

IMAGE EVALUATION TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

2.5
2.2
2.0

CIHM/ICMH
Microfiche Series.

CIHM/ICMH Collection de microfiches.

Canadian Institute for Historical Microreproductions / Institut canadien de microreproductions historiques

10

© 1981

Technical and Bibliographic Notes/Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

- Coloured covers/Couverture de couleur
- Covers damaged/
Couverture endommagée
- Covers restored and/or laminated/Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
- Cover title missing/
Le titre de couverture manque
- Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en couleur
- Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/ Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)
- Coloured plates and/or illustrations/
Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
- Bound with other material/Relié avec d'autres documents
- Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/
La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distortion le long de la marge intérieure
- Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.
- Additional comments:/
Commentaires supplémentaires:

- Coloured pages/Pages de couleur
- Pages damaged/
Pages endommagées
- Pages restored and/or laminated/
Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
- Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
- Pages detached/Pages détachées
- Showthrough/Transparence
- Quality of print varies/Qualité inégale de l'impression
- Includes supplementary material/Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
- Only edition available/
Seule édition disponible
- Pages wholly or partially obscured by errata slips, tissues, etc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image/Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées à nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/
Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

10X	12X	14X	16X	18X	20X	22X	24X	26X	28X	30X	32X
					✓

The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

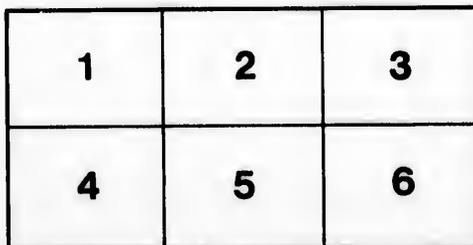

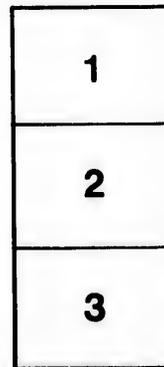

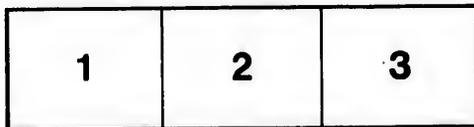

National Library of Canada

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol  $\rightarrow$  (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol  $\nabla$  (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Bibliothèque nationale du Canada

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

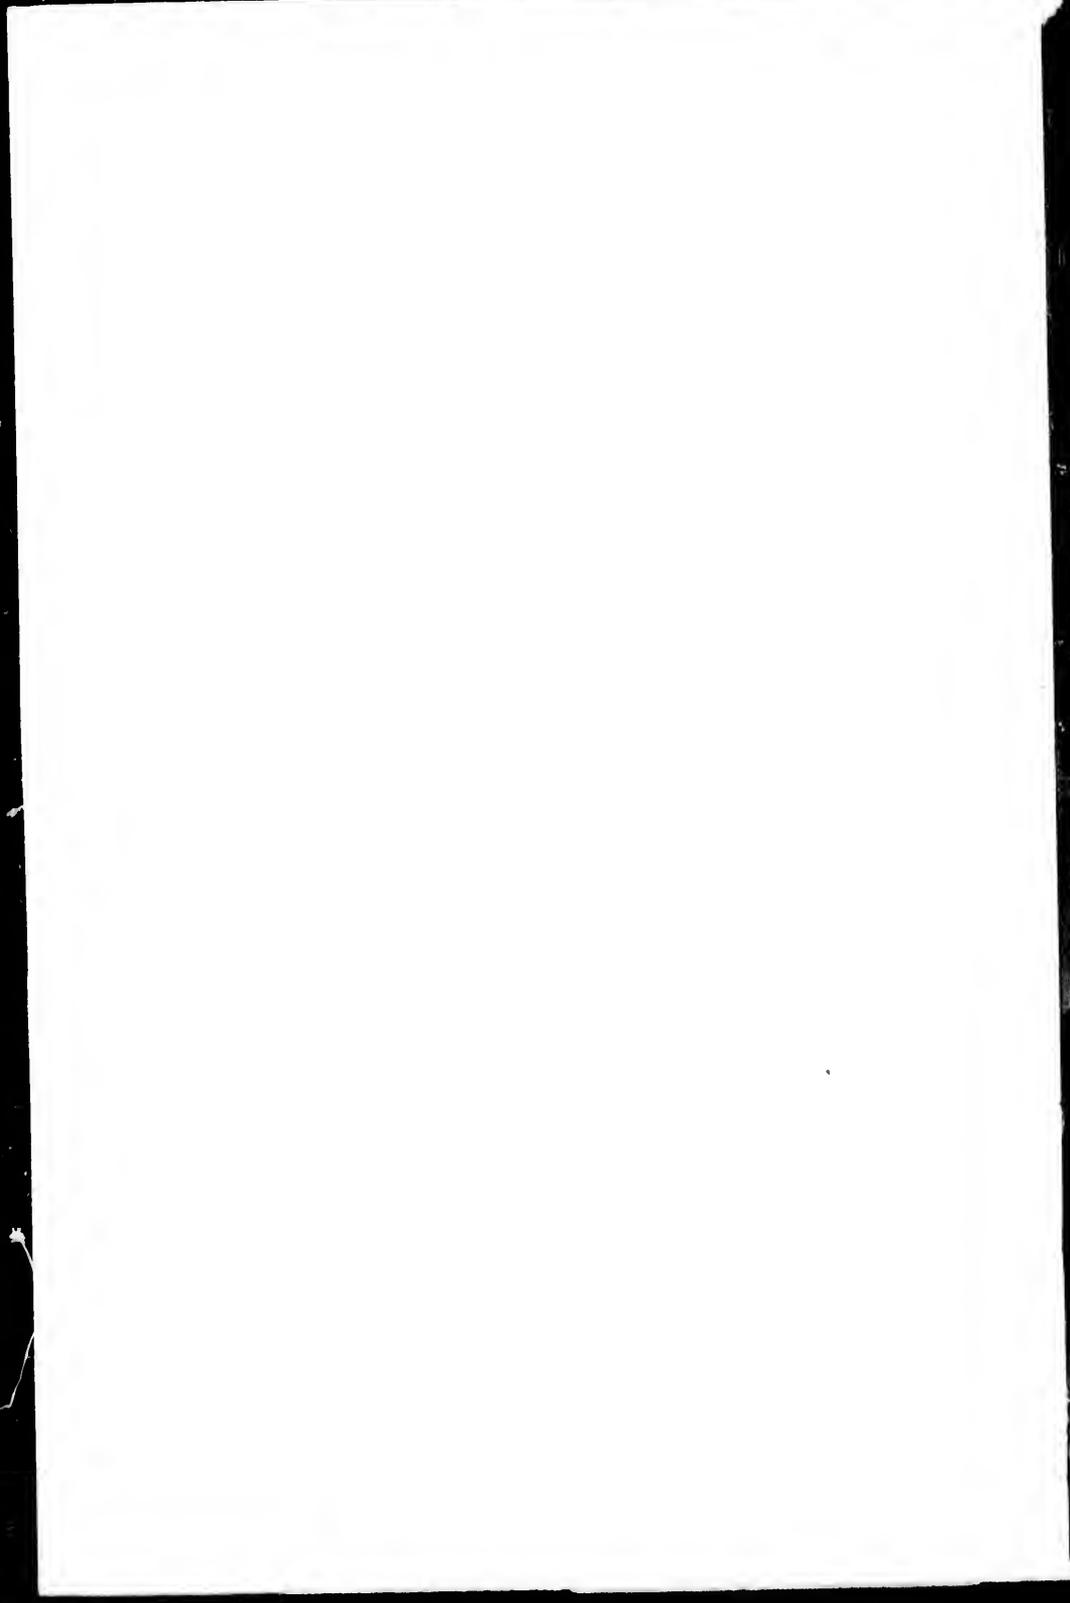

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole  $\rightarrow$  signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole  $\nabla$  signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

ils
lu diffier ne age rata

o elure, à

Can Par

H

Can.
Pass.

Burdette, Robert J.

ROBERTSON'S CHEAP SERIES.

---

POPULAR READING AT POPULAR PRICES.

HAWK-EYES.

BY

ROBERT J. BURDETTE,

THE "BURLINGTON HAWK-EYE" MAN.

---

COMPLETE.

---

TORONTO:

J. BOSS ROBERTSON, 55 KING-ST. WEST, COR. BAY.

1880.

Can.
Pam.

Burdette, Robert J.

ROBERTSON'S CHEAP SERIES.

---

POPULAR READING AT POPULAR PRICES.

HAWK-EYES.

BY

ROBERT J. BURDETTE,

THE "BURLINGTON HAWK-EYE" MAN.

---

COMPLETE.

---

TORONTO:

J. ROSS ROBERTSON, 55 KING-ST. WEST, COR. BAY.

1880.

ROBERTSON'S (LINA) SERIES

POPULAR READING AT POPULAR PRICES

HAWK-EYES.

ROBERT J. ROBERTSON

THE "HAWK-EYES" SERIES

THE "HAWK-EYES" SERIES

J. H. ROBERTSON, 100 N. W. COR. 1ST & BAY.

1880

THIRTY MINUTES OF AGONY.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Jasper Thumble-dirk, who is forty-three years old and unmarried, dashed into our sanctum and evolved a remark, the intensity of which fairly made our blood curdle. And when he completed the remark, which was neither very long nor remarkably complicated, he picked up a dictionary, hurled it at the proof-reader with great asperity, and before that good-natured and greatly-abused angel of the editorial staff could recover from his emotion and load his umbrella Mr. Thumble-dirk was gone. He dashed out of the door, missed the stairway, and stepped down the elevator well, falling a distance of three stories, but he was too mad and excited to get hurt, and we heard him rushing away down the alley, yelling and swearing till he was out of sight and hearing. As he is usually a very severe man, of habitual reserve, very particular and guarded in his language, we were amazed not only at his actions, but his words, for which his excited manner afforded not the slightest explanation. During the day, however, we became possessed of certain facts which may give the reader some clue to the causes of this worthy and respectable citizen's violent and disrespectful manner and language.

It appears that about two o'clock in the afternoon Mr. Thumble-dirk dropped in at the Union depot, to ask some questions relative to the arrival and departure of trains, and while passing through the ladies' waiting-room, he was accosted by a lady acquaintance who was going east on the T. P. & W, at half-past two. She wished to go up town to make some little purchases, but didn't want to take her baby out in the rain. Would Mr. Thumble-dirk please hold it for her until she came back? She wouldn't be gone more than five minutes, and little Ernest was just as good as an angel, and besides he was sound asleep.

Mr. Thumble-dirk, with a strange flutter of his feelings, lied, and said he would be only too delighted. Then he took the baby, and the ticket-agent, who has two, knew by the manner in which the man took the baby, and looked anxiously from one end of it to the other to see which end the head was on, that he had never handled a human baby before in all his life, and promptly closed his windows to shut out the trouble that he knew was on the eve of an eruption.

Mr. Thumble-dirk is a very tall, dignified man. He was rather annoyed, as the mother disappeared through the door, to observe that all the women in the waiting-room were intently regarding him with various expressions, curiosity predominating. He sat down and bent his arms at the elbows until they resembled in shape two letter V's, with the baby lying neck and heels in the angle at the elbows, and he looked, and felt that he looked, like the hideous pictures of Moloch, in the old Sunday-school books.

Mr. Thumble-dirk felt keenly that he was an object of curiosity and illy-repressed mirth to the women around him. Now, a dignified man does not enjoy being a laughing-stock for anybody, and it is especially humiliating for him to feel that he appears ridiculous in the eyes of women. This feeling is intensified when the man is a bachelor, and knows he is a little awkward and ill at ease in the presence of women, anyhow. So, as he gazed upon the face of the quiet sleeping infant, he made an insane effort to appear perfectly easy, and, to create the impression that he was an old married man and the father of twenty-six children, he disengaged one arm, and chucked the baby under the chin.

About such a chuck as you always feel like giving a boy with a "putty blower" or a "pea shooter." It knocked the little rosebud of a mouth shut so quick and close the baby couldn't catch its breath for three minutes, and Mr. Thumble-dirk thought, with a strange, terrible sinking of the heart, that it was just possible he might have overdone the thing. A short young woman in a kilt skirt and a pretty face, sitting directly opposite him, said, "Oh!" in a mild kind of a shriek, and then giggled; a tall, thin woman in a black bombazine dress and a gray shawl, and an angular woman in a calico dress and a sun-bonnet, gasped, "Why?" in a startled duet: a fat woman with a small herd of children and a market-basket shouted "Well!" and then immediately clapped her plump hands over her mouth as though the exclamation had been startled from her, and a tall, raw-boned woman who wore horn spectacles and talked bass, said "The poor lamb!" in such sepulchral tones that everybody else laughed, and Mr. Thumble-dirk, who didn't just exactly know whether she meant him or the baby, blushed scarlet, and felt his face grow so hot he could smell his hair. And his soul was filled with such gloomy forebodings that all the future looked dark to him.

The baby opened its blue eyes wider than any man who never owned a baby would have believed it possible, and stared at Mr. Thumble-dirk with an expression of alarm, and a general lack of confidence, that boded a distressing want of harmony in all further proceedings. Mr. Thumble-dirk, viewing these signs of restlessness with inward alarm, conceived the happy idea that the baby needed a change of position. So he stood it upon its feet.

It is unnecessary to tell any mother of a family that by the execution of this apparently very simple movement, the unhappy man had every thread of that baby's clothes under its arms and around its neck in an instant. A general but suppressed giggle went around the room.

Mr. Thumbledirk blushed, redder and hotter than ever, and the astonished baby, after one horrified look at its strange guardian, whimpered uneasily.

Mr. Thumbledirk, not daring to risk the sound of his own voice, would have danced the baby up and down, but his little legs bent themselves into such appalling crescents the first time he let the cherub's weight upon them, that the wretched man knew in his heart of hearts that he had forever and eternally most hopelessly "bowed" them, and felt that he could never again look a bow-legged man in the face without a spasm of remorse. As for meeting the father of this beautiful boy, whose life he had blighted with a pair of crooked legs—never, he would face death itself first. And in coming years, whenever he met this boy waddling to school on a pair of legs like ice-tongs, he would gaze upon them as his own guilty work, and would tremble lest the wrath of the avenging gods should fall upon him.

Alarmed at the gloomy shadows which these distressing thoughts cast over Mr. Thumbledirk's face, the baby drew itself up into a knot and wailed. Mr. Thumbledirk balanced it carefully on his hands and dandled it, for all the world as he would "heft" a watermelon. Instantly the baby straightened itself out with such alarming celerity that the tortured dry nurse caught it by the heels just in time to save it from falling to the floor.

"He'll kill that child yet," said the gloomy woman who talked bass, and Mr. Thumbledirk felt the blood curdle in cold waves in his veins. By this time the baby was screaming like a calliope, and the noise added inexpressibly to Mr. Thumbledirk's confusion and distress. He would have trotted the baby on his knee, but the attempt occasioned too much comment. The fat woman with the market-basket said:

"Oh-h, the little dear!"

And the short, pretty woman snapped her eyes, and said:

"Oh-h-h, how cruel!"

And the woman in the black bombazine,

and the woman in the sun-bonnet said:

"Oh-h-h! just look at him!"

And the woman who talked bass said, in her most sepulchral and penetrating accents:

"The man's a fool."

And the baby itself, utterly ignoring the fact that Mr. Thumbledirk was labouring in its own interests, threw all the obstruction it could in the way of further proceedings by alternately straightening itself out into an abnormal condition of such appalling rigidity, that Mr. Thumbledirk was obliged to hold its head tightly in one hand and its heels in the other, and then suddenly doubling itself up into so small a knot that the poor man had to hold his two hands close together, like a bowl, and hold the baby as he would a pint of sand; and these transitions from the one extreme to the other were made with such startling rapidity and appalling suddenness, that Mr. Thumbledirk had to be constantly on the alert; and his arms ached so, and he exhibited such signs of fatigue and distress that the depot policeman looked in to say to him that if he was tired out, he would send in a scotion hand or the steam shovel to give him a spell.

It seemed to Mr. Thumbledirk that he never heard so much noise come from so small a baby in his life. The more he turned it around and tossed it about the more its cloak, and dress, and skirts and things became entangled around its neck, and now and then the mass of drapery would get over the baby's face and stifle its cries for a second, but the noise would come out stronger than ever when the tossing little hands would tear away the obstruction. And the louder the baby screamed the faster the vigorous, fat legs flew, kicking in every direction, like crazy fly-wheels with the rim off. Sometimes Mr. Thumbledirk made as high as a hundred and eighty grabs a minute at those legs and never touched one of them. He was hot and blind and wild with terror and confusion. Once he tried to sing to the baby, but when he quavered out a "Hootchy, pootchy, puddin' and pie," the women laughed, all but the gloomy woman who talked bass—she sniffed, and he stopped. He gave the baby his pearl-handled knife, and the innocent threw it into the stove. He gave it his gold watch, and it dashed it on the floor. He gave it his emerald scarf-pin, and the baby put it into its mouth.

The pretty woman screamed.

The sad woman in the bombazine shrieked.

The angular woman in the sun-bonnet yelled, "Oh, mercy on us!"

The fat woman with the market-basket called wildly for a doctor.

The gloomy woman who talked bass shouted hoarsely.

"He's killed it!"

And Mr. Thumbledirk hooked his finger into that child's mouth and choked it until its face was purple and black, trying to find that pin. And Mr. Thumbledirk couldn't hear even the chattering women. It beat the air with its clenched fists, and thrashed and kicked with its fat bare legs, and wailed, and howled, and choked, and screamed, and doubled up and straightened out until Mr. Thumbledirk, steeling his nerves to the awful effort, clasped the screaming baby in his arms and rose to his feet.

He was going to go out and throw himself and the baby under the first train that came along.

The baby's mother sprang in through the door like an angel of mercy.

She took the baby in her arms and with one slight motion of one hand had its raiment straightened out so exquisitely smooth there wasn't a wrinkle in it.

The baby lay in her arms as placid, quiet, flexible, graceful and contented as a dream of Paradise.

The mother thanked Mr. Thumbledirk for the agony and torture he had endured so patiently for her—this was the way she thanked him. She did not look at him. She looked straight out of the window with a stony glare, and said, in tones that made the thermometer shiver:

"Mr. Thumbledirk isn't a very good nurse, is he, baby?"

All the women smiled, except the gloomy woman who talked bass. She nodded approvingly.

The baby looked up into Mr. Thumbledirk's face and laughed aloud.

What Mr. Thumbledirk said when he dashed in at the sanctum last evening was this:

"By the avenging daughters of Night, the everlasting, snake-haired Erynnes, the terror-haunted shades never knew the horrors that haunt the soul of a sensible single man that tries to take care of some other fool's howling, squalling, squirming baby!"

SITTING BULL'S JOKE.

Sitting Bull never perpetrated but one joke. That was one day last autumn, when he sat down on a cluster of clover, in which there lingered the bumble bee of all bumble bees. The petulant insect prodded the warrior with a sting that marked one hundred and ninety degrees in the coolest place, and with a mighty howl the chieftain rose up in the air and felt around for his tormentor, "Now is the winter of our discontent," he said, holding the writhing bee up in his thumb and finger, "this is the Indian's hummer." And no one laughed and no one said anything, nor asked him to say it again and say it real slow, and the forest monarch withdrew his card from the paragrapher's association, and never joked again.

ANOTHER BROKEN ENGAGEMENT.

Not that Mr. Jasman was particularly bashful, for a young man. On the other hand, he rather prided himself on his natural, unspoiled, inartificial manner. But he lacked presence of mind. He was easy and free in his manner so long as everything went off well, but any little incident out of the ordinary run of events upset him, and left him helplessly floundering in a slough of unutterable, because not proper to be uttered, thoughts and sentiments.

Last Sunday afternoon Mr. Jasman strolled out to enjoy the air, and for the further purpose of making a short call on Miss Whazzernaim, who lives out on Columbia street. The day was too lovely to be mocked by an overcoat even of the spring variety, and Mr. Jasman, as he sauntered up Third street, looked perfectly lovely in a pair of lean lilac pants, short coat and helmet hat. He also wore, as is the custom with our best young men, a large yellow cane, weighing seven pounds, which tended to give him the appearance of a commercial traveller for a wood-yard, selling cord-wood by sample.

He found the family all at home. They were sitting on the front stoop, taking the air, just for the novelty of sitting out-doors in December. The old gentleman soon blew his hat off with a sneeze that threatened to dislocate his neck, and went in; the old lady, in an effort that was just like it, went off into a paroxysm that sounded like the name of a Russian general in a fit, and she went in, declaring to goodness that she never, in all her born days, did. And then Mr. Jasman went up and sat down on the top stair, right at Miss Whazzernaim's lovely 1½ feet.

"Be careful where you sit, Mr. Jasman," she said, in tones whose liquid sweetness ran into Mr. Jasman's ears and penetrated every fibre of his being like snow water gliding into a last summer shoe. But his heart sank as her remark came to a close. Like the chicken the Irishman swallowed, she had spoken too late. "The children," she said,

"had been eating pears, and had scattered bits of the fruit around everywhere."

Mr. Jasman, as he sank upon the step, had been made aware that he sat down on something. Something his heart and the sense of feeling told him was a soft, mellow pear. He felt it yielding to the pressure of his weight. He felt it spread out on the cold step until it was as big as half a water-melon. His terrors even magnified and distorted the dreadful reality. He knew that if he rose to his feet he would present the horrible spectacle of a man who had sat down upon a mustard plaster. He felt dreadfully. He could not speak. He dared not rise to his feet. He thought dismally of the short coat, that looked so nobby, but was such a hollow mockery at a time like this; a coat that shone resplendent upon dress parade, but was an abhorrent, disgraceful "no account" for active service. And he inwardly gnashed his teeth, and smote upon his breast, and denounced himself for a vain, conceited, primordial fool, for coming away without his overcoat. And all the time Miss Whazzernaim kept chattering away to him, trying to make him talk and wondering what made him so stupid and shy.

The fact is, he was trying to die, but couldn't.

She spoke of the beautiful sunset that was just coming on. He spake never a word, but dismally wondered what she would say if she should see the picture of a winter sunset, executed in California pear on light cassimere. He writhed in mental agony, and he felt the fiendish pear spread out wider and thinner than ever. Miss Whazzernaim said it was growing colder.

He silently thought if she wanted to feel something so cold that it could stand at an iceberg and warm its hands, she could lay her hand at his heart. She said she was actually shivering. And he thought if she knew what a wild tremor of agitation his quivering nerves were in, she would never think of shivering again. She said if they were going to sit out there any—at-chew! longer, she must really—at-chee! go in and get a wrap.

Then he found voice. He rose, and facing her, while tears filled his eyes and choked his utterances as he thought what a demoralized facade his rear elevation must present to the passers-by in the street, shouted:

"I'd like to rap the icy-hearted son of a gosling that left that pear on the step, over the head with a club, dad burn she—"

She rose like a creature of marble, and gazed at him in indignant, voiceless rebuke. He backed slowly down the stairs. She turned, and with one glance of indignant, unforgiving scorn, went into the house. With a superhuman effort he conquered his fears, and looked at the step to gather a faint idea of the counterpart picture which he had lithographed upon his raiment, from the cold freestone. His fearful glance fell upon an innocent, flattened, but perfectly innocuous rubber doll, the property of the youngest Whazzernaim.

He looked at the cold, forbidding door of the mansion. He thought of the unforgiving glance that had betokened his dismissal. He thought of the suffering he had so innocently and unjustly undergone. He thought a thousand things that he couldn't be hired to say, and the sun went down behind the isomorphous furnace on West Hill, and left world and Mr. Jasman's heart in starless gloom.

The match is off.

Jasman now spends his days at Sunday-school pic-nics, which he is wont to immortalize in verse:—

THE PIC-NIC MAN.

Under the shell-bark hickory tree

The pic-nic man he stands:

A woeful-looking man is he,

With bruised and grimy hands;

And the soil that sticks to his trousers' knee,

Is the soil of several land.

His hair is mussed, his hat is torn.

His clothes are like the ground;

He wishes he had ne'er been born,

Or being born, ne'er found.

He glares and soowls in wrathful scorn

As oft he looks around.

At early morn, in suit of white,

He sought the pic-nic park:

His face was clear, his heart was light,

His loud song mocked the lark.

But now, although the day is bright,

His world, alas, is dark!

In joyous mood, at early morn,

He sat upon the stump,

But soon, as though upon a thorn

He sat, with mighty jump

He leaped aloft, and all forlorn

In haste he did erump.

For lo, in hordes, the big black ants,

With nippers long and slim,

Went swiftly crawling up his pants.

And made it warm for him;

And through the woods they make him dance,

With gasp, and groan, and vim.

And when the rustic feast is spread,

And she is sitting by,

His wildwood garland on her head,

The love-light in her eye,

He—woe, oh woe! would he were dead,

Sits in the custard pie.

And now they send him up the tree

To fix the pic-nic swing,

And up the shell-bark's scraggy side,

They laugh to see him oling :
They cannot hear the words he cried,
"Dad fetch ! dog-gone ! dad bing !"

And now he wisheth he were down,
And yet he cannot see
Just how the giggle, stare and frown Escaped by him may be :
He knows he cannot scramble down
With his back against the tree.

Sobbing, and sidling, and walling,
Homeward along he goes ;
Clay, pie, and grass-stains on his pants,
More and more plainly shows ;
And he vows that to any more pic-nics,
He never will go, he knows.

But the morrow comes, and its rising sun,
Brings balm to his tattered breaks,
He thinks, after all, he had lots of fun,
And hopefully, gayly he speaks,
And he goes to pic-nics one by one,
Nine times in the next five weeks.

AFTER ELECTION DAY.

It is absolutely mournful to notice how full of strangers the city has been ever since election. We know a man who six weeks ago couldn't walk across the street without stopping to shake hands with eighty-five men whom he had known ever since they were boys, who now walks from his home to the post-office, distance a mile and a half, and never takes his hands out of his pockets the whole distance. (He was left by about 2,842 minority.)

A SUNDAY AFTERNOON INSTITUTE.

I was pleased when my brother Harold and his wife asked me to amuse their little daughter Beth one Sunday afternoon. I loved my bright, restless, acquisitive, impetuous little niece most devotedly. I was glad to have her a whole afternoon to myself. I was delighted at the opportunity of putting into practice my untried but perfect theories in regard to the training of children. I had great confidence in my ability to entertain children ; I considered myself quite an excellent story-teller ; I had often heard my brother's wife say that you might as well try to keep a wild colt quiet and attentive, and sensible of the reverence due sacred things, as Beth, but then I never had too much confidence in her method of managing children. And as often as I maintained that I could make a good model child of Beth, I wondered what my brother Harold married my sister-in-law for.

When Beth and I were left alone in the house, I called the child to me and said :

"Now, Beth, this is the Sabbath day, and——"

"How d'you know it is?" she asked, dropping the question into my opening sentence like a plummet." I was first annoyed, then I was puzzled, and finally I was completely nonplussed. How did I know, to be sure ? I thought of all the tough old theological disquisitions on this very point, and for a moment I was dumb. Then, like many other great people, I quietly ignored the question I could not answer, and went on :

"It is wrong to play to-day, Beth——"

"Wrong to play what ?" she demanded.

"Anything," I said.

"Tain't wrong to play Sunday-school," protested this terrible logician, and I began to wish somebody was near that could help me. I pursued after Beth, who had made a little diversion by breaking away from me and chasing the dog around the front yard. I whipped the dog, and mildly reproved Beth, who looked archly up into my face, and said :

"Didn't you wisht 'at Carlo was me when you were whippin' him, Aunt Dora ?"

I couldn't tell the child an untruth, so I didn't say anything. But I got her into my lap, and before she had time to slide down, I said if she would be a real good girl and keep quiet, I would tell her a beautiful story, the tender story of Joseph.

"Joseph who ?" she asked.

I explained, as well as I could, why he had no other name, and Beth sighed and said :

"Well, dat's funny."

"Joseph," I said, "was the son of a good old man, named Jacob——"

"I knows him," shouted Beth, "he saws our wood, an' he's got a wooden leg !"

I endeavoured to explain that this was quite another Jacob, but Beth was incredulous.

"What was his last name ?" she demanded ; and again I was hopelessly involved.

"Well," she declared at last, with an expression that settled the controversy, "dat's ze same man. Our Jacob, he ain't got no ozzer name, either : dea Jacob, old Jacob."

"This good old man," I resumed, "had twelve sons."

"Any little girls ?"

"Only one."

"Huh ?" exclaimed Beth, in a tone of good contempt, "I dese she was might sorry wiz such a houseful of boys an' no little sister."

"Well," I continued, "Jacob loved this son very much——"

"How much ?"

"Oh, ever so much; more than he could tell."

"Ten hundred thousand bushels!"

"Yes, and more than that. He bought him a new coat—"

"May Crawford's dot a new dress," Beth shouted, "dry an' blue, an' pearl buttons on it, an' a new parasol, an' I'm goin' to have some new button shoes as twick as I can kick sese ones out."

And the young lady held up a foot for my inspection, the appearance of which indicated that the requisition for the new shoes would be sent in after one more race with the dog.

"His father bought him a new coat, a beautiful coat of many colours—"

"Oh, ho!" shrieked Beth, "deat like a bed quilt."

"And Joseph was very proud of this pretty coat—"

"Huh! I bet you the boys frowned stones an' hollered at him if he wore it to school!"

"But his brothers, all his older brothers, who—"

"Did he wear it to school, Aunt Dora?" I said no, I didn't think he did.

"I dess he was afraid," she said, "an' kept it for a Sunday coat. Did he wear it to Sunday-school?"

I tried to explain the non-existence of Sunday-schools in those days.

"Den he was a heathen," she said in a satisfied tone.

"No, Joseph wasn't a heathen."

"Den he was a bad boy."

"No, indeed; Joseph was a good boy—"

"Den why didn't he go to Sunday-school?"

I got over this stumbling block as well as I could, and proceeded:

"But all his brothers hated him because his father loved him the best and—"

"I 'spect he always dot the biggest piece of pie," my niece said, musingly.

"And so they wanted to get rid of him, because—"

"Den why didn't zey send him out in de kitchen to talk wiz Jenny? Dat's what my mamma does."

"And they hated him all the more because one night, Joseph had a dream—"

"Oo-oo! I dreamed that ze big Bible on ze parlour table had five long legs and a big mouf, full of sharp teeth, and it climbed onto my bed, an' drowled at me 'cause I bit ze wax apple an' tied gran'pa's wig onto Carlo's head last Sunday? Oh, I was so scared an' I hollered an' mamma said she dessed I had ze nightmare."

After the narration of this thrilling apparition, with its direct interpretation and moral application, Joseph's dream appeared a very poor, commonplace, far-fetched sort of a vision, and my audience listened to it in contemptuous silence.

"One day Joseph's father sent him away to see how his brothers were getting along—"

"Why didn't he write 'em a letter?"

"And when they saw Joseph coming they said—"

"Did he ride in ze cars?"

