigan and Caraquet oysters have acquired a nation-wide reputation. It is most urgent that the fisheries research board of Canada, in co-operation with the Department of Fisheries, carry out further investigation to improve the position of this industry. Unless new methods of oyster culture are discovered and large scale trials of cultivation are applied without further delay, I am prepared to predict that within the next five or six years this industry will drop to a new record low, which is causing great concern among our interested oyster fishermen. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Fisheries order an immediate survey of the situation, and that steps be taken at once to expand and improve, if possible, the facilities offered in this connection by the fisheries research board.

Amendments to the veterans welfare legislation or to the War Veterans Allowance Act to raise the basic rates as well as the ceiling on permissible incomes of recipients of allowances will create satisfaction throughout this country.

Early in the year a fire destroyed completely the Keymet mine mill which was at the point of starting its operations. Without losing a single day the management ordered the immediate reconstruction of the destroyed structure, and within a few months the new ore concentrator at Keymet was in full operation.

The base metal discoveries of 1953 in the Bathurst area, which were mentioned by the Mining World as the discovery of the year, were further implemented by the remarkable find of American Metal in the adjoining area early in 1954. With the Keymet mine already producing and a second mine ready to resume operation at the site of Brunswick Mining and Smelting, Gloucester county is gradually being recognized as the birthplace of a gigantic new mining field of great significance to the general economy of New Brunswick.

Every effort should be made to see that a zinc smelter, which is urgently needed in eastern Canada, be erected in the logical site offered by Gloucester county. The possible additional secondary industries which may spring up as a result of these new mining discoveries could be equal in importance to the mining and smelting operations. We have to offer in the proximity of these mining sites year-round water shipping facilities unequalled by any base metal mines now operating on Canadian soil. Recent hydrographic surveys have shown that Gloucester county offers facilities for the establishment of a year-round port with sufficient water depth for ocean-going vessels. This factor must not be neglected when the normal development of these mines takes place.

Numerous advantages would be derived if these developments could be followed by the construction of the Chignecto canal. Mineral ores from Ungava could then be processed in Gloucester and follow through this canal the short route to United States outlets.

Unfortunately, at the present time New Brunswick is faced with the major problem of providing adequate cheap power to facilitate the growth and expansion of these newly discovered mines. We have heard recently of the Beechwood project on the Saint John river, and of the possibilities offered by oil shale in Albert county. The water flow of the Saint John river is limited, and even the realization of the Beechwood project will not answer the problem by offering the large block of cheap power needed for the establishment of a flourishing mining industry and the subsidiary or secondary industries which would follow.

I am often wondering if coal, which exists in large quantities in New Brunswick and the neighbouring province of Nova Scotia, has been investigated to its full potentiality as a steam-generating facility. What a boon for the maritime provinces if in the near future a method could be found whereby cheap power could be generated from steam. The matter is worth considering and should be studied further by the research council of Canada. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the possibility of the commercial use of atomic energy as a power-generating factor seems to be coming closer to reality. When the day comes when practical use of atomic energy can be applied commercially to generate cheap electric power, may the province of New Brunswick be favoured with the first pilot plant of this kind.

On Friday last I listened with interest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) quoting suggestions made by some hon. members in connection with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river project. Mention has been made of the Canso causeway, of the St. Lawrence seaway, of the trans-Canada highway, of the removal of Ripple Rock and other projects. This reminds me of a most unfortunate situation which exists in the lower end of my constituency of Gloucester. At the northeastern end of the province, with the bay of Chaleur on the west and the gulf of St. Lawrence on the east, are located the islands of Shippigan and Miscou. On the island of Shippigan alone over 5,000 inhabitants are living who depend almost entirely on fishing for a livelihood. The distance from the island to the mainland is slightly over half a mile and transportation consists of a cable ferry. Unfortunately, during the winter months the operation of the ferry is prevented by heavy ice formations, and these island residents have to use the ice bridge to communicate with the mainland. During the freeze-up period in late fall, and during the moving of ice in the spring, these poor inhabitants are left for weeks at a time without communication with the mainland. Those who have decided to take risks on insecure ice blocks have taken chances which, in many instances, have resulted in loss of life.

The cost of construction of a bridge to the mainland is greatly increased on account of navigation which has to pass through this channel. The entire Gloucester county fishing fleet uses this passage on its way to and returning from the fishing banks. This necessitates an open span or a bridge with an overhead clearance of approximately 40 feet at high tide. In view of these being navigable waters, I would suggest that the federal government consider the possibility of contributing its share to assure the construction of a bridge between Shippigan island and the mainland, thus relieving this unfortunate population of hardship and unnecessary worry.

As one of the representatives of French Acadian origin in the house, may I be permitted, at the beginning of this memorable year 1955, to salute, in my mother tongue, my French Acadian compatriots who this year celebrate the second centenary of the deportation of 1755.

The celebration of the second centenary of the deportation of the Acadians will mark an epoch in Canadian history. Mr. Speaker, the members of the house may rest assured that it is not our intention to revive a certain resentment brought about by a sad and unfortunate period of our people's history, but rather to mark officially and solemnly the rebirth and the survival of a small group who, exactly two centuries ago, had been condemned to dispersal and to almost certain destruction.

History tells us that out of some 15,000 to 16,000 people who had been deported in 1755, fathers, mothers and children of all ages banished from their homes, 6,000 to 7,000 only survived the innumerable hardships and miseries that were to be their lot. Through a miracle that cannot be ascribed to any earthly power, those few thousand exiles, that martyred people of the past, multiplied and rose again with such a determination to survive that they succeeded in overcoming the numerous obstacles which threatened their miraculous survival.

The descendants of that small people, banished and dispersed as a result of the "great disturbance", number today, after two centuries, more than 1¼ million. Almost 300,000 Acadian descendants now live in the maritime provinces. Another 300,000 are scattered over the Gaspe peninsula and other parts of the province of Quebec. We find 100,000 of them and even more in the New England states and more than half a million have settled in Louisiana. In my own constituency, I am happy to be able to salute some 50,000 people of French Acadian origin who will take part with me, this year, in the celebration of our second centenary.

At the very moment when I am addressing this house, an impressive delegation of 135 members from Quebec province and the maritimes are being officially entertained at Alexandria, Lafayette, Baton Rouge and, more precisely today, at New Orleans. Nearly half a million descendants of these unfortunate exiles of 1755 now live in these Louisiana cities and towns. Those who, through destitution, difficulties, demoralization, perhaps, were prevented from making their way back to the forsaken land of Acadia chose that corner of the North American continent, wherein they had been carried by wind and wave, to make for themselves a new country.

With faith in God and Providence, the Acadians have retained the customs and traditions of their ancestors, as well as that gentle tongue of which, even now, you may be able to notice some overtones. Our Acadian people live in complete understanding with Canadians of British and other origins. They are peaceful and brotherly people, proud of their revealing survival and of their long and arduous rise to a place in the sun. The Acadian has preserved his love for the evergreen forest and his attraction for the almost enchanting and hypnotic breath of the ocean which offers him also the sight of the sun rising and setting magnificently in its glorious waters. This love for the sea and for the forest perhaps explains the irresistible propensity of the Acadian to seek a place close to the ocean. These sons of the exiled have become fishermen unfearful of the offing and unmindful of the hardships of the climate and storms, and are admittedly unequalled when it comes to felling trees in virgin forests.

Years, generations, have passed. Acadia, which was deemed forever destroyed, carried on patiently her reconstruction in the background. By a seldom empty cradle, the Acadian mother continued, and still does, to hum the old French songs and keeps on teaching persistently faith in God and respect for the authority. The cradle of the Acadian family is perhaps the secret of this miraculous survival.

In the cultural and social fields, the awakening and the progress are perhaps more obvious still. In the maritimes, Acadia today has her colleges and her universities: Ste. Anne college, at Church Point, in Nova Scotia; St. Joseph University in Memramcook, with its extension in Moncton; Sacred Heart University in Bathurst and St. Louis College in Edmundston. Notre Dame d'Acadie College for girls and several convents provide our young generation with a solid education based on principles which safeguard our language and our faith.

Today Acadia has, in the religious sphere, its archbishop, its bishops and a goodly number of priests, brothers and nuns. In the political field we are proud that one of Acadia's sons became the premier of a province, while some others have represented us creditably in the federal cabinet. We have our own judges, our own lawyers, our own doctors and our own engineers; we have in every profession representatives of whom we can be proud. We have also, in Acadia, our own French radio station and our own mutual insurance association, the Assumption Society. In the industrial and commercial sphere, our own people have forged ahead and now hold the foremost place in many branches of that field.

In a few weeks, to commemorate the bicentenary, one of our colleagues in this house, the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), who is descended from that race which would not die, will honour us with a book bearing a most appropriate title: L'Acadie des Ancêtres. That book will throw more light on the genealogy of the early Acadian families. In simple and easy language, the author will strive to bring back to life, in these few pages, the names of the founders and pioneers of the Acadia of bygone days. We will see names like Arsenault, Boudreau, Boucher, Chiasson, Doucet, Dugas, LeBlanc, Landry, Léger, LeBouthillier, LeBreton, LeMenager, Melanson, Michaud, Poirier, Richard, Roy, Robichaud, Savoie, Veniot and many others whom it would take too long to mention.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saluting this definite revival of the Acadian people. May Acadia be ever prosperous and keep on progressing towards the achievement of her destinies on American soil.

Before resuming my seat, on behalf of my compatriots I tender an official invitation to the Canadian people at large to take part in the magnificent celebrations that will mark the second centenary next summer at Grand Pré, Moncton, Caraquet and many other centres of the maritimes and Quebec. We also hope that the Canadian government will take part, in a concrete manner, in the celebration of the second centenary of the deportation of 1755.

(Text):

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, this debate on the address is, of course, one of the two parliamentary milestones; the mountains, you might say, we climb as the session progresses. The other one is the debate on the budget during which theoretically every citizen through the mouth of his member of parliament can present his or her grievances.

But this occasion, I am afraid, is looked upon by many as something of a bore. They forget the fact that the history behind this address in reply to the speech from the throne goes back to the very foundation of our constitution. They also forget that men risked their freedom and indeed their lives to make sure the executive, which presents its demands in writing before parliament, is made to account for those demands, and that through this means members of parliament now have a right to present their own views before dealing with those of the executive.

It is true, I am prepared to admit, that this principle might sometimes be abused. We have perhaps seen examples of that abuse in this house on more than one occasion. On the other hand we also see examples, as we did last week, of how parliament can deal with important or emergency matters efficiently and within a few hours.

It is therefore much better that members of parliament be permitted to bring too many things before the house than that they be curtailed in any manner. We sometimes hear suggestions that discussion should be curtailed, but I for one would oppose any such curtailment with all the power I can command.

It is conventional on these occasions to congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think perhaps, as they do in the United States congress, it would be more efficient if we took that as read and passed on to something else. Nevertheless, having gone through that experience myself in a different place, and knowing something of the trial it is to a new member, I wish to join with those who have gone before in extending my congratulations to the two hon. gentlemen who performed a very difficult task in a most exceptional manner.

If I may be permitted a personal word, I would also like to welcome into this house another new member, namely the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Richardson). I would have preferred to see another member enter the house on the behalf of the Progressive Conservative party, but if there has to be another Liberal here I am very glad it is the hon. member I have mentioned because after all he is a Nova Scotian, a graduate of Acadia and of the Dalhousie law school. With that background I am quite sure he will overcome the handicap of belonging to the political party of which he is now a member and make a real contribution to the debates in this house.

I am also glad to welcome the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). Most of us do not know him very well. If you go into the office of your bank manager you wonder when he stares at you just what kind of glass eye he has, and whether you will succeed in arousing his sympathy. But the new Minister of Transport seems very human, and he sat for many years in another place similar to ours. He must have made requests to the government and had the feeling of being frustrated and denied. He will therefore have a good deal of sympathy for those who make requests from this side of the house, and I can assure him we will exercise our right to make such appeals.

Since he is now here—and I do not mean that he is not always in his place—I wish to bring to his attention one matter in the speech from the throne which bothers me a great deal. Before I do that, however, as I am going to indulge in a word or two of criticism, perhaps I had better for the time being maintain this atmosphere of kindliness and good will.

There is another matter to which I want to make reference and which is referred to in the speech from the throne, namely the damage done to Nova Scotia by "Hurricane Edna." In that connection I want to express my appreciation and that of the people whom I represent to this government for the sympathy and practical co-operation which they extended to the fruit growers of the Annapolis valley. It is a devastating and terrifying thing to see what happened in this valley, which survived the vicissitudes of the war and while not perhaps overcoming the exchange difficulties, nevertheless faced them and brought the orchards back again into production with the finest apple crop which has ever been produced down there; I do not mean the largest, but the finest.

With the prospect of the British market opening up, and with harvesting only a few days away, in a few short hours we saw 60, 70 or 80 per cent of the crop thrown to the ground, when everyone's credit was extended to the very limit in the effort to bring that industry back as it was being brought back.

That was the situation we faced. As I said before, I want to express my appreciation to the government and particularly to the minister from Nova Scotia and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), with whom I dealt on various occasions during that time and who always showed the greatest interest in this matter. I know the people greatly appreciate what was done.

I should also like to pay a tribute to the efficiency of the officials of the Department of Agriculture who went down to that valley and handled a situation which was, to say the least, rather novel. Karl Conger and others went down from here and within a few short days they evolved a system which was hammered out by trial and error, but it was more trial and less error than one would expect; it worked exceptionally well. As a result, instead of a disaster which could have completely wiped out the fruit industry of Nova Scotia, at least we were able to survive and the people there can look to the future at least with courage, if not with too much optimism.

In that connection I think I should say also that although we suffered severely, two or three weeks afterwards when we read of the disaster which occurred in Ontario and of the terrible loss of life in and around Toronto, we realized how fortunate we had been in that our loss was entirely material and not both material and physical, such as that which was suffered elsewhere.

As I have already said, there is one matter in the speech from the throne that I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). Dealing with the ferry service, the speech from the throne reads as follows:

> It is expected that, in the course of the coming season, the new ferry between North Sydney and Port aux Basques will be in operation and the ferry service between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor started.

Ordinarily one would pass by that paragraph without question. But having dealt with this matter for six years now and having followed the many statements with respect to this ferry during that period, I am wondering whether there is a play on words being made between "being in operation" and "started". This ferry, Mr. Speaker, has started and stopped more often than any other ship ever built, not excluding Noah's ark, and its history goes back almost as far. I went to the trouble of getting extracts from statements made by the minister—I am not going to weary the house by going into details; it was not the present minister, of course, but his predecessor and other ministers—dealing with the course of construction of this boat. The story of Alice in Wonderland has nothing whatsoever on this story. When the minister speaks I hope he will tell us what is the difference between being in operation and starting. We do not want this one to stop. We want it to start and not stop. It has been a matter of stopping and starting up until now.

Away back in 1949 the then minister read an official statement in which he said this boat would be completed in time for the 1951 tourist season. Let me just interject this remark with regard to tourists. I think perhaps too much emphasis is laid on the fact that this is supposed to be a ferry for the benefit of tourists and, therefore, of course, for the benefit of our economy. It is true that we are tremendously interested in the tourist industry. It is true that we hope this ferry will accommodate hundreds and thousands of tourists coming into the maritime provinces. But there is much more to it than that, Mr. Speaker.

In Nova Scotia, particularly perhaps in my own constituency in the Annapolis valley, we grow large quantities of small fruits, such as strawberries, cherries, peaches and fruits of that kind. We need access to the United States market. We need access to Boston and New York. With that ferry in operation and operating on a proper schedule, we shall be able to put refrigerated trucks or even ordinary commercial trucks out of the valley and into the Boston market within a few hours.

This matter is therefore of importance to more than the tourist industry. It is important to the farmers. It is important to the fishermen. They are all getting fed up with the delays which have characterized this service. As I said before, we were promised it in 1951. Incidentally, I may say that we were then told that its cost would be $3 million, of which Nova Scotia would pay $1,500,000. The province drove a fairly good bargain and agreed to pay not more than $1,500,000 or 50 per cent, whichever was the lesser. I notice the figure is now over $5,100,000. The cost is certainly much greater than anticipated. From the standpoint of economy, I hope the minister will get this boat going fairly soon. Otherwise the cost may run up to $9 or $10 million.

As I said before, the whole thing has been a comedy of errors. After he said it would be ready in 1951, and then in 1952, we were told it could not be built because of the shortage of steel. Yet two days after the minister made that announcement that it could not be built because of the shortage of steel he went into his own constituency—as, of course, he had a right to do; he was the member for that constituency—and announced that the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway was to be commenced at once. It did not get commenced at once, I must say; but it did not add to the good feeling in the province of Nova Scotia to be told that a boat which would take a few hundred tons of steel could not be proceeded with because we did not have the steel, but that we were going to proceed at once with the construction of another public work which would take infinitely larger quantities of steel.

Finally we arrived at the stage where they were going to let the contract, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the contractor had some suspicion with regard to the plans. The ship was to have a speed of 18½ knots, I think. After the naval architect for the department had prepared the plans, the contractor said he was not satisfied, and that he wanted a model. A model was made, and it was then found that the ship could not attain the speed which had been ordered, and also that it did not have the required stability. I understand that is a euphemism for saying that it could not go ahead and that, if it did go ahead, it would upset. Let us remember that this boat was to traverse some of the roughest water in the world. So again there was delay. The matter has been delayed and delayed until finally it is actually coming under the aegis of the present minister, although of course he is not responsible for it.

We heard there was to be a launching. All the preparations were made for it. The government bought a bottle of champagne. They wrapped it up in fancy tissue paper; I have no doubt about that. A very charming lady was chosen to break the bottle of champagne over the bow. A silk cord was bought by means of which to swing the bottle to be smashed against the bow. Then somebody started to think perhaps they had better look into the ship in order to find out what was in it. When they did so, what do you think they found? They found they had forgotten to order the worm gears for the engine. Therefore there was no use in launching it, because if they launched it they would not be able to get it out of port. They checked up and found that the order had not gone to Great Britain for the worm gears; and that worm gears were supposed to have been ordered over a year ago. Worm gears, incidentally, are not little bits of things. They are what transfer the power from the engine to the shaft. So the matter has been delayed again. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) looks at me incredulously but these, sir, are facts that can be established. The champagne will keep, of course.

Mr. Brooks: Not in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: The champagne is in Montreal, not Nova Scotia. I thought, without being uncharitable or unkind, is that not somewhat in keeping with Liberal promises and Liberal performance? They buy their champagne but they forget to buy the worm gears. I hate to disillusion so early a new minister coming into the house, but I want to assure him that if he has been reading the press clippings of his department or of his colleagues and has believed them he is in for sad disillusionment, so we might as well disillusion him right now.

Incidentally, we had an election in Nova Scotia in 1953, and part of the Liberal publicity at that time was a full-page advertisement showing this steamer cruising across the sheets of the Halifax Herald with a bone in her teeth. She must have been making 15 or 20 knots an hour. This was one of the performances of the government on the basis of which they asked for re-election.

When I look at the statement the minister made last year, which I did not read analytically until today, I find something that is rather mysterious. The contract was signed on December 31, 1953. What the contract was for I do not know, because the keel was laid on July 30, 1953 and the launching took place on November 8, 1953. It was launched about six months after the election, but still it was launched some considerable time before the contract was let. It is no wonder the contractor has had difficulties about the matter.

I think the minister will perhaps understand now why I am slightly concerned about what has happened. We down there in the east want some assurance about this matter, because I can tell the minister that the public are angry and frustrated with respect to it. To be fair in that connection, and I want to be fair, I should also add that so far as the construction of the Canso causeway is concerned, it has been proceeded with expeditiously and efficiently. I think a very good job was done which will be of service to the province and for which due congratulations should be given.

Since the minister is in the house, and because he has sat in opposition, and because I know he is a sympathetic man and will listen at least with patience to the pleas of the opposition, even if repeated, I can perhaps trespass on the good nature of the house to make one other plea which I have made before. I ask him to discuss with his departmental officials the inauguration of a coastguard service on the Atlantic coast. The other day the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) made this suggestion with respect to the great lakes. I have no doubt it was a sound and proper suggestion, but I can assure him it is even more justified in so far as the Atlantic coast is concerned. The minister's predecessor always listened sympathetically, shook his head and said it was not necessary and could not be done. He said the search and rescue squadron of the R.C.A.F. was now performing functions which obviated the necessity for a coastguard service.

I do not want to depreciate one little bit the services of the search and rescue squadron. It is based in my constituency, and I know what these men do; but aeroplanes cannot land on rough waters and high seas. The minister from the province knows full well, because he comes from a maritime constituency where men go down to the sea in ships, that every year boat after boat comes drifting ashore, boats that have been lost for days. The men are either dying or sometimes even dead, and the evidence is all too plain that they have died within the last few hours. If some kind of co-ordinated search could have been made their lives would have been saved.

I do not think it would amount to a tremendous expenditure. I do not know, of course, but there are many ships in the department. There are the fisheries inspection ships and so on. There is the search and rescue squadron. I think what is needed largely is co-ordination and direction. We are in the position down there that when we need help we have to appeal to the United States coastguard service. I must say that it, of course, is one of the most efficient coastguard services, I presume the most efficient in the world. It has rendered yeoman service, but one does not always want to be applying to the Americans for help, and it is very often difficult for them to render that help anyway. We are told that we have to go to the NATO pool for shipping and that we have to go to the United States for coastguard service. I doubt if that is fitting for a maritime nation such as our own. I hope the minister will take this request under consideration again, and see if something can be done to inaugurate a coastguard service. It is badly needed, will serve a most useful purpose and, as I said, I think without too much additional expense.

There is another minister who has changed places since we spoke last in the house. He has not sat in opposition, but I should like to renew to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) an appeal I have made on different occasions and which I am going to continue to make as long as the present situation exists. I am asking that the question of grants to universities be reviewed and reconsidered, and that the system be amended by the government. As far as the grants themselves are concerned, I believe we all commend the government for them. I think we recognize that today universities are playing a more and more important role in the life of the nation, and that to some extent at any rate they are a national responsibility.

Without universities our industrial and scientific production, even our civil service, would not be able to function. All one has to do is look at the advertisements appearing from day to day for men for the civil service to see the emphasis which is placed upon university graduation. Yet the universities are caught, as everyone else is, with higher costs. Because of high taxation and succession duties the beneficent gifts of the old days, the large, substantial donations, have unfortunately decreased and in many cases virtually disappeared, leaving the universities with reduced funds.

The problem is an increasingly difficult one. Universities today are financed more and more on the tuition fees charged students. The problem has increased alarmingly in the last few years. It is a problem, of course, which I am sure the government will have to look at in a far wider field within the next five to ten years, because we are just on the verge of a new problem with respect to universities. Everyone realizes that between 1960 and 1965 we are going to commence to get the influx of students who were born at the time of the wartime prosperity increased birth rate. The physical plant of every university will be taxed to the limit. The faculties will be taxed. Facilities will have to be increased tremendously, but in the meantime they have not had the financial backing to maintain their present operation, let alone the expansion with which they will be confronted. I know that presents a national problem of far greater financial significance than the one I am mentioning at the moment.

To come back to the present, what is the situation? I think most hon. members are conversant with it. The dominion government makes available to the provinces 50 cents per head of population. Then the province distributes the money among its approved colleges. That at least is an advance over getting no assistance whatsoever. But how does it work out?

In the province of Nova Scotia we have a relatively small population for which we get 50 cents a head, and that money is made available to the universities. We have several universities in the province. Some will say that we have too many, but their roots are in the ground, they are established, they have rendered service to this country and are going to continue to render that service. We have no state university whatsoever in the province of Nova Scotia. None of the universities of the province get provincial grants at all, as is the case in most of the other provinces of Canada.

We do have professional schools in Halifax, and at Dalhousie we have law, medicine, dentistry and pharmacy which attract students from all over the maritime provinces and beyond. I know that in my son's class, the third year in law at Dalhousie, there are ten students from Ontario this year. The Nova Scotia technical college attracts engineering students from Mount Allison and the University of New Brunswick as well as other places. They are all charged up against the per capita payment to Nova Scotia.

I am not going to deal with the situation in detail, Mr. Speaker, but I communicated with the Department of Finance today and in these figures I have given you illustrations of how the existing system operates. In Newfoundland the university gets $477 per student because that province has only one college, as I understand it, and the registration apparently is not too large. I believe they have 401 students. At 50 cents per head of population they get $191,500 or $477 per student in that college. Prince Edward Island gets $209 per student, and then these grants drop down. Those are the two highest. Ontario gets $144 per student, Alberta $158 per student, and then there are three, Mr. Speaker, below $125.

In Nova Scotia this year, according to the department, we are going to receive only $89 per student as compared with $477 in Newfoundland and $209 in Prince Edward Island. Manitoba will get $10 more, or $99 per student. British Columbia, which apparently has a tremendous student body of 5,616, will receive only $109 per student. You have, therefore, three provinces in Canada that will receive less than $125 per student.

I have made this suggestion before, Mr. Speaker, and I am urging it again. As I said, we have a new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) who knows something of the experience of smaller universities. I know there are others in the government who have experience with universities. I am urging again that the government maintain the present system if that is their desire, but on the basis of a guaranteed payment of $125 per student as a minimum, or 50 cents a head. In that case the grants will be increased for only three provinces, Nova Scotia, British Columbia and Manitoba. The total involved will be relatively small, but it will make a substantial difference to the universities in those provinces.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, it will make a tremendous difference to the universities in Nova Scotia, where we now feel we are carrying a burden for all of eastern Canada. As a result we get the smallest grant of any province in Canada.

I am wandering somewhat afield on these matters, and I want to shift to another matter about which I have been intrigued during the last little while as the result of reading a series of articles which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. There has been some discussion about this matter previously. I want to bring it before the house at this time, and I am not suggesting any solution. I do not know what the solutions are. I believe there is something here to which we should be paying attention. I refer to the problem of the British West Indies vis-à-vis the Dominion of Canada. At one time the British West Indies was one of our greatest markets. A man sitting within the sound of my voice at this moment said earlier in the day that ordinarily he shipped thousands of bushels of potatoes to the West Indies, but this year not a bushel is going down there. In 1947 our exports to the West Indies amounted to over $80 million. Then foreign exchange control was imposed by Britain and the dollars dried up. Their purchases have fallen off until they are now less than $40 million.

I suggest that is not a matter this government has anything to do with at all, but is a matter of foreign exchange control restrictions imposed by the British government. Last year I went to a board which is administered here by the Department of Trade and Commerce, for the sterling stabilization fund for the West Indies. I went on behalf of a constituent who wanted to ship 10,000 boxes of apples to the West Indies. Finally, after making many calls—that was not the fault of the officials—that board was able to provide enough dollars to enable us to ship 2,000 boxes down there. As I said, there was a market for 10,000 boxes.

I feel this example could be multiplied a dozen times. Perhaps I am interested in the problem because the West Indies market has always had a traditional significance for the maritimes. In the days of our old wooden ships we took our potatoes, lumber and fish to the West Indies and brought back fruit, molasses and spices.

An hon. Member: And rum.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, we also brought back rum; there is no question about that. It was a very profitable trade, and I am told it was good rum. Before my day that trade dried up, so I cannot tell you about that. This trade was perhaps the background of the economic development of the maritime provinces; but as I said, it has almost entirely disappeared today. If something could be done to revive these markets it would be of direct assistance to the maritimes and Canada as a whole would benefit. I think there is a real problem there, Mr. Speaker.

Those of us who have been to the West Indies are somewhat shocked and appalled by the conditions which exist there. There is more food and yet probably more people verging on starvation there than any place in the world. You have people who are discontented, unhappy, poverty-stricken, living in hovels and in many cases under intolerable conditions. We are worrying about communism, and properly so. We have tried to assist in the Far East and in the Near East. We have our Colombo plan to which I give full support, and which I think should be extended even farther. I am wondering if we have not a problem right on our own doorstep which perhaps requires something of a Colombo plan. Something must be done because after all, without becoming an alarmist, every day we hear rumours. We know that only a little while ago there was trouble in different parts of the Caribbean.

You have a field there which is ripe for communism or anything else if something is not done in the relatively near future. The situation demands attention. I feel we should be giving some attention to that, and not merely because of the spread of communism. Whether it is in the form of a commercial union, whether it is in the form of financial assistance of some kind such as a miniature West Indies Colombo plan, or whatever the solution may be, there is a problem which is crying for attention. We are going to be forced to give it attention in the not too distant future, from the standpoint of national defence or any other way you want to look at it.

It is true that tourists go down there and create wealth; they bring money into the country. However, this also creates antagonism, especially when you see people flippantly throwing coins into the water for which the boys dive, and when they come back that is their penny for the day. This does not help create the good will which we are prone to boast about. I suggest some attention must be paid to this problem in the not distant future.

One could go over the problems which have been stressed by other members here. I do not propose to do that. We had a speech the other day by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) emphasizing the problem of the coal industry. I could echo everything he said, and at a later date I intend to deal with that problem, but not at this time. Then there is the problem of agriculture. It is trite to say that agriculture is depressed. It is proper to say that. Of course there are many examples, individual ones, that point to the contrary.

I am not going to subscribe to all the theories that have been advanced for the solution of agricultural problems, but I think increased production and efficiency will go a long way to meeting them if we have markets available for our products. Take our own fruit industry. One man with a power pruner attached to a power sprayer will prune more acres of orchard in a day than a dozen could do in a week a few years ago. In a day one power sprayer will spray more efficiently a larger acreage of orchard than formerly would be sprayed by four or five men in a week. Today the small unit, as in so many other branches of agriculture, is rapidly passing, from the standpoint of being an efficient producer. But unless you have markets, Mr. Speaker, the situation is really serious.

Although this government could be commended for things it has done—it could be commended for the extension of the war veterans' allowance, for the disabled pensions and a few things like that—I wonder whether the speech from the throne does show the vision, the imagination and the courage which are necessary to deal with the problems facing Canada today.

They talk about blasting Ripple Rock. I am sure that is of great importance to the people of British Columbia. It brings much satisfaction to my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). But I think it is the first time I can recall that constitutionally such language has been put in the mouth of the representative of His Majesty or Her Majesty—that a rock was to be blasted. When I read the speech it appeared to me that somebody had started optimistically with the first paragraph and the last paragraph, and had hoped to put something very important in between; but then something happened and they could not, so they just filled it in with this and that. Whether I am right in that I do not know. But Ripple Rock is there; the constitutional rock which threatened confederation was not mentioned. Perhaps that was obviated this afternoon. We shall see when we have an opportunity of reading the papers in connection with it.

I suggest kindly it is indicative of the approach which is being made by this government to the problems of today. There is nothing there which indicates the government is going to face the crisis confronting agricultural production and other problems.

I was intrigued by the C.C.F. amendment. It said that the government had gone back to uncontrolled and unrestricted free enterprise. When was there ever unrestricted and uncontrolled free enterprise in this country, Mr. Speaker? This nation historically has always been a nation of compromises. We were a small nation with a thin population strung north of the 49th parallel. From the beginning we had to compromise. We built the Canadian Pacific Railway with government assistance; then having built a so-called private railway, we afterwards took over a public one and operated it in competition with the private railway. We have a privately owned radio industry and a national broadcasting system as well. In no country in the world has there been a greater degree of successful compromise evolved between private enterprise and the state. In that way we are evolving, perhaps slowly, certainly not colourfully, not dramatically, a distinct Canadian nation with a distinctly Canadian culture and background. It is certainly not one of unrestricted and uncontrolled free enterprise, I can assure you of that; but I do think that we are perhaps not facing up to other problems.

I am intrigued by my hon. friends on the left talking about raising the old age pension to $65 a month. One can have sympathy with a proposition such as that. One knows that it is made sincerely, but I wonder when in this country we are going to create an atmosphere in which there will not always be pie in the sky for someone. I was rather shocked a little while ago when I received a letter from a constituent who told me he had his gall bladder out, and he now wanted a gall bladder pension. I presume that other hon. members have had the same experience. I think the time has come when in this country we have to produce more, and realize that there is no pie in the sky for all.

I do believe that the speech from the throne does not face this situation at all. It was written in a sort of languorous attitude on a late summer afternoon with the shadows of the setting sun falling across the page of the speech that was being written. It was not written in the bright, crisp sunlight of the early morning, when inspiration and action would be demanded.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the subamendment. I do not want to indulge in any unnecessary verbosity and repeat the excellent arguments put forward by a number of speakers in this group in support of our criticisms and various proposals, but I wish to make a few comments this afternoon.

I must say I personally was very pleased indeed to learn that there are going to be improvements in the war veterans allowance, and I am sure we all await with great interest the introduction of the bill. The announcement of those improvements have been very cheering words to many veterans and their dependents. We are also glad to note that the government is giving notice of the re-establishment of the veterans affairs committee. Once again, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a plea that this committee be made a permanent committee of this house.

It could be a clearing house for veterans problems and administration problems generally, and it would offer advantages not only to the opposition but to the minister and the government.

I was also very pleased to see the amendment to the Blind Persons Act, to lower the age of eligibility and raise the income ceilings. I am sure that measure will be welcomed by all hon. members. I was also pleased to see the suggestion that there would be an amendment to the Railway Act to accelerate the elimination of level crossings. Many members have for years been advocating a more vigorous policy on the part of the government with respect to the removal of the dangerous railroad crossings in this country.

Then two other very interesting measures are amendments to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, and a measure to control works which will affect the normal flow of rivers across international boundaries. These measures are of great importance to Canadians as a whole. I am sure when they are under discussion they will create great national interest. They are of great importance to British Columbia, and of particular importance to the people whom I represent.

I intend to speak at some length when these bills are under discussion, but I wish now to make a few comments on certain remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), when he spoke in the debate on Wednesday, January 12. At page 114 of Hansard, when referring to these measures, the hon. member had this to say:

> Insofar as the plans of the government with regard to the Columbia river system are concerned, we approve of anything which means the use of Canadian resources by the Canadian people.

That is just what the government intends to provide for. The hon. member went on:

> But I am afraid the story is not quite that simple. I believe this proposal is also designed as a club with which to beat the government of the province of British Columbia.

Later, on the same page and in the same speech the hon. member said:

> There must be co-operation between the two governments. I believe that both sides are sincere.

It seems to me a strictly illogical position to take to suggest that the government is using this legislation to beat the government of British Columbia over the head, and at the same time impute motives to that government which the hon. member considers to be sincere on this question.

I just want to say a word or two along this line because there has been some suggestion in the country that the government is acting unfairly, and I mention this because I am particularly anxious to see this question discussed on its merits. I am not a supporter of the government of British Columbia, and I am not a supporter of the government of Canada. However, I think this matter is so important that we should not have the whole situation fogged with the misunderstanding that it is purely a partisan and political matter.

United States interests have been very interested in the building of this dam since 1947. It has been discussed in congressional committees and by the Columbia basin committee of the United States; and it has been discussed by a good number of senators. In 1948 the United States Columbia basin commission passed the following resolution, which I quote to prove a point or two:

> Resolved by the Columbia basin commission that it hereby requests the international joint commission to direct its international board of engineers to give priority to studies and report on the storage of water in Arrow lakes, British Columbia, so that the commission may decide the amount of storage it will approve there, and if such report be favourable, that the Bonneville power administration and the United States, and the proper governmental agency of British Columbia and Canada, then proceed to negotiate for an agreement.

My first point is that in their resolution the commission recognizes the chain of responsibility—the international joint commission, the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia. Then the resolution goes on to say:

> —and be it further resolved, that the commission urge the state legislature, the members of congress from Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana, the governors of said states, and the President of the United States, to join in the above request to the American members of the international joint commission and the premier of British Columbia and the Prime Minister of Canada to join in the above request to the Canadian members of the international joint commission in the hope that the threatened electrical catastrophe to the Pacific northwest during the next five years may be averted, and that, instead, both the United States and Canada may have increased development and prosperity and a stronger national defence.

I quote that resolution to indicate that the chain of responsibility on this question is recognized by governmental authorities in the United States.

I remember discussing this matter in 1949 with the late Mr. J. Webster, a member of the Liberal party and the member for the constituency of Rossland-Trail, who strongly urged the coalition government of British Columbia to conduct an investigation as a result of this request of the United States for the building of a low level dam on the Arrow lakes for storage purposes.

I am informed that the government of British Columbia did consider the matter, but after discussing it with other bodies and receiving technical advice and so on they decided not to proceed with it as they felt it was not in the best interests of British Columbia to proceed with the proposal. I mention this to indicate that the matter has been discussed before, and I am quite sure it is only fair to say that the attitude on the part of the government at this time in relation to this question is simply the continuation of an attitude that has existed throughout the years.

The attitude of the Canadian section of the international joint commission is indicated in a speech by General McNaughton to the Pacific northwest trade association, delivered at Spokane, Washington, on November 2, 1953, before these proposals ever came before the house. In connection with this suggested low level dam General McNaughton had this to say:

> As regards the storage on the Arrow lakes which was mentioned this morning, the project is very much in the mind of our engineering board, but it ranks less in possibility of over-all benefit from a basin point of view and very much less in possible benefit to Canada and in consequence we are giving priority to the Mica project.

This matter was also under discussion in the external affairs committee last session, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked General McNaughton the following question which I find in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the external affairs committee, No. 7, dated May 12, 1954 at page 175:

> Q. The actual construction could not be done until you people have approved?
> A. No, sir.

I just mention these facts because I for one am very interested in seeing that this whole question be discussed in a purely objective way, since the matters being decided concerning the Columbia river are of great importance to the people of British Columbia, and are of particular importance to the people I have the honour to represent. I would like to say further that many hon. members do not recognize the fact that if it had not been for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) turning down the request to divert Yukon waters to Skagway for the production of power for the production of aluminum, British Columbia would not now be having the opportunity to consider the Frobisher proposals.

I think under the circumstances it is not fair to suggest that the legislation proposed in the speech from the throne with regard to the control of waters flowing across the international boundary is designed as a club with which to beat the government of British Columbia.

Before leaving that argument I simply wish to say that as a result of the public interest in this question—and I intend to say quite a bit more on it at a later date—I hope there will be a meeting of minds, as General McNaughton put it on one occasion, between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia, and that we can get together to develop the great Columbia river to our common and mutual advantage.

Mr. MacDougall: Well said.

Mr. Herridge: It is not usual for me to get commendation from the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

I have said all I am going to say on this question. I do not intend to repeat the arguments used by the members of this group concerning the unemployment problem, but I do wish to deal briefly with a situation that is of serious concern to a number of my constituents.

I, like other hon. members of this group and some other hon. members of the house, regret very much that the government has not devised and proposed an over-all and long-term plan to meet the unemployment situation. In my opinion unnecessary unemployment is immoral, inhuman and definitely wasteful. I cannot see under our present conditions any necessity for Canadians who are willing to work to be unemployed if all levels of government accept their responsibility.

There again I do not like the idea of thrusting responsibility upon one government or another. On this, as on many other questions, I believe that the most satisfactory solution is going to come about as a result of co-operation among federal, provincial and municipal governments.

The fact that this is a serious problem is evidenced not only by the concern among members of this house but by the representations that have been made to this government by responsible organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, the Canadian Welfare Council, labour organizations, and many others. These are representations by people who live close to the problems. I believe that if you live in Ottawa too long you find yourself not very close to the people or to the problems of this country. Those who live close to the problem recognize the situation as it exists from day to day. These representations indicate a growing concern on the part of those people with respect to the situation, which we view very seriously.

I am concerned over the development of a long-term, over-all public investment program which I think under present conditions, when we consider what we are spending for defence, could be financed from taxes quite easily. If the situation developed further it could be financed on the national credit of this country. It has always seemed amazing to me that during a war we can meet any financial obligation that is required to defend our country and its interests, and rightly so, but in time of peace our financial hands seem to be palsied. We stand off and say we cannot do this or that. I am quite confident that if the federal government would give a lead in this matter and devise a long-term plan to meet this problem we could do something very effective toward removing any possibility of large-scale, serious unemployment in the future.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) in his place. My constituents are pleased indeed that the new federal building at Nelson is now under construction. I have seen the plans, and that building is going to be a credit to the city of Nelson and the federal government. I am very pleased that tenders have been called for the new federal building at Castlegar, and I hope construction will be started as soon as possible.

I also urge the minister to use every possible means to get construction under way on the proposed federal building at Trail. We have quite a number of carpenters, mechanics, and other tradesmen unemployed in that area. The architect is now working on the plans, and I understand that is what is holding up construction. I would therefore urge the minister to do all he can to secure an early start.

When it comes to unemployment I am one of those persons who like to get value for the dollar. I do not believe in handing out money when it is unnecessary. Looking around my own constituency I asked myself what I would suggest as part of a co-ordinated municipal, provincial, and federal employment scheme. I can speak with some experience in this regard because I have built a good many miles of highway and quite a number of small bridges, and I know something about construction of that type. Certain projects could be undertaken in my constituency during a period of unemployment, and discontinued when spring arrived. In that way these projects could be carried out piecemeal, year after year, to the great advantage of the district, and the unemployed.

In our district we have miles of rock bluffs and narrow dangerous roads, some of which we have used for nearly 50 years; and they continue in that condition without serious attempts being made to improve them. We have some bluffs two or three hundred feet high at Coffee creek, Kootenay lake, which would be expensive to remove. We also have the Genelle bluffs near Trail, and the Cape Horn bluffs on the Slocan lake. Rock work is the kind of work on which you can employ a large number of men throughout the winter months, for considerable hand labour is required regardless of the compressors and other machines.

In our district we have a considerable number of unemployed miners, loggers and sawmill workers, and they would provide an ideal labour force for this type of work. I would suggest that under a dominion-provincial scheme we could chip away at these bluffs over a period of years.

As far as administration is concerned, I have gone into the whole question with a friend of mine who is an engineer, and I understand it would be a simple operation and would not require the establishment of camps, for most of the men could live in adjacent villages. After a few years, if work was undertaken on these bluffs, we would be able to travel on safe roads; but I would again emphasize that such projects could only be undertaken within the concept of a dominion-provincial plan.

I have also discussed with officials the possibility of building retaining walls during winter months at the cities of Nelson and Trail. Such projects would also require a considerable amount of hand labour and thereby provide employment for quite a number of men during the winter months.

On the Columbia river there is also serious danger of flooding at various places some years, and work is also necessary on the banks to prevent erosion. This has particular regard to the city of Trail, and that is another project that could be carried on from year to year whenever the situation required, if it were included in an over-all dominion-provincial plan. All that is required, as I see it, is the will on the part of the governments concerned to get together, use our resources and plan in order to make certain that we do not have any unnecessary unemployment in this country.

I am glad to see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) in his place, for I wish to say a word or two on another matter. This government has urged private employers to employ older people wherever possible. I believe the Department of Labour has carried out extensive propaganda in that connection. But this government does not practise what it preaches. I could give several illustrations, but I shall not take up the time of the house and will therefore confine myself to one case in point. This case concerns a dual-war veteran who worked as a satisfactory and efficient field officer for the Department of Veterans Affairs for six years. He was retired and told that they would try to fit him into some other department as soon as possible. The man is able, physically fit, a pioneer in the district, and very competent. Last year he filled out an application for employment in the Nelson post office and passed both the oral and written examination satisfactorily. He is an excellent bookkeeper, has good handwriting, and considerable office experience.

Despite the fact that he came out on top of the list he was turned down by the department on account of his age. Here we have a case of a man turned down on grounds of age by a government which encourages the private employers of this country to employ older people as much as possible. In this connection I want to read a letter I received from Mr. Bland, chairman of the civil service commission. It reads:

Dear Mr. Herridge:

The Department of Labour has sent me a copy of your letter of the 3rd instant, addressed to the Minister of Labour, and of one sent to you at the same time by Mr. W. P. F. Green.

The commission and its officers give sympathetic consideration to the application of older veterans. Two questions, however, arise in this connection, the first being the determination of the veteran applicant who will give the best service to the department concerned in the vacant post, and the second being that of the willingness or unwillingness of departmental officers to accept for employment veterans whose term of employment will be relatively short.

That part of the sentence, " . . . the willingness or unwillingness of departmental officers to accept . . .", is most intriguing, Mr. Speaker, because it was written by officers of a government which urges private employers to employ older people as far as possible. The letter continues:

This is largely a matter of education and persuasion, rather than any hard and fast application of a regulation, and I can assure you that our officers are working closely with the Department of Labour in their efforts to provide useful employment for qualified veterans in the older age brackets.

I draw that to the minister's attention because I think it is a bit peculiar that the government, after having announced this policy, should not require its officials to carry it out when it comes to giving employment to older veterans.

Mr. Blackmore: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to conclude his remarks, or call it six o'clock?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Herridge: I will call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, when we took recess for dinner I was bringing to the attention of the house and of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) the fact that while this government has a policy of trying to persuade private employers to employ as many older people as possible, some departments were not giving effect to that policy. I read a letter which had been written to me by the chairman of the civil service commission in which he pointed out that the second reason for difficulty in applying the policy was the willingness or unwillingness of departmental officials to accept for employment veterans whose term of employment would be relatively short.

I want to protest most emphatically about the unwillingness of departmental officers to give effect to a policy that the government and the Department of Labour are urging private employers to accept. I hope there may be some remedy to this situation, and that we shall not have this buck-passing from the civil service commission to the officers of the various departments and back to the Minister of Labour. It is a serious situation because it means there are a good number of capable older people who could be satisfactorily employed, particularly in the lighter civil service positions, who are being denied that opportunity actually against the announced policy of this government.

I have just a couple of items still to deal with, Mr. Speaker. I am making to some extent what Mr. Michael Barkway would call one of my parochial speeches, which deal with local matters, but they are of serious concern to my constituents.

I understand that the government is giving consideration to the sale of certain veteran rental housing projects that have been established across Canada. One of these projects, namely the Sunningdale veterans housing project, is in my constituency. Of course, in giving consideration to the sale, they are giving consideration to the price. I have been informed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the contract price for the construction of these houses was $5,200 for a two-bedroom house and $5,800 for a three-bedroom house. I have made inquiries, and I find that the city of Trail has assessed the two-bedroom house at $1,900 and the three-bedroom house at $2,100. Those assessments are on the basis of 60 per cent of replacement value. Those assessments have been approved by the provincial equalization board of British Columbia as being in line with standard practice and values.

The government has had rent from those houses for some years. They have had certain maintenance and administrative costs. But in addition to that, the veteran purchasers of those homes spent, in the majority of cases, considerable sums in improving the grounds around the houses, making fills and doing landscaping, planting and so on. Some of them have made extensive repairs and improvements to these houses. I urge that the minister give consideration to all these facts, when the sale price is being considered.

I understand that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not operated for profit. I make a strong appeal that these houses be sold to these veterans in Canada at the net cost to the government at the time of the sale. I am sure such a policy would receive the support of the majority of the members of this house. The government would not be losing a cent. They would simply be selling houses to these veterans at the net cost at the time of sale.

I mention this matter because some of these veterans are somewhat disturbed at the prices they hear they might be expected to pay. For the life of me I cannot see why Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should expect to make a dollar out of projects such as these. I am sure the people of Canada would be well pleased if these men receive these houses at the cost to the government at the time of sale.

Before leaving this question of housing I want to say that I listened to the extremely interesting speech the other day by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). He usually makes an interesting and constructive speech. He dealt at some length with the housing situation. I was rather intrigued with the novel proposal he made—and I say "novel" because it is new as far as the government or the members of this house are concerned —urging the government to establish some form of equity insurance for the down payment on homes. As I understood his remarks at the time—and since then I have read them carefully—his proposal would not cost this country one cent. It might mean certain careful administrative arrangements and some little extra work for the department concerned, but I completely agree with his analysis of the situation, with his proposals and with the benefit that would accrue to the home purchaser without any cost to this country. I urge the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), who is in charge of the housing act, to give serious consideration to this constructive and, in my opinion, forward-looking proposal.

I have come to the conclusion of my dealing with subjects that have been concerned with water and land. I now come to the air. For years I have been urging better facilities to improve radio reception in the northern half of my constituency, particularly. For years thousands of my constituents have not had the opportunity to listen to a Canadian radio station properly, and that situation exists at the present time. If they want to listen to a radio station satisfactorily, because of the mountainous terrain and unusual circumstances and the difficulties that prevail with regard to radio transmission they have had to satisfy themselves with listening to San Francisco, Seattle or some Central American station. Last year two low-power relay transmitters were established in my constituency, one at Castlegar, and one at Kaslo. I want to say that the people of the areas served by those low-power relay transmitters are delighted with their installation. For the first time in their experience as residents of Kootenay West they have had the opportunity to listen to the C.B.C. from seven o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night, and they enjoy it greatly.

But their enjoyment has created a great deal of interest among those who are not now enjoying such radio reception. On December 20 last I addressed a meeting at which were present over 300 people from various points along the Arrow lakes, and they discussed this question. That meeting passed a resolution urging the government to take action to bring about the installation of low-power relay stations in Kootenay West sufficient to cover the balance of the district which is at present suffering from poor reception.

I urge the minister of the department concerned to give consideration to this appeal. While other people—and soon possibly the majority of the people in Canada—are enjoying television, I have thousands of residents in my constituency who have never had the opportunity, since radio was first instituted, to enjoy proper Canadian radio reception. I urge early action to correct this unnecessary and, in my opinion, most unfair situation.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity of again saying a word as the representative of one of the finest and most progressive ridings in Canada. That goes without question. Like other hon. members, I congratulate and welcome the new members. I have personally congratulated the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should very much like to welcome the seven new members of the page staff. They are vital to the life of this house, and they are great boys.

There are some things that we miss on this side of the house. For one thing, we miss the clock. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) tells me that there is therefore no limit on the speakers on this side of the house; but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not go my 40 minutes unless something happens that has not happened previously. I say with a good deal of feeling that, as I look across at his empty seat, I miss the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I know the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) is doing a good job but, as I say, I miss the Leader of the Opposition. On former occasions he would sit through my speech for 30 minutes without batting an eye. Who would not appreciate that courtesy? We hope that soon, in answer to the quiet petitions of members of this house, the Leader of the Opposition will be restored to health and strength.

Having read and reread the speech from the throne, may I say that in my opinion it is the best that has been made in my short term in the house. I believe I have listened to 19 or 20 speeches from the throne. The present one deals with the general life of Canada better than any speech from the throne I have read. It is not in general but in particular language. After dealing first with certain outstanding questions it deals at the close of the speech with 15 pieces of legislation that will be dealt with by the house. Nobody speaking the truth dares to say that the speech from the throne is distinguished for what it does not say. It is distinguished for what it does say, and I think I can prove that.

The first thing in the speech from the throne that I appreciated was the fact that a committee of the house is to be set up to deal with the rules and procedure of the house. I do not think any man needs to speak for 40 minutes, because there are so many opportunities for members who wish to speak on the various questions that come before us. In the second place, if there is some matter that is burning our insides we can put a question about it and get the information. I think 40 minutes is too long. We will have to prepare more thoroughly. I know that those who speak loud and long and very intelligently may oppose cutting down the time, but I think their better judgment will lead them to see that this is a step in the right direction. I am looking forward to the report of the committee with a great deal of interest.

The speech from the throne also indicates that the government is considering the needs of the blind. The age limit is to be cut to 18 years. However, when the matter comes before the house I am going to urge the house that the blind should get their pensions without a means test. Consider the man or woman who has to go through the world without sight. You cannot compensate them in any way. It is a terrible handicap.

The amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act is most welcome because we believe it will do a good deal to help those who are not working. It tells me that the government is alive to the needs of the day, which are to keep men working or if they are not working to give them enough to live on so they will have the necessities of life and a little more.

In sport, Mr. Speaker, some athletes are honoured because they break records. It may be scoring a certain number of goals, it may be that a goalkeeper has so many shut-outs. it may be that a man has hit so many home runs or stolen so many bases. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has made a record in the House of Commons when he can bring in a money bill preceded by a resolution and in two days have it passed through the house and the other place. The bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act was introduced by way of resolution at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, January 11. The resolution was passed and the bill was given first reading on that day. Second reading of the bill was moved at 3.10 p.m. on Thursday, January 13. The bill received second reading, went through committee and by 5.15 p.m. was passed by the house. Before the day ended it was not only passed by the House of Commons but had been passed by the other place. All this was done in two days. We congratulate the minister on this record. It will be pretty hard for any other minister to beat it.

According to the speech from the throne the government is also going to deal with the needs of the veterans. Veterans allowances are going to be improved. For six years now I have been advocating that veterans of the first and second world wars, but particularly the first world war, should receive a pension at 60 years of age without a means test. I know some veterans in Fort William who are about 60 years old, and I can tell hon. members that they could not compete with me in athletic contests because they lost so much during those years of war. One man had four Christmas dinners in the trenches.

These men risked their lives. They left everything that was near and dear. Some of them came back, and those who did not need no pension; they have heard their "well done". As long as I am here I am going to press for a pension at 60 without a means test for the veterans of these two wars.

We were also pleased to learn that the Colombo plan not only continues to be supported and kept going in the old way but is being strengthened by a grant of an additional million dollars. Some people believe this is not enough, but to me a million dollars is a lot of money. An additional million dollars will strengthen the Colombo plan.

We are also assured that pensions for the handicapped will be put into effect. This is what we expected. I know we fought for them for quite a while. I said in the house I would not support any other social legislation until pensions for the handicapped were granted. Now we can support other legislation along similar lines.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) congratulated the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) on the speech he made. I congratulate him too. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) knows the hon. member is right when he says that any man who invests $1,500 in a new house should not lose his investment because of adverse circumstances such as sickness or unemployment. I congratulate the hon. member for Spadina on his splendidly prepared speech and the clear and concise way in which he delivered it.

I know we too have a problem at Fort William in the form of unemployment. The local member of the legislature for Port Arthur, who is a Conservative but who speaks the truth because he is a sincere man and a real friend—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: All Conservatives are.

Mr. McIvor: —says that we have unemployment at the lakehead but we are going to handle it. That is my interpretation of his words. He says we have the greatest country on earth, and I will give you some reasons why his statement is true. I congratulate him on coming out in the open and making this statement. I should like to say, though, that if anybody can find a cure for seasonal unemployment at the lakehead he deserves the highest honour of this country.

Let us see what happens. When the lake freezes, boats cannot enter the harbour. The elevators close down and lay off their employees. The railways lay off employees. There are four dredges busy there in the summer, and they lay off about 40 employees apiece.

The only thing these workers can do is to go to the bush if they are able to do so. However, some men cannot go to the bush, because they are not fit in many ways and do not have the experience. So I say if anybody can find a cure for seasonal unemployment at the lakehead he will be a dandy.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) made a good speech. I like to hear him, because I believe he speaks sincerely. I do not say that no one else speaks sincerely, but I like to hear him. At the close of his speech he said that this government is very fond of admiring itself, or something like that. I would tell the hon. member that they have something to admire. We not only think that ourselves, but there are those outside of Canada who congratulate Canada on its government. I should like to say there are those to the south of us who think we are doing a very good job. This summer the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was presented with the Guggenheim medal by the American Society of Engineers because of his aid to aviation. This is one of the highest tributes that could be paid to a minister.

When I think of Canada, there is music in the name. When I think of Canada from east to west, with all its provincial governments, its cities and its federal government, I am sure we have the best governments on earth. The opposition may talk as they like, but in their own hearts they know that we have good government. It is honest. I dare any man to stand up in this house or out of it and point a finger at a cabinet minister for taking one personal dollar of graft. After 20 years in office, Mr. Speaker, I feel that is a fine record. Where is there a provincial government that can match that record? I do not believe any other dominion government has equalled it.

Mr. Hees: What provincial government has not?

Mr. McIvor: I am not listening to interruptions. We have a great country. When I think of Fort William I think of what our city council is doing. As I have mentioned before, we are training our youth to become clean, Christian citizens. The city council is doing one job and our Sunday schools, churches and Y.M.C.A. are doing another. We have 29 hockey and skating rinks side by side. They are supervised by a superintendent who likes boys. There is a house at each rink. When I think of that, I admire our city council and its progress. The taxes in that city are no higher than in any other city. They are not even as high as in Ottawa.

In the summertime we have our parks board manager, Mr. Art Widnall. He has high school pupils and others who supervise the children in the different parks during the summer, so the boys and girls are kept busy. One of the outstanding features is that we have so many hockey teams in these rinks it is difficult to get individuals to supervise them. I remember once asking a big fellow if he would come out and have a look at what we were doing. I announced there would be a practice for pee-wees, 12 years and under, on Thursday afternoon at 4.15. This was an open air rink, and it was 15 below with a wind blowing. This big fellow, Ted Grant, a city policeman, came along, but neither he nor anybody else was cold that afternoon. Today this big policeman is carrying on, and he will never have less than three teams to supervise. He supervises baseball during the summer, and the boys are not afraid of him. Of course, they will do what he says.

I heard the leader of the C.C.F. say that nothing had been done for the benefit of the workers from 1935 to 1938. I do not know what was done in Rosetown-Biggar, but I know what was done in Fort William and district. The then deputy minister of labour, and afterward the late Humphrey Mitchell, came out. The relief camps were closed and the men were put at emergency work for the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. That was a month after our election, and I appreciated that very much.

I should like to say a word about strikes. I have been hoping that the brains of labour, which I believe are just as good as any others, would co-operate with management in finding a cure for strikes. I know that industries in Canada are growing. When we suggest co-operation between labour and management and a share in the profits for the worker as a cure for strikes, we know that will not work in companies like the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. However, perhaps it could be worked out. I am convinced that if you could give the worker his present salary plus a share in the profits that would work splendidly. Of course there are those who suggest that if you could get the golden rule put into practice it would cure strikes, and I am convinced that it would.

Fort William has some needs. In order to cure our unemployment we think we should have a breakwater in front of No. 2 and No. 1. It is needed for the storage of logs and the protection of industries. We know that the dominion government pays $33,000 for offices in Fort William, but we would like to have a federal building. We strongly advocate that dredging should be begun as early as possible instead of at the beginning of July. We think dredging should be started early in the spring.

I was told by a friend that Canada's danger today is not communism and is not war. I said, "Well, what is it?" He said it is the breaking of the ten commandments. I have thought a good deal about it. I have heard hon. members in this house debate the question of divorce, but I have not yet heard anyone give us a cure for divorce. The cause of divorce is the breaking of the seventh commandment; therefore my friend was right in saying the danger to Canada was the breaking of the ten commandments. The number of divorces is increasing every year. Why? Because of selfishness and the breaking of the seventh commandment.

I was in British Columbia this fall. I know that a man who visits another province and expects to assess the life in that province in a week is expecting a great deal. I could not do it. When I went to Vancouver I did find that there was a big ruction because certain individuals were putting out sweepstake tickets with promises of big rewards. A certain newspaper and the police checked up and found that no one had ever received a prize.

The cry all across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific is, "Buy a sweepstake ticket and get something for nothing." What commandment does that break? The tenth commandment says "Thou shalt not covet." He is just trying to get something the other fellow has paid for. Therefore the danger to Canada today is in the breaking of the ten commandments.

What do we find today in respect to working conditions? In the past we struggled hard for one day in seven for the workingman. He got one day in seven; now he has two. Some think it should be cut down a little lower, but I do not. We have the eight-hour day and the five-day week, therefore there are eight hours for work, eight hours for play and eight hours for sleep, with a full day on Saturday. Yet you find those who want to steal Sunday from the Almighty and make it a day of commercial sport. That is unpopular, and it is an unpopular thing to advocate. It is as true as life that when you hold your commercial activities on the Sabbath day, you are breaking a moral law, "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

I am not going to push that any farther, but I should like to add that this friend of mine says, "You have departments for war; why not have a department for peace?" With respect to the breaking of the Sabbath day,

I would advise cabinet ministers whose officials put on displays on the Sabbath, that many young men and maidens are leading children to Sunday school on the Sabbath day. I would ask them to refrain from putting on any exhibitions on the Sabbath day because you, Mr. Speaker, in leading us in prayer will recall that one petition in it is, "Lead us not into temptation." A big display by any department of government on the Sabbath day does lead children and older people away. Therefore I would say to them, "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your patience. There is one thing troubling me at the present time. The constituents of Fort William have treated me beyond any expectation I ever had. In fact I had a group call on me the other day. They do not think as I do, but they told me that I represented everybody in the constituency. I said, "No, I do not" and I knew whom I was talking to. I do not represent those who treat God as a myth or represent anything that that represents. I do not represent them and I do not claim to represent them, but of course I might try to change their minds. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions it has been my privilege either to follow or precede the hon. member for Fort William, and I am happy to say that on many of these occasions we have been able to see eye to eye on a good many questions. Tonight, as I had the privilege of again listening to him, I could agree heartily with many of the things he said.

The hon. member for Fort William spent some time out in the area that I have the privilege of representing, the Brandon-Souris constituency, and he left his mark there so far as spiritual values are concerned. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member will pardon me if I cannot agree with him in all things he has said with respect to the government and government policies, and I crave his indulgence in that regard.

As is usual in the throne speech debate, hon. members supporting the government spend a great deal of time extolling the virtues of the present administration. However, during this debate I detect an almost forced attempt to support the policies of the government, as revealed by the speech from the throne. Indeed it is almost possible to conclude that "they protest too much".

The throne speech, as I analyse it, assumes a cautious tone for the first time during my short experience in the house. I remember the first throne speech it was my privilege to listen to back in 1951. It was almost as buoyant in its tone as the inflation it was attempting to deal with at that time. There is one conclusion we can reach thus far in the discussion, namely that Canada is passing through a period of transition at the present moment.

In his recent speech the president of the Bank of Montreal suggested that we were in a phase of economic development where it was impossible to conclude whether Canada was heading into a period of deflation or inflation. When I read that statement it occurred to me that it might account for the early retirement of the highly respected governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, who at a comparatively youthful age, in his early fifties, has decided to relinquish that important post. It may be that resting on the horns of this insoluble dilemma, trying to decide whether we are heading toward deflation or inflation, has necessitated this unfortunate early retirement, because nothing is more exhausting to the nervous as well as to the physical energy than to be faced with an insoluble dilemma of that kind.

I would like to say one other thing in a general way about the speech from the throne. I must say this much for it. At least it deals with the problems confronting Canada at the present time in the correct order of emphasis. It places international affairs first. It refers to the continuing threat of war in the atomic age, and it also has an optimistic reference to the continuing cold war. I am not going to deal further with that aspect of the throne speech at the moment; there will be an opportunity later this week. It also mentions the Colombo plan, and in passing I should like to express disappointment at the small increase that is to be forthcoming for that very important activity in the sphere of international affairs.

The next matter dealt with was internal welfare. I join with other hon. members in expressing pleasure at the adoption of the disability pension plan for Canada, a plan pioneered by the Ontario Conservative government. The same applies to the other welfare measures, the pension for the blind and the war veterans allowance. In passing I urge that attention be paid to the last section of the amendment of this group to the effect that a contributory health insurance program be implemented at the earliest possible moment. It is one of the great gaps in the system of social security in our dominion at the present time.

Those remarks made in passing deal in a general way with the speech from the throne to which we listened just over a week ago. As I have already indicated, we can all agree —and the opinion has been expressed from all sides of the house—that Canada is passing through a period of rather uncertain economic transition.

I have before me many economic reviews from government departments and commercial and banking institutions, all of which point in this same direction. In fact there are so many statistics available today to the ordinary private member of this house that it is very difficult to gather any rhyme or reason from them. Speakers and documents, I sometimes feel, spout statistics like a demented quarterback, and it becomes very difficult for the ordinary member to make an adequate appraisal of the situation. I have here, however, a good summation which I found in a Bank of Montreal Review of June 24, 1954:

> It is now clear that after climbing persistently and often rapidly since 1946 business activity reached a peak in the autumn of 1953 and entered upon a gentle downward slope, the contours of which are still being mapped.

I think that is a good summary of the economic situation facing us at the moment. As has already been indicated, supporters of the government would perhaps deny that appraisal and would tend to emphasize the rosier aspect of the picture. On the other hand supporters of the group to my left, the C.C.F., would see in this transition another case of heading for a major depression which has been an unfortunate peculiarity of our so-called capitalistic system, at least since the beginning of the industrial revolution.

Despite the fact that the government backbenchers try to present the rosier aspects, some of the measures presented by the government indicate at least a vague awareness of the problems. The fact that we suspended the debate on the speech from the throne in order to pass some amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act is indicative of this.

Considerable anxiety is also being expressed concerning the trade difficulties confronting Canada at the present time. Europe has recovered in a spectacular way during the past year. Whereas in previous years the economic summaries of the outstanding financial and economic journals have been pointing to the rapid upsurge in the Canadian economy, the picture now is different and we find the same journals pointing to the remarkable recovery of the European economy. Because of her dependence on export trade Canada is placed in a very embarrassing position as the result. This was highlighted to me as I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his rebuttal to the speech of the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) on Monday last. During the course of that speech the Prime Minister picked upon what he thought was an indirect reference to protectionism, or what is very often referred to in this house as a policy of Tory protectionism.

Reference has also been made from time to time to a famous speech made back in the thirties when Canada was in the throes of a world-wide depression. The prime minister of that day in trying to cope with the very disastrous trade situation confronting Canada as a result of the world-wide depression indicated that he was going to blast his way into the markets of the world. I have been very intrigued and interested by the fact that almost invariably when we get on to the theme of trade in this house, some hon. member on the other side refers to that particular quotation.

I would like to say that a legitimate and enthusiastic attempt to restore Canada's trade position, or if you prefer to use the phrase "blast our way into the markets of the world", is much more effective than the blasting process referred to in the speech from the throne—the blasting of Ripple Rock. As far as I am concerned it has no connection at all with the trade situation confronting us.

We are all disturbed and distressed, particularly those of us from the prairies, the continental west, at the obstacles which are confronting GATT at the present time. As I understand it, when GATT was formulated it was the hope that it would lead inevitably to an international trade association, just as during those halcyon days it was the hope that the United Nations would lead the world into a period of blissful peace and contentment, ad infinitum.

I understand that at the time GATT was being negotiated all sides of the house were very strongly and enthusiastically in support of the trade policies represented therein. Unfortunately, the best laid plans of mice and men "gang aft agley". In our attempts to establish a system of international security we are faced with similar difficulties in the realm of trade as in the realm of military defence. Economic nationalism is just as difficult to deal with as is military nationalism, and economic warfare is just as real as is the other type of warfare that constantly threatens the world at the present time.

When we consider that the country closest to us, the country toward which we have moved as a market for our exports, the United States, has been making threatening gestures in reference to certain of our agricultural products, I think it will be readily appreciated how much more difficult the problem is when we are dealing with countries that are not in the least friendly toward us.

I might go even further on this question of economic nationalism. We are at least able to negotiate with the U.S.S.R. in regard to international security, but we cannot even get into communication with them, it would seem, with reference to this economic warfare with which we are faced.

I think we can conclude that there is a vast difference between theory and practice as far as economic disarmament is concerned. It is just as difficult, or perhaps even more so, as is the achieving of military disarmament. The experience of this country has been such as to make that almost axiomatic.

