

IMAGE EVALUATION TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic
Sciences
Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

CIHM/ICMH
Microfiche Series.

CIHM/ICMH
Collection de microfiches.

Canadian Institute for Historical Microreproductions / Institut canadien de microreproductions historiques

© 1981

Technical and Bibliographic Notes/Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

- ☐ Coloured covers/Couverture de couleur
- ☒ Covers damaged/Couverture endommagée
- ☐ Covers restored and/or laminated/Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
- ☐ Cover title missing/Le titre de couverture manque
- ☐ Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en couleur
- ☐ Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/ Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)
- ☐ Coloured plates and/or illustrations/Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
- ☐ Bound with other material/Relié avec d'autres documents
- ☐ Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distortion le long de la marge intérieure
- ☐ Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.
- ☐ Additional comments:/ Commentaires supplémentaires:

- ☐ Coloured pages/
Pages de couleur
- ☐ Pages damaged/
Pages endommagées
- ☐ Pages restored and/or laminated/Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
- ☒ Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
- ☒ Pages detached/Pages détachées
- ☐ Showthrough/
Transparence
- ☐ Quality of print varies/Qualité inégale de l'impression
- ☐ Includes supplementary material/Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
- ☐ Only edition available/Seule édition disponible
- ☐ Pages wholly or partially obscured by errata slips, tissues, etc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image/Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées à nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

10X	14X	18X	22X	26X	30X
<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
12X	16X	20X	24X	28X	32X

The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

Library of Congress
Photoduplication Service

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol ➡ (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ▼ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Library of Congress
Photoduplication Service

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole ➡ signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ▼ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

SPEECH

OF

^{Henry S}
MR. CLARKE, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

ON THE

OREGON QUESTION.

DELIVERED

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FEBRUARY 6, 1846.

WASHINGTON:

PRINTED AT THE UNION OFFICE.

1846.

F880
C59

209-04-5.2.2.

SPEECH.

On the resolution of notice to Great Britain to abrogate the convention of joint occupancy relative to the Oregon territory.

Mr. CLARKE obtained the floor and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is with much diffidence that I rise to address this committee for the first time on a subject which, in my estimation, is so immediately connected with the peace of the country, and on which gentlemen of much more ability and experience differ in some respects so essentially. But as a large portion of those whom I have the honor to represent seem to feel a very considerable interest upon the subject of Oregon, if I may be permitted to form an opinion of the extent of that interest by the resolutions lately adopted in their primary meetings, it is but proper—indeed, sir, it may be expected by them—that I should express my views upon this subject. Such as I have, they are entitled to, and I will give them to them; premising, however, that if on a question of this important character I should unfortunately have mistaken their wishes, it will be my pleasure, as it certainly is my duty, to rectify the mistake and to carry out whatever may be their purposes in the matter. Amidst all the differences of opinion on this subject, however, to which I have adverted—a difference of opinion both as to the extent of our rights and the best way of maintaining those rights—it is gratifying to witness the unanimity of all on one vastly important point connected with this controversy. If all efforts to settle this matter peaceably shall be of no avail, and if war is to be the dreadful alternative, we have the assurance of men of all parties, that they will unite, as if with one hand and with one heart, to give efficiency to the war, and to terminate the conflict, so far as human agency may prevail, honorably and gloriously for the country. What emotions of pride does not this assurance excite in the breast of every one; what a commentary does it not furnish upon our free institutions, and upon the character of our confederacy; and what a promise does it not hold out of our steady, gradual, and irresistible progress as a people to that magnificent destiny which is in reserve for us, if we will only be faithful to ourselves! However, therefore, this matter may be settled—whether by negotiation or by war; whether peaceably or by the clash and din of arms—this fact is of inestimable value, and cannot fail to exert a powerful moral influence upon the growth and prosperity of our common country. It will also give us confidence in the patriotism of each other; it will blunt, in some degree, it is to be hoped, the acerbity of party spirit; and it will tell to foreign nations, in terms which cannot be misunderstood, that however much we may differ on questions of domestic policy, when a foreign foe shall touch our soil, we are prepared to give him, in the language of the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLASS,] "the best fight we have on hand," and that is a united fight. As these assurances have from time to time fallen upon the ear of the House, the inquiry has involuntarily forced itself upon my mind, whether it were possible that this could be the result of the annexation of Texas, whether it were possible that this could be the evidence of that alienation of attachment to our free institutions, which was predicted by some as sure to follow the consummation of that great deed. Certainly, after so much was said about the dissolution of the Union, and the disaffection of a portion of our people to their own government, it was hardly to have been expected that in so short a time we should witness the gratifying spectacle of men of all parties coming up to the altar of their country, and there making a free and voluntary offering of devotion to her in every emergency. But, sir, it is as true as it is gratifying. The North and the West, the South and the East, without distinction of party, unite in the hearty, prompt, and cheerful declaration of a determination to stand by their country when the shock of war shall come. I was for Texas then, and am for Oregon now. I was for adopting the most prompt and vigorous measures when the former was to be introduced into our sisterhood of States; and I will now go as far as any one in adopting such measures as may be necessary, in the event of war, to maintain our rights and establish our authority in the latter. And, sir, if there could be any difference in my zeal in the two cases—which I do not, however, admit—I must confess that my zeal would be the greater in favor of Oregon; for we have learned from those who have had the management of this case from the beginning, that Oregon is ours, our own soil, our own patrimony. Texas, on the other hand, until admitted into our Union, was the land of another people. In contending for Oregon, we are but striving to retain our present possessions, endeared to us by the recollection and by the achievements of our ancestors. In contending for Texas, we were but striving to extend our possessions, to increase our wealth, our power, our resources, and to disseminate the blessings of our Union—results certainly gratifying to our pride and encouraging to our hopes, but which can hardly be said to be equal to the duty of holding on to our own, of keeping that which we have already got. What profit, I ask, can it avail us, if we accumulate with one hand to-day, and give away and squander with the other to-morrow? What seeming fickleness, at one time to peril the peace of the country in order to acquire territory, and at another time hesitate, for fear of encountering the dreaded power of another nation, to assert and prepare to vindicate our just and manifest rights? Nor can the consideration that one of these territories is to be the abode of freemen only, whilst the other is to be peopled in part by slaves, be allowed to have any influence whatever on my mind in bringing it to a conclusion as to the course I ought to pursue on a great question of national rights. Nor do I look to that balance of power which has been too frequently adverted to in this House and throughout the country, between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States of this republic, as necessary for the protection and security of the peculiar institutions of the South. These depend for their present support upon the concessions on that subject which are to be found in the constitution of the United States, and without which that instrument could not have been ratified; and they depend for their future support upon the sense of justice on that subject which can alone preserve and perpetuate that instrument. When these shall cease to operate, little is to be expected from it. It is worse than idle to place any reliance whatever on a mere abstract balance of power founded on numbers, on whichever side the preponderance may be. When they shall cease to operate, the balance of power by which those institutions are to be supported will be one not founded on numbers, but on might—the success of which will depend much more on the justice of the cause in which it is to be exerted—to wit: the maintenance of our just rights—than on any mere seeming superiority based on majorities. This is the view in which the two cases present themselves to my mind; and viewing them in that light, I cannot but say that my zeal for Oregon is at least equal to what it was for Texas. I repeat it, therefore, what seeming fickleness at one time to peril the peace of the country in order to acquire territory, and at another time hesitate, for fear of encountering the dreaded power of another nation, to assert and prepare to vindicate our just and manifest rights—our clear and indisputable title to the Oregon territory! But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Ewins] denies that our right to any portion of that territory can, with any propriety whatever, be pronounced clear and indisputable. The title to any of it is, in his estimation, doubtful; and this doubt he attributes to the uncertainty—not to say unsoundness—of the principles by which we lay claim to the country, when tested by any known and acknowledged principles of international law. The gentleman alleges, for instance, that—

1. It is doubtful, under the law of nations, whether the discovery of the mouth of a river gives a right to the territory drained by it.