"No, he walked. And when his brothers saw him coming—"

"I guess they fought he was a tramp. I bet you Carlo would have bited his legs if he'd been zere."

"No, they knew who he was, but they were bad, cruel, wicked men, and they took poor Joseph, who was so good, and who loved them all so well—"

"I see a boy climbin' our fence; I dess he's goin' to steal our apples. Let's go sick Carlo on him."

"Poor Joseph, who was only a boy, just a little boy, who never did any one any harm; these great rough men seized him with fierce looks and angry words, and they were going to kill the frightened, helpless little youth, who cried and begged them so pitiously not to hurt him; going to kill their own little brother—"

"Nellie Taylor has a little brother Jim, an' she says she wishes somebody would kill him when he tears off her doll's legs an' frows her kitten in ze cistern."

"But Joseph's oldest brother pitied the little boy when he cried—"

"I dess he wanted some cake; I cry when I want cake, an' mamma dives me some."

"And so he wouldn't let them kill him, but they found a pit—"

"I like peach pits," Beth shouted rapturously, "an' I know where I can find a great lot of 'em now. Come along!"

"No, let's finish the story first. These bad men put Joseph into the pit—"

"Why—Aunt—Dora! what is you talkin' about?"

"About these cruel men who put Joseph into the pit—"

"I dess you mean say put ze pit into Joseph."

I explained the nature of the pit into which Joseph was lowered, and went on.

"So there the poor little boy was all alone in this deep, dark hole—"

"Why didn't he climb out?"

"Because he couldn't. The sides of the pit were rough, and it was very deep, deep as a well—

"Ding-dong-dell, cat's in 'e wall; oh auntie, I know a nice story, about a boy that felled into a cistern and climbed out on a ladder."

"Poor Joseph was sitting in this pit—"

"Did he have a chair?"

"No, he was sitting on the ground, wishing—"

"I wish I was a humble bee an' could stand on my head like a boy, an' have all ze honey I could eat."

"But while Joseph was in the dark pit, frightened and crying, and all alone—"

"I bet he was afraid of ghosts!"

"While he was wondering if his cruel brothers were going to leave him in the dark pit, some merchants came along and Joseph's brothers took him up out of the pit and sold him for a slave. Just think of it. Sold their little brother to be a slave in a country away off from his home, where he would have to work hard and where his cruel master would beat him; where—"

"What did zey get for him, Aunt Dora?"

"Twenty pieces of silver," I said, "and now—"

"Hump," said Berth, "dat was pitty cheap, but," she added musingly, "I spec' it was all that he was worth."

Beth has grown to be a woman now, and to some purpose, say the Burlington chronicles. Some native bard has immortalized her as follows:—

THE READ AND UNREAD LEAVES.

It was a man of Burlington,
Full learned and wise was he;
Full oft he read in the magazines
And the encyclopedias.
And often times when the day was done,
He'd hasten him home from the store,
And over his volumes, one by one,
He'd ponder, and study, and snore.
When the nights grew long as the year wore on,
He'd study and ponder the more.

One night in sere October,
He hastened to his den,
And ye book he read to annotate,
He seized his ready pen,
But his good wife cried as ye book she spied,
"Now hearken to me, good Hege,
An' thou open that book, if I'm not mistook, Thou'lt be in a state of siege."

Then quickly spoke the master,
"Woman, thy wits are daff;
This is no book of idle tales,
Whereat ye have weepit and laughed;
Never this tome ye have looked into,
Thou of the flighty head,
The 'Extinct Mammalian Fauna of Dakota,' thou se'er hast read."

And his lips curled scornfully as this Undeniable thing he said,
Which he ne'er had spoken if he had been Less bookish, and a better bred:

"Now listen to me, thou man of brains,
And in mocking tones spake she,
"It's little I reek of the books that lead
The shelves of your library;
But this I trow, that within that book
Of which I have heard you speak,
I have more red leaves in an hour this morn,
Than ye have read leaves in a week."
And she folded her hands and looked at her man,
In a manner exceedingly meek,
And she had her own way, in her womanly
sway,
Though she knew neither Latin nor Greek.

Back on the shelf he laid it,
The book he had taken down;
And a wry grimace that wrinkled his face
Chased off the gathering frown.
"This book," he said, "I calculate,
Is safe, among my legions;"
And he laid his hand on "Man and Nature, in the Arctic Regions," But his good wife shrieked as though she were Chased by the hostile Fijans.

He sighed, and took down "Life and Death
In the Tropics," by Commodore Staples;
But she stayed his hand, "It's full," quoth she,
"Of gold and crimson maples."
"This I will read," he said, and took Down "Emory's Compendium."
But she spoke, "I filled that little book,
With rhus toxicodendron."
And she brushed, for her Latin accent was A subject she was tender on.

"Then I will con," he muttered,
The "Institutes of Coke"
But from its pages fluttered,
Bright leaves of the poison oak.
Then he said, "I will cram on the Zodiac,"
And he opened the book at "Libra"
And the floor was strewn with the yellow leaves
Of the common "juglans nigra."

He frowned and scowled, that book-worm,
As he opened the "Mill on the Floss,"
And over his lap and into his sleeves
Fell three or four kinds of moss.
Three or four volumes of Dickens,
And every page of Burns,
Were peopled with tinted boxberry leaves,
And graceful fingers of ferns;
Into whatever book he may chance to look,
New botany he discerns.

"Now heaven have mercy," he cried at last,
When he could find voice to speak,
"Is there aught on my shelves that I yet may read,
In my volumes of classic Greek?"
But his good wife said, as she shook her head,
And answered, in accents meek,
"The leaves must have rest until they be pressed,
Which will be about Christmas week."

Then up arose the good man,
And stifled his rising groans;
He strove to smile, and once in a while
He laughed in mocking tones,
And he buried himself in the newspaper,
And he read of murders dire;
Of factories stopped, of stocks that dropped,
Of losses by storm and fire;

How banks were robbed; how people were drowned.

How men from trouble were made,
How some men lied, how women cried,
And much more that was awful and sad,
Till it turned his head, and the man, it is said,
Became irreclaimably mad.

MORAL

The moral is obvious.

AN OBJECT OF INTEREST.

'Have you any objects of interest in the vicinity?' the tourist asked the Burlington man. 'I have, I have!' eagerly replied the other, 'but I can't get at it to show it you. It's a ninety days' note, and its down in the bank now, drawing interest like a horse race on a mustard plaster.' The traveller smiled as though an angel had kissed him. But it hadn't.

SPELL 'CUD.'

The other day the office boy came up into The Hawkeye sanctum with an expression of grave concern on his face. He gazed thoughtfully around the room for a moment and then asked:

'How do you spell "cud"??'

'What kind of cud?' somebody asked, in a careless, uninterested manner.

'Why,' the boy replied, 'the kind that a cow chews. Cud; how do you spell it?'

The city editor looked up, paused, and glancing anxiously over toward the managing editor,

'That isn't local, is it, Mr. Waite?' he asked.

'Yes,' was the reply, and the city man, after a little hesitation, remarked that he had never seen the word in print, but he believed it was spelled 'cudd.'

A long silence ensued, and the managing editor, feeling that the question had not been answered to the general satisfaction, and feeling that all eyes were upon him, said that he believed it was generally mispronounced, and that he believed that the proper orthography was 'cool.'

The congregation then looked toward the proof-reader, who said he was quite confident that it was spelled 'gwud.'

The manager was summoned from the counting-room, and said he was of the opinion that the word was of Latin derivation and was spelled 'cuid.'

A telegram was sent to the funny man, who was up in Beloit, Wisconsin, but he thinly veiled his awful ignorance by replying that 'you didn't spell it at all; you chewed it.'

The foreman was sent for, and on his arrival in the council-chamber, he said promptly that it was spelled 'cuid.'

In answer to the telegram sent to him, the editor-in-chief replied from the capital that it was spelled with a lower-case 'c.'

The pressman came up in response to a subpoena, and said that his father kept a stock farm, and that he knew you spelled it 'kud.'

The investigation closed with the testimony of this last witness, and the office boy went down stairs and resumed the duties of his honourable and responsible office.

But he couldn't clearly make out whether he had or had not learned how to spell 'cud.'

TIT FOR TAT.

'Does that hurt?' kindly asked the dentist, holding the young man's head back, and jabbing a steel probe with back set teeth clear down through his aching tooth and into the gum; 'Does that hurt?' he asked with evident feeling. 'Oh, no,' replied the young man, in a voice suffused with emotion and sentiment; 'oh, no,' he said tenderly, rising from the chair and holding the dentist's head in the stove while he dragged his lungs out of his ears with a cork-screw; 'Oh, no,' he said, 'not at all; does that?' But the dentist had the better of the young man after all, for he charged him fifty cents and didn't pull the tooth then. But by that time the astonished tooth had forgot its aching.

RAISING A CHURCH DEBT.

Not long ago Brother Kimball found a small church in central Iowa that was staggering along under a comfortable debt, and it looked to him as though it would just be recreation for him to lift a little country church out of the depths, after his experience and success with the big churches in great cities, with their overwhelming indebtedness. So he tackled the quiet little rustic Ebenezer, and shook it out of all the debt he knew of in about ten hours, and the building was clear of incumbrance.

Then before the benediction was pronounced the senior deacon arose and stated that there never had been but one payment made on the organ, and that the accrued interest on the deferred payments now amounted to about double the principal.

Well, they raised this amount, and

Brother Kimball was on the point of picking up his hat when the sexton arose and remarked that the man was around last week and said if the furnace wasn't paid for, the notes having run a year over their time, he would take it out before next Sunday.

Mr. Kimball laid down his hat, took off his coat, and the furnace debt was lifted.

He got one arm into his coat-sleeve and nodded to the pastor to dismiss the congregation, when the president of the woman's aid society said she wished to remark that the society had been unable to fill their pledge to pay for the pew cushions, and the upholsterer had, several times during the past year, served notice on them, and she believed suit would be commenced next week.

Brother Kimball groaned, slid his arm out of the great coat-sleeve, headed the subscription in his usual generous manner, and soon cleared the cushions, throwing his coat over his arm and starting for the door on the run as soon as this was accomplished.

But the chorister called out that he would like their dear Brother Kimball to remain and assist them in an effort to pay for the hymn books, and also for having the organ tuned. The 'dear brother' groaned, stopped and assisted.

Once more he started for the door. But Deacon Ophiltree said he believed, while they were trying to clear off the church debt, it would be well for them to remember that the sexton had not been paid anything since 1871, and that the interest was running up on his back pay all the time. So Mr. Kimball halted once more, and struggled along until the sexton was made happy.

Then he got to the door, but some one had locked it, and while he was hunting for the key a good sister arose and stated that the baptismal robes had never been paid for, and the woman who made them wanted her money. Inquiry on this subject revealed the startling fact that the robes had all been loaned to neighbouring churches and lost, long ago, but they had to be paid for, all the same.

The money was raised, and Mr. Kimball was trying to climb out of a window when he was pulled back and informed that there was an old tax title on the lot when they bought it, that had never been cleared off.

Mr. Kimball got this little flaw cleared up with neatness and despatch, and was running briskly down the aisle when he was collared by a trustee, and informed that the man who grained the pulpit and kalsomined the ceiling last winter, was there and wanted his money.

He was paid, and good brother Kimball was half way out of the door before he learned that the chandelier must be paid for that week, or they would sit in outer darkness Sunday night. So he went back and brightened up the chandelier.

He ran out so quickly then that he didn't hear the man who repaired the front fence presenting his bill, but while he was walking down to the depot with the senior deacon, that official suddenly halted, while a look of grave concern overspread his face.

'Well, well, well!' he said, 'if that isn't too bad.'

'What is it?' nervously inquired Brother Kimball.

'Why,' responded the deacon, dolefully, 'we forgot all about the pastor's salary; he only gets $700 a year, and we ain't paid him nothing but two donation parties since a year and a half ago.'

And when Brother Kimball climbed on the train he resolved that the next time he tackled a strange church he would demand a certified statement before he took off his coat.

THE ETHICS OF BUNG-HOLES.

Young Mr. Tarantret, just returned from college, was taking some of his friends into a cooper shop, desiring to show off the principal manufactories of Burlington. He hadn't been in a cooper shop so very many times himself. He paused at a new-laid barrel and rested his cane in the bung-hole.

'Here,' he said, with the tone of a guide, 'is where they begin to make the barrel; or rather,' he added quickly, observing a smile that he couldn't exactly understand play over the countenances of his friends, 'or rather, this is where they quit; this is the finish of it.' And then the smile deepened so that for ten minutes you couldn't hear the noise of hammer and adze in the shop.

THE COMPOSITOR FIEND.

The night is waning, and the hush of inspiration makes the sanotum solemn. The news editor has just written himself a New York despatch, telling all about the sea serpent. The political editor is just closing a orusher full of blood and thunder, and winding up with a terrific exposure. The proof reader is opening a new case of pencils for the purpose of marking all the errors in six lines of proof. The funny man, from the tearful ance,

The jo

'A week, clear c

Ente Atchie
To h Inte
Fun
The inform funny joke, forth h

'Oh

tor, an Fun
the in he wis word

'An compo
The means
'Oh
tor,

Mor home fame.

Pap
buffal
Tabl

THE

It w when Bagda and, a the cl

'A my ke
the 6.

And him, t at his

And went hold u into h

besou was c dead t

And Rhum panel

'Oh
it is t

tearful expression of his sorrowful countenance, is known to be in the throes of a joke. The joke is born, and this is its name:

'A man died in Atchison, Kansas, last week, from eating diseased buffalo meat. A clear case of suicide—death from cold bison.'

Enter the intelligent compositor. 'This Atchison item, what is this last word?'

To him, the funny man. 'Bison.'

Intelligent compositor. 'B-i,-s,-o,-n?'

Funny man. "Yes."

The intelligent compositor demands to be informed what it means, and the painstaking funny man, with many tears, explains the joke, and with great elaboration shows forth how it is a play on 'cold pisen.'

'Oh, yes,' says the intelligent compositor, and retires. Sets it up 'cold poison.'

Funny man groans, takes the proof, seeks the intelligent compositor, and explains that he wishes not only to make a play on the word 'pisen' but also on the word 'bison.'

'And what is that?' asks the intelligent compositor.

The funny man patiently explains that it means 'buffalo.'

'Oh, yes!' shouts the intelligent compositor. 'Now I understand.'

Mortified funny man retires, and goes home in tranquil confidence and growing fame.

Paper comes out in the morning; 'cold buffalo.'

Tableau. Red fire and slow curtain.

THE LEGEND OF THE DRUMMUH.

It was during the reign of the good Caliph, when Abou Tamerlik came to the city of Bagdad, threw his gripsack on the counter, and, as he registered, spake cheerfully unto the clerk, saying:—

'A sample room on the first floor, and send my keyster up right away, and call me for the 6.28 train east, in the morning.'

And Basler el Jab, the clerk, looked at him, but went away to the mirror and gazed at his new diamond.

And Abou Tamerlik hied him forth and went into the booths and bazars, and laid hold upon the merchants and enticed them into his room and spread out his samples and besought them to buy. And when night was come he slept. Because, he said, it is a dead town and there is no place to go.

And before the second watch of the night, Rhumul em Uhp, the porter, smote on the panels of his door and cried aloud:

'Oh, Abou Tamerlik, arise and dress, for it is train time.'

And Abou arose and girt his raiment about him and hastened down stairs and crept into the 'bus.

And he marvelled that he was so sleepy, because he knew he went to bed exceedingly early and marvellously sober.

And when they got to the depot, lo, it was the mail west, and it was 10:25 p. m.

And Abou Tamerlik swore and reached for the porter, that he might smite him, and he said unto him,

'Carry me back to my own room and see that thou call me at 6.28 a. m., or thou diest.'

And ere he had been asleep even until the midnight watch, Rhumul em Uhp smote again upon the panels of his door, and cried aloud,

'Awake, Abou Tamerlik, for the time waneth, and the train stayeth for no man. Awake and haste, for slumber overtook thy servant, and the way is long and the 'bus gone!'

And Abou Tamerlik arose and dressed, and girded up his loins, and set forth with great speed, for his heart was anxious. Nevertheless, he gave Rhumul em Uhp a quarter and made him carry his grip, and he cursed him for a drivelling laggard.

And when they come to the train it was 11.46 p. m., and it was a way freight going south.

And Abou Tamerlik fell upon Rhumul em Uhp and smote him and treated him roughly, and said,

'Oh, pale gray ass of all asses, the prophet pity thee if thou callest me once more before the 6.28 a. m. east.'

And he gat him into his bed.

Now, when sleep fell heavily upon Abou Tamerlik, for he was sore discouraged, Rhumul em Uhp kicked fiercely against the panels of his door and said,

'Oh, Abou Tamerlik the drummuh, awake and dress with all speed. It is night in the valleys, but the day-star shines on the mountains. Truly the train is even now due at the depot, but the 'bus is indeed gone.'

And Abou Tamerlik, the drummuh, swore himself awake, and put on his robes and hastened to the depot, while Rhumul em Uhp, the porter, went before with a lantern.

For it was pitch dark and raining like a house a-fire.

And when they reached the depot it was a gravel train, going west, and the clock in the steeple tolled 2 a. m.

And Abou Tamerlik fell upon Rhumul em Uhp, the porter, and beat him all the way home, and pelted him with mud, and broke his lantern and cursed him. And he got him to bed and slept.

Now, when Abou Tamerlik awoke the sun was high and the noise of the street car rattled in the street. And his heart smote him; and he went down stairs and the clerk said to him:

'Oh, Abou Tamerlik, live in peace. It is too late for breakfast and too early for dinner, nevertheless, it won't make any difference in the bill.'

And Abou Tamerlik, the drummuh, sought Rhumul em Uhp, the porter, and caught him by the beard, and said unto him:

'Oh, chuck of edded pup! (which is, "Thou that sleepest at train time,") why hast thou forgotten me?'

And Rhumul em Uhp was angry, and said:

'Oh, Abou Tamerlik the drummuh, hasty in speech and slow to think; wherefore shouldst thou get up at daybreak, when there is another train goes the same way to-morrow morning.'

But Abou Tamerlik would not harken unto him, but paid his bill and hired a team and a man to take him to the next town. And he hired the team at the livery stable, and he cursed the house that he put up at.

Now, the livery stable belonged to the landlord, all the same. But Abou Tamerlik, the drummuh, wist not that it was so, and while he rolled painfully along the stony highway, he mused as he rode, and, musing sang to these words:

A LEGEND OF ARABY.

'Twas even, and Fatima, old and gray,
Stood at her door to hear the khadoof sing;
And as the tarboosh tolled the close of day,
She heard her faithful Bah-wow whimpering.
"Kooftah; the dog is hungering," she said,
"And too stuck up, I reckon, to eat bread."

Straightway she opened the ke-yew-ubbahrd door

For the dim relic of the soup—a bone;
While Bah-wow sat expectant on the floor,
And pounded with his tail in monotone,
But she put on her khaddoon, and said,
"There is no meat; by-jings; you must eat bread."

She took the Wady Hadjr in her hand,
And sought the Beled emen dnas street;

While the low sun across the desert's sand
Touched with the hadramant Akaba's feet,
To speak her hunger, quick she touched her throat,
Yokoob el Hated, haben sie auch brod?

Then raised her finger in the air and smiled,
"Hooops!" she said, "just put it on the plate,
And homeward led, while Hated, somewhat riek.

Marked on her score twelve cents; instead of eight.
But when Fatima reached her rancho—zounds!
Bah-wow had sought the happy-hunting-grounds.

In speechless grief she dashed upon the floor
The loaf, for lack of which the dog went dead.

She paused one moment, at the open door;
'No, he's too thin for saumages,' she said,
'Sihoud, mehanna drahy jab el wog gin.'
(Give me a cracker-box to put my dog in.)

But at the door she stops and gives a shriek
That can be heard at Nedjed, fourteen miles,
For the dead Bah-wow, placid, happy, sleek, Sits up alive, looks in her face, and smokes,
'Islam Abdallah! Nassir-el-wahed matches!'
Which means, 'Just wait a minute, and you'll catch it!'

She sought the bazar of the sheostowman,
And cried, 'Ahl Wilkin, I would buy a boot,
Strong as a derrick, that will boost a man
High as the price of early northern fruit.
She put it on, and found her dog, the brute,
At the front window, playing of the flute.
Then she was mad. 'By Ibrahim's beard,' she yelled,
'I rather hear a double-barreled bassoon.'
She raised her foot; with rage her bosom swelled,
And then she lifted Bah-wow to the moon,
'Wadji Iouarick! Ghattee! he ki-yi'd, Which means, 'I wish I'd stayed dead when I died.'

Slow sinks the sun; the tarboosh on the jeld
By the kafusha's marabout is thrust;
And scarce a mourzouk in the negah held,
Breathes in the haunted bustchufullah's crust,
While the gafallah sings the Badween chants Likewise his sistahs, ouzzhans, and hysahutta.

WHAT ARE WE HERE FOR?

'What are we here for,' asked Goethe,
"if not to make transitory things lasting?"
Oh, matchless poet, that's what we think and that's what we are trying to do; but when a fellow has worn the same ulster three winters and two summers, the dawn of its third cycle as a duster finds its transitoriness outvoting its lastingness eight to seven, and what is courage, ambition, or genius going to do about it?

THE ROYS AND THE APPLES.

Now when the autumn was come it was so that the land of Burlington and the country round about abounded with much apples, so that the sound of the cider press ceased not from morning even unto the night.

And in the morning the husbandman arose, and he said, Go, to, apples is not worth much, but so much as they will fetch
I will have. And he laded up his waggon, and filled its bed even to overflowing with bell-flowers, and seek-no-farthens, and duchesses, and spitzbergens, and snow apples and russets, each after his kind.

And when he was come nigh to the town, lo, three town boys met him and spoke unto him delicately, and said, Give us a napple.

And his heart was moved with good nature, and he hearkened unto their words, and said unto them, Yea, climb in, and eat your fill.

And as he journeyed on he met yet two other boys. And they waxed bold when they saw the first three riding and eating apples, and they cried aloud! Give us snapple. And the man spake unto them and said Yea. And they clome in.

And they spake not one to another, neither did they cease to eat apple, save when they paused that they might take breath.

And the husbandman made merry and laughed with himself to see them eat, and and he said; Ho, ho; Ho, ho!

But the lads laughed not, for they were busy.

Now the eldest of the lads was thirteen years old, and the youngest thereof, was in his ninth year. And they were exceedingly lean and ill-favoured.

And when the husbandman was entered into the city he drave along the streets, and lifted up his voice and shouted aloud, Ap-pulls! Ap-pulls! Here's yer nighseatinnapples! Ap-pulls, Ap-pulls!

And the women of the city leaned over the fences and said, one to another, Lo, another rapple waggin.

And they spake unto the man and say, Hast thou of a verity good eatinnapples?

And he said, Of a verity I have. Come forth.

And when they were come forth they looked into his waggon, and they were wroth and cried out against him. And they said, Thou hast mocked us and thou has deceived thine hand-maidens with the words of thy mouth. Verily thou hast naught; wherefore dost thou drive through the city crying, Ap-pulls?

And when he had turned him around and looked he was speechless.

And the women of the city cried, Go to; are not thy words altogether lighter than vanity?

And he smote upon his breast and swore unto them, saying, I am a truthful man and the son of a truthful man. When thy servant left home this morn'ing there was even thirty-seven bushels of apples in the wagon bed.

Now there was in the waggon naught save the five boys. Neither was there so much as one small apple.

And the husbandman necked the lads, and entreated them roughly, for he said, What is it that ye have done? For ye have cast my apples into the street.

But the lads wept bitterly and said, Nay, not so. Are thy servants pigs that they should do such a thing?

And he said, Declare unto me, then, what thou hast done with my apples.

And the lads pointed at each other, even each one at his fellow, and they wept and exclaimed with one accord, He eat 'em.

And the husbandman was wroth and would not believe them.

For he wist not that the town boy was hollow clear into the ground.

But the women of the city cried unto him and said, How far is it the lads have ridden with thee; And he said, Even as far as a mile and a half.

And the women laughed and made merry and said, Of a surety it is even so as the lads have said. They have eaten up all the apples.

And they made light of it, as though it had been a very small thing for the lads to do.

And the husbandman marvelled greatly within himself, for the five lads did not fill one small end of the waggon. And it was so that it was beyond his finding out, where the thirty-seven bushels of apples had stowed themselves.

So he turned him about and drave home, and he commanded the lads that they follow him not.

And they hooted at him and cast stones after him even unto the city gates, for such is the custom and manner of the town boy.

But the husbandman spake not unto them, neither reproved he them, for his mind was heavy with thinking of this wonderful thing he had seen.

RULES FOR POULTRY NOVICES.

1. Wait until the moon goes down before purchasing your chickens. Pullets are always cheaper in the dusky hours that precede the dawn.

2. If you buy fancy eggs for hatching, do not buy any that were picked last fall. 'Hope springs eternal in the human breast,' but an egg stays right by the date of its birth, and is twenty-four hours older and poorer at each succeeding sunset.

3. Always consult the hen's convenience in the matter of setting. Do not insist on her breaking off any other engagements or putting off hatching or brooding day for the purpose of taking charge of thirteen eggs, of unknown sex or quality. Better, far better, that you should give up society and set on those eggs yourself, rather than intrust them to a reluctant and dissembling hen. You might break the eggs, but the fickle hen would break for the verbena bed the first thing in the morning.

4. Build your nests wide enough for a cow to turn around in. If the nest has an all-out-door, illimitable waste kind of look to it, where one hen will feel so lonesome and lost that she will wail and squawk with terror every time she looks around and feels the burden of her loneliness upon her, all the wealth of the Incas couldn't induce another hen to go in and keep her company or gossip with her until bed time. But if you make a nest just big enough for one lean hen to squeeze into without breathing, the nine biggest hens in your flock will fight for that nest and all crowd into it at the same time, flatten out all the eggs, and then, with gloomy but patient countenances, and their several heads turned in nine different directions, they will sit on the cold ashes of shattered ambition and wrecked dreams for the next four months.

5. Sprinkle sulphur in the nest before the hen is allowed to enter upon the performance of her incubation contract. The smell of the sulphur will prevent the hen from imbibing the pernicious doctrines of atheism, and will keep her from assuming too much, under the impression that a hen that can produce a diurnal egg, and from that evolve a living, breathing, scratching chicken, could, if she would give her mind to it, create a universe and people its planets with races of lying, thieving, swearing men.

Boost the hen off the nest once a day for exercise. Too much sentiment and reflection and an excess of self-communion is apt to make the hen moody and low-spirited. Point her to the dreadful effects of too long continued and unbroken exertion of the brain, as shown in the sad fate of Sergeant Batès and Denis Kearney.

7. About the time the young chicks are coming out, borrow a shotgun and tell your neighbour some scoundrel is shooting cats, and last night he killed a cat that belonged to your wife, that you wouldn't have taken fifty dollars for. This will have the way for future developments. A successful hennery is fatal to a cat.

10. When you catch a sentimental-looking Boston fowl alone in the gloaming, don't disturb love's young dream within her swelling breast, by shooting her. It will be one hen in your game-bag if you just sit down near her and whisper something like this into her cultured ear:—

LINES TO A HEN.

All the day long, in the haze of October,
Restless old hen;
Wand'ring disconsolate, moody and sober,* Where hast thou been?†

Gone are the joys of the onion bed, Summer's sweet scratching grounds have sped;
What does it count? You still are fed,
Thankless old hen.

Art thou of the Springtime's budding day
Dreaming old hen?
Brace up, November is shorter than May,
By one day, hen.

And what then, cackler? After a while Border and mound your claws will spoil;‡
Women may weep, but you will smile
Gayly, oh hen.

Now, by the cloud on your puzzled brow,
Coming again,
Surely you're thinking and wondering how Patiently, hen.

All hot July, in an old nail keg,
You sot* without stirring a wing or peg,
On a bureau-knob and a porcelain egg,
Fruitlessly, hen.

Banish your gloom! 'Tis the world's hard way,
Bow to it, then;
Labour and wait, for a brighter day
Dawns on you, hen.

I, too, have wrought in defeat's harsh school;
I, too, have—'ka-wah-kwah!—conned this rule—
'Ck't ka-dah cut! kwah! What a foolish Thing you are, hen.

GETTING MY HAIR TRIMMED.

The wild, ungovernable passion a barber has for trimming your hair! On the fourth of December I was in Boston, thinking about a lecture I was expected to deliver in the evening, and so badly scared that I couldn't remember the subject nor what it was about. I went into a Tremont street 'Institute of Facial Manipulation and Tonsorial Decoration,' and inquired for the professor who occupied the chair of Mediæval Shaving and Nineteenth Century Shampoo. One of the junior members of the faculty, who was brushing an under-graduate's coat, pointed me to a chair, and I climbed in. When the performance was about concluded, the barber said to me:

* A prominent clergyman offered us a chromo and a meerschauim pipe to print that word "Sankey" for the sake of the joke, but we refused. It would be irreverent, and spoil the rhyme.

† Pronounced "hen."

‡ Pronounced "spile."

* Sometimes written "sat."

'Have your hair trimmed, sir?'

I believed not.

'Needs it very badly, sir;' he said, 'looks very ragged.'

I never argue with a barber. 'I said, 'All right, trim it a little, but don't make it any shorter.'

He immediately trimmed all the curl out of it, and my hair naturally, you know, has a very graceful curl to it. I never discovered this myself until a few months ago, and then I was very much surprised. I discovered it by looking at my lithograph.

Well, anyhow, he trimmed it.

On the sixth of December I was at Bath, Maine. Again I was shaved, and again the barber implored me to let him trim my hair. When I answered him that it had been trimmed only two days before, he spitefully asked where it was done. I told him, and he gave expression to a burst of sarcastic laughter.

'Well, well, well!' he said at last, 'so you let them trim your hair in Boston? Well, well! Now, you look like a man who has been around the world enough to know better than that.'

Then he affected to examine a lock or two very particularly, and sighed heavily.

'Dear, dear,' he said, 'I don't know, really, as I could do anything with that hair or not; it's too bad.'

Well, his manner frightened me, and I told him to go ahead and trim it, but please not make it any shorter.

'No,' he said, 'oh, no, it wasn't necessary to cut it any shorter, it was really too short now, but it did need trimming.'

So he 'trimmed' it, and when I faced the Rockland audience that night, I looked like a prize-fighter.

In four days from that time I was sitting in the chair of a barber down in New York State. He shaved me in grateful silence, and then thoughtfully run his fingers over my lonely hair.

'Trim this hair a little, sir?' he said, 'straighten it up a little about the edges?'

I meekly told him I had it trimmed twice during the preceding week, and I was afraid it was getting too short for winter wear.

'Yes,' he said, 'he didn't know but what it was pretty short, but you didn't need to cut it any shorter to trim it.' It was very bad, ragged shape at the ends.

I remained silent and obstinate, and he asked me where I had it trimmed last. I told him, and he burst into a shout of laughter that made the windows rattle.