So far as the west is concerned, this problem affects us very intimately indeed. It particularly affects the three prairie provinces, whose economy is still based on the wheat trade. Wheat is still the economic lodestar of the prairies. I believe that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier prophesied at the beginning of the century that the twentieth century would belong to Canada, he had in mind the rapid development of the wheat trade on the prairies. Wheat made possible the building of Canada's first transcontinental railway, and I sometimes think the construction of the C.P.R. was the last major effort on the part of this dominion government relative to the prairies. It was conceived early in the history of this country and carried out with a magnificent vision that has since been justified many times over, even though there were many pessimists at that time.

I think it is also necessary to emphasize that the present request for some relief on the Crowsnest pass rate should take into consideration the contribution the wheat industry has made to the development of the railway system throughout Canada. It was also the rapid development of our wheat economy that made possible the great waves of immigration in the early years of this century and opened up that part of Canada to popular settlement. Unfortunately that trend has not continued with the same degree of rapidity, for reasons I shall deal with before I conclude my remarks.

Important as the wheat trade undoubtedly is, it nevertheless leaves our prairie economy in a particularly vulnerable position because it means we are tied to a one-product economy. When disturbances inevitably occur in world economy and are reflected in our internal economy, it is the agricultural industry that is first to suffer. You cannot have a healthy economic situation while you have an immature economy, and the prairie economy will always remain immature while it is dependent on one product. The wheat trade, regardless of changing prices and changing economic circumstances, except under extreme conditions such as those produced by world wars is subjected to comparatively inflexible conditions. This point was brought out by Professor Alfred Marshall in his "Industry and Trade" published in 1919, when he said:

> An exceptional "principle" applies to staple grain; because a fall in prices cannot generally increase its consumption as human food; and when it becomes dear, people will still buy enough of it to keep alive so long as they have means of purchase; in modern phraseology the demand for it is exceptionally inelastic.

That increases the difficulty of our prairie economy, and we have been continually subjected to boom and bust cycles which in more recent years have led to demands for methods of marketing that will take some of the sting out of the fluctuating trade cycle.

In this regard I would like to add, Mr. Speaker, that the wheat board has been particularly effective in smoothing out extreme swings in the economic cycle. The only difficulty with the wheat board is that it has tended to become used as an instrument of political manipulation, and wheat policies have been adapted to the welfare of the party in power. This, I feel, occurred quite recently in connection with the by-election in the constituency of Selkirk. An important announcement concerning interim payments was made the Saturday before voting took place. Other examples of this kind could be given.

With the spectre of a wheat problem hovering over the world once more, drastic action has to be taken in order to preserve our agricultural industry. Admittedly we are much better off now than we were in the thirties when the wheat surplus of that period unfortunately coincided with the market crash of 1929, and the whole wheat economy collapsed completely not only on the prairies but throughout the world. However, I believe there need be no repetition of this disastrous episode, because our appreciation of this problem is much keener now than hitherto.

Some claim that the party to which I belong is not too concerned with the attitude of the government toward these economic problems. For my own part I believe that government inactivity is in some cases almost as bad as too much government interference, and I believe there has not been a keen enough appreciation of the situation confronting the agricultural west at the present time.

Many hon. members who have already spoken in this debate have submitted ideas the acceptance and implementation of which might further stabilize the situation. For example, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) mentioned five points the other day. He suggested a 95 per cent parity forward pricing system; and that, of course, springs from the fact that agriculture is facing an increasing price squeeze at the present time. We have a support price system now, and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested that it be used much more vigorously than it has been hitherto. I agree with him on that score. I believe, however, that if we fixed parity at a 95 per cent level we would be aggravating rather than solving the problem, because it would introduce further rigidity into our economic system. When the United States are moving away from a high level parity I believe it would be unfortunate if we tried to occupy a position they are now abandoning.

The hon. member suggested marketing boards, and this also is being adopted in agricultural circles as a method whereby the boom-bust cycle to which I referred, and its inherent fluctuations, can be stabilized. I would add, though, that marketing boards do not necessarily increase the price to the producer. They merely iron out some of the wilder fluctuations. In the final analysis it is demand that determines price. Relative to any increase in the number of marketing boards, it should be emphasized that the producers should themselves organize and obtain control of such boards. Nothing would be worse than to have marketing boards used as political instruments in the hands of any particular party in power.

The two-price system was mentioned, which involves dumping our agricultural products on the external market and maintaining the domestic price at a higher level. In that regard I think it almost inevitable that we would be faced with a tariff war such as that which occurred in the 1930's. If we started dumping our agricultural products into the European market, or into any other market for that matter, they would retaliate with tariffs as they did in the 1930's. We must remember constantly that we have that problem of economic warfare, and that we are not all one big happy family in the world as yet.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

I was reading in a review called "Crisis in Wheat, 1926-1954" some extremely interesting information concerning the tariff policy of certain European countries in the 1930's.

> France began early to put duties on wheat imports. But as the wheat crisis deepened this process was speeded up and intensified as shown by the rates of duty prevailing in the following years. The rates are expressed in francs per quintal of grain.

The rates were as follows: In 1921, 7 francs; in 1926, 18 francs; in 1929, 50 francs; and in 1936, 83 francs, equivalent to $1.50 a bushel. I was quite amazed too, to see the German reaction and the way they had pushed up the tariff. In 1930 the duty stood at 35 reichsmarks per quintal, which was about the equivalent of $3.84 a bushel. No wonder the prime minister of that time talked about blasting his way into the markets of the world, when he had to face tariff barriers of that kind. Even though we have moved along in our international thinking, I do not think we can expect the European market to acquiesce in a dumping policy on the part of the Canadian agriculture industry. Such a policy could only result in retaliatory tariffs.

The fifth point was the suggestion that we could investigate the price spread. This is a question that comes up repeatedly, and I have not time to harp on it at the moment. In the Virden Empire-Advance for February 10, 1954, I notice an article by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who has the responsibility for combines investigation. He had apparently been subjected to some inquiries concerning this spread, particularly in reference to meat prices, between the price received by the producer and the price paid by the consumer. He had a long article trying to explain why this situation occurs. Then he said:

> Let me say, as the minister responsible for the administration of the Combines Investigation Act, that all complaints of this nature regarding the suspected existence of any such combine are thoroughly investigated. So if you have any yourself or know of any friends who have complaints of this sort to make, do not hesitate to bring them to our attention.

I have accepted that invitation tonight, and I am agreeing with the hon. member for Dauphin that there might be an extremely fruitful field for investigation in this regard. I am sorry that time does not permit my further development of that question.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had some recommendations to make with regard to agriculture. He suggested that something be done about the cash situation among the farmers. The city of Brandon that I represent is most directly affected by the cash shortage because we are largely a city serving the surrounding agricultural area. I made a survey in recent months among the retail merchants, and they are not at all happy about the situation. Something must be done in order to place cash into the hands of the grain farmers. During these periods of economic transition, unfortunately the credit facilities extended to other business activities in Canada do not apply too directly to the agricultural economy.

In the first instance the farmer is rather suspicious of debt, mainly because of his unfortunate experience during the 1930's and during the earlier periods of the boom-and-bust cycle. Then I came up against a special problem of this kind during the past summer when we had flooding on the Assiniboine river. That flooding has occurred twice in succession now, and there were groups of farmers who had had a complete crop failure for two years in succession. It is bad enough to take one crop failure, but it creates an almost hopeless economic situation to take two. There is no solution to their immediate financial problem. As is well known, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act does not cover that situation. There they were, left to sink or to swim according to their own ability. That is a situation that could well bear investigation by the government.

I agree heartily with the hon. member for Prince Albert that we could be more aggressive in our marketing policy. We have tended to become a bit slothful and soft in recent years because of the overwhelming demand from the foreign market. We might well do a little bit of "blasting", if I might use that word in quotation marks, in order to ease the present situation. Of course I most heartily agree with the extension of customs facilities at port Churchill, because we on the prairies believe that port Churchill has a great future as a port providing access to the European market.

To sum all this up, Mr. Speaker, agriculture is operating within a highly complex industrial society in which free enterprise is drastically modified by tariffs, fiscal policy, monopolies and so forth, largely because we are confronted with an unpredictable, uncontrolled external situation. I believe that there are some measures this government can take without resorting to tariffs—that nasty word —controls and so forth, which only tend to increase economic rigidity.

In the time remaining to me, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that what we should do is take into consideration the nature of Canada's present boom. We have been enjoying a boom since 1946 up until recent months. As I have already emphasized and now re-emphasize, this boom is a boom without a bust. As to business cycles, the bugbear of our capitalistic system, it is felt by economic authorities that we have at last beaten this bugaboo, this bugbear, and that we are now in a position to handle or iron out the harsher aspects of the boom-bust cycle.

The present boom in Canada's economy, as I see it, has two prongs; first, that in the primary resources industry and second, that in manufacturing. This primary resources boom is something new to our Canadian economy; and it is this primary resources boom that is giving the little shot in the arm that we have in the west at the present time and also in the northern regions. In many aspects, as a result of the boom in primary resources the north is becoming what the west was to Canada some 80 years ago.

The discovery of these resources is not necessarily new. We have known of their existence for some time. It has only become possible during recent years, particularly during and since the war, for Canada to exploit these resources because of the efforts of geologists and bush pilots. This being so, I was amazed last year when the government refused to grant a charter to Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which had requested the privilege of providing a cheap freight service in the northern part of Canada. I have before me a newspaper clipping which impresses me as being somewhat of an obituary in this regard. The heading of the article is "Canadian Pacific Air Lines Sells Two Giant Planes". It sold two DC-6A planes that it had purchased in anticipation that a forward-looking government would welcome an increase in freight transportation facilities in the rapidly developing northland. It is hard for me to understand the negative policy of the government in this regard.

I have had some personal contact with the boom in resources, because right in the middle of my constituency is Virden, which has become the oil centre of Manitoba. Just out of curiosity I took a recent edition of the Virden Empire-Advance and clipped four different articles dealing with the oil boom in that part of the province. The first article is headed, "Manitoba on the March". The next article is headed, "Twenty-six New Oil Wells Spur November Production". The next one is "Manitoba Steps Into Ranks of Major Areas of Canadian Oil Development." Indeed, we have moved forward so rapidly that Manitoba hopes to be self-sufficient in oil in a very short time.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) is aware of the fact that Virden is a boom town, because I think he has been besieged recently by protests concerning the inadequacy of the post office facilities in that community. The town has grown so quickly and subscribers have increased so rapidly that the post office service has become somewhat outmoded. I believe the Postmaster General is wrestling with that difficulty at the moment; at least I trust that he is.

This is all well and good as far as primary resources are concerned, but it is in the area of manufacturing that the west is weakest. We lack secondary industry. The great boom in manufacturing has all been concentrated around Montreal and Toronto. In other words the geographic pattern of industrial and manufacturing activity still remains much the same as it has been during the whole long stretch of the first half of the twentieth century. The shift to the west so far as economic change is concerned is merely a movement of ideas and money rather than manufacturing production. The brains and capital required in the search for primary products are largely being found in the eastern part of the country. I must add that the men with those brains came from the west to be trained in the universities of the east, and are now finding their way back to the prairies again. One of our chief exports from the prairies has always been men of outstanding ability.

In addition to that concentration in eastern Canada, there is the same concentration in the United States. In fact it may be said that to a great extent Canada's boom is based on and spearheaded by the relative United States boom. We have played into their hands with reference to trade. As has been pointed out by many speakers, United States capital invested in Canada now amounts to $7,235 million, $3 billion of which represents investments in companies actually controlled in the United States. As a result there has been a relative dropping off in our exports to Britain.

I think it should be noted, too, that United States capital has largely developed the Lynn Lake area in Manitoba, the oil industry, and Kitimat in British Columbia. I do not decry that fact. It is necessary at the present stage of development. I am merely pointing out that it does not help solve the problem of the prairies. That problem can only be solved if together with the boom in resources expansion and development we have an equivalent development in the secondary or manufacturing industries. If that does not happen our second state is going to be worse than the first, because if we have a sudden vacuum created in the western region after the initial exploration is over, a vacuum that has not been filled by secondary industrial activity, we are going to be badly off indeed.

I sometimes feel, Mr. Speaker, that the national policy that was so successfully pushed forward by the first administration of this country stopped short at the head of the lakes, and nothing has been done to develop a mature economy on the prairies. Because of all this and much more that I could say if time permitted, I subscribe heartily to the amendment moved by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), particularly paragraph (e) thereof, which reads as follows:

> to facilitate and encourage the processing of our natural resources in Canada, and thereby increase opportunities and employment for Canadians.

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, words fail to adequately express my dissatisfaction with the government for failing to deal with a very important aspect of the Canadian economy in the speech from the throne. I noted that the speech mentioned the great disasters that had befallen Nova Scotia and Ontario, and I was pleased to note that certain measures were outlined offering some relief to those stricken areas. But, Mr. Speaker, no mention was made of the disaster that struck western Canada this year. Rust in western Canada wrought a havoc that was worse in many respects than the drought of 1937. Some areas had a lower yield than in the worst years of the drought period.

The speech from the throne also says that the relatively poor wheat crop is being reflected by a small decline in the total national income. The only concern the Liberal government of today has with the west is that the west was inconsiderate enough to have a bad crop which will be reflected in a decline in the total national income. No mention was made of offering some measure of relief by amending the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to bring it in line with the present cost of production. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act the maximum amount a farmer may receive is $500 if he lives in a township in which the average yield of wheat is not more than four bushels per acre. This legislation was passed many years ago when the cost of farm production was but a fraction of what it is today. It seems to me that the farmers are justified in demanding revision of the act to bring it up to date.

Tied in with that, Mr. Speaker, there is the almost forgotten paragraph in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which states that if the average yield is between 8 and 12 bushels of wheat per acre, and if the average price of wheat should fall below a certain level, compensation will be paid. This is in paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 3. The only trouble is that it specifies that if the price of wheat should fall below 80 cents per bushel, then payment will be made. There again, Mr. Speaker, this price was set in 1939. When we consider the devaluation of our dollar, in effect the farmer who is producing feed wheat is receiving in the neighbourhood of 40 cents a bushel.

Yes, the Liberal government today is trying to get itself off the hook by saying it is the poor crop in western Canada that is creating these conditions. No, Mr. Speaker, it is the same factor that has created these conditions and that has brought about a marked increase in unemployment; it is not the poor crop but just plain, ordinary poor government.

The cash farm income for the first nine months of this year is less than half that of the previous year. There is a drop of $217 million, and the net income in Canada continues the decline it started three years ago. I feel we should give some consideration, not to whether this poor crop affects the national income but how this poor crop affects the livelihood of the farmers. It is not the poor crop that has given us these conditions in western Canada, because I do not know of a single farmer who has been unable to fill his quota. With only a poor crop he would not have had the grain to fill his quota, so there must be other factors to consider. The fact is that in the first five months of the crop year wheat deliveries from the farms in the prairie provinces were the lowest in the entire history of the present Canadian wheat board.

The estimates for the first five months of this year show that farmers have delivered 107 million bushels. The ten-year average is 211 million bushels, or 104 million bushels greater. Last year we thought things were bad enough when deliveries in this period were 228 million bushels. At the start of this year nearly three-quarters of the marketing points in western Canada were on a two-bushel quota. This meant that in this crop year the farmers were unable to deliver more than two bushels per specified acre.

The serious aspect of this, Mr. Speaker, was that in many of these marketing points the quota was not granted until the early part or middle of December. This meant that the farmer operated from the end of the last crop year up to the middle of December without receiving one cent in cash from that crop.

In western Canada there were two consequences of the rust. First of all it lowered the yield, and secondly it raised havoc with the grades. It meant that the farmer who had low grade or feed wheat, for example, got 87·5 cents per bushel and was only able to market two bushels per acre. This will give you some idea of the money he has had to work with over the past few months.

In view of the conditions that existed, it certainly should not have taken a political event such as the Selkirk by-election to bring about the announcement of an interim payment of 10 cents a bushel. This announcement was made in October, and all cheques were to be in the mail by December 21. By December 21 the farmers had been able, in many instances, to deliver some grain. The interim payment should have been made when farmers really needed it, in September and early October. Further, there should be an immediate announcement of another interim payment of 10 cents a bushel, with the final payment on last year's crop being made in the spring.

While I am discussing an agricultural problem such as grain, I do not think I can completely cover it without some mention of this matter of box car allocation. Last year the agriculture and colonization committee thoroughly discussed the problem. It was proved to the satisfaction of many members of that committee that the farmers and farm organizations were 100 per cent behind some equitable system. We even received assurance from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that something was going to be done about it. When I returned this session, I was delighted to see on the order paper a resolution to amend the Canada Grain Act. I thought that finally the government was going to introduce some measure for the distribution of box cars that would enable the farmers to deliver their grain to the elevator for which they had a preference. I was pleased to think that the minister was carrying out the commitment he had made, and that something was going to be done about it.

Well, perhaps this is done as well as the Liberal government can do anything. Instead of amending the Canada Grain Act to provide for this system of box car allocation, what did they do? They provided for the appointment of four instead of three commissioners and raised the salary of the chief commissioner from $14,000 to $15,000 and that of the other two members from $12,000 to $13,500. Certainly that is a fine way to help this box car allocation.

I believe a lot of the blame in connection with this matter should rest with the government representatives from Saskatchewan. As a member of the agriculture and colonization committee I was greatly disappointed to find that, although they represented western Canada, they were fighting vigorously against the interests of western Canada. I do not see how they could go back to meet the wheat pool organizations, attend the wheat pool annual meetings and farmers' meetings, knowing they had failed to fight for some amendment to the Canada Grain Act to make provision for this important matter.

Time is running out. The period of congestion is still with us. We have nearly 900 million bushels of wheat in storage, but we have had a very light crop in western Canada, estimated at 300 million bushels. This may mean that the problem of box car allocation may not be as important in the future as it has been in the past.

This government has failed to grant this concession to the farmers of western Canada. Perhaps it was not the failure of the government. Perhaps it is the only thing we can expect of a government that is dedicated to following the principles of capitalism and profit, to accede to the wishes of the large privately-owned grain companies.

This has dealt a blow to the co-operative grain handling movement that will be felt for many years to come. Just before I leave this subject of box car allocation, some claim that we should lay some blame on the shoulders of the top officials of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. I have heard some pool members say that these officials have not pursued this matter, which is of the utmost importance to the average member of the pool organization, with the same determination and vigour with which they fought some of the battles in the past. There may be hidden reasons for this action; there may be some reasons I may not be aware of, but it does seem to me that they are not putting up the battle on behalf of the membership of these great farm organizations that they did in past years.

Before leaving the matter of the Canada Grain Act I should like to point out that the government promised to bring this matter before the standing committee on agriculture and colonization for review. This promise was made two years ago, and I should like to see the government fulfil one of its promises. Perhaps it, too, is like the national health insurance promise and the act will not be reviewed in my lifetime.

In his address the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) dealt with another problem of the agricultural economy of Canada, namely the lack of consideration by the government in offering some measure of stabilization for farmers. No section of our economy is more subject to ups and downs than those involved in agriculture. A man who raises cattle may spend a lot of money to get his herd built up and then find, when he gets into a position to recover something from his many years of work, that the bottom has dropped out of the market.

The same thing is true of the poultry and hog producers. I am always amazed when I hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) tell us that we have a floor price of 38 cents a dozen under eggs, implying that the farmers of Canada get 38 cents a dozen for their eggs. The floor price operates at the packer level, and the packing companies can pay just about any price they like to the farmers for their eggs, not only just the farmers of Saskatchewan but all the farmers of Canada.

So the sooner we can consolidate these problems and smooth out some of the difficulties that are facing this important segment of our economy, the sooner we can expect those other segments of the economy that are so dependent on agriculture to become completely healthy. When the farm economy suffers a decline, it is only a matter of a few years until the rest of the economy suffers a decline. We can see that by looking at past statistics. It is desirable, Mr. Speaker, before it is too late, that this government throw off some of its lethargy and start to give serious consideration to a pricing policy for agriculture—and I am speaking of all agriculture. I am speaking of the milk producers of Ontario and Quebec, the fruit growers of the east and the west, all segments of our agricultural economy, so that farmers' incomes can be levelled off and we shall get away from these ups and downs that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) was just discussing.

As long as we are operating under the system of so-called free enterprise which the Liberal government and the Tories and the socreds claim to be following, it is inevitable that we shall have these booms and busts. It is one of the characteristics of the so-called capitalistic system, where the individuals look after themselves and show no concern for others in the economy. It is only when we can incorporate some Christian principles into our economic socialism that we can give a degree of relief to all of the people of Canada. Only when we forget about this profit motive, which has been leading us down the garden path, and resort to a little bit of common-sense planning, the same sense we use in our households and our own businesses; only by following some of these examples shall we level out these horrible ups and downs in our economy. Then in time we shall make this country of ours the best place on earth to live in, a place where we can be proud to look forward to the future and a peaceful heritage, where we shall be granted some return for the efforts we put forth.

Mr. J. H. Proudfoot (Pontiac-Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to reply to a speech made on January 12 by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). Like the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, it is not my intention to throw out any bouquets. When speaking in the house on Wednesday last, the hon. member said he wanted to offer some friendly advice to the government. He then said that his advice was designed deliberately to help the people of Canada get rid of a government that had been the most reactionary since 1935.

After reading the speech one wonders what are the qualifications of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam for him to give such advice to the people of Canada. While I must not make a personal attack on the hon. member, I am entitled to judge his fitness to give advice by the contents of his speech. I am quite sure that if the people of Canada read his speech they will never take his advice. Indeed, they will note what little information he has about Canada and how little understanding he has of his fellow human beings. He undertook to explain all about the conditions of the people of each province. The hon. member may believe that he is omniscient. I should, however, like to point out to him that arrogance of the mind is no substitute for knowledge, nor is it a substitute for an understanding of his fellow Canadians or of the problems that concern them.

I am one of those persons who believe that no one was given all the knowledge in the world, and I do not believe that I know it all. However, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam launched an attack on the province of Quebec.

Mr. Nicholson: No, he did not.

Mr. Proudfoot: An attack that was slanderous of the people of my province, and unfair to them.

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member indicate what he is reading from at the moment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: Straight from the heart.

Mr. Proudfoot: He said he spent a fair amount of time in the province of Quebec. I wonder on what day it was that he spent the fair amount of time in the province of Quebec. He referred to that great province as a sore spot in the matter of Canadian unity. Might I point out that much could be learned about unity in the rest of Canada by looking at Quebec and what is done there. It has been my privilege to represent the constituency of Pontiac-Timiskaming in this house since 1949. I am proud of that constituency; I am also proud of the province in which I was born. I am proud of that constituency where my father was born, the same constituency where my grandfather was born and where my great-grandfather lived for 40 years.

I want to point out that the minorities have been fairly treated in the province of Quebec. Most certainly that is so when compared with the treatment of minorities in some other provinces of Canada. I would say that in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, 75 per cent of the people are of a different religious faith from myself, and at least 65 per cent of the people in that constituency are of French-Canadian origin. In the last two general elections, the voters of my constituency were willing to and did support me, and I believe those who opposed me did so not because I was of a racial religious minority group but rather because I happened to be of a different political faith.

At this time I would ask, could a man or woman of French-Canadian origin and Roman Catholic faith be elected in the riding of Burnaby-Coquitlam where, unfortunately, the majority of electors appear to be supporters of the socialist party? Will the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, who prates so much about national unity and talks in such a disparaging manner of the province of Quebec, indicate to me where in British Columbia, or indeed in any of the provinces outside of Quebec, racial majorities give evidence of similar generosity?

Then he goes on with his attack on Quebec because we do not see fit to have divorce courts in our province. I might add that neither has the province of Newfoundland. The subject of divorce courts in our province is a difficult and a delicate one, but surely the situation is not helped by a socialist proposition that it is proper to ram down the throats of the people of Quebec the suggestion that they must establish divorce courts whether they want them or not. Surely national unity involves the right of a substantial minority to oppose a measure that is offensive to them. Surely having a strong emphasis on family life and an abhorrence of divorce is not something to be condemned.

The hon. member refers to Quebec as a sore spot in Canadian unity because of some difficulty in a tax situation, but when you analyse his remarks his real criticism of the people of Quebec and of this government seems to be because of the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) accepted a request of the premier of Quebec to meet in Montreal to discuss this difficult problem of taxation rights as between the province of Quebec and the federal government. Surely the socialist party did not think the Prime Minister of Canada should miss an opportunity of settling this important taxation difficulty merely because of false pride or some mistaken consideration of dignity. Did not Churchill come to Ottawa? Did not Truman come to Ottawa? Did not our Prime Minister visit many countries on the greatest good-will tour ever made by a Canadian prime minister?

The men and women of Canada will applaud the Prime Minister for being a big enough man to seize the opportunity of dealing with a difficult problem. His action in going to Montreal was the action of a statesman. It is what all Canadians would have their prime minister do in the circumstances. It does not warrant the socialist member's reference to the province of Quebec as a sore spot in the matter of Canadian unity. That the hon. member does hold it against the province of Quebec is indicated in the following statement of his, which I quote:

> In the city of Montreal the communist party polled about as many votes as the C.C.F.

All this indicates is that the people of Quebec reject the soul-destroying doctrines of socialism, and that they have no confidence in either branch of the socialist party.

The hon. member goes on to say that the people of Quebec are suffering, and that they are not enjoying the facilities in the field of education which they would like to enjoy. Does the hon. member not know that the minority group in Quebec have been granted and allowed to freely exercise all the rights and privileges which they require or desire in order to bring up their children in the beliefs of their parents? I venture to assert that Quebec is the only province where the rights of minorities are so fully protected in the field of education.

Why does not the hon. member take time off to compare the rights of minority groups in his province of British Columbia with those in Quebec. At this time I have in mind a place called Maillardville, British Columbia, and if I am not wrong I think possibly Maillardville is in the constituency of Burnaby-Coquitlam. I would ask him to examine the school laws of his province before he launches an attack on my province, and before he presumes to give advice to the people of Canada.

The hon. member says that his socialist party is the only party which has arisen out of the needs of the people of Canada; but an examination of his speech indicates that his socialist party is rather seeking to arise out of the stirring up of prejudice and hatred in this country. Let me assure the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and let me assure the people of Canada, that political tactics of the kind exemplified in his speech will not work in Quebec. I assure you the people of the province of Quebec know better.

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased as the representative of Kingston riding to take part in this debate, and I shall try to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers) and be brief and to the point. I should like to congratulate the government upon the fine legislation they have indicated in the speech from the throne which is now before us, which is indicative of the good government they have given this country for years.

I have on previous occasions expounded the good points of Kingston, and I think it might be summed up by saying that Kingston is a city of stability. But I think I should use the facilities of this forum to explain that of late years, due to the economic expansion of our nation, Kingston has had a face lifting. For many years Kingston was known as a lovely, quiet, old city, where education and military life set the pattern, but gradually industry recognized the merits of locating in the vicinity of Kingston. Fortunately the judgment of industry and the planning of the municipal councils resulted in harmony between the old Kingston and the new Kingston.

As of 1954 something more happened to Kingston as a result of the St. Lawrence seaway, the effects of which can be judged only by Kingston's rapid progress in recent years without the seaway. The advantages of ocean-going shipping and the availability of electric power should have far-reaching effects upon that area.

The constituency of Kingston comprises the city of Kingston, the townships of Kingston, Pittsburgh and Storrington, and Wolfe and Howe islands. This area also includes the most southwesterly area of eastern Ontario, which is shaped like a rough triangle. It is bounded by the St. Lawrence and Ottawa rivers and lies midway between the great Ontario and Quebec markets.

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not congratulate the eastern Ontario development association and its administrative officers upon the job they are doing for the area. Their efforts should be well rewarded. Locally the Kingston chamber of commerce are to be congratulated upon their determined efforts to bring more industrial development to the Kingston area. I think I can best express to this house why the efforts of the above two associations deserve praise by reading into the record an editorial which appeared in the Kingston Whig-Standard of January 14, 1955. This was entitled "Eastern Ontario—another Heartland" and reads:

The eastern Ontario development association has opened a campaign to inform the industrial world about the advantages and opportunities eastern Ontario offers to industries in virtually all categories. The association's objective, of course, is to attract industries to this district in growing numbers, and there are good reasons for the belief that the objective will be reached. A brief and not necessarily comprehensive survey of the situation in this large segment of Ontario leads to the conclusion that it is headed for an era of unprecedented development and prosperity. In the past, circumstances have forced eastern Ontario to mark time while western Ontario was the scene of intensive industrial development. Indications at present are that eastern Ontario will outstrip in development any area in Canada comparable in size within the next few decades.

The location of eastern Ontario in relation to the great Canadian and United States markets offers an advantage to industries locating here. It is a "heartland" at the centre of the rich markets of central and western Ontario, western Quebec, New York state and several of the New England states, which form a semicircle around eastern Ontario, affording potential outlets for industries. There is the further factor that an abundant supply of industrial sites are available.

Location and supply of sites alone are not enough to make an area preeminently desirable to industry. Industry must have power, and power has been one of the assets eastern Ontario has lacked in past years. Today, however, eastern Ontario is sure of a very large supply of hydroelectric power from the St. Lawrence river—sufficient to supply a huge industrial development in the area. In addition, Canada's atomic plant is located in eastern Ontario, and while no one is able to say with certainty when atomic power will be available for industrial use, the location of the Chalk River plant should prove an advantage to eastern Ontario when that day comes.

Eastern Ontario is also well served by transportation facilities. There is a basic network of highways which would support a large industrial development, and which could be easily expanded. It is served by three main railway lines and a number of branch lines. And it has access along its southern boundary to the greatest inland waterway in the world, which will have enlarged facilities when the St. Lawrence seaway project is completed.

All these things, and some others, eastern Ontario can and will offer in the very near future. Now is the logical time to tell industries throughout the world about these advantages, and the eastern Ontario development association acted wisely and with a fine sense of timing in opening its campaign. And now is the logical time for industrialists to begin thinking seriously of the desirability of locating in an area that is on the brink of one of the greatest economic developments that has occurred in this country.

That is from an editorial in the Kingston Whig-Standard. This paper and its editor are to be congratulated on their views. Oddly enough, the next editorial carries the headline, "Mr. Regier Needn't Worry Too Much".

I would now like to refer specifically to the Kingston district. A prospective industrialist wishing to settle in the area who approaches the municipal council of the city of Kingston, the townships of Kingston, Pittsburgh and Storrington, Wolfe island, and Howe island, and their local chambers of commerce, will find men who are understanding and co-operative.

I would like to put on record some facts and figures about the city of Kingston. First, dealing with population, the city of Kingston in 1954 had a population of 44,888, with a retail trading area of 101,382. There are 11,102 families in the city and 10,541 households. The number of industries was 65, and the gross annual production amounted to $56,122,499. The number of employees were 6,167, and the total payrolls for these industries amounted to $14 million.

The principal industries at present in operation there are the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited; the Du Pont Company of Canada Limited; Canadian Industries Limited; Canadian Locomotive Company, Limited; Kingston Shipyards Limited; Hield Brothers Limited; Gould battery manufacturing company; Frontenac Floor and Wall Tile Company Limited; A. Davis and Son Limited; K-D Manufacturing Company; Canada Steamship Lines; Canadian Dredge and Dock Company Limited; Dye and Chemical Company of Canada Limited, and many other smaller industries.

Kingston is served by one newspaper, which has a daily circulation of approximately 19,000. With respect to education, we have Queen's University; the Royal Military College; Regiopolis College; the National Defence College, and the Canadian Army staff college.

The city has 376 retail outlets, with total annual retail sales of $48 million. Kingston is also proud of its two radio stations and its television station. Employers must always appreciate that employees, in order to be satisfactory, must have pleasant home surroundings and facilities for their families. These requisites the Kingston district can furnish in abundance.

The Kingston area supplies a substantial pool of labour, both male and female, and the diversified industry in this area assures the availability of trained workers in most trades. Skilled craftsmen continue to locate permanently, attracted by the educational and recreational facilities available for their families. Kingston industry in the past has enjoyed trouble-free relations as far as labour-management problems are concerned. Indeed, labour in Kingston and district has demonstrated a sound and sensible approach in their dealings with management, and have always tempered their negotiations with co-operation. Kingston is open for industry.

I shall conclude my remarks by referring to one or two other items, with particular reference to the riot at Kingston penitentiary in the summer of 1954. I would like to take this opportunity to inform hon. members that in my opinion the warden and staff of the penitentiary are to be complimented on the excellent manner in which they carried out their duties during this difficult and trying period. I would also like to suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)—and I am sure this will meet with the approval of all hon. members—that segregation of prisoners should be carried out as soon as possible. The one hundred who caused the riot have, I believe, inadvertently set back the advancement of penal administration in Canada by their actions, and have made it more difficult for others who are serving sentences for lesser crimes and are not essentially criminal. I hope something will be done about that in the very near future.

I would also like to say a few words on our national sport, hockey. We all know that hockey occupies a great deal of time in the lives of both the young and the old in Canada. In this regard I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) will give some consideration to helping those private persons who contributed some $70,000, and the National hockey league which contributed some $30,000, in order to construct in the city of Kingston a museum of hockey. I firmly believe that the construction of such a museum in Canada close to the United States border, which would be known as the hockey hall of fame, would be of considerable benefit to the entire area. I might also add that those in charge of bringing about this hockey hall of fame in Kingston have in storage many fine items which they are ready and willing to place in such a museum. These people deserve our heartfelt thanks for their contribution to the history of this great national sport.

On motion of Mr. Henderson the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Office of the Premier
Province of Quebec

Quebec, October 11, 1954.

The Right Honourable Louis S. St-Laurent,
P.C., Q.C.,

Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

My dear Prime Minister:

Since our pleasant meeting last Tuesday in Montreal, my colleagues and I, with particular attention and with the sincere desire of co-operating to the fullest reasonable extent in its solution, have studied the important fiscal problem which was the subject of our interview.

Our legislative assembly opens in a few weeks, on November 17. I need hardly mention the vast additional amount of work involved in its preparation. Moreover, I am leaving this week on a vacation of about ten days' duration, the first I have taken in over a year.

Under the circumstances, even with the best of intentions, it is physically impossible before my departure to obtain and study the statistics which form the basis of the subject. At the earliest possible moment I will write you again on my return.

Nevertheless, I wish to mention here that, if you decide to call a Canadian intergovernmental conference at Ottawa, we will be happy to attend and we will not hesitate to defer our parliamentary work should this conference take place during the session of our legislature.

With my sincere regards,

(Sgd.) M. L. DUPLESSIS

Ottawa, October 15, 1954.

The Honourable M. L. Duplessis,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

I have received your letter of October 11 and I understand that, under the circumstances, it has not been possible for you to send me the information which, at our meeting of October 5 concerning your suggested amendments to your income tax act, we had agreed you would forward to me.

I hope that, when you receive this letter on your return, you will have had a pleasant and restful vacation and that we will then be able to resume consideration of a temporary and acceptable solution of the matter which is a problem for all of us.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

Office of the Premier
Province of Quebec

Quebec, November 1, 1954

The Right Honourable Louis S. St-Laurent,
P.C., Q.C.,

Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Pursuant to our interview in Montreal on October 5th last and to the letter I sent you on the 11th of the same month, I am writing you on the subject of the provincial income tax in and for the province of Quebec.

We believe that we clearly defined the opinion and the attitude of the government of the province of Quebec, in matters of the powers of taxation during the Canadian intergovernmental conferences which were held in Ottawa since 1945 and came to a close at Quebec in 1950, as well as in the correspondence we have had with federal authorities, particularly since 1949.

The agreement concluded between the preceding provincial government and the federal authorities, concerning important provincial powers of taxation, expired in 1947. Since then, the province of Quebec has not availed itself of its right to collect a provincial income tax in the province. This shows the earnest desire of the Quebec government to come to an agreement with Ottawa and, after all, the federal government has profited financially, to a large extent, by this situation which lasted approximately seven years.

The great progress and the tremendous developments, from which our immense province benefits, particularly large and numerous districts which were formerly less-favoured, necessitate numerous public services and many improvements in several important fields of provincial administration, especially in the vital fields of education and hospitalization.

Such tremendous progress and the brilliant prospects before the province require a more complete utilization of the sources of provincial revenue. It is unnecessary to emphasize that the progress and prosperity of the province of Quebec make a truly worthy contribution to the progress and prosperity of the country in general.

Therefore, the Quebec legislature decided to levy, within the province, a provincial tax on personal income. Unquestionably, as agreed by all, it is a tax that the Canadian constitution authorizes Quebec to impose. Actually, this tax represents only approximately 10 per cent of the federal tax on personal income collected in the province of Quebec, because, even though our provincial tax is apparently calculated to be 15 per cent of the federal tax, the exemptions provided by the provincial law materially reduce this proportion.

In short, the provincial tax represents approximately 10 per cent of the federal income tax collected from the taxpayers in the province of Quebec and, by deducting the provincial tax from the federal tax, Ottawa will in fact receive about 90 per cent of the tax on personal income collected in the province of Quebec.

The federal authorities assert that the province and the federal government have concurrent rights of taxing personal income. About 10 per cent to the province and about 90 per cent to Ottawa is an extraordinarily reasonable concurrence, you will no doubt agree. Furthermore, it should be recalled that our provincial income tax is used entirely for purposes of education and hospitalization, public health and social legislation among others, in and for the province.

Since the end of the last war—I merely mention facts without details or appraisal—some provinces have abandoned to the central authority certain important sources of provincial income in return for payment by Ottawa of federal subsidies to these provinces.

We have said on several occasions that the province of Quebec wishes to retain its powers of taxation and does not wish to exchange them for subsidies. We consider it our duty to maintain such an attitude.

We are ready to enter into a really temporary agreement which would grant to the parties concerned a further extension of time to arrive at a definite arrangement. The federal authorities are of the opinion—and we respect their opinion without sharing it—that they have the right to impose taxes in one province to assist certain provincial projects in another province. The province of Quebec has always been and is still ready to co-operate reasonably and in a constitutional manner for the welfare and prosperity of the other provinces of the Canadian confederation.

It is beyond question that the revenue derived from taxes levied by Quebec, including the provincial tax on personal income, and which would be affected by the arrangements arrived at between Ottawa and the other provinces, it is beyond question, I say, that such revenue of the province of Quebec represents much smaller sums than the amount offered by Ottawa to the province of Quebec in its proposal to exchange important sources of provincial revenue for federal subsidies.

In short, the other provinces and the federal authorities, in our humble opinion, cannot reasonably object to the proposal we are making; first, because the amount collected by the province is financially less than the grant offered by the federal government and, secondly, because, as everyone agrees, the province is only exercising an indisputable right. It seems to us only elementary justice that the federal authorities should deduct from their tax on personal income paid to Ottawa by the taxpayers of Quebec, the amount of the provincial income tax which only after all represents a small fraction of the federal tax.

It is our profound conviction that the taxing powers which belong to the province of Quebec must be exercised by the province. These powers, which spring from dearly acquired rights and freedom, are indispensable to responsible government; they are also essential if the province is, freely and in accordance with its religious and national traditions, to exercise its rights and fulfil its obligations, amongst others, those pertaining to the vital fields of education and hospitalization.

In order to reach an agreement concerning the deduction of our provincial tax, we are ready to delete from our act authorizing a provincial tax on personal income the statements, in the preamble, to the effect that the province has a prior right in the matter of direct taxation.

Further, we shall give effect, by order in council, to the decision we have taken, a couple of months ago, with a view to making the tax payable to Quebec on undistributed income and dividends consistent with the federal act. In other words, by virtue of such amendment, the province will only get 15 per cent of the rates authorized by the federal act in such cases.

Our provincial tax act on personal income is for a period of three years, that is to say, for each of the calendar years 1954, 1955 and 1956; we suggest that an agreement to be arrived at between Ottawa and Quebec should be for the same period.

The Quebec government wishes earnestly to reach an amicable settlement of this problem, and we express the hope that the above-mentioned provincial proposals will be favourably received by the federal authorities.

As I wrote you on October 11th, "if you decide to call a Canadian intergovernmental conference at Ottawa, we will be happy to attend and we will not hesitate to defer our parliamentary work should this conference take place during the session of our legislature".

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) M. L. DUPLESSIS

The Honourable
Maurice L. Duplessis, Q.C., LL.D.,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec, Que.

Dear Mr. Duplessis:

Pursuant to our telephone conversation of Wednesday November 3 concerning your letter received the day before, I wish to inform you that I am having statistics compiled by our officials of the Department of Finance, with a view to determining what would result, as regards deductions, from the fact that, to establish the taxable income under the federal act and your own act, the amount of such taxable income would be, for all single taxpayers, $500.00 less under the Quebec act than the federal act and, for all married taxpayers, $1,000.00 less.

Possibly, your officers have already prepared compilations to that effect, and if such were the case, it might be a good thing if we were to agree to their contacting ours, so as to prevent the possibility of misunderstanding which would affect the governing rules to be applied in order to eliminate double taxation.

Yours very truly,

Right Honourable
Louis S. St. Laurent, P.C., Q.C., LL.D.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

I reply as soon as possible to your letter dated November 5 and which was delivered to my office the day before yesterday.

We would be pleased to supply the particulars mentioned in your letter with respect to the effect of the said deductions.

Our minister of finance, the Honourable Mr. Gagnon, is presently taking a few days' holiday. If the officers of the federal Department of Finance, who are compiling the statistical tables to which you refer in your letter, wish to get in touch with my executive assistant, Mr. Emile Tourigny, Q.C., and indicate to him the exact information they wish to obtain concerning the provincial exemptions, the reply will be forwarded with all possible dispatch.

Kindly accept, Mr. Prime Minister, my best regards.

Dear Mr. Duplessis:

I received this morning your letter of November 10th, which is in reply to mine of the 5th.

I am advising my colleague, the Minister of Finance, of the substance of your letter in order that the officers of his department may communicate with Mr. Tourigny, should the occasion arise.

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, January 14, 1955

The Honourable Maurice L. Duplessis, Q.C.,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

Since receiving your letter of November 1, my colleagues and I have considered at length the problem raised by the Quebec income tax and by the fact that the taxpayers having to pay it remain subject also to the federal tax.

This is, of course, an inevitable consequence of two jurisdictions exercising their concurrent rights to tax the incomes of the same persons. The only way you suggested to avoid the effect of double taxation upon the taxpayers of Quebec is for us to deduct from the federal tax on the income of each individual an amount equivalent to the amount which he is required to pay as the provincial tax.

In your letter, you state that the provincial tax "represents only approximately 10 per cent of the federal tax on personal income collected in the province of Quebec because, even though our provincial tax is apparently calculated to be 15 per cent of the federal tax, the exemptions provided by the provincial law materially reduce this proportion". In this quotation from your letter, you refer to two different aspects of the provincial law. When you state that the Quebec tax represents approximately 10 per cent of the federal tax you compare the yield of the provincial tax to the amount produced by the federal tax in the province of Quebec.

When you say that your tax "is apparently calculated to be 15 per cent of the federal tax", you explain this percentage by referring to the scale of exemptions granted by your law. This scale is such that it does not subject to your tax all the Quebec taxpayers who are obliged to pay the federal tax. In order to obtain an amount corresponding to 10 per cent of the amount yielded by the federal tax, it has been necessary to fix, for those who have to pay your tax, a higher rate than if you had distributed the burden over all those we tax.

Provincial legislatures have, like the federal parliament, the right and the responsibility to distribute the burden of their taxes on their taxpayers in whatever way seems most appropriate to them. This is a right and a responsibility which is the same for all provinces, and none of them can be compelled to conform with the course of action followed elsewhere. Whatever differences there may be in the rules adopted by the different provinces, the federal law must be the same everywhere and it must be such as to leave the federal government with the revenues needed to fulfil its national responsibilities.

At present the federal law allows every Canadian taxpayer having to pay a provincial personal income tax to claim a deduction up to 5 per cent of his federal tax. This method of deduction raises certain administrative difficulties and, what is more serious, it makes the real incidence of the provincial tax depend on the terms of the federal law and makes the total amount deducted from the federal tax depend on the terms of the provincial law. Instead of deducting the provincial tax from the federal tax, we intend to propose to parliament a reduction of the federal tax for all taxpayers of a province having a provincial tax, whether or not they have to pay the provincial tax. Thus, the taxpayers of such a province will receive the benefit of the total amount of the reduction in the federal tax and the federal and provincial authorities will be able to determine, independently of one another, in what way and to what extent their taxpayers will be subjected to their respective taxes.

The 5 per cent deduction allowed at present by the federal law was fixed in 1946. Since that time, two changes have occurred. In the first place, the rates of the federal tax have been reduced with the result that there has been a corresponding reduction in the amount represented by the 5 per cent. In addition, the tax rentals paid by the federal government to the provinces under the tax agreements have been rising as a consequence of the increase in the population and in the national product.

Pending the results of a new federal-provincial conference, we propose therefore to ask parliament to amend the federal income tax law in order to grant a reduction of 10 per cent to all taxpayers of any province where a provincial income tax is levied whether or not all these taxpayers have to pay the provincial tax. We will recommend that this amendment apply to the years 1955 and 1956. At the same time, we will ask parliament to release from its present agreement any province which would prefer this new arrangement and I am immediately so informing the other premiers.

Moreover, we feel it would be reasonable to make the new percentage apply to taxpayers who have been in fact subjected to two taxes on their 1954 income. We intend, therefore, to propose that the taxpayers who will have paid provincial income tax for 1954 be allowed a deduction up to 10 per cent of their federal tax.

We hope that this action on our part will encourage your government to act in the same spirit and that we will have, on both sides, helped to prepare the atmosphere for useful and fruitful work during the next federal-provincial conference.

In any event, we would have had to meet before the end of 1955 to discuss the fiscal relations of the years which will follow the expiry of the present tax rental agreements. We feel that it might be appropriate to begin the new conference at an earlier date, if that is possible. Upon my return from the commonwealth meeting in London, towards the middle of February, I intend to communicate with the premiers of all the provinces with a view to working out arrangements for a conference and fixing a date for it.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT

The following letter sent to all provincial premiers with the exception of the premier of Quebec:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, January 14, 1955.

My dear Premier:

You will no doubt have learned from the press that I have been in communication with the premier of Quebec about the situation created for personal income taxpayers in that province resulting from the imposition of a provincial income tax applicable in the years 1954, 1955 and 1956.

Before this provincial tax was imposed, the situation in Quebec was that the income taxpayers of that province were paying federal taxes at the same rate as other Canadians although the people of Quebec were not receiving the financial advantage for their provincial services that the people of the other provinces were receiving through the tax rental agreements.

Since the imposition of the provincial tax many of the personal income taxpayers in Quebec are required to pay higher personal income taxes than other Canadians, and payments under the tax rental agreements are still unavailable to the people of that province, because the government of the province preferred, as was its right, not to conclude an agreement.

At the time the provincial tax was imposed, the provincial authorities suggested publicly that the total amount of the tax paid to the province should be allowed by the federal authorities as a tax credit against the federal income tax.

If the federal government had accepted this suggestion, we would have felt obliged to make the same concession to any other province, and this would have meant that the effective rate of federal taxation in each province would have been set by the provincial authorities and would have differed from one province to another. We felt that the federal law must be uniform in its application in all provinces.

We did indicate, however, that the federal government was not wedded to the principle of tax rental agreements to the exclusion of any better alternative arrangement if one could be found. At the same time, we made it clear that the present government had no intention of abandoning the objective of the tax rental agreements which is to make it financially possible for all the provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation. That is the foundation of the policy of the federal government.

I had a meeting with the premier of Quebec at his request in October and he indicated, at that time, that he was considering making certain amendments to the provincial tax law which he hoped might make some temporary arrangement possible. My colleagues and I felt it was our duty to make every effort to find some alternative to the tax rental agreements which would preserve the fundamental objective of those agreements which I have mentioned and at the same time be more acceptable to all provincial governments.

We are not yet in a position to propose an alternative to the tax rental agreements which we believe would be generally satisfactory and, as the agreements still have two years to run, we felt that, meanwhile, we should propose a stopgap arrangement which, without being unfair to the other provinces, would reduce the burden of double taxation placed on many of the income taxpayers in the province of Quebec.

I have already indicated that we could not meet the suggestion of the Quebec authorities and allow the whole of their provincial income tax to be deducted from the federal tax, unless we were prepared to accord a similar right to any other province.

It is our view that whatever differences there may be in the tax laws adopted by the different provinces, the federal laws must be the same everywhere and must be such as to leave the federal government with the revenues needed to fulfil its national responsibilities.

At present the federal law allows every Canadian taxpayer having to pay a provincial personal income tax to claim a deduction up to 5 per cent of his federal tax. This method of deduction raises certain administrative difficulties and, what is even more serious, it makes the real incidence of the provincial tax depend on the terms of the federal law and makes the total amount deducted from the federal tax depend on the terms of the provincial law. Instead of deducting the provincial tax from the federal tax we intend to propose a reduction of the federal tax for all taxpayers of a province having a provincial tax, whether or not they have to pay the provincial tax. Thus, the taxpayers of such a province will receive the benefit of the total amount of the reduction in the federal tax and the federal and provincial authorities will be able to determine, independently of one another, in what way and to what extent their taxpayers will be subjected to their respective taxes.

The 5 per cent deduction allowed at present by the federal law was fixed in 1946. Since that time, two changes have occurred. In the first place, the rates of the federal tax have been reduced with the result that there has been a corresponding reduction in the amount represented by the 5 per cent. In addition, the tax rentals paid by the federal government to the provinces under the tax agreements have been rising as a consequence of the increase in the population and in the national product.

Pending the results of a new federal-provincial conference, we propose, therefore, to ask parliament to amend the federal income tax law in order to grant a reduction of 10 per cent to all taxpayers of any province where a provincial income tax is levied whether or not all these taxpayers have to pay the provincial tax. We will recommend that this amendment apply to the years 1955 and 1956. At the same time, we will ask parliament to release from its present agreement any province which would prefer this new arrangement.

Moreover, we feel it would be reasonable to make the new percentage apply to taxpayers who have been in fact subjected to two taxes on their 1954 income. We intend, therefore, to propose that income taxpayers who will have paid a provincial tax for 1954 be allowed a deduction up to 10 per cent of their federal tax.

I shall be glad to know at your convenience whether your government would wish to be released from the tax rental agreement in order to take advantage of the proposed new arrangement for 1955 and 1956.

It had always been understood that it would be necessary to hold a federal-provincial conference before the end of 1955 to discuss fiscal arrangements for the years which will follow the present tax rental agreements. In the light of recent developments it might be the desire of the provincial governments to have this conference held at an earlier date.

I shall accordingly communicate with you again shortly after my return from the commonwealth prime ministers' meeting in London towards the middle of February with a view to working out arrangements for a conference at a time which will be satisfactory to all governments concerned.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 18, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Harbours Board Act to provide that the national harbours board shall consist of four members in lieu of three members as at the present time.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS AT BURRARD DRYDOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production. Has the minister been informed that commencing at noon on Thursday, January 13, the Burrard drydock in North Vancouver was shut down by a strike of electrical workers in that plant? Will the minister take steps to ascertain if an honest attempt was made by both sides to reach a settlement in the dispute before the strike was called?

Perhaps I should ask this question of the Minister of Labour, but I am directing it to the Minister of Defence Production because I understand naval contracts are being carried out at the yard. If the Minister of Defence Production would rather the Minister of Labour answered it I will see that he gets a copy.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I think the question would be more properly asked of the Minister of Labour. I may say that we knew of the pending dispute and did our best to avoid a strike. I have not been informed of what has happened since Thursday and I am sure the Minister of Labour is better informed.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my department, too, has been informed of the details of the dispute which caused a strike between the electrical trade union, local No. 1 C.C.L., and the Burrard Dry Dock Company Limited. My colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), has brought certain aspects of the matter to my attention. Since these activities come entirely within provincial jurisdiction I do not think that I as Minister of Labour should question what has been done in the way of conciliation proceedings.

H.M.C. DOCKYARD, ESQUIMALT—RETIREMENT AGE OF CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a question asked by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) in which he asked me to look into the retirement of civilian employees at H.M.C. Dockyard, Esquimalt. On investigation I find that of a total of 3,259 civilian employees at the dockyard, some 140, of whom 40 are casual employees, have been given notice that they will be retired on account of age during the current year.

The 40 casual employees will be released on February 28. The remaining 100 are part of the continuing complement of the dockyard and they will be released at various dates during the year. Extensions beyond the normal retirement age of 65 had previously been granted to some of these employees and they will be released at the end of their period of extension. Adequate notice is being given in all cases.

REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT DOMINION ARSENALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Minister of Defence Production. Is the minister aware that 40 women were laid off at the Valcartier arsenal some time last week and that 22 were laid off at the Quebec arsenal at the same time?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Will the minister tell the house if some other lay-offs are expected in these arsenals? Rumours are circulating to the effect that many hundreds of male employees will be laid off in the near future.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, just a few moments ago, I received notice from my hon. friend that he intended to ask this question. The fact that 40 women have been laid off from the Valcartier arsenal and 22 men from the Quebec arsenal naturally would not have escaped my attention. However, I will take this question as notice and endeavour to give a more complete answer at another sitting.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY LIEUTENANT GENERAL SIMONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the press report of a speech made yesterday in Montreal by the chief of the general staff, Lieutenant General Guy Simonds, in which he is reported as having advocated compulsory military service for Canadian young men and, if so, can the minister inform the house if General Simonds was authorized to make such a statement of policy? If not, is it the intention of the government to discipline him for having done so?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of this question. I have seen the press report to which his question refers but I have not had an opportunity to discuss its accuracy with Lieutenant General Simonds. If the hon. member will look at the full tenor of the article I think he will see that Lieutenant General Simonds was not really advocating compulsory military training for this country at the present time.

In any event the view alleged to have been expressed by him was also expressed by him last year at Saint John, New Brunswick. In answer to a question which raised the identical point referred to in this question Lieutenant General Simonds expressed the identical view indicated in the press report of his recent speech.

As a result a question was raised in this house on June 23, 1954 at which time the then minister of national defence, in referring to the answer given by Lieutenant General Simonds, made the following statement, as reported on page 6521 of Hansard:

> He made a reply which I think you could expect almost any officer to make, namely that he would be glad to see every youth in the country receive two years' military training.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have a supplementary question to ask the minister. In view of his answer, are we to understand that the government approves of generals on the active list making policy statements in public?

Mr. Campney: I think this is still a free country. If the hon. member will refer to the full press report I think he will find that his reference to the making of a statement of policy for this country is mistaken.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ADMISSION OF COMMUNIST CHINA TO UNITED NATIONS—POSITION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister.

Would the Prime Minister indicate to the house what attitude he will take, on behalf of Canada, should the question of the entry of communist China into the United Nations be included in the agenda of the commonwealth prime ministers' conference?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will only look at the debates for yesterday he will see that that question has already been put and that the Prime Minister has answered it.

Mr. Dufresne: Will the Prime Minister tell us what are his own personal feelings on the subject?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister wishes to answer.

(Translation):

[Later:]

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the answer which the Prime Minister was ready to give me a moment ago; will he tell me, yes or no, whether he favours the admission of communist China into the United Nations?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have no answer to give to that question.

(Text):

POLIOMYELITIS

DISTRIBUTION OF SALK VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of National Health and Welfare give an assurance that sufficient quantities of Salk polio vaccine will be available for full use in any of the provinces which may require it, and would the minister further make a statement as to the success of this vaccine in the control of poliomyelitis?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of his intention to ask this question and I thank him for so doing. As I said last year, the government, in conjunction with the provinces, has taken every step to make sure that within the bounds of reasonable possibility this vaccine would be made available for the people of Canada if and when the Salk polio vaccine had been finally assessed for value. That time has not yet been reached so I cannot say anything about its final value except to express a great hope.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY INTO CRASH AT CRUMLIN, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the lamentable air crash near Crumlin airport last Friday which resulted in the untimely death of Mr. Robert Saunders, chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission. Has the minister looked into two facts which have been reported in connection with this tragedy; the first being that there was a failure of power at the airport and no indication that there were in use at that time any auxiliary or mobile lights or such other equipment; secondly, that there was a delay of more than an hour before the stretcher party arrived at the scene of the accident from the airport?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would not like to rely on my memory concerning the first question the hon. member has asked, but I shall take his question as notice and reply tomorrow. With regard to the second part of his question I might say that I have no information whatever on the subject.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

WINNIPEG POST OFFICE—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask two questions of the Minister of Public Works with respect to the Winnipeg post office. Is he now able to table a copy of the contract signed between the government of Canada and the Foundation Company of Canada with reference to the construction of the Winnipeg post office and setting out the firm price list, and also the names of the subcontractors and the price agreed between the two parties? Second, would he confirm or deny that the Foundation Company of Canada made a further request for a grant beyond the firm price agreed upon in the fall of 1954?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was unable to hear the second part of the question but perhaps the hon. member can inform me of it later in the day. With respect to the first question I shall be very glad to table a copy of the contract which, as my hon. friend knows, does not contain a list of all the subcontractors. But I will table it in the form in which it was written.

Mr. Knowles: When will construction commence?

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Public Works heard my question which was supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), and whether he can answer it. When will construction of the new Winnipeg post office begin?

Mr. Winters: I understand that construction will commence in the very near future, if it has not already been put in hand.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTION OF PROVINCIAL TAX—AMENDMENT OF INCOME TAX ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance tell us when the bill amending the federal income tax law designed to implement the policy outlined by the Prime Minister yesterday will be brought before this house?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have just been looking at the orders of the day and observe that we have 18 items awaiting the conclusion of this debate. When the debate is concluded we shall set out government business in such a manner that the hon. member will have ample notice of the bill of which he speaks.

[Later:]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is proposed to discuss the terms of the amending bill, about which I asked a few minutes ago, with the premier of Quebec and his advisers before it is brought before this house?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the answer is so obvious that my hon. friend could supply it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, might I repeat the question?

Mr. Speaker: No.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

ACCESSION OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY TO NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. On January 10 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) placed on Hansard the protocol the approval of which will be debated here the day after tomorrow. Would the minister give consideration to placing either in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings the agreement made at the four-power and nine-power conferences which preceded the agreement to which the protocol in question refers?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke to me about this matter before he left today for a funeral in Toronto. He personally has no objection, subject to the wishes of the house, to the tabling of the relevant texts of the London and Paris agreements. In the meantime, I have looked over the schedules and most of them are long and quite meaningless without reference to the Bonn convention of 1952. In expressing the minister's wish I would say there can be no objection to this request providing it is understood that it would not be necessary to print the entire schedules. Instead a résumé of them could be given relative to the information which the hon. member seeks, and that résumé could be printed in Hansard, as was done the other day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members to give their opinion now as to the request made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the suggestion made by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs? Perhaps we might take that up when the documents are tabled. I was just about to call orders of the day because no one else rose, and I rose at this time to ask whether the house wishes me to request unanimous consent to have these documents printed.

My problem is that we are taking a decision now about documents we do not have. I feel that later on we could revert to motions and at that time consent could be given. It would be most irregular to give consent now when the documents are not available.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might consider the request made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to revert to motions at this time, and ask the consent of the house to have the documents he will now table printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I table three copies, in English and in French, of the final act of the London conference, October 3rd. I would simply point out that I understand now that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on January 10 tabled the other agreements and that the protocol itself was also tabled, so that with this tabling now, all of the documents to which my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) directed our attention are now before the house and his request is therefore in a position to be acted upon.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROCLAMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Minister of Finance say whether last session's legislation which amended the Public Service Superannuation Act providing life insurance or death benefits for civil servants and members of the armed forces has been proclaimed and, if so, can he say what percentage of civil servants and members of the armed forces appeared to be satisfied with this legislation?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the section referred to has been proclaimed. I do not recall offhand the date, but it was some time in the last ten days of December, to take effect on January 1. After November 1, which was the closing date for members to indicate their preference, we found that a sufficiently large number had shown their preference in favour of the legislation that we felt it was desirable to proclaim it as parliament had indicated earlier in the summer that it should be proclaimed.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the minister remember the percentage?

Mr. Harris: My recollection is that it was about 12 per cent, but I would not want to say that definitely at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Only 12 per cent were opposed?

Mr. Harris: Twelve per cent who had indicated their option against it.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, many will agree that in the policy of the throne speech there has been a noticeable trend towards saying less of future plans and of dwelling more on past achievements. This policy is all right for government members because they have ready-made for them a speech which can be dressed up with some slight detail; but for a member of the opposition who wants to do a conscientious job, it is not all right. He is forced to take a negative approach to the throne speech itself and consequently he falls back on this negative method of regretting that no action has been taken or of regretting that the wrong action has been taken. At the beginning of my speech I wish to apologize for this negative approach but with this trend apparent in the speech from the throne, I cannot see how any different attitude can be taken.

In the maritimes generally and in Saint John in particular we find the same situation prevailing, that of loss of markets, and unemployment. I think I should be fair and generous to say that the grain shipments through Saint John have increased somewhat, but unemployment is, at the best, about the same as it was last year. But there is a dangerous trend, Mr. Speaker, towards an increase in welfare demands. To me that means that the unemployment of past years is catching up with us. I know that in Saint John this Christmas the welfare demands of the citizens were four and five times as great as those of the previous year. There is a danger that should be noted there. In approaching this important throne speech debate in a constructive way, we find in the speech only vague references to regional and seasonal unemployment. There is mention of the commonwealth conference which is of interest to us, but nothing more is said. I am pleased that our amendment lists the loss of markets and the unemployment situation first in that order.

I have a long list of these so-called regrets but in picking out four or five I first would say that we regret the further loss of the United Kingdom markets. This hackneyed phrase of putting all our eggs in the one trade basket has perhaps been worn a little bit thin but one is forced to comment that it must be some basket by now.

The figures on the United Kingdom market show that in the first nine months of 1954—and they are the only figures readily available—British imports from Canada dropped in value to $192 million from $228 million in the same period last year. What is more noteworthy is that this decline in Canadian sales to the United Kingdom came at a time when other United Kingdom imports remained constant. In other words, the United Kingdom has held its own with imports from other countries—South Africa, India, New Zealand, Ceylon and so on—but their imports from Canada decreased sharply to the amount that I have shown.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) goes to the commonwealth conference with his contingent, surely it is not too much to ask that for the first time we take a little bit of leadership with regard to these interesting trade problems. If it is necessary to take the leadership in the matter of convertibility, in some limited way, let us do that. If it is a matter of some imperial preference, let us not be afraid to examine this matter and to push for it at the conference. I had occasion to do some research work on preferences and tariffs, and it amazed me to note that in the past history of imperial preferences, all leadership has been taken by the members of the commonwealth or of the empire, as it was then. There has never been any definite stand or a definite forcing of opinion by the so-called mother country in these matters. I feel strongly that we should not hesitate to take a strong stand in these two matters of convertibility and preferences.

Also interesting in this connection were the statements made last year by Mr. Thomas McKittrick, who appeared before the trade relations committee of the other place, when he made the bland remark that convertibility was in the hands of Canada. That is a statement by one of the leading bankers of the United States, and he was throwing on our shoulders the responsibility of bringing Britain and the United States together. This surely would be a great time for us to show that leadership which we so obviously have been hesitant to take.

We also regret the increasing trend to ship Canadian produce and manufactured goods through United States ports. I have here some figures that show that there has been little decrease in the amount of produce that is being sent to the other ports of the world from Canada through the United States. The figures are still alarming and no definite trend can be indicated. The figures that are more alarming perhaps are the ones that show our protected industries—that is industries in Canada which have some degree of protection —are the ones that use these United States ports almost exclusively. The figures are as follows:

Shipments Through United States Ports

	1952 per cent	1953 per cent
Automobiles	89·46	84·04
Auto parts	77·61	56·54
Tires, motor vehicles, pneumatic tire casings	78·08	84·78
Farm implements and machinery	82·26	80·86
Machinery, except agricultural machinery	55·76	44·51
Whiskey	45·92	44·69

These figures are of great concern to us because Canada has invested thousands of dollars in her transport facilities and yet we have not followed through with encouragement of domestic and foreign trade. It is a well known fact that the United States government is continually encouraging and advertising the use of their ports, but we seem to have fallen down in that respect. We have comparable facilities at our Canadian ports. Our handling is efficient, costs are supposed to be on a parity with United States rates, and yet when our ports need definite help because of economic conditions such help is not forthcoming. The government should take some definite action. It has not only a responsibility but also a definite obligation to see that these industries which are protected to a great extent should be forced in some manner to use Canadian ports for both import and export trade.

There has been considerable interest by Canadian manufacturers but the time has come when the government will have to give consideration to taking some action in this regard. One suggestion that should be investigated is the possibility of having our trade commissioners authorized and instructed that in their negotiations in other countries regarding imports and exports they should solicit the use of Canadian ports entirely. The United States government does it. Why can we not do the same thing?

We further regret that no action has been taken on the request of the provincial government of New Brunswick with respect to hydroelectric development. The other day Mr. James Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, said at the bank's annual meeting that there must be a farsighted policy to develop Canada's resources. We in New Brunswick are proud of the fact that this year we are spending $182 million on capital investment. This exceeds the figure for 1954 and is a new high, representing an increase of almost $18 million over the previous year's total of $164 million. On a percentage basis these figures indicate that our province is ahead of all other provinces in capital investment. Surely that is a good indication that we want to help ourselves. We have been able to dig up enough money on our own to lead the country.

The St. Lawrence seaway is taking shape and progressing. The pipe line is moving ahead, although I would not wish to comment on the present position of progress in this respect. But when these all-Canadian developments are presented to us we wonder why our request for hydroelectric development cannot be considered in the same way. It was interesting to note the other day that Mr. Rand Matheson of the maritime transportation commission made the first noteworthy statement that I have seen on the effect of the seaway on the maritime ports. He is reported as saying that, as business is taken inland with the development of the seaway, manufacturers and other exporters will tend to ship more during the summer months and thus decrease the winter business of the maritime ports.

This situation is alarming to us and we wonder why consideration cannot be given to our appeals. This is an appeal made in a non-partisan way. The opposition members of the New Brunswick legislature have given some sort of approval. At least they have not objected. To my knowledge no New Brunswick member in the House of Commons has raised any objection. Their silence is a little bit alarming to me although the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) did comment on it the other day, and there is a non-partisan approach to the whole matter.

More hydroelectric power would solve our industrial bottleneck and we could make plans for the development of our new mineral discoveries. It amused me very much to read in a newspaper the other day that Canada was permitting $3 million of its Colombo plan money to be used for hydroelectric development in India. It is quite ironical when you think that we in New Brunswick are asking for assistance with respect to our hydroelectric power development and cannot seem to get anywhere. Yet it is all right for the Canadian government to give $3 million to India to develop hydroelectric power there. This necessary assistance would enable us to round out our development. It would go a long way to help our economy. Of course there is the fact that the Atlantic provinces comprise a regional market of nearly two million people. In the years ahead Canadian industries in the central part of Canada would for various reasons such as high freight rates perhaps wish to decentralize their industries by coming to the maritimes. We would be able to offer them hydroelectric power and the regional market that is available. Surely we are not going to get a no answer to this request.

In the third place we regret that in the changes and reorganization of the reserve army that took place during the past summer there was gross discrimination against us. I should like to review the story briefly so far as New Brunswick is concerned, and also Nova Scotia to some extent. We have always prided ourselves on the high number of our enlistments. In the first and second world wars I think we had the highest per capita enlistment of any of the provinces of Canada. We have a background of good training and tradition in our provinces, particularly in my own province with which I am a bit more familiar.