2. It is doubtful, under the same laws, whether discovery avail anything without speedy settlement.

3. It is doubtful whether both discovery and settlement give title to a nation, unless made under government authority.

He also asserts that it is doubtful, under the law of nations, whether war extinguishes or puts an end to a treaty of the nature of the Nootka convention.

It may perhaps be true, sir, that not only the principles laid down by the honorable member, but that all other questions which require for their solution a reference to the law of nations, may, without any very great impropriety of language, be set down as doubtful and uncertain. And this doubt is owing to the various interpretations and applications which those laws have received by different nations, and even by the same nation at different times, and also to the absence of something in the nature of a judicial tribunal to adjudicate and settle them. It must, however, be borne in mind, that this present controversy is with Great Britain; and if she, by her past conduct has given a special interpretation to certain principles of international law, it is but fair and proper that we hold her to that construction; and if that interpretation when properly applied to this case shall give us the Oregon territory, it certainly cannot be regarded as a very great departure from propriety of language, if, when speaking to her, we should assert that our title to that country is "clear and unquestionable." Now, I would ask, if her manner of acquiring territorial rights on the Atlantic side of this continent has not given certainty, if not existence, to the doctrine that the discovery of the mouth of a river, followed up within a reasonable time by settlement, gave her title not only to the whole country watered by the principal river, but also that which was watered by its various tributaries? And by the skillful conjunction of the right by continuity to that conferred by discovery and settlement, I would ask the honorable gentleman if she did not extend her possessions far beyond the most distant sources, both of the principal rivers and their tributaries? if she did not push them even beyond the Alleghany mountains, and limit them only in their western extension by the great Mississippi river? The sincerity of Great Britain in giving this interpretation to the laws of nations cannot be questioned, because in 1760 she went to war with France to maintain it. She was not only willing to risk her character before the world as a fair and just interpreter of those laws, but for the maintenance of her construction she was willing and did expend millions of money, and sacrificed thousands of the lives of her subjects. Give us, then, as respects the Oregon territory, the rights to the same extent which discovery and settlement have conferred upon Great Britain in the eastern part of this North American continent—and to this, let us add the rights which continuity would give us, regulated by her own practice—and our title is complete. Discovery and settlement would give us title to the whole country watered by the Columbia and its tributaries, extending from the 42d degree of north latitude, and bounded on the east throughout its whole extent by the Rocky mountains, and on the west by the Pacific, until it reached the mouth of Frazer's river in latitude of 49°, when it would run along the highlands which separate the waters of the Columbia and Frazer river valleys up to 54° 40'. Give us, then, the benefit of continuity—let it operate in our behalf with only half the vitality without speedy settlement, both discovery and settlement, unless made under doubtful, under the law extinguishes or puts an end to the Nootka convention, sir, that not only the honorable member, but which require for their so-of nations, may, without of language, be set down And this doubt is owing to the nature of a judiand settle them. It must be that this present contain; and if she, by her cial interpretation to cer-pal law, it is but fair to that construction; and properly applied to this territory, it certainly ry great departure from when speaking to her, title to that country is Now, I would ask, territorial rights on the point has not given certain-doctrine that the discover, followed up within a cent, gave her title not watered by the principal as watered by its various difficult conjunction of the conferred by discovery the honorable gentle-her possessions far besides, both of the principal if she did not push them mountains, and limit extension by the great cerity of Great Britain to the laws of nations case in 1760 she went to it. She was not only before the world as a those laws, but for the tion she was willing and eas, and sacrificed thousands. Give us, then, as the rights to the same settlement have confer-the eastern part of this —and to this, let us add ould give us, regulated our title is complete. ould give us title to the the Columbia and its the 42d degree of north the east throughout its mountains, and on the reached the mouth of of 49°, when it would separate the waters river valleys up to benefit of continuity—with only half the vital-ty and efficacy with which it worked out territory for Great Britain on this our own continent, and we take in Frazer river valley, and become at once united to the Pacific. And, sir, if there ever was a country in which the doctrine of continuity would operate in the extension of territorial rights, the upper part of this Oregon valley is plainly and emphatically one. The very reason and object of the principle is, that a people may the more fully and conveniently enjoy that portion of any country which is clearly and confessedly theirs by discovery and occupation, or by some other acknowledged manner of acquiring territory. The valley of the Columbia is ours by the discovery of Gray in 1792, and by subsequent settlement within a reasonable time, as acknowledged by the surrender of it after the last war; and this valley extends as far north as 54° 40'.

The inhabitants, therefore of the northern part of this region would have to travel the whole extent of the Columbia river—a distance of some thousand or twelve hundred miles—before he could embark the products of his labor and skill on the mild bosom of the Pacific, in search of a foreign market. This long, and tedious, and toilsome journey he must take, with the Pacific within two hundred miles of his home, and Frazer's river within one-fourth of that distance, because Frazer's river was discovered by a subject of Great Britain! But this discovery, however, was not until the latter part of the year 1793, some 18 months after our citizens had discovered the Columbia, and therefore eighteen months after this principle of continuity—if it has any application, any force whatever—had extended our right to the Pacific. But admitting that we throw out of consideration any advantage we might claim to the Frazer valley by continuity, and concede that to Great Britain, and then our title to the south of 49° from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific, would be indisputable; and to the north of that parallel we would have the Columbia, and Great Britain the Frazer valley. Both these valleys are now, by the treaty of 1827, in the joint occupancy of the two countries. This, then, is the only portion of this northwest country—the portion to the north of 49° —which, in the most unfavorable view for us, can be the proper subject of division: A line beginning on the Pacific, somewhere between 51° and 52° and running along that parallel to the Rocky mountains, would give to Great Britain a portion of the territory we claim, and to us a portion she claims—would give us each a line of the Pacific coast equal to our line on the Rocky mountains, and would also secure to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Gentry] that straight fence he so much desired. By discovery, settlement, and continuity, therefore, the whole of Oregon is ours. Throw continuity out of the account, and confine us to discovery and settlement, and we have the very clearest title to 49°, leaving only the valleys of the Oregon and Frazer rivers, to the north of that parallel, to be divided between us. A line between 51° and 52° would accomplish the most just or equitable division; or, in consideration of our taking Vancouver's island, the line might be located on the 51st degree of latitude. But we are here met with another proposition of the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. Ewing], in which he asserts "that it is doubtful whether both discovery and settlement give title to a nation, unless made under government authority." However this may be, by the laws of nations Great Britain is estopped, by the character of her own pretensions to any portion of this country, from setting up any such doctrine. What, I would ask, is the beginning, the very foundation, of all the claim which Great Britain now sets up to any part of this country? Is it not all to be traced—does she not herself trace it, through the Nootka convention—to the mere temporary occupation of a part of Vancouver's island by Lt. Meares—who, it is true, was one of her subjects, but who, so far from acting under the direction of the "government authority" of his own country, was, at the time, sailing and operating under the Portuguese flag.

But, sir, if it be true that "government authority" must accompany discovery and settlement, in order to perfect the title to this territory, does it not follow that Great Britain has the clear title to the whole of this northwest territory, because she, as early as 1803, and then again in 1821, extended her laws over it, whilst we have not, to this day, extended either our authority, our laws, or our institutions over the country? And does the gentleman really mean to be understood throughout the country as denying that we have any rights in Oregon? I do not believe that he desires to be so understood; and yet this is the practical result of his position—the necessary conclusion from his premises.

