From "The Land of Manfred: There are various species of the insect, of different colors, and two different kinds of "tarantismo"—the wet and the dry. Women in the corn-fields are more liable to be bitten, because they wear so little clothing on account of the intense heat. A violent fever is the beginning of the disease; the person bitten sways backward and forward, moaning violently. Musicians are called, and if the tune does not strike the fancy of the "tarantata" or tarantato—the person who has been bitten—she (or he) moans louder, crying: "No, no; not that air!" The fiddler instantly changes, and the tambourine beats fast and furious to indicate the difference of time. At last the "tarantata" approves of time, and, springing up, begins to dance frantically. If she has the dry "tarantismo" her friends try to find out the color of the "tarantola" that has bitten her, and adorn her dress and her wrists with ribbons of the same tint as the insect, white or blue, green, red, or yellow. If no one can indicate the proper color, she is decked with streamers of every hue, which flutter wildly about as she dances and tosses her arms in the air. They generally begin the ceremony indoors, but it often ends in the street on account of the neat and the concourse of people. When the "tarantata" is quite worn out she is put into a warm bed, and sleeps sometimes for eighteen hours at a stretch. If it is a case of wet tarantismo, the musicians sit near a well, to which the "tarantata" is irresistibly attracted. While she is dancing, relays of friends deluge her with water, "and," said Don Eugenio, "the amount of blessed water used is not to be believed." Wet "tarantismo seems to be the worst, as the fever lasts seventy-two hours, but in either case I was assured that if the musicians were not called in the fever continues indefinitely, and is in some cases followed by death.

To a Tired Mother.

A little elbow leans upon your knee.
Your tired knee which has so much to bear.
A child's dear eyes are looking lovingly
From underneath a thatch of tangled hair;
Perhaps you do not heed the velvet touch
Of warm, moist fingers holding yours so tight;
You do not prize this blessing overmuch;
You almost are too tired to pray to-night.

But it is blessedness! A year ago,
I did not see it as I do to-day.
We are so dull and thankless, and too slow
To catch the sunshine, till it slips away.
And now it seems surpassing strange to me
That, while I wore the badge of motherhood,
I did not kiss more oft and tenderly
The little child that brought me only good.

And if, some night when you sit down to rest,
You miss the elbow from your tired knee,
The restless, curly head from off your breast,
The lisping tongue that chattered constantly;
If from your own the dimpled hand had slipped.
And ne'er would nestle in your palm again,
If the white feet into the grave had tripped,
I could not blame you for your heartache then.

I wonder so that mothers ever fret
At little children clinging to their gown;
Or that the foot-prints when the days are wet
Are ever black enough to make a frown.
If I could find a little muddy boot,
Or cap, or jacket, on my chamber floor;
If I could kiss a rosy, restless foot,
And hear it patter in my home once more.

If I could mend a broken cart to-day,
To-morrow make a kite to reach the sky—
There is no woman in God's world could say
She was more blissfully content than I.
But, Oh! the dainty pillow next my own
Is never rumpled with a shining head.
My singing birdling from its nest has flown;
The little boy I used to kiss is dead!

Rough on Womenkind.

Judging from their proverbs, the Arabs do not hold women in very high esteem. Some of the following are as bitter as anything Moleire was ever guilty of:

Obedience to women will be repented of.

A man can bear anything but the mention of his women.

The heart of woman is given to folly.

Leave not a girl nor a green pasture unguarded.

What has a girl to do with the councils of a nation.

If you would marry a beauty pay the dowery.

Fear not to praise the men whose wives are true to them.

Woman fattens on what she hears (flattery.)

Women are the ships of Satan.

If you would marry a woman inquire about the traits of her mother.

Trust neither a king, a horse, nor a woman. For the king is fastidious, the horse prone to run away and the woman is perfidious.

My father does the fighting and my mother does the talking about it.

Our mother forbids us to err and then runs into error.

Alas, for the people who are ruled by a woman.

Mr. Gladstone on one occasion in a speech told a story illustrating the want of humor among Englishmen. According to the ex Premier, a ball and concert were gotten up by a clergyman in order to provide the parish with a hearse. This has been nearly outdone by a ball which was held at Dingwall, in Ross-shire, Scotland, in order to provide an operating table for the Ross Memorial Hospital in the town.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

Religion is not a theory in the mind, but an emotion in the soul; not a belief about God but a feeling toward God.

Truth is as impossible to be soiled by any outward touch as the sunbeam.

Men do not believe in immortality because it has ever been proved; but they are forever trying to prove it because they cannot help believing it.

In religion, as well as in poetry, the rude man, it has been said, requires only to see something going on; the man of more refinement wishes to feel; the truly refined man wishes to reflect.

Christ-likeness is the living reproduction of Christ's spirit—the attempt to follow his methods, to share his hope, to fill our daily orbits of duty which light and love; not to say long prayers, or bow at the mention of his name, or deem sectarian warfare a "standing up" for him.

There are multitudes who are saints in the church, open handed in every public benevolence, who are petty tyrants in the kitchen to their help; who do not think that their servants have desires for other associations than with their pots and pans.

Unceasing Calamities.

The messengers of most puissant death are indeed many, as the Grecian satirist long since taught us by the mouth of the Stygian boatman, and it would seem as if during the current year some of the mightier of them were especially ruthless. The round of great calamities has been almost unceasing. Flood and famine, volcano and earthquake, gunpowder explosion, and railway disaster, have followed one another in rapid succession, sparing neither Chinaman in the East nor American in the West. Just now the land slide in Quebec has brought the series of disasters to our own land, though happily the destruction of life has not been on a scale of such magnitude as in some of the other cases referred to. Has the year been, indeed, exceptional in regard to the number and greatness of destructive outbreaks of the great forces of nature, or is it only that modern newspaper enterprise now brings to us news of such events from all parts of the world, whereas half a century ago the half of them would never have been heard of beyond the country in which they took place? There is much truth of course in the latter view, yet it is hard to rid oneself of the impression that this has been in such respects a phenomenal year.

Land in the United States.

Who owns the land in the United States? Why, the citizens do, or should, would be the natural reply. But, unfortunately, it is not altogether so. Some of the best land in the United States is said by the "American Citizen" to be owned by alien landlords. Nearly 22,000,000 acres of land are owned by men who owe allegiance to other governments. To be exact, there are 21,241,900 acres of land under the direct control and managment of thirty foreign individuals or companies. There are 2,720,283 acres of land in Massachusetts, so that the men living in other countries and owing allegiance to other powers own land enough to make about ten States like Massachusetts, more than the whole of New England, more land than some governments own to support a king. The largest amount of land owned by any one man or corporation is owned by a foreign corporation called the Holland Land Company. Talk about alien landholders in Ireland! There is twice as much land owned by aliens in the United States as there is owned by Englishmen in Ireland. Think of it! More than 22,000,000 acres of land owned by men in Europe.

After Eighteen Hundred Years.

The theatrical business in Pompeii, which has been at a standstill since the eruption of Vesuvius, in 79 A. D., appears to be looking up, judging from the following announcement of Signor Luigni:—After a lapse of more than 1800 years, the theatre of this city will be opened with 'La Figlia del Reggimento.' I solicit a continuance of the favours bestowed on my predecessor, Marcus Quintus Martius, and beg to assure the public that I shall make every effort to equal the rare qualities displayed during his management." Strangely enough Manager Luigni fails to add that the theatre has been "entirely redecorated since it was last opened to the public, and has been fitted throughout with new roomy and comfortable seats, etc."—[Lobbyist,] in the Stage.

The eggs of a female oyster, one authority says, number 178,000,000, but Prof. Rice said 50,000,000 was as many as he cared to estimate. In analyzing the contents of the stomach of an oyster nothing but vegetable matter has ever been found.

An example of the depreciation of agricultural land in England was afforded within a fortnight when a farm in Lincolnshire was offered for sale. The highest bid was £2,100 although the property cost £6 700 eighteen years ago, and a considerable sum has since been expended in improvements.

Amateur photographers who have lost great opportunities for views through bungling with their instruments, may cheer up after reading of the performance of Dr. Johnston-Lavis, deputed by the Royal Geological Society to investigate the volcanic phenomena of Vesuvius. Having advanced so near to an eruption that his porters ran away, he got two superb sights only to discover afterward that a portion of the focussing cloth had covered the lens so that only a small corner of the plates showed any impression.

John Leonatus Winston, of Cincinnati, known as a shooter under the names of Mudd, Drake, Jack, etc., broke the world's record at inanimate targets in a shooting against Frank Parmalee, of Omaha. The match was at 100 single bluerock pigeons, thrown from five traps, unknown angles, according to American Shooting Association rules, for $100 a side. Winson scored his 100 birds straight and landed winner by 10 birds. Winston is the same gentleman who was defeated by Al Bandle, of Cincinnati, in St. Louis several months ago. Parmalee will be remembered as the running mate of Chas. W. Budd, who, as a team, defeated Messrs. Al Bandle and H. McMurchy at 50 birds the last day of the American Shooting Association tournament held in Cincinnati some three months ago. Winston's record is the best ever made at inanimate targets in a match for stake money.

An Unknown Fiend.

TORONTO, Oct. 17th.—Between two and three o'clock the other afternoon an unknown man enticed a three-year-old child named Alice Bridget McCurry, of 9 Simcoe terrace, into the basement of the new Academy of Music, where he criminally assaulted her. The fiend met the child on the street with her little brother, and gave the latter a couple of cents to buy candy, saying he would wait till he returned. The little fellow went home and showed the money to his mother. She at once became suspicious and instituted a search for the little girl, but without finding her. Some women in the neighborhood saw the man putting the child out of a basement window. She was crying and her clothes were torn. There were several workmen in the basement at the time who could have captured the scoundrel had they known what he was doing.

A Rural Opinion.

The city gal's a queer consarn,
There's a lot of things she has to larn,
Tho' she may claim with angry heat
Her eddycation's quite complete.

She don't know yarbs from pizen weeds,
Nor nothin' much about the feeds
That's properest to give the stock,
Nor how on earth to tend a flock.

Mos' gin'rally she's skeert of bugs,
And hollers if you mention slugs,
And as fer cows and goats that's mild
She's kinder s'picious that they're wild.

She can't climb fences good, nor trees,
And she's no use at huskin' bees—
But then jes take her all in all,
She's purty nice—the city gal!

Buffaloes in Australia.

"Comparatively few Australians," remarks a Melbourne journal, "are aware that a part of their own country—the Northern Territory—has vast herds of wild buffalo roaming over its plains and wallowing in its shady pools. The animals are massive and heavy, with splendid horns, and afford sport of sufficiently dangerous a nature to possess charms for the most daring hunter. The first buffaloes were landed at Port Essington in 1826, by order of the Imperial Government, and after sixty years' uninterrupted increase, their numbers are now astonishing."

His Obesity Troubles Him.

The Sultan, says London "Truth," is much alarmed by his increasing obesity, and he has just summoned Dr. Schwennenger to Constantinople from Berlin, for whose accommodation a palace on the Bosphorus, at Therapia, has been prepared, where he is to stay for a week. Dr. Schwennenger's treatment has immensely benefitted Prince Bismarck, and the Czar was much the better for it, but he soon gave it up, as he is an inveterate gormandizer, and careful and very plain feeding was as impossible to him as the prescription of one tumbler of weak whiskey and Apollinaris at each meal, instead of the magnum of champagne which he usually consumes.

What a Bustle Contained.

Maria Vincenz Cheari Carracheni, who arrived in New York on the steamer Neustria the other day, wore a very large bustle, and on landing was invited into the searching room. The bustle was found to contain five gold chains, thirty-three pair of kid gloves, two gold mounted smelling bottles, two silver watch chains, nine gold rings, fine gold pendants, and five pair of gold earrings. The goods were confiscated, and Maria was held to answer a charge of smuggling.

Married on Her Deathbed.

Miss Carrie Dean of Augusta, Ga., who has been confined to her bed from sickness for the past three years, was married the other night to Mr. George North, at her sister's home, 1,204 Telfair street. Miss Dean was too ill to stand while the ceremony was being performed, and she was held up by her brother-in-law, Mr. Nations. The excitement had a bad effect on the bride and her death is expected at any moment. She had to take to her sick bed as soon as the ritual was performed. Mr. North met his bride last Christmas. He says his further happiness depended upon wedding his first love, whose death will soon make him a widow.

Within the last three years the Indians have seen the folly of applying names a rod or so long to their children, and in place of naming a young "pap" "He-that-does-not-look-behind-him-until-he-has-crossed the-prairie," they simply call him Joe, Tom or Bill.

There is no man whose imagination does not sometimes predominate over his reason, who can regulate his attention wholly by his will, and whose ideas will come and go at his command. No man will be found in whose mind airy notions do not sometimes tyrannize, and force him to hope or fear beyond the limit of sober probability.

A seal was caught in a net by Mr. George Smith, Baccaro, N. S., having a joint of stove pipe around its body. The most probable solution of the matter is that as the seal was a small one it was put on by some person who had caught it before and let it go.

The cocoanut palm supplies man with starch, sugar oil, wax, wine, resin, astringent matter, edible fruit, fibrous tissue, ornaments, cups, food for cattle, and clothing. In ten years the trade in the produce of the tree in the Madras Prisidency amounted to £6,000,000.

A report to the British Board of Trade on railway accidents in the United Kingdom during the year 1888 shows that the proportion of passengers killed was one in 6 942,336, and of injured one in 527,577. Only eleven were killed and 594 injured in consequence of accidents to or collisions between trains, the other casualties being attributable to various other causes, and especially to want of caution on the part of the individuals themselves. There is not so much danger in travelling by rail as most people imagine. It is even said that those who go about the streets of great cities are in greater peril than passengers on railway trains.

TIMELY TOPICS.

Navassa, the scene of the negro riots and murders, is a small island about a third of the distance from the westermost point of the island of Hayti to Jamaica. It belongs, apparently, to the Republic of Hayti, and the disturbances are probably due to the excitement of the negroes over the civil war which has just ended in their country.

At the risk of being looked upon as pro-Russian the people of Belgrade have shown their contempt for their late king by giving his injured wife a most excited ovation. It is not probable that except among the official classes, who are always bribed by Russia, pro-Russian sentiment is very strong in Servia—least of all in Belgrade, which, as a capital, has much to lose by annexation to a great power.

King Milan says he is not going to Belgrade, because he has the fullest confidence in the Regents. This agrees exactly with the views entertained by the Regents regarding Milan, whom they will not allow to visit Belgrade because they have no confidence whatever in him. It will be thought, however, that a man who confessed that a baby would make a better king than himself cannot be very dangerous to anybody or anything wherever he may be.

It is rumored that the British Government has seized the opportunity of the death of the Prince of Monaco to reopen the question of the suppression of the gambling establishment in the principality. The present Prince has expressed himself as willing to suppress the gambling at Monte Carlo if he can be assured of an annual income of 2,000,000 francs, and if the great powers will guarantee the neutrality of his principality.

The disaster to Johnstown seem to have been beneficial in one sense at least. While it unfortunately caused the loss of a number of lives, subscriptions have poured in from all quarters and the town will soon be a new Johnstown, and on a much more solid foundation, both financially and practically, than ever before. Yet all the money that charitable people the world over could send will not serve to alleviate the grief of a wife for her lost husband or that of orphan children for the parents so suddenly and unexpectedly taken from them.

After the recent defeat of the Mahdist forces on the Nile an Italian woman named Mariette Caracolo was found among the prisoners. She was one of six nuns who years ago went to the Egyptian Soudan to labor in the Roman Catholic missions there. All of them since the fall of Khartoum have been captives in the hands of the Mahdists, and though they have undergone many hardships, there is as yet no news that greater evils have befallen them. Their skill in nursing the sick, and their self-consecration to works of charity and mercy seem to have won for them the respect and protection of the fierce fanatics. The rescued woman thought it a bitter fate when she was taken from her sisters across the desert sands to Dongola, but the solitary journey happily ended her captivity and restored her to her friends.

London Hotels Beat American Houses.

Blakely Hall in New York Sun says:—Americans here had reason to suppose that our hotels are the best in the world—as they were until a little time ago—but to-day they are entirely eclipsed by the big caravansaries of London. There are no such hotels in New York as the Victoria, Grand, Metropole, and Savoy, the new hotels centered around Charing Cross, and built on the grand avenues that have been opened up where either slums or palace grounds used to be maintained. They are, first of all, very solid and substantial; they rise seven or eight stories above the ground, and their lobbies and parlors are walled with the most exquisite marbles, onyx, and metal work. They are cheaper than our hotels at home. Each floor has its own rates, and those who take the elevators to the topmost floors are able to get rooms for as little as five shillings and sixpence a day, which is $1 37 in our money. The beds, the ordinary appointments, and the conveniences common to all the guests are quite as good as the best we are able to obtain at home. Meals are charged for separately, and the rate of one shilling and sixpence for a plain breakfast, and five shillings (or a dollar and a quarter) for dinner. The main entrances gleam with electric lights and polished hard woods and precious stones. A cloud of men in gold lace and uniforms cluster at the doorways, suggesting endless tips, but also perfect service. A new era in hotel keeping has been introduced in this way. The old Langham & Morley's and the Golden Cross are now neglected and forgotten. You are ordered to write or telegraph for rooms at these new and grand houses, and if you are not well known you can not get rooms without doing so, but the ordinary citizen of the world takes his chances, and is reasonably sure of finding somebody already in the hotel to introduce him and get him a room. The American clerk is unknown. The different departments of hotel management are scattered all over the buildings, and that common center, the clerk's desk of America, is in London a mere depot for room keys and and letters in the care of what they call "Buttons" or boys in uniform. The cashier has another room, the manager still another, the porter another, and so on.

Precious Stones of the Months.

If each flower, have in the lore that has come down to us, a significance, so has each of the precious stones, which not only is used to symbolize mental and moral characteristics, but the month of the year, which in old Pagan days, and even yet amongst the ignorant in some countries, had a supposed bearing on personal history and traits. The following are the stones especially connected with the months of the year: January—A jacinth, or garnet, which denotes constancy and fidelity in every engagement. February—Amethyst, insuring peace of mind. March—A bloodstone, denoting courage and secrecy in dangerous enterprises. April—Sapphire or diamond, signifying repentance and innocence. May—The green emerald, typical of love. June—An agate, meaning long life and health. July—Ruby or cornelian, which insures the forgetfulness or cure of evils springing from friendship or love. August—Sardonyx, a happy married life. September—Chrysolite, which preserves from folly. October—Aquamarine or opal, which denotes both misfortune and hope. November—The topaz, bringing the owner fidelity and friendship. December—Turquoise or malachite, signifying the most brilliant success and happiness.

The Dutton Enterprise

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1889.

An instance of the evil effects of tying horses with the lines was seen on Main street Friday. The horse started backing, tightening the lines and pulling him back until he fell, nearly smashing the rig, besides injuring his mouth. A horse should never be tied with the lines under any consideration, and there is no excuse for so doing when halters can be had so cheaply. Many a valuable animal has been ruined by this practice.

If the parents of some of the children in town between the ages of five and fifteen years were to hear the language used by them while quarreling or playing on the streets at night it would fairly make their flesh creep. The obscene and insulting language used by these diminutive specimens of humanity would make many a beer-soaked corner loafer of long standing blush for shame. Bad as it is, however, Dutton is not quite the worst place in Elgin in this respect, for Rodney is worse. The fault lies almost altogether with the parents and the remedy is simple—keep the boys off the streets at night and make home more attractive for them.

It is not hard to foresee the outcome of the present difficulty between the high school board and the Aldborough council. The latter body has practically admitted the legality of the by-law setting apart the district by paying its share of the maintenance of the school for so long without protesting, and they will not get out of it easily. The district is sure to be left in its present shape, for the county council, having the power to remedy any defects in the old by-law by passing a new one, will scarcely allow a mere legal quibble to stand in the way of the success of the school, besides which an application could be made to the Local Legislature for an act which would forever put an end to the dispute by firmly fixing the district as at present constituted. It is hard to see, however, why Aldborough should wish to drop out of the district at all. The time is surely coming—and it is not far distant either—when the whole province will be divided up into high school districts on the same principal as townships are now divided into school sections, of which each municipality will have to form a part, and Dutton is and always will be the cheapest, the best and the most convenient school for Aldborough pupils to attend. If the people of that township would do less talking and more sensible thinking, the majority of them would see that they are standing in their own light in working against the Dutton high school.

The controversy over who may be responsible for the great loss of life and property caused by the rock slide at Quebec, has been made a political issue, and so it is not very easy to ascertain where the truth lies.

In the High School.

Editor of the ENTERPRISE :

Dear Sir,—I have just spent a very pleasant afternoon in our high school in the village, and I could wish that the members of the Aldborough council could have been present to see and hear for themselves what the school is doing, and I think they would cease their opposition and unite to do all that can be done to increase the efficiency of the school. In the past there has been so many things to militate against the school that it is a wonder it has done so well. Unquestionably, if circumstances had been favorable, it might have done better, but with so many changes in the staff of teachers, a lack of harmony in the district, and, to a large extent, a spirit of indifference in the village it is, I repeat, a wonder it has done so well. We trust that the difficulty with Aldborough will be amicably settled and that in future the board will more frequently visit the school and seek to avoid making changes in the staff while its members are rendering efficient service.

We would like all to do their very best to make it an institution of which we may all be proud. Let parents help by sending their children regularly and punctually, for here is one of the weak points and one that will tell at examination time—too many holidays were taken, too many lessons missed. The scholars cannot afford too much play in the early part of the term.

Well, now, what of the present staff? After watching carefully and listening attentively, we think they are thoroughly efficient, painstaking and patient with the scholars, willing at any time to answer a question or explain a difficulty, and they are deserving of our confidence and help. Let them have it fully and freely and I am certain it will not be misplaced.

In regard to the pupils the teachers express their great satisfaction, speaking in high terms of the first and second classes and very hopefully of the third.

Most sincerely do we wish for the school's increasing prosperity. We intend in a few weeks, when opportunity offers, going back again, and we will write you another letter.

Yours truly,
E. MIDDLETON.

Aldborough Council.

Minutes of special session of the council of the township of Aldborough, held in the towhship hall, West Lorne, on Saturday, 5th October. Present: First Deputy-Reeve McGregor, 2nd Deputy-Reeve McDougall: Councillors N. S. Lusty and Thomas Dymock. Lusty—McDougall. That Duncan McGregor be, and he is, hereby appointed chairman of this meeting.--Carried. McDougall--Dymock. That this council take steps under the D. and W. Act to have a drain constructed thereunder, commencing on the 4th concession line, opposite lot 13, in the 4th concession, and continuing thence northeasterly to a proper outlet, and that the clerk be, and he is, hereby authorized and instructed to prepare the necessary notices and have the same served on the Canada Company Hugh McArcher, W. L. Henderson, Charles H. Palmer, Richard Whelan and Jas. Mann—and that the reeve be authorize and instructed to sign all such notices on behalf of this township. —Carried. Dymock—Lusty, That the clerk and 1st Deputy-Reeve McGregor be, and they are, hereby appointed a committe to employ and consult such solicitor as they may see fit on behalf of this council to represent the said council in the dispute between the township and the Board of Trustees of the Dutton High School as to the liability of this township to contribute towards the support and maintenance of the Dutton High School, and as to the legal existence of the said district, and that this council take such steps in the matter as the said solicitor may advise.—Carried. McDougall--Dymock, That this council do respectfully intimate to his honor the judge of the county court of the county of Elgin that this council has caused a plan of the villages formerly called Bismarck and West Lorne in the township to be prepared and registered in accordance with the provisions of the Ontario Registry Act, and the said villages are on said plan jointly designated as the village of West Lorne, and that the clerk forward a copy of this resolution to his honor the said judge—Carried. Dymock—McGregor. That an order be granted on the treasurer in favor of Duncan McGregor for $10 for sessional fees, etc.—Carried. McGregor—Lusty, That the matter complained of by Joseph Wilton be referred to Councillor Dymock. —Carried. McDougall—Dymock, That an order be granted on the treasurer for $5.33 in favor of Joseph Wilton for sheep killed by dogs.—Carried.

Take pleasure in your work. A task which appears distasteful at first sight soon becomes pleasure.

When the hair shows signs of failing, begin at once to use Ayer's Hair Vigor. This preparation strengthens the scalp, promotes the growth of new hair, restores the natural color to gray and faded hair, and renders it soft, pliant, and glossy.

The poor law is said to be defective. But if it had no defects it could scarcely be called a poor law.

A PLEASING DISCOVERY.

I SUFFERED with neuralgia and obtained no relief until advised to try Hagyard's Yellow Oil. Since then I have found it to be an admirable remedy also for burns, sore throat and rheumatism.

MRS. F. CAMERON, 137 Richmond St. W., Toronto, Ont.

Endurance is more valuable than cleverness. It is the patient, steady plodders who gain and keep fortunes.

THE OLD RELIABLE.

In these days of humbug it is a relief to hear of something that can be depended upon. Wilson's Wild Cherry has been tested as a remedy for the cure of all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs, for nearly twenty years, with such success as to earn for itself the title of The Old Reliable cure for Coughs, Colds, Croup, Asthma, Bronchitis and other affections of the respiratory system. See that you get the genuine, in white wrappers. Sold by R. A. Kirkland.

The nights are getting longer, but the young man who occupies half a parlor chair with his girl every evening doesn't realize it.

TAKE NO CHANCES

BUT depend on solid facts. Nothing equals Hagyard's Yellow Oil for burns, scalds, frost bites, chilblains, croup, sore throat, neuralgia and aches and pains of every description. No matter where the pain or soreness is, or from what it arises, Hagyard's Yellow Oil will give quick relief.

For all derangements of the Bowels, Liver and Kidneys, there is no medicine like Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters. It purifies the blood, tones the system, and regulates all the vital organs. Sold in large bottles at fifty cents.

NOTICE.—All parties who are dissatisfied with the way their neighbors manage their own business can have the matter attended to by placing it in the hands of H. W. NOSLEM, chief scavenger for Dutton.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with the pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP and take no other kind.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1889.

An instance of the evil effects of tying horses with the lines was seen on Main street Friday. The horse started backing, tightening the lines and pulling him back until he fell, nearly smashing the rig, besides injuring his mouth. A horse should never be tied with the lines under any consideration, and there is no excuse for so doing when halters can be had so cheaply. Many a valuable animal has been ruined by this practice.

If the parents of some of the children in town between the ages of five and fifteen years were to hear the language used by them while quarreling or playing on the streets at night it would fairly make their flesh creep. The obscene and insulting language used by these diminutive specimens of humanity would make many a beer-soaked corner loafer of long standing blush for shame. Bad as it is, however, Dutton is not quite the worst place in Elgin in this respect, for Rodney is worse. The fault lies almost altogether with the parents and the remedy is simple—keep the boys off the streets at night and make home more attractive for them.

It is not hard to foresee the outcome of the present difficulty between the high school board and the Aldborough council. The latter body has practically admitted the legality of the by-law setting apart the district by paying its share of the maintenance of the school for so long without protesting, and they will not get out of it easily. The district is sure to be left in its present shape, for the county council, having the power to remedy any defects in the old by-law by passing a new one, will scarcely allow a mere legal quibble to stand in the way of the success of the school, besides which an application could be made to the Local Legislature for an act which would forever put an end to the dispute by firmly fixing the district as at present constituted. It is hard to see, however, why Aldborough should wish to drop out of the district at all. The time is surely coming—and it is not far distant either—when the whole province will be divided up into high school districts on the same principal as townships are now divided into school sections, of which each municipality will have to form a part, and Dutton is and always will be the cheapest, the best and the most convenient school for Aldborough pupils to attend. If the people of that township would do less talking and more sensible thinking, the majority of them would see that they are standing in their own light in working against the Dutton high school.

The controversy over who may be responsible for the great loss of life and property caused by the rock slide at Quebec, has been made a political issue, and so it is not very easy to ascertain where the truth lies.

According to an estimate by Professor Shelden, London alone pays £2,432,500 a year for cheese made on English farms. Of this, the great bulk is made on the system that has since extended over the whole world—the Cheddar.

The cheapest thing in London in the way of locomotion which has yet been met with is the half-penny 'bus, which is becoming a recognized institution. A distance of a mile, or even longer, may be covered for a bawbee.

A gentleman was out shooting near Totnes, England, the other day, when he had the misfortune to shoot his dog. For a moment he was tomuch overcome to see what damage he had done, and before he had recovered himself the animal, a black retriever, had come up to him bringing in its mouth its own tail, which had been shot clean off.

In the High School.

Editor of the ENTERPRISE :

Dear Sir,—I have just spent a very pleasant afternoon in our high school in the village, and I could wish that the members of the Aldborough council could have been present to see and hear for themselves what the school is doing, and I think they would cease their opposition and unite to do all that can be done to increase the efficiency of the school. In the past there has been so many things to militate against the school that it is a wonder it has done so well. Unquestionably, if circumstances had been favorable, it might have done better, but with so many changes in the staff of teachers, a lack of harmony in the district, and, to a large extent, a spirit of indifference in the village it is, I repeat, a wonder it has done so well. We trust that the difficulty with Aldborough will be amicably settled and that in future the board will more frequently visit the school and seek to avoid making changes in the staff while its members are rendering efficient service.

We would like all to do their very best to make it an institution of which we may all be proud. Let parents help by sending their children regularly and punctually, for here is one of the weak points and one that will tell at examination time—too many holidays were taken, too many lessons missed. The scholars cannot afford too much play in the early part of the term.

Well, now, what of the present staff? After watching carefully and listening attentively, we think they are thoroughly efficient, painstaking and patient with the scholars, willing at any time to answer a question or explain a difficulty, and they are deserving of our confidence and help. Let them have it fully and freely and I am certain it will not be misplaced.

In regard to the pupils the teachers express their great satisfaction, speaking in high terms of the first and second classes and very hopefully of the third.

Most sincerely do we wish for the school's increasing prosperity. We intend in a few weeks, when opportunity offers, going back again, and we will write you another letter.

Yours truly,
E. MIDDLETON.

Aldborough Council.

Minutes of special session of the council of the township of Aldborough, held in the towhship hall, West Lorne, on Saturday, 5th October. Present: First Deputy-Reeve McGregor, 2nd Deputy-Reeve McDougall: Councillors N. S. Lusty and Thomas Dymock. Lusty—McDougall. That Duncan McGregor be, and he is, hereby appointed chairman of this meeting.--Carried. McDougall--Dymock. That this council take steps under the D. and W. Act to have a drain constructed thereunder, commencing on the 4th concession line, opposite lot 13, in the 4th concession, and continuing thence northeasterly to a proper outlet, and that the clerk be, and he is, hereby authorized and instructed to prepare the necessary notices and have the same served on the Canada Company Hugh McArcher, W. L. Henderson, Charles H. Palmer, Richard Whelan and Jas. Mann—and that the reeve be authorize and instructed to sign all such notices on behalf of this township. —Carried. Dymock—Lusty, That the clerk and 1st Deputy-Reeve McGregor be, and they are, hereby appointed a committe to employ and consult such solicitor as they may see fit on behalf of this council to represent the said council in the dispute between the township and the Board of Trustees of the Dutton High School as to the liability of this township to contribute towards the support and maintenance of the Dutton High School, and as to the legal existence of the said district, and that this council take such steps in the matter as the said solicitor may advise.—Carried. McDougall--Dymock, That this council do respectfully intimate to his honor the judge of the county court of the county of Elgin that this council has caused a plan of the villages formerly called Bismarck and West Lorne in the township to be prepared and registered in accordance with the provisions of the Ontario Registry Act, and the said villages are on said plan jointly designated as the village of West Lorne, and that the clerk forward a copy of this resolution to his honor the said judge—Carried. Dymock—McGregor. That an order be granted on the treasurer in favor of Duncan McGregor for $10 for sessional fees, etc.—Carried. McGregor—Lusty, That the matter complained of by Joseph Wilton be referred to Councillor Dymock. —Carried. McDougall—Dymock, That an order be granted on the treasurer for $5.33 in favor of Joseph Wilton for sheep killed by dogs.—Carried.

CHOW-CHOW.

He Took Her.

She was a maid of high degree,
And quite severely proper;
Each man she met, so proud was she,
Would love, despair, then drop her.

But there remained without demur,
When all the rest forsook her.,
An amateur photographer,
And finally he took her.

CHESS.

BY J. HOYES PANTON, M. A., F. G. S., PROFESSOR OF NATURAL HISTORY AND GEOLOGY.

Questions are repeatedly sent to the college asking for information concerning chess. The answers to these sometimes entail a good deal of work. Consequently I have thought it expedient to prepare a bulletin upon the subject and thus put the information in a form that will be of service to those interested. It may appear strange that it is worth while to say so much about this plant, but when it is remembered that there are persons in various parts of the province who maintain that it is a modification of the wheat plant, brought about by winter killing of the wheat, it will not be such a matter of surprise that I should deem it expedient to write something about this apparently doubtful member of the grass family, endeavoring to show that it is a species (Bromus secalinus) just as much as any other plant is, and that it does not depend for its existence upon a modification of wheat plants growing in adverse conditions.

Much discussion has taken place regarding its origin in some other way than a plant perpetuated by its seed. As it usually appears among fall wheat that has been winter-killed, it seems quite natural to suppose that it is a degenerated condition of the wheat, and there are not a few farmers who insist upon this as being the only correct explanation of its presence under such circumstances. Thus it is that few discussions at a Farmers' Institute will lead up to a more lively discussion than that which deals with the origin of chess.

It seems remarkable that, if this is the true origin of the plant, one cannot readily grow it from wheat, while there is no difficulty in growing it from the seeds of chess. Those who sow wheat containing chess never fail to get a good crop, while those who are careful to sow clean seed seldom are troubled with the weed.

The following are some reasons why a person should be ready to conclude that the plant is no exception to others and depends for its perpetuation upon the seed which it matures :

1. The plant is widely different from wheat in appearance ; so much so that botanists place it in the genus Bromus, while wheat belongs to the genus Triticum. Couch grass (Triticum repens) being the same genus as wheat, comes much nearer in its characters than chess does, and yet no one ever hints that it is derived from wheat. If chess is a degenerated condition of wheat we might reasonably expect some resemblance to the plant from which it is derived.

2. The most devoted evolutionist would not expect to see develop in the short space of a few months, owing to the effect of frost, a plant so unlike in structure, form and habit to that from which it is derived. It is only through long periods of time that such modifications in a plant can take place as to change its character so much that it may be viewed as a new species. But in this case one season brings about such a remarkable change that the plant is ranked in another genus —more comprehensive term than species.

3. If chess be sown it yields chess. If it were degenerated wheat, and sown under favorable surroundings, it should soon return to wheat; for we observe in animal and plant life that a deteriorated form will return to its proper nature when conditions are suitable for growth. Some have gone so far as to say that chess will not grow from seed, but this is a mistake that can easily be seen by sowing some of the seed.

4. Chess will mature seed under adverse conditions, though the plant be only two or three inches high; while if surroundings are favorable it grows three or four feet high before seed is matured. This may account for it never being seen in good crops, while it may be seeding the ground for a more suitable time, when the crop in which it is seeded is injured by frost;then this hardy annual (the seeds of which possess great vitality) is ready to take the vacant soil and yield a crop no longer hid from the farmer's eye.

5. The conclusions arrived at by all men who make plant life a special study are, (a) that chess is a typical plant, producing seed yearly, which gives rise to plants of the same character; (b) that a seed of wheat cannot be sown so as to produce chess, (c) and that chess cannot produce wheat under the most favorable conditions for growth.

6. In instances where parts of a plant, apparently a combination of chess and wheat, were so mixed as to seem but one plant, examination proved them to be parts of separate plants, and that the apparent union was not real. In some cases microscopic examination has been required to prove it.

7. Wheat has been grown in some places and often winter-killed and no chess has appeared. There are places where chess is unknown, and wheat in these passes through all the vicissitudes which seem favorable to the development of this weed in other parts where the plant is common. Farmers careful in using seed often have winter-killed wheat unaccompanied by chess.

8. Liberal rewards have been offered by agricultural papers to any one who could prove conclusively that chess is derived from wheat, and as yet no successful competitor has appeared, though as high as $500 was the prize.

With these facts before us, it does seem difficult for a person to accept a theory which demands greater concessions than the most sweeping form of evolution. Though this plant may appear under circumstances difficult to explain, we are forced to believe that if its origin is carefully considered it will not require one to pin his faith to views so antagonistic to the teachings of science as those required to be accepted by persons claiming wheat as its source.

Remedy.—The great remedy for chess is to be exceedingly particular about the seed you sow. A few seeds scattered among wheat do not seem to amount to much in the heap, but if they were taken out we would be surprised at the quantity mixed among the grain.

LIFE WAS A BURDEN.

People Wonder

WHEN they find how rapidly health is restored by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. The reason is that this preparation contains only the purest and most powerful alteratives and tonics. To thousands yearly it proves a veritable elixir of life.

Mrs. Jos. Lake, Brockway Centre, Mich., writes: "Liver complaint and indigestion made my life a burden and came near ending my existence. For more than four years I suffered untold agony. I was reduced almost to a skeleton, and hardly had strength to drag myself about. All kinds of food distressed me, and only the most delicate could be digested at all. Within the time mentioned several physicians treated me without giving relief. Nothing that I took seemed to do any permanent good until I began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which has produced wonderful results. Soon after commencing to take the Sarsaparilla I could see an in my condition, my appetite began to return and with it came the ability to digest all the food taken, my strength improved each day, and after a few months of faithful attention to your directions, I found myself a well woman, able to attend to all household duties. The medicine has given me a new lease of life, and I cannot thank you too much."

"We, the undersigned, citizens of Brockway Centre, Mich., hereby certify that the above statement, made by Mrs. Lake, is true in every particular and entitled to full credence."—O. P. Chamberlain, G. W. Waring, C. A. Wells, Druggist.

"My brother, in England, was, for a long time, unable to attend to his occupation, by reason of sores on his foot. I sent him Ayer's Almanac and the testimonials it contained induced him to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After using it a little while, he was cured, and is now a well man, working in a sugar mill at Brisbane, Queensland, Australia."—A. Attewell, Sharbot Lake, Ontario.

JACK (?) THE RIPPER.

Probably a Woman, in the Opinion of One of the Most Eminent of London Surgeons -A Startling Theory and Argument.

Mr. Lawson Tatt, the eminent women's surgeon, having read the suggestion published in the Pall Mall Gazette that "Jack the Ripper" might be a woman, had the other day a chat with one of that paper's representatives. He said :

"No serious suggestion in connection with this matter that one can make may be wisely discarded or made light of. The police have discovered nothing, and are evidently at their wits' end. They must begin afresh.

"I have taken a great interest in these tragedies from the very commencement. Now, looking at the subject as a surgeon, the first conclusion is that the whole of the murders, not only in Whitechapel, but in Battersea and Chelsea are the work of one and the same individual. They must be grouped together. Secondly, the crimes are the work of a lunatic. The absolute motiveless ness of the whole business shows this.

"Again, the operator must have been a person accustomed to use a sharp knife upon meat. The work was done by no surgeon. A surgeon cuts in a niggling kind of way. The murderer in these cases has worked in a free, slashing manner. The criminal must have been a butcher and a London butcher. The cuts are made in a fashion peculiar to the London butcher. They would have been made quite differently if the operator had hailed from Dublin or Edinburgh.

"I have said the criminal was mad. He or she is undoubtedly a person suffering from epileptic furor. The fits only last for a short time. May not the police be floored at the outset by the important question of sex? The male epileptic has his fits irregularly; in the case of a woman this is not so. This is something to go upon. Granted that an epileptic be the criminal, on coming out of his or her fit the offender would have no recollection of the murder or cutting up, and would resume his or her everyday life in no way perturbed by what had happened. Nothing is more likely than that 'Jack the Ripper' is some big, strong, woman engaged at a slaughter house in cleaning up, now and then actually cutting up meat.

"Again, in a number of instances the women when found were hardly dead. The bodies were warm; the murderer could not be far away. The fact that the police were so close upon the criminal goes to prove to a wonderful degree that the operator was a woman. On the discovery of one of the murders the police promptly made a circuit round the neighborhood. Nobody was arrested, or, rather, no man was arrested—they did not look for a woman."

"How could a woman have so cleverly committed the deed?"

"It must be clearly understood that whoever was the criminal would be thoroughly splashed with blood. It would be impossible to hack and hew a warm body in 'Ripper" fashion without getting all over blood. A man who thus besmeared himself could not possibly have got clear away time after time. The thing would be perfectly easy for a woman. See here." Here Mr. Lawson Tait picked up a Liberty "chair back" and placed it round himself like an apron. "Conceive the murder done and the woman all splashed. All she has to do is to roll up her skirt to her waist, leaving her petticoat, and fold up the shawl that is over her shoulders and tucked in at her middle. Then she might pass through the croud with the very slightest fear of detection.

"Then as to washing the blood-dyed garments. What would a man do? Plunge them into hot water. Result, the blood coagulates, won't come off, and stains the clothes. And where is he to get hot water, or how is he to pour away bloody water undetected? A woman is always at the washing tub, and she would put the clothes in cold water, when, with a little soap and rubbing, they would become clean, practically unstained, and she would be unsuspected.

"An important point to be noted in connection with what has been termed the fiendish disemboweling of the bodies, and with reference to the particular place at which the incisions have been begun. It is no wild slashing, done without method by a novice with the knife. Having cut the victim's throat from behind, the operator simply by an act of unconscious cerebration goes to work in the regular butcher fashion. Having slit the calf's neck the next thing to be done is to make an incision at the bottom of the abdomen, and lay aside the various organs in the very fashion reported at the inquests as having been done. The resemblance between the 'Ripper's' work and that of the butcher's is complete.

"On at least one of the occasions when the police came upon the scene there were to be noticed several women in the crowd that quickly gathered. Had those bystanders been searched there is all the chance that the criminal would have been captured."

"What advice do you, then, give to the police?" our representative asked.

"Let them visit all the slaughter houses in the district, inquire as to male or female regular assistants or occasional helps—there are not so many slaughter houses, and they are all licensed and under the health authorities—and find out what facilities there are for entrance into the houses after the work of the day is done.

"If this were carefully done at once the police would catch the criminal in a week. The police need to go on a brand new road.

Life in Mexico City.

Much has been written on the climate of Mexico. Too much cannot be said in its behalf. In the city, at an altitude of 7,500 feet, there is no chimney in sight and fires are almost unknown to any save the dusky vestals who bend over charcoal braziers of the kitchen. The mean average of the mercury for about eight years summer and winter, shows 60° Fahr. The limits are 34°—86°. The air is dry of course, except during the actual rain, and, while a foreigner finds himself disqualified by this rarefaction for any extraordinary exertion, yet it gives him a particularly buoyant, champanage like feeling. Rain generally falls each afternoon from June to October, and the next day's sun shines through the freshest and purest of atmospheres. Mexico's streets, however, are very dirty.

The cost of living in Mexico need not be great. A good room can be had for $1 a day and board at a good cafe for $28 a month. Whatever may be the experience of foreigners who will stop at places where they are robbed, who will hire guides to go every block or two with them, and who are too ignorant of the language to protect themselves—in spite of this a much smaller income suffices one here than in the same sized cities of the United States. One does not always get the same quality of fare or attendance, or what else he pays for, as in the States, but Mexico ought not to be judged yet by New York or Paris standards. The wonder is that a country so long isolated from the rest of the world and struggling with so many difficulties of race, religion and education should possess as many of the comforts of high civilization as it really does.

Mexico resembles Paris in its love for cafes and the open air. For the men the cafe in the evening largely takes the place of the social drawing room. There is no such thing as "society" in our meaning of the term—no receptions or germans or evening calling. The only recourse then left the bachelor or undomestic married man is the theater or cafe. The former is a poor sort of alternative. Not that there are no good troupes in the country, but the theater is a gloomy place on the whole. There is too much of it in the city, to begin with, there being three large theaters and a perennial circus. The houses are very large, with four and five tiers of galleries, and the city patronage being divided up among them, they seem ordinarily wofully triste and empty. Men keep on their hats and smoke during the entreactes, there are ordinarily neither dress suits nor evening toilets to be seen in either box or pit and altogether one misses the atmosphere of fashion and refinement to be found at home. A compensation I should not omit reference to is the fact that the Mexican ladies do not wear hats at the theater.

Evangelical churchmen in England are getting alarmed at the prospect of a revival of the monastic system in the Anglican Church. The subject will be discussed at the next session of Convocation.

A new gem, the pierre Tonquinoise, is in the market. When cut like diamonds it is said to be very beautiful. Its color is a dark blue, more brilliant than sapphire, though some varieties have a purple or red tinge.

After destroying a very large number of letters, Mr. Gladstone has selected 60,000 for preservation, and has built for them a fireproof room. When his biographer comes to overhaul them, he will find his work half done in advance.

A London journal is very despondent on the prospects of professional men in England. The rate of emolument for the professional classes, it says, is steadily going down. It is nearly as difficult now for a member of the professional classes to make £500 a year as it was for his father to make a thousand.

The value to Scotland of the opportunities for sports is very large. The deer forests, of which there are 109, covering 3,000 square miles of land useless for agriculture, rent for £100,000 annually. £12,500 of this goes to the local taxes. If any forest fails to be rented, the whole neighborhood feels it greatly in the diminished amount of money expended there. The grouse moors rent for £440,000 and pay £55,000 in taxes. Most salmon rivers are let with the moors, but some are rented alone, and add a considerable sum to the total already given.

Some of the ecclesiastical journals of London are very indignant with the Anglican Bishop of London for allowing his name to appear on the Mansion House manifesto below that of Cardinal Manning. As a matter of fact, the signatures of the Bishop and the Cardinal were placed on the some line. Sir Thomas Dakin was the first Lord Mayor who recognized the title of Cardinal at the Mansion House during his Mayoralty. The two titles held by Cardinal Manning are conferred by a foreign dignitary, and are not legally recognized in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Maybrick's photographs are the sensation of the hour in London just now. The preliminary difficulty which prevented their sale seems to have been overcome, and full-length portraits of the unhappy woman attired in widow's "weeds" are to be seen in the windows of all the principal photographers' shops in the city and the west end. They invariably attract a gaping crowd, and the police have all their work cut out to keep even a portion of the pavement clear for pedestrians, while the gazers seem to base their comments on the facial characteristics or the views they hold as to Mrs. Maybrick's innocence or guilt.

The true scientific attitude of the day, as expressed by the president of the British Association, Pro. Flower, is "a suspended judgment." Prof. Flower endorses Sir John Lubbock's idea that the field of inquiry is limitless, and that there may be "fifty other senses as different from ours as sound is from sight; and even within the boundaries of our own senses there may be endles sounds which we cannot hear, and colors different as red from green of which we have no idea. These and a thousand other questions remain for solution. The familiar world which surrounds us may be a totally different place to other animals. To them it may be full of music which we cannot hear, of color which we cannot see, of sensations which we cannot conceive."

IN THE BALKAN

Omens of Trouble Which Point to a General Convulsion in the Peninsula.

Recent events indicate that Russia is on the eve of acquiring the complete ascendency over Servia which she possessed before the last war with Turkey. In the general election for the Skuptschina, or Servian House of commons, the Radicals, who are avowedly and fervently pro Russian, have been overwhelmingly successful. The Belgrade Government, moreover, has accepted the Czar's offer to educate in Russia 300 young Servian students, selected for their intellectual ability. What is even more significant, the ex-Queen Nathalie, who is a Russian by birth, education, and sympathy, has, in spite of the protests of the ex King Milan, and of the so-called Regents, who rule but do not govern, returned to Belgrade and announced a firm intention of remaining there.

At the first glance Austria seems to have irremediably lost a great deal of ground in the Danubian region since the abdication of Prince Alexander of Battenburg.

JUST BEFORE THAT EVENT

her friends were dominant in Sofia, Belgrade, and Bucharest. Now her enemies preponderate in the two last-named capitals, while at Sofia Prince Ferdinand of Coburg avowedly fights for his own hand, and may conceivably at any time come to terms with Russia. The Vienna Government, however, has some cards left to play. Whatever personal influence belongs to King Charles of Roumania he could doubtless be persuaded to wield on its behalf. Its devoted partisan, the ex King Milan, may at any hour return to Servia, where he still has many adherents. Above all, it holds in reserve Prince Alexander, who, should he re-enter Bulgaria, could count on an enthusiastic welcome from the people. But, inasmuch as Count Kalnogy remains the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, we see no reason to believe that his country's diplomatic resources and opportunities in southeastern Europe will be turned to much better account in the future than they have been in the past.

It seems probable that, if the present state of things continues, the Servian army will be reorganized and disciplined by Russian officers, as it was in 1874-75, and, when restored to comparative efficiency, will be launched against Bulgaria on some plausible pretext transmitted from St. Petersburg. Unless such a design were contemplated, the incidents above mentioned would have no raison d'etre. A Servian movement against Bulgaria, however, must, under the existing circumstances, provoke a general convulsion in the Balkan peninsula. The Porte has declared that such a demonstration would be met by the interposition of a Turkish army. The Vienna Government, also, unless it means to abjure the hope of southward expansion and to leave a free field to the Pan-Slavic aspirations which threaten even the Hapsburg possessions with dismemberment, would have to interfere. As Russia would unquestionably support her Servian protege, all the elements of a far-reaching contest would be forthcoming. Even assuming for the moment that Germany and Italy might not be parties to the conflict, we should still see arrayed upon the one side Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria, and on the other Russia, Servia, and Roumania, the pro-Russian party having lately, as we pointed out above, regained control at Bucharest.

The original treaty between Germany and Austria, to which Italy subsequently became a party, provided, not for an unconditional offensive and defensive alliance, but for cooperation in case one of the contracting powers by two enemies at once. In the complication above supposed, Austria and Turkey, which are both nominally powers of the first class, would be opposed to Russia. There would scarcely be ground, therefore, for German and Italian interference under the terms of the original compact. How much the bonds uniting the three central Governments have have been tightened by later treaties and informal agreements is not definitely known, but it is believed that Bismarck would not suffer his Austrian ally to be seriously discomfited by Russia. He might, indeed, postpone any over proof of sympathy on the theory that Turkey, which, single-handed, held Russia and Roumania at bay for a considerable time, might, with Austrian assistance, prove more than a match for its former antagonists. But should the invasion of Galicia, which is believed to be a feature of the Czar's programme, be successful, the House of Hapsburg might need aid from Germany in order to retain its hereditary dominions.

In such a crisis it is incredible that Kaiser William II. would remain quiescent.

The Climbers of Mt. Blanc.

Up to the first of this month thirty-seven persons had succeeded this year in reaching the summit of Mont Blanc. Five of those who have this season stood on top were Americans.

Compared with some other Alpine summits, Mont Blanc is not a very difficult or dangerous climb, but it puts ordinary powers of endurance to the test, and the number of people who fail to reach the summits, either through fatigue or bad weather, fully equals that of the more fortunate climbers.

That Mount Blanc may be ascended by almost anybody of fair physical powers is shown by the fact that Miss Flossie Morse, only thirteen years old, climbed the mountain in August last year under rather difficult circumstance, as the wind was blowing so strongly that the party were oblige to retrace their steps part way and take another route to the top. Danger is sometimes met with, however, particularly early or late in the season, when the climbers may be caught in such a snowstorm as nearly overwhelmed Mr. Aitken's party in June last. They did not reach the top, and, losing the track for a while, had a terrible time getting down.

Among the 2,000 tourists who in the past century have stood on top of the great summit are only forty women—hardly the proper proportion, for many women are enthusiastic and skilful mountain climbers. They say in the White Mountains that a few women have climbed Mount Washington through Tuckerman's Ravine and down again by the same route in one day, which is considerably more than the average man cares to do. And is the game worth the candle? some will ask. If they could get to the top once they never would ask it again

The Faithful Engineer.

Watson J. Rowell tells the following incident in the "Montreal Witness." It occurred in connection with the war of 1837:—He was then employed by Mr. Molson as head engineer of one of his steamboats which plied between Quebec and Montreal. The captain was a Frenchman named Cote, and my relative, Mr. Watson, strongly suspected that he was a rebel at heart. The boat at that time was used for carrying supplies for the troops of the Loyalists. On its way from Quebec it stopped at Three Rivers. Here the rebels were assembled in large numbers and were probably on the lookout for this vessel. They commanded the captain to surrender the vessel with its supplies. The captain began quietly bargaining to give up his command to the rebels. The purser, who was a young man named Samuel MacDowell, and Mr. Watson the engineer, thought they might save the vessel from falling into the hands of the French. They were Scotchmen, and being so, they were loyal to the Government and honest to their employers. Besides this there was a great friendship between these two men. Mr. Watson had always taken a fatherly as well as a friendly interest in Mr. MacDowell and they could trust each other in their scheme against the captain. They planned not to tell the captain, but secretly to cut the cable which held the vessel to the wharf; also that the purser should take the helm and that the engineer should turn on the steam at a given signal. The rebels could not see these men while they were cutting the cable on account of some barrels than were on deck. Mr. Watson then went to the engine and Mr. MacDowell took his post at the helm. The signal was given, the steam was turned on and the vessel was steered from the wharf and up the river. The rebels were very much surprised for a few minutes, but they soon recovered from their astonishment and immediately poured into the boat a volley of musket balls, but, happily, nobody was hurt, for the barrels spoken of before protected them. Captain Cote was very angry at the escape of the boat and asked the purser why they had acted so, as some of them might have been killed. The purser replid, "Better some of us be killed than all fail to do our duty." After this Captain Cote thought that he had better keep his anger to himself, for the officers could tell a pretty bad story about his conduct. The vessel went victoriously up to Montreal without any more trouble from the rebels on board or on land. There was quite an excitement over the news brought. Mr. Molson was very glad at the escape of his property and thanked the two very heartily. It was mentioned in the papers and Mr. MacDowell did not go back to his employment on board the vessel, but was kept by the authorities to carry despatches for the Loyalists, and after the war he retired to a farm in the Eastern Townships and is, I believe, still living. Mr. Watson remained in the employ of Mr. Molson, as one of his most valued officers until the time of his death ten years later. He died of a fever caught from the emigrants while in the discharge of his duty on board his steamboat. Many officers deserted their position on account of the fever, but Mr. Watson having been so long in Mr. Molson's employ did not like to desert his trust, and so met his death. The end of Captain Cote was tragic for he lost his life in the burning of the theatre at Quebec.

Autumn Fashions.

Velvet ribbon will be used for ties and loops more than any other variety, and black will be worn with all colors, as black ties of this material are supposed to be delightfully becoming to all complexions. Gold beads are arranged as bands or fillets on black velvet bonnets.

Amongst the numerous hats which give the impression of having been met with in wanderings in picture galleries, is one which we can easily fancy will become first favorite as the autumn season approaches. It is called the Napoleon II., is in black, is worn across the head, and, with its coquilles of corded ribbon and plume of cock's feathers, is both becoming and picturesque.

Every aspirant to fashion now appears crowned with an Alsatian bow, its wide ribbon loops flattened to the sides, and the narrow strings coming from the back. Generally the bow is accompanied by lace, but sometimes it forms the entire bonnet, resting very lightly on the wearer's hair, cap fashion, and strengthened by a small wire shape underneath. This introduction has "taken" wonderfully, and certainly it is becoming to most faces, especially long ones. At present black velvet ribbon is the most used, but some light structures are formed of a bow of broad gold canvas braid, veiled with delicate lace.

White velvet hats, with wide brims lined with green or golden-brown plush, and loops of white velvet holding a tuft of white ostrich tips, are novel and both soft and be coming. Suit bonnets of cloth have the back gathered like a baby's bonnet, with velvet folds drawn up in front, knotted once, and the ends left standing up. A throat bow of the velvet comes from the back.

Light biscuit-colored felt hats are faced and draped with brown velvet, and finished with brown plumes or tips. Velvet flowers will be worn on velvet bonnets until midwinter. Velvet crowns, nearly covered with tips, are stylish with felt brims. Yellow birds trim black hats, and small black birds are perched on hats and bonnets of every color and shape.

One bonnet seems to have been inspired by the cap associated in our minds with the Polish dress. It is made in velvet of two shades—brilliant scarlet, and a red just a trifle darker. Its brightness is relieved by black velvet bows and quills. Unlike the greater number, this bonnet is deeper at the back than in the front. To wear with it there is a dainty little muff having the appearance of a large bow with the ends standing upright. The darker red is used as a lining to the lighter, and a bird of soft jet black plumage is fastened amongst the cunningly arranged loops and folds.

A large hat in black velvet, with low crown and flat, broad brim, very small at the back, and standing well up from the face, is apparently only connected with the front of pink velvet by spotted tulle, which comes in full, soft folds right to the upper edge of black velvet. The pink is of a lovely new shade, rich and full, but quite indescribable. A novel effect is produced by small gilt pins with jet heads, placed about an inch apart all round the brim. A prettily arranged rosette of the pink under the brim, and two or three pink tips curling over it, complete this charming head-dress.

In a bonnet of a close-fitting shape, the narrow brim widens towards the front, and is curved upwards, as though to make room for the puffings of velvet, which are held in the centre by a long narrow jet buckle. The velvet is dark green, and there are feathers of the same color. The rest is covered in Sicilienne of a greenish gray tone, and this at the back is drawn into five small fanlike folds, each sewed for a few inches to keep it well in place. Cloth and velvet are often used together, and look very soft and pretty.

Small bonnets of colored or black velvet sit flat on the head; the hair must be worn low, with velvet ribbon strings from the centre of the back edge tied in two short loops and ends in front. A flat Alsatian bow on top is of brocaded or Persian ribbon, having a black bird in the centre.

Round turbans are trimmed with wings or a bird, and loops of ribbon coming from the back. Low toques of felt or velvet are worn back by ladies wearing their hair in the Catogan braid, and really seem to consist of a frame covered with velvet in loose, low folds and a knot in front, or a bow of ribbon is tied in Alsatian fashion in front, and one or two black birds nestle in the knot.

PERSONAL.

Mr. Lewis Morris was intrusted to write the ode to Queen Victoria on the occasion of her recent visit to Wales. Morris is a friend of the Prince of Wales and it is thought by some that he will succeed Lord Tennyson as poet laureate of England.

The home of Jean Ingelow is described as an "old-fashioned, cream-colored stone house in Kensington, surrounded by handsome grounds, and embosomed in flowers and shrubs." Miss Ingelow is well along in years, but is still active with her pen, although she publishes infrequently.

The Shah of Persia did not make himself particularly popular in Austria. He ignored members of the imperial family and failed to keep his engagements. He was the guest of the imperial family at the circus, and when the Archduke Joseph stumbled over a foot-stool in the impeial box and bruised his ankle severely, the Shah clapped his hands and burst into a roar of laughter.

Lord Lytton, British Minister to France, is said to resemble his father, the novelist, in personal appearance, having the same long face, sad-looking eyes, full, straight beard and prominent nose. While literature has been his avocation, he has made diplomacy his vocation and has served at many of the courts of Europe. His most important positions have been that of India and his present one. As Minister to France he receives $60,000 salary and a palace to live in.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe lives a peculiar existence at present. She eats very little, confining her diet almost altogether to bread and butter and fruit. She sleeps well in the daytime, but is apt to be wakeful at night. At times she seems to have a momentary return of her old brilliancy, but as a general thing is mentally apathetic. She is fond of being in the open air and can walk around a little with a cane. Her tenure of life is considered remarkable by her physicians, who say she has the strongest vitality of any woman they have ever known.

Queen Louise, of Denmark, has recently celebrated her seventy-second birthday. She was surrounded by her six children and most of her grandchildren. These six children have made most illustrious marriages. Crown Prince Frederick, the eldest, married Princess Louise, daughter of the late Carl V of Sweden; Princess Alexander married the Prince of Wales; Prince William, who is now King George I of Greece, married the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia; Princess Dagmar married Alexander III, Emperor of Russia; Princess Thyra married the Duke of Cumberland, and Prince Waldemar married Princess Marie of Orleans.

A Paris correspondent gives the following description of Mr. Pasteur: "The great scientist is a modest, unassuming man, a trifle below medium height, with a slight limp in the right leg, whether temporary or not I do not know. His gray hair is short and his beard, also gray, is short-cropped. His face wears a look of intense thought, which does not relax, even when a smile comes to light it up. As is but just, Pasteur's popularity is great in Paris, and when he stood at the entrance of the institute that bears his name, and with his favorite grandchild, a tiny little girl, standing by his side, welcomed the representatives of the universities of every land come to pay homage to the great scientist, there broke forth from the ranks of the lusty-throated students cries loud and long of "Vive Pasteur!" Afterwards, at the Hotel de Ville reception, when he walked through the rooms leaning on the arm of the President of the City Council, I saw him receive a perfect ovation, cries of "Vive Pasteur!" following him herever he went."

The Hammerless Gun.

As the breech-loader has driven out the muzzle-loader, so the hammerless gun is displacing those with projecting locks. It is neater, surer, very much safer, not very much more costly, and fully as convenient. There are a dozen or more makes—each claiming superlative excellence, with partisans plenty to maintain the claim. The cost is from sixty to three hundred dollars each. For wing shooting of quail, snipe, woodcock, reedbirds, rail or partridge, guns of twelve to sixteen gauge, weighing nine to six and a half pounds are chosen. For duck and goose shooting a 10 gauge, nine pound gun is the correct thing. For big game a gun 8 to 10 gauge, weighing nine to thirteen pounds. For boys and moderate sportsmen there are single breech-loaders that cost from ten to twenty dollars. Both these classes, however, are apt to choose instead the target or pocket rifle as cheaper, lighter, more convenient, more economical and much more conducive to good shooting. With a rifle it is a clean hit or miss—there is no stray shot to save you from the consequences of a bad aim. So every well-regulated boy with anything to shoot at wants a "little rifle" as soon as he sees it or its picture. Seven to thirty dollars buys one magazine or repeating rifle, weighing five to nine pounds and good for six to twenty-five shots without reloading, can be emptied inside of ten seconds and cost from fifteen to twenty five dollars each. They run from 22 to 44 calibre and shoot from 20 grain bullets with three grains of powder up to big grain fellows with grains of villainous saltpetre behind them.

It is found that cocoanut oil is not only an excellent lubricant, but it is of great value for lighting purposes. A Frenchman in Cuba has just established a factory for the manufacture of this oil. He has imported the most perfect machinery, in order that the oil produced shall be as pure as possible. The oil is very fluid, oxidizes slowly, and is said to keep long without turning rancid.

A religious order pledged to poverty, chastity, and obedience is proposed by Canon Farrar as the means by which the Church of England can reach the thousands of heathens in London. If the order should assume the name of one of the communities abolished under Henry VIII. it should, provided pro-Jesuit oratory in this country is not astray, be able to claim reparation for King Hal's confiscations.

The impetus given to sculling by the Searle and O'Connor race, and by other matches since arranged, has induced Mr. Innes, the well known writer on aquatics under the nom de plume of Pegasus, to offer a series of prizes for young scullers, with a view of ascertaining whether there is any thing sufficiently promising in England's rising talent to warrant supporting it for champion sculling honors.

The various autumn shows and county fairs which have been held in all parts of the country during the Fall have afforded to outsiders a good idea of what the country can do. They also give a good idea of the people who till the ground and reap the harvest, and bear out what Lord Stanley has been saying concerning the inducements which Canada offers to people on the other side of the Atlantic to make the Dominion their home. There is point too in what Mr. Curran, M. P., said to the representative of the American press, namely, that it was something to see twelve thousand laborers turn out all well dressed and with money in their pockets to spend. A country which was not making progress and prospering could not make such a good showing as the cities of Canada make on all public occasions when a collection of her people is made. Evidence of comfort and contentment are to be seen on every hand, and while Canada has her drawbacks, as has every country in the world, Lord Stanley is not doing the surplus populations of the congested countries of the old land an unkind turn when he points them to the millions of land to be had in the great North-West. This country has not immense standing armies to support in idleness as has almost every country in the Old World and there is no reason why it should not pursue the even tenor of its way, enjoying a graceful civilization and making itself worthy of a place among the nations.

Why it Is.

The statement that out of every hundred men engaged in business, but three are successful, is a statistical chestnut which may be correct in the main, and if so, the pertinent inquiry, what is the matter with the other ninety-seven? is in order. This query, so far as it relates to manufactures using steam power, has a partial answer. A leading firm has recently been pursuing a systematic series of investigations to determine what per centage of the power actually developed was utilized in production and how much was wasted. Careful tests in some of the most prominent manufacturing concerns in the country gave curious results. In nearly every case it was found that at least fifty per cent. of the power was wasted. One large establishment wasted sixty-five per cent. and another seventy-three per cent., while in another, where the engine was developing sixty indicated horse power, eleven-twelths of this amount was wasted in friction and other useless work, and only five horse power was available for purposes of manufacture, in most manufacturing enterprises the cost of fuel is a very serious item, and "The Stationary Engineer" thinks it would appear to be well worth the time of the owners to start a little investigation as to what becomes of the power they pay for. Economical production and judicious utilization of steam are the beginning and end of steam using, and the concern which pays no attention to these points need scarcely hope to be one of the lucky three.

The Candy Fiend Again.

Mrs. McRae, wife of the eminent Presbyterian clergyman at St. John, N. B., has been poisoned by strychnine put into candy sent her husband by mail. Two other St. John ministers received poisoned candy in the same way. The case, which is most mysterious, is similar to the one at Galt, when little Meta Cherry was murdered, and poisoned candy was sent to the family of Rev. John Ridley. An investigation is in progress.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD AT HARVARD

The Famous Scholar Talks About the Poetry of the Brahman Sages.

Sir Edwin Arnold delivered an address upon the "Upanischad" in Sanders theater, Harvard college, at Boston, Mass., recently, which, while it deeply interested a large and cultivated audience, added not inconsiderably to the reputation of the author of the "Light of Asia." "The 'Upanischad,'" Mr. Arnold explained, "are the poetical teachings of the philosophers of Hindoostan— the Brahman sages who, when Alexander the Great encountered them 2,000 years ago, placed in opposition to his Macedonian phalonx a calm philosophy so superior to all earthly bribes and threats that the great conqueror retired abashed." Sir Edwin evidently knew that not even the scholars before him had any comprehension of the gentle teachings of these "word sages," as he called them, and he quoted from their writings more fully and literally than any other Caucasian can do. The similarity of their doctrines and in several notable instances of the language in which they were clothed to the scriptures was pointed out. Said the lecturer: "The Hindoo theology is not dark, hopeless, despairing. Their pessimism springs not from despair but from disdain. It is wrong to call India idolatrous; it is monotheistic." In another place he said that while India with its 200,000,000 people never knew a marriage based on inclination, there were more happy marriages there than anywhere else, and more domestic love. "Better," he exclaimed, "to live in transcendental sunshine than in Calvinistic gloom, and while I would not give one verse of the sermon on the mount for 1,000 Upanischads I do love sunshine better than gloom, and I feel grateful to these old sages for what they have left to us." Sir Edwin will speak at Harvard again to-morrow night. Thursday he will start on his journey to Japan.

Twilight or Sunset?

Dr. Robson Roose, in a recent number of the "Fortnightly Review," has a most valuable paper on "The Art of Prolonging Life," in which he says: "The whole term of life may be divided into the three main periods of growth and development, of maturity, and of decline. No hard and fast lines can be drawn between these two latter phases of existence; the one should pass gradually into the other until the whole picture is changed." The word picture is happily used, for it suggests beauty, and each phase of life has its own beauty, if lived naturally. The old phrase, "Whom the gods love die young" might be added to: "Whom they wish to honor live to old age." Dr. Roose says that occupation is an absolute necessity to the prolonging life; that frequently mental power grows stronger as the bodily power decreases, and for this reason he urges that the mental powers be exercised during the period of maturity. Persons in middle life, he says, should seek and find pleasure in definite ends. He points out the fact that life at the present time offers many more allurements to the mind than in the past. Science has become an open gateway to the most elementary seeker; the difficulty in literature is to keep to one line where there are so many pathways offering both pleasures and training. Hobbies, he tells us, are a good possession, keeping the mind fresh when the muscles have lost power.