Last year I put a question on the order paper asking the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) the present state, classification and training position of all the reserve army units in Canada. To my mind this was the key question as far as the changes were concerned and how they should be effected. The question went to the head of the order paper, stayed there for two months and that was the end of it. I suggest that these figures would have uncovered the unmistakable fact that our New Brunswick units were in A-one shape and probably unsurpassed anywhere in Canada. What happened? When the changes were made last year our three regiments, the North Shore regiment, the Carleton and York regiment and the New Brunswick Scottish, were wiped out entirely. It was not a case of reduction or reorganization, to which we might not have had any objection. It was simply the fact that in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia the units, as such, were completely wiped out. These are the only provinces in Canada in which the new units were given a provincial designation. When the major-generals Letson, Kennedy and Renault came down to New Brunswick to investigate the matter, they were only there for two hours. They talked to one or two army officials and gave no indication that these changes were coming. Evidently they went away without a clear picture of the facts.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we do not object to the changes that had to be made. We realize that some reorganization of the reserve army had to take place. We do object to the fact that our units were completely wiped out. In reply to letters that were sent, the minister said it was necessary to reduce the infantry and increase the armour. I ask the question today, where is the increase in armour in the regiments in New Brunswick? There has not been any change whatever. Again there is a touch of irony in this whole case, as was the case in my previous regret. One regiment is now to be called the First New Brunswick Regiment, so we are right back where we started in 1793 because there was a Royal New Brunswick Regiment at that time.

We regret also, Mr. Speaker, the discontinuance of the railway lines in Albert county. There is a history connected with these lines that goes back a long way. The first reference in any act is to the Elgin line. This railway was originally partly financed by the people in the area surrounding Elgin. They were forced to buy bonds to help with this railway. When the Canadian National took it over, certain statements were made and a definite obligation was undertaken to continue this line which is so necessary to the residents of that area. The cheese factory at Elgin, the lumber and pit prop business as well as the new mineral discoveries, particularly copper in this area, all need this line of railway. The highways will not take the heavy load that the railway line can accommodate, so it is an absolute necessity that further consideration be given to any plans that are in the minds of the transport commission or the railway to tear up those tracks.

Another point of interest concerns the recent discoveries in Albert county, particularly of oil shale. New Brunswick has invested considerable money in a complete examination of the possibility of burning oil shale to provide electric power. A new New York firm has been approached and is in the process of doing that. I suggest it would be folly to do away with these railway lines while the future looks so bright. While this was taking place, and while considerable opposition was building up to the loss of this line, evidently the government, in their sly little way, were toying with the idea of eliminating a further line in Albert county, the Hillsborough to Albert line. Just the other day the residents in this area were notified that there is to be a board hearing to ascertain why this line should not be removed.

One goes back twenty years when there was some talk of removing the same line, but for some reason or other the government left it there. Later gypsum was discovered and it was possible to locate quite a profitable industry in the area. If this line had been abandoned the industry, of course, could not have been accommodated. Here we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to develop the marshlands in Albert county in a successful way for the future, and at the same time talk of removing the railway line. What is going to happen to this investment in the marshlands? We sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government, through the Canadian National, will give every consideration to these appeals that the lines be left in their present position.

We regret further that there is too much rigidity in the Post Office Department around our area. Good officials are hamstrung because of the rigid requirements imposed by Ottawa. They make investigations quite thoroughly with respect to changes in the post office and carrier service, yet they are bound by the rigid requirements of the Post Office Department. The local officials fall back on the Ottawa department and their excuses, consequently bad public relations exist. Personally, I can say that I have had quite a few inquiries of the Post Office Department and I must admit that prompt replies have been received. There seems to have been a betterment of the condition that was so criticized during the last session.

However, in the East Saint John area the people greatly desire a new post office. The surrounding district of Little River feels it is entitled to a sub-post office. The Glen Falls area has been petitioning for some time for rural mail service. I understand that all these requests have gone through the local department in the proper way and have received the approval of the local officials. Someone here at Ottawa or back in Saint John has fallen back on the rigid requirements of the department that so much has to be given for a mail contract or a box has to be within so many yards of here or there before this mail service can be inaugurated. I suggest that some little discretionary power given to the local officials would not be out of the way in helping to repair the bad public relations that are building up.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to develop the pattern that seems to be shaping up in our area, particularly with reference to this debate. There has been this reckless abandonment of rail lines in Albert county, which seems to be contrary to the enthusiasm engendered by our new discoveries; there has been this indiscriminate undermining of our traditions, traditions that only we in the maritimes really appreciate, and we do object quite seriously to this discrimination against our army units. Personally I feel that the rail lines would not have been removed nor the army units changed if they were in the central areas which have more powerful lobby groups to speak for them. Little Albert county is out of the way. Changes can be made there without too much objection.

In so far as the army units are concerned, we do not have the powerful officers' messes of the Queen's Own or the Black Watch that could lobby with influential men. We feel that our regiments mean just as much as these other units, and we object very strongly to these two changes merely because of the effect politically. However, I must say in all fairness, Mr. Speaker, that it is significant to know that the loss of markets which has been affecting us for the last two or three years is now touching the whole dominion. I feel certain that when everybody becomes aroused over the matter it will help us. I feel certain also that we will not be turned down in our pleas for assistance in connection with hydroelectric power, particularly in the light of the news that India is to get some help.

There is a new interest in the maritimes, perhaps for the first time in recent years, with our discoveries. A new spirit seems to be developing. We feel now that by standing in unity we may be able to make use of the lessons we have learned in the past. It is gratifying to note the success of the Atlantic economic council that is meeting regularly now each year. This was the dream of the late Premier Angus L. Macdonald, and I am sure his spirit will always be alive while that council is meeting.

I had occasion this past summer to make some general remarks on maritime union, and I must say for the record that I have never said anything rightly or wrongly that caused as much interest as this subject. I did not receive a word from anyone who was opposed to it; in fact everyone who spoke offered comments of a complimentary nature.

It may be far removed, but surely any steps we can take in this respect will benefit all of us.

I was also very much pleased the other day to hear the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Balcom) speak about the need for regional assistance in a financial way in the maritime provinces. I believe his observations were to the effect that the maritimes have a continuing problem, and that a regional agency should be set up along the lines of the industrial development bank. In any event, it is just another way of saying that we do need collective help down there, and I compliment him upon his remarks in this respect.

We have had very clear indications of the government's interest in our fishing problem, and it is encouraging to know that our fisheries—perhaps one of Canada's most undeveloped industries—are being given some help, and that research is continuing in this respect.

These last few words perhaps paint a little brighter picture than those with which I began, when I mentioned those things I thought it necessary to point out. But I do feel that perhaps the government has finally begun to take note of our traditions. We have finally got our backs up and we are going to do a little fighting for some of our new discoveries. I believe that when we see on a wall or in print the motto of Canada, which was offered by a father of confederation from New Brunswick, we will not have to blush any more, because perhaps Canada will really be a nation from sea to sea.

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first to add my congratulations to those which have already been extended to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, upon the exceedingly able manner in which they discharged their duties. It is reassuring to the membership of the house when these more recent additions bring with them the capacity for clear thinking and lucid expression, indicating a full sense of their responsibility as members of this Canadian parliament. I add my congratulations most heartily to those which have already been given to them.

Then, with regard to the speech from the throne itself, as we always do, we have heard hon. members expressing a wide diversity of opinion concerning the value of the government's program which has been set out in that speech. Let me say that in my opinion the speech from the throne is a source of justifiable satisfaction to supporters of the government. When one reads it and hears it, and when one sees the measures there promulgated, he realizes that it reveals and outlines a program for the session now beginning which is well timed and, while perhaps not spectacular, represents a steady advance for improvements which lead always to the greater welfare of the Canadian people.

Nothing has emanated from the opposition benches to cause me to doubt the correctness of the opinion I have just expressed. We have heard of course the cry, which is so easily uttered by those who do not have to shoulder any responsibility, for lighter taxes and heavier expenditures. We have heard broached again—or at least hinted—the ancient and, I believe, the now thoroughly exploded doctrine that high and higher tariff walls are the panacea for all our ills.

Then, from more than one source we have heard what seems to me in effect to be a complaint that it is not good that the Liberal party should have at its head a man of such high character and outstanding ability as our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and that we Liberals should not take such great pride in that fact. That position, of course, is understandable from the opposition's point of view.

Then we have listened to a very considerable amount of what I have no doubt would be deemed suitable stump material in certain quarters of the country, such as the prophecy commented upon so much in the latter part of the debate as to the possible coming victory of the communists in Quebec and the socialists everywhere else. All I have to say concerning that prophecy is that it is a very well balanced one, because I think one-half of it is just as likely to be fulfilled as the other.

We have heard presented the hoary and inevitable argument that no matter what beneficial measures the government may see fit to introduce, it should have gone farther and provided a little more. But, of sound and constructive criticism—and, after all, that is or should be the chief aim of opposition parties—it seems to me that there has been a distinct paucity. And I think this very lack is in itself a not inconsiderable tribute to the strength of the government's policies.

No thinking man will suggest, of course, that everything is exactly as we should like to see it. In Canada, as everywhere else in the world, inevitably there are certain problems, some of which are national and some regional, some of which are minor and others more important, which inevitably must be faced and, if possible, overcome.

Speaking as one from the maritime provinces let me say that in that section of the country we always have a full share of regional problems. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell), who is also from the maritime provinces, has just concluded a speech in which quite properly he laid a great deal of emphasis upon the regional problems of the maritimes. I should like to say something along similar lines, although of course my approach will be different from his, and will seek to emphasize more the problems of my own constituency. For at the mention of regional problems we think of those with which the maritime provinces have to contend. And one thing that stands out is this, that as each year rolls around we see and the world sees unmistakably that Canada as a nation is advancing into a glorious future. Not all the talk from the opposition benches can seriously impugn the truth of that statement. But it is also unfortunately true that not all parts of the country are advancing at the same pace. We in the maritime provinces are advancing, yes, but not at the same pace as is enjoyed by others parts of the country. In the maritimes we lack a central geographical position; we lack vast hinterlands and, to a considerable degree, untouched natural resources. And when I say that, of course I have in mind the fact that great discoveries of mineral resources have been made in New Brunswick and to some extent in Nova Scotia.

Nevertheless we do lack to a very considerable degree untouched natural resources. We have a lack of easy access to profitable markets. These are conditions of geography, conditions due to our situation. Nevertheless they militate against us.

I think it is correct to say that every province of Canada, with the exception of the maritimes, enjoys some, and certain of them enjoy all, of the advantages which I have said we lack. Therefore, as equal partners in the great scheme of confederation, of which two of the maritime provinces are charter members, we are legitimately entitled to claim special consideration from the federal government with respect to the problems which we have to face, to the end that in the advancement of this country—I refer particularly to economic advancement, for in other respects socially, culturally and intellectually, we can hold our own without difficulty—to the end, I repeat, that in the economic advancement of this country we in the maritimes shall have our place, if not in the vanguard at least within hailing distance of the more fortunate provinces.

I do not mean by that and I do not suggest that in a country of this size there can be absolute equality in this respect in all regions. For example, I do not suggest that Nova Scotia can foreseeably hope to match in this particular, let us say, the province of Alberta where, if I might use a figure of speech, we might say that the good ship prosperity rides snugly, perhaps even smugly, in a sea of oil. I suppose some hon. gentlemen might suggest that I carry that figure of speech a little further and put Social Credit in the role of a stowaway.

But I do say that much can be done and every possible step should be taken to alleviate existing economic inequalities. This government can perform no greater service in the interests of Canada as a whole, not merely in the interests of the maritimes, than to bend its energies and turn its resources toward the accomplishment of that end. A few days ago during the course of this debate one of the hon. members for Halifax suggested the possibility of close liaison between some federal agency and the newly formed economic council of the Atlantic provinces, and also suggested the desirability of encouraging new industry in the maritimes by the greater use of the facilities of the industrial development bank. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) mentioned that just a few moments ago. I heartily endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax in that respect. I should like to add my compliments to those which have been tendered the hon. member by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert.

It seems to me, as the hon. member for Halifax indicated, that in the past the efforts made to improve the economic life of the maritimes have been of too sporadic and piecemeal a character, involving perhaps the appointment of a temporary commission to consider some problem when it has become acute, but never a continuous program of research and investigation which would permanently carry on and cover all phases of the maritime economy. I should like to see the creation or appointment of some permanent federal body charged with such duties, acting of course in the closest co-operation with all organizations in the maritimes having the same purposes in view, including the newly formed economic council of the Atlantic provinces.

In a developing and changing country such as this, with its vast distances and great diversity of interests, it is not surprising that steps may need to be taken from time to time to ensure that adequate attention shall be given to the needs of a particular area. Perhaps I may cite as an example—I do not think it is too good a one—the fact that last year it was found desirable to effect a change in the name of the former department of resources and development which has now become the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, marking the reorientation of the work of that department with increasing emphasis upon the administration of the northern territories.

Although this analogy is not by any means a perfect one, I use it to stress the desirability, I think I might say the necessity, of providing some effective mechanism whereby the economic problems of the maritimes can be kept in a constant focus of attention by this government and means for their solution devised, not sporadically but as a part of a comprehensive program to raise the whole economy of these provinces to a level more nearly commensurate with that enjoyed elsewhere in Canada. One of the primary points of such a program would most certainly be the promotion of greater industrial activity in the maritimes where factors which I have already mentioned militate heavily against us in that respect.

In this connection let me revert to the speech from the throne and say that, of the beneficial measures thereby adumbrated, the proposed increase in unemployment benefits, already partly put into effect, has perhaps aroused the most general public interest and approval. Certainly this is true of industrial centres such as my own town of Amherst. This measure to my mind marks a further expansion of that sweeping program of social security instituted by the Liberal party and still proceeding as the continuing development and increasing wealth of the country permit. Yet, and here at last I find some common ground with opposition speakers, unemployment insurance, beneficial though it has proved, is certainly no complete answer to any problem of unemployment which may arise. Obviously the only real and complete answer is a continued high level of industrial activity.

I am very far from agreeing with the belief, or apparent belief, of some of the opposition members that the federal government, single-handed, or any other government for that matter, by a sort of waving of the wand of its magical powers, so to speak, can permanently end unemployment. But I do suggest as one ameliorating policy, which at least to some extent lies within its powers, that the federal government, rather than promoting the further undue concentration of secondary industries in those parts of the country which are already highly industrialized, should turn its efforts toward increasing the level of industrial activity in the maritimes.

This of course is not by any means a new proposition. It has frequently been broached that this wider distribution of industry is desirable. I think it is usually approached from the point of view that in the event of war it would be a good thing in the interests of national safety and defence. But I think, taken in the perspective of years, it would also prove a strong weapon in preventing or combating unemployment.

In this free land the government cannot say to one industrialist "Build there" and to another "Build here." I never have a great deal of sympathy for those who say that the government should build an industry in that town or this town. Under our present system that is not the right approach to the problem. But we must remember that in these days the federal government exerts a very weighty and potent influence upon the industrial life of our country. It is a mighty buyer, a mighty awarder of contracts. I urge that some suitable scheme of regional allocation of these contracts should be devised which would promote the further industrialization of the maritime provinces. I say further that it is in the national interest that this should be done.

Turning again to the speech from the throne, I, like other hon. members, am deeply interested in the proposal for an expanded program of public works. As I have mentioned before in this house, I consider the most desirable type of public works, those most to be encouraged, to be not those which only furnish employment during the stage of construction, or which may be a mere matter of pride or convenience to residents of a community or district, but those which may reasonably be expected to provide a permanent stimulus to the whole regional economy.

Such are the Canso causeway and the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry, and such will be the Chignecto canal project when that long overdue project is finally undertaken. Surely in the light of present developments, in the light of the St. Lawrence seaway, the iron ore development in Labrador, maritime security in time of war and the expressed intention of the government to embark upon an expanded program of public works, no time could be more opportune for instituting a new, thorough and conclusive investigation into the feasibility and economic possibilities of this canal. At this date it is not germane to say that a commission which conducted a survey in 1931 decided against the commercial value of the canal. Conditions now are in no way similar to those of 25 years ago. I think the whole subject should be approached anew. A commission should be appointed and a thorough investigation made, taking into account representations from all interested areas. A final decision should then be taken as to whether the Chignecto canal is to be built.

We in the maritimes firmly believe the decision would be a favourable one, but I think I may say that if, after a thorough investigation of the matter, it was decided that the canal could not be commercially justified, then the people of the maritimes would be content to accept that decision. But they are not content to allow this matter to stand year after year without any further reinvestigation into the merits of the canal.

Another badly needed project which I should like to bring to the attention of the government is the establishment of a ferry service across Minas channel between Parrsboro in my constituency and the opposite shore in Kings county. I should say the re-establishment of a ferry service; for prior to its discontinuance during the last war such a service had, I am told, been in existence in one form or another for over a century, although I suppose it was originally a sailing ship proposition.

However, it is a rather stark commentary that in this year of progress, after such a long period, no such ferry operates. The provision of adequate deep water docking facilities near Parrsboro and cape Blomidon on the far shore would enable a ferry service to be maintained over a few miles of water and independently of the tides. Such facilities would eliminate an overland journey of some 150 miles. Such a ferry would, as a glance at the map of Nova Scotia and the maritimes will demonstrate, greatly expedite traffic between western Nova Scotia on the one hand and Cumberland county, Prince Edward Island, and the north shore of New Brunswick on the other. It would certainly provide a substantial impetus to the Nova Scotia tourist trade, and I believe in many ways it would be complementary to the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry service which is shortly to go into effect.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in this modern age any worth-while improvement in transportation facilities such as I have suggested should merit the careful consideration of the federal government. Indeed, the federal government has an interest in transportation in many ways, not least of which is its interest and support of the building of the trans-Canada highway. Therefore, without reservation, I would urge this government to carry out a new and comprehensive investigation of the Chignecto canal project, and ask them to provide full co-operation and assistance in the establishment of the Minas channel ferry service which I have mentioned.

Another public works project of a different character which I also strongly commend to the attention of this government is the erection of a new armoury in the town of Springhill which is in my constituency. For years the existing armoury in that sturdy mining community of some 8,000 people, an ancient wooden structure, not erected by the government in the first place, has been inadequate for its purposes. Now it has been officially condemned as unfit for use. No renovation or reconstruction will prove a satisfactory substitute for a new and modern building.

In this connection let me add that if a community's record of patriotism and military service is to be taken into account in such a case, the town of Springhill is entitled to very high priority indeed. In both great wars the percentage of enlistments from the town was among the highest in Canada, and in the two wars 140 Springhill men fell in the armed service of their country. I would add that enlistment figures were very high in spite of the fact that a great many miners were held at their work in the mines under wartime regulations.

In peacetime reserve army activities are maintained at a high level in the town, with approximately 100 men on the strength of the local company and training each week. Future interest in matters military is ensured by an efficient and enthusiastic cadet corps which has held the best standing in military district No. 6 on various occasions, and in 1950 and 1952 won the King George trophy for marksmanship—emblematic of the Canadian championship. We need not doubt that if the need again arises the rugged miners of Springhill will pour to war as valiantly as in the past.

These are things to be taken into account when consideration is being given to our request for the construction of a new armoury. The present lack of a suitable armoury is a serious handicap to military training and a damper on enthusiasm. We should also bear in mind the importance of a suitable armoury as a meeting place in the social, sporting, and public life of the community.

In this respect I would like to say a few words about the reorganization of militia units in the maritimes. Reorganization took place in Nova Scotia and it was with deep regret that we learned that the honourable name of the North Nova Scotia Highlanders could not be maintained, and that a military unit could not be known as such. The North Nova Scotia Highlanders had a very high and honourable tradition in the last war, and much as we regret that the need for efficiency and economy has meant the disbanding of the unit, I do not believe it will affect the interest and enthusiasm for military training in that area. That being the case, I say that Springhill is fully deserving of a new armoury and I urge the government to provide one as soon as possible.

While on the subject of public works I should like to recommend a comprehensive survey of the docking, dredging, and other harbour and channel requirements of the various ports along the two coast lines of my constituency, Wallace, Pugwash, Northport, Advocate, Spencer's Island, Port Greville, Parrsboro, and the rest. Fishing and shipping are still important constituents in the economy of Cumberland county and deserve every reasonable encouragement.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the mention of Springhill, a coal mining town, calls to mind a topic on which I wish to say a few words, for it constitutes what is perhaps the most serious problem in the Nova Scotia economic picture today, that of the coal mining industry.

A great deal has been said in the past in this house about the state of the coal mining industry, but I make no apology for mentioning the subject again. As we enter another year the future of the industry remains generally sombre and cloudy, particularly for the small independent producer. According to the latest report of the dominion coal board, the forecast is very much the same as before, namely that in spite of increasing competition from oil and natural gas, the increase of population and expansion of industry in Canada will provide, or is expected to provide, sufficient markets by the middle sixties to enable the industry to survive, at least at its present level. This forecast, of course, does not take into account the present incalculable factor of atomic power. However, from that forecast I think we may reasonably hope that the industry is not necessarily doomed to extinction for lack of markets. But the next decade will be a critical one. It will require a continued flow of governmental assistance and co-operation to enable the industry to stagger through to better days. Not only in the interest of the coal-producing provinces but in the national interest as well, it is imperative that this assistance and co-operation be continued and, if necessary, expanded. We have only to remember that coal is still the chief source of energy in Canada, that it is still an essential in time of war and that the mines, if they are once closed, will in all probability never reopen.

I am confident that this government will continue to play a full and generous part in the struggle to save the industry, as it has done in the past. What form of assistance may prove most effective is not an easy question to answer, even for experts. It may prove to lie in the realm of the development of new and commercially practicable uses for coal other than as fuel. That has always been a favourite thesis of my own. It may be found elsewhere. The ultimate answer will probably be a composite of many factors. I hope at a later stage of this session to be able to discuss the matter of the coal industry in much greater detail even as I hope to be able to present the needs of the farmers and of other important economic groups in my constituency. But for the present I merely wish to urge upon this house the emergent nature of the situation confronting the coal mining industry and the necessity of finding a satisfactory solution.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I just wish to revert to an earlier stage of my address and to use that example to emphasize again the need for a special degree of attention by this government to the economic problems of the maritimes.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Lusby), who has just taken his seat, on the excellent balance which he maintained in his speech. He spent about two minutes in chastising the opposition groups for their failure to recognize the fact that we have the best of all possible governments today and about thirty minutes telling us of the injustices from which his part of the country is suffering under that same government.

Unlike many Liberals who have spoken, Mr. Speaker, I find nothing in the throne speech on which I can congratulate the government. One hon. member—I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott)—stated that he was doubly thrilled by this speech. Personally I find myself chilled rather than thrilled—

An hon. Member: It is the weather.

Mr. Noseworthy: —by the nonchalant manner in which the grave and serious social and economic problems of this country are completely ignored in the speech from the throne which is now before us. For instance, there is evidence that for the next five or six months we shall be amending and consolidating existing legislation. In the speech from the throne there is nothing to indicate that we are to be presented with any new legislation designed to cope with the problems that face us today. For instance, there is to be no new legislation providing national health insurance, the need for which is growing and for which there is increasing national support. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are probably expecting too much from this government if we expect them to introduce any such measure as that at a time when we are two or three years from a federal election.

There is to be no improvement in old age pensions, no improvement in family allowances, nor any new social security measures that will redistribute the wealth that we are producing and increase the diminishing purchasing power of the Canadian consumers. No new measures are forecast to check the diminishing net income of our rural population. At a time when bold, progressive measures—measures such as those proposed by this government in their green book of 1945—are needed to meet an unemployment situation which is annually growing more serious, we have offered us nothing that can by any stretch of even Liberal imagination cope with the situation.

It is true that at long last the government has yielded to the repeated requests of veterans organizations and to the annual bombardment from the opposition benches. After nation-wide protest the government has agreed to increase veterans allowances. To the veterans of the country they are offering a few crumbs from a rich uncle's table. There is to be no new housing legislation of such a nature as will make the securing of homes possible for tens of thousands of people who really need homes and who cannot afford to buy them under our present housing legislation, or to rent them. There are no new measures whereby these people may be able to secure houses, unless perchance the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) may be close enough to the government to know what the government's intentions are but which intentions are not expressed in the speech from the throne. If, as I hope, the speech which he made in the house the other day—and which I may say re-echoed requests made by this group a year ago that purchasers' equity in homes should be safeguarded just as is safeguarded the interest of the lending institutions—indicates that there is a prospect of the government's introducing such legislation this year but which they did not forecast in the throne speech, then we say that we are extremely happy. We certainly are delighted to have that speech from the hon. member for Spadina, a member so closely associated with the cabinet that his name on numerous occasions has been mentioned in connection with the post of cabinet minister and other positions within the gift of the government; and I want to add my voice in support of that suggestion. I think the Liberal party is missing a grand opportunity, in so far as Toronto is concerned, in having failed to provide some such position for the hon. member for Spadina. Personally, I should like to see him elevated to the Senate. We might then make more progress in Spadina. However, Mr. Speaker, we hope that some such legislation on housing will be introduced.

There are facing the country today many other problems for which no provision is made in the speech from the throne. For instance, we find no provision made for the employable unemployed other than the possible extension of unemployment insurance benefits. Notwithstanding the fact again that in 1945 the government placed itself on record and outlined its policy as being one of providing unemployment assistance for those who failed to benefit from the Unemployment Insurance Act, there is no evidence that we are to have any application of that policy in this session. We are told in the speech from the throne that our national economy is in a generally healthy condition and although there are half a million or more Canadians looking for jobs that are unavailable the matter is dismissed in the speech from the throne in these words:

> Some unemployment of a regional and seasonal nature is being experienced.

Just how healthy is our national economy, and what are some of the danger signals that can be observed today and which we should be observing if we want to keep that economy in a healthy condition? In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident that our national production is declining while at the same time our labour force is increasing and our technological processes are being improved to the extent that it is becoming possible to produce more goods with fewer workers every year.

Probably one of the best indicators of the level of our production is provided by the dominion bureau of statistics report on railway carloadings for the first ten months of 1954. These months are compared with the first ten months of 1953, and we find that there is considerable indication that the volume of production in at least 15 major products dropped. These major products include fertilizers, petroleum and petroleum products, pulpwood, lumber, grain products, building products, livestock, logs and posts, merchandise, automobiles, trucks and parts, primary iron and steel, iron ore, farm machinery, machinery and castings, and grain. In all of these there has been a considerable reduction in carload loadings in the first ten months of 1954 compared with the same months in 1953. The percentage decreases range as follows: For automobiles a drop of 18 per cent, for primary iron and steel a drop of 21 per cent, for iron ore a drop of 23 per cent, for farm machinery 24 per cent, for machinery and castings 25 per cent, and for grain 34 per cent.

The dominion bureau of statistics report on employment in certain basic industries tells much the same story. It tells the story that with unemployment growing in these basic industries to such an extent there must of necessity be a drop in production. The dominion bureau of statistics figures in their report on employment by industries indicate that in the nine month period from January to September, 1954, unemployment increased in all our major goods producing industries. It increased by 11 per cent in clothing and 11 per cent in the railroad equipment industry. In the latter industry unemployment in September, 1954, was 20 per cent higher than in September, 1953.

There is an 11 per cent increase in unemployment in the automobile and parts industry, an increase of 17 per cent in textiles, 17 per cent in primary iron and steel, and 20 per cent in farm machinery. In the case of farm machinery the decline in employment over the comparable period in 1952 was 34 per cent. In the consumer durable goods industries we have, for example, in the first six months of 1954 a decline of 6 per cent in the production of refrigerators and 20 per cent in the production of washing machines. There was a drop of 16 per cent in employment in aircraft plants below the peak of employment in the spring of 1953, and a drop of 14 per cent in employment in shipbuilding between April and September, 1954.

When figures are available for the last three months of 1954 there is no doubt in the world but that they will show that there has been a greater increase in unemployment and a greater drop in production over the entire year than that shown by the figures for the first nine months of the year. The figures pertaining to railway carloadings and unemployment indicate a considerable decline in production in all our major goods industries, particularly in industrial machinery, farm machinery, railroad equipment, aircraft, shipbuilding and consumer durable goods.

A second danger signal that I think we should watch, and which should lead us to the conclusion that our economy is not in that healthy condition that the government would have us believe it is, is the drop in net farm income. As has already been pointed out in the house, 1954 was the third successive year in which net farm income dropped substantially. While official figures are not yet available, it has been unofficially estimated that net farm income for 1954 will show a drop of $400 million. This would mean that between 1951 and 1954, a period of only three years, net farm income has dropped from $2,150 million to $1,200 million, a drop of 44 per cent.

I think we should all realize, Mr. Speaker, that a drop in farm income has of course been the main reason for the depression in farm machinery plants, for the decline in the demand for trucks, for the dropping off of railway traffic and consequently the large unemployment in the railway equipment industry, building materials, fertilizers, fuels, etc. The relationship with respect to the drop in farm income is reflected in the drop in retail sales in the three prairie provinces which are most affected by that drop in farm income. Retail sales in Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, in the first nine months of 1954, dropped by 3 per cent, 7 per cent and 12 per cent respectively. I believe that drop in retail sales indicates the extent to which those provinces were hit by the drop in farm income.

A third danger signal to which we should be paying some attention is our export position. Our export position was anything but good in 1954. Sales abroad of Canadian wheat and coarse grains from January through October were down 40 per cent from the same period in 1953. Total merchandise exports in the first ten months of the year dropped off 8 per cent in value as compared with the same period in 1953.

There are also some danger signals, Mr. Speaker, indicating that a decrease in production and employment may continue, in fact is most likely to continue in 1955. We all realize that in a country such as Canada where our labour force is increasing at the rate of something over 60,000 annually, and where technological improvements are being introduced continuously, it is not good enough that our production, and consequently our national income, should remain even at the peaks which they attained in earlier years. It is essential, if we are to keep Canada prosperous, that our national income continue to increase.

Some people find considerable solace in the fact that in the recession year of 1954 wages and salaries were maintained at a comparatively high level. As a matter of fact, wages and salaries improved by 1·8 per cent in that year. But the two dynamic factors to which I have referred, that of an increasing labour force and improved technological processes, render it necessary that wages and salary must keep pace with these other two factors. These two factors render the creation of new jobs a necessity in a healthy economy. What is the condition today? From 1952 to 1954, Canada's labour force increased by 122,000. The rate of increase in new jobs tapered off during those years. In 1952 there were 34,300 new jobs created in industry. In 1953 that dropped to 23,000, and it is estimated that in 1954 there will be a further drop to 16,200 or less than half the number of new jobs that were created in 1952.

Some propaganda reports, government and business propaganda, find considerable satisfaction in that, notwithstanding the increased unemployment, there was a slight increase in wages and salaries paid in the year 1954. As I have pointed out already, the increase of output per man hour brought about by our improved technological processes, and possibly better management and better labour-management relations, has rendered it necessary and, as a matter of fact, has made it possible for labour to receive an increasingly larger amount in wages and salaries. The most significant fact is that the rate of increase in average hourly wages dropped off substantially in 1954 as compared with earlier years, as a matter of fact as compared with any year since 1946.

Another danger signal that should demand our attention is the fact that the estimates for capital investment and outlays for repairs during the coming year 1955 remain at about the same level as they were in 1954, or about $7,085 million. If these estimates hold true, 1955 will be the first post-war year in which capital investment has not shown an increase. Capital expenditures in 1954 were 3 per cent higher than those of the previous year, 1953. Personal expenditure in consumer goods and services is estimated by the dominion bureau of statistics to be approximately $15·5 billion. No increase in consumer expenditure is expected for 1955.

If consumer expenditure per capita over the recession year 1954 is to be increased or even maintained, and if there is to be no increase in capital investment by private enterprise, then it becomes evident that if we are to continue to increase our national income, as is necessary, and if we are to provide employment, as is necessary, then the policy which the government laid down for itself in the green book of 1945 must be followed. Government expenditures, either on social welfare work or on capital expenditure projects or both, must be stepped up. We ask the question, where and how can government expenditures be increased? We all realize, of course, that first of all there are the expenditures for the civil service that must of necessity be limited and that must be determined by the standards of efficiency which the government sets for itself and for its employees. Government expenditures may be briefly summed up as follows: first, all current expenditures for goods and services in connection with government services and operations; second, transfer payments, that is social welfare expenditures; third, capital expenditures for roads, buildings, armaments, etc. As I pointed out, the first is of necessity limited. The second can be expanded; and it can be expanded in the best interests of our national economy and of the welfare of the Canadian people if the government decides to do so. And certainly there is ample opportunity for an increase in the third class of government expenditures.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

These transfer payments in the form of family allowances, and the like, influence the rise of employment, as they are converted into consumption expenditures. Increased government expenditures on capital projects raise the levels of new investment. The result: Since national income comprises these two forms of expenditures, the national income is automatically raised by an increase in those expenditures.

Certainly there is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate that the government has any intention at this session of introducing measures of a nature such as were outlined in their own green book of 1945, and which were then designed to meet just such a situation as faces the country at the present time.

For example, as to the responsibility for the unemployed employables, let me read a few lines from the green book:

> As a part of the general arrangement with the provincial governments, the dominion government now proposes to establish a practicable and comprehensive system of assistance to able-bodied unemployed persons as soon as possible, rather than waiting until the need for it actually arises.

I submit the need has actually arisen today. The government has not made provisions in advance of that need, and the time has now come when it should implement that policy because the need is now with us. Here is another statement:

> It is thought necessary not to permit the recurrence of the problems of administration being separated from financial responsibility, and to avoid the makeshift arrangements and controversy with provincial governments which otherwise would be almost certain to recur under the old methods of providing relief even though the number of persons involved were small.

The number of persons involved today s no longer small. They are many, and are increasing. And municipal councils, mayors and reeves from all over the country have been pleading with the federal government to assume responsibility in some measure for these employable unemployed.

Then, one further quotation from this plan of 1945:

> The plan proposes acceptance of dominion responsibility for unemployed employables, and provincial and local responsibility for unemployables . . .

And a further quotation:

> Payments for unemployment assistance would be made under authority of an appropriation for this purpose, out of the consolidated revenue fund, and not out of the unemployment insurance fund.

Those were the policies the government presented to us in 1945, policies then designed to cope with a situation such as that facing the country today, a policy upon which the present cabinet has turned its back, and which it has repudiated. I submit this is the session of parliament when the government should review the promises it made to the country in that green book of 1945 and, in the light of present economic conditions, it should bring those policies into effect at this session.

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, before coming to the substance of my remarks, as one who was congratulated about eight years ago on having moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne I wish to join with my colleagues in congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address. Listening to their speeches at the opening of the session one was led to realize that the constituents in those two ridings had elected two very distinguished members. In the light of the qualifications stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as to their public service before entering the House of Commons, and keeping in mind the substance of their speeches, we may rest assured that the electors of those two ridings will see that these two members are re-elected at later dates.

On this occasion I do not intend to discuss what might be called the highlights of the speech from the throne. I congratulate the government upon having mentioned and bringing in at this session certain remedial measures for the development of the economy of this country, and also for having introduced a measure dealing with employment which will be beneficial to the labouring class in Canada.

This afternoon I asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) certain questions in connection with the construction of a public building in Winnipeg. I regret there has been so much delay in starting work on this building, and that there is still delay in creating work for labour in the greater Winnipeg area.

If reports are correct, then I must express my disappointment that not only was the contract given to an eastern firm, but that the goods and supplies are to come from eastern Canada. Surely in the greater Winnipeg area of Manitoba we have responsible contracting firms whose bids or tenders could have been accepted. As yet no decision has been taken with respect to subcontracts covering the bulk of the material to be used in the building, and I hope the contracting firm will see fit to invite tenders from responsible manufacturing firms in Manitoba. We have some very able firms manufacturing not only cement and steel but also electrical devices which will be required in the building.

This afternoon it is my intention to address the house publicly as to what I consider abuse by certain government officials at the level of deputy minister, or its equal, in flouting certain laws of parliament, disregarding members of parliament, and treating parliament with contempt. For the last ten years, mostly during sessions of parliament or, at times, between sessions, either by correspondence or by visits to this capital city requesting certain consideration, as a member of parliament I have felt injured by the treatment received from certain officials at the level of deputy minister, or its equal.

The reason I am determined to make this public this afternoon is that one of these criminal injustices occurred last fall in the province of Manitoba, and I warned the deputy minister concerned that I would make it public. I am going to ask for remedial measures to be taken to correct this situation. Naturally in the 40 minutes allotted to me I will not be able to bring before this house all the injustices that have been perpetrated upon valiant, hard-working civil servants throughout this country. I shall limit my remarks, as I said a while ago, to one injustice which occurred in my own province of Manitoba.

I contend that this situation is the result of not having a fully functioning civil service commission as laid down in the Civil Service Act which was passed years ago by this parliament. The act states that there shall be three commissioners who will hold no other office in the civil service or engage in any other employment. We have the chairman on duty as well as one other commissioner, but during the past four years the third commissioner, who represents French-speaking Canada, has spent more of his time in foreign lands than in the capital city where he should be in order to carry out his duties according to the act passed by this parliament.

When the Civil Service Act was passed and this commission created, the number of civil servants was not as large as it is now. The number of civil servants has reached the point where three commissioners cannot have full knowledge of the details concerning the thousands and thousands of civil servants employed by this country. So, according to the act, responsibility has been transferred to the deputy heads of the departments. The result has been the creation of this vicious circle which now exists within the civil service of this nation. It is because of this that we had this injustice which was perpetrated in Manitoba last fall.

The deputy heads connive together when they do not want a certain individual, who may be ready to retire in eight or nine months, to be succeeded by his assistant. Then they make application according to the act. This may be legal, but it satisfies that lust for power which exists in the ordinary human being, and the net result is that the title and qualifications of the position are changed along with a change in the salary. But when the assistant is in a position to assume the office, what happens? He finds that he must take part in a competition because the position has been changed and his qualifications do not entitle him to succeed as the head of that branch within the department.

This is not a far-fetched statement; this condition has existed. If my voice could be heard—and no doubt what I say will be noted by the press in a few days—if the crying injustices done to many civil servants could be recorded and presented to a committee of this house, I am satisfied that following the action of that committee application could be made to the governor in council to remove these deputy heads who have abused their office and imposed injustice upon faithful civil servants throughout the country.

A few years ago a vacancy occurred in Manitoba in the Post Office Department. The vacancy was advertised in the usual manner by the civil service commission, by means of a poster issued in its name by the Post Office Department. The successful candidate was not one who pleased the unelected depository of power in the Post Office Department in the capital city. What happened? A board of appeal was set up, consisting of three members. Two members of the civil service commission refused to accept the application of the protégé of this unelected depository of power in the Post Office Department, and the third member submitted a minority report.

When this news reached the capital city a new board of appeal was created, and the third member of the previous board who had submitted a minority report and who represented the Post Office Department was made the chairman. With what result? The result was that the protégé was immediately selected to fill the position of inspector for the Post Office Department, over and above the heads of more qualified civil servants in the Post Office Department in the province of Manitoba.

This situation has existed for quite a while. Last fall I was duly informed that one of the post office inspectors in Manitoba, the only French-speaking inspector in the province, was to retire on March 1, 1955. He was ill last year, and it was said that because of his illness he was requested to tender his resignation as of December 1, 1954. Naturally I was quite concerned over whether the principle of bilingualism was going to be maintained in the province of Manitoba. I came down to the capital city, and I was given the assurance by this unelected depository of power in the Post Office Department not only that the principle of bilingualism would be maintained, but that a competition would be held to select a qualified candidate to replace the retiring post office inspector.

I returned to Winnipeg, or rather I should say to St. Boniface, and was there only a few days when I was informed by a responsible official that I should pay no attention to the assurances given to me by the officials of the Post Office Department in Winnipeg because on December 1 Mr. So-and-So would be appointed as inspector or, as they now call it, area superintendent. I flew at my own expense to the capital city and appealed to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote). I inquired if the information I had received was quite correct. His answer was "Yes. Why?"

It was not that he had discovered himself that it was not possible to hold a competition or to name a bilingual candidate in the province of Manitoba, but that he had been informed by the deputy postmaster general, part of this unelected depository of power, that a regulation of the civil service commission had been discovered which stipulated that when there was not 20 per cent French-speaking or English-speaking there was no need of bilingualism in any area in this nation of ours.

The figures were submitted by the deputy postmaster general who had them all prepared, apparently after a long study. They could only have been obtained through researches by the bureau of statistics and the Post Office Department while the member for St. Boniface was here in the capital city seeking from responsible officials confirmation of the statement that there would be a competition and the principle of bilingualism would be maintained in Manitoba.

The figure given was 18·54 per cent. I know my own province, and I know we have a larger number than that within the area where this postal inspector was going to work. However, I am not going to dispute the fact that we are short 1 per cent. They insisted on this 1 per cent in the Post Office Department, not because they wanted to respect the Civil Service Act, not because the regulation established by the civil service commission said not less than 20 per cent, but because of a lust for power. They wanted this principle established two years ago, and they railroaded it through in the province of Manitoba despite the civil service commission. The post office department of Manitoba will remain with only 1 per cent of French-speaking employees at the level of administration.

I naturally brought this to the attention of the Postmaster General, and I was told I did not understand the regulations of the act. I was reminded of the words of the deputy postmaster general, that as long as he held office he would never appoint anyone who was mediocre, regardless of the large number of French-speaking Canadians living in the province of Manitoba. I suppose the Postmaster General meant that he would only employ those who had a super education, but for him to call French-speaking Canadians mediocre is not only an insult to them and to myself as a member of parliament, but is treating this house with contempt, for such an attitude is directly contrary to the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

One realizes how absurd his attitude is when we recall that the government spent thousands of dollars to have a firm in Toronto investigate the operations of the Post Office Department, and found that the deputy postmaster general was himself inefficient in carrying out his responsibilities. Despite the findings of that investigation that gentleman still carries on, creating injustices such as the one I have mentioned which result in the morale of the employees of the department being kept at a very low ebb.

Not long ago I brought to his attention a tender which was submitted in Ottawa. If my memory serves me right the tender arrived at four o'clock on October 7, 1954, and it related to a contract for over $1 million in the province of Manitoba. As a matter of fact three tenders left Manitoba at 1.20 a.m. on October 7 and arrived in Ottawa at 9.25 a.m. Two were by special delivery and one was by registered mail, but it took seven and a half hours to deliver these three tenders practically just across the street in Ottawa. One of the special delivery letters arrived at defence production at 2.45 p.m., but the other two did not arrive until 4.11 p.m. It appears that Mr. Johnston could do nothing else but refuse the other two contracts because of the regulation. The net result of that transaction was a loss to the taxpayers of $36,000, because one of the delayed contracts carried the lowest tender. That money was lost to the taxpayers because of the inefficiency of the Post Office Department. So here we have an official of the government flouting laws passed by parliament, insulting a member of parliament, and being inefficient in the handling of his responsibilities.

In my own province of Manitoba an official has been appointed to a position in the post office to which he is not entitled. But before dealing with that I would remind the house that not so long ago the Post Office Department, without consulting members of parliament or provincial and civic officials, established what is called a zoning system in greater Winnipeg. That system will never work. It might work in cities such as Toronto, Montreal, or Winnipeg, but certainly not in the greater Winnipeg area. I opposed the introduction of this system, with the result that it is not now in effect in the constituency of St. Boniface. But as an example of just how ridiculous this can be, I have a letter here addressed to "The Postmaster, Winnipeg, 297 Des Meurons," and in brackets after that comes "St. Boniface, Winnipeg, Manitoba". We spend thousands of dollars to educate our children in geography and the civic structure of this country, and here we have officials of the government flouting our beautiful history by implementing a system which makes no sense whatsoever.

Following the Woods-Gordon report of last July, post office officials in Ottawa advertised a promotion competition for area superintendents. That is the new name given to postal inspectors. This competition was confined to the Winnipeg area. At that time a certain A. Vermander and Mr. Walker, both postal inspectors, retired, but no vacancy was created and the name of the post was changed to that of area superintendent. After Mr. Vermander was called upon to retire last fall

I was given an assurance by the deputy postmaster general that there would be a competition covering the appointment of a bilingual area superintendent in Manitoba. This assurance was given after I came here at my own expense and was ridiculed by the deputy postmaster general and two of his officials, the executive assistant and the director of administration. But on December 1, 1954, a sign in French and English was posted in every office in Manitoba with the following ultimatum to all civil servants employed by the Post Office Department. It is headed "Appeal Notice" and then comes the following:

The department has approved of the following transfer without advertising a formal competition subject to no appeals being sustained.

This is contrary to the Civil Service Act, which states that if there is a vacancy the deputy head of the department must advise the civil service commission, which will take the necessary measures to formally advertise a competition.

But who was the successful candidate? A short time ago I mentioned a certain protégé of the deputy assistant to the Postmaster General, and he in fact was the man who was railroaded into the position over the heads of fully qualified members of the civil service in the province of Manitoba. The man who was appointed area superintendent for Winnipeg without a formal competition was Mr. R. J. Emerson. This was done contrary to the act. It denied the French-speaking population of Manitoba the right of employment, and also denied the rights of highly qualified personnel employed in that area.

All I can do now, Mr. Speaker, is to ask the government of Canada to see that the civil service commission acts in accordance with the regulations of the Civil Service Act. The Postmaster General, his deputy or the civil service commission should be called upon to remove Mr. Emerson from office immediately and to advertise a competition for a bilingual area superintendent for Winnipeg. The competition should then be carried out in accordance with the act. We have the qualified personnel, and it is high time some of the ministers of this government inquired closely into the actions of some of their deputies, particularly when it comes to an appointment of the kind I have mentioned. Action should be taken when an injustice has been done and when a member of parliament brings that privately to the minister's attention, for it will then be possible to handle the matter without the necessity of a member of parliament having to make the matter public as I have now done.

[Mr. Viau.]

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to add my word of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They are both young members. Not only did they speak well but their material was well prepared.

In so far as the speech from the throne is concerned, I was disappointed that mention was not made of matters which I consider to be of urgent importance. I was glad to see that some measure was to be introduced to deal with war veterans allowances. I feel that such a measure is overdue. I can never agree with the statement made by one hon. member to the effect that he did not believe men had aged prematurely ten years in the war. I think it is a well-established fact that the men of the first war particularly aged prematurely at least ten years in their period of service. There is no special yardstick by which the effect can be diagnosed, but many of these veterans with excellent service are in need of higher payments owing to the present cost of living and the cost of maintaining their homes.

This debate on the address is of value to this house because it gives members an opportunity to present to parliament conditions in their own ridings, and as well to call the attention of parliament to the position of the country as a whole. I cannot be accused in any way of talking blue ruin in this country because I do not believe this to be a fact, for the future of Canada is possibly brighter than that of any other country on the globe. Canada covers 3,695,000 square miles and has 13,000 miles of coast line on the great lakes and the seas. The territory of Canada is about the same size as that of Europe and larger than that of the United States. There are 300 million acres of arable land in Canada, and of that 300 million acres only about half are cultivated. The surface has only been scratched of our vast mineral resources. Industry has grown, and in 73 years the value of manufactured goods has made progress from a few million to more than $5 billion.

It is true that there are matters of urgent importance affecting this country. We find marked unemployment, falling markets and an unfortunate economic balance in agriculture where the price received by the farmers for their commodities is going down and the farmer finds himself faced with the present high cost of consumer goods which he finds it necessary to buy.

Much credit has been taken by this government in past years and even up to the present time with regard to the growth and the prosperity of Canada. My faith in Canada is so great that, in spite of adverse conditions, I believe Canada will still grow and will still prosper. I am reminded of the statement made years ago by that delightful figure in the world of entertainment, Will Rogers. He was not only an entertainer but also a philosopher. Once, when discussing the political situation in the United States—that of Democrats versus Republicans—he made a statement that I think could be well taken to heart by those who argue blue ruin. He said, "This country is too big to be destroyed by any political party".

I wish to present to you today the position of the agriculturalists and more particularly that of the dairy farmers, not only in my own riding but in the whole of the dominion. I find that there is considerable misunderstanding with regard to the difficulties faced by this great industry, especially on the part of those who are not actively engaged in the industry itself. The county of Lanark has been recognized for years as an important centre in the dairy industry, and over the years it has been especially noted for its production of cheddar cheese manufactured both for export and for domestic consumption.

It should be appreciated that dairy farming is an occupation which requires many hours of hard work. It is not merely a matter of a six-day week. Even on Sundays cows must be milked and cared for, and milk must be prepared and cooled in order that it may reach market on Monday in good condition. Not only is there this consideration, but in order to build up a good dairy herd and secure high production, there must be constant care and supervision. Any dairy farmer can tell you that it is an expensive proposition for him during the years when he builds up a good dairy herd. There is also the cost of maintaining equipment such as silos and barns. Of late years the cost of labour has been so high that it is a factor which must be taken into account in the cost of production.

As an industry, dairying is one of the most important in Canada. It is not generally realized that 450,000 farmers depend upon the dairy industry as their source of income. Indirectly two million Canadians derive part or all of their income from this source. That includes those engaged in production, distribution, processing and supplying various services and equipment. It contributes more than $600 million to our national commerce. Food, of course, is the main product, and this includes butter, cheese, cream, bottled milk, powdered milk and many other types of food provided by dairy herds. I mention these facts in order to bring before this house and the public the importance of this industry.

Last November the bureau of statistics showed a drop in the cost of living index, and it was to be noted that the lower figure was accounted for by food prices. This figure would have been considerably lower were it not for the fact that the cost of other commodities showed a rise or remained at their former figures. In plain language, the drop in the cost of living was due to the farmer. Reports at the end of the year showed that the drop in farm income in 1954 amounted to 13 per cent. To one section of our population this was a pleasant thing, because cheaper farm commodities meant cheaper food. But there is something more serious which has been generally disregarded by a large portion of the public, namely the drop in farm income; and the drop in general food prices has had much to do with the jobs of ordinary Canadians.

We are hearing all sorts of reasons, even in this house, as the causes of unemployment. It has been called seasonal, and even the weather has been blamed. But everybody who talks about it apparently avoids the obvious explanation. One reason is plainly outstanding. Far too many farmers have not available the cash with which to buy manufactured goods, nor have they the cash when it is necessary to employ labour themselves. We must remember that the 450,000 dairy farmers, together with their families and all the people who are connected with the dairy trade, consume large quantities of manufactured goods. We cannot afford to have the income of that large group of people so reduced that their buying power will be impaired.

The buying power of the farmers is required in connection with goods manufactured by Canadian industry, by Canadian labour. When the buying power of the farmers becomes impaired—and let us remember that there are several hundred thousand farmers—there is a slow-down of our industrial economy, and we have the kind of unemployment that we are experiencing in Canadian business today.

Under present conditions in Canada it is an excellent thing to be able to obtain cheap food. I repeat that the drop in our consumer price index, or the cost of living record, is mainly due to the fact that there has been a drop in the price of food. In this connection it is well to remember that cheaper food is related to jobs; I refer to jobs of people employed in industry and manufacture. There is little good in the saving of a few cents on the cost of a spread for bread, or a pound of processed cheese, if the result is going to be that more Canadians are thrown out of jobs. Let me again emphasize the fact that in this case food costs are related to jobs.

The average farm family buys about four times as much goods of every description as does the average urban family. The farmer buys not only the necessities for his household but, in addition, buys largely the products of industry in the nature of farm implements and various types of goods or machinery which he uses in his work on the farm. When the farmer makes less money he does not buy, and the people who are employed in other industries, who live and are consumers in urban centres, should remember that when they demand cheaper food they are, without thinking, contributing to unemployment within their own country. I do not blame people for wishing to buy their food more cheaply. This is only natural with the present high cost of living, but one must take a broad and long-term view of the matter.

I now come to the question of the importation of New Zealand cheese. There is an old saw about carrying coals to Newcastle, and this is about the most surprising deal one could imagine. In Canada we have cheese to give away and now more of it is being hauled thousands of miles across the Pacific, adding to the confusion. There has been some mystery about this deal, because it is extremely difficult under the circumstances to find why such a deal was ever made. Under the deal 2,250,000 pounds of New Zealand cheese are being imported into Canada at a time when about 10 million pounds more cheese is reported in Canada than there was a year ago. If an importer can bring in New Zealand cheese, this takes the props from under any Canadian dairy product.

Further, if what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) says means unrestricted imports of cheese and powdered and processed milk, then within six months Canadian products will be at the world price, which is approximately $2 a hundred for milk. It may be argued that this New Zealand cheese is only one shipment, is not likely to be repeated, and is not a matter of great moment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in the house a few days ago that no further imports of New Zealand cheese are expected for six or nine months.

Apparently a verbal agreement was made in 1952 whereby New Zealand agreed not to send cheese to Canada for the reason that Canadian producers were having difficulty in selling to the British market. The Ontario cheese producers' association has been working, at considerable expense to the organization, to stabilize this department of the dairy industry of the country. In fact it has raised over a million dollars for the purpose of exporting Canada's surplus. Now the cheese producers find that the market is completely disorganized, and it was already in a difficult position.

The statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the house on January 10 has added to the confusion, as it appears that the way is left open for unrestricted imports of dairy products from New Zealand. It has placed the cheese producers of Ontario in a very precarious position. Under difficult circumstances they have been doing an unusually fine job in marketing their products. They have a marketing scheme, and they are a thriving organization. But at the same time they have incurred large debts, and they have a large stock of cheese on hand.

The organization was built up largely with the blessing of the federal and Ontario governments. Under existing legislation the federal government guaranteed them 24 cents a pound. The Ontario government gave them other guarantees. The cheese producers have built a large warehouse at Belleville and have another under construction at Winchester. This has been done by means of Ontario government loans. These warehouses were built to facilitate the handling and proper storage of cheese. The federal Department of Agriculture has been close to their activities, and with the full knowledge of that department the cheese producers have deducted two cents on every pound of cheese produced in 1954 to bonus or subsidize their exports to the United Kingdom. By the use of the funds thus created they have exported over 4 million pounds of cheese to the United Kingdom.

I received a letter a few days ago from the patrons of a cheese factory in my own area pointing out that from cheese sales totalling $59,881, they had paid $3,883 to the fund to stabilize the price of cheese. The fund was built up at the rate of two cents a pound on cheese, which was equal to 17 cents on every hundred pounds of milk. One must admit that this was a very high contribution in order to build up their industry and retain markets. The cheese producers now hold and own 10½ million pounds of cheese, which would require $2,853,000 to liquidate it at 27¼ cents a pound. At the same time they owe the banks on guaranteed loans over $3,300,000. One must admire these producers for their confidence in the industry to date, because they were in business to help themselves with the full knowledge and apparently the blessing of the federal Department of Agriculture.

Unfortunately they received no advance warning of this New Zealand shipment, although details must have been known to persons in Canada some months ago. Because the federal and Ontario governments have given encouragement and guarantees, both these governments have a stake in the cheese stocks which are now held by the producers' own organization. Even the threat of further imports could force down domestic cheese prices. Then both governments would lose considerable amounts of money. The cheese marketing scheme apparently has been working well and satisfactorily, but buyers will have lost confidence.

There is about 10 million pounds more of cheese reported in Canada today than there was a year ago. Let us assume that this is surplus to our needs, so that an export policy is needed to get it moving abroad. The importation of cheese from New Zealand was completely unnecessary, and it now makes the job of selling Canadian cheese more difficult. The smaller traders will be doubtful for some time about buying in quantity. No doubt an argument will be made that the 2¼ million pounds represented by the New Zealand importation will cost the firm finally receiving it more than the world price, and that it will give them no great advantage in the price field. It was rumoured that this cheese was sold by the New Zealand dairy board in Halifax, off ship, at a considerable premium over the price received by the same board from the United Kingdom, and that the cost to the final buyer will be around 27 cents.

The prevailing price of Ontario cheese for domestic buyers has been around 30 cents for the past year, and somewhat less for Quebec cheese. The home price in New Zealand for cheese shipped to the United Kingdom really amounts to about 21½ cents in Canadian funds. If the threat of further New Zealand cheese imports is held over the head of the Canadian industry, it is not very difficult to see the implications involved therein. Canadian milk producers, at world prices for dairy products, would receive less than $2 a hundredweight for milk at the farm.

No matter what the cost of milk production is in other countries, we must be fully aware of the fact that it cannot be produced for any such amount in Canada. No farmer can keep ten to twelve dairy cattle on a farm for a day, feeding them and milking them, for $2. It just cannot be done in this country, where our whole milk producers get over $4 per hundredweight.

Unemployment is now a big issue in Canada. It is so big an issue, in fact, that a special bill was introduced into parliament for consideration not very long ago. There is no reason to look any further for causes of unemployment. One of the reasons stares us in the face. Over two million Canadians have less money to spend and they are buying fewer automobiles, sewing machines, tractors, farm implements and trucks. Fewer men are required to make these machines. This in large part is the story of unemployment. The importation of 2¼ million pounds of New Zealand cheese may have enabled some Canadian manufacturer to sell some products to our sister dominion. In the long run many more might have been sold right here in Canada to Canadian farmers if the latter had the money with which to buy them.

The entire dairy industry is carrying on under the competition of cheap imports in the various forms of edible oils which are coming here from other countries, especially the United States. I mention this fact because it is one of the difficulties the dairy farmers are facing today. With the addition of these shipments of cheese from New Zealand, the position of the dairy farmers is going to be extremely difficult.

Some of the areas from which edible oils are obtained have a very low standard of living. Wages are only a fraction of those paid in this country. The duty on these edible oils is either small or non-existent. I point out that Canadian farmers are asked to compete with a product exported from countries with the lowest wage rates in the world. No other industry in Canada would stand for such competition.

Other Canadian farmers outside the dairy industry are beginning to realize their position. A few weeks ago the soybean growers of western Ontario appeared before a dairy convention in Toronto and the annual meeting of the Ontario federation, asking these bodies to work with them to secure protection against cheap imports. In the face of public demand for cheap consumer goods, one must realize again the importance of maintaining the dairy industry, composed of 450,000 farmers, and of maintaining the buying power of the two million people who contribute in some way to this great industry.

There has been a considerable decline in our exports during the past year. Canada is losing markets to which she formerly exported agricultural products such as milk, milk powder, cheese and pork. There is a general tendency to say, and I quote the words, "Canadian farmers cannot compete in world markets due to high prices." This may be true, but it creates an entirely wrong impression. It gives the impression that farmers have raised their prices to such a degree they are unable to compete with farmers in other countries. It also gives the impression that if farmers would only reduce their prices they could sell more abroad.

The truth is that not only farmers but other Canadian producers find themselves being priced out of world markets. If all other things were equal farmers would be glad to cut their prices so they could export, provided they would not be expected to do all the cutting. Farmers and manufacturers in other countries can sell for less in the world markets because their costs are less, wages are lower and the standard of living is lower. Canadian farmers have made a substantial contribution, but this has been offset by high processing and handling charges. Canadian consumers are not receiving the full benefits of lower farm prices, because costs over which the farmer has no control have risen.

Turning to another subject, I may say that I was interested in a speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) in Montreal in November. He indicated in that speech that he found taxes in Canada pretty high—those were his words—and he was amazed that Canadian citizens put up with them. I enjoyed hearing someone in the government say this, especially the Minister of Finance. Evidently the minister is aware of the burden on industry and the people in general.

There is no doubt about the requirements for defence and general maintenance, and allowance must be made for increased services. But if our industries are going to succeed in a competitive market there must be a cutting down of costs. This must start with a real program of economy within the government. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that it is true of human nature that where a person has been living high, with almost unlimited money to spend, it is sometimes difficult to learn how to restrict unnecessary spending. I suggest that in this connection study should be given to the report of the Auditor General.

There has been a great deal of discussion on the matter of cutting costs in order that we may export, and a tendency to blame various groups or sections of our people. It is sometimes difficult for any one group to make the first move because of the cost of living. Hardship is always involved if the balance between income and the cost of living is disturbed. The workers in any industry wage a continuous struggle to maintain the balance between wages and the cost of living.

Our great neighbour to the south, the United States, is almost self-contained. They have a domestic market of 160 million people. There is complete interchangeability of goods among the 48 states. Again I cannot help but point out that our domestic market is only 15 million people. This brings up the question of the importance of immigration, and the building up of our population as a long-term plan cannot be overemphasized. If we doubled our population that would give us a domestic market which would absorb more and more of our industrial products, including agricultural products. The development of our natural resources would mean many more workers, more buyers of domestic consumer goods and a greatly increased domestic market. It therefore follows that in such a long-term program of development there would be more employment for Canadian workers.

Certain factors must be taken into consideration in meeting competition. Taxes add to the cost of production and place our industries at an unfair disadvantage. When industry suffers in this way, unemployment is created. Industrial growth is hampered by high corporation taxes. Increased consumer buying power stimulates industrial expansion, and in turn creates more jobs. Steps taken toward lowering taxes would decrease production costs and help our industries to meet competition, not only in the domestic field but in the export markets as well.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that there is no mention of economy in the speech from the throne. Every year the government says the Canadian taxpayer must produce more money. Taxes can defeat their own ends. If the tax levy is at too high a rate, production and expansion in industry are decreased and in the end the tax will produce less revenue than a somewhat lower rate. A corporation tax of 49 per cent would leave little room for industrial expansion, cutting of costs, and hence ability to meet foreign competition.

I am fully aware of the difficulties involved in world trading today, but again I point out that under present conditions we cannot afford to sacrifice the great Canadian dairy industry. The international tension that exists today makes it necessary, for our own preservation, that we maintain this important industry as part of our program of preparedness.

The farm implement industry now has marked unemployment. In this connection I wish to briefly discuss the Colombo plan. Canada has voted $100 million to help the economic development of south and south-east Asia, and to help raise the standard of living of the 570 million people in that area. The Department of External Affairs, in discussing the Colombo plan, has stated:

> India's food problem is tremendous. There is never enough food produced in India to feed the population at even the minimum standard to which they are accustomed.

The shortage of food amounts to five million tons. According to the same statement the government of India seems to be fully aware of the desperate need to close this gap, and its five-year development plan concentrates on increased agricultural production. We are told that India devotes 17·5 per cent of investment capital to the improvement and extension of agriculture, and 21 per cent to irrigation. It would seem that it is India's policy to grow more food for her people.

Apparently it is left to the country receiving the help under the Colombo plan to decide how the money should be expended. If the policy of India is to grow more food it will mean bringing more land under cultivation and improving the farming methods on the new land as well as the areas already under crop. The improvement could be carried out in some ways by using certain types of Canadian farm machinery.

Of the $51 million Canada sent to aid India, we find that none of the money has been spent on farm machinery. Pakistan and Ceylon received the remaining $48 million, and of that sum only $200,000 has been spent on farm machinery. Canada sent to India locomotives, electrical equipment, boilers and the like, but no plows, tractors or other farm implements. It would seem that in India, which is concentrating on increasing the production of foodstuffs and has reclaimed two million acres of land, added to another eight million acres which were brought under irrigation, it is poor policy to continue working on land by primitive methods which in years gone by have never yielded adequate crops.

I am aware of the difficulty in teaching these new methods as opposed to the ancient methods in some of those countries; but if sufficient food is to be grown then new methods will have to be adopted. In view of the fact that the farm implement industry in Canada is going through a difficult period from lack of orders, I suggest that measures be taken to increase the shipment of those commodities to such countries as India which are receiving help under the Colombo plan. Certainly $200,000 worth of implements is a very small proportion of the $100 million Canada has already expended. I believe expenditures under the Colombo plan represent money well spent, and will bring excellent results. But as I have suggested, it would help the farm implement industry in Canada if a due proportion of Canada's expenditures were to consist of agricultural implements.

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I am always very favourably impressed by the high level of debate and the effective presentations one hears in the house, to the point where sometimes I am a little diffident about making my own contribution. I wish particularly, however, to congratulate the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply. The hon. member for Verdun made a most eloquent presentation. This is understandable in one who comes from a province where fine speakers and great orators are the order of the day. And most certainly one must take justifiable pride in the clear, concise and comprehensive remarks of one's closer associate from the Toronto area, the hon. member for Trinity.

It is understandable that many hon. members are most concerned about the unemployment situation. I think we all feel that, so long as one person who wants work is unable to find it, for him the distress is great indeed. During the past two years we have seen a change in economic conditions on a world-wide scale. Competition has increased greatly in the selling field in all parts of the world, particularly with the economic come-back of the European countries, including Germany and Great Britain. We have witnessed a change from a wartime economy, with defence expenditures predominant, to a peacetime economy and certainly to a more normal period of economic growth and change. This change has been followed with some anxiety and certainly with a great deal of interest by the investor, the businessman and the worker.

Fortunately there has been no great economic upheaval, although there has been some economic upset. We see a residue of unemployment now resulting in Canada. The latest figures I have from the dominion bureau of statistics indicate that on November 30 of last year 214,000 persons were out of work and seeking employment. This was the total in a labour force of 5,417,000 workers, or a little more than 3½ per cent of the total labour force.

Without wishing to minimize the seriousness of unemployment generally I should like to draw a comparison between the monthly unemployment figures of the years 1953 and 1954, to show the increase per month during that time. For example, in March 1953 there were 172,000 persons seeking employment and in the corresponding month of 1954 there were 318,000, or an increase of 146,000. In April of 1953 we find the figure to be 165,000 and in 1954 to be 303,000, or a slightly smaller increase of 138,000. For May of 1953 the figure was 114,000, and in 1954 it was 217,000, or an increase of 103,000. In June, July and August the increase per month was 95,000, 82,000 and 83,000, respectively. The same proportions applied for September, but in October the increase had dropped to 68,000 and in November the increase over the corresponding month in the previous year had dropped to 63,000.

I know the argument will be offered that one can do anything with figures, but I do suggest that they indicate a strong trend. The problem is serious, but it was not as serious at the end of that period, namely in November of 1954, as it was in March of that year. And I think we have good reason to hope that this trend will continue. I do not share the view of the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) who felt that unemployment would continue to increase to a point where we would have about 600,000 unemployed before the close of the winter months. If the trend I have indicated continues I feel the situation at that time will be somewhat less serious than it was last winter.

In Toronto we are very fortunate in this respect. In a recent issue of the Globe and Mail there is a comment by an official of the unemployment insurance commission to the effect that there is the equivalent of a little more than one person unemployed for every 28 employed in that city. We know that unemployment figures vary from municipality to municipality and from area to area, and that the unemployment situation is most serious in some areas. I do feel that in those places the intelligent allocation of public works and projects is most important to alleviate local situations.

While I am on this subject I will point out that an awkward problem does exist in connection with the relief of the employable unemployed. I know the federal government has been charged with complete responsibility for these persons. The statement is made that in the green book, which is the record of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and 1946, the dominion government made certain proposals in this connection. I would point out, however, that when an offer is made it does not constitute a binding contract until such offer has been accepted. At that time, as we know, the two largest and richest provinces did not accept the offer. Ontario entered into a separate tax agreement in 1948, and Quebec has not as yet entered into any agreement. Therefore the legal responsibility still rests, of course, with the provinces for the relief of the employable unemployed.