Thus far of our title acquired by the enterprise and adventure of our own citizens, which I regard as the most reliable part of it. Let us now look into our title from Spain, by the treaty of 1819. By that treaty Spain ceded to the United States "all her rights, claims, and pretensions to the northwest territory." So far as prior discovery is concerned, "these rights, claims, and pretensions" of Spain extended, and were complete, as far north as 54° 40', at least. Between 1774 and 1779, exploring expeditions, sent out by their government, had discovered the Pacific coast as far north as the parallel of 60°, had landed on it at various points, had traded with the Indians, and had taken formal possession of the country in the name, and for the benefit, of their government. Whereas, the first English nav-igator who saw any portion of this coast north of 42°, was Cook, in 1778, after every portion of the coast he visited had previously been visited by the Spaniards, Perez, Heceta, and Bodega.

The government of Great Britain, however, contends that in the year 1790, Spain concluded with her a treaty, by which certain rights were secured to Great Britain, in this Oregon territory. This treaty of 1790 she contends is still in force, and that the only effect of the treaty of 1819 was to substitute our government in the place of Spain in the former treaty: But we contend that the treaty of 1790 was abrogated and annulled by the war of 1796 between the two contracting parties. All who have argued on this point seem to admit that there are some treaties which a subsequent war between the contracting parties annul and destroy; and numerous attempts have been made to lay down some general rule, by which it may be determined what kind of treaties are destroyed by war, and what kind survive a hostile conflict between the parties.
It may perhaps be more easy to determine that question in individual cases, which may present themselves to our minds, than to lay down anything like a general rule. And the result of the attempts which have been made, strongly verify this assertion. Some gentlemen, for instance, declare, as a general rule, that all commercial treaties are abrogated by war. This, as a general rule, is not comprehensive enough; for it is certain that the treaties which are not commercial in their characare also terminated by a war between the parties. A treaty offensive and defensive is of this character. Another gentleman—I mean the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. Holmes]—has tried his skill on this point, and, with all due deference, his attempt comes equally short of the mark, if not more so. He contended that those treaties which confer privileges, are abrogated by war; whilst those which confer rights, remain untouched. This, as a general rule, is certainly wanting of distinctness, for some privileges are most certainly rights. The only distinction which occurs to me to be at once sensible and comprehensive, is that which declares that executed treaties are not affected by a war between the parties; whilst those that are unexecuted—those which are executory—those which are inserted, are annulled. Treaties, for instance, which settle boundaries—which limit or confer territorial rights, are unaffected by any and every change in the relations between the two countries. The treaty of 1790 between Spain and Great Britain is clearly embraced in the latter class. It provided for trade with the Indians, and for settlements, for the purposes of trade, and for that purpose only. The right to make settlements can, by no fair construction, be regarded as a right to appropriate territory. Such a construction is not warranted by the unambiguous meaning of the terms employed; and when we refer to extraneous considerations, in order to aid us in coming at the meaning of the parties, this construction has still less on which to stand. If territorial rights were intended to be secured, it is a reflection to suppose that two such intelligent nations would not have employed less equivocal and more precise and definite terms. Still less can it be believed that Great Britain, who was the party to be benefited, would have left such essential and permanent rights to implication and construction. It is only when she seeks to extend her claims far beyond the meaning and intention of the power with which she is treating, that she employs doubtful and ambiguous phrases. It is by the arts and tricks of diplomacy, she aims to accomplish her wishes, when more open and direct means have failed of success. Again, at the time when this treaty was made, and for many years before, Spain seemed to be beset with a perfect monomania for the acquisition of territory—for the discovery of new islands and new continents. Her exploring vessels were sent out into every sea, and to the uttermost parts of the earth, in search of some new spot on which to plant the standard of her enterprise and power. Is the idea that the treaty of 1790, acknowledged joint territorial rights in this northwest territory, which was clearly the property of Spain by discovery, between these two nations, consistent with the avarice of Spain—with her rage for the acquisition of more land? Is it to be credited that she would thus surrender the darling of her affections, the object of all her self-sacrificing efforts, without even a struggle to maintain and preserve them?

Is it not more natural, more consistent with the circumstances of the two nations at that time, to believe that Great Britain represented to Spain what she now says to us, that she did not desire the country for the purpose of making permanent settlements, but as affording facilities of trade with the Indians for its furs. This facility, this privilege of trade, we might well suppose that Spain would be willing, for valuable considerations, to grant, inasmuch as the country was only desirable to her as a future abode for her citizens, and for the precious metals which might abound in the bosom of its mountains. Moreover, if the treaty of 1790 was an appropriation on the part of those powers of the Oregon territory, is it not a little remarkable that soon after the close of the last war, Great Britain should have placed the United States in possession of a portion of this very territory which had been taken from the latter during the last war? Can she admit, without involving herself in dishonor, that she surrendered to our government at that time territory which she now urges belonged to herself and Spain? Is it not more easy to believe that this right to the territory is all an after thought of hers, pressed now with the greater pertinacity because of our offer to compromise, because of our tacit acknowledgment, as she construes it, that she had permanent rights there?

Gentlemen have been pleased, Mr. Chairman, to consider this question in its bearing upon the peaceful relations of the two countries, and I trust I shall be pardoned if I should so far imitate the example which has been set as to express my opinions on that point. I venture to say that no one would deprecate more than myself a war with England, or with any other power. I trust that I feel a just appreciation of the horrid calamities of war—the effusion of blood it would produce, the loss of life it would occasion, the injury to commerce it would effect. But these are the invariable and unavoidable effects of all war; effects which would be visited on Great Britain in a degree equal, at least, to what we might experience of them. And if the invariable and unavoidable effects of war are to be effectually urged against the maintenance of our just rights, it requires no Solomon to see that these rights are forever to be abandoned whenever their assertion would, by the most remote probability, lead us into a conflict with another people. It appears to me that in ascertaining our rights, and in coming to a determination to vindicate them, considerations of peace or war should not be allowed to exercise a controlling influence. In case of doubt and uncertainty as to our rights, I admit that they should be allowed to turn the scale in favor of a compromise, or, if necessary, an abandonment of our pretensions. But when our rights are "clear and indisputable," as clear as a sun-beam, as we have been taught to regard them in respect to Oregon, it will not do to listen to them, unless we are prepared to deprecate war on any occasion, and for any purpose. It appears to me, sir, that the example of our revolutionary fathers is the only proper one in such cases, and one which recommends itself to our most favorable consideration. When they were about to engage in a conflict with the dreaded power of Great Britain, and that, too, at a time when the odds were a hundred-fold greater against them than they are against us, did they stop to calculate the consequences of the truly appalling contest in which they were about to engage? No, sir. They but satisfied themselves of their rights, and they went ahead to vindicate them, leaving the consequences to Him who rules the destinies of nations as well as of individuals. Their sufferings, and losses, and hazards were far more startling than any that can possibly befall us. Their sufferings were imprinted by their bloody foot-steps on the frozen earth—their loss, if overwhelmed, would have been the loss of freedom—their hazard was that of reaping the death of the traitor, and the ignominy of the rebel—suffering, and losses, and hazards which in no possible event can come to us.

Such was the spirit that actuated our ancestors then, and such I believe to be the spirit by which a large portion of the American people are actuated now. If war therefore should unfortunately grow out of this matter, its responsibility, whatever it may be, whether for glory or for shame, must and will rest upon those who have proved before the American people their clear and indisputable title to the whole of Oregon. Convinced that it is theirs, they will be unwilling to yield a single inch. When required to do so, they will desire to know why it is urged. And what will you tell them? You cannot tell them that our title is involved in doubt and uncertainty; and, therefore, that it is a fit subject for compromise. You cannot tell them that, because you have already convinced them, that our title to the whole of it is clear and unquestionable. It will not do to tell them that the country is poor, not worth having, and that we would make a good bargain to give it away. It could not but occur to them that it would be worth as much to us as to Great Britain. You would have to come out with the honest, bare-faced confession, that you wanted to give it away in order to appease her wrath—in order to avert her power—in order to avoid the conflict with her, which would be necessary to maintain our rights. Such appears to me to be the complexion of the case, so far as regards all those who think our title to the whole of Oregon is clear and indisputable, and are still willing to give up a portion of it.