'What's the matter, Jim?' inquired an assistant partner down the room, holding his patient in the chair by the nose.

Jim stifled his laughter, and replied:

'This gentleman had his hair trimmed down in Maine.'

There was a general burst of merriment all over the shop, and the apprentice laid down the brush he was washing, and came over to look at the Maine cut, that he might never forget it. I surrendered. 'Trim it a little, then,' I groaned, 'but in the name of humanity, don't cut it any shorter.'

When I left that shop, if it hadn't been for my ears, my hat would have fallen down clear on my shoulders. When I reached the hotel, everybody started, and a couple of men got up and read a hand-bill on the wall, descriptive of a convict who had recently escaped from Sing Sing, and looked from the bill to myself very intently. That night several of the audience drew revolvers as I came out on the platform.

Then I went to Amsterdam, New York. The barber of that sleepy village, who, in the interval of his other duties acts as mayor of the town and edits the local paper, undertook to shave me with a piece of hoop iron he pulled out of his boot leg. When I resisted, he went out into the kitchen, and came back with a kitchen knife and a can opener, and offered me my choice. I selected the can opener, and he began the massacre, remarking incidentally that he used to keep a good sharp spoke-shave for his particular customers, but he had lost it. Then he said my hair needed trimming, very badly. I protested that it was impossible, it had been trimmed three times within ten days, and was as short now as a business man on the first of January.

'Oh,' he said, 'it wasn't too short, and besides, there was no style about it at all.' He could give it some shape, however, he said, without making it any shorter.

So I surrendered and told him to shape it up. And if that fore-doomed, abandoned, Amsterdam son of an oakum-picker didn't go out into the woodshed and come back with a rusty old horse-rasp, and begin to file away what little hair I had left. He allowed a few shreds and patches to remain, however, clinging here and there to my scalp in ghostly loneliness. I rather feared that my appearance that evening would create a panic, but it did not. I observed that the majority of the audience had their heads 'shaped up,' after the same manner, and were rather pleased with my conformity to the local custom and style.

Well, I got along to Corry, Pennsylvania, and rushed in for a shave and got it, in one time and two motions.

'Hair trimmed, sir?' the barber said.

I supposed he was speaking sarcastically, and so I laughed, but very feebly, for I was getting to be a little sensitive on the subject of my hair, or rather, my late hair. But he repeated his question, and said that it needed trimming very badly. I told him that was what ailed it, it had been trimmed to death; why, I said, my hair had been trimmed five times during the past thirteen days. And I was afraid it wouldnt last much longer.

'Well,' he said, 'it was hardly the thing for a man of my impressive appearance, who would naturally attract attention the moment I entered a room (I have to stand on my tiptoes and hold on with both hands to look over the back of a car seat), to go around with such a head of hair, when he could straighten it out for me in a minute.'

I told him to go ahead, and closed my eyes and wondered what would come next.

That fellow took a pair of dentist's forceps and 'pulled' every lock of hair I had left.

'There,' he said, proudly, 'now, when your hair grows out it will grow out even.'

I was a little dismayed at first when I looked at my glistening poll, but after all it was a relief to know that the end was reached, and nobody could torment me again to have my hair trimmed for several weeks. But when I got shaved at Ashtabula, the barber insisted on putting up the holes and giving my head a coat of shellac. I yielded, and my head looked like a varnished globe with the maps left off. Two days afterward, I sat in a barber's chair at Mansfield. The barber shaved me silently. Then he paused, with a bottle poised in his hand, and said:

'Shampoo?'

I answered him with a look. Then he oiled my hairless globe and bent over it for a moment with a hairbrush. Then he said:

'On which side do you part your hair?'

MR. EARNEST MARCHEMONT, of West Hill, is not a very experienced sportsman, but he set a trap, all the same, for a fox or some other animal that was decimating his hen-roosts. The next morning there was something stirring about in the trap. Mr. Marchemont got down on his knees and looked in. 'It looks like a rabbit,' he said, and he opened the trap. 'But it doesn't smell exactly like one,' he added sadly; and when he went to the house Mrs. Marchemont made him stand in the back yard while she stopped her nose up with blue clay and addressed him with the cistern-pole. 'Each heart knows its own bitterness best,' Mr. Marchemont said, when his tailor wondered what he wanted another fall suit already for.

CLEANING HOUSE.

It didn't occur to the Bashful Bazouk of South hill, when he went to see the only pretty girl in Burlington last Wednesday evening, that her folks had been cleaning house that day, and that she was naturally a little tired and fretful. He thought for a long time for something to say, and finally remarked:

'I see your father's bug—'

'Sir!' she said, with a chilling intonation, opening her blue eyes upon him with a glare that curdled his life blood.

'I see,' he said, in a tumult of terror, 'or rather, I saw your father's old buggy—'

'Sir!' she screamed, rising before him like an inspired sibyl, 'sir!'

His hair stood on end. He also rose, picked up his glossy silk hat, put it down in the chair, and sat down upon it, got up and picked it up and stared at it; turned red and white by turns, and felt himself growing hot all over, and generally uncomfortable.

'Why,' he stammered, 'I said I saw your father's old buggy bed—'

'Sir!' she shrieked, in a thoroughly bass voice, and turning an icy, marble face upon him, turned to the door.

He went out of the door like a man who was going to be hanged.

'By jocks,' he said to himself, on the way home, while he tried in vain to smooth out the wrinkles in his corrugated hat, 'I just tried to tell her that I saw her father's old buggy bed getting new cushions and lining fixed in it, and the dash-board mended, down at Jenkins' carriage shop, and she got mad, and acted like a crazy woman. Plague on the old buggy, I don't care if it never gets fixed.'

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

And now the Chinese claim that the telephone is nearly two thousand years old, having been in use about that time in their country. Oh, pagans with the almond eyes, there is something that is older than the telephone! Lying! It is older than the great Chinese wall. It is older than the city of Peking. It is as old as the first Chinese historian—and about as reliable.

A TRUE FABLE.

A Kansas mule, of the brindle denomination, was standing in a pasture field, backed up uncomfortably close to a mild-eyed steer. The mule was not feeling in a very good humour. He had lost his railroad ticket, or had a note to lift, or somebody had kicked his dog or something. Anyhow, he was cross, and feeling just ready to do something mean the first chance he got. By and by a careless swish of the Texan's tail gave him the longed-for provocation, and before the mule got his heels back to the ground the Texan thought somebody had shot him with a double-barrelled cannon. And then the steer slowly turned his head, and opened wide his clear, pensive eyes, and without swearing or catching his breath or saying a word, he just lifted one of his hind legs about eight feet from the ground, and tapped the astonished mule, with his cloved hoof, right where he lived. And the mule curled up in a knot for a second and just gasped, 'Oh, bleeding heart!' And then he leaned up against a tree to catch his breath, and sat down on the ground and opened his mouth to get air, and finally he lay down and held his legs up in the air and said, in a huaky whisper, that if he could only die and be over with it, he would be glad. But he got over it a little, after a while, and as he was limping sadly towards the fence, trying to think just how it happened, and wondering just where he was hit, he met his mother, who noticed his rueful countenance and his painful locomotion.

'Well,' she said, 'and what's the matter with you?'

'Nothing,' the mule said faintly, 'oh, nothing. I have just kicked an insurance agent.'

STICKING TO IT.

'Stick to one thing,' says the New York Herald, 'until it is done, and well done.' The man who wrote that must have been inspired by watching the tenacity of purpose which inspires a spoonful of tar on a pine board, doing its level best to overshadow the bright prosperity of the after-guard of an unwary pair of linen pantaloons.

FIAT MONEY.

The other day Mr. Middlerib stopped at a grocery and bought some onions, giving the grocer a two-dollar bill. Among the change handed back to the customer was an old one-dollar bill. It had been in that morning for kerosene oil, and there was just a dash of the oil on it, that had been spilled in the morning. Then the grocer had laid it down on a pile of codfish while he fixed the stopper in the oil-can. Then he had it on his fingers while he cut off a couple of pieces of cheese, and the cheese on the bill struggled with the codfish and kerosene for pre-eminence. Then it got a little touch of mackerel and a little tincture of stale egg on it, and at last the grocer stuffed it into his pocket along with a plug of tobacco, and finally, when Mr. Middlerib got it with his onions, he held it to his nose once or twice, sniffed it with an investigating air, and at last walked out of the store with a cheerful countenance, saying, 'By George, we're all right now. Good times are here again, and the government is paying one hundred cents on the dollar.'

RHYMES ON THE WING.

- There was a young man of Cohoes,
Wore tar on the end of his nose;
When asked why he done it,
He said for the fun it Afforded the men of Cohoes.
- There was a young maid of Lancaster,
Who said, 'I will wear a corn-plaster,'
But instead of her foot
The plaster she put
On her nose, and the street Arabs sass'd her.
- There was a young fellow of Canton Much given to ravin' and rantin';
With his clamorous riot
He murdered the quiet
That hallowed the city of Canton.
- There was a young man of Palmyra,
Sat down along side of his Myra,
They had just doused the glim,
When her parent came in,
And the young man achieved his Hegira.

PREACHING v. PRACTICE.

A Sea Cliff, L. I., audience was dreadfully shocked last Sunday night. Just as a local temperance leader was about to begin his address, he leaned too closely over the candle and his breath caught fire. He afterward explained, however, that he had been using camphor for the toothache. The amendment was accepted and the talk went on.

THE START.

When you go to a railway station at 11 o'clock p. m., and your train leaves at 11:15 p. m., and you look into the telegraph office and see the operator lying down with his ear at the instrument, reading a book--I do not mean that his ear is reading a book, but that the operator is, and then you see a bus driver stretched out on a table sound asleep, and the baggage man spread out on the deck, trying to go to sleep, then you can make up your mind that the train is an hour and seventy-three minutes late."

When you see a train about three hundred and twenty yards down the track, with the rear end of the train pointed toward the station, and you also see a man on the platform with a valise in one hand and a ticket in the other, waving his burdened arms furiously, and incumbering the pure air with rude, ungrammatical, but evidently earnest expressions, you may depend upon it, that that man and that train desire to effect a junction, no matter whether you can understand a word the man says or not. That is, the man wants to get to the train pretty seriously. The train doesn't appear to care very much about getting to the man. If it did, it would reverse its motion. It is this cool, stolid, haughty indifference of the train to the man's anguish and his agonized appeals, that is so maddening to the man.

That is the gall of being left. You wouldn't really mind being left, so much, if the train went away from you rather regretfully, like. If it seemed to look back at you longingly, as you stand wildly gesticulating and howling on the platform, if it seemed to be tearing the fibres of its heart to go away from you, you might endure it. But to have it get up and dust, as it always does, to turn its back right squarely in your face, and go off coughing and barking down the track, just as completely and sublimely unconcerned about you as if you had no existence—this is what makes you rave. And this, also, is what pleases the rest of the people on the platform.

'ROGERS AND I.'

I think the Adjuster is the most observant man I ever met on a train. He sees everything, and notes the peculiarities of the people he meets before he has seen them. We sat in a car together up in Wisconsin one day, and he said,

'Don't you always notice, in every car in which you ride, the fool that always sits directly before you, and always opens the window every time the engine whistles, and sticks his head and shoulders out to see what they are doing at the station, and never closes the window till the station is out of sight?'

'Yes, I had; and he never saw anybody he knew at any station?'

'Never,' said the Adjuster, 'and he never sees anything anybody is doing at the station, and can't tell the name of the station while he is in it.'

'And always scrapes the back of his head against the sharp edge of the window sash when he pulls it in,' I said, 'and then dismally rubs his head while he turns around and looks suspiciously at you, as though he believes you did it, and did it on purpose.'

'And the man who is waiting at the station to see the train come in?' continued the Adjuster; 'the man with butternut overalls tucked into his boots, tawny leard, arms crammed into his pockets up to the elbows, mouth wide open—you never miss him; when you go down, he is standing there at sunset; when you come back at sunrise, he is waiting for you; never sees anybody he knows get off the train, never sees anybody he knows get on; never expects to; would be astonished to death if he should happen to see an acquaintance come or go; isn't paid for it, but it's his business. Has nothing else in the world to do. Is always there. If the train comes in fifteen minutes ahead of time, he has made allowance for it and has been there twenty minutes; if the train is four hours late, he waits for it. You see him at nearly every station.'

'Never speaks to anybody,' I said.

'Never,' said the Adjuster, 'and if anybody speaks to him, he says "Dunno." If the baggageman runs over him with a truck, he says "Huh!" and shrinks up a little closer against the station, but he never gets out of the way.'

'And do you remember the man who sits behind you and whistles?' I asked.

'And when he gets tired of whistling in your ear, sings bass?' suggested the Adjuster.

'And never whistles or sings anything that you know.'

'Or that he knows.'

'And the masher, whose breath is nearly as bad as his morals, who wants to tell you all about the daughter of a wealthy merchant who was "just dead gone" on him the last time he went over this road?'

'And the man behind you who bites off half an apple at one bite, and then, while crunching it, puts his chin on your shoulder and tries to talk to you about the weather and crops?'

'And the man who comes into the car at the front door, walks clear back and out on the rear platform, looking at each one of a dozen empty seats, hunting for a good one, and then turns back to find every last seat taken by people who came in after him?'

'And have you never seen the girl get on at some country station,' said the Adjuster, 'fixed up mighty nice for that town, the belle of the village, dressed in more colours.

k of his head
window ash nd then dis-turns around.
s though he
on purpose.
g at the sticontinued the ernut overalls leurd, arms
o the elbows,
miss him ;
iding there at t sunrise, he anybody he ees anybody
s to ; would ould happen
go ; isn't paid
Has nothing ays there. If es ahead of r it and has the train is
it. You see

I said.
ster, 'and , he says
n runs over ys "Huh !"
ttle closer r gets out of man who sits ked.
of whistling
sted the Ad-anything that ath is nearly y to tell you thy merchant him the last who bites off then, while our shoulder the weather

o the car at and out on ch one of a a good one,
ry last seat
after him ?

girl get on e Adjuster, t town, the more colours.

than you can crowd into a chrome, half the town down at the station to see her off ; she walks across the platform, feeling just a little too rich to look at, comes into the car with her head up and plumes flying, expecting to set every woman in that car wild with envy as she walks down the aisle ; she opens the door and sees a car full of Chicago girls, dressed in the rich, quiet elegance of city girls in their travelling costumes, and see how she drops like a shot into the first seat, the one nearest the stove, and looks straight out of the window and never looks anywhere else, and never shakes her plumes again while she stays in the car ?

'And the man who wants to talk,' I said ; 'the man who would probably die if he couldn't talk five minutes to every one he rides with ; who glares hungrily around the car until his glance rests on the man whom he thinks is too feeble to resist him, and then pounces down on him and opens the intellectual feast by asking him how the weather is down his way ; the man who is always most determined to talk when you are the sleepiest, or when you want to read, or to think, or just sit and look out of the car window, and enjoy your own idle, pleasant, vagrant day-dreams ?

'And the man,' said Rogers, 'who gets on the train and stares at every man in the car before he sits down, and stands and holds the door open while he stares ; who always carries an old-fashioned, oil-cloth carpet-bag with him, as wide and deep as a fire screen, and before he sits down, he takes that carpet bag by the bottom, rolls it up into a close roll, and puts it in the rack ? It is always dead empty. When he leaves home, he never puts a rag or a thread or a button in it. When he comes back it is emptier than it was when he went away. It never had anything in it, that he knows of, since it was owned in his family, but he will never travel without it.'

'And the other man,' I said, 'who carries nothing in his carpet-bag but lunch, and eats all the way from Chicago to Cairo ?

'And the man,' he said, 'who rides on a pass, and stands on familiar terms with the company, and calls the brakeman Johnny ?

'And the man,' I said, 'who is riding on a pass for the first time, and stands up and holds his hat in his hand when he sees the conductor approaching, and says "sir" to him as he answers the official's questions, and is generally more respectful to him than he is ever going to be again ?

'And the man,' he said, 'who walks through the entire length of an empty coach looking for a seat, and then goes back and sits down in the first one, nearest the door ?

'And the man,' I said, 'who always gets left ?

'And the man,' he said, 'who loses his ticket ?

And thus, with pleasant comments on our fellow-passengers, did we beguile the weary hours.

A Minnesota poet tunes his sounding lyre to harvest notes, and sings :—

There's music in the sigh of the wind
There's grace in the waving grain ;
Broad acres a-tint with the day-god's gold,
In their ripening oriflamme.

Now, why couldn't he go right on, without racking his brain for new rhymes, and sing :—

Ready the reaper stands ; he lists
To the thresher's clattering hum ;
And he waves aloft in his brawny fists
The harvest's oriflamme.

Here and there in the reckless world
Stocks go up and stocks go down,
But care from his happy heart is hurled
By the sight of the oriflamme.

And when at eve, at the set of sun,
Swiftly he hastens to his home,
And his day is spent, his work is done,
'And he has no use for an oriflamme.

THE TRAVELLING 'SICK MAN.'

Do you know, a man likes to be ill ? Likes to have a wasting fever, a terrible headache, or a thoroughbred ague-chill, with patent vibrator attachment. I don't think he likes it pretty much at the time ; the circus isn't so interesting while the play is on, but he does enjoy it after it is all over, and he can torture his friends with the doleful narrative of his sufferings. How some men do love to talk about their physical ailments !

The young man sitting just in front of me has been ill. He lay, as I learn from the narrative he is pouring into the ears of his weary-looking friend, like Peter's wife's mother, sick of a fever. It was no ordinary fever, either. It came upon him, he tells his friends, as a low type of typhoid, but soon developed into a malignant typhus, and then the struggle for life began. For twenty-two days and nights his friends and watchers never left his bedside. The point of the most intense pain was located right above the left eye. The young man points it out with his finger, and his friend looks at the place curiously, as though he expected to find a label on it. The young man is growing rapidly worse. He has got into the medicines. He is taking a drop of digitalis; now he is taking three drops; now he has just taken six. He will never get well, I know. His pulse is 103, and the temperature of his body is 128 degrees. Now he is talking medical Latin. How a man does love to dabble in the lore of the physician. His pulse is coming up, and has reached 118. I know he will die. The pain over his left eye is increasing in severity, and shooting pains are tearing up and down his back. Now a new pain has set in, in both knees. Now his feet are cold, and his dose of digitalis is increased to ten drops, and he is taking two doses every three minutes. The temperature of his body suddenly falls to 107. His physician, standing at the bedside with an American hunting-case, cylinder escapement, full-jewelled, low-pressure silver watch in his hand, tells him that if the temperature of the body goes down to 105, and stays there, he will die. Now his pulse reaches 120. The temperature of his body has gone down to 105½. The pain over his left eye has received reinforcements, and is pounding away like a trip-hammer. He is suffocating with a dull, heavy heat, but cannot 'prespiah.' More watches are sent for. He counts up his insurance. It amounts to $7,000. Two more drops are added to his dose of digitalis, which he now takes every time the clock ticks. His hair is beginning to fall off; his eyes are heavy; the end of his nose turns cold, his pulse falls, he gasps for breath, he d—

No, by St. George, he doesn't! Suddenly, right in the pain over the left eyebrow, he 'prespiah.' He is saved. The perspiration spreads all over him. He lives.

Merciful heavens! Can it be? Yes, the truth must be told. It is his friend, his weary, uncomplaining, listening friend, who dies.

A nice Dubuque man, having occasion to use the expression, 'bowels of compassion,' hesitated, hemmed and hawed, and finally substituted 'intestines,' and then wondered what everybody was grinning at.

THE MAN WHO HAD LETTERS FOR HIS DOG.

When a man has once fallen a slave to the dog habit, when he has become addicted to a dog, when he drags a dog around after him, into cars, into omnibuses, into society, all the Murphy movement in the world cannot reform that man. And there are such men, O, millions of 'em.

One, night, when I was coming West from New York, a bridal party, boarded the train at Elizabeth, New Jersey. I heard laughter and weeping, and I knew that laughter and weeping never went together, except at weddings. So I said, speaking to myself—the only man who never contradicts me when I tell lies—'I will have a look at the young people.' I went out and looked.

I saw the bridegroom, happy, laughing, fussy as an old hen with her last lone chicken, holding a black and tan dog tenderly in his arms, and clutching his bride by the elbow, to help her on the car. The brakeman shouted:

'Hold on; take that dog to the baggage car.'

Dismay, consternation, terror, came out and sat all over the young man's face, but it brightened up and again with a happy thought. He dropped his bride's arm, and folded both arms about the dog of his heart.

'No, you don't!' he shouted; 'no, you don't. I've got letters for that dog. I've got a letter for that dog from the superintendent of the division. This dog goes with me!'

And he danced up and down the platform with excitement, while the brakeman helped his bride on the train, and then the young husband followed, clinging to that precious dog.

Now, do you know I wanted to take that girl's hands (having previously sent a postal card home for permission), and say to her:

'Dear young woman, confide in me. Allow me to collar your husband. Then do you brace yourself against the side of the car, and kick him so high that all the dogs in America will have starved to death before he comes down.'

But I didn't say anything. But when the party came back into the sleeper, then there was a scene. The porter looked at the dog uneasily, and said he 'allowed it was kind of onregular, tottin' dogs into de parlour cars.' And whatever misgivings he may have had on the subject were speedily cleared by a passenger—a testy old gentleman with a back as broad as a county atlas, and a breath so short that he breathed three times in speaking a word of two syllables—an old gentleman with the baldest head that ever mocked hair oil, a head with a fringe of upright, bristly hair all round it. He stood in the aisle, as he heard the dog mentioned, stepping out from behind the curtains in the attire of a mar-who is not going into society, immediately. His bare-feet spread out on the floor, his suspenders dangled down behind him, his fat face glowed with rage, and he roared out to the porter:

'Out with that dog. No dogs sleep where I do. I ain't used to it and I won't have it. Trundle him out.'

'Hold on there,' cried the confident husband, 'that dog's all right. I've got letters—'

'Blast your letters,' roared the old party. 'The whole United States post-office department can't crowd a dog in on us. Tell you, young man, it ain't right; it ain't decent, and by gum, it ain't safe. Body of a man in the baggage-car now, in this very train, that was bit by a lap-dog two weeks ago while he was asleep, and died just eleven days afterward. Country's full of mad dogs.'

This was a lie about the dead man, but it woke everybody in the car, set all the women to screaming, and arined public sentiment against the dog.

'But I tell you the dog isn't mad,' persisted the owner, 'and he'll have to stay in here. I have letters from the superintendent of the division—'

'Blast the superintendent!' roared the asthmatic passenger, triumphantly, 'he's got nothing to do with the sleeping car. Take the dog into a day coach and shut him up in a wood-box. Throw him overboard. I don't care what you do with him, but he can't stay here.'

'But, my dear sir,' pleaded the young man.

'Don't want to hear nothing!' yelled the fat passenger, 'I don't travel with a menagerie. Nobody wants your dog in here!'

'No! Nobody! Nobody wants him!' came in hearty, fearless chorus from the other berths, the chorus carefully and modestly keeping itself out of sight, so as not to detract from the power of the solo, who was gasping out the most terrific denunciations of all dogs in general, and especially this one particular dog.

'But my dog——' the young man pleaded.

'Devil take your dog, sir,' the old passenger would gasp, 'what is your dog or any man's dog to my comfort? I say I shan't sleep with him in this car. He can't stay here.'

Well, the upshot of it was, the dog had to emigrate into a day coach, and it is a gospel fact that that irate, just married, with the prettiest bride that has been seen in this country (since eight years ago) didn't know whether to sit in the day coach and hold his dog all night, or stay back in the sleeper with his wife. He trotted in and out, and every time he came in, the glistening head of the fat passenger would poke out from between the curtains, and he would meet the reproachful glances of the bereaved young man with a stony glare that would have detected the presence of that dog had the young man even attempted to smuggle him into the car by shutting him up in a watch-case.

A TWILIGHT IDYL

They were sitting on the front porch enjoying the evening air, and gazing at the canopy of heaven thickly studded with glittering stars. 'How incomprehensible,' exclaimed Mr. Ponsonby, 'is the vastness of nature! Each glittering orb of the myriads we now behold is a sun more glorious than our own, and the centre of a grand planetary system, and their centres, in their turn, revolve around other centres still more magnificent. How wonderful are the eternal laws which hold this universe of worlds in their unchanging orbits, and——' 'Yes,' said Mrs. Ponsonby, 'and the man didn't bring up half enough ice to-day, and I'm just certain that cold corn beef will spoil before morning. Did you order those salt cod-fish to-day?'

CURIOUS STRANGER.

When the delegate from the Hawkeye was travelling in the East, reaping the winter harvest of shekels that the cultured people of that section of the country are wont to shower upon the Western lecturer, brimful of information—and asthma, if he travels much in Maine—he met a good many curious persons, who were not absolutely hedged in and hermetically sealed by the shell of reserve which enclosed the good people of Boston, when the stranger approached them; a reserve that, as to Bostonians, only mantles a wealth of good fellowship; delightful companion-ship, warm, broad-hearted humanity underlies this reserve, when a closer acquaintance has worn it through, and this rather repellant reserve, which the stranger is almost always apt to misunderstand and misconstrue, is the characteristic of all Eastern people. Once in a while, however, you meet an Eastern man who is as charmingly free from any cold, unsociable reserve as you could wish.

While on my way to Bath, a ship-carpenter got on the train at Portland and sat down beside me. Pretty soon, after an off-hand remark about the weather, he said:

'Does this car run right through to Bath?'

I said I didn't know, I believe it did, but I never was on this road before.

Then 'the stranger' stood revealed in his accent and his confession of ignorance, and the ship-carpenter cast off all reserve, put on the pumps and immediately applied the suction.

'Had I ever been in this country before?'

'Never; I had never been in New England until a week ago.'

Then he "wanted to know."

I made no objection.

Then he reckoned I was going to Brunswick or Bath?

'Yes,' I said, 'I was.'

'Which one?' he asked.

'Bath.'

It was none of his business, he said, but he reckoned I was going to Bath on some kind of speculation?

'No,' I said, 'no speculation; I was going there on a legitimate deal.'

'Now?' he asked.

'On regular business,' I said.

It was none of his business again, but what was my business at Bath?

'I was going there to talk.'

Yes; and who was I going to talk to?

To anybody who would listen to me.

Oh, yes; I had something to sell them?

I might sell an audience, I said; I had done such a thing.

Yes; well, of course I didn't want to sell my business, it was all right. There wa'n't no harm in asking. Was I from Boston?

No.

It wa'n't none of his business again, but I might be from New York?

No.

If it wa'n't a secret where was I from?

Burlington.

Oh, yes; up in Vermont.

No.

'No?' A long pause. 'Didn't I say Burlington?'

Yes.

'But it wa'n't Burlington, Vermont?'

No.

'Ha; there was another Burlington, then?'

Yes.

Where?

'In Nebraska.'

Eagerly, 'And I was from Burlington, Nebraska, then?'

Oh, no.

Dejectedly, 'Then there was a Burlington somewhere else still?'

Yes.

'Where?'

Wisconsin.

'What part of Wisconsin?'

Southern, not far from Elkhorn.

Cautiously, 'And was that the Burlington I was from?'

Oh, no.

'Ha; what Burlington might I be from? Burlington, Iowa.

'That was my home?'

Yes.

'What did I do when I was home?'

Played with the baby.

'Yes, but what was my business?'

Wrote for the newspapers.

'What newspapers?'

Hawkeye.

'Ha; then I was the man that was going to lecture in Bath to-night?'

Yes.

Then he 'wanted to know,' but without saying what, went into another seat, curled up and went to sleep, and I drew on my lap folio a pen-picture of my inquisitor, that was to serve as a fateful warning to the next Eastern inquisitor who dared to dead-head an Iowa lecturer out of twenty-five cents' worth of valuable occidental information.

The other day a Burlington man, while digging a well, found a carving-fork, sixty-three feet below the surface of the ground. The fork was very much the same style as those of modern make, and was very little marred or damaged, beyond a crack in the fore handle. The question is, how did it ever come so far below the ground? Answer: the man's wife threw it at him when he went to dig, because he refused to buy her a new hat to wear to the circus.

STUFFING A STRANGER.

A gentleman has just sat down beside me, and as he measures four and a half feet from tip to tip of the elbows, he has to lay one elbow in the pliant hollow of my arm. It is not easy to write and hold a man's elbow at the same time, and I will not continue the effort. In this instance the labour is rendered doubly difficult by the burning anxiety which the gentleman feels to know what I am writing about. And every time he leans forward to see, he bores into my anguish-stricken ribs with his elbow. When I put away this manuscript he is going to ask me questions. Then I will lie to him. Man of the elbow, stranger of the anxious mind, prepare to be misled and deceived, prepare to be stuffed plumb full.

Well, I stuffed him!

'Much of a place, your town?' he asked.

'Oh, yes,' I said, with the matter-of-course carelessness of a citizen of the great western metropolis, 'about forty-five thousand, I guess.'

The man eyed me with keen, awakening interest. 'So big as that?' he said.

I nodded, and he presently said, 'Well, I had no idea there was such a large city in Iowa. State must be pretty well settled up, I reckon?'

I said, 'Yes, it was. Some portions of it pretty wild, though.'

'Any large game in the State?'

'Herds of it,' I said. 'I killed deer last winter not two miles from the Burlington court house.'

I pacified my conscience for this lie by explaining to that rebellious and vociferous monitor that there was no Burlington court house, that it was burned down seven years ago, and the county was waiting until it could buy a second-hand court-house for $1.75, before replacing it. Therefore I could truthfully say that I killed all the deer that came within two miles of our court house.

'I want to know!' the native exclaimed.

'Do you, though?' thought I, 'then I'll tell you.' And so I went on, 'Why the wolves, only two years ago, made a raid into Burlington and killed all the chickens on South Hill.'

Conscience raised a terrible protest at this, but I hushed it up too quick, by citing the well-known case of Meigs Schenck's wolf that got loose and in one single summer night ate up everything on South Hill that wore feathers. The native looked astonished and doubly interested.

'Any Indians?' he said.

'Land, yes,' I told him, yawning wearily, as one who talks of old, stale things. 'Sitting Bull was educated at the Baptist Collegiate Institute, in Burlington, and was expelled for trying to scalp Professor Wortman with a horse-shoe magnet.'

'You don't tell me!' exclaimed the native, in wild amazement. By this time I was perfectly reckless, and told conscience to keep its mouth shut and give me a chance.

'Oh, yes,' I said. 'Yellow Wolf's old medicine lodge is still standing, right out on West Hill. The Indians come into the city very frequently, tearing through the streets on their wiry little ponies.'

'Ever have any trouble with them?' the man asked.

'Oh, no,' I said carelessly, 'the citizens seldom do. The cow-boys, who come up from Texas with cattle, hate them terribly, and occasionally drop one of them in the streets just for revolver practice. But nobody else interferes in their fights.'

'I suppose,' the man said, 'you all carry revolvers strapped around you, out there?'