The secret of a working old age, after all, lies in the power to adjust life to the changing conditions. Dr. Roose says that when a man finds that severe mental effort is necessary to accomplish that which was previously accomplished with ease, he must yield to the power that controls his faculties, and adjust effort to that power. The same rule should govern physical effort. Exercise is a necessity, inactivity a cause of physical degeneration; but the exercise must never be exhausting; as that which depletes physical power robs the mind. No law or rule can be made by which the machinery of life can be perfectly balanced. Each man must learn from experience how much exercise he is capable of, and then wisely refuse to exceed that limit. Dr. Roose says: "Above all things, sudden and rapid exertion should be scrupulously avoided by persons of advanced age." Many times a man that might have lived to accomplish his share of life's work for years longer has perished because of sudden exercise that used all reserved force. Old age cannot store up a fund of strength that can be used at once. Food has an important place in the preservation of old age. The man who has violated the laws of digestion during a period of thirty years or more cannot hope to redeem the error by a sudden revolution in his habits, any more than the spendthrift can accumulate a fortune by economy when he has lost his earning power.

Sleep is an important factor in the preservation of powers, and for many old people an afternoon nap is a tonic. Careful bathing, Dr. Roose insists, is another preservation and should be a part of the daily routine; warm water is better than cold, and brisk rubbing very essential.

Then the secret of an old age is a wisely lived life began in the cradle. Habits of temperance in food, in exercise, in occupation: the cultivation of a philosophy or creed that distinguishes between essentials and non-essentials, and gives to every event, every incident, its proper place; the wisdom to keep a perspective in life, not bringing every possiblity into the immediately foreground—this is the secret of an old age of usefulness. Happy the man and women who can say, with Rawdon Brown, who, in old age, commenting on the death of a friend wrote: "It seems to me to bode my own speedy departure hence, and always with gratitude to the Almighty for having been allowed to pass so great a portion of my life here." He found his work and his place, and life was, from beginning to end, one great opportunity.—[Christian Union.

A Simple Test for Fresh Eggs.

This method is based upon the decrease in the density of eggs as they grow old. Dissolve two ounces of kitchen salt, says the account, in a pint of water. When a fresh laid egg is placed in this solution it will descend to the bottom of the vessel, while one that has been laid on the day previous will not quite reach the bottom. If the egg be three days old it will swim in the liquid; if it is more than three days old it will float on the surface, and project above the latter more and more as they are older.

We like the fine extravagance of that philosopher who declared that no man was as rich as all men ought to be.

Has a Crater on the Moon Changed?

The members of the Baltimore Society of Amateur Astronomers have received a despatch from Professor Ritchie, at the Harvard Observatory, announcing a change in the crater Pliny of the moon. This remnant of a volcano is one of the many crags and peaks distinguishable through an opera glass, field glass or telescope. The entire surface of the moon is broken up by walled plains, in the centre of each of which rises a straight mound. Crater Pliny is one of the best known of these, and is in the north-western quadrant of the moon. A Baltimore astronomer said yesterday that he thought that a mistake had been made in regard to the discovery, as the satellite is believed to be dead, and no change can take place on its surface. He said that it is possible that the professor, who thought he had made a discovery, had been misled by the different prominences on the surface being illuminated at different angles, and thus presenting a different appearance. By the most powerful telescopes the moon can be brought within 150 to 200 miles of the earth, and "everything," said the astronomer, "appears dead. Nothing but the wildest desolation prevails. Circular caverns and pits have their floors strewn with huge blocks and sides stretching upward a thousand feet. Some of the mountains inclose areas of forty to 120 miles in diameter, while the peaks themselves rise often to 7,000 feet, and in one instance 16,000 feet in altitude."—[Baltimore Sun.

Have you got salt-rheum or tetter,
Scrofula or fever-sores?
You will never be the better
For your faith in quackish bores.
Seek from nature's store the treasure
That will save you from the grave,
And give blessings without measure—
Not to fool, or quack, or knave, but to Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, the world-famed cure for the above diseases. It is guaranteed to cure the diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be refunded.

"Let us pretend you married me for my money, Johnnie." "All right, Flotssie. Give me a quarter this morning, dearest."

"Yes; I shall break the engagement," she said, folding her arms and looking defiant; "it is really too much trouble to converse with him; he's as deaf as a post, and talks like he had a mouthful of mush. Besides, the way he hawks and spits is disgusting." "Don't break the engagement for that; tell him to take Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It will cure him completely.' "Well, I'll tell him. I do hate to break it off, for in all other respects he's quite too charming." Of course, it cured his catarrh.

Most Invigorating, So They Say.

I have drank St. Leon Water for the last two years and find it most invigorating for the system. I consider this water to be invaluable for the people of Ontario, living as they do at such a distance from the sea. Its saline properties alone cannot fail to have a renovating effect. E. B. "What is Home Without a Housekeeper," is the degraded view taken by a gruff old bachelor, of the holy office of wife and mother. And yet how many mothers and wives there are who are simply "housekeepers," household drudges, whose life is worked out while disease is let in, during the ceaseless round of washing and scrubbing and dusting and baking and cooking. The same clothes and floors and furniture and dishes are gone over and over until the heart is sick and the body is broken with worry and disease. Amid this toil nervousness begins, bad digestion, irregularities of the reproductive organs, prolapsus or other displacements, popularly known as "female weakness," sick headache and a host of female complaints follow on. For all such take Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, the only remedy sold by druggists, UNDER A POSITIVE GUARANTEE, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction or money will be refunded.

The Dutton ENTERPRISE shows its go-ahead spirit in publishing a full account, together with the prize list, of the Wallacetown Fair on the morning after it was held.—Glencoe Transcript.

The I. O. F. gave a succesful concert at Rodney Saturday evening, after the fair, the proceeds of which amounted to $115. The entertainment throughout was of a high order. E. A. Hugill, C. R., presided.

The fifth annual exhibition of the Muncey Tecumseh Agricultural Society will be held at the Central School House, on the Muncey Reserve, Caradoc, on Wednesday and Thursday, October 23rd and 24th.

Local sports are now in their glory, and some full bags of game are reported to have been secured by some of them lately. Game of all kinds is said to be exceedingly plentiful in this neighborhood.

The Molson's bank staff at St. Thomas and other branches have been handed a dividend of 20 per cent. on their year's salary by the management, the profits of the year having warranted the generous donations.

J. J. Stalker, Reeve of Aldborough, returned on Saturday from a trip to Manitoba and the Northwest. He reports the crops good in some localities while in others the yield of wheat is very poor, three and four bushels per acre.

Arch. McWilliam lies dangerously ill at his residence, near Cowal, of typhoid fever. The doctors almost gave up hopes of his recovery last week, but his strong constitution is pulling him through. He is not out yet of danger however.

The St. Thomas police made a raid Thursday evening upon a room in the city which a lot of tough youngsters had rented for a rendezvous for the winter to hatch plans against the peace of the city. The boys were allowed to go on suspended sentence by the magistrate.

The following decidedly original composition was picked up on the street the other day and handed in for publication. It is evidently the first effort of some aspiring literary genius: "Mr. B wants to hire a middlen age and steady habits man to manage a farm and that tall bashful man is the boy's cousin."

Governor Moore, of the Elgin jail, has prepared his quarterly report for the three months ending October 1st. During the term there were 35 municipal and 36 Government prisoners. The total days chargeable to the county was 562, and chargeable the to Government 729. The total days' stay of lunatic prisoners was 129.

Jas. Pool's spirited team ran away on the Coyne road Tuesday morning. The driver, named Graves, was thrown out and left insensible on the roadside and on coming to found that he had sustained a severe cut about three inches long on the side of his face. The team was stopped after a run of two miles, little the worse for their run.

While two boys, sons of Mr. Gunn, living at Wardsville, were out huntlng Friday morning one of them was accidentally shot. His brother fired at a squirrel, and the little boy, who was running along the fence, received the charge in his right arm and side. A doctor was called and he found the arm so badly lacerated as to require amputation above the elbow.

The members of the Dutton Baptist congregation intend giving two novel entertainments in the church, on Friday evening, Oct. 25th and on Friday evening Nov. 1st. The first of these entertainments will be conducted exclusively by the ladies and the second exclusively by the gentlemen. See programme for ladies entertainment next week, Admission, 15 and 10 cents. The proceeds will be applied towards repairing the church.

When an animal or article is lost the quickest way to recover it is by advertising it in the newspaper. A great many people adopt the penny wise and pound foolish policy of tramping the neighborhood over in fruitless search of the missing object, losing more time than would pay for an advertisement many times over. If you have lost an animal advertise it. If one has strayed upon your premises advertise it. The ENTERPRISE is the only reliable local advertising medium.

Whoa, there! —— !! —— ? ! ! —— ! —— ! such a horse anyway, said a fair damsel who gave said horse too much freedom while she was engaged in fixing her hat and ogling the boys on the sidewalk, with the result that the horse carried out an notion of his own to trot back to the stables. The animal was stopped before it had gone very far, and when the driver alighted she used some very uncomplimentary language towards the poor brute, causing any amount of fun for the spectators.

The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper will be dispensed in Knox church on Sunday next. Preparatory services will be held at 11 a. m. and at 8 p. m. to-day, Rev. Mr. McIntyre, of Delaware, conducting the services, and on Saturday at 11 a. m., Mr. Alex. Wilson, brother of the pastor, preaching. Rev. W. H. W. Boyle, of St. Thomas, will preach on Sunday at 11 a. m. and at 7 p. m., and on Monday Rev. D. Kelso, of Wallacetown, will preach at 11 a. m. The ordinance of baptism will be administered at the Saturday service.

On Saturday morning about half past two o'clock the barns, stables, and outbuildings on the premises of D. McGregor, first deputy reeve of Aldborough, were discovered on fire and despite all efforts made to save them were with all their contents burned to the ground. The barn was a fine structure with stables underneath and contained 14 tons of hay, 50 bushels of wheat, 50 bushels of oats, 43 bushels of peas, a single reaper, single mower, set of single harness, set of double harness, cutter, plow and all of Mr. McGregor's farming implements, except a buggy which was undergoing repairs and a lumber wagon which was borrowed by a neighbor. The loss will amount to over $1500 while the insurance was but $500 in the Huron and Middlesex Insurance Company. The fire is supposed to have been caused by tramps sleeping in the barn.

Anniversary services were held in Tait's Corners Presbyterian church on Sunday last, conducted by the Rev. W. Henderson, of Hyde Park, the three services being well attended. On the following Monday evening a tea meeting was held, which was the most successful financially ever given in that section. A. McLean, of Glencoe, filled the chair admirably, and addresses were delivered by Revs. Currie, of Glencoe, and Henderson, of Hyde Park; music by the Glencoe choir, Mrs. Cameron and Prof. Peachey, W. W. Gordon and Jas. Stevenson. Miss Edwards gave two dialect recitations. The proceeds amounted to $83, which will be applied towards building sheds at the church to accommodate teams.

The Young People's Society of Christian Advance in connection with Knox church re-organized for the coming season last Friday evening with the following officers: Hon. President, Rev. Principal Caven, of Knox College, Toronto; resident hon. president, Rev. Thos Wilson; president, C. St. C. Leitch; 1st vice-president, Miss Ada Black; 2nd vice-president, C. L. Patterson; secretary, R. Sutherland; assistant secretary, Miss Minnie Hollingshead; treasurer, Miss Flo. McIntyre; councillors, Misses Belle Paterson, Kate Campbell and Ida Leitch and Messrs. M. McArthur, S. R. Bright, Wm. Hollingshead and C. E. Knight. The society will shortly give a grand opening entertainment, of which full particulars will be given later.

MOCCASIN TRACK HUNTING TOTEM OF HEALTH

An important change, and one which will prove of great benefit to commercial travellers and others, will come into effect on the Michigan Central under the new time table on November 10th. Heretofore commercial men and others who desired to visit the towns and villages west of the city have been obliged to travel by the local way-freight, and that the service has been most unsatisfactory, owing to unavoidable delays, no person need be told who has ever travelled on the train. Under the new time table a passenger train will leave St. Thomas at 6 a. m., stopping at all stations between that place and Windsor. Returning it will leave Windsor between 5 and 6 p. m., arriving in St. Thomas about 10 p. m.

Ayer's Hair Vigor

IS the "ideal" Hair-dressing. It restores the color to gray hair; promotes a fresh and vigorous growth; prevents the formation of dandruff; makes the hair soft and silken; and imparts a delicate but lasting perfume.

"Several months ago my hair commenced falling out, and in a few weeks my head was almost bald. I tried many remedies, but they did no good. I finally bought a bottle of Ayer's Hair Vigor, and, after using only a part of the contents, my head was covered with a heavy growth of hair. I recommend your preparation as the best in the world."—T. Munday, Sharon Grove, Ky.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for a number of years, and it has always given me satisfaction. It is an excellent dressing, prevents the hair from turning gray, insures its vigorous growth, and keeps the scalp white and clean."—Mary A. Jackson, Salem, Mass.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for promoting the growth of the hair, and think it unequaled. For restoring the hair to its original color, and for a dressing, it cannot be surpassed."—Mrs. Geo. La Fever, Eaton Rapids, Mich.

"Ayer's Hair Vigor is a most excellent preparation for the hair. I speak of it from my own experience. Its use promotes the growth of new hair and makes it glossy and soft. The Vigor is also a cure for dandruff."—J. W. Bowen, Editor "Enquirer," McArthur, Ohio.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for the past two years, and found it all it is represented to be. It restores the natural color to gray hair, causes the hair to grow freely, and keeps it soft and pliant."—Mrs. M. V. Day, Cohoes, N. Y.

"My father, at about the age of fifty, lost all the hair from the top of his head. After one month's trial of Ayer's Hair Vigor the hair began coming, and, in three months, he had a fine growth of hair of the natural color."—P. J. Cullen, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

THE LATE PROF. PHELPS.

The above is a portrait of the late Prof. Edward E. Phelps, M.D., LL.D., of Dartmouth College, He was a strong, able man, who stood high in the literary and scientific worlds. It is not generally known, but it is, nevertheless, the truth, that Prof. Phelps was the discoverer of what is known to the Medical Profession and Chemists universally as Paine's Celery Compound, unquestionably one of the most valuable discoveries of this century. This remarkable compound is not a nervine, an essence, a sarsaparilla or any devised article, but a discovery, and it marks a distinct step in medical practice and the treatment of nervous complications. It has been freely admitted by the best medical talent in the land, and also by the leading chemists and scientists, that for nerve troubles, nervous exhaustion, insomnia, debility, senility and even the dreaded and terrible Paresis, nothing has ever been discovered which reaches the disorder and restores health equal to this discovery of Prof. Phelps

Paine's Celery Compound is now being prepared in quantities, and can be procured at any reputable druggist. An attractive bunch of celery is to be found on every wrapper. It has become specially popular among professional men, mind workers, ladies burdened with exciting social duties and frequenters of the leading clubs.

A coolie dog owned by Richard Lipsey, River Road, Southwold, went mad Saturday, and after biting another dog belonging to Mr. Barrett, and two or three cows, attacked Miss Edith Fitzsimons. The young lady experienced considerable difficulty in fighting off the brute, which tore one of the mitts from her hand. Fortunately she escaped the animal's teeth, however.

E. Morgan, of Delhi, has issued circulars offering $15 reward for the conviction of two burglars who robbed his premises on Oct. 11th. One, Alfraedo Bonner, is a boy about 18 years of age; light hair; blue eyes; has had his left hand injured recently; height about 5 feet six inches. The other, Ed. Gilbert, is about the same age and size; dark hair; hazel eyes; has two teeth out in front, and the others are very irregular. Supposed they will be wearing the goods stolen, which were: Two pea jackets, one with velvet collar and made of nap goods; two overcoats, one is worsted, trimmed with imitation of Persian lamb, the other a brown cast worsted, both having on the loop on the collar the mark of W. E. Sanford & Co.; also silk handkerchiefs, caps, boots and underwear. Supposed that they boarded a Michigan Central train at La Salette on the morning of the 12th inst. They have friends in Rodney, Comber and near Essex Centre, where it is supposed they will go.

After Many Days.

On the night of June 1st, 1887, Richard Cusack, cattle buyer, well known in Dutton, was made the victim one of the most daring robberies ever committed in this city. As he was walking along Wilson avenue toward home, he was stopped by two highwaymen, one of whom knocked him senseless with a stone wrapped in a pocket handkerchief, while the other rifled his pockets of $350. Two respectable citizens were arrested for committing the crime, but were honorably acquitted. Some months ago Police Constable Mitchell was made aware of certain facts which led him to believe that the robbery had been committed by Thomas Havercroft, hackman, and Burleigh Beach, at that time employed as a M. C. R. brakeman. Beach left the city shortly after the robbery, and about 18 months since was killed while switching cars in the Wisconsin Central yards at Stevens Point. Havercroft has remained in the city ever since and followed the avocation of a cabman. Constable Mitchell continued to work on the case until Saturday, when it was decided to arrest Havercroft, and he was taken into custody at Fingal Sunday afternoon. The police claim to have a strong case against the accused, who has been remanded to jail for a week.—St. Thomas Times.

The convention will close with the election of officers.

Death of Major Ellison.

The death occurred at Port Stanley Tuesday morning of one of the most highly respected and best known residents of the county in the person of Mr. John Ellison, or Major Ellison, as he was more generally known. Deceased, who was in the 75th year of his age, had been failing for a year or more past. He was the eldest son of the late John Ellison, of Southwold, and had spent most of his life in Elgin County. He had been identified for many years with the growth and development of Port Stanley, and for ten or twelve years was reeve of the village, having first been elected when Port Stanley was incorporated in 1874. For several years he was Warden of the county. He had previously filled the office of reeve of Southwold for several years.

Mr. Ellison was commander of the Marine Company of Port Stanley for several years and retired retaining the rank of Major. He was a staunch Conservative, and many a time and oft has been heard on the hustings in support of the candidate of his choice. He was promnently identified with the Orange Order.

Deceased commenced business at Union in 1837, where he transacted practically all the business of the place, owning a saw mill, grist mill, general store, and carrying on the business of a contractor. He actually built the whole village. He removed to Port Stanley in 1854, where for a number of years he filled a contract for the Government in dredging the harbor. During the construction of the London & Port Stanley railway he was overseer of the road, and as contractor built the bridges, etc., along the line. He also carried on the business of contractor at the same time, and erected all the buildings in the village and surrounding country, including the Episcopal church, which still stands. He also built many other buildings in this city, and numerous bridges throughout the county.

During the past eight months his health had been failing, and Tuesday morning he passed peacefully away, though he was able to walk about the lawn Monday.

A large family survive him. The sons are: Alonzo and Hubbard, of St. Thomas; Capt. John, Port Stanley; Joseph, of Kansas City; Luke, of Buffalo; James, of Port Stanley; Albert, of Topeka, Kansas; and William, of St. Louis. There are three daughters: Alice, residing at home; Mrs. Moore, Port Stanley; and Mrs. Urquhart, of Cowal.

The funeral will take place at 2 p. m. to-day under the auspices of St. Mark's Lodge, A. F. & A. M., Major Ellison having been a member of the Masonic Order.—Times.

Allan McDonald, of Oil Springs, fell through the railway bridge, near there, on Saturday night, breaking his neck. Deceased's family reside in Wallaceburg, whither the body was taken. No inquest was deemed necessary, as Mr. McDonald had been seen going in the direction of the bridge and the night was very dark.

A STOLEN IDENTITY.

CHAPTER III

The difficulty which now lay in Stassart's path was to arrange a meeting between Kingsford and the Japanese doctor at the latter's house. Stassart had known Kingsford was a year senior to him; but they had not corresponded since Gladys' lover had gone out to South Africa a year ago in order to carry out some investigations on behalf of a proposed gold-mining company. He thought over the matter a long time, and one or two days had already passed before he could find out a means. He was so conscious of his own ulterior designs, that he sought for some excuse to invite Stanton Kingsford to his house on the Thames, an excuse that would sound natural and matter-of-fact even after the long interval caused by his rival's voyage to the Cape. It did not strike him till he had wasted some time in devising various futile plans that it would be the most natural, and, indeed, friendly, thing to invite Kingsford to his house for a night, just because they had not seen each other for so long. He laughed at himself for his own stupidity, and, hastily seizing pen and ink, wrote off a friendly note to Kingsford, who, he had already learnt, was in rooms near his fiancee's house in Kensington, to which Gladys had returned from the country. The answer came in a day or two, and was of a very cordial nature. Somehow or other Stassart felt a little ashamed of the part he was playing, but, having begun the game, did not like to draw back. He sent Raphael with a note to Amida Sama, to say that he wished him to come and dine with him on the following Tuesday evening, when he expected Kingsford would be staying the night at his house. He did not tell the cherub faced page that he expected a visitor to sleep the night on that occasion; he did not wish the boy to think anything extraordinary was to happen.

On Tuesday evening Stanton Kingsford arrived in time for an eight-o'clock dinner, at which he was introduced to a quiet little man of somewhat foreign appearance, who, Stassart whispered to him, was an Eastern savant sent over on a scientific mission from the Japanese Government. The quiet little man had spent a short time in the Cape Colony, and proved a most interesting companion. He, too, like Kingsford, knew something about the gold and diamond mines there.

"I have some rather interesting specimens of mineral ores," he remarked casually during dinner to Kingsford; "I think you might like to see them. I should like your opinion upon their value."

"By all means," answered Kingsford. "I should be very glad to see them. Where are they?"

"I will show them to you if you will come over to my house after dinner," answered the Japanese; "it is only a few minutes' walk from here."

"Will you come, Stassart?" asked the young man of his host.

"Oh! yes of course, if you care to see these specimens," answered Stassart. "And perhaps, Doctor, you will give us a cup of coffee in Japanese fashion, and then we need not wait for it here," he added.

"With pleasure," replied the doctor.

So, dinner being over, the two young men went out with Amida Sama, Stassart first telling Raphael that he need not wait, and that he was to call him at half-past eight next morning. Arrived at the doctor's house, they examined some curious specimens of minerals and some Cape diamonds of peculiar purity and brilliancy, and then went to the study where Stassart had first been initiated into the strange discovery that was to effect his whole life. Lounging on luxurious divans, Stassart and Kingsford sipped their coffee, smoked their cigars, and listened with interest to an account that Amida Sama was giving them of some recent experiments upon hypnotic subjects in Paris.

"What you tell us is most interesting, Doctor," said Kingsford. "I wish I could see some of these experiments performed."

"Nothing more easy," answered Amida Sama. "I could do them myself here, if I only had a willing subject. Will not one of you two friends sacrifice himself for the other?" he asked, with a smile, as if he were desirous of complying with his guests' wish.

"Well," remarked Stassart, as if hesitating, "if you promise not to make me do anything very ridiculous while I am under your influence, I would not mind obliging Kingsford's curiosity."

"Very good, then," said the doctor. "Lie down on the divan."

He then made a few ordinary mesmeric passes, and of course as Stassart was a perfectly willing subject, soon put him into a state of mesmeric coma, in which condition he made him repeat poems in Japanese and Hindustani, answer questions of which in his normal state he could not possibly know the answers, and do several other acts familiar enough to those acquainted with the tricks of ordinary mesmerists, but quite new to Kingsford. Then, releasing the young man from his influence, he asked Kingsford if he also would like to be hypnotised.

"If you like," answered he, readily enough; "but do you think I am a good subject?"

"That depends entirely on yourself," answered Amida. "If you trust yourself to me, and do not attempt to think or exercise any volition, I have no doubt I can hypnotise you."

"Very well, then," answered Kingsford, with a laugh, "I will put myself entirely in your hands." And he resigned himself to the doctor's influence.

It was soon done. Aided by the young man's unsuspecting confidence, Amida Sama cast him into a complete hypnotic lethargy, and obtained entire mastery over his will. Kingsford lay motionless and apparently lifeless on the couch. Then hastily turning to Stassart, the doctor bade him lie down also, cast him likewise into a trance, and in a few moments stood thoughtfully before these two young men, so completely under his power, their volition voluntarily surrendered to his.

"It will be a most interesting experiment," he remarked to himself.

He made a few more motions with his hands, then concentrated the whole force of his powerful will upon his two subjects. No visible change took place. Only, after a few moments of evidently great effort on the part of the doctor, a slight tremor shook the frame of Stassart, then communicated itself to the body of Kingsford. Both men simultaneously drew a deep breath. Then all was still. Amida Sama fell back exhausted upon his divan, and great drops of perspiration stood upon his forehead. A silence as of death reigned throughout the room.

After a time the Japanese rose up, and placing his hand upon Kingsford's forehead, stroked it gently, as a nurse would soothe an invalid child. The eyes opened, and the young man sat up.

"Doctor," he asked eagerly, "Is it done?"

"Look in this mirror," was the answer, "you will see." Kingsford's body, now inhabited by the personality of Stassart, rose and looked at the glass. Then he turned towards the couch and gazed at the still sleeping figure. Stassart felt a curious sensation. He saw himself; not as he so often before had done, as a man sees himself in a mirror regarding himself with his own eyes, but he saw himself as he appeared to others—as he actually was in daily life. Yet that body was his no longer. All the world would think him to be Kingsford. It was a strange idea; it even struck him as having a slightly comic side to it, and he laughed in grim amusement.

"We must get him back to your house," said the doctor, and then you can go to his rooms, in his person."

Kingsford, in Stassart's form, was still under hypnotic influence, and mechanically obeyed the doctor's command to get up and walk. The two placed him between them, and proceeded towards the house they had left a few hours before. There they placed the sleeping form in Stassart's bed, and quietly departed without awaking anyone in the building. Then Stassart Kingsford—for we must give him this double name—returned to the doctor's house till it was time to catch the first morning train to London; and arriving in town, took a hansom to Kingsford's rooms in Kensington, and let himself in with a latch key which he found in the suit that his changed personality was wearing.

The first thing that Stassart Kingsford sought to do was, naturally, after the somewhat exciting events of the evening, to find his bedroom and turn in. Here a practical difficulty arose for he had only been in the house once before, and then only in the sitting room. However, he took a candle which stood on the hall-table, and proceeded quietly upstairs till he saw a door slightly ajar where the gas was still burning. Luckily it proved to be his friend's room, for he saw on the dressing table a letter addressed to 'S. Kingsford, Esq., 250 Edith Terrace, Kensington, W.,' which set his doubts at rest, and he turned into bed with a sigh of relief. He slept soundly till the maidservant called him next morning at eight; then arose, dressed, and went down to breakfast. On the table he found two letters—one in a girl's writing, which he guessed instinctively was from Gladys, and another evidently from a masculine hand. He opened this the first, and read the following little note:

"Aug. 20, 1887.

"My dear Stanton,—Just a line to send you my best and kindest wishes for your approaching happiness. I am in a great hurry, but hope to look in and see you in a day or two. Meanwhile, please accept the enclosed as my wedding gift. Your affectionate uncle,

"P.S.—When is the 'happy day'?"

The enclosure was a cheque for five hundred pounds. Stassart felt most perplexed. Here was some old uncle of Kingsford's writing a letter, and forgetting to put any name or address to it. It required, of course, a grateful answer; but how could he write one? It really was rather awkward. He turned to open the other letter, which smote him with a pang of jealousy. It was from Gladys, asking her lover to be sure to come that morning at half-past eleven, and take her into town to shop, and ending: "If you come in good time I will give you—you know what.—Your own loving Gladys."

With such a prospect in view, the transformed Stassart lost no time in setting out to see his former love. He hailed a passing hansom, and soon arrived at a pretty little semi-detached house in Kensington. Dismissing the driver, he inquired for Miss Meredythe, and was shown into a quiet morning-room while the servant went to announce his arrival. Stassart looked round the room, and caught sight of himself in a mirror which stood above the mantelpiece. Although he was, so to say, in the secret of his transformations, he could hardly repress a start of surprise as he saw the face of Stanton Kingsford looking out at him. He was gazing at himself, and yet he saw someone else. But this thought did not trouble him very long. He was about to see once more his adored Gladys, and this time she would not repulse him. The thought gave him a feeling of exquisite triumph and of still more exquisite anticipation. But even in the midst of his victory the timidity of true love made him, for the moment, feel as nervous as if he were still the rejected suitor, Arlon Stassart. The entry of the maidservant gave a sudden shock to the thoughts that were agitating his mind. At her approach he could not repress a sudden start; his heart almost stopped beating when the girl uttered the common-place announcement:

"Miss Gladys will be ready in a minute."

But she had hardly left the room again before the door opened, and Gladys herself appeared, ready dressed for a morning's walk. Arlon for half a second hesitated, and then, feeling how foolish it was that in his position of accepted lover he should still have the thoughts and sensations of a despised suitor, stepped towards her and caught her eagerly in his arms, while his whole soul seemed to pour itself forth in the impassioned kiss he pressed upon his darling's lips.

It was very strange, but even at this apparently quite ordinary proceeding on the part of her supposed lover, some delicate sensitiveness, some divine warning of the instinct of affection, seemed to pass over Gladys' mind like an intuition, unfounded perhaps, but none the less real.

She drew back rather hastily, and coldly returning his salute, remarked, with some degree of asperity, "I wish you would not be so rough, Stanton; you are quite spoiling my hat. Let us go out for our walk now."

'Why are you in such a hurry to go out, darling?' expostulated the supposed Stanton; 'I have hardly seen you yet. Is there anything particular you want to buy immediately? Why this have to go out?' And he once once more stepped towards her, as if to embrace her.

No more kisses, sir, said Gladys, playfully. "If you want one very much, I'll give you one when we have got what you promised me. Shall we go and get it?"

Arlon felt bewildered at this. What had he—or, rather, Kingsford—promised his future bride? It was rather awkward that his ignorance of small details should show itself so early in the proceedings. However, he determined to put the best face on it he could, and answered: "Of course, dear, we will start at once, if you like." He was about to ask her where they should go, but reflected this would betray an unseemly forgetfulness. To his horror, she asked the question herself.

"Well, then, let us go. But where are you going to take me to choose it."

"To choose what?" he asked, unguardedly and then could have almost kicked at the betise he displayed.

"My dear Stanton," said his lady-love, in a surprised tone of voice, "surely you can't have forgotten?"

"Oh! no, darling," replied the agonized representative of Kingsford, "I haven't forgotten, only I was thinking of something else. Let me see. We were going to choose a ring, were we not?"

This was about the most unfortunate thing he could have said. Unluckily Kingsford and Miss Meredythe had chosen that indispensable accompaniment of matrimonial happiness the day before. Gladys looked at him in amazement.

"Stanton, what is the matter with you this morning?" she cried. "Why, we did that yesterday. What has made you so absent minded? Are you quite well? You don't seem quite yourself to-day, somehow."

"No," thought Arlon, "I am not myself. I am somebody else; and I begin to wish I wasn't. I must say something. I'll say I'm not well." "I'm not quite the thing to day, Gladys," he said aloud. "I had a return of that beastly sunstroke I had in Africa again yesterday afternoon, and my head feels rather queer still."

"Oh! I'm so sorry," said Gladys. "What a strange boy you are! You never told me before you had had a sunstroke when in Africa."

"Didn't I, dear?" said her lover. "I did not like to bother you about a little thing like that, you see. Never mind, Gladys, I'm all right again now, only I can't remember what I promised you to-day. What was it, dear?"

The subterfuge worked very well this time, and Gladys unsuspiciously answered:

"You said you would take me to the City, and we would choose a setting for that lovely Kimberley diamond you brought me.

"Oh! of course," answered Arlon. "What a fool I was to forget it! Have you got it with you?"

"No," said Gladys, with considerable surprise, "of course not. I asked you to take care of it for me, Stanton. And I do wish," she added, with ever so slight a touch of petulance, "that you would try and collect your thoughts a little."

"When I am thinking of you, dear," began Stassart, with a loving air, "I seem to forget everything else."

But Gladys did not seem to care for this pretty speech. She was becoming rather perplexed with her lover's strange manner; and besides, Stanton never used to go in for that kind of complimentary trifling with her.

Stassart, too, began to grow uneasy at the turn affairs were taking. What was this wretched diamond? and where was it to be found? "Probably Kingsford has it locked up in his rooms," he thought, "and I shall have to go back for it. Anyway, I must find it." Turning to Gladys, he said, penitently:

"I am sorry I'm so stupid, darling. I left it in my rooms. We can call and get it on our way to the City."

"All right, Stanton dear," answered Gladys, cheerfully. "It won't be much out of our way; and I dropped something out of my pocket when I was there yesterday—a note to Eva, you know. Did you see it? We can look as well."

So they went, and seeing a hansom, Stassart hailed it, and they drove rapidly towards Edith Terrace. Arriving there, Gladys said she would get out and look for her note while Stassart was seeking the diamond. She went into his sitting-room, and her lover rushed upstairs, wondering where that unfortunate jewel was to be found.

"I expect the beggar has locked it up in his dressing-case," he thought to himself. "Most likely place. One of these keys is sure to fit it;" and he pulled out a bunch of keys from the pocket of the suit he was wearing. He soon found the key of the dressing case, but, alas! the diamond was not there. He hunted high and low, but could not find it. Meanwhile Gladys had found the note she dropped, and was becoming impatient. Looking round the room to while away the time, she noticed a letter lying open on the table, and beside it a cheque for 500l., which Stassart had carelessly left lying about. The letter she saw at a glance, was from a relative of Kingsford's but she did not remember to whom the initials J. L S. belonged.

"It's very good of him, though, whoever it is, to send us such a nice wedding-gift," she remarked to herself. "But where can Stanton be all this time?" Something certainly seems to have gone wrong this morning."

At last Stanton—or, to be more correct, Stassart in his shape—appeared with rueful looks. He was very sorry, quite ashamed of himself, but he must confess he could not remember where he had put that diamond. Would Gladys come with him and choose another?

"Oh! never mind, dear," answered she, though a shade of disappointment crossed her fair brow. "It does not matter to-day, and, perhaps, if we wait a day or two, it will turn up. We will go for a walk instead, shall we? We hardly have time, after all, to go to the City before lunch, you know. You will lunch with us to-day, Stanton, won't you?" she said, with a sweet smile that made the somewhat dismayed Stassar, feel rather penitent at the part he was playing.

"Yes, darling," he answered, eagerly, "I shall be delighted to do so. But won't you let me get you another diamond? I really ought to make amends for my carelessness."

"No, I would rather you did not—at least, not to-day," replied Gladys; for, to tell the truth, she felt a little hurt at his carelessness, and not quite so eager to make a long shopping expedition that morning. "I think I should like a walk in the Park better. And—and—I don't care much about diamonds anyhow," she added, with a little pout, that, to Stassart's enraptured eyes, made her appear more charming than ever, though he was secretly afraid that the harmony of the proceedings was not quite so secure as might be wished. But he thought he had better say no more about it, and allowed Gladys to lead the way out of his rooms into the road towards the Park.

"How delightful it is to be walking with you again, Gladys!" he remarked. "It seems ages since I saw you last."

"And yet it was only yesterday," she answered, "that we took the very same walk. It used to be very lonely for me when you were away. I only had auntie to walk with then, and she goes slowly."

"Ah! darling, it was even more lonely for me," answered Stassart, acting up to his part. And, indeed, this remark was perfectly true, and he was on pretty safe ground here. He thought he had better improve the occasion. "I sometimes think," he went on, "that if it had not been for your dear letters I should have gone mad."

"Don't talk rubbish, Stanton!" said Gladys, with a pleased little laugh, however. "By the way, you had a letter this morning, had you not? And a wedding-present in it, too, I think."

"Oh, yes!" said Stassart, "from my uncle. He sent us 500l."

"Wasn't it nice of him?" said Gladys. "But which of your uncles was it? You have so many, you know."

"Have I?" thought Stassart to himself; "I didn't know that before. I suppose I must make a guess at one of them." "It was Uncle James," he said aloud, making a wild guess. "The fellow's initial was J., anyhow," he thought.

"Why, Uncle James sent us those blue vases only yesterday," remarked Miss Meredythe, with some surprise. "Are you 'sure' it was Uncle James?" she asked, doubtfully.

"Oh yes!" said Stassart, confidently, "it was Uncle James, sure enough. It's just like him to do that kind of thing."

"Well, yesterday, you know, Stanton, you called him an old skinflint, because he only sent us a pair of five-shilling vases, and you said that was just like his meanness."

"I confess I misjudged him," answered her lover. "He has shown up better since then. Shall we sit down in the Park a little?" he continued, rather anxious to change a subject which might lead him into fresh difficulties. They were about to do so when Stassart suddenly found himself face to face with his own personality, in which the identity of Stanton Kingsford was unwillingly concealed. But to explain this most unfortunate contretemps I must ask you to return to the little cottage on the Thames where we first met Arlon Stassart.

Queen Victoria as a Trooper.

The First Guard Dragoon Regiment, of which her Majesty has become chief, is not only one of the most distinguished cavalry regiments in the German army, but in military history it will live as one of the participators in those episodes which occurred at critical moments in the great battle of Vionville Mars la-Tour on the 16th of Agust, 1870, when there depended for the moment on a mere handful of horsemen the fate of some thousands of their comrades. Twice during the battle did the German cavalry in order to avert the impending catastrophe, ride to certain destruction; and on one of these occasions it was the First Guard Dragoons that single-handed, first arrested the almost triumphal onward march of the enemy and thus helped to beat back the well-nigh overwelming tide of advance. The formation of the regiment dates from the 21st of February, 1815, on which day King William Frederick the Third issued an order to the following effect: "I have determined to raise three new guard cavalry regiments in place of the existing light cavalry regiment, and to form them from the three national cavalry regiments which have fought with the army during the war, in order, not only to give to the provinces to which the regiments belong and to which they owe their origin a fresh proof of my kindly feelings toward them, and which they deserve, but also to testify my satisfaction with the spirit shown by the Light Guard Cavalry Regiment during the war." The three regiments thus formed became the Guard Lancers, the Guard Dragoons and the Guard Hussars. The Dragoons were composed of the Guard Dragoon Squadron, two squadrons of the Pomeranian National Cavalry Regiment, and a squadron from the Queen's Dragoon Regiment. The men and horses from the national regiments were selected with special care. Those men who had obtained, during the war, the decoration of the Iron Cross were first chosen, and then preference was given to any who had served during the war.

Rough on the Attorneys.

A little 9 year-old colored boy was called upon as a witness in a Western court and was objected to by one of the lawyers. The Judge said to him:

"Do you understand the nature of an oath?"

"No, sah."

"Do you attend Sunday school and church?"

"Yes, sah."

"What would become of you if you should tell a lie?"

"Dey would get me."

"Who would get you?"

"De lawyers would."

As the audience saw the point that "de lawyers" were the head men in the undesirable locality where all liars go, the laugh was upon the lawyers and the boy was allowed to testify.

Is Jay Gould a Moral Man?

Eli Perkins tells this story on Jay Gould: A Saratoga clergyman, in making parochial calls on the guests of the United States Hotel, asked Giovanni Morosini, Gould's old Italian partner, if Gould was a moral man.

"Does Mr. Gould keep the Sabbath?" asked the clergyman.

"Gould keep ee the Sab-bath?" repeated Morosini, with an Italian shrug. "Gould keep ee the Sab-bath? Why, Gould he keep ee anything he lays his hands on. You try 'im!"

A School of Whales.

The New York Sun says that passengers on the steamship Algiers, from Galveston, Tex., were treated on Sunday afternoon to a nautical spectacle not usually observed by coast skirting travellers. About fifty miles off Hatteras the ship took them through a big school of frolicsome sperm whales, which sent 100 fountains in the air just before the rush of the ship drove them below the surface.

AN UNCANNY EAST INDIAN GAOL.

A Curious Ghost Story.

Many gruesome associations are attached to the corner of Alipore Gaol where are situated the scaffold and the dead-house, the roof of the latter forming the platform of the former. On the gallows, three culprits can be hanged at a time. When the bodies have been suspended for the prescribed period, they are lowered on to the mortuary table beneath, and after the inquest, if claimed by relatives, are passed outside the prison walls through an iron door on a level with the table. Those who know something of the natives of India will not be surprised to learn that no warders can be got to parrol at this spot at night time; double guards have to be placed on duty here after dark. What increases the difficulty in this matter is the fact well-known throughout the gaol that the place possesses its ghost story. Here is the tale as it was narrated to a correspondent of the "Times:"—Saheb Dan Dhobey was of proved courage and magnificent physique, who was brought from Jessore to Alipore to take the place of head warder. It was his duty to visit the patrols between the surrounding walls every night between the hours of 12 and 2. On one occasion, after he had been only a few days in the goal, he set out on his rounds as usual, but some time after 2 a.m. it was found that he had not returned. Time wore on, and at last mere wondering why he was so late gave place to anxiety and a search party was organized. They carried torches, and at last came upon the insensible form of Saheb Dan Dhobey. He was lying prostrate on the ground, close to the hospital gate, which is situated about 150 yards distant from the gallows. The unfortunate man was carried to the official's quarters, and there, after a time, by the application of water and other restoratives he was brought round. The following was the story he had to tell:—He had been going his rounds, and had stooped down to adjust one of his shoes, when he

A PRISON OFFICIAL

FELT SOMEONE SPRING UPON HIM

from behind and commence belabouring him between his shoulders. The concussion forced him on to his hands and knees, and he at first thought that it was a prisoner trying to escape. Not very much alarmed, for he had confidence in his great physical prowess, he tried to grasp his assailant by putting one arm behind his back, but he could feel nothing; yet the blows continued to rain down upon him, and he felt himself pressed down to the earth by a great weight. At last a voice addressed him, "You dare come here, do you, to defile by your presence the territories of Govind Brahmin?" And with that the man felt himself lifted bodily up, and then dashed face forwards on to the ground. He remembered no more till he awoke to consciousness in the guard-room. When Saheb Dan Dhobey had finished this strange story, the aged head-warder, who was about to retire, came up and put the question: "What is this that is being said about Govind Brahmin?" This led to explanations, and the old warder told how a noted "budmash" of that name, who had committed several cold-blooded murders, had been hanged in Alipore gaol 26 years before. "But," pointed out one of the auditors, "Saheb Dan Dhobey was attacked a good distance from the gallows. We found him close to the Hospital gate." "Ah!" replied the old man impressively, "the scaffold in these days stood on the very spot where you found the prostrate body of Saheb Dan Dhobey." The latter to this tale; then he threw himself back on the couch on which he lay. "My hour has come," he said. "It must have been the spirit of Govind Brahmin that attacked and beat me. My heart is broken. It is certain I must die." And die he did in two days' time. Such is the ghost story of Alipore Gaol, and it is needless to say that it is devoutly believed in by every prisoner and warder in the place. The actual facts do not differ materially from those set forth in the story. However, a post-mortem examination showed that Saheb Dan Dhobey had died of cerebro spinal-meningitis, a disease that may strike down the strongest man in a moment. It is not unfrequently met with in prisons, barracks, emigrant vessels, and other places where men are crowded together, often under depressing circumstances. The beating on the shoulders complained of by the unfortunate head-warder can also be explained, for since his tragic death a prisoner had died in Alipore Gaol of the same disease, and he complained of a precisely similar sensation. Therefore, the ghost story of Alipore prison is not one the members of the Psychical Society at home need bother their heads about.

LISTENED WITH BLANCHED FACE

Daring Bank Robbery in South Africa.

A bank robbery equalling in audacity the Kimberley Park robbery of a few months ago was recently committed at Krugerslorp, South Africa. Two men, named John Lewis McEwan and Richard Turpin, entered the the Standard Bank, and, presenting their revolvers at Mr. Stewart, the manager, demanded the keys of the safe. They then bound and gagged him, as well as the assistant, and made off with £4,000 in gold and notes. They had 10 minutes' start of the police, but were pursued on horseback and overtaken in less than an hour. The robbers, finding themselves hard pressed, dismounted, and fired at their pursuers, but none of their shots took effect. Mr Ewan was then wounded by a shot from the sergeant of police, and immediately afterwards Turpin threw up his hands and surrendered. They were than secured and taken back, and the whole of the stolen money was recovered

It is almost certain that the majority of moderate Republicans in the French Chamber will be so great that Mr. Clemenceau will not be able to form any infamous coalition with the enemies of the Republic. This situation of things will assure the stability of the Government and shatter the hopes of all pretenders whether royalist, Inperialist or anarchist.

FOREIGN NEWS

The "Pekin Gazette" asserts that nineteen hundred of its editors have been beheaded. The journal in question claims to have been in existence for a thousand years.

The attempt to popularize George Eliot's works in France has failed, her novels remaining on the publisher's hands. M. Zola explains this failure by saying that George Eliot's philosophy is too sad and dull for the Latin races.

The Spanish bull fighters, having conquered high society in Paris, have been received latterly in the same circle in Madrid in evening dress. Formerly they were obliged to wear their war paint. Next year they will be seen in London.

The first returns received in Paris after the recent election were from Cochin China. This was due to the clocks in Cochin China being seven hours in advance of Paris time, so that the telegraph was able to transmit the news before even the Paris results were known.

Of late the relation between the Emperor William and Prince Bismarck have not been very cordial, in consequence of the Chancellor having remonstrated very earnestly with his Majesty against his dangercus habit of reckless talking on important and delicate matters.

We are informed by an English journalist that in Paraguay, "the lady of the house, as she comes, clothed in soft raiment and flashing gems, to meet the stranger traveller with mouth upheld for the formal kiss of greeting, removes from her cheek the quid she spends her days in chewing."

The Transvaal remains in the exclusive political possession of the Boers, to whom it was handed over in 1881, but the dominant class are already outnumbered by the new settlers who have thronged, chiefly within the last two or three years, to the districts —or rather to a few of them—in which gold has been found. The growth of these young gold producing communities has been so rapid as to leave behind even the amazing records of American or Australian progress.

On the Archives of the Nurnberg Railway at Farth, which was the first line constructed in Germany, a protest against railroads has been found, drawn up by the Royal College of Bavarian Doctors. In it occurs the following passage; "Travel in carriages drawn by a locomotive ought to be forbidden in the interest of public health. The rapid movement cannot fail to produce among the passengers the mental affection known as "delirium furiosum." Even if travellers are willing to incur this risk, the Government should at least protect the public. A single glance at a locomotive passing rapidly is sufficient to cause cerebral derangement; consequently it is absolutely necessary to build a fence ten feet in height on each side of the railway."

A trial of an exceptionally romantic character will come before the Court of Ragusa in October. Twenty years ago a peasant emigrated to the United States, leaving his wife in charge of the village priest. Getting work there, he was able to send the priest 50 florins a month for his wife; but the former, being a scamp, gave 5 florins a month only to the woman. This went on for fifteen years, when the priest, wishing to retire, forged the death certificates of both husband and wife, and, handing them over, betook himself to Corfu to spend the remainder of his days in peace. The woman was forced to get her living by begging and her husband remarried in America. After twenty years' absence he resolved to make a tour in Europe with his family. He finally visited Ragusa. On landing at that harbor a beggar woman asked him for alms. They recognized each other simultaneously. The beggar woman was his wife. The priest has been arrested, and will be tried, and in all probability the second marriage will be annulled.

A specimen of the seed "Ekumkni Rudrakshi," which to be in a sale of State jewelry in Calcutta, is thus described in a local paper: "The most remarkable item in the sale is lot No. 209, which is a wonderful seed called 'Ekumkni Rudrakshi,' regarded with veneration by the followers of Shiva, and of such uncommon rarity as to be practically unobtainable. Most marvellous stories in regard to the origin of this seed are current. It is said to be produced in Nepaul, and, according to the laws there, if any one except a priest is found in possession of the seed he will be beheaded. The tree on which this seed is said to grow is the only one in the territory of Nepaul, and is guarded by soldiery, whose heads pay the penalty of the slightest indiscretion. It is said that many years elapse before any seed of the kind is produced by this tree, and out of a million of the seeds produced it is very rarely that three of the genuine ones, recognized as sacred, are found. The one on sale is said to be a genuine one, and we understand that a Hindoo gentleman has made an offer of a lakh of rupees if Messrs. Hamilton & Co. would certify it to be genuine. We learn that Messrs. Hamilton & Co. would not take upon themselves the responsibility of guaranteeing the genuineness of this marvellous seed, as it has been intrusted to them for sale. All that they can say is that the seed has been sent as genuine.

Poor girl, poor girl, so young, so fair,
And doomed to die so soon:
The seeds of death are scattered there,
And long before life's noon
The grass will grow upon her grave:
So friends in sorrow say,
And think no power on earth can save
The dear one from decay.

Why do they think and talk like this? Simply because some of her family have died from scrofulous poisoning of the blood, and they see indications of the same taint in her. Scrofula of the Lungs, commonly called Consumption, is a terrible disease, and it is not to be wondered at that they dread it. But it can be conquered. The poison can be driven out of the blood. The taint can be eliminated from the system. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has cured thousands of persons who were expected to find early graves because "there was scrofula in the family." "Golden Medical Discovery" is warranted to remove all blood-taints from whatever cause arising. It cures all scrofulous, skin and scalp diseases, or money paid for it will be returned.

THE LONG LOOKED FOR REVIVAL
"TRUTH" BIBLE COMPETITION.
NO. 19.

The Rewards to be Distributed Through the Whole Competition in Fifteen Divisions, instead of Three, as Heretofore.

A BETTER OPPORTUNITY THAN EVER OFFERED TO SECURE A PRIZE, NO MATTER WHEN YOUR ANSWERS ARE SENT.

At the urgent request of thousands of the friends of TRUTH, one more competition is now offered—the crowning one of the whole series. The distribution has been so arranged that if your answers are correct, no matter at what time, between now and 31st December, next, inclusive, you send in, you will be in a better position than ever before to secure one of these rewards, although the best prizes, as will be seen, go to those whose answers are received first.

Be prompt! don't delay! For everybody sending in cannot get a prize The profit comes from those who don't get rewards. These competitions could not be continued if every one competing secured a piano. We give our readers credit for understanding this, and also this pointer, that it is best always to be as early as possible in sending in your answers. Be sure they are right, for no corrections can be made after your answers are mailed—unless you send the correct answers and another dollar and have your subscription extended or the paper sent to some friend. From among this great list (as there are so many prizes), you can hardly fail to get something good, IF YOU SEND IN QUICKLY. All these rewards will be given away, you can absolutely depend on this. TRUTH cannot afford now to risk the excellent reputation it has obtained by the uniform fairness with which these competitions have been conducted. Over 50,000 delighted prize winners have sent us voluntary testimonials as to the value of their rewards.

WITNESSES:

Noel Marshall, manager Smith Coal Co., Queen St. West, opposite Shaftesbury Hall, Toronto has been in possession of the House and Lot in Toronto over a year now, which was won by him in one of TRUTH Bible Competitions.

Isaac McNaughton, Eureka, Picton County, N. S., acknowledges a fine Quadruple Silver Plate Tea Service

Miss O'Reilly, daughter of Judge O'Reilly, James Street South, Hamilton, delightedly acknowledges the receipt of an Upright Piano. "It is an excellent instrument," she says.

And over 50,000 others from parts of the compass. Sorry we haven't space give them all.

These rewards will be divided as nearly as possible into Fifteen equal portions instead of three, as formerly, thus covering nearly the entire term of the Competition from first to last, giving all, whether late or early, as well as can be arranged an equal opportunity of getting a reward, if their answers are correct.

The Questions are, where in the Bible are the following words first found; 1, FISH; 2, FLESH; 3. FOWL.

One dollar must be sent for four months' subscription to TRUTH, with your answers. The three answers must be correct to secure any prize. Three dollars is the regular price for a year's subscription, you are therefore charged nothing extra for the privilege of competing. We retain the right to return the money and deny any one the privilege of competing. TRUTH contains, every week, 32 page of choice, interesting reading for the home circle, and is well worth the amount charged, irrespective of any prize. Lively, pithy, pointed Editorial Paragraphs on current events, political and otherwise, from an untiased standpoint for father's reading; Contributor's Page, for all thoughtful readers; Tested Domestic Receipts, and Medical Health Notes for mother; Latest Fashions, artistically illustrated, for the young ladies; Choice Music, and Young Folks' Page, for girls and boys; Copyrighted Stories and Serial Tales for all the family, as well as many other attractions. Full lists of the Prize Winners will be published in TRUTH immediately at the close of the competition, with street and number in cities, where given, and post-office addresses for town, village and country, so all may be assured of the utmost fairness If any one competing is particularly desirous of not having their names published among the prize winners, they have only to say so when sending in their money and answers, although it is preferred that every name should appear.

The distribution of the prizes will be in the hands of disinterested parties, and the prizes given strictly in the order the letters arrive in TRUTH office. Twelve days after 31st December will be allowed for letters from distant points. About 150,000 persons have received rewards in previous competitions. FALL AND WINTER, 1889-90

HOCKIN & POOL, DUTTON.

Our Fall and Winter Announcement contains matters of vital interest to you. It is intensely interesting and bristling with profitable suggestions. It contains a large amount of valuable information for the home and the guidance of the careful buyer. READ IT WELL.

Our recognized system of fair dealing has done wonders in the upbuilding of our extensive business—at no time in our history has the volume of trade been so large or so satisfactory. This, in the face of the low prices of cereals, is ample evidence that the people appreciate our magnificent variety and low prices. We believe that the purchasing public has an intense interest in getting the fullest information as to where they get the best value for their money—that is why we advertise. The merchant of to-day's success depends upon a large volume of trade and small margins—the old-time profits don't go in these days of keen competition—and we fully understand the position Our aim was, and is, to give our patrons better value than they can get elsewhere and we do it. We say this with becoming modesty and a due sense of the importance of the statement.

For this season we have increased our efforts to secure the most desirable, substantial and fashionable fabrics for our customers' requirements and we have been successful. Our long-established reputation for keeping a magnificent variety is fully sustained, and we are in a better position than ever to please and satisfy you.

PLEASE READ.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1889.

Aldborough Council.

Council met at Rodney on Monday, Oct. 14, all the members being present. Reeve J. J. Stalker presided.

After reading and confirming the minutes of previous meeting, councillors McGregor and McDougall made the following report.

Your committee appointed to examine bridge on the McCowan Creek (on road allowance between cons. 1 & 2, McDougall's ward) report that we find timbers in bridge decayed and not in condition of safety as it is nearly 100 feet long; and as timber is getting valuable, it would cost too much money we would recommend that a three feet iron pipe be put in bed of creek and the gully be filled with earth. The cost may be a trifle more than bridge, but the work will be permanent and safe.

Moved by McGregor, seconded by McDougall, that the report be adopted—Carried.

Moved by Dymock, seconded by Lusty, that J. J. Stalker, D. McGregor and H. F. Jell be a committe to consult J. M. Glenn in the dispute with Dutton H. S. Board and to obtain his advice as to the best course to pursue for the settlement of the dispute, and with said solicitor to consult the reptesentatives of Dutton H.S. Board with view to settlement of difficulty.

Moved by McGregor, seconded by Dymock, that McGregor carry the Wilton drain to proper outlet and that costs be assessed against the parties liable for original construction.

Moved bp McDougall, seconded by McGregor, that the council make a grant of $50 for cutting hill ahd grading road opposite lot 8, con. 14, and that N. S. Lusty be commissioners, & c.

The engineer is to be called re ditch commencing on s½ 5, con, 6. Engineer to prepare a plan of the village of Rodney.

The reeve was empowered to sign agreement respecting the drain applied for by M. Brown and J. C. Schleioauf.

By-law 525 to close the present road at Wardsville bridge and to open up the new road was read and passed.

A report was read from Bell & Campbell re cleaning out Johnson drain. Resolution passed and the work ordered to be let by the engineer.

During the day the following accounts were paid:—

W. C. Grout, inspector, $3.10; Thos. Erskin, $26 80; H. F. Jell, services, &c. $48.60; J. Wilton, culvert, $2.25; F. C. Newland. tile grant, $100.00; Mercury, printing &c., $11.40; F. M. Marshall, work, $5.00;

Council adjourned till Thursday, Nov. 14.

A Word to Farm Buttermakers.

For many years the writer exchanged goods for butter. Butter was bought at a price still lower as "store packed" when it had come from the farm. The commission men of Chicago continually answered, "Get down on the price for your quality of butter. Good dairy is selling freely at 16c. to 17., while the returns for store packed that had been purchased from farmers sold at 10 and 12 cents. Being anxious to know wherein lay the fault, the writer requested a lady, who was a good house-keeper, to make a tub of butter, informing her of his intention to take it to Chicago for inspection. In a few days the tub of butter was delivered at the store and taken in exchange for goods. The buyer tested the butter and complimented the good old lady on the fine flavor. The venerable lady, who had made butter for fifty years, and had placed it before men at "barn-raisins," "bees" and "huskins," and before ladies at quiltings, and had sent rolls time and again to the preacher, and had taken prizes at the county fairs back in the '60's,' thought if they did not call that good butter in Chicago, they must be mighty particular. The butter, precisely as it had come from the hands of a woman who had churned, salted and worked butter for half a century, was expressed to Earl Bros. for cold storage and to be held for the writer's appearance at the inspection. The day following the sending of the butter the writer appeared at the commission house, and asked a report to be made on the tub of butter. The "butter man" of the commission house led the way to the basement and brought forth the identical tub from the cold storage room. His careful inspection was invited. The trier was run into the butter and withdrawn. He tasted it near the top and frowned; he took a bite from the centre and ground the salt between his teeth; he tasted from the bottom and spat it out. He then placed the trier under his nose, and moving it to the right and left, smilingly exclaimed: "Coarse, undissolved salt, fit only for stock, cream kept too long, bitter before churning, butter worked too much, making the grain thereby become lardy." Telling him that I had travelled 280 miles, and wanted the whole story, he continued: "Cream kept in an open pan, probably in a buttery off the kitchen. considerable dust settled on the cream from sweeping the floor, a "biled" dinner of potatoes, cabbage, rutabagas, and some fried onions, had been served, and the cream, being a sensitive absorbent, had received the floating aroma of the cooking vegetables."

He hesitated, I demanded that having travelled 280 miles, 30 miles by stage, the exigencies of the case required that a story should not be spoiled for relations sake, and to tell it all. He resumed: "The good woman has had a large washing, stirring them up occasionally with a stick, and letting the steam fill the room, and hang over the pans like a gathering storm cloud. The cream received its full share of the steam is traceable in the bottom of the tub." He again hesitated. I insisted that the long journey travelled demanded the whole story, without any fear or favor. He continued: "Some of the boys had a sprained ankle, or the "old mare" a galled breast, and having steeped some smart weed, and applied it to the afflicted parts, the cream got a full share. Traceable near the top. Undoubtedly a child has been visiting its venerable grandmother, and being sick with "wind on the stomach" a trace of catnip is discernable in the centre of the tub, while the whole tub of butter has evidence of tobacco having been smoked morning noon and night."

Drawing a fresh trier full, he continued: "The milking of the cows has not been attended to with the cleanliness that is important for pure cream and good butter. The cows have roamed at will, and partaken of every grass and herb and weed that their taste desired. They have drank water from a pond where cattle have stood to keep flies off their legs, and swine grunt as companions in the wallow."

He then remarked: "To have good flavored dairy, the farmer must have thrifty cows, personal cleanliness in milking, keep the cream away from all vapors of steaming clothes, away from boiled dinners, free from smoke of tobacco; give the cows good clean food, clean places to lie down in at night, good and pure water. Feed the slops, decayed cabbage, and potato peelings to the swine. Treat the cows giving milk as you would visitors, and then the dairy will pay better."

Subsequent inquiries found the cream kept as suggested; tobacco smoke floating through the room, morning, noon and night; that a sprained ankle had been healed by smart weed, and the only water was the pond in which the cattle stood and swine wallowed. Life was too short for the writer to introduce so radical a reform alone.

The fair season of 1889 has closed. It is proposed, next season, to amend the prize list. It is proposed to abolish the prizes for the best boar, the best cow, the best ram, and the best turnip, and make out a list which will read something like this:

	1st.	2nd.
Highest balloon	$100	$50
Biggest snake	10	5
Best trained dog	10	5
Most reckless trapeze man	10	5
Longest hair on cowboy	10	5
Loudest-mouthed fakir	10	5
Highest female kicker	25	10

etc., etc., etc.—St. Thomas Times.

The liking for celery is an acquired one, like that for tomatoes. But no plant grown is more healthful, and it should be more generally on farmers' tables during fall and winter. It costs a good deal to buy celery, as it requires extra rich ground and a good deal of labour to grow it fit for market. When the conditions are right the market gardener finds celery one of his most reliable and most profitable crops. If farmers more generally grew celery, what they did not need for their own use could be most profitably sold.

It is a good sign for a horse to carry one ear forward and the other backward when on a journey, because this stretching of the ears in contrary directions shows that he is attentive to everything that is taking place around him, and while he is so doing he cannot be much fatigued or likely soon to become so. Few horses sleep without pointing their ears as above that they may receive notice of the approach of objects in every direction. "When horses or mules," says Dr. Arnott, "march in company at night, those in the front direct their ears forward, those in the rear direct them backward, and those in the centre turn them laterally or across, the whole troop seeming thus to be actuated by one feeling which watches the general safety.

ATTACKED THREE TIMES.

"HAVING been attacked for the third time with Inflammatory Rheumatism, which kept me in bed six weeks under medical care, without relief, I resolved to try Burdock Blood Bitters, and before I had finished the third bottle I was able to work again."

LIFE WAS A BURDEN.

UNTIL lately I suffered from headache, always preceded by constipation, making my life a burden. A friend advised Burdock Blood Bitters. I took three bottles, and now feel myself a new man, and my headaches are things of the past.

Wilson's Wild Cherry has been prepared by Archdale Wilson & Co., Wholesale Druggists, of Hamilton, for nearly twenty years, for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Croup, etc. It has no equal. Take no substitute but get the genuine with white wrappers. Sold by R. A. Kirkland.

Not a favorite dish—Parishioner (to old clergyman with a bundle of old sermons) —"What ye got there, Dominie?" O.C.— "Preserved tongue."

THE OLD RELIABLE.

In these days of humbug it is a relief to hear of something that can be depended upon. Wilson's Wild Cherry has been tested as a remedy for the cure of all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs, for nearly twenty years, with such success as to earn for itself the title of The Old Reliable cure for Coughs, Colds, Croup, Asthma, Bronchitis and other affections of the respiratory system. See that you get the genuine, in white wrappers. Sold by R. A. Kirkland.

ALMOST DRIVEN INSANE.

"I HAD such distress in my stomach and head that I thought I would lose my reason, but on trying Burdock Blood Bitters I derived great benefit. I have used three bottles and am now as well as I ever was in my life. Thanks to your medicine." MISS LIZZIE DOUGLAS, Rednerville, Ont.

"Like Magic,"

THE effect produced by Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Colds, Coughs, Croup, and Sore Throat are, in most cases, immediately relieved by the use of this wonderful remedy. It strengthens the vocal organs, allays irritation, and prevents the inroads of Consumption; in every stage of that dread disease, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral relieves coughing and induces refreshing rest.

"I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children have been subject."—Capt. U. Carley, Brooklyn, N. Y.

"From an experience of over thirty years in the sale of proprietary medicines, I feel justified in recommending Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. One of the best recommendations of the Pectoral is the enduring quality of its popularity, it being more salable now than it was twenty-five years ago, when its great success was considered marvelous."—R. S. Drake, M. D., Beliot, Kans.

"My little sister, four years of age, was so ill from bronchitis that we had almost given up hope of her recovery. Our family physician, a skilful man and of large experience, pronounced it useless to give her any more medicine; saying that he had done all it was possible to do, and we must prepare for the worst. As a last resort, we determined to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and I can truly say, with the most happy results. After taking a few doses she seemed to breathe easier, and, within a week, was out of danger. We continued giving the Pectoral until satisfied she was entirely well. This has given me unbounded faith in the preparation, and I recommend it confidently to my customers."—C. O. Lepper, Druggist, Fort Wayne, Ind.

WINTER AMUSEMENTS.

The value of having a number of places for healthful and moral exercise, entertainment and amusement for young and old in town during the winter months cannot be overestimated. They are a great benefit to the place—if properly conducted—morally and financially, giving it a reputation for life and enterprise, which all will admit Dutton did not have last winter, and keeping the young off the streets, out of bad places and better fitting them for the duties of life. We already have our literary societies, church entertainments, band concerts, etc., and they are all right in their places, though all could stand improvement, but something besides is required more in accord with our rapid growth.

There is ample room and plenty of talent in Dutton for a first-class amateur dramatic company, one which could present moral, elevating and instructive plays before our citizens, the proceeds of such entertainments, after necessary expenses were paid, being given to the poor or some other worthy object. The same remarks might apply to many other entertainments.

Then again we require a good public library and reading-room, where at a small cost all might have easy access to the choicest reading, besides giving a place to spend an odd hour in the evening. The Mechanics Institute offers the best method of securing this within our reach, it only requiring a small annual outlay by the members, the Local Legislature materially assisting in its maintenance by liberal grants in proportion to the membership. We know of a reading room of this kind where the whole of the expenses for rent, light and fuel, papers, magazines and attendance was paid wholly by the government grant, assisted by a few concerts, gotten up for that purpose. Why should we not be able to do the same?

There is also a lack of means for physical exercise during the winter months which ought to be supplied. A good gymnasium would fill the bill completely. The cost of equipment would be slight, as many of the necessary articles could be made at home, and such an institution would be of inestimable benefit to both young and old, the exercise imparting health and vigor of body and mind. It should not, however, be for the men and boys alone, but for the gentler sex as well.

Dutton is sadly behind the age in not having such institutions and the only way of redeeming her reputation is to start in at once and provide them. Our citizens are proverbialy slow to take hold of anything new, but when they do they are determined to carry it to a successful issue despite all obstacles. All that is necessary is a start. Who will give it?

There can easily be an interminable discussion as to whether farmers can or cannot afford to buy all the new and expensive implements that are now offered. It costs enormously more than it used to to stock a farm with tools. But without them the farmer is at a terrible disadvantage. The true policy doubtless is to take such care of our expensive machinery that it will pay its way before it wears or rusts out. This the half-civilized purchaser can never nor will do. It is this liabilitity of reapers and harvesters to break and wear out quickly under improper care that more even than their first cost limits their use to the skilful and careful.

Dr. Talmage is asking aid for the rebuilding of his tabernacle, lately destroyed by fire, from all persons, the world over, who have read his sermons, although the building was well insured and his congregation numbers amongst its members some of the wealthiest people of New York and Brooklyn. This is carrying church begging a trifle too far. People generally have enough to do to build churches in their own towns without sending money to assist outsiders who are well able to provide for themselves.

Fast time on railroads has always brought to the nervous or imaginative passengers a certain dread of the consequence should the train fly the track, and a wonderful experience of some travellers in New Jersey last week will be remembered hereafter by patrons of fast roads with a shudder of dread. Running at sixty miles an hour an express train on Pennsylvania road, when near Rahway, jumped the track, and ran nearly a thousand feet on the ties, finally bringing up in all sorts of shapes on a wrecked roadbed. Yet, wonderful to relate, not a passenger was injured, save two ladies who were cut by broken window glass. There were about two hundred passengers on the train.

At a session of the county judge's criminal court Thursday morning Frank Gardner, who pleaded guilty to robbing the stores of J. O. Lumley, of Iona; Crosby & Risk, of Highgate, and J. C. Macdonald, of Duart, was brought up for sentence. Gardner said he had been led into the commission of the crimes by others, and asked for a chance in order that he might do better in future. He had worked hard until a few years ago, when he was taken ill and being unable to work had taken to stealing for a livelihood. The judge stated that his antecedents did not bear out his story, as he was known as a confirmed thief in several cities. He sentenced Gardner to 23 months in Central Prison on each charge, the sentences to run concurrently. The sentence was made lighter than it would otherwise have been, owing to the accused having pleaded guilty and acted during the months he had been in jail as if he was repentant.

The wildest excitement exists on Pelee Island, over 100 cases of small-pox having developed there within the past four days. The island has about 1,000 population. All avenues of escape from the place have been closed by the American and Canadian authorities. Every one of the entire group of Lake Erie islands, including Put-in-Bay, North Bass, Middle Bass, Kelly's and others, have been quarantined against Pelee, and the Canadian authorities have quarantined the mainland against the island, which has thus become a vast isolated pest house. Mayor Hunt, of this city, telegraphed the State Board of Health to-day explaining the situation and asking what he should do. Vessels ply between Pelee and various lake ports on this shore, and it is feared some of them may bring the disease over to this side. It is expected that the State Board will order all ports along this shore of Lake Erie closed against Pelee.