Now will the assertion of our manifest and acknowledged rights, of our clear and unquestionable title to the Oregon territory, involve us in a war? And here I will take occasion to observe, that what I shall say in this connexion, as well as what has been said by others here, is at best but idle and vague conjecture. I deem this avowal necessary, for fear it may be supposed by some of my constituents that I was in possession of some facts unknown to them, on which I predicate my opinion. For their information, it may not be amiss to state, that I know no more about the matter than what has been published and sent forth to the world, and upon which they can speculate as much, and perhaps more certainly than I can. I will not stop to inquire whether the mere giving the notice is a just cause of war. I consider the notice as preliminary only to the adoption of such measures as may be necessary to maintain our rights, whatever they may be, in the Oregon territory. It is evident that the President so regards it, when he says in his message, "at the end of the year's notice, should Congress think proper to make provision for giving that notice, we shall have reached a period when the national rights in Oregon must either be abandoned or firmly maintained." It is the effect, therefore, of the measures which are to follow the notice, and without which the notice would be an idle mockery, and not of the notice itself, to which we must direct our attention, when arguing the probable consequences of our conduct in this matter. The portion of that territory to which we may lay claim, and the course which we are to pursue in order to establish our exclusive authority in it, are the proper considerations to be taken in the account when we undertake to answer the question whether there will be war. And here I would observe, that my opinion on this question is entitled to but little weight when put in opposition to the opinion of the humblest citizen in this country. Unsophisticated in the arts of diplomacy, wholly unacquainted with the arts of craft-ty politicians, accustomed to look at things as I see them, and hear them, and read them, and to form my opinion accordingly, it may be that I am deceived by false appearances. But if much that I see, and hear, and read, be not intended for other times—for the year 1848, for instance—if there be nothing of scenic effect in all that strikes my vision, I should say that the prospect of a war between this country and Great Britain, about this Oregon territory, is very far from being visionary and chimerical. I do not say that we are to have it the next week, or the next month, nor perhaps the next year. But if it shall not come before two years, it cannot but be regarded as imminent and impending, for it will take until that time to get ready for it. When I say that the prospect of a war is far from being visionary, I take it for granted that we are to go in for the whole territory—nothing more nor nothing less. A majority of the people are for the whole of it—a majority of their representatives, I believe, are for the whole of it—and the President appears to be for the whole of it; nor do I believe that the President will accept any thing short of the whole of it. Can any person believe otherwise of his views? Sir, I have great confidence in that officer—more than all, I have great confidence in his candor, a quality which has laid hold on the feelings of the people; and which, as much as any other, and, perhaps, more than all others he possesses, has given him an abiding place in the very affections of the people. He declares that our title to the whole of it is "clear and unquestionable." It is true, that in obedience to the actions of his predecessors, he submitted a line of boundary to the British government, which, if accepted, would have given us less than the whole country. But no sooner is the offer rejected, than he instantly puts an end to further negotiation, as if rejoiced that he is rid of the trammels by which he is surrounded; as if glad that he is at last thrown upon his own resources and left to follow the dictates of his own judgment. From considerations like these, I do not believe that the President will accept anything short of the entire country. And if we are to take possession of the whole territory, can gentlemen be really sincere in the declaration, oft made and oft repeated, that we are to have no conflict? Can members bring themselves really to believe that Great Britain will suffer her citizens to be quietly, peaceably, and unceremoniously dispossessed of their present position throughout that whole country, without making any effort to sustain them—without raising so much as her right arm in order to stay the hand of the spoiler? They who thus count upon her tame submission, and most speedy abandonment of her pretensions, seem to have forgotten her pride—her ambition—her avarice for territory. They blindly close their eyes to what the events of the few last years cannot have failed to impress upon the government of Great Britain—and that is, that sooner or later, she will have to strike a blow for even a foothold on this North American continent; nay, that she will have to strike it now, strike it for Oregon, or submit soon to see the sceptre of her power forever removed. If she falter now, her doom is sealed. This she cannot fail to see and to feel, and seeing and feeling it, depend upon it, this taking possession of the whole of Oregon will be no holiday business, as a distinguished senator, [Mr. WASSERMAN] once said, when encountering the popularity and power of the hero of New Orleans. And, sir, if, after notice, we consent to limit our claim by the 49th deg., I still have my fears that even then war is not improbable. I am aware that the press of this country, and the politicians, too, have expressed a hope, and many of them a belief, that the differences will all be amicably adjusted. We have also, within a week or two past, heard from the press of the other party, and they, too, express the hope, and most of them a belief, that the two countries will yet peaceably settle their present controversy. This, sir, is creditable to the humanity of the two people. But when the press and the politicians of the respective parties attempt to specify the manner in which it may be peaceably compromised, you at once perceive that their hopes are delusive. On our side the 49th degree seems to be the ultimatum with each party, and with every man. On the part of Great Britain it is the 49th degree, with Vancouver's island and the free navigation of the Columbia. This, sir, is the difference, with some variation, which has separated the two countries for the last twenty-five or thirty years. And the question still occurs, which will recede from its pretensions? Can any one propose that our country shall recede further than the 49th degree? And who can say with any certainty, or probability even, that Great Britain will curtail her demands. The free navigation of the Columbia appears to be the sine qua non of all her offers to compromise, and that the President has declared he cannot accede to; and for this determination I believe he will receive a hearty and almost universal response from the whole American people. Great Britain may recede, and I sincerely trust she will; but as yet I have seen no evidence of it. Of this I have my fears, and upon these fears rest my apprehension that this matter will sooner or later interrupt the peaceful relations of the two governments.

On our side, also, there is much which has transpired of late which is calculated to prepare the minds of the people for, and to hasten on, a conflict between these two great and powerful governments. Irritation has succeeded irritation, and aggression has followed aggression, until our people seem to be not only ready, but many of them anxious, for a conflict with that haughty power. In the first place, the people of the United States look upon Great Britain as having overreached us in the settlement of the northeast boundary, and that, too, by fraud and imposition. They have not forgotten that her statesmen held up in the British Parliament, before the face of the whole world, a map which was in their possession during the negotiation, in order to show what they had gained over us by management and art, and as an evidence of our ignorance or of our submission. This fact has sunk deep in the bosom of the American people, and disposes them to anything rather than a backing out of their pretensions to the Oregon territory. Her secret and officious interference also with the authorities of Texas, in order to defeat the great project of her annexation to this country, is of too recent origin to have lost any of its stirring and harrowing effect on the public mind. To this may be added her interference with a colony planted under our auspices on the coast of Africa—her claiming, and in some few cases exercising, the right of searching our trading vessels in the Mediterranean—and last, though not least, her avowal of a determination to preserve the balance of power on this continent—a determination which she has already commenced to enforce among the South American states, and which, at some convenient time, if we fail now to act with decision and firmness, she will seek to extend to us. It is in view of all these considerations of aggression on the one side, and of irritation on the other, that I am constrained to say that I have my fears that the peace of the country does not rest on such a sure foundation as some seem to suppose. I repeat it, sir, that my opinion is entitled to but little weight, for, after all, it is vague speculation; and I am willing to admit that from my extreme ignorance of the way in which these things are managed, I may be most grossly deceived by appearances. But I agree with the honorable member from Massachusetts, who sits usually behind me, [Mr. Winthrop,] that we should speak plainly in this matter. Whatever our rights in that country are, I go for maintaining them at every hazard.