'Oh, yes,' I replied, 'of course. We have to; a man never knows when he is going to have trouble with somebody, and in case of any little misunderstanding, it wouldn't do for a fellow not to be heeled.'

I think the man shuddered a little. Then fearing he might ask to look at my revolver, I casually remarked that I never carried my barkers when I came East.

He said no, he supposed not. Then he looked out of the window a long time and said nothing. Finally I asked him in what part of Maine he made his home. He looked up at me in surprise.

'Me?' he said, 'Lord, I don't live in this rocky patch. I'm only on here visiting some relatives.'

In a feeble voice I asked him where did he live, then?

The man yawned, and again looked listlessly out of the window.

'Oh,' he said, 'I live on a farm just out by Lefler's; about six miles out of Burlington. I wish I was back there now.'

So did I. So did I. I wished he had never left there.

We didn't talk together any longer. Shortly after that the weather changed, the car grew very cold, and I went into the smoking car to look for a fire.

'Suppose,' said a brow-beaten Clarinda lawyer to a witness he was trying to badger, 'suppose I should tell you I could bring a dozen men of your own town to this court room who would say they would not believe you on oath, what would you say?' And calmly the witness made his reply, 'I would say you lied.' A gentle smile diffused itself all over the court room, like a lump of butter on a hot cake, and the unruffled witness stepped down.

THE RELENTLESS BAGGAGE-MAN.

After lecturing there, I left Lancaster at midnight to hurry through to North Attleboro, Massachusetts, by the next night. I checked my valises. They had to be rechecked at New York. And they were rechecked. And right here permit me to make a statement.

The baggage-man who was on duty at the New York, New Haven & Hartford baggage-room at eight o'clock on the morning of Saturday, December 21, 1878, will deceive passengers. He lied to me.

I saw my baggage re-checked, and got the checks in my hand. Then I said:

'You'll get it on this 8:05 train?'

'No,' the baggage-man said, 'I can't.'

'Then,' I wailed, 'give it to me; I can carry it, and I must have it on this train.' For it was only heavy hand baggage.

But the baggage-man would not. He only said incredulously:

'No, if you can get on that train, your baggage will be on before you are.'

'Sure?' I asked anxiously, for I had my misgivings.

'Yes,' he insisted, 'I can get the baggage on before you can get on.'

'All right,' I shouted, 'don't fail me, now.'

I got on the train and sat down. I got up and went out on the platform and looked for the baggage-man. Over all the wide expanse of platform he was not visible. I thought he was either terribly slow or had been marvellously rapid. The train pulled out.

That baggage-man, after I left him, sat down and played a couple of games of checkers on a trunk. Then I think he went to sleep. Then, I believe, he awoke, rubbed his eyes, looked at my valises, kicked them to see if there was anything in them that would break, and said, dreamily and Richard Grant Whitely,

'There's that feller's baggage that wanted 'em to go to Providence on the 8:05.'

Measureless liar! by his wicked deceit he sent me to North Attleboro with just about as much of a wardrobe as a tramp. And I never got my baggage till the Monday morning following. Why did he lie to me? Why didn't he give me my baggage, when he knew in his vicious, depraved, prevaricating heart that he wasn't going to try to get my baggage on that train? We do these things better in the West. Why, on the old reliable Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, from the time the first spike was driven, there never was a piece of baggage lost or left, there was never a passenger misled or deceived, there never was a train reached a station off schedule time but one, and it came in ten seconds ahead, and since Potter has been superintendent, a man's baggage always gets to the hotel thirty minutes ahead of him and spreads out his clean linen to air for him.

Some Indian mounds, supposed to be three or four thousand years old or so, were recently opened near Beloit, Wisconsin, and the first thing the excavators dug out were a couple of railroad passes and an autograph album. Thus we see the early dawn of remote civilization mingles with the gray shadows of the æons that—of the æons—the æons—the gray shadows of the æons. Æons. Gray shadows of the æons.

RAILROADING DOWN EAST.

Railroading is exciting business in this country. On most of the New England roads trains run both ways every fifteen seconds. On busy days they put on a few extras, and the freights never count for anything. When you come from Providence to Foxboro, not 'east' or 'west' or 'north' or 'south' or 'middle' or 'upper' or 'lower' or 'old' or 'new' Foxboro, but just plain, raw, unvarnished and untitled Foxboro, you have your choice of coming straight through or taking a train by which you must change cars at Mansfield. If you have to change cars you get off at Mansfield, and find three or four trains, all headed in different directions, all impatient to jump away like rockets, and you climb into one and sail away, and the conductor comes along, looks at your ticket and says, 'wrong train, and holds out his hand for ten cents. When do you get a train back? Eleven and one-half seconds. Back you go clear through; 'this train doesn't stop at Mansfield.' When can you get a train that does? Three minutes. Up you go again. That train doesn't stop at Foxboro. In four minutes you have passed through the town, you strike the train that possesses the happy qualifications of going in the right direction and stopping at the proper place, and you are at Foxboro. You have travelled on five different railroads, in eleven different directions, have gone one hundred and twenty-three miles, and got to Foxboro in eighteen minutes.

It is no off-hand thing for the guileless, untutored child of the West to go anywhere in the barbaric orient. You say to the man at the ticket office:

'I want to go to North Haddock.'

'Yes,' he says, 'which way do you want to go?'

And you learn that there are five ways to go; via all sorts of fords, and tons and dams and junctions.

'Well,' you say, 'I want to go by the shortest route.'

And he tells you that as far as time is concerned, by which all railroad men measure distance, they are all about alike; you'll get there at just about the same time.

You are puzzled, but suddenly think of a way say, with mak don car T

as s sele way love road five if th
a ty
A of ti on t ute, to lo
TH meas
tem.
train learn he ca char wait puzz mete cloth of w of o
it is perf
ther at M ed, c
and stat of a sour
TH
J dow tic pla full ry bef
tip
I w lon
as sac

way by which your choice can be made. You say,

'All right, give me a ticket by the route with the fewest changes.'

'Oh, well,' the man says, 'it doesn't make any difference, as far as that goes. You don't have to change; you get into a through car whichever route you take.'

There is something beautiful about that, as sure as you're born. You immediately select your route at random, go the longest way around, and get there, first. It is a lovely country for travellers. And such roads. Look at this manuscript. Thirty-five miles an hour and not a jog in it. Or if there is, the compositor put it in, and it is a typographical error.

And then they always offer you a choice of tickets. One that sends you right through on the jump, and won't let you stop a minute, and another kind that will permit you to loiter along the way for a month.

THE METRIC SYSTEM.

The railway stations in New England are measled with the charts of the metric system. By the time a man has waited for trains at two or three junctions, he has learned as much about the metric system as he can forget in ten minutes. I studied a chart in the station at Mansfield, while waiting for a train to Foxboro, and it has puzzled me ever since to know why a polymer of water should equal a centipede of cloth, or why the measure of two kilometers of wood should be identical with a decimeter of oats. People who know assure me that it is the finest, most convenient and most perfect system in the world. If that is so, there is something wrong about that chart at Mansfield, because, just after I had figured out that a duckometer was exactly a mile and three-quarters long, I read a foot-note stating that a duckometer was the 'minim' of apothecaries' measure. There certainly is something weird about it.

THE TROUBLE OF THE TALL MAN.

Just after I left Foxboro, a tall man sat down in the seat in front of me. I had noticed him standing wearily about on the platform, and I pitied him. My heart was full of sympathy for him. I am always sorry for a tall man. Sometimes, when I get before an audience, and have to stand on my tip-toes to look over the foot-lights, I wish I was a trifle taller than I am. But this longing is only momentary. It passes away as soon as I see an unusually tall man. You see, a very tall man is always pursued, haunted, by one unvarying joke. Every short or ordinary-sized man that approaches him throws back his head, affects to gaze up into the heavens with a painful effort, and asks, 'Isn't it pretty cold up where you are?' Just watch the next short man you see meet a tall one, and see if this conundrum doesn't follow the first greeting. Just watch and see if you do not ask it yourself. And this must be dreadfully wearing on the tall man. I have observed that as a rule big men, tall men, are good-natured. It is we little fellows who have waspish tempers. So the tall man never resents this venerable joke by sitting down on the man who gets it off. He smiles drearily, and with a weary effort, to appear interested, and tries to look as though he had never heard it before. It must be a perfect torture for the tall man to hear this question fifty times a day for thirty or forty years. Sometimes, when I hear a dozen men ask a tall man of my acquaintance this question, in direct succession, and see him endure it so patiently, I wish I was the Colossus of Rhodes, and a little man, four feet eleven and a half, would come up to me some day when I felt right good, and stare up at me with a grin longer than his body, and ask me 'if it wasn't pretty cold up there?' and I would hold him up by the neck, and I would swing my brazen leg until it got the motion and the impetus of a wall-ig-beam, and then I would kick the little fellow so high that he could read the names of the streets on the street lamps in Uranus, and I would sarcastically shout after him, 'No, it's red hot!'

Have tall men no rights that we, who live eight or ten inches nearer the earth, are bound to respect?

'Of what is milk composed?' asked the professor. And the smart, bad boy that has to study through vacation, replied, 'one part oxygen to two of hydrogen.' The professor looked incredulous. 'Well, not quite so bad as that,' he said; 'anything else?' 'Sometimes,' said the smart, bad boy, 'a little tincture of lactic acid or some caseous matter.' The professor sent him to his room and told him the next time he wanted to analyze milk he mustn't buy it so near the river.

TOO LATE FOR A TICKET.

The happiest travelling companion I have met this winter was Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, whom I met on a train somewhere in Central New York. Off the platform, and I expect on the platform as well, he is as happy and care-free as a boy fourteen years old. He is running over with fun, and stories, and reminiscences, and I think the fifty miles I rode with him were the shortest and happiest of my pilgrimage. A grand, a thoroughly grand man!

One time he went down to Boston to lecture. In the afternoon he went into a barber shop of great tone and refinement in Tremont Place, to get shaved. The barber was a garrulous fellow, a Polish Count, judging from his manner—perhaps the Count Bozenta Modjeska, who knows?—who entertained Mr. Beecher, while he lathered his face, with intellectual conversation. He asked, 'Are you going to the lecture this evening? Going to the lecture?'

'Oh,' Mr. Beecher replied, wearily, as a man who didn't take much stock in lectures, 'I don't know; where's going to lecture?'

'Why,' the amazed barber exclaimed, 'Rev. Henry Ward Beecher; Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, of Brooklyn. Going to lecture to-night, in Music Hall.'

Mr. Beecher roused up a little with an air of indifferent interest. 'Oh, well,' he said, 'if he's going to lecture, I guess I'll have to go.'

'Got your tickets?' the barber rattled on. 'Got your tickets? Got your ticket?'

'No,' Mr. Beecher replied, 'I have no ticket.'

The barber laughed merrily, 'Ha, ha, ha!' he shouted. 'You'll have to stand up; you'll have to stand up! Seats all gone two days ago; you'll have to stand up.'

'Well, now,' said Mr. Beecher, with an air of grave vexation, 'do you know, that is just my luck? I was in Brooklyn last Sunday, and went over to Plymouth Church twice, to hear that fellow preach, morning and evening, and both times I had to stand up all through the sermon.'

And as he went away, the still unlightened barber laughed at the man who would 'have to stand up' at Mr. Beecher's lecture.

RAILROAD SLEEPERS.

Thus far, I have passed the greater part of the winter of 1878 in getting up at 2 o'clock in the morning to catch trains. Early rising may be very beneficial to as health-promoting habit, but it isn't the sweetest thing on earth as an amusement, or a simple means of passing time. And then, if you ride on the cars all that day, you get sleepy. And you sleep a little.

Now, you can't sleep when you first get on the car. You are wide awake. The car is always cold at that unearthly and unchristian hour. And you have to either sit on the wood-box or have a timid quarrel with some man travelling on a pass or a half-fare ticket to make him let you have a small fractional part of one of the four seats he has spread himself out over. If you don't weigh any more than myself, you do as I do—pick out the cross-eyed-looking brakeman on the train, call him 'conductor,' and give him half a dollar to get you a seat.

And it just makes the immortal gods lie down on the grass and hold their ambrosia-scented breath to see him waltz in and stir up the menagerie.

But along about ten o'clock you begin to grow most intolerably sleepy. This is partly owing to the fact that the car is now delightfully warm and comfortable, but it is chiefly because the car is at this time about as full of passengers as it is going to be, and about two-thirds of the number are women.

It is a supremely comfortable feeling that comes creeping over a man, just as he sinks into profound slumber. But it is extremely mortifying for him to wake very suddenly, with the scalding consciousness that he has been sleeping for nearly eighteen miles in the regularly ordinary day-coach fashion, with his head hanging down over the back of the seat, his mouth open so wide nobody could see his face, and the first thing he sees when he opens his eyes is five girls, looking straight at him. It annoys him. It makes him feel that he appears at great disadvantage with the rest of the passengers who are and have been wide awake. Even a married man, the marriedest man in the United States, old and out of the market, doesn't like to afford amusement in that way to the only pretty passengers on the train. Even a man with the best wife and the only boy worth having in America, feels that he has lost dignity under such circumstances. I am going to quit it. I shall cancel, without further provocation, the next lecture engagement that is implicated with a peep o' day train.

I am going to shut down on this early rising. Somebody will get killed with this foolishness yet. Congress ought to pass a law, making early rising a capital offence. By the time one or two men were hanged for getting up at three o'clock, people will quit it. If it isn't stopped, some man will get his eye put out with it.

If—I mean when I am president, I shall issue a proclamation compelling all railway trains to start from all stations at 9 o'clock, A. M.—that's a good hour—and to arrive at all stations at not later than 6:30 P. M. I think I have about the correct views on railway legislation.

A DISAPPOINTED ETYMOLOGIST.

"Let me look at your dictionary a minute," a polite, well-dressed stranger asked, bowing into the sanctum in some haste yesterday morning. "Certainly," and we shoved Noah W.'s charming novelette, unexpurgated edition, over to his side of the table. Long and earnestly looked the man. Then a dark frown settled down on his brow like a winter cloud. He banged the book down on the floor and kicked it. "Blame such a dictionary," he roared, "I wouldn't give a cent a thousand for such a book! It's got Independence, and Homestead, and Crescent, and Pilot, and Sandwich, and a whole host of them little towns in it, and never a mention of Burlington, or Keokuk, or Des Moines, or Chicago, or any big town in the whole book!" And he gave it a parting kick and was gone.

CARDS vs. CROQUET.

From the car window, I saw to-day the first game of croquet of the season. The game possesses a singular interest for me. One time, I rode more than fifty miles in a railway car, seated behind four men who were playing with those awful playthings of the devil—cards. They played euchre until they were tired of it; they played a little seven-up, pedro, and occasionally a trifle of poker. I never heard a dispute. Their frequent bursts of merriment at some unexpected play repeatedly drew my eyes from my book. They never quarrelled, and never once called names. When I got out at the station I sat at my window and watched a party of young men and maidens play croquet. In fifteen minutes I saw two persons cheat successfully. I heard the one player who did not cheat accused of cheating five times. I heard four distinct, bitter quarrels. I heard a beautiful young girl tell two lies, and a meek-looking young man three, and finally I saw the young girl throw her mallet so hard against a fence that it frightened a horse; the other young girl pounded her mallet so hard on the ground that it knocked the buds off an apple tree. They both banged into the house at different doors, and the two young men looked sheepish and went off after a drink. Now, why is this? Isn't croquet a good moral game?

A woman writes to find out what evil genius it is that always leads a man into the parlour to black his boots on the best ottoman, rather than on the more convenient wood-box in the kitchen? And why a man always starts to walk away from the washstand when he begins to wipe his face, and drops the towel half-way down the stairs, or out in the front yard, or wherever he may be when his face is dried? Good land, woman, do we know the unfathomable? We suppose its the same impulse that always makes a woman stand before the glass to comb her back hair or button the back of her polonaise.

THE PASSING OF THE TRAIN BOY.

In the West the day was dying;
Wintry cloud ships near the sun,
In a sea of crimson lying,
Told the day was almost done.
On his couch of pain and weakness,
Pale and still the train boy lies,
Beams his face with placid meekness,
Glow with softened light his eyes.

'Comrades, on both sides surround me,'
And he brightens with a smile;
'In two long lines stand around me,
Make my couch the Pullman aisle.'
Even as the wish he utters
Round they stand with wond'ring stares,
While in husky tones he mutters,
'Pears? Fresh California pears?'

Then they tumble to his fancies
And at passengers the play,
While they snarl with surly glances,
'Naw!' 'Don't want no pears!' 'Go 'way!'
Then they closer stand around him,
Bending low to hear him say,
As though in the car they found him—
'Peanuts? Roasted, fresh, to-day!'

Then they hoot in wild derision,
And in answer to their scorn,
Loud he cries, with kindling vision,
'English walnuts? Fresh pop-corn?
All the latest and the best books?
Morning papers? "Journal," "Times,"
"Daily Hawkeye." Roasted chestnuts?
Don't be stingy with your dimes.

'New-laid figs? The best imported Hand-made Abyssinian dates?
Train stops while you eat one: sorted
For the trade in canvas crates.'
Thus his strength comes back with chaffing,
And his comrades dry their tears;
From death's jaws he leaps, and laughing,
Runs the train for fifty years.

When Hamlet said, 'Seams, madam? Nay, I know not seams,' he was not talking poetry, but had just killed a sewing-machine agent in the front hall.

LOST HIS POCKET-BOOK.

My troubles in getting from Summit, New Jersey, to Herkimer, New York, in a snow-storm, began at the Hoboken ferries. There was enough ice in the river to start a new Greenland. Then, when at last I got across the river and up the Grand Central depot, I found I had just time to make the train if I flew around, and—

I couldn't find my pocket-book.

I knew I hadn't lost it, or given it away, so I hunted for it.

I have often laughed at a nervous, belated traveller searching for his pocket-book, while the jangling bells and hissing cylinder cocks out on the tracks drove him wild with nervousness and terror. I will never laugh at him again.

Believe me, there is nothing funny about it, nothing.

'You'll have time to get the train if you hurry,' the ticket-agent said.

I felt in my hip pocket. No pocket-book there. I felt in my other hip pocket. A watch key, a chestnut, five newspaper clippings, two letters and a piece of string. No pocket-book. I went down into my inside vest pocket. No indication of a national bank in that vicinity. I dived into my outside vest pockets, and the sounding apparatus brought up handfuls of lint, broken matches, fragments of wooden tooth-picks, hotel cards, eyeless buttons, and bits of lead-pencils. I plunged madly into the pockets of my coat. I brought up handkerchiefs, a pocket-comb, some visiting-cards, a conductor's check—how did I manage to keep that? I wondered; a calendar for 1879, a reporter's note-book, a hotel-key—for heaven's sake when and from where did I carry that off?—a pair of gloves, two time cards, and a pocket-map of New England, but nothing with which I could buy a ticket to Utica. My hands moved faster than the days on a promissory note. The people in the depot laughed a great deal and pitied a little. The case was growing desperate. The man at the gate chanted, "All aboard for Albany and the West," and I went fairly wild with excitement. I inaugurated a sweeping investigation into the condition and contents of my overcoat pockets, and as I dragged the things out, I piled them upon the floor. Newspapers of various dates; an "Official railway guide," with all the time-tables wrong and the ticket fares set down in the population columns; a map of New York and Pennsylvania, a pair of mittens, a pocket knife—how did that come out there? a lot of visiting cards, a memorandum book, a quart of letters, a package of stamped envelopes, a pocket-handkerchief, a vest buckle, a copy of Puck and a late Graphic, two grains of corn, a hat full of lint, some string, a round stone, a black neck-tie, and a lamp of chalk.

How the people in the depot enjoyed it and took it all in. Only one man sincerely pitied me. He came up and watched me, while with feverish eagerness and frenzied haste I emptied those cisterns of pockets, and by and by he said:

'How fur ye going, mister?'

'Utica,' I gasped: 'Utica, if I go anywhere.'

He looked at me pityingly for a moment, while I went on wildly strewing the floor of the Grand Central depot with the chaos of things evolved from my pockets.

'By gaul,' he said, 'I've a good mind to lend you the money.'

But just then, clear down at the bottom of an outside pocket, my missing national bank turned up. I got on the train without even time to thank the tender-hearted New-Yorker, and started on my way toward a snow-drift as big as the side of Pike's Peak. And when I got down to Herkimer this afternoon, I rode down in a train consisting of three coaches and three engines.

Engines are no object to the railroaders of this country where there is snow on the air. Last night you hear the air go into convulsions with the most terrific coughing and puffing that ever startled the night. The earth trembles and quakes under the straining, panting engines. Here she comes. One locomotive passes you; two, three, four, five, six engines go straining and panting by. Now for the train. You look to see a train that reaches from there to Rochester.

There is one smoking car!

A BASE FLATTERER.

Jonesburg, Missouri. A touching incident has just obtruded itself upon the attention of the passengers. A gentleman, it may be Mr. Jones himself for aught I know, has just got off the train very abruptly. He missed the two lower steps on the car entirely, but he hit the platform plumb centre, breaking his fall by dropping on a bird-cage he was carrying. As a buffer a bird-cage is not a success. It is yielding enough, but does not possess a sufficient degree of elasticity. I am happy to state that although the once beautiful bird-cage, as the gentleman angrily holds it up to examine it, now looks like a gilded wire gridiron, the canary is not dead. But it is cooped up in the narrowest corner that a terrified canary ever cramped its legs in.

How the people in the depot enjoyed it

BEAUTIFUL SNOW.

A NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

My visions of spring have taken the wing, and are off with the flight of the stork, and the climate to-day, in a mild sort of way, reminds me of Central New York.

For the beautiful snow, as you probably know, has taken this country by storm; and with wonderful thrift it piles drift upon drift, in the very worst kind of bad form.

The trains are delayed, and my lecture played, for it's thirteen long miles to Carlisle; and the way it is snowing, and drifting and blowing, thirty rods makes a pretty long mile.

So despairing I wait till the storm shall abate, and some kind of a train comes along, when, shorter and faster than any short metre, I'll cut off the rest of my song.

But with portent most dire, still higher and higher, still pile up the drifts at the winder; with the roar of a gong* the storm sweeps along, and no one seems able to hinder.

It's provoking, oh, very; I thought February a season devoted to thaw; but the ground hog—I guess 'at het, just like necessity, knows neither season nor law.

For the flakes whirling down I can't see the town; I can't tell the South from the Bend; for all I can see, all the world except me, has suddenly come to an end.

It's just my blessed luck, in a drift to get stuck, and I think if I sought the equator, that a snow storm would foller and fill every holler, with the drifts of a seventy-eighter.

FOREBODINGS.

'Blow, blow, thou winter wynd,
Thou art not so unky-ind
As man's ingrati-ude;
The folk at New Carlisle,
With unbecoming smile,
Will say, 'He might have got here if 'he wude.'

But how can a feller get anywhere,
When the drifting snowflakes fill the air,
And the trains are all behind?
When he can't do nothing but stand and stare
At the useless time cards, here and there,
That grimly answer his anxious stare
By asking him "what he can find?"

* It doesn't really sound very much like a gong, but I couldn't think of anything else to rhyme with song.

Accent heavy on the first syllable of this clause. Explanations of this line will be sent to every person who sends in a year's subscription for The Hawkeye.

When the best he can do is to sulk and mope,
And vainly hope against hopeless hope,
And vaguely into philosophy grope
And endeavour to feel resigned?
While he knows, as certain as he can see,
How awfully mad the committee will be,
The much-abused, patient committee,
With the hall man claiming his rent or he'll sue,
And a bill for dodgers and posters due,
And nothing to straddle the blind?"

THRENODY.*

I've a letter from thy sire,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann,
And he's just as mad as fire,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
And he says if I come nigher,
That he'll raise me ten times higher,
Than the German Methodist spire,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
If to win thee I aspire,
Mary Ann!

Oh! I dread to see his fa-face,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
For I know he'll give me cha-
-hase,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
He will wait me round the room;
He will fan me with the broom;
Yes, I safely may assume,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann,
That he'll fire me out the roo-
-hoom,
Mary Ann!

I'm so scared I cannot slee-
-heep,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann;
For I'm stuck all of a hea-
-heap,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
He is coming after me!
Blood in both his eyes I see,
Oh wherever shall I flee-
-hee?
Mary Ann, Mary Ann;
He will make it hot for me-
-he,
Mary Ann!

There is a parrot in Marshalltown, Iowa, that is fifty years old, but it can say 'Pollywolla kowackwah' just as plainly and just as many hundred thousand times a day, as it could when Iowa was a howling wilderness.

* This expression, the exact meaning of which I do not know, is something I once heard down in south-western Missouri. I think it is the pass-word to some sort of secret society.

* It may strike the critical reader that the threnody hasn't much to do with the snow storm. I will admit that I was impressed with the same idea, but I couldn't see, as I went along, just how I could work the snow storm in, so I just let the thing take its own course, hoping that it would come around to the snow storm after a while, some way or other; instead of which it just seemed to get threnodier and threnodier; and connoisseurs think the climax is reached in the third stanza, which is pronounced by the supreme court of the United States, admitted to be the best judges, to be the threnodiest of the lot.

THE VENTILATION FIEND.

At Lyon Falls the ventilation fiend gets on the train. She is a woman this time. 'Would I open the window for her?

I would and did.

Did it annoy me?

Oh, no; I rather liked to have the snow blow in and beat down my neck and back. It soothed me and braced me, as it were, up.

She was fading away, she told me, with consumption.

I didn't doubt it. She was five inches taller than myself, and weighed about one hundred and eighty-nine. Every time she coughed it knocked the stove down.

The woman said to me that she knew it was her fate. Her mother passed away with the same fell scourge: her mother's father and his mother before him died by the same disease; all of her brothers and sisters, too, had thus passed away. She was the last of seven, she said, sadly. Was my life, she asked, under the dark shadow of any hereditary taint?

Oh, no, I said, as cheerfully as I could under the circumstances. Oh, no, there had never been any such depressing monotony in our family in its taking off. We never had any particular or favourite style of dying. When the time come we never delayed things waiting for the family complaint. We just laid down and died of anything that happened to come along. Anything that was handy at the time suited us.

The other day such a beautiful young lady, eyes like midnight, hair like the raven's wing, brow like alabaster, lips like coral, purse like an overland mail pouch, went into a Jefferson street dry-goods store, and asked to see some corn-coloured silk. The youngest clerk limped painfully behind the counter and handed her down a piece of scarlet. 'I said corn-colour,' she murmured. The young salesman hesitated and fidgeted. 'Well, by dad,' he exclaimed, 'that's the prevailing colour of all my corns.' And by the time the proprietor could hurry over to ask what was the matter, she was out of the door, and half a block away.

EATING ON THE FLY.

Lowville—Ten minutes for refreshments. The sandwich of the railroad; the custard pie three inches thick; the ham sandwich with the ham left out; the biscuit that was cast at the iron foundry; the coffee that ought to be named Macbeth, because it murders sleep; ten minutes for refreshments. Bolt 'em down.

Castor Land, the next station, only eight miles further on. What an appropriate name to follow the dinner station! Castor Land; pity it wasn't an island, they could call it Castor Isle. Castor Land. I suppose the happy beings who live here are known as Castor beins.

It is snowing so hard as we pass through this station that you can't tell the land from the Castor.

A NEW NAME FOR IT.

'King Humbert,' old Mr. Throstlewaite read from his paper, 'is said to be very fond of Garibaldi.' 'And it's none to his credit,' sputtered Mrs. Throstlewaite, 'that he is. The king of Italy might have better tastes than to be a-sitting on his royal throne guzzling and swilling spirituous liquors with funny names while the people demand all his attention. If he's fond of it now, where will his appetite carry him by the time he's forty-five? His fancy drinks won't be strong enough for h'm then, and he'll be a common raw whiskey drunkard.' And she went on to tell of a young man she knew at New Bedford, who was passionately fond of Tammanjerry, and drank himself to the grave in 23 years.

RAILWAY CRITICISM.

Friday morning, as the Utica and Black River train goes out of Watertown, two intelligent citizens sitting behind me enter into conversation. The first intelligent citizen, whose face is fringed with a gray beard, and whose mouth looks as though it had been used to hang him up by when he was young, wanted to know of the second intelligent citizen what the lecture was about. The second intelligent citizen, a tall, brown-bearded man, who wrinkles his forehead to the roots of his hair in an apparently agonized effort to keep his eyes open, while he stares feebly out at the world through a pair of eye-glasses, and who tucks his long hair under at the ends until he looks like a blood relation of the jack of clubs, says, "it wan't much account; it was about a man—some man he knew—a kind of a boy—boy—sort of a kind of a boy—or a man—man died, he believed; boy shaved himself—some boy; it wan't much account; wan't worth listening to."

I am greatly pleased, but I have my revenge. I draw, on my paper block, pictures of the 'jack of clubs,' and make his nose enormously long. There is a look of a school teacher about the 'jack' that reminds me of my school days, and I never yet saw the on, only eight an appropriate nation! Castor and, they could

ad. I suppose ere are known e pass through the land from

R. IT.

Throstlewaite to be very fond
'to his credit,'
'that he is.
'better tastes
al throne guzliquors with le demand all it now, where the time he's on't be strong be a common she went on knew at New tely fond of mself to the

ISM.

and Black own, two in-me enter into gent citizen,
ay beard, and it had been he was young,
d intelligent out. The se-brown-beard-head to the tly agonized hile he stares
a pair of long hair unlike a blood
rs, "it wan't a man—some -boy—sort of a died, he be-ome boy; it orth listening have my reok, pictures his nose en-of a school minds me of

ret. saw the time, when I wore jackets, that I could not wreak a terrible and all-satisfying vengeance upon a teacher for any insult or indignity, by drawing pictures of him on my old slate. I can make better, that is, worse, pictures now than I could then, and my revenge is correspondingly more terrible and satisfying. The 'jack of clubs' gets off at Carthage.

I am so far quieted and reconciled by my revenge that I sadly tear up my ugly pictures and look regretfully at the tall figure and the long hair as they go plodding off through the snow, and I wish I hadn't made the nose so long nor the eyes so 'poppy.' Poor old 'left bower,' I take it all back, and I will never be so mean again.

But then a fellow shouldn't rattle a fellow by sitting down right behind a fellow and running down a fellow's lecture.

This reminds me of a story they tell of Josh Billings, one of the best of the multitude of good things Billings says. Some one asked him if he ever stood at the door of the hall and listened to his audience comment on his lecture as they passed out.

'I did—once,' the philosopher replied, very solemnly, 'but,' he added, after a long and impressive pause, 'I will never do it again.'

USES OF ROPE.

When a guest at a hotel sees the porter carrying a coil of rope three hundred feet long into his room, a feeling of tranquil security comes over him, and he lies down to sleep without a thought of fear. But when a boy sees his father coming up-stairs to his room with only the little end of a rope not more than two feet long, with a knot at one end, it kindles a conflagration of wild apprehension and terror in his soul that all the waters of the Mississippi valley cannot quench.

SQUATTER SOVEREIGNTY.