It is true that we have taken on the task of providing an unemployment insurance act. Many people feel that because we have done so we should assume complete responsibility for unemployment. From a practical point of view it might be better to administer this type of thing by one government and with one administration. Perhaps that is the only really businesslike way in which the matter can be handled. But you cannot take on a financial responsibility which by virtue of the constitution rests upon the provinces unless you enter into some agreement with them to safeguard yourself at the time you take over. When a dominion-provincial conference is held in the future I feel that this question should be placed high on the agenda, and it should be decided definitely where the responsibility will lie.

When we look at the third quarter of 1954 and the beginning of 1955 we see a feeling of buoyancy and optimism expressed by our business leaders, by our newspaper columnists and commentators. Despite the unemployment I feel I have caught some of that feeling of buoyancy and optimism. I think as a federal government we should do all we can to foster an optimistic outlook.

One of the strongest pillars of employment, in metropolitan Toronto in any event, has been our housing program. The government must feel most gratified indeed at the unqualified success of the National Housing Act over the past year. We know that on the national level in 1953 some $280 million was invested in National Housing Act loans. For the first nine months of 1954 that figure had increased to $418 million, nearly twice as much for just the first nine months of that year. It showed a tremendous increase.

In the Toronto area some 7,500 homes were built under National Housing Act auspices in 1953. In the first nine months of 1954 that figure had doubled, to 15,000. The manager of the local office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Scarborough tells me that over 60 per cent of all National Housing Act homes built in metropolitan Toronto were constructed in that township. I am quite proud of that. Over 7,000 homes were constructed during the year in Scarborough, which is certainly most gratifying.

The building of homes has a tremendous impact upon our economy in the way of providing employment and an outlet for investment. In this connection I should like to quote from a speech delivered by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) to the Electrical club in Montreal on December 1 last. The minister said:

> By the end of the year Canadians will have spent about $1,250,000,000 on new housing during 1954 alone. This is 5 per cent of our gross national product. This program means expenditures on materials of over $680 million, and employment for a labour force of an average of about 100,000 men for a full year on site alone.

We are all anxious to keep the housing program or housing boom—I think I can use that word—continuing at its present level, if not increasing. We must look at some of the problems involved in this situation. If we are to bring housing into a more effective field of demand where it will be progressively necessary to build more houses, then the price of housing must be brought within the reach of the average income groups.

One of the largest items of cost in connection with housing, at least in the metropolitan Toronto area, is the cost of serviced land. Municipalities hesitate to impose increasingly heavy tax burdens on the taxpayers in these communities. The largest single item of cost to the community is that of providing schools. I noticed in the January 7 issue of the Toronto Daily Star that the township of North York, a great part of which is in my riding, has a program for schools that will cost more than that of any municipality in the country. The cost of education falls directly upon the home owners. In my riding this accounts for 50 per cent, or in some cases 60 per cent, of the real estate tax bill. This is really a crippling proportion. As I say, municipal councils hesitate to embark upon new housing projects if this taxation has to be increased.

We are often requested as a federal government to contribute toward the cost of education. Under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, which allocate powers to the provinces and the dominion, we do not have jurisdiction to interfere with or to make direct contributions toward elementary schooling, or toward secondary schooling for that matter. We have made contributions to the universities which have been accepted and administered by the provinces. I think in a future dominion-provincial conference the question of federal contributions toward education might be usefully dealt with.

We could confer a direct benefit upon municipalities by allowing real estate taxes to be deducted from net taxable income for income tax purposes. I realize that this is not the first time this has been suggested in the house. On checking Hansard I notice that the former member for York West, the late Rodney Adamson, at one time made this very suggestion. There may be more equitable ways to reduce taxes if that is what we have in mind. I feel that this would not be so much a reduction in taxes as an adjustment to encourage the continued expansion of the housing industry. I think perhaps it is worthy of some consideration. I admit that I have not attacked all sides or looked at all the considerations that might arise in connection with his suggestion, and I must admit that the suggestion may be considered a selfish one on my part because more than 95 per cent of my constituents are home owners.

Mr. Nicholson: Could the hon. member estimate what it would cost the federal treasury?

Mr. Enfield: No, I do not have any estimate of the cost of this reduction to the federal treasury.

The question arises as to the application of the sales tax and excise tax in connection with supplies purchased by school boards for maintenance and construction. We saw this principle invoked last year in the reduction of excise taxes on certain equipment purchased by municipalities. It might be well worth looking at the school situation from this point of view.

Tax reductions do not always mean reductions in the actual revenue collected and perhaps that was what was in the mind of the hon. gentleman who asked the question a moment ago. This may seem paradoxical, but we all know that often some reduction in taxes will produce an increase in economic activity, the fruits of which are greater revenue or perhaps the same revenue as before.

I do not like to think of taxes being decreased because that raises connotations in the minds of businessmen that the government is on an economic drive. I would not like to see government expenditure decrease because I think that would be a very bad thing for the economy at this time.

Since 1946 we have seen a tremendous expansion in business and in the economic field throughout the country. We have an expanding economy, and while it is expanding we enjoy more or less full employment. It is necessary that we sell the fruits of our labour abroad. We have to trade to survive, and I would like to commend the government on taking a stand for the ideal of free trade. The liberal trading policies of Canada —and I use the small letter "l" there—have been questioned lately as never before, and that is perhaps natural. Canada's trading pattern before the war was well established. We applied the sterling balances in our trade with Britain to the deficit in our trade with the United States, and thereby maintained a balance of trade between the two areas.

After the second world war sterling area restrictions were strengthened; there were increases on quotas—quotas that still exist—and, of course, the pound was unconvertible. The pattern of trade under these circumstances changed. Britain and other sterling area countries were unable to take the volume of commodities they previously took because they did not have the dollars with which to pay for them, and more and more the emphasis was placed on our trade with the United States. That was a natural and in my opinion inevitable result.

We could have joined the sterling area, but I do not think anyone would seriously suggest this proposition. It ignores the economic realities of our situation, which include the close geographical proximity of the United States. It would also ignore the North American outlook which is part and parcel of Canada and the United States. Our equipment and organization in Canada is North American in its scope and details. We have great and numerous inter-company relationships between the two countries which is an altogether desirable and inevitable consequence of our geographical proximity. There is a terrific pressure for United States capital to seek an investment outlet under profitable private enterprise. The United States is our chief source of foreign capital, and it will be more so.

We recall the Paley commission, which was set up in the United States to study their sources of natural energy, hydro, coal, oil, and uranium. The commission, I believe, reported in 1952 to the United States congress that their home sources of energy were on the decline and had passed their peak. Every day means the consumption of more energy in industry and in homes in the United States. Canada, on the other hand, has tremendous sources of energy that have yet to be developed, and some that have yet to be discovered, while the United States will be forced to look more and more outside their own country for sources of cheap natural energy.

Developments in British Columbia in the field of hydroelectric power are indicative of the trend. We see ourselves exporting tremendous quantities of hydroelectric power in the form of aluminum from British Columbia and some other parts of the country. What then is the result of this trend? Two-thirds of our import and export trade at the present time is with the United States. Roughly, we take about 26 per cent of all United States exports. We are their best and largest single customer. We take more goods from the United States than all the Latin-American countries combined, and indeed more than all the European countries combined.

We still have surpluses, of course, particularly in our farm products. It has been suggested that in order to promote convertibility of the pound we should loan money to Britain. This is a good suggestion, but it ignores the fact that British traders of late have been given more or less a free hand in the purchase of lumber, wheat, and metals, and they do not want to borrow money to purchase items which are not essential to their economy. It is all very well to suggest that we loan Britain the money with which they can purchase our goods and thereby assist them in their drive toward convertibility. It takes two to make a bargain, and it is very doubtful if Britain is disposed to borrow money. Her aim is to get out of debt and strengthen her economy, which in itself will provide the answer to convertibility. That answer lies in free trade.

The general agreement on tariffs and trade embodies the old empire preferences, because they are acceptable to the countries taking part in the agreement. Under the circumstances we have seen an increasing amount of multilateral trade between sterling and dollar countries, and the situation is improving continuously. However, convertibility is not something you just pick out of the air. It will take time and patience on the part of the countries involved to reach that point when we will have the benefit of trade with the sterling area free of quotas and restrictions.

In the meantime, our government is pressing for the provisions of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and urging that they be fully carried out. I think the recent journey of our ministers of trade and commerce (Mr. Howe), finance (Mr. Harris) and external affairs (Mr. Pearson) to Washington was an imaginative, courageous and highly commendable action; and although it may be some time before we see any change on the part of the government of the United States we can certainly say that we have tried to impress upon the United States the importance and urgency of carrying out the provisions of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. From that point of view I think the negotiations were highly successful.

We have seen a great economic and spiritual conflict in foreign relations among the different countries of the world. We hope that out of that conflict, as is very often the case, a firmer understanding towards peaceful development will emerge. Despite our problems the Canadian nation has been pulling its weight as a world power. When we have been called upon to do so we have contributed to the defence of the free nations. We took our part in the Korean conflict. We participated fully in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I think the free world is better for the 12 squadrons of fighters we now have operating in Germany. We have an important role in Indo-China. We did our part in the Korean negotiations. I feel that our spokesmen are admired and respected at the United Nations.

On the economic front, the Canadian dollar is still the world's strongest currency. We shall obviously have our bad moments, but underneath it all there is an underlying economic, spiritual and philosophic strength which none of us yet fully appreciates. I feel that we should have no fear for the future.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will realize that for the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) to start his speech at five minutes to six might not be too convenient. Shall I call it six o'clock, if that is agreeable to the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, may I thank you indeed for your courtesy at five minutes to six in asking for unanimous consent to call it six o'clock. It helped me to avoid starting my speech only to break into it for the dinner recess.

In the debate on the speech from the throne I wish to speak on behalf of the people of the constituency of Macleod, which I have had the honour to represent for some years.

The constituency of Macleod is quite diversified in several ways. There are the Turner valley oil fields at the northern and western corner, and while they are not quite as active today as they were some years ago, nevertheless there is quite a little industry in that part of the constituency. Then there is the great foothills country on the east slope of the Rocky mountains, which is a tremendous ranching region. Toward the south and west is the coal mining area of the Crowsnest pass. We have a sugar beet industry in the southern and eastern corner, and most of the central region is composed of a rich and vast wheat growing area.

In the time allotted to me in this debate I do not expect to be able to speak on all the various things that affect my constituency. There will be time for that later during the session, when I will be able to speak on behalf of every part of this diversified riding. But I do wish to pay some attention at the present time to a situation that I think is most serious. I refer to the cash position of the farmers of the west. I refer to those of my constituency in particular, because I represent them; but I am sure many others who represent farming regions of western Canada will agree with me that this matter is of grave importance. During the summer I attended and spoke at a number of meetings called by various farm organizations, as well as having the opportunity, of course, of talking to many farmers privately. I found that to many of them the situation was serious to the extent that they did not have enough money to get along.

I think we all realize that over the past number of years the farmers have not complained too much. Prices have been fair to good, and for the most part crop conditions have been reasonably good. There have been some areas where we have had crop failures, and of course the situation in Saskatchewan this year is very bad. But the fact that there is a surplus of grain does not help the farmer if he has no money at the moment. In my investigation I found this meant that certain farmers were in danger of having foreclosures made on the things they had bought. Machine companies were beginning to tighten up, and other companies that had financed purchases of the farmers were beginning to take steps if payments were not made right on time.

Some farmers came to me and said they had difficulty in meeting their current expenses to the extent of having to ask the grocer and others to wait for a little while. It is a well known fact that oil and gas companies came to a point in their operations where they instituted a cash on delivery policy. While we are very thankful in our part of the country, Mr. Speaker, for a measure of prosperity over the years, it must not be thought that all our farmers are wealthy. Some of them have not done too badly, but there are others who by no stretch of the imagination can be considered to be wealthy or in a favourable financial position.

Young men who have started to farm are finding it particularly difficult to get along when they have no cash. The same is true of some young veterans who have started afresh. They do not complain about the treatment they have received from the Department of Veterans Affairs or the policy that has been laid down for them by the government, but they are having difficulty now in financing their way because they do not have cash.

Then again there are the small farmers. In my part of the country it is pretty difficult to be successful with a small farm at any time. Wheat growing is pretty general among the farmers of that particular area, and it is considered that a farmer there finds it pretty tough unless he has a fairly large amount of land. The small farmer finds it hard to get along today, particularly in view of the fact that he cannot sell his wheat and consequently does not have any cash.

It might be said that there is a surplus of grain, and most of these farmers have wheat in their bins. That may be so. Perhaps there was a day when the saying was true that "wheat in the bin was as good as money in the bank", but that cannot be said today. It is not true today because while they may have a surplus of grain stored on their farms, they cannot meet their bills if they have no cash. Foreclosures of one kind and another are threatened, and that is not a very healthy or happy situation.

I think we will all agree that the government has given no consideration whatsoever to alleviating this serious condition. I believe they should have done so, because there are ways of alleviating what may be more or less a temporary condition. However, if the temporary condition lasts too long it is then more than temporary; it becomes a condition that one must expect from one crop year to another, and that is not good.

I claim that the government could have taken steps to devise some plan whereby farmers with wheat in storage on their farms could have received some money, at least enough to get by on. I see no reason why the government could not have guaranteed the banks against loss in case they lent money on the farmers' wheat. They could have done that as a sort of bridge-the-gap policy. The government guarantees bank loans today in many other respects. We have the Canadian farm loan board, the loans of which are guaranteed by the government. We have the national housing scheme under which the government guarantees the loans of those people who borrow money for housing. The banks are now engaged in these lending operations, so it is not a new thing for the government to guarantee the banks and lending institutions against loss. It does seem to me that the government could have taken some steps along that line to help the farmers.

There is another suggestion. In my opinion it would not have been difficult for the wheat board itself to advance payments on the grain the farmers have in their granaries. It would be tantamount to taking the grain ahead of time. After all, the wheat ultimately has to go through the wheat board for sale, and I see no reason why the wheat board could not have adopted some plan of that kind under the direction of a government policy.

This would have been of tremendous help to the farmers who were in need. It would not be necessary for the farmers to take advantage of these loans if they did not need them, but the farmers who find they cannot pay their grocery bills, cannot meet operating expenses on their farms, cannot pay for oil and gas deliveries, cannot pay for truck repairs and a lot of other things, could have taken advantage of loans if they had been made available. I do believe the government could have done something along those lines.

Now, what of the future? It is wintertime now, but the first thing you know spring will be here. The farmers will have to put in their crops. Again perhaps the oil companies and other companies dealing with farmers will go on a cash delivery basis. What is going to happen? Are the farmers to continue in this predicament? I urge the government, in the strongest possible terms, to give serious consideration to this most grievous problem, and during this session to introduce appropriate legislation to deal with this matter. I am sure western farmers would be pleased if something of that kind could be accomplished. Nobody would be out of pocket, and the farmers would be pleased with that action by this government. I ask that the government take appropriate measures along these lines as soon as possible.

During this session I shall deal with other matters affecting my constituency at such times and on such appropriate occasions as will afford more effective discussion. I turn now to another matter upon which I think there is need for some comment. We have heard a good deal in this debate, particularly from our C.C.F. friends, about what they regard as the evil of our private enterprise system. Frankly, of course, we in this corner of the house, we Social Crediters throughout Canada, support an effective private enterprise system. We recognize that in the past there have been certain abuses of the system by certain individuals or corporations. However, that is no reason for blaming the system as a whole. We believe that these abuses could be eliminated and that the private enterprise system could function effectively and efficiently for the good of all the citizens of Canada, providing them with incomes and at the same time giving them the freedom that free enterprise should give.

We believe private enterprise could become extremely effective under a proper financial policy. It does seem to be a sort of stock in trade argument for our C.C.F. friends, whom we have learned to like as men, to blame private enterprise for everything. It is significant that they never say, at least I have never heard any of them on any occasion, how they would handle any problem for which they blame private enterprise.

If an economic problem exists they never appraise it in the light of all its factors; they never seek for a proper solution. They just blame private enterprise and rap the knuckles of this Liberal government or any government throughout the country for what they claim is that government's loyalty to the private enterprise system.

While I say that, after a good many years of observation and study, and a good many years during which I have been responsible for appraising political trends, I have come to the conclusion that in reality there is no more dangerous socialist party than the present Liberal party in Canada. Now, that may sound strange to some ears.

Mr. Winch: Who is to cross the floor?

Mr. Hansell: I think I can show that is true. I did not say they were socialists in the same sense as our C.C.F. friends are. I said they were a more dangerous socialist party than our C.C.F. friends are, and I shall tell you why. Our C.C.F. friends are outspoken in respect to their socialist proposals. They make no bones about them. They say "We are socialists; we believe in the socialization and government ownership of industry". They lay their cards on the table and say "There you are. We believe in it and we want it to come." But our Liberal friends, they say "Go easy; not so fast". They give lip service to free enterprise but bide their time to introduce socialist legislation.

One only has to examine the debates of the house to find the truth of what I have just said. If you turn to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) the other day you will find that he talked about the Conservative amendment. I am not going to read all he said because I think we all remember it. Oh, I got the wrong page.

Mr. Winch: That is not all you got wrong, either.

Mr. Hansell: We will see in a little while how wrong I am. The hon. member for Winnipeg South—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: I should say Vancouver South; excuse me. You see, there is so very little difference between one of the members from Winnipeg and one of the members from Vancouver that it is very difficult for me to distinguish between them. I was about to say that the hon. member for Vancouver South was very jubilant in recognizing that the Conservative party in this country is now jumping over the traces and recommending a contributory national health insurance plan. Indeed, he said at page 103 of Hansard that when he heard that his heart beat for joy. He said:

> When I heard that my heart beat with joy. My cup of jubilation really ran over.

But he did deplore the fact that the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) had stolen the thunder of the leader of the C.C.F. He referred, of course, to the humorous incident that had occurred in English bay when some chap dived in and came up minus his swimming trunks, and you will recall how he likened that to the leader of the C.C.F., visualizing that hon. gentleman standing in English bay minus his swimming trunks.

Then he said, to quote again from page 103—and, remember, the hon. member for Vancouver South recognized that the proposal made in the amendment was in fact a piece of socialist legislation—

> May I say without any attempt at being facetious or witty just how glad all of us are on this side of the house who have always believed in the principle of national health insurance and who also believe in the principle of "not swift nor slow to change but in its season to bring the law".

And then he went on to say:

> May I express the true hope that the smiling, genial and highly respected Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) will still be around when our Prime Minister rounds out the final blueprint which was laid down in 1919 by the great Mackenzie King and we finally wind up the finest welfare state on earth with a national health insurance scheme.

That is the quotation. How often do we hear it said in this house and out of it that the C.C.F. are nothing but Liberals in a hurry. I did not go to the trouble of turning back to last year's Hansard and reading the speech which I remember was given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when he was pleading for this legislation. At that time the hon. member went back into history and said, "Now, in such and such a year we proposed this. We have been urging it and urging it, and eventually the Liberals have adopted it. In such and such a year we proposed this other thing, and we urged it and urged it, and later on the Liberals adopted it." He went back into history; indeed, he must have done quite a little bit of research. We know he does that.

I was interested in his speech when he proceeded to show how the C.C.F. had urged these various policies—and they must be socialist policies or they would not be urging them—and that the government eventually had adopted them. Then he went on in his speech to say, "Now we have proposed this. It is coming. Why not now?"

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: "Hear, hear" the hon. member says. What does it mean? It simply means this—

Mr. Gillis: That the Liberals are smart.

Mr. Hansell: And I will tell my hon. friend from Great Britain—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: From Cape Breton—I will tell my hon. friend just how smart they are. They are a little smarter than the C.C.F., because the C.C.F. wear heavy clog boots when they propose something, letting everybody know they are coming.

Mr. Gillis: Honest, honest.

Mr. Hansell: But the Liberal party are smarter, because they put on their socialist carpet slippers and creep up on the public. Eventually socialist legislation is put on the statute books, and some time after the people suddenly awaken to the fact that they have been engulfed in a sort of socialistic welfare state, without their knowing it. The Liberals give us socialism by stealth; that is the difference between the parties.

Mr. MacInnis: You are not saying that the Liberals are stooges for the C.C.F., are you?

Mr. Hansell: I say that the Liberal party of Canada is the great carpet-slipper socialist party of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Do you favour health insurance, or are you against it?

Mr. Hansell: I knew my hon. friend would have to bring that up. We do favour a type of health insurance, but not the type my hon. friend favours.

An hon. Member: A different kind of slipper.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know; perhaps we are not so smart, either. We are so far ahead of them in our thinking that perhaps we are ahead of our times.

Mr. Knowles: What have you got on your feet?

Mr. Gillis: Moccasins.

Mr. Hansell: We see things happening in the world; we see things happening all around us because of an economic system that is basically wrong. We Social Crediters believe we have the solution whereby the people of Canada can have the security that our vast productive wealth can give them, and that they can have it without socialization and without taking any of their freedom from them. They will be able to be free and secure and enjoy all the good things this potentially wealthy country can give.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. MacDougall: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hansell: Well, my hon. friend is very genial, so I think perhaps I should allow him to ask his question.

Mr. MacDougall: Thank you very much. I was going to ask you if you believe in voluntary health insurance, because you certainly preached it in British Columbia.

Mr. Hansell: Of course we believe in voluntary health insurance, because we have that now throughout the country.

Mr. MacDougall: Oh, yeah?

Mr. Hansell: Of course we have. Anyone can go into a voluntary health insurance plan simply by paying the premiums. There are a good many companies that have it.

Mr. Knowles: Anyone can have a Cadillac, if he can pay for it.

Mr. Hansell: I turn now to the amendment proposed by the C.C.F. I should like to read it, because I have a word or two to say about it. It says:

> That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "Your Excellency's advisers" the following words:
> "have deliberately returned to the policy of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise which resulted in the depression and unemployment of the pre-war years, and that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to undertake the economic planning necessary to cope with the serious problems now facing the Canadian people, and"—

Now, I wonder if the wording of that sub-amendment is correct. In it they are blaming free enterprise or private enterprise for the depression of pre-war years. To my way of thinking private enterprise in pre-war years did a grand job. The job was to produce the things people needed. They did that job. As far as my friend saying that the government is returning to an uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise, may I say our war effort was carried on remarkably well. The reason it was carried on remarkably well was that the government, with a system of controls which I admit are necessary in wartime, did permit private enterprise to do the job and it did it well.

In pre-war days we know that we had an economic depression, but it was not because private enterprise had not produced the goods. It had produced the goods. The only difficulty in pre-war years was that the people did not have the money in their pockets to buy the goods.

That brings us back to a very different line of thinking. It was not a matter of private enterprise or government ownership at all; it was a matter of pursuing a financial policy that failed to put purchasing power into the hands of the people, enabling them to buy the goods which were available.

Here is one thing I would like to have our C.C.F. friends tell us. I would like to have them tell us how in pre-war years they could have taken over private enterprise and still distributed the goods that were piled sky high in our stores, in our granaries, in our warehouses, and with our assembly lines closed down. It was because people did not have any money with which to buy them. I would like them to tell me how government ownership would have solved that problem.

Now they talk about a planned economy. I am not saying that those in responsible government positions should not have some idea of what they are doing, if that is what they call planning. But that is not what our C.C.F. friends mean. I would like to know who is to do the planning. I might ask my friends, since they believe in economic planning, if they would be satisfied with the type of economic planning that this Liberal government would pursue? Of course, the answer is obviously no. Would they be satisfied with the type of economic planning that would be pursued under the policies of the Conservative party? Of course, I do not think the Conservatives will ever be on that side of the house to attempt to follow their policies; nevertheless, would they be satisfied if that happened? Of course the obvious answer is no. I am quite certain if we Social Crediters believed in economic planning and were on that side of the house they would not agree with our type of economic planning.

What would they be satisfied with? Of course my hon. friend back there says "Our type of economic planning". When our friends talk of economic planning what do they mean? They mean, of course, what they themselves would plan. It would be socialist economic planning by the socialists; that is what they mean.

Mr. Speaker, we in this house have claimed for years and years that there is a basic error in the present monetary policy. We have claimed that there never is enough money coming out of the process of production, whether in wages, dividends, salaries and so forth, to buy back the total production at the prices they are offered for sale. We claim there is a fundamental, basic error in economic policy; that the only way the products of the nation can reach the consumers is for an additional amount of purchasing power to be placed in the hands of consumers without going through the productive system.

We say that if that were done, then the standard of living of our Canadian people would be just as great as our productive capacity could produce, and at the same time you would not have what our socialist friends claim must come, that is socialist economic planning; for a properly devised and effectively functioning financial policy would be its own planner.

Mr. MacInnis: Who would devise and plan? Somebody would have to do it.

Mr. Hansell: My friend may say that, but it would not satisfy him anyway, even though I answered him.

An hon. Member: Who does the planning now?

Mr. MacInnis: You have no other answer except the issuing of money.

Mr. Hansell: I am positive that those who sit on the treasury benches today know that the big problem is to equate consuming power with producing power. If there is an equation of production with consumption in terms of purchasing power and prices you will have no difficulty, and you will solve the very grievous problems that are facing the people of Canada today.

Mr. Knowles: Who is going to plan the equation?

Mr. Hansell: As far as unemployment is concerned, we look upon that in a different light. That is why I say that in our thinking we are just a little bit further advanced than some of the others. I am not patting ourselves on the back when I say that; I am simply saying that I think it is so. What is the objective of civilization? Are not we out to make progress? Are we here for the purpose of seeing that everybody works, works and works? I do not think we are. I think we are here to see that people enjoy life with perhaps the least possible amount of work.

I say that seriously. We do that in many ways; yet when we do it, it produces problems for us. For instance, we cut the hours of labour to a 40-hour week instead of a 48-hour week, and perhaps the day will come when we will have a 36 or a 34 or a 32-hour week. Why? We can do things in less time. That does not solve the problem, yet we do it. Surely it is a thing to be desired, to take the sweat and toil from the brows and backs of our workers. We drag out all sorts of labour-saving gadgets in order to save labour. We do that, and then we talk about unemployment. It is not unemployment that should be our concern, it should be "unimpayment". You will not find that word in the dictionary; I originated it.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Hansell: That is something we should and could do. We should provide adequate incomes, and it is possible to have adequate incomes and at the same time take the sweat and toil from the brows and backs of those who work.

I am not going into all the technical details of our Social Credit proposals, although I could do it. You would not accept them if I did.

An hon. Member: The hon. member should have started earlier.

Mr. Hansell: We have been presenting our proposals in this house for the past 20 years. Some of us are now in our twentieth year in this parliament, and we trust that some of these things may eventually come to pass. I do not believe they will come about through our present Liberal administration. They certainly will not come from our socialist friends. The Conservatives will not have the opportunity to bring them in. What, therefore, are we to conclude? The only thing we can conclude is that if these things are to come it will be through a Social Credit government, and they alone will bring them to realization.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to extend my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Perhaps I should say a word about the very entertaining speech by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) to which we have just listened. I tried to follow him when he endeavoured to prove that the Liberals were really socialists in disguise. Of course, it would be difficult to prove that to me. However, I was interested in his reasoning. He said that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had outlined various C.C.F. proposals, and suggested that the Liberals had put those proposals into effect. I do not recall exactly what proposals the C.C.F. suggested, but the hon. member for Macleod said they must have been socialist proposals because they were suggested by the C.C.F. I tried to remember the items listed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which the Liberals put through and I recalled unemployment insurance, old age pensions, blind pensions, and, I believe, family allowances. In this regard, however, I would remind the hon. member that the Social Credit party also supported those measures, and I suppose on the same reasoning they are therefore socialist.

That is the full extent to which I shall try to answer the hon. member for Macleod, because I confess I was not very successful in following his reasoning. I closely followed speeches by members of the official opposition and attempted to detect what faults they had to find in the past administration of this country, and what they had to suggest by way of remedy. It seems to me they concentrated on two things; first, the question of rising unemployment, and second the reduction in export trade. I shall deal with some of their suggestions during the course of my remarks, but first of all I wish to deal with some of the positive achievements of the present government which, I believe, fully warrant the support they have received over the past 19 years.

I believe the most important consideration for all of us is the extent to which we have contributed as a nation, under the leadership of the present government, to the preservation of peace. The London-Paris agreement will shortly be laid before the house. That agreement is designed to promote the solidarity of the western world against the only possible aggressor, imperialist communism. With regard to this agreement, in my opinion there can be no doubt as to what we should do in the light of history.

We were often told in the past that if it had been made plain to German leaders before the outbreak of the 1914 war that they were going to find Great Britain arrayed against them, they would never have plunged the nations of the world into war. Certainly I believe it is fair to assume that had they known they would ultimately find ranged against them not only Great Britain but the United States as well, the 1914 war would never have taken place.

Coming now to the outbreak of the war in 1939, it was thought at that time that if Great Britain made it plain that if Hitler committed further acts of aggression against Poland there was no doubt where Great Britain would stand, it was hoped that would deter Hitler. Apparently Hitler was not convinced that Great Britain meant business. Also I think it is again fair to say that if Hitler had been sure that not only would Great Britain enter the war with the determination which she ultimately displayed, but that he would find the great power of the United States also ranged against him, he would never have started the war in 1939.

Surely we should learn from these events. If we who are opposed to aggression make it quite plain to the aggressor that we mean business and will stick together and fight against anyone who endangers the peace of the world, then it seems to me that in all probability war can be prevented. Therefore in our attempt to unify the western world we should thereby make it plain to the only potential aggressor in the world today that if she starts a war she will find the entire western world unified against her. I believe that by taking this step we will be going as far as we possibly can in this field to ensure the peace of the world.

It seems to me that when communist groups in all parts of the world try to undermine the will and determination of the free world to unite in strength and common purpose and make their enmity plain, then it is quite clear where their interests lie. People who believe in freedom, democracy, and peace surely should not follow the lead of communist stooges, witting or unwitting, in this or any other country.

There is another feature of the international situation in which our government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), have played a very worthy part, and that is in their support of the efforts of the United Nations to help the economically undeveloped nations, particularly in the Far East. I do not believe there is any doubt that rather than starve to death people will fight and it should not be overlooked that force will not indefinitely maintain world peace if it is not established on justice and fair play between one section of mankind and another.

I therefore strongly support the policy of the United Nations designed to assist economically undeveloped nations so they can increase their own productive capacity, for I am convinced that such schemes will assist in the preservation of world peace. Canada, by her support of such United Nations schemes, and also the Colombo plan, is assisting materially toward that end, and I believe Canada has played a very worthy part in all these programs.

A proper attitude toward the less fortunate people of the world is a very important feature of the struggle for peace. They are fellow human beings. We do not want them to swamp us by coming into this country in too great numbers, but we certainly must help them to increase their production and allow their exports into this country in sufficient quantities to buy enough food so their people shall not starve to death.

It is a question of whether we would rather trade than fight. On the ground of simple Christian fair play, or on the ground of self-interest, it seems to me that we should be prepared to reduce the barriers to trade, and permit those people to obtain the wherewithal to feed their teeming populations. It seems to me that Canada's work along that line has been extremely worthy. She has taken the lead in promoting the elimination of the barriers to trade.

I might say it appeared to me that one of the bases of the opposition criticism was that the government had gone too far in that respect, and that we should be processing more of our raw materials at home. That was the basis upon which Sir John A. Macdonald got his nationalist policy accepted, namely that we should cease to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the United States. The only way we could process more of our raw materials in this country is in some way by quotas or tariffs to protect the industries which might process those raw materials. If we begin to put on quotas and protective tariffs, then of course we lose any influence we have in promoting the expansion of trade. Other nations will begin to do the same thing.

I think the United States today is at her period of great decision in that respect. The United States today has assumed political world leadership, but she must assume economic leadership if she is going to carry through to success the political leadership she has assumed. About 100 years ago Great Britain realized that, as the great commercial centre of the world, she had to open her markets and throw down her tariff barriers. By that move Great Britain became tremendously prosperous. She also gave leadership to a great expansion of prosperity in the whole world. The United States is much greater and more powerful today than the Britain of 100 years ago. It seems to me that although there would be some dislocation, the United States could follow the policy that Great Britain followed 100 years ago.

This would stimulate the development of all countries of the world. It would allay much of the fear that exists today; because many people, even today, who have access to United States markets fear to rely on them too much, because they do not know when the United States may change their policy and plunge them into chaos in their trade relationships. If the United States could make up her mind that she was definitely going to follow the policy which her great President today is asking her to follow, namely to enable nations to expand their trade with her, to buy her production with their production, it would start the world on the road toward greater prosperity, and would ensure that we would not embark on the policy on which the nations of the world embarked in the 1930's.

When I see the world today, ten years more or less after the end of a great war, reaching about the same stage we reached about ten years after the first war, with the dislocations that follow a war, the getting on their feet of various nations, the pressures beginning to build up through unemployment developing in various nations, pressure upon their governments to put on tariffs or trade quotas or in some way to interfere with trade; when I see that situation developing in various parts of the world today, I wonder if mankind must go through what they went through when they followed a policy of economic nationalism ten years after the end of the first war. We are just reaching that stage today. I hope the great leader of the world today, the United States, will be given the vision and wisdom not to begin to tread the road that was trodden in the 1930's, with all that will result therefrom.

One of the things I hold much to the credit of the present government is that they have steadfastly held to that course of promoting trade, in spite of pressure not only from outside their own ranks but from within; and they are going to have more pressure put upon them. I say this. If the Canadian government wavers in its devotion to that policy of trying to promote freedom and expansion of trade, then they might actually tip the scales when a real fight in that regard is coming to a decision in the United States.

Who can say to what extent the government of Canada, by adhering to the policies and the principles which all governments should have learned from the experience of the 1930's, may influence others? If the government adheres, as it has in the past, to the right policies, who can say to what extent she may have a decisive effect upon the decisions made in the United States and ultimately upon the whole course of world events? If they make a mistake or listen to some of the pleas to interfere with trade, others will do the same thing, and the whole sad story will start all over again.

I want to say to the government that I appreciate the way they have handled the situation thus far. For that reason alone it seems to me that they deserve the support and the approbation of this house and of the country.

I should like to say a few words with regard to the development of this country. At a time like this there is bound to be a measure of readjustment leading to a certain amount of unemployment. There is bound to be difficulty with regard to trade. But the question is this. Has the situation worked out in this country as well as or better than it has worked out in any other country in the world? We are looking to the United States as an example of what can be done in the way of great development, but what is the record of Canada under the leadership of the present government? Our total gross national product in 1937 was something over $5 billion. In 1954 it had risen to $24 billion, an increase of almost 400 per cent. We think of the United States as going ahead by leaps and bounds with regard to population. But what is the great record of our own country? Since 1945 Canada has increased in population by 19 per cent while the United States has increased by only 12 per cent. Is that not something of which Canadians should be really proud?

During that period we had one of the unique experiences in modern times, that of a great free people deciding by vote to throw in their lot with us. Certainly that is a great achievement of the government of Canada, in that they were able so to conduct the affairs of this country in the previous 15 years that when the time came for Newfoundland to decide whether she would complete confederation, she felt that our country had showed that it was in such good hands, had such good fiscal, economic and other policies and standards, that she could safely join her lot with ours. It seems to me that is something of which the Canadian people may well be proud. They have joined us not by reason of force or pressure exerted on them, but by deciding that they should join their forces with ours. It seems to me that fact speaks volumes for the sort of government our country has enjoyed during the last 15 or 20 years.

If you wish to refer to the rise in the actual standard of living in Canada, you will find that it rose by 13·3 per cent from 1945 to 1952. In the United States during the same period the rise was 15·4 per cent, or a little more than ours. As to the gross national expenditure, or the proportion of it spent on capital development—and we sometimes think Canadians do not spend enough of their savings in developing their own country—in 1952 the proportion in Canada was 18 per cent, and in the United States it was only 14 per cent. The confidence that ordinary Canadians had in the soundness of the future of Canada was marked by the fact that they were willing to invest almost $1 out of every $5 in the development of Canada. That is one of the reasons we have forged ahead as we have.

During that time, under the leadership of the present government, we as a country have not forgotten the weaker members of society, as is shown by the various social welfare measures that have been enacted. Of measures taken, undoubtedly one of the most important was the one making it possible for the provinces to carry out their constitutional obligations. There is no use in a province having certain powers if it has not the financial means of exercising those powers. A province like Saskatchewan could not possibly give the standard of education, the standard of health, or the standard of roads that could be given by a province like Ontario, with means of reaching the great sources of wealth in the great corporations in that province. With our own provincial resources alone we could not possibly establish, with regard to education and health, a standard of citizenship that could compare with that which could be established in Ontario.

This government recognized that there could not be first-class and second-class citizens in Canada, that all provinces had to be given the means of providing a minimum standard of education, a minimum standard of health and a minimum standard of the other things that the provinces should supply. So they embarked upon these financial agreements.

These agreements mean a great deal to the province of Saskatchewan. Of the money spent by the government of Saskatchewan about 40 cents out of every dollar comes from the federal treasury, and there is no doubt that Saskatchewan could not maintain some of the programs of which it is so proud if it were not for these financial agreements.

Mr. Ellis: May I ask the hon. member whether other provinces do not get the same deal from the federal government?

Mr. Tucker: I am dealing with the contribution the federal government has made to this whole program, and I am speaking about Saskatchewan because I know it best. I am not making any suggestion that the federal government has favoured Saskatchewan, but I do say that Saskatchewan of all provinces is probably as much in need of this program as any other province, certainly far more in need of it than Ontario, Quebec or British Columbia. As a matter of fact, now that my attention has been drawn to it, one of the things about which I find fault with the present government of Saskatchewan is that the premier there takes great credit for the hospitalization scheme. for example—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tucker: —and for other things that have been done, none of which would have been possible in the absence of the financial agreement without crippling taxation that would have prevented any development in our province. One of the things I have said is that when the premier is taking credit for all these programs he should at least say that in part at least they have been helped to do these things by the program of the federal Liberal government.

Mr. Ellis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Tucker: These agreements were most essential. They have been recognized as essential by other governments, but particularly by the government of Saskatchewan. One of the things that must have worried people who realize this and understand anything about politics was that when an important part of the country such as the province of Quebec was getting no benefit from such a financial program, there would be constant fault found with that program, and some shift in political support might mean that the program would be endangered.

That was regarded as very serious by the government of Saskatchewan. I know hon. members will be very surprised to learn that one of the main arguments of the premier of that province in the last federal election was to this effect. He said, "There is no danger of the present government being defeated and the financial agreement being endangered because there is no chance whatever of the St. Laurent government being beaten. You can safely vote C.C.F. The Liberals will still be in power. You will still have all these different measures that you want to keep, but by voting C.C.F. you will show that you are not quite satisfied and would like a little bit more."

There is no question but that was the main argument of the premier of our province and it showed what importance he placed upon these agreements. Our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) found that it was thought by the province of Quebec that these agreements did not fit in with their conception of confederation. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I would draw particularly the attention of the people who have been finding so much fault with the province of Quebec to something that should never be forgotten. If our compatriots of French-speaking origin had not been willing to join in bringing about confederation, if they had not been willing to trust their fellow citizens of English-speaking origin, confederation would not have been possible. Canada would never have become a country.

Mr. Noseworthy: An original idea.

An hon. Member: Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Tucker: That is one reason I say that the pact of confederation embodied in the British North America Act must be lived up to in the letter and the spirit. The hon. member mentioned Sir John A. Macdonald. If Sir John A. Macdonald had not been willing to go forth and meet some of the requests of the leaders of French-speaking Canada, confederation would not have been possible either. Yet these people find fault with our present great leader because he went forth to meet the premier of Quebec in order to bring about a satisfactory settlement of this important foundation of the continuation of confederation, when as a matter of fact he was just carrying on in the great traditions of great leaders of Canada of the past.

I say it ill behooves any member of the C.C.F. party, whose only provincial government in Canada depends almost for its very existence upon the continuation of these agreements, to find fault with our leader for going to Quebec and trying to work out an arrangement whereby Quebec will come into this scheme and be satisfied with it. It is only on that basis, Mr. Speaker, that we can be sure these financial agreements are a part of our confederation set-up; and the present Prime Minister, in going as far as he could to try to work out some satisfactory arrangement with Quebec, has helped to complete that foundation.

I say that far from the people of Canada being humiliated, as was said by a member of the C.C.F. party in the house, by the Prime Minister going to meet the premier of Quebec to try to work out some sort of satisfactory arrangement that would give them a chance to share in this program together with the rest of Canada, the people of Canada will honour, as I do, that willingness to serve which does not stand upon false dignity but goes out to try to do the best it can for the country. Surely that is in keeping with the teaching in which we nearly all believe; he who would be a leader amongst you, let him be the greatest servant of all. Is it not something that we have a prime minister who, when he sees a chance to get this matter settled in the interests of Canada, says, "Certainly I will go and meet you and talk with you."

I know that the socialists, particularly the socialist leaders in Great Britain, have praised Winston Churchill because he has said that in order to try to promote the peace of the world he will go any place and meet anybody. Yet they find fault with our Prime Minister because he is willing to go to meet a fellow Canadian to work out a common Canadian problem.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

There were two items in the speech from the throne with which I was very pleased indeed; because after all, as has been pointed out, the Liberal party step by step has brought in a program of social welfare that is not excelled by any country in the world. The standard of living of the average individual in Canada is just as high as in any country in the world. The standard of living of the older people, the people who need help from the state, is not excelled in any country in the world. This has been brought about step by step by various measures as the people have been willing and able to pay for them.

One such measure that will be brought into effect during this session is the provision of pensions for the needy, totally disabled. I think every member of the house will be pleased to vote for that, and I would be very surprised if the Social Credit group voted against it for fear of it being branded as a socialist measure.

Of course I do not accept the argument of the hon. member for Macleod for a single moment. I suggest that it is basic Liberal policy to promote social welfare. As you promote development and expand your national income by a system of controlled free enterprise, there is more chance of doing something for the needy and helpless than by hampering development by attempting to get the utmost out of what might be regarded as equitable distribution. Surely we can do more by increasing our gross national product from $5 billion to $24 billion; surely we can do more for the old, the unemployed, the helpless and the blind by such an increase in our gross national product than we can by any system of very refined distribution. As I see it, that is the answer of the Liberal party to socialism. It hampers development which is the basis upon which one can really improve the lot of the needy by concentrating too much on distribution. Another measure about which I was very pleased to see a reference was the proposal to improve the position of those receiving the war veterans allowance

Before I conclude, however, I should like to deal with a problem facing western Canada today. As you know, in 1939 the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was passed under which the farmer contributes one per cent of the receipts from the sale of his grain. This is collected by the federal government. In the case of crop failure, payments are made to the farmers.

At the time that act was passed the farmer received about 57 cents per bushel for his wheat, on an average. The levy of 1 per cent meant that the federal government collected about half a cent per bushel. For the last eight years the federal government has been collecting, under this 1 per cent provision, 1·6 cents per bushel on an average price prevailing during that time of $1.63. This is almost three times as much as it had been collecting when the act was passed.

The difficulty is that the payments to the farmers remain practically as they were when the act was passed, with the maximum payment being $500. Today $500 will not go even half as far as it would when the act was first passed. This payment was supposed to enable the farmer to put in his crop and tide himself over to the following year. It was not too generous an allowance to do that. Today, when the dollar does not go nearly as far, of course this payment does not do what the act was originally designed to accomplish.

The actual costs the farmers must pay to live and carry on their occupation have risen to an extent indicated by the fact that taking the index for the base period 1935-1939 as 100, the figure today is 225. In other words, it takes $225 today to do the work that $100 would have done in the period 1935-1939. Today, therefore, $500 will not do as much as $250 would do when the act was first passed.

Here is the situation. For the last eight years the government has been collecting almost three times as much per bushel as when the act was passed, and when a crop failure comes along, as it did last year, the farmer receives in actual purchasing power less than half as much to tide him over until the next year.

Mr. Knowles: Liberalism.

Mr. Tucker: Of course; it was the Liberals who passed this act, and I hope they will improve it.

Mr. Ellis: Are they responsible for the cheaper dollar, too?

Mr. Tucker: So far as the cheaper dollar is concerned, if you people could have put your policy into effect the dollar would not be worth half what it is today.

The fact that the dollar will not go as far as it would 10 or 15 years ago has been recognized in other fields. Superannuation rates have been increased. Old age pensions have been doubled compared to what they were when first introduced. Pensions for war veterans have been doubled. The salaries of civil servants, I believe, have been more than doubled. When I first sat in this house members of parliament drew $3,600, and their salaries have been substantially increased. Unemployment insurance benefits have been increased.

The farmer says that when he has been paying into this fund for some time on the basis of an undepreciated dollar, under an act designed to carry him over in the event of crop failure, then he should have the same recognition that has been given to these other groups. This provision is something in the nature of unemployment insurance. The farmer believes this was a good act, and if it is going to do the thing it should do then he should be given the same purchasing power as envisaged by the act when it was first passed.

I am quite aware of the fact that the federal government has to put money into this scheme. Up to last fall they had paid out $144 million and collected from the farmers only $73 million. In other words they paid out almost $2 for every dollar collected. Somebody may ask, in view of this, why I am suggesting the payments ought to be increased. At the time the act was passed it was recognized that you could not have an actuarially sound scheme of this sort that would carry itself. The government deemed it wise to have a plan whereby, in the event of crop failure, the farmers could get some money to carry them over until next year out of a fund to which they had contributed, rather than have the government pay out money from public funds entirely by way of relief or agricultural assistance. Today I believe it is generally recognized as being much sounder to have a scheme whereby people contribute to a fund, rather than have the whole burden fall upon the national treasury.

This was a good act when passed. I suggest now that the payments be increased so that they will have the same value in tiding the farmer over as they had when the act was first passed. I am also aware of the fact that somebody may say, well, you are doing that only for the prairie farmers. I suggest that if the farmers in any other branch of agriculture are willing to contribute to such a scheme, it would be a good thing to give them the same protection as the prairie farmer receives. I feel that in every way that would be better than waiting until disaster strikes and having these people have to come to ask for something by way of agricultural assistance.

I feel that would be fairer to agriculture; because we recognize that agriculture, and particularly western agriculture, suffers from protective tariffs more than other industries. Some of the protected industries can look after themselves in the case of set-backs. Farmers, and particularly the prairie farmers, have never been in that position, except for a few fortunate ones. It was recognized, therefore, that they should receive some protection like this as some compensation.

I would appeal to the government to give consideration at this time to increasing the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, especially since many of our farmers have had almost complete crop failures. This would not result in a loss to the economy as a whole, because over and over again it has been demonstrated that if you destroy the purchasing power of the farmers, particularly the western farmers, you begin to add to the lines of the unemployed in the rest of Canada.

The act is a splendid one, one of the finest ever passed. This is one way in which we could put that act, passed by a Liberal government in 1939, in a position to do the job it was able to do when it was first passed. We would merely be recognizing the change in the value of money. I make this suggestion in the hope that the government will recognize its merit, as it has so properly done in the many other fields I have mentioned.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): In rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I am taking it for granted that the leader of this group congratulated the mover (Mr. Leduc) and seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address, so I shall not need to do it. I will say to the two new members that I hope their sojourn in the House of Commons will be as pleasant as mine has been over the years.

Now, I do not want to rehash the Selkirk by-election in any way, but I owe thanks to some people, for they certainly helped me in that by-election. My friend the genial Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) spent some pleasant but ineffective days in the constituency. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) found his mission equally fruitless. My good friend the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister certainly created some heat, but no light. Since the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) appeared only for a one-day stand, I accepted that as a polite tribute to a lost cause. I appreciated the interest shown by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), but it is obvious that the statements made by these gentlemen carried no weight. Indeed, as I said earlier, they were of great assistance to me in winning the seat and therefore I do appreciate the co-operation they gave.

Many veterans' organizations, and others, have written me and come to see me personally making representations with respect to war veterans allowances. I feel I would be failing in my duty if I did not bring this matter again to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). These groups have requested me to draw the attention of the minister to the plight of the many veterans receiving benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

However, since the beginning of this session the minister has placed a resolution on the order paper to deal with this problem. The different veterans' organizations are pretty well agreed on what they want for the veterans who have become old before their time. In many cases they are broken in health. These organizations ask that the allowance be raised to $60 for a single person and $120 for a married person, per month. Permissible income has been a serious complaint, and they ask that it be raised to $1,200 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man. I am pleased to note that the matter will be discussed this session, and I hope the minister will meet their demands.

The old age pensioner is still receiving $40 a month, and the pensioner between the ages of 65 and 69 is still subject to the means test. Surely we can find ways and means to increase this amount. Every day we read about some group or other getting an increase in salary, and many of those people are not in the low-income brackets. It has been announced that a bill will be introduced to increase judges' salaries, and other increases are going to be asked. Anyone who will look at the order paper can see them there.

In the recent by-election I visited many elderly people, a good many of whom were finding it hard to get along on $40 a month. About a month ago Val Werier, writing in the Winnipeg Tribune, disclosed some alarming facts concerning the living conditions of elderly citizens in Winnipeg. Not only is this happening in Winnipeg, but it is also found in other cities, in fact right across Canada. I have clipped from the Montreal Gazette, a city far removed from Winnipeg, which is as follows:

> An 80-year old woman found near death from malnutrition in a shabby one-room apartment on Aylmer street, is slowly being nursed back to health in St. Mary's hospital.
> Weakened by a diet that afforded her no more than tea and toast, the woman was taken to hospital in an ambulance. She had lived in the apartment since her husband died of cancer six years ago. But of her $40 old age pension each month, $35 was taken to pay the rent. The remainder, $5, bought a month's supply of food.

That is a deplorable condition for such a fine country as this, and we should be able to do something to relieve it. I know the general opinion on the government side is that we cannot afford an increase at this time. But I have lived through three wars—the South African war, world war I and world war II—and I know we were always hard up before those wars. No one had any money; but when war was declared we could find all kinds of money.

A former minister of finance—I believe it was Mr. Dunning—when he sat over where our Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) now sits was asked by one of the members of this group to set aside some money for unemployment relief early in 1939. What did he reply? He said, "Does my young friend think that money grows on gooseberry bushes?" But remember this; that when war was declared in 1939 the government found the gooseberry bushes. They found the money to buy armaments.

Our old age citizens are far more important than armaments. Perhaps I do not need to tell the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the plight of the interlake farmers at the present time. He was out there, and I know from past experience that when he goes anywhere he looks into things like this. I give him credit for that. It would have pleased me even more if it had been possible for the minister, when visiting the constituency of Selkirk, to go back 60 or 70 miles farther north to see conditions there. I know the Minister of Justice knows the district very well, because he spent many years up there, in one way or another.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bryce: I did not say anything about by-elections. I hope the minister will not take any political meaning from my observation, because I did not mean it that way. Those three lakes, namely lake Winnipegosis, lake Manitoba and lake Winnipeg, are now 4·7 feet above normal level. Many of the farmers there had practically no crop last year or this year. Livestock farmers have not been able to cut hay, because the hay land was all flooded. They found great difficulty in obtaining feed. Along lake Winnipeg the situation is very bad; and it is no better at lake St. Martin, because at that point the provincial government has had to move people to higher ground. When I left, the farmers on the west shore of lake Winnipeg were taking the matter up with provincial authorities who, I believe, will appeal to Ottawa for some help. I hope their request when it comes will not fall on deaf ears.

It has been suggested that the administration under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should do something about this condition, but it does not operate in that district. It only goes so far north. There has been some talk already that the P.F.A.A. does not look after flood conditions. I have had many letters from men in these districts who have been hard hit. I will not take the time of the house to read any of these letters; they are all similar—practically no crop in 1953, no crop in 1954, no cash income, no credit. How are these folks going to live until the spring comes? I want to appeal to the minister now to do something for these people who are facing starvation.

It is most unfortunate that New Zealand should be sending 2¼ million pounds of cheese to Canada when Canadian farmers have 10 million pounds of surplus cheese to sell now. I know there is more to the cheese shipment than the average man knows. It has been said that New Zealand is paying a tariff of one cent per pound and that New Zealand had a gentleman's agreement with Canada not to send any cheese for a certain period. That agreement has now expired. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture will tell us what goods New Zealand is taking from us in this trade. We can then judge for ourselves if it is the proper thing to do, to bring in 2¼ million pounds of cheese when we have a surplus of 10 million pounds. I know in some districts of Manitoba the only revenue the farmers have is the little money they obtain from the sale of milk going into the cheese factories; and we are destroying that.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) say the other day in answer to a question asked by my colleague on my right, and I quote from page 185 of Hansard:

> I am not aware of there being any complaints about the manner in which these collections are made, but I can assure the hon. member that the officials who administer the acts will bear in mind the terms of the acts and the spirit parliament had in mind in passing them.

I can assure the minister that there had been complaints from Manitoba, and from my own constituency. I do hope that the assurance of the minister will correct this situation.

Farm income has dropped tremendously. In Toronto the price paid for cattle dropped from $36 per hundredweight in August, 1951 to $22 per hundredweight in August, 1954, a drop of 40 per cent. But in the same period the retail price of round steak dropped only 20 per cent, from 94 cents to 73 cents a pound. The farmer who is taking this considerable loss of practically 50 per cent of his income finds his costs going up. I made it my business to attempt to find out the latest costs and I find that this is what they are up as from 1949 to August, 1954, the latest figures I could get:

	per cent
Taxes and interest rates	21
Farm wages	19
Farm machinery	25
Building materials	30
Gas, oil, etc.	9
Farm living costs	17
Equipment and materials	12

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the marketing of livestock across the country. Two of the provinces are seeking to set up livestock marketing boards. With costs going up and prices coming down the farmer is getting quite a squeeze. When the farmer sells his cattle he finds they may go into about eight different grades. In these grades you have choice, good, medium and common. Grading is not done by a government grader but by the buyer. What may be No. 1 on Monday on a short market may be No. 3 on a plentiful market on Wednesday. This fluctuation is not good for the farmer. All or most of the cattle find their way to the retail butcher shop as red, blue or commercial beef. The consumer does not always get what he wants. This is what the Globe and Mail has to say:

Dishonest Grading

Guelph, June 7—Eastern Canadian housewives are ignorant of beef quality and as a result they are handed whatever their vendor likes to give them, Professor E. Stillwell of Ontario Agricultural College told a gathering of 500 Shorthorn breeders and their families at a demonstration of beef grading at the college here today. Producing 12 cuts of beef, he told his audience that they were purchased in various parts of Ontario as choice prime cuts, at prices ranging from 65 to 79 cents per pound, in the past few days. Not one cut could be called choice prime beef.

In no instance was any of the team of purchasers, sent out under the auspices of Professor Knox, head of OAC animal husbandry department, and the Ontario Shorthorn Association directors, able to purchase red or blue ribbon beef, first and second grades respectively. All the beef purchased was of commercial quality, some of it very poor.

Last week top steers at Winnipeg sold for $21, the average for the week being $19.96. Last week top steers at Toronto sold for $22, the average for choice steers being $21.73. So we had cattle selling from a top of $22 to as low as $6 for canners. But all this meat finds its way into the butcher shop. By the way, canners were selling at Winnipeg for less than that; there were canners sold in Winnipeg last week for five cents per pound. We said we would never go back to cent cattle, but if you take the valuation at today's dollar you find that five-cent canners are pretty near the cent cattle that we had in 1932.

I was delighted to hear the Minister of Agriculture say the other day, when answering an hon. member, that he had a bunch of hogs himself. I am glad of that because it may mean that he will be more sympathetic to me now than he was previously, because I have always had a grievance to offer in connection with the hog business.

Let us look at the hog business today. We have government graders, and there are different grades. We have select hogs B1, B2, and B3, and we have C hogs and D hogs; then we have lights, heavies, extra heavies, No. 1 sows and No. 2 sows, or 10 grades in all. But what does the housewife buy in the butcher shop? The answer is pork and bacon. You never hear of a housewife going into a butcher shop and saying, "I want a pound of No. 1 sow." I supported the minister before I came to this house and after my arrival here in the grading of hogs because I believed it to be a good step. But eight of these grades are detrimental to the farmer today, and without such a grading system the farmer could obtain more for his hogs.

I would also like to draw the minister's attention to the hog that was a little too greedy at the trough and weighs 186 pounds instead of 185. This means that the farmer loses $2 of the bonus and also $1 on the price. In other words he takes a $3 trimming on that one pound of pork. I brought this to the minister's attention before, and no doubt he has had a similar experience. I believe this is something that should be corrected. I am quite certain the minister does not wish to penalize the man who has a hog which is a pound too heavy, so that he thereby loses $3.

Mr. Gardiner: I lost more than that on one myself.

Mr. Bryce: But perhaps you could afford it.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I could not, but I could have avoided it by delivering him five pounds lighter.

Mr. Bryce: The minister is the last man to complain about this, because he introduced the regulation. This is a serious business, and I think the minister should do something to rectify it. The hogs should be weighed on a graduated scale and instead of taking $3 when they are overweight it could be reduced to about 50 cents, because nothing will convince me that a 186-pound hog does not finally end up in the bacon trade.

There is one other thing I would ask the minister to do, and that is to give serious consideration to the establishment of a national livestock marketing board. Such a board should have been established a long time ago, and I believe the farmers of this country are beginning to realize that we must have it. What has taken place within the livestock industry over the past two years is nothing short of a tragedy, because there has been a 50 per cent drop over that period. But the farmers' costs have not dropped. The average price of beef cattle going through the Winnipeg market this year is around $130, but three years ago the average price was $260. It will therefore be seen that the price of beef cattle has been reduced by 50 per cent over the past two years.

On the other hand we find that over-all production costs increased by 8 per cent over the same period, thereby constituting a total loss to the farmer of almost 60 per cent. The latest available information indicates that the situation might become even worse. I fail to see any reasonable justification for the drastic reduction in the price of beef to the producer. Certainly it cannot be argued that such a slump in producers' prices can be attributed to any oversupply or surplus, because we had only 5 per cent over and above our needs, and only 5 per cent was exported. The September 1953 issue of the current review of agricultural conditions states that the Canadian people consumed 95 per cent of the total amount marketed, and only 5 per cent was exported during the first seven months of 1953.

Those figures show that we are not producing more than we can dispose of, and should prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that there is no possible reason for the decline in livestock prices. If supply and demand have something to do with prices, as we are constantly led to believe, then the price of beef cattle should be increasing instead of going down because livestock production is constantly decreasing in direct ratio to the increase in population. At the beginning of the century the cattle population was 1,200 per 1,000 inhabitants. In 1954 it was only about 750. Our cattle population is therefore decreasing, and as long as the present system of marketing livestock is continued the producer will inevitably receive inadequate returns from the sale of his products.

The concentration of price competition among packer-buyers works to the disadvantage of the farmers. In this connection I would like to put on record a statement concerning the Stevens report:

> In the Stevens report on price spreads (1934) uncontradicted evidence was submitted that after the formation of Canada Packers there were consultations between Swifts and Canada Packers before the market opened each day on the prices to be paid for livestock. Further evidence submitted revealed that there was a singular absence of competition for cattle among the larger packers' buyers either on the ranch or in the stockyards. Prices quoted by one large firm would not be raised by any other packer-buyer. In this way the livestock producer was exploited.

I appeal to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to give serious consideration to the setting up of a national livestock marketing board.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, differences of opinion have been and still are one of the sacred rights of democracy. This is especially true in a deliberative assembly such as this. During the present debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne hon. members have fully exercised their right to differ.

I do not intend to add much to what has already been said during the course of this debate, but I feel it is my duty to submit some of the views shared by my constituents in Glengarry-Prescott, with particular reference to the speech from the throne. But may I first be permitted to sincerely congratulate the hon. members for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) and Toronto Trinity (Mr. Carrick) on the magnificent oratory they demonstrated in proposing and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure that they both expressed the thoughts of the Canadian people at large.

We all noticed that, while dealing mainly with general policy, the speech from the throne made clear the constant care of the government for the betterment of the welfare of the Canadian people, through a policy based on social security and economic stabilization in our country as well as in the rest of the world.

Once again the government is showing its broadmindedness in bringing this house and the people of Canada at large to consider the problem presented by the frame of a universal community growing smaller every day. Unfortunately Canada, as a growing nation, has not yet the facilities with which to measure itself with many of its elders in the cultural field. That is why I feel justified in deploring the fact that the government is not yet ready to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on arts, letters and sciences. The proposed establishment of a council on arts, letters and sciences is of great interest to the youth of Canada in general and, as I see it, is a logical evolution toward a federal department of youth.

Solving the immediate problems and needs is evidently one of the main things the government must keep in mind in laying down their policies. But one must not forget that we are now working for the future, actually for the generation which will be called to lead the nation tomorrow. I know it is the intention of the government eventually to create such a council and such a department, but I sincerely believe that each day and each month that such a move is postponed is a delay in allowing our young people to develop their talents in a way to enable them better to serve a better Canada.

As much as my constituents are aware of the necessity of furthering the cultural and physical development of the younger generations, they are also quite appreciative of the laws introduced to improve conditions among the farm and industrial workers. As you know, Glengarry-Prescott is of dual composition not only in name but also in the activities of its population. Farming and industry are its two components, and both these groups looked at the speech from the throne with a mixture of satisfaction and anxiety.

The majority in Glengarry-Prescott is made up of people of the agricultural class, and my constituency now ranks among the largest cheese producing constituencies in the world. Our dairy farm owners, I am sorry to say, were greatly disappointed over the absence from the speech from the throne of any mention of added help to solve the acute problems faced by them. But they are even more worried over the importation into Canada of some 2¼ million pounds of New Zealand cheese. With the millions of pounds of Canadian cheddar cheese at present in storage, the people I represent in this house are at a loss to understand why such authorization was granted.

Eastern Ontario—and for that matter a good part of eastern Canada—is aware of the difficulties our cheese producers have gone through during the last two or three years, with regard to the marketing of their product. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we had to go through a great many interviews in order to secure a reasonable price for that commodity. Now every spring the farmers of my constituency and in that region are in anguish and doubt as to the price that will be secured through the marketing of their product. I should like to see this government place this commodity under import control while we have a surplus on hand. I hope we shall see to it that this New Zealand cheese does not add to the already heavy burden on our local farmers.

That two-way trade should be promoted to ensure markets for Canada is an already accepted theory. But that this practice should be implemented particularly by means of one of the products which we have in surplus is something that is not as easily understood. If it is necessary to accept this importation of New Zealand cheese in order to maintain the balance of trade between our country and New Zealand, may I suggest that we could possibly exchange part of our surplus cheese or the whole of the imported cheese under our Colombo assistance, for example. It would be a way of counteracting the bad effects of such an importation, and would also be a way of relieving our dairy producers of their annual fear with regard to the marketing of their product. At this point may I also suggest that federal subsidies would be especially welcomed by the hard-pressed cheese producing industry, and that they would also help to maintain the stability of our national economy as a whole.

As regards help to certain groups of the population, in the speech from the throne I notice that it is the intention of the government to provide facilities for loans to fishermen similar to those provided to farmers by the Farm Improvement Loans Act. This is a commendable move, but the farmers would also appreciate it if the facilities extended to them by the above-mentioned act were increased in such a way that they could benefit from higher loans at a lower rate of interest. At present it is felt that the conditions laid down for the securing of a loan are altogether too hard to be met by the average farmer, and that in most cases the obtainable loans are not sufficient for the purposes to be served. By reconsidering the amount and the interest rates with regard to loans to farmers, I am sure the government would not only greatly help the farming industry but would also help itself.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken this opportunity to stress a few of the problems of the cheese producing and farming industries, for two main reasons. The first is that I am one of those who still believe agriculture to be the most stable element of the Canadian economy. The second one is that I represent a riding made up mainly of people of the agricultural class. Nevertheless, Glengarry-Prescott also has a large portion of its population directly engaged in industry. That being so, they are fully aware of the fact that employment is of paramount importance at the present time.

I was also glad to see that one of the highlights of the speech from the throne was aimed at providing more employment through a new scheme of federal public works. It is agreed that the present unemployment is seasonal and temporary, but I feel that the government were well advised in laying down a program to relieve the tension voiced from certain quarters.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member wish to adjourn the debate? It is now ten o'clock. Unless he obtains unanimous consent to complete his remarks, I cannot allow him to proceed. If he were about to conclude—

Mr. Bruneau: If I had unanimous consent to go on for two minutes, that is the most I would require.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member has unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bruneau: In this respect may I point out that Glengarry-Prescott is the logical geographical centre for a federal building. Such a building is actually much needed in our constituency. Besides providing work for many of our local labourers, such a project would enable the government to save money in the long run by moving under one roof services like the post office, the offices of the national revenue department, the unemployment insurance commission, the Department of Agriculture, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and so forth.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the riding I represent is not only located halfway between the metropolis and Ottawa; it lies exactly between the two main waterways, the St. Lawrence river and the Ottawa river. This geographical factor should undoubtedly constitute a strong argument to persuade the Canadian government to select a centre in our region as a suitable federal zoning area. On the other hand, convinced that their municipality could provide a logical site, the people of that region rejoice at a recent opinion that Canada has now reached a point where heavy industry should be decentralized. Geographically and ethnographically we enjoy first-class industrial activity, but there is room for more factories. Allow me also to inform you, sir, that our working hands are "tops". I and my constituents feel that such a policy of industrial redistribution cannot be successfully achieved with these thriving municipalities left out of the picture.

I am well aware of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that important measures announced in the speech from the throne have to be studied with diligence and voted upon. Finally may I say that the speech from the throne offers a rather substantial program of measures, and I believe it should give the average man the feeling that Canada is really going forward under a progressive and competent government.

Mr. Studer: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be a slight conflict here. As the hon. members concerned know, to accommodate members there are certain agreements in the debate on the address that are usually adhered to. I am sure the hon. member who moved the adjournment first will yield to the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac in order to adhere to the arrangement which was made, by virtue of which it was understood prior to this hour that the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac would adjourn the debate tonight because he was going to follow the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott. Is that agreeable to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek?

Mr. Studer: I am agreeable.

On motion of Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac) the debate was adjourned.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 19, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REFERENCE TO ACCUSATIONS AGAINST DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the minister read the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) during which very serious accusations were made against—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Balcer: —the deputy postmaster general, and what steps will he take to make certain that such behaviour ceases immediately?

Mr. Dufresne: That is a good one.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was not in the house when the speech referred to was made, and I have not yet had time to read it. I will do so and thereafter will be in a position to decide if a statement should be made.

HOUSING

REPORTED RESTRICTION ON LOANS ON HOUSING NEAR AIRPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question. Can the minister enlarge upon the report that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is currently refusing to approve loans on housing located within a one mile radius of airports?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I may say that each request for a loan is treated on its individual merits, but if I may take this question as notice I will be glad to answer it more fully at a later date.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

WINNIPEG POST OFFICE—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the second part of the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), which I did not hear. He was referring to the proposed Winnipeg public building and asked:

Second, would he confirm or deny that the Foundation Company of Canada made a further request for a grant beyond the firm price agreed upon in the fall of 1954?

The answer is that to the best of my knowledge and to the best knowledge of the officials of the department, no such request has been made.

NATURAL GAS

PROPOSED PIPE LINE FROM ALBERTA TO EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, to clarify rumours now current, would the Minister of Trade and Commerce state whether it is now the intention of the government to facilitate the financing of the all-Canadian gas pipe line by a government guarantee of principal and interest of bonds issued by the pipe-line company?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government has taken no action along that line. If and when action is taken I shall be glad to make an announcement.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—HANDLING OF FLAX AND RYE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government received any request to have the Canadian wheat board handle flax and rye in addition to those grains already under the control of the board? If so, what steps does the government intend to take to implement this request before the new crop year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. Representations have been received from various farm organizations from time to time requesting the government to assume responsibility for marketing flax and rye. However, it has been the view of the government that the wheat board is fully occupied with its responsibilities in marketing the three major crops, wheat, oats, and barley, and it has not been disposed to ask the board to take on the two small crops of flax and rye. Officials doubt whether they could do a very much better job than is being done with those crops on the open market.