But sir, even among those who are agreed as to our right to the whole of Oregon, there is a diversity of opinion as to the best manner of asserting and securing our rights there. Whilst one portion of its friends are decided in the opinion that we should come boldly out—declare our claims before the world and prepare to defend it if necessary with the strong might of the country's arm—there is another portion who are for leaving it to time and emigration quietly and peacefully to effect the same result. It appears to me that time and emigration have been looked to long enough to adjudge and decide this matter. Twenty-five or thirty years ago, this same matter was left to the arbitrament of time, and it may be asked, what is now the state of the case? Why, sir, we are now further from a decision of it than when it was first submitted to that tribunal. The two governments are actually getting further and further apart all the while in their efforts to bring about a satisfactory adjustment of that matter. And pray, sir, what has emigration done all the while? It too has been tardy and inefficient, and is now altogether hopeless. It is true, that there are now in Oregon some seven thousand Americans, but the time when these seven thousand people went there is an important inquiry in this connexion. I would ask, if it be not true that they have nearly or quite all of them gone there since the spring of 1844, when the democratic party in convention at Baltimore declared our title to the whole of Oregon? and if it be not true, that yet a larger portion of these have gone there since the people of this country, in the great popular election of 1844, ratified and confirmed this declaration? Mr. Greenhow states, in his History of Oregon, that so late as the fall of 1843 there were but four hundred Americans in the whole territory. These, then, are the assurances that have carried them there—assurances that the country was ours, that it was to be taken under our own dominion, and that they would be protected by our laws. Refuse now to give the notice, and thereby manifest a distrust of our title, or a backwardness in adopting measures to maintain it, and you will not only, in my opinion, effectually arrest emigration thither, but that thousands of those who have already gone there will return to the States. Or if emigration shall be continued, it will be limited entirely to the south of the Columbia, and thus will give to Great Britain all that she desires. I must confess, that I have no confidence in the wonder-working-effects of "inactivity," whether it be called wise and masterly, or stupid and bungling. It never has done anything either for nations or for individuals. Activity is the main-spring of success and prosperity in all our undertakings. Accord-ision and firm-It is in view of

on the one side,
I am constrainthe peace of the foundation as sir, that my
it, for, after all, willing to admit of the way in may be most
But I agree
Massachusetts,
VINTHROP,] that
ter. Whatever for maintaining are agreed as to is a diversity a asserting and one portion of that we should me before the essary with the arm—there is it to time and effect the same and emigration adjudge and desire years ago,

ment of time, the state of the er from a decimitted to that tri-actually getting in their efforts ent of that mat-ration done all inefficient, and true, that there and Americans, and people went connexion. I they have nearly ce the spring of n convention at hole of Oregon?
rger portion of le of this coun-f 1844, ratified
Mr. Greenhow,
that so late as four hundred these, then, are em there—assuthat it was to be and that they Refuse now to at a distrust of eeping measures.
in my opinion,
but that thou-there will re-
all be continued,
of the Columbia,
all that she de-no confidence in ivity," whether tupid and bun-ther for nations n-spring of sucakings. According to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Rnerr,] our revolutionary fathers tried both, and the result of their experiment is a glorious commen- tary upon the superiority of determination—of firm- ness, of activity. We are told by him that they en- dured for ten years the hardships, and oppressions, and exactions of the mother country, before they took up arms to redress themselves; and we are ad- monished to imitate their patient forbearance. But what did this forbearance effect for them? Inactivity but brought upon them an accumulation of wrongs, an increase of exactions, and an addition of hard- ships. It was activity—a firm and open avowal of their rights, and a determined effort to maintain them—that worked out a vindication of their rights, and a redress of all their grievances. Let us imi- tate them in their last resolve—let us declare our right not merely to establish forts and post-routes, but our right to the territory, to the soil—and by the time we shall need them, we have fifty thousand people in Oregon. Instead of seven thousand men, women, and children, we shall have twice that num- ber of fighting-men—men of nerve and skill in the use of the deadly rifle—ready and on the spot to defend their homes and their firesides. But these gentlemen who promise to get for us the whole of Oregon if we will not pass the notice, tell us that their plan will not lead to war. There is the pacific policy, if we would trust to their skill in prophecy. But let us analyze their plan and see how it is to work in practice. They, like us, advocate our right to the whole, and that we shall take posses- sion of it, or encourage our people to do so.

The only difference between us is, that we pro- pose to notify Great Britain of our intentions—they propose to do the same thing without any notice. Well, how do they propose to take possession? Why, by erecting forts, by establishing post offices and post routes, and by extending our laws over our emigrants, and by encouraging them to make per- manent settlements in the country, and to reduce and cultivate the earth. And all this is to be done throughout the whole extent from 49° to 54° 40'. To limit these establishments to the Columbia, or by the 49°, is at once to admit that you intend to surrender the balance of the territory. Can Great Britain fail to see in all this a determination to oust her from the country? Is she so blind that she can- not see—so deaf that she cannot hear—so dull that she cannot understand? Think you that our actions will not speak to her louder than any words we could employ? Will not our forts, and our militia, and our farms, and our workshops, speak to her in language stronger than what we can put into any written notice we can serve upon her, and tell her of our determination to appropriate the whole coun- try? And if she is determined to retain any portion of it, will she not prepare to do it at once, at the point of the bayonet, and at the cannon's mouth? To expect anything else, is to calculate largely upon the blindness or tame submission of that haughty power. The gentlemen appear, themselves, to have some apprehension after all that their plan may not work so peacefully and quietly; and they attempt to prepare and reconcile us to the war which their plan may bring about by telling us that it will make Great Britain the aggressor and they amplify most eloquently upon the manifold advantages of being in the defensive. I am willing to admit that there are great and manifest advantages in being on the defensive in any controversy, whether it be of a warlike or other character. But it would seem to me that no war will possibly grow out of this ques- tion in which Great Britain will not necessarily and unavoidably be the aggressive party. Even if the notice is given, and war should ensue, she must begin it. All will admit that we can populate that country more rapidly than she can. The gentle- men who propose to get the whole country, if the notice be not given, count largely if not entirely on our superior advantages for colonizing that country. So long, therefore, as we can do that, and thereby secure by our majorities the control of the country, what more do we ask? What is there to fight for? Nothing, certainly, on our part. Our position would give us every advantage. So far, therefore, as the question of war is concerned, the practical results of both plans would seem to me to be the same. The one may bring it on a little more speedily than the other, but war is as likely to follow the one as the other, and in either case Great Britain must begin it.

I am, therefore, in favor of the notice, because I believe that there is a disposition on the part of al- most every member of this House to take posses- sion of some portion of that territory—to encour- age our citizens to emigrate there, and to make per- manent and exclusive settlements, and to extend our laws and institutions over them. This cannot be done, in my estimation, consistently with substat- ing treaty stipulations, until after the notice is given and the treaty abrogated. The notice is the only way in which we can in proper faith rid ourselves of our obligations to Great Britain. And this course is as necessary for those who think our claim does not extend beyond the 49°, as for those who would be satisfied with nothing less than the whole. For the subjects of Great Britain have the rights of ingress and egress and of trade into every portion of the territory—to the south as well as to the north of 49°, and to the south as well as to the north of the Columbia. To curtail or destroy these privileges by any measures which shall operate either directly or remotely to produce such a result, cannot justly be done without first putting an end to the treaty of 1827. And I very much doubt whether we shall be able to get the signature of the President to any laws, the immediate or remote effect of which would be to exclude Great Britain from any portion of the country, until the notice has been first given. Tra- ties, when once concluded, are invested by the con- stitution of the United States with the force and name of laws, and by that same instrument the President is bound by his oath to see that the laws are faithfully executed—faithfully is the word ac- cording to their direction, their spirit, their letter, and in no other way.