We have left Chicago, and on the best road in the world we are whirling along toward Burlington. I go out into the dining-car to eat. I come back, and lo, a family has 'squatted' in my seat. The patriarch and matriarch, two children and a short ton of baggage. I am inclined to get mad, and I think, indeed, I do make a pretty good start at it. I jerk my overcoat angrily away from the recumbent shoulders of the honest, but not stylish, agriculturist who has made a mattress of it, and glare savagely down at a little bundle of blue and white baggage that these people have piled up on my seat.

And lo, while I glare, a tiny, dimpled hand peeps out of the folds of the blue cloak, with dainty nails, tinted like a shell; a flossy little halo of silky hair, white lid closed over the blue eyes, long lashes that fringe the white lids—ah, the baby is welcome to all the seat. Who can keep cross at the baby? Poor little dot, it will have to fight for its privileges after awhile. Instead of spreading out over a whole seat that belongs to somebody else, it will be happy if it is strong enough to capture and hold one half of the wood box. So I hunt for another seat, and I really feel glad to let the baby have mine.

It is all I am going to subscribe, though, you bet. I take another seat, and a sweet-voiced, truthful-looking woman tells me it belongs to her little boy.

Well, I say, he can sit with me.

But, she says, there are two of them.

They are not visible, however, and they do not appear all the rest of the trip. I am convinced that those boys are not yet born.

Another boy belonging to the family that took my seat turns up in a few minutes and disputes possession of the seat I finally occupy. But the line has to be drawn somewhere, and I draw at the baby. A boy loses a powerful sight of beauty between eleven months and eleven years. So I am not moved by any tender emotion toward the boy.

I give him the end of the seat next to the window, however, because it is mean, it is dirt mean, to make a boy on his travels sit away from the car window.

Then, the window is broken and there is a strong draft blowing in, which will not hurt the boy, while I must take care of myself. Mr. Tilden's health is failing. General Grant is reported insane, and there must be somebody saved to be president of this unhappy country.

There is a woman behind me who talks bass. Just now she asked the train boy the price of his apples, and I thought it was a man talking under the car. She is a large woman. If she wasn't, it would tear her to pieces every time she said "good morning."

We stopped at Buda and a young man who wants to get off has to ask a portion of the family that 'squatted' in my seat, to get off his overcoat, and to take their feet off his valise. I really cannot express a feeling of resentment at this excessively diffusive family. It seems to have jumped all the claims in the car while the rest of us were out at dinner. I don't mind the baby; not a bit of it. The baby is more than welcome to my seat, and it can have my watch to play with, if it wants it; but I do protest against the colonizing tendencies of the rest of his family. They seem to sit on everybody's things except their own, and their numerous feet are on all the various valises in the car.

They are too awfully diffusive.

There now, I knew there was something ailed me. I needed vent. I was carrying too much steam. But I feel better now, and unless this family should develop a new column in some unexpected direction—but no, the woman who talks bass is at it again, and the Swede baby that has been crying in the forward part of the car for the past sixty-eight miles, is awed into wondering silence.

The man with the family has just got up and gone into the seat of a commercial traveller who just this minute went into the smoking car. The man is now curling up for a nap.

I can write no more. There is a limit to human patience, and the contemplation of this man's repeated invasions and steady acquisition of territory, maddens. There are only seven of his family, but they now occupy thirteen whole seats, and from his vantage ground in the drummer's seat, the head of the family is looking out for more.

TWO KINDS OF SUGAR.

'The first Napoleon,' remarked Mr. Midlerib, 'introduced into France the manufacture of beet sugar, and it is to-day an important industry in our own country.' 'Yes,' said Master Midlerib, in a subdued tone of countenance, 'I tasted some of it to-day.' 'Tasted some of what?' inquired his father, sharply. 'Beech sugar,' said the boy wearily, and then he drew closer to the table and sat more specifically on the edge of his chair. And silence fell on the family like a fog.

ENVOI.

Over the land where the hoop poles grow,
(Benjamin, Benjamin, draw it mild),
Daintily drifted the beautiful snow,
Whirling and eddying, free and wild.
Nobody knew what it came there for,
Nobody wanted it, everyone swore,
But it drifted and eddied just all the more,
Till up to the chimney tops it piled.

Oh, somehow or other I want to be—(Lay him to rest with his ulster on);
Where never a flake of snow I'll see,
While the changing seasons come and gone.
I'd like to get up in the voiceless night,
And wing my rapid, unwearied flight,
To some sunny clime of pure delight,
Where never a snowflake flecks the dawn.

Come with your perfumed robes, winds of May (Pull her wide open and give her sand);
Wrapped in your tender arms, bear me away
Into some fairy, enchanted land.
Where the slumbering winter can never awake,
Where the snow clouds never loom up and break,
Where there ain't enough winter to frost a cake,
Give me a ticket to that fair land.

THE FIRST BUTTON MAN.

Samuel Williston, the first manufacturer of buttons in the United States, is seventy-three years old, and worth six million dollars. He has made half the buttons used in the world, and has never yet made a suspender button that would hold its grip and not fly off and rattle across the floor every time a man stooped to pick up his hat in church. He was the man who manufactured a tin button that looked enough like a silver five-cent piece to fool a shortsighted deacon with a contribution basket.

PA AND THE BABY.

After we left Vincennes this afternoon, a man got on with his wife and two children. One of the little ones, a boy three years old or over, was fretful and weepful, and the father did his best, and in the tenderest, patientest manner, to quiet the child and put him to sleep. How the little fellow did cry and kick, and throw things around. He had been crying that way, the man said, all day long, and he couldn't imagine what ailed him. He 'allowed he might have the ear-ache.' The passengers were full of sympathy, for which, as they strove to express it in various ways, the father appeared unspeakably grateful for, and the boy indignantly repelled. One man gave him an orange; the boy hurled it spitefully into the face of his baby sister, sleeping in the mother's lap, and the terrified young lady added her wail of fright and pain to the general chorus. A lady gave him her handsome smelling-bottle; he dashed it on the floor and howled more fiercely than ever. I handed the poor little innocent my pocket knife; away it went out of the car window and the urchin wailed more indignantly than ever. All the time the father never got cross or grew impatient, but 'allowed he could hush him off to sleep after a bit.'

*The question may be asked, 'What has this line to do with it?' In reply to this piece of unwarranted impertinence, I have simply to ask the reader, 'What is that your business?'

† This should be 'come and go,' but 'go' wouldn't rhyme.

‡ 'Ain't' would be more grammatical, but it wouldn't fit in half so well.

winds of May her sand)
ar me away
and.
never awake,
loun up and er to frost a air land.

MAN.

manufacturer is, seventy-million dollars used in made a sus-d its grip and the floor every p his hat in ho manufacted enough fool a short-ion basket.

BY.

afternoon, a two children.
ree years old ful, and the enderest, paild and put slow did cry
and. He had said; all day
e what ailed have the earof sympathy,
ess it in vari-unspeakably
antly repell-
; the boy
e of his baby lap, and the her wail of l chorus. A elling-bottle:
rowled; more the poor little way it went rchin wailed
All the time
w impatient, off to sleep

What has this piece of un-simply to ask business?
go, but go'
natical, but it

And by and by, sure enough, the pain and impatience yielded to the father's patient soothing, the little head dropped over on the father's shoulder, the broken sobs became less and less frequent, and finally died away, and the poor little fellow just began to forget his troubles in sleep as the train slowed up to a station, when suddenly the father, walking up and down the aisle with him, darted a glance out of the window, stooped down and looked again, and shouted:

'What's the matter with that man?'
'Hello!' he shouted. 'Here, Emily, take him—watch him—here! I can't wait! Don't let him roll off! Watch him!'

With a hasty motion he tossed the baby into the seat behind his wife, getting him just about half-way on. He gave a hurried jab at the boy with his extended fingers, to push him further on the seat, but missed him, and darted off to the door of the car, shot out of it and was down on the platform in a flash. The mother quickly put down the smaller child and turned to attend to the boy, two or three passengers at the same time sprang forward with the same purpose—all too late; before the father was well out of the door, the boy toppled off the seat, came to the floor with a thump and a howl of real pain and fright, and when the father, looking sheepish and cheap, came back into the car, the poor little fellow, wide awake to all his old miseries and the one crowning, insulted new one, was screaming away at a rate that fairly made the windows rattle, and he kept it up until we got to Terre Haute, and I don't know how long after that. And all this time nobody else had been able to see anything, to excite the father to such a remarkable degree, and he saw our wonder in our countenances.

'The man was a coal miner,' he explained, as he took the screaming boy, 'and I reckon he's been loadin' a car of coal and got his face smutty.'

Our amazement looked out of our eyes greater than ever.

'An' I thought,' continued the father, nervously patting the boy's back, and seeing that some further explanation was necessary and expected, 'I thought his eye was blacked, an' I 'lowed there'd ben a fight.'

MORAL.

The profound silence, excepting the boy's wailing, which didn't count, which followed this explanation, was broken at last by the man from Sullivan, who was sitting back by the stove, and remarked in solemn and impressive tones:

'What shadders we are and what shadders we pursue.'

THE QUIET OF THE TOMB.

'Algernon' sends us a poem in which he declares, 'There is the rest for me in the silent tomb.' Oh, there is, is there? Yes, there is; lots of it; lots of it. You try it. You'll find out how much rest there is in the silent tomb with half a dozen medical students digging in after you and fighting over you. You crawl into the tomb for a little quiet time, if you want to, Algernon, but you just take your revolver with you all the same.

WHEN HE SWORE.

Shortly after the battle of Mormouth, Washington, his brow contracted with thought and shadowed with gloom, stood in the back yard. It was midnight, and the sinking moon cast a strange, weird pallor over the darkening landscape. The Father of his Country held a shot-gun in his hands, the smoke still wreathing slowly above his head. It was evident that his slumbers had been disturbed. 'I feel,' he said, passing his hand across his throbbing brow, 'I feel like one who, from a lofty height, looks down upon the mighty torrent of resistless Niagara.' And then, with one last glance at the cat he wrecked, he turned toward the house and tried to tell his staff what he had said; but alas, he couldn't remember it, and when they tried to laugh out of courtesy, the sleepy cackle betrayed the hollowness of the effort. It was then that Washington swore.

THE CHAMPION DOG.

A man up on North Hill is just the maddest man. He went to Philadelphia and paid $320 for a pure blood bird dog, with a pedigree longer than the chronological table of the kings of England, and the dog hadn't been home two days before the next door neighbour killed him with a brick in his hen house, where the thoroughbred was sucking eggs. Blood is as uncertain and rare in a dog as it is in a South American battle.

TRAIN MANNERS.

Genesee.—A woman with three bird-cages and a little girl have just got on the train. She arranges the three bird-cages on a seat, and then she and the little girl stand up in the aisle, and she glares around upon the ungallant men who remain glued to their seats, and looked dreamily out of the window. I bend my face down to the tablet and write furiously, for I feel her eyes fastened upon me. Somehow or other I am always the victim in case of this delicate nature. Just as I expected. She speaks, fastening her commanding gaze upon me:

'Sir, would it be asking too much if I begged you to let myself and my little girl have that seat? A gentleman can always find a seat so much more easier than a lady.'

And she smiled. Not the charmingest kind of a smile. It was too triumphant to be very pleasing. Of course I surrendered. I said:

'Oh, certainly, certainly. I could find another seat without any trouble.'

She thanked me, and I crawled out of my comfortable seat, and gathered up my overcoat, my manuscript, my shawl-strap package, my valise, and my overshoes, and she and the little girl went into the vacant premises as soon as the writ of ejectment had been served, and they looked happy and comfortable.

Then I stepped across the aisle; I took up those bird-cages and set them along on top of the coal box, and sat down in the seat thus vacated. I apologetically remarked to the woman, who was gazing at me with an expression that boded trouble, that 'it was much warmer for the canaries up by the stove.' She didn't say anything, but she gave me a look that made it much warmer for me, for about five minutes, than the stove can make it for the canaries.

Belvidere.—A woman has just gone out of the car and left the door wide open, and the wind is blowing through the coach a hundred miles a minute. Why is it that a woman never shuts a car door? And why does a man always leave it open? And indeed, why nobody ever shuts it except the brakeman, and he only closes it for the sake of the noise he can make with it.

Yesterday morning, I saw a man go out of a car, and shut the door after him. I have travelled very constantly for nearly three years, and this was the first man I ever saw shut the car door after him as he went out.

And he only shut it because I was right behind him, trying to get out, with a big valise in each hand. When I set down my valises to open the door, I made a few remarks on the general subject of people who would get up in the night to do the wrong thing at the wrong time, but the man was out on the platform, and failed to catch the drift of my remark.

I was not sorry for this, because the other passengers seemed to enjoy it quite as well by themselves, and the man whose action called forth this impromptu address was a forbidding looking man, as big as a hay waggon, and looked as though he would have banged me clear through the side of a box car if he had heard what I said.

I suppose these people who invariably do the wrong things at the wrong time are necessary, but they are awfully unpleasant.

Cuba.—A woman gets on the train and says a very warm-hearted good-bye to a great cub of a sixteen-year-old boy who sets down her bundles and turns to leave the car with a gruff grunt that may mean good-bye or anything else. There is a little quiver on her lip as she calls after him, 'Be a good boy, write to me often, and do as I tell you.' He never looks around as she leaves the cars; he looks just like the kind of a boy who will do just as she tell him, but she must be careful to tell him to do just as he wants to. I have one bright spark of consolation as the train moves on and I see that boy performing a clumsy satire on a clog dance, on the platform. Some of these days he will treat some man as gruffly and rudely as he treats his mother, and the man will climb on to him and lick him; pound thery sawdust out of him. Then the world will feel better and happier for the licking he gets. It may be long deferred, but will come at last. I almost wish I had pounded him myself while he is young and felt able to do it. He may grow up into a very discouragingly rugged man, extremely difficult to lick, and the world may have to wait a very long time for this act of justice. It frequently happens that these bad boys grow up into distressingly "bad" men.

We have got as far as Hinsdale, and here we have ceased to progress. The experienced passengers sit as patiently as the train itself. The inexperienced ones fly around and tramp in and out and leave the door open, and ply the train men and operator with numerous questions. Sometimes the train men answer their questions and then sometimes they do not answer them. When they do reply to the eager conundrums, somehow or other the passenger always feels as though he knew a little less than he did before. It is a cruel, deceitful old world, in snow time.

A man has gone to the front seat, and is warming his feet by planting the soles of his boots against the side of the stove. As he wears India rubber boots, the effect is marked, but not pleasant.

As usual, the drinking boy is on the car.

quite as well
whose action address was s g as a hay gh he would the side of a air'.

invariably do ng time are lly unpleas-

he train and od-bye to a boy who sets leave the car an good-bye le quiver on
'Be a good do as I tell as she leaves the kind of ell him, but to do 'st as nt spark of on and I see satire on a ome of these gruffly and er, and the lick him ;
n. Then the ier for the fferred, but wish I had s young and w up into a extremely ay have to t of justice.
e bad boys
'men.

, and here
The ext
ly as the l ones fly leave the and opera-
n. Some-ver their mes they hen they nundrums, always feels an he did d world, in at, and is soles of his

. As he is marked,

the car.

He has laid a regular siege to the water-tank, and I think will empty it before we get to Salamanca. I wish to call the attention of the temperance society to this class of intemperates. There should be a pledge drawn up and some colour of ribbon—a bit of watered silk would be appropriate, I suppose—for boys of six and seven years, who are addicted to drinking water at the rate of eighteen tin-cupfuls a minute. Ten or twelve boys of this class can drink a creek dry when they are feeling comfortably thirsty.

A friendly passenger wants to talk. I am not feeling particularly sociable this morning, and consequently I do not propose to talk to anybody. He asks how I like this kind of weather, and I say, 'Spendidly.'

He laughs feebly, but encouragingly, and says there has been a little too much snow. I say, 'Not for health, it was just what we needed.'

He asks if I heard of the accident on the Central Railroad, and I say, 'Yes.'

Then he asks how it was, and I tell him, 'I don't know; didn't read it.'

He wants to know what I think of Hayes, and I say, 'I think he made a very good constable.'

'Constable?' he says, 'I mean President Hayes.'

I say I thought he meant Dennis Hays, of Peoria.

Then he asks if I 'am going far?'

I say, 'No.'

'How far?' he asks.

'Fourteen hundred miles,' I say, unblushingly.

He thinks that is what we call 'far,' and I make no response. Two babies in the car are rehearsing a little and in rather faulty time, but with fine expression. And the man, with one or two 'dashes,' asks if it doesn't bother me to write with a lot of "brats squalling around?'

I looked up at him very severely, for it always makes me angry to hear a man call a baby a 'brat,' and I say to him, in a slow, impressive manner, that 'I would rather listen to a baby cry than hear a man swear.'

This eminently proper and highly moral rebuke has its effect. The man forsakes me, and he is now wreaking a cheap, miserable revenge on the smiling passengers by whistling 'My Grandfather's Clock,' accompanying himself by drumming on the window with his fingers.

THE ZEPHYRS OF MAINE.

There is only one drawback to the glorious old State of Maine, and that is not a natural obstacle. It is an error of education, and is not a general error either. It is confined to the railroad men. They have received the impression, from what sources and through what teaching I know not, that a passenger coach is comfortably warm at zero, is rather sultry at ten degrees above, and is positively destructive to human life at twenty-five degrees. When the trains stop at a station it is pitiful to see the passengers rush out of the car and stand on the platform to get warm. When you ask a brakeman on the Maine Central to put another stick of wood in the stove, he stares at you in amazement for a moment and then reaches up and opens a ventilator. If you should say it again, I believe he would kick out the end of the car. The stove doors on these cars are kept locked, so the passengers cannot manipulate the fires. If this were not the case, I am afraid the six sticks of wood brought into the car at Bath would not have lasted more than half way to Boston. As it was, under the economical administration of the brakeman they lasted all the way to Boston and part of the way back.

THE RISING GENERATION.

An intellectual young man, a promising student just back from Brown University, was met at the Union depot by an elderly man, who made a grasp at the young man's hands, and even essayed to clasp him in his arms. The young man shook hands with enthusiastic native in a non-committal sort of way, and said, in not unfriendly tones, 'Well, indeed, my dear fellow—I really—your face is rather familiar; it seems to me I have met you somewhere, and yet I can't exactly place you.' And as the father gazed at his distinguished son in dumb amazement, and thought: how only five years ago, he had distributed thoroughbred welts and orthodox blisters all around his youthful back with a piece of lath, for taking the old man's razor to trim off a shabby club, he sighed, and went back to the office with an unalterable determination to bind out his other sons to shoemakers and blacksmiths.

THE AMENITIES OF TRAVEL.

How hot and dusty it is! How dirty and grimy everybody looks! How cross and unobliging and disreputable everybody feels!

The cars are crowded, and everybody is wishing everybody else was out of the way. The woman in front of me has dropped her shawl on the floor. She is not young or handsome, but she is a woman. Her face has a harsh, forbidding expression, but withal, I think I can see tender lines about the mouth. It is a face that has seen trouble. Poor woman! Perhaps she has raised eleven children, and now she has them all, with their husbands and wives, to support. No wonder she looks tired and worn and repellent. If she was young and pretty, as she was thirty years ago, a dozen men would spring forward to snatch her shawl from the dusty floor, and bow themselves crooked handing it to her. Now we look at it, and feel too dusty even to tell her where it is. A commercial traveller walks down the aisle, and steps carefully over it. A woman goes down the other way and thoughtlessly steps on it. I feel ashamed of myself, and pity the poor, homely woman. With an effort I rise from my seat, I stoop to pick up the neglected shawl.

'Madam,' I say, and—oh, if my son's mother could see that smile—'Madam, permit me; your shawl!'

I stopped right there. For as I picked up the neglected shawl, out of its voluminous folds fell thumping and rattling to the floor a paper bag, badly fractured, full of crackers, a tin can, some remnant of an ancient lunch, a six-inch bologna bit off at one end, and a bottle of milk, the latter uncorking itself as it fell. The poor neglected woman did not seem to be transported with gratitude for my attention. She snatched the shawl from me and said, with apparent vexation:

'There now, drat ye, look at ye, what you've done. Why can't ye mind yer own business and leave other people's things alone?'

A ripple of subdued hilarity passed through the car, and I resumed my seat, fully resolved that if the most extravagantly lovely and loving girl that ever blessed this world of ugly men should come into that car, and her head should fall off her shoulders and drop into my lap, I would kick it savagely out of the window and snarl,

'Keep your lumpy old woodeny punkin head out of the way, if you don't want it tramped onto.'

NAMING THE BABY.

A loving couple on West Hill had promised an old bachelor friend to name their first baby after him. They wanted to keep their pledge, but after debating and planning and contriving until the baby was sixteen days old, Thomasetta Jacobina was the nearest they could come to it.

A SAD CASE OF WHOOPING COUGH.

The evening I went down to Abingdon the train on the Quincy division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy was crowded, of course. It always is that way. The more extra cars they put on at Galesburg the more people would make up their minds to go on that train. So, as usual, seats were at a premium. I managed to get a whole seat all to myself and tried to look pleasant and inviting at people at a distance, and cold and repelling when they came up close. By these hoggish tactics I hoped to have a comfortable, roomy ride. Just on the other side of the aisle a forlorn-looking man had two seats turned, and was seated in the midst of his five children, every one of the juvenile quintette appearing to be about nine or eleven years old, all white headed, and wild looking, all very quiet, and apparently awed by the crowd and commotion on board and the swift motion of the train.

While I was studying the odd-looking family group a woman, the womanliest kind of a matronly-looking mother woman, came down the aisle leading a five year old, and she smiled and enquiringly asked me, might her little girl occupy the vacant seat beside me?

'Oh, to be sure (smiling sweetly, as I know how to smile), 'I would be charmed,' I said, showing my fangs clear back to the palate, 'to take care of the little Blossom as far as I went.'

'And how far was I going?' with a smile, responsive in sweetness to my own (the carrier is requested not to leave a copy of this issue of The Hawkeye on Barnes street), but deficient in responsive size about seventeen inches.

'To Quincy,' I said, increasing my smile till my cheeks cracked. I was only going to Abingdon, 350 miles this side of Quincy, but it is so hard to tell the truth when anybody asks you a question on the train. You get so used to lying to the conductor about losing your ticket and one thing and another.

Well, she went away, and I put away my pleasant book, and prepared to bore myself to death entertaining a strange child that was already beginning to cry with terror at my looks before I said a word, when suddenly the mother came swooping down the aisle like a tornado, lightning in her eyes and her hands fairly clenched. I was afraid she thought, from the poor child's agonized expression, that I had been sticking pins into the poor innocent. So I ducked my head and threw up my arms.

'I never touched her?' I shrieked. As the excited woman drew up along side.

To my great relief she never paid a bit of attention to me. She caught up her little one and turned savagely upon the man with a family, opposite me.

'I understand,' she gasped, 'your children have the whooping cough?'

It took the man a long time to answer her. At last he seemed to comprehend the question, and said in a very deliberately:

'Wall, yes; fact is, they did hev it, right smart, but I don't reckon as they's much danger—'

The mother was gone, up the aisle, through the door, into the famigated atmosphere of the smoking car, and the man with a family stopped speaking.

In a moment or two came a fond father with a four-year-old boy in his arms. He sought out the vacant seat. He 'didn't want to sit down himself,' he said apologetically, 'but,' with great urbanity, 'might his little boy—'

'Oh, surely,' I said promptly, 'I should be only too glad to—'

'Thank you, thank you,' said the grateful father; the boy was deposited under my gracious and fatherly wing, the father went into the smoking car to see a man, and by way of opening an easy conversation with the boy, I asked him:

'Do you not find that travelling, at this uncertain and unchangeable season of the year, with its sudden climatic and atmospheric changes, and the over-crowded condition of the cars is extremely uncomfortable?'

The boy began to cry.

'Son,' I said, sternly, 'cheese that sniffle or I'll bust your crust.'

The child broke out into an agonizing howl, and just then I saw his father dash into the door and come galloping down the aisle like a man chasing a chromo agent. I instinctively threw up my guard again, ducked my head, and cried out, without indicating any particular man, and with that lofty disregard of grammar that comes upon us in moments of intense peril:

'He done it!'

And again I had thrown out cautionary signals when there was no danger. The frenzied father merely wheeled around with his boy in his arms and faced the man with a family.

'Sir!' he exclaimed, 'do you know you have no right to bring your children on the cars when they have the whooping-cough?'

The man with a family looked up, at his questioner, clawed his tawny, unkempt beard in an absent manner, and finally said:

'Wal, you see they did have it right peart, but I allowed there wa'n't much danger in—'

But the father fled without waiting for explanations, leaving a train of maledictions trailing behind him as he went. The man and his family never said a word to each other and I began to pity them, as they huddled together and looked as though they hadn't a friend in the world.

'Dog gone it!' I exclaimed confidentially to the boy of the party, 'this is a free country. If you've got the whooping cough, why whoop her up! Whoop thunder of the old thing!'

The boy looked up at his father timidly, and the old man with a family stared at me for a moment and said:

'Wal, ye see, he did have it right uncommon, along o' the rest of 'em, but I don't allow as how—'

But at this point he was interrupted again, this time by a little woman with a baby—a fat, crowing, laughing baby. An emphatic little woman, who measured her remarks with more italics than you'll find in a society novel:

'Would it discommode me too much if she and baby begged for that vacant seat?'

'Oh, cer-tainly not,' I echoed, sliding over to the window with great alacrity, 'in-deed no, I was only too glad to be of any service.'

'Oh, thank you, thank you ever so much. It was so disagreeable riding in such crowded cars.'

'Oh, dread-ful, DREAD-ful,' I ejaculated, and then baby crowed and the emphatic little woman laughed, a merry, mellow, rippling laugh that made Laby's eyes dance with joy. I laughed a great rasping guffaw that sounded like a crow with the bronchitis, and frightened the baby into a fit of weeping, I felt awkwardly enough, but just then my attention was attracted to the conductor, who was talking to the man with a family.

'You know,' said the conductor, 'that other people travel with children, and when your children have the whooping cough, you—'

The little woman sprang into the aisle as though she were shot. 'What?' she screamed.

The man with a family looked at the conductor, clawed his beard, looked at the excited little woman, and finally said, in tones of real distress at the annoyance his innocent family was causing:

'Wal, ye see, they did hev it a right smart, but I didn't reckon thet—'

The little woman was gone, but the conductor remained. I wanted to hear that sentence completed if I had to run past Abingdon.

'How long ago did your children have the whooping cough?' asked the conductor.

'Wal,' the man with the family said, 'the first one hed it back in Tennessee, nine years ag', and the last un had it down in Nodoway county, nigh onto four years ago, an' I don't allow they's no danger of ketching it from any on 'm now.'

'Abing-don!' yelled the brakeman, and I never was able to learn how many more panics the man with the family created before he got through to Nodoway county.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The women in Kansas vote at the school elections. At a recent election at Osage City one woman went up to vote, but before she got through telling the judges what a time her Willie had with the scarlet fever when he was only two years old, it was time to close the polls and she had forgotten to deposit her ballot.

INVADING MISSOURI.

I had a very pleasant trip from Burlington to St. Louis. I boarded the C., B. & Q. sleeper for St. Louis, just in time to crawl into the last vacant berth, thanks to the supreme goodness of a sleeping-car conductor, who ought to have the rank and pay of a major-general in the United States army.

Do you know how much pleasanter and more comfortable it makes a berth in a sleeping car, to hear two or three disappointed tired men standing in the aisle, growl and swearing because they can't get any? It is a mean feeling, I will admit, a mean, hateful, unmanly feeling, but it is powerful comforting. I try to break myself of it, but at the same time I am willing to admit that I would rather lie in the berth, and enjoy the mean, selfish gratification, than stand up in the aisle and indulge in an honest, frank, manly swear at the supreme selfishness curled up in the berth, making the air vocal with simulated snores.

Moral: Such is the Sad Perversity of our Fallen Nature.

No other events transpired during the journey until seven o'clock this morning. Then the porter said 'St. Louis,' and the grand spectacular sleeping-car feat of standing on one leg and pulling an pair of tr*s*s*rs was performed by the whole strength of the entire ballot.

A great big trunk is wheeled across the platform toward the baggage room. On the end is painted, in large black letters, the owner's name, 'P. F. W. Shope.' 'Hullo,' shouts a C., B. & Q. brakeman, staring at the trunk and its name, 'Hullo, when did they move the Pittsburg and Fort Wayne shops' to St. Louis?'

St. Charles, Missouri—The city looks stately as a queen, throned in beauty on her hills by the river side. It is a lovely city. St. Charles! Where have I seen it before? Ten, twelve, it must be fourteen years ago, when A. J. Smith's detachment of the sixteenth army corps, 'Smith's guerrillas,' were going up to the river seeking whom they might devour good old 'Pap Price' up. And here at St. Charles, when the boats landed, Sherman's orders took the bravest man and the best fighter in the United States army away from the corps, to go with him across to the sea, and left the first division wondering what was going to become of it, without 'Old Joe.' It was a long distance from a private gentleman of the escort up to a general of division, and in addition to the difference of rank, it was a long ways physically from me up to General J. A. Mower, for he was a magnificent specimen of physical manhood, and when I was in the saddle I looked like a patent clothes pin in uniform; but we all made a demi-god of Mower, and when he held my hand when I went up to say good-by, and gave me a dozen words of parting advice, I wouldn't have exchanged places with the general of the army. Proud? I wouldn't give up the recollection now, to be president.

POLITICAL RENUNCIATION.

I wouldn't be president any how. I won't be president, under any circumstances.

What's the use of being president, anyhow? And have the stalwarts scalp you on one side and the conservatives kick you on the other, and every man that doesn't get a post-office call you an 'accident.' Take away your presidency.

And yet it wouldn't be a bad advertisement for the next lecture season. I don't really know but if the people of the United States insist upon it, that I may be induced

during the
this morning.
s," and the feat of standa pair of the whole

across the om. On the letters, the e.' 'Hullo,' n, staring at e, when did Fort Wayne

looks state-on her hills
ly city. St.
it before?

years ago,
of the six-'guerrillas,' king whom
'Pap Price' s. when the s took the ter in the he corps, to d left the s going to

It was a ntleman of ion, and in nk, it was a to General magnificent nd when I a patent all made a held my od-by, and ng advice, aces with
I wouldow, to be

ION.

how. I circum-

ident, any-ip you on k you on n't get a ake away advertise-
I don't he United e induced

— a man's duty to his country, you know, should always override his personal wishes.

The more I think of it, the more desirable the scheme appears. I could stay in Washington, you know, during the summer, when everybody else is out of town, and have a nice quiet time to write my lectures; then, just about the time congress assembles the lecture season opens, and I could skip out and lecture all winter, and thus dodge all the cabinet meetings and evade all the sessions, and get back in time to sign all the bills. I wish the people of the several States, in selecting their delegates for the republican national convention in 1880, would just think of this.

SHE THOUGHT SHE HAD 'EM.