A very pleasant event took place at the residence of Duncan Campbell on Friday night when our old friend and neighbor, in the presence of a representative audience, was presented with the following address :—

To Mr. Duncan Campbell, Dunwich :

We, a few of your old neighbors, would approach you on this the eve of your departure from our neighborhood. You have lived in our midst for a long number of years and we have always found you to be a quiet and obliging neighbor. We would now present you with this Bible and cane as a small token of our respect and esteem and best wishes for your welfare. We will all miss you and we feel sorry at you leaving this locality. We hope that peace and prosperity may accompany you, and that the God in whom you trust may be your God and guide through life.

After the presentation a sumptuous feast, prepared by the ladies, was partaken of. The evening was spent with music and recitations.

The Rebuilding of Jerusalem.

Jerusalem is growing in size and population at a remarkable rate,says an Israelite paper. Its growth is all the more surprising because neither its situation nor its trade is favorable to a rapid increase; it lies among a not very fertile group of mountains ; it has next to no commerce, and has no manufactures. Nevertheless, new buildihgs are rising daily, churches, gardens and institutions of various kinds are filling up the formerly desolate neighborhood to the distance of half an hour's walk beyond the old limits of the city. The Jews are to the front as builders. Their honses spring out of the ground as mushrooms, uniform, ugly, one-storied, plentifully supplied with windows, but with little or no adornment. The Rothchilds have completed a new hospital. Close beside it is a new Abyssinian church. The Russians are also great builders. They have erected a new church, consulate, lodging houses for the pilgrims of the orthodox national churches, and a hospital. Near to the Russian group stands the "German House" for German-Roman Catholics, from whose top the German and Papal flag float side by side. The Russians have also built a tower on the Mount of Olives, from whose summit the Mediterrian and Dead seas can both be seen. The Greeks and Armenians are also busy builders, but they provide for the bodily rather than the religious demands of the pilgrims. The former build caves and the latter build cafes and b zaars,and the latter set up shops.

A Newspaper "Fake" in China.

Some time ago the Tien Shih Chai, an illustrated newspaper which is published in Shanghai, contained a long article concerning "the manufacaure of soap and fertilizers from human bodies in Europe." The article was very minute. It described the whole process of manufacture in detail, from the decapitation and disembowelment of the bodies to the stamping of violets and roses on the finished soap cakes, and the packing of the fertilizer for shipment. Numerous illustrations calculated to raise Chinese hair and to curdle Chinese blood embellish the gruesome text. Just how the editors of the Tien Shih Chai discovered that their European correspondent had been libeling European civilization they refuse to say. That the discovery, when made, quite upset them, however, is evident from this very abject retraction in a recent copy of their publication:

"As we subsequently learned by investigation, the descriptions of European soap and manure factories formerly published by us are only the plans and inventions of scientific men which have never been put into practice, and, there fore, our accounts of these factories and our pictures were wholly false. In the future we will make every effort to keep all untruthful articles out of our columns. We make this announcement in order that through the foreign and Chinese press we may confess our mistake, which we hope has done no harm.

"Like Magic,"

THE effect produced by Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Colds, Coughs, Croup, and Sore Throat are, in most cases, immediately relieved by the use of this wonderful remedy. It strengthens the vocal organs, allays irritation, and prevents the inroads of Consumption: in every stage of that dread disease, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral relieves coughing and induces refreshing rest.

"I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children have been subject."—Capt. U. Carley, Brooklyn, N. Y.

"From an experience of over thirty years in the sale of proprietary medicines, I feel justified in recommending Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. One of the best recommendations of the Pectoral is the enduring quality of its popularity, it being more salable now than it was twenty-five years ago, when its great success was considered marvelous."—R. S. Drake, M. D., Beliot, Kans.

"My little sister, four years of age, was so ill from bronchitis that we had almost given up hope of her recovery. Our family physician, a skilful man and of large experience, pronounced it useless to give her any more medicine; saying that he had done all it was possible to do, and we must prepare for the worst. As a last resort, we determined to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and I can truly say, with the most happy results. After taking a few doses she seemed to breathe easier, and, within a week, was out of danger. We continued giving the Pectoral until satisfied she was entirely well. This has given me unbounded faith in the preparation, and I recommend it confidently to my customers."—C. O. Lepper, Druggist, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Executing Members of Secret Societies.

The Straits Times contains full particulars of the trial of a number of Chinese prisoners accused of being members of an active secret society in Sarawak. The special Court appointed for the purpose consisted of four European, four Malay, and four Chinese members. On the 12th August, the Supreme Court was convened by the Rajah for the purpose of passing sentence on the prisoners. His Highness opened the proceedings by giving a short account of the arrest of the prisoners and the motives which had led to their arrest, the state of the law of the country as regards Chinese secret societies, and the impartial method (mixed Commission) by which these prisoners have been tried. He gave the past history of secret society work in Sarawak, and expressed his intention, for the good of the country and its population, both Malay and Chinese, of stamping out any such illegal combination in his dominions—a combination which, from papers seized, was known to have as its end, when strong enough, who did not wear a "towchang." The prisoners were then called up; the decision of the "Court of Twelve" as regards their guilt were then interpreted to them, and, separately, each was asked if he had anything further to say. The answers were mostly to the effect that they knew nothing of the matter with which they were charged. The Rajah then pronounced the following sentences:—That six of the prisoners, having been found to be leaders of the society, should be shot at eight a. m. on the next day (13th). That 11 being active members and agents, should receive six dozen strokes with a rattan, have their heads shaved, be imprisoned during his Highness's pleasure, and be branded with the letters "S. S." on the hand, and that on release they should be banished for ever from Sarawak. That the remaining seven prisoners being members only, if they would swear in their temples to have no further dealings with the society, and would give up any documents in their possession relating to the society, should be released; if not, all or any one should be dealt with as the foregoing active agents.

THE MURDER OF ALL

THE SENTENCE OF EXECUTION

was carried out on the following day at eight a.m. on the usual execution ground. The firing party consisted of 20 Sarawak Rangers, and death was certified by the principal medical officer. The flogging was carried out partially by giving each man sentenced thereto three dozen within the precinct of the goal on the same day at 11 a. m. The remaining three dozen and the rest of the sentence were to be carried out when the health of the prisoners would allow. Commenting on the swift and sharp punishment meted out to the criminals, the "Straits Times" says:—"The Rajah of Sarawak knows from painful experience what evil Chinese secret societies can work. A generation ago they nearly put an end to the late Sir James Brooke's Government, and were only overcome after great bloodshed; and the law of Sarawak has made effective provision against any recurrence of the event by decreeing death against

ACTIVE AND LEADING MEMBERS

of these illegal organizations. When opportunity arose the enactment was enforced with a rigour which soon rendered these oath-bound associations things of the past. Lapse of years has since so worn away the impression made by these early executions that the Ghee Hin Society, so notorious in this colony, took steps to start branches in Rajah Brooke's dominions. The Rajah, on discovering what was brewing, lost not a moment in frustrating their plans. Secret society men know now what awaits them in Sarawak and if they choose to take the risk they deserve the penalty. Unsailed for agitation against the law which has preserved Sarawak from the evils so rampant here cannot fail to work mischief. In their own country these secret conspirators would have been dealt with in even a worse fashion.

British Capital in the United States.

The suspicions of the American public in connection with such transactions are natural, in these days of trusts; and the outgrowth of that suspicion finds expression in such declarations as this of the Chicago Tribune; "These bargains are pleasant for those who sell out, retire from business, and go to Europe with their families to enjoy themselves and spend the money, but they are not agreeable reading for those who believe that American manufactories like American lands should be controlled by Americans and not by aliens." Such an objection would have a good deal of foundation of there was any possibility that British capital could control the industries into which it is purchasing, so as to freeze out rival establishments, or exact exorbitant prices from consumers. But a study of the list of purchases reported to have been made will show that everyone of them is in a line of business which by nature is incapable of being monopolized. The people who have sold out cannot go to Europe and spend their money without finding good investments for their capital. If the British management should put up prices no better investment could be found than in putting up new mills, elevators and breweries. The investment of foreign capital in competitive enterprises affords no threat to this country. —[Pittsburgh Despatch.

How Celluloid is Made.

Most celluloid is made in France. A roll of paper is slowly unwound and at the same time is saturated with a mixture of five parts of sulphuric and two parts of nitric acid, which falls upon the paper in a fine spray. This changes the cellulous of the paper into pyroxyline, or gun cotton. The excess of acid having been expelled by pressure, the paper is washed with plenty of water till all traces of acid have been removed. It is then reduced to pulp and passes on to the bleaching trough. It is this gun cotton which gives its explosive nature. Most of the water having been got rid of by means of a strainer, it is mixed with from 20 to 40 per cent. of its weight in camphor. A second mixing and grinding follows. The pulp is spread out in thin slabs, which are squeezed in the hydraulic press until they are as dry as chips. Then they are rolled in heated rollers and come out in elastic strips. They are from that point worked up into almost any conceivable form.—[Boston Commercial Bulletin.

THE RUSSIAN PEASANTRY.

Peculiar Superstitions.

The Russians were the last European race to be converted to Christianity. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that singular superstitions should still survive amongst the peasantry. Had newspapers been published in A.D. 1400 in London, they might have frequently chronicled similar events to those in the columns of Russian papers today. Not many years ago a Russian nobleman made a balloon ascent, and had the misfortune to come down somewhere in the Baltic provinces, where not even the picture of a balloon had penetrated. A wild panic ensued, in which the unlucky aeronaut was almost torn to pieces. If a similar descent could have been made into Yorkshire 400 years ago, the anachronistic aeronaut would have met with the same fate or have been regarded as a messenger announcing the Divine wrath and the final dissolution of things—a panic to which English people have been peculiarly liable. This superstitious

TERROR ABOUT BALLOONS,

however, is an amiable weakness when compared with others. Belief in witchcraft is still general in some districts. It was only a short time ago that the Russian newspapers related how a peasant had, with the approval of his acquaintances, murdered his aged aunt because he believed her to be a witch who had made him the victim of her evil spells. A still more horrible case of superstition was recently reported in a leading Russian journal. An old peasant woman, living near Sookoom, in Caucasus, was suspected of witchcraft. Beyond the infirmities of age, and perhaps of ill temper, the unhappy wretch was no doubt as innocent as the victims of our own "witch finders" used to be. Her son died, and immediately the rumour spread that she had slain him, with the assistance of the Evil One, whose co operation she had claimed. The neighbours sat in judgment over her, and decided that she should be submitted to "the ordeal by fire;" that is to say, she was to be burnt and tortured in the hope she would confess her supposed crime. The terror of the poor old creature deprived her of coherent speech. This was assumed to be

A PROOF OF HER GUILT.

She was seized, tied to the pole, and burnt to death. What gives a still more fiendish aspect to this carnival of cruelty is that her surviving son was amongst the most energetic of those who tortured his mother. It will take some generations of education and progress before the peasantry of the remote districts get rid of such bloodthirsty superstitions. As a race, they are generally amiable and affectionate, rarely quarrelling in their cups, as is too often the case in England; it is only when their supernatural terrors are aroused that they seek what they think is their own safety in malignant manifestations of fanatic ignorance. Examples such as those we have related are fortunately rare. Generally, their superstitions do not go beyond the ordinary phantasmagoria of bogeydom. In the Ukraine the people believe in every sort of supernatural being, from vampires to water sprites. Amongst the most gruesome of their superstitions is the ceremony performed in some remote places in a season of drought. The peasants lo up day after day to a cloudless sky whe the sun is blazing. The crops are beginning to droop, and the whole country side is aching for the cool rush of the long deferred rain. It is then that they take counsel together, and make a strange propitiatory offering to the powers that preside over the moisture held in suspension by the unseen clouds. Should extreme methods be deemed necessary, an old woman, without a rag to cover her, is harnessed at midnight to a plough, and driven through the village, whilst the male portion of the population are supposed to be sleeping. Her drivers are the village maidens attired, for this horrible ceremony, in their nightgowns. If any of the men, except the greybeards, should be tempted by profane curiosity to to look on this strange procession, a great misfortune will, they believe, befall the community. This strange performance is probably the relic of a midnight sacrifice to some heathen god. As is usually the case in such religious rites from the ranks of the weak and defenceless. The scapegoat plays a prominent part in most efforts of man to propitiate a pantheon of capricious deities. All is not black and ugly, however, for there is a romantic side to these degrading superstitions. Throughout Southern Russia the people tell endless stories of witches, wizards, fairies, wood sprites, and vampires. Every wood, stream, and tree has its spiritual and invisible denizens, who bring good luck or ill luck as the case may be, to the wayfarer. It is, too, strange how these obsolete superstitions crop up side by side with events that show the progress of liberal notions in the land of the Czar. Not long ago the inhabitants of Tomsk in Siberia, were surprised at the appearance of a female advocate in the district Court of that town. She came to plead in the interests of two men who were, as she proved to her Judges, undergoing a term of illegal imprisonment. The Court gave the lady an impartial hearing, and her clients were ordered to be set at liberty. To read of Portia and Sycorax as it were in parallel columns shows that the intellectual extent of Russia is, in a sense, as broad and diversified as its physical area.—[London Post.

TO BRING ON THE RAIN

THE VICTIM IS CHOSEN

Safety Railway Carriage.

A genius is at work on a new railway carriage which will not burn or telescope. It is all iron and steel. The roof, sides and ends of the car are made of steel boiler plates riveted together, and is nothing more or less than a big boiler. It is not quite round, however, being somewhat the shape of a horseshoe—the round part being the top. In the bottom, it is said, are several steel girders packed in cement, much the same as in the Pullman cars. Along the sides is an array of windows precisely similar to those of an ordinary passenger coach. The top of the car is destitute of the heavy roof and ventilating arrangement that is seen on ordinary cars. It is said that ventilation is to be secured by pumping air into the car through pipes. These pipes in winter will furnish warm air. There is also a system of ventilators around the windows.

WIT AND WISDOM.

They have 355 churches in Chicago. This shows what can be done in the matter of foreign missions, if it is gone about in the right way.

No wonder there are plenty of dentists. No sooner does the cable man let up on occurrences at Trichinopoli or Nikolaiev than a mining strike breaks out at Punxsutawney, Penn.

Cantwaite—"Say, do you remember that $5 bill I loaned you?" Owen Long—"Remember it, sir. I never forget a favor like that. You haven't got another one about you, have you?"

Mrs. Hinton (recently married)—Did you know my husband was very ill? Miss Carrington—I suppose he must be, my dear. Before he married you he told me I had broken his heart.

Now a days the youn men of the period dont't go down on their knees in nervous agong before their future wives. They hold a solitaire diamond ring above their heads and the girls jump for it.

Young manager—"You are making a great deal of talk about the legitimate drama. Now, I'd like to know what you mean by the legitimate anyway?" Old manager—"The legitimate drama, dear boy, is made up of those plays whose authors are dead and on which managers need pay no royalty."

The citizens of Taylorville, Neb., recently tarred and feathered old Jason Mitchell and then rode him on a rail. Instead of resenting this treatment, Jason seemed to enjoy it. This puzzled the boys very much until the old man sued twenty-five of them for $100 damages each, and got it. Then they began to see that Jason really had the most fun.

An Unfortunate Reminder—Mr. Franklin de Belleville—"I'm mighty glad cold weather is coming on for one thing. I won't have to work this lawn mower then." Mrs. de Belleville (pleasantly)—"No; you'll have nothing to bother you but the furnace." De Belleville (fiercely, after an interval of gloomy silence)—"Well, you're a cheerful companion for a man, I must say."

Curious Medical Opinions.

Milk, no matter how pure, is condemned by a prominent British physician as a "mischievous diet for adults," and if we were to credit some other medical men, is a dangerous medium frequently in use for conveying the germs of various contagious diseases. Beef, and flesh generally, are pronounced oracularly to be unfit for consumption by human beings. Even salt has its enthusiastic enemies, as is evidenced by the fact that an anti-salt hospital and anti-salt societies have been in recent times amongst the curiosities of modern propagandism. Scarcely anything which men eat, drink or do escapes strong condemnation in the name of medical science, and nervous people may well find living uncomfortable and dangerous if they pay heed to very much which the printing press gives currency to as new light in sanitary science or hygiene. Medical science is not fairly chargeable with the onslaughts made in its name against what the general judgment of mankind throughout the ages has approved of. Medical science is disposed not to pronounce sweeping judgments, but rather to seek to explain the facts of individual experience in matters coming within its proper sphere. The onslaughts referred to are often due to the fact that some medical men neither have, nor can have, the capacity for scientific investigation. They are not built that way. Their faulty methods of thought necessarily lead to faulty conclusions at variance with the lessons of every day experience. Very often a too exclusive following of a certain line of enquiry to the exclusion of premises which should have been taken into account, results in a very pronounced opinion being given to the public with the name sometimes of a fairly clever medical man attached to it. These are, however, but incidents in the grand onward march of medical science, and their parallels are found in all most every other science. It is difficult, however, to account for the medical utterance which was recently found in the archives of the Nuremburg railway at Furth, and which was drawn up by Bavarian doctors in 1835. The protest reads: "Travel in cars drawn by a locomotive ought to be forbid den in the interest of public health. The rapid movement cannot fail to produce among the passengers the mental affection knownas delirium furiosum. Even if travellers are failing to incur this risk the Government at least should protect the public. A single glance at a locomotive passing rapidly is sufficient to cause the same cerebral derangement; consequently it is absolutely necessary to build a fence ten feet in height on each side of the railway."

There must have been a good deal of rash movement here. The doctors were very far wrong, but that their fears of mischief to the nervous system resulting from railway travelling was not wholly unfounded, as shown by the complaints of queer nervous sensations made by some commercial travellers who have been long on the road. The exaggeration of the Bavarian doctors was not in degree much greater than that of some more recent pronouncements.

A Boy's Awful Death.

MONTREAL, Oct. 24.—A terrible accident took place the other morning about three o'clock in the Montreal rolling mills, near St. Cunegonde. The workmen in this establishment had been divided into gangs, one party working at night and the other during the day. One of the night workers named Alderich Prevost, aged 14, and living on Albert street, caught his arm in a large wheel which was revolving with almost lightning rapidity, and before the machinery could be stopped the poor lad was whirled round several times and thrown on the floor a mass of flesh and bones. In spite of the terrible wounds inflicted the boy lived twenty minutes, and did not draw his last breath until the Notre Dame hospital had been reached, four miles away. The coroner held an inquest and a verdict of accidental death was returned.

A Gastronomical Criticism.

"Here's a pointer for ye, Bill," said a tramp to one of his companions. "Don't never go to that house on the hill yonder."

"Why not?"

"'Cause whenever they've got pie they haven't any cheese, and when they've got cheese they haven't any pie. I wouldn't eat at any such place as that."

CHINESE SUPERSTITION.

Exorcising an Evil Spirit from a Boy.

Indian papers report a case of a most unusual nature which was investigated by the Calcutta Coroner, Dr. Blaney recently at the morgue. A Hindoo millhand named Ramji Deji, residing at Mazagon, had for some time past been unwell, suffering from pains in various parts of his body and swollen knee-joints, his ailments being so serious as to prevent him going to work. However, one day he, accompanied by his father, went to the Framjee Petit Mill, where the deceased was employed, for the purpose of receiving some pay due to him. The father and son then returned home, but went out again, and while the deceased" father was conversing with an acquaintance he missed his son and went home, thinking, in all probability, Ramji was going home slowly. On arrival at the chawl in which they resided it was found deceased had not returned, but he was shortly afterwards brought in on the back of a fellow-millhand in an almost unconscious state. The deceased was put in a sitting posture, being held by the father, when a man named Deo suggested that very likely the deceased was possessed of a devil, and, in order to expel the evil spirit, he swayed himself about in front of the sick man, and afterwards took hold of his hair and asked "the devil" twice who he was. Not receiving a reply, he struck deceased violently with a rattan, when the latter fell back in a dying condition; but before he died another man named Shriputty Mohiputty took the rattan and also hit the deceased, both of these men subsequently to and fro professing to be possessed with the spirit of a god. The flogging was intended to drive out the evil spirit. The deceased died without a complaint, and his body was removed to the morgue. Dr. Sydney Smith, surgeon to the Coroner, made a post-mortem examination of the body. The doctor said there were several bruises on the back apparently produced by flogging with a cane. There was a small abrasion on the right hip. From the post-mortem appearances he was of opinion that the cause of death was hemorrhage from rupture of the spleen, which rupture could have occurred without much violence being used. A fall might have ruptured it. The witness did not think that flogging would have ruptured the spleen. The jury returned a verdict "That the deceased died from hemorrhage from rupture of the spleen, but under what circumstances it was ruptured there was no evidence to show."

AFTER A SHORT INTERVAL

Wreck of a British Barque.

The Pacific Company's Royal mail steamer Aruba, which has arrived at Plymouth from Valparaiso, brought among her passengers nine of the survivors of the crew of the barque Georgina, of Swansea, Captain Watkins, which was wrecked on Wednesday, Sept. 18th on the English sandbank near Montevideo. She was from Newport with coals for Rosario, and in hazy weather ran on the bank under a press of sail on the afternoon of that day. The crew, 15 all told, were not rescued till noon on the following Saturday. For the first 24 hours after grounding, the wreck was being continually washed over by seas. The crew then took refuge in the rigging, where they were further exposed for 44 hours without food or water. From the mizzentop they had to climb to the maintop, and ultimately to the foretop. On Monday an apprentice boy was so prostrated, that in climbing from the mizzen to the maintop, he lost his hold, fell overboard, and was drowned. Ten thousand dollars were raised and offered as a reward for the rescue, which was accomplished on Saturday by a tug and two lifeboats. The shipwrecked seamen on landing were taken every care of and supplied with food and clothing, and £50 in money was divided between them.

An Indian Attempting Suicide From Revenge.

A correspondent of the Calcutta "Englishman" tells a curious story which he heard from a warder in the Alipore Gaol. Two prisoners were reeling jute yarn on neighboring benches. One of them had conceived a bitter hatred for the other, and was wont to declare that he would get him hanged for murder. At last, he said, the time had arrived, and reiterated his threat so often that the man became frightened, and making an excuse for leaving his bench quietly sought the European superintendent of the mill, and asked his advice. The latter listened to the story, and advancing to a window asked the man to point out his persecutor. He did so, and a moment afterwards they actually saw the fellow cut his throat from ear to ear, and throw the bloody knife over towards the bench a few minutes previously vacated by his companion. The alarm was given, and the injured man was carried to the infirmary, but not before he had mustered strength to indicate that the other man, who had been with the superintendent at the very moment of the deed, had tried to murder him. The would-be suicide eventually recovered. Another "good hater" among the prisoners once stabbed a fellow-convict dangerously in the breast, and was in consequence sentenced to five years' extra penal servitude. When the injured man was got out of the hospital he was transferred to a remote corner of the gaol. But, so intensified had become his assailant's hatred by reason of the additional punishment, that one day he managed to pass through several yards undetected, and was just going to spring at his enemy's throat when he was observed and overpowered.

A Degree Shop.

A royal road to learning has not yet been built, but nevertheless any person who happens to have $25 can provide himself with degree of A. M., and for $35 he can buy a nice serviceable LL D. Or he can have both the A. M. and LL. D. for $50. And no questions asked; that is to say none touching the talents and accomplishments of the buyer. All degrees furnished within fifteen minutes after application for them is made. It is a Chicago "University" which so handsomely meets this want of those who yearn for the badge of scholarship rather than for scholarship itself. It would be a graceful thing for the admirers of Mr. John L Sullivan to send on $35 to Chicago and make him an LL. D. And when John gets tired of it by way of showing that he bears no ill-will toward the man with whom he lately fought, he can hand it over to Kilrain.—[N. Y. Tribune.

The Death of the Mist.

High over the clouds a sunbeam shone,
While far down under him,
With a subtle charm that was all her own,
The Mist gleamed, fair and dim.

He looked on her with his burning eyes
And longed to fall at her feet;
Of all sweet things there under the skies
He thought her the thing most sweet.

He had wooed oft, as a Sunbeam may,
Wave and blossom and flower;
But never before had he felt the sway
Of a great love's sudden power.

Tall cloud mountains and vast space seas,
Wind and tempest and fire—
What are obstacles such as these
To a heart that is filled with desire?

The Mist grew pale with a vague, strange fright
As fond yet fiercer he came;
He was so strong and he was so bright,
And his breath was a breath of flame.

Boldly he trod over cloud and star,
Boldly he swam through space,
She caught the glow of his eyes afar
And veiled her delicate face.

Close to his heart she was clasped and kissed;
She swooned with love's alarms;
And dead lay the beautiful, pale-faced Mist
In the Sunbeam's passionate arms.

WHEELER WILCOX.

Salting Stock.

With some kinds of stock especially, too much salt will often prove very injurious; and when the salt is only given occasionally it will often occur that the animals, being very hungry for salt, will eat more than is best. On the other hand, as a rule, if a supply of salt is kept convenient, the stock will eat what they want, and no more. They are not likely to damage themselves, under ordinary conditions, if boxes are provided, and are kept filled, so that the stock can help themselves to what they want to eat. It is not the quantity they eat, in a given length of time, but rather the large quantity that they will eat at once, when they have been deprived of it that proves more or less injurious.

There is no class of stock kept upon the farm but they will be benefited by having access to a good supply of salt, and some arrangement should be made so that this can be done. During the season that stock are in the pasture, boxes or troughs may be placed in convenient places, where the stock can go and help themselves.

The advantage in using rock salt is that if placed in boxes or troughs without shelter there is but little if any waste, either by throwing out of the boxes or troughs in eating, or by being washed out by hard rains. A boy placed in the center of the hog-pen and kept supplied with salt and ashes, will aid materially in keeping the hog in good health and thrift. Sheep, cattle and horses need a supply all the time; and if it is placed where they can secure a supply readily, they will be found eating a small quantity every day.

As a rule, with the exception of hogs and poultry, the better plan is to give the salt by itself. With poultry, usually the better plan is to season the food.

Mr. Irving's views on the prospects of those who adopt the stage as a profession are not very encouraging for youthful aspirants. Of the total number of actors in England, estimated to be above 20,000, he expresses the conviction that quite half of them would be glad of an assured $1,000 a year.

One of the latest social innovations in England is the female butler, a parlor maid in livery. A good-looking girl in livery of dark blue, green and gold, or scarlet and white looks very smart, and the waiting is, as a rule, done more quietly and deftly than by a man. This opens out a new field of employment for women.

Naval authorities in England are panic-stricken by the collapse of both the 111-ton guns of the war ship Victoria while they were being proved. They cost $95,000 apiece, exclusive of $150 000 for carriages, mountings, and machinery necessary to work them, and throw a projectile weighing 1,800 pounds. This result has somewhat dampened the ardor of the advocates of big guns.

A London paper announces that a Worcestershire village, from the fact of its being called Broadway, first attracted the attention and then the visits of Americans and now there is quite an American season and a small artist colony, which is six miles from a railway station. The American artists have established a Broadway school at this spot, which, with its ivy and creeper-covered Worcestershire houses, is regarded by them as the most typical of English villages. The object of Mr. Alma-Tadema's special journey to this favorite resort was to paint some wild roses growing in a cottage garden.

The Curator of the Wiltshire Archæological Museum, England, grieves over the depredations committed at Stonehenge by the modern excursionist. "I do not want to see him kept out altogether," he says, "but I want a certain protection put over Stonehenge that such acts as sliding down the face of one of the fallen stones, cutting initials in the turf inside the circle, scratching and chalking initials on the stones, picnicking inside the circle, throwing broken (or otherwise) bottles about, with pieces of cucumber rind now and then, and any other kind of litter, will be prevented. All of the above acts of desecration I witnessed one day last week. It is idle to say that there is no appreciable difference in the condition of Stonehenge to what it was fifty years ago. It is in a far worse state than it was fifteen years ago, when I first went there."

The British commercial world has been deeply stirred by the assertion from numerous quarters that the Germans were crowding the English out as clerks and drummers, all over the world. The reason given is that the English shrink from selling by retail. The English men who go abroad are generally drawn from a class which hold retail trade in abhorrence, and carry their prejudices with them. If an Englishman cakes to selling retail he losse caste. As one critic puts it, "he is sailing rather close to the wind if he sells a single bale, but if he splits the bale and sells by the piece he is anathema; he cannot dine with the Consul or play tennis with the chaplain's daughters. The result is, he abstains from retail trade till wholesale trade abstains from him." The cry is for Britishers whose social influence will not prevent them from being retail dealers.

DEATH FOR LIBERTY.

A PRISON GRAVEYARD FILLED WITH CONVICTS WHO SOUGHT TO REGAIN THEIR FREEDOM.

How Some of the More Noted Insurrections Were Planned and Carried Out to Failure.

Situated behind a little hill a few hundred yards from the entrance to the penitentiary at San Quentin in the prison graveyard, a bleak, desolate acre of weather-beaten head boards and bare mounds. Two or three simple marble slabs show that even there there is an aristocracy.

The convict dead lie on the breast of a hillock, at the foot of which the waters of the bay beat the rocks. Though so near to the prison it is not in sight of it, and the spot is as lonesome as can be.

Most of the headboards bear simply the number borne in the prison by the occupant of the grave it marks, but the older boards show traces of what were once inscriptions. Some of these are still decipherable. One of the headboards has been split and only half of it remains:

ACIO

16,1861.

shot wound.

The letters were orignally in relief. The soft wood of the board was whittled away by the friends of the dead man during the time between their work in the jute-mill and the sounding of the "lights-out" bell.

THE LETTERS STOOD OUT CLEARLY

when the board was first raised; now they must be half-guessed to be understood. Rain and weather have worn the raised letters until the board is again smooth.

"That inscription used to read," said one of the prison guards, "'Damacio Berryessa, Jan. 16 1861 from the effects of a gunshot wound.' The number, 1,637, was his number in prison. You know who Berryessa was, don't you?"

"Who was he?"

"He was the leader of probably the most desperate break that was ever made in San Quentin. Berryessa was the predecessor of Joaquin Murietta and Vasquez and all that line of Mexican desperadoes. They got Berryessa somehow and sent him here for life, I think. He had always behaved pretty well until this date that's marked on the headboard. He got about half a hundred of characters like himself to join him in a break. At about 2 o'clock on that afternoon the gate was opened to admit a cart and Berryessa gave the signal. The Mexicans and Indians broke out, seizing Deputy Warden Pennie and Sheriff Kennard of Sutton county, who was there, and two guards, and rushed down the road toward San Rafael. They kept their captives between them and the guards, who stood on the wall ready to fire. Berryessa and another convict held Pennie between them. The leader of the mutiny put a knife to his throat and ordered him to tell the guards not to fire.

"By way of reply Pennie yelled:

"'Shoot, you idiots! Shoot, or I'll—I'll discharge the last one of you!'

"The guards fired right into the fleeing convicts. The first volley killed three men and wounded thirteen. Among the dead was Berryessa. The brave deputy warden's arm was SHATTERED BY A SHOT.

We chased them and a lot surrendered, but a score or so managed to get away. We hunted them for a long time and shot several in the gulches around Tamalpais.

"But we've had worse breaks than that," continued the guard, "Nearly all of these graves are those of men killed while escaping—Mexicans mostly. They are the most desperate of men. There was one break about '59, I think, where fifty convicts got out with tools from the shops. They came rushing around the corner of the buildings and turned straight up the hill to where the Gatling gun is now. There were six-pounders there then and they had an idea that if they got that post they could control the whole place. Not more than fifty feet separated them from the guns, but before they had gone half the distance twenty of their number were writhing on the grass, dead or desperately wounded. The guns were loaded with grapeshot and at that distance were most effective. Their dead and wounded rolled back on the stormers and hindered their progress up the steep slope. At last they broke and ran. Ten were caught, but ten got away, and although some were killed in the ravines, most of them got away all right. If I recollect aright, Francisco Acapulco led that break. His grave is somewhere here about. That break was when the prisoners worked in the brick-yard. About 200 prisoners were out, but only fifty broke. The guards, however, get rattled and fired into the other 100, who were trying to crowd back inside the prison. They killed three or four of these unfortunate fellows and wounded half a score. When Acapulco and his followers broke they slammed the prison gates, and those not in the gate

COULDN'T GET BACK.

It's easy to say now they ought to have been more careful, but then there was no time to consider anything. These convicts carried off two guards, Lee and Spell, toward Tamalpais. This saved many of them, as the guards were afraid to fire for fear of hurting their comrades. Probably thirty got away altogether that time.

"The biggest break of all, though, was July 22, 1862. Three hundred of the convicts broke out then, but only forty or fifty got away. I don't know how many were killed, for some were shot weeks afterward. That was a fearful time. For awhile it looked as if they would conquer the prison. About 150 were passing out to the brick-yard when they suddenly seized Con Murphy, who was guarding the front gates, and demanded his keys, in order to liberate the other prisoners. Murphy managed to secrete the keys of the inner door, and though they beat him cruelly they could not get them from him. Lieut Gov. Chellis was at lunch when the break was made and the convicts soon got hold of him. They made him go to Murphy and order him to give up the keys. Murphy refused to obey, and, after kicking him into insensibility, the convicts smashed the locks. Then over 100 more convicts from the workshops joined in the break. They raided the armories, but though they found plenty of arms they found no ammunition. By this time the guards and officers of the prison began to shoot into the convicts. Capt. Vanderlip with a few men headed off fifty of the convicts and got them back into the prison. The cannon, loaded with grape, were turned on the striped horde, but as they kept the lieutenant-governor in their midst they only fired over them. A guard named Watson was in charge of post 5. He swung the cannon so as to bear right in the midst of the rioters, but Cuellis received a persuading prod from his captors and yelled to him: and the guard turned his piece to the water, fired it, and then spiked it. This enraged the convicts. They had hoped to have fought with this cannon. They caught Watson and threw him down the bluff. Then they rolled the gun down over him and into the bay. Station 10 had another gun and the man in charge was killing the convicts on the edge of the crowd.

"FOR GOD'S SAKE, DON'T SHOOT!"

"They were afraid that Cuellis couldn't stop this firing and so divided and ran. About half of them got possession of the prison sloop Pike County and cut her from her moorings. There was no wind, however, and she drifted into a mud bank and stuck. The guards had the men on the sloop at their mercy. I guess that ten were killed from the shore and some that jumped overboard were drowned. After it was all over the remainder were taken off and brought back to their cells.

"Meanwhile, however, the other half, still holding the pleading and protesting Chellis, hurried away toward the Corte Madera marsh and Tamalpais. The guards had several chances to shoot into them, but the lieutenant-governor yelled to them not to shoot. Pennie had been in the same fix a year before, but you know how differently he acted. The convicts hurried Chellis along despite his heaviness, making him climb fences and wade creeks until he was nearly dead.

"The citizens of San Rafael had heard of the uprising of the felons, and a band of them pursued the convicts on horseback. They met them just on the edge of the march. A number of guards from the prison came up at the same time and flanked the remnant of the mutineers. Finding themselves hard pressed, the convicts released the half-dead lieutenant governor and tried to get away, but they were between the two bands. They tried to cut their way through the San Rafael posse, but only succeeded after fifteen or twenty of their number were either killed or wounded. Only about thirty-five convicts succeeded in reaching the thick woods about Mount Tamalpais. As usual we hunted them there and quite a number were killed. Capt. McLane came up with one of them and snapped his pistol at him, but the weapon did not go off, and the convict pulled him from his horse. Both had knives and they stabbed each other half a dozen times as they were rolling around under the trees. Capt. McLane got the best of it at last and he is an officer here still, but he carries with him the marks of that struggle yet.

"There have been a lot of smaller breaks, where one, two, or three men were killed, and that is why so many of these headboards bear that sentence:

"Died from the effects of a gunshot wound.'"

Summer Sunbeams.

BY ARCHIE MACK.

Summer sunbeams, brightly shining,
Prove a happy, golden day,
Brighten every dell and dingle,
Chase each lowering cloud away
'Neath their rays the bright flowers blossom,
'Neath their rays the grasses spring,
Over every tree and meadow
Open-handed blessings fling.

Gloomy dells are penetrated,
Their dark shadows are dispelled;
Peeping coyly like a maiden
Come the beams which joy compelled
Where 'twas shady nooks we find thee
Shedding brightness everywhere,
O'er the streamlets laughing ripples
Sparkling in the sunshine fair.

'Midst the monarchs of the forest
Glance thy beams athwart the trees,
Weaving many a fairy palace
Lulled by music of the leaves
O'er the grain-fields and the moorland
Flash thy rays with fervid glow,
In the valleys, on the mountains,
Summer's gladness, winter's snow.

Summer sunbeams ever shedding
Love and beauty all around,
May I like to thee, thus ever,
Smoothing life's dark scenes be found!
May my life be one endeavor
To shed brightness where I roam,
Whether forest, vale or moorland,
Valley mountain, streamlet, home.

AMONG MAN-EATERS.

The Flesh of White Men is Too Salty, but Chinaman is Not Half Bad.

Explorer Lumholtz has just returned from Queensland, says the "Pall Mall Gazette." He devoted a year to the cannibal tribes inhabiting a terribly wild tract of country a couple of hundred miles north of Townsville. Mr. Lumholtz says:

"To begin with don't imagine that because the tribes are cannibals they are therefore loathsome or repulsive in appearance. On the contrary many of the men are physically fine fellows and some of the women have pleasing features. Then, when you call them cannibals, you must remember that human flesh is a very rare luxury, for they only eat foreign tribes—native tribes, I mean, for the flesh of the white man is nasty to their palate. He has a salty flavor, which is very disagreeable to them." "That was lucky for you." "Well, no. If I were once dead it mattered little to me how my body was disposed of. But being without morals and absolutely indifferent to human life, they would have killed me if they had dared for the sake of the tobacco and the few odds and ends I had with me. When I joined them at first they were friendly enough. They were a good bit afraid of the white man, and for an inch of tobacco apiece were willing to serve me. Then they respected what they called my baby gun—my revolver—which I fired off every night. But in time their fearswore off and there were several attempts to tomahawk me, but I was lucky. I had a splendid hunter with me who twice tried. I should have shot him dead, but I was a little loath to do so as I was very keen about getting that specimen of the tiger marsupial, so I tolerated him. Might is right among them. If I had shot a few of them my dangers would have been considerably lessened."

"To resume about the man-eating, I never saw a cannibal feast, but every night in their huts the talk was of women and human flesh. Those were the stock subjects of conversation." "Not very different from highly cultivated Europeans, Mr. Lumholtz? Women and cooking." "I was able to understand them, for I had learned the language, and I gathered that white man was no good—too salty. Chinamen was not half bad. He fed on rice, and had a tender vegetable flavor about him, like a mealy cauliflower. But of all varieties there was nothing so sweet as a native baby—so sweet, so juicy, so fat, so tender. Old men and women were naturally tough and sinewy. And the favorite parts were the thigh and the flesh of the hand. The cannibal blacks have no religion, no ceremonial, no idols, and the only approach to a charm was a bit of human fat, wrapped up in grass and tied round the neck as good luck to your hunting."

"If you want a wife and you have money, which is tobacco, or a handkerchief, or a tomahawk—I should tell you that these articles percolate through the densest bush, and over the wildest ranges—you can buy a wife. you may inherit a wife by agreement. You may get your dead brother's wife, but the commonest method of acquiring a wife is to go and help yourself. If you are a big fellow you walk into a hut and take the lady. Then there is a row, and you have to fight a duel with a wooden broadsword, and the women come down to the fight and howl and screech and back their men and there is a terrible to-do. It is the women who cause all the rows, all the wars, all the feuds. It is always some chocolate Helen and some ravishing Paris." "And do the ladies like a change of husbands?" "They go, and don't seem to mind in the least." "How do the men regard the women then?" "As useful drudges, to do all the work and make them comfortable. The more women a man has the bigger swell he is. The black fellow hates work. He only cares for hunting. He hates to rise until the sun is well up in the heavens and the dew has disappeared. Then he and his friends depart into the forest and hunt, seldom bringing home the food, but devouring it in the bush. It is one of the remarkable things that the old men have always the prettiest wives. There are no chiefs. One man is as good as another, but when a political crisis arises the old men are the most influential. As for the young fellow, he often has to do without a wife until he is 30.

Wiman's Large Place.

"San Francisco Call:" The purchase of Alaska was a small matter; but the American who consolidated Canada with the United States would occupy a large place in history; and the scheme, large as it is, does not present insuperable obstacles. Of the seven provinces and four territories which constitute the Canadian Dominion, two provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are openly in favour of annexation; three provinces, Ontario, British Columbia and Manitoba, are believed not to be irreconcilably opposed; while the territories would naturally acquiesce. There remain the Prince Edward Island group, whose temper is unknown and the Province of Quebec, which, so far as its opinions can be gathered from the utterances of its leading men, is against annexation, from a notion that the Roman Catholic religion would be endangered if it were a State of the Union. Whether this delusion could not be dispelled by proper information, and whether an offer by the United States to assume the Dominion debt of $285,000,000, and to complete at American expense the public works now needed by Canada, would not lead to a change of public opinion in Quebec, and to a decided development of annexation sentiment in the other provinces, might be a question worth Mr. Blain's while to consider.

Many Woods in a Bridge.

A rustic bridge has just been completed at Beech Haven, Ga., that contains 57 different kinds of wood and vines, grown on the 50 acres of Beech Haven Park. Vines—Grape, muscadine, bellflower, rattan, bamboo.

CALEDONIA.

The following is a most delightful description of a short holiday spent in bonnie Scotland. The writer is one of my dearest and best valued English friends. As there are such a number of auld Scotch and Scotch Canadians throughout Ontario and the other provinces I feel that it may interest them and so take pleasure in handing it to them through the wide columns of your paper. NORA LAUGHER.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE ROAD, LONDON, ENG.

MY DEAR N.—Forgive me not writing from the "Land o' Cakes," for truly I had not a moment's time.

Have just returned from my most enjoyable holiday and I must tell you all about it.

We left London on a Saturday, by the night express and reached Edinboro' early the next day.

That same morning we went to the Cathedral, "Scottish Free Church" a simple service, conducted by three clerics in black gowns and white ties a la John Knox; it was so soothing that we—tired with our journey—nearly went to sleep.

In the afternoon we commenced the lions of that fair and lovely city; those terms describe the new part, as for the old, our noses would not allow us to investigate that too closely. The houses of the older portion are to a degree squalid and so are the people. Yet the Scotch as a race I think are prepossessing; they are very hospitable, in fact anxious to fill one's mouth directly one enters their doors.

Well, we did the Castle, Calton Hill, various monuments, Arthur's Seat, the Queen's Park, Holyrood Palace, Rosslyn Chapel, John Knox's House, Parliament House and saw the "Heart of Midlothian." Then on to Stirling and Callander where we took coach through Trossachs (very beautiful.) Then we took steamer down Loch Katrine (lovely) to Inversuen which is on the banks of Loch Lomond (indescribable), the mountains around it being perfectly grouped and the scenery exquisite.

He visited Rob Roy's Cave—no wonder Helen McGregor ran away from him, indeed I should run away from any man who wanted me to reside upon cold stones, quite inaccessible to callers for afternoon tea, and report does not say Rob Roy was amiable.

We saw upon one of the mountains a pulpit shaped rock, from which in the time of the covenanters, John Knox is supposed to have preached, if he did he certainly bowed to the wind.

We then sailed to the head of the loch and took coach through Glenfalloch. It is a grand road right through mountains.

Afterwards we journeyed by train to Oban from whence we visited Dunolie Castle and Dunstaffnage Castle, the latter one of the oldest in Scotland. I beg you to understand that all these castles are simply ruins like Kenilworth. They stand on heights with glorious views of sea, mountain, pasture, land and loch. And imagine the mountains, covered for the most part with heather, with here and there great masses of grey, red or black rocks.

One day we took steamer to Ballachulish, and from thence coach through the pass of Glencoe; we were simply awed by its mighty grandeur. One mountain "The Black Rock" looks a great mass of gothic architecture. There are two others "The Glencoe Sisters" brownish grey, and another towering in the distance "The Etive Shepherd" grey, and one in the foreground, red, at the summit of which they call Ossians. Picture if you can the grouping of these mountains, the mass of subdued colour, the silvery streams of water rippling here and there down their rough sides. There is less heather or verdure of any kind in this part. The population of Ballachulish and Glencoe is employed at slate quarries. The people look very dirty, and the children, ragged and tiresome, followed our coach for a mile, crying out for "backsheesh." I forgot to tell you the children of the lower classes both in the cities and villages do not wear shoes nor stockings, and that of course adds to their squalid appearance.

Another day we sailed by steamer down Loch Awe, saw the Pass of Brander and then took coach back to Oban—about 30 miles—through the Pass of Melfort. I really think the most exquisite scenery of all, the mountains are as high but covered with heather, and very broken and rugged, with belts of fir-trees and banks of other trees just changing colour, and here and there a rowan tree standing out bright crimson and at the foot, just below the picturesque coach road, water dashing and foaming over high boulders and stones.

Another day by steamer to Iona, a funny little island with a few houses and the ruins of an ancient Cathedral with a number of tombs supposed to be those of early Scottish kings and chiefs of clans. One curiosity they show is a most unrestful-looking stone which they assert was the pillow of St. Columba.

We again embarked and in about an hour reached Staffa—an island of rocks. We climbed over one which was composed of huge square blocks to another called Fingal's Cave, a gothic arch on pillars, with the sea rushing at its base; it seemed incredible that it should have been formed so perfectly without hands. It reminded me of the nave of some stately cathedral.

The sea was rough and the tide running high or the sailors would have rowed us down in the ship's boat.

We then returned to Oban by the Sound of Mull. But alas! I cannot tell you anything about this scenery, for I was compelled to wind a wool wrap around my head and hold on to my seat—the Atlantic rollers were truly awful; but I am proud to say I did not suffer from mal de mer.

Another day we journeyed to Connel Ferry, where we went to see an old man who combines the duties of post-master, pastor and poet. He has reclaimed a hill of moorland and made it a beautiful and romantic-looking garden. On it is a large, hollow rock, which he has industriously roofed in, and squared two apertures, one of which is glazed for a window while the other serves for the door. It contains a few oaken benches and there he conducts service for the few crofters and fishermen in the neighbourhood. Such a restful place, with the sweet scent of the mountain flowers and musical murmuring of the sea. Of his own table he is very proud, it is a small, thick, oval block of solid, black oak and is the identical one upon which Robert Bruce took his last meal. He is a dear old man, and he was most hospitable and entertaining, giving us a quantity of fruit and lovely flowers out of his cherished garden. They tell me his poetry is marvelous for a self taught man, but I have only seen a copy in Gaelic.

We returned home to London by steamer through Crinan Canal and Kyles by Bute, down the Clyde, and had a look at the shipping and boat building, to Glasgow—a dirty, smoky hole, where we did not care to linger—then to "the city of ships" by train.

To all these delights add good hotels, pleasant acquaintances and fairly fine weather and you must agree with me it was a glorious holiday. Of course you will say in Canada "We have all this and more! Our mountains are higher, our views and falls far grander, and our climate infinitely superior!" But that will not do away with my abiding content in having seen one of the loveliest countries God has shed His light upon, and it is not only that Nature is so beautiful, but one must feel proud of the triumphs of engineering, the canals and bridges, and the roads cut through the very heart of the mountains.

I hope my enthusiasm will not bore you; but if so forgive me, I only wish you could have been there.

Ever your loving old friend,

M. A. E. S.

Advantages of Life in Families made up of Many Members.

There is no cheerfulness in the world comparable to that afforded by the daily life of a large family, says "Harper's Bazar." There may be an equal amount of happiness in a small family, there may be a depth of bliss where only two are together of which the life lived by ten or a dozen could afford no idea; but for the cheer of varied interests, of lively voices, of going and coming, of song and laughter, of moving figures, of the sense of action and life, what can be desired better than a family where father and mother and grandmother, aunts and children, make the round dozen? In a small family it is difficult to keep up the wide interest in people and neighborhood which does a great deal to promote cheerfulness; it is difficult to keep up such interest in more than a very few, from the mere want of time, from the difficulty of getting about, and the impossibility of being in more than one place at a time, if from no other reason. But where there are a number of people under the roof that answers every purpose, as each one bringing in keen feeling for the affairs of several others, the whole together maintain a wide and deep connection from which cheerfulness is precipitated like a salt from its component gases.

But, apart from the cheer derived from intercourse and relationship with the outside multitude by means of a large family's varied acquaintance, comes that derived from other sources in consequence of our full circle. This member of the large household is the one devoted to charity; all the rest do a great deal of vicarious charity, as we may call it, through that channel. and feel content with satisfied consciences in a sense of duty done, which sense, whether it contributes to virtue or not, does, at any rate, to cheerfulness and it is cheerfulness of which we are speaking. This other member is the student of science, and out of the chance conversation, the books, plates, experiments and experiences of this individual, the rest hive sufficient amount of scientific honey for their own uses, and are enriched with learning without the least exertion of their own, receiving it, as it were, through the pores. These others, again, do the gay society business; and those of the remainder who are quietly inclined go to all the routs and sails in the gay one's enjoyment, see what the bells wear and how the beaux behave, and never have to leave their tranquil corner at all. And this last one, with scraps of singing and scraps of pianoplaying, and mornings of practising and evenings of mirth, welds every thing together in a sort of perpetual ringing of joybells. In short, in a large family the whole world comes to every member of it, and in a small family only a narrow segment of it can come.

That Lawyer Chap.

Quite an amusing scene took place the other day in one of our police courts just as the court was about to adjourn for the day, says the Brooklyn "Citizen." The prisoner, who gave his name as Rafferdi and occupation as that of an organ-grinder, was charged with disturbing the neighborhood and refusing to leave when ordered. When the officer was making the complaint Rafferdi was seen to be in close conversation with one of those interesting lawyers who hang about the court-room with their hands in their pockets.

"Rafferdi," said the justice, "what have you to say to this charge that has been made against you?"

"May it please your honor, I appear for Rafferdi," said the lawyer, coming to the bar.

"Well, sir, what have you to say for him," replied the justice.

"May it please your honor, this unfortunate man, a native of Italy, sought this city to earn his living. Being of an industrious disposition, he bought an organ and a monkey with a determination of making an honest living. On this day this officer ruthlessly seized him and brought him before you, your honor. I now ask that——"

"Stop," said the justice. "Do I understand you to say that this man is an Italian?"

"He is, your honor."

"Well, one would suppose that he was an Irishman," continued the justice.

"Sure an' it's a pretty good guesser your honor is," said the organ grinder.

"Then what do you mean by deceiving people by saying that you are an Italian?" said the justice, in a severe tone.

"Desave, your honor! Is it desaving, you mane? Sure an' I didn't at all. It was that lawyer chap there. I paid him 50 cents, an' he's lying out the worth of it."

That exclamation set the court in roars of laughter.

"This is enough of this," said the justice when order was restored. "You, Rafferdi, or whatever your name is, get out of this, and recollect if you are brought here again you won't get off so easily."

Rafferdi quickly took his departure amid the roars of laughter that followed the dumfounded lawyer.

Poor Bloggs.

Bloggs (late in tallow trade, who has just bought a place down in Midlandshire, confidentially to the Earl of Midlands after dinner)—"Now, wot I was a-thinkin', my lord, was this: You've got the rank, I've got the money; s'posin' my son marries one of your gals? Eh, my lord? Wot do you say?" Earl of Midlands (pale but calm)—"With great pleasure, Mr. Bloggs. Which one would he like—the kitchen girl or one from the dairy?" (Poor Bloggs.)

A large company was present and after a short programme had been carried out, the following officers were elected :—President, Rev. E Middleton; vice-president, Mrs. Tremeer; secretary-treasurer, Mrs. Hill; assistant do., Miss M. Sutton. Several committees were appointed for the quarter and arrangements made for the carrying on of the winter's work.

Messrs. J. J. Stalker, reeve; Duncan McGregor, deputy-reeve, and H. F. Jell, township clerk, of Aldborough, met at St. Thomas on Thursday with the Dutton high school board to arrange the paying of teachers of the Dutton high school district for the year. The high school board asked for $643.71, and the Aldborough deputation decided not to pay one dollar towards the support of the Dutton school, but decided to defend any action that might be taken to compel payment.

The Vanderbilt special which passed over the M. C. R. on Tuesday, made a fast run between Windsor and St. Thomas. The train left Windsor in charge of Conductor Fryer, Engineer Sam Whitwam, engine 416, at 8:54, and arrived in St. Thomas at 11:02, the 111 miles being covered in 2 hours and 6 minutes. There was a stop of 6 minutes for water, and thirty minutes were lost in slowing up. Deducting the 36 minutes, the actual running time was 90 minutes for the 111 miles. Over some portions of the road the speed exceeded seventy miles an hour. The train left for the Falls at 11:10 with engine 415, engineer Deyell. The party on board was made up of Cornelius Vanderbilt, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, H. McK. Trombley, C. F. Cox and H. W. Webb, New York railway magnates.

The half-yearly communion services in Knox Church last week were particularly interesting. Rev. R. McIntyre, of Delaware, preached two able sermons on Thursday, which were well listened to. On Saturday morning, the new members to the number of 19 were received into the church, four being baptized. There were also five intant baptisms. Mr. Wilson brother of the pastor, preached an excellent sermon afterwards. On Sunday the church was crowded, many being unable to get inside. The Rev. W. H. W. Boyle preached two eloquent and impressive discourses. On Monday thanksgiving services were conducted by the Rev. D. Kelso, of Wallacetown. The services were all well attended, and the pastor and congregation are to be congratulated on the prosperity of the church this year, no less than forty-eight new members having been added.

The new Masonic hall above Hockin & Pool's was dedicated last Thursday evening by D. D. G. M. Doherty, of St. Thomas. Visiting brethern from St. Thomas, West Lorne, Iona, Rodney and other places to the number of 78 were present to witness the ceremony, which was performed in ancient manner. A number of degrees were conferred, after which all adjourned to the McIntyre House, where the visitors were entertained to an oyster supper, being serenaded meanwhile by the I.O.F. band. After a sumptuous repast a procession was formed headed by the band, and Mr. Doherty was escorted to the station, and when the train moved away all joined in singing, "He's a jolly good fellow." Every part of the ceremony passed off without a fault and everybody seemed well pleased. The officers and members of the lodge will long remember the pleasant event. Cameron Lodge bids fair to prosper, and will at all times be pleased to have any of the brethern of the mystic tie visit them.

The ladies call the attention of our readers to the entertainment announced last week to be held in the Baptist church on Friday evening, Oct 25th. Tea served from 7 30 to 8.30. Admission, 15c. and 10c.

At the Baptist Convention at Woodstock Friday, Rev. Mr. Lowerville was elected secretary of the Elgin Foreign Mission branch. Rev. Mr. Munro, of St. Thomas, presented the report of the Resolutions Committe. Amongst them was one against all steamboat and railway traffic on Sunday, and it was resolved to petition the Dominion Government to forbid all such traffic on the Lord's Day. The next Convention will be held at Woodstock. The following resolution was unanimously carried:—"That in the opinion of this Convention the acceptance by Baptist churches of the exemption of their church property from municipal taxation is inconsistent with our distinctive principles, and is an impediment to our work of evangelising the world."

A Fact

WORTH knowing is that blood diseases which all other remedies fail to cure, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Fresh confirmation of this statement comes to hand daily. Even such deep-seated and stubborn complaints as Rheumatism, Rheumatic Gout, and the like, are thoroughly eradicated by the use of this wonderful alterative.

Mrs. R. Irving Dodge, 110 West 125th street, New York, certifies :—

"About two years ago, after suffering for nearly two years from rheumatic gout, being able to walk only with great discomfort, and having tried various remedies, including mineral waters, without relief, I saw by an advertisement in a Chicago paper that a man had been relieved of this distressing complaint, after long suffering, by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I then decided to make a trial of this medicine, and took it regularly for eight months. I am pleased to say that it effected a complete cure, and that I have since had no return of the disease."

Mrs. L. A. Stark, Nashua, N. H., writes: "One year ago I was taken ill with rheumatism, being confined to my house six months. I came out of the sickness very much debilitated, with no appetite, and my system disordered in every way. I commenced to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla and began to improve at once, gaining in strength and soon recovering my usual health. I cannot say too much in praise of this well-known medicine."

"I have taken a great deal of medicine, but nothing has done me so much good as Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I felt its beneficial effects before I had quite finished one bottle, and I can freely testify that it is the best blood-medicine I know of."—L. W. Ward, Sr., Woodland, Texas.

It Makes You Hungry

"I have used Paine's Celery Compound and it has had a salutary effect. It invigorated the system and I feel like a new man. It improves the appetite and facilitates digestion." J. T. COPELAND, Primus, S. C.

Spring medicine means more now-a-days than it did ten years ago. The winter of 1888-89 has left the nerves all fagged out. The nerves must be strengthened, the blood purified, liver and bowels regulated. Paine's Celery Compound—the Spring medicine of to-day—does all this, as nothing else can. Prescribed by Physicians, Recommended by Druggists, Endorsed by Ministers, Guaranteed by the Manufacturers to be

The Best Spring Medicine.

"In the spring of 1887 I was all run down. I would get up in the morning with so tired a feeling, and was so weak that I could hardly get around. I bought a bottle of Paine's Celery Compound, and before I had taken it a week I felt very much better. I can cheefully recommend it to all who need a building up and strengthening medicine." Mrs. B. A. Dow, Burlington, Vt.

Paine's Celery Compound

is a unique tonic and appetizer. Pleasant to the taste, quick in its action, and without any injurious effect, it gives that rugged health which makes everything taste good. It cures dyspepsia and kindred disorders. Physicians prescribe it. $1.00. Six for $5.00. Druggists.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

Wm. Smith, alias Henderson, the supposed St. Thomas burglar, has been committed for trial.

O. F. Jordan, roadmaster of the M. C. R., will make a tour of the road on a hand car this week.

An unsuccessful attempt was made to burglarize the shoe store of D. Galbraith, St. Thomas, on Sunday night.

The death occurred at Fingal Sunday from paralysis of the brain of Amanda, wife of H. N. Gaines, aged 62 years.

The body of James Bell, one of the victims of the Erie Wave disaster, has been recovered near Port Rowan cut.

The annual meeting of the Elgin teachers' association will be held on Friday and Saturday, November 8th and 9th.

The house of Thos. Venning, an M. C. R. laborer, residing in St. Thomas, was entered by a sneak thief the other day and $18 stolen.

Flour dropped from $2.75 to $2.50 per cwt. retail in St. Thomas on Saturday. Bread was reduced to 5c. per loaf there on Monday.

A young man named James Kelly lost all the fingers of his left hand while running a planer at Heard's factory, St. Thomas, on Saturday.

Another pioneer of Ekfrid township has gone to his last rest in the person of Arch. McDougall, who died at his home near Melbourne last week at the ripe old age of 88 years.

M. C. R. officials went over the route of a proposed new railway from Kingsmill to Port Burwell, but no important business was transacted in connection with the movement.

The M. C. R. have erected a new 3,200 ft. siding from Canfield east, making the total length of the siding 7,240 feet. A new switching siding has also been laid in Montrose yard 1,400 feet in length.

The following business assignment was reported on Saturday: Robert Fletcher, tins, Melbourne. The stock of dry goods and groceries of Wm. McIntosh, of Aylmer, has been sold by the assignee to Joshua Sisler, of Springfield.

Detective Heenan, of the M. C. R., has returned from Alvinston, where he investigated the recent burglary at the M. C. R. station. The thief was a tramp about 18 years of age. He left behind a mortice key, and was traced west.

The Leamington Tribune has suspended publication. The proprietors have found out by this time that it does not pay to run a newspaper in a small town where there is already one good paper, for the gratification of a little spite.

On Saturday afternoon a young son of Chas. Gay, St. Thomas, while following a horse which was being led out of the barn for water, and was kicked in the face, inflicting a fearful gash extending from the eye to the centre of the cheek.

Trainmen report a large fire in the swamp on the St. Clair branch of the M. C. R. at the Great Western crosssing. The fire has caught into the spruce and underbrush, and unless rain comes there is danger of its spreading. The fire extends over an area of between 200 and 300 acres.

A destructive fire occurred at Comber on Friday morning, destroying Goathe & Brown's hardware store, the Misses Munro's millinery store, Mrs. Kennan's dwelling house, J. McAvanie's butcher shop, and Dr. Abbott's drug store. The fire was evidentlly kindled by an incendiary. The total loss will approximate $15,000.

On the 13th of September Reuben Shoup, night operator on the M. C. R. at Hagersville, was assaulted on a train coming from the Barnum show at Hamilton and was struck on the head with a cord wood stick in the hands of William Vanghan. Shoup's skull was crushed, and his assailants were arrested. Shoup died from his injuries Thursday morning.

The funeral took place in Southwold on Sunday of Mr. Sampson Sutton, a well-known farmer in that township, who died suddenly Friday. Deceased, who was in his 77th year, had been suffering from paralysis for some years, but on Friday was around as usual and ate a hearty dinner. He subsequently laid down and in a few minutes was a corpse. He leaves two sons. Dr. James, of Clandeboye, and Lewis, residing home The daughters are Mrs. John Brotherhood, of Chicago, and Mrs. John Best and Mrs. O'Neil, of London township.

A team of horses belonging to Mr. John Graham, of Ekfrid, near Middlemiss, took fright at a covered wagon on O'Mara street, Tuesday afternoon, and ran away. When the horses turned the corner of Water and Main streets Mr. Graham, who was in the rig to which they were attached, was thrown out, and striking his head on the ground received a severe scalp wound, Dr. Walker was called and attended to Mr. Graham, who is recovering. The runaways afterwards collided with a buggy standing in front of Harris' blacksmith shop, and Mrs. McMurchy, of Aldboro', who was in the buggy, was thrown out, but in no way injured. Dr. Henderson followed the runaways and caught them near Kilmartin. Neither the horses nor rig was injured.—Glencoe Transcript.

The Post Office Muddle.

Inspector Barker held a public investigation into the charges made against the Dutton postmaster in Brown's hall on Thursday last. T. W. Crothers, of St. Thomas, appeared in support of the charges, which were preferred by W. H. Nelson, and Mr. Leitch defended himself. There were fourteen charges in all, some of them of a very flimsy nature, and none of them being of very great importance, the principal grievance appearing to be that the post-office is not located centrally enough to please some of the business men. Some of the charges were that when Mr. Leitch was financial secretary of the Dutton Home Circle he distributed assessment notices through the post-office without stamps; that he distributed newspapers published in Dutton to the village subscribers without the payment of postage; that a letter was received at the post-office on the 2nd of August, addressed to R. McGill, was not delivered until Oct. 8th; that four letters and a postal card addressed to Jas. McDougall, which arrived on Sept. 25th and 26th were not delivered until the 30th, although called for twice a day, and that a letter sent from Dutton in January, 1888, to the manager of the Imperial bank, St. Thomas, containing a cheque to retire a note, was kept in the Dutton office for six months and then sent direct to the dead letter office. Inspector Barker conducted the investigation in a fair and impartial manner, and when the witnesses had been examined, gave an opportunity to the citizens to give voluntary testimony as to the management and location of the post-office, several giving opinions favorable to the present management and location. The investigation lasted nearly all the day, and was attended by large numbers, evincing the interest taken in the matter by the citizens. Inspector Barker will forward the evidence to the Postmaster-General, who will dispose of the matter. The result is doubtful, though it is reasonable to suppose that the government will require more substantial charges than those brought forward to induce them to discharge a public officer who has held his position for 15 years.

Six petitions are being circulated in the neighborhood, expressing the confidence of the people in the present postmaster and their satisfaction with its location, and asking that no change be made. Over 800 signatures have already been received.

Progress of Inventions since 1845.

In the year 1845 the present owners of the Scientific American newspaper commenced its publication, and soon after established a bureau for the procuring of patents for inventions at home and foreign countries. During the year 1845 there were only 502 patents issued from the U.S. Patent Office, and the total issue from the establishment of the Patent Office, up to the end of that year, numbered only 4,347.

Up to the first of July this year there have been granted 406,413, showing that since the commencement of the publication of the Scientific American there have been issued from the U. S. Patent Office 406,166 patents, and about one third more applications have been made than have been granted, showing the ingenuity of our people to be phenomenal, and much greater than even the enormous number of patents issued indicates. Probably a good many of our readers have had business transacted through the offices of the Scientific American, in New York or Washington, and are familiar with Munn & Co.'s mode of doing business, but those who have not will be interested in knowing something about this, the oldest patent soliciting firm in this country, probably in the world, Persons visiting the offices of the Scientific American, 361 Broadway, N. Y., for the first time will be surprised, on entering the main office, to find such an extensive and elegantly equipped establishment, with its walnut counters, desks, and chairs to correspond, and its enormous safes, and such a large number of draughtsmen, specification writers, and clerks, all busy as bees, reminding one of a large banking or insurance office, with its hundred employees.

In conversation with one of the firm, who had commenced the business of soliciting patents in connection with the publication of the Scientific American, more than forty years ago, I learned that his firm had made application for patents for upward of one hundred thousand inventors in the United States, and several thousands in different foreign countries, and had filed as many cases in the Patent Office in a single month as there were patents issued during the entire first year of their business career, This gentleman had seen the Patent Office grow from a sapling to a sturdy oak, and he modestly hinted that many thought the Scientific American, with its large circulation, had performed no mean share in stimulating inventions and advancing the interests of the Patent Office. But it is not alone the patent soliciting that occupies the attention of the one hundred persons employed by Munn & Co., but a large number are engaged on the four publications issued weekly and monthly from their office, 361 Broadway, N. Y., viz.: The Scientific American, the Scientific American Supplement, the Export Edition of the Scientific American, and the Architects and Builders Edition of the Scientific American. The first two publications are issued every week, and the latter two the first of every month,

ONE AWFUL NIGHT.

A Thrilling Experience with Wild Beasts.

I was acting as shipping clerk in the office of the Liverpool and Calcutta Steamship line at Cape Town, and among the helpers in the big warehouse were two or three fellows who were called "Half Hots." They were a mixture of white and black, but not mulattoes. The color was more like that of the Chinaman, and their vernacular was a queer mixture of English and Dutch. These fellows were as servile as slaves to one's face, but as revengeful as fiends behind his back. The old clerk had been in fear of them and had put up with their faults, but I walked them around pretty lively from the first day, and at the end of the first month had plenty of cause to discharge them. I had the power to hire and discharge my own help, having at times as many as twenty-five men in the sheds, and nothing was said about these three going away. They made no protest to me, but a Boer who was acting as my assistant warned me that I had best look out for myself for the next few weeks, as he had overheard them threatening vengeance.

Two days after the discharge of the men an English ship, which had been around to the east coast and up the Bay of Bengal collecting wild animals for the Royal Museum at London, put into Cape Town in distress.

SHE WAS LEAKING SO BADLY

that she had to go into dry dock, and she had to be lightered of almost everything before she could pass over the gate sill of the only dock at her disposal. The animals were stored in one end of our big ware-house, which was a building 200 feet long by 100 feet wide. There was one big African elephant and two medium-sized ones from India, together with two male lions, three tigers, four or five hyenas, several wolves, a couple of bears, half a dozen snakes, a couple of panthers, and a large number of monkeys. All but the elephants were in cages, and these were placed in a row at one end of the building, and the elephants far enough away so that they could not reach the cages or each other. They seemed peacefully inclined, although strangers to each other, and the beasts and serpents had been so shaken up at sea that they were glad to secure rest and sleep.

It was in summer and the weather was very hot. The warehouse was only one story high, built of brick, and the many windows in it were doubly guarded to keep out robbers. Stout iron bars ran up and down, and outside of them were heavy wire screens. This enabled us to leave all windows raised day and night and keep the building ventilated. In the center of the building was a cupola, furnishing further light and ventilation, and at the east end a little room had been partitioned off for my office. This room contained a sleeping bunk and a hammock, and I slept here and took my meals at a hotel. There was no watchman inside the house, but one was stationed on the wharf outside. At midnight of the night of which I am now going to write there was a full moon, and the interior of the big warehouse was almost as light as day. I had been asleep for an hour and a half, when I was suddenly awakened by a trumpet blast from the big elephant. He was chained by one foot to a ring bolt in the floor, and stood broadside to one of the windows and about ten feet away. He trumpeted as if highly angered, and as I dropped out of the hammock I heard him tugging to break his chain. On that side of my office was a large window, and I had no need to open the door to see what was going on. I saw the big fellow tugging and straining, and he with his trumpeting. I don't think I had been on my feet half a minute when his chain snapped and he was free, and then it struck me that the situation was an unpleasant one.