HIGHWAYS

POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF NORTHWEST HIGHWAY FROM DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 14, I asked the Prime Minister if he had any information with regard to the possible transfer of responsibility for the northwest highway from the Department of National Defence to some other department. I wonder if he is now in a position to answer.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry I did not state positively at that time that no such decision had been taken. I make that positive statement now.

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION TO OPERATE TRANS-POLAR SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Transport say what has happened to the application of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines in regard to the granting of a licence to operate an air line in the trans-polar region, and when a decision is expected, if it has not already been given?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I might answer the hon. member by saying that the matter is under consideration, and I hope it will be possible to make a decision at an early date.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to ask a question supplementary to the one I just asked the Minister of Transport. Has any other air company made application for a route across the trans-polar areas or has any objection been raised to the granting of a licence to Canadian Pacific Air Lines, the objection being raised by Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Marler: The answer to both questions is no.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY INTO CRASH AT CRUMLIN, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question asked yesterday on the orders of the day by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) regarding the recent regrettable air accident near Crumlin airport. His question was:

> Has the minister looked into two facts which have been reported in connection with this tragedy; the first being that there was a failure of power at the airport and no indication that there were in use at that time any auxiliary or mobile lights or such other equipment; secondly, that there was a delay of more than an hour before the stretcher party arrived at the scene of the accident from the airport?

Perhaps I might first mention that it was announced yesterday that a board of inquiry would be nominated within a few days to hold a public inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the accident. I do not wish to anticipate any of the facts that may be determined by the inquiry, but should like to give the house an answer to the questions raised by the hon. member.

From information received by the department, it is understood that the airport rotating beacon and obstruction lights were in operation continuously. The runway and runway approach lights are under a separate control system which is set up so that all runway and taxiway lights, plus one set of approach lights, may be turned on at the same time. The control system, however, is not intended to carry at one time more than one set of approach lights, because experience has demonstrated that this is a necessary safety measure. If more than one set of runway approach lights are on at the same time, pilots may be confused and use the wrong runway.

At 11.49 p.m. the pilot asked for all runway and approach lights to be turned on, presumably because of the urgent situation in which he found himself. In view of the special circumstances, and in spite of the control arrangements, all lights were turned on, but they stayed on for approximately one minute only and then a fuse blew out because of the overload on the system. The traffic control officer on duty in the tower immediately called the senior controller, the airport maintenance foreman, the field radio technician, and then called the R.C.A.F. for crash and fire trucks. Trucks and other vehicles were lined up on one side of the runway, lighting it effectively, and the pilot of the aircraft was informed by radio that this had been done. The lights were restored at 10 minutes after midnight, having been out of operation for 20 minutes.

Hon. members will note that although the runway and approach lights were not in operation, the tower still maintained ground to air radio communication with the aircraft. Also the instrument landing system and the radio range were still in operation, providing a means by which an aircraft equipped with a radio and instrument landing facilities could make an approach to landing.

With regard to auxiliary lighting, I am informed that there is auxiliary generating equipment at the field. This, however, is designed to be used in the event of a general failure in the power supply to the airport. It is not the general practice here or in any other country to instal a complete duplicate set of airport lights.

In connection with the reference to time of arrival of the stretcher party, I am advised that the tower continued in radio communication with the aircraft until approximately one minute after midnight. At 5 minutes after midnight the tower telephoned the township and provincial police and a commercial ambulance. The airport did not know at this time the exact location of the aircraft. The department does not, of course, operate an ambulance service.

FISHERIES

VISIT BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT TO TEST KITCHEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as one of the more fortunate members of this house, alphabetically speaking, I should like to express to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and his staff my appreciation of the opportunity of visiting the test kitchen of his department today. I am sure those who were there with me will join with me in suggesting to those less fortunate members that, should they have a similar opportunity, they should by all means take advantage of it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

NOTICES OF MOTIONS AND QUESTIONS TO BE DEALT WITH MONDAY, JANUARY 24

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): On Monday the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe) asked if arrangements could be made for questions and notices of motions for the production of papers to be called at some early date before the orders of the day are called. In view of the standing order with respect to the debate on the speech from the throne, if that debate is not completed it could be done only with the consent of the house. If the house agreed, I would suggest that it might be done on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that this agreement be adhered to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT DOMINION ARSENALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Yesterday I asked a question of the Minister of Defence Production with regard to lay-offs at the Quebec and the Valcartier arsenals. Is the minister in a position to give an answer today?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): No. The information has not been furnished to me. I will try to have it tomorrow.

REDISTRIBUTION

REQUEST FOR STUDY BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has he been made aware of the steps being taken in my province of Manitoba to set up an independent commission for the redistribution of provincial electoral constituencies? In view of a motion on this subject that was passed by the house last year, will the government consider arranging for a committee of the house to study that matter at this session so far as federal constituencies are concerned?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was not informed of the attitude of the government of Manitoba to which the hon. member has referred. I will look into the matter, collect the necessary information and give an answer later.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in the traditional speech from the throne there are some matters on which I think all hon. members are in cordial agreement. There are three items to which I will refer. The first is the reference to the bringing into operation of the Disabled Persons Act, whereby assistance will be granted to totally disabled persons. Hon. members who come from the province of Ontario will be more or less familiar with this act which has been in force in Ontario for some time. I am sure all hon. members from Ontario will agree that in Ontario the act has filled a long-felt need. I trust that the contributions the federal government will make will be ample in every way.

The second matter in the speech from the throne on which I think all hon. members will agree is the provision whereby the age of eligibility for blind persons will be amended and the income ceiling will be adjusted. I am sure all hon. members are only too anxious that every possible assistance will be rendered to our more unfortunate citizens who are blind.

The third matter is the welcome announcement that the War Veterans Allowance Act will, after these long and weary years, be amended. I would say to the minister that I hope on this occasion when the act is amended he will not make the same mistake that was made several years ago when the act was amended. I wonder if the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) would mind just for a moment giving me his attention. I should like to say this to the minister. When you bring in the act to adjust the war veterans allowance, I hope you will not make the same error that was made by your predecessor several years ago when this act was amended and when you made only a slight raise in the monthly compensation and only a slight adjustment in the ceilings. At that time the veterans committee and the government were urged in every possible way by all opposition parties that the monthly allowance be placed at a higher figure than $50 a month and, further, that the ceiling be much increased over and above the amount proposed in the act. I say that to the minister in all kindness because he realizes only too well that an act such as the War Veterans Allowance Act is only amended once in a good many years. If the same error is made this time, I fear that it will be a fairly long time before there will be any further change in this act.

I might point out to the minister that the same mistake was made by his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), when some few years ago he brought in a bill to adjust the salaries paid to the members of the judiciary. He found that he made a mistake, and now he has to come back and do the same thing all over again. Therefore on behalf of these veterans, most of them from the first world war, I urge the minister that, when it is decided in cabinet council how much the increase in the allowance is going to be, he should be very generous and keep in mind that these veterans should not be restricted with a ceiling on their income but on the other hand should be urged in every possible way to earn as much as possible for themselves and their families. I have only one other suggestion. When the bill is introduced I would ask the minister if he would consider having the increase, no matter what it may be, made retroactive to at least the 1st of January, 1955.

I have received from the county council of the county in which I reside a copy of a resolution which they have asked me to bring to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). The resolution passed by the council of the county of Hastings reads as follows:

> That since, by the statutes of Canada, November 11th is designated as a public holiday, our government be urged to enact legislation that November 11th not only be declared a national holiday, but that it also be observed as such.

I can recall occasions in November when parliament has been in session and the House of Commons has continued to sit and conduct business just the same as any other day. There may be many in Canada who do not care or pay much attention to the significance of Armistice day, but at least to the veterans of the first war it means a great deal, and I would suggest to the government that the resolution of the county council be given attention.

It was suggested last session that at this session the Dominion Succession Duty Act would be amended, but there is no mention of it in the speech from the throne. I trust that amendments will be brought forward at this session because I am sure the government is aware of many unsatisfactory features in the present legislation. I will mention only one or two. One is that at the time the rate of exemption was set the dollar was worth a great deal more than it is today. The other is that an estate is entitled to exemption up to $50,000 but if the estate exceeds that amount duty is collected on the whole amount. If there are to be amendments of this act I trust the legislation will be sent to a committee of the house for study and consideration. If so, there is another point that might well be considered by the minister, namely, that the exemption granted to a widow under the act should be raised considerably.

In the speech from the throne reference is made to unemployment and it is described as being only seasonal and regional. I have in my hand a long article from the Belleville Ontario-Intelligencer of January 17 which contains a long statement issued by the manager of the unemployment office at Belleville. The article is headed in large capital letters: "Employment Office Appeals to Residents to Get Repairs, Alterations of Homes Done Now." The article is two columns long. It states that in the Belleville office alone there are over 16,000 persons, male and female, registered for work. It further points out that the Belleville office does not service the whole county of Hastings, that the town of Deseronto is serviced by the Napanee office and that the west half of the township of Sidney, which contains the large town of Trenton with a population of well over 10,000, is serviced by the Trenton office. In one county there are over 16,000 registered for work, not including two large centres. Therefore I submit to the minister that it is quite reasonable to say that in the whole county of Hastings there are at least 20,000 persons registered and seeking work at the present time.

That is only one county in the province of Ontario. Yet in the speech from the throne this condition is referred to as only seasonal and regional. The legislation the minister introduced last week and the legislation he proposes to introduce with respect to unemployment insurance are all to the good, but I would repeat to the minister what many others have said to him, that these increases, beneficial as they may be, are not an answer to the problem. They do not provide jobs. The minister at least has something to say about the policy of the government. He can at least use his voice to urge a reduction in taxation and do what he can to assist industry to produce more at lower cost so that industry will be better able to face and meet the competition of goods manufactured in other countries.

Much has been said in this debate regarding the importation of cheddar cheese from New Zealand. In eastern Ontario where I reside the cheese industry is most important. Hastings county is the place where the famous Black Diamond cheese is manufactured, a cheese that has done a great deal to advertise Canada throughout the United States. The whole dairy industry is of great importance to the economy of Canada. I should like to point out that it is estimated that the dairy farmers and their families comprise two million persons. Their hired help and their dependents number 160,000. Employees in dairy factories and their families come to 90,000 and employees in fluid milk plants and their families number 120,000. The gross value of the whole dairy industry in Canada in 1953 was estimated at $920 million.

The cheese producers in my riding particularly have both interviewed me and sent me petitions asking me to protest to the government in the house against the importation of New Zealand cheese. One question the cheese producers would like to know the answer to is whether or not the government intends to permit further imports of New Zealand cheese. The only answer they have received so far was given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in reply to a question asked by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe). As found at page 187 of Hansard of January 14, he said:

> Perhaps I could answer that question, Mr. Speaker. We do not expect any further substantial shipments of cheese from any source for at least six months and probably at least nine months.

Why we want cheese imported into Canada in six months or nine months when cheese production is at its peak I would not know. Neither the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) nor the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has as yet given any reasonable explanation to this house as to why New Zealand cheese was permitted to enter Canada, especially so at a time when there is well over 41 million pounds of cheese in storage which is at least 10 million pounds in excess of other years; also at a time when the cheese producers have collected from their own members a very large sum of money in order to finance the export of cheese to the United Kingdom. They have collected a sum of approximately 17 cents a hundred pounds of milk which in the average factory would cost the patron at least $100 to $130 a year.

The cheese producers of Ontario own over ten and a half million pounds of cheese. According to the press they owe the bank on guaranteed loans $3,300,000. To liquidate that cheese today in view of the competition with the cheese from New Zealand they would probably suffer a great loss. We are told or are led to believe, that the cheddar cheese of New Zealand costs approximately 25 cents to 26 cents a pound on the dock at Montreal. There is a tariff of one cent a pound on cheese which amounts to about 4 or 5 per cent. Compare that to industry which has a protection of approximately 20 to 25 per cent.

Other speakers in this debate have pointed out to the government that in years gone by a decline in the purchasing power of the farmer has always led to unemployment. Today we have a decline in the purchasing power of the farmer. This decline in the purchasing power will be further aggravated by the importation of cheddar cheese from New Zealand. It may be that cheese producers of Ontario are suffering a great and heavy loss if the government permits further importation of cheddar cheese from New Zealand. The importation of this cheese into Canada has been described by one federation official as the worst slap in the face Ontario farmers have ever received.

I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture or his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce what action, if any, the government intends to take in order to prevent further shipment of cheap cheddar cheese from New Zealand.

At page 20 of Hansard of January 10, 1955, in reply to a question, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this comment:

> During the war years a permit was required to import cheese for the reasons stated by my hon. friend, but at the moment cheese is not under price support so far as I am aware.

At page 231 of Hansard under date of January 17, 1955, the Acting Leader of the Opposition asked this very interesting question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> Mr. Rowe: In view of the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day to the effect that we might assume that in perhaps six months there might be other shipments of cheese, has the government given any consideration to making the import of cheese into Canada subject to permit under the Export and Import Permits Act, which governs the import of butter?
> Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the two situations are not parallel because cheese does not qualify under the legislation which governs the Export and Import Permits Act.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the minister states that cheese does not qualify under the legislation which governs the Export and Import Permits Act. Under that act, in the interpretation section, "minister" means the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Section 5 of the act reads as follows:

> 5. The governor in council may establish a list of goods, to be called an import control list, including therein any article the import of which he deems it necessary to control for any of the following purpose, namely.
> (b) to implement any action taken under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act, the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act or the Agricultural Products Board Act, to support the price of the article or that has the effect of supporting the price of the article; or

I would particularly point out that this provides for any action taken under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act to support the price of an article.

We find that under P.C. 4087, 1951, an order in council was passed to bring butter under the control of the Export and Import Permits Act.

As far as cheese is concerned we find that under order in council P.C. 1954-694 it is provided:

> The committee of the privy council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture, advise that Your Excellency may be pleased, pursuant to section 3 of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, to approve of the Minister of Agriculture entering into an agreement in the form hereto annexed, subject to such minor amendments, without changing matters of principle, as the minister may approve, with the Ontario Cheese Producers' Association Limited, for the marketing of a quantity of cheddar cheese produced in 1954 in the province of Ontario, and, pursuant to section 6 of the said act, approve the appointment of the firm of Arthur A. Crawley and Company, chartered accountants, Ottawa, Ontario, to inspect and audit the books and accounts of the said association.

In pursuance of that order in council the Minister of Agriculture did enter into an agreement with the Ontario Cheese Producers' Association in May of 1954. While this agreement is a bit long, Mr. Speaker, I am going to read it. It reads as follows:

> Between:
> THE ONTARIO CHEESE PRODUCERS' ASSOCIATION LIMITED, hereinafter called the "Selling Agency"
> OF THE FIRST PART
> and
>
> HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN in right of Canada and represented herein by the Minister of Agriculture, hereinafter called the "Minister"
>
> OF THE SECOND PART
> Whereas the party of the first part has been appointed as selling agency, under the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Act and the regulations thereunder, to market under a co-operative plan, within the meaning of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, cheddar cheese produced in the province of Ontario during the year 1954, on behalf of cheddar cheese producers within the areas of Ontario coming under the Ontario cheese producers' marketing scheme and
>
> Whereas the selling agency is desirous of marketing quantities of cheddar cheese produced during the year 1954 in the province of Ontario, and delivered to it or to its order on a co-operative plan under the provisions of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act,
>
> Now therefore, in consideration of these presents, the parties hereto hereby covenant and agree each with the other as follows:
> 1. The selling agency agrees to market or cause to be marketed, cheddar cheese produced in 1954 in the province of Ontario and delivered to it or to its order by cheddar cheese producers on behalf of milk producers, for sale on a co-operative plan under the provisions of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act.

2. The selling agency will pay to the said cheddar cheese producers for such cheddar cheese, when delivered to it or to its order, an initial payment on the following basis:

(1) For first grade cheddar cheese 24 cents per pound, f.o.b. cheese factory;

(2) Second grade cheddar cheese 23 cents per pound, f.o.b. cheese factory;

(3) Third grade cheddar cheese 22 cents per pound, f.o.b. cheese factory; and the selling agency will arrange to have the cheddar cheese producers pay to the milk producers an equivalent price in terms of fluid milk, less manufacturing costs.

3. The selling agency will make no payment to the cheddar cheese producers subsequent to the initial payment unless such subsequent payment is first approved by the governor general in council.

4. The selling agency will market such cheddar cheese to the best advantage possible.

5. For the purpose of this agreement, processing, carrying and selling costs shall include transportation, storage, shrinkage, handling, colouring, waxing, interest and finance charges, insurance, accounting, selling commissions and other processing and marketing costs, and all other expenditures properly included in an operating account, the total of which shall not exceed two and three-eighths cents per pound; provided that in the case of any unforeseen expenditure in excess of normal processing, carrying and selling costs, the minister may, subject to the approval of the governor general in council, increase the total amount of the costs allowed under this clause.

And now we come to the important clause, where it says:

6. The minister undertakes that if the average wholesale price of all cheddar cheese produced in the province of Ontario during the year 1954 and marketed by the selling agency according to the terms of this agreement is less than the average initial payment, together with the actual processing, carrying and selling costs which shall not exceed the maximum fixed in clause 5 hereof, there shall be paid to the selling agency the amount, if any, by which the average initial payment together with such costs exceeds the average wholesale price aforesaid.

7. The books and accounts of the selling agency shall be inspected and audited by an accountant or professional auditor as provided by section 6 of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, and the report of such accountant shall be submitted to the minister as required.

There are several other clauses which do not apply particularly, but I should like to point out that under clause 6 the minister agrees and undertakes to pay a set price, or to pay a price which would put a floor under cheese. This agreement has been amended by P.C. 1955-30 of January 4, 1955. The amendment is trifling, extending the time to April 30, 1955, and making provision whereby certain further payments will be made over and above the initial price.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has said that cheese is not controlled. He has also said that the legislation does not cover cheese so that it could be brought under the Export and Import Permits Act. I think the order in council I have read and the agreement made as a result of the order in council show clearly that cheese is an article being supported under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, being one of the acts referred to in section 5 of the Export and Import Permits Act.

So I say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that the government has the necessary machinery and the authority to bring cheese under the Export and Import Permits Act, thereby prohibiting or controlling any further imports of cheddar cheese from New Zealand. I think before the debate closes the cheese producers of Ontario would like to have some statement either from the Minister of Trade and Commerce or from the Minister of Agriculture as to whether or not they intend to bring cheese under the Export and Import Permits Act, or whether they intend to permit further shipments of cheap cheddar cheese into Ontario, thus causing loss to the cheese producers of that province.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to be associated wth all members in the House of Commons from Saint John to Victoria who have taken part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As all hon. members are aware, this throne speech gives an indication of the state of the nation; and if it is to give a true picture I believe it is the duty of members to place before the house the state of the nation in its more limited aspects, as it affects their own constituencies. And that is what I shall do in the time allotted to me this afternoon.

It is always in order and a matter of courtesy to extend congratulations to all those deserving of them in the House of Commons, and in that group the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) must be included. There seems to be some hesitancy on the part of some members to extend congratulations to those people who have given service throughout the past year in the forum of government. I am sure however that the government need not feel unduly displeased because of that. So far as Liberal governments are concerned, certainly they are not flattered by praise nor are they dejected by criticism. The people of Canada expect Liberal governments, as a matter of duty, to be patient and progressive and, irrespective of praise or condemnation, Liberal governments in the past have, and I am sure Liberal governments of the future will deliver that service to the very greatest extent of their ability, to all the people of Canada so as to have this country continue to be what even some socialists admit—the best country on the face of the earth.

As hon. members were told last year, the constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek is one of the greatest in Canada. It is my hope this afternoon, after listening to some of the damp, depressing, death-around-the-corner speeches we have heard during the last week, to present a somewhat more optimistic picture of what is in evidence throughout the country.

It is not my purpose to minimize the difficulties that we face in the country, or the problems, nor is it my purpose to underrate the fact that there are some good things in this country, and I believe that if more emphasis were put on some of the good things of the country than on some of the bad things that may exist we would all maintain a proper balance in regard to the situation in Canada today. When we hear the people who have no hope and who live in despair speak, they talk about unemployment—and there is unemployment. It is an evil that should be eradicated. Yet, there are well over five million people employed in Canada, five million people who are able to earn their own living at perhaps as high wages as earned by any people in the world. That is not done as a matter of course; it did not come about on account of any socialist party or policy in Saskatchewan or anywhere in the world. It came about because of Liberal principles that have been in evidence not only in Canada but throughout the whole world. Those Liberal principles reflect themselves in free trade throughout all of the world, which bring us to a united front and a united attack upon the evils that may exist not only in Canada but throughout the whole world.

Therefore I should like to talk of some of the good things in this country. One of the best things that I know of in this country is food. One of the accomplishments of Liberal policies throughout the years is production which has resulted in plenty. If there are still problems in regard to distribution you will never solve them unless you also have plenty to distribute, or the production that is necessary in order to solve the problem of distribution.

It is a good thing to talk about food; it is something that is a primary necessity of life. Any government in any part of the world that puts emphasis on food, to make sure that food is produced to the ultimate to feed the hungry people of the world, is the type of government that gives the greatest service to all of the people of the world. In my constituency, Swift Current-Maple Creek, comprising 300 miles from one corner to the other, there is at the present time an abundance not only of food but of oil and minerals —even dinosaurs are being taken out of the ground, which may or may not mean anything, according to some scientists' interpretation. We have some manufacturing, but the great emphasis is on food in the southwest corner of Saskatchewan, and in Swift Current-Maple Creek. Food is vital; food is a necessity. The question most often asked in the whole world is, when do we eat, and what do we eat?

In my constituency there are 16,500 square miles of land, comprising 10½ million acres, practically all of which is under cultivation or used for ranching, and which provides an abundance of food, if nature is kind to us, which is of value because it creates national wealth that others may distribute throughout the length and breadth of this country. Although we have heard of drought, of dust and of all the evils of the 1930's in that part of the country, no part of the world has recuperated faster than southwestern Saskatchewan has. And this area, above all other areas in western Canada that suffered from drought in the past, is in the best position this year to understand the situation because we have suffered much from years of drought in that part of Canada. We have taken advantage of the policies of the federal government in such matters as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and all the other services provided by the federal government, and we have recuperated in that part of the country on a basis that we hope will be permanent. Therefore, in words that I hope all of us can understand, Mr. Speaker, and that you may like, I should like to present the production of Swift Current-Maple Creek in the form of a menu, a menu which we, the people of Swift Current-Maple Creek as producers, can place on the tables of 250,000 Canadians 365 days a year, produced from that land of over 10 million acres. For breakfast we offer you not a commodity that is manufactured but the ingredients that go into the commodity. For breakfast we offer you porridge made from the finest of oats for the finest people on earth, with milk and cream from the Jersey and Ayrshire and Holstein herds that are second to none. We offer you bacon from the leanest Yorkshires and Tamworths in the whole country. We offer you eggs from the finest flocks of Leghorns, Barred Rocks and New Hampshires in the country that any man would care to see, west of the Ottawa valley. We offer you toast made from the best wheat grown anywhere, and we give you honey that has won prizes in Toronto and Saskatchewan last year and this year, honey produced by the busiest bees in Canada.

For lunch we offer you, Mr. Speaker, roast leg of lamb and scalloped potatoes, from potatoes that weighed three pounds this year. We offer you rye rolls made from grain and rye grown in the grain and rye fields of my constituency. We offer you butter which is the finest made in creameries throughout the length and breadth of this area. We offer you crabapple jelly made from the Dolgo crab of my constituency, and there is none better in Canada. By the way, I produced 1,200 bushels of apples on my farm this year, and I hope in the future to produce about 3,000 bushels. We also won the trophy in the Saskatchewan fruit show this year.

But that is not all. We now offer you dinner, and first as an aperitif we will offer you rye and water. We have lots of rye in that country. We offer you a choice of sirloin of beef or broad-breasted turkey, such as are grown nowhere else in Canada. We offer you vegetables which are grown with a minimum amount of moisture. Anything grown with a minimum of moisture is of high quality, be it wheat, beef or vegetables. We offer you tomatoes and also macaroni made from Durum wheat grown in my constituency and, as the pièce de résistance, Saskatoon berry pie. If you have not eaten it you have not lived. That is what we as producers place on the tables of 250,000 Canadian families 365 days a year. The only reason I mention this is to indicate that the importance of agriculture in this country cannot be overestimated.

Over and above that wheat and beef required by the 250,000 families, we can supply more than a million people in Canada, because my constituency is one of the greatest and best agricultural areas in Canada.

I said I was going to talk of some of the good things in this country, after hearing about all of the bad things. One of the greatest encouragements came to my desk this morning that anyone could ever have. After listening to the socialist speeches in the House of Commons, I found on my desk this morning one of the socialist papers, which is printed in Saskatchewan. It is called the Commonwealth. Here is the headline: "Figures show big growth in Saskatchewan economy." Can you beat that? How can we talk about difficulties in Canada—and we have difficulties—how can the socialists and others talk as they have been when their own paper denies what they have said? Irrespective of that, there are difficulties in agriculture. Agriculture has never been in existence anywhere when it was in the same position as other industries. Everyone knows of the vagaries of nature, the conditions under which we operate, the inability to control prices of any kind. We are subject to every condition that can react against us.

Irrespective of the fact that these figures show a growth in Saskatchewan economy, I am not suggesting that there is not room for improvement in agriculture in Saskatchewan. We have made some advances in agriculture in regard to some stabilized prices, especially in regard to wheat. Let us hold what we have. We should at least support a government that has influence throughout the world with the trading nations of the world. Let us support that government which has the only system that can hold that advance. We have to trade with the people of the world because we cannot create an economy of our own. We cannot continue indefinitely to pay subsidies to one group at the expense of another, because if we do so we will have to take money from one group and pay it to another, thereby diminishing the purchasing power of certain sections of the population. We do not want subsidies. We want to expand the economic wealth of the country and raise the standard of living throughout the dominion and, incidentally, transmit that standard of living to other countries.

There are other important industries in Canada but none of them are as important as agriculture because it means the production of food. You must first eat, and there is nothing else you can do if you do not eat.

In this house we have 23 lonesome farm representatives, 23 who are endeavouring to fight perhaps the greatest battle that any group of men could take on, and they are fighting that battle for the benefit of the agricultural industry without which all the rest of our organizations, our standard of living and our social services must deteriorate.

Therefore, when we hear hon. members in this house talking about cattle, hogs, poultry, and the need for floor prices and parity prices under the agricultural support act, these hon. members are actually speaking on behalf of us all. They are talking about your future because they are advocating policies that will guarantee your future. Once agriculture goes asunder, then all the industries of Canada will fall asunder. Purchasing power will be disrupted. Every member of this house and all the people throughout Canada will be guaranteed food and will continue to eat if hon. members will in turn guarantee the agricultural industry its demands.

This industry has never asked too much, though it has always been in a position where it is deficient. We always hear about legislation in regard to subsidies to farmers. But if farmers ask for that sort of assistance it is because they are short, and it is in order to keep their industry alive and in full production that they ask for these things. We do not ask for anything we do not think is necessary and we do not ask any more than other sectors of industry in Canada.

But we want to guarantee that we are going to continue to have a high standard of living, to which as Canadian citizens we are all entitled, so that we will all be able to meet the trials and tribulations that lie ahead.

We are now wondering how to accomplish this. I do not know of any method of determining what percentage of wealth is accorded to various groups within the economy. But we should determine the labour that enters into agriculture and into every other industry and then as a result of that decide what proportion of the Canadian people in their various groups are getting too much or too little. When there is an injustice that injustice should be corrected.

We have not the talking or voting power of labour. There are 636,000 farmers in Canada and 5,530,000 workers in general industry, and the latter have the strongest bargaining and voting power. It should not only be the farmers who are asking the people of Canada to come to the assistance of the agricultural industry because we are weak and lack the necessary bargaining power.

We are weak in voting power and if we had the strength there would be a different situation in Canada today. No other industry has the paramount need of stabilization that agriculture has. The farmer's share of the national wealth is extremely difficult to determine. It must be remembered that the farmer's family is also working and producing, and that is a fact that is often overlooked. The farmer's wife contributes extensively to farm operations.

I have an article here written quite recently by an Ontario economist who estimated that the services of the farmer's wife were worth approximately $69,000 over a period of 40 years, provided she was normally industrious—and most farmers' wives have to be.

A western economist puts the figure at approximately $173,000. That works out at approximately $4,000 per year. That is not too great a figure when we come to consider what should be the farmer's share of the national wealth.

If commissions are appointed here in Canada, then I think one of the most important tasks to be undertaken by such a body would be the determination of what share of the national wealth should be accorded to each of our major industries. If we can determine that, then we do not need to listen through thousands of speeches in the House of Commons. We do not have to take things for granted. We do not have to read newspaper articles with regard to the actual conditions which govern the economy of Canada.

When this commission is set up, and I hope it will be soon, we will then be in a position in western Canada to know whether or not we are having a share of the national wealth equal to that offered to other industries in the Dominion of Canada.

Proof of the farmer's position is to be found in the income tax returns. Those returns show that the farmer is sixteenth on the list in regard to receipts. Fishermen are even worse, for they are seventeenth on the list. I will not mention who is at the top of the list or even comes into second place, but something should be done about the farmer's low position on that scale.

As we all know, the farmer's purchases are limited by the amount of revenue he receives, and if we safeguard the farmer's interests, then we will be safeguarding our own.

We have often heard references in this house to a bill of rights. And I think it is high time the farmers of this country had a bill of rights. Last year Senator Humphrey, of St. Paul, Minnesota, proposed a bill of rights, and it may interest hon. members to hear what it contained. It reads as follows:

1. The right to full equality of economic opportunity.
2. The right to improved standards of rural living.
3. The right of reasonable protection against natural hazards.
4. The right to extend agricultural free enterprise through co-operative action.

Mr. Argue: Tell the Liberal government that.

Mr. Studer: What was that?

Mr. Argue: Why not get that policy adopted now by the Liberal government?

Mr. Studer: This government was not born with a silver spoon in its mouth, like some members of parliament. I was not born with a silver spoon in my mouth. I hope I am not boasting, but I had to go out to work at the age of 12 and I have been working ever since, doing a man's work and providing something which is of value to this country. I did not have a socialist, university education handed to me on a platter. I was not born in a log cabin, and I was not born in a sod shack, but my parents moved into one as soon as they could afford it. The bill of rights continues:

5. The right to public co-operation and assistance in saving the soil.
6. The right to preserve the social and human values of family farming.
7. The right to decent land tenure which would encourage the desirable goal of farm ownership.

Try that in Saskatchewan.

8. The right (of a farmer) to a democratic voice in his own farm program.
9. The right to benefits of an expanding world trade.
10. The right to a long-term program of food storage to encourage abundance.

That is the bill of rights for farmers. That is the sort of program to which we should all subscribe. That is the bill of rights every hon. member should be advocating; for again by protecting the agricultural industry we would be protecting ourselves.

We have agricultural difficulties. We cannot sell wheat. But that wheat will be sold, and I believe that within eight months we will no longer be talking about the problem. We cannot deliver to the elevator of our choice. But whatever our difficulties are out in Saskatchewan, they are of a temporary nature and will be corrected.

Production difficulties are permanent difficulties existing in western Canada and particularly in southwestern Saskatchewan, and those are the difficulties we wish to see eliminated. But I would add that we also have had the problem of empty granaries in southwest Saskatchewan, rather than full ones. We also want a floor price, and a good floor price, on eggs. They talk about somebody not receiving the floor price on eggs. All the Saskatchewan government needs to do is to implement their marketing legislation, buy up all the eggs in Saskatchewan and sell them back to the federal government. There is the solution. Will they do it? I do not think that they will. It is much wiser politically not to give consideration to that solution but rather come down here to the House of Commons and tell the federal government what to do.

Then there is the matter of the floor price on hogs. I am glad that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) yesterday took up the problem of the underhog. It is about time he had his day. The only thing I think he recommended was a change in grading. From what I know I think perhaps the hon. member for Selkirk thinks there are not sufficient grades in hogs. But if he would need one more in order to sell his product, I think we should enter another grade of hogs and it would be called the razorback class. Some of the solutions are right at the socialists' back door. But will they take them? No, they will not, because talk is cheaper.

One of the difficulties in Canada is taxes. We have our provincial taxes. As you know, we have a provincial treasurer in Saskatchewan. His name is Fines; and everybody knows that we are fined for everything in Saskatchewan. We also have our federal taxes. We have the greatest tax, which is for national defence, and who is more responsible for the tax for national defence than are these socialists and their cohorts? Why? Because in the Regina manifesto they stipulate that they will not rest content until this system under which they have lived and prospered shall be eradicated. And the other reason why that national defence expenditure is incurred is on account of their cohorts, wherever they may be in the world. Listen to this:

Thirty-five years ago Lenin made a prophecy that "first we will take eastern Europe; then the masses of Asia; then we will encircle the United States of America, which will be the last bastion of capitalism. We will not have to attack it because it will fall like an over-ripe fruit into our hands . . . "

Again, in 1930 Dmitri Z. Manuilsky, who later presided over the United Nations security council in 1949, when addressing the international students at the Lenin school of political warfare in Moscow came out with the somewhat astonishing "war to the hilt between communism and capitalism is inevitable. Today, of course, we are not strong enough to attack. Our time will come in twenty or thirty years. To win we shall need the element of surprise. The bourgeoisie will have to be put to sleep. So we shall begin by launching the most spectacular peace movement on record. There will be electrifying overtures and unheard of concessions. The capitalist countries, stupid and decadent, will rejoice to co-operate in their own destruction. They will leap at another chance to be friends. As soon as their guard is down, we shall smash them with our clenched fist".

That is why you have to have a defence program in Canada. That statement has never been repudiated. The Regina manifesto has never been repudiated. I wish some good honest-to-God socialist would stand up in this House of Commons and repudiate that whole thing. Then we shall be able to conduct ourselves here in this country on a basis of peace with all people of the world.

What is the policy or the idea behind these socialists? You will remember that last year, when we were having the debate on amendment to the Criminal Code, they had an objection. What was their objection? Every one of them was endeavouring to have the penalty for sedition lowered from 15 years to 5 years. We spent almost a week on that matter. Why? If I am a traitor to this country that has given me my living and if I advocate sedition and I am biting the hand that feeds me, why should I get only 5 years? Why should I not be hanged?

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Studer: Mr. Speaker, where do they stand? If and when communism knocks at our door, whom are they going to support? Are they going to support this system which they are pledged to eradicate or are they going to support the communistic system to which they give a little bit of lip service once in a while and condemn in a mild manner on occasion? I have never heard an anti-communist speech in this house or in any other house by these socialists since they have been in this House of Commons. I have never heard a good soul-shaking anti-communist speech by them, and you never will as long as they are associated with those with whom they are associated.

We also have federal taxation but we get something for it. Out in Saskatchewan the only thing you receive for your taxes is more taxes. In Canada here we pay taxes. Certainly we pay federal taxes, but we receive something for them. What do we receive? We receive veterans pensions for our taxes. We receive old age assistance for our taxes. We receive family allowances, old age security, national health, disability pensions and blind pensions. We receive the safeguarding of the nation, the administration of the country, the maintaining of floor prices, the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the bonuses and the subsidies, subsidies on farm feed, railway subsidies, trans-Canada highway, housing loans, farm improvement loans, farm loan board, Veterans Land Act, veterans pensions, unemployment insurance and so on and so forth. I should also mention disability pensions.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the other day made mention of how this disability pension came about. A little girl in Sherbrooke wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) such a pathetic letter that the Prime Minister just had to inaugurate this disability pension. That is the first time I ever heard any socialist admit that they were not responsible for all pensions.

I would suggest to the socialists that they get into harness, get out of this House of Commons and earn some of the production that they wish to distribute among the people of the world. But in Saskatchewan they just live on capitalistic production. They live on capitalistic money that is paid into Saskatchewan. As it appeared in Hansard last year, the amount of money that is spent in Saskatchewan by the federal government, irrespective of the production of it, is over $139 million. That money the socialists are using in order to promote socialism. If they had to live on socialist policy and had to produce their own wealth in Saskatchewan, every one of them would be in the poor-house. There is no question about it; every one of them would be there. They are living on capitalistic money in the province of Saskatchewan and capitalistic money has been keeping them in existence in Saskatchewan. Once that capitalistic money is withdrawn, then of course their bubble is burst. There is no question about that. But do not expect anything else in Saskatchewan because few of the socialist leaders know the value of a dollar. Any person who has not earned a dollar by the sweat of his brow does not know the value of it. Hence from this non-producing element that is in existence out in Saskatchewan you can continue to expect higher and higher taxes until our farmers are taxed off the land. That is one of the great overheads that the land carries at the present time and that the farmer has to pay, namely the overhead of taxes in the province of Saskatchewan. I want to warn the rest of the people in Canada to look into that picture in Saskatchewan before Quebec or any province adopts socialism.

So they are living off capitalistic money. How did the socialists get that way? I will tell you how they got that way. How did they become socialists? You will remember that back in 1933 a book came out, published by Dale Carnegie, I believe. It said something about trying to win friends and influence people. Every socialist in Saskatchewan read that book and he used it to advantage, so much so that they almost wrote a book of their own, they did not call it "How to Win Friends and Influence People". That was the original title, "How to Win Friends and Influence People". They entitled their manuscript "How to Win Votes and Fleece People". You see the result in evidence every year since they have been here. The best times that Canada ever had were the times when there was the smallest number of socialists in this House of Commons and that was in the period from 1949 to 1953. As long as the people of Canada send socialists to this House of Commons who are pledged to destroy this system, we shall have the customary result. Why do they say that we should follow a capitalistic country, the United States of America, in our contributions to Colombo? Why do they not present to us for comparison a socialistic country? If they are against the capitalist system one would think they would never refer to it; but all they are interested in is to keep in office and to keep financing on capitalistic money. The day is coming when they will not continue to exist. You have heard of the communistic slogan: "Workers of the world, unite; you have nothing to lose but your chains." The socialists have a slogan too. Their slogan is: "Irresponsible socialists of the world, unite; you have nothing to lose but your brains".

We have heard some speeches in the house in which objection was taken to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) kissing babies. I hope the Prime Minister continues to kiss babies as long as he is Prime Minister and long afterwards because he kissed babies long before he was ever Prime Minister. I like a person at the head of our government who does not have to make an effort to do something that he has not been accustomed to doing all the days of his life. I like people at the head of our government who are family men and not people who ridicule family men. If the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) thinks he can make little men big by making big men little, that has never happened yet in the history of the world and never will.

I come to another friend of ours in the ranks of the socialists, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Johnson). You will remember that last year a heifer was lost somewhere in the city of Ottawa which was threatening to destroy the whole city and our hero came to the rescue with a rope. It was like David and Goliath. David wound up his sling-shot and hit a bull's-eye. My hon. friend wound up his rope, let fly and missed the heifer. I do not blame him too much because I think there is something wrong with the hon. member's eyesight. I think he is suffering from myopia. During the past summer he was at a provincial C.C.F. convention in Saskatoon and he made a speech to the convention. He is reported in the Leader-Post of July 21, 1954, as having said:

> I went to Ottawa expecting to see the benches filled with intelligent faces. I was disappointed.

I would say that the hon. member, sitting in the back row as he does, would not be able to see much further than the front socialist benches directly in front of him, and I think his statement was well founded. In any event he would not have been able to see any further than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because that member was standing up all the time. If my count is correct that member rose to his feet 700 times in the last session. I think the hon. member for Kindersley is suffering from myopia. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is suffering from athlete's foot. You can imagine that as soon as disability pensions were passed both these men would put themselves in a position where they would eventually be recipients of it.

We have also had some speeches by members of the official opposition. I would refer to them as a paper opposition. I do not mean that they are not worth the paper their speeches are written on; I mean that if you read today's papers you will find out what the opposition is going to say tomorrow. That is why I call them a paper opposition. Inasmuch as that is their policy, I suggest that they take ten newspaper editors from across Canada who have been picked at random, put them in the front benches, and they will do a cracking good job. In fact you could pick ten members of the press gallery at random, put them in those front seats and they would do a very good job for the opposition.

But they will not have to do that. Why? Because we Liberals form our own opposition right within our ranks. That is why the opposition's case is hopeless. We form our own opposition within our own ranks. We guide and advise, reject and add, and admonish our government, so that it is the type of government against which the opposition has about as much effect as the waves around the rock of Gibraltar. But they can improve, and we hope that they do and will eventually make some contribution to the people of Canada.

I think my time is about up, much to the regret of the socialists perhaps, but I want to mention one more thing that should be put into effect in Canada. There should be qualifications for members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Studer: That would leave me out, I am sure, but that would be expected. You have qualifications for members for school districts and school boards. You have qualifications for municipal administration and for city administration. You have qualifications all the way from the lowest form of government with the exception that when you come to the highest you can be elected a member of parliament as long as you are not in jail. That is one reason why there are so many socialists here. Since the indemnity has been increased, I think there should be qualifications established for members of parliament so that we will eliminate those from our public life who are professional politicians. Let us eliminate those who have no stake in the country except a political stake, and this is my reason. Go back through history and see what happened so far as the advancing or retarding of humanity is concerned.

What stake did Hitler have in Germany except a political stake? What stake did Mussolini have in Italy except a political stake? What stake did Lenin have, what stake did Stalin have, what stake did Karl Marx or Engels have or any of these individuals? What stake did they have in their countries except a political stake? Therefore I suggest that every member of parliament should have certain qualifications. He should have a job, an occupation, farming, or a vocation, and if he does not spend six months of the year at it he should not be permitted to be a member of parliament. Then there would be no more socialists here. After all, the socialists in Saskatchewan are nothing more or less than socialist profiteers, socialist middlemen reaping a profit from the expenditure of dominion government money in the province. We can get along without them just as the socialists say we can get along without other middlemen.

I was going to talk about unemployment but there is not enough time except to say, what do the socialists do when there is unemployment? The only socialist country I know of that deals with it in any way is Russia, and if there are people unemployed there they are either put in the army or sent to Siberia. What is the socialists' solution? I have not heard it. We are pledged to eliminate the cancer of unemployment—and I claim it is a cancer—from society when it occurs. I also think that the workers in industry should be greater sharers in industry. I cannot see that strikes will be eliminated or that we will eliminate the conflict with respect to the sharing of the national wealth unless that is done.

Our government has the responsibilities. It is not assisted by rabble rousers or socialist malcontents. I do not think there is anything like a rabble rouser in Canada. But we do have to strike a balance in government. Living in the world, I say that as an exporting nation we are dependent not on our own policies alone but on the policies of 73 other countries in the world with which we trade. So we wish to strike a balance. I hope I have contributed to that balance in endeavouring to speak not only of the bad things, the things we wish to eliminate in this world, but also of some of the good things that it has been our privilege as Canadian citizens to enjoy. I am in favour of Liberal policies not only in Canada but throughout the whole world and when that comes about you will have one world with the power of production, which is essential, and a solution of the problem of distribution which will guarantee every man on earth his right to live and his fair share of the wealth of the whole world.

[Mr. Studer.]

So this Liberal government and all other governments having Liberal policies have fed, clothed, housed and provided health and guaranteed freedom to more people than any other system on earth. We wish to extend these benefits to all people on earth. We want to extend the corporal works of mercy. We want to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, shelter the homeless, take care of the sick. As long as that is the objective of the Liberal government and party, I hope that by word, action and example I can always be found worthy to be considered as one of them.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I intend this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, to make some reference to dominion-provincial relations, and particularly the announcement made the day before yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

Before going on to demonstrate, as I believe I can, that the government's policy is one that is a disservice to Canada, I wish to say that I welcome the announcement in the speech from the throne that amendments are to be made to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I have had the privilege over a number of years of adding my voice to those of members on all sides of the house calling upon the government to make a substantial increase in the burnt-out pension or, to be more correct, the war veterans allowance.

We in the C.C.F. support the demand of the Canadian Legion that the war veterans allowance should be increased from the present figure of $50 in the case of a single man and $90 in the case of a married man to $60 for a single man and $120 for a married man. We all agree that allowable income ceilings should be raised from $720 single to $1,200 single, and from $1,200 married to $2,000 married.

Further we in this group see no reason why the veteran should not be given the benefit of an additional $40 a month when he reaches the age of 70 and is eligible for the old age security pension. We believe that it is unfair and unjust for this government to single out the veterans of Canada and discriminate against them by reducing the amount of the war veterans allowance when those veterans become eligible for the old age security pension.

During the war years and immediately following the government held out to the people of Canada the promise of a new social order. The late prime minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, had proposals which he set before the people of Canada and which he maintained would result in full employment, including greater social security measures and the national health program. He went further and said that the proposals would include adequate guaranteed prices for agricultural products. The late prime minister pointed out that farmers in this country had accepted lower prices during the war, and that they should therefore be guaranteed adequate prices after the war. He also said that if his government were returned to power he would undertake the steps necessary to see that all the provinces of Canada had the financial means to discharge their constitutional responsibilities.

Of the principles outlined, the principle that agriculture should have guaranteed prices has been the first casualty. The Liberal government came back to power in Canada in 1935 and has been in power ever since, and the figures put out by the dominion bureau of statistics show that today agriculture is back in the position it was in the late thirties. Figures from the dominion bureau of statistics show that farm cost of production today, based on 1935-1939 equalling 100, is 238·7. But the price level of farm products is only 220·1. In other words the farmers' cost-price relationship, according to the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics, is even worse today than it was in 1935-1939, when we were still in the depths of a depression. If you want to know why there is unemployment in Canada, if you want to know why farmers are having difficulty in meeting their obligations, you can see the answer in the figures I have just quoted.

We had expected as a result of Liberal promises and commitments that agriculture would be guaranteed adequate prices after the war, because of the low prices accepted during the war. Under the policy of the present government not only are the so-called floor prices inadequate, they do not operate at all.

On December 6 last, speaking to the dominion-provincial conference, the Minister of Agriculture made a public confession that his floor price under eggs was not operating. He said the floor price was 38 cents a dozen, and the producer should be entitled to at least 32 cents a dozen. He quoted figures showing that farmers at Edmonton get 30 cents a dozen, at Winnipeg 27 cents a dozen and at London 37 cents a dozen. The government not only has not adequate floor prices for agricultural products, but the floor prices as set are paper floor prices, phony floor prices, and just so much fiction in the words of the Minister of Agriculture himself. At the dominion-provincial conference he admitted that the farmers were not receiving those prices.

Much has been said about the condition of the wheat producers and the wheat industry in this country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is always very optimistic. He has said time after time that exports in the current crop year were going away up, that sales were improving, and that there would be very little difficulty.

I believe the trend is toward improvement, but not the way the Minister of Trade and Commerce has pointed out. The latest weekly publication issued by the board of grain commissioners for the period August 1, 1954, to January 5, 1955, shows that during that period we exported 99·6 million bushels, whereas during the same period of last year we exported 99·7 million bushels of wheat. This year to date exports are as low as last year, and last year was not a good year. So far as exports and sales of Canadian wheat are concerned, we can only hope that the trend is toward improvement.

Farm marketings of wheat this year are away down, from 230·9 million bushels a year ago to just 111·7 million bushels during the present period. Do not let anyone tell you that the main reason western farmers are short of cash today is that they have had a crop failure. The truth is that the western farmer has not been able to market even the small quantities of grain he has threshed. When the present crop year ends the majority of farmers will probably have little grain on their farms. The farmer has been able to keep the elevators filled, and the main reason he has no money is that marketings are down, coupled with the additional fact that the price-cost relationship is adverse. We have in Ottawa today a delegation representing the farm unions of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. This morning they made a well documented submission to the cabinet requesting, among other things, that the farmers be given adequate support prices, that they be given parity prices for wheat sold in Canada, and adequate floor prices for wheat sold on the international market.

Every important wheat producing country in the world today guarantees a support price to its wheat producers; and if one looks over the wheat support prices of the various countries of the world he sees that the Canadian position is bad indeed. It is right at the bottom of the list. The Argentine wheat producer is guaranteed $2.72 a bushel. The Australian wheat producer gets $1.55 a bushel on domestic wheat, plus a cost of production floor on export wheat. The farmer in Spain is guaranteed $2.73 a bushel, in Japan $2.53, in Greece $2.45, in France $2.95, in Belgium $2.49, in Sweden $2.28, in Turkey $2.28 to $3, in the United Kingdom $2.22, in the United States $2.24 and in West Germany $2.72 to $2.83 a bushel. Canada has the lowest guaranteed price of all, only $1.40 a bushel at Fort William, which means an effective price to the farmer of about $1.20 for No. 2 northern wheat at his local elevator marketing point.

There are three facts about the Canadian wheat picture we should not forget. The first is that the Canadian wheat grower produces the best wheat in the world, but under a Liberal government he is condemned to the highest cost of living in the world and the lowest guaranteed price in the free world. I say that the attitude of the Canadian government as expressed in its treatment of the wheat producers is shameful. No wonder the farmers of western Canada, through their farm unions and other organizations, are considering once again a mass movement on Ottawa to try to impress upon this anti-farm government the need to increase the support price on Canadian wheat.

It is a shame that Canada, one of the wealthiest if not the wealthiest country per capita in the world, should pay its wheat producers the lowest guaranteed price. The agricultural policy of this government is definitely and decidedly against the interests of the producers, and does not in any way give the farmers the guaranteed floor price they were promised by the late prime minister, Mackenzie King, at a time when agriculture was taking such low prices during the period of the war.

We in the C.C.F. believe that the principles laid down in the original dominion-provincial conference following the war were good. We believe that Canadians in every province of Canada are entitled to a basic minimum standard of services. We believe that dominion-provincial agreements are necessary if the government is going to adopt the financial policies necessary in order to maintain full employment. We believe such agreements would be of assistance in connection with the other things proposed to the original conference. We are sorry now that this government is set against implementing those important financial and social security measures. The late prime minister, Mackenzie King, said that just as soon as a sufficient number of provinces signed the taxation agreement he would implement the various social security and full employment measures proposed.

But with the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the policy was changed. Hon. D. C. Abbott, who was minister of finance in December of 1950, said then that even though all the provinces were to sign a taxation agreement the federal government was not committed to anything in any other field.

The government today has demonstrated by its actions that it will not undertake the measures necessary to provide full employment. When the then minister of finance made his budget speech in the House of Commons in the 1954 session he forecast that the real wealth production of Canada would not go up in the coming year. The real wealth production of this country, because of the increasing population and the improvements in technology, should go up by at least 5 per cent every year. Instead of going up by 5 per cent it is forecast that the gross national product is likely to go down to the extent of some $500 million. Even allowing for a poor crop in western Canada, the fact remains that because we did not have full employment in Canada we lost during 1954 approximately $1,200 million in wealth production. That $1,200 million represents sufficient wealth to provide a health insurance program, to increase family allowances and to provide stabilized prices for agricultural products. But the government has allowed production to go down and the people of Canada to lose $1,200 million worth of wealth production.

The day before yesterday the Prime Minister announced unilaterally some of the results of the taxation negotiations he has had with the premier of Quebec. Ordinarily one expects that when two governments have been making negotiations, any tabling of documents or statements made will be made concurrently. But the federal government made its announcement one day; and the premier of Quebec did not bother making one at all, and did not table the letters until the following day.

I may have some criticisms to make of the premier of Quebec, but certainly I will not malign him to the extent the Prime Minister did, according to a report in the Montreal Gazette, when he made the statement that Canada's prosperity and growth pleased everyone except countries behind the iron curtain and some people in Quebec. I may criticize the premier of Quebec, but I shall never criticize him in those terms; because even though I disagree violently with the stand taken by the premier of Quebec, I say those terms should not be used in relation to a premier of any province in Canada elected by democratic vote.

Mr. Dufresne: Why do you disagree with him? Is it just because you are a socialist?

Mr. Argue: Oh, that is about as sensible an interruption as the remarks of the previous speaker, which lasted some 40 minutes. I do not think such a question requires an answer.

Mr. Dufresne: You cannot give it.

Mr. Argue: The statement by the Prime Minister of Canada in which he said that the Canadian income tax law would be amended to reduce the federal tax by 10 per cent in Quebec means, in my opinion, a complete surrender by the federal government of Canada to Premier Duplessis in Quebec.

We were told by the Prime Minister that the 10 per cent reduction represents just about the same amount of money that will be collected by the 15 per cent tax in the way it is applied in the province of Quebec. Now Canada has to go back to the kind of taxation situation that existed before the war, when taxes varied from one province to another. We have all the ill effects, double taxation and differing taxation, and I am extremely disappointed that the federal government of Canada has yielded to the premier of Quebec in this way. It is a disservice to Canada.

Mr. Dufresne: You admit that he was smart, anyway.

Mr. Argue: As a nation we are going to suffer from this policy, because it demonstrates that the government has forgotten about the principles enunciated in the dominion-provincial conference following the war. It shows conclusively that this government is not prepared to take those fiscal, taxation and economic measures that are necessary to guarantee full employment and full prosperity.

The result of this reversal of policy and attitude is shown in the fact that in 1954 Canadians lost $1,200 million of wealth production that should have been obtained. It shows that this government has now abandoned the idea of a social security program that would include health insurance. I believe the health insurance proposal, in the original conferences, was one of the most important proposals. The announcement of the Prime Minister demonstrates that he is now surrendering even his plan of a health insurance program.

The proposals in the original dominion-provincial conferences would have made it possible for Canadians living in all provinces of Canada to have a minimum basic standard of provincial services. The provinces have not the taxation resources necessary to fulfil their duties under the Canadian constitution. The revenues of the federal government amount to $4,500 million a year. The revenues of all ten provinces in Canada combined amount to only some $1,400 million a year, and the combined revenues of all the municipal governments in Canada, both rural and urban, amount to some $900 million a year. Therefore, out of the revenue dollar the federal government takes 73 cents, the provinces have 17 cents and all municipal governments have is 10 cents. There is the reason the federal government needs to provide increased grants and measures to enable the provinces to meet their very important obligations under the constitution.

One of their most important obligations is the provision of educational services; another of their most important obligations is the provision of roads which is a vital service in this nation today. The United States government recognized the necessity for an adequate road program as far back as 1912 and provided grants to the states for the building of roads. Today the United States has a good road system and President Eisenhower has proposed that congress provide $101 billion for roads in the United States in the next ten years. If the federal government of Canada did the same thing on a per capita basis it would provide $909 million a year toward the building of roads.

The only item in the estimates provides the magnificent sum of $15 million for the trans-Canada highway. The amount should be $909 million a year if the Canadian government was to make the same contribution to roads on a per capita basis. But ours is a much larger country than is the United States. If the Canadian government were to undertake a road program that would give us the same type of roads, no doubt it would cost a great deal more. Our government should give serious consideration to providing immediately adequate grants for the building of roads in various parts of the dominion.

The United States grants are not just for super highways or even just for ordinary highways in the states, but are for assistance in building every single mile of road in the United States of any consequence whatsoever, even farm to market roads and roads for local school buses. Rural municipalities in Canada, even urban municipalities, where a highway goes through a city, find the provision of adequate roads an impossibility.

The reason municipalities are unable to provide adequate roads in Canada is that the tax base in a municipality is so narrow. Municipalities derive almost all of their revenue from taxation on real property, and the taxation on land and urban properties for roads and for education is becoming almost unbearable in every single province of Canada. If there is an important political issue that is the same in each and every one of the provinces it is this matter of inadequate roads, high land taxation and the inability of municipalities to provide roads on their meagre taxation base.

The same thing is true with respect to adequate educational services. Any country in the world that prides itself on being a democracy and being progressive should provide adequate moneys to create equal educational opportunites for all the young people of that nation. We know the attitude of the premier of Quebec toward university grants. He will not take them. When the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) advocates that the federal government make grants for the provision of equal opportunities for education on the public and high school level, this government allows the attitude of the premier of Quebec to influence it to the point that it says no, we will not make grants for education in Canada. The result is a lowered standard of education in many provinces.

I come back to the statement I made earlier, that the Prime Minister had surrendered—yes almost unconditionally—to Premier Duplessis, as was clearly demonstrated in the statement he made in the house the day before yesterday. He has not only surrendered on the matter of taxation agreements, but he has surrendered to the leader of nationalist ideas, Premier Duplessis, to the point that he says, "No educational grants. We will let the children of Canada suffer from unequal educational opportunity." This attitude is a shame.

I would like to see the federal government, in the dominion-provincial conferences that are coming up, return to its original principles which were presented to the dominion-provincial conference after the war, and even at this late date undertake measures that will provide full employment, and an adequate social security system; and that will mean health insurance now. I hope they will adopt measures that will provide adequate guaranteed floor prices and a fair share of the national income for agriculture, and which will grant to each and every provincial government in Canada the financial resources to carry out its responsibilities under the Canadian constitution.

I do not think the attitude of the premier of Quebec should be allowed to condemn 15 million Canadians to suffer such things as high hospital bills, and high doctors' bills; to cause 15 million Canadians to go without adequate roads and adequate educational opportunities, and the Canadian nation to lose $1,200 million of wealth production in one year.

Again I make the statement that the Canadian government should stop sacrificing the well-being of 15 million Canadians on the altar of ultranationalism; and, if that statement be considered too strong, I suggest hon. members read the Prime Minister's statement to the Reform club in Quebec last September.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to get to my feet so early in this session because I am sure the general rule about being seen and not heard is as applicable to new members of this house as it is to small children. But times have changed. I know that my two daughters have a great deal more to say than their parents had, so perhaps I may be permitted some slight deviation from the golden rule of silence.

I must admit I have been perplexed as to just what opening remarks I might make. I have no desire to make an evangelical speech of condemnation and denunciation. Neither have I any desire to offer wholesale congratulations to the government. Let us face it. As a member of the opposition, that group without which no government can operate efficiently, it is my duty to point out what I consider the shortcomings and deficiencies of this government, and I am prepared to say that this privilege only exists if such criticism can be constructive and a sound alternative offered.

Criticism, of course, either constructive or otherwise, can fall on deaf ears. My leader has conferred upon this government a diploma characterizing them as the greatest free traders of all time. I would confer upon them a degree "in mutual admiration". Perhaps they cannot be blamed for the fact that such a degree can be conferred upon them, because 20 years in office has convinced them that there is no alternative to their type of government.

I believe there is an alternative, and to express my views I might even have to use such unmentionable terms as tariffs, protection, and free enterprise.

What are the problems that face us today? Certainly by far the most important is unemployment. I agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) that there is no magic formula which can put an end to unemployment. But if unemployment were as regional and seasonal as the speech from the throne suggests, then I believe the magic formula of government handouts would do the trick. I am sure the Minister of Labour knows as well as we do that the situation now confronting us is much more serious than that. I know that in West York unemployment is greater today than it has been since the depression, and I do not need the benefit of information from the dominion bureau of statistics to convince me of that fact.

But now that we have criticized, have we anything to offer by way of solution? First of all, conditions can only be improved if all three partners in the free enterprise system join in a common program. But who are they? First, labour; second, management or industry; and third, the government. Each has a vital role to play.

To the workingman I would say that we cannot compete for the world's markets without getting more for our production dollar. Let me make it quite clear that I do not believe wages are too high. Far from it. But if businessmen are asked to devise better and more efficient methods of production, to reduce production costs, then I think labour too must join in the same program to see that greater productivity results from each man's daily job.

To management I would say that on you must fall the major burden of achieving the highest production at the lowest cost. Production methods must be constantly under study. The introduction of "automation" in plant equipment, it appears, must more and more be emphasized. New sales techniques must be tried and new markets sought to free us from dependence upon the United States.

Industry has achieved a great deal, but there appears to be an ever-increasing tendency to ask for government assistance even on small matters. Leaders of business must realize that if the government is asked for assistance there can be no satisfactory answer if the government asks for control. And this government shows no reluctance in accepting the principle of controlling every phase of economic life in this country if it is given the opportunity.

I might bring this thought to the special attention of bank presidents, whose lengthy reports I read annually. If the country's credit requirements cannot be met without government guarantees, then tighter and tighter government administrative control can be the only result, ending ultimately in government control of every phase of banking.

What could the government do to relieve unemployment other than the pump-priming job it is doing? I believe it could do a great deal, but this government has done nothing. We do not recommend high tariffs and protection, but we do ask for an end to the naïve program of binding us under trade agreements to nations which are not playing under the same rules. The problem is just as simple as that. We choose up sides and we are ready to kick off, when we are informed that our opponent has just built a brick wall on the 20-yard line. With that system the best we can ever do is kick single points. The touchdowns will always be against us; and is that not just what our government has allowed to happen? Our two biggest customers, the United States and Britain, have allowed our goods entry or refused entry as they saw fit, regardless of the GATT agreement.

I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) that if industry is called upon to cut down costs, to improve production techniques, and to economize, then I think it has the right to say to this government: "You economize, improve your methods and reduce your taxation program in the same proportion that you have asked us to reduce our prices to get into the world markets." Surely it is not too much to ask this government to reduce its over-all expenditure in the same proportion that has been achieved in the United States in the last couple of years.

This government could help further if it took another look at what I consider to be a very artificial exchange rate on the Canadian dollar. It is readily apparent that the rate is not based on the world's desire for Canadian dollars for trading purposes, because our adverse position in that respect has already been pointed out very forcibly by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The real demand for Canadian dollars in the world's money market is for capital investment, and the artificially high value placed on the dollar is a real handicap to our manufacturers in their trading position. We should face this issue now because, if we do not, I shudder to think of the situation looming up and what will happen when our foreign investors complete their programs of construction and start asking for their dividends.

Is this not the way this government must face up to the country's unemployment problem? There appears to be no alternative. What will it be? Will it be a continuation of pump-priming, a little loosening up of the purse strings on the workers' and employers' own hard-earned unemployment insurance dollars, or a cold, hard, practical approach to this greatest problem in Canada today?

I think, Mr. Speaker, the spectre of unemployment is a far greater worry to the home owner than to any other individual in the community. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has emphasized that fact in this house, and has suggested a method of protection for home owners who are buying under N.H.A. I wholeheartedly support the idea of equity of redemption insurance and, as a matter of fact, I strongly advocated such a plan during our recent by-election campaign in West York.

But the real problem facing the home owner is in his capacity as a shareholder in his municipality. That municipality is having more and more trouble meeting its obligations because of its unfortunate position in the tax source picture. I am firmly convinced that we are saddling the municipality with responsibilities far beyond its capacity. I find it very difficult to understand why real estate should be carrying almost the complete load for educational cost, police protection and other similar responsibilities. Surely these items are for the benefit of all persons, not just for the benefit of home owners. I am hoping that when the dominion-provincial conference becomes a fact, the problems of the municipality will receive serious and thorough consideration, because otherwise it is questionable if essential services can be maintained and expanded.

The Minister of Finance should remember that the home owner is entitled to a tax break. His investment in a home is the largest investment of his life. It is an investment in the development of this country. It has created jobs on a greater scale than any investment in common stock in a corporation. Yet, Mr. Speaker, this government has given a tax credit of 20 per cent on dividends received from common stocks to anyone who invests in the same. I say to the Minister of Finance that it is much more important that such a tax credit should be allowed on annual payments of principal on house purchases, and on realty taxes paid on the same.

For example, a purchaser pays $400 in principal on his house mortgage annually, and $200 in realty taxes. Each of these amounts has created employment. It is a real investment, just the same as or more so than an investment in the common stock of one of our corporations. He should receive a credit on his income tax of 20 per cent of the total amount of both principal and realty taxes paid, namely $120. If that formula is not acceptable to this government the least which should be done for the home owner is to allow the real property taxes which he pays on his home as a deduction from his total income for income tax calculation.

I cannot close without mentioning that my constituency of West York has suffered as the result of two major disasters in this country during the past year. First, as the result of the Moose Jaw T.C.A. air crash, it lost its esteemed and highly honoured member of this house, Rodney Adamson, and his wife, Cynthia. I know this house and our party deeply feel his departure from this chamber, as he was a fine parliamentary representative. Then late in the year West York bore the brunt of "Hurricane Hazel". Loss of life and property were appalling, but our people went to work with grim determination. Their efforts and their financial contributions to the various charitable drives have been tremendous.

This sacrifice must not be in vain. Surely this disaster has brought home to this house the necessity for an adequate national civil defence set-up. This program needs more than air raid sirens. It needs an adequate permanent force, small though it may be, just as much as an army does. Let us see that we get it, because I saw municipal authorities working under appalling conditions which should not occur in a well organized society.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to deliver a good part of my speech in French, but it is already difficult enough for a new member to make his maiden speech in his native tongue without venturing into the other official language of this country. I hope to do better in the future.

(Text):

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, once again I have the privilege of rising in the house and speaking on behalf of one of the finest constituencies in Canada. May I first of all join with other members in congratulating the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder (Mr. Carrick) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The way these two hon. gentlemen acquitted themselves was certainly a credit to themselves and to the communities they represent, and was in the finest traditions of the house.

When I say I have the privilege of representing one of the finest areas in Canada I of course am referring to the people of the constituency. There is probably no other rural constituency in Canada whose population is as cosmopolitan as that of Vegreville. It is indeed true that the strength of Canada lies in her diversity. When we take Canada as a whole we find people of different backgrounds, different origins, different traditions, each of whom has something to contribute to the building of a new national Canadian culture and the strengthening of this land. So I say the constituency of Vegreville is most cosmopolitan, and I think you will find there the finest example of unity because the people, regardless of their origin, are able to understand and get along with each other. I also feel, and this is an actual fact, that our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will go down in history as the greatest promoter of unity in Canada.

I listened with a great deal of interest during the course of the debate to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), and especially what he said with regard to tariffs. I wish to assure the house that the people of the province from which I come will endorse his views in this regard. Canada is the third largest trading nation in the world, being exceeded only by the United States and the United Kingdom. The well-being of this nation depends upon the volume of our trade with other countries.

This is true, of course, for every section of our population. It is certainly true of western Canada, for it is essential that the people of the prairies have a market for their wheat and other agricultural products. The same is true of the fisherman, whether he be on the east coast or on the west, and the same is also true with respect to any of the workers in our factories. The fact remains that if we want other countries to buy from us the things that we have to sell, then naturally these other countries will expect that we will buy from them. For that reason high tariffs do not promote trade. Tariffs are always a barrier to trade.

In view of certain restrictions that have been imposed on our exports by the United States government, I realize that some measure of protection is necessary for our industries. It is necessary that we promote their expansion and development and provide more opportunity for the creation of jobs for our people. But I believe the United States is at the crossroads today so far as giving economic leadership is concerned. They will have to decide, and decide soon, whether there is to be more and freer trade among nations. In this respect Canada has had the courage and determination to give leadership in attempting to break down the barriers to such free trade.

As one who represents a farming area, I sometimes find it difficult to tolerate the views held by some individuals who have a fatalistic attitude and regard farming as though it were the worst type of occupation. On the contrary, farming is one of the finest occupations in which one can engage. It may be that I hold this view because I was born and raised on a farm, but the outlook of the farmer is most independent, and with the advent of modern machinery farming no longer is the drudgery that it used to be years ago. I think hon. members will agree with me that with good and careful management most people who go into farming are able to do well.