The other day a West Hill woman found a large, dark bottle, worth about a pint, in the closet, and she immediately took it down and jerked out the cork to see what there was in it. She smelt it vigorously for a second, and then, unable to determine just what it was, she tipped the bottle very cautiously, but before it was more than half turned over, the little green snake that her son had stowed away in that bottle shot out and dropped into her extended hand, and the curtain went down on a most magnificent transformation scene, red lights burning on one side and green at the other, grand overture by the orchestra, trumpets sounding the flourish behind the scenes, and the full force of the entire ballet before the foot-lights. Long before the police could break in the front door, the snake got away.

THE ADVERTISEDEST ROAD IN THE SOUTH.

En route for Hannibal. And at last I have reached the realization of my heart's desire. I am riding on the 'M., K. & T.' railway. I am passing through the beautiful Indian territory. At least, I suppose I am passing through it. It is down on the bill, in red, and yellow, and purple, and green, that all passengers on the M., K. & T. do pass through the beautiful Indian territory, and I hold a first-class ticket. I see the beautiful Indian leaning up against the fence, calmly surveying his territory. And I am free to admit that the territory is a powerful sight more beautiful than the Indian. The Indian is chewing tobacco and swearing at a mule. He is six feet high, the Indian is, and his tail is full of burs, the mule's is. He wears butternuts jeans, and a fur cap, the Indian does, and you can hear him bray clear into the ear, the mule, that is. He has a bushy head of hair and shaggy whiskers, tanned out by the sun, has the Indian; and he wears more flat leather harness than he has hair, the mule does. He carries a blacksnake whip, the Indian does, and as he swears, he larrups it over his hunkers, the mule's hunkers. And every time he, the Indian, fetches him, the mule, one, he, the mule, kicks down a whole panel of fence. I trust I have made this clear enough. But the train flies on. The air is balmy with the breath of May. This is February, but the bill says May, and the M., K. & T., doesn't care for the almanac.

'The class will rise, remarked the precise lady teacher in the grammar department, 'the class will rise, and remain rising.'

THE ROMANCE OF A SLEEPING CAR.

It was in the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern sleeper. Outside, it was dark as the inside of an ink-bottle. In the sleeping car, people slept.

Or tried it.

Some of them slept, like Christian men and women, peacefully and sweetly and quietly.

Others slept like demons, malignantly, hideously, fiendishly, as though it was their mission to keep everybody else awake.

Of these, the man in lower number three was the 'boss.' When it came to a square snore with variations, you want to count 'lower three' in, with a full hand and a pocket full of rocks.

We never heard anything snore like him. It was the most systematic snoring that was ever done, even on one of those tournaments of snoring, a sleeping car. He didn't begin as soon as the lamps were turned down and everybody in bed. Oh, no! There was more cold-blooded diabolism in his system than that. He waited until everybody had had a little taste of sleep, just to see how good and pleasant it was, and then he broke in on their slumbers like a winged, breathing demon, and they never knew what peace was again that night.

He started out with a terrific

'Gn-r-r-r-t!'

That opened every eye in the car. We all hoped it was an accident, however, and trusting that he wouldn't do it again, we all forgave him. Then he blasted our hopes and curled the sweet serenity of our forgiveness by a long drawn

'Gw-a-h-h-h-hah!'

That sounded too much like business to be accidental. Then every head in that sleepless sleeper was held off the pillow for a minute, waiting, in breathless suspense, to hear the worst, and the sleeper in 'lower three' went on, in long-drawn, regular cadences that indicated good staying qualities:

'Gwa-a-a-h! Gwa-a-a-h! Gahwahwah! Gahwahwah! Gahwa-a-a-ah!'

Evidently it was going to last all night, and the weary heads dropped back on the sleepless pillows, and the swearing began. It mumbled along in low, muttering tones, like the distant echoes of a profane thunder-storm. Pretty soon 'lower three' gave us a little variation. He shot off a spiteful

'Gnwock!'

Which sounded as though his nose had got mad at him and was going to strike. Then there was a pause, and we began to hope he had either awakened from sleep or strangled to death, nobody cared very particular which. But he disappointed everybody with a guttural

'Gnrooch!'

Then he paused again for breath, and when he had accumulated enough for his purposes, he resumed business with a stentorous

'Kowpf!'

That nearly shot the roof off the car. Then he went on playing such fantastic tricks with his nose and breathing things would make the immortal gods weep, if they did but hear them. It seemed a matter incredible, it seemed an utter, preposterous impossibility that any human being could make the monstrous, hideous noises with its breathing machine that the fellow in 'lower three' was making with his. He ran through all the ranges of the nasal gamut, he went up and down a very chromatic scale of snores, he ran through intricate and fearful variations until it seemed that his nose must be out of joint in a thousand places. All the night and all night through he told his story.

'Gawah, gnrrh! gn-r-r! Kowpf! Gawawwah! gawah-hah! gwock! gnarrt! gwah-h-h-h! whoof!'

Just as the other passengers had consulted together how they might clay him, morning dawned, and 'lower number three' awoke. Everybody watched the curtains to see what manner of man it was that had made that beautiful sleeping-car a pandemonium. Presently the toilet was completed, the curtains parted, and 'lower number three' stood revealed.

Great heavens!

It was a fair young girl, with golden hair, and timid, pleading eyes, like a hunted fawn's!

BREAKING THE ICE.

The New York Commercial Advertiser says more than one hundred handsome American girls broke through the ice last winter, were rescued, and married their rescuers. Yes, and we know one American girl, good as gold, and homely enough to scare rats, who has broken through the ice every winter since 1844, and has had to scramble out by herself every time, and is the confirmed-est kind of an old maid yet.

PRIVILEGES OF LITERATURE.

Do you know, I've gone to railroading? Yes indeed. Haven't quit lecturing, but I brake on freight trains and camp out on side-tracks in the intervals. It takes a longer time to spend nine hours on a siding than it does to deliver a popular lecture, but it doesn't pay so well. I know every switch, side-track and Y in the State of Iowa by name, sight and reputation. If I were dropped out of the clouds in the darkest midnight that ever frowned, and should light upon a side-track I could tell right where I was. Try me sometime. One night last December I was going from Grinnell up north. According to the custom of James T. Fields, and other bucolic lecturers, I was riding in a caboose, jamming along behind a freight train as long as a kite string. I was stretched out on a long seat at my full length, which isn't much longer than a piece of cord wood. I was trying to sleep. I was wooing the drowsy god by pounding my ear on the cushion till the dust flew.

The drowsy god was not on that train, however. He was back in Grinnell, waiting for the sleeping-car.

Pretty soon the train stopped, about a mile north of Grinnell. It was very restful to the one lone passenger in the caboose. It was soothing to his swollen ear. It was easy on the cushion. I felt that sleep was just about to settle down upon the subscriber and knit up the ravelled sleeve of care, so long as the absence of motion rendered the ceremony of knitting possible.

The conductor came in. Gloom sat enthroned upon his brow, and his lowering frowns made the car look dark. He opened

leted, the curtains or three' stood re-

with golden hair, es, like a hunted

ICE.

ial Advertiser says dsome American last winter, were rescuers. Yes, a girl, good as scare rats, who e every winter scramble out by s the confirmed-

TEMPERATURE.

to railroading?
ecturing, but I camp out on
s. It takes a urs on a siding
ular lecture, but
w every switch, e of Iowa by n. If I were in the darkest l, and should uld tell right metime. One ing from Grin-the custom of colic lecturers, aming along ng as a kite
a long seat much longer was trying to rowsy god by n till the dust
that train, nell, waiting ped, about a very rustful caboose. It car. It was hat sleep was the subscriete of care, ion rendered le),
om's late ornis lowering
He opened

a window and let in a wandering zephyr that froze the flames in the stove into icicles. It's a way freight conductors have.

He brought his head in after a while, and from the way he acted I judged he was moved. He seemed to be deeply affected over something. I had a dim suspicion that he might have been irritated. He slammed down his lamp, and he kicked the stove. Then he jerked down another lantern, and snatched up an oil-can and slammed the stove door shut, and said he hoped he might be dead essentially criminy jeminy teetotally got twisted to jude.

I arose, with the intention of leaving the car if such language was repeated. I was spared the trial. It was not repeated. The next time he said it, he made it worse, a thousandfold.

But I was used to it by that time, and endured it with a fortitude and resignation that astonished even myself. I asked him:

'Are we waiting for a train to pass us?'

'Yes,' he roared, 'waiting for a train to pass right through us.'

I sighed and rolled upon the bench and once more essayed to sleep. Pretty soon, when the conductor had the second lantern trimmed and burning, he came and stood beside my virtuous couch. He said,

'Here, young fellow; get up out of this. Take this lamp and trot down the track about seventy yards, and stay there till I send for you. Swing the lamp this way if you see a train coming.'

I asked,

'And what does this feature of the programme mean?'

He said that it meant that the engine and half our train and all the brakemen had broken loose from us and gone on to the next station, he reckoned, and when they discovered we were left, would come back for us. He had to flag one end of the train against the returning half, and I must go down the track and do duty against a passenger, and a possible freight or two that might otherwise wander into us.

He was correct. Moreover, he was firm about it. He seemed to be a man of convictions, so I yielded to his earnest solicitation and girded up my loins and sallied forth.

I halted at a cattle guard. Great heavens! but the night was cold—colder than a Beacon street Boston man, to whom the misguided stranger has spoken without an introduction. I could have warmed my feet in the bosom of a snow man. The wind flew about 1,000 miles a minute, and everything it touched turned to ice or stone, just as it happened. I got down in the ditch to get out of the wind, but it was so much colder down there that the wind felt warm. Then I got out on the track, and the wind had got so much colder than the ditch, that I was afraid to step back into the ditch again lest I should be sunstruck. My teeth chattered so that I couldn't have heard a train if it had run up my trousers leg. It was a terrible situation. Alone, in the wild, wild night, with no human ear to hear my cries if danger assailed me, no human arms to protect me; suddenly the fearful thought flashed across my mind:

What if, in that hour of darkness, in that wild, lonely place, some woman should come along, kick over my lantern, stifle me with chloroform and kiss me?

I am a married man. I felt that my duty to my family demanded prompt action, and I left that warning lamp sitting by the cattle guard, while I trotted back to the caboose and kept up the fire.

In about two hours the advance guard of our train came feeling its way back after us and picked us up. The conductor came in, so cold he couldn't shut his eyes, and saw me, just rousing up from a dream of peace.

'How long have you been in here?' he demanded.

I said I didn't know; I had been in so long my watch had run down.

'How long did you stay at where I sent you?' he asked.

I told him, 'About five minutes.'

The conductor was a man of wonderful presence of mind. He didn't try to say anything just then. He was too cold. He made me go out and bring in my lamp. I brought it in and turned it over to the company and resigned my position on the spot. But I wasn't allowed to get out of the service of the company so easily.

The conductor waited until he was sufficiently thawed out to orate fluently and rapidly, and then he let me have it. It was in vain that I pleaded; in extenuation of my fault, that I would rather have a freight train run into and over me, than freeze to death, that when I had to die, I wanted to die warm. Excuses availed me nothing. The conductor gave me the most refined, eloquent, polished, scholarly, classical, and vigorous 'cussing' that was ever administered to a free-born American lecturer. If the audiences whom I have stricken could have been present at that matinee, they would have felt avenged, they would have pitied me. I couldn't help thinking, while the orator was laying it on, what a scathing dramatic critic he would make.

I survived the blessing and got into Mar-

city. 'He said
The gentleman was——'
?' cried the fat man, 'I made no wing. You cerce from so many dud-don't-don't,

gentleman.
' roared the big
t made the car
't talkin' when the fat old gen-

'
prehend clear-
the precise wo-
train!'——
'?' shouted the

in a surprising
t-d-did-did—— at man, talking

no 'nobody, no't didn't didn't he did?' howled

, interrupted probably about whatever has the departure of then you inter-an unfinished an erroneous remarks. He fat man, 'of good hearin', apologetically

shrieked it ;

the fat man ;
roman ; ' he in that your effective'
ooted the fat

in the thin
-sa-said-said-
-dud—was a

the fat man, said I was a
him to me !

Who says I'm a thief? Who says so?'

'Now,' shouted the big rough man, 'nobody don't say ye ain't no thief. I jest sayed ashow we didn't git along very well. Ye see he,' nodding to the thin man, 'he can't talk very well an'——'

'Wh-wh-wh-why c-c-can't he t-t-tut-tuttut-talk?' broke in the thin man, white with rage. 'I-I-I-I'd like t-t-to know wh-wh-w-h-what's the reason I c-c-c-can't tut-tut-talk sa w-w-w-w-well as any bub-bub-body that's bub-bub-bub-been tut-tut-talking on this car ever s-s-s-since the tut-tut-tut——'

'Hey?' roared the fat man, in an explosion of indignant suspicion.

'I was sayin', howled the big rough man,
'as how we didn't talk middlin' well——'

'Should say so,' growled the fat man, in tones of intense satisfaction.

'And,' the big rough man went on, yelling with delight at having made the old party hear something, 'and you can't hear only tollable——'

'Can't hear!' the fat old gentleman broke out in a resonant roar, 'can't hear! Like to know why I can't? why can't I? If I couldn't hear better than half the people on this train, I'd cut off my ears! Can't hear?
It's news to me if I can't. I'd like to know who——'

'Burlington!' yelled the brakesman. 'Chag car f'r Keokuk, Geed Rap's, an' f'r Mad'son!
This car f'r Omaha! Twen' mints' supper!

And but for this timely interruption, I don't think our pleasant little party would have got out of that snarl this side of San Francisco.

A VEGETARIAN PROBLEM.

'SPELL parsnips,' said a South Hill teacher. 'G-i-n, gin, howled the biggest boy in the class, 'there's your gin, n-a-n, nan, ther's your man, there's your ginnan, s-h-u-g, shug, there's your shug, there's your nanhang, there's your ginnanshug, g-e-r, ger, there's your ger, therels your shugger, there's your nanshugger, there's your ginnanshugger——'
"For mercy's sake" exclaimed the horrified teacher, as soon as she could catch her breath,
"what are you doing?" "Spelling par's snips," said the boy, "an' that's only one of 'em, but he says it's the boss." She told him he needn't spell the others, and he said he'd have the old man write 'em on a postal card and send 'em to her.

All the vaunted skill of the chiropodist cannot keep the ache out of the feet of a young man whose boots are smaller than his socks, Chiropod the chiropodist never so chiropodily. Now say that real fast, and see if you are sober.

A HARROWING TALE.

I am running east on the Toledo, Peoria and Warsaw, and am busy. I am scribbling as fast as I can get a letter ready to send back to Burlington when we meet the other train, and my writing excites the curiosity of an inquisitive-looking old lady sitting just opposite me. I know she is going to speak. She stands it as long as she can, and then opens out with:

Where did I come from?
Black Hills.

No? Well, I didn't look like it.

I explain that I have not been out there mining or roughing it, but went out to get the body of my brother, who was a miner, and had been shot by the Indians.

Oh-h-h! with a wailing inflection of sympathy that makes me ashamed of myself.
But curiosity soon conquers pity, and the old lady goes on probing my lacerated heart.

Did you git him?

'Yes, ma'am, very solemnly, 'I have him in the baggage car.'

A long pause, for mournful reflection, I suppose, and to give me a chance to nerve up and prepare for the next question.

'Was he scalped?'

'Yes, I say, with a sigh, 'scalped, shot through the body with arrows, all his fingers choppen off, his eyes gouged out, and his ears bored.'

The old girl's cup of horrors is full. She leans back in her seat with a sigh of grim satisfaction, and questions me no more.

Was it wrong to lie to the old lady in this heartless and scandalous manner? Yes, I think it was not. On general principles, it is just the cheese to toll lies, unless you have some object in telling them. In thus innocently stuffing my travelling acquaintance with a fable about a country I had never seen, a brother I had never had, and Indians that never were, I wrote for the old lady a thrilling chapter in her quiet life.
She would go to her quiet little home, and brighten its humdrum life by telling her people how she met and talked with a man who was going home with the body of his brother mangled in the manner described.

Then, in the course of time, after many repetitions of this narrative, she would involuntarily and innocently glide into the statement that she went into the baggage car with me and I showed her the mangled, tortured body, and she would mangle it more and more as the narrative grew upon her.
Then she would, after a little while, declare,
and in all innocence and truthfulness and lief in her own statement, that she was on the train when it came through the Black Hills, and from the car window saw the Indians chasing the doomed man and perforating his body with arrows, and dancing around him in fiendish glee, while she begged the conductor to get off and stop them, and how he declined, on the flimsy ground that he had a wife and nine children to support, and no insurance either on the top of his head or his life. Then, after a few more rehearsals, arrows would fly right in at the window where she was sitting, and one or more passengers would be killed. One arrow would pass through her bonnet. The train would be a scene of the wildest confusion and carnage. And at last, after the old lady had been gathered to her mothers, her grandchildren would tell their grandchildren about their noble old grandmother and their brave, gallant grandfather, who both fell by the hand of outnumbering savages, while defending a railway train from the attack of a band of Sioux Indians, under the command of Sitting Bull, whom their grandfather, just before he died, killed with his own hand. And thus a grand, thrilling page of family history will grow out of my unaffected little romance to the inquisitive old lady.

I will not get anything for it, it is true. The family will never thank me: the old lady will not leave me a cent, although I am the founder of the one page of greatness in their family history. But why should we be sordid and grasping and selfish? Is it not our duty to do all the good we can in this world? It is, and I will not shrink from the performance of any duty that may come to my hands, although the accomplishment of this pledge should compel me to lie to half the people I meet on the train.

SHAVING AGAINST TIME.

I had an hour to wait in St. Joseph, and I improved my time in the busy, solid old city by cleaning up. I came out of the bath, looking like Venus rising from the sea foam. Indeed, I think I "Looked a sea Cybele, fresh from ocean;"

I never saw a sea Cybele, but I think I looked like one. And I never heard of a sea Cybele waiting in a St. Joe barber shop to get shaved, either. And I don't believe there ever was a sea Cybele who lived long enough to wait, either. I waited. I saw the barber lather the face of the man in the chair. It was five o'clock, and my train started at 5:47. Good; there was plenty of time. I waited. The man in the chair went to sleep, and the barber lathered his face and washed it, and lathered it. He laved it with warm water and dried it with towels. He critically examined the cheeks and investigated the chin. He fingered the man's bristly mustache and ran his fingers meditatively through the visitors' hair. Then he strapped a razor and gazed out of the window with a far-away, dreamy look, and I saw that his soul was dwelling in the shadowy aisles of the Long Ago, and I had not the heart to call him back, although it was fifteen minutes past five, and the sleeping man's face had not been touched by the razor yet. Presently the barber sighed, and turning to the patient, rubbed his sleeping cheek with his fingers, and appeared to be on the point of asking him who he was, what he was doing there, and what he wanted. But then he looked down at his razor in an absent kind of way as though it was something he never saw before; a gleam of living intelligence lightened his face, and he came back into the land of activity and life; he turned the razor over once or twice as though he wasn't quite certain whether to shave the man with the edge or the back, and then he touched the cheek of the sleeper so lightly that it never disturbed him.

Tempus fugit a thousand miles a minute fidgeted and looked nervously at the clock. 'Time,' said the barber, with his silent, deliberate hand, 'is for slaves.' He went over that man's face as though he was shaving the queen of England. Bristle by bristle he mowed the stubble field of that man's illimitable cheek. It was twenty-five minutes after five, and the shaver was just making his first swath on the man's chin. I said, in tones suffused with waiting anguish:

'When does that train go north on the K. C. & C. B.?'

The barber nursed his way around a pimple on the man's chin as carefully as though it was the end of the jugular vein sticking out, and stepped back to admire his work. Presently he looked up at the clock and then he looked at me, and then he said:

'Which train?'

I told him, 'On the K. C., St. J. & C. B.; passenger; going north.'

He turned the man's face over to the other side, washed off the lather with a sponge, laid on some more, washed it off, dried the man's face, washed it, lathered it, strapped the razor a little, made an offer at the man's cheek, drew back, looked at the razor, glanced at the clock, put down the razor and took a chew of tobacco, picked up the razor, laid one hand on the man's head and was on the point of beginning, when he poised the razor

athered his face red it. He laved dried it with mined the cheeks

He fingered the ran his fingers itors' hair. Then gazed out of the reamy look, and I illing in the sha-go, and I had not although it was and the sleeping shed by the razor sighed, and turn-his sleeping cheek

red to be on the
he was, what he he wanted. But is razor in an ab-
it was something gleam of living ace, and he came vity and life; he r twice as though ther to shave the

ack, and then he sleeper so lightly

d miles a minute rrovously at the barber, with his nd, 'is for er that man's aving the queen

istle he mowed man's illimitable

le minutes after r making his first
I said, in tones
h:

north on the K. around a pimfully as though r vein sticking ire his work.
e clock and then said:

St. J. & C. B. ;
ver to the other
with a sponge, ed off, dried the
ed it, strapped fer at the man's he razor, glanced razor and took a the razor, laid nd was on the oised the razor

in the air, nodded to some one across the street, looked at me, and said:

'One that goes to the Bluffs?'

I said, 'No, the Hopkins branch.'

The barber began shaving the man. Then he stopped, looked at the clock, turned his head and looked out of the window, then he glanced at me in a fixed manner, and said:

'I don't know.'

He resumed his study of that man's face and went over it like an anatomist. He shaved it in three different directions. He went back at it three times after he was through and shaved some neglected spots. He laved and stroked and dried and perfumed and powdered that man's face until the clock said it was thirty-nine minutes after five, and I felt the premonitory symptoms of convulsions and nervous insanity creeping over my quivering limbs.

Too late I stayed—oh monstrous crime,

I cursed the barber's whistles;

How noiseless falls the foot of time

That only treads on bristles.

He passed over the man's hair until I felt that time had given place to eternity. He rubbed it and dusted it; he parted it four times before he got it to suit him. He combed it and brushed it down so slick, that an early fly, trying to climb to the crown of the man's head, slid off and broke his neck. At four minutes of train time, the man who was now wide awake, made an effort to rise and get out of the chair, and my heart swelled with hope. The barber pushed him back.

Shadow of eternity! he began to wax the patient's mustache.

It lacked two and one-half minutes to train time when the chair was empty. I shrieked at the patient barber in profane accents, and told him I had to be at the depot at the time.

'Well, what do you want done?' this terrible man asked me.

'Shave!' I howled with some variations not in the next text.

'Oh, well,' he said, quietly, 'climb into the chair.'

'You won't make me miss that train?' I yelled, in a fever of nervous anxiety.

He shook head. 'You can walk down there in a minute,' he said.

It was wonderful, the degree of confidence I felt in that man's latent abilities, after I had just seen him take forty-four long solid, dragging minutes to shave a man with less beard than a nun. 'Go ahead,' I said, with forced calmness.

He tucked a towel around my neck in one time and two motions.

'Swoosh!' there was an avalanche of lather from my right ear to the middle of my chin, extending laterally from the neck into the eye, nostrils, and one corner of my mouth. 'Slosh!' a corresponding freshet inundated the other side of my face and closed the left eye, and lay on the other corner of my mouth like the foam from a Buffalo schooner.

I felt the barber's left hand grasp my hair. 'Swoop!' one side of my face was shaved, down to the chin. 'Swoop!' the other cheek was clean. 'Scrawtoch; scrawtoch!' my chin was smooth. 'Rake, rake!' my hair was combed.

'Fifteen cents; there's your train now, sir. Next!' said the barber.

I caught the train and had thirty-two seconds to spare.

A FEELING FEAT.

'Sing me, my own,' he whispered, lovingly, as they both sat down on one piano stool, 'sing me, "Oh whisper what thou feelest."

'I will, young inan, I will,' said the tremulous tones of her papa, from the direction of the door. 'We will sing it as a duet, you and I; I will feel, and you can whisper what it is.' And then he felt for the boy with his foot, and went on, with unfeeling indifference. 'And you needn't confine yourself to a whisper, necessarily, in telling what you feel, and what it feels like. Give it voice, young man, give it voice.'

A NOCTURNAL DIARY.

I like to keep the diary of a journal by night. It usually consists of one short entry, made the following morning, as follows; to wit, viz:

'Paid the porter a quarter.'

The entry is varied, occasionally. In one instance, I find it made in my diary, in the following expressive language:

'Told the porter I'd pay him a quarter the next time I came that way.'

And a foot-note, on the same page, of a much later date, and referring, apparently, to the same entry, says:

'Never went that way again.'

But a reference mark on the foot-note again carries me over the score or more of pages, to a still later day, where I find the equally significant entry:

'Met the prowling, dark Nemesis on another train.'

This careless, loose-jointed system of transferring the Pullman employees is iniquitous in the extreme, distressing to the employees, and annoying to the traveling public. Congress ought to put a stop to it.

When the train on the St. Joseph & Denver City Railway leaves the first-named station, two hundred and thirty passengers try to crowd into one hundred and twenty seats. This puts me on the best possible terms with each other. I am assigned to a seat already occupied by a young gentleman with legs as long as cottonwood trees, and two valises. I wonder where he is going to put his feet. The question doesn't seem to bother him a bit. He solves it without a struggle. He puts them in my lap.

I am pleased.

But I do not say so.

Neither do I look very much like it.

But while I am pleased and proud to nurse his feet, I resist his effort at a familiar conversation. I do not approve of encouraging familiarity in strangers. He says:

'What mout land be wuth around here?'

I feel myself turn pale, for I recognize accents that I once heard, earlier in the season, down in Maine. I tell him that I don't know; that nobody really knows; that the worth of land, its actual, absolute worth, and its market value, are, indissolubly and indiscriminately, per se, and in the very nature of things, two very distinct considerations.

'How?' he says.

'Readily enough,' I tell him; 'the very hypotheses which underlie the stability of all government, the binocular theories which contaminate the indigenous type of all mar-supial and otherwise intermate forms, affect each other, neither more or less, but rather approximately.'

He 'lowed that mout be so, but he couldn't see what it hed to dew with price of land.'

I said very coldly that if he 'tried to buy land in Kausas he'd mighty soon find out what it had to do with it. Then I rudely pushed away his feet, and he put them affectionately upon the shoulders of a patient man sitting just before him.

We pass Hiawatha. I don't know why the town is so named. A distant creek is apparent, and I suppose there is Hiawatha in the spring than there is in the summer. Now don't swear and act like a three-ply idiot. I don't often do anything of that kind but you don't need to read this unless you want to.

At Sabatha, the train is halted alongside of a cattle train, while the other cattle, those in the passenger car, go up town and get dinner. After dinner the passengers solemnly contemplate the cattle, packed in at the rate of about three or four to the square inch.

'How on earth,' asks a young lady, a very pretty young lady, who gets off at Seneca,

'how on earth do they pack them in so close?'

'Why,' asks a mild-looking young man, with tender blonde whiskers and wistful blue eyes—he is an escaped divinity student, just going out to take charge of a Baptist church in western Kansas—'Why,' he says, 'did you never see them load cattle into a car?'

'No,' said the pretty Seneca girl, with a quick look of interest, 'I never did; how do they do it?'

'Why,' the divinity student remarked, slowly and very earnestly, 'they drive them all in except one, a big fellow, with thin shoulders and broad quarters; they save him for a wedge, and drive him in with a hammer.'

Somehow or other it didn't look hardly fair to me; nobody protested against its admission, however, so it went on record, but the conversation went into utter bankruptcy right there, and the theological-looking young man was the only person in the car who looked supremely satisfied with himself.

All the way from Burlington to Hopkins I peacefully snored in an upper berth. I never get any other. I always reach the conductor just in time to learn that he'll 'have to give me an upper berth.' All this winter I have lived on the road, and never got a lower berth but once. That was on the St. Louis sleeper of the C. B. & Q. road, which has no upper berths. And when I went to get into my lowly couch that night, I was so accustomed to climbing into my lofty berth from step-ladders and porters' boxes, that I didn't know how to get into a low one, and the porter boosted me up to the curtain rod, which I scrambled over, and tumbled down inside. Why, about one-fifth of my life, this winter, has been spent dangling between heaven and earth, clinging to the edge of an upper berth, feeling for the floor with my feet. There is some mistake about this. Nature never intended me to sleep in an upper berth, else she had given me legs with tubular joints, that would slide in and out, like a spy-glass.

I am glad I am not fat, since this relentless fate has assigned me forever to the doom of the upper berths. If there is anything that would make a snake laugh, it would be the spectacle of a fat man, a little along in years, with a head rather of the bald baldy, and wide suspenders flapping and dangling down his legs, puffing, squirming and kicking over the edge of an upper berth, trying to get in, grabbing at the yielding, unhelpful pillows, balancing himself on his stomach while he tears his bed to pieces with frantic snatches, and at the same time kicks the immortal breath out of the man in the opposite berth, and at last, with a hollow moan, comes sliding down, landing astride of the neck of the man who is sitting on the edge of the lower berth, unbuttoning his shoes. It usually winds up by his giving some man a dollar and fifty cents to trade berths with him.

It is unnecessary to say that the old fat man is very sensitive on this subject, and doesn't like to be joked about it. One night, after I had laughed myself blind at just such a scene as I have described, I heard the fat man ask, with great sadness of voice, if anybody wouldn't like to exchange berths with him. Moved to pity I said, 'I would.'

'All right,' said the perspiring fat man, 'mine's upper five, but you'll have to get the porter to make it up again before you get it. It's kind of tore all to pieces,' he added, rather apologetically.

And he was correct, for I could see it lying all over the floor of the car.

'Which is your berth?' he asked, as, with a grateful glow on his face, he prepared to drop into it.

'Upper seven,' I said, 'next one to yours.'

And I don't think I was ever called quite so many names in five minutes, all different and none complimentary, in all my life, as I was then. I will never again try to be accommodating in a sleeping car.

The Shah of Persia does not pay his debts. Shake! old Nasser-ud-deen; what do you do with yourself about the first of the month?

'I am going to Colorado for my health,' said young Keepitup to old Bobysheal, the other day. 'Ah!' replied the old man, 'and when did you leave it there?'

TWO DARING MEN.

On the way from Terre Haute—which is indifferently pronounced Ter Hut, Terry Hawt, Terry Hot, and Terra Hote—down to Princeton we passed through a station called Sullivan, where two men got on the train in a state, or rather in two states, of the wildest excitement. Only about fifteen minutes before the train reached the town, a terrible explosion had occurred in a coal mine; a column of smoke and slate and broken timbers and flame had shot up into the air from the mouth of the shaft, like a volcano; the debris had choked up the shaft, and thirty men were imprisoned in the mine. And nothing, these two passengers declared, was being done. People were standing around horror-stricken, they said; nobody would go down; nobody would do anything. 'Oh,' they shouted, while the people in the car looked at them with undisguised admiration, 'Oh, if they only had had time, they would have headed a rescue party and brought those suffering miners to light and safety.'

'I would have gone down into that shaft,' said the first noble passenger, 'if I knew I would never come out alive.'