My office was opposite one of the big doors of the warehouse, but ninety feet away. To reach it I must cross the building. My first idea was to go for help to secure the elephant, but he had scarcely broken loose when pandemonium reigned supreme. The other elephants began to trumpet and to strain at their chains, and every wild beast set up an outcry. The big fellow came straight to my end of the warehouse, swinging his trunk right and left, and within ten feet of my door he began work on fifty sacks of corn corded up in a row. He picked up the sacks one after another, and flung them about, and he grew more angry with each effort. He wasn't through with the sacks when the smaller elephants broke loose, and then I knew what I must prepare for. The watchman outside had caught the alarm, and he came to the nearest window and shouted to me. I dared not answer him, as the elephant was now close by, and I was fearful that the sound of my voice would cause him to attack my frail shelter.

Having tossed the last sack high in the air, the big fellow made a rush down the warehouse for the smaller ones, who were trumpeting at each other and preparing for a row. He knocked one of them over with his rush, and then pursued the other as he fled among the piles of freight. We had been pretty well cleaned out by the last ship, but we had considerable machinery, 200 barrels of salt, 300 bags of sugar, 500 barrels of flour, about a thousand Canadian smoked hams, with perhaps fifty boxes, large and small, containing dry goods, groceries, boots and shoes, and other stuff. When the small elephant who was knocked down went over he smashed the lion's cage, and I plainly saw both of them leap over him and spring upon the cage holding the monkeys. Such a growling and snarling and howling and roaring no one ever heard before, and the rumpus drew the attention of the elephants directly to the cages. Dropping their own differences for the moment, they drove at the cages, and in two minutes the entire collection killed in his cage, was let loose and flying around the big room. By this time the watchman had aroused a number of people, but they dared not open the door. I stood no show to reach the door and let myself out, and at once decided that my safest plan was to keep quiet. I was in the darkest corner of the building, and unless one of the elephants took it into his head to investigate I might hope to escape injury. My room was not as high as the ceiling of the warehouse, but only about nine feet, and the top of it was ceiled over. This made a platform about 9x14, and I knew that some of the animals would seek this shelter if driven that way. All did fly to my end of the building as they got out of their cages, and the very first move made by one of the panthers was to leap upon the platform. The other was seized by one of the tigers right before my door, and the fight lasted until the elephant came to investigate.

Then for about five minutes everything was at quite as you please. The animals seemed to be sizing each other up, and taking in the situation. I could hear the people outside moving about and talking in exciting tones, but when they hailed me I dared not reply, for the big elephant stood within four feet of my window, and was growing restless for further destruction. The lions stood side by side on the barrels of flour, which were piled up about eight feet high, while the tigers were further down on the other side and well on top the bags of sugar. One panther was above me, as I have said, while the other had skulked among the machinery. The wolves I could not see, but a big serpent was over by the doors and the monkeys were aloft among the rafters. One of the bears was crowded into a corner, evidently wishing to keep out of the row, while the other I could not see. The hyenas had been skulking among the hams, and what started the row anew was one of them trotting down a wide aisle towards my office to find safer shelter. The patter of his feet aroused the big elephant and he who were waving their tails and defying him to come on. He hit the pile of flour barrels about in the centre, and knocked a lot of them down, but before he had reached them both lions leaped to his back, and from thence to the floor behind him. This was the signal for a terrible battle, a sort of free-for-all fight. I could see the entire length of an aisle thirty feet wide, and it was in the aisle that the lions, tigers, hyenas, and wolves fell upon each other with such ferocity that my hair stood on end, and the scores of people now at the windows fell back in terror. While the wild beasts were having it out, the two smaller elephants began a row, and the big fellow came swinging up the aisle in which the hams were scattered in search of something to vent his spite on. I drew back from the window afraid he would see me through the glass. He reached out his trunk and fell all over the glass, which was a new substance to him, and he might perhaps have pulled the room down over my head had not the panther above me betrayed his presence by a growl. He had better have kept quiet. The elephant uttered a shrill cry and reached for him, and although the panther bit and tore at the trunk feeling for him, he was seized, held aloft for a moment, and then dashed to the floor with such force as to break every bone in his body.

If ever a man was scared out of his boots by an adventure, he was no more alarmed than I was as that elephant went swinging down one aisle and up another, clearing everything before him. He knocked the other two down among the flour barrels, and then pursued the wild beasts as they ceased their fight and fled before him. He picked up ham after ham and flung them the length of the building, and a large cogwheel belonging to an engine was flung against my bulkhead with such force as to shatter four of the boards. From the time the second row began to its close was thirty-five minute, and all this time each beast and animal was uttering his own peculiar war cry. The row was brought to a close in a peculiar manner. The bears had kept clear of the fight as long as possible, but when finally forced into it both tackled the big elephant as the party responsible for the situation. As they did so he rushed full tilt at one of the big doors, and carried it out with him, and took himself up the wharf to the main street with one of the bears fastened to a hind leg. Such of the wild beasts as were not too badly injured at once broke for the door. One of the tigers and both of the panthers were dead in the warehouse. The other tigers escaped through the town, and were killed miles away a day or two subsequently. One of the lions was dead, and the other, instead of as he went out ran along the wharf and leaped aboard of a coasting schooner a hundred yards away. One of the hatches was open, and he leaped down, and next day was shot in his hiding place. Two of the five hyenas got out alive, and were killed next day while secreted under a barn. Not a wolf was left alive, but the monkeys and serpents had climbed aloft by the supports, and kept themselves out of the row.

Of the two small elephants one had a leg broken and the other had been so severely injured internally that he died before morning. The big one, together with the bears, kept right on through the town and beyond, where they separated. The bears were shot by the men who went in pursuit, while the elephant was captured and brought back so generally knocked out that he was three months getting over it.

It was six months after the adventure before we learned what brought it about. Then we ascertained that one of the discharged "Half Hots" took this way to be revenged on me and the company. Standing at the window opposite the big elephant he had used a hollow reed to blow little darts at him, and one of these had struck the monster in the right eye and made him furious.

The warehouse was a sight to behold the next morning. Over 300 barrels of flour had been smashed, the sugar was scattered from end to end, dry goods and groceries littered the floor, and the corn could never be separated from the sugar. The hams were about the only thing saved, and these had been tossed to every point of the compass. The all around damage was estimated at $100,000, and the man responsible for it died before he could be brought to trial.

A Young Strategist.

Prince Adalbert of Prussia, the third son of the German Emperor, is still in short frocks; but he has already developed quite a strategist's instinct for making the most of an opportunity. The phonograph was exhibited the other day to the Imperial circle, and at the request of the Empress each of the young princes recited something into the receiver. The Crown Prince sang a verse of the martial "Heil Dir im Siegerkranz," and Prince Eitel Fritz rendered a starza of Uhland's well-known lied "Ich hatt' einen Kameraden." When, however, it came to Prince Adalbert's turn he seized the opportunity to say something that was evidently very near his heart. "Will papa please give me a pony" is what he shouted at the sensitive machine, with an earnestness which made papa and mamma and the whole Court circle roar with laughter.—[Ex.

Marketman—"Sell you a cabbage, miss?" Girl—"No. Up to our house the gas pipe leaks and the sewer's burst and father spilt a bottle of assafetida on the carpet and we can't stand everything."

The only person whose company is welcome to her on these occasions is her daughter, Ailsa Craig.

Miss Eastwood accomplished a very remarkable feat at Amat, Rosshire, Scotland, when fishing with a nine-foot trout rod. She had on only two flies. With one she hooked a salmon, and at the same time a sea-trout with the other, and after a severe struggle landed both fish. The salmon weighed eleven and a half pounds, and the trout one pound.

A man, Mr. John Leversha, appeared as a plaintive in a breach of promise suit in Sandhurst, Australia, during the last month. He claimed a thousand pounds from Miss Sarah Wrangham. He was 41 years of age. The defendant pleaded that she was an infant when the promise was made, but the jury found for the plaintiff, and awarded him a shilling damages.

The Pope has commissioned the Right Rev. Mgr. Fagging seems still to be carried on to a barbarous extent at some of the English Public Schools. It is not long since a morning paper reported the case of a boy who was held before the fire till he was actually scorched and blistered, because he would not perform some menial work; and at one of the great schools it is a rule that the youngest boy in a dormitor shall wake the older boys at 6 30 o'clock.

Speaking of Queen Victoria's literary tastes a recent writer says: "She still finds pleasure in Trollope's novels. Tennyson is her living idol. Walter Besant is another writer whose works stir the aged monarch. And Mrs. Humphrey Ward's Robert Elsmere was read not once but twice by the Queen of England. She has met many American writers in her day, but is not acquainted to any extent with their works."

A short time ago a young student applied for admission as pupil to the priests' seminary at Kalocsa, Hungary, and, being duly provided with examination certificates, was at once received. The new pupil led exactly the same life as the other inmates of the establishment, and showed a marked disposition for study. A few days ago Cardinal Haynald visited the seminary, and in the garden met the newcomer, who bowed respectfully, but, contrary to custom, did not kiss the Cardinal's hand. His Eminence not only noticed the omission, but it led him to examine the candidate priest somewhat closer. The effeminate face of the young student turned scarlet under the scrutinizing gaze, whereupon the prelate uttered a few words in a low tone that caused the former to return quickly to the house. Five minutes afterward this mysterious personage had left the premises, and has not since gone back. Rumor says the individual was a lady, who felt an irresistible vocation to become a priest.

Mark Twain lives an idle, easy going sort of existence during nine months of the year. Unlike most authors, he works in summer and rests all the remainder of the year. His home at Hartford, Conn., is a handsome red brick Queen Anne villa, the principal attraction of which is a large library on the first floor. Here Mark Twain may be found any day during his loafing season, sitting in a comfortable arm chair, with his feet on the window sill, partly hid by a cloud of tobacco smoke. Mrs. Clemens is a sweet, lovely, refined woman, but a serious drawback to her husband's happiness is the fact that she cannot appreciate his jokes.

A Dean on Burial.

The Dean of York is a very strong advocate for earth-to-earth burial. What it meant by this is that no strong substance such as coffins are usually made of, should come between the dead body and the surrounding earth. If coffins are used at all the Dean holds that they ought to be of quite perishable material, which would soon crumble away and allow mother earth to do speedily and effectively her kindly and salutary work of dissolution. If this were done, the Dean contends that burials could take place in light, porous soil without any of the disagreeable surroundings which naturally and necessarily result from cremation. Such perishable coffins, made by corn pressed pulp or any similar material, could easily be had, and with such arrangements, a corpse thus surrounded and covered with a suitable quantity of earth could be resolved into air or ashes in from three to seven years without the least injury to the neighborhood of the living. The rubric of the Anglican Church, the Dean further holds, permits the interment of such unoffined or fragilely-offined corpses. He also contends that, to prevent the spread of disease, burials should take place as soon as there are indubitable proofs of dissolution, and that all palls, bricked-up graves, vaults, etc., ought to be abandoned, and also that the surfaces of graves ought not to be covered with slabs or monuments, or anything which will prevent the growth of plants or the free circulation of the air.

All this seems reasonable and full of wise philosophy. The kindly effect of earth in counteracting impurities is well known, and the more directly it is applied to all decaying and offensive substances the more effective and the more beneficent its influence. How any one could imagine that it is showing respect to the loved dead to have their decaying bodies kept entirely isolated from earth in stately mausoleums and in strongly-formed coffins, so that for as long a time as possible they may send forth offensive smells and be a centre of menace and disease to the living, is beyond all ordinary reason to say. The whims of fashion are mysterious, and the follies of tradition are proverbial. If ashes were always committed directly to ashes, as nature and reason would have them, one half of the arguments for cremation would have no place.

Would I Were A Widow.

Young maids, you know, are voted slow,
And set aside completely,
While sprightly dames assert their claims
And smile on men too sweetly.
Who cares for youth and beauty blended?
This is the married woman's day;
The "buds'" bright reign, alas, is ended,
And only matrons hold full sway.

The married belle is versed quite well
In what we term flirtation;
Her honeyed smiles and artless wiles
Drive girls to desperation!
No wall flower is she, nowadays,
Nor treads the sober Lancers,
But joins the waltzer's giddy maze,
The merriest of the dancers!

A maid may be most fair to see,
And robed in daintiest dresses,
Know how to talk and dance the York,
Yet failure the confesses.
She murmurs:—"Would I were a widow,
How delightful it would be:
In widow's weeds there's many a bidder
Would surely bid on me."

She sighs in vain, and it is plain,
Can ne'er have her desire,
For how can she, 'less wedded be,
To widowhood aspire?
Her chances now are very small,
Quite slim the prop of hope beneath her,
For wives and widows have it all,
And she, poor thing, cannot be either.

A correspondent of the London Sportsman writes that he has been rearing dogs for over 30 years, and has never had a single case of distemper. The preventive treatment is by inoculation when six weeks old. It is further averred that a dog which has never suffered from distemper is never liable to rabies in any form in after life.

The loss of vigour and energy, of good spirits, of a cheerful and happy tone of mind does not end in a mere personal loss. It affects everything that men think or say or do, it influences all with whom they mingle and labour, and it operates unfavourably upon the very work which they hope to benefit by their sacrifice.

Good Points in A Woman.

A clear bright eye
That can pierce the sky,
A rounded cheek
Where the roses speak,
A chest so grand
That the lungs expand;
A steady brain
That can bear the strain,
A manner bright
And a spirit light.

Who does not wish for these, or having them wish to keep them, yet when weakness, irregularities, sick headache, nervousness, and inflammations, attack her, restoration can be accomplished by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, a medicine designed for woman's use, and placed with all druggists for their relief. THE VIKING'S MEAD.

A Drink Enjoyed by the Congress of Orientalists at the Grave of Odin.

The highest of high jinks, says the London "Telegraph," have been enjoyed by the erudite members of the congress of orientalists, which has been in session at Stockholm, the pleasant and instructive proceedings of which were wound up by a speech in Latin by his majesty King Oscar. Ecstatic applause greeted the announcement that Dr. Petersen, one of the delegates from Bombay, contemplated the speedy publication of an important work on Sanscrit. Then a learned pastor rejoicing in the interesting name of Amirchanjanz read a paper on Turkish dialects, and laid before the central Asian section a manuscript in the Djagatar language of a work by one Fir-dus-ul dgbale on "Khivian History; from the creation to the year 1250." It says much for the muscle of mind of the members of the congress that, when the alarming designation of the khivian historian was cited, they refrained in sheer affright from getting under the table, as the delightful Mrs. Bancroft used to do in "Caste" when she fancied that she beheld the ghost of her brother-in-law. But the orientalists, as will be subsequently seen, are in possession of a cordial the potency of which might enable them to encounter things even more terrible than the name of Fir dus, et cætera. The previous day the entire congress had proceeded by special train to Upsala, where, on the grave of Odin, the minister of the interior drank to the health of the learned linguists present. The beverage imbibed in honoring the toast was not champagne, nor even the national potation, brandy, of which seventeen different kinds are said to be manufactured in Sweden. The special tipple handed round was called "viking's mead," contained in a magnificent drinking-horn presented for the purpose by the king. According to the poet Longfellow, the vikings of old, when at their wassail bouts they wore the long winter out, and with their midnight shouts set the cocks crowing, were accustomed to measure the Berserk's tale in cups of ale, "Draining the oaken pail filled to o'er flowing." A legend more grim relates that the companions of Odin, when they met in the hall of Einheriar, were accustomed to quaff their mighty draughts from the skulls of their enemies; but the learned pundits who caroused at Upsala are far too gentle and pacific individuals to have any enemies, or to think of using such unlovely drinking cups if they had any. "Viking's mead" in a royal cornucopia was clearly the most appropriate chalice that could be used on such an occasion, and Prof. Max Muller gained the entire sympathy of his audience when he proposed that all future oriental congressmen should use the horn, not only in memory of Odin, but in honor of King Oscar. At all events, the orientalists did full justice to the contents of the flowing horn and doubtless separated with loud-resounding shouts of "Skoal! to the North land! Skoal! Skoal!

It is as easy to say that Odin—if such a person ever lived—was buried at Upsala as that Arthur was interred at Avalon and Alexander at Babylon. That which is topographically certain about the agreeable and hospitable Swedish city, famous for its university, and in the handsome cathedral of which undoubtedly repose the ashes of Gustavus Vassa, of Linnæus, and of Chancellor Oxenstiern, is that in the environs of the town there is an old-fashioned village which, according to immemorial tradition, is the site of the temple of the god Odin, and that close to this village there are three huge burrows or tumuli, which are popularly known as the tombs of Odin, Thor, and Balder. The two last were, of course, sons of the chief deity of the Scandinavian mythology. Thor seems at some period of his career to have visited Great Britain; at any rate, the memory of him was retained within our confines, for his appellation enters into many names of British places, such as Thorsby in Cumberland, Thunderhill in Surrey, Thurso in Caithness, and Torthowald in Dumfriesshire; and it is likewise shrewdly suspected that Thor is the etymon in Thursday, as the name of his mamma Frigga is in Friday. As for Balder, the peaceful god who was slain by the blind war god Hoder, but was restored to life at the general request of the gods in Walhalla assembled, he also might have come as far as Scotland and have given his name to some cairn or cromlech which many centuries afterward furnished a designation for Caleb Balderstone, the faithful retainer of the master of Ravensworth. Confusing, however, as are the manifold legends and traditions touching the Scandinavian gods and heroes, we are constrained as loyal subjects to believe implicitly at least in the existence of the sire of Thor and Balder since in the "Royal Almanack," published in the year 1746, in which there is given an exhaustive genealogy of the house of Brunswick, Odin is stated to be the founder of that illustrious family. But next to Odin we find Wig. Who was Wig? Was he a Berserker or a Viking or a Skald? Had he anything to do with Wigalois, who turns up in one of the romances of the minnesingers of the thirteenth century? There was a Wigamur, too, who was one of the Knights of the Round Table, and who came so very near killing in a terrific combat of two the doughty Prince Paltriot, ignoring the fact that his opponent was his own father. A closely similar incident is narrated by the transatlantic Skald, Leland, in his account of the exploits of Hans Breitmann during the war in the south, only the prowess of Breitmann is celebrated in about twenty stanzas, whereas the romance of Wigamur absorbs 6,000 verses in black letter. On the whole, we may consider the descent of the kings and queens of the house of Hanover from Odin as certain, and from Wig as possible. Still, there may be a considerable number of not unintelligent persons who may be somewhat puzzled to know what concern the members of an oriental congress can have with a town in Sweden and with a tumulus traditionally supposed to be the tomb of Odin. What have these earnest students of Sanscrit and Djagatar-Tartar got to do with the Scandinavian Odin, whose court was Walhalla, whose steed was Sleipner, a wonderful horse with eight legs; who had two black ravens and two wolves, and a spear called Gungner, and a ring named Draunner, which every ninth night dropped eight other rings of equal value?

Prof. Max Muller, however, and the other orientalists had an ample sufficiency of reasons for passing round the convivial horn and draining the "viking's mead" in honor of Odin. They considered him possibly from the legendary point of view as the son of Boer and the giantess Besla—Boer himself being the son of Buri, who was engendered from a block of salt which was licked by the cow Andumbia. Odin and his brothers killed the primordial giant Ymer and with his body formed the terrestrial globe, the only inconvenience arising from this being that the giant's blood became an immense deluge which drowned the major portion of humanity. The mythological Odin, who, in the two "Eddas," had n 140 surnames, possessed only one eye; he was constrained to hypothecate the other to Mimir, the guardian of the Well of Wisdom. It is melancholy to add that Odin, in addition to Frigga, had nearly as many wives as Brigham Young, and the number of his sons and daughters would have more than sufficed to fill the "family box" of the prophet at Salt Lake City. It is less, however, as a Scandinavian divinity than as an eastern king who migrated to northern Europe that Odin becomes an object of historic and philological interest to the orientalists. The old chroniclers of the Norwegian kings declare that the real name of the personage supposed to be interred at Upsala was Sigges, son of Fridulph, but that he assumed the name by which he is best known when he left that part of Asia situated to the east of the river Tanais, where he had been a priest of Odin, the supreme god of the Scythians. The chroniclers go on to say that Odin in his oriental aspect was king as well as priest, and that he reigned over an immense city called Asgard, but that when the Roman eagles became triumphant in the east Odin abandoned his kingdom, traversed Russia, and established himself in Saxony, then occupied by the Cimbrians, who eventually acknowledged him as Woden. But perhaps the very strangest and most inexplicable feature in the legend of the migration of Odin from the orient to the Septentrion is illustrated by the fact that in the museum of the City of Mexico there are preserved certain rolls of cotton cloth painted with figures after the manner of the Bayeux tapestry, and well known to "savants" as the "Peregrinations of the Aztecs," and in which antiquaries assert that they can trace the journeying of a Scythian race identical with that of Odin across Asia to the East cape, and so by Behring's straits into the new world. Odin, if this contention be true, may be the Aztec god Huitchlipotchli. Much more recent historians have sought to prove that Odin arrived in Scandinavia from Asia only in 40 B. C., while a later German critic distinguishes four different Odins, the second of whom fled before the victorious legions of Darius, bringing with him the Phœnician alphabet and the secrets of Freemasonry; while it was the fourth Odin, the son of Friedlaf, who, driven from Asia by the Romans, built the temple and city of Upsala. Amidst this huge chaos of legend, tradition,, dim history, and conflicting criticism there stands out clear and undeniable only the fact that Scandinavia was peopled ages ago by an oriental race; that other tribes of this race settled in Germany, and that in all probability many millions of Englishmen, in addition to our gracious sovereign and her family, have in their veins a strong infusion of the blood of Odin and Wig.

China is Moving.

China is just now voluntarily undertaking an enterprise which bids fair to have a more important influence upon her destiny than did the compulsory opening of her ports to British commerce nearly half a century ago. After years of hesitation and agitation a decree has at last been issued by the Emperor authorizing the construction of a railroad from Pekin to Hankow, a distance of about 700 miles. Hankow is on the Yang tse-Kiang, some hundreds of miles from its mouth. The avowed motive of this concession, so contrary to the ordinary course of Chinese conservatism, is warlike rather than commercial. The road is to be constructed as a part of the great military system which the empire is now busily engaged in developing and perfecting. Nevertheless, it is hardly probable that when the road is constructed and equipped its operations can be confined to military purposes. The beginning of railroad building into the interior of a country like China is like the letting out of water from a great reservoir. The end, it may with some confidence be predicted, will be, sooner or later, and probably not very far off at latest, the opening up of that vast country to foreign travel and commerce. Whether with almost revolutionary suddenness, as in the case of Japan, or by slow degrees, as in that of China, the great nations of the East are being aroused from the torpor of centuries, and emulating the activity and turmoil of Western life. It is not unlikely that the next decade may prove to be a turning-point in Chinese history. The possible results to civilization and commerce of the opening up by railroads of a country which contains within its own borders a fourth or third of the total population of the world, furnishes room and material for unlimited conjecture. Nor, amongst other possibilities to be taken into the account, can those of war and conquest be overlooked. There are already some predictions and perhaps some indication that the new military policy of the empire may bring it into conflict with western nations. A recent writer on Asiatic affairs goes so far as to hint that the nineteenth century may yet, before its close, see the Chinese Empire divided between Russia and Great Britain, the former taking the northern the latter the southern moiety. The improbability of such an event arises, it must be confessed, not from the strength or prowess of the Chinese themselves or from the lack of aggressiveness on the part of Russia, but solely from the peaceful tendencies of the British people of this generation.

Gentle Sarcasm.

"Mrs. Mulligan," said Mrs. Ginty, "is it well yer falin' the day?" "Yis, very well." "An' shtrong?" "Yis, quite shtrong." "Then, p'r'aps it's able ye'd be to bring back the two wash-tubs yez borried last Monday."—[Merchant Traveler.

It seems likely that the young Prince Albert Victor will be cordially received in the Indian dominions of his Imperial grandmother, and that while his visit is to be semi-private in character so as to dispense with the expensive practice of exchanging presents with the native princes, it will not be without an important political effect. The Bombay corporation have voted him an address, to be presented in a silver casket. He will be invited to open the new bridge at Madura to be named after the Prince of Wales. His uncle, the Duke of Connaught, will be at Bombay to welcome him.

From the Ends of the Earth.

"From the ends of the earth would I cry unto Thee, when my soul is over-whelmed".

Out of the trackless desert,
Out of the mountains steep,
Out of the thorny pathway,
Out of the caverns deep,
Out of my every trial,
O God, would I cry unto Thee,

Out of the midmost ocean,
Out of the tempest's roar,
Out of the angry billows,
Far from the shelt' ring shore;
Out of the raging waters,
O God, would I cry unto Thee

Out of the depths of my heart,
Out of my grief and my woe,
Out of the sorrow that none
But Thou and myself may know;
Out of my inmost soul,
O God, would I cry unto Thee.

The Message of the Morn.

I know the hush of misty morning woods,
The dim green aisles, the night-damp on the grass,
All dew-impearled the spider's viscous lure
Set to entoil where Summer idlers pass,

Across the path are writ in shadow-runes
The lore of leaves, the tales of waving trees,
The secrets told by errant, gossip winds,
The whispered wisdom brought across the seas.

It seems the time half way 'twixt wake and sleep;
The glamor of the night clings to the day,
And o'er the wood broods yet the drowse of dreams,
As mem'ry clings to love that's passed away.

Not yet is woke the wood to care and pain,
And slumber still gaunt grief and cruel strife
Of orphaned nestlings and of nests bereft,
And tiny tragedies of insect life.

Ah! would, my heart, that thou couldst learn to heed
The message told in this deep, silent peace,
The stately calm of this sweet Summer morn
From vain regret, might yield thee, then, surcease.

Her Beautiful Eyes.

Bright, bright are the stars in the blue of the skies,
As they beam on the world from above;
All golden and bright—but I love not their light
Like the light in the eyes of my love.
The beautiful eyes 'neath the tresses of gold
Where the bluest of heavens enhanced I behold.

And not for the light of the stars of the night,
If forever they shone in the skies
With never a cloud for a shadow or shroud,
Would I barter these beautiful eyes.
What musical meanings their glances impart!
They were made for a mirror to show me her heart.

A faithful, fair mirror. But some day I know,
A shadow above them will creep
And darken their glow, while the lids will droop low
At the kiss of the Angel of sleep.
But my kisses will close them—my kisses and sighs—
Till she wakes with God's light in her beautiful eyes.

The Husking of the Corn.

The golden days of Summertime have swiftly glided by,
And Autumn's subtle witchery is changing earth and sky.
The leaves have lost the emerald green they wore in vernal days,
The frost is kissing forest boughs into a scarlet blaze.

The grapes are purpling in the sun upon the woodland vine,
The air's invigorating as a draught of rich, red wine.
The earth is fair as clover-fields bedecked with dew at morn,
And Autumn welcomes with a smile the husking of the corn.

My mind goes back to other days, and better, if you please,
When boys and girls were wont to meet at jolly husking bees—
Girls who it really seems to me were handsomer by far
Than all the artificial ones the tailors make us are.

Those were delightful evenings when we mixed our toil with bliss,
For every red ear which we found secured the cherished kiss.
It isn't strange that now I feel so lonesome and forlorn
Since all my friends are absent at the husking of the corn.

English curates may have a little worldly wisdom occasionally. Lord Cowper, the patron of a Welsh living worth £300 a year, received refusals from many curates to whom he offered it, one of them, a Londoner, writing that he "found the place so insufferably dull that he was afraid he never would be able to accustom himself to it after the bustle and activity of town life."

M. Schneider, the great Creuzot iron master, has read a paper upon his proposed bridge across the British Channel between Cape Grisnez and Folkestone. He proposes to build it entirely of steel, for £34,000,000 in ten years. The large spans would be from 500 to 800 metres, and there would be a headway from the sea of at least fifty-seven metres. The cantilever principle would not be adopted.

Professor Tyndall has returned to England much improved by his sojourn among the Alps. He has suffered greatly from insomnia. Professor Tyndall is a pretty lively climber for a man of his years. He is in his 70th year. His first exploration of the Swiss glaciers was made thirty-three years ago, but not for love of adventure; it was for love of science. His object was to determine glacier motion, and he found, as he expected, that it was on the move—in fact, very fast.

The "Toy Symphony" was paraphrased at a London church the other night. The incumbent was away for his holidays, and two clergymen were dividing his duties between them. Through some misunderstanding neither appeared to conduct the service. For some time the organist filled up the blank and the congregation sang hymns. But music alone had not sufficient charms, and the congregation dwindled away by twos and threes until the organist was left alone in his glory.

Drinking Before Breakfast.

Professor Leuf says: In the morning the stomach contains a considerable quantity of mucus spread over and adherent to its walls. If food enters at this time the tenacious mucus will interfere to some extent with the direct contact between the food and the stomach necessary to provoke the secretion of gastric juice. A glass of water taken before breakfast passes through the stomach into the small intestines in a continuous and uninterrupted flow; it partly distends the stomach, stretching and to some extent obliterating the rugae; it thins and washes out most of the tenacious mucus; it increases the fullness of the capillaries of the stomach, directly if the water is warm and indirectly in a reactionary way if it is cold; it causes peristalsis of the alimentary tract, wakes it up (so to speak), and gives it a morning exercise and washing. Care must be taken not to give cold water when the circulation, either local or general, is so feeble as to make reaction improbable. We should not risk it in advanced age nor in the feeble, whether young or old, nor should it be given in local troubles like chronic gastric catarrh. In these cases it it best to give warm or hot water. The addition of salt is very beneficial. —[Philadelphia Inquirer.

A Conscientious Young Man.

Everybody was wondering why Willie Wishington had said nothing for so long, and a young lady said in a bantering tone:—

"A penny for your thoughts, Mr. Wishington."

"Aw, weally; I—aw—wouldn't like to pose as a wobber or a confidence man or anything like that."

And several people realized that maybe Willie wasn't as badly off as he looked.

An Ingenious Device.

An ingenious plan to straighten walls that have gone out of plumb was practised in Paris. The weight of the roof of the large gallery to the Conservative des Arts pressed the side outward so as to endanger the building; and it was requisite to find means by which the wall should be propped so as to sustain the roof. A series of strong iron bars were carried across the building from wall to wall, passing through holes in the walls, and were secured by nuts on the outside. In this state they would have been sufficient to prevent the further separation of the walls by the weight of the roof, but it was desirable to restore the walls to an exact perpendicular by drawing them together. This was effected in the following manner: Alternate bars were heated by lamps fixed beneath them. They expanded, and consequently the nuts, which were previously in contact with the walls, were no longer so. Those nuts were then screwed up so as to be again in close contact with the walls. The lamps were withdrawn and the bars allowed to cool. In cooling they gradually contracted and resumed their former dimensions, consequently the nuts, pressing against the walls, drew them together through a space equal to that through which they had been screwed up. Meanwhile the intermediate bars were heated and expanded and the nuts screwed up as before. The lamps being again withdrawn they contracted in cooling and the walls were further drawn together. The process was continually repeated until at length the walls were restored to their perpendicular position. The gallery may still be seen with the bars extending across it and binding together its walls.

A Singular Accident.

A curious accident which happened recently in Paris points out a possible danger in the wearing of combs and bracelets of celluloid. A little girl sat down before the fire to prepare her lessons. Her hair was kept back by a semicircle comb of celluloid. As her head was bent forward to the fire this became warm, and suddenly burst into flames. The child's hair was partly burned off, and the skin of the head was so injured that several months after, though the burn was healed, the cicatrix formed a white patch on which no hair would grow. The burning point of celluloid is about 180°, and the comb worn by the girl had attained that heat as it was held before the fire.

Going Back to Their own Styles.

The Ostasiatische Lloyd says that the Empress and members of the aristocracy of Japan have given up the idea of adopting the Western styles of dress for women. The Parisian models did not please the people in general, and the historic costumes will again be worn exclusively. The great "Lady tailoring establishment" in Tokio, which has been under the charge of a Parisian, has closed its doors for lack of work to do. The Lloyd greets the failure of the pretended reform, declaring that a more complete caricature was never seen than a Japanese woman in a bonnet and dress of the boulevards.

"That was rather queer conversation," observed a passenger who had overheard it, after the liver-ailing man had got off. "Oh, I had to hedge, replied the other. Where Doon rins, wimplin', clear,
Where Bruce ance ruled the martial ranks
And shook his Carrick spear,
Some merry, friendly, country-folks
Together did convene,
To burn their nits, and pou their stocks
And haud their Hollowe'en

—BURNS.

The charmed number, seven, (so called by the superstitious) rules the evening. So the girl who catches seven nuts, or any large number, which is a multiple of seven, is considered most fortunate. The one who receives the largest number of all (if it can be divided only by seven) is declared the fairy godmother, and she becomes arbitress of the "Shake."

Seven baskets are brought, into which the nuts that have fallen on the blankets are gathered.

Double nuts are said to signify an early wedding; clusters of three a legacy; four indicate great wealth; five a voyage across the sea; six fame as a public speaker; seven the possession of the gift most desired by the finder.

The fires are now, probably, sufficiently advanced so that the roasting of nuts, apples and late planted corn may begin. So with long pointed sticks, some spear the corn and apples, while others bury nuts and apples in the hot ashes. Still others name the nuts and lay them upon a shovel above the red hot coals, watching with deepest interest what their behavior while roasting may predict.

If the nuts roast quickly, it foretells long and true friendships. If they fly about snappishly, a quarrel is prophesied. If one or more bursts loss of money is to be expected. Those that keep moving are unstable, and those that fly off the shovel will remain single still another year.

The same mystic interest and meaning must enter into the apple roasting. Apples are named likewise, for those present, after which the apples must be turned seven times about on the palm of the hand before being confined to the ashes. If an apple cooks evenly to the core without scorching, and the seeds number seven or fourteen, or possibly twenty-one, great good fortune may be expected. If the core proves hard or worm-eaten, and less than seven seeds may be counted, bad fortune is anticipated. If the apple bursts its skin and flies in pieces, it indicates great wealth; if it fails to cook at all there is little hope of a wedding ring during the year.

Again, the corn roasting must go on under the mysterious influences of the fairy folk. The unhusked ears are placed by sevens in baskets. Each person chooses one. If the kernels are full and run in straight lines the full length of the ear a prosperous year is heralded; if the lines run unevenly, and the kernels are not found in full numbers and not well filled out, bad fortune is at hand. If the kernels number seven, or some multiple of seven, the evil omens may be overcome.

A Fable.

A certain cruel King sent his Servant to look for some lost Asses, promising the Death Punishment if not successful in his search. The Servant returned, leading Nine Men, saying:

"While I have not found the lost, I have done even better. Here are Nine Business Men having families, yet they neither advertise nor are insured. Lo, are they not Greater Asses than the Ones you have lost?"

"Thou art a Wise Man," said the King. Wear my crown and let me sit at Thy Feet until the Sun goes down."

To all such anxious fair ones I would in all kindness and confidence in the result advise them to take a ball of twine and while holding firmly to the end throw the ball up in a mow of barley and close your eyes and ask, "Cho a shide' suisi air cean ma ropan?" and if there is anything in the matrimonial market for you you will hear, "Mishe' Donnach a Ban" or "Fearlach Beag," as the case may be.

In case the reply is not forthcoming wind slowly and ask in solemn tones, "Am beille daoine air bi am so aha a gheari bean—Cair 'sone a tha thu dol? air falladhe." If your future life companion is a tailor, he may tell you to "Gear cota do Dhonul."

The Wee Bit Kettle in a Ferment.

Kristie, mak' haste, wuman, an' gang tae the door, yon's Wuliie coman tae hae a crack. Good mornin', Wullie. Come awa ben ma mon. An' hoo are ye? An' hoo is tho gude wife?

Verra weel, thank ye for spiein'. Jean is a' richt, but, Davie, am in sore distress this day. I hae a wee stirk yonner, an' as sure as ye're name is Davie he's gane clean demented.

"Gude preserve us," Wullie; hoo came that about? Div ye ken o' ony cause?

Ay, ye see, Davie, like ye did yerself, I gaed tae the ribbon, star an' gairter coourt o' law ye ken in Ditton, where the boilin' an' seethin' o' the bit social pot filled the hale toon and the surroundin's wi' a strong current o' electricitv, an' I economise, ye ken, I brocht wi' me a muckle tub an' took hame the fill o't o' water for the beasties, an' not ane o' them would tak' a drap o't exceptin' the stirk, an' it has ruined him wi'oot a doobt; an' it's a' thrae the bawd effect on thae waters o' the toon thrae fichtin' ane another.

Tak' a seat, Wullie, mon, an' haud yeresel in a' patience a wee. Need I tell ye 'am verra much grievt tae think that onything should gae wrang wi' the stirk, an' Kristie an' masel' wull gang an' hae a look at him; but, Wullie, what did ye think o' the affair, onyway, just atween us twa?

Think, Davie. Think, a just think that o' a' the strain at a gnat and swallow the caumel sort o' attempt at keepin' maitters richt yon farce was the maist provokin'.

Haud, Wullie, hoo div ye mak' that oot? Div ye think the greatest mon in oor midst wad walk a' the way tae the muckle chair or seat o' government tae hae the machinery fixed for Ditton an' yon cratur knocked oot o' office for nae reason at a'. Gie the maitter yere unbiased consideration; a ken weel ye are fashed aboot the stirk, but some ane has tae lose in a' battles for the right, an' gin it should dee a think Sir John himsel' mun gie ye anither or the worth o't.

Noo, Davie, that's eneuch o' that; 'am well aware that a hunner cents mean just ane dollar wi me, but it is no that, but as 'am a mon an' a Tory, it has just brocht the blush o' shame tae ma face an' ma heid is a' thrae ither tae have sic slurs cast on thae whae represents ma pairty in Ditton. Sic brawls, an' sic evidence, black, blue an' white, an' Wullie said yere great mon winna have mail handlt by a grit, but he's no tae high an' mighty tae make use o' Grit as weel as Tory siller.

Wullie, I just had a great ficht mysel' when big Tam gaed spierin' for Wullie Nelson. We a' ken weel that Wullie is just, wi' a clean hairt an' clear conscience, ay laboring for the gude o' the toon an' no frae ony personal feelins.

A, weel, Wullie, am sorry masel', but ye gin a mon disna gie oot a' letters an' a' the papers when caed for he canna be keepit there tae be makin' a foul o' a' the folk. Am a hurried masel' tae get awa fra a place sae divided against itself, an' as I was leavin the toon a gude lookin' mon wha resemblt big Alex. was ay tellin' ane o' the store keepin' bodies that a hoose built on the clay wasna ony mair secure than ane on the sand itself.

An', noo, Davie, 'am thinkin' we ay better gang nae mair tae yon toon, where, if they are 'a Jock Tamson's bairns, be they Grit or Tory, they are a verra crankit lot an' a' need a messionary.

FROM SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS OF THE ENTERPRISE.

Iona Station.

Things are booming at the Station.

Mr. Wastie has rented J. P. Martyn's farm for a term of five years at $200 per rear.

Mr. Pierce has moved into Mr. McLandress' house.

Thos. Burns is back from Windsor and expects to get a section on the M.C.R. in a few days. Mr. Burns was section foreman on the M. C. R. for nearly 15 years and never lost one day in that time nor had an accident happen on his section. This speaks volumes for Mr. Burns, and no doubt the M. C. R. are anxious to secure such reliable men.

The boys around the Station met together and concluded to put a new roof Mrs. Decow's house and appointed H. Brown overseer.

Jno. McNeil intends running his cheese factory another week.

W. McLandress shipped 225 hogs from this station last Friday and intends getting another car load up for next Friday. Mac. is our principal drover around here, the farmers being well suited with him.

R. McDonald is getting in over a carload of wheat dally. He is paying 80c. for standard.

Jas. Campbell is stocking his store with winter goods.

West Lorne.

Miss Flon, of London, and Miss Yaugh, of Rodney, are the guests of Mrs. Dan Kirkpatrick.

J A. Jamison, of Watford, has been engaged by E. C. Harvey to manage his drug store here.

Miss Jennie Palmer is away on a visit to her sister in St. Thomas.

A number of our eitizens drove out to the residence of Reeve Stalker one night last week, where they held an oyster supper. The evening was spent in eating the good things provided, toasting, singing, music and speeches, and all enjoyed themselves to their hearts content.

Squire McGregor, whose barns were burned some time ago, is replacing them with a new lot of buildings.

Miss Harper, of Pittsburg, Penn., is the guest of Miss Miria Greer.

Wm. Spencer, who has been ill with typhoid fever, is getting around again.

Mrs. Young has returned from Chatham, accompanied by her daughter who will renain here a short time.

Miss Maggie McEachren, of Detroit, is visiting her sister, Mrs. Fred. Mettam.

A new sidewalk is being laid by the post-office; the improvement is made none too soon, as it was badly needed.

Shedden.

Dr. Howell has sold his residence and practice here to Dr. Anderson of Woodslee, who will take possession on November 1st. Dr. Anderson is a practitioner of 20 years' standing and comes highly recommended. We much regret to lose Dr. Howell, who has made many new friends during his stay here. The members of the Canadian Home Circle surprised the doctor while he was spending the evening at Wm. Orchard's, Monday. A number of them walked in and presented him with an address, expressing their regret at his departure, accompanied by a gold ring. The address was signed by J. A. Powers, J. C. Horton and W. H. Morrison, on behalf of the circle, and was read by W. H. Norman, the presentation being made by W. H. Morrison. The Dr. replied in a feeling manner, expressing his regret at leaving Shedden. No sooner had the Dr. taken his seat than a number of the lady friends of Mrs, Howell came in and presented that lady with an address, accompanied by a pair of very handsome parlor urns. The address was read by Miss Maggie Orcharb and the presentation made by Miss Bertha Orchard. The Dr. replied on behalf of Mrs. Howell. He will locate in Welland, his former home, the citizens of that place having sent a largely signed petition for him to return there.

The Cusack Robbery.

At the St. Thomas police court Thursday morning Thomas Havercroft was charged with having on the night of the 1st of June, 1887, been one of the parties who assaulted and robbed Richard Cusack of $397. Burleigh Beach, who the police allege was Havercroft's accomplice, has gone before a higher tribunal, having been killed in the Wisconsin Central yards in Milwaukee. The evidence of Richard Cusack was heard, detailing the facts of the assault and robbery. He also swore that he was in the company of Havercroft and Beach, and others, at the Grand Central hotel a short time before he was waylaid, and that he exhibited his money to the crowd. Andrew Christmas testified that Havercroft told him that it was he (Havercroft) who struck Cusack down. Emily Goodwin, of Detroit, who was boarding at Havercroft's at the time of the robbery, testified that the prisoner told Mrs. Havercroft in witness' presence how he had committed the robbery, describing the manner in which he had tied the stones in the handkerchief. P. C. Stewart gave evidence to the effect that after Havercroft's arrest the latter admitted that he was in Cusack's company a few hours previous to the robbery, and also stated that it served Cusack right to get robbed; he had no business to be showing his money around. The accused was committed for trial.

The meanest man on record is the one who said recently to a young lady: "No, I'd rather not have you take my arm. It does no good and wears out my coat sleeve."

A Tale.

Havin' lived next door to the Hobart place f'r goin' on thirty years, I calc'late that I know jest about as much about the case as anybody else now on the airth, exceptin' perhaps it's ol' Jedge Baker, and he is so plaguy old 'n' so powerful feeble that he don't know nothing.

It seems that in the spring of '47—the year that Cy Watson's oldest boy was drowned in West River—there come along a book agent sellin' volumes 'n' tracks f'r the diffusion of knowledge, 'n' havin' got the recommend of the minister 'n' of the select men, he done an all-fired business in our part of the country. His name was Lemuel Higgings, 'n' he was as likely a talker as I ever heard, barrin' Lawyer Conkey, 'n' everybody allowed that when Conkey was 'round he talked so fast that the town pump'd have to be greased every twenty minutes.

One of the first of our people that this Lemuel Higgins struck was Leadner Hobart. Leander had just marr'd one o' the Peasley girls 'n' had moved into the old homestead on the Plainville road—ol' Deacon Hobart havin' given up the place to him, the other boys havin' moved out West (like a lot of darned fools that they was!) Leander was feelin' his oats jest about this time, 'n' nothing was too good f'r him.

"Hattie," says he, "I guess I'll have to lay in a few books f'r reading in the winter time, 'n' I've half a notion to subscribe f'r a cyclopeedy. Mr. Higgings here says they're invaluable in a family, and that we orter have 'em, bein' as how we are likely to have the family bymeby.

Lord's sakes, Leandner, how you talk! says Hattie, blushing all over, as brides allers do to hearn tell such things.

Waal, to make a long story short, Leander bargained with Mr. Higgings for a set of them cyclopeedies, and he signhis name to a long printed paper that showed how he had agreed to take a cyclopeedy oncet in so often, which was to be once in so often as a new one of the volumes was printed. A cyclopeedy is not printed all at oncet, because that would make it cost too much; consequently the man who gets it up has it strung along fur apart, so as to hit folks oncet every year or two, and generally about harvest time. So Leander kind of liked the idee, and he signed the printed paper and made his affidavit to it afore Jedge Warner.

The first volume of the cyclopeedy stood on a shelf in the old seckretary in the setting-room about four months afore they had any use for it. One night Squire Turner's son come over to visit Leander and Hattie, and they got to talking about apples, and the sort of apples that was the best. Leander allowed that the Rhode Island greening was the best, but Hattie and the Turner boy stuck up for the Roxbury russet; till at last a happy idee struck Leander, and says he, we will leave it to the cyclopeedy, bygosh! Whichever one the cyclopeedy says is the best will settle it!

But you cannot find out nothing about Roxbury russets or Rhode Island greenings in our cyclopeedy, says Hattie.

Why not, I would like to know? says Leander, kind of indignant like.

Because ours has not got down to the R yet, says Hattie. All ours tells about is things beginning with A.

Well, ain't we talking about apples, says Leander. You aggrivate me terrible, Hattie, by insisting on knowing what you do not know nothing about.

Leander went to the seckertary and took down the cyclopeedy and hunted all through it for Apples, but all he could find was Apple—see Pomology.

How in thunder kin I see Pomology, says Leander, when there is no Pomology to see? Gol durn a cyclopeedy, anyhow.

And he put the volume back onto the shelf and never sot eyes onto it agin.

That's the way things run for years and years. Leander would have given up the plaguy bargain, but he could not; he signed a printed paper and swore to it afore a justice of the peace. Higgins would have had the law on him had he throwed up the trade.

The most aggravating feature of it all was, that a new one of them cussed cyclopeedies was always sure to show up at the wrong time—when Leander was hard up or had just been afflicted some way or other. His barn burnt down two nights afore the volume containing the letter B arrived, and Leander needed all his chink to pay for lumber; but Higgins sot back on that affidavit and defied the life out of him.

Never mind Leander, says his wife, soothing like, it is a good book to have in the house, anyhow, now that we have got a baby.

That is so, says Leander. Babies does begin with B, don't it?

You see their first baby had been born; they named him Peasley—Peasley Hobart—after Hattie's folks. So, seeing it was for a book that told about babies, Leander did not begredge that five dollars so much after all.

Leander, says Hattie one afternoon, that B cyclopeedy is not of any account. There is not anything in it about babies except See Maternity.

Wall, I will be gosh durned! says Leander. That was all he said, and he could not do nothing at all, for that book agent, Lemuel Higgings, had the dead wood on him—the mean, sneaking critcritter!

So the years passed on—one of them cyclopeedies showing up now and then, sometimes every two years and sometimes every four, but allus at a time when Leander found it pesky hard to give up a fiver. It was no use cussing Higgings; he just laffed when Leander allowed that the cyclopeedy was no good and that he was being robbed. Meantime Leander's family had been increasing and growing. Little Sarey had the whooping cough dreadful one winter, but the cyclopeedy did not help out at all, because all it said was, Hooping Cough—see Whooping Cough—and of course there was not no Whooping Cough to see, being as how W had not come yet.

Oncet when Hiram wanted tc dreen the home pastur, he went to the cyclopeedy to find out about it, but all he diskivered was, "Drain—see Tile." This was in 1859, and the cyclopeedy had only got down to G.

The cow was sick with lung fever one spell, and Leander laid her dyin' to that cussed cyclopeedy, 'cause when he went to readin' about cows it told him to "See Zoology."

But what's the use of harrowin' up one's feelin's talkin' 'n' thinkin' about these things? Leander got so after awhile that the cyclopeedy didn't worry him at all; he grew to look at it as one o' the crosses that human critters has to bear without complainin' through this vale of tears. The only thing that bothered him was the fear that mebbe he wouldn't live to see the last volyume,—to tell the truth, this kind o' got to be his hobby, 'n' I've hearn him talk about it many a time, settin' round the stove at the tavern 'n' squirtin' tobacco juice at the sawdust box. His wife, Hattie, passed away with the yaller janders the winter W come, and all that seemed to reconcile Leander to survivin' her was the prospect of seeing the last volyume o' thau cyclopeedy. Lemuel Higgins, the book agent, had gone to his everlastin' punishment; but his son, Hiram, had succeeded to his father's business, 'n' continued to visit the folks his old man had roped in. By this time, Leander's children had growed up; all on 'em was marr'd, 'n' there was numeris grandchildren to amuse the old gentleman. But Leander wuzn't to be satisfied with the common things of airth; he didn't seem to take no pleasure in his grandchildren like most men do; his mind was allers sot on somethin' else,—for hours, yes, all day long, he'd set out on the front stoop lookin' wistfully up the road for that book agent to come along with a cyclopeedy. He didn't want to die till he'd got all the cyclopeedies his contract called for; he wanted to have everything straightened out before he passed away.

When—Oh, how well I recollect it—when A come along, he was so overcome that he fell over in a fit of paralysis, 'n' the old gentlemen never got over it. For the next three years he drooped 'n' pined, Finally he had to take to his bed, he was so old 'n' feeble; but he made 'em move the bed up against the winder so he could watch for the volyume of the cyclopeedy.

The end came one balmy day in the spring of '87. His life was a-ebbin' powerful fast; the minister was there, 'n' me, 'n' Dock Wilson, 'n' Jedge Raker, 'n' most o' the fam'ly. Lovin' hands smoothed the wrinkled forehead 'n' brushed back the long, scant, white hair, but the eyes of the dyin' man was sot upon that piece of road down which the cyclopeedy man allus come.

All to oncet a bright 'n' joyful look come into them eyes, 'n' old Leander riz up in bed 'n' says, "It's come!"

"What is it, father?" asked his daughter Sarey, sobbin' like.

"Hush?" says the minister, solemnly: "he sees the shinin' gates of the Noo Jerusalem."

'No, no," cried the aged man: "It's the cyclopeedy—the letter Z—it's comin'!"

An sure enough! The door opened 'n' in walked Higgins,—he tottered rather than walked, f'r he had growed old 'n' feeble in his wicked p rfessio.

"Here's the Z cyclopeedy, Mr. Hobart," says Higgins.

Leander clutched it; he hugged it to his pantin' bosom; then, stealin' one pale hand under the piller, he drew out a faded bank-note 'n' gave it to Higgins.

I thank Thee for this boon, says Leander, rolling his eyes up devoutly; then he gave a deep sigh.

Hold on, cried Higgins, excitedly. You've made a mistake—it is not the last—

But Leander did not hear him—his soul had fled from its mortal tenement, and had soared rejoicing to realms of everlasting bliss.

He is no more, says Dock Wilson, metaphorically.

Then who are his heirs? asked that mean critter, Higgins.

We be, says the family.

Do you conjointly and severally acknowledge and assume the obligation of deceased to me? he asked them.

What obligation? asked Peasley Hobart, stern like.

Deceased died owing me for a cyclopeedy! says Higgins.

That is a lie? says Peasley. We all seen him pay for the Z.

But there is another one to come, says Higgins.

Another? they all asked.

Yes, the index! says he.

So there was, and I will be eternally gol durned if he is not a-suing the estate in the probate court now for the price of it.

The Safest

AND most powerful alterative is Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Young and old are alike benefited by its use. For the eruptive diseases peculiar to children nothing else is so effective as this medicine, while its agreeable flavor makes it easy to administer.

"My little boy had large scrofulous ulcers on his neck and throat from which he suffered terribly. Two physicians attended him, but he grew continually worse under their care, and everybody expected he would die. I had heard of the remarkable cures effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and decided to have my boy try it. Shortly after he began to take this medicine, the ulcers commenced healing, and, after using several bottles, he was entirely cured. He is now as healthy and strong as any boy of his age."—William F. Dougherty, Hampton, Va.

"In May last, my youngest child, fourteen months old, began to have sores gather on its head and body. We applied various simple remedies without avail. The sores increased in number and discharged copiously. A physician was called, but the sores continued to multiply until in a few months they nearly covered the child's head and body. At last we began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In a few days a marked change for the better was manifest. The sores assumed a more healthy condition, the discharges were gradually diminished, and finally ceased altogether. The child is livelier, its skin is fresher, and its appetite better than we have observed for months."—Frank M. Griffin, Long Point, Texas.

"The formula of Ayer's Sarsaparilla presents, for chronic diseases of almost every kind, the best remedy known to the medical world."—D. M. Wilson, M. D., Wiggs, Arkansas.

CHAPTER V.

Kingsford, in the personality of Stassart, had been placed in the bed of his rival, and slept quietly and unsuspiciously till the ext morning. On waking he, naturally, ened his eyes and looked around him. He w a room, simply but tastefully furnished, with clean white curtains, through which the morning sun was shining brightly, while not very far off could be heard the rustle of trees mingling with the quiet flow of the waters that ran beneath their shade. A good-looking page boy was just entering the room, bearing his master's hot water.

Seeing the young man was awake, Raphael asked the usual question: "Shall I order breakfast now, sir?" and was much astonished at receiving the unwonted reply:

"Who the devil are you?'

With a look of alarm, he answered: "Please, sir, it's only me, sir—Raphael."

"But what are you doing here? and where am I?" asked the young man, looking round the unfamiliar room.

"Marster must have been taken very bad last night," remarked Raphael to himself. "I knows two gents had to put him to bed, 'cos I heard 'em tramping up the stairs." Aloud he remarked, soothingly: It's all right, Mr. Stassart, sir; shall I get you some soda-water, sir?" for the cherub knew the efficacy of that beverage in similar cases.

Kingsford began dimly to perceive that something was wrong, and determined to get up and dress. He told Raphael to go out, and have breakfast ready in twenty minutes, and, as soon as the boy had left the room, he went up to the looking-glass. To his surprise, he saw therein the face of Arlon Stassart. He turned angrily away and looked over his shoulder, thinking that perhaps he had spent the night at his friend's house, and that Stassart had just come into the room to greet him. Of course he saw nobody. He rushed to the window. Instead of the noisy London street, with the milk-boy and the grocer's cart, he saw a pleasant little garden, sloping gently towards the river that murmured at the end of the lawn. He turned to the glass again, and rubbed his eyes. Still the face of Arlon Stassart. The perplexed Kingsford began to remember strange stories of mesmeric influences, and to recall the experience of the previous evening. He remembered reading a German tale that told of a ghost appearing in the form of another person. It was evident that he was not, to the eyes of outsiders, Stanton Kingsford. On the contrary, he was a friend of his own, one Stassart, whom he had known at Oxford, and whom Gladys had once spoken about as being a rather too ardent admirer. Ah! Gladys—that might—— Good heavens! had Stassart, then, changed his personality by some devilish piece of mesmeric jugglery? Was he even now with Gladys—embracing her, kissing those sweet lips, while she was resting confidingly in his arms, as in those of her real lover? The thought made his heart beat wildly, the blood rush hotly to his forehead. He must go and see her—break in between them—thwart Stassart in the midst of his triumph! He began to dress feverishly, and hastened downstairs. Here he found Raphael waiting for him, and the breakfast ready on the table, with three or four letters beside his plate. I do not suppose he ate much breakfast—would you have done so in a similar situation? Suppose your ancient rival for the affections of Miss Brown had played a practical joke of this description upon you? Would you have sat calmly down to the matutinal egg and the early morning toast, while it was possible that your charmer was resting in the embrace of that low fellow Jones? Perish the thought! Would you not have rushed madly to her house, and confronted the villain J. in her very presence? yea, pulled his nose, and thrust him down the front door steps? That is what Kingsford would have liked to do, and such were the thoughts that were passing through his anxious brain. Only there was a very great difficulty in the way—no one would believe he was himself, and it would only appear to all as if he were the once rejected Stassart creating an unseemingly fracas in the house of his former inamorata. But he determined he would not be baffled by an obstacle such as this. He would be cool; he would not attack his rival in her presence; he would talk to her when she was alone, and convince her that he, and no other, was her real fiance, and that Stassart had only borrowed his personality in order to steal a mean advantage. With these thoughts in his mind, he called Raphael, and told him to bring him his hat and gloves, walked hastily to the station, found a train for West Kensington, and, after what seemed to him an endless journey, at length arrived there. He first went to his own rooms, and inquired for himself—asked if Mr. Kingsford were in? Humiliating position! thus to tacitly have to acknowledge his rival's success. His good landlady told him that "Mr. Kingsford" had just been into his rooms with Miss Meredythe, and that, after a few minutes, they had gone out again for a walk. "Mr. Kingsford" had said he would not be in for lunch.

The real Kingsford strolled sadly away, and his footsteps led him naturally towards the Park, where he had so often taken those pleasant morning walks with Gladys. Now she was walking with Stassart. Poor Kingsford began to understand, to a very harassing degree, the feelings of Othello after Iago's good-natured tale-bearing. His agonies were by no means decreased when he caught sight of Gladys and Stassart strolling quietly along a shady path, and evidently looking for a seat. "Shall I speak to them?' thought Kingsford, hesitatingly. "Oh! I must—I must! I cannot see her walking by his side so confidingly and trustfully, and not interfere. I will let him see that his trick will not be altogether successful." He approached them, and, raising his hat, said politely: "Good morning, Miss Meredythe. I hope you have not forgetten me." He took no notice of the traitor by her side.

"Oh no, Mr. Stassart," answered Gladys, cordially; "I am very glad to meet you again. Why, it must be more than a year ago since we met last, is it not? Don't you know Mr. Kingsford? Allow me to introduce——"

"Oh! of course we know each other," interrupted Stassart, the personifier of Kingsford, eager to prevent any accidental disturbance of their relations, for he saw that his rival understood the change of indentity. "I dined with him last night. Did you not see me, Stassart? You did not seem to recognise me."

"Thank you," replied the real Kingsford, coldly; "I recognised you perfectly?' Then, turning to Gladys, who was utterly astonished at this rude behaviour of one friend to another with whom he had dined the night before, he remarked, as if casually, "Do you believe in mesmerism, Miss Meredythe?"

"I don't know exactly what you mean by 'believing' in it," she answered, still more surprised at the abruptness of the question, and at his evident earnestness of manner. "I know it can produce some very extraordinary results."

"Oh! I think it's all nonsense," broke in Stassart, who began to feel that his rival, though under the disadvantage of not being himself, was treading on dangerous ground. "You will generally find it can all be explained away. I knew a man in South Africa, Gladys——"

"No one, sir, asked you to elucidate the matter with any of your own experiences," said Kingsford, in a most frigid tone. Gladys looked uncomfortably at the supposed Mr. Stassart, and wondered how he could be so rude. She tried to make peace.

"Have you come across anything of particular interest in that kind of thing, Mr. Stassart!" she asked, in a kindly tone. "You seem to be interested in the subject."

"I am," said poor Kingsford, "deeply interested. My whole life and happiness have been threatened by it. You see before you the victim of a mesmeric trick." Gladys looked bewildered. "You will hardly believe," he went on, "what I am going to tell you——"

"Oh! look here, Stassart," said the real owner of the name, "we don't want any of of your long-winded tales of wonder now."

"No," said Kingsford, at last losing his patience at this interruption, "you don't. It would expose you, traitor, coward, villain that you are!" He fairly shouted these words in his frenzy of excitement.

"I'm not going to stand this kind of thing from any man," replied Stassart, who, however, kept pretty cool, feeling that he had the best of the situation. But he thought it better to appear very excited. "If you are going to call people names in a public place like this, you will only get into trouble. Why, you are attracting a crowd already. Gladys," he continued, with much dignity, "let us come away;" and he moved off, with the frightened girl holding his arm, while he whispered to her: "Stassart must be mad. I know he drank a good deal last night, but I should not have thought it would have affected him so much." And to put the finishing touch to the scene, he spoke to Policeman X22, who had been watching the quarrel of two apparently respectable young men with interest, and said, as he dropped half a crown into his hand, "Just put the poor fellow into a cab, policeman; D. T., you know." The unsuspecting constable winked, and proceeded to carry out his instructions, and Stassart had the satisfaction of seeing his body, inhabited by his unfortunate rival, gently pushed into a passing hansom, while the policeman smiled knowingly at the driver.

So far he had triumphed over all his difficulties, and, indeed, congratulated himself upon the successful termination of the scene just recorded. But he foresaw that further difficulties were to come, and felt rather uneasy at the prospect. Gladys had been quite frightened by the quarrel between the two young men, and begged her lover to take her home at once. Their walk back was a quiet one, and they spoke little till they arrived at the house. As they went in Miss Meredythe remarked to Stassart: "Go into the drawing-room, Stanton, you will find auntie there. I will come down as soon as I have taken off my things."

Stassart did not know where the drawing-room was, but opened the first door he came to, which happened to be the dining-room. Gladys, who was going upstairs at the time, noticed it, and thought to herself, "Stanton really seems very absent-minded to-day; I wonder what has happened to disturb him? I never heard of that sunstroke before."

Stassart, meanwhile, had found the proper room, and tried to walk in as if he were quite at home, though he felt that his endeavour to appear so was not a conspicuous success. He was nervous, and his nervousness increased when he saw in the room two ladies, both middle-aged, talking eagerly together over a piece of fancy-work, Which was Gladys' aunt? He was unable to decide, for both of the ladies seemed so at home that he could not tell which was the hostess and which the guest. He resolved to make a dash at them, as it were, and to trust to chance that he should accost the right lady. But by the playful providence which generally directs our actions at such a crisis, he went up to the wrong lady, cordially shook hands with her, saying, "Good morning, aunt. Gladys has brought me to lunch with you to-day you see."

"Indeed, sir," said the lady addressed, who could not imagine who this young man was who called her aunt, and seemed so familiar. Mrs. Branxton, Gladys' real aunt, was simply aghast. What had come over Stanton that he should act in this strange way? Besides, he never was accustomed to call her by the familiar name of "aunt," but always Mrs. Branxton. She felt quite uneasy.

"Mr. Kingsford," she said, "you seem very absent minded. Don't you see you have made a mistake? What are you thinking of? This is my cousin, Mrs. Merivale."

Stassart felt miserable. But he did his best to get out of it. "I'm very stupid this morning, auntie dear," he said, "but the fact is, I had a return of that confounded sunstroke yesterday, and my head is not quite right." He hoped the "auntie dear" would soothe Mr Branxton. But she only thought he had become still more familiar, and did not quite like it. But, with a polite smile, she accepted his explanation, and turning to Gladys, who at that moment was entering the room, said laughingly: "Why, Mr. Kingsford is quite forgetting his friends. He actually took my cousin for me just now. He seem tetrait today."

"Yes," said Gladys, with a faint smile. "But he isn't quite himself; are you, Stanton? His sunstroke is troubling him again."

"Can I get you anything for it?" asked Mrs. Branxton, anxiously.

"Oh! no, thanks; it will soon pass off," said the false Kingsford. "I must be more careful this hot weather, that's all."

"Perhaps some iced claret would do you good?" suggested Mrs. Merivale, kindly. "It's very cooling, you know."

"Yes, you shall have some at lunch," said Mrs. Branxton. "And we might go to lunch now," she added; "I think Jones is sounding the gong."

The three ladies and Stassart went into the dining-room, and luncheon was served. The conversation was pretty general for some time, but soon became rather embarrassing. Mrs. Merivale was speaking of her son, who had recently gone up to Oxford.

"Ah!" said her cousin, Mrs. Branxton, "what is your brother doing now, Mr. Kingsford? He was at Oxford, was he not?'

Oh! yes," answered Stassart, making a wild guess, "he is up still and reading law," This was unfortunate. Gladys looked at him in amazement.

"Why, Stanton," she said, "you told me he was at Cambridge reading medicine, and would soon take his degree.'

"Yes," answered Stassart, "he was at Cambridge, but got ploughed, so he went to Oxford."

"How very singular!" remarked Mrs. Merivale. "I should have thought he would have tried again at Cambridge."

"Oh! he became very tired of the place, and the dons wouldn't have him in the college," answered Stassart, "so I advised him to go to the other University."

"Oh! your own University, is it not?" asked Mrs. Branxton, in the most innocent way. 'Let me see. I forget which college you were at?"

"Brasenose," replied Stassart confidently, for he thought Kingsford was a Brasenose man. He fancied he was safe this time. But Gladys corrected him again.

"Why, you were at Baliol, Stanton; I remember lunching in your rooms often in commem. week."

"Balliol! Yes, I said so, did I not?" he asked, with assurance.

"No, you said Brasenose," remarked Gladys.

"I meant Balliol, though, of course," he said; fine old college too. He felt safe again, and talked about Oxford quite enthusiastically, till Mrs. Merrivale asked another innocent question:

"What part of South Africa did you visit?" she said. "I have some friends out there, and I am rather interested in the colony."

"I was at Kimberly," he replied, "surveying the country round there for a mining company."

"Which company?" inquired Mrs Merivale eagerly; "I have been asked to take some shares in one of those mines, and should like your private opinion."

"It was the Kimberly Mining Company," answered Stassart at random. He would have been quite safe if Gladys had not known so much about it. She, unfortunately, was fully aware that it was another company, the "New Griqualand and Basuto," as it was called, in direct opposition to the one Stassart had named. But she said nothing this time.

Cimmerian optic! How thou hast possessed
Thy little world's attent. When thou wert fair
And like thy fellow, void of vicious air,
None with thy character seemed much impressed;
Now, in thy purple and fine linen dressed,
E'en modest maidens, passing, at thee stare,
Although they never met thee otherwhere.
In former days unstained, wert thou so blest?
Ah! Virtue's even course runs on for aye
And no one marks it. Good is reckoned nil.
So runs the world. Said any yesterday,
"Thy dexter optic! Lo! How free from ill!"
Yet now, meseems, the very asses bray
And o'er thy blackened woe hee-haw their fill.

THE LAKE BUMBOATS.

Hazardous Trade of Sailor. Comforts on the Huron and Clair Rivers.

There is a class of shipwrecks in the rivers between Lake Erie and Lake Huron that, because of the size of the ships and the value of the cargoes, are seldom written about in the newspapers. The ships are small—they are simply big Whitehalls—and the crew consists of but one man, while the cargo seldom exceeds $25 or $30 in value. Nevertheless, there are scores of veritable shipwrecks, many of them involving loss of life, among these little freighters. Within the past twelve or fifteen years some smart fellow discovered that the crews of the ships passing up and down through the rivers by the dozen and score every day were men of like appetite with other men. They were fond of apples and watermelons and sweet milk and pies and cakes and all sorts of garden truck in its season, and fresh meat and chickens and tobacco and home-made and other sorts of alcoholic drinks. The discovery was made at some one of the numerous piers along the rivers at which vessels sometimes stop to buy firewood at $4 50 a cord for three-foot hemlock.

Finding the demand good and the prices fair, the enterprising genius soon had rivals. The pier trade was uncertain, however, for the vessels as much as possible because of the extortionate price charged and the tendency to cheat in measure as well. So, since the vessels would not come to the truck peddler, the truck peddler must go to them.

He began by loading his truck into a common light river boat. He rowed out to a long line of schooners or barges in tow of a big tug bound up. He threw a line to a man on the first schooner and the man made it fast. Then he sold such stuff as he could, the line was cast off, and he dropped back to the next schooner. The traffic was good. The dealer was elated.