Again: I am for the notice, because, if we are to take exclusive possession of any portion of the ter- ritory, to proceed with the notice is more open and above board. For us to attempt secretly to get pos- session of the country, would carry with it the ap- pearance of an effort to deceive—an attempt secretly to undermine, which could really deceive no one, and which is equally against good faith and fair deal- ing. Our country should always remember to ful- fill, with scrupulous exactness, all her obligations—her contracts—all the pledges of her faith, whether they relate to the payment of money, to territorial rights, or to commercial privileges. To keep them to the promise, and to break them in act and in deed, is unbecoming our frank, our manly character, as a people. To proclaim the inviolability of treaties at the same time that we are secretly and sneakily seeking to empower ourselves to violate them with personal impunity, if I may so speak of a government, is very near akin to that faith which has been ingloriously immortalized as punica fides—Judas-like, it salutes with a kiss that it may the more completely deceive and betray.

Again: I am in favor of the notice, because I believe that the giving of it now holds out the only plausible means of preventing a war between the two countries. The postponement of the notice from 1827 to this time has increased and multiplied the difficulties with which the controversy was originally surrounded. And it is difficult to see what else could have been anticipated. For the interests of Great Britain have been and are now daily increasing in extent and permanency, making all the while stronger and stronger appeals to her pride and avarice to maintain them. At first, she had but the moving tent and the temporary stockade. Now, she has the permanent dwelling and the bristling fortifications. At first, she had but the roaming hunter, as wild and unsettled as the game he pursued. Now, she has the fixed agriculturist and the settled farmer. Now, she has there a scattered population. In a few years this population will be doubled, adding constantly and daily to the difficulties of a satisfactory and peaceable adjustment. Never was the application of that holy injunction, to "agree with thine adversary quickly, whilst thou art in the way with him," more appropriate and pressing than it is in relation to this present controversy. Let us profit by it. The notice is all-important as leading irresistibly to a settlement of this matter in some way.

There is still another consideration influencing my mind in favor of the notice, growing out of the history of this Oregon question. In 1818 this question was brought up for negotiation and compromise; and so intimately connected with the peace of the two countries was it then regarded, that its agitation was attended with the most injurious effects upon the commerce, upon the credit, and indeed upon all the various pursuits and interests of our people. In 1827, its agitation was again attended with the same disastrous results. Now, again, for the third time, has it been brought up for renewed discussion in the year 1846; and if we are to credit those who profess to understand such matters, it has again exhibited its galvanic effect upon all the best interests of the country. Postpone it now, and some eight or ten years from this time, if not sooner, it must again come up with all its usual concomitants of panics and depressions. Is it not the part of wisdom to put an end to such a state of things? Do we not owe it to ourselves, and to those who come after us, to arrest this political earthquake, which at intervals has given a shock to all that is valuable in society?

Mr. Chairman, as something has been said about leaders in this matter, and as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] has been held up before the country as the leader of those who are in favor of the notice, I will beg the indulgence of the committee whilst I make a few remarks in relation to that matter. I will take occasion to say, that in giving my vote for the notice, I shall follow the lead of no man—the lead neither of the illustrious gentleman from Massachusetts, nor yet of the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. Bayly.] I know no lead, and I shall follow no lead but that of my constituents. Whithersoever they direct in a matter of so much importance to their peace, thither I go cheerfully and promptly. But, sir, if the gentleman from Massachusetts happens to coincide with me in opinion upon this or any other subject, I shall most certainly not change my views on that account merely. To do so, would be to put my political principles entirely in his keeping, to be controlled and directed as he might think proper. He would only have to affect to be on one side, in order to drive me into that very position into which, above all others, he would most desire to place me. Again: I would ask with what propriety can it be said that the honorable member from Massachusetts is the leader of all those who are in favor of the notice? I had thought that the democratic party was the leader in this matter. I had thought that their delegates in convention had declared our title to the whole of Oregon. I thought it formed a part of the declaration with which we entered the political struggle of 1844, in which we were opposed and resisted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and by those who usually act with him. And now, after the gentleman, with all his might and main, resisted the election of the only candidate that was publicly pledged to the maintenance of our rights in Oregon, he is to be held up as 'the leader of all those who advocate the notice. It will not do. Gentlemen will fail in their object. They ought to know, and do know, that the democratic party have adopted their principles, not from a spirit of opposition to others, but because of their connexion with the prosperity and glory of our common country. By such an intimation, the honorable gentleman depreciate the moral influence of the political principles by which they have, for some time past, professed to have been governed.

But some gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate, declare that before we proceed to adopt measures which may possibly lead to war, we ought fully to be satisfied, not only of our rights, but that those rights are of sufficient value and importance to justify a resort to that dreadful alternative. This will lead me to trouble the committee with a few reflections upon the value of Oregon; and in this connexion I will consider it with respect to its agricultural, its manufacturing, and commercial capacities. And, first, as respects its agricultural advantages. And here I am willing to confess that at first blush, and as appears from the very imperfect accounts from the portions of that territory which have been yet explored, the prospects are not so encouraging, so far as agriculture is concerned, as is to be found in other portions of the habitable globe. It has not, for instance, the smoothness of the valley of the Mississippi, nor yet perhaps its fertility. But that the parts of it already explored do hold out very considerable inducements to the agriculturist, and that a more thorough examination may yet lead to the discovery of other and still larger tracts suited to the same desirable purposes, is far from being without the range of human probability. Of late, every year is rewarding the toil of the hardy pioneer with the discovery of some new valley vieing in richness of scenery—in fertility of soil—beauty of location, and salubrity of climate, with any spots of equal extent in the world. The valley of the Umpqua, of the Willamette, and of the Walla Walla have, from time to time, burst upon the gaze of the hardy adventurer, and rewarded, from time to time, his daring and toilsome wanderings. But, sir, when we remember that, until within a few years past, this whole country has been looked to with an eye single to the furnishing of furs; and when it is further remembered that those portions of any country any other subject, I give my views on that subject to be put my position keeping, to be considered proper. He is on one side, in order to place me. Again: can it be said that Massachusetts is the favorite of the notice? Democratic party was the thought that their declared our title to the it formed a part of the entered the political were opposed and re-m Massachusetts, and with him. And now, his might and main, only candidate that was entrance of our rights up as 'the leader of all notice. It will not do. object. They ought to democratic party have from a spirit of opposi- of their connexion with our common country. honorable gentleman de- of the political princi- for some time past, proto have preceded me in ore we proceed to adopt sibly lead to war, we not only of our rights, sufficient value and im- to that dreadful alterna- to trouble the committee in the value of Oregon; consider it with respect facturing, and commer- respects its agricultural is willing to confess that are from the very imper- tions of that territory ored, the prospects are as agriculture is concern- portions of the habit- for instance, the smooth- Mississippi, nor yet per- the parts of it already ry considerable induce- and that a more thorough to the discovery of other to the same desirable without the range of hu- every year is rewarding er with the discovery of richness of scenery—in location, and salubility of equal extent in the world. of the Willamette, and from time to time, burst ardy adventurer, and re- ne, his daring and toil- sir, when we remem- few years past, this looked to with an eye fore; and when it is fur- e portions of any country which are most inviting to the foot of the traveller are the least adapted to the products of agriculture, the wonder perhaps is, not that so few, but rather that so many spots have already been found which are hereafter to gladden the heart and reward the toil of the husbandman. Much, too, that at first sight would seem to be unsuited to cultivation may, by dint of industry and enterprise, become the abode of the quiet and independent farmer. To the eye of the pilgrim as it, wandering over the surrounding country for the first time, from the rock of Plymouth, how dreary and desolate the scenery. Nor did a further progress into the interior destroy or even weaken for a long time the startling features of the picture as it first presented itself to his vision. But Massachusetts is now a great and powerful State—great in her population, in her wealth, in her commerce, in the intelligence and enterprise of her citizens, and great in her revolutionary reminiscences. By the industry of her people, by their economy and prudence, her snow-capped mountains have been converted into fruitful gardens, and her very rocks have been made to bloom with the freshness of vegetation. And of a majority of the old States, how small is the portion of their surfaces that gives employment to the husbandman. But in all that contributes to the nurture of flocks and herds, and to the support of manufacturing establishments, Oregon bids fair to stand unrivalled on this northern continent. Her valleys, her hills, and her very mountains produce spontaneously and in abundance the most nourishing grasses, adapting her above all other countries to the growing of wool—a commodity for which we are now so largely dependent upon importations from abroad. And though her rivers and water courses are broken by falls and compressed in places into narrow defiles, offering no safety on their bosoms to the vessel or the steamship, these very deformities, if I may so express myself, make them invaluable to the manufacturer.