'I would not hold my life worth that,' snapping his fingers, 'when the thought of those poor fellows suffering untold and unknown horrors and agony down in the burning mine.'

'If the train had only been an hour later,' cried the first noble passenger, 'it would have found me down in that mine when it came along.'

'If I had thought the conductor would have waited for me,' exclaimed the second noble passenger, 'I would have gone down anyhow.'

And the passengers could not repress a murmur of admiration. An old man, who was chewing cardamon seeds for his catarrh, said:

'There is another train comes down in about three hours.'

But nobody paid any attention to him except to frown at him, and then they turned again to look at the two noble, daring passengers, and shudder at the thought of their recklessness.

'Oh,' the two noble passengers cried in unison, 'we couldn't get anybody to go down that shaft. We begged and commanded, and did all that mortal men could do, but we couldn't get anybody to go down.'

I rather expected this was true. I have no doubt of it.

'I wonder,' said the first noble passenger, 'if the conductor wouldn't run the train back and wait for us?'

'I wonder?' shouted the second noble passenger, enthusiastically, 'let's ask him!'

And the burst of admiration from the other passengers was so strong that I thought they were going to raise a purse for the rescuers on the spot. But the train passed on, while the two rescuers kept declaring they had a good mind to get off and walk back, because nobody up at Sullivan would do anything. And, finally, they did get off at a little station about thirteen miles down the road; and what do you suppose was the important business that had dragged them away from the rescue of twenty or thirty perishing men?

There was a man down there they heard had a cow to sell, and when they got off the train they learned that he had sold her two days before.

A PRACTICAL MAN.

Something about the engineer, his face or his manner, or possibly his clothes, attracted my attention. Anyhow, I wanted to talk to him and hear him talk about his engine. There is always a wonderful fascination about railway engineers and locomotives and railroad men generally; for all people, and I am, and have always been, especially susceptible to this fascination. Were you ever at Creston, Iowa? And did you ever stop at the old Creston House? I have sat, quiet and motionless, in its sitting-room, by the hour, listening to the clatter of the train men about me. Creston is the Hornellsville of Iowa. 'By thunder!' one man would be shouting, 'I looked out of the way-car window and saw old Flanigan comin' down the main line lickety split, thirty miles an hour if he was makin' a mile, and I——' '—— switch open and two coaches on the siding,' says an engineer, 'and I squealed for brakes an' throwed her clear over, and you should see the fire fly out of them rails, and before——' 'Well, sir,' somebody else from some other run chimes in, 'I twisted that blamed old brake till I thought I'd twist it off; hold nothing, you couldn't hold——' 'Aw, she is tough; she's the prettiest piece of iron on this division; she's quick as a——' 'Who went out on No. 37 last night?' And so on through a charming confusion of throttle and lever and lamp, and draw-bar, fire-box, cylinder-cocks, way-cars, frogs, switches, trucks, tanks, claw-bars, cattie-guard, platform-cars, chairs, cross-frogs, signals, flags, and a thousand things that I didn't know anything about. I rather liked it. But before I could get to this engineer I was speaking of, who had a passenger engine on the Indianapolis, Bloomington and Western, another had already engaged him in conversation. 'I am always willing to let anybody else make a fool of himself and ask the questions, just so I get the benefit of the answers, so I let him talk while I hung around and listened. This man wasn't like any engineer I had ever made friends with before. He was an awfully practical fellow, the passenger said.

'Your's is a very exciting life.'

'Is it?' said the engineer, with an air of interest.

'Well,' said the passenger, quieted a little bit, 'I meant isn't it?'

'Oh,' was the reply, with a satisfied accent. Then, after a pause, 'Well, I don't know; do you see anything very exciting about this?'

He was lazily stretched out on his cushion, dividing up his paper of fine cut, putting all but one 'chew' of it into his vest pocket, and putting the one 'chew' into his tobacco-pouch, so that he could show the fireman that was all he had, when that useful official should ask for it.

The passenger fidgeted a little, but didn't seem to want to give it up. I didn't know how to feel glad enough that I hadn't gone into the catechism business with the quiet man.

'Well,' said the passenger, after a little while, 'are we pretty near ready to pull out?'

'Pull out what?' asked the engineer.

'Why, the train.'

'Train isn't in anything. Train's all right.'

'Well,' said the passenger. 'I mean, are we nearly ready to go?'

'I am,' quietly remarked the engineer, 'are you?'

'You have a splendid engine there,' said the passenger.

'Tain't mine,' replied the sphinx, 'it belongs to the company.'

'How much can you get out of her?' asked the passenger.

The engineer looked surprised. 'Can't get a cent out of it,' he said; 'can't get anything out of anybody except the paymaster!'

'Well, but I mean,' persisted the passenger, 'what can she do, on a good road, easy grade, and you cracking on every pound of steam she can carry?'

'It can pull the train,' he said; 'what would you expect it to do?'

'Well, but how fast?'

'Schedule time,' was the reply, 'that's all we're allowed to make; must make our time between all stations. That's imperative orders on the I., B. & W.'

'Well, but couldn't you pull wide open and——'

'Pull who wide open?'

'Why, her—your engine, and give her sand and——'

'Why should I give it sand?'

'To make her run faster.'

'Sand does not increase the speed of an engine, steam is the only motive power.'

'But you give her sand on a heavy grade and——'

'Excuse me, I never give an engine sand. The sand is poured on the rail.'

'Oh, well, you know what I mean. You give her steam, you know, and——'

'No,' he said, 'I do not, I merely move the throttle lever, thus opening the regulator valve, and the steam is introduced to the proper portions of the machinery in simple obedience to the laws of physics. I have no control over it, beyond regulating the supply.'

'Did you ever,' said the despairing passenger, 'come so near a collision that you had to throw her clear over and——'

'No,' the man said very gravely, 'and I never expect to. It couldn't be done. No one man could throw this engine clear over. It weighs thirty-five tons.'

'I suppose,' the passenger obstinately persisted, 'that when you start out with a heavy train you have to hold her awfully close to the rails?'

'I have nothing to do with that,' he said 'the laws of gravitation and friction control all that. I presume my weight on the engine adds somewhat to its pressure on the rail, although of course that amounts to very little in comparison with the weight of the engine.'

The passenger wiped the beaded perspiration from his brow.

'Well,' he said, 'how do you like life on the foot-board, anyhow?'

'I don't live on the foot-board,' the engineer said, 'I live at home.'

'Well, how do you like running on the road, then?'

'I don't run; I ride.'

The conductor came along just here and handed the man in the cab a bit of yellow paper, and then shouted 'All aboard.' The passenger, with a grateful expression of countenance, said, 'Thank heaven!' as he went back and climbed on the rear platform of the last car, as far away from the engine as he could get, and I heard the engineer, as I turned away, growling about people who 'always wanted to take shop.' It was a terribly narrow escape for me, but I made it, and I rather enjoyed it. Providence always does take care of the truly good.

A MYSTERIOUS ACCIDENT.

One bright morning, early in October, I was on Dave Blackburn's train on the Keokuk division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad. We were running so fast that the noise of the wheels was rattling along about two hundred yards behind the train, doing its level best to keep in sight, but losing ground every jump. Suddenly the train stopped. Away out between stations, no cattle on the track, no water tank in sight, nothing apparently to step for. She pulled up so close to an orchard that the farmer came out and sat on the fence with a gun in his hand, and a couple of bold, bad dogs, looking deceitfully pleasant, tagging along at his heels. He evidently didn't care about setting up the apples. The passengers were alarmed, not at the determined neutrality of the farmer, but at the sudden stoppage of the train. They knew something serious had happened. Presently the fireman came walking down along the side of the track, looking carefully as though he had dropped his diamond out of the cab window.

'What is it?' asked the first passenger.

'What is the matter?' asked the second passenger.

'What has happened?' asked the third passenger.

'What broke?' asked the fourth passenger.

'Why did we stop?' asked the fifth passenger.

'What's up?' asked the sixth passenger.

'What's broke loose?' asked the seventh passenger.

'What done it?' asked the eighth passenger.

'Broke a spring-hanger,' gravely replied the fireman, and passed on, and all the questioning passengers drew their heads back and closed their windows, and with great gravity was repeated the fireman's statement to the other passengers who had not been able to get to a window in time to ask the fireman anything:

'Broke a spring-hammer.'

'Broke a sling-hainer.'

'Broke a screen-hanger.'

'Broke a string-hammer.'

'Broke a string-ander.'

'Broke a scene-hanner.'

'Broke a steam-hammer.'

'Broke a swing-hanger.'

'Broke a bean-sparker.'

'Broke a hair-hanger.'

And if Benjamin Franklin and George Washington and Christopher Columbus had been in that coach, they couldn't have looked wiser nor been more thoroughly ignorant of the nature of the accident than the awestruck passengers who imparted and received this information and tried to look as though they weren't wondering what it was. There should be a law compelling railroad people to speak United States when imparting information relative to the nature of accidents, to the inquiring passengers. There wasn't a passenger in that coach that ever expected to see good Dave Blackburn or the engineer alive again. We all supposed that when a spring-hanger broke, it just tore the engine all to pieces, stood it on end and rammed it into the ground, and then ran on ahead, tore up the track, set fire to a bridge and blew up a culvert. The average passenger has an idea that a spring-hanger owns about the whole engine, that it is one of those things that can even swear at a brakeman and walk up to a baggageman and call him a 'wooden-headed, flat backed, trunk-liftin' hurricane of wrath,' and consequently when a passenger is told that the spring-hanger is broke, he has an impression that it will take every last dollar there is on the train to set the old thing up again.

SCIENCE vs. IMPULSE.

It is very easy to write long articles, profound with medical learning and wisdom advising people, as they value health and life, to avoid 'hurrying and excitement,' during the heated term; but when a man is only ten feet away from a petulant gentleman cow, and sixty-five feet away from the nearest point in the pasture fence which they are both heading for with all the intensity of purpose that can actuate living creatures, who is going to stop and feel his pulse to see whether he is in more of a hurry than is warranted by the laws of hygiene?

MISSED HIS COUNT.

The neighbour's cat had clawed the baby, and the man was going out to the wood-pile, with his ax over his shoulder and the cat under his arm. 'Carom me back to the house,' said the cat, who appeared to be chalk full of emotion; 'that ought not to count, it was only a scratch.' The man took his cue, and looked thoughtful. 'True,' he said, 'and this is only an accident.' And he laid the feline across the block and held it down with his foot, and swinging the axe above his head, brought it down with dreadful force. There was a moment of dreadful silence, and then, while the cat, from her high seat on the neighbour's shed, sang, 'Oh, wauly, wauly, up the bank,' the man scraped around in the chips to find his three toes, and carried them in to his wife, and asked her if she supposed the doctor could sew them on when he came.

THE STORY OF INNACH GARDEN.

'ARMA virum que cano'
The man with two arms and a hoe,
I sing.
The spring
Saw him with spade and hoe and rake,
With back and arms that burn and ache,
Dig and swear
At the hard earth, where Over the adamantine sod
All winter long the family trod,
All day long like a slave he wrought;
The spade was dull and the day was hot;
When a softer or softer place he sought,

Sunstrokes and brick-bats filled the spot.
From rosy dawn,
Till the day was gone,
With tears and groans he laboured on.
By Luna's light the lettuce bed
With seeds of lactuca sativa were fed
Where the onion wept at its breathful taste
The bulbs of the allium cepa he placed;
And you never have seen a
More charming verbenas
Than those he put in the oblong mound
With viola tricolor bordered round;
And on each side of the walk from the gate a Row of the reseda odorata;
Back in the kitchen-garden bed,
Raphanus Sativus, white and red;
Where the tall poles burden the haunted air, is
The place where he plants phascolus vulgaris;
All of the seeds that the grocer had;
Lots of things good, and some things bad;
Things that he didn't know how to spell;
Roots that bite and bulbs that smell;
Un-known vines of suspicious breeds;
Sprouts that come up and turn to weeds;
Things it would poison the children to pull—
Every inch of his garden filled it full.

Daybreak came, and its earliest ray Smiled on the garden just as it lay.
Eight o'clock, and the man went down
To his office desk in the busy town.
Nine, and his family flitted away
With a rich relation to spend the day, Then.
Just as the whistles were tolling ten,
A hen
Pride of the flock that lived next door (Numbering a hundred and seventy-five), Peeped through a crack of the neighbour's fence,
And said to her comrades: "Lettuce, hens!"
Hens!
They came by ones, by scores, by tens;
Gallus old birds, a clarion crew
Came with the crowd, as they always do;
Bantams, hardly as big as a match,
But worse than a snow-plow on the scratch;
Dorking fowls that make things whirl
When they dig up the ground with their extra spur;
Malays and Hamburgs, spangled and plain,
White checked chickens that hail from Spain;
Fighting game-chickens, Poland black,
Guinea hens, with eternal "squack"
Hens with chicks that weeted and cried,
Hens bereaved, whose weetes has died;
Giddy young hens that never had set,
Grave old hens that were at it eye;
Portly old roosters solemn and stout;
Old-time bruisers with one eye out;
Hens with broods of awkward ducks,
That gave no heed to their anxious clucks,
And never regarding their worried looks,
Plunged into gutters and ponds and brooks;
Mortified roosters, with tall feathers lost;
Fowls whose claws were nipped by the frost;
Business-like birds, with no ear for fun;
Pullets whose troubles were just begun;
Tough old fowls, for the boarders' collation;
Yellow-legged hens of the Western persuasion,
Bright gems in the circuit rider's vacation;
Baptist-like ducks, with their awkward totter,
Hunting around for some waist deep-water;
Blue-looking turkeys, scratching a living,
Fore-ordained to die next Thanksgiving,
And here in the mob was a solemn passel
Of geese, with tremendous feet for a wrastle,
Not much on the scratch, but 'twas easily seen
They were worse on grass than a mowing-machine.

Where they all came from nobody knew,
But over the fence in clouds they flew;
And into the garden for life or death,
They scratched till they panted, out of breath;
No pause, no stop, no stay for rest,
Till the sun went down in the crimson west;
Till the man came home from his work and found

The yawning clefts in the riven ground,
And he gazed for a space, with a fearful start,
Which the deep sobs broke from his grateful
heart;
And he clasped in his arms his babes and spouse,
'Thank Heaven, the earthquake spared my 'house!'

THE MERRY, MERRY SPRINGTIME.

The month of April is the seventh month of the year. It was originally the thirteenth, but in 1303, Augustus Cæsar changed the calendar, because he had a note to meet in the middle of the month, and did not have a cent to pay it with, and he dropped that month out entirely, and April thus became the third month, as it now is. It was named after Aprillia, the god of spring, who used to get up on the last day of March, and taking a paint-pot and a marking brush, go around the country painting Latin mottoes and moral precepts and bursts of poetry on the rocks and trees, among others, the following gems which have come down to our own day:

'Takibus liverimus correctore for the Bloodibus.'

'Dulce et ducorem est to take 'rye and rock' in the

'Honey, tar, rumque cano, for colds and coughs.'

'Nox populi pro Bolus's corn pilaster est.'

'Gissipius W. Achates, ear and lung doctor.'

'Chew only optimus nave plug, ten cents a hunc.'

'In hoc cough syrup vinces. Sign of the big mortar.'

'Try Brown's magic lotion for freskles.'

Now, thousands of people used to read these things, and they actually believed them and tried them on. They all died miserably, and were called among men, 'April's fools.' This is the origin of a custom that has lasted even unto our time. The cursed 'em is most vigorously observed by the man who kicks the hat full of bricks.

The motto of April is 'Dum eripuit, erump,' which means, 'Do not go out of the house without an ulster, a duster, a chest-protector and a palm-leaf fan.'

It is a month devoted to, and by the immortal gods set apart for weather, and sometimes, in a good April, that understands its business and can get up and bristle around,

there are eight kinds of climate in one day.

The jewel of April is the sardonix, and it is said by people who have studied meteorology ever since the time of Augustus to be the sardonickest month in the whole lot.

The Fourth of July used to be April, but after they tried it a few years it had to be changed, on account of the weather.

Perhaps, however, in the whole history of the month, the best thing that ever happened in April happened in our house. It is just two years old this week, and can create a panic at his 'pa's' desk among the manuscript and papers, that can't be excelled by the best efforts of his natal month upon the dinner-table of a premature picnic.

There may be some apparent discrepancies in the opening portion of the historical part of this sketch of April. It is, however, a sufficient answer to any objections that may be raised, to say that we believe what we have written concerning this month, its history and traditions, and if we believe it, anybody can.

AGRICULTURAL AFFLICTIONS.

From Augusta to Macomb, Illinois, every field is full of plows and patient farmers. Dear, patient, good-natured, grumbling agriculturists. Where the farmer gets his good nature from is a mystery to me every time I look at him. I watched him to-day from the car window, plodding along at the tail of the plow, and I wondered that he ever smiled at all, under any provocation. Of all men, it seems to me the farmer has the best right to grumble. Only, he never grumbles at the right things. He grumbles at prices, and then, of course, nobody sympathizes with him nor cares a cent for his troubles, because we grumble at the same thing. Prices never did suit anybody. The seller always thinks they are too low, and the buyer always knows they are too high. The merchant goes into bankruptcy because he is compelled to sell his goods for half what they cost him; and the customer goes naked and starves because he can't afford to pay one-half what is asked for them. So the farmer, when he grumbles at prices, is no worse off than the rest of us, and accordingly attracts no sympathy.

Down in Southern Indiana, somewhere about Seymour, they were telling me about an old settler who was depressed on account of the hard times. Everything went wrong; this honest farmer remarked, in tones of the deepest dejection, 'The big crops don't do us a bit of good. What's the use? Corn only thirty cents. Everybody and everything's dead set agin the farmer. Only thirty cents for corn! Why, by gum, it won't pay our taxes, let alone buy us clothes. It won't buy us enough salt to put up a barrel of pork. Corn only thirty cents! By jock's, it's a livin' cold-blooded swindle on the farmer, that's what it is. It ain't worth raisin' corn for such a price as that. It's a mean, low robbery.' Within the next ten days that man had sold so much more of his corn than he had intended, that he found he had to buy corn to feed through the winter with. The price nearly knocked him down. 'What!!!' he yelled, 'thirty cents for corn! Land alive—thirty cents! What are you givin' us? Why, I don't want to buy your farm, I only want some corn! Thirty cents for corn! Why, I believe there's nobody left in this world but a set of graspin', blood-suckin' old misers. Why, good land, you don't want to be able to buy a national bank with one corn crop! Thirty cents for corn! Well, I'll let my cattle an' horses run on corn stalks all winter before I'll pay any such an unheard-of outrageous price for corn as that. Why, the country's flooded with corn and thirty cents a bushel is a blamed robbery, an' I don't see how any man, lookin' at the crop we've had, can have the face to ask such a price.'

But here is where, to my way of thinking, the gazelle comes in for the farmer.

It is spring, and the annual warfare begins. Early in the morning the jocund farmer hies him to the field, and hunts around in the dead weeds and grass for the plow he left out there somewhere sometime last fall. When he finds it, he takes it to the shop to have it mended. When it is mended, he goes back into the field with it. Half way down the first furrow he lays, he runs the plow fairly into a big live-oak root. The handles alternately break a rib on this side of him and jab the breath out of him on the other, and the sturdy root, looking up out of the ground with a pleased smile of recognition, says cheerfully:

'Ah, Mr. Thistlepod, at it again, eh?'

Fifty feet farther on he strikes a stone that doubles up the plow point like a piece of lead, and while the amazed and breathless agriculturist leans, a limp heap of humanity, across the plow, the relic of the glacial period remarks, sleepily:

'Ah ha; spring here already? Glad you woke me up.'

And then the grauger sits down and patiently tries to tie on that plow-point with a hickory withe, and while he pursues this fruitless task, the friendly crow swoops down, near enough to ask:

'Goin' to put this twenty in corn this year, Mr. Thistlepod?'

And before he has time to answer the sable bird, a tiny grasshopper, wriggling out of a clod so full of eggs that they can't be counted, shouts briskly:

'Here we are again, Mr. Thistlepod; dinner for 500,000,000,000.'

And then a slow-moving, but very positive potato-bug crawls out into the sunlight to see if the frost had faded his stripes, and says:

'The old-fashioned peach blow potatoes are the best for a sure crop, but the early rose should be planted for the first market.'

Then several new kinds of bugs who haven't made any record yet, climb over the fence and come up to inquire about the staple crops of the neighbourhood, and before he can get through with them Professor Tice sends him a circular stating that there won't be a drop of rain from the middle of May to the last of October. This almost stuns him, but he is beginning to feel a little resigned when a despatch is received from the department of agriculture at Washington, saying that all indications point to a summer of unprecedented, almost incessant and long-continued rains and floods, and advising him to plant no root crops at all. While he is trying to find words in which to express his emotion, a neighbour drops in to tell him that all the peach trees in the country are winter-killed, and that the hog cholera is raging fiercely in the northern part of the township. Then his wife comes out to tell him the dog has fallen into the well, and when the poor man gets to the door-yard, his children, with much shouting and excitement, meet him and tell him there are a couple of cats, of the pole denomination, in the spring house, and another one under the barn. With tears and groans he returns to the field, but by that time it has begun to snow so hard he can't see the horses when he stands at the plow. He is discouraged and starts for the house with his team, when he meets a man who bounces him for using a three-horse clevis he had made himself, and wrings ten dollars out of him for it. When he reaches the house the drive-well man is waiting for him, and while he is settling with him a clock pedlar comes in, and a lightning-rod man, screened by the storm, climbs up on the ten-dollar smoke house, and fastens $65 worth of lightning-rods on it, and before the poor farmer can get his gun half loaded, the bailiff comes in to tell him that he has been drawn on the jury.

No, I would not, even I could, be a farmer.

The life is pleasant and independent, but it seems to have its drawbacks.

If I were a farmer I would grumble all I wanted, and thump the man who found fault with me for it.

A BLIGHTED CENSUS TAKER.

'What does your husband do?' asked the census man. 'He ain't doin' nothing at this time of the year,' replied the young wife. 'Is he a pauper?' asked the census man. She blushed scarlet to the ear. 'Law, no!' she exclaimed, somewhat indignantly. 'We ain't been married more'n two weeks.' Then the census man threw down his book and rushed out into the depths of the gloomy forest, and caught hold of a white oak tree three feet through to hold himself up by.

POKING FUN AT THE NATIVE.

The Sioux City and Pacific train stopped at Onawa the other day and the smart man on the train leaned out of the window and shouted to a native, 'What is the name of this town?' 'Onawa,' replied the native. 'On a what?' queried the smart man. Patiently the native repeated the name of the helmet. 'Do you want to sell it?' asked the smart man. The patient native didn't know; 'lowed mebber they'd sell if anybody wanted to buy it had enough.' 'I'll give you twenty-eight cents for it,' bid the smart man. The native turned his head thoughtfully on one side and considered the proposition in silence. Finally he raised his head with the air of a man who had made up his mind to trade: 'An't row yourself in?' he asked. The window came down with a slam, and as the train pulled out, there was laughter in the car, but the smart man couldn't tell whether it was meant for himself or the native, although he was inclined to think it was.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Aberdeen, May 3.—Who was the author of the 'Waverley Novels'?

CONGLOCKETTY ANGUS McPHERSON McCLAN.

A man named Tom Donovan; lives down here in Bogus Hollow and drives a dray. What do you want to know for?

Boston, Mass.—Can you tell me whether Connecticut has now two capitals, as formerly, or only one?

STATESMAN.

It has five. Have you no spelling-book, that you had to send clear out here to learn what every schoolboy in Iowa could tell you?

Marion, Iowa.—Who wrote the poem called 'Thanatopsis,' beginning, 'To him, who in the love of nature'?

ASA.

We did, but you need not go and tell everybody about it.

Peoria, Ill.—Is it true that a cat has nine lives?

THOMAS.

It is, it is. Some of them have eleven. In the year 1853, during the reign of King IX., there was a cat at Medford-upon-Rum that had fourteen lives, and after being beheaded the fifteenth time, got up, picked up her head in her mouth and ran away, and is supposed to be alive to this day. And we think this same cat is the one owned and maintained by a neighbour of ours.

Appleton, Wis.—Was William Tell, as is claimed by some folks, really a fabulous or mythological character?

HISTORY.

No, he was not. He was a real man; had just as actual an existence as Washington or Grant. If you don't believe it, come down here, and we can prove it to your perfect satisfaction. We can show you a book with a picture of William Tell shooting an apple from his son's head, and Tell, the apple and his son are all there.

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Can you tell me why it is warmer in summer than it is in the winter?

I. C. S.

It isn't. Who put that nonsense into your head? If the Ann Arbor schools can't do better than to teach people that it is warmer in the summer than it is in the winter, they had better sell out. Where did you get such an idea, anyhow?

Denver, Colorado—(1) Where is the Yosemite Valley, and (2) what route do I take to get there?

TRAVELLER.

1. There is no such a place. It used to be located about three miles below St. Joseph, Missouri, on the Kansas bank of the Mississippi river, but about two years ago it was washed away by a freshet and has never been seen or heard of since.

2. We don't know, and what's more, we don't care a red-handed, continental, star-striped Royal Bengal American nickel.

Mishwauka, June 2.—Is it right for a temperance man to drink whiskey?

REFORMER.

Well, no; it is hardly right; hardly right; unless he likes it. That makes a difference, and even then it is hardly the thing for him to do. Unless he likes it very much indeed.

Newark, N.J.—How many body servants did George Washington have?

He had five last summer, but this season

he has only three, the two who travelled with Mr. Barnum's show last year being now engaged for the gorilla and the wild boy of Borneo, until July 1, when the gorilla will be withdrawn and Joice Heth substituted, on account of the heat.

Ann Arbor, Mich.—How many bones are there in the human body, at maturity?

STUDENT.

It depends on the size of the man. Now, in a shad weighing one pound, there are 2,625 well defined bones. A man weighing one hundred and forty pounds, therefore, would have in his body one hundred and forty times as many as a one pound shad, or 936,852,623 bones. Given the weight of the man, it will always be perfectly easy for you, by this method, to ascertain the number of bones in his body.

Chicago.—Who is the wealthiest man in the United States, outside of New York State and the great mining States?

BANKER.

We are. But we are not lending a dollar to anybody, for anything. You understand?

Boston.—Who was the author of the Junius letters, do you think?

POLITICIAN.

Junius, you donkey; Junius.

Warrensburg, Mo.—When is the time to travel?

When you hear her father's foot on the third step, young man, is about as good a time as any, to start, and you can prolong the tour to suit your own convenience and the length of the old man's cane. From the innocence with which you ask the question, we suppose you didn't travel until he was clear into the parlour. Served you right.

Cohasset, Mass.—Why do not the lower animals speak?

We never gave the subject very close thought, but we suppose it is to avoid being called on to make addresses of welcome and after-dinner speeches.

Cleveland, O.—Mr. Editor, can you tell me what was the peculiar and specific charm in the intonation of the great actor, who, it is said, could make an audience weep, by the manner in which he could pronounce Mesopotamia?

ETHICAL.

We do not know just what was the trouble with him, Ethiel, and we have always been rather inclined to think it was a campaign story, got up for political effect; but it may be true, for we have seen men so drunk that it made them weep and howl like demons to say 'individual aggregations,' and we don't believe money could have hired them to say 'Mesopotamia.'

THE TROUBLE WITH MOODY.

'Oh, pshaw!' exclaimed the gentleman who has just billed Burlington for a lecture on 'The frauds of the Bible,' closing an animated theological discussion in a Main-street bar-room; 'oh, pshaw; they ain't no sense talking that way about him. I'm willin' to give Moody credit for all the good points he's got. He's an earnest enough man; believes what he says, honest enough in his opinions, I reckon; but, dog-gone it, the man's coarse; he ain't got no kulcher.' And the discussion was closed.

BERGHIZING A CAT.

When you feel that you have got to kill a cat, when you must kill a cat or suffer night after night from the pangs of a reproving conscience, this is the way Our Dumb Animals says you must kill it, the cat, not your conscience:

'Place the cat in a box large enough to turn round in and not feel stifled. Then, for a grown cat, put two table-spoonsful of best chloroform on a handful of cotton batting. Put the cat in first, shutting the lid of the trunk, then open the lid wide enough to slip in the chloroformed cotton, and immediately close it.'

Now, could anything be more considerate or humane? Be sure and have the box large and well-ventilated, so that the doomed cat 'will not feel stifled.' Nothing is more annoying to a chloroformed cat than a close, stifling atmosphere. Cats have been known to die from the effects of chloroform administered to them in a tight, stifling box. The best box for the purpose should have a bay window in each end, and should be ventilated by the Ruttan system, and there should be a large hole cut in the side of the box so that the cat could come out and get something to eat and drink when necessary. Then you should have the chloroform carefully deodorized, so as to remove any unpleasant or noxious flavour, and it should be dropped on a bit of perfumed cotton and laid away in one corner of the box, within easy reach, where the cat could go and smell it when it felt like it. In the course of some ten or twelve years the cat will pass gently away. Our Dumb Animals is a very excellent journal, but it has some dumb queer notions about cat killing.

A REMARKABLE CURE.

'For many, many years, 'said the man with the bad eye, 'I was troubled, annoyed, positively afflicted with a raging, burning thirst for strong drink, and alcoholic beverages. I sought for relief in every way. I sought the advice of physicians and the counsels of friends. I tried various cures recommended by the newspapers, but none of them seemed to do me any good.'

'And by what means,' asked the clergyman in the tall hat, 'did you at length succeed in allaying this terrible thirst?'

'Well,' said the man with the bad eye, after a moment's reflection, 'I found that Old Crow whisky, as a steady thing, kind of softened it down and quieted it about as much as anything I tried. When I found the thirst and the burning desire for a drink coming on, I would go and take about three fingers of Old Crow and the thirst would pass away, and—'

CATCHING THE HORSE-CAR.

'Stop that car!' cried old Mr. Nosengale, chasing a flying car up Division-street, the car fresh as a daisy and Mr. Nosengale badly blown, and the distance pole not a minute away. 'Stop that car!' he shouted, to a distant but fleet-limbed boy. 'Certainly,' shrieked back the obliging boy, 'what shall I stop it with?' 'Tell it to hold on,' shouted the abandoned passenger. 'Hold on to what?' yelled the boy. 'Make it wait for me!' puffed Mr. Nosengale. 'You've got too much weight now,' said the boy, 'that's what's the trouble with you.' 'Call the driver!' gasped the perspiring citizen, and as the car rounded the corner and passed out of sight, the mocking echoes of the obliging answer came floating softly back, 'All right! What shall I call him?'

SOMETHING TO BOOT.

'Did you trade your brown mare for Gilderoy's gray horse even. Mr. Pillicoddy?' the neighbour's son asked him the other evening, as they were looking at the new horse down in the stable yard. 'N-no,' replied the old man listlessly, 'no,' and then, with an air of interest, as he looked up and saw a young man in a little straw hat, a new summer suit, a button-hole bouquet and a cane cross the yard and drop easily into a rocking chair on the porch, within easy reach of Miss Pillicoddy's sewing-chair, 'No,' said the old man, kind of pulling his hat on a little tighter, 'no, I've got something to boot,' and before the blooming cherub could button up his seven by nine ears, he was ricocheting across the pasture fence and seated on a moist warm spot. 'How fresh!' murmured the old man, as he trundled the sewing-chair into the house, and locked and bolted the front door after him.