From schooners he went to the big passenger-carrying propellers, and there the trade was better yet. It was a novel thing and the vessel men rather liked it. But it was not long before the peddler came alongside a big propeller in such a way that the strain on the painter of the boat was more athwartships than fore and aft, and the little river boat was rolled over and broken in pieces before the poor truck dealer knew what ailed him.

Of course whether the first man to suffer such a mishap was drowned or not is not known. In any event, the business continued to grow and the accidents to multiply. It became evident in time that the river boat was not suited to the requirements of the trade, and special boats were constructed. They were much larger and considerably broader in proportion to their length than the ordinary river boat. They were fitted with a single sail, but were commonly handled with substantial oars. After a few of them had had the bows jerked out brought on the painter when it was made hard fast by the sailor on the ship, the boatmen got to putting extra timbers and diagonal metal braces in the bows of their boats. The boats got a liberal sheer forward and aft, so that they would be less liable to overturn. A line of rope fenders were stretched along the gunwales. Watertight and air-tight lockers were built in the bow and the stern and under the thwarts, not only to hold goods likely to spoil, but to make the boats capable of floating when overturned, or when broken in two, for that matter. The size of the painter was gradually increased from that of a half inch heaving line to a good solid inch manilla rope, and even that is sometimes found too small.

The truck boat best adapted to the trade, in the minds of the boatmen, is about fifteen feet long, five wide, and two deep. The boatman keeps two pairs of oars on board, for not infrequently one is lost or broken. A light, easily handled spar with a sail helps when the wind serves. Good oilskins and sou'westers are stowed handy for wet weather, but he is often wet through for all of that. With a cargo of stuff such as sailors fancy he pushes off and sails to the track of the coming tow of schooners or the steamer, as the case may be. He must look out for himself now, for the steamer will not vary her course save by accident. If he makes a mistake and gets under the bluff of her bow he is crushed under water and lost. If he gets too far away his line may fall short, or, being caught and made fast, the strain comes at such an angle with his keel that he is rolled over. He may get hung too far aft, and his boat is drawn in under the counter of the ship and knocked to pieces by

A BLOW FROM THE PROPELLER.

The wind and waves may drive him against the side of the vessel so hard as to made the boat spring a leak. Every one of these accidents has happened, not once, but many times during the past season, and nearly twenty lives have been lost in the fleet of truck peddlers between Huron and Detroit. It is a common saying among them that married men have no business "bumming."

The fall season is not only the best for the trade, but the most dangerous for the trader. The wages of the seamen are double in October what they are in July, and the cold weather gives the men an appetite for the goods not down on the ship's bill of fare. But the winds chill the trader. The choppy waves dash over and wet him. He is sometimes doused entirely by the plunge that his boat takes when the strain first comes on the line. His hands are numb and his senses less alert. He is caught foul and wrecked when he least expects it, and burdened by the weight of his clothing and numbed by the icy water he sinks out of sight and is lost.

Nevertheless the number of traders is increasing. When sales are made the profits are fair. The traders get acquainted with officers and seamen on the vessels. They thus get a trade that will sometimes wait for them. It is an invigorating and healthy business, and one that develops the wits as well as the muscles. The very uncertainty of the business and the great risks to life form part of the attractions that draw men into it.

A Proverb Well Indorsed.

"Remember, my boy, that time is money, and you must use it to the best advantage," said old Parrot to his nephew, at the conclusion of an hour's harangue.

"I will try to," replied the scapegrace. And as he looked at the kind old man's fifty dollar check in the hallway, he murmured: "Eighty-three cents a minute; that hour's been well employed?"

Telegraphing to a Moving Train.

The idea of telegraphing to moving trains had its inception as early as 1853; but of the many forms suggested all were impracticable in that they involved a mechanical contact between the train and the stationary conductor. Obviously, it is not feasible to make a circuit, either through a sliding arm projecting from a car, or by so modifying the track of a railroad that its rails may be utilized as electric conductors. But that this may be done by induction there can be no doubt, for its feasibility has been shown in daily practice upon the lines of the Lehigh Valley railroad for the past two years. A moving train may now receive messages passing along a neighboring wire almost as readily as New York communicates with Philadelphia by ordinary methods. Nor does the great speed of the train interfere with successful communication. If it could attain the velocity of a meteor, signals upon the wire would fly across the intervening space, inductively impressing themselves upon the metal roofs of the cars, with the same certainty as if the cars were motionless upon a side-track; and it is not even essential that the train and the line be separated by a clear air-space, for non-conducting or non-magnetic substances may be interposed without impeding transmission. During the memorable blizzard of March, 1888, the capacity of the system, in this particular, was subjected to an instructive test on the Lehigh road.—[Charles L. Buckingham, in Scribner's Monthly.

To Cure Snoring.

Only the man or woman chained to that rest-destroying angel, a snoring partner, can appreciate its sinfulness. The wicked emotions aroused in the soul of the sufferer against the sleeper can not be transferred to paper. Could a man or woman preserve their night thoughts of the innocent offender during the entire twenty four hours married life would be a bleak, treeless, unwatered waste. For this sort of affliction, if made public, a man or woman gets only the same class of sympathy accorded to malaria—a grinning "That's too bad." There is a remedy for ague; quinine is bitter, but it breaks up chills. There is a remedy for snoring, and that is bitter, too. Scientists have discovered that snorers are invariably great laughers and talkers, who exist principally with their mouths wide open, thereby clogging the breathing apparatus with dust and roughening the delicate cords by contact with crude air. To these good-natured and loquacious sleep-killers science says: "Shut up; keep your mouth closed; better deprive the world of your cackle and chatter than turn honey into gall and make marriage a failure." If this does not cure snoring, then Bob Burdette's remedy for dandruff is the only recourse—chop the head off.—[Washington Critic.

Joe Darby, the famous English jumper, intends visiting America. He has issued a challenge to jump any man in America from two to twenty standing broad jumps, with or without weights. Darby was coming last spring, but he injured a knee cap, and had to stop exercise. He is jumping better than ever now, and will undoubtedly show performances never before witnessed here. His best records, which are also world's records, are 26 feet 2 inches for two standing broad jumps with weights, 41 feet 7 inches for three jumps with weights, and 112 feet 4 inches for ten jumps without weights. He is a very solidly built man, 5 feet 9 inches tall, and weighing in jumping costume 166 pounds.

Unspeakable as the Turk is said to be, he is nevertheless the most spoken about personality in Europe. He is also said to be a sick man, but he is one of those sick men who never gets better, but is always getting worse. The world has just had another taste of his quality as a government, this time in Crete, the reports from which unhappy island are as bad as ever came from Bulgaria. He seems to fancy that he has a free hand among his Greek subjects owing to the jealousies of the European powers and bids defiance to Mr. Gladstone's "bundle him out, bag and baggage," policy. He will have to go, nevertheless, sooner or later, and the sooner the better. The powers have been roasting Turkey long enough, it were time the guests were bidden to the feast and let the carving begin.

We don't know whether or not any, or many of our readers, are interested in trotting horses, and so perhaps they will not care to be told that the past season, in the opinion of experts, has been quite remarkable for the speed shown by several stallions. For instance at the Chicago meeting last August, Axtell made his mile in 2 14¼, which is regarded as phenomenal for a three year old colt as he was. Nelson is a Maine sensation. He made a record of 2 14¼ and three straight heats in 2 15, 2 17¼ and 2.15. More recently a California stallion named Palo Alto, owned by Senator Leland Stanford made a mile in 2 13¾ in the third heat, the first two being won in 2 16½ and 2.17¾.

Prince Bismarck, although not yet seventy-five years of age, is said to be in appearance a feeble old gentleman. His health is anything but robust and he frets a good deal over the fear that he may not last much longer. His face is described as being waxen and flabby in appearance, his hands as yellow and large at the joints. He is not able to take very much exercise and this fact tends to depress him. He lives very simply on his estate at Friedsrichsrue. This estate was presented to the Chancellor by the old Emperor some fifteen years ago. There were then upon it two or three farmhouses and a hotel. The Chancellor took possession of the hotel for his own use and built a new hotel for the accommodation of travellers. He changed the old hotel very little. In fact, the painted numbers still remain on the bedroom doors of the mansion just as they were when it was used as a hotel. The Prince is very enthusiastic in the many varieties of trees he has on his plantation. He has a number of trees of American origin, including the Colorado red-wood, the magnifica, and some of the giant cypresses. He watches over these young trees with great solicitude. He lives in Friedsrichsruhe most of the year. When Parliament is in session or he has State business to transact, he removes to Berlin. He has a little place at Varzin which he goes to occasionally when he is residing at Berlin. The Prince, it is said, becomes more and more gloomy and he has forebodings with regard to Germany's future. He looks eastward for the coming trouble and believes that it will come through the advancement of Russia.

DR. DAMERON'S STRANGE EXPERIENCE.

A Modern Ghost Story With a Natural Ending.

[Written for the New Orleans Picayune.]

Some people harbor a prejudice against ghosts, mysterious rappings and spiritual manifestations of any sort; these, like Banda, in Sir Walter Scott's "Pirate," don't believe in but are afraid of them; others, like Minna, believe but do not fear, and others again laugh at anything of the ghostly kind as the most arrant foolishness, coined especially to furnish plots for children's tales, to which no sensible, philosophical person in this enlightened nineteenth century would give a moment's serious consideration. Charles Dameron, M. D., it must be said, rather belonged to this latter class. A hardworking, fast rising young physician, he was as level-headed a man as ever lived, with no nonsense about him, and yet not one of those disagreeables who would mold the whole world after his own fashion, and not too clever to tolerate and even enjoy nonsense in other people. He had never been in love but once in his life and passed through it as other persons pass through the mumps. It had not hurt him much, but since that time he was not inclined to regard every woman he met in the light of a walking angel.

It was one night in June, after an unusually hard day's work, that Dr. Dameron had the experience I am about to relate, an experience he has never accounted for as long as he lived, but "must simply place in the list headed, "Inexplainable." He retired that eventful night, giving orders that nothing, not even a call from the dead, should be allowed to disturb his slumbers. A couch of white rose leaves fanned by Circassian slave girls could not have been more acceptable than this bed, and no sooner had his head touched the pillow than he was asleep. That was at 11:30 o'clock, and it is not probable that he had slept more than three hours when he awoke all of a sudden, fancying he had been called, but seeing no one in the room turned over again, supposing he had dreamt it; but there it came again: "Doctor! Doctor Dameron, for heaven's sake help me!" He half sat up with an impatient exclamation on his lips, and saw in the dim light of his room a woman standing half-way between his bed and the door. She seemed to be dressed in some thing white, with a shawl muffled about her. The material that airily enveloped her head was lace. He could see her face perfectly well as the light from the window fell directly upon it, and noticed that she was pretty and dark eyed, but very pale and anxious looking. It takes a good deal to surprise a doctor, so this one really felt more annoyance than amusement at sight of his feminine visitor, and if he supposed anything it was that being denied admittance, she had forced her way to his room to importune aid for some sick relative or friend.

"What is it you wish?" he asked, not too amiably.

"Doctor," said a most appealing voice, "my sister, Hilda Stratton, is ill. She lives at 1222 West Fourteenth street. For heaven's sake go to her, now!"

"My good woman—girl—it is impossible! I am not well myself and worn out; I can't go anywhere to-night; you must get some one else!"

"But in the meantime she may die." There was positive anguish in her voice now and her face looked ghastly white and sad. "For heaven's sake, don't refuse me! Go to her, if you are human; go to her!"

It was curious that she used the word "go" instead of "come," as most persons would have done; but Dr. Dameron thought the strong excitement she labored under caused her to disregard grammar. He groaned aloud, for there was no resisting her despairing life and death appeal.

"Well, if she is as sick as all that there's no help for me, I suppose! Go on and I'll follow, or you can wait for me down stairs as it can't be pleasant walking the streets alone this time of night."

He heard a faintly uttered "Thank God!" Then before he knew it, she was out of the room, leaving so noiselessly that Dr. Dameron did not even hear the door close behind her or the sound of her retreating footsteps.

He dressed in a hurry and went down stairs expecting to find her waiting for him in the hall, but to his astonishment she was not there. Neither was there any sign of her to be seen on the street in either direction. "Little idiot!" he said. "I suppose she misunderstood me." However, he found the house, which was not more than three or four blocks away, without any difficulty and gave the door bell a resounding peal wondering why on earth the woman had not waited there for him, at any rate, so as to let him in; but as no one came he concluded that he must have reached the house before her, which was certainly queer. Finally, after two more peals, the sound of shuffling footsteps was heard and a sleepy-eyed old woman, holding aloft a candle, opened to him with rather a dubious air, as if he might be a highwayman for all she knew.

"I am the doctor!" he stated briefly, thinking that all sufficient.

"Who?" asked the old lady, curiously.

"The doctor! I have come to see the lady who is so sick."

"What lady?"

"Miss Stratton?" exclaimed Dr. Dameron in exasperation, stepping inside the door as she showed signs of shutting it in his face.

"Miss Stratton is not sick, sir!" she said in great surprise.

"Is not sick; what do you mean? Her own sister came after me and said the young lady was ill!"

"Her sister! Lord bless me, sir, don't you suppose the child would have come to me if her sister was sick, and I right here in the house with them and the only one to call upon!"

"And a very poor one, too," thought her listener; "well," he said, "as I have been called in to see Miss Stratton I don't intend leaving until I know whether there is anything the matter with her or not!"

"Then you had best walk up stairs and see for yourself, sir," answered the old lady, kindling indignantly.

"That is just what I intend doing, if you will kindly show me the way!" he retorted. They marched up the stairs, the old lady leading with her candle. Arrived on the second floor she stood still and stiffly pointed to a door. "There's their room! They always keep a light burning at night."

Dr. Dameron held up his hand with a gesture of silence. From behind the closed door came sounds like moans, faint but very penetrating. The old lady changed color. "Maybe she is sick," she muttered; "but it's strange they told me nothing of it."

"Are you their landlady?" asked the doctor. He was at the door trying to open it.

"Yes," she said. "Miss Hilda and her sister have lived with me for a year. Poor young things!" The door was locked; so she went around by another entrance to open it for him.

Dr. Dameron heard the moans more distinctly now, seeming to come from one in acute pain. "This is a strange affair, he thought. "Where is the girl who came after me? and why in thunder didn't she tell the landlady her sister was sick and get her to stay with her or send after me, instead of coming herself?"

His self interrogations were interrupted however, by the opening of the door. "I'm afraid she's mighty sick," said the landlady. They were in a large room, lighted by a night lamp placed on the floor. From a and at one end came the sounds they had heard outside; near it was a little cot in which a child lay sound asleep undisturbed by the half unconscious groans of its roommate. The doctor approached his patient; she was lying with closed eyes, her hair tumbled in great disorder over the pillow, her breath coming in panting gasps from her parted lips, and her cheeks crimson with fever. As he came near her she opened her eyes; they were brilliant with the same light that painted her cheeks red; she knew nothing, evidently saw nothing, but moaned unceasingly. Dr. Dameron saw that he had a very sick girl to deal with and turned sharply to his companion who was looking dismayed.

"Where is her sister?" he demanded. "Why don't she come to her?"

"There she is, asleep, sir," said the woman, pointing to the crib where the child of ten years or so lay. "Nonsense, not that child, of course not! Her other sister I'm talking about." She looked bewildered "She has no other sister here, sir, she and little Nan live all alone."

Dr. Dameron was completely staggered and concluded that the old woman must be crazy, but before that night was over discovered that on some subjects at least she retained her senses. For one thing she was a most efficient and kind-hearted nurse and relieved him greatly of the burden of responsibility thrown upon him so suddenly. Together they worked on Hilda Stratton in her sudden illness.

Mrs. West, for that was the landlady's name, said she had been slightly ailing for some days, and she supposed had overworked herself, for pretty Hilda was a music teacher, and with her earnings almost entirely supported her little sister and herself. They were orphans. Mrs. West had lived in their family for many years as housekeeper, for as she said they had nothing, as a small life annuity had died with their mother's death just a year before. There was another sister older than Hilda living in New York, but in St. Louis the two girls had no living relative. This much Dr. Dameron found out, though there was little time for talking.

He did what he could for the girl to whose bedside he had been called in so mysterious a manner and did not leave her until break of day when she was sleeping, with Mrs. West to watch over her. Then he returned to his home a perplexed and weary man.

In the solitude of his own room he tried in vain to solve the question: Who was the girl who had entered his room and entreated him to go to her "sister," when Hilda Stratton's only grown sister was miles and miles away from her.

Who ever the woman was, how did she get inside the house and his room and out again without being seen or heard, for the servants positively denied all knowledge of her visit. The doors were locked and bolted for the night, and the office man swore he had not let a soul in the house after his master retired, and had not been called to the bell once during the night. Dr. Dameron wondered at himself for not having felt more surprise when he saw the woman in his room, for it was not a usual thing for people to precipitate themselves upon him in that fashion even if their nearest relatives were dying.

He recalled the girl's white face with her dark shining eyes, the softly modulated tones of her voice, and suddenly remembered with a disagreeable little thrill, how suddenly and noiselessly she had left the room; why, he did not even remember seeing the door open and close behind her!

Well, there was nothing to do but accept the affair for what it was, a mystery; and though Charles Dameron had not a grain of superstition about him and was a scoffer at all such things, he was forced to admit against his own belief and judgment that this little affair had something of an uncanny aspect about it. But even mysteries he thought could be analyzed, and this he was determined to sift to the very bottom when the proper moment came.

Hilda Stratton was ill unto death and her little sister Nannie implored that Irene, the absent sister, should be sent for. Mrs. West also said, "if anything happened to Miss Hilda it would drive Miss Irene mad with grief," and she thought the latter should certainly be telegraphed to come at once "if the doctor thought there was real danger." The doctor thought the danger so very real that he sent the dispatch the day after Hilda was taken and Irene Stratton reading it in that far off city thought her heart must break with anguish and suspense before she could reach the sister dearer to her than her own life. And in the time that intervened before her arrival Charles Dameron thought much of a face with dark appealing eyes and fought the battle of life for his young patient right manfully, not only from a natural human sympathy, but for that absent sister's sake, the sister who would "go mad with grief" if anything happened to Hilda.

She came at last, and though Hilda had moaned for her incessantly, she knew her no more than she had known Nannie or Mrs. West, and still cried for "Irene, Irene!" When Dr. Dameron first saw her, she was kneeling by Hilda's bed, her face buried in her hands, for she was praying for that dear life. And when she lifted that face to him—Charles Dameron felt a strange secret thrill, not of surprise, for in his soul he felt it all along, but a thrill of recognition! Yes; there was the same pale, pretty face, the anxiety on it deepened to actual dread; the dark beseeching eyes that had haunted him, and when she spoke in earnest, grateful words it was the same voice he had heard before—the voice summoning him to the aid of her young sister!

But this peculiar recognition was on his side alone. She greeted him warmly, gratefully, for Mrs. West and Nannie had told her of his kindness and attention to Hilda, but not with the faintest symptom of ever having seen him before; and so he kept his secret, for a time at least. It was many a weary day and night before Hilda was out of danger, and in all that time Dr. Dameron was untiring in his care and attention, and what wonder is it that he won more than gratitude from Irene Stratton by that tender devotion to her dear one, and they were much thrown together in that time of dread and trial for Irene.

One night she told him something that he had wanted to know for a long time, for he had often wondered if she had had any unusual experience on that night when Hilda was taken ill; a presentiment, or forewarning, or something to coincide with her appearance or seeming appearance in his room.

It was towards the end of Hilda's illness, and she was lying in a deep, dreamless sleep. Irene and Dr. Dameron were sitting by her bed; Mrs. West dozing in the big arm chair by the window. In Irene's face was perfect peace and contentment, for the long battle was fairly over now and Hilda on the road to perfect recovery.

"Dr. Dameron," she said suddenly, breaking a long silence, "do you believe in dreams being sent sometimes as a forewarning of coming trouble?" He was startled, for his thoughts were running in that vein. I have never had much faith in forewarnings of any kind," he answered; "but why do you ask?"

"Because I had such a strange dream the very night Hilda was taken so ill. Of course it may have been a mere coincidence, because I was always thinking of her and was especially anxious just then, as she had not written for nearly a week."

"Well, what was the dream?"

She paused slightly. "I am afraid you will think me so silly to give it a thought!"

"Indeed, I will not. Pray tell me what it was?"

"Well, I did not fall asleep that night for ever so long, worrying, I suppose, over Hilda's silence and—other things, and I don't remember when I did go to sleep. For my dream, if dream it was, was so vivid I felt as if I was awake all the time. I thought I heard Hilda's voice moaning aloud in great pain and distress; it seemed as if she was trying to call some one and could not do it. I tried hard to get to her, but there was an impassable barrier between us; the groans grew more distinct and then I thought I saw her, as it were, at a great distance lying on a bed, flushed with fever and raging in delirium, and all alone, without a soul to help her. I do not know where I was when I saw this, but all around me seemed to be dark and only a faint, pale light came from Hilda's room. It seemed to me that I screamed aloud in my anguish and utter helplessness: 'God send some one to her! Help her! Help her!' The light of Hilda's room faded away and I was standing in a large, dark chamber. I could just make out the outlines of a bed and some one lying on it. I had a confused idea that there I was to find aid for Hilda and heard myself crying out: 'Help! for Heaven's sake help me! My sister is ill! for God's sake go to her!'" Dr. Dameron, started visibly at this, for that appeal, couched in those very words, was familiar to his ears.

"Well, what else?" he asked breathlessly.

"There was very little else. I had a vague assurance of aid and comfort—though that was dim and confused as dreams often are. But a strange thing about it was that when I awoke I was standing in the middle of the floor, the tears streaming down my face, and yet even in my sorrow I felt a sense of comfort in the firm conviction that God would send aid to Hilda if she needed it, just as if I had been told so." Dr. Dameron was strangely moved by the girl's story; it tallied so exactly with what had occurred that night that there could be no mistake about it tallied so exactly with what had occurred that night that there could be no mistake about it. Irene Stratton was in New York, he in St. Louis on a certain night in June, and yet notwithstanding the miles that separated them, she had appeared to him and had implored him in moving terms to go to her sister, who was lying at the point of death. That she should have left Hilda's condition was not so remarkable, for wonderful love compasseth all things and leaps with unknown speed o'er barriers of seemingly impassable space. But how she appeared to Dr. Dameron was not to be known.

Sitting with her that night he told her all; of the strange summons he had had, and how he arose, dressed and went in all haste to the very house she had designated, of his incredulous amazement when told that Hilda's sister was far away, and then of his recognition of herself and conviction that what he had seen and heard was not a dream but sober truth.

She listened in deep attention and awed silence until the very end, then said: "It was not a dream or delusion. I am sure that in the fearful anguish of that moment my spirit left the flesh and went to you for help. There is nothing strange to me in this. I cried to God for help and he helped me in that way, by sending me to you. Men do not know of what the untrammeled soul is capable. My body slept, but I am certain my soul was with Hilda that night!"

What was there to say to this? and what could Dr. Dameron believe save that her solution of the mystery must be the one nearest approaching the truth, in spite of all scientific scoffers and skeptics may say to the contrary?

It must have been intended that the two who first met so strangely should wield an uncommon influence over each other's lives, and viewed in this light there was only one thing to be done to save himself from a repetition of such spiritual visits, and it was not more than six weeks or so before Irene gave a blushing consent to this plan of Dr Dameron's, which was of course the old, old plan of making two lives one by a, it is to be hoped, happy marriage, with which ended Dr. Dameron's strange experience.

Jennie (sadly)—No, Julia, I'm not. Papa hadn't enough to pay his debts.

Something very much like a tempest in a teapot may now be witnessed in England. A correspondent of the London Times having protested against the injustice of compelling the younger boys in the great public schools to do compulsory ball playing out of school, a lot of old boys, Etonians, Harrovians, and Rugbeians, have rushed into print, protesting warmly against any innovation upon an old and salutary custom. Meanwhile this species of fagging—for it is nothing else—is still in full force, simply because it has been tolerated a century or more.

A little girl, daughter of Geo. Duncan, met with a severe accident on Tuesday. She was attempting to climb over the picket fence in front of the residence of A. J. Leitch and slipped and fell, her foot becoming caught between the pickets. On being extricated from her painful position it was found that her ankle had been severely wrenched, but fortunately no bones were broken. The accident will keep her indoors for some time, however.

A meeting was held in Duff's church, Largie, on Friday last, to consider the advisability of erecting a new church at that place. A site was chosen on the farm of John McIntyre, and collectors were appointed to canvass for subscriptions to the building fund. The members of the congregation are united in their object and a handsome edifice will no doubt be erected next year. The old church will be used for the Gaelic servics when the new one is built.

We regret this week to announce the death of Meredith Conn, sr., which took place at Tyrconnel, on Thursday last, at the ripe old age of 98 years. Mr. Conn was born in Ireland in the year 1791, emigrated to this country in 1824, and settled in the township of Dunwich on the lake road, about a mile east of Tyrconnel. He endured many hardships along with the other pioneers who first settled in what is known as Little Ireland. Some 28 years ago he, along with his son, moved into the village of Tyrconnel and engaged largely in the grain business and farming. His wife died a few years ago. He was a consistent member of the Methodist church and will be greatly missed by that body and many sympathizing friends. The funeral took place on Sunday and was largely attended by his numerous friends and acquaintances.

One of the most daring and clever robberies ever heard of in Dutton was perpetrated at the M.C.R. station on Saturday at noon. The agent, F. J. Armstrong, locked up the station at 12:18 and went to dinner, and a few minutes afterwards R. J. Catley, who intended going away on the local, discovered that some one had forced open the door of the office and torn the till from beneath the counter. Mr. Armstrong was at once notified, and on examination found that the entire receipts of the day, amounting to $92.45 had been carried off the only thing left in the drawer being the lower left hand corner of a dollar bill which had been torn off by the thief in grabbing the money. The poker of the waiting room stove had evidently been used in forcing the door, and the money drawer was smashed to pieces in tearing it from its position. Detectives Heenan and DesRosiers were notified of the robbery and are at work on the case, but no clue to the perpetrator has yet been discovered, but the general impression seems to be that he is not far away. For cheek and daring the thief that worked this job takes the cake, as the station is seldom left for five minutes without somebody being around, and he was liable to be interrupted at any minute.

The whole truth.—Caller: "Bridget, is your master in yet?" Bridget: "No, sorr, he's out on bail."

LIFE WAS A BURDEN.

UNTIL lately I suffered from headache, always preceded by constipation, making my life a burden. A friend advised Burdock Blood Bitters. I took three bottles, and now feel myself a new man, and my headaches are things of the past.

Sufferers

FROM Stomach and Liver derangements—Dyspepsia, Biliousness, Sick-Headache, and Constipation—find a safe and certain relief in Ayer's Pills. In all cases where a cathartic is needed, these Pills are recommended by leading physicians.

Dr. T. E. Hastings, of Baltimore, says: "Ayer's Pills are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of my profession."

Dr. John W. Brown, of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I have prescribed Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

"For a number of years I was afflicted with biliousness which almost destroyed my health. I tried various remedies, but nothing afforded me any relief until I began to take Ayer's Pills."—G. S. Wanderlich, Scranton, Pa.

"I have used Ayer's Pills for the past thirty years, and am satisfied I should not be alive to-day if it had not been for them. They cured me of dyspepsia when all other remedies failed, and their occasional use has kept me in a healthy condition ever since."—T. P. Brown, Chester, Pa.

"Having been subject, for years, to constipation, without being able to find much relief, I at last tried Ayer's Pills, and deem it both a duty and a pleasure to testify that I have derived great benefit from their use. For over two years past I have taken one of these Pills every night before retiring. I would not willingly be without them."—G. W. Bowman, 26 East Main st., Carlisle, Pa.

"Ayer's Pills have been used in my family upwards of twenty years, and have completely verified all that is claimed for them. In attacks of piles, from which I suffered many years, they afforded me greater relief than any medicine I ever tried."—Thomas F. Adams, Holly Springs, Texas.

It Made Mother Strong

"My mother has been using PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND for nervous prostration, accompanied by melancholia, etc., and it has done her a world of good. It is the only medicine that strengthens the nerves.' G. H. BEERS, Orbisonia, Pa.

"I am in my 64th year. Have been afflicted in several ways—could not sleep, had no appetite, no courage, low spirits. I commenced using Paine's Celery Compound, and felt relief from the third day after using it. I now have a good appetite and can sleep well. My spirits and courage are almost like those of a young man." S. C. KINKAID, D. D., Gonzales, La.

Paine's Celery Compound

Strengthens and builds up the old, and cures their infirmities. Rheumatism, indigestion and nervousness yield quickly to the curative power of Paine's Celery Compound.

A Perfect Tonic and Invigorator, It GIVES NEW LIFE.

"I am now 69 years old and have tried several remedies, but none had any effect until I used Paine's Celery Compound. I feel entirely different for the short time I have used it. I can walk nearly straight, sleep sound and well, and feel as though there was new life and energy coming into my whole system." H. MYLIUS, Cleveland, Tenn.

Paine's Celery Compound is of unequaled value to women. It strengthens the nerves, regulates the kidneys, and has wonderful power in curing the painful diseases with which women so often silently suffer.

WHY COUGH,

WHEN a few doses of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral will relieve you? Try it. Keep it in the house. You are liable to have a cough at any time, and no other remedy is so effective as this world-renowned preparation. No household, with young children, should be without it. Scores of lives are saved every year by its timely use.

Amanda B. Jenner, Northampton, Mass., writes: "Common gratitude impels me to acknowledge the great benefits I have derived for my children from the use of Ayer's most excellent Cherry Pectoral. I had lost two dear children from croup and consumption, and had the greatest fear of losing my only remaining daughter and son, as they were delicate. Happily, I find that by giving them Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, on the first symptoms of throat or lung trouble, they are relieved from danger, and are becoming robust, healthy children."

"In the winter of 1885 I took a bad cold which, in spite of every known remedy, grew worse, so that the family physician considered me incurable, supposing me to be in consumption. As a last resort I tried Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and, in a short time, the cure was complete. Since then I have never been without this medicine. I am fifty years of age, weigh over 180 pounds, and attribute my good health to the use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral."—G.W.Youker, Salem, N. J.

"Last winter I contracted a severe cold, which by repeated exposure, became quite obstinate. I was much troubled with hoarseness and bronchial irritation. After trying various medicines, without relief, I at last purchased a bottle of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. On taking this medicine, my cough ceased almost immediately, and I have been well ever since."—Rev. Thos. B. Russell, Secretary Holston Conference and P. E. of the Greenville District, M. E. C., Jonesboro, Tenn.

The valise stolen from the M. C. R. station at Alvinston has been found by section men on the track between Alvinston and Inwood.

Detective Wesley Webb arrested J. E. Gardiner at Clinton for unlawfully practicing medicine, and Justice Clark fined the "doctor" $50.

T. Doyle, night operator at the Air Line station, St. Thomas, has been transferred to Aylmer, and is succeeded by Mr. Norris, of Lawrence.

Mr. Northwood, of Chatham, bought the bankrupt stock of Thomas Cole, Ridgetown, at 51½ cents on the dollar. It was invoiced at $4,487.

It is reported that St. Thomas is to be made the headquarters of all the freight crews running over the G. T. Air Line from Windsor to Niagara Falls.

Thamesville is enjoying a boom. According to the Herald several barns and outbuildings are being erected and a man has sold a half acre of land for a cemetery.—Ridgetown Standard.

The duties of excise collected in the city of St. Thomas during the month of October, 1889, were:—On spirits, $1,297.07; tobacco, $313; cigars, $242.80; malt, $2,286.33; petroleum fees, $45.30; total, $2,366.50.

A Frenchman's brindle cow took occasion to challenge the right of way over the Canadian Pacific railroad with a construction train Thursday near Tecumseh, and although she did not live to see it, yet thirteen cars are piled on top of each other on both sides of the track.

Under the new time table on the M. C. R., which comes into effect on the 11th inst., Moorhead station, on the eastern division, will be abolished and the station building removed to Canfield crossing, to which point the siding has been extended. The station will in future be known as Canfield.

The county engineers of Middlesex, Elgin and Kent met at Bothwell and decided to recommend to the councils of these counties the construction of an iron bridge to replace the wooden structure across the Thames there. The bridge will consist of two spans of 125 feet each, with one stone abutment, one stone pier and one iron abutment. The bridge will cost upwards of $20,000.

It is now stated that the collapse of Jas. Pickard, of Exeter, is far more disastrous than was at first anticipated. It would appear that the total amount of liabilities foots up to something like $76,000. He is the reputed owner of a large amount of real estate, but this security is so handicapped with first mortgages that the proceeds over and above those claims will not realize a sufficient sum to satisfy the other creditors.

The Canadian Pacific Railway have perfected a time table for the running of a mail train which for speed will eclipse anything known in the history of railroading. No passengers will be taken, and it is to run from Vancouver or Port Moody, B. C., to St. John, N. B.—from the Pacific to the Atlantic—in four days. It was requested by the Home Government for the speedy transit of the English mail which passes between that country and China, Japan, Australia and the ports in the Indian ocean where there are English interests. The experimental train will be given four days. Fourteen locomotives will run, each doing about 250 miles. These or some of them, are now ready for the rail, and will be distinguished by having red smoke stacks, driving-wheels and running gear. Though not of extra weight, the capacity of the tender will be double that of ordinary machines. It is quite likely that the train will be put on as soon as the St. Lawrence freezes over.

A STOLEN IDENTITY.

"Well, what do you think of it?" asked he lady, in a business-like tone.

"Oh! a very fair investment on the whole," he replied, "though of course I must not betray any secrets."

"Of course not," Mrs Merivale said; but you might tell me who are the directors. My husband may know some of them."

Stassart was quite at a loss. "I really orget their names just now," he said, "but will send you a prospectus, if you like."

"Thanks," said the lady, "I should be glad if you would;" but to herself she remarked that he certainly was a most absent-minded young man. Not know the names his directors, indeed! Certainly very rgetful of him. However, she said no more, and, luckily for the representative of Kingsford, the rest of the conversation during the meal did not touch upon subjects with which he was unfamiliar, and he congratulated himself that, after all, he was getting on pretty well.

When Gladys and he were left alone together after lunch, Stassart hoped that there would by a temporary cessation at least rom his perplexities. But fate did not seem at all propitious to him to-day. Almost the first remark that Gladys made was:

"Oh! Stanton, what time ought I to be ready?"

"To be ready, darling?" answered Stassart. 'Ready what for?"

"You don't mean to say you have forgotten again?" asked Gladys, with a tone of some vexation. "You promised to take me to call on your friend Mrs. Audrey. You know you said you would like us so much to know each other."

Stassart was hopelessly in a fix. He did not know who Mrs. Audrey was, nor where she lived. He must make some excuse.

"Don't let us go to-day, Gladys," he answered; "it's so hot and dusty. We'll stay here instead, dear; or go for a walk again, if you like.'

"Oh! but, Stanton, if I don't go to-day," she said, "I don't see how I can go at all, or I'm so busy now, you know. And besides," she added, in a plaintive tone, "I've kept this afternoon on purpose, and put off Eva, who wanted to come and see me very particularly."

"Well, I don't want to go, Gladys," said her supposed lover. "Mrs. Audrey can wait. I don't care so much about her as all that."

Gladys was becoming not only surprised, but vexed. "Think, Stanton," she remarked, "you are very inconsiderate. You told me only two days ago how much you wanted us to meet each other, and said so much about her that I felt quite anxious to call, and kept this very afternoon free for that reason. And now ou refuse to take me, just because you are oo lazy to go out."

"It isn't that, Gladys," said Stassart, whose own temper was by this time a little ried; "only I don't care much about it to-day."

"I don't think you care much about me either to day," answered his lady love, with some asperity. "You have forgotten everything, and seem so strange and——"

"Gladys, dear, you know I care for you," said Stassart, hoping to soothe her. "You know I do, darling," he repeated, coming closer to her and placing his arm round her. He pressed her closely to him and once again imprinted a burning kiss on her lips while his eyes looked with fierce passion into hers. Gladys felt frightened. This was not at all like Stanton's ordinary manner or look. She tried to draw quietly out of his embrace, but Stassart would not let her go. His clasp grew tighter and his kisses more eager. Gladys felt now thoroughly angry.

"Let me go, Stanton!" she cried. "I don't want to kissed; and you are very unkind to-day, and I don't like it. And—and I wish I had asked Eva to come now, instead of putting her off like that," and she pouted with vexation.

"Well, you can if you like," said Stassart, sulkily; "I'm not going to Mrs. Audrey' anyway.'

"You are very horrid, Stanton," answered the girl; "and I think we had better go up stairs and talk to auntie instead of quarrelling here."

"If you like," replied he, coldly, and followed her up to the drawing-room. As they went in, Mrs. Branxton, seeing Gladys' vexed look, asked with a smile, "What have you two been quarrelling about? That will never do——" But she was interrupted by the servant opening the door, and announcing "A gentleman to see Mr. Kingsford, please."

A cheery old gentleman of some sixty years of age, with a pleasant open face, walked in and went up to Stassart, shaking hands with him in a most hearty manner.

"Very glad to see you again, my boy," said the old gentleman, who was in reality the uncle who had sent the cheque that morning. "I called in to see you at your rooms, but they told me you had come here for lunch, and as I am only in town for a day, I thought I might venture to call too."

"Certainly, sir; delighted to see you," answered the bewildered Stassart, wondering who on earth it was. He stopped short, quite embarrassed, well aware that he ought to introduce him to the ladies, and not knowing in the least who he was. He felt the ladies were looking at him. Gladys, who had turned away to a side table as she came into the room, looked round again, and stared in wonder at the awkward pause which followed. The sicuation was becoming too ridiculous. Stassart felt he must do something.

"Allow me to introduce my uncle James, Mrs. Branxton," he began, nervously. The old gentleman started in amazement.

"Your uncle James, sir!" he almost shouted. "You mean to say you don't know me from that idiot James, sir! What are you thinking of, Stanton?"

"I am very sorry, uncle—sunstroke," he began, apologetically.

"Sunstroke, sir!" cried the old gentleman, who, though cheery, was choleric. "Sunstroke be hanged! You've never had sunstroke. You won't know your own father next. Introduce me at once, sir, and don't stand gaping there."

Stassart felt it was a crisis. He looked at the three ladies, who had risen from their chairs, and were staring in amazement at this extraordinary conduct on the part of the supposed Kingsford. Gladys, recognizing the caller as Kingsford's uncle Jonathan, was dumb with surprise at her lover's apparent madness. Her would-be lover saw it was hopeless.

"I am very sorry—I don't know the gentleman," he began desperately. Then, losing, his temper at this unfortunate rencontre, he burst out "And I wish I had never come here—and I'm not myself to-day. I am going out, I can't——" And without further explaining this extraordinary utterance, he rushed wildly out of the room. Seizing his hat, he pushed past the astonished servant at the door, and ran madly to Kingsford's rooms in Edith Terrace. He had quarrelled with Gladys, made himself appear a perfect imbecile, and had broken down altogether, just because some old idiot of a relative had chosen that day to call and see the man whose shape he wore. The luck was all against him. After this he had no choice.

CHAPTER VI.

He arrived at Kingsford's lodgings, and hastened hurriedly to his room, uttering a deep curse at his ill-luck as he shut the door. As he did so, a man with haggard face and disordered clothing jumped up from a chair near the window. It was the real Kingsford, who had been waiting for his rival.

Stassart gave an involuntary start of horror and surprise as he saw his own form, with a desperate resolve written in his face and a blaze of deadly anger in his eyes, advance to meet him. His own Self was rising against him, ready to strike him down in the midst of his mortification and failure. He involuntarily made a movement of self-defence as Kingsford strode savagely towards him.

"You villain!" exclaimed Stanton, breathless with rage, "so you have come back at last. By heavens, you shall not return alive. Ha! I thought you would come. You have not succeeded in your trick—I can see that by your face. And it is as well you did not," he went on, with terrible earnestness," "or, by God! I would have shot you like a dog, even if you had been with her." He pointed a revolver at his rival as he spoke. "Look here, Stassart," he continued, "I know the trick you played me. It was clever, I admit—so clever that no one but ourselves can see through it. But I warn you of this, you don't go out of this room again alive unless you accede to my terms. I am desperate, and I would die willingly now if I could only kill you first."

Stassart looked at his rival, and saw that he meant what he said, and that he was mad with rage. He thought it best to keep cool, and not provoke him further.

"Put down that revolver first," he said, "and then I will talk to you."

"Talk to me!" shouted Kingsford. "You will do as I tell you, Stassart, or else, as I am a living man, I'll shoot you on the spot."

"I should not care much if you did," answered the other gloomily, knowing his cause was lost. "It's all up with me, anyhow. I will do as you like. Sit down, and I will explain to you."

He poured out a glass of wine from a decanter that happened to be on the table, and, drinking it hastily, went on:

"I have played you a mean trick, Kingsford; I own it. I am a traitor; you need not tell me that. But I was mad when I did it—mad with love for your bride. You don't know, perhaps, about my love for her. I loved her when I met her at Oxford more than a year ago. I told her then of my passion. It was useless, for she loved you too well. I left her, and for a whole year have done nothing but think of her and brood over my wasted hopes." Even while he spoke he could not help thinking how curiously this confession was made. He was speaking to his own Self, who was sitting opposite to him, haggard, desperate, with a fierce light of righteous indignation in his eyes. It was like talking to a visible accusing conscience. The thought made him speak more unreservedly. He went on: "Then I was tempted by that d—d little Japanese fellow, Kotaro, with his cold-blooded suggestion of a scientific experiment. I honestly think I did not realise the baseness of my action till I had begun. And then I was too much afraid of what my two accomplices would think to draw back. Amida Sama told me of the possibilities of changed personality, and I allowed him to practise his arts upon you. Well, it was of no use. Gladys seemed to suspect me from the first. She would hardly let me come near her."

A grim smile passed over Kingsford's face at this, and Stassart saw his conscience mocking him as it sat visibly opposite in that chair.

"People asked me questions I knew nothing about; and, to crown all, some old relative of yours came in, and I didn't know who he was. I was in such an infernal fix that I bolted. And I don't care how soon I'm out of it."

It afforded Kingsford some satisfaction to know this, even in the midst of his misery. "You had better get out of it as soon as you can, then," he said grimly.

"With pleasure," said Stassart, almost eagerly; "only we must go to Amida Sama in order to be restored again to our proper and respective identity. Let us go at once."

"Yes," answered Kingford, putting away his revolver. "You had better lose no time.'

The two young men went out together. The afternoon was far advanced, and dusk was coming on. Kingsford, still in Stassart's form, impatiently hailed the first cab he saw and told the driver to drive to the Japanese doctor's house. Fortunately he was at home, and took the two rivals to his inner room without delay.

"I know what you have come for, my friends," he said, with his quiet gaze. "The experiment is too successful, is it not?"

"It depends upon how you look at it," answered Stassart, gloomily.

"Too d——d successful for me, sir," said Kingsford. "You nearly ruined my happiness by your cursed experiment. And the only amends you can make is to undo it again as quickly as may be."

"Yes," said the doctor, "I must acknowledge that your position was uncomfortable. I confess I had not paid sufficient attention to your probable feelings before beginning the change. I will make all the amends in my power."

With his usual calmness of demeanour he looked at Kingsford, who gave himself up to his gaze unreservedly. The magic sleep fell upon him. Then Amida Sama beckoned to Stassart, who gloomily submitted to the same operation. The doctor looked at the two young men lying before him in a sleep as of death.

"A delicate experiment," he said aloud; "'tis a pity it could not be completed. But Western minds are very little advanced as yet;" and he sighed pityingly. A dead silence fell upon the room.

Stanton Kingsford arose, and looked round him. He was in his own body once more. But the room was empty, and he saw no way out. He hesitated for a moment, then rang a silver bell that stood on a table near at hand. An Oriental servant appeared, apparently through the wall, and bowed him out by the narrow door thus disclosed. Kinsford would fain have questioned him, but the man pointed to his lips, and Kingsford remembered he was dumb. The young man went out into the night.

He never heard from Amida Sama or from Stassart, and did not care to trace them after one or two fruitless attempts. When next day he went to call on Gladys, she clasped him in her arms, and kissed him passionately.

"My darling," she cried, "I have nearly lost you!"

Stassart had written explaining all. The day before the wedding a Japanese mute brought Gladys an exquisitely wrought jewel-case containing a wealth of diamonds and pearls, utterly beyond the girl's Western ideas of magnificence. They were truly Oriental in their splendour. But Gladys never wore them. And some people remarked that she was very superstitious about hypnotic influence; "which, after all, you know, is all rubbish," as they wisely added.

[THE END.]

Bruno's tue at Rome.

The erection at Rome of a statue to Giordano Bruno, who on the 17th of February in the year 1600 was publicly burned in that city for the heresies alleged to be contained in his philosophical writings, is a noble act of justice to the memory of a great and much injured man. It is more than this, however, for it bears emphatic witness to the determination of the Italian government and people to range themselves on the side of the wildest freedom in speculation, and thus to place their whole civilization under the auspices and guidance of the modern spirit. It is satisfactory that, amid not a few partial signs of reaction, we have this great and formal vindicatien of the principle of intellectual liberty on the part of one of the leading nations of the world. When we read of the thousands of telegrams of sympathy sent to the Pope in connection with this event, we cannot help wondering how the sympathizers, who, it may be presumed, all enjoy a fair measure of civil liberty in the countries throughout which they are scattered, would themselves like to be in the hands of a power that could bring them to the stake if their opinions were not of the pattern which that power chose to approve. From the modern point of view the execution of Bruno was simply cold-blooded murder by ignorant fanatics of a man immeasurably their superior in knowledge and intellectual power; and who, by his refusal, in the face of death, to recant his opinions, proved himself possessed also of the highest degree of moral heroism. He was accused of atheism in his day, but his system of thought was pantheistic rather than athestic. He believed that the universe had an animating soul, which was diffused through every form of material existence, giving to each the powers and properties it was found to possess. He was a warm upholder of the Copernican system of philosophy; for adherence to which Gallileo also suffered at a later date. He believed that the universe was of infinite extent and embraced an endless mulitude of worlds. In a word, he had broken the fetters of ecclesiastical dogma, and had entered on a career of original speculation and research. No wonder he was considered a dangerous man, and that first the prison, and finally the stake, were his portion. Times, however, have greatly changed; and he who was led as a criminal to death for having dared to think for himself and uttered his thought, is now placed on high on the honor-roll of the forerunners of modern liberty and civilization, and is gratefully remembered by thousands of intelligent men and women the world over.—[Popular Science Monthly.

Aurora Borealis and Sound.

The published observations upon the aurora borealis made by Mr. Tromholt in 1882-3 touch upon many of the curious and inexplicable phenomena of that subject. Among these is the traditional accompaniment of sound. Upon this point the scientist says:

There is no point relating to the aurora borealis which is more disputed than th sound which some persons say accompanies the phenomena—at all events at certain times. It is described as of various natures, viz.: cracking, whizzing and hissing, from nearly every part of the world where the aurora is visible, and the faith in the "sound" is as orthodox among the Eskimo of Greenland and the Lapps of Finmarken as the people of Siberia.

Even Captain Dawson and his party, the English Circumpolar Expedition to Fort Rae (1882), assert that they distinctly heard the sound one night when passing up the Great Slave Lake; and in latitudes much farther south, too, people aver having heard the noise.

Well, the remarkable part of this question is that all other scientists who have sojourned for a length of time in northern regions have never heard the slightest sound which could, with any amount of certainty, be ascribed to the aurora borealis.

Without absolutely refusing to believe in the possible existence of such a sound, I fancy that there must be some acoustic deception or misunderstanding which has created this belief in an auroral sound. During my stay in Lapland, I was daily surrounded by people who believed as firmly in the sound as in the Holy Gospel. Yea, at Bossekop they even told me that they did not think there was any aurora borealis at all until it whizzed, and yet I maintain that of all the intense auroræ I have observed in various parts of the Arctic regions, and which I am sure I have watched with more attention than is generally bestowed on them, every one has been perfectly silent.

ST. HELENA'S LEGENDS

Tales About the Island where France's Greatest Sovereign was a Prisoner.

When stout Juan de Nova Castella about the beginning of the sixteenth century started out from Portugal in his tub of a ship to go prowling about the world, seeking what he might discover, no doubt he had his head full of dreams of glory. Columbus had done well, but who could tell what remanied beyond the vast continent which Columbus had ound. Who could say but what there might be half a dozen more continents on the other side of the world, compared with any one of which the land of Columbus was a mere trifle in size and importance. So away went Juan and his hardy crew of Portuguese daredevils, eager to discover a new world and Christainize or cut the throats of its inhabitants.

Where they went and what they found when they went there is not of much consequence at present, since the most notable incident of their voyage took place on St. Helena's day, May 22, 1502, when they sighted a strange land and at once turned in its direction. It was a rocky, mountainous island, of no great size, being only ten miles long by seven in width, on every side presenting precipitous shores, barren cliffs, from 600 to 1,500 feet high, standing out of the sea, pierced here and there by a narrow cleft, through which a tiny stream had forced its way. But Juan was not to be deterred by barren cliffs, knowing well that appearances are often deceptive, so he skirted his way carefully round the island till he came to an inlet guarded by two mountainous promontories, one of the crags projecting to such a shape as to resemble a hugh nose, whereas the navigators were not a little disturbed in their minds, since it was well known that the devil had a personal interest in all heathen countries, particularly in islands, and generally "staked his claim" by setting up a sign, by impressing his face on the rock or carving it into the shape of one of his hands or feet.

So Juan and his crew knew as soon as they came in sight of the crag that Satan had been there, but trusted to luck that he might have gone away again, or, if not, might be driven away by the powers of the holy emblems, relics they had thoughtfully provided themselves ere leaving Portugal. So they came to anchor in the bay at a safe distance from the ill-favored promontory, which they dubbed the Devil's Nose, and set a man to watch, so that his Satanic majesty might not take them unawares, and went to sleep. How the man watched till he became nervous, how he jumped every time he heard a splash of water, how he saw strange sights on the beach, how he stared at the nose till he saw it move to and fro as though in derision, while a pair of eyes glared from behind it, would all make interesting reading had Juan or anybody else preserved the story for us. But they did not, and all we know is that they landed on the beach and set up a cross to scare away the devil, who fled so precipitately that he forgot to take his nose, so left it, and it remains on the rock to this blessed day. So they took the island, and in memory of the day on which they discovered it, and in gratitude to the saint, who no doubt had aided them against the evil one, they called it St. Helena.

At present the only relic of the Portuguese occupation is connected with a curious natural monument in a valley of the island nown as the Friar's dell. A large, isolated stone stands near the middle of the glen, and as it bears some resemblance to a gowned and cowled monk the Portuguese straightway fitted it out with a legend on this wise: Ages and ages before they found the island it was inhabited by a solitary monk, who was greatly bothered by the temptations to which he was constantly subjected by the demons who resented his intrusion. For a long time he successfully resisted their temptations and the importunity with which they besought him to leave the island, until they were at their wits' ends how to get rid of him. Finally, one day wandering in the glen near by, he was no little surprised to see flitting before him the figure of a beautiful girl.

Never before having seen any girls on the island, his curiosity was excited and he sought a nearer view. But the girl was as scary as a crow, and do what he could, it was a long time before he could catch more than a glimpse of her drapery as she vanished round the corner of a rock. But he learned to watch for her, and after a time to think about her, even when at his prayers. At last he was permitted by the coy maiden to exchange a word with her, but only a word, for, like a flash, she was off whenever he attempted an approach. Of course he was piqued, and equally, of course, he fell in love with the girl and besought her to marry him. After long refusal she finally consented, when he led her to the chapel he had constructed in the valley, intending there to espouse her before the altar, when, in an instant, an earthquake shook the island, the chapel, the crosses, the altar disappeared, the beautiful maiden changed to a mocking demon, and there stood the deceived friar, a pillar of stone, a perpetual reminder of the danger of flirting with unknown girls. The negroes of the island, brought there during the Dutch and early English occupation, have learned the legend and regard the stone friar and his vicinity with holy horror, never, save under compulsion, visiting the glen. When Napoleon was on the island he offered one of them a large sum to go there at midnight, but in vain.

After examining his conquest old Juan was disgusted enough to turn it over again to its original possessor, for there was not a trace of gold or silver; not a jewel was to be found in it from one end to the other. So he left the cross on the landing-place to indicate his ownership and to dismay Old Nick when he came back after his nose, and sailed away in search of other worlds, little thinking that the only thing he ever did that would be remembered in history was the discovery of the bleak rock he left behind. But when he got back to Europe he told about the island, and it was put down in the maps and acknowledged to belong to Portugal because nobody else wanted it enough to try to take it, and occasionally a Portuguese ship on the way home from the Indies would call there and get water.

By and by the Portuguese naval power began to decline and the Dutch von Tromp gave himself airs in various parts of the world, parading up and down the English channel with a broom at his masthead, by way of a hint that he meant to sweep the English off the face of both earth and sea, and a Dutch man-of-war called at St. Helena, and, without the formality of asking the permission of the two or three Portuguese families living there, took the island in charge, built a little fort, made a road up the hill, ever since known as Ladder hill, and told the Portuguese if they wanted their island to come on and take it. The Portuguese did not want it enough to fight for it. So they said: "Let the heretics have it," and duly rejoiced when, fifty years later, it passed out of the hands of the Dutch into those of the East India company.

To this great military and mercantile corporation St. Helena was a valuable possession as a water station for their ships on the homeward voyage, not for the outward-bound ships, for such is the situation of the island in the ocean, such are the peculiarities of the trade winds in that part of the world, that a sailing vessel, to reach the island, must overshoot it far to the west, then again to the south. It was this peculiarity and advantage of position which determined the British cabinet to choose the rock as a prison for Napoleon, for not only would a hostile squadron be greatly delayed, but the East India company had strongly fortified the island and held it with a considerable garrison.

The natural features of St. Helena are the same now as when old Juan steered his crew of cut-throats past the Devil's Nose into the harbor, but every spot is hallowed by the memory of Napoleon. Up to quite recently there were living a few old islanders who remember the lively excitement that was created on the island when a British vessel came into the harbor, and it was announced to the astonished population that a man-of-war was on the way thither with Napoleon on board as a prisoner. The inhabitants had heard of Leipsig and Elba, but so slow was news in those days that the return from Elba, the Hundred days, the hurried preparations for war, the rush to arms all over Europe, the campaign of Waterloo, and the second abdication were to them unknown. But they all understood that thenceforth their island was to be famous, one of the noted places of the earth, a place to which pilgrimages would be made, whose memory would live in story and song as long as that of the most extraordinary man the world ever produced.

The memorials of Napoleon are numberless. Here are the Briars, the first home of Napoleon on the Island, where he resided until the house prepared for him by the British Government was completed. The island is full of stories of his captivity. How he played with the children and ran away from the angry cow; how he tried to frighten one of his childish friends by brushing up his hair and giving a Cossack howl; how he helped the little girls in their French exercises, correcting their idioms and spelling; how he would sing, or attempt to do so, with his peculiar squaling voice; how he was fond of displaying his horsemanship on the lawn; how, with maps and red and black pins, he fought his battles over again; how he helped rig out a negro slave as a ghost to frighten the family; how he explored every nook and corner in the island and asked questions about everything you will read in the histories.

Longwood, the emperor's permanent home on the island, is in the same condition as when he left it, though now it is a museum of Napoleonic relics. Here he endured a living death for over five years. Longwood is situated on the largest of the plains of St. Helena, in a singularly forbidding part of a singularly desolate island. It is said that the mighty heart of the emperor sank within him when, from the deck of the man-of-war, he contemplated the island that had been selected by the British government for his prison and even more cheerless than the view of the harbor is the prospect from the windows of Longwood. Not far away is a little rocky valley where the great soldier sometimes walked. It contains three conical mountain known as Lot and his Daughters. Fairy Land is the name of the glen, and on more than one occasion runaway slaves and criminals have found temporary safety in the almost inaccessible clefts of these column-like mountains. At the foot of one of these Napoleon often took his stand and watched the sea, perhaps looking for the deliverance that never came. During the first two years of his captivity he confidently expected to be by some means released, anticipating that European complications might necessitate his recall, but with failing health came the conviction that he was not destined to leave the rock alive. Five years and a half after his arrival on the island he died in a little dark room, very meanly furnished, and his body was borne to the grave prepared not far away. Here he was buried. It was his desire that his remains should rest in France, and if the English forbade, in Corsica; but many years passed before the English government would allow the transfer of his body to Europe. The English feared even a dead Napoleon, and would not give up the remains. At last, in 1840, the French government of England yielded, a French squadron was sent, and, with all the honors that were paid to the living man, the dead conqueror left his island and came back to the people who still worshipped his memory.

A Legend of Mace's Bay.

About a century ago a rakish-looking schooner bore down to Mace's Bay, which strikes in from the Bay of Fundy, on the New Brunswick coast. After some manœuvering, she ran into the bay and came to anchor. A boat was lowered, and, with muffled oars, the men pulled for the shore. The moon peeped through the clouds sufficiently bright to throw light upon the whole proceedings. The men dug a hole and buried their treasure. The bearings were taken, and the boat again headed for the vessel, which was soon running out of the bay, with a stiff breeze after her. The men who were engaged in this buisness have all long since been placed under the ground, and the whereabouts of the treasure has been kept a secret until recently the chart locating the treasure found its way into curious hands, who determined to investigate. The secret was known to two only, who one year ago went to the spot, dug up the longhidden box, and returned it to its hiding place. They admit finding the treasure, in evidence of which it is said that one of the men has begun the erection of a fine dwelling near St. Stephens. They refuse to divulge their secret or make any explanation.

TOPICS OF THE TIME.

Sir. Francis de Winton, late Governor of the Congo State, says that in spite of the scores of explorers who have been traversing Africa in all directions since Livingstone began his travels, the larger part of the many millions of natives have never yet seen a white man. As we trace the routes of explorers on the map we see that their tracks make merely a network over Africa, and that there are enormous unvisitad spaces between the lines. As yet we can only infer what large regions and the people who live in them are like from the reports of perhaps a single traveller who has hurriedly passed through the country.

Since the world set about the exploration of Africa in earnest, however, acquaintance with no part of the world has advanced so rapidly in so short a time. The coasts of Africa were outlined centuries ago, but it took three centuries and a half to completely map the coasts of North America. More than one-half of this continent was almost wholly unknown a century ago, and more than three centuries elapsed before all its western border was discovered. It is a curious fact that while geographical enterprise, pure and simple, has revealed most of the secrets of inner Africa, the fur trade was the chief influence in unfolding the nature of our far West and the northern part of our continent.

It is now over four months since the great Conemaugh disaster took place, and yet we find it noted as a remarkable fact in a recent despatch from Johnstown that two days and a half had just elapsed without a body being found. The discovery of the remains of the victims has continued daily, it would seem, ever since the date of the disaster, and there is no knowing how many corpses still lie buried in the debris. Although the streets have all been opened, many lots and cellars have not yet been touched, and the beds of the Conemaugh river and Stony creek are one half cleared out. The exact loss of life, it is now certain, will never be ascertained. Miss Clara Barton, the head of the Red Cross Society, who has spent the whole summer in ministering to the wants of the needy, is just about to close her work in the valley, having from first to last attended to over twenty thousand cases.

The news that missionaries on the shores of Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika are alive and in good spirits will be received with rejoicing by those throughout the world interested in those missions. Nearly a year ago a lieutenant of the British army who had almost, by accident, found his way to mission station on Lake Nyassa, and who had conducted the desperate defence of the missions against the Arabs who had attacked the stations and the people among whom the missionaries worked, returned to England, leaving the missionaries in the midst of the hostile slavers, who outnumbered them greatly. He promised to secure reinforcements and return, but his urgent appeals to the British public have not yet been successful, though a great project of establishing a British protectorate over all the unoccupied lake region and thoroughly ruling it by means of small military stations on the healthy highlands near the lakes, has been taken up and is being pushed.

There were over sixteen millions of dollars' worth of minerals of all kinds mined in Canada last year. The increase in the output of coal was about 250,000 tons, making the total output about 2,758,000 tons. The value of the gold produced was over $1,100,000, and 80,000 odd tons of iron ore were contributed to the wants of the nation. There were 22,500 tons of phosphate mined and 50,000 tons of salt was found under the crust of Canada. The value of other leading products for the year are as follows: Asbestos, $255,007; bricks, $1,400,746; building stone, $641,712; cement, $95,593; charcoal, $87,000; copper, $667,543; fertilizers, $21,600; glass and glassware, $875,000; granite, $147,305; graphite, $51,129; gypsum, $179,393; lead, $27,472; lime, $339,951; limestone, $16,543; manganese ore, $47,044; mica, $30,207; mineral water, $10,456; moulding sand, $755,571; pyrites, $85, 655; sewer pipes and tiles, $66,320: slate, $90,689; steel, $472,611; sulphate acid, $122,515; terra cotta, $49,800.

The game of cross purposes played by the powers in Bulgaria is illustrated in a striking manner by three recent items in the cable reports. A St. Petersburg paper demands that Austria shall stop intriguing in Bulgaria, while an agent of the Czar has been moving at Sofia for the expulsion of Prince Ferdinand from the throne of that distracted country. Then comes the announcement that an Austrian bank has lent Prince Ferdinand twenty-five million francs. We are thus enabled to fix the storm-centre of the troubles that threaten Europe. Russian objections to Austrian intrigues are rather amusing in the face of constant irritation kept up by Russian Government agents on the same ground. But it appears that something like a child's bargain was proposed by the Czar at his recent visit to Berlin. He will let Austria alone in Servia, if Austria will let him alone in Bulgaria. It is a simple programme on the surface. But, as Russia is racing for Constantinople, and Austria for Salonica, and neither wants to be outstripped in the run by the other, a good deal of jockeying is only to be expected.

An opportunity for a settlement of the Behring sea difficulty is approaching. The lease of the sealing grounds by the Alaska Commercial company expires on the 1st of May next. But already we see by American newspapers a lobby has been formed to secure a renewal of the lease from Congress. Opposition has also formed, and here is where the curious point comes in. This opposition alleges that the Alaska Commercial company is in reality more English than American, that its operations are carried on in the interests of British shareholders, and that while the American press and politicians have been whooping up American claims and demanding the exclusion of Canadian poachers from Behring sea, certain very respectable, quiet English gentlemen are enjoying the profits. To make the situation still more comical, it is alleged that these Canadian sealers are in part, at least, owned by Americans who float the British flag to obtain a share in the trade gobbled by Englishmen under the stars and stripes! A more amusing mixture of trade and national questions could hardly be imagined. Evidently all the "smart" people in trade are not located in the United States.

THE V SHAPED NICK

Why Placed at the Juncture of the Coat Collar with the Lapel

Did you ever wonder why that little V-shaped nick was placed at the juncture of your coat-collar with the lapel? says a writer in the St. Louis Republic. I suppose you have. Occasionally we all have our little ruminating spells and fall to wondering the whys of the many odd things we see about us. Hold your coat up before you and you will see at a glance that it will "set" just as well without the nick as with it. Therefore, the matter of fit can not be given as a proper solution of the fact that it is there. Without apparent purpose this nick is clipped from the lapel of every frock coat worn in the world. But there was motive in the madness of the man who adopted the little insignia of distinction. I will tell you about it: When the first Napoleon gave way to his ambition he tried to implicate Gen. Moreau in Pichegru's conspiracy. Moreau had been Napoleon's superior and was very popular, but under the circumstances, as Napoleon was on top, it was not safe to express publicly any sympathy with Moreau; so his admirers secretly agreed to nick their coat lapels to show who they were. Carefully note the outlines of the first coat-front you see that is well fitted and buttoned and see if you can not plainly detect the initial letter M in its windings. The M will appear upside down, the little nicks forming its sides. M was the initial letter of Moreau and his champions were known by the nicks in the lapels of their coats.

PRAYERS AT A LYNCHING.

Religious Services Held by a Mob at a Hanging in South Carolina.

COLUMBIA, S. C., Oct. 29.—Some very curious facts in connection with the recent lynching of young Robert Berrier for the murder of his mother-in-law near Lexington N. C., have just come to light. A party who witnessed the hanging says Berrier was taken from the jail at 1.30 and immediately carried to the outskirts of the town under a large oak tree. Here the mob stopped and asked the prisoner if he was ready to die. Berrier said he would be if he knew he would meet his wife and babe in heaven. The mob then informed him that he would be allowed time to prepare for death.

About this time a drummer who was in town came upon the scene and asked to be allowed to pray with the condemned man. His request was granted and he knelt down by the side of Berrier and prayed very fervently that God would save his soul. During the the prayer many hearty "amens" and such responses as "Lord grant it," etc., went up from the mob. For more than three hours praying and regular religious services were conducted. A few minutes before midnight Berrier expressed his willingness to die. He was then placed upon a horse with a rope about his neck, and then, as an appropriate hymn was raised, the horse was led from under him, and the body was left dargling in the air.

Hints For Reading.

"Read according to some plan or system."

Don't wait for books to come to hand, and don't read as many people are supposed to fall in love, simply as a matter of propinquity. It is a universal truth that the best way of living is to do the duty that lies next one, but this truth does not apply to books. Too many people read the books that lie next them, and read no others. These contiguous books are sometimes good and often bad, but they are always miscellaneous.

The habit of reading is easily formed, and once formed there is small danger that you will lose it. It is a habit which grows stronger as one yields to it, and its resources of pleasure are so many and so unfailing that no one cares to break away from its thrall. No man or woman, except during those crises which occasionally interrupt the regularity of life, ought to be willing to live without constant intercourse with books. Books are the necessity of a full, rich, intelligent life—unless one happens to be a Stanley opening up a continent, and even in that case books go with the arsenal and medicine chest.

It is surprising how much time ravels out and escapes us; slips through our fingers, and leaves nothing but empty regrets behind. Keep the book you are reading at hand, and when you have five minutes invest those minutes in reading. A great many people think apparently that time is not worth saving unless they have it in a large quantities. Give them a day, and they fancy they could do something; but with fifteen minutes what can be done. Well, 15 minutes a day at the end of a month aggregate ten hours, and at the end of a year a good deal more than a working week! Time is saved, like money, in small amounts; the savings banks represent small, not large investments, and they stand for the wealth of the community. Save your minutes as you save your quarters, and you will have a considerable investment in good season.

Beunos Ayres Sporting Customs.

A correspondent writing from Buenos Ayres, where so many high class thoroughbreds have been received from England and France, says:—"The methods of native training are peculiar, and so you must think when I tell you the horses are out and at work by 2 to 3 a.m. Indeed, the gallops and trials nearly always take place by 3 30 to 4 a. m., and generally before the early hour of 3 a.m. Very rarely does one see a blood horse out after 5 a. m., unless it be occasionally in the afternoon, about 5 to 6, for a walk. Oats being scarce, and very dear, the horses are fed on maize, except those owned by the Portlands and Westminsters of Buenos Ayres, and these have oats of course. The native Argentine is a fair devil at betting, and is, taken all round, a good sportsman in his way, and he likes to see his dollars and those of his fellows flying around. One great point I must not forget to record in the favor of the native sportsman. At the races one never sees a drunken man or woman, never hears bad language, never sees horseplay of any sort or kind, and any man can walk about with thousands of dollars in his hatband and he will never have them even so much as looked at. Certainly, they are the most honest lot of sportsmen, from the highest to the lowest, in the way I have named I have ever come across; though, mind you, the native owners and trainers quite understand running the "bloods" to get weight off, and put the backing public off the scent, so that when the colt comes out and wins there are few tickets on him and they are the holders. In this way they can be taught nothing."

A TRAVELLING SWALLOW

Gets a Free Ride on a Sleeping Car from St. Paul to Portland.

A well-known conductor on the Northern Pacific told a queer story the other day about the compulsory migration of a hen swallow, nest, eggs, and all, from St. Paul to Portland, Ore. The swallow last spring, evinced a particular fondness for the eaves of a sleeping car in the yards in St. Paul, and several nests were built by the busy little workers before the repairs on the interior of the car were completed and it was returned to the service. When the car was pulled out and attached to the west-bound train, there was a commotion among the feathered community: but the train pulled out just the same, and every one supposed that the swallow had concluded to build new homes and start new families. When the first stop was made, however there emerged from one of the nests a badly scared hen swallow, which flew around and about the car until the train started, when she darted into the nest again, resuming her exhibition of bewilderment at each stopping place.