Our political opponents have for a long time been pressing upon the country the unspeakable advantages of making everything within ourselves, and being dependent on foreign nations for nothing; and really, sir, when we are once in the peaceable possession of Oregon, I shall feel that we are about to experience the realities, whatever they may be, of their political hallucinations. We can then certainly make our own cotton, our own wool, our own meat and bread, our own clothes, and our own gold and silver. Yes, sir, our own gold and silver; for who can tell of the countless stores of mineral wealth which lie embedded in the bosom of her mountains. For her mountains are but a continuation of those which, in Mexico, have poured out their treasures in such astonishing profusion into the laps of her citizens. But it is in regard to the commercial importance of this wonderful country that prophecy has ventured her most amazing speculations. It is in this point of view that Oregon becomes invested with an interest and importance which it is not given to the most sanguine imagination to grasp. We are told that whatever nation in the history of the world has monopolized the trade of the East, has exercised a controlling influence over the destinies of the other nations of the earth. Phenicia, Carthage, Greece, Rome, Venice, Genoa, and Holland, have been successively the successful competitors for the glittering prize, and they were successively the masters and school-masters of the world, giving to it law, civilization, the arts that embellish and the sciences that dignify and ennoble human nature, and pouring into the laps of the other nations the luxuries of a refined and cultivated existence. The sceptre of this all-pervading power is now in the hands of Great Britain, and she stands confessedly the master power of the world. To secure this trade by the only practicable route which now presents itself, her merchants are compelled to traverse an ocean way of some tens of thousand miles, and requiring for an average voyage some five or six months.

If Oregon shall become ours, and the project of a railroad between the Atlantic and Pacific shall ever be realized—and realized it will be—that trade must pass through our country, because the route from the East to Europe would be shortened by some two-thirds. Our country must then become the thoroughfare of this great trade, and into our hands must pass the sceptre of that power, which, in all ages that are past, has given such controlling moral and physical influence to its fortunate possessor over the kingdoms of the earth. Considerations like these—considerations, too, far from being fanciful and visionary—invest Oregon with an interest and value which will not justify us in surrendering it as a barren waste. I am aware of the attempts made at times to depreciate and underrate it. I know that it is represented by some as a desert waste, in which mountain is piled upon mountain in wild and sterile confusion, fit only to be the abode of the murderous savage, and of the prowling wild beast. But, sir, I must confess that I like the country for the very wildness of its mountains. Mountainous countries are the nurseries of freemen. The love of country which they inspire is to be found nowhere else. The inhabitant of the plain loves his country, but it is often a cold, selfish, and calculating attachment. Point out to him a place where his interest will be more promoted, and country is lost sight of, amidst the engrossments of interest. The mountaineer loves his country with a romantic devotion, partaking of the grandeur, the sublimity, the sternness of the scenery by which he is surrounded. And, sir, when liberty is about to depart from any country which it has once blessed with her presence, her last and lingering footsteps are to be seen in the defiles and recesses of its mountains. And when our country shall have reached the meridian of its glory, and, in obedience to that law which nature has impressed all things human, shall begin to wane and decline, perhaps some patriot Wallace, with his few valiant, devoted followers, will, in the rude mountains of Oregon, stay for a while our downward course, and drive back for a time the mercenary forces of the usurper.

I will now proceed to answer some of the statements made on this floor by gentlemen on the other side. Some of them tell us that we are not prepared for a conflict with Great Britain; that we have no fortifications deserving the name; no navy; no army; no militia; whilst she is represented as having preparations in all these respects, never before seen in the hands of any power in the history of the world. Statements like these are the standing and stereotyped arguments of all those, who, in the history of the United States have been opposed to war. They are considerations which were urged just before our revolutionary and our last war, and urged with an ingenuity, and eloquence, and seeming propriety which they can never bring with them again. They carried with them little or no force then, and they can carry with them still less now, when the result of both those wars, but especially of the latter, has proved that our strength consists in our resources, in our material for ready preparation, and in the indomitable spirit of our people, rather than in any extended previous preparation. To argue that we should adopt no measures which, by any possibility, will lead to war, until we are on an equality in point of preparation with the power which it may be supposed we will offend, is to argue against all war, as well as against the advocacy of any measure which, however remotely, may operate to produce hostilities. For the sense of our people, the spirit of our institutions is opposed to large standing armies, to expensive navies, and to extensive fortifications, so that our preparations are always made after war is declared, or considered inevitable.

Other gentlemen tell us that the certain effect of a war for Oregon will be to lose the whole of it for a while, at least, and that its probable effect will be to lose it to us altogether. But, sir, I cannot bring myself to believe that we shall lose it even for a time. I cannot but believe that we shall be able to send men enough into that country to expel any force which Great Britain can send there, and supply with the necessities of life and the munitions of war, for any considerable time. And as to her Indian allies, very little is to be dreaded from them, except in their attacks upon defenceless women and children. Great Britain managed in both our wars to get them upon her side, but we were an overmatch for both of them, and that, too, when the Indians were much more numerous and powerful than they are at this time, and when we were far less so, and when the Indians were far more formidable than the half-brute creatures which bear that name on the west of the Rocky mountains. Indeed, I am inclined to the opinion that the Indians have but served to fetter and clog the operations of their civilized allies. This is emphatically so, in all their pitched and regular battles. In all such engagements, the British would have done better without them. I repeat it, therefore, sir, that I cannot but believe that we can employ a force in Oregon that will enable us to retain possession of it against any force which can be sent there. I have great confidence in the enterprise and prowess of our western citizens whose invaluable services as hardy pioneers, both in possessing themselves of the country, and in the rapid population of it, was so graphically described by the honorable member from Indiana, [Mr. KENNEDY,] and whom he so faithfully represents on this floor. I never can believe that they will allow the cross of St. George to float in triumph over any portion of that territory. But if misfortune should lose us the country in the beginning, there never can be any possible chance of our losing it altogether. If Great Britain should expel our people from the territory, we can take possession of Canada, and New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia; and when we become tired of fighting each other, she will give us Oregon, and we will probably surrender these countries to her. But, if we should unfortunately lose it altogether, we shall have the gratification of remembering that it was lost by the fortunes of war, rather than by ignoble surrender—that we were at least true to the motto which we have adopted in the management of our foreign relations, "to ask nothing but what is right, and to submit, with impunity, to nothing that is wrong"—and that we have not been altogether false to our reiterated assertion that our title to the whole of Oregon was clear and indisputable.