But farming is also a very risky occupation, and it is often very discouraging and difficult. The farmer is subjected to declines in prices, as was the experience in the hungry thirties. He is subjected to weather conditions such as hail, drought, early frost, bad harvesting weather and, as was the case last year, excessive moisture. We are all aware of the serious crop failure experienced in the three prairie provinces in 1954, especially in the central and northern parts, and we can hardly expect to have another crop failure without disastrous results.

Some reference was made during the course of the debate to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I believe that act, which came into existence in 1939, is a great thing and a wonderful idea, but I agree again with the hon. member for Rosthern that in view of present conditions the payments should be broadened. I might go a step further. I pointed out a moment ago that another crop failure in the three prairie provinces would be disastrous to the farmers, and I wonder whether the government would not give consideration to seeing whether the farmers would not agree to an increase in the contribution they make. At the present time it is 1 per cent. It could very well be raised to 3 per cent or even more.

Perhaps some arrangement could be entered into with the provinces whereby, through the co-operation of the governments of the provinces and the federal government the farmer, in the event of a crop failure, would obtain much greater assistance than he is able to get at the present time. I would be glad if the leaders of the farm organizations would give this matter serious thought. Incidentally, I regard the farm organizations as most desirable and necessary, because their leaders have the opportunity to study various problems, to make suggestions and to advise governments, provincial or federal. For that reason I should like to know the feeling of the farm organizations about the suggestion I have made with respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

What I really want to bring to the attention of the house and the government is another problem which I consider to be serious, and which we are being confronted with in the farming communities. I am of course referring to the great difficulty that young men and women must overcome if they want to start farming. We realize that it requires a lot of capital, and because of lack of capital it is difficult for these young men or other people who are interested to make a start. We all realize that the very high cost of machinery as well as the very high cost of land probably requires a minimum investment, in our area at least, of $15,000 to start a farm. There are many people who wish to make a start who just do not have that kind of money.

When my grandfather came to this country some 60 years ago he was able to obtain a homestead upon the payment of a $10 fee. We are now living in a different age, however, and under different conditions. I think we still have enough of the pioneering spirit left in us, but as I say it still requires a lot of capital. You will find instances of families where there are four or five boys, and these families are able only to set one boy up farming. The other lads just are not able to make a start. They must move into some industrial centre such as Hamilton or Toronto in order to find a job.

What about the farm hands who are employed on salary? It is most difficult for them to save enough money to be able to make a start in farming. The same thing applies to many of our newcomers. Why should many of these people who have the qualifications and the desire find it necessary to move into industrial centres? There was a time when industrial centres were able to absorb these people, but often they only add to the problem of unemployment.

If I may digress for a moment, one of the serious problems we have in the prairie provinces is the lack of a self-sustaining population. If you were to compare the 1941 census with the census of 1951, which is the last census, you would find that in Alberta, although there was an apparent gain of some 140,000 people during that period, actually it was not a true picture of the situation because that figure does not take into account a very important factor, namely the natural increase. When I speak of the natural increase I am referring to the number of births in excess of the number of deaths. We have very accurate figures in that respect. When you take these figures into account you will find that the net loss of population in Alberta for that ten-year period was 9,500.

That is not very serious, but if you take the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan the figures are much more serious and disastrous. In Manitoba the net loss of population was over 65,000. In the province of Saskatchewan there was a net loss of over 200,000. Therefore, you will readily see that the net loss of population in the three prairie provinces during that period from 1941 to 1951 was over a quarter of a million. This shows that we not only have failed in that period to attract people, but have failed to even keep those people who were already there. Many of these people have moved into industrial centres because they are areas where there is a great population, and a greater population offers better opportunities.

My point is that, whether in the prairie provinces or in any other province of Canada it is our young men and women who wish to go into farming and who have the necessary experience and desire who should be given an opportunity to remain on the land. I believe they would be able to make a much more valuable contribution to the wealth of this country if they were encouraged to remain on the farms where they desire to be. The fact is that it is almost impossible for a man to make a start in farming because of the amount of capital that must be involved.

What can be done about it? I can only offer a suggestion. May I point out that at one time it was impossible for many Canadians to own their own homes, and then along came the national housing plan. That plan was by no means perfect. It still probably needs changes. Some changes have already been proposed by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). But the fact is through the operation of this act thousands of people in towns and cities became home owners who otherwise never would have been able to own a home.

What actually happened was that a scheme or a plan was set into motion without any risk on the part of the government or on the part of the lending institutions. It is not a case of a handout. It is a plan which was put into motion and which has brought a benefit to thousands and thousands of people in this country. I therefore ask why there should not be a similar plan for our young men and women who wish to go into farming.

I am not suggesting handouts. Some of you will say we already have legislation which tends to assist the farmers, such as that setting up the Canadian farm loan board or the Farm Improvement Loans Act. This legislation is intended to assist those people who have already made a start in farming. It is a case of enabling them to buy better equipment, improve their homes, or purchase additional land. But as far as I know there is nothing on our statute books which would tend to help the people who wish to make a start on the farm, along the lines of the national housing scheme.

Mr. Speaker, a plan similar to the National Housing Act, possibly with the co-operation of the provincial governments, could be, I think, brought into existence. Let me point out that we have already the basic machinery to set up this kind of a plan. We have the V.L.A. offices in various provinces. They already have the know-how, the knowledge to deal with these matters.

Since there is great room for expansion of our agricultural industry in this country I do not think we want these people who are suited for farming and who have a wide background of experience in that occupation to go into something else when they are desirous of going into farming. I do hope the government will give this matter very careful consideration.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): It is not my intention today, Mr. Speaker, to contribute unnecessarily to the prolongation of this debate. However, there are a number of matters of vital concern to the residents of Fraser Valley, which electoral district it is my honour to represent. Therefore I shall endeavour to present them and deal with them as briefly as possible, while stressing them as vigorously as I believe their importance and urgency would warrant. As you are no doubt aware, the economy of the Fraser valley is quite diversified, and the problems to which I shall refer today have to do with different aspects of our economy.

A great part is played in my riding by those who are engaged in the fishing industry, and during the past several weeks it has been my privilege to discuss with them some of the problems with which they are currently faced. I should like first of all to refer to the closure regulations which are affecting them at the present time. I believe that as these regulations are imposed they will bring additional hardship on our people in this industry.

Last year the department announced that the closure on commercial fishing in the Fraser river above New Westminster bridge would be in effect on September 16, as a conservation measure. Following strong protests this decision was altered and the closure date for 1954 was set at October 8, for 1955 at September 30 and for 1956 at September 15. This modification was welcomed by the fishermen in this area, and in a letter to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) I expressed the hope that after further consideration and investigation it might not be necessary to apply the earlier closures as set out in the statement.

Regarding the effectiveness of the closure measures last fall, I should like to read a short paragraph from the brief submitted by the gill net section of the Pacific fishermen and allied trades union. It states with respect to closure:

> At the time the suggestion contained in article 5 appeared our organization sent a brief to the federal minister of fisheries and also told him at an interview in Vancouver that the proposed measure would not only work a very great hardship on the fishermen and the businessmen of the area, but that the measure would not have the desired effect, i.e., to increase the number of parent fish reaching the local streams between New Westminster and Mission. There being no pink salmon run to the Fraser this year, commercial fishing was allowed to October 8 and then closed supposedly to conserve the chum salmon. Our contention was fully borne out by the fact that up to December 1, (when all commercial fishing automatically closed by custom in past years in the Fraser river) the showing of chums in the local streams mentioned was the poorest in history, showing plainly that the stopping of fishing above New Westminster bridge had no bearing on the matter.

Therefore I suggest that further consideration be given to this matter. As I have already said, I hope that in the future earlier closures such as have been suggested will not be imposed.

There was also the suggestion that the closure would prevent the taking of a poor grade of fish, which would obtain above this specified point in the river. In this connection I would call attention to two letters, one of which is written by the secretary of this union to the Johnston Fishing and Packing Company of New Westminster, British Columbia. It states:

> Gentlemen, the directors of the gill net section of our union are desirous of obtaining information as to the procedure used in handling salmon caught above New Westminster bridge. As you probably know, there have been a lot of loose statements as to the quality of salmon caught in this area and in order to arrive at the facts of the case we would be very much obliged if your company could answer the questions listed below.
> 1. In deliveries of salmon from your collectors to your plant are the salmon caught and collected above New Westminster bridge kept entirely separate at all times from salmon caught and collected in other parts of district 1?
>
> 2. In the process of canning salmon at your plant is a separate code mark used to differentiate between salmon caught above New Westminster bridge and salmon caught in other parts of district 1?
>
> 3. Does the government laboratory require certification from your company as to the place or origin of any parcel of canned salmon submitted by your company for inspection?
>
> 4. What percentage of this year's total pack was of grade "b" quality which was canned at your plant?
>
> Thanking you in advance for this and other information which may occur to you as pertinent to the quality of salmon caught above New Westminster bridge, I am,
>
> Yours sincerely,
> F. ROLLEY,
> Secretary.

In reply they received the following letter from the Johnston Fishing and Packing Company:

> Pacific Fishermen and Allied Trades Union,
> 298 Main St.,
> Vancouver 4, B.C.
> Attention Mr. Fred Rolley,
> Dear Sir:
> Replying to yours of the 4th instant in which you ask four questions dealing with the Fraser river fishing operations, our answer to the first three is "No" and to the fourth "None".

Therefore we have a picture of the situation as it exists, relative to the suggestion and contention that above the New Westminster bridge the fish are of poorer quality.

Another matter of concern to the fishermen is that while the maximum length of gill nets for use in the Fraser river is only 150 fathoms, that allowed in the past in other areas, and for seiners, is 200 fathoms. Fishermen have told me that 150 fathom nets are only about 50 per cent effective, as the nets have a tendency to gather, whereas on the other hand 200 fathom nets remain at approximately their full length. In this respect these men are wondering why gill nets are all to be reduced to 150 fathoms while no reduction is contemplated for the seiners. There is also dissatisfaction over the fact that while gill netters are under constant and close inspection, little if anything is being done to enforce the regulations with respect to the seiners.

Then I have one further observation to make about the fishing industry. Last year a statement was made to the effect that a number of reconstructed seiners were to be permitted into Canada and given some tax concessions. They were required to spend at least two years in the deep-sea fishing industry. It is now brought to my attention that last fall at least one of these vessels was reported fishing right up to the very mouth of the river. The gill netters of the Fraser river are concerned about this and other problems to which I have referred, and are of the opinion that a concerted effort is being made, by restrictive measures imposed against small and independent fishermen, to force them out of the industry, so that further benefits will accrue to the large company-owned seine boats.

I call these matters to the attention of the minister and suggest that he will have to do a lot of fast talking—perhaps faster than usual—to convince fishermen that this is not so, if indeed it is not.

The second problem to which I would call attention is that of river bank erosion and flood danger. It appears that at least some of these problems are characteristic of the Fraser valley. I have not heard other members dwell upon them at length in any respect, but I can say that they affect mightily the Fraser valley. Before coming to Ottawa for this session I spent a good portion of one afternoon in the company of the reeve of Kent municipality, inspecting the river and protection work at several locations. There certainly is cause for immediate concern. From the annual report of J. L. MacDonald, provincial diking commissioner, contained in the report of the land service for the year ended December 31, 1953, and reported in the Fraser Valley Record, I quote the following:

> Within the memory of many the Fraser river has washed away vast acres of fertile land, replacing homes and farms with gravel bars. This destructive action is continuous. The effects are especially evident in the districts of Kent, Nicomen island, Matsqui and Pitt Meadows. On Nicomen island the Department of Public Works has had to move a road located outside the dike back from the river bank three times within a year. Remedial action will have to be taken.
> To find a solution to the problems which should attempt to control the cause, is not a simple matter. It will require comprehensive engineering investigation and study.
> Corrective measures are beyond the scope of local districts. The subject is of importance both to British Columbia and Canada.

In the one district of Kent I understand 1,200 acres of valuable agricultural land have been lost. At the present time farms are in immediate danger as the process of erosion continues. At one point the river threatens to break through the bank completely and cut another channel. If this were to happen, not only would it be disastrous to the farmers but it is questionable whether navigation would be possible through that section at low water.

Engineers have made a survey of the area and estimate that the cost of the required work would be in the neighbourhood of $43,500. The municipality is committed to $7,000 for river bank work during the current year, and it is completely beyond the ability of the district to assume further responsibilities at the present time. The nature of the problem is such that further delay in its solution will be disastrous not only to the few farmers near the bank but also to the entire community.

I might say in this connection that the natural process of erosion is tremendously aggravated by the passage of tug boats. These boats keep close to the bank in order to miss the strong currents, and one can stand and watch the wash as it strikes the bank and then recedes, carrying soil with it. We do appreciate the assistance given by the dominion government in this matter, but we urge that an effort be made to solve the whole problem permanently and allay the fears of those people who are in danger of losing large parts of their farms. What is true in Kent is likewise true in the other areas I have already mentioned, and also in Albion, further down the river.

I should like to refer again, as I did last year, to a matter which concerns the residents of another section of the Fraser valley, namely those who are living along the Vedder river. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources by the officials of the department of agriculture of the British Columbia government. The whole proposition has been presented, with aerial photographs and all the data required, and we were hoping that some positive action would be taken in this respect. We had hoped that the dominion government would be prepared to give some substantial assistance in this matter. The Vedder river is gradually filling up the channel, until at the present time we find that for possibly three miles there is very little channel, and the river just meanders here and there. It is quite possible, in the event of a flash flood, that the whole area would be under water.

There are some valuable dominion government works in that section. Even although it is the judgment of certain officials that they are not in danger at the moment, there is a definite possibility that they would be in danger in the event of a serious flood developing. Therefore I again request that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources further consider this matter and render some assistance in its solution.

Once again it appears that the government does not intend to do anything toward raising the pensions of our senior citizens. I have listened to the speeches of hon. members from day to day, and the fact that very few have even referred to this matter has given me some cause for surprise. I believe the senior citizens of our country are deserving of some real consideration at the present time. It appears that many of those citizens who have worn themselves out in building up our great country are to be forced to spend their remaining days in actual want, and that certainly most of them are in far from comfortable circumstances. The governments of British Columbia and Alberta have recognized the need for some action and are now supplementing the old age security payment by $15 a month. I understand that Saskatchewan still holds to the $2.50, and the other provinces are not contributing anything in this regard.

Last year this government balked at raising the war veterans allowance because they said it would jeopardize the progress of their social welfare program, but we find this year they have introduced legislation to raise the war veterans allowance. I do not know how much the increase will be, but I certainly hope it will be substantial. We hope that if this government cannot find it possible to increase old age pensions at this session—we hope they do—they will be prepared next session to bring in legislation to give better consideration to those who are elderly, to enable them to meet their living costs.

I have the honour to represent one of the great agricultural areas in British Columbia. One of the main problems confronting those engaged in certain aspects of agriculture in that area is the high prices they are forced to pay for feed grains. I have no quarrel with the prairie farmers in their endeavour to obtain a greater share of the national income. I believe it is coming to them; but the farmers in my area do object to paying a terrifically high price for products for which the farmer receives very little.

For instance, I have been given to understand that the farmer receives approximately $28 a ton for feed wheat. When our poultry raisers in British Columbia purchase feed wheat it costs $68 to $70 per ton. The freight charge from Regina to Vancouver would be in the neighbourhood of $13.40 per ton. Someone somewhere is receiving 100 per cent profit. I believe this situation warrants investigation, for this problem is of vital concern to the farmers in the Fraser valley and is one to which I sincerely direct the attention of the government at this time.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me voice appreciation for the measures being introduced by the government this session. I suppose the proper psychological approach would be to think in terms of a motion of commendation, but I shall reserve that for later in the session.

We welcome amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Veterans Benefit Act, although, as I have already intimated, we do not know to what extent the proposals will go. We would say that to be in any degree satisfactory the requests of the veterans organizations should be acceded to in full. I do not have to go into their requests in detail and place them on record again. They are well known to every hon. member, and I would suggest that the government would be doing the minimum by meeting those requests.

We are also appreciative of the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, as other hon. members have stated, there are still many inadequacies quite evident in the legislation. There are still many who should be receiving benefits but who are classed as ineligible. A group of men came to see me several weeks ago and called to my attention the fact that despite their employment with Buckerfield's Limited they were not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. These men might be classed as a marginal group. They are clipper operators and tow truck drivers, and therefore find themselves somewhere in between agricultural workers and those engaged in industry. I submit that in all fairness these men should be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits the same as others who are engaged in operations conducted by Buckerfield's Limited.

The disability pension legislation brought in last session and now proclaimed is wholly commendable but, as has already been stated, it is so restricted in its application that men who should be receiving assistance under the legislation are likewise ineligible.

We are also appreciative of other things such as the proposal regarding blind pensions and the legislation authorizing loans to fishermen similar to those provided to farmers under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. But again let me say that we are far from satisfied with the situation in regard to the other matters I have mentioned, and I would earnestly request that the attention of the respective departments be called to those problems and something be done to rectify them.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, at the opening of my remarks I wish to extend a most hearty welcome to the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). I have had the honour of being one of his friends for some years, and I can assure hon. members, though it is something they will find out for themselves as the weeks go by, that in the new minister this house has made a very valuable acquisition indeed. His parliamentary experience, which is extensive, will be an asset to us. Apart from that he is perfectly bilingual, and that will give him the opportunity of being courteous and capable in both languages. I am quite sure that as far as Magdalen islands are concerned we will have with him the same pleasant relationship we had with his predecessor, Hon. Lionel Chevrier.

I also wish to welcome to this house a confrere from the Quebec bar, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Richardson); also a confrere from the Ontario bar, the hon. member for Toronto Trinity (Mr. Carrick), who seconded the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

This brings me to the pleasant task of congratulating both the mover (Mr. Leduc) and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Translation):

I congratulate the mover of the address (Mr. Leduc) on the fine way in which he carried out his task. He remained true to the fine traditions of his predecessors who spoke in French in the house and he was a credit not only to his language but also to his province.

(Text):

It may be noted that after a Toronto lawyer moved the address last year, another Toronto lawyer seconds it this year, and I can only repeat what I said to his predecessor last year, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth), that he acquitted himself very well indeed and fully measured up to the standard we expect from a member of the Ontario bar.

Mr. Fleming: It is a good city.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Mr. Cannon: Yes, but you may not be so well pleased with the remainder of my remarks.

Mr. Martin: Some might take exception to that observation.

Mr. Cannon: I am sorry I cannot congratulate the members of the opposition who have taken part in this debate so far. In reading over their speeches in Hansard I made notes on certain passages to which I would like to draw the attention of hon. members. To begin with, we find that the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe), as reported at page 22 of Hansard, congratulated some members of his party on having obtained certain things from the government. For example, he congratulates the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) for having his plea heeded on behalf of the war veterans. He congratulates the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) on his success with regard to Ripple Rock. He also congratulated the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) for having obtained a new ferry service, and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) on having obtained amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Then a few lines further on he states:

> Can it be that this government has grown so strong that they think opposition is unnecessary, so strong that they think opposition has very little place in the present trend of events?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I may not have learned my logic at the same place as the Acting Leader of the Opposition, but I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that after having quoted several instances in which this government has taken representations by the opposition into consideration, the hon. gentleman immediately reproaches the government vehemently with not taking notice of the opposition and carrying on as if there were no opposition at all. To put it mildly that logic is not very consistent.

We on this side of the house could hardly believe our ears when we heard the Acting Leader of the Opposition in his motion propose that health insurance should be introduced at the earliest possible moment. All through the years we have heard the Conservative party oppose the proposition that we should have health insurance. They have wrapped it up with the rest of the social security measures of the Liberal party which they have labelled socialism, and they have always combated these suggestions. If I were a Conservative—and I am not, thanks be to God—I would be discouraged to hear the acting leader of my party throwing aside Conservative principles for which they have fought for so long and trying to be more liberal than the Liberals, saying that he wishes to bring in a measure of health insurance that the Liberals have been talking about since 1919.

An hon. Member: Just talking about it.

Mr. Cannon: I know it is a long time. I just mention it in order to show that it is a matter the Liberals have been suggesting for a long time.

Mr. Fleming: At election time.

Mr. Cannon: I say that the people of the country will not be taken in by the late conversion of the Acting Leader of the Opposition and by the late conversion of the Conservative party. I say that the people of the country will not give their votes to the Conservative party because of that late conversion, but rather they will count on the Liberal party which has always been in the forefront when social security measures were concerned. As I say, they will count on the Liberal party to give them health insurance when the time for it has come.

Mr. Fleming: When?

Mr. Cannon: When the budget of the federal government will permit us to give it. They know it was we who seriously suggested it in the first place, and they know it is we who will carry it out when the time comes.

Mr. Fleming: When will that be?

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member knows as well as I do that at this time we cannot increase social security measures because of the great load that military expenses place on the budget. We all hope that eventually we shall be able to diminish these expenses. In the meantime it is not possible to increase social security measures.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles: Will it be in the year 2000?

Mr. Cannon: Before that.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

Mr. Fleming: If it is not going to come into effect for perhaps another 36 years, does the hon. member not think it only fair to the Canadian people that the Liberal party should stop talking about it and stop making these idle, empty promises?

Mr. Cannon: It is not the Liberal party that is talking about it; it is the Conservative party.

Mr. Fleming: We are talking about campaign promises made at election time by the Liberal party.

Mr. Cannon: It was the Acting Leader of the Opposition who was talking about it. It was you who brought it up, not I.

Mr. Fleming: You have been talking about it at every election within living memory.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cannon: You will be surprised. In any event, it will come up much too soon for your liking. I can tell you that.

Mr. Rowe: You changed your mind rapidly.

Mr. Fleming: That is some more of your logic.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is that an announcement made, through you, by the minister?

Mr. Cannon: The minister makes no announcements through me. He is quite capable of making his own announcements.

Mr. Rowe: That whisper from the health department changed your mind very quickly, that it may not take 36 years.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Cannon: And now, Mr. Speaker, I come back to the French language in order to direct a few remarks to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) who granted to himself a certificate—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He is absent.

Mr. Cannon: Unfortunately, he is absent but, nevertheless, he can read my remarks in Hansard. On page 225 of Hansard, he awarded himself, in a clear and intelligible voice and with abundant gestures, a certificate to be valid only at the end of this session, that of having accomplished his duty.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He has foresight.

Mr. Cannon: After referring to the end of the session, the hon. member stated:

I will then have—

That is to say, at the end of this session.

—the great and noble satisfaction of having done my duty.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that ridicule is fatal to none in Canada, as the hon. member appears to enjoy good health.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I can congratulate even less the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). I was not present in the house when he made his remarks about the province of Quebec, but I read his remarks, and I could hardly believe my eyes when I read them. At page 121 of Hansard the hon. member is reported as having said:

> I contend that there is no part of Canada that is as ripe for advances by the communist party as the province of Quebec.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the greatest exhibition of colossal ignorance that I have ever heard or read in all my life. I would remind the hon. member that apart from the labour progressive party, under which name the communist party masquerades, the party in Canada which is closest to the communist party is the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: Now who is showing his ignorance?

Mr. Cannon: Before he talks about there being any danger of the communist party becoming powerful in our province the hon. member had better look to the other provinces where the C.C.F. party is in power or gets a large vote. It is in those provinces that there is a great danger of the communist party taking a foothold, certainly not in the province of Quebec. In Quebec we have respect for constituted authority; we have a true religious sentiment, and there is no danger of the communist party obtaining a foothold in our province. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, in order to illustrate his point, again at page 121 of Hansard is reported to have said:

> In the city of Montreal the communist party polled about as many votes as the C.C.F.

In place of saying that the communist party polled about as many votes as did the C.C.F. in the city of Montreal, I think it would be fairer to say that the communist party polled as few votes as did the C.C.F. in the city of Montreal, because the C.C.F. never polled many votes in our province. It has an unblemished record of never having elected a representative in the province of Quebec either to the federal house or to the provincial house.

Mr. Winch: What about Fred Rose?

Mr. Cannon: He was a communist.

Mr. Winch: That is what I say. He was from your province.

Mr. Cannon: You are a member of the C.C.F.

Mr. Winch: Thank goodness.

Mr. Cannon: Are you identifying yourself with him? That illustrates the point I just made, namely that your party is closest to the communist party.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. Ellis: That is why the communists supported the Liberals in 1945.

Mr. Cannon: I wish to turn my attention to the third party of the opposition, namely the Social Credit party. From my county I have been receiving letters cut out from the official newspaper of the Social Credit party in our province, L'Avenir. These letters, which are printed in the newspaper with the caption "Send them to your member", "Envoyez-les a votre députe", are accompanied by bunches of signatures that have been obtained in the constituency of Iles-de-la-Madeleine by the emissary of the Social Credit party who went down there for that purpose. These letters asked that military expenditures be reduced in order to double family allowances. They contain such demagogic phrases as "Families need more bread than guns to bring up children".

I should like the leader of the Social Credit party to tell the house and the country —because I say the country is entitled to a declaration from the man who is leader of a party that claims to be a national party— whether or not he is in favour of Canadian armament, whether or not he is in favour of Canada living up to the obligations it undertook with the rest of the western European nations to resist communism, whether he is in favour of Canada living up to the obligations that it undertook under NATO. I say that if he is in favour of these things the Social Credit party cannot in good faith tell the people of my county or of any other county that this country ought to reduce military expenditures in order to double family allowances.

I say that if the Social Credit party is in favour of our living up to our obligations under NATO and our obligations to the other free countries allied with us, its leader should denounce in the house and repudiate what has been done in my constituency in the name of the Social Credit party. I shall look forward to hearing him make a statement on that point.

An hon. Member: Who is in carpet slippers now?

Mr. Cannon: To the people of my constituency I say that first things must come first. If we are to preserve family allowances we have to preserve our liberty and our way of life. The old Roman saying, si vis pacem, para bellum, was never truer than it is today —if you want peace, prepare for war. It is absolutely necessary that we be strong. Everybody knows that. The leader of the Social Credit party knows it. The emissaries of his party who went to my constituency to try to subvert the people there and make them sign silly petitions know perfectly well, as he and other members of the party here know, that these expenditures must be made. He knows that we have to be strong and that we have to combat communism if we are to retain our way of life and our liberty.

He knows also that our liberty and our way of life are essentials that we must have before we can have any family allowances at all, let alone double family allowances. I say to the people of my county that when the time comes to increase family allowances the Liberal party will increase them. The Liberal party was the party that introduced family allowances in the first place, and it can be counted upon to increase them when the revenues and wealth of the country permit us to do so.

On motion of Mr. Cannon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) the house adjourned at 5.56 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 20, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the English and French versions of the first report of the special committee appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house. If unanimous consent is obtained, concurrence might be asked later in this sitting.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSING

REPORTED RESTRICTION ON LOANS ON HOUSING NEAR AIRPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister give the house more information with regard to the announcement that was in the press this morning that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is suspending all loans on housing that is within one mile of an airport? Does this mean government airports, all airports or just airports that jet planes will use or are expected to use?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) asked that same question yesterday, at which time I replied that it was the policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to consider each of these proposed projects on its merits. The whole situation with regard to property around airports is being kept under review for obvious reasons. I expect that later on I shall be in a position to make a more complete statement.

TRADE

FARM SURPLUSES—REPORTED DUMPING OPERATION BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a Washington dispatch appearing in the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix of January 15, stating that the house appropriations committee has recommended a straight, undisguised dumping operation to get rid of their large farm surpluses? Can the minister state the government's reaction to this statement?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I read the dispatch in the paper, and it is my personal view that there is nothing very alarming in the situation. The United States has had for some time a program of giving away certain quantities of wheat, and also accepting payment for wheat in local currencies. However, it is worth noting that the administration have been careful to consult Canada about the destination of these gifts and sales. I have great confidence that the administration will be careful in future not to interfere too seriously with Canada's normal markets. If that is done in future, I think Canada can live with the situation with which we may be confronted.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT DOMINION ARSENALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): On January 18 the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) asked the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) if he was aware that 40 women had been laid off at the Valcartier arsenal the previous week and 22 at the Quebec arsenal at the same time. He also asked that the house be advised whether or not other lay-offs are to be expected at these arsenals.

In answer to the first part of the hon. member's question, I am informed that the lay-offs to which he refers occurred at plants of the small arms ammunition division of Canadian Arsenals Limited at Quebec and Valcartier. The total number of employees in these plants at December 31, 1954, was 2,258. A contract for the production of 9 mm. rounds on which 500 employees were engaged is at present coming to an end. Canadian Arsenals Limited are therefore under the necessity of laying off a portion of the employees who were engaged on this contract. Forty-six women were laid off on January 14, a further 45 will be laid off on January 21, and it is anticipated that another 50 will be laid off during February and March. The balance of the 500 employees referred to will be retained in connection with the production of 9 mm. rounds at a lower rate to meet present commitments, and also in connection with current contracts for other types of small arms ammunition.

In answer to the second portion of the hon. member's question, I am informed by Canadian Arsenals Limited that very substantial contracts which have been running for some two years are now coming to an end. The volume of work available depends upon the ammunition requirements of the Canadian defence services and other countries. We have been fortunate in having large orders which have kept the facilities of Canadian Arsenals Limited at both Valcartier and Quebec fully occupied, and some additional orders are in sight. It is inevitable, however, that as contracts are completed there will be a reduction in both production and employment, and it may be expected that approximately 500 employees will be laid off during the course of the next six to eight months.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REFERENCE TO ACCUSATIONS AGAINST DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Postmaster General has had time to read the speech made by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), and whether he can make a statement now?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I had time to read the speech, and I read it. The only information I have received so far is to the effect that the appeal to the civil service commission is still under consideration. I am asking for and I hope to receive all the information with regard to this case. Eventually I will satisfy my hon. friend by giving the full details in a statement.

(Translation):

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PULPWOOD—INQUIRY INTO THE DEALINGS OF CERTAIN COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gustave Roy (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Is it the intention of the government to conduct an investigation, following what the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) said last week, as to the existence of a combine between certain companies to control the maximum price of pulpwood?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF AGENDA FOR CONFERENCE OF PRIME MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Acting Leader of the Opposition): In view of press releases by the Prime Minister of Australia, Mr. Menzies, and the Prime Minister of New Zealand, Mr. Holland, regarding the forthcoming commonwealth conference, stating that they may discuss the entry of communist China into the United Nations and other matters mentioned by Mr. Holland, would the Prime Minister tell the house if he has given any consideration as to what Canada's position will be on these matters?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. All suggestions as to what might be under discussion at the conference have been given careful consideration. I have had, with the Department of External Affairs, memoranda prepared on these different subjects. But as I said the other day the main purpose, as I envisage it, is to devote our efforts toward recommendations to our respective governments that would ease rather than complicate the international situation. It is in that frame of mind that I will be approaching all these questions. I think the commonwealth can be a very useful and effective instrument in furthering the consolidation of the precarious kind of peace in which we are living at the present time. We will be devoting our energies to trying to find a common approach to these problems that will be a contribution to the efforts to maintain, stabilize and improve the present situation.

Mr. Rowe: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I am in full agreement with the Prime Minister's objectives, and we can all agree with the generalities; but in view of the complexity of the problems and the trade situation, which is so vital and so important to Canada at this time, I would ask the Prime Minister if he would not give consideration to providing an opportunity for some discussion. It seems very strange and unusual that we do not have the opportunity to consider some of these problems now that parliament is in session. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister is leaving a week from tomorrow, I believe, I urge and strongly recommend to the Prime Minister that the debate on the speech from the throne be adjourned long enough to have at least a day's discussion in the house on the issues that may come before the conference.

We are, I believe, to discuss the Paris agreements today, and I think the Prime Minister intimated yesterday that these other matters might also be discussed. I submit with all respect that there is no relationship whatsoever between the Paris agreements and the forthcoming commonwealth conference. We are quite satisfied to discuss the Paris agreements and their ratification. Everybody is keenly interested in that matter and is prepared to depart from the ordinary custom of proceeding first with the speech from the throne. But in view of the Prime Minister's coming visit to London and the fact that he is leaving in about a week, I ask and strongly urge the Prime Minister and his cabinet to give consideration to letting the house know something about these matters. We have many proposals we would like to make that might be discussed. I understand that Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, has said that anything may be discussed—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rowe: —and these other prime ministers are telling their people what is going to be discussed. I submit that now with parliament in session we should have a discussion of these matters, and I suggest that the No. 1 item we would propose for the agenda is trade.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

NATURAL GAS

PROPOSED PIPE LINE FROM ALBERTA TO EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce supplementary to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle), when he asked whether it is now the intention of the government to facilitate the financing of the all-Canadian gas pipe line by a government guarantee of principal and interest of bonds issued by the pipe-line company. The minister will recall that he said the government has taken no action along that line. May I ask him whether the company in question has asked the government for such a guarantee?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add to my answer of yesterday. Government actions are announced, and until such actions are taken it is not usual to announce them. No action has been taken in the matter. There is nothing I can add to my answer.

Mr. Knowles: Then we will assume that the company has asked for it.

Mr. Nickle: Inasmuch as some consideration is apparently being given to the suggestion that the government guarantee the bonds of the pipe-line company, could the minister state whether or not any consideration is being given to making the pipe-line project east from Alberta more feasible by considering the revision of gas pipe-line design, route and markets?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Continuous attention is being given to the problem. We will be glad to look into the question raised by my hon. friend when we get around to it.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL ON ACCESSION OF FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this resolution—or rather I should say, in view of the state of my voice, in attempting to speak to this resolution—I am afraid I will have to crave the indulgence of the house in that, voice permitting, I think it will take me longer to go into this important matter than I would normally like to detain the house. But it is, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure hon. members will agree with me, a very important question indeed. I doubt whether any matter placed before the house this session will have greater long-range implications for our country and for peace. Because of its importance I should like to examine this particular protocol in its context.

What is that context? Part of it is the series of related agreements which were worked out at the London and Paris meetings last autumn, and which with this particular protocol make up a co-ordinated program. But more fundamentally the context in which we should consider this protocol is, I think, nothing less than the present position of the cold war and our chances for peace.

Incomparably the most important political problem facing Canadians today is the danger of that cold war becoming a blazing thermonuclear one. We know that such a war, of course, would threaten the very existence of every nation, indeed of the whole human race. The supreme task of statesmanship today, therefore, is to act so that the fantastic physical power which scientists are placing at man's disposal will be used not for warfare but for welfare.

Related to this danger of thermonuclear war or thermonuclear annihilation is the problem posed by totalitarian imperialism. The communist dictators have already dragooned hundreds of millions of men into highly centralized empires which deny the dignity and worth of the individual except as a creature of the state. This imperialist and materialist conspiracy has recruited its dupes in the rest of the world and organized them into fifth columnists. It thereby seeks, through propaganda and subversion, to foster disunity in the non-communist world while it expands the area of its own direct control by coup d'état or military forces around its periphery in Europe and in Asia.

Facing up to these fundamental problems, there are three main areas in which we must seek to advance. The first area involves a search for agreement on effective disarmament, substantial enough to lessen the burden of present defence expenditures and including the total and effective prohibition of all weapons of mass destruction. But such a program must be carefully balanced to avoid creating the incentive to aggression, and with reliable safeguards, inspections and controls to guarantee that it will be carried out.

For years, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has taken an active part in the search for such an agreement. Last autumn at the United Nations assembly the Canadian delegation, I think it is fair to say, took the lead in submitting proposals of certain principles and procedures with a view to further negotiations on this vital matter. These proposals, after arduous negotiations conducted on the western side, under the skilful and devoted leadership of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), won the unanimous approval of all the governments represented at that world organization. We will continue, Mr. Speaker, to do all we can to pursue agreement on effective disarmament.

As I see it, there is nothing inconsistent between this policy and the agreements I am about to discuss. Indeed, if the communist powers would accept the level of armaments, as well as the limitations and controls, in these agreements, we would be well on our way to a universal United Nations disarmament treaty which would make limited defence arrangements such as NATO and those under the western European union unnecessary. The limitations on national prerogatives involved in the provisions of the relevant Paris agreements, dealing with the maximum size of forces, with international inspections, controls and deployments are, I suggest, significant as a development illustrating to the world at large that international supervision and control of national armaments is possible, granted a genuineness of desire and a willingness on the part of nations effectively to harness and check the destructive potential of national forces.

It is true that the Paris agreements apply only to a limited group of nations. They are, however, not only consistent with but may some day be recognized as a useful precedent for an effective universal system. Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, pending agreement on such a universal and therefore a better system, an essential step in maintaining peace lies in building and in maintaining controlled and defensive strength in the free world to deter aggression. That, I suggest, is the second area in which we must move forward.

The third area in which progress is essential, and this area is the most fundamental of all, lies in improving relations between states; in removing the causes of war and in the development of the international community, which involves fostering wherever we can an effective sense of co-operation and unity amongst the free peoples. We cannot do very much to promote this idea amongst the unfree. It involves patient efforts to heal national rivalries, to heal the causes and tensions of war, and to bind the peoples together. Yet we cannot afford to be naïve or unrealistic; so while we must do everything we can to make war impossible, through trying to resolve issues that divide, and promote co-operation through the United Nations and elsewhere and through seeking effective disarmament, we must, as I have just said, consolidate our deterrent strength and by removing the greatest temptation of all to aggression which, in the present circumstances, is weakness, strengthen the chances of peace.

I believe that our activities in the development of the north Atlantic community are a vitally important contribution to this specific purpose. For the time being at least, in this tense and dangerous world, the unity and strength of the north Atlantic nations unquestionably provide the most important and immediate existing guarantee of peace. But the north Atlantic community—this has been said many times before—is potentially far more than a military alliance. These other non-military aspects of the development of NATO will, I think, grow more important as the military danger recedes, as we must hope it will in the course of time. The attitudes and agencies of co-operation among these free nations which NATO fosters can then remain to chart the way to a better state of society long after the present danger of military aggression has passed into the limbo into which history eventually tosses all tyrannies.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the house today to approve the adherence of the federal German republic, not only to the North Atlantic defensive alliance but also to this north Atlantic community which we are seeking to develop, and to which the free and democratic Germany of today has the right to belong. The Soviet government and its satellite governments are seeking to prevent this development by an unparalleled campaign of intimidation, of cajolery and distortion, by the exertion of every kind of pressure through the lure of promises and the threat of punishment. In our own country the communists are doing all they can, of course, to further this campaign, by a propaganda barrage focusing on the statement that a vote for this protocol is merely a vote for German rearmament. Such an oversimplification is grossly misleading. It is, indeed, the most insidious type of distortion, a fractional truth.

Communists themselves, as agents of Moscow, have so far abandoned intellectual integrity and simple honesty that it is futile to try to enlighten them by discussing their charges. But in this case their campaign unquestionably strikes some response in the hearts of many honest and sincere Canadian patriots, who have good reason to remember and fear the dread effect of German arms. It must therefore be objectively and exhaustively examined.

There are several significant features of the Paris agreements which we have to consider today. It is I think reasonable to expect that in the long run the most fundamental and durable of these features will be, first, the restoration of German freedom and sovereignty—that is, freedom and sovereignty to the people of West Germany; second, acceptance of the voluntary adherence of these people to the western coalition. Those two features, as I see it, are fundamental.

The third feature of course is the provision that is being made for the federal German republic, in the exercise of the first right of sovereignty, to bear a fair share of the common burden of defence in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, through the western European union. In this connection I think hon. members would delude themselves if they conceived of the people of the German federal republic today as a nation of militarists straining at the leash for freedom to rearm, to tax themselves for weapons, and to conscript themselves for military service.

The fact is that in Germany, as elsewhere, there is revulsion against war and militarism from which Germans as well as the rest of us have suffered so much and so recently. In the Federal Republic of Germany today as elsewhere in free countries, rearmament, when it is supported—and there is a strong body of opinion in Germany which does not support it, some from good motives and some from bad motives—but where rearmament is supported in Germany today, as it is supported by the freely elected government of that country, it is generally regarded at best, as indeed it is here, as a tragic necessity.

In Germany as elsewhere moods and attitudes can change; but at present the situation is, I think, as I have described it. West German policies are of a kind which merit our support, and West German leadership is of a character that we should encourage. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if that leadership had been in existence in Germany in 1914 and 1939 we would have avoided, I think, two world wars. Nothing, it seems to me, could be more calculated to discourage the development of healthy political forces in Germany, or to encourage a dangerous relapse into narrow nationalism and disillusionment with democracy, and ultimately into dangerous militarism, than a rejection by the parliaments of the west of the plans worked out by the democratic government of Germany and other western democracies for the integration of that people into the west European and north Atlantic communities, where they can play a proper and worthy role.

It is also a gross distortion to represent the London and Paris agreements as an aggressive move which threatens the people of Russia. It is too late in the day to be surprised by the falsity and hypocrisy of Soviet propaganda in this matter, but I am still sometimes astonished by the continuing gullibility of some who are taken in by it.

So let us not forget, and let us keep on emphasizing, that the defence policies of the west in EDC or in NATO or in these Paris agreements are not the cause but the result of the aggressive policies of Russian imperialism, and of the huge communist armies backing those policies; of aggressions in Berlin, Czechoslovakia and Korea. It was all this, with the fear that followed it, that forced the world reluctantly to regather some of the strength it had thrown away in 1945, while Russia remained under arms on land, on sea and in the air.

It is also worth recalling in particular that the Russians began the rearmament of Germans in the eastern zone as long ago as 1948, when there was not a soldier in the federal German republic. The communists have made a transparent effort to disguise this by calling the armed forces in East Germany, which they had organized, barrack police. Quite apart from some 80,000 frontier and civil police, there are almost 100,000 more of these barrack policemen organized into army corps and divisions, and into air force and naval formations on Soviet lines. The East German army units have some 600 tanks, 250 self-propelled guns and 1,700 other pieces of artillery. Any ex-nazi who wishes to sell himself to communism is welcomed into these forces and into their leadership. Their strength would be even greater if the communist masters felt that they could count on the reliability of more of their German subjects, if they were given arms.

For many years the Russians have also been organizing military forces in other European nations, including those who were our fascist enemies in the last world war and are supposed now to be disarmed by treaty. There are, for example, about a quarter of a million Bulgarian troops, over 225,000 Hungarian troops and some 350,000 in the Roumanian forces. There are in all, 75 satellite divisions, some of them armoured, and over 2,500 planes. All are under complete Russian control, and in Poland that control has been carried to the point where the defence minister in that country is a Soviet marshal. But far more important even than these are some 500,000 Soviet troops in occupied Europe west of the Soviet frontiers, no less than 400,000 of whom are stationed in Eastern Germany, where they are the European spearhead of the 175 divisions of the Soviet army.

So much, then, for the absurd contention that the present western defence program is a hostile, aggressive move which threatens the Russians and their peace-loving friends, who have never had any policy or any plan, so we are told, except peaceful coexistence in a world without arms.

We should also examine the false assertion that the adherence of the federal German republic to the west European and north Atlantic communities would make the west responsible for perpetuating a partition of Germany, which the Soviet union would like to see ended. It is worth recalling in this connection that the original plan, which was agreed to at Potsdam in 1945 among the four victorious allies, called for a peace treaty with a democratic, freely elected all-German government. Hon. members will recall, I am sure, the frustrating years when, despite western efforts to implement the Potsdam agreement in this regard, the Soviet government refused to allow their zone to co-operate, economically or otherwise, with the three other zones of Germany. The Soviet rulers had decided that unless and until they could ensure a united Germany which would do their bidding, they would make of East Germany a communist puppet state, which of course they have done. And so it was this policy that resulted, in September 1949, in the creation of the German federal republic, in order to achieve the maximum degree of democratic unity which was possible in the circumstances.

There are those today who are saying, some with sincerity but others, the communists, with calculated deceit, "Why do we not have one more conference with the Soviet on German unification and on a peace treaty before taking the final step to ratify these agreements?" Mr. Speaker, I would remind those persons that from October, 1950, until the present time there have been at least 16 occasions on which France, the United Kingdom and the United States, the occupying powers of Western Germany, have in notes to the Soviet government, or the government of the German federal republic, in notes to the authorities of East Germany, proposed, as a basic condition of agreement on German unification, the holding of free elections under a form of international supervision which would ensure that those elections were honestly carried out.

One of those occasions was the conference in Berlin among the foreign ministers of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet union, which took place less than a year ago. For 25 days every possible avenue of approach to a mutually acceptable solution of the problems of German reunification, and peace treaties for Germany and Austria, was exhaustively examined, but all to no avail. Surely that conference exposed in a clear-cut and unmistakable way the obstinate refusal of the Soviet government to allow any settlement of the German and Austrian problems except on terms which, regardless of the wishes of the peoples themselves, would in effect guarantee the continuation of Soviet control of those countries equal to, if not exceeding, that already obtaining in the areas which they were occupying. There is no reason I can see to believe that this attitude has now suddenly changed, in spite of the honeyed but ambiguous words which are now issued from the Kremlin and other communist centres.

A reason for, if no justification of, the adamant stand of the Soviet against German unity on the basis of free elections is shown by the results of two recent elections in Germany and Austria. In certain Austrian areas under Soviet army occupation—and this of course is very significant—our type of free election took place in August, 1954, and the result was a resounding repudiation of the communists; right under the intimidating shadow of Russian military might. In the Austrian provinces, all or partially within the Soviet zone, the communist party won only 6 out of 100 seats in Vienna and 3 out of 56 in lower Austria. The overwhelming majority of seats were divided fairly evenly between the two government coalition parties. In the two other provinces where elections were held the communist candidates failed to gain any seats at all. In West Berlin only a month or so ago, in elections for the Berlin house of representatives, the communists, under free elections, again could do no better than poll 2·7 per cent of the vote. They got about 41,000 votes against 684,000 for the Social Democrats, 466,000 for the Christian Democrats and 190,000 for the Liberal Democrats. No wonder the communists shudder at the prospect of free elections.

The Berlin conference then made it quite clear that an honourable and acceptable basis for German unity could not be found. Therefore surely the only possible course that offered any hope of progress was for the west to make its own arrangements with the German federal republic, without losing sight of the essential objective of unification, because Germans rightly insist—and we certainly should support them in this—that unification must remain the essential goal of German policy.

It is well to keep this background clearly in mind now that we are being urged in some quarters to scrap our present policy and agree to another conference with the Russians immediately; a conference designed by Moscow not, I suggest, so much to achieve constructive results as to delay and prevent the ratification of these agreements, and to divide and disunite the west.

Experience surely shows that we should refuse to be lured into this false course, but should follow through with the policy charted in the Paris agreements for the restoration of sovereignty to the German federal republic, the integration of this sovereign Germany into the western community, and the appropriate participation of Germany in that community's common defence effort to deter aggression. Once that has been done conferences or diplomatic discussions with the Soviet union on Germany, on Austria or on any other subject can be resumed and the west can then talk from strength and unity.

It was hoped about a year ago that we would implement this policy of German association with the west through the European defence community. Those hopes, of course, have been destroyed. We supported the European defence community. We supported it in this house two years ago. So it was with deep concern that we watched the dramatic developments of last summer when Mr. Mendes-France undertook to obtain at a special conference in Brussels the agreement of the other signatories to the modification in the EDC treaty which he claimed would be necessary if that treaty, after two years of indecision, was to be approved by the French parliament.

As we all know, the Brussels conference did not succeed, and soon after EDC was rejected entirely. The resulting dangers were great. Western solidarity and unity of purpose were shaken. The hopes which EDC has aroused for closer European unity and Franco-German co-operation and friendship were in danger of being replaced by disillusionment and despair. In the German federal republic the unceasing effort of Chancellor Adenauer to rally the German people to support a close and lasting alliance with France and with her other free European neighbours might soon be lost in cynical and destructive nationalism. The danger also existed that the allies, short of patience and dismayed by the difficulties entailed in devising a new European system, might try to disregard France and work out separate agreements with the Federal Republic of Germany.

During those months which saw the end of the European defence community, and indeed in recent weeks also, there has been talk of a European and Atlantic security system functioning without France. In my view this is careless talk, or worse, as it ignores the great importance of France politically, strategically and industrially. I do not think any Atlantic or European system of security really could be satisfactory or effective to which France did not willingly contribute.

The importance of France to collective European security is not restricted to its strategic or economic role. We should be poorer culturally and weaker spiritually if we had to attempt to arrange our own defences or those of our civilization without the participation of the country to which we owe so much. Therefore a western alliance which excluded France or which was forced on France against the wishes of the majority of the population is not, as I say, a prospect which would be faced with any satisfaction by the Canadian government or people.

At this time it is well to remember that the danger last summer was not limited merely to the exclusion and possible isolation of France, fateful as that might have been. The very existence of NATO, the whole north Atlantic concept, was threatened. Just as there has been among some sections of Europeans an understandable, but in my opinion a superficial and mistaken, tendency toward what I might call continental neutralism or isolationism, so there has been among some North Americans a tendency to move toward either bilateral or continental defence arrangements. There was developing a few months ago a "go it alone" psychology in this part of the world, due in part to impatience with allies but rationalized by strategic theories, based on impregnable continental defences coupled with almost exclusive reliance for victory against aggression on massive retaliation by long range planes and missiles of intercontinental or global range. Certainly, as we all know, continental defences for North America are vitally important and may well become more important, but any implication that in themselves they would ever be an adequate basis for security is quite another matter.

I ventured to point out in an address to the National Press club in Washington last March that in my view any idea that the great coalition which we have formed for peace should be replaced by an entrenched continentalism would make no great appeal to Canadians as the best way to prevent war or defeat aggression. Nor would it be likely to provide a solid basis for good United States-Canadian co-operation.

Indeed the idea of continental self-sufficiency, in the military as in the economic or political fields, makes no appeal, I suggest, either to our sense of reality or to our deepest Canadian instincts as exemplified over the whole of our history. In 1914 and 1939 Canadians were quick to recognize that a threat to the democracies of western Europe was a threat to their own freedom; and subsequent events confirmed rather than upset this deep-seated conviction that it would not be safe or ultimately possible for us on this continent to stand aside from events in Europe. And so NATO, with the United Kingdom, the United States and France in it, is for us an indispensable instrument both for co-operation and defence. But last autumn NATO was in danger of being lost.

I may appear to be digressing, but certainly these thoughts were very much in the minds of those of us who had the responsibility for action on behalf of the government during the rapidly moving events of last summer and last autumn. I think it is well that these considerations should be put on the records of this house.

In this situation so full of danger which followed the French rejection of the projected European defence community immediate remedial action was required to weld together the cracks which were appearing in the north Atlantic structure and to continue the progress toward European unity which had been interrupted. It was more important, we felt at that time, to look ahead than to indulge in recriminations as to who was responsible for the set-back. It was in that spirit that we took part in the developments of that time.

The initiative to restore the situation came from the United Kingdom, whose earlier refusal to join the European defence community had heightened French distaste for that treaty. Therefore I am sure it was with a profound feeling of admiration and relief that all of us in Canada followed the skilful and untiring effort of the United Kingdom foreign secretary, Sir Anthony Eden, as with the strong backing of the United States secretary of state he gathered support in the main European capitals for a new approach to the problems arising from the failure of EDC.

As we over here watched those developments, while we were happy over the initiative taken in London, we were also concerned that any arrangement to replace the European defence community should not impair the strength and unity of NATO as the organization primarily responsible for defence planning and for co-operation in the non-military field, we desired that progress toward European unity should be made within the larger framework of the Atlantic community. We wanted all these things to be done within the framework of our north Atlantic organization to the greatest extent possible. For this reason we felt, and indeed we suggested, that the new proposals to replace EDC should be submitted initially to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization council for consideration. However, that idea did not command general support, and it became clear that the majority of the countries most directly concerned were in favour of the United Kingdom proposal for a conference in London of the countries signatory to the proposed EDC, along with the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada.

We were glad to support that procedure and to accept an invitation to attend the London conference as a country with a direct and important stake in any arrangement to take the place of EDC, and as a member of NATO with sizeable forces on the European continent itself. As a participant in this conference we endeavoured with some success to stress the importance to NATO of the solutions which were discussed in London, and to ensure as far as we could that these problems should be discussed and solved within the NATO concept.

At these London meetings, which began on September 28, we were able to work out the broad lines of an agreement for associating the Federal Republic of Germany with the western community on a basis of equality, the only basis of course which was possible, and to further the aims of western defence and European unity within the North Atlantic alliance.

Moreover, it was recognized that these historic decisions together formed part of one general settlement which was directly or indirectly of concern to all the members of NATO. It was therefore agreed that the final act of the London conference, which outlined the main understandings reached, should be put into the form of more detailed agreements which would be submitted later, as appropriate, either to the four powers, the seven Brussels powers, or to the whole NATO council. That was done, and we met in Paris on October 22. All the resulting agreements were signed the next day, October 23.

I approach this result in no defensive, defeatist or apologetic manner. I think it was a great achievement. I can say that with more conviction because it was an achievement which others had far more to do with bringing about than we did. I think it was a great achievement, all the greater in view of the price we would have had to pay for the failure to bring it about, a failure which seemed so close only a few weeks before.

Mr. Speaker, I apologize for the length of time I am taking, but I believe the house would expect me to say a few words about the actual terms of the agreements, their general significance and also their particular relation to the question of German rearmament which is so much in our minds, as well as their significance to Canada itself.

These Paris agreements can be divided, for purposes of consideration, into four parts. There are the four-power agreements signed by the three occupying powers and the West German government, which provide for restoration of sovereignty to the German federal republic and for the present and future stationing of foreign forces on the soil of that republic. Then there are a series of seven-power agreements which provide for the reconstitution of the Brussels treaty organization to include two new members, namely Italy and the Federal Republic of Germany, into a new organization which we now call western European union. Then finally there are certain NATO agreements which include the protocol now before the house and certain resolutions designed to strengthen the NATO defence structure.

So far as the first series of agreements are concerned—and they are of immediate importance to Canada because we have troops in Germany—the special problem of the four powers was to determine how and when the federal republic should be given its sovereignty, in a manner which would permit it to function as an equal partner in the western coalition and which at the same time would not preclude eventual unification of all Germany. In addition, it was necessary to provide a legal basis for the stationing on German soil of foreign forces when the federal republic became a member of NATO.

In effect, what was done was to provide that the occupation regime, which was already pretty much of an anachronism, should be ended as soon as possible and that, in the meantime, until that regime ended legally and formally, the occupying powers would act in accordance with the spirit of the agreements under consideration.

Regarding disarmament and demilitarization, however, it was provided that the three powers should continue to exercise certain responsibilities until the federal republic became a member of NATO. Also the continuing responsibilities of the three occupying powers with respect to German reunification and a peace treaty are reaffirmed.

To answer the criticisms—and we hear criticisms—of those who might view the agreements as a deliberate step in the direction of the permanent division of Germany, the three powers issued a joint declaration during the London conference—to which later in Paris Canada and the other NATO members subscribed—which stated among other things:

> A peace settlement for the whole of Germany freely negotiated between Germany and her former enemies, which should lay the foundation of a lasting peace, remains an essential aim of their (i.e. the three powers) policy. The final determination of the boundaries of Germany must await such a settlement.

And further:

> The achievement through peaceful means of a fully free and unified Germany remains a fundamental goal of their policy.

That is the policy of the NATO countries. I am sure all hon. members would agree that this statement of policy provides a fairly clear response to any who may maintain that in their efforts to associate the German federal republic with the west, the western powers had lost sight of the ultimate aim of a peace treaty for a united Germany.

I now turn to the second series of arrangements, which are intended to associate a sovereign German federal republic with NATO and with the move toward European unity which has been interrupted. When these agreements go into effect we shall have a new organization which we now call western European union. That new organization is essentially a modified version of the structure based on the Brussels treaty of 1948, with this one important difference which I have already mentioned. To the original members of the Brussels organization are now added Italy and the Federal Republic of Germany. So western European union can be considered as an alternative method of achieving much the same purposes which the European defence community had been designed to achieve.

There are, of course, some differences. There are in particular two main differences: The first difference is the inclusion of the United Kingdom in western European union with that historic, courageous and, in my opinion, far-reaching pledge which she gave for the maintenance of four divisions and the second tactical air force on the continent of Europe for another 44 years. The second main difference is that the European defence community placed greater emphasis on supranational features.

Western European union will have a permanent council, an assembly and an agency for the control of armaments to be set up by and under the authority of the council. The council will sit in London and the armament control agency is to sit in Paris, where it will work in close co-operation with the NATO secretariat and for carrying out its duties will use to the greatest possible extent NATO personnel.

I now come to an extremely important part of the WEU agreements, namely that part which gives Germany the right to rearm. Much attention has been paid to this right which it is now proposed to give, but not so much attention has been paid to the way in which it is limited and controlled. I should therefore like to put on record, Mr. Speaker, what these limitations and controls are.

The first is that the maximum forces to be permitted to Germany under WEU are the same as those which would have been permitted under EDC, namely 500,000 men organized into not more than twelve divisions with 1,350 fighter—that is defensive—aircraft. That number must not be increased except by the unanimous consent of the western European council. Second, all German forces, if and when they are constituted, are to be brought under the supreme allied commander in Europe, SACEUR, and are to be integrated into NATO forces. That means that there will be no separate German national army apart from NATO. Nor has Germany, under this agreement, the right to deploy her own forces. That can only be done by SACEUR, subject to political guidance from the NATO council. Furthermore, German forces—and I think this is extremely important—are to be dependent upon NATO rather than upon national logistic support.

It is worth remembering in this connection that the whole system of logistic support for forces in Europe, which includes such vital things as fuel pipe lines, transportation, communication facilities, air fields and other essentials for the conduct of modern war, has been organized on a highly integrated basis under NATO. As such it makes for economy and efficiency. But it would also—and this is probably more important in the context of the matter we are discussing—make it incomparably more difficult for any NATO country to operate its forces separately because they are mixed up, especially in such vital things as logistics, with the other NATO forces. In other words this provision involves important built-in safeguards against purely national action.

Third, Germany agrees unconditionally not to manufacture atomic, biological or chemical weapons and also not to manufacture long-range aircraft and guided missiles, mines, warships, except some small ones for coastal defence, or bomber aircraft; and she can only be relieved from these obligations by a request of the supreme allied commander, Europe, which received a two-thirds majority of the western European union council.

Fourth, certain other types of heavy armaments, a long list in fact, are to be controlled for all members of the western European union, including Germany, by the arms control agency of the western European union. There are other proposals for limiting and pooling the manufacture of arms which are at the moment under discussion in Paris.

Fifth, and I have mentioned this, there has been set up an arms control agency in Paris to work closely with the NATO authorities, and to use NATO inspectors to visit and check national plants for the production of arms whenever they see fit in order to see that the limits accepted are being observed.

Sixth, and finally, there are also certain political controls and limitations written into these agreements. Germany solemnly pledged at the London conference that she would conduct her foreign policy in accord with the principles of the United Nations charter and the North Atlantic treaty, and in particular she undertook:

. . . never to have recourse to force to achieve the reunification of Germany or the modification of the present boundaries of the German federal republic —and to resolve by peaceful means any disputes which may arise between the federal republic and other states.

If Germany should violate these undertakings a special provision contained in the joint declaration of the three powers, to which the other members of the NATO council later subscribed, would come into play. The pertinent paragraph of that provision, by which we would all be bound, reads as follows:

They—

That means the NATO powers.

—will regard as a threat to their own peace and safety any recourse to force which in violation of the principles of the United Nations charter threatens the integrity and unity of the Atlantic alliance or its defensive purposes. In the event of any such action, the three governments—

Now it is 14 governments.

—for their part will consider the offending government—

It might be the German government; it might be any other government.

—as having forfeited its rights to any guarantee and any military assistance provided for in the North Atlantic treaty and its protocols. They will act in accordance with article 4 of the North Atlantic treaty with a view to taking other measures—

That is, against the offending member of NATO.

—which may be appropriate.

Now, sir, I submit that it would be difficult to devise a more impressive set of safeguards than these. But I know that when I say this I will be asked what guarantee there is that they will work. Can we expect these limitations and controls that Germany has accepted to be of any value? Will she throw them aside whenever she feels like doing so? We are conscious of the fact that this has been done in the past.

Well, Mr. Speaker, all international agreements, even those we make with our friends and neighbours, have this element of risk and uncertainty. It is inherent in international arrangements; but some of those who now are stressing that element and challenging the value of these agreements with Germany are, however, quite ready to take the same risk in making another effort to bring about an agreement with Russia which they think would remove all our fears and uncertainties about Germany.

I frankly admit, however, that we have every right to be concerned with German good faith in this series of agreements. Many Canadians, including many of us in this house, and even more of our allies who are taking this decision with us and with all its consequences, bear on their bodies and in their minds scars from the German war machine. We remember how Hitler, with shocking and unscrupulous design, and with Soviet connivance and assistance, started world war II in 1939. We do not forget how the nazis conducted that war with savage brutality, and how the German people supported it.

While we do not forget that and cannot forget it, it is my considered view that support of these agreements with the safeguards I have described is both wise and farsighted, and of all the courses that are open to us this is the best course to follow in our effort to shape a better future.

I do not suggest that we should ignore the lessons of the past. Indeed, as George Santayana has said, "Those who will not learn from history are condemned to repeat it". But we should draw the right conclusions from the past, and we should also not ignore the vision of the future. Indeed, experience of the past teaches us that if a nation only looks backward to justify its fears of the future, it is likely by that very fact to suffer again the same tragedy which in the first place caused that fear. The past must influence but, I suggest, it should not determine and distort the future.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is because of my appreciation of history and not in spite of it that I believe the safeguards which we have worked out in these agreements within our North Atlantic community organization against unilateral abuse by Germany, or any other member, are of real value and make even stronger the case for a coalition which will include the Federal Republic of Germany with its sovereignty restored and on an equality with the other members. I also believe that the institutions and habits of co-operation which our Atlantic community is developing, and with which we now desire to associate Germany, may well be of even greater value than military safeguards in removing the risk that might follow from putting arms in the hands of Germans.

In the very nature of things there can never be on this earth, as I see it, absolute assurance or safety for anyone, individual or nation, because the future will depend among other things on attitudes and choices which we shall have to adopt from time to time. But there are good grounds, I think, for reasoned confidence in this matter. Moreover, whether this confidence will be justified will depend upon our own policies as well as upon those of Germany.

We now have a type of government and a political system in western Germany which are democratic and European-minded. Surely —and I mentioned this a few minutes ago— we should do what we can to encourage and strengthen that type of government, not weaken it by suspicion, mistrust and rebuff. That government, moreover, is led by a man who believes in freedom, peace and co-operation, a great European and internationalist, Herr Adenauer.

It is also, I believe, reasonable to believe that national self-interest will counsel the Germans to stand by these agreements, which are not imposed on them but which have been freely negotiated with and accepted by the government which they have chosen for themselves. Surely in that respect the situation is very different from that of the 1920's, when relations of the victors in the war with Germany were characterized by uncertainty and vacillation. We never did make up our minds then whether to treat Germany as a new friend or an old foe, and as a result we got the worst of both worlds.

Quite apart from the pressing fact of the Soviet threat to western Europe it would, I submit, be wrong and foolish to deal with Germany now as a rejected, unequal people in international society. If we do so they will soon conclude that their choice lies only between isolation and a brooding introspection, or seeking domination and aggressive strength on their own. Surely the sensible course, even if the threat of communist aggression were removed, would still be to bring the Germans into the west European community, which includes the United Kingdom, and into the North Atlantic organization where they would only be one of 15 members, including the United States, and which they could not hope to dominate. It is precisely by such participation in partnership that nations as well as individuals learn to prefer co-operation and good will to domination and submission.

Though I can certainly understand and deeply sympathize with the hesitation and soul-searching which I know are involved for very many in the issues we face, it is nevertheless my conviction, I repeat, that the course of wisdom is to bring about German participation in the western coalition where we can work together for the common security and welfare.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I should take enough time to examine another aspect of the matter. What are the alternatives? There is a good deal of criticism of this course, part of it sincere and genuine criticism, but very rarely do I ever read or hear of any satisfactory or better alternative than the one which is before us. What are the alternatives which would produce a better policy?

Well, the first—these are the only ones I have been able to think of, but there may be others—is to keep Germany disarmed and neutralized as at present. This might seem to many people an appealing course, and would indeed be so in a world where all arms were limited and controlled. But it is impossible under present circumstances. It was impossible in the twenties. How then could it be done now with the victors of the last war divided and bitterly hostile and in the face of the control of a rearmed communist East Germany by an aggressive, mighty Russian imperialist power? Is Russia likely to give up that control for a genuine international system of supervision of a disarmed, neutral and united Germany which, in its turn, assumes a situation in which the east and west would work amicably and altruistically together for a common peaceful purpose?

The question answers itself from the history of the last ten years. Even if it were possible, how long would a dynamic, powerful and proud people like the Germans—fifty millions in the heart of Europe—be willing to accept a position of this kind? In short, the neutralization or disarmament of Germany, as I see it, would be difficult under any conditions, impossible under present conditions. It would, in any event, leave a vacuum right in the heart of Europe. A vacuum may be regarded by nature as something to be abhorred, but it is regarded by the communists as something to be filled.

A second alternative would be to do nothing, continuing as long as possible the present occupation arrangements and hoping that something would turn up. As I see it, that would be a futile and negative course. What turned up would probably be a Germany increasing in strength, with a growing national feeling, taking advantage of every opportunity to end or whittle away the occupation and determined to remove restrictions on her sovereignty as she grew stronger. At best such a policy would lead to an increasingly resentful and unfriendly Germany. At worst the result would be reminiscent of the thirties, with extremists in control.

A third alternative which has been suggested would be to give West Germany back her sovereignty unconditionally, but without making any arrangements for associating her with the Atlantic system or the western European union, and again hoping for the best. That might be followed by a separate alliance between Germany and one or more of those western powers which desired it; or the Federal Republic of Germany might remain outside any collective arrangement while we merely hoped, in our turn, that if there were aggression against the west she would line up with us. We would also hope, and I do not know what basis there would be for our hopes, that under such circumstances Germany would not move east or, even more likely, play the east and west against each other to her own advantage.

Any of the above courses I believe, especially in view of the declared United States policy, would mean the end of the Atlantic alliance we have been building up and which is now our greatest deterrent against aggression. It would also end the move toward European unification, which through these dreary post-war years has been a bright hope for peace and prosperity in free Europe.

We return, then, to the only possible solution in my view, bringing a free Germany into closer association with a group of other free countries in an alliance through which Germany may contribute to collective security, but which will be so constructed that no one member can possibly dominate the others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I resume my seat, I did indicate that I would say something about the effect of these agreements more particularly on Canadian policy and what, if any, the effect will be on Canadian commitments or obligations in Europe. I should like to apologize for the length of time I am taking.

Mr. Gillis: You are doing a good job.

Mr. Pearson: So far as the NATO resolutions passed last October are concerned, those resolutions have strengthened SACEUR's powers and have increased the mutual interdependence of NATO forces. So far as those resolutions are concerned, they will not make any significant change in the position of Canadian forces in Europe, because our forces are already closely integrated with those of other NATO countries. They are subject to the over-all authority of SACEUR in military matters. Their movement in Europe would take place only as part of agreed NATO strategy. Therefore the new arrangements—and they are outlined in the documents before you—merely set down in writing and make generally applicable the arrangements by which we are already bound.