A DIRE CATASTROPHE.

A man came into the office the other day and said that 'Yuletide was coming on apace.' We were equal to the emergency, and after a little manouvering got him seated in the patent 'Middlerib Welcome' and shot him out of the alley window and through a brick wall twenty-eight inches thick. And it wasn't until the inquest came on that we thought to look into the Encyclopædia, when we were amazed to learn that Yuletide meant Christmas. Alas, alas, how often we cause pain and give offense by our thoughtlessness! Just for the lack of a little patient investigation we have knocked a hole in our neighbour's wall that will cost $3.75 to repair, and that man's widow is so offended that we don't suppose she will ever speak to us again. Ah, dear, we must learn to be more patient; in our blind slavery to an ungovernable temper, we fear we may hurt somebody yet.

A TRIBUTE TO 'CULCHAW.'

During the recent convention of governors, the governor of North Carolina rose to make his usual remark, but observing that the governor of Massachusetts was present, he so far amended the original resolution as to say to the governor of South Carolina that 'the leaden hours on slow, unfolding wings had dragged their weary lengths in mock eternities nigh half-way round the tiresome dial-plate, since last they bent the pregnant hinges of the elbow, and touched with earthly nectar rare, from old Kentucky's copper-bottomed stills, their parched lips, to cool with gurgling dewiness the dry and whistling throat.'

Did you ever notice that the raggeder and frayer the neck-band of your shirt grew, the more starch the washerwoman put into it, and the harder and glossier she ironed it? (And the higher you carried your head the more you fidgeted?)

The phonograph will registers thirty-two thousand vibrations a second. And then it can't half keep up with a man who is trying to tell how he did and what he said when the passengers saw that the train was going to plunge through the open draw-bridge.

RULES OF CONDUCT.

Never exaggerate, at least, don't exaggerate so excessively as to cause undue remark.

Never laugh at the misfortunes of others, save in the isolated instance of a man struggling between heaven and earth, with only the blue dome of the sky above him, and nothing to speak of under him, except a banana peel.

Never send a present hoping for one in return. Nine times out of ten you will slip up on your expectations. Freeze to the present you buy. You are dead sure of that.

Never question your neighbours' servants or children about family matters. They are liable to fib to you. The best way is to 'snook' around and find out for yourself.

Always offer the easiest seat in the room to a lady or an invalid. A hard-bottom, straight-back chair is usually considered about the easiest thing there is made to sit on. A rocking chair is apt to produce seasickness.

Never pass between two passengers who are talking together, without offering an apology. One of them may lift you a kick that will raise you through the pier glass.

Never put a fire or warm, dry sheets in the spare room. It's too awfully inviting, and these are hard times.

Never insult an acquaintance by harsh words when applied to for a favour. It is just as easy and ever so much pleasanter, to lie to him and tell him you haven't got it. He may know you are a liar, but he can't deny that you are a gentleman.

Never fail to answer an invitation, either personally or by letter. If it is an invitation to dinner, by all means answer it personally. If it is an invitation to a wedding or donation party, a letter will do just as well, and is about ten times as cheap.

If you lounge down into a rocking-chair and tilt back across the toes of a man in a neat fitting boot, don't ask him if he is hurt, or say anything else calculated to make him speak, just let him stand up and smile for a few moments till he gets his voice under control. Society is used to the ghastly smile of a man with tight boots, and doesn't mind it, but the quavering tones of an anguish-stricken voice are always calculated to cast a gloom over the entire community.

SOUNDS AND SENSE.

'Mr. Parafine,' exclaimed an indignant woman, dashing into a West Hill grocery. 'I don't like that sugar you sent me last week at all. It wasn't fit to use.'

'Not fit to use!' asked the astonished grocer, 'why, what was the matter with it?'

'Matter enough,' said the woman; 'it looked nice enough, but it was as gritty as gravel.'

'Oh, yes,' responded the grocer, 'oh, yes, I know now. It was a new brand, that was landed in for our customers to try. Oh, yes, I know. I'll give you something better this week.'

And the woman looked him right in the eye, but he never quailed, and she didn't know just whether she heard him right, or whether he meant just what she thought said, or not.

ROMANCE AND REALITY.

A party of serenaders halted on Boundary street the other night, touched the light guitar, and struck up, with great feeling, 'Come where my love lies dreaming,' and then a great bush-headed wretch, forty-eight years old, with a beard like a thicket, leaned out of the window and said, in a loud, coarse, unfeeling manner, 'Young gentlemen, you mistake, she isn't dreaming. Far from her be it to dream, or even sleep. She's sitting on the back porch, with her feet in a tub of cistern water, drinking iced lemonade and fighting mosquitoes with a palm-leaf fan, and she isn't dressed for company. Sing something true.' But long ere he ceased to speak, the summer night was still, the front yard was empty, and the voice of the passel tree and harp no more awoke the night in melody.

THE ART OF DRESSING.

A NEW YORK 'modiste' has written a pamphlet on the 'Art of dressing.' That isn't the book the times demand. What the young men who come home at 2:15 A.M. want is lucid instructions in the art of dressing. And if such a work could be supplemented with a few hints on practical methods of distinguishing the foot of the bed from the end where the pillows are, it would have an immense sale.

THE CLIMATE OF PERU.

It never rains in Peru, and a man in that rainless climate never knows what it is to get up Sunday morning and spend five hours pumping out his cellar, when he is just wild to go to church. But to atone for the loss of this pleasant pastime, he has to stand up about four times a week and let a raging earthquake kick him clear across the county line in one time and two motions.

THE SLAVE OF HABIT.

'Boys,' said the man, holding an inverted match in one hand, and a dark cigar in the other, 'never acquire the pernicious habit of smoking. I am a slave to it now, and yet I hate it. I never see a cigar that I do not want to burn it up.' And then, with extreme satisfaction, he burned up the one he had in his hand.

WHY IS IT?

WE don't understand why it is that a constable with a search-warrant, looking for whiskey in a temperance town, can search for five days and never get a smell, while a dry and thirsty man in the same town steps out of his office, walks briskly away, and in three minutes is seen emerging from an adjacent alley, wiping his perspiring mouth with his cuffs.

DIDN'T KNOW IT WAS LOADED.

A WEST HILL man sat up one night till two o'clock in the morning, throwing poker dice with a fellow from Nebraska City, and then, when they rose to go, and the West Hiller felt that all that he had was the man's, he smiled sadly, and in low, sweet tones, more in sorrow than in anger, remarked that 'he didn't know they were loaded.'

THE SNOW-BALL MYSTERY.

When a snow-ball as hard as a door-knob hits you on the back of the head as you are crossing the street, no matter how quickly you turn, the only thing you can see is one boy, with the most innocent face and the emptiest hands that ever confronted a false accusation.

It is often remarked that 'the boy is father to the man.' This may be true, but we know that after the snow-ball has knocked off the man's hat, it is father to the boy than it is to the man's corner, by a long sight, and the man will find it out if he is foolish enough to chase the boy.

HEAVEN AND EARTH.

'Oh, heaven and earth are far apart,' says the poet. They are, they are; and it is just as well that is so. If they were very close together, the cabinet-organ dealers would be buzzing the poor, harassed, distracted angels eighteen hours a day, and the advertising agents would talk them blind the rest of the time.

ADVANTAGES OF A FREE COUNTRY.

It is going to cost England $10,000,000 to kill ten or a dozen Zulus. It costs more to kill a Zulu than it does an Indian. Our government never pays more than $200,000 for killing an Indian; and a white man—well, in this country you can kill a white man for almost anything you are able to pay a lawyer.

THE REASON WHY.

E. C. Stedman sings, in Scribner, 'Why should I fear to sip the sweets of each red lip?' Why? Because, Mr. Stedman, you have a conviction that the gloomy-looking old gentleman in the background, with blood in his eye and a cane like the angel of death in his hand, will make a poultice of you if you do any such sampling while he is in reach.

THE PHONOGRAPH, IN GERMAN.

The name of the phonograph, in German, is unsergehausnoeketigenfernstehaupftheichtaunsgesprecher. When you wind that up on the cylinder, and leave it till it gets cold, and then grind it out, it usually tears the machine to pieces and strikes the house with lightning.

A GRECIAN CIRCULAR.

'Why,' asked Ulysses, as he accompanied the swift-footed Achilles on his djurnal family marketing tour, 'Why do you call your butcher Ixion?'

The son of Peleus looked attentively at the fletcher slicing off cutlets, to see that he didn't get in three times as much bone as calf, and then replied:

'Because he's the man at the veal.'

The waster of cities sighed heavily, and shaking his head gloomily, said he never understood politics very well, and so, without coming to a vote, the house adjourned.

The man whose pantaloons bag most at the knees isn't necessarily the man who prays the most. Sleeping in a day coach with your knees propped up against the seat in front of you, will wreck the knees of a straight pair of pants quicker and more successfully than two years of prayer-meetings.

'Her eyes,' remarked the proof reader, 'are her strongest attraction. They draw your attention and admiration in spite of yourself.' 'Ah, yea,' replied the cashier, 'a kind of a sight draft, as you might say.'

A DAY AT TROY.

TROY, Ohio, March 4.

'Arma virumque cano,
I sing the first Trojan, you know;
'Qui primus ab oris,'
Who mounted his Horace,*
And settled down in Ohio,
With more terror than joy
With his pa and his boy,
He fled, feeling dreadful Uneasy,†
For just about then
A horse load of men
Made the climate unwholesomely Greecey.
And his fond, loving wife,
The joy of his life,
He ran off and left her behind,
For Æneas, gay boy,
Was sure that in Troy,
Ohio, new wives he could find.

NOCTURNE.

Had he struck this new Troy just when I did,
(Oh, Mother, are the doughnuts done?)
He'd thought with the Arctic zone he'd collided,
And back to the Greeks had turned and run.
For the snow was deeper than the national debt,
And the slush was running like a river;
And the Trojan hackmen, you just bet,
Don't drive, when the weather makes them shiver.

Old Troy don't look very much as it did
When plous Æneas ruled the roost;
And I thought of the many changing years that slid,
Since Vulcan gave his step-son a boost.
For I wandered over Troy, through the slush aforesaid,
And I took an aged Trojan for a guide,
And every time he opened his head
The old man lied,

I mused at the trenches where the Grecian warriors lay,
And I wandered where Hector fired the ships,
And I strolled where the 'waster of cities' held
sway,
When a Trojan daren't open his lips.
Here the great son of Telamon nursed his direful wrath,
Here the mighty Achilles sulked and swore;
And there, right directly across the street,
Is John Smith's store.

Then I made certain inquiries at the hotel,
And the answers I got made me mad;
For I'd wasted all my classics on a hollow-hearted sell,
And I felt it was really too bad.
For they told, that Æneas never voted in this town,
And that Hector never boarded here at all,
But a man named Paris, they said, was here,
But he moved last fall.

* This is considered one of the most intricate and elaborate classical jokes ever 'penetrated' upon an intelligent people. Send stamp for explanation, sent closely sealed in packages to suit the purchaser.

† Professor Wortman, to whom I showed the manuscript of this stanza, offered me two hundred dollars to print that word 'Æneas-y,' but I refused. I didn't think it would be right. I have yet some little conscience in these matters.

RECREATIONS IN THEBAN LITERATURE.

'Married people,' said Epaminondas, 'cannot talk as freely and rapidly as young people.'

'I hadn't noticed it,' said Pelopidas, 'and I don't think it is true.'

'But it is true,' replied the illustrious Theban, 'because—'

'Because they are paired?' sagely asked his friend.

Epaminondas shook his head.

'Because the two married people are only one, while each of the young people is one, two?'

Epaminondas looked sad, and stifled a rising sigh.

Pelopidas thought a moment, and said:

'Because their two 'heads have but a single thought?'

'Oh, no, the statesman said, 'it isn't necessary to have even one thought to do an infinite amount of talking. Look at the Congressional Record. 'No,' he continued, with an air of interest, 'but you know the marriage service is conducted orally? Verbally? By word of mouth, or tongue, as you may say, the knot matrimonial is tied?'

'Yes,' said Pelopidas, 'I see so far.'

'Well, then,' said Epaminondas, with a faint gleam of triumph on his face, 'the married folk do the less talking because they are tongue-tied.'

Pelopidas was rapped in silent amazement for a few moments, and then said it was a pretty good conundrum, if that was its first appearance in the West, but it reminded him of a man building a one-storey house.

'How's that?' asked the soldier statesman.

'Blamed sight more scaffolding than house,' said Pelopidas.

And then Epaminondas set his teeth and muttered that it was a pity some people were born without any appreciation for anything.

'When shall we eat?' asks a medical journal. Same as you drink, doctor, same as you drink: every time anybody asks you to.

There are two brothers on West Hill who look so much alike they cannot tell each other apart, and one day last week, when John was raging like a volcano with the toothache, Henry went down to the dentist's and had six teeth pulled.

'You could tell, by the easy versification,' remarked the barber, on hearing 'The Raven,' that this was poem a Po-made. It's so slick.'

TOO PARTICULAR.

'Peucestas,' said Leonatus, one day, when the all-conquering army of Alexander was on its march to Malli, 'Peucestas, why is the crupper of Bucephalus like a ship's anchor?'

Peucestas was buried in deep thought for a moment; 'Because it has no pocket to put it in?' he ventured timidly.

'Naw!' roared the son of Pella.

'Man behind the counter?' pursued Peucestas.

'No!'

'To cover his head?'

'Shades of my feathers, no!'

'Because it's infirm?'

Leonatus only made a despairing gesture.

'Because it's a slope up?'

Leonatus made a motion to strike him, and Peucestas said he wouldn't guess any more, and he couldn't see why a horse's crupper was like a ship's anchor.

'Well, it is,' replied Leonatus, 'because it's at the end of the hawser.'

'Which end?' presently Peucestas inquired, with a show of interest.

And then Leonatus looked a long way off, and said that the peculiar appearance of the clouds and the humidity of the atmosphere indicated considerable areas of disturbance, with a right smart of mean temperature at local points.

THE SKIRMISHING FUND.

'Varinus,' said Lentulus, one day, just before the praetor marched against Spartacus, 'Varinus, did it never occur to you that these little signs in the city parks, all over the civilized world, "keep off the grass," are instigated by British influence?'

The praetor couldn't see why British influence should trouble itself to preserve the grass in a United States park, and he said so.

'Well,' said the consul, 'it is so. It is only another exhibition of English hatred against the Fenians, to which other powers are thus induced to lend their influence. You can see no connection between these signs and the Fenians?'

'None,' replied Varinus, 'unless the signs are like the Fenians, because nobody pays any attention to them.'

'Not exactly that,' responded the consul, with some asperity, 'although that isn't so bad.'

Varinus respondit non, sed intimated: by shaking his caput, ut he would give it up.

'Well,' said the consul, with a pitying look at his comrade, 'it is because these things are put up to keep people from "wearing off the green."'

It was a long time before Varinus made any reply, when he finally said he hoped, if the consul ever said anything like that again, Sparticus might give him the awfullest Thracian a Roman ever got. And then he called out the troops and went over to Vesuvius, and got one himself, just to see what it was like.

A MISS, BUT A GOOD LINE SHOT.

'Iphigeneia,' her father said one morning, when the ships were becalmed at Aulis, 'Iphigeneia, do you know why President Hayes is like Charles IX. of France?'

The daughter of Agamemnon, who was working a green worsted dog on a seal-brown sofa cushion, said, 'Two greens, a pink, three yellow and four brown,' and then spoke up:

'Because he was a long time reachin' to his title?'

'Hey?' shouted the venerable Calchas, who was a little hard of hearing, 'Hey, what's that?'

'Because,' repeated Iphigeneia, blushing at her own audacity, 'he was a long time regent to his title?'

The Reverend Mr. Calchas shook his head and said this paragraphing was too strong for him, and went away to kill a goose for its bone, and look at the corn husks to see how the winter was going to be, while the son of Atreus only laughed, and told his daughter she was a mile away from it, and Iphigeneia tried again.

'Because,' she said, 'he's a kind of little off'un?'

But Agamemnon told her not to get slangy, and she gave it up.

'Why is it?' she asked.

'Because,' said her father, with the happy, triumphant air of a man whose conundrum comes back to himself for solution, 'because he is friendly to Pacify the Potter.'

Iphigeneia laid her work down on her lap, crossed her hands on the idle needles, and after musing a moment in silence, inquired:

'Friendly to which?'

'To Pacify the Potter,' replied her wailike parent, with evident ill humour. 'Pacify the Potter; can't you see? Potter; Pacify the Potter.'

'Ye-es,' replied Iphigeneia, 'yes, I see what you mean, I guess, but his name wasn't Pacify, it was Palissy; Palissy the Potter.'

And then Agamemnon threw his helmet on the floor, and said something savage about the stupid French not knowing how to spell a man's name anyhow, and went and told

Calchas he was tired of fooling around here, and if he couldn't tell him when they were going to have good sailing weather, he'd discharge him in a minute, and hire old Professor Tice, or else depend on the United States signal service reports. And ten minutes later the revengeful Calchas had cooked up a plan for cutting Iphigenia's neck off.

It appears, from the teachings of history, that it was just as hard to build a conundrum that would stay, away in prehistoric times as it is to-day.

RECREATIONS IN MYTHOLOGY.

'Have some yourself,' shouted the unhappy son of Æolus, pausing in his professional duties with the big stone, to look at his neighbour in the water, who was doing his level best to take a modest quencher, but was always frustrated by his enforced and perpetual red-ribbon vows. 'Drink hearty, Tantalus, you're welcome.'

'Thank you, good Sisyphus,' replied the discousolate Phrygian, with an equally fine play of delicate sarcasm; 'put a brick under the stone to hold it, and come down: and have some of the fruit. Don't tire yourself out working all the time. Come down: and have a cool bath.'

'Not any,' replied the Corinthian, 'I don't like a plunge bath; I prefer asking our patient friend with the sieve there for a shower bath, when I perform my ablutions. But don't you get awfully tired of so much water and fruit?'

'Oh, not to speak of,' Tantalus said, lying with the easy grace of a paragrapher: 'I must prefer this quiet, meditative solitude to the active cares and the fatigues of a life of labour. It is a source of amazement to me, at times, to watch your persistent struggles with that rough, grimy, and unstable stone.'

'Oh, I'm fond of action; I live by exercise,' replied Sisyphus, as calmly and unblushingly as though he was a witness in a whiskey case. 'Look at my muscle,' he added, displaying a biceps as big as a watermelon, 'you bet your boots I could burst the jaw of all the Furies this side of the Styx. But I say,' he continued, with a shout of laughter, as Tantalus made a sudden but ineffectual duck at the receding water with his chin, 'when you try to take a drink you remind me of President Hayes reaching after popularity with a policy scoop. You come about as near getting it, too.'

'And when I see you trying to get that stone to some place on the hill where it will stick,' shouted the indignant Tantalus, 'you make me think of the republican party.'

'And why for?' asked Sisyphus, as he leaned against the stone and held it in place with his back while he spat on his hands.

'Because,' said Tantalus, 'it has only to carry fourteen democratic congressional districts next election in order to get a majority in the next house.'

And just then the boss Fury came along and stirred up the menagerie with a live snake, and the convention let go of politics and resumed the consideration of the business on the speaker's table.

INSURANCE ON THE TIBER.

'Marcus Cælius,' Cicero said to his legal friend, meeting him one morning on the other side of a screen under the capitol, 'what shall it be?'

Cælius said he would take a little spiritus fumenti optimus, straight, and the orator remarking that that was about the size of his, went on:

'I wish you would get out the necessary papers some time to-day, and bring suit for me against the Yellow Tiber Fire and Marine Insurance Company, for the amount of its policies on my villa at Tusculum and my town house.'

M. Cælius looked up in amazement.

'Why,' he exclaimed, 'when did they burn down? And what was it? Accident? Mob? Some of Clodius' people?'

'No,' Cicero said, 'they are intact as yet, and in fact, I haven't insured them yet, but I am going to do so to-morrow, and I want to bring suit against the company now, so that if they ever should happen to burn, I won't have quite so long to wait for the money.'

Cælius saw that the orator's head was level, and brought suit that afternoon. Eleven years afterward the villa at Tusculum and the town house were both destroyed by fire. The suit had by that time been in five different courts, and had been confirmed, and reversed, and remanded, and referred to the master to take proof, and stricken from the docket, and amended, and rebutted, and arr-rebutted, and impleaded, and rejoindered, and filed, and quashed, and continued until nobody knew what it was about and Cicero was notified, three weeks after the fire, that he would have to prove wilful and long continued absence and neglect, as he could not get a decree simply on grounds of incompatibility of temperament. And when he went to the secretary of the company, that official told him the company didn't know anything about the fire and had no time to attend to such things. The company's business, the secretary said, was to insure houses, not to run around to fires, asking about the insurance. If he wanted any information on those points, he would have to ask the firemen or the newspaper reporters.

The more a man reads in these old histories, the more he is convinced that the insurance business in the days of the pætors was a great deal more like it is to-day.

EGYPTIAN PHILOSOPHY.

'Erastothenes,' asked his master, Callimachus, one morning when they were taking their morning's morning down near the temple of Hephæstus, 'Erastothenes, why is the—just a little more dash of the bitters, Johnny—why is the bread bowl of the Ptolemies like this obelisk of Rameses?' 'Is it anything,' asked Erastothenes, watching the man behind the counter slice the lemon, 'is it anything about putting up a stove?' 'No,' was the reply. 'Is it anything about neither of them being able to climb a tree?' 'Then,' said the philosopher, 'I give it up.' 'Because,' said the poet, 'it is Cleopatra's needle.' And then these two great men looked long and silently into their glasses, and stirred them in abstracted manner, until Callimachus remarked, 'Well, here's at you,' and they leaned back their heads with a gurgling sound, while the fragrant breath of a lemon peel floated off on the morning air, like a dream of the tropics. The world is not what it used to be!

STUDIES OF THE ANTIQUE.

It was the evening after Hector's last attack upon the Greek camp, and there was a general gloom, as usual after these matinees, over the entire community. The son of Peleus, yawning over a volume of the report of the committee, on the 'conduct of the war,' turned to Agamemnon, and said:

'Why were there no democratic papers published in Israel or Judea?'

The king of men chewed his toothpick for a few moments in deep reflection, and then he said he didn't know, unless it was because the Mosaic laws were so terribly down on all kinds of vice and immorality.

But the swift-footed Achilles said that wouldn't do at all, and Patroclus, dearest and most honoured among the brazen-coated Achæans in the war, said that maybe it was because the Israelites were a commercial nation, and wouldn't sell ink and paper on long time.

The son of Æacus shook his head. The silver-tongued Odysseus suggested that probably it was because there were no railroads in the country, consequently no editorial excursions nor free passes, and therefore, no incentive to publish a paper. But Achilles said:

'No; because there is no letter "f" in the Hebrew. Nothing to make a democratic paper. Nothing to write about. Nothing to say. How could they spell "fraud" without an f?'

And the wily Ulysses, who wasn't very well read up in politics, said that was too deep for him.

THE ODD I SEE.

What time Ulysses, in the frosty morn,
Prepared to face the fierce November storm,
His well-saved winter duds he eager seeks,
And in each closet's dark recess he peeks,
'Ehu!' he cries, 'my ulster is not here,
Nor in their place the heavy boots appear;
My seal-skin cap, when I would put it on,
From its accustomed peg is surely gone.
I see no scarf; by Venus and her loves,
Some son of Mercury hath cribbed my gloves.
Mehercule! who's got my chest protector?
I'm cleaned out by some savings bank director.'

With that he ripped, and roared, and cussed and swar,
While all his household looked on from afar.

To him, at length, with grieving, down cast eyes,

Faithful Penelope, distracted, cries:
'Ulysses, hush; such actions more become
On who is steeped in old New England rum.
Why wag your tongue with neither rhyme nor reason.'

For things that are so useless out of season?
Why should an ulster cumber up the wall,
When August sun-rays fiercely on us fall?
Why should your winter boots impede our way,
When July sunstrokes hold their fatal sway?
Go to: when summer's sun was hot and strong
The Plaster Paris peddler came along;
Quick for his wares I changed each winter robe.

And sent him burdened down the dusty road.
I think, foolsooth, your senseless rant'll cease
When you behold our plastered mantel-piece.'

He views the mantel; on his knotted face, Frowns scatter smiles, and smiles the dark frowns chase.

He pauses for a space, then sits him down,
And makes him ready to go off down town.
First pulls, to save himself from snow and sleet.

Two plaster paris kittens on his feet.
Around his neck, with cotton thread, he ties
A snow-white angel with the bluest eyes.
Napoleon, with his crossed arms firmly pressed.

He binds upon his cough-affected chest.
Two jet black dogs with gilded collar-bands.
He drawn for gloves upon his trembling hands,
While a huge plaster paris billy goat,
Swings over his shoulders for an overcoat.
Loud laugh the gods, as down the street he strides

And e'en Penelope his style derides.

HOME LIFE OF THE ANCIENTS.

It was a dismal, rainy day in December. Socrates, who had no umbrella, and in fact didn't have time to live until the first one was made, stood on the front steps of his house, drawing his cloak around him, before venturing down the street. From the opposite side of the street his friend Theremenes, passing by, familiarly hailed him as 'Soc,' and shouted:

'Blustery this morning.'

'Yes,' replied the philosopher, 'it's cold.'

'Hey?' suddenly shot the voice of Xantippe, from a second storey window; 'hey? what's that?'

'I said,' exclaimed Socrates, promptly throwing up his guard and backing prudently into the doorway; 'I say it's cold.'

'Said what?' was the sharp rejoinder 'you say that again, and say it slow.'

'It's cold,' repeated the philosopher; 'it's cold; it's cold; it's cold as ice, I said.'

There was a moment's silence, during which Xantippe appeared to be buried in profound thought, while the great disciple of Anaxagoras occupied the painful interval by girding up his loins and tucking his trousers in the tops of his boots, and making other preparations for a lively run. Presently there came from the window:

'You hold on there a minute, young man, till I come down. I want to see you a second before you go down town.'

There was a fierce, rapid flapping of Attic sandals upon the wet pavement, the wild rush of a cloaked figure through the pelting rain, and ten minutes later Socrates was explaining to Plato and Xenophon that he had chased a street car all the way from the Peiraic gate, and was clear out of breath.

ROMAN DOMESTIC LIFE.

It was along about the kalends of May when Coriolanus went into the hall closet at the head of the stairs and brought forth a pair of his last summer trousers. The mailed hand, that 'like an eagle in a dove cote, fluttered the Voices in Corioli,' dropped with a gesture of despair when he beheld a yawning posterior gate in the raiment, where breach or fissure there should have been none. To him, his true and honourable wife, the fair Virgilia, said:

'Now the gods crown thee, Coriolanus, what appears to be the trouble with you?'

'Now the gods mend these troubles, oh, my gracious silence!' replied Coriolanus. See what a rent the envious tooth of time has made.'

Virgilia dropped her tender, beaming eyes and drew a heavy sigh, as she turned and dived mournfully into the rag bag to hunt for a patch.

'My lord and husband,' she said, wearily dragging up bits of red flannel, tufts of raw cotton, scraps of calico, tags of carpet rags, and finding nothing that would match the lavender trousers any nearer than a slab of seal-brown empress cloth. 'I've patched those trousers till my eyes and fingers ache at the sight of them. I would the immortal gods would send on Rome and to our house the one unending blessing of eternal piece.'

Coriolanus looked at her steadily for a moment, but couldn't tell from her unrippled face whether she meant it or not.

'And I too, thou noble sister of Publicola,' he said, 'I too, thou moon of Rome, for my great soul, to fear invulnerable, is weary of the restless God of wore.'

Virgilia dropped the rag-bag and looked up at him quickly, but he never smiled.

'Keno,' she said.

'Put it there,' he said, and then they both promised they would never behave so like mouthing paragrapuers again.

THE PUPIL OF SOCRATES.

One morning, on their way to the academy, and while they were yet in the city, two eminent disciples of Socrates, who were cramming for the junior examination as they walked along, heard the human voice uttering remarks in the female language at a rate of one hundred and ninety words a minute. The remarks were made in pure, classical Greek. Both students paused to listen.

'Construe,' said Apollodorus, with mock sternness.

'It is the old girl, Xantippe.'

'And yonder goes the master,' said Apollodorus, as a venerable-looking man, in a linen duster and a helmet hat, fled swiftly down a side street in the direction of the Peiraic gate, hotly pursued by a cistern pole with a red-headed woman at the end of it, while the boys of the neighbourhood rent the air with shouts of 'Whoa, Emma!' and 'Soc et tuum!'

HECTOR'S LAST.

'Andromache,' said Hector, who was sitting on the floor in Priam's palace, tying a cranberry on his bunion, and swearing vengeance on the man who invented box-toed sandals; 'Andromache.'

Andromache, who was getting ready for the bawl that was to come off as soon as the Greeks got inside of Troy, tried to say,

'What do you want?' but as her mouth was full of hair-pins she only said :

'Wup poo you wup?'

The godlike Hector understood her all the same, and with a terrible grimace as he drew the bandage a little too tight, he said :

'Why is Hawkeye creek like Hell Gate rock?'

Andromache, who knew Hector was going out to fight that morning, was wondering how she would look in black, and didn't understand just what he said.

'I didn't know,' she remarked, in a tone of surprise, 'that Hawki Krick did like Helga Trock.'

Hector ceased to pet his bunion for a moment and looked up with an expression of business. Then, with the explicit intonation of a man who has a good thing and isn't going to be trifled with, he repeated his question,

'Oh,' exclaimed Andromache, with a matter-of-fact air, 'I suppose it's because it's a blasted nuisance.'

And Hector, who had sat up half the night fixing the thing up, kicked his sandal clear across the room in supreme disgust, and said, testily :

'Aw, shaw ! somebody told you!'

And then he gathered his two-handed sword with the terrible name and went out and chased Greeks up and down the sand, and pounded some, and talked the hardest kind of Latin that no fellow could scan, to many others for two long mortal hours, and when he came back he said he'd like to bet somebody fifty dollars there were some people about Troy that had a little courteous respect for original o-mundrums, anyhow.

But Andromache only said, 'Construe, construe!' and that made him so mad he borrowed an opera-glass and went to see the female minstrels.

A German dentist has invented paper teeth. 'Tischew paper, probably.

THE END.

JAN 2 9 1962

Accession no.

Author, Title Burdette, Robert J.
Hawk-eyes.

Class mark

Copyright no.

or Deposit no.

Order no. 5519 (2)

or Can. acc. no

Gift/Exchange

Date rec'd Jan.29, 1962.

Source Antique Book Shop.

List price

Destination Can. col.

NL-27