Other gentlemen have descanted most beautifully upon the prosperity of our country; its wealth, its commerce, and the achievements of its arts and industry; and we are bid to look upon them all as the trophies of peace. That peace is the immediate cause of all this, I am ready to admit. But there is a class of causes, called remote causes, and they are frequently entitled to more weight, when results are to be considered, than those causes which are seemingly more direct and manifest. And among the remote causes, which have enabled us to attain our present position, in all that aggrandizes a people, the two wars through which we have passed, are certainly entitled to no little weight and consideration. The first war brought out our independence, and gave us existence as a free confederacy of States. And the second gave our people a name for valor and unconquerable determination, and for jealousy of our rights, which challenges respect for us in every sea and in every port. This respect, sir, is the chief element and support of extended commercial prosperity. Let us forfeit that by any surrender of our just and proper rights, and these monuments of our enterprise and adventure, to which we now refer with so much, and with such just pride, will be humbled and levelled in the dust. And, I would ask, if Great Britain stakes nothing in this conflict? Where are her wealth, her prosperity, her commerce, and the achievements of her arts and her industry? Where are the thousands and tens of thousands of her people, who are now employed in manufactories, but who, if the supply of cotton shall be cut off by war, will be thrown out of employment, and reduced to beggary and starvation? Where are the murmurings of the gathering storm, which are constantly heard amongst her enslaved and starving populace, and in the very heart of her kingdom? Where is Ireland, with her convulsive throes for the very birthright of freemen—direct representation? Where is the wild, the brave Affghan, who, in the rude mountains of his native land, is beating back with fury and destruction the wave of British power, as at each returning wave it seeks to overrun his own, his native land? Where are her numerous colonies and settlements, scattered throughout the habitable globe, bound to her only by fear, and who are seeking the first favorable opportunity to throw off the yoke of her exactions and oppressions? Where are all those nations of the world, who, according to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] are standing by, panting for her overthrow, and ready to gather up the spoils of her dissolution? Is it true that we have everything to discourage, and she everything to prompt and urge her to the conflict? If the sympathy of mankind be the platform on which we are first to place ourselves in order to ensure success, where, I would ask, amid the realities of the picture I have drawn, she is to obtain even a foothold?

There is yet another and a distinct class in this House—for on this question there are several classes, as well as shades of opinion—I say there is a class who are opposed to this notice, because they are of opinion that the President and Senate have that authority, as the treaty-making power, and they are opposed to what they consider unnecessary and unauthorized legislation. It is true that the President and Senate have the power to make treaties by the constitution. But that the power to make carries with it the power to annul and abrogate, may admit of some doubt. It is true, there are cases in which they may destroy a former treaty, by making a later one, whose provisions conflict with the former; but this is but the consequence of their power to make. But that they may of their own mere motion, by way of notice, proclamation, or otherwise, put an end to a subsisting treaty, when the terms of the treaty confer no such power on either, may well be questioned.

And when reference is had to another clause of the constitution, which gives to treaties, when properly concluded, the force, and power, and name of a law, this view of the case would appear to receive additional strength. This clause would seem to bring treaties, when once made, under the control of the law-making power, which embraces the President and both houses of Congress. If these considerations, which would seem to confer the power on Congress, the President co-operating, are entitled to any weight, and there be likewise any force in the arguments which confine this power to the President and the Senate, these conflicting opinions and arguments but show that the question is involved in doubt. And where there is doubt as to the question, whether any power is properly to be exercised by a part or by the whole of the legislative authority of the government, that construction ought to prevail which refer it to the whole, as being more safe and more in unison with the spirit of our institutions. Regarding it, therefore, as a question of doubt, the President certainly acted with prudence in conceding the power to Congress conjointly with himself, and the people will commend him for his prudence.

Again, the question of terminating the treaty, and the measures by which it is to be followed, are so intimately connected, in the estimation of many, with the peace of the country, that even if the power were clearly with the President and Senate, there would be no manifest impropriety in taking advice of Congress, inasmuch as if war do follow, Congress must declare it—must vote the money necessary to carry it on—and inasmuch as the people we represent will at last have to furnish the pecuniary and physical material for prosecuting it. It is from no desire to shun any just responsibility of his position that he refers the matter to Congress. Whatever of responsibility is to attach to the giving of the notice, he has boldly assumed before the face of the country by recording, under the solemnity of his constitutional obligations, his opinion that the notice should be given, and given at once.

And it is to be feared that many of those who are now most ready to brand the President with a desire to shun the responsibility of his station, would, if the notice had been given by him and war have unfortunately ensued, and proved disastrous in its termination or its progress, be foremost in denouncing him as heedless, reckless, and wanting in respect to the representatives of the people in a matter concerning their peace and their very lives. The passage of this resolution has been branded in advance as an infringement of the powers of the executive. But I must confess that I am at a loss to perceive how, in any possible view of the case, it can be so regarded. What I understand as an infringement of any power, is an arbitrary and unsolicited interference and usurpation of it. In the case now before us, we are called on to act at the instance of the Executive, and at his request, advising what may be best for the interest of his country. And, Mr. Chairman, it is a little remarkable that the objection that Congress should not interfere in the giving this notice, but that the whole of it should be left with the President, is urged with the greatest pertinacity by those very gentlemen who, for the last four or five years, have been envenoming with the most violent denunciation against the already over-grown and irresistible power of the executive, as they were pleased to term it. It certainly was hardly to have been expected that, in so short a time, they would be found in a case of doubtful right, ready to leave to the Executive the exercise of a power which, according to their own confession, must almost necessarily lead to war.

Before I take my seat, I will make but a remark or so upon the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HILLIARD.] His amendment proposes to empower the President to give the notice when, in his opinion, the public interest requires it. The President, sir, under the solemn discharge of his duties under the constitution has stated to this House and to the country his belief that the notice should be given now—should be given at once—and that without delay. To authorize him, therefore, to give the notice, when he shall think it best to do so, is to authorize him to do it now; and that is precisely what the original resolution, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, proposes to do. And, sir, for us to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILLIARD] would look very much like questioning the sincerity of the President or his firmness when he made that declaration. It is very much like saying to him, we know you have told us in your message that, in your opinion, the notice should be given forthwith, but we can hardly think you in earnest, and will therefore empower you to do it, when you really do get in the notion that it ought to be given. The adoption of the amendment will certainly furnish very strong evidence either that we question his sincerity, or that it is the desire of a minority of this House that the notice should be postponed, or that we are unwilling to share with him any responsibility whatever of the consequences which may follow the notice. The first inference would be unjust to that officer; the second would be contrary to the wishes of a majority of this House, and to manifest an unwillingness to share with the Executive the responsibility of the notice and the consequences to which it may lead, is exceedingly unkind in his political friends, and looks very much like turning the "cold shoulder" when one's friend is in a crisis, and that, too, a crisis into which those very friends have been instrumental in bringing him. The democratic friends of the President made the assertion of our title to Oregon one of the cardinal doctrines to which they pledged him before the people; and now, when he comes forward to take the first step necessary to redeem that pledge, these very friends are called upon to turn their backs upon him, and tell him, "Sir, you must take all the responsibility; the business begins to look rather squally, and we had rather have as little to do with it as possible." Call you this supporting your friend? Will it not rather go to some extent to verify the predictions made on this floor that the President, friends and all, will back out from this whole matter? For these reasons I am opposed to the amendment of the honorable gentlemen from Alabama. It is but right and safe that we share with him the responsibility. The union of all the legislative and representative departments of the government will give the notice a moral influence for good what it could not carry with it when it had the sanction of a part only of that authority.

Mr. Chairman, I am done, and my concluding desire is, that whatever turn this matter may take, it may result in the preservation of the peace of the country; but, at all events, in the maintenance of our just rights in the Oregon country.

unction of a part only of me, and my concluding this matter may take tion of the peace of the in the maintenance of country.