With respect to the new territorial commitments involved in the protocol before us on German accession to NATO, the situation so far as Canada is concerned is similar to that which arose in June, 1952, when this house approved the NATO protocol extending to all members of the European defence community the assistance guarantee of the North Atlantic treaty. I pointed out in this house then that since the Federal Republic of Germany was the only member of the European defence community not a member of NATO the effect of the protocol, if it came into force, would be to extend the obligations which Canada had undertaken under the North Atlantic treaty to the Federal Republic of Germany.

I emphasized then, as I should mention now, that this extension of our obligations was more theoretical than real, because under article 6 of the North Atlantic treaty, by which we are bound, we were already under an obligation to come to the assistance of the NATO forces stationed in the territory of the German federal republic. The situation then, Mr. Speaker, is substantially the same under the present protocol in so far as extending our territorial guarantee is concerned.

While I am on the subject of commitments —and there has been some discussion about this previously outside the house—I should like to assure the house that the Canadian government took no new commitments in London or in Paris to keep Canadian forces in Europe at any given level or for any given period. What was emphasized at the conferences was our determination to continue to play our full part in the North Atlantic organization. As I stated to the nine-power conference in London last October—and this statement was made public immediately—

> As I see it, European unity cannot be effectively secured unless the lines not only across the channel but across the Atlantic are strong and unbroken. My country has a part to play in this Atlantic aspect of the problem. Therefore, we accept the continuing obligations arising out of our membership of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and we are resolved to continue to do our best to discharge them.

Also at the same time I declared to that conference:

> The North Atlantic Treaty Organization remains the focal point of our participation in collective defence and of our hope for the development of closer co-operation with the other peoples of the Atlantic community. As such, it remains a foundation of Canadian foreign policy. Indeed—

I hope I was correct in saying this; I think I was.

> —enduring and wholehearted support for NATO is for us a policy above politics on which I think our friends can rely.

As regards the proposals for an arms pool, which my hon. friend from Prince Albert

(Mr. Diefenbaker) brought up the other day, these proposals, which as I mentioned a minute ago were submitted originally by the French government, are now under active discussion among the European governments concerned. We are being invited to send an observer to those meetings when matters come up which are of interest to us. As this matter is under discussion it would be premature for me to comment on it now. But our direct interest in the arms pooling proposals would of course relate only to the allocation of Canadian arms made available through our mutual aid program to our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

I may say that we are quite satisfied with the present procedure, and we are not anxious to have it changed—the procedure under which recommendations for the allocation of these arms are made by the standing group of the NATO organization. But if a proposal emanated from the conference which concerned our allocation of mutual aid, then of course we would give it consideration.

Now, finally—and this is final—I wish to come back just for a moment to the argument, the most impressive one to my mind advanced against this policy, that these agreements will not make for peace but will make for division and controversy and renewed trouble in Europe; that they will provoke the Soviets into violent reaction, and will drive that country into intransigent Stalinism again at a time when its government, under new leaders, seems to be getting somewhat more co-operative and less hostile.

As to the first, I do not think there is cause for undue alarm over Soviet threats to retaliate—and we have heard these threats in strong language—by forming a heavily armed eastern European alliance. While we should never dismiss pronouncements from Moscow as unworthy of serious examination, I do not think we should become unduly worried by Soviet "kicks" any more than we should become unduly elated by Soviet "carrots". Both are often offered for the same purpose, to weaken our resolve and confuse our purpose.

There is certainly no reality behind the threat of an eastern NATO, because they have now a military alliance system, as I have tried to show, which is already more heavily armed than NATO, and under complete Soviet control. There are certainly no limitations or controls over armaments or men or anything else in that line. They could hardly go any further. As to the second point, there is no possible validity to the contention that these agreements justify or make inevitable an intensification by the Soviet union of the cold war, at a time when it seemed to be lessening.

I point this out because in the harsh and unreasonable things which the Soviet government has been saying recently about western policies, there is the constant accusation that western nations respond to offers of peace and friendship from the Soviet union by the warlike action of arming Germans for an eventual attack on the Soviet union. It is hard to believe that Soviet leaders can make these claims seriously.

The Soviet government has never shown any inclination to discuss these agreements on a rational basis, or to take any reasonable attitude toward Germany or Austria. It has avoided constructive discussion and made no attempt to find out about or to seek reassurance on any point about western policy toward the German federal republic which it regarded as menacing to the Soviet union.

No one of course would deny to the Soviet union, which suffered so cruelly from German arms, the right to issue warnings about German militarism. But we cannot regard Soviet judgments on this subject as superior to those of other nations, which also suffered from the same source.

The logic of the Soviet position on this matter seems to be either that Germans in the German federal republic, regardless of the prior rearmament in East Germany, must never possess the right to carry arms, even within a defensive association which imposes controls, or that any arming of Germany can be carried out only on Soviet terms. Looking back a few years this logic seems pretty strange. According to it the western powers had no right to feel alarmed when the Soviet government, contrary to agreements with allies about the occupation of Germany and without any regard for the wishes of these people, armed its eastern satellites and bound East Germany into the monolithic unity of communist Europe.

The Soviet government now claims the right to regard almost as a provocation to war the culminating act of a slow process whereby the German federal republic, with the consent of its freely elected government and that of 14 other free nations, enters into an association which has as one of its chief purposes the prevention on a permanent basis of German militaristic nationalism.

So we would be unwise and shortsighted if we yielded to Soviet threats about what will happen if these agreements are ratified. Nor in my view will that ratification provoke warlike retaliation, unless the Soviet government, for other reasons, desires to pursue such a belligerent policy.

I think myself, Mr. Speaker, that the chance that such retaliation will happen and war might follow are less now than they were last summer after EDC was rejected. On our part we have made it abundantly clear that NATO policies in Europe are defensive and pacific. Among many others, President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles have both recently emphasized that the aim of the west is to be strong enough to defend itself, to be moderate in responding to the provocations of others, and to be active in seeking every means of easing tensions and ensuring peace.

We know that the political and moral values which we cherish and the political system on which we rely do not thrive in conditions of war or continued tension. Our preparations are made for defence only, and war is for us not a means of combating ideologies which we do not like. Therefore any genuine Soviet move to lessen tension, even if it affects only a limited area of international relations, should be welcomed by us, and we should be willing to go half way at any time to meet it.

There is, of course, the constant danger of conflict from a misunderstanding on both sides of each other's motives. In the west we remain with good reason alarmed by the threatening and aggressive policies of the U.S.S.R. in recent years. In turn I think it is not inconceivable, given the atmosphere of totalitarian isolation and ignorance in Moscow, that the Soviet people, and even certain Soviet leaders, may at times consider —sincerely consider—that they are threatened by the west. One of the great tasks in the next few years in diplomacy is to try somehow to bridge this gap in misunderstanding, to build what His Holiness the Pope recently so aptly described as "a bridge of truth" between east and west.

I wish in closing to reaffirm my confidence that we are on the right path, and that the agreements we drew up in London and Paris will make an important contribution to security and peace. From the foundations of defence strength and constructive unity, which they will provide the west, I sincerely trust that it will now be possible to convince the Soviet leaders of our firm intention, and indeed determined resolution, to defend ourselves without in any way menacing them, or without rejecting any opportunity to ease a state of international tension which is both sterile and dangerous.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope this house will give strong support to the resolution which is before it.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I join with hon. members who applauded the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on a speech, powerful in its delivery and cogent in its lucidity. He drew a dark picture. He produced a calm in this house that I have never before witnessed.

As he spoke, hon. members in all parts of the house listened with that seriousness that is justified by the motion that is now before us. Was it a picture known in mythology as the analogy of Scylla and Charybdis? There seemed to be that alternative as the minister spoke and developed his forceful argument.

I doubt whether in the years since the second great war there has been a more momentous debate than the one before the house. It is the first time in the history of Canada that the House of Commons has been in a position where an adverse vote would not only defeat the motion before us but would render nugatory and ineffective the favourable decisions by parliaments in Britain, West Germany, France and the other members of this union. The defeat of this motion in this parliament would have the effect of putting an end to the agreements that have been entered into which become effective only by unanimous decision.

The international chain of collective security among the free nations depends on the individual links, and if any one of these links breaks the chain is destroyed beyond repair. I believe that was the reason for the seriousness displayed by members in all parts of the house as they listened to the revelation of the occurrences of recent days, detailed by one who by personal participation is aware more fully than the rest of us can hope to be of what took place during the days that followed the defeat of EDC.

There are many people in our country, Mr. Speaker, who while realizing the need for unity in defence measures in the forces of freedom because of their memory of two world wars, view these agreements with the fear that comes from their experiences of recent history. Only the other day Arnold Toynbee when asked "What is the future of coexistence?" replied "It is indefinite, uncomfortable, anxious and frictionable".

As the minister said, the free peoples have not forgotten. They cannot forget so soon after war. Because they cannot forget while the leaders of democracy ask for the mobilization of the forces of freedom based on faith, others demand the permanent quarantine of Germany because of her record in history.

People are fearful. The course to follow deserved greater consideration than it will receive after the agreements have been signed. It would have been well if last September or October we in parliament had been given an opportunity of discussing the situation following the defeat of EDC. Today we find ourselves in a position where, the agreement having been achieved without consultation, we are faced with a decision based on an accomplished fact without having had an opportunity to discuss the terms of this decision made by Canada.

Parliament was convened to discuss the railway strike, a serious matter affecting our nation. Was there any less reason that the representatives of the Canadian people should not have been convened last fall to enable a discussion to be held on this problem, and to permit them to obtain information such as parliament has received today, which I hope even at this stage will remove many of the fears of thinking Canadian people?

I hope we shall not return to the practices of the former prime minister of Canada, the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who seemed to believe that restricted discussion of foreign affairs was of the essence; that only the cabinet had the right to know what was going on, with parliament being called in and the story of events placed before parliament in a restricted manner that limited discussion and denied parliament the opportunity to offer alternative suggestions or ask for clarification of the things which should be clarified. If the speech which my hon. friend has made today and the details which he has given had been given to the Canadian people earlier, much of the feeling that has been aroused would have been allayed, diminished or eliminated.

I do not want to bring in other subjects at this time, but I think that this should be an object lesson to the Prime Minister. He is about to attend the meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers. He should not go over with the secrets locked in his soul, but should notify Canada through its representatives in parliament of the attitude he intends to take at this conference, so that when it is over we will not be faced with accomplished facts about which we have not had an opportunity to even offer an opinion.

I approach the discussion of this motion on behalf of my party in an objective way. I am going to restrict myself to some matters to which reference was not made by the hon. gentleman. It would be an easy course to follow for the members of the opposition to stand in this house and place the responsibility for this measure upon the government, hoping thereby to take advantage of some of the honest fears of former members of the armed forces and their dependents who are concerned over the eventualities which may occur. That is not the course which the Progressive Conservative party intends to follow. We desire to be objective. I desire to discuss this matter in a non-partisan spirit, for after all this is a measure upon which the future and the freedom of our country depends. Partisanship has no place in frank discussion.

I hope that we shall not be mistaken in the course we shall take and that what has been done will be a triumph for faith rather than a victory for doubt; that we will prove that the soul of freedom is strong enough to meet the needs of the turbulent present; that out of the agreements that have been made, out of the ashes of frustration in the negotiations with the U.S.S.R. to which the minister made reference will rise a new world achieved by the extension of the area of collective security.

The Canadian people are interested in foreign affairs, as is evidenced by the fact that editorials in our papers and observations of those who write on the subject of international affairs are receiving more and more attention. I believe a greater dissemination of information on international affairs should be made to the Canadian people than is furnished by the magazine External Affairs. Useful as it is, in recent months it has betrayed evidence of self-congratulation of those associated with the Department of External Affairs.

We are now in a period of coexistence. Recently the minister gave a description of coexistence which I thought was particularly appropriate. He said that the U.S.S.R. idea of coexistence was that of Jonah and the whale. There is no denying the fact that the U.S.S.R. has adopted a new strategy of sweet words, a coaxing attitude and a smiling Molotov. This change of attitude has become the unsecret weapon of the U.S.S.R. The Soviets smile, but at the same time they try to create and foster discord among the members of the United Nations. Coexistence is a seductive word. One of their smartest pieces of propaganda ever developed is the use of that word.

We believe in coexistence. Coexistence means to us the handshake, but not the embrace. The U.S.S.R. has shown the smiling face lately while it continues its aggression by proxy. It has rejoined the international labour organization; it has joined UNESCO; it has offered a conducted welcome to those who visit the U.S.S.R.; it has allowed the wives of diplomats to migrate; it has joined in the unanimous votes in the United Nations on disarmament, and in the setting up of an international atomic energy agency. It has been sweet and conciliatory; it has practised flattery and blandishment. It even offered to join NATO, which was analogous to Satan joining the anti-hell society. It is trying to coax by promises and to threaten by intimidation.

There have been tremendous changes since parliament last met. There has been the settlement in Trieste and the Saar; there have been the Anglo-Egyptian settlement and agreement and the Persian settlement. But the U.S.S.R. has not changed its objective. Nothing has been more serious than the revelation that for the last six months the secretary of the defence council in France each day delivered to the U.S.S.R. copies of the minutes of the meetings of the national defence council of France, and minutes which revealed the strategy of NATO.

The objectives of communism are unchanged. This is revealed by the declarations of the governments of the U.S.S.R. and the so-called republics of Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Ukraine, the German democratic republic, Hungary, Roumania, Bulgaria and Albania. It takes courage to be a member of parliament in any of those countries. In the 1950 election, of the members elected to the Volkskammer, in East Germany 49 have been shot and 59 have had to leave that country as refugees. I am just going to give one or two quotations from the declaration. It gives evidence of care in its preparation, power in its vision and deception in its concept. It states:

> The Paris agreements are directly at variance with the possibilities for further relaxation of the international tension which has come to light of late.

Later:

> Not only are these agreements alien to the interests of the German people, but they are directly spearheaded against the German working class, are designated to suppress democratic forces in western Germany.
>
> These agreements create a military bloc of aggressive circles of U.S.A., Britain and France with German militarism.

It maintains that the agreements are the product of great monopolies.

Then it says further:

> Rejection of plans for remilitarization of western Germany and her integration in military alignments, which would remove the main obstacle to the reunion of Germany on peace-loving and democratic principles;

And still further it says that the real security of Europe can be assured if instead of following this course we operate in co-operation with all European states irrespective of their social and state systems and thereby make possible by combined efforts of European states the safeguarding of peace in Europe.

My hon. friend has stated that meetings with the Soviets seldom lead to agreement. A simple example of ineffective negotiation is what has been done on the Austrian peace treaty. There were 352 meetings without settlement. Finally—and the threat is at the end—it says:

> Our peoples are confident in their strength, in their inexhaustible resources. The forces of peace and socialism are stronger and more solidly united than ever before. Any attempts to attack, to unleash war and to disturb the peaceful life of our peoples, will receive crushing rebuff.

First there is the cajolement and then the threat. They fear rearmament in West Germany, with 175 divisions of their own under arms and 80 divisions in their satellite countries.

Is German rearmament a new idea? It was first brought to the attention of the world by Ernest Bevin, who used these words some four and a half years ago:

> If West Germany is to be defended it seems to us only fair and reasonable that the people of Western Germany should help in their own defence.

On September 14, 1951, the three foreign ministers made the following declaration after the Washington conference:

> The three foreign ministers declare that their government's aim is the inclusion of a democratic Germany on a basis of equality in a continental European community which itself will form part of a constantly developing Atlantic community.

Out of that declaration grew the European defence community. It provided for the mobilization of 500,000 men and other forces to which the minister made reference. It provided an executive cabinet of all the member nations, a court of justice, an economic and social council, a house of parliament with two chambers, a senate and a house of representatives. It assured effective control of any German army that might be mobilized, because such an army would be part of an international army. The armed forces from Germany would find themselves not allocated to their own units but placed indiscriminately among the forces of other nations in an international army in much the same way as foreigners who join the French foreign legion lose their national identity in a common loyalty. France defeated that plan, the great concept of 500 years. It was defeated by France whose statesmen first gave it outline. As the minister has said, a vacuum was created at that time, and then the NATO defence system was put in a position to take its place. Mr. Dulles has set forth the basic and stubborn facts with regard to what followed the defeat of EDC last September.

Effective military defence of Europe called for a substantial military contribution by Germany; Germany could not be subjected indefinitely to discriminations relating to her sovereignty and her right of self-defence; the prevention of war between neighbouring nations with a long record of fighting could be dependably achieved only by merging certain functions of their governments in supra-national institutions.

Out of those views and out of the wise leadership of Sir Anthony Eden. to which tribute was paid by my hon. friend, and the leadership of Sir Winston Churchill, out of what appeared to be the degradation of defeat of collective security for generations, grew the inception of the present system which, imperfect as it is, represents in my opinion the best of any of the alternatives that are offered.

NATO has been a pronounced success when the situation in Europe four years ago is compared with today. When you visit the headquarters, and when you see that leader of the democracies, General Gruenther, you realize the difficulties that he must have had in bringing together the clashing elements of national jealousy and the formidable developments that have taken place. Indeed, when General Montgomery was in Canada a little over a year ago he said this:

NATO—

Canadians recognize NATO as one of those things that was evolved out of a Canadian concept.

—is the strong right arm of UNO. Without NATO, UNO would achieve little. Together they can achieve much. Both are necessary. If NATO had come into being earlier there would have been no second war. In the strengthening of NATO lies the best hope of preventing a third world war.

I consider that the strengthening of NATO on the political side for purposes beyond those of defence is all-important.

The minister said the same today. I ask him now, to say when he replies, what has been done to make NATO an institution that can be held together only if we realize that we must merge some of our economic problems within the purview of its concept. What has been done and what is being done to make NATO an institution not altogether military in its concept? General Gruenther said this, and I think his statement is worthy to be quoted. He shows no aggressiveness in his attitude to the U.S.S.R. He shows firmness and statesmanlike vision. He said this while the London meeting was under way:

West German armament and the tactical use of the atom bomb would produce in three or four years a reasonably good chance of preventing the Soviet union from overrunning Europe. West German rearmament was necessary because the western powers needed a shield strong enough to hold while reserves were being mobilized. Tactical atomic bombing was needed to compensate for the immense numerical superiority of the Soviet bloc.

There is the background. The discussion of these agreements and protocols falls, I believe, into the ambit of four or five subjects with which I am going to deal now in somewhat lesser detail than I had expected, in view of the explanations given by the minister. What is the essence of the terms of these agreements? What are the safeguards against the resurgence of German militarism? What are the dangers if the projected course contemplated by these agreements is followed? What are the alternatives to these agreements?

The minister reviewed the agreements, and I am not going to do so again except to make one or two references. He set forth what the agreements provided for and he set forth some of the safeguards. The western European union will set up an agency for the control of armaments. The council will make an annual report on its activities setting out the statistics of the various countries and the land and air forces necessary to be provided after consultation with each of the countries. The supreme allied commander in Europe will have entire control over the armies that will be raised, their deployment, their use, and above all, as the minister said, the logistics, which is simply a term that implies and contemplates those things upon which armies march. Particularly, as I see it, the gas and the oil necessary for the instruments of war will be entirely under the control of the general commanding in Europe who can turn the tap either on or off as need requires.

The minister then mentioned the fact that Germany agrees not to manufacture atomic, biological or chemical weapons except with the unanimous agreement of the other members of the organization. For some reason the minister left out three very important words. The undertaking of Germany is not to manufacture these things within its own territory. I am going to ask the minister a question later as to why it was necessary to permit Germany to manufacture these things outside her own territory.

The agency that is to be set up to control rearmament will appoint a director who will gather and examine national statistics and budgetary information, and have before him also a full record of the types of armaments being produced. All forces, as I said a moment ago, will be under the supreme commander. The location of all forces will be determined after consultation with NATO. These, in short, are the safeguards, coupled with a declaration by Germany that she will do nothing of an aggressive nature, and that she will live true to the principles of the United Nations Organization, in particular article 2 thereof. She undertakes also that she will never do anything to retrieve her lost territories or to reunify Germany. Of course these declarations, without safeguards, could well prove in the future to be hollow promises, unkept as were some other promises and undertakings of Germany in the past.

Britain made a great sacrifice in order to achieve this agreement. To keep the United States in Europe, to maintain the hopes and faith of France, Britain departed from her position of several hundred years and entered into an undertaking to remain in Europe for a period of some 40 years. Some of us were given to understand by the press of our country that this undertaking had also been given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on behalf of Canada. The minister has stated today that he did not go that far, but what he said in effect, as I understand it, is that Canada will make the necessary contribution in order to live within the concept of the agreement entered into.

For 500 years Britain has always been of Europe and yet not in Europe. Now she becomes both, in the interests of world peace. Will the controls work? Will the annual review protect from resurgent militarism? All that we can do is to believe that the agreements will be carried out, policed as they will be by full inspection and reinforced by careful examination of the budget of West Germany. Lord Ismay, speaking in London last November, said that the annual review has been effective in so far as the nations now members of NATO are concerned. He went on to say:

> It is extraordinary, when you come to think of it, that countries should be prepared not only to lay the details of their national military production and fiscal programs before their partners, but also to be cross-examined upon them. Never has the principle of alliance been carried to such a pitch.

If the U.S.S.R. would accept similar inspection, might we not hope to achieve what the minister stated was the first aim and purpose of the democratic nations of the world today, namely, the abolition as an instrument of war for all time of atomic and hydrogen bombs? What are the dangers? The minister has pointed them out—Scylla and Charybdis. Lord Ismay, when he affixed his name to the agreements, used his personal seal upon which was inscribed this motto: "Have no fear". We have fears. While every eventuality cannot be covered by an agreement, I believe with the minister that what the agreement does is to cover everything within the contemplation of the nations who fear a resurgence of militarism, everything within the limitations of the sovereignty of another nation.

I cannot believe, sir—and I am leaving my own country now when I say this—that Sir Winston Churchill, after all the years that he warned of the dangers of militarism in Germany, can now be appeased by an uncertain agreement. I cannot believe that Sir Anthony Eden, who gave two brothers in the first great war and his son in the last, is going to be deceived into entering into agreements that have in their being the germ of another war. This is what Eden said:

> There are in these agreements all the safeguards it has been possible for human ingenuity to devise.

Then he went on to say:

> Out of these agreements France and Germany may work together in the confidence that can breed peace, instead of the suspicion that can breed war.

Have they not gone far in the Saar agreement? Germany gave up a great deal there in return for what was given up by other nations.

What of Herbert Morrison, the former foreign secretary, who said that this is the only alternative? I return now to the question I asked in all seriousness. Why was article I of part I of the nine power conference agreement worded as follows—I am going to take the time of the house to quote the entire section:

> The high contracting parties, members of western European union, take note of and record their agreement with the declaration of the chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany (made in London on 3rd October, 1954, and annexed hereto as annex I) in which the Federal Republic of Germany undertook not to manufacture in its territory atomic, biological and chemical weapons. The types of armaments referred to in this article are defined in annex II. These armaments shall be more closely defined and the definitions brought up to date by the council of western European union.

Why were those words "in its territory" put in the agreement? Does that open the way to the building of armaments in the Saar once the Saar becomes internationalized? There must have been a reason for those words. On the face of them, they appear to leave the door open to the manufacture elsewhere of atomic and other weapons. These are striking words. What was the reason for this qualification? Certainly there must have been much soul-searching before those words were added to an absolute ban that could be lifted only with the unanimous consent to the agreement of the nations.

We ask ourselves, will this agreement turn into bitter disillusionment? We remember the treaty of Rapallo in 1921. We recall the Hitler-Stalin pact of 1939. Will the decisions reached by this agreement ultimately become solutions? Those are questions, Mr. Speaker, that only time can answer. Whatever the answer may be, I believe that in those agreements the free democracies of the west have spoken with a free and united voice rather than in the uncertain babble displayed in the months prior to the defeat of the European defence community.

Will the agreement protect? I cannot believe that France, having suffered from militarism as no other nation has suffered, would have voted approval of the agreement unless she believed that. France knows from personal experience. France feels. France cannot forget. Yet when this question came before the assembly, they voted for it. When properly evaluated, it was a large vote. The vote was 287 to 260, which seems a very insignificant majority for such a tremendously important matter. However, if you count out the 99 communists who could vote only one way, you find that the actual vote of those who were free to vote as they would was 287 to 161. France took the view that failure to approve and adopt these agreements would indeed exact a terrible penalty.

The minister asked, what are the alternatives? That group of communist nations who met in Moscow on December 2 said: Just wait and see. After all, we have discussed this matter for only three and a half years. We have had 16 conferences, I think the minister said, but if we have the opportunity of having just one more, who knows but that we shall establish peace in Europe?

While they talk and prate and counsel "wait and see", they pile up 175 divisions and 80 in the satellite countries. As the minister said, they mobilize in East Germany armed forces to the extent, as I recall it, of 180,000 men.

What are the alternatives? I dislike quoting from what the leaders of other nations have said, but I cannot forget that when this matter was before the British House of Commons Clement Attlee asked in effect: in view of Germany's past actions should she not be disarmed? He answered by saying that it was a logical position, but not a practicable one. Eden said this:

> The failure to ratify the pact with West Germany would bring about consequences fearful to predict.

He said also that it would drive Germany once more along dark and dangerous paths. Where is she going if you create a vacuum, a no-man's-land in the centre of Europe? Do you not place that country in a position where, sooner or later, it will fall under communist control?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Sir Winston Churchill saw the danger long before anyone else did. I heard him in the British House of Commons in 1936 when he pointed out that his own party was wrong because they were not mobilizing in the face of rising nazism. I saw Churchill in 1916 when he was in disgrace, when he came back from France wearing the uniform of the armed forces. The house emptied because Churchill was still in disregard, if not disgrace, over Gallipoli. I saw him in the role of a Cassandra in 1936 in the British House of Commons. Yes, he was right then, and others were wrong. We remember Eden when he refused appeasement. Has he changed?

On October 8, at a Conservative party conference, Churchill used these words:

> It would be disastrous to the human race to judge the Germans or any other peoples by past crimes committed in their names by dictators. Let Hitler take his name to hell. Let the peoples extend the hand of friendship and forgiveness to each other and walk together through the mysteries of life to freedom, justice and peace.

Scylla and Charybdis agreements are only as strong as the soul and the heart of the nations that enter into them, but the terms impose the greatest control ever imposed on any nation as a result of a conference.

What can Canada do? Well, Canada's contribution to NATO has been an outstanding one. I believe that we must maintain the strength of NATO, and that we should give Canadians a greater opportunity to understand NATO than ever before. Speak to the service clubs and to the public organizations of this country: how many of them have any realization of the responsibilities that NATO imposes upon our country?

I ask the minister this: under this agreement as it now stands, if a number under arms in Germany endeavoured to retrieve their ancestral capital of Berlin and if, as a result, the U.S.S.R. moved in, would we, under the agreement of NATO, find ourselves at war? The minister says no. There are conditions that place a different interpretation upon our responsibilities, qualified as they are in the manner indicated by the minister. I think Canadians as a whole will ask the minister to give that assurance in even more clear and unequivocal terms than he did today.

Believing that NATO should be strengthened, I am one of those who believe—and I speak only for myself in this—that a consultative assembly of NATO parliamentarians from each country might meet from time to time for a discussion and for an exchange of opinions, so that we in Canada would have a fuller realization of our responsibilities in the world of today.

The minister mentioned the contribution of Mr. Dulles of the United States. When and if these agreements are ratified, would it not be an impressive action on the part of the President of the United States if he were to reverse the order of things we have had in the last few years when Sir Winston Churchill has come to America? Because of his position as general commanding the forces of freedom in the last war, he still carries prestige that few possess. Would it not, I say, with the impact of the President's personality and of his persuasive powers, have a tremendous effect if, following the ratification and the approval of these agreements, he were to reverse the order and, himself, go to Great Britain and to France, and give them the reassurance of his presence?

Finally I make this appeal once more to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). It was made today by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Rowe). Let us, while maintaining these international organizations, be assured as well that our commonwealth will be able to speak with that degree of authority and power that its greater strength, its defences, its development and its economic possibilities will assure. Let us have that opportunity. We are not here to prejudice the Prime Minister, but we do want to have some idea, regarding these international matters affecting Canada and the commonwealth, as to what stands Canada will take before they are taken, rather than after they have become accomplished facts.

And now, fully aware of the dangers inherent in any agreements entered into, I should like to see this parliament, moved as it is by emotions consequent upon two world wars, make a decision with courage, wisdom and infinite compassion. Replete as it may be with danger, it is nevertheless circumscribed in such a way and to such a degree as human ingenuity can make it.

We are going forward. We failed after the first war. We were guilty of withdrawing and leaving Europe isolated. The United States never entered the league of nations. Canada and other nations treated their obligations with almost shameful triviality.

The aim is peace; the means, through strength. We have learned that peace cannot be achieved by chance. This is not an ideal agreement, but we must accept the world as it is. With world conditions as they are, these agreements may not achieve the world of our dreams. But I hope that they can assure a better and a safer world.

How many of us would have thought five years ago that the time would come when an implacable foe would join with us? The minister has said that history is a great teacher. History does teach the fallacy of finality. I believe that, subject to human frailties and human errors, these agreements represent an advance. Perhaps it is old-fashioned to hold this view, but I think the world contest will not be determined by nuclear weapons. I think we need faith. When there is a contest between good and evil, that is important.

Fears we have. For generation after generation men have faced the challenge of freedom. Those without faith have concluded that freedom was about to be destroyed in a glacial avalanche. But faith has always triumphed; and faith will triumph again unless we allow it to die in the grave of doubt and fear. As I see it, this is a step forward to justice under law. It has its dangers. It arouses its fears. But the stakes are high. The failure of this momentous scheme will exact a terrible penalty.

In that spirit, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of Her Majesty's loyal opposition to support the motion.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) reads as follows:

> Resolved, that it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

I rise to support the motion. Of course, in saying that, I recognize that hon. members are faced with a decision, in common with the rest of the country, which is not easy to make. I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he said it is rather regrettable that we had not an opportunity to examine the proposals earlier. I should have liked to see the protocol, and the agreements which are involved in the adoption of this protocol, referred to the committee on external affairs so that there might have been a discussion there, and so that hon. members might have been better informed. Even those of us who have taken the trouble to do a good deal of reading in connection with this matter would still like some of the questions in our minds answered. In a discussion of this kind we are not in committee; we cannot question the minister. All he can do is to reply to the debate. It would have been very much better if these agreements and this protocol could have been referred to the committee on external affairs. That committee could have been set up and perhaps we could have had an examination and the terms of the treaties involved explained to us, and then had the protocol before the house for approval.

As I have said already, I know from personal conversations, both in Canada and abroad, that there are widely held and genuine fears and misgivings concerning the rearmament of Germany. The hon. member for Prince Albert and the minister himself recognize that this is so. Let it not be said that those who conscientiously oppose the proposals are sympathizers either with the communist bloc, because they are so violently opposed to it, or those who are opposed to it are treating what we hope is an emerging democratic Germany as a permanently outcast nation.

I am certain that most members of the house know, as I know, that misgivings are shared by patriotic and peace-loving persons in all parties, in all walks of life and in all the NATO countries. In France, for example, the de Gaullists, the M.R.P., that is the Roman Catholic party, have on the whole bitterly opposed the present proposals for German rearmament, and these are not influenced by the communist party or by communist propaganda.

For my own part, I have given long and anxious thought to the protocol and to the problems of a rearmed Germany under certain conditions and limitations. So have all my colleagues, and I hope that all other hon. members have done likewise.

That we may come to different conclusions may be a matter of regret, but, certainly, under the circumstances, not unnatural or to be unduly disturbing. For my part, I believe that the best interests of the democratic world will be best served by admitting Western Germany to NATO—that is the purpose of the protocol before us—and then, under the guarantees set forth in the London and Paris agreements, agreeing to the suggested limited and supervised rearmament of the Federal Republic of Germany. But I respect the views of those who arrive at a different conclusion, and those views I hope will be put before the house by my colleagues, perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

In coming to a conclusion to support the protocol before us, I neither minimize widespread doubts and fears nor misunderstand them. What those of us who support the protocol are doing is to take, as I believe, a worth-while—if calculated—risk.

I said in a previous debate that it was unrealistic to believe that the democratic countries could undertake the defence of Western Germany in the event of aggression without the participation of German troops. I said that only within NATO and without establishing an independent German general staff should this be done. I believe the protocol and agreements provide these safeguards. Others may not think they are sufficient. But I do not dispute the contention that there are great risks. There are memories, as the hon. member for Prince Albert said, bitter memories, sharp memories of the horrors of two world wars, provoked by German aggression.

These memories make acceptance of any proposal for German rearmament difficult. But let me remark that the leaders, including the socialist leaders of all the democratic countries which were subjected to devastation and attack, have given public support to this protocol. I should say, lest there be any misunderstanding, that a majority of those attending our convention last summer and our national council more recently were fearful of and opposed to German rearmament before a further attempt had been made to negotiate a satisfactory agreement with Russia on German reunification. That the risks associated with German rearmament are recognized by the sponsors of the proposals is evident in the lengths to which they have gone to restrict the size of the armed forces Germany may recruit and the weapons she is allowed to manufacture and use. That was quite evident in the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon. Those who think that even these are insufficient point to the former nazis who may be given influential positions in the new German army. That is something that the western powers must watch and resist.

Our preoccupation with aggressive international communism—and it is international and aggressive—must not blind us to the dangers of admitting a sovereign Western Germany into the family of nations. To my mind, however, refusal to do so would cause bitterness and might have the effect of causing them to look behind the iron curtain for support. After all, Germany has looked in that direction before and could do so again, particularly as her economic interests have been largely centred in eastern Europe in the past.

Many who oppose these proposals point this out with the added fear that since Russia alone can satisfy Germany's demand for a revision of her present boundaries, she may, when rearmed, use her stronger international and military position to bargain with the east as well as with the west. That has to be watched.

In 1939 Hitler and Stalin made an unexpected agreement which touched off world war II. We must beware lest the reunification of Germany, the revision of boundaries and German economic interests cause her to take the other side in the cold war if we rebuff her now. Hatred of communism did not prevent the nazis from coming to terms with the soviets in 1939.

Many undoubtedly fear that the safeguards and the pledges made by Herr Adenauer may be ignored by a strengthened Germany which in the past has been and may be again the dominant power in central Europe. Care must be taken that the provisions of the Brussels treaty controlling the level of stocks and the production of armaments as well as the prohibition of atomic weapons, chemical weapons, naval and military aircraft and so on, are not circumvented. I noted the words that were drawn to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Prince Albert, to prohibit the manufacture of these things within Germany's own borders.

For example, our newspapers carried a dispatch on December 9 which said:

> The Dornier organization has established a branch in Spain and has built its first aircraft there to get around the ban on Germany's aviation activities.

Many persons reading this doubtless had their opposition to German rearmament considerably strengthened.

Then again many wonder why, if Liddell Hart, General Montgomery and others are correct in stating that atomic weapons and not large armies are now the basis of western defence, the arming of 12 German divisions is so pressing and important. Those who oppose the proposal think that more importance should be given to the effect of rearmament on the future of Germany, the future of Europe and future relations with the Soviet union.

I understand this position and respect it, but my experience at United Nations meetings leads me to believe that world tension has decreased as the western allies have achieved greater unity and strength. That unity and strength must be maintained by the democratic nations.

Fear there is that the rearmament of Germany will result in the irrevocable division of Germany with a revival of the kind of reaction which gave Hitler his opportunity in the 1930's, the kind of reaction there was against the Versailles treaty.

But no proposal for the reunification of Germany on the basis of free elections has been accepted by the Russians. Some believe, quite sincerely, that if pledges were given that a reunited Germany would be a disarmed Germany for a period of time, say ten years, Russia might agree. That proposal might have been made and might have been worth trying but I doubt it would have changed the Russian view. It is too late to suggest it now.

But may I add here that no opportunity for the negotiation of outstanding problems with Russia should be neglected. I was very pleased to note that the minister of external affairs in the course of his speech this afternoon made exactly that point, that even on minor issues, when the opportunity to negotiate settlement occurs, those negotiations should be undertaken in the hope that if we can negotiate some of the minor issues we can ultimately negotiate major ones. If after the ratification of the protocol four-power negotiations are undertaken, we should support them wholeheartedly. I hope and indeed believe that ratification will promote negotiations rather than hinder them.

Perhaps the most potent argument against the proposal is that there is a sharp difference of opinion regarding rearmament in Western Germany itself. The trade unions and the social democratic party are unitedly against it. Those of us who read the reprint of an article from the New York Times in this morning's Montreal Gazette saw that the non-communist youth of Germany met a few days ago and strongly opposed German rearmament. So there is no doubt that there is opposition to rearmament in Germany itself. We must beware lest the sympathies of this large section of German opinion are alienated from the west. They fear a resurgence of militarism as a result of rearmament—hence every precaution must be taken by the supervising authorities to see that the German divisions are organized and officered by men who are entirely free of nazi predilections.

It seems to me, then, that hon. members of this house must weigh risks and advantages and make their decisions on the balance they achieve. This I have tried to do honestly and conscientiously, with the result that, as I said at the very outset, I shall rise in my place and vote for the motion, approving of the protocol.

Many of my friends will arrive at a different conclusion. That I regret, but I can respect their judgment because I understand the basis for their opinions.

The overriding consideration which has governed my own decision may be briefly stated. It is that the failure of Russia to co-operate in the United Nations with a view to setting up the military staff committee, and to participate in the security measures provided for and envisioned in the United Nations charter, made the organization of the regional defensive alliance known as NATO necessary and inevitable. I was present at the United Nations when the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) placed the alternative before the United Nations assembly. I approved of what he said at that time and I have not changed my opinion since.

The gradual national disarmament which we envisaged at San Francisco has not been achieved. On the contrary, Russia maintained its armies and strengthened them as we demobilized and turned our airfields back to pastures and our factories to the production of civilian goods. True, a change came over us in 1950 because of the Korean war.

Now the time has come when a proposal is before us for recognition of the partial sovereignty of Germany. As the minister said this afternoon, sovereignty surely involves the right of a nation to defend itself against aggression. How shall that be done?

The alternatives as I see them are to drift along until Germany rearms of her own volition and without supervision or control, or to see her rearmed with the support of one or more friendly powers, perhaps the United States, or to recognize her right to limited rearmament under safeguards and supervision outlined in the treaties. To my mind the limited and supervised rearmament within NATO is the alternative I must support.

The indefinite occupation and defence of Germany by the NATO powers is, of course, another alternative but one which no country is prepared to undertake indefinitely or even in part, without German participation in her own defence.

May I say one further word regarding NATO. I feel very strongly, as I have said so often in the house and wish to reiterate this afternoon, that we in the western alliance would be in a much stronger position in the world if we had paid more attention to article 2 of the NATO agreement. Had we given as much attention to the integration of the economies of the NATO countries as we have to military arrangements, our European allies would have been more stable, more secure against communist infiltration, and this very strength and stability would have minimized the danger of communist aggression against which the NATO treaty was originally formulated. May we take this lesson to heart and in formulating future plans for the maintenance of peace in Europe, Asia and indeed Africa or the rest of the world, give more heed to economic aid as a means of promoting freedom, democracy and world-wide peace and progress.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset that I too look upon this debate as perhaps covering the most important matter to come before parliament at this session, if not at many other sessions. I listened carefully to the speech given under great difficulties this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who, by the way, seemed to grow stronger as the minutes passed. For that I was glad. I must say that he presented a sombre picture, one which certainly confirmed my own feelings as to the whole world situation that we face. We are now discussing a matter of tremendous importance, and I believe that each person in this house must look into his own conscience and decide whether or not he has been able to give it adequate consideration. As for me, I have devoted a great many hours of study and contemplation to this whole matter. I have read every single thing that I could get hold of with respect to it in an effort to try to make up my mind on the basis of the fullest knowledge which I was capable of obtaining.

Over the past several weeks, Mr. Speaker, I have noted the intensive campaign of opposition, I must say, carried on by the communists in this and other lands. I must say that, in my judgment, they have overplayed their hands. However, as a result of their overplaying their hands, I believe that a good many serious-minded, loyal citizens of this country have possibly been silenced for fear that they might be classed as communists or communist sympathizers. When I say silenced, I mean in their criticisms, if they have criticisms, of the protocol and the agreements that have been entered into at Paris and London. We in the Social Credit group have all given many hours of study to this complicated group of interrelated protocols, annexes and treaties because it is not easy, in my judgment, to get them all separated and put into their proper perspective so that they can be understood.

The minister's speech this afternoon—and it was an excellent one, I may say—helped us greatly to get a better understanding of this whole complex. But what makes complete understanding much harder to get is the fact that there are so many implications in what was done at both London and Paris. Here we are dealing with matters of power politics, a field in which we can never be quite sure that we have caught the full picture because every move that is made can be understood only against the background of decades of history and against a great many shifting alliances.

In the light of all the complexities and problems associated with the protocol now under discussion, we think that it would have been wiser if the government had brought the resolution before the house so that it could have been considered in committee of the whole where the members could have asked as many questions as they liked and where they could have made every effort to get a complete understanding of the whole serious situation. However, that has not been done. I do not know what else to suggest to the minister. I know that there are serious misgivings in the minds of many people because we have not brought the protocol in for consideration in such a way that questions can be asked. The only other thing that I could possibly suggest might be reference to the external affairs committee. I would not even do that if it were to be interpreted to mean that what I was seeking was delay, because that is not my object at all. But let us keep in mind the fact that history will judge us with some harshness if it ever takes the view that we have made a decision on this extremely important matter without the fullest possible measure of consideration and study. If the minister can see his way clear to refer this protocol to the external affairs committee for study, I should like to see that course adopted because I would not want anyone to feel that this house took a measure of this great importance and dealt with it summarily without having every opportunity to get at the root of every single thing that a member wants to investigate.

From talking with people and from receiving communications from them I have discovered that a good many of our good, loyal, serious-minded citizens throughout Canada have in their minds many misgivings about the rearmament of Western Germany. Let me hasten to differentiate between the protocol and rearming Western Germany, because there is a difference, in my judgment. I must confess that I have some serious misgivings about the rearmament of Germany myself. The misgivings of serious and good and loyal people in this country revolve around what will really be the result of ratification of the protocol rather than its major purpose. I think that most people feel that the thing that is uppermost in the whole business is the rearming of Germany, with all the possible consequences and dangers that attend that business.

I have received quite a number of communications about the matter. Some I have not placed at a very high level of worth; others I have. I cannot help paying attention to the things that are brought to my attention by people who I know are loyal citizens of this country and are serious-minded people. I have in my hand a letter from one such person; and by the way it is from a man who professes adherence to the Conservative party in my own part of the country. I want to quote from it as being typical of the attitude of quite a number of Canadian people. I propose to read briefly from the letter, Mr. Speaker. I may say that I am quite prepared to table the whole letter if it is desired that I do so. In fact, I will do so anyway because I think this house is entitled, whenever a member quotes from a letter, to see what is in it. This is what this good man says:

> It has occurred to me that whereas in a democracy we are all responsible for the actions of our governments it is proper for us to express our opinions when we think they are doing wrong.

I agree with that statement 100 per cent; and I am glad this man had the courage and the anxiety about the whole matter to write to me. He continues:

> I am much worried about the rearming of Germany and more particularly our alliance with Germany even though it is only a part of the country. It seems to me to be morally wrong.
>
> We have had no reliable evidence of any repentance on the part of Germany for all that they did, and thus our acceptance of them now really implies condonement of their wickedness. We are being unjust to ourselves and we are failing in a sacred duty to our brothers who were slain by their hands.
>
> No emergency can truly justify saving ourselves at the expense of honour. God always provides a better way if we look for it. Mr. Pearson asked if anyone could suggest a better way. I say let us face the situation squarely as we did after Dunkirk, looking for help neither to right nor to left but only up. In that way only will we be worthy of that help that comes from above

Then in another part of the letter he goes on to say this:

> If we do have to come to blows with Russia, which I think we won't, will the acceptance of German help do us any good? I think it will do harm. History has shown that battles are not always won by the side with the biggest army, but by the side with the best will to fight. The will to fight goes with the most righteous cause. We may find many such cases in the Old Testament. Even a dictatorial government must have the will of their people behind them to successfully wage war. We must try to imagine what the feelings of all people of eastern Europe must be in the present case. They undoubtedly will have a horrible memory of German occupation. Our alliance with Germany will associate us in their minds with all that they dread. It will fix their will solidly behind every action that their government takes against us. This I think will more than offset the advantage of having Germany on our side.

I do not wish to quote any more at this time. This man has written me in good faith and said that I might quote from his letter if I wished. I did so because it is typical of of the attitude and feelings of a great many people who are loyal citizens of this country and who can by no stretch of the imagination be called communists or fellow travellers. I say it is typical, and we must not brand these people as communists.

When EDC was being promoted and before France turned it down we were told that the revival and use of the German general staff would not be allowed. That assurance did set some of our very deep misgivings somewhat at rest. But since EDC was scotched and these new proposals were adopted at London and Paris there has been some evidence and quite a good deal of prospect that the German general staff will not only be revived but that members of it will be given a big part to play in rearming Germany. We know that many of them are nazi sympathizers, outright nazis or some other form of extremists, and people generally are fearful that the German general staff, who were mainly responsible for the brutal and bestial acts of the German army during world war II, will soon come to exercise far too much influence not only on military life in Germany but also on the political and social life of the German people as a whole. I think we ought to be given every assurance that this will not be so and that they will not be allowed to do so. What assurances can be given I do not know, but certainly we should be given assurances that they will not be allowed to do so.

I recall that when I visited Germany in 1948 there was an intensive effort going on then on the part of the occupying powers to condition the German people out of their uncommonly strong bent towards militarism and at the same time to encourage and help them to establish a real democracy deep-rooted in their country. These were the two major objectives in the intensive educational campaign that was started by the occupying powers soon after they went into Germany. They realized what a terrific task it would be because for centuries the German people had never taken their individual responsibilities of citizenship. They had let Adolf do it until it became instinctive for them to look for a fuehrer instead of the practice of individual responsibility and taking their fair share in their own government.

Of course the German general staff and the military junta have exercised undue influence over the people since the time of Bismarck, and so it was not surprising to me that for a great time the German people had been developing a national character that leaned heavily toward militarism and war. But during the past ten years the intensive educational campaign of the allies in Germany has taught the younger people to hate militarism and the people as a whole have adopted democracy as their form of government. It is not deep-rooted, as we know, and perhaps will not be deep-rooted for a good many years. It is quite true it will need a long time to become firmly established, but my opinion is that the younger Germans as a whole bitterly hate even the appearance of a uniform and they have given Theodor Blank, the man who undertook to publicize the new army, a pretty tough time in many areas of the country. In one place I understand they even threw a wine glass in his face when he attempted to speak to them. That is an indication of how they look at it. Does it not seem tragic and ludicrous that we would now turn completely around and plead with the Germans to think in terms of militarism, even if it is limited? It would be especially ludicrous if we did not take every precaution against the revival of the German general staff.

A good deal has been said this afternoon about the dangers involved in German rearmament, and there are dangers. Other speakers have pointed them out. Indeed, the minister himself did so and suggested that in all of these international agreements there is a risk we have to take. I am glad he did not use the term "calculated risk" because a good many people in this country look upon it as more or less a useless term. Certainly any risk is calculated. You never take a risk unless you feel you can get away with it. We know that there are dangers, and I think we should always keep those dangers in mind. If the protocol is ratified, as I hope it will be, then we should never relax in our efforts to prevent the dangers from being realized.

There are dangers we can see and there are dangers that will not become evident for some time after we have begun to gain experience in the practical working out of the protocol. I do not believe I should take the time here to point out too many of these dangers. There are some I shall suggest to which reference may have already been made. A rearmed Germany might try to seize East Germany by force. The minister set some of my misgivings at rest in that regard when he said that there could be no deployment of forces within Germany except at the command of the supreme commander of NATO, which I admit is in itself some control. But still it is not airtight. If a rearmed Western Germany should attempt to seize East Germany by force, thinking perhaps that with the 12 divisions the minister spoke about, the 1,350 airplanes and a naval force of a sort, they would be the strongest military power on the continent with the exception of Russia, what kind of predicament might that plunge us into? That is the point. It is not whether or not they would be able to accomplish their task, but it would of course intensify the risks of war.

So we have to be very careful to see that there are safeguards against any precipitous action for unification that may be in the minds of a frustrated people who for years have been thinking in terms of unification and who seem to be willing to give their lives for it. I am not one who overlooks the fact that unification of Germany has only been a matter realized in comparatively recent times, and in the long run it is not an important consideration by any means. It is important, but certainly not the most important.

Another rider to this danger might be if the Western German people became frustrated in their desire for reunification and a strong wooing movement on the part of Russia conceivably induced a rearmed Germany to make a deal with Moscow. I wonder what result that might have. We have to look at that possibility. If we had to face a resurgent Germany allied with the imperialist bolsheviks from the east we would of course have our hands more than full, even with NATO.

I might also mention the possibility that ratification might intensify the arms race. That has been suggested, and it is possible, although I do not look upon it as a grave danger by any means. I might suggest, as has already been suggested, that ratification of the protocol might harden the present division of Germany as well as the situation of the east versus the west blocs of the world. It might do that. I do not know. It is something concerning which we have to wait and see. I do not like to think that it will. I hope it will not, but it might put an end to any possibility of achieving success in the drive for disarmament. However, we have to take the risk.

These are the dangers, and there is one other. The complex of protocols, agreements and annexes does set up, I understand, a system of interlocking controls that are expected to operate successfully against the dangers I have mentioned and any others that may be seen. They might work well but it will only be so if all the parties to NATO, the western European union and the Brussels pact continue to act in the very best of faith and if the German people continue to root their democracy deeply, resisting the influence of the German general staff as well as any extremists in other places.

Now, I have faith in Adenauer. So long as Adenauer is there, I think that he could successfully lead Germany along the path of rectitude. I believe that, but we must remember that President Adenauer is getting older. Of course, we sincerely hope he will be around a long time to see this thing through. We must not overlook the fact that he is not expected to be around all the time. I am wondering what would happen if the western European nations decided later that it would be wise to raise the ceiling on West Germany's military strength. They could not order an increase; that has to be done voluntarily. I understand that under the treaty the western nations could not force it, they would have to negotiate for it. It is conceivable that in the negotiations Germany might bargain for a relaxation of some of the controls. If a dangerous east-west situation were to arise, a situation of real urgency, the western powers might yield to Germany's desire in order to get the increase.

What would happen then? Away would go the system of controls, and I do not know where it would end. I point these things out, Mr. Speaker, more to indicate what is in the minds of those people who are thinking this thing through very carefully. Certainly a lot of these things were in my mind, although I suppose I must have given thirty or forty hours of study to this whole question since we were told this debate would take place. There are some things that I cannot understand fully even yet, and I suppose a good many people would be in the same position.

As we study this whole complicated series of documents, this protocol, I feel we should do so against the background of two very important things. We should never lose sight of what happened at Munich, and how Munich contributed to the terrible things that eventually took place in world war II. In my judgment it would never do for us to let down our guard for one moment. At the same time, I must say we should do all we possibly can to spread the gospel of love, charity and good will to our fellow men wherever they may be, behind the iron curtain or in front of it.

The second consideration I feel we should always keep in mind is what the bolshevik imperialists are trying to do, and in fact, I think, are determined to do. I believe I understand what it is. I believe that, just as it was true that Hitler and his objectives were made clear by his own publication, "Mein Kampf", today the objectives and determination of the leaders of the bolshevists are made quite clear by the things they do and the documents they publish. Back in 1923, that is a long time ago, Lenin set out a blueprint for communist action over the years. He said:

First we will take eastern Europe, then the masses of Asia, then we will encircle the United States, which will be the last bastion of capitalism. We will not have to attack. It will fall like an overripe fruit into our hands.

We must secure the good will of teachers and professors in schools and universities, of liberal ministers of religion and of the pacifists and reformers of the world in order to create a mental barrage in the minds of the capitalist youth, which shall forever bar them from participating in a carnal conflict with the communist order.

This man Lenin was one of the architects of the communist conspiracy. Coming closer to modern times, I quote a man whom I met at the United Nations, a man by the name of Manuilsky. At one time he was the head of the comintern and, by the way, was the man who betrayed the Ukraine and led that section into a trap. He said:

War to the hilt between communism and capitalism is inevitable. Today, of course, we are not strong enough to attack. Our time will come in 20 or 30 years.

That is approaching.

To win we shall need the element of surprise. The bourgeoisie will have to be put to sleep. So we shall begin by launching the most spectacular peace movement on record. There will be electrifying overtures and unheard-of concessions. The capitalist countries, stupid and decadent, will rejoice to co-operate in their own destruction. They will leap at another chance to be friends. As soon as their guard is down we shall smash them with our clenched fist.

He was speaking on behalf of the comintern. What else do we need with that blueprint and the knowledge of events that have been happening in the world since that time and what is happening today? An attempt is being made by the communists now with a bit of a peace movement, overtures and all that sort of thing. We have to beware. That is why I say we have to watch these blueprints very carefully.

A NATO letter for May, 1954, sets out on page 25 a statement showing current Soviet military capacity. I believe the minister described that this afternoon in adequate terms, so I will not need to repeat it. Anyone who wants to see the strength of the communist countries today has only to turn to the NATO letter for May, 1954, page 25, and take a look at it. If you do not get shocked into a sense of reality, then I miss my guess. I should like to ask why in the world Russia has built up such a huge armament in relation to the other parts of the world. Why have her satellites followed suit, as the minister said this afternoon? Why have they allowed Germany to continue divided for all these years? Why have they refused to help bring about a peace treaty for Austria? All these things we have to try to keep in our minds.

I believe fully that the division of Europe was brought about by Russia and her close allies through their refusal to take even a good look at suggestions for the reunification of Germany on the basis of free elections, and also because they have constantly refused to co-operate to the smallest extent in trying to solve the many problems that are causing tension in the free world today. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks left, so may I continue and try to conclude before the recess?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Low: It is clear to me at any rate that Western Germany would not be able to defend herself against an already armed Eastern Germany without having some military strength with which to do it. In addition to that, I feel quite certain that Europe could not possibly defend itself against a possible communist aggression without German manpower and German arms. Just here let me say that in case of trouble between the eastern powers and the western powers, I am sure that the Canadian people would not want Canadian boys to give their lives defending approximately 30 million people who were not taking any part in the responsibility of defending themselves. That is one of the most serious considerations. I feel that such considerations must enter into the minds of the Canadian people from one coast to the other. I would not want that, and I believe I am about average in that respect.

I believe that the free nations of the world must be strong and be able to withstand the forces that are arrayed against them. I believe that the only thing the communists understand and respect is strength. I feel we have reached a point where we must take a stand to prevent any further communist victories and so that we will not have to continue with any kind of policy of salvage out of our international conferences. We have lost too much already. I think now is the time to take that stand. We have to take it whether or not we want to do so. Perhaps the most important deterrent to communist aggression is the knowledge of the unity of western Europe. For that reason I believe it is wise, very wise, to admit Germany into the North Atlantic community, and I say "the North Atlantic community" rather than NATO, advisedly, and into the western European union.

While I realize that the controls that are set up may not work, I believe there is much less danger to the free world from a possible gradual break-down of controls over a period of years than from a determined adversary sworn to destroy all the free nations of the world, and that maintains a strong fifth column in every country where they are pledged now to lull the citizens of those countries to sleep with that peace opiate about which I spoke, and who would like to sabotage their efforts to defend themselves if it becomes necessary to resort to armed defence. We do not want to forget quickly how much influence that fifth column had at one time in many countries of Europe, and some that are now far from us.

I am certain in my own mind that NATO has prevented a western push by the communist imperialists before this, and that is why I have supported NATO right from the beginning. And I want my hon. friend who spoke last evening before six o'clock to hear what I am now saying. I say to him, the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon), that I have supported NATO right from the beginning, because I have felt that Canada must be strong, and that Canada must stand with the other free nations of the world to resist communism. I believe we must continue to spend for defence purposes and keep ourselves strong and, certainly so long as the present situation continues, we must give high priority to defence. That is where I stand.

Mr. Cannon: I am glad to hear the hon. member make that statement. As a matter of fact I was going to ask him that question.

Mr. Low: I took a note of what the hon. member said last night and I felt that under the circumstances I was obligated to state where I stand. And by the way I am speaking at this time for the Social Credit association of Canada, of which I have the honour to be leader. I am sure all the members of that association, and those affiliated with it, will stand by what I have to say.

The possession by a united west of atomic weapons, and at least a measure of western solidarity, have been I am sure great deterrents. Divided and weak, all the negotiations and peace conferences we could think up would be useless in the face of communist blueprints and determination to reach their goal.

We in this group would like to see a general disarmament. We pray for it and will work for it, but I hope we are not unrealistic enough to believe that we in the free nations of the world, in spite of our great military inferiority under the east, should start disarming unless Russia and her allies give undoubted evidence of their readiness to go along with us in disarmament. I think that we should pursue every effort and take advantage of every possibility to get world-wide agreement on disarmament and effective international control of atomic weapons to ensure that they will never be used in war.

If I thought the ratification of the protocol would destroy our chances of achieving general disarmament and effective international control of atomic weapons, I would vote against it, and I would use every ounce of my energy to persuade others to vote against it. But I am convinced that the only thing that will ever bring Russia's communist imperialists seriously to consider disarmament will be the realization on their part that they can never become strong enough to whip us all, if we stand together.

Consequently if we stand together and keep our unity solid and keep ourselves strong, I believe that we will have a much better opportunity, and a much better chance of negotiating for world peace and disarmament, so as to usher in that time for which we all long, the time when "every man may sit under his vine and fig tree and none shall make him afraid." I feel at the present time that we should support the protocol that has been placed before us, give it every possible chance to work, and show unity in the face of the difficult situation which obtains throughout the whole world.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on many occasions in this house when he has given us a review of the international situation, but I do not think I ever heard him to such advantage as I did this afternoon. He was lucid, he was clear and he gave us facts. I think that those facts showed us the motion which is before the Chair and the ratification of this protocol of NATO to be one of the most important pieces of legislation that has ever come before the Canadian parliament. I know he has been suffering from a sore throat, and so on, but he did so well this afternoon that I hope the next time he speaks he has another sore throat. I am not wishing him any harm, but I think the speech he gave and the way he put it when he answered all our fears augurs very well for the future. I cannot help paying this tribute to the speech which he made this afternoon and usually I do not pay compliments.

There are two or three things that I want to touch on tonight in regard to this protocol and the questions raised by the speakers this afternoon. After listening to the minister there is not very much a backbencher can say about this protocol. But I think it will be understood that whenever we negotiated with the communists, when we sat down with them, we always did it not being sure of our position and through a sense of weakness, in that the communists had this advantage: they knew that we did not desire war nor did we have any intention of attacking them. But we did not know what they were going to do to us. That gave them an advantage and a great advantage in their negotiations. The result was that many times we came off a bad second. The Geneva conference last summer demonstrated this weakness. I am glad to note that out of this weakness came the realization that if we had continued with any more Genevas we would be placed in such a position that our chances of maintaining peace would be very small indeed.

It was the failure at Geneva and the failure of France to ratify the EDC that awakened people to the sort of danger into which they were drifting. Then Sir Anthony Eden and other statesmen realized it and got together with the people behind them and worked out this protocol which we have before us tonight.

Sometimes out of weakness comes strength. We have been negotiating for years through weakness and it is only when we negotiate through strength that we seem to make any deal with the Russians at all, or make any impression upon them. We have now reached the stage that with NATO we are building up the strength to negotiate. We are in a position to sit down on equal terms with the Russians and negotiate through strength on equal terms. The value of this protocol to me means simply that.

I said that in this house two or three years ago and perhaps I was the first to enunciate the policy of peace through strength. I am convinced—others may have different opinions—that peace never came through weakness and it will never be maintained through weakness. If we are to have peace we must be strong enough to see that we can keep it; therefore tonight we are debating this protocol binding the NATO nations together so that we may negotiate with the communist powers in the future on equal terms.

This afternoon the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) strongly supported the motion before us and raised one or two questions. One of his questions had to do with our troops in Germany and the position in which they would be placed if this new German army took it in their heads to try to get back Berlin. I am not going to try to answer the question for the minister because he is well able to do so himself, as you all know. It was a hypothetical question, of course. But if the German army is to be integrated into NATO, with all the safeguards which were outlined to us this afternoon, I cannot for the life of me see, from a military standpoint, how the German army on its own is ever going to take Berlin without orders from the supreme commander of NATO.

The question was also raised: what is the position of the Canadian troops under this arrangement if they do not get sufficient safeguards? Well, if I know the Canadian troops and the spirit of the fighting qualities of the Canadian troops, I do know this: If a fracas takes place in Europe, they are not going to sit on the sidelines; they are going to take part in it. That is what they are there for. There are under this protocol risks which we have to take. There is no treaty today, however much you may bind it with safeguards, that is going to be kept unless the will behind it is to keep it. It has been demonstrated often enough in the last five or six years that treaties are kept by certain powers only when it is convenient for them to keep them. We therefore must accept certain risks when we ratify this protocol. There has never yet been an airtight treaty, Mr. Speaker, so my position tonight is to rise and support this protocol, fully accepting the risks which I know I have to take. I am sorry I have to ratify it, but because we have no choice I ratify it and am going to vote for it, for this very simple reason. The general welfare of this country is wrapped up in this treaty, and possibly the peace of the world.

When the hon. member for Prince Albert emphasized the importance of this protocol coming before this parliament and the duty of each member of this parliament toward the treaty, he brought out a very good point. It is the duty of hon. members to safeguard the welfare of the people of this nation and to try to maintain peace. That is why I am supporting it, with all its drawbacks and with all its risks.

I am going to support the protocol, Mr. Speaker, because I am here to safeguard the general welfare of the people of Canada and to try to maintain peace. That is why I am going to vote for it and that is why I hope all hon. members will make up their minds on that basis and not on the basis of party. This is beyond party. It is the national welfare that is before us, and if we vote on that basis there will be no doubt of this protocol being ratified in an overwhelming manner. I am voting for it for the reasons I have stated.

I do not want to take any more time because I know many hon. members want to express their thoughts. I simply wanted to express mine and to say once more that in voting for this treaty I am voting on behalf of the general welfare of the people of Canada and for the peace of the world.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to confine my remarks this evening to the aspect of this problem referring to the rearmament of Germany. If my remarks should savour somewhat of a military appreciation, you, sir, know my background, and I have no apologies to make.

As has been stated on several occasions during the debate already, it is not unnatural that many people view with apprehension the rearming of Germany. The wounds inflicted during world war I and world war II left deep impressions in the hearts and homes of thousands of Canadians. These wounds are not yet healed. On the other hand, it would be senseless for us deliberately to keep open the scars and to continue the hatreds cultivated during the war years. It is difficult for the ordinary mortal to follow the divine injunction to love one's enemies, but if what we choose to call common sense indicates a similar course then perhaps we may be capable of rising slightly above the implications and emotions of frail human nature.

The fears which have been expressed might, I think, have been to a certain extent relieved had it been possible for the government to have given an opportunity for a full discussion on this problem before this. But, even now, I will endeavour to remove some of those fears which beset the people of Canada. In order that we may have a correct approach I will review quite briefly the events surrounding the background of this problem.

You will remember that during the period of happy optimism which followed immediately after the cessation of hostilities at the end of world war II, the hope expressed at Potsdam persisted for a short time that the German people might remain unarmed for many years because all the great states adjacent to the reich were on seemingly good terms so that the chances of war in Europe were regarded as remote.

It was not until the four-power pact of 1946 failed in the face of the Russian demand for the control of the Ruhr that the western powers found it necessary to build up the economic life in their respective spheres of Germany in order that they might relieve the burden on their own taxpayers. From that date on the division of Germany became more and more clearly defined and we also witnessed the miracle of West German resurgence.

Then followed the Soviet rejection of the Marshall plan, the Czech-communist coup of 1948, and the Russian blockade of Berlin countered by the airlift on the part of the western powers. These events eventually drove the western powers in self-defence into the Atlantic alliance. Even then no serious consideration was given to the creation of any German contingents although it was known that Russia had equipped the police forces of Eastern Germany with tanks, artillery and modern arms at that time. Therefore the blame for the failure of the Potsdam agreement lies squarely on the shoulders of the U.S.S.R. It was not until operations were started in Korea in 1950 that Europe really became alarmed. The fear that an invasion similar to that which took place in South Korea might be launched in central Europe became great, that is an invasion by proxy. It was then and only then that Mr. Winston Churchill, as he then was, advanced a suggestion to the council of Europe that West German troops might be integrated into the defence system of NATO.

The various plans which culminated in the European defence council failed to materialize after the rejection of that European defence council by the French chamber last year because of its supra-national character. Now, it seems to me that the west has but three choices. I put these three choices in slightly different language to that voiced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon.

The first choice is to act on the assumption that Russia will never attack through West Germany and therefore we can leave the Germans unarmed and undefended. In other words, let us turn back the clock to the Potsdam period. That is just not practical—you cannot turn clocks back.

Secondly, to assume full responsibility for the entire defence of West Germany by the western powers. The adoption of such a policy would mean much heavier commitments in arms, money and manpower by the western powers. In order that Canada might bear her full share of any such program she might easily be asked to station a much larger force in Europe than the one brigade we have stationed over there at the present time.

I do not think that anyone suggests seriously that Germany could be occupied indefinitely by the allied forces. It would be repugnant to all the principles of democracy. Such an idea would be politically impossible and furthermore could easily ruin the economy of the western powers.

The third alternative that it has been suggested we adopt is to give West Germany the opportunity to contribute to the maintenance of the forces now being built up by the NATO powers in the hope that those forces will be sufficiently strong to deter Russia from committing any overt act which would lead to war.

The choice really lies between linking the federal republic of West Germany strongly with the west or allowing her to drift about in the centre of Europe, eventually and inevitably to be sucked into the Soviet system. I think a neutral and defenceless Germany simply does not make sense. The days when any country could remain in splendid isolation are, I think, past forever.

It seems to me that the question we must ask ourselves is whether we really need a German contribution in order to offer a strong deterrent to possible Russian aggression. I am fully aware of the risks we run by rearming Germany. Is it possible for the west to prevent war without German manpower? That is the question I ask.

A few years ago General Eisenhower said that German manpower was essential to stop Russia from overrunning western Europe. Up to now German manpower has not been available, nor have the Russians attacked in western Europe and overrun western Europe. Why is this? The answer to that question is that up to now we have held the lead with the atomic bomb. But today the Russians, too, have the atomic bomb.

So before answering my question as to whether we really need German forces I think we should assess the opposing forces as we know them to be.

From the most reliable information available it is indicated that the U.S.S.R., Eastern Germany and the eastern European satellite states today have over six million men under arms, of which number four and a half million approximately are in the army. Mr. Harold Macmillan, the minister of defence in the British house, on November 18 during the debate on a motion similar to this one, stated that well over 100 divisions could be made available by the Russians in 30 days and that their total forces numbered over 400 divisions. More than one-third of these Soviet divisions are tank or mechanized divisions armed with modern equipment. Russian tanks today stand on the line of the Elbe. They dominate the central plains of Germany and within a few hours' run could be on the Rhine.