The bird travelled all the way to Portland in the same way, being kept watch on by the sleeping car porter, who when ordered to do so by one if the road officials at Portland, knocked down the nest and the bird mother, bereft of the home and prospective progeny she had zealously guarded, flew widly about for a time, and at last flew away to seek, perhaps, a new mash and material for a new mansion.

Full Speed in Fogs.

It is safe to say that Dr. Sievking, who represented Germany in the Marine Conference, has produced the surprise of the day, upon those who have become alarmed by the steadily increasing speed of ocean steamships. The present rule of the nautical road requires a ship to slow down in thick weather but Dr. Sievking, and all the German delegates with him, are in favor of reversing this rule entirely, so that henceforth all skippers, if they would live up to the law, must run through thick weather at top speed.

The argument for this is not given in full, but we imagine it to include the theory that if ships must strike, the one which strikes hardest has the best chance.

Both the English and American members of the Conference are against this change, and of course, theoretically, they are right. The best rule which could be devised for seafaring would be the guiding principle of that noted landsman, Davy Crockett, "Be sure you're right; then go ahead." If that rule were required on the ocean, on a foggy night the entire commerce of the world would have to heave to. We suppose that no law could possibly effect that. So great is the expanse of water that at the worst, danger of collision is but small, and excessive caution has never been born in the sailor. If it had, he would have rarely sailed.

This is not a new idea suggested by Dr. Sievking, but its introduction at so important a conference shows that it possesses great weight evenamong the highest experts. It may perhaps afford a little cheer for some nervous passengers, when they are being hurried over the Atlantic of a foggy night, to know that their Captain is driving ahead with the approvalof the very highest authority.

The British Minister Interviewed.

Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British minister at Washington, has taken up his permanent residence at the United States capital with his family. He has, moreover, allowed himself to be interviewed. It is true he didn't say much, but the word spinners have made a column out of what he did say. He, however, acknowledged that he was under instructions to endeavor to bring about a settlement of the fishery question and the Behring sea difficulty. He said it was a kind of a triangular duel in which Great Britain, Canada and the United States were engaged. Lord Salisbury had not, he believed, conveyed any peremptory wishes to the Ottawa government, and, in fact, the home government was bound to respect the views of Canada in the premises. There was no truth in the report that he was to meet Sir Charles Tupper at Ottawa for a conference, or that he was to ascertain the views of the Harrison administration as to an extension of the commercial relations between Canada and the United States. He was authorized to deal with the question of extradition, but in all those matters he was to keep himself in consultation with the Canadian government. This is as it should be, and it is to be hoped that Canada will never again be sacrificed to the fancied requirements of peace.

Love the Conqueror.

O love, if life should end to-night,
How short our life would seem!
One little flash of summer light;
One brief and passionate dream;
One glimpse of roses on the wall,
Or blue-bells in the lane,
Then, love, the end, the end of all—
Aye, buds might swell, and leaves might fall,
But not for us again!

The stream we used to watch and love
Would ever onward flow;
From the dark pines the grey wood-dove
Would call—we should not know.
Ah! not for us the pines would wave,
For us no stream would run;
We should be silent in the grave,
Unable even to hoard and save
One little glimpse of sun!

Yet is not this a somber view
Of life and all it brings?
Thank Heaven, the bright waves still are blue
And still the throstle sings!
And on, before love's conquering song
Death's voice sinks quite away;
For life is short, but love is long,
And death is fierce, but love is strong,
And love shall win the day!

—GEORGE BARLOW.

It is reported that the Washburn and Pillsbury flour mills at Minneapolis will shortly pass into the hands of an English syndicate. The consideration is said to be $5,200,000.

A greater prodigy than little Josef Hoffman, the pianist, who visited this country two years ago, is Raone Koczalski, a Polish boy of five years of age. It is announced that he is about to play in Berlin selections from Mendelssohn and Chopin, and other difficult compositions.

Hard to Understand.

One of the things which "no fellow can understand" is why a person declared to be insane should be required by law to be sent to gaol for two weeks before being admitted to an asylum. A melancholy instance of late occurrence shows stupidity as well as danger of this regulation. Surely when physicians of high standing declare confinement necessary it is an outrage to require incarceration in the gaol as a preliminary. Originally the idea may have been to prevent the unjust commitment of persons alleged to be insane, but in these days less degrading regulations ought to be devised. In some cases the very fact of being taken to gaol would permanently destroy all hope of recovery. We are a long way behind the age in some things in this part of the world.

Faith Cure or Divine Healing.

Some excitement has lately been caused in Toronto by another of those cures which have come to be known as, in a special and peculiar sense, the results of "divine healing." In this case a young woman took direction as from Heaven by having recourse to the old, often tried plan of Biblical sortilege, or random openings of the Bible, on the understanding that the first words that caught the eye were to be regarded as a direct message from God. Encouraged by three such messages, it seems that this person rose, dressed and walked down stairs for the first time for months. This is taken as an instance of supernatural intervention—a cure effected by faith alone.

A Restless Ruler.

The German Emperor's next journey is to be made to Greece. Since his accession to the throne, in June, 1888, he has visited Russia, Austria, Italy, Denmark, Sweden, and England, as well as the principal cities in the German Empire. A less restless mode of life, and fewer experiments with new and improved instruments of war, would be better guarantees of peace than Triple Alliances and meetings of Emperors.—[Philadelphia Record.

The newer boas of fur are partly flat, instead of round, as a year ago, and they are sometimes added to fur collars or small shoulder capes.

The Shah of Persia begot a peculiar passion in England. He became infatuated with cape coats and had a large number made of all colors and from various kinds of materials. He wears these garments at all times, and seems to feel that a cape coat of gorgeous hues is especially adapted to glorify the king of kings.

The ancient aqueducts have just been discovered at Athens, one large and fit for use, in the part called Govdi, toward Hymettus; the other, made of brick, in the city itself, beneath the royal stables. Near the latter have been found several tombs in marble, and in both places fragments of inscriptions, one of them bearing the name of Philagros, son of Alexis, of the demos of Melite.

The last of the Lady Hollands died recently in London, and it is reported that the famous Holland House will soon be demolished, and that its beautiful grounds, which comprise nearly ninety acres in the heart of of London, will be cut up into building lots. The Lady Holland who just died was a worthy successor of those who preceded her. She was a patron of art and literature, and the friend of such celebrities as have always frequented Holland House.

A Kansas City, Mo., despatch of October 12, says: "The wonderful trotting red Irish setter Doc, owned by Willie Ketchum, of Brighton, Ont., gave an exhibition at the Exposition Driving Park matinee to day, and made a half-mile in 1.49¼. A pony was used to urge him, but the pony became scared at his strange competitor and proved of little help to him. The first heat was made in 1.52. In the next heat Doc trotted a perfect half mile in 1.49½."

A railroad conductor wanting to teach a new brakeman his duties told him to go to the other end of the car and when he, the conductor, called out the names of the stations along the route that he should say the same at that end of the car. When they came to the first station the conductor called out "Ma-wash in-e ta!" which is a small town between Indianapolis and Elkhart, Ind., and the brakeman yelled with all the might his lungs would permit him: "The same at this end."

The friends of Lord Tennyson fear that the publication of his forthcoming volume of poems may have a deleterious effect upon his health. He is said to be always angered at any adverse criticism, and, the assumption being that there will be some hostile criticism, it is thought that such excitement at the present time might injure the repose of mind which alone keeps him well in body. Tennyson is said to remember every word of disapproval about his poems that has ever come under his eye, and when reading to his friends, as he takes great pleasure in doing, he will stop in the middle of a verse to berate the critics and disprove their strictures.

The fact that nearly all railway accidents reported recently—and they have been of almost daily occurrence—have been found to have been owing to something having gone wrong with the machinery should warn railway men of the direction they should look in order to find the means of prevention. Carelessness on the part of those in charge, or lack of sufficient inspection, are the alternative conclusions at which the public will arrive. In one case the breaks refused to work at a critical moment, in another a small piece of iron was found where it blocked the action of a piston. In each case there was a deplorable loss of life and much suffering. Yet both were in the nature of preventable accidents. There may be, as some allege, a false economy, founded on the idea that because things worked well yesterday they will work well to-day, and, therefore, supervision is less strict than it ought to be. Yet nothing requires more constant attention than the machinery of moving trains. Some time ago the accidents mostly arose from defective rails. The substitution of a better rail reduced the number of casualties from that cause to a minimum. Then followed an era of bridge breaking, which in turn induced an overhauling of those structures with a consequent falling off in the number of accidents from that cause, now we have a period of defective machinery. This, too, will, no doubt, cease after a while for like reasons. Meantime the public is paying a heavy price in human life and suffering for the education of the modern juggernaut.

A Monument to La Salle.

If has fallen to the lot of an American to erect a monument to the explorer LaSalle. The situation is Lincoln park, Chicago; the giver of the monument Judge Lambert Tree. Though we in Canada have an historic interest in LaSalle, Montreal having been his base of operations, the people of the Western States, and particularly the Chicagoans, have reason to honour him. He was undoubtedly the first white man to visit the West, and to stand on the site now occupied by Chicago. All who have read LaSalle's history must have been struck by his determination and courage. It is easy to imagine a man two centuries ago following the waterways, and returning after a brief visit to the most distant point he could reach. But LaSalle did more than this. He went West with a definite purpose in view—the discovery of the route across America to China—and he prosecuted his intention vigorously until he arrived, not at China, but at the mouth of the Mississippi, where he was assassinated. He was an intrepid man. Who, for example, would have cared to set out as he did at the commencement of the winter, when the leaves had fallen and the snow lay thick on the ground, to make the trip on foot from Niagara through a pathless forest to Montreal? LaSalle's house, near Lachine, is said to be still standing, though in ruins. It should be preserved as Canada's memorial of the discoverer of the West.

The Old Vet's Chew.

An old veteran without any arms walked along First avenue south yesterday in company with his wife, says the Minneapolis Tribune. Of a sudden the man stopped, and turning to his companion, said:

"Mary, gimmie a chew."

This seemed like a very singular request to make, but the woman appeared not all disconcerted. Putting her hand into her husband's vest pocket she extracted a plug of tobacco and held it up to the veteran's lips. The latter took a goodly "chew," and the pair proceeded on their way.

Straw, Weeds and Stubble.

What use shall we make of these waste products of the farm, and how shall we manage them to get the most good at least cost from them? The profits of the farm are not large, and we cannot afford to let anything go to loss. If we can by a careful saving of all vegetable matter increase the manure pile so as to transfer a few acres from the unprofitable to the profitable side of the ledger it is our privilege and duty to do so. The worst possible use that a farmer can make of straw is not to use it all, and strange as it may seem, there are thousands of farmers who do this very thing. They thrash in some remote corner and leave the straw on the ground. I have often counted from five to eight of these straw stacks on a single farm, containing one year's crop of straw.

Good, bright wheat or oat straw has considerable more than half the feeding value of average hay, and either horses or cattle may be wintered in good condition with no other rough feed, with a moderate increase of the grain ration. It is best that this increase shall be of bran, oats and oil meal rather than corn. I have neighbors who bore auger holes in the floor of their horse stables to allow the urine to run through, and yet leave stacks of old straw in the fields. I not only bed liberally in the stable, but cover my barnyard so that it is never muddy and no liquid runs from it.

Weeds, cornstalks, potato vines, clover straw, etc., are all packed into the barnyard. We have just cut and raked up all our wheat stubble for this purpose. From a part of the field we got a full two-horse load to the acre. Eight acres of our wheat that had been sown to timothy had made quite a growth, and as the spring was very dry the clover was poor. Consequently foxtail and ragweed made a vigorous start, but we mowed it early, and there will be no foul seed on the field, while the weeds and stubbles will help to keep the barnyard clean and save the urine.

The last week in August I visited a neighbor who is a successful wheat grower and found him spreading straw on a field which was plowed and harrowed ready for the drill. He burns the straw and tells me that many years' experience shows him that it pays as well as to manure an equal area. His land is strong and rich in humus, and while this without doubt is a good practice for him, on thin land it would probably pay better to plow under straw than burn it. I would, however, if possible, burn stubble on fields where there are chinch bugs. It is well on such fields to set the machine to cut high so as to leave enough stubble to burn readily. I have seen excellent effects from burning stubble on land to be plowed for wheat, the wheat in a few weeks after it came up showing to a foot where the stubble had been burned by its growth and healthy color.

It is a fact, perhaps not known to all, that one pound of the urine of a horse has a fertilizing value equal to six pounds of the dung, and the only way we are likely to save this is by the free use of absorbents. With good management every farm will furnish enough of these, and it is wise to make tight stable floors and bed freely. Even cornstalks make an excellent absorbent and will decay more quickly than straw. If cut to lengths of from six inches to a foot they make excellent bedding for horses. They crush easily, and the pith of the stalk takes up the liquid better than straw. I scatter the waste of twenty acres of corn fodder over my barnyard each winter to be tramped and mixed up with the straw and manure. By April 1 the manure is in good shape for spreading, and only very close inspection would discover a cornstalk in it.

A dreamy writer estimates that in two million years from now the earth will be as smooth as a billiard ball, through the smoothing down process of disintegration of matter. His head will soon be like his billiard ball if he wastes vital energies on such nonsensical looking forward.

Elgin House of Industry.

Dr. Luton, surgeon of the Elgin House of Industry, has prepared his annual report for presentation to the County Council. He visited the institution 56 times, put up 361 prescriptions. The only diseases of an acute nature during the year were ordinary colds or diarrhœa. There wereno births during the year. The deaths were as follows—

NAME	AGE	CAUSE
Emma Bennet	23	Peritonitis.
Jane Ireland	45	Empyema
Wm. Wilson	74	Paralysis.
Geo. Irving	84	Old age.
Daniel Nichol	77	Cancer.
Jos. Fletcher	88	Old age.
John Dunn	46	Consumption.

The new railway bridge across the Firth of Forth, one of the most marvelous pieces of engineering of the century, is shortly to be put to the test of carrying fifty locomotives hitched together and travelling back and forth at varying rates of speed.

The tallest smokestack in the United States was finished last week. It will be connected with the 40 boilers of the four new mills of the Fall River Company. It is 350 feet in height and cost $40,000. Two chimueys in Glasgow, Scotland, are higher, one being 454 feet and the other 435 feet.

It is improbable that the court annals of any country can show a parallel to the efforts to secure a jury in the celebrated Cronin case in Chicago. Seven weeks were taken up in examining over one thousand veniremen before a jury of twelve was secured. Surely this emphasizes the need of a reform of the jury system in the United States—a reform, one may add, that is equally required in Canada.

A contemporary wails out his sorrows in verse as follows: The autumn leaves are falling and the year is growing old and the snowdrift will be soon against the door; but our wood shed still is empty and our coal bin full of air, and our winter clothing hanging in the store. Yet the marble face delinquent reads our paper by the stove, while he burns the coal for which he owes; while we go shivering in our sanctum till the tears bedim our eyes, and the blossom re-appears upon our nose.

A writer in the Canadian Presbyterian alleges that many religious congregations are "penny wise and pound foolish" in neglecting to give due publicity to their services and meetings. He says: "Do not be afraid of printers' ink. Print your programme of services. In other words, let the people know. It is, after all, the greatest economy." There is also an element of justice involved. Too much is expected of newspapers in the way of gratuituous advertising. More publicity means larger audiences and better collections, out of which the trifle it costs to use printers' ink could easily be spared. It is more harmonious with the Christian principal, "live and let live." Congregations would feel more independent, and the publishers would give them more friendly notices with more cordiality if they got more legitimate business patronage from churches.

DISTRICT DASHES.

FROM SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS OF THE ENTERPRISE.

Wallacetown.

Oct. 29.—Mrs. Thompson, of Brantford, is visiting at J. Lyon's.

Jno. Cattanach had a narrow escape from being killed last week by his horse running away.

As Rev. Mr. McLarty, in company with Mrs. Malcolm McIntyre, was driving along the road one day last week the horse became frightened and ran away, throwing the occupants of the rig out. Mrs. McLarty received a severe cut on the forehead, and the rev. gentleman was somewhat bruised about the shoulders. They are both able to be around again.

Friday evening as Mrs. Black was driving along the Currie road the buggy wheel ran into a hole, overturning the rig and throwing her out. In falling she struck on her head on the hard road, where she lay unconscious till some passersby chanced along, who conveyed her to her home. At first her case appeared dangerous, but we are happy to say that she has nearly recovered.

Mr. Bolton has purchased Mr. Snivley's house and lot.

We are soon to have a new storekeeper.

A few evenings ago a number of the young people of the town spent a very pleasant time at Miss Mary McColl's. Vocal and instrumental music and games were enjoyed by all.

Iona Station.

Messrs. Edward McKellar and Alex. McKillop, two enterprising farmers of this vicinity, are buying cattle and shipping them to the Toronto market.

J. D. McIntyre is repairing the barn of Daniel Black.

Messrs. Malcolm and Duncan McIntyre have put away their threshing machine for this year. They report the poorest turnout of grain this year of any year since they started, which is over twenty years ago.

John D. McIntyre, who has been in the timber business for the last 15 years, and who has been foreman for George Campbell for the last four years in Arkansas and Mississippi, and also worked at timber in Montana and other states reports that this is the finest country and climate he has yet seen, and says that farmers should be contented here and advises them not to leave.

Delmer Brown, of Middlemiss, has rented the farm of his father, W. A. Brown, for a term of years.

W. McLandress and A. P. Campbell, of Lawrence Station, are buying stock steers for Aberdeen, Scotland.

On the morning following Holloween Mr. Campbell, and Edward Milligan, proprietor of the Dufferin House, found their buggies perched on the roof of Rob't. Near's house.

J. and Alex. Kerr are loading lumber for the Massey firm, of Toronto.

The death of Mrs. Daniel Patterson, of Hogg street, Dunwich, took place on Saturday evening at 8 o'clock after a long illness, she having been confined to her bed for about 18 months, which illness she bore with Christian fortitude. Mrs. Patterson was the daughter of John McIntyre, of Yarmouth. The remains were interred in the Cowal cemetery.

Willey's Corners.

Mrs. John Shearing, who has been very ill for the past few weeks, is slowly recovering.

Mosey Graham has been digging a large cistern at his barn, it being 20 feet deep and 10 feet in circumference.

Mr. and Mrs. John C. Graham attended on Wednesday last the wedding of Mrs. Graham's cousin, Miss McAlpine.

Dug. Graham, of this place, is threshing clover with J. Lodge.

Rodney.

D. Paterson is moving his barn on the property he purchased from Mrs. Early.

F. Muller is learning the operating with W. Boyce.

Mr. Clarke has bought up a large number of bushels of apples and is on the way to Liverpool with them.

Rev. Mr. Ghent, church of England minister, preached an excellent sermon in the Methodist church on Sunday evening.

Elder Prosser, of Leamington, will preach in the Baptist church on Sunday, November 17th.

Rev. H. Werner is on a visit to Travistock.

Ed. Zimmerman is home for the winter from the cheese factory.

Cowal.

Nov. 4.—Thanksgiving services will be held in the Presbyterian church on Thursday at 3 p. m.

The funeral of Peter McBride took place last Tuesday to Cowal cemetery, about 80 teams being in the line. The obsequies were conducted by Rev. Alex. Urquhart.

The woods in this vicinity are full of local nimrods these days who are assisting nature in despoiling the trees of their leaves.

A case of obtaining squirrel tails under false pretences, which was to have to a hearing before Mr. Thompson, J. P., on Wednesday last was settled out of court by the defendant paying damages and cost.

Hamilton and Holmes, of Dixey, have secured the contract of cutting 400 cords of wood for D. Crossan on his farm west of the village.

Mrs. J. G. Leitch, of Vulcan, Mich., paid her aunt, Mrs. Patterson, a visit last week.

Little or no fall plowing is done yet in this section owing to the extreme dry weather.

Does It Pay?

In one of the large towns of a western state two young ladies are suffering from lead poisoning as a result of using toilet powder containing white lead. One of them is greatly emaciated, and suffers much from spasms. In both cases the fingers and arms are paralyzed. If these unfortunate young women live, which is doubtful, they are, perhaps, rendered helpless for life.

Cases similar to the above are not infrequent from the use of piosonous cosmestics. A fresh, healthful complexion is to be desired, but its artificial counterpart is very undesirable and does not deceive any observer. The use of powder and rouge is not only offensive to the eye, but leaves the skin sallow, dry and rough, even if it produces no worse results.

Not long ago we heard of a young woman who began using drugs upon her eyes to increase their brilliancy. Her silly vanity has rendered her blind for life!

Such sufferers from their own foolishness are not always young ladies. A gentleman of 60 years of age died last week as a result of blood poisoning. For fifteen years he had been in the habit of dyeing his hair and beard, and to this practice the physicians attributed his death. His is but one out of four cases, within the writer's knowledge, where paralysis and death have been ascribed to poisonous hair dyes.—Youths' Companion.

An Ideal Dairy Cow.

A cow for the dairy is valuable in proportion to her power to yield milk at a profit, to drop valuable calves, and to produce beef of an excellent quality at a cost less than its selling price. The size of her body is of secondary consequence, but its quality is of prime importance. Her organs are to be considered, mainly, as the parts of a living machine, acting for the accomplishment of the end for which she is kept by her owner. The kind of constitution that she has will be indicated by certain external evidences, which are commonly called "points." A strong, healthy constitution, which is indispensible for the production of wholesome milk at a profit, can be possessed by only those cows which have a large breathing capacity, vigorous circulation of the blood, and active digestion of the feed which has been consumed. The temperament which causes a cow to direct the energy derived from her feed to the production of milk, rather than the production of beef, is called the milking or nervous temperament. The presence of these two desirable qualities, viz., a strong, healthy constitution, and a nervous and milking temperament, will be shown by the following points, which are placed in the order of their merit as indications of large milk-giving capacity :—

1. The cow should have a large udder, which gland is adapted to the yielding of quantities of milk in proportion as it is long, broad and deep in size, and of a fine elastic quality. The skin and hair which cover it should be fine and very pliable.

2. The skin of the cow should be mellow, and easy movable on the ribs and rumps; its covering of hair should be soft and silky.

3. The barrel of the dairy cow is required to be large and roomy; the ribs should be broad and wide apart.

4. The cow should be broad across the loins; her rumps should be broad and long; they should also be wide across the head of the tail; the hips of the cow should be thin, and not closely joined behind for a few inches above the udder. That formation is called an open twist.

5. A comparatively long face, with large prominent eyes and a good forehead are good points; the muzzle should be broad, and the neck should be tapering and fine.

One hundred years ago our leading men, our men of wealth and culture, were nearly all country gentlemen. Now the members of the governing classes live in towns and cities, except in the South, which still continues to send farmers to Legislature and Congress. But for the South the farmers of the country would be almost unrepresented at Washington. We must change the drift of things if we would see our people enjoy the fullest measure of prosperity and happiness. This craze for town life is all wrong. If half of our ambitious young men who are living in a shabby genteel way in the professions and in dry goods stores would put their brains and energy into farming our country districts would soon become thickly settled, and with well tilled farms, comfortable modern cottages, and good roads, life outside of the towns would be in every way superior to the mode of existence found within the walls of our crowded cities. The towns do not need an influx of population from the country, but the country needs a lot of town people to take hold of the farms and produce something. We can get along without more lawyers and dry-goods clerks, but we need more farmers—we need their products, their healthy influence, and their aid in running the Government.—Atlanta Constitution.

The true worth of Cleveland's Chinese Exclusion Act is shown by a San Francisco despatch which says that the immigration of Chinamen does not diminish. There is a horrible declaration in the said despatch to the effect that in the last batch there were 24 Chinese women, brought in as wives of merchants under a habeas corpus, but really intended for immoral houses. It is said these girls are bought in China for one or two hundred dollars, ostensibly to be brought over and married, but when in 'Frisco are sold to keepers of such houses for $1500 and upwards. There may be exaggeration, but any one who knows Chinatown in San Francisco will believe it readily enough.

Milking-Stool Reflections

A school-day conundrum used to run this way, "Why does a dog wag his tail?" After the new boy and girl had screwed up and down the skin of the brow—(how much does that act help the mind in arriving at a conclusion?)—it would be given up. Then came the moment when the experienced pupil could glory in displaying his towering superiority of knowledge. "Give it up?" "Eh?" "Why, just because the tail cannot wag the dog." It is always easy to arrogate the unreal superiority of a learned-off readiness in the furnishing of an answer of words to every problem. The habit does not belong exclusively to little folks, but is the common and prized possession of little minds. These reflections had their primary conscious impulse from a mental enquiry, suggested by a switch from the cow's tail that nearly knocked my old hat off, "Why does a cow switch her tail?" If she does so to an annoying degree at this season of the year, an examination should be made as to the cleanliness and general condition of her skin. The curry comb and brush should be brought into daily use throughout the winter. "So, bossie! So!"

What for do I keep cows anyway? Certainly not for the fun of it. I am not enough of a calf to find it at all funny to milk cows night and morning; I get no specially relished kind of enjoyment from feeding them, and the cleaning of the stables is not an amusement for which I feel eager. No, indeed, not for the fun of it! It does not inhere in me to be so fond of seeing indolent-looking cows lazily lying about in the fields or stables that I gratify any æsthetic tastes by their proximity or possession. A well-bred cow—that is, a well-behaved cow (good breeding always manifests itself in proper behavior)—is pleasing to the eye and especially pleasing to the man who has an eye to profit. I keep my cows for profit. Some of them have not been paying me—they have been living on me. "So, bossie! So!" But now the conclusion of the matter is this:—I will no longer keep any kind of a cow that does not serve me by making a profit for me; I have quit living for the sake of keeping cows; my cows will have to quit living for themselves only; and only those that live for me will live on me. "So, bossie! So!"

I must now feed my pigs, and if anybody wants to send me a subject or two for "reflections" he may address me at the ADVOCATE Office, London, and I will write nothing that will reflect on their courtesy or my own modesty.

Yours reflectively, I. A. H. SHORT.

To our Subscribers.

The special announcement which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address (and enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the horse it is indispensible, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenomenal sale throughout the United States and Canada, makes it standard authority. Mention this paper when sending for "Treatise." 6-2-0.

People Wonder

WHEN they find how rapidly health is restored by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. The reason is that this preparation contains only the purest and most powerful alteratives and tonics. To thousands yearly it proves a veritable elixir of life.

Mrs. Jos. Lake, Brockway Centre, Mich., writes: "Liver complaint and indigestion made my life a burden and came near ending my existence. For more than four years I suffered untold agony. I was reduced almost to a skeleton, and hardly had strength to drag myself about. All kinds of food distressed me, and only the most delicate could be digested at all. Within the time mentioned several physicians treated me without giving relief. Nothing that I took seemed to do any permanent good until I began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which has produced wonderful results. Soon after commencing to take the Sarsaparilla I could see an in my condition, my appetite began to return and with it came the ability to digest all the food taken, my strength improved each day, and after a few months of faithful attention to your directions, I found myself a well woman, able to attend to all household duties. The medicine has given me a new lease of life, and I cannot thank you too much."

"We, the undersigned, citizens of Brockway Centre, Mich., hereby certify that the above statement, made by Mrs. Lake, is true in every particular and entitled to full credence."—O. P. Chamberlain, G. W. Waring, C. A. Wells, Druggist.

"My brother, in England, was, for a long time, unable to attend to his occupation, by reason of sores on his foot. I sent him Ayer's Almanac and the testimonials it contained induced him to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla. KENDALL'S SPAVIN CURE

The Most Successful Remedy ever discovered, as it is certain in its effects and does not blister. Read proof below.

STREETSVILLE, P. Q., May 3, 1889.

DR. B. J. KENDALL CO., Enosburgh Falls, Vt.

Gentlemen,—I have used Kendall's Spavin Cure for Spavins and also in a case of lameness and Stiff Joints and found it a sure cure in every respect. I cordially recommend it to all horsemen.

Very respectfully yours,

CHARLES J. BLACKALL.

KENDALL'S SPAVIN CURE.

WONDERFUL JUPITER.

Some Surprising Scenes Taking Place in the Huge Planet—An Interesting Object Which all Should Study.

Astronomers have of late been making some exceedingly interesting discoveries about the huge planet Jupiter, which is now visible in the evening sky. When we are thinking about worlds it is just as well to think of Jupiter, for that is a globe worth pondering over. Thirteen hundred times as large as this big earth of ours, and illuminated by four obedient moons, Jupiter has uncommon claims to consideration. But it is not so much the gigantic size of that wonderful planet as the extraordinary appearances and occurrences upon its surface that command particular attention at present.

Most readers know that when Jupiter is looked at with a telescope certain bands, or belts, are seen extending in parallel lines across its disk. We ordinarily see the great planet thus represented in illustrated books of astronomy. It is among these belts of Jupiter that the astronomers have observed some very surprising things. The most conspicuous belts lie on either side of the planet's equator, in what upon the earth we should call the tropical latitudes. Jupiter's equator, however, is so slightly inclined from the plane of his orbit that his tropical circles do not extend as far north and south as the belts lie. The first explanation that naturally occurs to the observer who watches these belts is that they must be encircling the giant planet on each side of its equator. If he has a powerful telescope and a patient mind he discovers that changes of form and position occur in the belts, which strengthen the probability that they are composed of clouds. The various colors that they show, and in particular the prevailing red tint which characterizes the largest belts may excite wonder as to the nature and condition of masses of vapor that could present such an appearance, but upon the whole there seems to be nothing to seriously discredit the idea that the greater number of these phenomena really are clouds.

And now we come to the most surprising facts. It is evident that a tremendous current is continually sweeping right around the huge globe of Jupiter over its equatorial regions. The cloud belts are all in motion, but not all with the same velocity. The nearer they are to the equator the faster they move. The observations of Mr. Stanley Williams and others show that in the north temperate zone there is a broad light band encircling the planet which may possibly be the actual surface of Jupiter's globe. By comparing the rate of motion of cloud-like objects seen in this region with that of the adjacent cloud belt it is found that the latter is moving much more swiftly. The general period of Jupiter's rotation upon its axis, notwithstanding enormous size of the planet appears to be a little short of ten hours. But the equatorial clouds go around in about nine hours and fifty minutes, while the clouds 30° north and south of the equator require five minutes longer to complete a circuit. In other words, the equatorial part of the atmosphere appears to be flowing past the regions on either side of it at the rate of some 240 MILES AN HOUR!

This as M. Flammarion has remarked, is incomparably faster than the most violent cyclone upon earth. And this gigantic current of wind, if so it may be called, forms a perpetual hurricane, blowing around Jupiter as unremittingly as our trade winds, but with inconceivable power and energy. The result of the varying velocities with which adjacent portions of the Jovian atmosphere appear to move should naturally be the formation of enormous whirling storms, cyclones, and tornadoes of incredible fury.

It is probable that, looked at in a vertical section, the atmosphere of Jupiter would present an equally remarkable contrast and conflict of motions. There is evidence that the dark colored spots, or clouds, are at a greater elevation than those of a lighter hue and it has been observed that the dark spots move more slowly than the bright ones. It follows that the deeper you go into the atmosphere the faster it is found to be moving and hence it may be that the actual solid surfaces of the planet, if any solid surface it has, rotates within its shell of clouds considerably faster than the shell itself turns.

Another very singular phenomenon of the strange and tremendous planet Jupiter is the great red spot which has been seen upon its southern hemisphere ever since the summer of 1878

INCREDIBLE AS THE THOUGHT SEEMS,

and difficult as its explanation upon any analogy drawn from terrestrial geology undoubtedly would be, there are certain facts which suggest the possibility that this phenomenon may be an elevated region of the planet thrust up through its environment of clouds. It must be remembered that the so-called red spot, which really appears only as a small oval blotch upon the disk of Jupiter, is in reality some 30,000 miles long and 7,000 broad. Think of a mountain of those dimensions raised above the clouds! Then, to add to the startling suggestions of the hypothesis, the color of this gigantic elevation or protuberance is a fiery red. Perhaps the strongest reason for regarding the red spot as an elevated mass is the fact that the clouds of the southern cloud belt, close to which it lies, never pass over it, but on the contrary, in passing by it, are driven out of their course and curve around its southern border, just as clouds in the earth's atmosphere glide along the shoulders of whose summits rise above their level. It might be urged in behalf of this view that, inasmuch as the force of gravity on Jupiter is nearly two and a half times as great as on the earth, the major portion of its atmosphere must be pressed close to its surface, and that consequently its clouds do not float at such a height as the gigantic proportions of the planet might otherwise lead us to expect, so that the elevation of the red spot need not be supposed unduly great in order to place it above the general level of the cloud strata. Then there is the commonly accepted theory that Jupiter is yet in an early stage of development to support the hypothesis of the elevation of a large region of its surface in the manner in which parts of the earth's crust were thrust up, folded and crumpled in the fiery ages of its history

However we look at them, these strange discoveries on Jupiter indicate that but a very small part of the energies of creation are centred upon our own little globe. Jupiter has winds and storms and clouds and geological convulsions that make the great events of terrestrial existence seem but a miniature representation of planetary life. After all, the man who is said to want the earth doesn't appear to be so very grasping. If he wanted Jupiter his ambition would be truly gigantic.

The Links That Bind Us.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Oh! the fond links that bind us to this earth,
Strong as bands of iron—yet fine as gold;
Partings and tears oft mingle with our mirth,—
If loving much love never can grow cold!

Ah! were it not for partings now and then,
Love of home and friends were never tested,—
Hardship and trial make the noblest men;
Present pain is future joy invested!

The patriot's wistful eyes are dimmed with tears
When parting from his much-lov'd native soil,
His heart doth throb with many doubts and fears,
Yet hope points FORWARD though his soul recoil!

But when the weary years have come and gone,
And o'er the sea he homeward ploughs his way,
He finds his former doubts and fears have flown—
Midnight with him hath changed to dawn of day!

A mother parts with one—her only son,
Each shows but half the anguish that they feel,—
The voyage finished, or the battle won,
What depths of love the meeting doth reveal!

Methinks such joy is ours when God, at last,
Shall find us gather'd 'neath Heaven's azure dome;
Our journeys, tears, and partings of the past
Will be as naught if we but reach our home!

Would We Return?

Would we return
If once the gates which close upon the past
Were opened wide for us and if the dear
Remembered pathway stretched before us clear
To lead us back to youth's lost land at last:
Whereon life's April shadows lightly cast
Recalled the old sweet days of childish fear
With all their faded hopes, and brought anear
The far-off streams in which our skies were glassed;
Did these lost dreams which wake the soul's sad yearning
But live once more and waited our returning,
Would we return?
Would we return
If love's enchantment held the heart no more
And we had come to count the wild sweet pain,
The fond distress, the lavish tears—but vain;
Had cooled the heart's hot wounds amidst the roar
Of mountain gales, or, on some alien shore
Worn out the soul's long anguish and had slain
At last the dragon of despair—if then the train
Of vanished years came back and, as of yore
The same voice called, and with soft eyes beguiling,
Our lost love beckoned, through time's gray veil smiling,
Would we return?
Would we return
Once we had crossed to death's unlovely land
And trod the bloomless ways among the dead
Lone and unhappy; after years had fled
With twilight wings along the glimmering strand,
If then—an angel came with outstretched hand
To lead us back, and we recalled in dread
How soon the tears that once for us are shed
May flow for others—how like words in sand
Our memory fades away—how oft our waking
Might vex the living with the dead heart's breaking,
Would we return—
Would we return?

If Love Were Life.

If love were life and hearts more tender were;
No growing old or dying would there be;
No eyes from too much weeping fail to see;
No more the brow be the interpreter
Of care beneath, nor soul a prisoner
Within a cell, but like a breath that's free,
Would spread itself through all eternity;
If love were life and hearts more tender were.

It is not hard to understand God's plan,
Nor be submissive when submission's sweet;
A flower simply lives to bloom, and man
Should simply live to Live, or else defeat
The Master's will, which He has made so clear,
That love enough would make us angels here.

President Elfot, of Harvard College, is in favor of pensions, not only for soldiers and sailors, but for Judges, teachers, firemen, policemen and all public servants who have deserved well of their country. "If pensions are to be granted for all kinds of police service, why exclude the men who clear the country's forests and build its houses? Any kind of honest work is public service."

Scribner's Magazine for November has for frontispiece an excellent engraving of Emin Pasha, and a well written, entertaining article by Colonel H. G. Prout (Baroud Bay) on "Where Emin Is." The article is illustrated. J. Russell Poley discusses "The Effect on American Commerce of an Anglo-Continental War." "A Student of Salamanca" is the theme on which William Henry Bishop expends himself. Harold Frederic's story "In The Valley" runs its course through an additional chapter or two. M. Allen Stark treats of "Electricity in Relation to the Human Body." There are a number of other equally excellent articles in the number.

OFF FOR AFRICA.

Eclipse Viewers Make Their Wills Before Sailing for the Deadly Coast.

The American solar eclipse expediton, of which Prof. David P. Todd is in charge, sailed on the sloop-of-war Pensacola from the Brooklyn navy yard. She will go direct to the Cape de Verde Islands, and there refill her bunkers with coal. Thence she will go to Sierra Leone for more coal, and then stop at Fernando Po to get coal enough to carry her to St. Paul de Loanda, her destination There the astronomers will disembark and go to Maxima, on the Quanza River, with a guard of marines, and there prepare for the eclipse which is to take place on December 22. Maxima is about 100 miles inland. It is a Portuguese trading station.

Mrs. Todd had been helping her husband in his preparations. She worked up formulas and acquainted him with many details of geography and climatic peculiarities on the west coast of Africa. She has read every book concerning that part of Africa that she could obtain, and read to him selected passages every day. Before sailing Prof. Todd said:

"We have a large equatorial, twenty cameras, and other instruments necessary for astronomical observations, photographing the phases of the eclipse and deep sea discoveries. We, unfortunately, have not Prof. Agassiz with us, but he says he will try to get away in about three weeks and meet the ship at Cape Town after she has landed the others at St. Paul de Loanda. The total eclipse will be visible in a path about 5,000 miles long and 100 miles wide. The path begins in the Caribbean Sea and skirts along the northern coast of South America. It then stretches eastward and southward to Africa. An expedition from the Lick Observatory of California will view the eclipse at French Guiana, in South America."

Prof. Todd gave the following facts about his companions: Prof. H. F. Bigelow is his chief assistant. He is Professor of Mathematics at Racine College. He has devised several of the instruments that will be used by the astronomical observers. He was assistant astronomer at the National Observatory of the Argentine Republic at Cordova. Prof. Eben J. Loomis, for forty years in the Nautical Almanac Office in Washington, is the naturalist. He also will assist Prof. Bigelow. In 1879 he discovered the leaf-like formations of the maidenhair fern, which was pronounced by Prof. Asa Gray one of the most wonderful of botanical phenomena. J. E. Carbutt is the photographer. He also is an analytical chemist. His father made the negatives of the eclipse of 1869 for Prof. Henry Morton, who, in appreciation of those services, presented him with the camera and enlarging lens, and the electrical exposing apparatus, which he had used, and which will be used again at Maxima. Some of the dry plates used will be orthochromatic, and moderately rapid, sensitometer No. 16, and some will be eclipse orthochromatic, sensitometer No. 27. The former will be used for taking the partial phases, and the latter will be used during totality, with the intention of obtaining a more perfect image of the corona than has ever been obtained. The diameter of the sun on the photographs will be four inches, a greater diameter than ever before taken. The great mirror to be used in connection with the photography was made for Prof. Langley of the Smithsonian Institute by Prof. J. H. Brashear at a cost of $10 000. E. J. Wright is the assistant photographer.

Prof. L. N. Jacobi is assistant astronomer and meteorologist. He will also make investigations in natural history. Prof. Cleveland Abbe, attached to the Army Signal Bureau, is the meteorologist. E. B. Preston of the Coast and Geodetic Survey will make magnetic observations and gather information about gravitation. W. H. Brown of the National Museum at Washington is the osteologist and naturalist of the expedition. His assistant is A. H. Brown, his brother. H. S. Davis, of Princeton, is one of the assistant astronomers. He will give attention to the instruments, at which he is an expert. G. E. Van Guysling will study the winds and clouds, and on the voyage will send up a lot of little red balloons. C. A. Orr is the ethnologist and ornithologist. Heli Chatelaine, master of a dozen languages, including Portuguese, is the interpreter. George T. Flint is the stenographer and typewriter. Dr. Bartlett is the apothecary and professional nurse. On the coast the party will drink water that has been boiled and filtered to preserve them from the deadly African fevers. Nevertheless, Prof. Todd and all the rest have made their wills.

Esquimaux in Nova Scotia.

At a missionary meeting in Newark, N.J., this week, an Esquimaux priest from Nova Scotia, the Rev. Simon Gibbons, was one of the speakers. He said that at Cape Breton, where he was stationed for many years, he was in the habit of going on long journeys on snowshoes, and was often compelled to hollow out caves in snow banks, lie down in these caves, and sleep at night in order to protect himself from the violence of the elements. He also said that there are but three brick or stone churches in Nova Scotia, the remainder being wood structures. He added that his parish is thirty-miles long, and comprises eleven mission stations, and that for the first time in his ministry he is within access of a railway station. He spoke of the devotion of the Christian Esquimaux to the Church, and told how on one occasion when he was compelled to make a journey of fifteen miles through deep snow a body of the Esquimaux tramped ahead of him on snowshoes breaking a path, and then tramped back, making a walk of thirty miles with out even stopping for food.—[Rochester Democrat.

When The Ring Was Lost.

A terrible incident happened at a wedding, that of a couple both of middle age. There was a grating just in front of the altar rails, which led down to the pipes which heated the building. In his agitation of putting the ring upon the finger of his bride the unfortunate bridegroom let it go, and it rolled down the grating. The poor bride shed copious tears, and the bridegroom gallantly stanched them as well as he could with a large red-and-green handkerchief, murmuring soothingly: "There, don't'ee cry—don't 'ee cry," in the endearing tone which is often used to a baby. We are sure we sympathized, but our sympathy was hardly sufficient to control our risible propensities. A ring had to be borrowed from one of the officials, and the bride's tears were dried at last.

At the time of the Reformation the average life of man was 21½. In the early part of this century it was rather more than 40½ and certainly has not lessened since. That means that as many people live to 70 now as lived to 40 300 years ago.

A Judge in a Chicago court is reported as saying: "Of all the boys in the reform school at Pontiac and in various reformatories about the city, 95 per cent. are the children of parents who died through drink or became criminals through the same cause."

Nova Scotia is remarkable for the number of its old people. It has a larger number of centenarians than any other country, there being one to every 19,000 inhabitants, while England has one to every 200,000. They are chiefly of the farming class, in comfortable circumstances, accustomed to exercise in the open air, plain food and plenty of it, with good inherited constitutions.

The breed of Shetland ponies is almost extinct in the Shetland Islands. None are now bred there, and there are fewer specimens in these islands than in many other places. Bred as they are under widely different conditions, the old shaggy-coated Shetland pony is a thing of the past. The small smooth-coated ponies now in fashion are the improved Shetlands bred in milder climates.

Church union may be making little progress; but such cannot be said of church unity. The latter idea is moving forward, and clergymen of all denominations are recognizing it. In New York the other day the Church Unity Society of the Anglican Church held its meeting. There were present, besides the Anglican dignitaries, prominent men in other communions, as, for example, Dr. Schaff, of the Presbyterian Church. Most friendly experiences were exchanged. The Bishop of Pittsburg called upon the members not to let the difference among Christians dismay them, adding: "Some on boards and some on pieces of the ship; and so it came to pass that they escaped all to land." A rather apt quotation.

The delegates to the American International Congress are really enduring a sort of martyrdom. For instance, according to the correspondent of the New York "Tribune," they retired at two o'clock the other morning after a banquet in Buffalo only to be aroused at six to take the train for Cleveland, and their appearance was decidedly "seedy," notwithstanding their manful attempts to look otherwise. How they looked after their banquet at Manchester, N. H., a few days before has not been stated, but it has leaked out that they were forced to drink sherry out of ginger-ale bottles, New Hampshire being a prohibition State. In Portland, Me., no such attempt was made at ostensible compliance with the law, wines being openly served at the banquet.

It is announced that the Imperial government has refused to consent to the bill passed at the last session of the federal parliament providing for the return of all criminals from the United States who have sought refuge in Canada. This is only in accordance with the true British principle that the meanest of human creatures have rights that they cannot be deprived of at a moment's notice. Canada allowed these people under its laws to take up their habitation in our midst, and it would be eminently unfair to shove them forth at a moment's notice after perhaps years of residence. Possibly they are undesirable citizens, but we should have made up our minds about that before they came among us. Having once sought the shelter of our laws, with our sanction, seeing that there was nothing on the statute book at the time forbidding them, we are bound to respect the rights of liberty they thus claim.

DOGS AS HORSES.

The Country Where They Are the Beasts of Burden.

A Paris correspondent says: I have met M. Nantet, the Belgian author, who follows the usage of his country in utilizing the dog as a draught animal. He has a little phaeton drawn by dogs in which he drives about when at home, and in which he has come from Brussels to Paris. M. Nantet thinks that Belgium, with her cheerless sky and sodden soil, is able to hold her own, and be among the most prosperous nations of Europe, because the dog is not only the friend and comrade, but the carrier of the poor man. The costermonger and his wife in Paris or London are broken down prematurely from fatigue, and stabling and fodder for a donkey is a heavy tax on their profits, but their Belgian brethren can house their dogs with themselves. The dogs, after being unharnessed, dine with their masters, and in winter sleep before the kitchen fire.

The strength of a good draught dog is marvellous. He does not spoil roads like a horse and when tired he asks to lie down, a favor always granted; and, on being rested, goes on again cheerfully.

The pair which drew M. Nantet is of average size and strength, and had a long line of ancestors, who did good work in their time as carriers. When at an inn their master used to unharness them and take them with him into the coffee room, where they lay at his feet. He drove all the way, unless when there was a steep hill to climb. At a place called Louvroil the Mayor heard he had come into the town, and informed him that his equipage came within the reach of the Grammont Law for the Protection of Animals. "Very well," answered the Belgian, who was preparing to start, and he ordered the dogs to get into the phaeton and sit on the seat, while he drew them. They obeyed, and stayed there until they were beyond the bounds of the commune, where they descended to be harnessed. To avoid crowds, who might think well to take part with the dogs against their master, M. Nantet kept clear of large towns. At Compeigne he telegraped to a number of Belgians here at what time he was likely to reach Paris and they went out to meet him. When he was sighted the dogs were going at a brisk pace. He thinks they could have done the journey comfortably in five days, but as he is as much their friend as their owner he gave them seven.

The Institute Pasteur.

Many years of labor proved to Pasteur that by inoculation he could give the disease, or cure it, in a dog; but it was not until July, 1885, that the experiment was tried on a human being. The first patient, a small lad, having been severely bitten in some dozen places on the hands, arms, and legs, his mother, a simple peasant, brought him from Alsace and asked M. Pasteur to do the same to her son she heard he "did to dogs to prevent their getting hydrophobia." Pasteur hesitated; but having procured medical advice, all of which concurred as to the impossibility of the child's recovery, he (not being himself a doctor) let his surgeons inoculate the boy, which operation was repeated fourteen times—on two occasions twice in twenty-four hours to accomplish the task as quickly as possible. The child has not only never showed symptoms of hydrophobia, though it is now over four years since he was treated, but is fast growing to manhood. During the four years that have elaped since M. Pasteur inoculated his first patient no fewer than 7,000 persons have been treated in the Paris institution alone, of whom 73 have died—that is to say about 1 per cent.—while before he commenced his inoculation treatment from 15 to 20 per cent, invariably succumbed. Pasteur has now made the interesting discovery that the nearer the part bitten is to the brain the shorter is the period of incubation and the more virulent the attack of the disease produced. While the ordinary mortality in such cases is 80 per cent., M. Pasteur by his treatment has reduced it to 4 per cent. Surely these facts speak for themselves. I will now give a short description of the modus operandi of the inoculation itself as I saw it. The large outer hall of the institution by 11 o'clock contained eighty-nine persons, composed of all classes, all nationalities, and all ages, who had come to be inoculated, (free of charge,) having previously had the misfortune to have been bitten by some rabid animal. On right hand of the hall is a regular office, in which every case, with all particulars, is most carefully registered. After the patient has furnished every possible particular he crosses the passage to a small room on the left, where the inoculation is performed. There sits the operator, who is assisted by a doctor, a nurse, and a clerk furnished with full particulars, and the number of each case. The process is a remarkably simple one. A small hypodermic syringe filled with the preparation is injected under the skin, the point of the instrument being no bigger than a wool needle; the operation is as trifling as it is painless, and occupies about five seconds. It is repeated on fourteen successive days; the dose being made slightly stronger each time.

Count and Pirate.

Letters from China give particulars of the dislodgment at Haiphong of a strong band of pirates who for five years past have occupied an island in the river from which they sallied forth on passing junks, and also levied black-mail on the neighbouring villages. In the dislodgment by the French forces thirty of the pirates were killed and some taken prisoners. The remainder succeeded in escaping to another island, where they are said to be still 500 strong. Two Europeans were with them, one of whom at least was a Frenchman. The latter dropped his fan in his flight, and on it was the name Henri de Clausade, and above a coat of arms and a count's coronet. De Clausade had deserted from the French army, and had been acting as armourer to the pirates, preparing the weapons for the slaughter of his countrymen. The pirates left behind a large quantity of arms and ammunition including many Winchester and Gras rifles. It is also said that an Englishman is one of the gang.—[San Francisco Call.

It has been remarked that the advent of smokeless powder should be the date of the advent of a smokeless cigarette. The sentiment is very pretty indeed but the real invention of the latter article is now, and probably will be, a task for future generations. In the meantime, however, there's a remedy in the reach of all who are addicted to the so called pernicious habit. Smokeless cigarettes.

The Bataks of Sumatra—The Doom of Their Old People.

The population of Serapit turned out to see us. The women were a strange contrast to the men in appearance. While the latter were as lean as whipping posts, and uglier than most monkeys, the former—at least those under 20 or so—were plump, solidly built, full-bosomed creatures, and there were at least half a dozen in the crowd before us who might fairly be termed good-looking.

But the older members of the community, the women especially, almost surpass my powers of description to give an idea of weird ugliness. K. tersely summed them up as "baked monkey;" but a monkey would at least have had a covering of hair, whereas these dreadful persons had nothing but their very scanty clothing to conceal any part of the leathery integument that was so tightly shrunken over their skeleton bodies, and looked so hard and dry that you expected to hear them crackle when they moved. Their faces seemed to consist solely of skin drawn over a skull without a particle of flesh, and looked precisely as if some one had tried to make a mask out of old leather, and, failing, had thrown it down in disgust and stamped on it. Yet they seemed neither decrepit nor idiotic. The men carried their complement of arms; one old fellow had girded on the longest and crookedest sword there. He looked like Death with his scythe. A woman, who resembled one of the dried mummies of blacks found in North Queensland, reanimated, was pounding paddy in a wooden mortar, so I concluded that appearances were deceptive, and that they were not nearly so old as they looked. Indeed, the Malayan races are not long lived, and really old people are very scarce, such an instance as the late Sultan of Brunei, who lived to nearly 100 being almost unheard of.

And here the appropriate place to speak of the strange and unnatural practice, universally ascribed to the Bataks, and confirmed by Dutch travellers, thought I do not understand that any European has actually witnessed the ceremony. When the elder members of a family have reached the stage of decrepitude and uselessness (and what their appearance must be one shudders to contemplate), a general meeting of relations is held, and the senile one is invited to ascend a small tree, which the affectionate relatives then shake with all their might, chanting a song expressive of hunger the while. If he can succeed in holding on until the shakers are tired out, he is reprieved but, if, as is most likely, he tumbles off, he is promptly despatched. A Dutch author, Junghuhns, I think, grimly remarks that this ceremony usually takes place at the time of year when limes are ripe, this fruit being very plentiful, and forming a large ingredient in the cuisine of both Malays and Bataks. But if the natives of the interior resemble those whom I am describing, the meal must be a mere form. I had forgotten to state that the Bataks file or grind all their incisor teeth down to the level of the gums, and only the jaws of a hyena could have disposed of one of the elders of Serapit. As to their cannibalism there can be no doubt.

A Bitter Misanthrope.

Burdette in the Brooklyn Eagle: People who have met me on the train say that I am of all men most morose, unsociable, and unaccommodating; that I never offer to open the window for any one, never close the door after the brakeman has gone out and taken the end of the car and a crashing noise with him, never offer to turn a seat for two ladies who wish to monopolize four sittings with a trip pass and a scalper ticket; never, in short, offer any of those little attentions to my fellow-travelers which the fresh young man and the simple old one are so ready and glad to extend. I plead guilty. I never do. I will do anything I am asked to do, if I have time, and feel just like it, and there seems to be no reason why I shouldn't, but I won't volunteer to do anything on the train. I used to—some. I am older now, and know as much less than formerly that both my neighbors of the road and myself get along much more comfortably. Years and years ago I one day picked up a shawl which fell from a lady's lap into the aisle of the car. As I picked it up such a miscellaneous assortment of articles, mostly of an edible nature, fell out of that shawl that I was paralyzed with amazement, and nothing but the lurid language of the owner brought about the reaction that was necessary to save my life. For the largest fee I ever was paid I never afforded a car full of people so much amusement as as I did for nothing by that little act of kindness. With the exception of the lady whose lunch basket the shawl was and myself I think everybody in the car was pleased. And passengers in the other cars, all the way from the smoker to the sleepers, hearing the sounds of mirth, came into our car and asked about it. And the people who had the loudest and clearest voices told the incident, referring to me as "that man," or to avoid tautology, as the story had to be repeated many times in the course of 145 miles, "that fellow," or "that chap," or "that man settin' there." I sawed wood very conscientiously for a long time after that, but on another evil day I entertained another traveling audience by tugging at a car window which had never been opened since the car was built. I wore a porous-plaster on the plinth of my spinal column for a couple of weeks, and reformed again. I burned the old resolutions on the tablets of memory and engraved them with a pen of iron on my heart. I also made up my mind that I would endeavor to remember them.

Well, a week or two since I was thundering along through the miles of exquisite landscape gardening that mark the suburbs of Philadelphia. A young gentleman sitting just in front of me left the train at a local station, and just as we started again half a dozen female voices shrilled out upon the startled air: "Oh! Oh! Oh! That young man has left his umbrella! Oh! He'll never see it again! Called him quick! Oh! Throw it out to him do do DO throw that young man his umbrella!" And as they pointed at the young man and shrieked at me I hastily raised the window, the powers of darkness assisting me, yelled at the young man, hurled the umbrella at him, like a javelin and we were gone.

In about two minutes a young man two stories and a mansard taller than any member of my whole family came down the aisle of that car with a darkened brow, and looked long and earnestly into the vacant seat whence I had just fired a silk umbrella with a hammered-silver head. He looked under the seat and then he looked into the rack, then he looked at me. I didn't look up, but I felt his eyes go clear through me, as I gazed fixedly out of the window and tried hard to think of the form of prayer to be used for a man who expects to spend the rest of the winter in the hospital. Before I could remember it the athletic looking stranger said kindly but very firmly: "I left an umbrella in this seat a few minutes ago." For one moment the ghastliest silence you ever heard settled down on that car, and then those shrieking women giggled as though it were a light thing to die when you had a return ticket in your pocket that would be wasted. I tried to tell the stranger that the young man who was sitting in the seat took it with him, but I thought I had done enough wickedness and folly for one trip. I owned up and told him the truth. He was a magnanimous man and he spared me. But it was a moment of agony, and today there are white hairs on the back of my head that I never saw before, and I never pass through Merion station without a shudder. And I never again will offer to extend the slightest helpful courtesy to a stranger. No; if a train should jump off a bridge 4,000 feet high into a cataract fiercer than 10,000 Niagaras I wouldn't offer to hold a lone woman's baby and get her hand-bag out of the rack for her, while she put on her gossamer and hunted for her lost check in case she should want her baggage when we got to the bottom.

An Essential of Success.

At the present time, when the determination to make money is uppermost in almost every man's ambition, it is recognized, even by those who profess to despise advertising of every kind, that publicity is essential to success. In primitive times a great author dedicated his works to some person of great influence, and thereby secured a hearing. A watchmaker would present a sample of his work to the king, and straightway the royal sanction procured him business. But in this country, where the trade is continually changing, not only from one house to another, but from one street to another, where every one is on the lookout for "bargains," "goods at wholesale," and "goods at less than cost" and "half price," and where the desire to make money without hard labor is the national characteristic, and where the merchantile and trading spirit is the habit and ambition of all classes, a merchant must keep his business before the public if he would have the best success.—[J. W. Thompson.

FAVORITES OF FORTUNE.

Two Cleveland Men Draw Large Amounts in the Louisiana State Lottery.

A Sun reporter, having learned that D. W. Gibbons, who lives at 496 Lorain street, near the corner of Tracy street, held one-twentieth of ticket 39,526, which drew the second capital prize of $100,000 in the recent drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery, Sept. 10, called at the residence of Mr. Gibbons a day or two since to see if the rumor were true. Mr. Gibbons was away at work being a maker of washers, at the Upson nut and bolt works. The young lady who opened the door of the humble cottage informed the reporter that the rumor was true. Mr. Gibbons and seven others had drawn $5,000 in the lottery, and the money had already been paid, each receiving a share of $625.

D. W. Gibbons is not the only lucky man. There is another heart made glad on the East Side. C. A. File, a young mechanic of 25 or 26, who lives on Dent street, near Wade Park avenue, and works at the Brush Electric works, near Wilson avenue, held one-twentieth of ticket 38 159, which drew the third capital prize of $50,000. J. H. Maskell, of 40 Willet street, purchased ticket for Mr. File at his request, the latter never for once dreaming that the lightning would strike him. Great was his surprise when the news came that he was one of the favorites of fortune, and greater was his joy when the tangible reality of $2,500 was put in his possession.

Only a few months have elapsed since Mr. Peter Weber, of Liberty street, a bridge tender, had a windfall of $15,000 from a lucky drawing in the same lottery.—[Cleveland (Ohio) Sun, Oct. 2.

The Sewers of Paris

are one of the modern wonders of the world. That marvelous network of underground streams, over which the tourist can travel by rail and in boats, constitutes the bowels of the gay capital. This labyrinth of streams is kept with scrupulous care; for any obstruction in the flow of the sewage would be attended with serious results to the health of the inhabitants of the city above. The sewers of the human system are the liver and bowels, and in order to keep disease out of the wonderful city of which they are a part, they must be kept always free and unobstructed. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets are the best laxative and cathartic known for the purpose. Tiny sugar coated granules, in vials, always fresh.

The catogan style of arranging the hair is most popular with young girls, and a second and smaller bow is tied at the top of the head, keeping back the front locks of hair.

A large and handsome white pearl, held in place by the curled apices of the leaves in a laurel wreath, forms one of the prettiest lace pin-heads shown this season.

You Were Once Beautiful, Madam,

but your glass tells you that you are so no longer. Why is this? It is because you are suffering from functional derangement. You may "paint an inch thick," as Hamlet says, but you cannot conceal the ravages of disease No wonder you are low-spirited. But why suffer any longer? Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will restore the bloom to your cheek, the sparkle to your eyes, the old-time lightness to your step. It will make a happy woman of you again. It cures all those weaknesses, backaching, bearing-down pains peculiar to your sex. The only medicine sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case or money refunded. See guarantee on bottle wrapper.

Veils may be worn just to the chin, a trifle below, or only to cover the nose. Large spots are coming in again on net veils. The long scarf veils are still worn twisted around the neck twice, and then pinned with a fancy pin, with an air of seeming carelessness, which is impossible for some women to catch.

Her Riddle.

"Why is Summer like pride?" inquired Clara of George, as he strolled about the moonlit lawn. "I cannot answer, love. Why?" "Because it goeth before a Fall," she answered laughingly. "We had better go in now," was all the young man said as a deep sigh escaped between his teeth.

The basque waist is almost a thing of the past.

In ether pure; in sunshine glow
In fruits, in crops, in springs that flow,
All giving life, in them we see
Thy hand flowing mercy DEITY,

From birth to manhood we increase in bulk and weight. After growth the repairing process goes on: living tissues are steadily broken down. The waste if not carried out and constantly replaced with proper elements the body suffers, sickens, down, down. Vitality so lowered many drop into a premature grave. Among the discoveries of the age nature towers over all. A mineral spring is found containing all the elements—sixteen—the same as that composing the body. This water—the famed St. Leon—effects such marvelous cures; its name is spreading to all quarters. The ablest physicians are lost in wonder, and pronounce it "a miracle of healing power unequalled." Few know health such as St. Leon brings. It is safe, certain; its duplex action unfathomable. It expels the most deadly poisons. And all through life long its building, bracing, regulating influences last. After a free use the wasted organism becomes firm; the pale, wrinkled skin assumes its summer bloom. A fresh charm is lent to life never before experienced. Purchase the water, drink freely, and continue until the system is built up with nature's pure elements that nourish the vital forces, regulate and tone the mechanism so that the tear, wear and worry of life may be overcome with those buoyant feelings perfect health alone can maintain.

Black lace fichus are worn by young ladies with black surah or light silk gowns. The large-meshed nets, threaded with tinsel or ribbon, are used for dainty collarettes and fichus.

Principal Crosby expresses himself highly satisfied with the results of the high school examination, held on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. He commenced the practice of sending out monthly reports of the pupils' progress to their parents.

Extra high prices were realized at the sale of Dougall McDougall's property at Campbellton last week. Oats went as high as 40c. per bushel, while the market price is only 25c. Stock and implements also commanded good prices. Peter Duncanson was the auctioneer.

A Rodney correspondent neglected to sign his or her name to an item sent in this week, consequently the item does appear in our columns. No item, however small, will be allowed to appear in our columns unless the name of the author is known to us.

Under the new time table the M. C. R. will use "fuzees" for the guidance of trainmen. The fuzee serves the same purpose as a flag signal. They give a bright light and serve to show trainmen that it is not safe to pass over the section where they have been placed until the light burns out.

A. N. C. Black and party arrived home from their duck shooting expedition to Rond Eau on Thursday night. The party had a fine time and secured some 300 ducks. While at Ridgetown the party were entertained by Henry F. Duck, architect, and they speak in high terms of that gentleman's hospitality.

J. M. Jackson has on exhibition at his music store the big teeth which were plowed up in a field near Clachan last year. They are of immense size and belong to the remains of some animal long since extinct. There are three pieces in the lot, which are all that could be preserved, the other bones crumbling to dust as soon as exposed to the air.

The St. Andrew's Society of Dutton will hold its annual supper on the evening of December 2nd, invitations for which will be issued this week. The officers of the society are already making preparations for a grand Scotch concert to be given early in the new year, and at which the best Scotch talent in Ontario will be present. Watch for particulars later.

"The Jesuits; a history of their open and secret proceedings from the foundation of the order to the present time," is the title of a fine book, for which Roderick McKenzie, our well-known book-agent, is now taking orders. This book is well worth double the price asked for it and can only be obtained from the agent, Roderick McKenzie, who will be pleased to wait upon anyone who may drop him a card to Wallacetown.

A shooting accident took place among a number of Hamilton sportsmen who are duck shooting at Rondeau. A young man named Warren recklessly discharged his weapon so that the shot scattered among a crowd of his companions, three of whom were hit, one so badly that it is feared his eye is destroyed, and he has left for Detroit to consult a specialist.

Application has been made to the Divisional Court at Toronto by Messrs. Macdougall & Robertson, solicitors for the Dutton high school board, for a declaration making Aldborough part of the high school district, and, as such, entitled to contribute its share towards the maintenance of the school. This will have the effect of bringing the present dispute to a speedy settlement.

Some individuals who have not a very large stock of liberality or common sense on hand have been circulating the report in surrounding places that the Dutton high school will be closed at Christmas. It is almost needless to say that there is no truth in the report as it is too nonsensical to bebelieved by any thinking person. The Dutton high school is not going to be closed as soon as a few disgruntled kickers would like; but has the best prospects before it for a successful term's work.

F. J. Armstrong, who has ably filled the position of M. C. R. agent here for the past eight months, was on Thursday last removed from that office, Jas. Balkwill, relieving agent, occupied his place until yesterday morning, when the new agent, W. D. Alexander, late ticket agent at Niagara Falls, Ont., took charge. Mr. Armstrong made many friends during his short stay here, and our citizens will be sorry to see him go, as he was always obliging and courteous in his dealings with the public.

Municipal election matters are rather quiet yet, although several parties are actively canvassing. Amongst the candidates for the reeve's chair are mentioned the names of Messrs. A. A. McKillop, L. W. McIntyre, D. McLean, the present councillor for Ward No. 4, and A. J. Leitch, the present reeve, is being pressed to appear in the field again, although he has so far declined to do so. Councillor Hine, of Ward No. 2, will be opposed by J. D. McDiarmid, and Councillor McCallum, of Ward No. 3, will have for his opponent Judson Milligan. Very little is heard about the other two wards.

J. C. Macdonald, whose store at Duart was robbed by Frank Gardner, offered $50 for the detection of the thief, which was supplemented by an additional $50 from the township of Orford. The township met its obligation and the $50 was divided between Constable Philpott and Detective Heenan. Mr. Philpott called upon Macdonald for his $50, but he declines to pay it. As much time and considerable money was expended in securing Gardner's apprehension, the officers are considerably out of pocket in consequence of Macdonald failing to meet his obligations like a man.

The regular meeting of the Helping Hand Society was held in the Methodist church on Thursday night last when the following excellent programme was presented, A. E. Crosby, B. A., acting as chairman:—Devotional exercises; reading, "The Raven," Jas. Tremeer; song, "The Mill Wheel," Dutton Male Quartette; recitation, Miss Florence Schultz; instrumental, Miss Ella Jackson; essay, "Cowper," Thos. Porter; solo, "Tired," Miss Hattie Lacey; the society's paper, "Enterprise-Advance," read by Miss Ella Jackson; song, "The Shepherd's Chorus," Dutton Male Quartette. The next meeting will be held at the residence of F. Millard on Friday evening, Nov. 15th. The society is in a flourishing condition and its meetings are better attended than ever before.

The two entertainments given in the Baptist church lately were novel and interesting and drew large audiences. That on Friday evening, Oct. 25th, was managed entirely by the ladies, who furnished a most excellent evening's amusement. Miss McCormick filled the chair, introducing the programme, which has already been published, in a highly creditable manner. The entertainment throughout was most successful, the receipts being $22.15. On the following Friday evening the gentlemen of the congregation gave their entertainment, which was also well received. Dr. Ruthven occupied the chair. The receipts of this entertainment were $16.20, the wet night no doubt keeping a large number away. Whether the gentlemen were chivalrous enough to allow the ladies to beat them or the fair ones had the best talent and cooks 'tis hard to say, but the general verdict gives the palm to the ladies for getting up the best entertainment.

A Fact

WORTH knowing is that blood diseases which all other remedies fail to cure, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Fresh confirmation of this statement comes to hand daily. Even such deep-seated and stubborn complaints as Rheumatism, Rheumatic Gout, and the like, are thoroughly eradicated by the use of this wonderful alterative.

Mrs. R. Irving Dodge, 110 West 125th street, New York, certifies:—

"About two years ago, after suffering for nearly two years from rheumatic gout, being able to walk only with great discomfort, and having tried various remedies, including mineral waters, without relief, I saw by an advertisement in a Chicago paper that a man had been relieved of this distressing complaint, after long suffering, by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I then decided to make a trial of this medicine, and took it regularly for eight months. I am pleased to say that it effected a complete cure, and that I have since had no return of the disease."

Mrs. L. A. Stark, Nashua, N. H., writes: "One year ago I was taken ill with rheumatism, being confined to my house six months. I came out of the sickness very much debilitated, with no appetite, and my system disordered in every way. I commenced to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla and began to improve at once, gaining in strength and soon recovering my usual health. I cannot say too much in praise of this well-known medicine."

"I have taken a great deal of medicine, but nothing has done me so much good as Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I felt its beneficial effects before I had quite finished one bottle, and I can freely testify that it is the best blood-medicine I know of."—L. W. Ward, Sr., Woodland, Texas.