The precise figures given for the forces of the western powers have not been made public, but the figure which is generally accepted is a little short of 50 divisions, with another 50 divisions in reserve. That, Mr. Speaker, is the measure of our disadvantage. Surely another 12 divisions from West Germany will help us to offset that disadvantage. The Soviet air force seems to have been stabilized in the last few years to a figure of about 20,000 aircraft of which more than half are modern jet types. Perhaps half that number of aircraft are available under the command of the supreme allied commander of the European forces. The German contingent is limited to 1,350 aircraft of which I understand some 10 units are to be of tactical bombers and 4 units are to be fighters, while the other 2 units are to be made up of reconnaissance aircraft. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made a slip of the tongue this afternoon when he said they were all fighters.

The Russian navy comprises some 20 to 25 cruisers, 100 to 150 destroyers and at least 350 submarines. I think the navies of the west are at least as strong as that. However, with regard to this problem we are dealing particularly with armies and air forces.

There is little doubt that the Soviets have stockpiles of atomic and thermonuclear bombs. It is, however, by no means certain that the Russians would use those terrible weapons at the commencement of any aggressive action that they might plan; for there is no real defence against strategic forces armed with H-bombs. The western powers also have their long-range bombers widely distributed throughout more than 150 airfields in Europe and Africa, all within bombing range of the principal Russian cities and their principal centres of communications. Since both sides have many airfields from which their bombers, armed with H-bombs and A-bombs, might take off, I therefore suggest that it would be the wildest gamble for either side to count upon its ability to knock out or to neutralize the other's power to retaliate. A war fought with H-bombs could only result in mutual destruction of the nations concerned. Both sides may therefore hesitate to use the H-bomb, in much the same manner as both sides in world war II refrained from using poison gas.

The large Soviet forces with more or less conventional arms to which I have already referred, however, constitute a threat if we do not possess a deterrent; and I do not see how we can rely solely upon a weapon such as the H-bomb which quite possibly we might never dare to use. We are therefore obliged to provide ourselves with the means of defeating, with conventional arms, an attack by conventional arms as well as retaining the power to retaliate against thermonuclear attack. By maintaining powerful and conventional forces armed with modern weapons for use in the field, the NATO powers hope to deter the Soviet from using their armies.

We have been told over and over again that the west does not have sufficient manpower to provide an effective deterrent against the Russian armies without a contribution from Western Germany. Furthermore, if war broke out, whatever might be the final outcome Western Germany would be the first country to suffer. All the cities of the Ruhr are within range of rockets of the V-1 or V-2 type now in positions occupied by the Russians today. In short, western Europe and Great Britain cannot be defended without including in their defensive zone the territory of West Germany. It therefore surely makes sense for us to defend West German territory and to have that defence provided with rather than without the assistance of West German manpower.

A great many people from one end of Canada to the other are apprehensive, as I have already said, about rearming Germany and they have expressed great anxiety over the steps which are now being taken. Many fear that the German army, once formed, may get out of hand. These fears exist in West Germany itself. As has already been done by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), may I call attention to the safeguards which are included in this agreement. While EDC sought a complete surrender of national sovereignty to a supra-national organization and was rejected on that score, the new plan still demands a partial surrender of sovereignty by all western powers. The maximum size of the armies and air forces of all powers is laid down. For Germany, as we have already been told, the forces laid down are 12 divisions, 1,350 aircraft and a navy designed solely for coastal patrol. Only by unanimous vote of NATO can these forces be increased. Another safeguard is this. So far as is practical, these forces are to be interlocked. The degree of their integration is to be left to the supreme allied commander in Europe. But the important feature of that integration will be the allotment of German staff officers to the supreme headquarters so that those staff officers will be in constant touch with the thoughts, opinions and philosophy of the allied staff officers. I believe that a great responsibility will be placed upon the staff officers of the western powers, including Canada, who will be serving on that headquarters staff, to imbue the officers of the German general staff with the spirit of the proper position of an army in a democracy.

The forces will be allocated and deployed under instructions from the supreme allied commander. Once deployed they cannot have their positions changed or be redistributed by any national authority without the consent of the supreme allied commander. As has already been said this afternoon, Germany cannot manufacture in her own territory atomic, biological or chemical weapons, nor make certain other types of weapons, except on the recommendation of the supreme allied commander. He also has control of the supply of petrol and so forth, the so-called logistic support as described in the articles of the agreement.

NATO is also provided with the authority to conduct rigid inspections. But probably one of the best safeguards in keeping the German army within its proper sphere of activity is the feeling that exists among the people of West Germany themselves as to the relation of their army to the state. There is by no means a unanimous desire on the part of the Germans to make a contribution to the common effort. The main argument upon which this reluctance is based is not dissimilar to the fears held by many people outside of Germany and in this country. I think the first and foremost one is based upon the traditional position held by the German army in German politics during the past century. Hon. members who have read "The Nemesis of Power" by Mr. Wheeler-Bennett will realize the political influence which was in the past and might in the future be exercised by a German army on German foreign policy.

There is an old saying that Prussia was not a country with an army but an army which ran a country. The question which is now being asked both inside and outside of Germany is: Can a German democracy exist side by side with a German army? Under Kaiser Wilhelm II and under Hitler it could not. Nor could it exist under the regime of the Weimar republic. Under Kaiser Wilhelm and under Hitler no democracy existed in Germany. During the days of the Weimar republic the army, by the sheer strength of the personality of the army commander, dominated the foreign policy of that republic. The question asked is: Will conditions be different now? I am pleased to say that western statesmen believe that they will be.

In the first place, Germany today is divided. I think we hope, in exactly the same way as Germany aspires, that eventually some day, perhaps in the quite distant future, Germany once again will be united when it is possible for the German people to express their desire freely as to the type of government which they desire. However, Germany is divided today and we notice that the more warlike Prussian states and Pomerania are in East Germany. They are already armed. The more democratically-minded and peaceful peoples of Hanover, Schleswig-Holstein, Hesse, the Rhineland states and Bavaria form the great majority of the inhabitants of the federal republic.

Furthermore, Germany will have a democratic constitution at the same time as she will have an army based on compulsory military service. During the days of the Kaiser and of Hitler they had an army based on compulsory military service but they did not have a democratic government. The new German army will be a conscript army and it will be controlled by a parliament alive to the dangers of the political influence of the army in the past. It will be very close to the army because, as I have said, the army will be a conscript army drawn from the youth of the country in all walks of life.

If I may digress for a moment, I think it would be of interest for us to look at the personalities who are at present controlling or will in the near future control that army. At the head of the organization will be Theodor Blank, director of the federal German office of security and defence, which is similar to our Department of National Defence. Herr Blank very recently stated:

> The only man who can be entrusted with the defence of a system is the man who believes in it.

Thus, writes the special correspondent of the Manchester Guardian on Thursday, January 13, 1955, Herr Blank "has summed up his determination to make sure that the new German soldier should be regarded as a citizen in uniform." How very different that philosophy is to that of the old Prussian regime. Herr Blank has been appointed by Chancellor Adenauer to head the shadow ministry of defence in the federal republic of West Germany. He is a former trade union leader and is a member of the Christian Democratic party. The army officers who have been mentioned prominently in the German press as the most likely leaders of the West German army are first of all General Ludwig Cruewell, a Rhinelander, not a Prussian, who hails from the Ruhr valley. He was born at Dortmund in 1892. He was not a professional soldier. He was educated at the universities of Grenoble and Munich. In fact he had a comparatively short military career before he was captured in Africa on the 1st of June, 1942, and he remained as a prisoner of war until the end of the war. Press reports indicate that he will be the commanding general of the new German army.

The other name that is prominently mentioned, and is perhaps better known, is that of General Hans Speidel, who was chief of staff to Field Marshal Rommel in army group B. He is mentioned as being the chief of the German delegation to NATO. He is not a Prussian. He is a Wurttemberger, born in 1897. These men, as I have said, are not Prussians, nor did they at any time hold any blind unreasoning devotion to the nazi regime. In fact, Speidel risked his life to free Germany from nazi tyranny through his connections with Rommel and the revolt against Hitler. If the government of the federal republic therefore enforces its constitutional authority, the army will not be in a position to usurp that authority. There would seem little doubt in my mind that Herr Blank, who is responsible for the build-up of the German army, has any illusions on the dangers that exist.

I believe that here is a place in which Canada, the western powers, the Canadian officers and the officers of the western powers stationed in Germany have an important role to carry out. They could explain to the new German army the right position which any army occupies in the organization of any democratic state. Again, I feel it will depend on the attitude which is taken by the Deutschen Soldaten Bund, that is the German exservicemen's league. Will these men confine their activities, as the branches of our Canadian Legion do, to looking after the welfare of their old comrades or will they advocate the erection of some new military caste? These men have fought one or two wars, and many of them through both. I cannot believe that even our late enemies will want to see the creation of a military caste again.

On the other hand, as opposed to the possible attitude of these veterans, there is a strong element of pacifism existing in Germany today which is not likely to permit the new army to get out of hand. There are so many visible reminders in Germany, and I have seen them myself, of the price Germany paid that it is not surprising that strong elements of emotional pacifism exist in practically all social groups in Germany today. I should like to read a brief quotation from the special correspondent of the Manchester Guardian Weekly, which appeared under date of Thursday, January 13, of this year when he was discussing West German defence and democracy. He says:

> One favourable factor is the difference of outlook between young Germans and the older generation. Most observers would probably agree that the young Germans who have grown up during and since the destruction of the nazi regime present one of the most heartening features in the country. They are open-minded and are far more sensible and realistic than one had reason to expect. They are certainly not inclined to submit to indoctrination or to accept authority as blindly as their elders have done.

Therefore, in spite of all the powerful arguments which may be advanced against German rearmament, I feel forced to recognize the necessity for a German contribution towards western defence. As stated by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), with the other members in this party I will support the resolution which has been placed before us by the government. I have reached that decision, not with enthusiasm but as the choice of a lesser evil. I recognize the risks involved, not only to the free institutions of Western Germany itself, but also to the peace of the world, should the German army at some far distant date be in a position to make war contrary to the wishes of the North Atlantic powers. But I have to be realistic. I cannot see a force of 12 divisions launching an offensive against 100 Russian divisions. It does not make sense to me. I am not elated at the prospect of seeing this field grey army once again in existence. But if the participation of Germany in the western European union will make that system effective, I am prepared to accept the risks. I believe we all pray that there will be no war. Just because we offer prayers, however, we are not absolved from the responsibility of taking whatever action we can to ensure that there is no war.

In conclusion, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to give us a little more information regarding the precise position of the Canadian forces now in Europe. The United Kingdom, as is well known, has made a commitment of four divisions and their second tactical air force. She is also very heavily committed financially. Just what is the status of the Canadian brigade and the air division in Europe? The minister referred to it today, but we do know that for operational and training purposes heretofore the Canadian brigade has been under the command of the British commander on the Rhine. We are vitally interested in this problem. Any further explanation that he can give us regarding the system of command would be beneficial to the country.

We have heard of the increases and further commitments which have been made by the government of the United Kingdom. This afternoon the minister said he had given assurance that Canada would play her full part in the new defence organization. Is he satisfied that Canada is playing her full part in relation to what the other NATO powers are doing? While he has made no commitment to the other powers as to whether Canada is to give any guarantee that her forces will remain in Europe for any definite period or whether there is to be any increase in these forces, perhaps he would inform this house as to whether it is the intention of the government to make any further commitments in that respect.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In rising at this time, Mr. Speaker, I am deeply conscious of that sense of appreciation which I am sure is often felt by every member of this House of Commons. Differ though we may on major or minor issues—and we now have before us one of major importance—all of us are extremely grateful for the fact that we in this country are the proud possessors of free institutions including, in particular, this free parliament, where it is not only our right but our obligation to express our firm convictions. That, Mr. Speaker, is what other members taking part in this debate are doing, members from all sides of the house, and that is what I propose to do at this time.

As my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) indicated this afternoon I would do, I rise at this time to oppose the motion. I do so, Mr. Speaker, for three reasons. First of all, I shall register my opposition from a deep personal conviction. It is my judgment that the rearming of Western Germany at this time is a step we should not now be taking. My second reason for rising to express this opposition is that I am satisfied, as other members are—indeed as other members have said—that there are thousands of good, solid, patriotic Canadians —never mind the others—from one end of this country to the other who are concerned about this step. Indeed there are many who feel it should not be taken, and I believe their view should be expressed in this debate as early as possible.

I also take this position because, as my leader pointed out this afternoon, it is the position of the movement to which 24 of us in this house have the honour to belong. As my leader pointed out, at our national convention in August 1954 a decision was taken against the rearming of Western Germany at this time.

Further, as my leader pointed out in his address this afternoon, the matter was under very serious consideration at a meeting of our national council this past week-end. That meeting of course was held with the knowledge of the debate to be undertaken in the house this week; and the view of that council by majority vote was that we should oppose the rearmament of Western Germany at this time. And so I say it is for those three reasons I rise now to state my opposition to the motion presented to the house this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

All of us recognize, and that recognition has been stated by every member who has spoken, that this is a very difficult question—perhaps the most difficult one that most members in this present parliament have had to face. Everyone will agree that, at best, the proposal to rearm Western Germany at this time is a calculated risk fraught with very real danger. Indeed the Secretary of State for External Affairs said this afternoon that at best it had to be regarded as a tragic necessity.

A while ago the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick), in indicating that he would vote for the motion, said, if I heard him correctly, that he was sorry that he had to vote for it, but he felt from conviction that he had to do so. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes), who has just spoken, expressed similar sentiments.

In other words everyone recognizes that the risk being taken is fraught with danger. Those who support the taking of that risk feel that it has to be taken because of the menace of Soviet imperialism. Some of us feel that it is precisely because of that menace—and it is a menace—and that it is precisely because of the seriousness of the world situation at this time, and that it is precisely because the division of our world into two camps should not be pushed beyond the point of no return, that Western Germany should not now be rearmed.

I wish to say very clearly that I do not impute to any of those in the house who support this motion any militaristic or warmongering motives, and I abhor the fact that there are in this country those who do impute such motives. That is not the way to deal with an issue of this kind. There are too many members in the House of Commons who, themselves, have suffered at the hands of German militarism for anyone to think that there is any member in the house who likes the idea of putting arms back into the hands of Germans.

We in the House of Commons, and the people of this country from coast to coast, will never forget the names Dachau, Buchenwald and Belsen. We will never forget those six million Jews who were slaughtered during the Hitler regime in Germany, an awful blot not just on those who perpetrated such a crime but on our times. There is no doubt about it that no one, not even the most ardent advocate of the motion before us, wishes to put arms back into the hands of the Germans. Those who are making the decision to vote for the motion are doing so as a result of applying their best judgment to the problem, because they feel it is the best way out of a dilemma and the best solution of some of the most difficult problems now confronting the world.

By the same token I ask that no one say of anyone in any corner of the house who rises to oppose the motion that he is a communist stooge, that he is playing the communist game, either wittingly or unwittingly, or that he is trying to undermine the strength of the west, or that he is unwilling to take steps to bring Germany back into the family of nations. Thank God, Mr. Speaker, we have a parliament where we can discuss these issues on their merits.

I have been delighted at the level of debate thus far, even though I disagree with the conclusions reached. I have listened with deep respect to the arguments put forth and I rise confident that, though my position may be different from any that has been expressed thus far today, the same respect will be shown for my position which, as I say, I believe is shared by a great many people in this country.

What we are seeking to do is to bring to bear on the problem before us the results of our best judgment. It is my judgment that the position taken by the movement to which I belong, at its national convention and national council, is the correct one, and that we should not rearm Germany at this time.

Not only is the question in itself a difficult one, fraught as it is with memories and emotions, and all the rest of it, but it is a difficult and tangled question procedurally. So far as most of us are concerned, so far as the people of Canada who are watching this debate are concerned, this is a debate on German rearmament. The Secretary of State for External Affairs could point out that that is not the motion he has proposed, but that he is proposing a motion for the approval of a protocol admitting the Federal Republic of Germany to NATO.

He will readily admit of course that the rearmament of Germany is involved in the other agreements to which he referred this afternoon; so that in fact, tangled though it is, we do have involved in the proposition that is before us the fundamental question of German rearmament.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, if I may say so with deep respect, I think confused that issue this afternoon by having quite so much to say about the right of a free and democratic Germany to be brought into the western community. I agree with that and I want it to take place, but the difficulty that confronts us is that what we have before us is not just a motion that German sovereignty be restored; that Germany be brought into the orbit of the west. We are confronted with a multiple proposition, including some things that are good, but including this one element which some of us feel is exceedingly dangerous. Because of that one element, the proposal to agree now to the rearmament of Germany at this time, I for one cannot support the motion. My vote, Mr. Speaker, which will be against the motion presented to the house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will be a vote on my own behalf and on behalf, I believe, of many thousands of Canadians against rearming Germany at this time.

Since I have taken that position the obligation rests upon me to say why I think this step should not be taken, particularly in view of the well-thought-out arguments that have been presented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by others, including the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) who just preceded me with an analysis of the whole situation from a military point of view.

I think everyone will recognize that basically my reason—and I am sure that goes for others in the house who no doubt will join with me in opposing the motion—is that some of us have come to the conclusion that in view of the type of armaments that are available for modern warfare we simply cannot permit the world to go to war again. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich dares to hope that the hydrogen bomb is so terrible that it will not be used; therefore we must have conventional armaments upon which to rely. We all hope that is true, but I wonder whether in our heart of hearts any of us really believes that a third world war would go very long without the use not just of the now obsolete atomic bomb but of thermonuclear weapons. No, Mr. Speaker, I feel we have to start from that premise and somehow we must take the kind of steps which will make sure that war will not break out again.

I liked the challenge the Secretary of State for External Affairs threw out this afternoon —often when he makes speeches with the conclusions of which I do not agree I find that they nevertheless contain many sentences I enjoy, sentences that get quoted by those of us in this group—I liked the challenge he threw out when he suggested that it is up to us in this day and age to see that the tremendous forces and powers that are being given to us by science are used not for warfare but for welfare. It is no longer a dream, no longer something we must hope for. It has become a necessity for us to do so. If we use these things for welfare, we are blessed with a glorious future. If we use them for warfare there is no future.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, starting from that basic position that we must expect a third world war to result in the possible end of civilization, so that it is to be avoided if at all possible, I come to the immediate question as to whether or not Western Germany should be rearmed. I feel it should not be rearmed because by doing so we run a greater risk of war breaking out than would otherwise be the case. I see that greater risk in two ways. On the one hand, I frankly admit that I am afraid, as are a great many people, of what a rearmed Germany herself may do.

I congratulate those who devised the controls that are written into the agreements that are behind the motion before us. They are the most effective controls of that kind we have ever seen. I recognize the statements that have been made by others, that for the first time there is a Germany in which the political arm will be superior to the military. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not far enough away from what the Germans have done in two world wars to be sure the same military aggressiveness that broke through the controls, lesser though they were, which were set up after world war I, will not break through again. One thinks of the complications that arise because of the various ways in which changes can be made. Some things can be changed only by unanimous consent; some things can be changed only by a two-thirds majority, and some things can be changed by a simple majority. Some of the controls are simply guarantees based on the pledge of the present German chancellor, Dr. Adenauer. When one realizes that in all these things are certain economic compulsions, he realizes that those controls, strong though they are, well worked out though they are, can be broken through.

My leader this afternoon quoted that dispatch from Reuters concerning the Dornier organization which has already established a branch in Spain for the production of aircraft to get around the prohibition of manufacture of that type of aircraft in Germany itself. We know the ingenuity of these people. The fact of the matter is that though certain non-Prussians, as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said, may in the immediate future be in high positions in the German army, they will have to rely on men who had military experience in world war II. I suggest that there is very real danger that it will not be long until those same people will again be in charge of German troops, with all the compulsions, the compulsion particularly toward German unification, that are there. I need not drive home the point that the danger is very real.

As for German unification, I do not want to misquote the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I believe he said this afternoon that would of necessity or inevitably be a major factor in German policy, the desire to reunite the two parts of that country of so many millions of people. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because of these underlying compulsions, it is my fear, and the fear of a good many people, that we might find in the not far distant future we would ourselves be the pawns of the militarists who have been our enemies in two world wars. Remember that it will not be long under this arrangement until the German military people will be the largest single group in the European continental part of NATO. They will be newcomers. They are like the new members in the back row of this house; it does not take long for new members to get down to the front. It will not be long before this newcomer to the North Atlantic partnership will have a major voice because of its strength on the continent of Europe. I suggest we have to think very carefully before we agree to the arming of Germany at this time.

As I said earlier, and as my leader said this afternoon, those of us who take this view must not be regarded as opposed to the idea of bringing Germany back into the family of nations. I would go further than bringing her back into the western group; I look forward to the day when Germany might be able to take her place in the United Nations, and to the day when that organization might be enlarged to take in all the nations of the world. I know there are those who will say "There is a dreamer", but I submit that in the light of thermonuclear warfare the dreamers have become the realists. There is no future unless we get rid of war itself.

As I said earlier, the rearming of Western Germany would increase the danger of war rather than decrease it on two counts. My first point was that I would be afraid of what would be done by a rearmed Germany herself. My second point is that this step will increase the danger of war, because, if I may use the very language the minister used this afternoon in trying to set the argument aside, it is in the nature of an irrevocable step in the further division between east and west. I know that east and west are divided; I know that the Soviet union has played a major part in bringing about that division, not only in drawing the line of division but pushing it as far west as she can.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I know how obstinate the Soviet union has been; I know too that one must not think of West Germany as far as we are concerned as being any different in a military sense than the placing of arms in France or any other of the NATO countries. But let us face the fact that this has become a fetish; this has become a point which seems to the other side to be a case of our taking an offensive step.

There is no question, no matter what our philosophical views of war and peace may be, that we are in the kind of world where you have to be in the position to negotiate from strength. But there are two kinds of strength; there is not only military strength, but moral strength. As for military strength I listened with interest to the exposition made by the hon. member who preceded me as he made the point that from the military point of view we need the extra 12 divisions and extra German aircraft in order to achieve a balance. Suppose that takes place and that so-called balance is achieved. Is that the end of it or does the other side then decide it has to get more? Then where do we go from there? Is Spain next? I hope not. I hope there is some point where we will realize that we in the west not only need military strength but that we need moral strength.

I think that our moral strength is weakened if we at this time put arms into the hands of ex-nazis. I want the west to be strong. I accept the proposition, whether I like it or not, that in the world today we have to be in a position to negotiate from strength; but I think there comes a point where you will push that building of strength beyond the point of no return, where there is nothing left but an arms race which can have only one end, an explosion into a catastrophe that can mean the end of civilization.

I believe that in this world today we are playing for time. We need it terribly. There are things that we can do if we are given the time. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, as I have already suggested, referred to the tremendous forces being made available to us as science gets down to the power of the atom with its tremendous peacetime uses. If we had the time I think mankind could yet turn this world from one of recurring wars to one of permanent peace and human accord, with a high standard of living for mankind the world over.

I think we can yet achieve the dreams of the religionists and poets of days gone by, yes our own dreams and hopes, but we need time. Let me get specific rather than poetic. We need time to push the Colombo plan, and to push it a lot more than the Secretary of State for External Affairs is proposing that we push it by increasing our contribution by only a million dollars. We need time for tremendous advances on the economic front.

This afternoon the minister mentioned the need for solving the basic causes of war, for getting down to the roots of things. We need time for that. If we had the time I think we can do it. Given the time I think we can remove some of the causes of the world's ills. We can change the picture so that instead of two-thirds of the world's people going to bed hungry tonight, as they do every night of their lives, there might be some sharing of the food and good things that we can produce.

We need time for these things. My fear is that if we take the wrong step we may throw time away. We need time for further diplomatic efforts. This afternoon the minister said, in response to the suggestion that still further efforts should be made to get together with the Soviet union to solve the problem of Germany, that sixteen attempts had been made during the last several years. The inference was this: Is it fair to ask for another attempt to be made?

I would rather that we made 16 more attempts than go to war. Almost everybody who ever discusses the United Nations when some heated discussion is going on says that it is far better that they should be calling each other names and fighting with words than that we go into the catastrophe of a hot war.

I think we should continue the efforts to obtain the reunification of Germany even if it does mean multiplying the efforts and multiplying the attempts. I was going to say, multiplying them times without number.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested this afternoon that one of the cornerstones of German policy will be the reunification of that country. He talked about giving Germany sovereignty. Even this set of agreements does not give her complete sovereignty. So far as military matters are concerned she surrenders sovereignty in the same sense that France and other nations in the agreement do, but in addition she has no sovereignty over her relations with East Germany or in the making of peace with her enemies in the last war.

So the German problem is still there. It is not solved by the arrangements that are now suggested. I think the Ottawa Citizen is right in its editorials when it suggests that the possibility of negotiating the reunification of Germany after we have armed West Germany is not as good as it would be if we were not to take that step, which I am afraid is going beyond the point of no return.

So I urge in all seriousness and in all earnestness that the house give a great deal of consideration to this matter. It may be said, and said rightly, that whichever step we take we will really never know whether we are right or whether the other step should have been taken. Of course, if we take the wrong step, whichever one it is, and the result is a third world war with all its catastrophic consequences, it will be known that it was wrong only if there is anyone left to know it. Let us avoid that situation, Mr. Speaker. Let us use the time we have to push for the settlement of disputes along the lines outlined in the charter of the United Nations. Let us use the time we have to get the rest of the world into that world organization. Let us pursue our economic attacks on the problems connected with war. Let us try to remove the causes of war. We have time to do these things. Let us not throw away our opportunity by taking the wrong step.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I said that I rose to make these remarks particularly conscious of the great possession that is ours in this free parliament, in which we have not only the right but the obligation to express our convictions and what we believe to be the convictions of the people who sent us here. Having been able to make these remarks without some of the interruptions that I thought might come, I now want to express my appreciation of the respect that has been shown for my views by those hon. members who I know do not share them. I trust that the debate will go on in that vein and that we shall have discussion of this important question on the basis that it is our job to bring our best judgment to bear on this question.

As my leader said this afternoon, we in this group regret that in our attempt, as a group of 24 members, to bring our best judgment to bear on the question, we have not all come out with the same conclusion. Regret that fact though we may, I think I can say for my leader as well as for myself that we are proud of the fact that, so far as our party is concerned, we feel that it is our right and our duty to express our personal convictions on this issue and to vote on the motion in the way that each of us feels is best for the future of this country and best for the future of mankind. I hope that members in all other parties will do the same.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I know of nothing more tormenting or more difficult than the clash between a man's emotions and his urge for rationalization. In the one case he is prone to deal with a problem in response to his feelings, his passions and his conscience and in the other he faces it with an almost precise mathematical calculation based on logic and pure reason.

Men in all of the democratic countries of the world in recent months have been pondering over and are today struggling with precisely this dilemma. By the measure now before the house hon. members are also called upon to face it. I feel that each one of us should seek a solution not only by such processes as those with which the Almighty has endowed us but also with a most solemn prayer that Divine guidance will lead us to a conclusion that may be in the best interests of all mankind.

As one of the beacons for guidance in my difficulty, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a phrase frequently used by our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). In describing the consideration to be given to a piece of legislation, he always urges us to follow what I consider to be a most democratic precept, namely that we must constantly seek the greatest good for the greatest number. That is a brief quotation but to me it is a profound and soul-searching guide in considering this extremely difficult problem. I interpret this to mean that individuals should yield their personal considerations for the benefit of their ethnic groups; ethnic groups should yield their own motivations for the benefit of their country; and countries should yield their particular viewpoints for the benefit of the world. If yielding in all these cases should be necessary to obtain the greatest good for the greatest number by approving this resolution, I find myself as an individual, as a member of an ethnic group and as a citizen of this great country in that very dutiful position.

It is perfectly true that almost four years ago on the floor of this house I took a forthright position against arming nazis. My views are on record. At that time I stated that history is replete with Teutonic bellicose activities. In our own lifetime we have seen what Germans will do with arms. We remember 1870, 1914 and 1939. They had arms but they shamefully abused them. I then also cautioned that there is no love in German hearts for France, England or America who humbled into submission their abuse of military power. I then believed and I still believe that, hungering for revenge, Germans might use our own weapons against us at the first opportunity they had.

It will consequently, no doubt, be a bitter pill for thousands of Canadian families who suffered at German hands to acquiesce in arming those same Germans. We can also well imagine that individuals, ethnic groups and countries that were virtually devastated by the German military machine may likewise be writhing in anguish as they contemplate rebuilding this military machine once more. In order therefore to give full and careful consideration to this painful problem, Mr. Speaker, we cannot—we must not—forget, especially at this solemn moment, that we are being asked to ally ourselves with and to help arm a country that has been proven guilty of the most heartless atrocities in human history.

Less than a month ago, while in Rome, I was taken to a martyr's shrine and, in a single mausoleum, I saw 374 sealed coffins of innocent men, women and children who were forcefully taken off the streets of Rome at random and shot in reprisal for the death of three SS troops.

On December 21, 1954, in the Ottawa Citizen Mr. Jack Scott painfully describes a similar incident in the Ardennes forest in France. History will ever remember the atrocity of Lidice, the inhuman nazi laws enacted, not under the pressure of war conditions, but in cool, premeditated and calculated wickedness: sheer inhuman wickedness, unequalled in the history of our civilization.

I do not want to inflict upon the house the details of some of these laws that reduced intellectual giants—men who made great contributions to twentieth century civilization and fine human beings—to the level of ordinary animals, and then destroyed them. Nor can we ever forget, Mr. Speaker, that these are the people who constructed gas chambers and crematoria in which they wantonly murdered 14 million innocent people.

All this, Mr. Speaker, briefly summarizes one side of the dilemma. This sad picture, as it did in 1951 when I addressed the house on this question, could lead us to the conclusion that it may be dangerous to place weapons of warfare in German hands once more. Many of the leaders of the democratic countries at the time thought likewise, but they have since then modified their views. What intervened? Do they now see a danger to the peace of the world that is greater than the danger of rearming Germany? Apparently they do, because they now sound a clarion call to the peoples of the western world to rally and to unite to help ward off a third world war.

These leaders are, no doubt, fully mindful of the inherent dangers in arming Germany, but in their wisdom, to avoid an even greater danger, they are prepared to take what they call a calculated risk. They believe that a united show of strength will help prevent a world disaster. Mr. Dulles, the United States secretary of state, summarized the situation in a recent statement when he said:

"The need for western European unity coincides with the new danger born out of the expansionist policies of Soviet Russia, inspired by the world-wide ambitions of communism and backed by a Red military establishment.

From this and from the information that constantly reaches us it becomes more apparent from day to day that the determination of the Soviets to communize the world by fair or foul means is like a hydra-headed dragon which unexpectedly emerges in various parts of our troubled world and there sinks its fangs and spreads its poison. If, Mr. Speaker, this constitutes the greater danger to world peace it must be stopped regardless of any emotional revulsion which most of us feel at the thought of having to arm a people known to misuse military might. As a consequence we are certainly placed squarely on the horns of a most painful dilemma and it compels us in making a decision either way, to arm or not to arm, to take a calculated risk.

We are primarily all concerned with averting another world war because we fear the horrifying consequences to the entire world. Therefore, and I again quote our own Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent):

We have to take those risks that seem to offer greater advantages over those that offer the lesser advantages for averting another world war.

I as an individual, and each one of the hon. members of this house also as individuals, have to make a choice between the lesser of the two evils which, for the purposes of more clearly understanding them, I should like to compare in the following way. We are facing two diseases which are menacing to mankind. The fear and the danger of arming Germany is one unhealthy condition. The war-threatening expansion of communism is the other. I consider the German disease as one which I think can be more easily curbed and arrested. With proper safeguards it is not likely to get out of hand again. The Germans tried it in 1914 and they tried it again in 1939. The back of the disease was broken on both occasions, and I doubt whether they will ever try it again. I do not think the disease is fully cured by any means but I do think that it is restrained and can now be controlled.

The other disease of Russian origin is to me not unlike a creeping paralysis or, in some cases, even like a galloping consumption, the virus of which is slowly penetrating into every corner of the globe. That disease, unfortunately, is not so easily checked, nor can it be so easily controlled. This creeping paralysis has crawled into China, Korea, Indo-China, a great section of Europe and has even split two major European capital cities, Berlin and Vienna. It is now penetrating by innocuous manoeuvres into Africa and Central and South America, and thus slowly it attempts to paralyse the whole of the democratic way of life. This disease is, consequently, to me far more dangerous than the German disease, and it is to cure, arrest and control it that every conceivable effort of man should be directed. If, therefore, in the wisdom of the democratic leaders, a third world war could be averted by stemming the advance of this cancerous paralysis and if this can be achieved by building an antidote in the form of a defensive force, it becomes a powerful consideration in helping me reach a decision.

Another consideration that influences the decision I reach, Mr. Speaker, stems from the fact that I recall the boundless hate of communism frequently expressed by the late President Roosevelt and the even more forthright assaults on communism constantly made by Sir Winston Churchill. Yet, when their feelings, conscience and emotions clashed with the stark realism of winning world war II, they selected what they thought was then the lesser of two evils and allied themselves with Russia. Their cold and calculated reasoning and rationalization subdued their emotional and idealistic hate of communism. History confirmed their judgment and proved them right.

Today history repeats itself. Democratic leadership again faces a Hobson's choice and has already declared itself as to the greater of the two evils. We are warned that the expansion of communism is a greater menace to world peace than our union with a militarized Germany. Our leaders correctly calculated their risk over ten years ago and they most certainly deserve now not only our confidence that they again correctly calculate the risk but, moreover, they merit our every support in their efforts to avert a catastrophic war.

Their judgment is abundantly supported, amongst other things, by the experience we had with the pressure groups that invaded Ottawa last week to lobby members of the house to vote against the resolution now under consideration. This hypocritical march on parliament helped me to decide to vote for the resolution rather than against it. There were some six delegations consisting of about 50 people who visited my office. I personally was unable to receive them but my secretary gave me their names and their propaganda. While there might have been amongst them a number of citizens who were there in good faith, as the minister stated, the delegations to my knowledge did not include a single person of authority or responsibility. What I did find, however, was that the spokesmen were notorious leaders of communism and communist propaganda. These are the same men who have consistently over the years followed the Moscow line and who are known to be violent, active and unscrupulous agitators for communism. They have previously headed countless delegations to pressure members on a multitude of issues, but all of them pivoting around what would please the Kremlin rather than what is important or basic to the welfare of Canada, its people and the democracies.

The literature they have left convinced me that their concern was more for world communism than for world peace. They made me wary of the classical enjoinder to fear the gifts that the Greeks bring. Their presentation lacked sincerity and was altogether too colourful for me or anyone else to be impressed by their recommendations. It would be folly to be guided by their concern in the matter. Have these selfsame communists who invaded Ottawa ever raised a protest during the past three years, during which time they knew that Russia was arming East Germany to the teeth? Have they condemned the Kremlin by protest meetings, petitions, delegations, and telegrams for the alliance between the Russians and the eastern section of Germany? Are not the Germans in the east the very same type of Germans as in the west? Would it then be healthier, Mr. Speaker, for the preservation of peace to have a strongly armed East Germany and a completely unarmed and defenceless West Germany? This would bring Russian military might to the borders of France. Is that what they would like to see?

What would these selfsame communists do if they were to hear that Western Germany is entering an alliance with Russia and that Russia is arming Germans in the west with every conceivable form of weapon and instrument of destruction? That would certainly please them and I am sure that we would not hear from the infamous peace congress a whimper of protest against Russia for doing exactly what the democracies are now planning to do. To them, what is sauce for the goose is obviously not sauce for the gander.

How stupid and how inconsistent is their position! How effective a case indeed they clearly make out for the approval of the measure before the house! Their vociferous protests and anxiety convince anyone who may be in doubt, and who may be torn between his emotions and his reason, to promptly realize how fatal it would be to follow Moscow's desire in this matter. They help, therefore, provide the answer to the dilemma in which many of us find ourselves.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge there was not, in all the delegations that came to my office, a single person in a position of responsible leadership. I thought it my duty, however, to seek guidance and I carefully canvassed the opinions of the recognized leaders in my own ethnic group across Canada. Nowhere in this responsible leadership was there an opinion other than to uphold the position of our government in its all out effort to halt the advance of communism. But at the same time we should like to caution our government and the democratic leaders of the world that this alliance should not be made without the greatest measure of controls, and safeguards being provided against any possible abuse of the weapons placed in German hands.

In order to achieve this, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call on the government to make certain that, in addition to the safeguards contained in the protocol, there should be further provision that the new German republic should be bound by the genocide pact and the human rights charter under the United Nations Organization. In this way inhuman or discriminatory laws enacted by the republic could be brought before the tribunal of the world, where they could be declared illegal and expunged from the statutes.

We recall, during the Hitler regime, the cries from world Jewish leadership to the democracies that inhuman laws were being enacted and implemented in Germany. The world remained silent. This silence encouraged the horrible legislative process of exterminating millions of innocent people. Under international law, very little else could then have been done. There could be no interference in the domestic affairs of a sovereign state. What a tragic situation that was!

Under the ties presently being established between the NATO countries safeguards must be taken against a possible repetition of such a condition. I should, therefore, like to see either enactments or obligations contractually undertaken that would make it possible to bring before the world tribunal for examination any doubtful law enacted by any member state. The international tribunal could then, if it so found, declare it a contravention of human rights and therefore illegal and inoperative.

With Germany as a member of the family of nations, she would be bound to abide by the decisions of this world tribunal, and could never again enact inhuman or discriminatory laws. She would likewise be obliged to observe and respect the four freedoms, as well as the contractual obligations she will undertake concerning the limitation of her armanments as set forth in the protocol now before us.

With regard to the sure and careful control of German arms and munitions, as set forth in this protocol, I have every confidence that our military experts have provided adequate safeguards. But more important even than contractual arrangements, in my opinion, will be the assured maintenance of a strong allied land force on the European continent. This will be the best guarantee that the German army is not left free to run havoc with its own resourcefulness. Any complete autonomy given Germany should, therefore, only be agreed to with the proposed limitation of German arms. On that issue I agree completely with the people of France.

In other words, complete autonomy can cover everything with the exception of autonomous control of its army, air force and navy, as well as the extent of its armaments, all of which should remain constantly under the supervision of the western powers in conformity with the terms of the protocol.

Germany should not hesitate to yield to the western powers the fullest long-range guarantees to ensure against a resurgence of her militarism. In fact, Germany should not object to anything that will give the utmost confidence to her allies that she will comply with her obligations. This will also show that she consents to be placed in a position where she will not be able to use her armaments for her own military adventures, either now or in the future, if a changed leadership in Germany should at any time have such notions.

This procedure would also show a measure of atonement for the shameful performance in the past, and would be a genuine earnest of her humility in asking to be admitted to the family of nations once more.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that all my colleagues in the house will bear with me if they find that I have spoken with some emotion on this subject. If I did so, it is perhaps due to the fact that, to a greater extent than anyone else in the house possibly, I have personally been a victim of nazi cruelty. My rather distressed feelings result not only from the fact that I belong to that ethnic group which suffered most, but also because my own uncles, aunts and cousins, consisting of a family of over 60 persons, were tormented and put to death by the nazis. Hon. members I am sure can therefore appreciate that notwithstanding the over-all record of nazi cruelty and my own personal grief, I am still led to the conclusion to vote in favour of this resolution, I do so only because, to paraphrase a Shakespearean line:

Not that I dislike Berlin less,
But because I fear Moscow more.

By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one more personal remark, and it is this: as I stand here before my colleagues on the floor of this house, and as one of the spokesmen of my ethnic group, I most solemnly declare that I vote for the resolution, but not without a deep ache in my heart caused by my grave doubts, apprehensions and misgivings; and I therefore accompany my vote with a most fervent prayer that, in the wisdom of Him who guides the destiny of us all, this vote may be for the betterment of all mankind.

On motion of Miss Aitken the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Rowe: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this debate tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 21, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the first report of the special committee appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house, presented Thursday, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—ADJUSTMENT OF END SELLING PRICE AND DOWN PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation recently taken steps to adjust the end selling price and down payment of homes built under the National Housing Act, as reported in the Hamilton Spectator of Wednesday, January 19?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has the end sale prices of N.H.A. houses under continuous study and this recent adjustment is the result of a review just concluded. It is related to current building costs.

REDISTRIBUTION

REQUEST FOR STUDY BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): I should like to answer a question asked two days ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. His question to me, as found in Hansard of Wednesday, January 19, page 331, reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has he been made aware of the steps being taken in my province of Manitoba to set up an independent commission for the redistribution of provincial electoral constituencies? In view of a motion on this subject that was passed by the house last year, will the government consider arranging for a committee of the house to study that matter at this session so far as federal constituencies are concerned?

To the first part of the question I would say that no information has been received either by the Department of the Secretary of State or by the chief electoral officer; in so far as I am concerned the only information I have received is through the newspaper report which my hon. friend was good enough to send me the other day. In so far as the second part of the question is concerned, I wish to state that this matter has been under serious consideration for some time and no decision has been arrived at yet.

GRAIN

REPORTED DECREASE IN WHEAT SHIPMENTS BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the latest crop report and having to do with the sale of wheat. Why is it that in the first four months of the current crop year Canada's shipments of wheat abroad have dropped compared with increases on the part of the other three great producing countries? Why is it that Canada's share of the over-all market has dropped while the share of three other countries has increased?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The facts as stated by my hon. friend are not true. The reason shipments dropped—

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are right in the records.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They may be in the records, but my hon. friend is looking at shipments rather than sales. The reason shipments dropped is that there was no carry-over of sales as there was in the previous year, but I can tell him that sales this year are ahead of this time in any of the last several years. It is really the sales that count. Eventually that wheat moves, and we look for a good year in wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what that record shows.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

SYNCHRONIZATION OF ELECTRIC CLOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works if he thinks his department will eventually be able to get the electrical clocks around the building back into operation and synchronized and, if so, when he thinks that might be done.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): At the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Fulton: I believe I am correct in understanding that the hon. gentleman is a most highly qualified electrical engineer. Could he, therefore, perhaps take the matter under his personal supervision?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

EXPROPRIATION OF PROPERTIES HELD UNDER VETERANS LAND ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The province of British Columbia is expropriating land for the southern terminal of the Oak street bridge in Richmond, British Columbia. Some of the land is held by veterans under the Veterans Land Act. Will the minister make an investigation to assure those veterans that they are afforded full protection by the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): I thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond for giving me notice of his question. As a matter of policy, the director of the Veterans Land Act endeavours to co-operate with municipal and provincial governments in cases where land, the title to which is held by the director but which is under agreement for sale to a veteran, is required for public purposes, always assuring, however, that the interests of the veteran settlers are fully protected and that the price is fair. Any veteran whose property is required for such purposes, should he so desire, is assisted in obtaining a continued establishment on another suitable property. The time in which the veteran earns his conditional grant continues to run from the date of his original establishment. In the case of the Oak street bridge terminal, about 12 veteran settlers are affected. These have already been told to seek the advice of the Veterans Land Act appraisal staff before agreeing to any offer made to them.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF RECONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works which he may take as notice. When is the parliamentary library going to be ready for use?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): There is still a considerable amount of work to be done on it, but I will take the question as notice and endeavour to give a target date in a few days.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL ON ACCESSION OF FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this house do approve the same.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, so far in this debate we have been listening to the experts. We have had experts speak on the political, military, security and defence phases of rearming Germany. We have listened to one hon. member tell us why he is opposed to rearmament. I think that at least on one thing we are unanimous in this house, and that is, this is one of the most difficult problems we have had to face. Certainly, it is the most difficult problem we have had to face since I came into the House of Commons. I am sure that is true for everyone in this house.

Having listened to the experts, I want to say something about the more human aspects of this problem and what I believe is going on in the minds and hearts of the Canadian people. It seems strange indeed that we should be asked to deliver arms on a silver platter to a people who were our bitter enemies ten short years ago. I believe that instinctively most of us would like to vote in the negative because our memories are not that short. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has explained why he is voting against the rearmament of Germany. We all listened carefully and I do not think we ever doubted his sincerity. But, Mr. Speaker, he left us with the scales unbalanced. He highlighted the dangers of the rearmament of Germany, but he did not highlight the dangers of the alternatives.

What are the alternatives? During the past month I have received scores of letters asking me to vote against the rearmament of Germany. I have seen almost as many delegations. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I can say that I have not refused to see any person or persons who had opinions on this subject. Even when I knew they were communist-inspired delegations or letters, I saw them and I read them. It seemed to me this was no time for one's personal prejudices. Many of those who came to see me were not communists, but loyal, patriotic and worried Canadians. On this same subject of rearming Germany one hon. member in the British House of Commons said foreign affairs is a choice of difficulties. No truer words were ever spoken. Our choice is a Russia armed to the hilt on one side and on our side an unarmed vacuum in the middle of our own defences.

When I have asked the people who came to see me and to ask me to vote in the negative what the alternative would be, they have said, negotiate and keep on negotiating. They have said, better 1,000 years of negotiating than one day of war. As the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said yesterday, the allied foreign ministers have already held 352 meetings with Russia over the Austrian peace treaty. We are no nearer settlement than we were 352 meetings ago. I say, by all means let us keep on negotiating, but not through fear. Let us negotiate in equality.

In arming Germany we are not, as I see it, obliterating our chances of negotiating. In fact, I believe we are actually broadening the avenue towards peace. There are no more realistic people in the world today than the Russian leaders. They know, as we know, that it is better to bargain and negotiate through strength than through weakness. I believe nothing proved this more conclusively than the Berlin airlift. When the Russians blockaded our lines to Berlin the ingenuity and imagination of men was enlisted to overcome the blockade. Brains, not guns, were used. There was no war. As soon as the Russians realized that they were beaten at their own game, they capitulated.

No, Mr. Speaker, I have come to appreciate that you cannot bargain or negotiate in weakness. But it does seem to me that the government has been woefully remiss in explaining to the Canadian people why Germany should be rearmed. In foreign affairs, this government seems to adopt a very patronizing attitude, a sort of papa knows best attitude; a children should be seen but not heard attitude. Perhaps that was all right when our voice did not amount to much in foreign affairs, but today it does count and no one man or group of men should take it upon themselves to make these decisions without consulting parliament.

An articulate politician in the United States in the person of Mr. Adlai Stevenson once wrote:

> Unless the great political parties and their spokesmen assume responsibility for educating and guiding the people with constant candor, how can we be sure that majority rule will meet the test of these searching times.

I feel that this government has not assumed any responsibility for educating and guiding the people on this very complex problem.

There has been much talk in the house about an unarmed Germany being a dangerous vacuum in Europe. Yesterday the minister said that we of the democracies abhor vacuums while the Russians step into them. That is exactly what has happened in Canada between October and January. The government allowed a vacuum of ignorance to emerge. The communists filled that vacuum with the fears and natural apprehensions of the Canadian people. For one thing, the fellow travellers of communism have been playing hard on the fact Germany will be in the atom bomb race. Until yesterday the government did nothing to explain exactly where the atom bomb came into this picture. Until yesterday the government did nothing to reassure Canadians as to the safeguards that are being devised. Until yesterday the government did nothing about the elaborate system of arms control that the allied powers planned.

Is it any wonder the Canadian people are confused, apprehensive—yes, and fearful of what this parliament is doing. Those Canadians who look with favour upon the communist line have been quick to seize upon a Gallup poll which was taken on November 24, 1954. Their interpretation of this poll is that 61·6 per cent of the Canadian people oppose a new German army. That is not the true picture, Mr. Speaker. I believe it is the fault of the government and not of the people or of the poll that it is not a true picture.

I believe that any one of us, if we had been asked such questions without any background knowledge, with no explanation, no ramifications, would have said no, too. The government has made no effort, despite the millions spent on publicity and public relations bureaux, to inform the people. The first question in this particular poll was, can you tell me what the initials EDC stand for? Only one in five Canadians knew the answer. There were 74 per cent who could not answer at all. The next question was, if Germany were allowed to have her own army, do you think it would be a step towards peace or away from peace? There were 43 per cent who said it would be a step away from peace and 27 per cent said towards peace. There were 26 per cent who had no opinion whatever.

In summing up, the Gallup poll itself has this to say:

> If it had been practical to include the fine shadings of the control question, results might have been different.

I question the word "practical". I do not think anyone knew the fine shadings of the control question in order to ask it, and certainly they did not know the answers. So there is a vacuum that this government has allowed to emerge between October and January.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for the inclusion of Germany in NATO—not because I like it but because, after a great deal of honest study and much soul-searching, I believe it is the only alternative. I believe it is the safest step for peace. I believe it is the practical rather than the sentimental step toward a sane and civilized world.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we have been presented with what is apparently, on the face of it, an innocuous resolution, and we have to give a decision on it. But I suggest that this innocuous resolution is more like a package deal than anything else—and I am supremely suspicious of package deals. Because while this resolution deals only with the admission of Germany to NATO, there is not one member in the house who does not realize that what lies behind it, unsaid and unwritten, is the rearmament of Germany. And there is not a member in the house who has yet spoken, either for or against the motion, who has not expressed his fear of it.

We have been told that we are faced with a calculated risk, and that is true. Most of our policies in external affairs must be calculated risks. But a calculated risk can be either a success or an uncalculated disaster. There is not one of us who does not hope that the net result of this agreement will mean success, for the sake of the peoples of the world; but there are many of us who fear that, unhappily, the outcome may be uncalculated disaster.

This is not the first package deal we have had in parliament. We had one some years ago when NATO was presented. I supported NATO then for reasons which at the time I considered adequate and which, in retrospect, I still consider adequate. To some substantial extent the western world had disarmed after the war. But we saw what happened in Czechoslovakia; we saw what happened to Poland; we saw the encroachment of international communism, and for our own sakes it was essential that a line be drawn. But in diplomacy you can only draw a line when you have guns behind it, and that line is only as strong as the calibre of the guns.

And so I supported rearmament because it was put before us—and rightly so at that time—as something which was urgent, imperative and for our own well-being. But there was also something else in that package deal; and I supported NATO as much for article 2 as I did for the rearming of this group of allies.

Article 2 is the article which promised us some hope of economic and political co-operation on the Atlantic. I remember my friend, who was then the hon. member for Vancouver East and is now the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), saying back in 1947 that there was going to be no safety for the world in an arms race, or in military alliances, but that the solution had to be achieved in another area, which was the area of economic co-operation. Apparently the government of the day believed that. They went to Washington, and Canada achieved some prestige throughout the world because of this article 2, which was presented by Canada and which is known as the Canadian article.

Yesterday, dealing with aspects of NATO other than military, the minister said that NATO is potentially more than a military alliance. I thought so, too, Mr. Speaker. But how potential is "potential"? When are we going to get some results? When are we going to get some action?

The minister said that we are seeking to develop a North Atlantic community. I would like to see a North Atlantic community; but what practical proposal is this government going to make to develop that sort of community? I may be told, "Oh, we are making private protestations". I am not remotely interested in private protestations. I want public declarations of policy so that I know where the government stands in respect of its own child, article 2 of NATO.

We said—and I believe there are many who agreed with me—that if NATO was going to be strong defensively it had to be strong economically. We have iterated and reiterated this at wearisome length throughout the years, and our warnings have been valid, even though they have been ignored.

In 1949 the government were all for article 2; they were proud of article 2. But through the intervening years, down to the present, there has been a weary shuffling back on the road from Damascus. There has been nothing done, so far as any significant effort is concerned, to achieve what we want. And one of the troubles today, not only in this House of Commons but in the western world, is that we are facing the problems of 1955 with minds which still dwell in the years before 1939. There has to be a shaking up in our thinking.

Some six or seven years ago the government saw the necessity for economic co-operation, because fear was in the hearts of the people. The government saw the light, but now that light is spluttering to ignoble extinction. It is not good enough.

Article 2, the creature of this government, up to the present has been a lamentable failure, and the government must take the responsibility for it. For we were in a position to give leadership. It is not too late to give that leadership, but if we fail to do so the failure will be a suicidal failure.

I have been told that there is no alternative to the calculated risk set before us. I do not believe it; I simply do not believe it. There is one, but we have never tried it out —for what reason, heaven knows. Whether we lack determination or vision I do not know; but I do know we have not tried out the alternative.

Yesterday the minister said there are certain courses which we can pursue. He said that we could keep Germany disarmed and neutralized. That is a policy which I exclude immediately. I do not say it is not possible, but I say it would be unutterably stupid to pursue such a policy, because the net result could only be that the Germans would be left so embittered and vengeful that war would be inevitable.

The minister said that, as a policy, we could do nothing, and hope that something would turn up. I repudiate that policy for reasons I have given before, the chief reason being that it is impracticable.

The minister suggested as another policy that we could give Germany back her sovereignty, without any conditions attached. I reject that, because it solves no problem and would not solve the problem before us in this house today.

Now we have been presented with another solution which the government itself accepts. We have been invited to vote to bring a rearmed, sovereign Germany into NATO. This is an invitation I decline, for the basic policy which the government has been pursuing in the last few years is wrong.

There is another policy, that of putting the horse before the cart. If I may digress for a moment, hon. members in this house realize as well as I do that throughout this country the concept of the Colombo plan has received acclaim, and is popular throughout the nation.

On the other hand, NATO is regarded with apathy. On the Colombo plan we are going to spend this year the niggardly miserly sum of $26 million, but because the people know that this is something positive and affirmative and something which will help the world, they are prepared to go for it in an infinitely greater measure than the government apparently believes; yet on NATO, if we include capital expenditures, we may spend $1,000 million this year. There is nothing but apathy and, in some areas, dislike. Who is to say that the instinct and the judgment of the Canadian people are wrong because they feel with justification that NATO is nothing more than a military alliance? NATO is something vastly different from that which we envisaged and that is why we feel that our hopes have been betrayed. There is a lesson to be learned from this.

But let me ask this question. Why must we always restrict our calculated risks to the area of defence? This is the only field in which we have done it up to the present. Is it not possible that, for the sake of all concerned, we should take a calculated risk in the field of economics? We have agreed that it is essential to our security that our allies be economically strong because only if they are economically strong can our defence be strong. That follows, I suggest, as day follows night, and yet there has been so pitifully little done by this government to make our allies as economically strong as I should like to see them, and therefore there is a possibility that our defence will be correspondingly weakened.

Obviously the more prosperous nations are the more they are able to share their prosperity with those who are less fortunate, and the more secure we all shall be. Prosperity is indivisible. But a lead has been given, of which this government is aware, by a most distinguished American who, in his wisdom, saw what ought to be done. He who is now the President of the United States said a few years ago, as commander in chief of NATO, that before we embark on German rearmament the first thing we must try to achieve is the economic and political integration of Germany with the rest of Europe. That is the course we should be pursuing, but the government has put the cart before the horse. Arms must come first. I say that policy is wrong. I say that economic co-operation with political integration must come before we do the other, if we desire security.

If article 2 has the validity which I, with faint hopes, still think it has, it is the duty and responsibility of this government to lead, to take a calculated risk in the field of economics, and I offer a suggestion. I today am speaking for myself and none other. What I say commits nobody and no other; but I offer this suggestion. If we are serious in this business of economic co-operation, we should suggest to our allies that, on a reciprocal basis over the next ten years, we are prepared to reduce our tariffs and barriers to trade 10 per cent a year. And I argue that, as a result of the enlarged markets which would ensue, all of us would be much better off than we had ever dreamed possible. Prosperity would become more of a reality than certainly it is now.

There is a risk. Certainly there is a risk, but it is a risk which would capture and hold the imagination not only of our people but of all those who are our allies and friends in Europe. It is an offer which would win acclaim, perhaps as great as Churchill's, when in the darkest days of the war he made that offer to France of which this house knows. There are those of you who may say that this suggestion is fantastically impossible. Mr. Speaker, there was nothing more impossible than that a member of this parliament should have risen in his place in this house a decade ago and said that we were going to rearm Germany within ten years. That was the impossibility of impossibilities, but it has happened. I question very much the validity of impossibility in politics anyway. As for it being fantastic, is there anything more fantastic than the threat of destruction by thermonuclear energy?

There is nothing impossible about the suggestion if we mean business. We pursue that course and we give hope to millions, we give leadership to those who are desperately seeking leadership. Unfortunately we have not yet been able to break away from the bonds of our own national sovereignties.

The government apparently prefers the calculated risk of rearming Germany before insisting on the economic and political integration of which I spoke. It may be said that I am arguing for a European community. I am not, because I do not think a European community in itself is viable. I am arguing that we must work with Europe. Whether we like it or not, we are ineluctably bound up with Europe, so we ought to realize what the future may have in store for us.

Let me ask another question. Why is there this speed in rearming Germany? We have been told on all hands by those who are in a position to know that the international situation is such, that tension has so decreased, that we can perhaps feel a little more secure than has been the case during the last few years. Yet we intend to rearm Germany.

Now, I have no illusions about Soviet policy. We have to safeguard ourselves against the effects of Soviet policy, but I assume the same calculations are in the minds of those who say that the situation today is somewhat less tense than has been the case for some years. But why the hurry? Why the need for another 12 divisions when there are proposals before the United States congress now that there be a reduction in American forces between 300,000 and 700,000 men. Is it the idea that those 12 divisions will take the place of those Americans who will now return to their homes? Why this hurry, if other NATO nations feel that the international situation has sufficiently improved for them to reduce their own commitments? Why then the addition of another 12 divisions in Germany?

I have no means of knowing that this is so, but I read newspapers like other hon. members and I have read speculations on what happened in the last NATO meeting, where apparently those who in responsible positions suggested that the goal set in Lisbon two or three years ago was too high; that we do not need today the same level of conventional arms; and that therefore perhaps we could lower that level. If that is so, why do we ask Germany to rearm itself with conventional arms and throw another 12 divisions into the military kitty? The answer may be—this again is supposition—that the NATO staff may have decided if there is going to be another war atomic weapons will be used but merely in a tactical sense. I hope that is not true. I cannot believe it, because if they are used in a tactical sense, they are going to be used in a strategic sense. Once atomic weapons are used, thermonuclear weapons will be used, and the fields of the earth will be white with the ashes of humanity.

One can always argue, of course, that if there is going to be a war we have nothing to worry about, for if thermonuclear weapons are to be used we shall not be here to do any worrying. Why the hurry then to have these 12 German divisions, if the situation is obviously better than it has been for some years?

The answer is American pressure. In 1950 the American chiefs of staff decided that Germany was going to be rearmed. In the fall of 1950 the NATO ministers agreed that such would be the case; and because of this, and the pusillanimity among the western allies in refusing to stand up to the United States, we now have this problem before us. Let me quote from a journal which I am certain must be the bible of all Liberals the world over, the Manchester Guardian, in its issue of September 23, which had this to say:

> About EDC Americans really ought to realize that it was an expedient hastily devised because the United States blackmailed its European allies in 1950.

That is why we are faced with this problem today. There is no military need for this haste, but there is imperative need for haste in the field of economic and political co-operation and that is the one area in which we have seen none. It may be argued that Europe has failed. That could be so, but I suggest that whether it has failed or not the government owes it to its own people to try once again to make economic co-operation a reality.

We are being asked to rearm Germany. We cannot be blamed if our minds sometimes dwell on history. We cannot be blamed if we have doubts that history has perhaps outlived itself. I am not one of those who would suggest for a moment that the German people are inherently warlike. I do not believe that they are. I know far too many people of German descent in this country to believe that, and I know the active part they have taken in democratic organizations. Yet if I may translate what I have to say into simple musical terms, there is the Germany of Beethoven but there is also the Germany of Wagner.

I know that there are thousands of German refugees from Hitler who have returned to their own country in an attempt to recreate and rebuild it on a democratic basis. I know that in my own city there are Jewish people who are alive today because of the valour of individual Germans and groups of Germans in helping them to escape. I know that there are tens of thousands of Germans who are buried today in Germany who were victims of Hitler's concentration camps. To suggest for a moment that you can indict a nation is extraordinary nonsense. And yet we have these questions. We know that Jews and Ukrainians and Poles in their millions were murdered by German troops. Today it may be so that the relatives and friends and countrymen of these dead, in their magnanimity, are prepared to forgive for the sake of world peace; but they are never going to forget.

I am not going to mention the revulsion which all of us felt and still feel when we remember the concentration camps of Germany, because revulsion is not a substitute for policy, and abhorrence is not an alternative to policy. But these things cannot be forgotten.

There are certain facts which we must bear in mind. There is the fact that in the past the nationalists and militarists came to power and led their people, and those people followed them except for a valiant minority. There is the probability that Germans were politically immature. That can be argued against. It can be said that here is the fallacy of post hoc ergo propter hoc and that such a situation does not exist today. I can only hope that such is the case, but I have no proof.

There is the undeniable fact that today in Germany nazis are in key positions in government and business. To suggest for one moment that nazis will not again get into the army is arrant rubbish. We have been told that there are millions of young Germans who oppose rearmament. Are they likely to be the ones who will enter this new army of this new reich? No. Those who are going to enter the army will be the spawn of former nazis. To suggest that the screening will be sufficiently effective to keep out the nazis is nothing but wishful thinking.

I state as a fact that the reception given Kurt Meyer was not an accident, that it is indicative of a state of mind which is perilous to all of us, even although there were many Germans who deplored it. I state as a fact that what Frau Schlitter said in London was not an accident, that she meant it.

I state as a fact that the Russian face of Germany is a reality. I agree with what my leader said yesterday about what is happening in connection with a German aircraft firm and certain interests in Spain. We can also say as a fact that there is now a Spanish face to Germany. Some German corporations in their attempt to evade the obligations of their country are doing now what they did with Russia in the 1920's.

I aver that this will be a fact, that within the predictable future the Germans will want and will get atomic reactors. I affirm as a fact that within the predictable future the Germans will want an increase in their forces and may conceivably get it. I state also as a fact that there are unscrupulous groups in Germany who will go to any lengths in an attempt to unite East Germany with the west. Then what will we do? We are told that there are safeguards, that those safeguards are in the treaty. What if the United States decide that they are going to support this war against communism and communist barbarism in eastern Europe? What then do we do? What control do we have as a matter of fact over what the United States may do, despite this talk of the Atlantic community. There is no community and this government must take its share of responsibility for that fact.

There is no one in this house who wants Germany rearmed. The only ones in Canada I can think of who want the Germans rearmed are the communists of Canada, and for obvious reasons. They know that the only country which can offer anything to Germany is the Soviet union. Russia can offer Germany a reunited country, and local communists may be looking to the day when a rearmed Germany will be joined with the Soviet union to try to dominate the world in so far as they can.

All of us have been subjected to communist pressure in the last few weeks. It is nothing new. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) said the other day, there is no group in Canada which has more gall. It is those same communists who in 1939 were prepared to fight Hitlerism, who a few days later were prepared to lick the boots of Hitler's nazis, and who now again because of Russian policy are prepared to pursue the course dictated by the Kremlin.

There are some who are quite in favour of German rearmament. One has only to read the business pages of the newspapers to realize how United States steel interests are looking forward with some anticipation to German rearmament. We know that there are industrialists in the United Kingdom who feel the ferocity of German competition in the markets of the world and who want to see Germany rearmed in the hope that it will curb their power to compete. Then there are those who welcome German rearmament, those who have been so aptly termed in the past as merchants of death. Yet surely the greatest fact before the house is that there are millions of Germans today, knowing their own country as they do, knowing their own countrymen as they do, who are opposed to its being rearmed, and we are thrusting arms upon them.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

There is another aspect to this calculated risk. There is an element of gamble in it and the gamble is the possibility of an old man living another two or three years, the gamble that Herr Adenauer will survive the next two or three years. I would hope that he does, but what is the alternative? Suppose he does not; what sort of government do we get then? No one knows; no one can speak with certainty. But that is far too big an X in this equation to be glossed over lightly.

I do not deny the need for generosity to a beaten opponent. Germany must be brought back within the comity of nations and as rapidly as possible, though not on Russian terms. There are some who feel that further discussion with Russia would be futile; some who feel that further discussion might be useful; some who feel, as I do, that the suggestion offered by Premier Mendès-France is worthy of consideration, namely that meetings should be held with the Soviet union in May.

But surely again the obvious fact is that if Russia was afraid of Western German rearmament she would have reached an agreement long ago. I do not believe for a moment that the Russians have any great fear about the rearmament of Western Germany. But this much I am certain of, namely that Germany will be united when Russia is ready to give them union, and not one moment before. Not all our blandishments or speeches will alter that situation.

One of the unhappy facts we must face is that when we meet the Russians we never speak the same language. We use the same words but when the Russians say "democracy" they mean tyranny; when they say "justice" they mean iniquity; and when they say "life" they mean death. That is a fact we will have to remember.

I am one of those who feel that perhaps another discussion with the Soviet union on Germany might be fruitless. Nevertheless, it is imperative that there be discussions as soon as possible with the Soviet union on other and wider matters. The time is not far off when we shall have reached what somebody called "the intolerable atomic absolute," when certain people in the United States feel that Russia has got the air power and thermonuclear power necessary in one blitz to extinguish the west. What do we do then? What happens when some trigger-happy fool shoots? It will be the death of all of us. It is imperative that we meet the Russians and we continue to meet them until we can arrive at some modus vivendi and modus operandi. But this is an interpolation.

I come back to my charge that the government has not followed the path of economic co-operation as I am convinced it should have done, and the government is wrong in saying there is no alternative. Of course, it may be said that no matter what I say, no matter what my feelings are, and no matter what my colleagues say, Germany is going to be rearmed in any event. I believe that to be the case.

If this agreement is not approved in other countries, I am convinced that the nationalists in Germany will rearm bilaterally with the help of Washington, and if not with Washington then with Moscow. No matter what I think or do, I for one am faced with a fait accompli. I am faced with the choice of an armed Germany with controls or an armed Germany without controls, and I must accept the controls no matter how ineffective and inadequate I may consider them to be.

But to refer to myself again, what do I want? There can be only one answer, to my mind. I want these controls in existence if Germany must be rearmed, because I think it is essential for the welfare of all of us that they be there.

We all know what happened with EDC but I still believe we have got to go forward with this concept of integration. I did not agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) yesterday when he paid tribute to the United Kingdom for departing from its age-old policy of not putting troops into Europe. I believe the EDC met with failure in the French assembly in large measure because of earlier British refusal to co-operate in Europe.

Too late the British again have divisions in Europe, and here, Mr. Speaker, is the supreme irony, namely that France agrees to German rearmament if the United Kingdom keeps a number of divisions in Europe to protect France against the consequences of that German rearmament. How illogical can we get? Yet I as an individual and as a member of the Canadian parliament am faced with this package deal. I am faced with a deal wherein German rearmament, which I oppose at this time, is tied in with the necessary controls on that rearmament. I am faced with the accomplished fact. I support the controls. I oppose this resolution for what is not in it, and I support it for what is in it.

Someone yesterday mentioned Scylla and Charybdis. I refuse to be devoured by one or engulfed by the other. Some perhaps may show their feelings in this matter by being absent from the house when the vote is called. I shall not be absent. I shall be in my place in the house and as a matter of deliberate policy I shall refrain from voting.

(Translation):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, the question which we are debating today is of major importance for the western powers which, for the past ten years, have had to withstand the constant aggression of communist countries.