ELGIN TEACHERS.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

President Harvey in the chair. The first subject in the afternoon was Arithmetic, by Mr. Campbell, of St. Thomas. Mr. Campbell took up the subject with special reference to H. C. F. In commencing the subject he showed how he would drill upon the previous work of divisors, and by a slight change draw out the idea of a common divisor. The whole subject was taught inductively, step by step being taken in such logical succession that no pupil could help but understand easily.

Dr. McLennan followed Mr. Campbell. subject, Primary Reading. The Doctor dealt with the look-and-say method, and showed the chief objection to it. After a child had been a long time in learning a vocabulary by that method he was still unable to help himself except by what little word-analysis he was able to learn. "Why, then," said the speaker, "not help him?" He advocated proceeding from the known to the unknown. In illustration, he began with the letter "a." After this was understood he would add the letter "t." From this the word "at" was formed. After words an initial consonant was prefixed. By this principle word after word was built. This, he laimed, enabled the pupil to help himself sooner than by any other way.

Mr. Burdick illustrated Canadian History. He would divide the history into periods; show how the changes of one were the natural sequence of the defects in the one preceeding, and how these changes showed the growing influence of the people. From the way he handled his subject it is evident he has the true method of its teaching.

Dr. McLennan was again called upon and gave a lecture on "Training of Language Power." He gave the general principals upon which he would proceed. Without language he considered there was poor thought. Then he would impress upon the teachers the importance of oral language.

SATURDAY'S SESSION.

The Association opened this morning at 9 a. m. Miss Ettie McCredie introduced the subject of "Primary Numbers." Beginning with the simplest combination of objects, Miss McCredie carried her subject gradually upward by the use of bundles of objects, of crayons, of candies and other familiar objects; afterwards by problems she would impress and attest the work done, by a simple device she was enabled to get over the pons assinorum of units and tens.

Mr. Millar followed with Teachers' Certificates. Mr. Millar ably reviewed the subjects on the programme. He showed how the present tendency was to make the course more practical, but condemned the exclusion of Euclid.

A discussion followed on the proposal to create a permanent third-class certificate. Messrs. Atkin, Campbell, (St. Thomas), and Campbell, (West Lorne), condemned the proposal.

Incidentally the amount of matter to be learned by rote by entrance candidates was introduced. Messrs. Hammond and Campbell considered the amount excessive. Mr. Campbell, of West Lorne, did not approve of limiting the age for teachers entering the profession.

A motion was next carried asking the Minister of Education to arrange a course of professional readings for third class teachers.

Mr. Campbell, of St. Thomas, from his experience in the Model School, considered that a teacher required maturity of mind.

Dr. McLellan next finished his lecture of yesterday, "The Training of the Language Faculty." The Doctor dwelt on the importance of the development of the mind, and showed the effect of its consequent growth.

A resolution of condolence with the family of the late Miss M. Steele was passed.

After a vote of thanks to the retiring president, J. H. Harvey, the meeting adjourned by singing the National Anthem.

Prof. Loisette's memory system is creating greater interest than ever in all parts of the country, and persons wishing to improve their memory should send for his prospectus, free, as advertised in another column

Two weeks ago thousands of Second Adventists across the line sat waiting the final judgment. As usual it did not come. Twenty years ago Canada witnessed a similar session. When calculators have exhausted all their methods of determining the precise date of the day of doom, those who take Holy Writ in its simplicity as the basis of knowledge will begin to feel a greater likelihood of the second advent being nigh. Determinations of prophetic time-symbols are all theories, more or less, and the estimates of the probable length of this final dispensation are necessarily of the same character. One scarcely knows whether to sympathize with or to laugh at these deluded folk. Their earnestness is the only redeeming feature in the thing.

The extension of the Erie & Huron railway to Rond Eau will be commenced as soon as permission is granted by the Railway Committee at Ottawa. The Government will be asked to make some improvements in the harbor by the construction of a wing that will prove an additional place of safety for shipping, and it is altogether probable that before long a steamer will ply between that point and Cleveland.

A couple of serious accidents happened in Glencoe on Thursday. In the afternoon Mrs. McKellar, wife of the proprietor of the McKellar House, was out driving, accompanied by Miss Johnston and Miss Galbraith, when the horse became frightened and ran away. Coming into a collision with a telegraph pole the ladies were thrown out. Mrs. McKellar was cut on the face and bruised about the head, Miss Johnston had an arm broken and Miss Galbraith several ribs. Mr. Clanahan, contractor, while working on the Presbyterian church in the village, fell from the roof, and striking an upright board sustained very serious injuries, the full extent of which are not known.

A TERROR TO EVIL-DOERS

By CATHERINE G. FURLEY.

CHAPTER I.

The town of Picton stands on the high-road between Melbourne and the gold-fields of Victoria. It is now the centre of a large pastoral district, with railway communication with the capital, and a growing population that divides itself into castes in the orthodox old-country style.

But twenty years ago it was a small place, important chiefly because it was the only township within thirty miles, and because inside its walls—such as they were—all the organisation of civilisation was concentrated. There were churches in Picton—an Episcopal church and a Baptist chapel; there was a store and a court house; and a doctor had lately set up in practice. Being an energetic young fellow, who believed that skill and earnestness are worth as much in a new country as capital is in an old one, he was doing well; though his patients paid their fees in gold-dust and sheep and grain as often as in coin of the realm. Yet he was not a happy man this mild March day, as he stood in the veranda of the vicarage, looking with irritated admiration at a girl whose yellow dress and tawny hair and eyes harmonised with the brilliant autumn tints of the creepers that twined around the posts and hung in long trails from the roof.

Madge Renton, the vicar's daughter, was not the belle of Picton; that pre-eminence was claimed by Jenny Birch, the innkeeper's only child, who had golden hair, and a pink and white complexion, and three times as many new gowns as Miss Renton. But tastes differ, and though the miners from up country and the occasional travellers who for any reason, or none, stopped at Picton, all admired Miss Birch, Dr. Philip Sewell did not think her worth looking at when Madge was by. He would have been well content to have had this eccentric taste all to himself; but, unfortunately, it was shared by another member of the small community, and that the most important one in it. The Law by common consent ranks above Medicine in our social organisation — the newspaper which spoke of "the value of life and the sacredness of property" only echoed the public sentiment, which has fixed the respective status of the professions—and though the Church is supposed to rank above either, it is to be feared that the lawyer, above all when he is magistrate as well, bulks more largely in popular esteem than the parson. At least that was the case in Picton, where Captain Frere, the "police magistrate," was decidedly the greatest man in the place.

He had been in the army before he came to Australia, and had been invalided after the Crimean War, which at once made him something of a hero. He was, moreover, a distant cousin of a peer who had once been Governor of Victoria; and it was to this connection that he owed his present appointment, given him when his health seemed so shattered as to make active service impossible. The Australian climate had restored him to strength, and, if one might judge from expression as well as looks, to more hope and energy than he had seemed capable of when he came to Picton, two years before the day when Dr. Sewell—a later arrival still—lost his temper with Madge Renton after having already lost his heart to her.

The girl sat rocking herself in a light cane chair, as if trying by the motion to keep some inward vexation from finding vent in words. A faint flush stained her usually pale cheeks, and her tawny eyes looked darker with anger. Miss Jenny Birch, who had been known to describe Madge as "a red-haired, white-faced thing," had never seen her look so beautiful; for it was Miss Renton's wont to go about the world rather coldly, except when love or pity or anger roused her soul and her features to some excitement.

There was considerable excuse for the indignation she was now showing. Dr. Sewell had the habit of candour, and he had been indulging in it to the full, under circumstances when reticence would have been especially advisable. He had just asked Miss Renton to marry him; and his request being refused, he had demanded the reason of her reply, and begged her to reconsider it. At first Madge had merely reiterated her assurance that she could never accept him; but she liked him just well enough to hate wounding him, and in order that she might not seem to be doing so without cause, she at last explained that she was engaged—privately, not even her father knew of it—to Captain Lewis Frere. At this point the rejected suitor's duty was clearly to bow to the hand of destiny and retire from the contest with as much dignity as he could muster.

This, which he ought to have done, was exactly what Philip did not do. He looked aghast, shocked, indignant, and ejaculated almost unconsciously: "Engaged to that old—fogey!"

Madge felt certain that a harsher word than fogey was in his mind, though he managed to restrain it; and fogey was bad enough. A girl who is thoroughly in love with a man considerably her senior can laugh at the surprise of her friends; but when she is not quite sure that he is the one man in the world for her, when she has been carried away by the novelty of wooing, and by the knowledge that a man who has been all round the world and has tried all life's flavours for five-and-forty years, seeks as the best it can give him her untutored self—when vanity has dictated her acceptance more than love, she is apt to resent very deeply any insinuation that, after all, her prize is not so very well worth winning. She must prove that it is a pearl of price; she requires to convince herself of it as much as any one else; and she is very indignant when another gives utterance to the doubt that has been lurking half-suspected, in her own mind.

Fogy, indeed! How dare Philip Sewell hint at such a word! It is true that Lewis was a little bald, and had a few crow's-feet about the eyes, and that there were white streaks in that beautiful beard of his. She was sure that Philip would have been only too proud if he had had a beard as long and flowing, instead of a miserable little moustache. Still, she would make Lewis shave it off; it certainly did make him look older, and there was no need to do that. But he wasn't a fogey!

"You are very courteous!" she exclaimed in tones that made Philip feel how lacking in courtesy he had been.

"I beg your pardon Miss Renton; I had no right to speak as I did; but—but—you know"——

"O yes, I know! I know that boys of four or five and twenty" (Philip was twenty-six, and this was as near it as she dared venture) "always try to disparage men who have reached the age of wisdom. They are jealous of them, I suppose."

"No, they renot, said Philip bluntly; 'except—that is—except when—when"—'

"Pray, don't make exceptions out of consideration for me. I am quite prepared to admit that very young men don't appreciate the qualities of those who have more experience than themselves; but women, fortunately, are different," said Miss Madge who had just passed her nineteenth birthday, with a grand air.

"I hope they are! That is, I hope you are in love with this fellow Frere, though I don't see how you can be. And I don't believe you are."

"Dr. Sewell, how dare you speak in such a fashion!"

"I beg your pardon; I am very stupid. I know I have no right to criticise your choice. I am mad—jealous, I suppose. But when a man has his best hope taken away from him, he"——The words ceased, a certain husky feeling that had been in Philip's throat since the moment Madge said "No" having suddenly become so marked as to prevent articulation.

The girl grew softer when she saw how moved he was. "I am very sorry, Philip, very sorry," she said gently: "but you see I am not free, and you will find somebody else who will suit you better."

"Never!" he exclaimed stoutly. "Even a boy may know his own mind, when he is a boy of twenty-six, and I know that I shall never love any one but you."

She was about to combat this opinion, which would probably have resulted in a new development of the original quarrel between them, when, her father appeared. The Rev. Mr Renton was an anxious-looking man, who seemed to feel how little his Oxford training was adapted to his Australian environment. He had come to the antipodes first because his health was weak; and when the pure soft air had healed his feeble lungs, he began to look for some sphere of work in the new land. It was in the purest missionary spirit that he had come to Picton ten years before; and it was in a missionary spirit sublimed to a forlorn-hope that he clung to his post in spite of the bitter consciousness of failure. A few, the more aristocratic portion of the Picton community, came to his church; but the majority of those who cared for religious exercises at all went to the chapel. This consciousness of failure in his life-work gave the parson an apologetic air, even before those who, like Dr. Sewell, were loyal members of his flock. Philip did not indeed see that Mr. Renton was nervous in his presence; but he perceived, and confided to himself—having no other confidant whom he could trust with a disparaging judgment of Miss Renton's father—that the vicar almost cringed to Captain Frere; and at this moment he glared at his inoffending pastor, being suddenly struck with the idea that he had forced his daughter to accept the Captain.

Fortunately, Mr Renton did not perceive the frown on the young doctor's face; neither did he notice his daughter's flushed cheeks, nor any of the subtle tokens of a disturbed moral atmosphere. He had news of his own to communicate, and that excited him, to the detriment of his faculty of observation.

"What a dreadful affair!" he exclaimed. Madge thought of Philip's proposal: Philip thought of Madge's engagement, and both asked, "What affair?" with more embarrassment than curiosity.

"That murder of the policemen down the river."

"The murder!' They were both sufficiently curious now, and for once in his life Mr Renton had two attentive listeners. "You know," he exclaimed, "that a month ago the police escort took a load of gold and dust to the bank at Melbourne. I suppose they left most of it there; but they were bringing back a considerable sum in bank-notes to the miners up the country. Bank-notes are light, so there were only two men sent on the return journey."

"I know all that," said Philip, with a touch of impatience. "We expected them to stop at Picton last night. When they didn't come, I concluded that the roads were bad, and that they had got along slower than they expected."

"The roads "were' bad, and they could not reach Picton before nightfall; at least, so I suppose, for they camped about ten miles away on the bank of the river, and there they were found murdered this morning."

"Who can have done it?"

"Some bushranger, I suppose. Of course the object was theft; all the notes are gone."

"It won't profit the thief much, I fancy; for doubtless the numbers of the notes are set down in the bank at Melbourne; and as soon as he presents one he will be caught—that is, if he is rash enough to present it himself. If he gets a dupe to do it for him, it may take a longer time, but not much: he is a fool as well as a rogue."

"It is funny that we should not have heard of bushrangers being in the neighbourhood," said Madge. "Captain Frere was out all the night before last looking about on the route the policemen were to take, in order to make sure that all was right; and he told me the coast was clear. If there had been any dangerous characters about, he would have sent an escort to meet the men, I suppose."

"Ah! the bushrangers must keep a better lookout than the police magistrate," said Mr. Renton. "They have brought the bodies to the inn; and I suppose Captain Frere will hold an inquiry, though it is hardly likely that anything will come of it besides a verdict against "person or persons unknown."

"To the inn!" exclaimed Philip with some irritation. "I hope not; noise or excitement may injure my patient greatly, poor woman."

"Oh, you have a patient at the inn," remarked Madge, faintly piqued. "Is the fair Miss Jenny ill!"

"Not she; Miss Jenny is the goddess Hygeia. But they have a guest there, a woman who has once been beautiful, but has, if one may judge by appearances, had a hard life. I suppose she was going up to the mines. But I know nothing about her, beyond the fact that she fainted after going out for a walk yesterday morning, and that she is now in a very weak and feverish condition."

"Poor thing! Is she young?" asked Madge.

"Not very. About forty, I should think from her appearance. I think I ought to go and see her. The bustle may have injured her. Miss Jenny—I know her!—would go rushing up to the invalid's room to tell her of 'the murder,' as if it were really a great treat. Besides, they'll probably want me to diagnose the nature of these two poor fellow's wounds."

So Philip, glad of the excuse for a graceful departure, went away, his sore heart—such is human nature, with its troubles balanced by strange and fantastic compensations—fretting him a little less because of the exciting news.

He went down to the inn, partly to see his patient, partly to ask if his services were to be called upon in connection with the inquiry on the murder of the two policemen. He was interested in the matter, and when one has a curiosity to gratify, it is well to have the excuse of official duties to justify its gratification. The innkeeper's daughter met him at the door. Her eyes were not dim, nor was her natural colour abated but, nevertheless, when she saw Philip, she leant up against the doorpost and gasped out: "O doctor, I am glad to see you. Isn't this a terrible business! It has made me quite faint." For the goddess Hygeia, probably because she had never had a day's illness in her life, had a great ambition to be considered an invalid—a weakness which had become more pronounced since Dr. Sewell came to Picton.

"The air will do you good, then," said the doctor coolly, passing her with a nod.—"Is your father about? I want him to take me to see the poor fellows."

"He is in the coach-house. They're there, and father is with Captain Frere, who is looking at them.

Philip Sewell was not particularly desirous of meeting Captain Frere at this moment; but having expressed a desire to see the bodies, he could hardly turn round in a moment and profess indifference to the matter; besides, it was inevitable, if any investigation of the murder was to be made, that the doctor and the magistrate should meet in connection with it.

He went to the coach-house, where two dead men lay. They had been stalwart fellows, apparently of a more active habit than the blue-coated guardians of the peace at home—rough-riders, who could find their way across an almost trackless country, and perhaps were not very scrupulous whether they took a bushranger alive or dead—men who have no place in a fully civilized community, and in a semi-barbarous one are a protection or a terror to the inhabitants according as some chance word of circumstance may move them towards good or evil; but brave men, who, having undertaken a task, discharge it at any cost. These two had died in the fulfilment of their duty, and apparently had died hard. The discharged pistol taken from the cold nerveless hand of one proved that he had tried, however vainly, to prevent the theft. It was just possible that the thief had got more than the bank-notes in that midnight robbery.

Dr. Sewell nodded silently to the innkeeper and Captain Frere as he entered the coach-house. A scant greeting suffices for the living when we are in the presence of the dead, and besides, Philip was not in the mood to lavish courtesy on Madge Renton's lover! What on earth could she see in that withered old stick? Philip asked himself, eyeing the captain with vigorous disfavour. The contempt was decidedly unjust. Lewis Frere was a picturesque-looking, if not a handsome man. His face was indeed decidedly thin at the temples; but his dark eyes had that melancholy look which has a certain attraction for girls who have never known trouble themselves; and his long silky pointed beard was in itself a feature, giving him something of the aspect of the high-bred gentlemen whose portraits Van Dyck painted for all time.

"This is a sad sight, doctor," said the innkeeper, after Philip had looked silently at the bodies for a minute or two. "These two poor fellows, full of health and strength only yesterday, and murdered last night when we were fast asleep in our beds!"

"Not quite," said Philip, whose professional eye noted more than that of an ordinary observer.

"Not quite what? Not murdered?"

"O yes, murdered. But they were not murdered last night. From all appearances, I should judge that they have been dead more than twenty-four hours."

"Nonsense! How can you tell that?" exclaimed Captain Frere sharply.

"Oh! the study of medical jurisprudence is not exactly a waste of time; one learns a good deal by it," answered Philip, in a tone which, without obvious discourtesy, indicated the sentiment, "Mind your own business, and don't interfere with mine."—"These two men must have been killed the night before last," he went on in a more amiable tone; "and, by-the-by, it's funny, as you were out on scout-duty that night, that you didn't see a sign of the murderer. He must have been somewhere in the neighborhood."

"I wasn't out the night before last," said Frere, hastily; "I was in my bed, like the rest of you."

"I beg your pardon. It was Miss Renton who said you were out, and I took it for granted she had learned the fact from you."

"Miss Renton is not my guardian."

"No; but I took it for granted that as your fiancee, she did not speak without authority, or at least knowledge."

Frere muttered an imprecation, which Phillip took to be an expression of anger at his stupidity in thus abruptly announcing an engagement which was supposed to be still secret, and the words which the captain at last addressed to him—"You are a good gossip-monger, Dr. Sewell"—confirmed the notion in his mind.

"I suppose I ought to apologise," said Philip; "but as a marriage is a thing for all the world to know, doubtless I am anticipating your announcement only by a very short time. I can only say that I hope you will be worthy of Miss Renton's love.—Now, Birch, I think I will go and see my patient. Her heart is weak, and this fuss and excitement in the house may have injured her."

He went out; and Birch, turning to offer surprised congratulations to the captain, saw that he was very pale. "You look bad, captain," he exclaimed. "This sight does make a man feel a bit queer. Come into the house and get a drop of brandy."

"I confess I would be glad of it," said Frere, and they left the coach-house. But the captain would not enter the inn. He threw himself down on a bench near the door, saying that the air revived him; and while Birch hurried away to bring the brandy, Miss Jenny, who was still leaning against the doorpost, pouting a little that the doctor had wasted so few words on her, entered into conversation with him.

"You do look ill, captain. Of course that sight would give you a turn; and you've got a cold too, haven't you?"

"No; I haven't. How could I catch cold?" he said irritably, as if the idea of a cold annoyed him.

"Oh, I don't know," she returned, offended at his tone. "But seeing you've had your throat wrapped for two days, it wasn't such a strange idea to get into my head, was it?" And she pointed to a silk handkerchief, which the captain wore folded closely around his neck.

Captain Frere had apparently recovered his temper. "You're right, Miss Jenny," he admitted; "I have a cold; but you see I'm very touchy about confessing to such an old woman's complaint."

Philip Sewell meanwhile was sitting holding his patient's wrist with his fingers on her pulse. He had been pleased to note when he first took it that it was calm and steady. But the voices of the two speakers outside floated up to the open window of the room where the unknown woman lay, and at the sound of the captain's, the pulse suddenly leapt into a quick flutter in irregular beat.

"Now, this is very funny," said Phillip to himself, preserving an immovable countenance the while. "I wonder if it was Frere she came to Picton to see? It is evident that his vicinity excites her."

The Bachelor Coat.

Old coat, for some three or four seasons
We've been jolly comrades, but now
We part, old companion, forever;
To fate and the fashion I bow.
You'd look very well at a dinner,
I'd wear you with pride at a ball,
But I'm dressing to-night for a wedding.
My own—and you'd not do at all

You've too many wine stains about you,
You're scented too much with cigars;
When the gaslight shines full on your collar
It glistens like myriad stars.
That wouldn't look well at my wedding,
They'd seem inappropriate there;
Nell doesn't use "diamond powder,"
She tells me it ruins her hair.

You've been out on Cozzen's piazza
Too late when the evenings were damp,
When the moonbeams were silvering Cro'-nest
And the lights were all out in the camp,
You've rested on nicely oiled stairways
Too often when sweet eyes were bright,
And somebody's ball dress, not Nellie's
Flowed round you, in rivers of white.

There is a reprobate looseness about you.
Should I wear you to-night, I believe
As I came with my bride from the altar
You'd laugh in your wicked old sleeve.
When you felt there the tremulous pressure
Of her hand in its delicate glove,
That is telling one slyly, yet proudly.
Her trust is as deep as her love.

So go to your grave in the wardrobe
And furnish a feast for the moth!
Nell's glove shall betray its sweet secret
To younger, more innocent cloth.
It's time to put on your successor,
It's made in a fashion quite new,
But, old friend, I'm afraid it will never Set as easily on me—as you!"

Thanksgiving.

Brought through a year wrought with pleasure and pain,
Gladdened by sunshine and freshened by rain,
Led by the ever wise God from above,
Whose kingdom is purity founded on love.

We have set by a day to give thanks in our land,
For the fruits of the soil so abundant and grand,
The harvest is plentiful, we need not complain,
Let the people rejoice o'er the valley and plain.

What if troubles beset us in life's busy fight,
There is always some happiness, always some light;
This world's not all darkness, all sorrow and woe,
The sunshine oft comes with its warmth and glow.

Then give thanks for our lives that we find them no worse,
Don't grumble at luck or give vent to a curse,
We have privileges many, our disasters are few,
We'll abandon the old and make way for the new.

Give thanks for the sovereign far over the sea,
Who with sceptre of truth makes our country so free,
Though ocean divide us, yet nought stands between,
In our love for Victoria, "God save the Queen."

Give thanks that we live where the gospel is heard,
In the land of free speech, with the Sabbath observed,
A country of culture, and wisdom, and wit,
With abundance of backbone, and plenty of grit.

Be thankful that war with its horrors untold
Dwells not in our midst as in Britain of old,
While with winter upon us, and plenty in store,
No want shall o'er take us, or knock at our door.

With the north star of progress to lighten our way,
With the bright sun of hope for our guide day by day,
With our banner of might floating high as the domes,
Peace and joy shall abound in Canadian homes.

AN ASIATIC POTENTATE.

The King of Cambodia as Described by M. Adolphe Belot.

Norodom, king of Cambodia, is somewhat of a wag in his way. It is said he had a great desire to visit the Paris exhibition, but it appears there were some political objections to his doing so. Although, as a consequence of the French protectorate in Indo-China, he has to a certain extent adopted the habits of European civilization, yet in the main he still remains a purely Asiatic monarch, ruling over a court whose fantastical customs can not but appear most singular to us. We have it on the authority of M. Adolphe Belot, who has journeyed to Cambodia and has had audience of the king, that under no pretense whatever is any one of his subjects permitted to touch him without a special order. This exaggerated deference is not infrequently attended with inconvenience to himself. On one occasion, his horse having taken fright and bolted and run foul of a post, his majesty was thrown out of his carriage and lay wounded and bleeding on the ground. There were numerous mandarins and attendants on the spot, but none of them dared to offer him any assistance. Fortunately a European happened to pass by at the time, and taking pity on this forlorn king, whom a silly etiquette condemned to die unattended, he took him up in his arms and carried him into the palace. His being nursed in illness is entirely a matter for the hands of the "bonzes," or body-servants, whose fingers have to be bound in strips of cloth of gold. His hair-dresser, previous to operating on the royal head, has to put on gloves, over which are worn heavy rings set with precious stones. Working under these conditions is no easy matter, and King Norodom's hair is undoubtedly the worst cut of any, in the world. His majesty has adopted a style of dress in vogue in Europe seventy years ago. He wears a blue tail-coat with gold buttons, satin knee-breeches, and pumps. No traveller who has had an audience of his majesty in his palace of Paon-Peuh has been able to suppress a smile at the sight of this Asiatic potentate in the evening attire worn in the reign of George IV.

King Norodom's harem is noted for its beautiful women—all Asiatics from different regions. Lately he had no less than 500 wives, and he considered that a moderate number. On one occasion, being remonstrated with on the subject by a missionary, who pointed out to him that he ought to be satisfied with fewer wives—for instance, 100 as being a unit of a century—he replied that he would just as soon be a bachelor. This legion of spouses is watched over, not by eunuchs, as is generally the case in the east, but by horribly deformed specimens of humanity. The law in Cambodia is that whenever a child is born deformed, infirm, or crippled his parents shall hand him over to the king, who rears him and raises him to the dignity of a guardian of his harem. By these means he considers he insures conjugal security. But tradition says that these precautions have not at all times been attended with success, inasmuch as on one occasion a certain favorite beauty eloped with an ugly hunchback. The runaways were so unwise as to seek a refuge with a tribe of semi-savages known as the Phuongs, who, being absolutely callous to the charms of the fair sinner, delivered both her and her lover into the hands of the king in exchange for four oxen and a sack of salt. The guilty pair were immediately decapitated. Norodom is not naturally cruel, but he thought it was necessary to make an example. Being a practical monarch he insists on his wives making good use of their time. Some attend to household duties, others have the care of the royal wardrobe, and others devote their energies and talents to acting and dancing in plays invented by the king himself on the models of the ancient poets, for he is an artist in his way.

Norodom has sixty children, and is reported to be an affectionate father. As a husband having the responsibility of so many wives he has, it appears, found it necessary to adhere to an old Asiatic custom which prescribes moderate physical punishment of the fair sex, in the belief that it is not without good effect. Now and again a few slight strokes of a light rattan cane are administered to the comely shoulders of an unruly spouse. The punishment is generally inflicted after King Norodom has lost at play, for he is unfortunately addicted to gambling. He puts on a good face over his losses before his partners, and invariably pays up; but no sooner has he returned to his harem than his ill-humor breaks out, and then the ladies have a mauvais quart d'heure. The beauty who happens to be at fault had best keep out of his reach. He understands French pretty well, but can not speak it. The whole of his vocabulary consists of two words—bonjour, tres bien. But then tres-bien spoken at the right time may imply a good deal.

A Grateful Chief.

There is an Indian exchief, now residing at Metlakathla, British Columbia, named Jim, who is to be the recipient of a singular token of gratitude from his successor to the chieftainship of the tribe of which both are members. Some years ago Jim killed an Indian who had provoked a quarrel, and Jim was arrested for murder, but in some way escaped trial. On his return home he was forced to abdicate in favor of the heir apparent. This latter assumed the chieftainship, but always felt grateful to Jim for having committed the crime which placed him, the present chief, at the head of the tribe, and promised that should it ever be in his power to show his gratitude in a substantial way he would do so. Last summer Jack, the present chief, cleared $2,000 netting salmon, and out of the money thus obtained set aside the sum of $800 to pay for a monument which is now being made at Victoria. This monument Chief Jack proposes to have suitably inscribed and taken to Metlakathla, where it will remain until Jim departs for the happy hunting grounds, when it will be erected over his grave. The ex-chief is very proud of the monument, and hopes to live to see it completed and transported to his native village, where it will by unveiled with becoming ceremonies.

He Admired It.

Miss Ethel—"Oh, Mr. Sharpley, have you heard Mme. Decollete's new ditty?" Sharpley (absent-mindedly)—"No, but I have seen it and admire it very much." Miss Ethel—"Haven't heard it but admire it? Why, Mr. Sharpley, how can that be?" Sharpley—"Why, all the young men admire her nudity."

BATTLE WITH A SHARK.

An Ottawa Man's Encounter With an Aquatic Man-eater in British Columbia.

Mr. James Potts, formerly of Ottawa, in writing to a friend here, sends the following account of his thrilling experience with a shark recently in Esquimalt harbor, British Columbia. He says:

"At about 6 o'clock on Friday morning, while standing on the edge of a lighter, I observed a shark approaching and as it swam alongside, I threw an axe at it, striking it in the back and inflicting a deep wound. In its blind fury, lashing about with pain it dashed itself upon the beach. I called to my wife to bring another axe, and ran to where the huge fish was struggling. Before I could reach the spot, however, the shark had got afloat again. Armed with an axe I waded into the water, when the monster came straight at me, turning over on its back ready to seize me. I watched my opportunity and as the fish came near enough I drove the axe with my whole strength into its head. The second blow caused the shark to retire in haste, and it swam out into the bay again but soon returned, evidently with the intention of having another try at me. I had waded into the water waist deep, and planted myself firmly against a large rock to wait his approach. As it came up I threw the axe and again was lucky in inflicting a deep wound, this time in the monsters side. Instead of retreating this time the shark turned over opened its jaws, and came straight for me. My wife had promptly supplied me with a third axe and as the shark swam close up I dealt blow after blow on its head, the keen blade sinking to the bone at every stroke. I sprang ashore, caught up a boathook, and with my wife's assistance got the fish upon the beach, when I soon ended its life. After it was dead we measured it, and found it to be twelve feet long and two feet six inches across the middle. On opening it I found several salmon, a large fishhook, and several stones in its stomach."

A Kentucky Yarn.

There comes from Kentucky a really charming story. Early last spring a turkey hatched a large brood of young. The farmer who owned the hen and brood placed a bell on the mother, and the young, after they ceased to instinctively follow their feathered parent, by force of habit continued to follow the bell. The farmer, observing this, took the bell from the hen, and, when he hoed his tobacco, tied it about his own neck. The young turkeys then followed him up one row and down another, eating the worms from the plants. They did the work of five men and saved the crop.

much art; little galleries terminate, at intervals, in more extensive ones, supported by pillars. all this is done with earth and a slime which they secrete, by means of which the working ants make a mortar.

When the female ants are ready to deposit their eggs, they wander about through their palace and let fall at hazard their little eggs; the workers pick them up and gather them together in heaps in the places which separate the galleries. The larvæ are soon hatched, and are not long before they pin themselves little cocoons; when the moment comes for their issuing from their confinement, the workers tear the cocoons, and thus facilitate the operation; then they carefully extend and smooth the wings of the males and the females. From these eggs are born, in fact, not only ants of both sexes, but the workers also, which have no wings. During several days food is brought to the newly-born, and then they are allowed to go out to commence life's work for themselves.—[American Agriculturel,

Robertson of Irvine-Poet-Preacher, is the title of a new life of this distinguished divine, to be issued at the end of October by Mr Arthur Guthrie, Ardrossan, who was long on terms of close intimacy with Dr. Robertson.

The Harpers are said to pay $500 a number for a serial story in their Monthly. A story is generally finshed in twelve numbers that means $6 000 for a novel. They are said to pay $50 to an English author for the early sheets of his novel when they print it in the Bazar or Weekly. This difference is to be accounted for by the lack of international copyright.

Herik Ib sen, the Norwegian dramatist and poet, has a most remarkable physiognomy, as depicted in the first number of the new Boston paper called The Transatlantic. His face is surrounded by an aureole of hair and whiskers which stand out in all directions. His mouth is firm and compressed, and his spectacles remind one of Horace Greeley's. The whole effect is something like that of a "Jack in the Box."

In a paper which he read the other day before the American Public Health Association on the subject of "Food in its Relation to Health," Professor Atwater, Director of the Agricultural Experiment Station at Washington, maintained that the people of the United States eat too much, their consumption of food being far greater in proportion to population than that of European nations, and that there was too much overeating of meat and sweetmeats. Although to the lay mind it may seem paradoxical to say so, yet it is very probable that this excess is largely the cause of the thinness of the typical American. A man may eat and eat and be a bag of bones still; in fact, lath-like proportions are more frequently the result of over-eating than of starvation.

The Penalty O Polish.

Our Huldy's home from boardin' school;—
She's been there now three year,
But things she's learnt a bein' there,
Strike me as mighty queer!
Somehow we don't do nothin' right—
Melissy Ann an' me,—
Though Huldy never noticed this afore
She went away, you see.
I'm blowed if I don't b'lieve the cash,
I've gin to make her bright,
Haint well-nigh made a dunce o' her—
An mebbe it has quite!

She says, we musn't eat out loud,
An' forks an' knives shouldn't clash!
An' forks want made for stirrin' things.
Nor knives for eatin' hash.
An' then we musn't "soup" our tea
Or pour it out the cup;
No matter if it burns our mouths,
An' tongues an' palates up!
Nor must we ever "snap" our food
As hoptoads do a fly,
But put things slowly in our mouths,
Then eat it quietly.

An' wuss than all the rest, she's got Sech names for things she sees!
She hitches on a Latin word
To all the weeds an' trees.
Why that old vile skunks cabbage plant
It wallers in the mire,
Is "Symplocarpus fœtidus"—or some
Sech blamed high-flier.
An' then the weed that yallers up
The roadsides an' the ways
Is "Solidago"—this an' that,
An' fetched in for boquets!

One day she picked a lot o' weeds,
(Though Huldy called 'em flowers,)
An' got her microscope an' viewed
The trumpery for hours.
It seemed like wastin' time to me,
But gals are somehow changed.
Mebbe its right an' I am wrong,
The way the thing's arranged,
But when I see Melissy Ann
A sweatin' 'bout her work
It makes me think, 'mong other things
Our Huldy's learned to shirk.

But folks are driftin' out o' ways
It used to be the style,
Bumbye two pints won't make a quart
An' cheatin' wont be vile.
An' hens 'll hatch out chiny eggs
An' crows 'll pass for quails,
An' cars 'll float along the air,
An' hoptoads 'll have tails!
I'm blowed if I know where I am,
Or what on earth I be,
This eddicati..' Huldy has
So discomfuzzled me!

The Country.

What a delightful home life they have in the country.

Dull, you say. Perhaps so. But full of calm content and simple pleasures and sound advantage.

A winter in the country would put meat upon the bones and new energy into the life of the miserable office dyspeptics of the

It is true there is no theatre, except now and then a wandering Ten Nights in a Bar Room or an Uncle Tom's Cabin down at the neels and bare in the pocket, hunting home by way of the village town hall and the rural schoolhouse.

They have no roller skating rink, but they have the ice on the creek below the old mill dam, the brilliant moon, the keen, frosty night, the ringing laughter and the royal spirit of a company who happily know little of social divisions and class exclusiveness.

They have the paring-bee, and the corn-husking, and the surprise party, and the church social, and the singing school, and the Temperance lodge meeting, and the sleighing party.

Best of all, there are the long nights at home, when the young folk come over from the neighbors, and the swift hours are engaged by harmless games, and jovial chat, and genial controversy, and rare good comradeship.

The Busy Ants.

Many of our boys and girls have, no doubt, often wondered why the ants are such rapid and continuous travelers, always on the go, and always going, seemingly for a purpose. So they do. Let us watch them. Here they are, on the rose basket. What for? Their breakfast, perhaps. Just watch them; see how they tickle the aphides, or green fly, with the antennæ, in order to make them yield a saccharine liquid of which ants are very fond.

This is a systematic work with them; they farm out insects of various kinds to feed upon, and as systematically as a farmer does his stock. In the greenhouse they take the young scale insects—a most troublesome greenhouse pest—and plant them out regularly on the leaves, always choosing such leaves as are the most difficult to clean; and when the insects are of full size, the ants extract a juice from them with as much regularity as a farmer milks his cows. It is very interesting to watch them at their work, as one can easily do in the garden, where nearly every plant has some insect enemy, which, in its turn, has an enemy that destroys.

The ant is proverbial for its industry; its ingenuity is quite as remarkable, and its habits most singular. Did you ever examine an ant-hill—a subterranean city, closely populated? In this little city three classes of ants dwell—the females, the males, and the common people, which have no sex. These do all the work of the community; the males and females perform no labor.

Mrs. Hallam Tennyson, the daughter-in-law of the poet, lives in her husband's family, and has entire charge of the dairy connected with the poet's estate at the Isle of Wight. The milk and butter of this dairy are in great demand and bring a high price. It is a coincidence that the son-in-law of our laureate, James Russell Lowell, has a famous dairy at Southborough, Massachusetts, and the butter of Deerfoot farm is as well known in the New York as in the Boston markets.

A Fortune in Soap.

The fortune of the late B. T. Babbitt, the great soap manufacturer, is estimated at $3,000,000. One of the sights of New York to people interested in its manufactures has long been Mr. Babbitt's six immense kettles, made of heavy boiler iron, their aggregate capacity being 3,500,000 pounds, while the value of the raw material it takes to fill them before boiling is $216,000. "What do you think it costs Babbitt to keep the kettle boiling?" was long a venerable joke in the trade. Most of the great machinery employed in the great factory is of Mr. Babbitt's own invention. He was possessed of a high order of inventive genius, and a great part of his success in the business of manufacturing, in which a small proportion of those who engage succeed, was due to his ability when a new idea struck him to "turn in" himself and make the machinery necessary to carry it out. He is said to have made the first mowing machine that would mow.—[Chicago Inter Ocean.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

Wheat continues to show considerable strength, but no material advance is made. The amount on passage to Great Britain and the continent increased 24,000 bushels the past week.

At a meeting of the Provincial school trustees association on Tuesday a motion calling for the abolition of all kinds of tax exemption was defeated and a resolution was carried recommending one annual examination for admission to high schools.

Many things are reversed in Australia. It is summer there while it is winter in America. Trees shed their bark instead of their leaves; swans are black; there is a species of fly that kills and eats the spider, and a fish called the climbing perch walks deliberately out of the water and, with the aid of its fins, climbs the adjacent trees after insects that infest them.

The Cronin murder trial still drags its weary length along, and it will not likely be terminated very soon. The prosecution is making out a strong case against some of the prisoners, Burke in particular being in a very tight box, and the prospects are good that they will meet the punishment they so richly deserve—the gallows.

Two of the prisoners charged with complicity in the Baltic outrage have been sentenced to one year's imprisonment each and four others to six months each. The general opinion is that the punishment was not nearly heavy enough. Wretches like these who would tar and feather an innocent boy and drive him to his death should have the severest punishment the law allows.

The Latter Day Saints have lately held their sixtieth conference in Salt Lake City, and the doctrine of polygamy has been again officially and publicly declared to have been revealed directly from God, and the determination has been expressed to maintain it. It is the fact, however, that only a small minority of Mormons now advocate plural marriage, but the fanaticism of the leaders still control the so-called church.

The Young Mens' Christian Association in London, Eng., generally known as "The Parent Association," was organized in 1844 through the efforts of George Williams, an earnest Christian young man, twenty-three years of age, and at that time a junior clerk in a large dry goods establishment of which he has since become the head. There are now (1889) 3,788 associations distributed throughout the world, in North America and Europe, in Turkey, Syria, India, Ceylon, China, Japan, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and South America. There are 276 college, 77 railroad, 9 German, 34 colored and 15 Indian associations. They own 156 buildings, valued at $6,830,000.

By our local columns it will be seen that the churches of the village have at last made a move in the matter of securing a more central site for a cemetery for the village. The matter is one which should have the earnest support of every citizen and our country friends as well. There are many good arguments in favor of such a movement and none against it. We have at present no place in which to bury our dead without driving three or four miles, making funeral expenses twice as high as they need be, an item which can ill be afforded by many families. Then the present ones are very inconvenient for those who wish to visit the spot where their departed friends are laid. This alone should recommend the project to every resident of Dutton. The committee has in view a handsome plot of ground within five minutes walk of the centre of Dutton, and if they are successful in carrying out their design we may expect to have ere long one of the most handsome cemeteries of any country town. It is an absolute necessity and it is to be hoped that every one will encourage the project as it deserves.

To Laboring Men and Mechanics.

From the Detroit Commercial Advertiser we republish the following, which will be of interest to those who intend going to Michigan :

There are advertisements in the papers from time to time that men are wanted here in Saginaw valley. Some advertise for house carpenters and some to work in the woods, mills and factories.

Now, there are no men wanted here. There are plenty of men here who are walking the streets looking for a job.

The lumber kings and contractors do this to keep wages down.

The advertising is done in papers that are published in other states, and especially in Canada. And there are agents in Canada holding out inducements for men to come here to this valley by telling them that wages are from $20 to $30 per month. They come here and hire out and go in the woods and work all winter, expecting to get such wages, and in the spring they are paid off at $10 and $15 per month.

Now, laboring men and mechanics, when you see these advertisements and hear these agents, take no heed, but stop and think before you leave your homes and families. Ask your friends about it. Write to your friends here, or get your friends to write, and find out if it is so or not, and you will save a good deal of suffering and misery.

Men come here and have spent their last cent to get here, and perhaps are arrested for tramps and locked up. Now, that has ruined many a good and honest man, for when he gets out he is ashamed to be seen by his former associates and alls an easy victim to that class of criminals that is always ready to catch the unwary.

Another scheme of these men who advertise is to furnish tickets to men, with which to go from here to the camps, that cost them about 80 cents on the dollar, and it is understood with their foreman, and they work a day or two and perhaps a week and then are told to take the tote road without a cent.

Another scheme is to have agents that sell cheap jewelry of all descriptions into their camps to entice men to buy. They do not ask for money but will take what time the men have worked and ask enough for their trash to stand a big discount, and the man who does the labor is the loser. The man who works the scheme is the gainer.

Now men, those who happen to see this, take heed, for you can see that this valley is no place to make money and hardly a living, so keep away and give the men who have homes partly paid for a chance for their lives and you will save a good deal of suffering and hardships.

To our Subscribers.

The special announcement which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address (and enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the horse it is indispensible, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenomenal sale throughout the United States and Canada, makes it standard authority. Mention this paper when sending for "Treatise." 6-2-0.

Messrs. Stirling and Muckler, of Rond Eau, with their wives, are the guests of Miss Annie Murray, of this place.

Miss Carrie Collard, of West Lorne, is visiting friends in this neighborhood.

John McKillop, of this place, is the happy possessor of a young daughter.

A great number of squirrels and other game were slaughtered by the boys of this place Thanksgiving day.

Willey's Corners.

Alex. Black has been visiting friends in Brantford.

The Misses McCallum, of your town, spent Sunday at this place.

Dan. McWilliam & Son have the contract of cutting 300 cords of wood.

While Angus Campbell was returning from Mr. Pearce's the other evening his horse took fright and upsetting the rig completely demolishing the top, but Mr. Campbell escaped with a few bruises.

Tyrconnel.

The day of national thanksgiving appointed by the Governor-General was religiously observed in St. Peter's church, Tyrconnel, by the incumbent and a devout congregation in special prayers, thanksgiving and a sermon appropriate to the occosion. The interior of the church presented a very thanksgiving and harvest festival appearance In the centre of the aisle there was a table laden with choice flowers and fruits; underneath there was a great variety of fruit and vegetables, The large stone font at the east end of the aisle, which is grand in itself, was ornamented on the top with chrysanthenums, geraniums, lillies, carnations and other flowers and a perfect variety of fruit. Around the font were sheaves of wheat, oats and barley, with fruits and vegetables. In the front of the gallery and on the sides of the church there were suitable texts and mottos in letters of white on a crimson ground, tastefully trimmed with oats. On each side of the chancel window there was a shield with sheaves of grain, in imitation of basso-relievo work, but although the work was only slightly raised from the plane of the shield it was so artistically executed as to present a striking appearance of full, whole sheaves. On the holy table were three beautiful vases containing the most beautiful boquets. The reading desk and the pulpit were ornamented with festoons of grain, simple and appropriate. The whole of which testified of grateful hearts for the never failing goodness of the Lord, which found further expression in hymns of praise and thanksgiving and a very liberal offering in money for the benefit of the Indian mission.

Middlemiss.

Capts. Graham and Lucas commanded a couple of hunting parties on Tuesday, the losing side to pay for the oyster supper. Graham's side won by 3,000 points.

Geo. H. Corneil had a couple of stacks of hay, containing 10 or 12 tons, burned on Tuesday afternoon. The origin of the fire is a mystery.

Levi Corbett purchased a house and lot from Oscar Brewer, of Parkhill.

Ed. Whittaker, despatcher, spent his holidays here.

The boys celebrated Hallowe'en by running wagons and buggies and changing wheels of wagons to the tops of gate posts.

Water in this section of the country is very scarce, as there has been no rain all summer, and consequently those on farms have to drive their stock to the river and draw water from there for house use.

John Graham, who had his face badly cut a few weeks ago by his team running away, is slowly recovering and will be out in a few days.

Henry Mullins sold thirteen spring hogs, which were about seven months' old and weighed 200 lbs. each. Beat that who can.

Some of the game to be seen around here a number of years ago is to be found occasionally on the river flats—such as wild turkeys and the swan.

Bert. Clay had his eye severely injured by the explosion of his gun while hunting lately.

Miss Fullerton, guest of Mrs. Kelso, is recovering from her sudden and severe illness.

Miss Nellie Crane is taking leave of her friends here. She is going to Port Arthur to spend the winter with relatives.

Dr. Niven, of London, was in town on Tuesday en route to Port Talbot for a few days' hunting.

The annual tea meeting in the Methodist church, Thursday evening, was very pleasant and successful, the musical part of the programme being exceptionally excellent.

A. McFarlane is very little better.

Service was held in the Presbyterian church on Thanksgiving day. The collections were for the French Evangelization Fund. The church managers met after the service, it being one year since Mr. Kelso took charge of the congregation, and found the congregation in the enviable position of being able to pay their pastor and all liabilities in full, having a surplus on hand independent of what the Ladies' Aid have saved during the past year.

The Foresters are making arrangements for their annual concert which will be held early in December.

Angus Gunn is home from Toronto for a few days. Living in the metropolis evidently agrees with him.

Iona.

The entertainment in connection with the Methodist church on Wednesday evening was a decided success, the sum of $33 being realized. It consisted of stereoptic views of some of the principal scenes met with in a voyage around the world. The music of Prof. Ainsley was exceptionally fine.

Chas. Davis, the blacksmith who settled here some time ago, took sudden leave of the village last week.

Thanksgiving services were held in the Methodist church on Thursday last by Revs. Meed and Truman. The attendance was very small.

J. W. Brown has been re-engaged in the Iona Station school. Miss Brown and Colin McArthur have declined engagements for 1890; the latter will be succeeded by Miss McNeil.

West Lorne.

Miss Patterson, who has been visiting here the past week, has returned to her home in Highgate.

W. S. Whiting's many friends will be pleased to see him around and able to attend to his work. His place was ably filled by Wm. Petherick.

Dr. Brock is the proud possessor of a daughter.

P. J. Lindenman, of Eagle, has purchased his brother's interest in the store here and engaged Geo. Bracken as manager and V. Yerick as assistant. They intend to move the stock to more commodious premises in the McKillop block.

P. McGregor has also found his present store too small for his business and has rented the premises to be vacated by P. J. Lindenman.

A. McKillop & Co. are shipping their lumber at Taylor this week.

Miss Annie O'Neil, of Detroit, is home for a short time.

Thos. Mehring had the misfortune to have his valuable cow killed by a train here on Monday.

Quite a ripple of excitement was created on Thanksgiving day by the local sports getting up a shooting match. After a long talk, R. McFate and W. Lemon were chosen to captain the opposing armies, and they sallied forth to carry death and desolation in the woods. At night when it became time to count the results it was found that Capt. Lemon's side had come out winners by 395 points. All then sat down to supper at the Argyle House at the expense of the losers, and an enjoyable evening was spent. The principal features of the day were the magnificent score of Dr. Eaton and the amount of noise made by the boys while out.

Wm. Ackworth, who had his ribs broken, is able to be around again.

Geo. Greer has left for London to resume duty on the C. P. R.

Tricks in Hunting.

The hunter in every land has long used deception and ruse to enable him to get within reasonable distance of his game. Hunting by imitating the animal to be caught is very common among the natives of many tribes. In Africa we find the curious dwarfs, the Akkas, discovered by Dr. Schweinfurth, hunting ostriches in this manner. An ostrich skin is taken and drawn over one of the hunters, who supports the neck either with a stick or one arm, a bow and arrow being held ready for use. Fitted in this way the human ostrich moves over the plain, pretending to feed, and imitating the motions of the live birds so well that in many cases they approach closely enough to bring them down with a well-aimed arrow.

A family of these little people, who are not over four or five feet in height, was recently brought to Europe, and in Berlin gave a representation before some scientific men of their method of taking ostriches, which was considered very ingenious.

The ostrich, though stupid, is not always deceived, and an instance is related where one of the birds becoming enraged, either at the supposed bird or the hunter, rushed at it and at a single kick knocked over the unfortunate Akka and tore his ostrich skin in shreds while trampling him under foot, and it was with considerable difficulty that the bird was driven off and the bogus ostrich rescued.

Some curious tactics have to be adopted in hunting the crocodile in eastern countries. One method among the native tribes is to fasten a native baby—a fat, plump one—to a stake near the shore, and when the huge reptiles, attracted by its screams, come out of the water, they are shot. In other places the hunters attach branches to their heads and crawl along until they are within reaching distance. This is often attempted with birds, and the so-called floating blinds are often merely boats covered with branches; the wind taking the latter carries it down among the unsuspecting birds.

Very few animals are caught napping, unless the hunter displays remarkable talents in deception. When a herd of elephants is feeding it invariably is protected by a guard of watchful sentinels. So with monkeys. When they are devastating a cornfield the sentinels are stationed about to give warning at the slightest noise, when the whole band will go pell-mell over the fields in the direction of the forest.

I have often noticed this among birds, especially the California quail; the moment I approached the sentinel bird would pipe up and tell all the rest that danger was nigh. The most striking example of this guardianship I observed on the Pacific coast, about four miles south of the town of Santa Monica. A mile away I saw a flock of pure-white cranes, and wishing to secure one I rode up the beach upon the ocean side, there left my horse, and began my walk over the sand dunes. The majority of the flock were in a secluded portion of a little bay, presenting the appearance from a distance of a white sheet upon the dark shore.

When within an eighth of a mile of them I found that there were half a dozen sentinels posted at various places. Every slight elevation near the flock bore a very wide-a-wake bird, and my only chance to approach them was by hiding behind the sand hills and crawling from one to another. This I did for at least half an hour, making perhaps two hundred feet, and then I ventured to look up. I fairly held my breath, as not ten feet away was a beautiful white sentinel. He saw me immediately, gave a note of warning, and at the moment the air was filled with waving wings and the long white necks of the birds.

It is very evident that the birds have a language understood by themselves. This system of placing sentinels is one of the best evidences of it, and shows that our feathered friends are far more intelligent than we generally suppose.—Philadelphia Times.

Resolution of Condolence.

At a recent meeting of Gordon Grange, No. 260, the following resolution of condolence to Mrs. Euphemia Buchanan, was passed:—

Whereas our Heavenly Father has in His divine providence seen meet to remove from our midst our highly esteemed neighbor and brother, James Buchanan, we, the members of this lodge, while we deeply feel the loss of one whose many sterling qualities and true interest in all that pertained to the welfare of our order, would, in all sincerity, extend to you and your bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy in your great bereavement. Knowing the weakness of human sympathy, we earnestly commend yourself and family unto Him who is able to heal your sorrow. May he direct you in the discharge of your increased responsibility and enable you to look beyond this to that fairer clime above.

For there is a hope eternal,
Free for all, yes, every one,
Who in love and faith can say,
Father, thy will be done.

Incipient Idolatry.

To the Editor of the ENTERPRISE :

Sir,—Some suppose, and I dare say rightly, that idolitary sprung up during the building of the tower of Babel, and that on the dispersion of the architects, overseers, builders and others who labored on this historical pile this first schism, or rather apostacy, was spread abroad and established in every colony which they founded. In the course of a few generations their descendants lost the true tradition of the flood and of Babel. The Hindoo mythology, if I mistake not, represents its various castes, proceeding at the same time from Brahma, all of them, like Melchesidek, without father, without mother. Brahmins, it is said came from his head; Rajahs from his breast, pariahs from his feet. Queen Victoria, herself, is only a pariah, that is of the lowest grade. We may now suppose that their forefathers all came to India together; then architects are represented by Brahmins, overseers by Rajahs and so on to cooks, coolies and totees who performed the most menial offices. We may also perceive that the tower of Babel is personified, as from every part of this edifice workmen came forth, some from the head or upper stories and so on. But as on this hypothesis they could not account for the existence of inferior animals they had recourse to a fruitful source of many foolish errors, viz., the disposition of the spirit after death. I may here observe that Noah and Shem took no part in this great work. By getting a reference Bible you may see that they were still living when the tower was in the course of erection. These Hindoos are antedeluvian in their food and cookery.

MANY A LIFE

HAS been saved by the prompt use of Ayer's Pills. Travelers by land or sea are liable to constipation or other derangements of the stomach and bowels which, if neglected, lead to serious and often fatal consequences. The most sure means of correcting these evils is the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills. The prudent sailing-master would as soon go to sea without his chronometer as without a supply of these Pills. Though prompt and energetic in operation, Ayer's Pills leave no ill effects; they are purely vegetable and sugar-coated; the safest medicine for old and young, at home or abroad.

"For eight years I was afflicted with constipation, which at last became so bad that the doctors could do no more for me. Then I began to take Ayer's Pills, and soon the bowels recovered their natural and regular action, so that now I am in health."—Mrs. C. E. Clark, Tewksbury, Massachusetts.

"I regard Ayer's Pills as one of the most reliable general remedies of our times. They have been in use in my family for affections requiring a purgative, and have given unvarying satisfaction. We have found them an excellent remedy for colds and light fevers."—W. R. Woodson, Fort Worth, Texas.

"For several years I have relied more upon Ayer's Pills than upon anything else in the medicine chest, to regulate my bowels and those of the ship's crew. These Pills are not severe in their action, but do their work thoroughly. I have used them with good effect for the cure of rheumatism, kidney troubles, and dyspepsia."—Capt. Mueller, Steamship Felicia, New York City.

"I have found Ayer's Cathartic Pills to be a better family medicine for common use than any other pills within my knowledge. They are not only very effective, but safe and pleasant to take—qualities which must make them valued by the public."—Jules Hauel, Perfumer, Philadelphia, Pa.

FARMERS COMBINE

To Raise the Price of Wheat.

A Cincinnati special says :—The wheat growers of the Mississippi Valley assembled in convention here yesterday. Walter N., Allen, president of the Farmers' Federation made a speech. He said :—"It is the first meeting of the kind ever held on this continent. Realizing our individual feebleness and the great importance of unity of action as a class, we have been called together to consider the proposition to delegate to a power of our own creation the exclusive right to market the products of our farms and to take such measures as will afford present relief and future protection to the agricultural interests of the Mississippi Valley. The farmer is the only producer who sends an over supply of his wares to market to be sold by some one else, and like the goods of the bankrupt at some one else's price. If farmers would organize like manufacturers to control production and regulate the output in the public market, they could in common with all other producers set the price on their own products, irrespective of overproduction or the power of the Liverpool markets. The unavoidable tendency of the present established trade system is to bring the price down to the lowest limit at which a good supply can be produced under the most favourable conditions of soil, season, and climate. Now in order to avert impending ruin we must reverse this order by substituting a new system, fixing the price of farm products at the cost of production on lands that produce only thirty fold. The power to establish the value of one bushel of American wheat and one barrel of mess pork can control the markets of the world. This power is to be found in the centralized agency of the Federated Farmers of the Mississippi Valley, a company legally chartered with a capital stock of $2,000,000."

Ex Governor Charles Robinson, of Kansas, was made temporary chairman. He strongly urged the organization of the farmers throughout the grain-growing States. Norman J. Coleman, of Missouri, ex-Secretary of Agriculture, was made permanent chairman.

Apples and Pears.

The English are almost as fond of congresses and conferences as we Canadians are of associations and societies and their annual meetings. The Royal Horticultural Society has just published the report of a Congress of experts on the important subject of the culture of apples and pears. As far back as 1853 there was an apple Congress, and, in 1885, a Pear Congress, and now, in 1889, we have more recent results of English experience on both apples and pears. Much of the discussion turned on the purely English question of the relation of landlord and tenant, and the proportion which each should bear to the first cost of planting fruit trees, but, fortunately, in this country the farmer and fruit grower is oftenest the owner of the soil. However, it is interesting to learn that sanguine fruit growers talk of a 50 per cent. profit on an investment in apple and pear trees, but that would turn all our farmers into fruit growers. One expert spoke of "Apples for Profit," another of "Fruit Culture for Profit in the Open Air;" a third of "Dessert Pears;" a fourth on "Pruning;" a fifth of "Canker in Fruit Trees;" a sixth on its "Cause and Cure;" a seventh on the "Enemies of the Apple and Pear," and the poor sparrow was praised and blamed by turns in the paper and the discussion that followed it; and so every branch of the subject of when, where and how to grow apples and pears was taken up. One very interesting feature was a map to show the proportion which orchards and vegetable gardens bear to population in every county in England, with reference to the influence of railroads on cultivation of fruits and vegetables for the market.

Habits and Long Life.

The information which the blanks give on the subject of habits coincides with the opinion of most people, formed from observation, that longevity without regularity of habits is rare. These old people, men and women alike, are put down as early risers and retirers, almost without exception, and fully nineteen out of every twenty have observed this custom throughout life except perhaps at some short period in youth. Meals have been eaten regularly, three each day, with dinner at noon, the exceptions being so rare as to indicate nothing. Exercise in most cases has been hard work up to sixty-five or seventy, and after that period has consisted (when the regular occupation has been given up) of walking, gardening, or both. Except in cases of sickness these old people are as a rule as active and as fond of constant occupation of some sort to-day as most men and women are at thirty-five.

One of the most significant facts gathered in this canvass is that regarding occupations. Out of 1,000 men, throughout life, 461 have been farmers; 92 have been carpenters; 70, merchants; 61, mariners; 49, laborers; 42, shoemakers; 41, manufacturers; 23, clergymen; 23, masons; 16, blacksmiths; 16, bankers; 12, each, iron-workers, mill-hands, physicians, and lawyers; and the balance are divided among nearly all the other trades and professions. The list includes only one each of the following: Hermit, hunter, chemist, professor, soldier, broker, auctioneer, jockey, contractor. Nearly all, however, began life upon the farm.

A New King.

The new King of Portugal, Carlos I., who a few weeks ago completed his twenty-sixth year, comes to the throne not unprepared, the invalid condition of his father having for some time caused more and more official responsibilities to be placed on him. The little kingdom, too, has now few causes of disturbance or anxiety abroad or at home. Her chief colonial troubles are in South Africa, and these are likely to be quickly settled, the rivalry of her two strong neighbors, Germany and England, furnishing, perhaps, a guarantee that she will find aid in defending her rights. Yet the accession of a new monarch must cause some speculation as to its effect. The twenty-eight years' tranquility which Portugal had under King Luis I. was largely due to his observance of constitutional principles, willingness to favor reforms, and lack of disposition to seek personal prominence at the expense of the peace of the kingdom. Still, even under him there were some exciting political crises, and for a long time a continuation of the financial embarrassments and disorders which had been inherited from his predecessors. The probabilities are that no great changes in Portugal's domestic or foreign affairs need immediately be expected.

Wilkie Collins held that no great artist who had work to do could go into society. He regarded the atmosphere of society as deadly. He applied this, however, rather to London then to Paris, where the conditions of society are favorable for literary and artistic work.

Accounts have been received of a so-called snow flower, said to have been discovered by Count Anthoskoff in the most northern portion of Siberia, where the ground is continually covered with frost. The wonderful object shoots forth from the frozen soil only on the first day of each succeeding year. It lives for but a single day, then resolves to its original elements. The leaves are three in number, and each about three inches in diameter. They are developed only on that side of the stem toward the north, and each seems to be covered with microscopic crystals of snow.

Regarding the proposed bridge across the English Channel to connect England and France, the Builder says: We are told it will be no danger to sailing ships, because there is plenty of room between the piers! We have no authority to speak for seamen, but we can fancy pretty well what would be the feelings and opinions of the captain of a sailing ship caught in a gale in the Channel on a dark night, with his ship only half under control and with the knowledge that a row of concrete reefs, extending all across the channel, were to leeward of him. He would wish at all events for the "melancholy satisfaction" of having the engineers who built them on board with him.

At the eighth annual meeting of the American Forestry Association, which was held in Philadelphia the other day, and at which sixteen States were represented, several important resolutions were passed. Among them was one in favour of the presentation to Congres of a petition asking that body to provide for the withdrawal from sale of all Government forest lands until a commission, to be appointed by the President, should determine what regions ought to be permanently preserved from the ravages of the lumberman. Great as the forests of the United States are in extent, our neighbours have begun to realize that they are not only wasting this natural wealth, but allowing great injury to be done to various interests by the woodman's axe.

The theory that Leif Ericson, the Norseman, was the real discoverer of America finds favours with many who have investigated the subject, but there appears to be some reason to believe that that honour may belong to a still earlier voyager. There is a tradition that St. Brendin, a renowned abbot of the sixth century, crossed the ocean to this continent over thirteen hundred years ago. During a visit to France last summer General Butterfield, of New York, took occasion to search among the old parchments in the Bibliotheque Nationale for information on the subject. He found thirteen different manuscripts of the eighth and ninth centuries in an excellent state of preservation, and his study of them so far has been sufficient to convince him that St. Brendin did make a voyage to sea, and that he was led to do so through the confessions of one Barenas which told of a land beyond the seas.

When Russian decorations are given to foreigners they usually take the form of medals, which at St. Petersburg are the reward of the faithful domestics of the court. Dumas pere received the medal of St. Anne after he had written a story of Russian life; but, hearing that such a decoration was of no social value, he returned it to St. Petersburg, whereupon a cross of the second class of that Order was despatched to him, with an apology for the mistake, as it was termed. A famous singer was much ridiculed at St. Petersburg when he walked about wearing the medal of St. Andrew which he innocently regarded as being very nearly equal to the light-blue ribbon, gold collar-chain, and eight-pointed star, with a blue eagle on it, of that famous Order, which ranks with the Black Eagle of Prussia and with our Garter. The medal, however, is an upper servant's decoration, and Russians laugh in their sleeves when they see foreigners (to whom it is given by dozens) wearing it as a mark of high distinction.

The German delegates to the Marine Conference at Washington have created no little surprise by asking for the reversal of the rule that ships should slow down in foggy weather, and that top speed should be required under such circumstances. Such a proposition at a time when the speed of the great ocean liners is being rapidly increased seems extraordinary, but it is probable that the Germans are proceeding upon the theory that when collisions do take place the ship that is going the fastest has the best chance of surviving. They may also hold that the quicker a ship can get out of a fog the better, and that by reducing its speed its chances of collision with another are so much increased. These arguments are plausible, but it is not likely that they will have much weight with the conference, the other members of which are opposed to the suggested change.

Great artistic excellence has been reached in Europe in the manufacture of tin soldiers. A German military officer has found it possible to represent military operations on a large scale by their means. He has collected 35,000 tin soldiers, belonging to every branch of the service and completely equipped, and has displayed them on a platform in the Kempten barracks, to illustrate a siege conducted in accordance with the best teaching of modern tactics. The scenery and other appurtenances have all been supplied by toys in common use, and the picture is said to be marvellous perfect. A French garrison, of course, occupies the fortress, and naturally is compelled to surrender.

THE 1,000,000 POSTAGE STAMP MYTH

Origin of an Idea That Has Bothered Many Hundreds of Good People.

Now and then some one announces himself as the victim of the one-million postage stamps hoax. It is firmly believed that if 1,000,000 stamps are collected and forwarded to some one, a bed will be provided for an invalid boy in some hospital, or a home for an orphan. Christian churches have been the special victims, and there is hardly one in England, the United States, Australia, India, or in any other country, that has not had several members begging, borrowing, and even stealing postage stamps in order to make up the million that will go to clothe and feed some orphan.

This swindle originated in the fertile brain of a postage stamp collector at Stettin, Germany. He desired to get vast collections to sort out and sell again, and hit upon a plan to set the whole civilized world to go to work for him free of charge. He preyed on the sympathies of people by announcing that an orphan would be cared for in 'the Syrian Orphan Home" for every 1,000,000 stamps sent to him. This worked well; and the next dodge was the starting of a mythical mission in China, the Holy Sisters of which agreed, for every million stamps sent to them, to save from the jaws of the crocodiles of the Yellow River at least one Chinese baby, and then educate and christianize it. The stamps were to be sent not to Jerusalem or China, but to Munich or Stettin. The last claim on the sympathy of the world that has been made by this German is that for 1,000,000 stamps a home for an old lady or an old gentleman will be provided in one of three homes—one in London, another in New York, and the third in Cincinnati. For 500,000 stamps a bed will be endowed in a hospital, and for 100,000 a home will be found for one year. There are agencies in various cities to forwarn stamps to Stettin. It is estimated that this swindler has collected over 100,000,000 stamps in the United States alone, and that these were worth from $500,000 to three times that amount.—[Good Housekeeping.

The Chinese Question.

Representative Thomas Brown of Indiana, one of the ablest Republicans in the House, was asked the other day:—"Do you think the discussion of the Chinese Exclusion Act will take any prominence in the next session of Congress?" Mr. Brown replied:—"I have been a heretic on the Chinese question. I was one of the very few who voted against the bill excluding the Chinese as a violation of the Burlingame treaty, but now I think the United States Government should exclude the Chinese, and the Chinese, on the other hand, should exclude Americans from their country, and cut off all intercourse between the countries. The Chinese cannot come here and be treated with any fairness. The Chinese have been used infamously by the American people, and the Government has permitted such action to go on. The Chinaman is industrious, law-biding, and a good citizen. He is never a pauper, never strikes nor violates his agreement, is never as anarchist, and never engages in a riot. He does not become a politician and run ward politics. He is a clever kind of fellow. He smokes opium, but that is no worse than drinking bad whisky. For all that he is not for this country.

More Giant War Vessels.

The British are pushing the work on the ships building and to be built under the Admiralty programme. At Pembroke the Repulse and Renown, two immense battle ships of 14,000 tons burden, have their keelplates laid and the frames are being put in position. Over fifty tons of steel are being worked into each vessel per week. At Portsmouth the large cruiser, which is to be built on the slip from which the Trafalgar, and later the Vulcan, have been launched, is fully worked out in the rough and the material is being forged. This vessel will be the longest in the British navy and will have engines of 22,000 horse power. Little doubt is expressed that the whole seventy ships will be completed within the next four years.—[N.Y. Times.

Germany in 1888 published 2,963 papers and periodicals, the number in 1887 having been 2,729. No other country publishes so many journals devoted to special fields and departments. The bronze statue at Vienna of the composer Schubert, who was a short, insignificant man, with coarse features, represents a gentleman of great elegance, tall and stately form, seated on a heap of stones, with his elbow resting on a tree stump and a pencil in his hand, as if writing in a large book open upon his knees. He gazes into the air with a rapt look.

There are no doubt some things not all together right about club life, but that life meets a felt want in the breast of the average man no amount of cold reasoning can explain away. If it did not, there would not be the amount of popularity belonging to it which is so remarkably the case. London has long been famous for its numerous and wealthy clubs, whose houses are among the most palatial in that great metropolis. On this side of the Atlantic New York is the city of clubs above and beyond all others. "Clubbable" men there are numbered by the tens of thousands, and new clubs are being formed every year, and splendid club houses furnished in the most luxuriant way are being built. The number of distinct clubs in New York and Brooklyn is now close upon 300. They include social clubs political clubs, literary clubs, religious clubs, musical clubs, sporting clubs and many special clubs. The membership runs up to between 50,000 and 100,000. The older social clubs, which have been known more distinctively as such, are in a very prosperous condition. Applications for membership almost invariably exceed, and sometimes largely exceed the limits of membership allowed by the constitution.

WRONGED YET FAITHFUL.

An Extraordinary Story of Woman's Devotion.

"A strange and peculiarly interesting romance came to my notice a few days ago," remarked a Detroit detective recently. "Thirteen years ago a very attractive young maiden of 17 was a favorite member of a troupe of singers and bell ringers which was composed almost entirely of members of the family to which the young woman belonged. The troupe travelled the country from ocean to ocean, meeting with the most flattering success wherever they offered an entertainment. Our seventeen-year-old heroine, by her beauty, her grace of manner, her amiability, and her accomplishments as a musician, won the admiration of many. Among her most devoted and persistent admirers was a fine-appearing, cultured man of 45, who laid siege to the maiden's heart with such ardor and unremitting perseverance that finally she capitulated. He was a man of ample fortune, had one child, a young son, and told his fiancee that he had been a widower some five years or more. At his earnest entreaty the young woman resigned her position and married him. Things moved on pleasantly and smoothly for six years, when with paralysis, and to the care and comfort of her stricken spouse this good woman consecrated the rest of her life. She was constantly by the sick man's side, caring for him as she would a babe. Finally word came to her ears of the wonderful healing powers of the Mt. Clemens mineral waters.

HER HUSBAND WAS STRICKEN

Straightway she journeyed to that refuge of the lame and halt, filled with the hope that the healing powers of the famed waters would relieve him if they did not restore him to perfect health. Arrived at Mt. Clemens, she might be seen day after day, month after month, wheeling the paralyzed and emaciated form of her invalid husband from their boarding house to the bathhouse and back again. Every one commented on the fidelity of this beautiful woman to her helpless charge.

"One afternoon she chanced to be looking over a stack of old letters, and while thus engaged found one addressed to her stepson and signed "Your effectionate mother.' Filled with wonder and amazement, she went to the youth and asked him what it meant. He hesitated, stammered, and blushed, then faltered out the explanation that his mother was alive when his father married the second time, but died six months later. Not satisfied with this, she went to her husband and demanded to know of him whether his first wife was dead. The paralytic was forced, under a rigid questioning, to admit that and residing in Syracuse, N. Y. From her he had never been legally separated, never had even quarrelled with her, but being taken captive by the charms of the heroine of this tale, had forgotten his wife and his allegiance to her, and had wooed and won her who had so tenderly watched over him through years of helplessness and pain.

"The deceived and horror-stricken woman, who found herself to be no wife at all, made no scene, but calmly accepted the situation, resolved to make the best of a bad matter, wrote to Syracuse, ascertained the address of the genuine wife, whose place she had innocently usurped, informed her just how matters stood, insisted that she come for her long-lost husband, and, what is more, succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation between the parties. She made it clear to them both that they owed it to their son as well as to themselves to spend the ramainder of their lives together, and so, not long ago, she set out with them for their Eastern home, accompanying them as far as Rochester, where there was a most enacted at the depot, the broken and miserable man sobbing and crying as if his heart would burst as he gazed for the last time on earth into the eyes of the one woman he had loved.

Back to Michigian and Detroit came this deeply-wronged woman, and with a courage that nothing could daunt, began life anew, relying on her own unaided efforts to secure a livelihood. As a dressmaker she has supported herself comfortably, and never at any time is she heard to murmur or cry out at the cruelty of fate. A week ago she left Detroit for Nova Scotia, where I understand she has been assured an excellent position.

If lovely and attractive at 17, she now at 34 is regally beautiful, and perhaps the soft tinge of melancholy that casts but the suspicion of a shadow on her fair face helps to render more striking a beauty that even age cannot wither.

He Wants to Settle.

The Rev. George Farmer has had a flock in Iowa for the last twenty-seven years, and the said flock has been supposed to pay him a salary of $600 per year. The good man balanced up his books the other day, and he found a deficit of $6,000, and now the congregation has suddenly concluded that he is old-fashioned, lacks energy, and that they had better let him go and take the debt with him.—[Detroit Free Press.

is a good thing to get, and the man who wins it by superior skill, or by an unexpected turn of Fortune's wheel, is to be congratulated. But he who escapes from the clutches of that dread monster, Consumption, and wins back health and happiness, is far more fortunate. Woman's Smiles and Woman's Tears.

One to enliven, the other to soften the heart of mankind. An old bachelor once said women were either "all smiles or all tears;" but this cannot be true for what would there be "'twixt a tear and a smile." Women have enough to bear to make them "all tears" and enough to hope for to make them "all smiles." When afflicted with nervousness, "female weaknesses," sick headache, and the numerous diseases peculiar to their sex there is necessity for contemplation, and for "tears," but when they consider that there is a sure remedy in Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription for all such "female complaints," there is reason for "smiles."

FOR PAGAN WORSHIP.

The Palaces in Which the Poor Heathen Bend the Knee to Manufactured Deities.

INCREDIBLE SPLENDOR OF EDIFICES BUILT AND DECORATED BY NATIVES IN HINDOSTAN.

Some one says that the power of religion among a people may be gauged by the character of their temples and by their reverence for holy places. If the statement be correct, then the influence of the various forms of heathenism prevalent in India and China particularly, whatever it may be now, must at one time have been stupendous, for the grandest cathedrals of the middle ages, while they may be equal, scarcely surpass the glories of pagan houses of worship. Like the mediæval cathedrals, pagan temples were built for the most part by kings, princes, and governments, and also, like the cathedrals, every resource of architecture and art was exhausted to render them worthy places of prayer and pilgrimage. As there are many kinds of pagans, so there are many varieties of heathen temples, but in the most of them quite as much attention was paid by the architects to the outside and surroundings as to the interior of the structure. Most Indian temples were at one time surrounded by walls of great strength and solidity, and the entrances were made as beautiful as the resources of the builders would permit. The gates, where they still exist, are of brass, decorated with that lavishness of design and profusion of ornament peculiar to oriental buildings.

The arch surmounting the gateway is generally the object of much zealous and careful attention and some of the decorations are in a style that would do credit to the artist of any age or country. The sculptors and decorators of Siam were particularly good in designing artistic gates, and specimens of their best work may still be seen in the temples of that country. The Siamese as brass-workers, however, did not compare with the Hindoos. The designs which the latter executed have never been equaled for intricacy and beauty. Generally the pattern repeats itself throughout the panel or section in which it is employed, but sometimes an artist of wild originality planned a gate of brass bars, the pattern being, at first glance, one of hopeless confusion. After a little study, order begins to develop out of the maze, and gradually, as the plan is studied, the eye follows the intricate windings of the brass bars from one part of the structure to another, and the perfect symmetry and balance of every part commands the admiration of the most hypercritical.

The most ancient temples of Hindostan, says a writer to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, antedate written history, and even the traditions of the natives are so greatly at variance that to get at the truth, or even at an explanation of their origin that will be reasonably satisfactory, is a matter of no small difficulty. The early Hindoos were apparently imbued with the idea that their deities should be worshipped in comfort at least, so the first temples were probably caves, and enlargements of these resulted in of Elephanta, near Bombay, and the grotto temples of India, Wisura, and Ellora, any one of which for stupendousness of design and amount of work required in its execution is unequaled by any structure of modern times. Only the wealth of an empire supported by absolute power could have hewn these monstrous caves from the solid rock. But scarcely less labor was expended on the "stone temples," technically so-called, each being hewn from a single stone. At Mavalipuram there are seven of these remarkable relics of a former age. The smallest of these is 24 feet high by 12 feet wide, and in two stories. Each temple is hewn from a solid block of granite, and the supposition is that an ancient monarch, finding these huge bowlders, determined to fashion them into temples worthy of the gods; so, with immense expenditure of time and labor, the work was done, and well done, too, for the architectural proportions are perfect, and the collection of temples thus made each within a few yards of the others, is one of the most extraordinary monuments of antiquity.

To the Hindoo one of the most sacred spots in the world is Benares, which is indeed a city of temples, since there are no less than 1,200 of these sacred structures within its walls. Benares is to the Hindoo a convenient city, for there are temples to all manner of deities, and no matter which he desires to adore the temple is easily found. Even the monkey god has here a shrine, well patronised, and in a grove containing thousands of well fed and exceedingly mischievous monkeys. There is a story current in Benares concerning this temple, that once upon a time a certain man came to pray, but before doing so laid aside his apparel, containing 30 rupees. A monkey seized the garment and fled with it to the nearest tree. After much comoined with stone-throwing, the mischief-making deity began to fling down the rupees, but varied the performance by casting every other coin into the sacred pool, where it was lost beyond redemption, as the pool contained, besides water, a number of ferocious crocodiles. The man at once admitted the justice of the punishment, and confessed that he was a milkman, and that the water had again claimed its due and proper share of his gains.

Pools or tanks are an indispensable accompaniment of every temple in India. Water is necessary at every stage of worship, though the tanks are commonly exceedingly foul, for at every hour of the day worshipers are throwing into them flowers, grain, and similar offerings, which, under a torrid sun, soon putrify and render the tank an ill-smelling nuisance. Still a Hindoo's nose has no conscience, and the odor is to him no objection to the water. The tank is as sacred as the temple, and in numerous cases small shrines are built in the centre of the tank and reached by a portable bridge, not by wading or swimming, for the pool usually is inhabited by crocodiles, and on account of this fact more than one community of priests has made the tank a treasury. When they had money or valuables they did not desire to use at once they inclosed the property in an iron or earthen vessel and dropped it in the pool with a sublime confidence that it was safe and that the crocodiles would give a good account of any hardy thief who might undertake to rob the treasury. Surely a primitive bank, but safe and not likely to break through the operations of sneak-thieves.

The situation of the Hindoo temples, or those at least which are above ground, are generally well chosen and with an eye to beauty of surroundings. The temple of Krishna, at Napaul, for instance, is beautifully situated on a hill, not very high, but sufficiently elevated to give the edifice a commanding appearance and an extensive view of the surrounding country. An exceedingly imposing edifice, it is rendered more so by its surroundings. Extensive gardens inclose it on every hand, well laid out, and boasting of an unlimited number of those truly tropical trees, the cocoa palms. In Ceylon and many parts of India the palm is one of the most important kinds of property and a man having twenty or thirty palms is independently wealthy. From his palm orchard he has food and clothing all the year round, and besides when tapped at a certain stage of growth and properly fermented, yields a spirituous liquor highly intoxicating, so that the palm-raiser can be as drunk as a lord all the year round, if he choose, without spending a rupee.

THE JUICE OF THE NUT,

But palms are not the only trees which are cultivated in the inclosure of a Hindoo temple, although they are by far the most profitable. The terrible heat of an Indian sun renders shade of some kind indispensable, and so it is no uncommon sight to behold by the wayside a temple half hidden by trees and foliage like the structures on the top of Swayambhu hill. Into its hallowed groves the Hindoos pass today to pray as did their fathers for countless generations, for many of these Indian temples were old when Christ was born, and the origin of not a few had been forgotten when Jerusalem was still a fortress of the Jebusites, when Rome was a nest of robers and the Greeks were savages. Many of them contain inscriptions as illegible to the Brahman of to-day as to the European, so completely has the memory of those who built them passed away.

But others are more recent. The great temple of Umritsu is a comparatively modern structure, only a few hundred years old, and so a babe in years compared with the stone temples or still more ancient grottoes. It shows traces of foreign influence and indicates that when it was built the Hindoos were taking lessons from the Moslems. The towers look almost Saracenic and are evidently an afterthought, for the Hindoo temple builders did not aspire to reach the clouds, but to burrow beneath the earth; did not seek the sun so much as endeavor to escape its rays. But it was probably built before the Moslem invasion; after that event the conquerors devoted no small share of their time and attention to the destruction of the idol temples, for no Christian ever had greater abhorrence of an idol than was felt by the Moslem. One Mussulman emperor made to destroy all the stone temples in his dominions. Immense piles of wood were heaped around the structures, and when the flames were at their height water was thrown on the heated stone. But the old builders had not labored in vain, and the work of their hands resisted both water and flame. Scarcely a crack appears in the walls, and in many cases even the paintings on the interior walls are uninjured. More effective were the efforts of the Moslems when the Pagan temples were built of brick or of stone laid in courses. Then they could pull down and did so with a vengeance. In Delhi is shown a mosque built of the materials of seven temples torn down for the sake of the stone they contained. But the result is an architectural failure, for the Moslems simply piled the stones together without regard to their ornamentation or to the places they had formerly filled in the walls, so that two carved blocks of huge size may often be seen with a plain slab between them, thus producing a glaring sense of incongruity in every part of the building.

To the solidity of their construction the temples of the Hindoos owe their permanence, a character as different from that observable in Chinese sacred architecture as night is from day. The Chinese pagoda architecture seems to have been founded on that of the celestial junk, and, as the ornament is purely extraneous, simply loaded on the structure, it falls off almost as easily as it is put on, and the result is there are few ancient Chinese temples save those the characteristic features of which were borrowed from India. Both in India and China however, the temples of heathendom are no longer the thronged resorts they once were. A few years ago, when the car of Juggernaut was brought out for the last time, no volunteers could be found to tug at the ropes in the city where a century earlier willing thousands struggled and fought with each other for their turn at the cable. Juggernaut made his last parade by horse-power, and after that humiliating experience hid his face in his temple. The masses of India are evidently losing faith in heathenism, but whether they are yet prepared to substitute church for temple is a question about which the best informed still differ.

The theory that fish is brain-food receives a blow from Prof. Atwater, who says that fish contains no more phosphorous than does butchers' meat. Brain workers, however, may find benefit from a fish diet because of the easy digestibility of fish.

Among all animals the feeling of alarm and sudden terror is liable to have the same result—a wild break, a rushing this way and that; even among men it is not uncommon. In every war sudden surprises have resulted in a stampede, where hundreds of men, ordinarily brave, have rushed headlong to escape the supposed or actual danger, stampeded just as they might if they were seasons or buffaloes.

While the delegates to the American International Congress are being conducted through the United States at great expense to the Government, e State Department finds itself in a very unpleasant position with regard to the members of the International Marine Conference. Only $20,000 was appropriated by Congress to meet the expenses of the conference, and it is now discovered that half of this sum will be required to pay for the reporting of the proceedings, leaving very little to be expended on entertainments. It is safe to say, however, that many of the touring delegates to the former conference would gladly change places with their marine friends. If all the reports be true, they are being killed with kindness, and are already in a state of exhaustion, though their trip is not half done.

Prince Louis of Battenburg has been appointed to the command of Her Majesty's cruiser the Scout, which is to be recommissioned for a further term of service on the Mediterranean station. Prince Louis succeeds Commander C. J. M. Conybeare, whose term of service has expired.

A London statistician figures that 80,000 Americans have landed in England this summer, the expenses across averaging more than $100 each, and that upon the lowest calculation they have circulated $21,000,000 in Europe on railways and at hotels, without counting the money spent in purchases.

Hypnotism is to be elevated into a science. Already a society is being formed in London to investigate its merits and has promise of influential support. So much encouragement has, in fact, been given to the movement that a semi-public gathering has been held in Westminster Town Hall to take it into still further consideration.

The question of the larger introduction of the lance into the French army is under serious consideration by the French war authorities. The Fifth Brigade of Dragoons has been supplied with the new and improved lance for some time past, but, upon the arrival of the Dragoons in Paris, these lances have been taken away, for fear that foreign military visitors to the Exhibition should obtain a knowledge of their construction.

Probably the smallest republic in the world is the one which declared its independence on Aug. 9 at Franceville, one of the islands of the New Hebrides, and elected M. Chevilliard its President. The inhabitants consist of forty Europeans (including a solitary Englishman, a missioner), and 500 black workmen employed by a French company. The new flag of the republic having been duly hoisted, the French gunboat Saone landed a detachment and saluted the flag.

The talk heard so often nowadays about China's growing friendliness to the outer barbarians is founded on error. The Chinese hate them as bitterly to-day as they did thirty years or more ago. The lives and limbs of foreigners in Canton are said to be much less safe than formerly, insomuch that if they choose to visit unattended the temples, the Potter's Field where the beheading takes place, or any of the other famous sights in the wonderful city, the risk run is considerable.

A notable decrease has taken place in the British convict population. In July last the total number in custody under sentence of penal servitude had dropped to 6,405, as compared with 11,660 twenty years ago. The number of women sentenced to penal servitude has fallen very much below even recent years, the number in 1888 being 57, and in 1883, 186 The whole number of women in England and Wales now under sentence of penal servitude is only 402, or less than a third of the daily average female convict population of ten years ago.

One of the most remarkable feats of photography on record is the photographing the terrible explosion at Antwerp, or, if not the explosion, the immense clouds of smoke produced at the moment. The current number of "La Nature" gives an illustration copied from a photograph of the huge cloud that shot up in the air, roughly in shape like an inuerted Florence flask, when the explosion occurred. It has been estimated as being seventeen or eighteen hundred feet a cross, and, according to the journal quoted, the cloud remained motionless for about a quarter of an hour, preserving the form recorded by the photograph.

Taking pattern by their elders, a number of schoolboys in the old Country have "struck" for shorter hours and no home lessons. On October 8th several hundred boys attending the Albany Road Board school, Cardiff, came out on strike. They then marched to another school in a body and tried to induce the boys there to atrike. On the teachers endeavouring to drive them away they smashed the school windows. The school strike appears to have begun in Scotland, schools in Dundee, Ayr, Greenock, and other places having been left in a body by the pupils usually attending them. At West Harrlepool the boys came out in a body and marched through the streets. At one of the schools a spokesman of the strikers said they wanted better teachers, shorter hours, and fewer home lessons.

A musical troupe crossed the frontier of Saxony the other day. The officers of the Douane hoped to get a great prize and were very much disappointed with the way matters turned out. But they did their dutymanfully to the end. One of the properties was a crown of laurels which the musicians carried off from the latest of their triumphs. The officials taxed the laurels as spice. Massenet, the composer, had a somewhat similar experience—in Germany also. He was crossing the frontier with a crown of laurels, and he also was attacked by the Chef of the Douane. His laurels had to pay duty. They scheduled them as "medicinal plants."

King Charles of Rumania has shown remarkable talent in re organizing the Rumanian Army on a German basis, adapted, of course, to the requirements of the Rumanian habits and character. The Vienna correspondent of the London Times declares that the army has now become an object of great interest to military men. King Charles talents were long ago discovered by General Von Moltke, who declared that the young Hohenzollern prince would some day be heard from.

The precautions taken to render the recent visit of the Czar of Russia to Berlin safe, were most extraordinary. Large sums were uselessly expended at the old Schloss and the palace at Potsdam for securing the isolation of the czar if he should stay at either. No precautions seemed to satisfy the Russian officials. Count Schouvaloff fortified the Russian Embassy. Six Russian artisans, especially attached to the Czar's retinue, examined the walls, flooring and furniture of the embassy and inserted gratings at the tops and bottoms of the chimneys. Sentries were also stationed upon the roof, apparently to prevent explosives being thrown down the flues. The Berlin secret police assisted the Russian detectives as far as the frontier. In accordance with the Czar's desire the railway bridges at Neustadt, Dirschau and Marienburg, and all the streets of Dantzic were guarded by troops. Until the moment the Czar left Dantzic even the officials were not allowed to know whether he would board the imperial yacht "Derjava" or make the journey by railroad. When the train started via the Dirschau line for the frontier, orders were telegraphed to put 50,000 Russian troops in motion to protect the lines.

Children's Faces.

You bring me peace, O innocent child-faces!
With your clear questioning eyes,
Your fairy forms, your sweet unconscious graces,
Your lips, where laughter lies,

Out in the world too long, I grew heart-weary;
But in those leisure days,
Throwing aside the old routine so dreary,
I join the children's plays

What fun we have! what skating and what racing
Out in the frost and snow!
What battling with the north wind, keen and bracing,
That sets the blood aglow!

In twilight, round my chair they love to gather,
To hear the story told—
Heroic tales of many a poor forefather
In stirring days of old.

Ofttimes I pass the room where they are lying,
Each in a snowy bed,
And hear my little name-child sweetly trying
To pray for "Uncle Fred."

God bless the children with their rosy faces!
Their eyes like Truth's clear wells,
Their loving hearts, their many heavenly graces,
Their lips, where laughter dwells.

Bound in the Bundle of Life.

"And Abigail said unto David: the soul of my Lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God."—1 Samuel xxv. 29.

Herald it forth to His praise!
Jesus, my Lord, can it be
I shall be bound
At the end of the days
In a bundle of life with Thee?
Life will be Thine,
And life will be mine,
And love be the girdle our souls to entwine.

Laud I the Infinite grace,
Lifting me up to Thy side!
Granting my soul
In thy presence a place,
Not a gift nor a favor denied:
Life like Thine own,
As bright as Thy Throne
And as pure as Eternity ever hath known.

Bound in a bundle with God?
What a translation and gain!
Now I am under
His grace and His rod,
In weakness and peril and pain;
Held—so He saith
In bondage to death,
And life is a mystery, locked in a breath.

Then thrill with rapture, my heart!
I, once a sinner, shall be Like Thee, and know Thee
And be where Thou art,
And have life in its fullness with Thee:
Death shall have run
His race, and be done,
Thy dying such living for mortals hath won.

Bound in a bundle of life?
Soul of mine, so saith His word!
When thou art done
With mortality's strife,
Thou shalt then be bound with the Lord;
Joyfully prove
Below and above
The bondage and freedom of Infinite love.

W. C. Corbett, of San Mateo Stock Farm, has had an offer of $20 000 for the services of Guy Wilkes for the season of 1890, and a like offer for the year following. The offer was made by J. E. Green, of Louisville, and is the largest of the kind ever made.

The present revival of trade in Britain is something quite remarkable. All the leading railways are having wonderfully increased receipts. The steel industry is so active that every work in the West of Scotland is working on the double shift system. This is greatly due to the great activity in the Clyde ship building which for the last three quarters of a year has turned out 239,000 tons. Shipping companies have been making large profits and wages are everywhere going up without the heed either of strikes or of threats. In short it may be said that there is no country in the world at present enjoying so much prosperity as Great Britain.

An Ohio man has sued a wealthy widow for breach of promise to marry. It is fairly time for some men to have taken such a step in order to put a stop to the trifling which widows and maidens, especially the wealthy ones, often indulge in. It does not appear to make any difference to some women how much men love them, nor how much money they have expended in making themselves lovable, if they suddenly take a notion that they do not want to stick to their bargain. These same women would be the first to resent their own desertion by their cavaliers, and the first to resort to the courts of law for redress.

The world still wonders after the sayings and doings of those three Emperors who, though anything but wise men, seem to hold the destinies of their different countries and of Europe and the world in the hollow of their hands. It is a crying shame that such should be the case, and shows what a poor thing our modern Christian civilization is after all. It seems that these three personages have been dubbed respectively SLOW, KNOW, and SO. The world would not need to care what they were called if they had not unfortunately so much power of mischief making about them. If the people were wise and knew their strength this would not be.

Arthur Young, the Suffolk gentleman, who travelled in France during the years 1787, 1788 and 1789, gives a better idea of France before the great revolution of the utter degradation and hopelessness of its people, and the reckless brutality and oppression of its ruling classes than all the many books since published on the subject. This book has been long out of print, so that only wealthy people could now and then after long waiting secure a copy, and that at an enormous price. In has now been republished in Bohns' Library, and many will have now an opportunity of studying for themselves under the guidance of this wise and honest traveller the state of things in France a hundred years ago, and how necessary the revolution was to bring such a horrible state of things to an end.

DEVOURED BY WILD BEASTS.

The Frightful Destruction of Human Life in India.

In the last number of the Nineteenth Century of London Mr. J. Fayrer says that, according to official reports, 2 618 Hindoo subjects of Queen Victoria have been devoured in 1877 by wild beasts, while 17,740 have been killed by snakes.

Lions are no longer kings in Hindostan, but tigers are growing there and multiplying to a fearful extent. In 1887 they killed 1,063 persons and 27,517 head of cattle. After the snakes they are the most destructive beings in India.

Their appetite is enormous, but their favorite food is ox meat, and the reasons for it are obvious. Deer are rarely taken by surprise, and when warned have feet too nimble for a bounding tiger. Buffaloes have a queer way of forming themselves into square battalions, presenting formidable rows of threatening horns; boars are no cowards, and fight valiantly for dear life. But the ox and cow of India are mild, pacific bashful creatures, who prefer violent deaths to a good fight. Hence the natural fondness of tigers for them.

Some tigers, however, become regular man-eaters. But the taste for human flesh comes to them by accident. They generally bite their victim's shoulder and turn away disgusted. But when they have once eaten up a man they don't care for any other eatable. For three consecutive years the district of Nyneetal was at the mercy of a single man-eater, who devoured some eighty persons a year.

In that same year, 1887, tigers killed 1,063 men, but men killed 1,408 tigers, a balance of 345 tigers to the credit of mankind. So war is constantly carried on on both sides, but the tiger might be the winner in the long run, for he is always on the alert, while Hindoos are lazy, and moreover, hate to hunt an animal which they consider an incarnation of the evil spirit. Tigers and wolves fill them with superstitious terror, as they believe these beasts have the powes of revenge after death. They are glad if somebody else kills them, but they don't like to be a party to the killing from fear of posthumous reprisals.

A few years ago, says Mr. Fayrer, a nabob had a wolf in a trap. Not one of his men dared to kill the beast, so the nabob ordered that it be freed but had a bell first suspended to its neck. The poor wolf, constantly betrayed on its approach, soon starved to death.

A pretty ingenious trick, by the way, but not practicable with tigers.

The Fence Must Go.

The agitation against the universal and generally unnecessary use of the fence has already borne substantial fruit in many parts of the country. There are many villages East and West from which these offensive barriers have been entirely removed; and one feels in looking at many a lovely town that while the land is held in severalty, the landscape belongs to the community. There is nothing more striking to an American in the landscape of Belgium or Bavaria than the entire absence of fences. The gain in beauty and finish, in the completeness and harmony, of a stretch of country, is simply immeasurable. The Belgian and Bavarian farmers are far more economical in their methods than our own, for obvious reasons, and it is quite certain that if the fence served any real purpose they would be quick to introduce it. On the other hand, with their rigid economies and their careful use of every bit of soil, they have found it greatly to their advantage to save both the land and the expense which are involved in keeping up fences The American fence is the ugliest feature of the American landscape. It is never otherwise than offensive to the eye, and it is often in a condition of general dilapidation, or furnishes a convenient place for the deposit of odds and ends of the farmer's work, The fence is an ugly object; the expense of building and keeping it in order, both in actual outlay and in the land which it occupies has demonstrated over and over again that it is one of the most costly and least remunerative investments which the farmer makes; and it is also conceded that, for the most part, the fences now in use serve no purpose whatever. A little more stringent control of cattle, and the legitimate use of the fence for paddocks to confine them, would reduce to a minimum the large expenditure to which most farmers are now committed by extravagant fence-building. An anonymous contributor, who may possibly be Mark Twain, although we do not venture a guess on the matter, has formulated several good reasons for the fence. He thinks that house-owners are generally rich and ought to be required to spend their money in putting up fences in order to stimulate trade. "If properly made and kept in repair, fences can be depended on to keep trees, shrubs, flowers, and vegetables from straying into the road, and thus obstructing travel and possibly injuring animals who have a right to the public highway." He finds another great advantage in fences in the fact that they occupy a great deal of ground, which it is unnecessary, therefore, to till. Bill Nye declares that the fence line has kept more people out of heaven than the rum; but he thinks that stone walls are all right in regions where stone is the principal crop and where it is necessary to fence in the boys in order to make them stick to the farm.

Rustless Iron.

The rustless process, which has been until lately an experiment, has now demonstrated that great economy can be used, not only in ice pipes, but in every article where iron is used. In the past year over 2,000,000 kettles have been subjected to this process in Pittsburgh. The method is very peculiar. After the article is made it is put into a furnace about 3½ feet high, 15 feet long, and 8 feet broad. The furnace is made in an oval shape, air tight. After the iron has been in the furnace for two hours, and it has attained almost a white heat, the air that comes through the regenerators and air valves is shut securely off, and the furnace is made air tight.

After the air has been shut off, the superheater, which is located in the combustion chamber at the rear of the furnace, and at right angles from the air valves, is opened and the furnace is filled with steam and kept in this condition for eight hours. At short intervals a small valve is opened, so as to allow an exodus of steam in the furnace, allowing fresh steam to be put into the furnace.

When the articles have been ten hours in the furnace there has been accomplished the formation of magnetic oxide upon the iron surface. They are then put into an acid well, which is the last treatment.

The special services are being continued in the Presbyterian church this week, Rev. Mr. McLaren, of Aylmer, officiating. These services are being well attended and prove very interesting to the congregation.

Enoch Clark, book-keeper for Jas. McDougall, started out for a drive on Monday but neglected to screw up a nut on the axle of the buggy, consequently a wheel came off and Enoch was spilled out on the road.

The town was quiet on Thanksgiving day, there being but few amusements. Not many attended the football match between the high school and town teams, but the attendance at the different churches was large. A number attended the S. A. banquet and jubilee from outside places.

A horse belonging to J. Schleihauf, of Wallacetown, while standing in front of Price's bookstore, managed to pull the bridle off its head and ran away. One wheel was torn off the sulky to which the animal was attached and the rig otherwise badly wrecked. The horse was caught opposite the public school uninjured.

The opening meeting of the West Elgin Farmer's Institute for this season will be held in Leitch's hall on Wednesday, December 4th. Prof. Robertson, of the Ontario Agricultural College, will address the meeting in the afternoon on "Diarying and Hog Raising, and in the evening on "Skill in Farming." Other prominent gentlemen are also expected to be present.

During Sunday night the house of Mr. Symes, tinsmith for A. E. White, was entered and eleven jars of fruit stolen. The burglars entered the house by means of a window, stepping boldly into a room in which Mr. Symes' little daughter and her cousin were sleeping, picked up the fruit and left the house by means of the front door, which they unlocked. The little girl saw the robbers and is able to give a very good description of them.

A union thanksgiving service was held in the Dutton Baptist Church, on Thursday, at 11 a. m. Rev. E. Middleton, pastor of the Methodist church, preached an eloquent and instructive sermon to a very large and appreciative congregation of both Methodists and Baptists, from the text "Freely ye have received, freely give," Matt. 10, 8. A collection for the benefit of the poor was taken up at the close of the service, and L. J. Willson appointed treasurer, Mr. Willson will gladly receive further contributions to this important fund from any who may desire to give.

John W. Cook visited the farm of Jas. McIntosh, in Southwold, Thursday, and proceeded to seize the effect of Wm. Rose, a farm hand in McIntosh's employ, under power of a chattel mortgage for $1,600. Rose became abusive, and finally pulled a revolver, and presenting it at Cook's head ordered him to desist under penalty of being dosed with the contents of the firearm. Mr. Cook went to St. Thomas and lodged an information against Rose, and he was arrested, subsequently being bailed to appear before Squire McCausland. It has since transpired that the revolver was a small iron bootjack.

Representatives from each of the churches in the town met at the Baptist church on Tuesday evening last for the purpose of considering the advisability of procuring a suitable site for a cemetery for the township and village, in a more central location than any of the present cemeteries. Wm. Rothwell, B. A., was called to the chair, and short addresses were given by the delegates present, all speaking strongly in favor of the project. A committee was appointed to look up the Act bearing upon the matter, and the assembly adjourned until Saturday evening, when further discussion will take place.

Nine cords of wood in ten hours by one man may appear to some as an unlikely story; but a machine is now manufactured which has proven such a feat is possible. It can be carried folded on a man's back, saws down trees and runs easy without causing backache. 25,000 now in use and the demand is constantly increasing. Apply to Folding Sawing Machine Co., Chicago, who will send free illustrated catalogue containing testimonials from hundreds who have sawed from 4 to 9 cords in a day. A new invention for filing saws accompanies each machine; same can be had separate. With this tool anyone can file a saw better than an expert can without it.

Although the publishers have not yet made any announcement of it, the orders for the Christmas number of the Montreal Star, both from dealers and private citizens, are larger than ever before at the same time of the year. The Christmas Star this year is said to be the loveliest Holiday Pictorial ever issued from the press. The publishers have requested dealers to exercise the greatest care in seeing that all the beautiful supplements are delivered with each and every number, and to report any cases where vendors sell the supplements separately. The orders booked for the Montreal Christmas Star this year augur an immense demand.

Thanksgiving services were held in Knox church on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock. The Rev. T. Wilson preached an excellent thanksgiving sermon, showing many reasons why we should be thankful to the Heavenly Father for many mercies shown us during the past year, as individuals, as a congregation, as a town and as a nation, giving vent to patriotic sentiments, which found ready response in the minds of all present. The rev. gentleman drew comparisons between the civil, educational and religious liberties and advantages of Canada and other countries, showing the great superiority of our Canadian institutions. The service was attended by a large congregation, who listened attentively to the discourse. A special collection was taken up to be applied towards paying off the debt on the church, but only the sum of $30 was realized—but a small sum for even one member of the congregation to contribute, considering the object in view. It is said that other means will shortly be taken to raise the debt and provide for necessary improvements. With such a large congregation there should be no difficulty in securing the amount required.

For the sixth time within two years Geo. McCollum, a bachelor living near Mapleton, was robbed by his hired man. The thief on this occasion was a young man named Wm. Minhinnick. On Saturday night Minhinnick arose from bed, and securing $20 in cash, a silver watch, fur hat, pair pants and other goods, left. McCollum came to the city on Sunday and notified the chief, and detective Fairbrother was despatched to the scene and succeeded in capturing Minhinnick a mile or two from the house. He had celebrated the robbery by becoming gloriously full, and had just recovered from the effects of the spree when the officer pounced upon him. The watch and $10 in cash was found in possession of the prisoner.—Times.

The town and high school football teams played a lively and interesting match on the polo grounds Thanksgiving day. But few spectators were present. The match lasted one hour and from the start to the finish was closely contested, neither team winning a goal. Fair work was done by both teams, although they showed a lack of practice. Neither team is satisfied with the result of the game and it will be repeated at an early date. Following were the teams: High School—Goal, D. G. McPherson; backs, Thos. Porter and F. Black; half-backs, J. Ferguson, D. Ruthven, W. Wise; forwards, H. O'Malley, C. A. Black, D. McCallum, D. F. McRae, J. Jeffery; umpire, J. Middleton. Town—Goal, C. E. Knight; backs, M. McLean and C. S. Leitch; half-backs, B. Hales, U. Rihill, E. Rihill; forwards, E. Rothwell, W. Hollingshead, C. L. Patterson, S. R. Bright, F. Charlesworth; umpire, R. Sutherland. Referee, A. Paterson.

GRIP'S COMIC ALMANAC—There are few people in Canada who do not see this entertaining annual. It has just made its appearance for the eleventh year; and in many respects the new book is ahead of any predecessor. The illustrations are abundant; and all of the contents are of a very amusing character. A new feature is the calender of "Remarkable Events," which runs through the year, and which, alone, is worth far more than the price. In this department it is certainly entertaining and helpful to be told the day and year when pancakes were invented, when the half-holiday agitation was started, or washing-day instituted, or stolen sermons first used, or Frank Smith was ruined by the street railway (Jan. 15, 1906), or the mother-in-law joke invented, or Chicago morally reformed (A. D. 5969), or bootjacks first used as a cat cure, or the streets of Toronto finally fixed, or Friday discovered to be an unlucky day,—information on all of which, as illustrations, may be found in the January calendar. And the other months are quite as communicative.

The entertainment given at Wallacetown on Thanksgiving evening was largely attended and as one of the party from Dutton remarked, "It was by far the best entertainment I have ever attended in Wallacetown." W.S. Jackson, of Dutton, was called to the chair at 7.30, and the programme opened with an anthem by the Wallacetown choir, "O, sing unto the Lord" which was nicely rendered and was well appreciated by the audience, Rev. Mr. Middleton then led in prayer, followed by an address from the chairman; a quartette, "Hip hip, hurrah," by the Dutton quartette club, was given in masterly style, calling forth the greatest praise; a recitation followed, "The Station Master's Duty," by Miss Carpenter, given in excellent style; address, Rev. D. Kelso, pastor of the Wallacetown Presbyterian church; Rev. Mr. Middleton then favored the audience with a solo, "When the mists have cleared away," in fine style, a recitation, "The charity collector," by Miss Carpenter, provoked much laughter; song, "Fairy moonlight," Dutton quartette club, in response to an encore they gave "Merry sparkling waters;" address, Rev. Mr. Mason, of St. Thomas; duet, Mr. and Mrs. Tremeer, given in their usual pleasing styles; Miss Carpenter then appeared for the third time, giving "Betsy's Ambition," in a manner which called forth a rousing encore in response to which she gave one equally as good; solo, "I shall be satisfied," by the Rev. Mr. Mason; an address by Mrs. Mason, which proved that the ladies are as fully capable of speaking in public as the gentlemen; and last, but not least, a song by the Dutton quartette club, entitled, "What shall he have who kilied the deer." After a few announcements from the pastor, the Wallacetown choir closed this, one of the most successful entertainments ever given in the village.

THE BRAIN (from a photograph.)

It Healthy Condition. With Paresis Lesions.

There are many well known men confined in our Asylums who but a short time ago were prominent among our business and social circles.

Why are they there?

Paresis!

Did it come on at once?

Not at all. It was a gradual but positive growth. They overtaxed nature. The drain on their vitality, their nerve powers, their brain tissue, was too great, and they gradually but surely sank under it. The things they did to bring this sad end about are precisely the same things that are being done by thousands of men and women to-day. It is not necessary to name them. They all end disastrously unless checked or regulated.

Prof. Phelps, of Dartmouth College, knew this fully when he began his experiments which resulted in the discovery of the wonderful Paine's Celery Compound. He realized that paresis (consumption of the brain) was our great National weakness. He knew that the brain and nervous system must be fortified to meet the great strains which modern life bring upon it. He saw that men were becoming debilitated and women weakened by the pressure and demands of life, and he sought and discovered the remedy Paine's Celery Compound, if rightly taken, will renew the brain and build up nerve tissues as fast as they become exhausted. It is not a narcotic. It contains no drugs, no nostrums. It is perfectly pure. It is absolutely harmless. The high character of its discoverer guarantees this, and the indorsement of the medical and chemical professions prove it.

The Safest

AND most powerful alterative is Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Young and old are alike benefited by its use. For the eruptive diseases peculiar to children nothing else is so effective as this medicine, while its agreeable flavor makes it easy to administer.

"My little boy had large scrofulous ulcers on his neck and throat from which he suffered terribly. Two physicians attended him, but he grew continually worse under their care, and everybody expected he would die. I had heard of the remarkable cures effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and decided to have my boy try it. Shortly after he began to take this medicine, the ulcers commenced healing, and, after using several bottles, he was entirely cured. He is now as healthy and strong as any boy of his age."—William F. Dougherty, Hampton, Va.

"In May last, my youngest child, fourteen months old, began to have sores gather on its head and body. We applied various simple remedies without avail. The sores increased in number and discharged copiously. A physician was called, but the sores continued to multiply until in a few months they nearly covered the child's head and body. At last we began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In a few days a marked change for the better was manifest. The sores assumed a more healthy condition, the discharges were gradually diminished, and finally ceased altogether. The child is livelier, its skin is fresher, and its appetite better than we have observed for months."—Frank M. Griffin, Long Point, Texas.

"The formula of Ayer's Sarsaparilla presents, for chronic diseases of almost every kind, the best remedy known to the medical world."—D. M. Wilson, M. D., Wiggs, Arkansas.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

St. Thomas has a Chinese laundry.

Four more passenger conductors have been discharged from the M. C. R.

The flour market in the Maritime Provinces is becoming duller every week.

A young man named Gideon Smith dropped dead in a store in St. Thomas on Friday.

E. Murphy, ex-chief of police of Ingersoll and one of the known detectives in the province is dead.

A young man named Clark, belonging to Eden, was thrown over a steep embankment with his horse and buggy, the other day, and both driver and rig were badly demoralized.

Under the new time table, which came into effect on the C. P. R. on Monday, the train leaving St. Thomas at 2 p. m. for Toronto has been discontinued, and the 4.35 p. m. train now stops at way stations.

Wednesday night Miss Smith, a young woman belonging to the Salvation Army at Oil Springs, took a dose of "Rough on Rats." Dr. Hanks was called and after using the stomach pump succeeded in bringing her around.

J. A. McCausland, license inspector for East Elgin, is making an inspection of all the hotels in his district, and license holders not possessing the necessary qualifications will be asked to explain the reason thereof before the commissioners.

It is learned on what should be good authority that the Michigan Central Railway Company has determined to carry into effect next spring the long contemplated extension of the St. Clair Branch to Detroit. The right of way has already been purchased.

Another serious fire took place in Blanshard on Friday evening, Mr. Josiah Lane losing a fine barn and a lot of contents. The loss is not exactly known, but it will be in the neighborhood of $800. Insured in the Blanshard Mutual. This is the third loss the company has sustained this fall.

Sunday night an extensive fire took place in the old Port Stanley road station and freight sheds in London, now the property of the Grand Trunk. In it were stored several barrels of oil and varnish, a large number of stoves, etc., belonging to the McClary Manufacturing Co., and other materials, amounting in value to $5,000, partly insured. The fire was the work of an incendiary.

Joseph Mack, of St. Thomas, a young lad employed in the Heard factory, was maimed for life Monday morning as a result of recklessness. He was at work on one of the lathes, and undertook to show a companion how near he could put his right hand to the knives without injury, but shoved the hand too close, and as a result four fingers were chopped into mincemeat.

A frightful accident took place Saturday night at the crossing near Milton Station, on the C.P.R. Patrick Connors, a farm laborer, was making his way homeward on foot and it is supposed that he intended walking down the track, and, as the evening was dark, was probably trying to crawl across the cattleguard when the engine struck him on the head, cutting the top off and killing him instantly.

P. C. Stewart, who has acted as a member of the St. Thomas police force during P. C. Armstrong's illness, is no longer a patrolman, having tendered his resignation to the chief on Saturday. The resignation was called forth by the fact that a complaint had been made that he warned certain parties wanted by the police of an intended raid on their premises, and in consequence of this warning the ends of justice were frustrated. Stewart admitted, when handing in his resignation, that he had supplied the information to the suspected individual.

Wm. McIntosh, J. P., who absconded from Aylmer some weeks since, was arrested at Buffalo Friday night. McIntosh became financially involved and went to Buffalo, where Deputy-Sheriff Sloan, with a warrant in his pocket, was waiting for him. He kept his hiding place concealed until Friday night, when he went to a festival a friend with whom he was stopping. When the pair arrived at the friend's house about 11 p. m., Deputy Sloan was waiting outside, recognized his man on the description furnished and promptly arrested him. He is arrested under the Absconding Debtors' Act, and owes between $5,000 and $6,000.

A farmer by the name of McCallum, living in Mapleton, has been robbed again by his hired man, and it is the sixth time within two years. Now we have no sympathy with him, or any other farmer who is imposed on by his hired man. Any amount of help is available for farmers in their own districts, if they will pay decent wages, but for the sake of cheapness they employ men whom they know nothing about, and they must take the consequences. No business man will employ anyone without knowing him personally or getting credentials from responsible individuals, and farmers ought to exercise the same precaution, or even greater ones, for the hired help becomes almost virtually one of the family.—Brantford Telegram.

Dr. Tweedale, Medical Health Officer of the city of St. Thomas, died at his residence there on Monday.

The tallest chimney in the world is now building near Freiberg in Saxony. It will be 460 feet high, with an inside diameter of 23 feet at the bottom, and 16 feet 6 inches at the top. It will take 1,500,000 bricks and the cost is $30,000.

Miss Hattie Rockey laid her pocket-book containing $4.50 on the counter of Mr. Sutherland's store at Fingal while making some purchases. A young lad appropriated the pocket-book and after abstracting $2.50 threw the pocket-book away. It was subsequently found, and the young thief was followed and caught, but was allowed to go upon making restitution.

At the St. Thomas police court Thursday morning two young lads were summoned before the police magistrate on complaint of A. Hamilton, who charged them with carrying away gates, overturning outhouses, and indulging in other vandalism, as a result of which his property suffered on Hallowe'en night. The boys were allowed to go with the admonition that the next offence would entitle them to a term in jail.

A disastrous wreck occurred on the M. C. R. at Stevensville on Sunday morning. A freight train ran through an open switch, upsetting the engine into the ditch and piling freight cars loaded with sheep, flour, glue, railroad ties, etc., in an inextricable mass. About 100 sheep were killed, and two of the trainmen were severely injured. The officials claim to have ample evidence that the switch was left open with the intention of wrecking the train.

The Earl of Mountcashel, who has recently died, was once a resident of this vicinity, when he was known as Hon. Geo. Moore-Smyth, and lived on a farm near Komoka. He was particularly fond of pistol practice. He used to carry two or three pistols about him all the time, a fact which earned him the name of the "Wild Irishman." The township of Moore takes its name from the family, and was at one time owned by the Mountcashels.—Advertiser.

A distinguished clergymau has recently condemned all social and polite fictions. When, for instance, a stupid bore calls upon you, he thinks you ought to tell him that you are glad to see him, but that, on the contrary, you are sorry to see him, and that you wish he would go. This sort of brutal frankness would not do in the pulpit, as a critic of the clergyman has pointed out. A clergyman might as well quit preaching who should begin his sermons as follows: "My selfish, mostly ignorant and despicable hearers—I should like to call your prayerful attention to my text, but I know most of you are thinking about other matters and that you do not come here to learn piety but rather to show your good clothes and maintain a social position."

Scott Act Returns for West Elgin.

The following are the details of the general expenses of working the Scott Act in West Elgin for the last year of its operation as presented to the commissioners by the Inspector at a late meeting:—

EXPENSES.

General expenses, including Inspector's salary	$500 00
J. W. Manning, Inspector	3 35
Printing and advertising	12 10
Commissioners' expenses	83 25
Postage, etc	17 32
	$616.44

Two-fifths of this is chargeable to St. Thomas—$246.57. The balance at the credit of West Elgin is $516.23, and at the credit of St. Thomas.

That Man.

"Do you see that man over in the field driving? Who is he, and what is he doing?" "He is a farmer and is engaged in plowing. He is the man that moves the world. If he would go out on a strike and refuse to raise a crop for a single year it would produce a more disastrous effect than would result from a universal strike of all the brotherhoods and of railroad employes combined. He, with glittering share, furnishes subsistence for all the brotherhoods and everybody else; if he should go out for some real or imaginary wrong he would paralyze the commerce of the world on sea or land, every locomotive would rust in its stall, the cars would rot on the sidetrack, the songs of the spindle and factory would be hushed and silent, the goods of the merchant would be moth-eaten on the shelves and even the government would be powerless to interfere. That share, though bright, glitters only when it is idle. It hides its polish under a six inch lever of usefulness. That man, though intelligent, dresses in homespun, and patiently toils on year after year, bearing the toils he cannot shun, and because he does not strike, the world moves on and the people have enough to eat."

And now stop and consider how much more prosperity depends on the man with the mules than the dude with the cane and waxed moustache.

A TERROR TO EVIL-DOERS.

CHAPTER II.

The inquest was duly held. Captain Frere examined the witnesses—the shepherds who had found the dead bodies lying near the extinguished fire, and Dr Sewell, who certified that the men had died from wounds caused by pistol bullet; and everybody looked upon the affair as over. It was a regrettable accident, a thing for which somebody ought to be hanged, if one only knew who that somebody was; but it was over, and the excitement it had caused died away. Within even twenty-four hours of the discovery of the dead men, most people had found something else to talk about.

To many people, Captain Frere's engagement offered a more inviting topic—to Miss Jenny Birch, for example. Whether gentleness of temperament be the cause or not, most women, dearly as they love sensation, would rather hear of a single marriage than of half-a-dozen deaths; and though Miss Birch felt annoyed, and in a sense ill-used, that Madge Renton, who was five years her junior, and was, besides—she considered—absolutely plain, was to be married, she could not keep the objectionable topic from her mind and tongue. She questioned her father minutely about the manner in which "the doctor" had announced and "the captain" received the the news; and made him repeat the story so often that at last he exclaimed irritably that he wished he had never said a word about it. There was no question of keeping the engagement a secret now: Miss Jenny made that quite impossible by telling every one who entered the inn to talk about the murder. The effect of this on minds which were fundamentally sanguinary was to confuse therein the clear and lucid—howbeit imaginary—picture of the murder they had held, by superimposing the love-story upon it; a process which resulted in one of those incongruous unions of people and events which mark our dreams, and find a physical exemplification at times in those scrap-work screens, the result of domestic genius, where Her Majesty in full court costume is represented against a background of kitchen dresser, rich in willow-pattern plates.

"If you go mixing up the marriage and the murder in that fashion, lass," said old Birch to his daughter, "People'll go away thinking that the captain murdered the policemen in order to marry Miss Renton."

"Well, father, you are a donkey!" exclaimed Miss Jenny with great candour. "Who on earth would think that!"

"Why, any one would, from the way you're chattering. Is there a single person who has been in the house to-day whom you have not told?"

Miss Jenny laughed. "O yes; there is—you didn't expect that, now! I haven't told the sick lady up-stairs."

"It's because you haven't had a chance, then."

"Well, maybe. The doctor said I wasn't to go up, for fear of exciting her, and gave old Margaret orders to look after her. Perhaps he thought like would draw to like," said Miss Birch with some irritation; for she resented being excluded from the stranger's room, and tried to soothe herself by pretending that Dr. Sewell wished to spare her the indignity of waiting on one who was very probably a fitter companion for old Margaret—the maid-of-all-work of the establishment and an ex-convict.

Miss Jenny did not mind escaping the task of waiting on the invalid; but she felt wronged at not having the opportunity of retailing her news. It almost spoiled her sleep that night, to feel that she had thus failed in her duty.

With the morning, however, opportunity came. Miss Birch was lounging at her favourite post at the front door, when the strange lady came downstairs, dressed for walking. She walked slowly, with one hand pressed to her side, as if she feared that any exertion would cause her pain; and the lines round her mouth and between her eyebrows told of suffering already endured and the expectation of more. She had once had a delicate prettiness of flaxen hair and blue eyes, the sort of beauty which seldom outlasts youth, and which in her. disease, and probably enough hardships of another kind, had destroyed sooner than usual. Her clothes were poor and worn, and she seemed conscious of their meanness; yet she had that air of refinement which no woman ever wholly loses who has once possessed it, and which made even Jenny Birch, who preferred to judge people and things by their surface aspect, treat her with respect.

"Are you going out, ma'am?" she asked in surprise, seeing the stranger's feeble steps.

"I am going away," was the answer. "Will you ask the groom to get me a carriage to take me to the next station?"

"A carriage!" thought Miss Jenny. "You don't look one that can afford that; I'd have said from your appearance that the stage-fare was much as you could manage" Not being, however, destitute of good-feeling of a pachydermatous kind, she said: "Hadn't you better wait till to-morrow? The stagecoach passes then, and you'd be the better of another day's rest. The doctor won't be pleased at your runing away like this."

The invalid shook her head. "I" want to get back to Melbourne as soon as I can," she said; "so I am going to evade the doctor, for fear he should forbid me.—Will you, however, give him my most grateful thanks for his kindness, and ask him to accept this?" She handed the girl a sealed envelope, and proceeded to ask for her bill.

"It's father who manages that part of the business," said Miss Jenny; and she disappeared for a moment to bid him prepare the account and order the carriage to "You liked the doctor, didn't you?" she asked when she returned to the guest, who had now seated herself on the bench Captain Frere had occupied the previous day, and seemed to be gratefully inhaling the fresh autumn air.

"I did indeed; he was so kind to me, a stranger, and apparently a poor one. He is in every respect a gentleman."

"Isn't he, now?" exclaimed Miss Jenny. "More so than Captain Frere to my mind; though of course, the captain's very well connected. But he's not up to Dr Sewell. And if, as they say, Miss Renton could have had either of them—I don't believe it myself—I can't understand how she accepted the captain."

"What do you mean? What are you saying?" The lady started from her seat and caught Jenny's hand. Her body was swaying with weakness, but her voice was firm and imperious. "Tell me what you mean?" she cried again.

"Why! that Miss Renton, the parson's daughter, is going to marry Captain Frere.—There's nothing so wonderful in that, is there?"

But apparently there was, for the lady's grasp relaxed, and if Miss Jenny had not caught her in her strong round arms, she would have fallen to the ground.

Jenny carried her back to her room and laid her on the bed she had lately quitted, then calling old Margaret to attend to her, she ran herself for the doctor.

"It's all my fault!" she said penitently, when she had explained what had occurred. "Though I don't see yet why Miss Renton's marriage should upset her so. But it seems to be upsetting everybody," she added with a glance at Philip, who had winced a little when she spoke of Madge; for even in her distress at the strange lady's danger, Miss Jenny was woman enough to feel annoyed—"riled," as she phrased it—at Miss Renton having won the hearts of both the most desirable men in Picton.

Philip hurried to his patient, and having forbidden her to leave her bed for several days, went off on his rounds, which this time were to include a journey into the bush that would take two days.

"I I see you as soon as I come back tomorrow evening," he promised; "meanwhile, you must not be guilty of any more such rashness as this morning's work."

She smiled, but did not answer, perhaps because she was too weak. But when he was going, she caught his hand and detained him a moment. "You have been very kind to me," she said. "Women like kindness; not girls, perhaps—they have never felt trouble, and like a man whose manner masters them. But as life goes on and sorrows come, one learns to appreciate a man who is strong and tender too. You are both, and I wish you all happiness. This morning, when I meant to go away, I left some money for you; but money isn't happiness, is it? If I could only do something to secure that!"

"My dear lady!" exclaimed Philip, bewildered and embarrassed at her words, and so taking refuge in professionalism, "give me the happiness of seeing you much stronger when I come back, and I ask nothing better. I suppose success in our vocation is the best happiness we can look for in this life."

The touch of bitterness in his words did not escape her; but she said nothing, and he went away.

"As soon as he is gone, I shall get up and do the work that has fallen upon me, and then go away." This was her thought; but she was tired and languid, and unconsciously let the minutes slip away into hours without doing anything. Miss Jenny, remorseful and tender, brought her first soup and afterwards tea and as she took each she said to herself, "I must get up as soon as I have finished this;' and yet lay down again as she put aside the empty cup. At length the rays of the sun streamed, yellow as bright amber, into her room, and she knew that it was waning afternoon. Then, with a great effort she rose and put on her shabby garments—very slowly, because it fatigued her so; and when she was dressed, looked and listened from the top of the stair, to be sure that no one was about, to intercept her escape. As it chanced, Miss Jenny was out, gone to talk over recent events with a friend; old Margaret was in the kitchen; and Birch himself was sleeping the afternoon sleep of the well-fed and portly within the bar; so she was able to leave the house unseen.

Once outside, she hurried—or thought she hurried, struggling along at a snail's pace—to Captain Frere's house. He was not at home, she was told in answer to her inquiry; he was at the vicarage; so she went on there.

There was no longer any secrecy about Lewis Frere's engagement; Philip Sewell had put an end to that. "And, my dear," said Mr. Renton to his daughter. "I don't see why it need ever have been concealed. Captain Frere should not have suggested keeping me in ignorance, and I can't think why you consented. Why did you, Madge?"

"Oh!—I don't know." And indeed Madge did not know why she had been glad to say nothing to any friend of her proposed marriage; and still less could she have explained why, now that it was declared, she felt a little annoyed—with Philip, of course. "He is so much older than I," she suggested at last.

"That is true; but it is not a fatal barrier, other things being favourable. His position is satisfactory. I think he deserves the scriptural definition of a ruler, "A terror to evil-doers, and a praise and protection to them that do well." And if you love him, Madge, there's nothing more to be said."

"I suppose not," she answered dubiously.

Being thus, to public knowledge, an engaged man, Captain Frere was minded to enjoy the privileges of his position by spending as much time as he could with his betrothed. It is true that her society did not seem to give him much pleasure. He was gloomy; and she, being out of humour herself, though she tried to feel and act as the maiden should whom a good man has chosen as his wife, ventured to complain of his taciturnity. He said that he was thinking of "these two poor fellows;" which was a very pretty reason, but hardly accounted for his being nervous and irritable as well as grave; still less did it account for his impatient exclamation when she touched on that very subject. "For heaven's sake, Madge, don't talk of that affair. Every one has been chattering about it till I am sick of hearing of it."

Madge was bewildered and hurt; but, still striving to do her duty, like the hero of the thirty years' courtship described by Lewis Carroll, "as she had read in books," she began a coquettish teasing about her lover's beard. It was quite common in novels for the heroine to find fault with the way her lover parted his hair or with the fashion of his collars and neck-ties; and to ask him to sacrifice moustache or whiskers for her sake was equivalent to the hardest "quests" of the old chivalrous days. And surely Frere's beard was a safe subject!

But it was not. He nearly lost his temper when she suggested that he should shave it off.

"To please you! Why should I make a fright of myself to please you? You would regret it after I had done it. Besides, I am subject to colds; my throat has been weak ever since that beastly winter in the trenches, and the beard is my best protection."

"Why did you not tell me that at once?" she asked gently. "Of course, I would not have you do anything that would hurt you; but I did not know that was why you wore a beard. It was stupid of me, though; I might have noticed that even this mild evening you have your throat wrapped up. You caught cold that night you were out, I suppose?"

"Yes. And that's another thing I want to warn you about. Don't blazon my comings and goings as you have been doing half my usefulness would be gone if people could calculate where I had been and where I was likely to go. I didn't want people to know I had been out two nights ago, and when Sewell spoke of it, I denied having gone. Don't look so con——fearfully shocked; it was my duty, you know. And then he came down on me with your authority. Don't go chattering in that way again; remember that."

"I'll remember," said Madge meekly; but she could not help feeling that being "engaged" was not half so pleasant as her girlish fancy had dreamed. And if this was betrothal what would marriage be like Husbands are proverbially not more considerate than lovers. She felt depressed, and sat silent for a moment; and on this silence broke the announcement that a lady wanted to see Captain Frere.

"A lady! What lady? I can't see her!" he exclaimed abruptly in a harsh voice. Madge noticed that his face grew pale, and thought it was with anger at this visitant—doubtless some one with a legal grievance, and as impatient and importunate as claimants mostly are.

"I don't know who she is," answered the maid who had brought the message, in the tone of independence which the British domestic assumes in the freedom of colonial air; "but she says she must see you, and won't be put off. She's waiting at the front door."

"Yes, I must see you," said a voice behind; and the strange lady from the inn, who had not waited at the door, slipped past the astonished maid into the room. "I wanted to see you alone, Lewis, and to beg you, for honour's sake—not for mine; I expect no grace from you—not to be guilty of the wrong people say you meditate. I would have spared your good name if I could; but I have no time to spare, and perhaps it is just as well that this lady should know the truth. She must never marry you, Lewis, not though I lay dead at your feet, for you are not a man who deserves a good woman's love."

So far, Captain Frere had let her go on because he could not find voice to interrupt her; he had striven to speak, but the words would not come. Now, however, he exclaimed: "Be quiet; go away, and I'll see you elsewhere."

"I will not go; I must speak now."

He lifted his hand, as if to push her away, but Madge came between them,

"Captain Frere," she cried, "you shall not behave so in this house. Why are you afraid of this lady?—for I can see you are afraid of her.—What is it you have to say to him, madam? Is it anything I may hear?"

"It is something you must hear, Miss Renton—you are Miss Renton, I suppose?—if your happiness is to be saved. It is that I am this man's wife."

"It's a lie!" protested the captain.

"No lie! It is the truth. I have the certificate here; thank heaven, I was not weak enough to give it up to you when you asked. But I would have kept the promise I made you two days ago, when you gave me the money to take me back to Melbourne, never to trouble you again, if I had not heard that you meant to marry this young lady. I could not be a party to that.—Here is your money, since I have not kept my word."

She had spoken feebly, with frequent pauses for breath; but Frere had seemed unable to check her words. He read belief in Madge's face, and knew that nothing he could say would win her trust again. But when his wife held out a roll of banknotes to him; he struck it angrily from her hands. It was not a violent blow, though it came from a reckless and revengeful soul; but it seemed to have more power than mere physical force could account for, for as she received it, Mrs. Frere fell to the ground. Madge threw herself beside her and raised her up only, to see the sad eyes grow dull with the film of death.

"You have killed her!' she exclaimed to the man who an hour ago had been her lover. Only an hour?—only a few minutes! It seemed a century, or more—a memory of something that had occurred in a past life, fresh only in its power to shame her.

"She was dying; she would have died anyhow—why could she not have kept silence! he answered with a cold cynicism that sickened her. Then he came and touched her shoulder as she bent over the dead woman. "Madge," he said, "I swear to you that I loved you honestly and truly I thought to get rid of this—barrier; and if you had never known, it would not have mattered to you."

She did not answer him; but she withdrew from his touch with a glance of loathing, and rising to her feet, she crossed the room and rang the bell. He saw that all was over for him, and as he heard the footsteps of the maid outside—who, having listened at the door to the scene that had passed, was now slipping away a short distance, in order to return, as from the kitchen, in an ostentatious fashion—he rushed from the room. First, however, he picked up the bundle of notes that lay, half unrolled on the floor, and thrust them in his pocket.

If possible, a deeper scorn came over Madge's face. "He has time and thought for meanness in the midst of his discovered guilt," she said to herself.

Certainly Picton was unwontedly rich in sensations just now. The strange lady's death was the climax of all; for though all the circumstances of it were not understood enough had been grasped by the eavesdropping domestic to show that there was a certain connection between the dead woman and Captain Frere, and every one knew that it had terminated the recently announced engagement between him and Miss Renton.

Miss Birch was full of the theme, with the latest variations, when Philip Sewell came home. He had gathered from the old woman who was supposed to look after his comfort, only that his patient at the inn was dead; for his servant was deaf, and being unamiable as well, had often to go stinted in the matter of news because no one would take the trouble to shout details of local events into her ear. Philip therefore heard the tale from Miss Jenny, who, having an imagination that was shrewd as well as active, and more knowledge of the facts than any one in the town besides Captain Frere and Madge, gave him a not unfair idea of the state of matters.

"There was some connection between that lady and the captain," said Miss Jenny in conclusion; "and whatever it was, it has broken off his engagement to Miss Renton—that seems to be certain."

Philip was silent, filled with many emotions, thankful that Madge was not to marry a man whose past evidently held something he wished hidden, yet uncertain if his thankfulness was not vindictive spite.

"She left a letter for you, doctor, when she meant to go away that morning, before she fainted. I forgot to give it you; here it is."

Philip took the envelope, and on opening it, found some unsigned words of thanks and a bank-note.

"I don't want her money, poor creature!" he exclaimed. "If she has prevented Miss Renton'——He stopped, afraid of betraying too much, and added: "And my fee wouldn't have come near five pounds."

"Well, doctor, she meant it for you, so you'd best take it, I should say."

The doctor looked dubious, and stood crumpling the note between his hands. "Did she pay your father's bill?" he asked finally.

"No; she went out, you know, and died at the vicarage; and it seems there was no money found on her; at least there's been no word of any. And I don't suppose father would get much, if he asked Captain Frere to pay. Besides, under the circumstances, poor thing'——

"Look here Miss Jenny"—Philip jumped at the idea that had come to him—"you take this towards paying what she owed you. It isn't right that your father should lose by this poor lady; my services were very useless, and besides, they're not solid facts, like the comforts of an inn."

Jenny protested; but Philip was firm and old Birch, when appealed to, took a practical view of the matter. "There was her bed and her food, and brandy when she fainted; and there were things that we bought and had to be paid for; and there was no reason why he should be out of pocket,' he said.

So the five-pound note passed into Mr Birch's keeping; and as this was the time when he usually took a journey down the country to buy in goods for the winter, he took it with a good many others to his bank at Melbourne. And here a strange thing occurred. Mr Birch was arrested for being in possession of one of the notes from the policemen who had been murdered near Picton. Fortunately, the innkeeper was a careful man, who could give an account of all he possessed; and from the entry in his cash-book it was proved that the note in question had been given him by Dr. Philip Sewell, and was the one left to the latter by Mrs. Frere. Where had she got it? Proof, though not suspicion, might have been at fault here, if Madge Renton had not come forward and told how Mrs. Frere had spoken of money given her by her husband to buy her off; and also how Frere, when leaving the room where his wife's dead body lay had had forethought enough to pick up notes that had fallen from her hand. It cost Madge much to do this, conscious that thereby she must renew a strain of gossip that was torture to her; conscious, too, of Frere's reproachful eyes, that seemed to plead Gloucester's extenuation of his crimes to Lady Anne—"'Twas for thy sake I did it." But to Madge the plea was worse than useless. She remembered too well the worn anguished face of the deserted wife who had died in her arms.

Then the law laid its hand on Lewis Frere; and he, seeing that all hope of escape was over, even though he had burned the notes he had reclaimed from his wife, made cynical bitter confession of his sins. "There aren't many things worth risking one's life for," he said, "and a woman's liking isn't among them." When the jailers were cutting his hair and beard before putting him in convict dress, they found a scar, not yet wholly healed, beneath his chin. When asked how it came there, he told them that it was caused by a bullet which one of the policemen had fired almost at random. "I thought myself lucky then that it grazed me; I wish now that it had shot me dead."

No one was surprised when, soon after this, if appeared that Miss Renton was to go to England for a year or two to visit her mother's relations. It was felt to be the best thing she could do—to get away from Picton for a time; and friends hoped that she would marry at home, and so get over this sad affair, as they called it.

Philip Sewell, when he heard the news, debated with himself during a sleepless night, and then went up to the vicarage. "Madge," he said, "I am going to repeat a statement that angered you once, and may do so again. I am sure you never loved Frere; but I know that doesn't prove that you love me—I wish it did."

He paused; but Madge made no reply beyond a blush.

"I had a letter last mail," he went on, "from an old friend, who offers me a chance—a good chance—of practice in England. But I like Picton well enough, and I am getting on, so I won't accept, unless—unless, dear, you will make it worth my while to leave Australia by coming with me."

Still she said nothing; but she looked up with an expression in her eyes which Philip thought justified him in clasping her in his arms; and probably he was right.

[THE END.]

A BIG BATTLE IN EAST AFRICA.

The Germans Defeat 6,000 Savages Brought from the Interior.

Details have been received from Zanzibar of the recent engagement between a section of Capt. Wissmann's expedition, under command of Lieut. Gravenreuth, and Chief Bushiri's forces, which resulted in the defeat of the rebels. Lieut. Gravenreuth found Bushiri at the head of 6,000 Mavites, who were ravaging the country around Uzaramo. The Mavites made three desperate charges upon the Germans, but were repulsed with great slaughter.

Seven friendly natives were killed, but no Europeans, Lieut. Gravenreuth pursued the enemy, making a four days' journey inland from Bagamoyo, clearing the country of the rebels. The Germans came upon the bodies of 500 dead Mavites. The friendly natives are killing the rebels wherever found.

This is the first news we have received that the coast rebels have enlisted the services of savage tribes from the far interior in their war with the Germans. The Mavites are the most southern people of the famous Massai tribes. They have no quarrel with the whites, their home is in Nguru, and chiefly in the country northwest of that district 200 miles inland from Zanzibar, and this is the first time they have been heard of so near the Zanzibar coast as Uzaramo.

A short time ago Bushiri penetrated as far inland as Mpwapwa, a German post and English missionary station, where he killed one of the Germans and drove the missionaries away. He was then only a short distance south of the Mavite country, and he improved the opportunity to induce a large force of these famous warriors to go to the coast with him, doubtless promising them lots of plunder. They, of course, fought with their native lances, which accounts for the small amount of damage they inflicted upon the whites. After the usual Massai tactics, the Mavites tried to overwhelm the whites by a rush, and it was during these charges, doubtless, that the guns of the whites did such terrible execution.

Uzaramo, where this important battle took place, is a region southwest of Zanzibar, extending from the coast about sixty miles inland. It was in this district that the first white man, a Frenchman, who attempted to penetrate inner Africa from Zanzibar, was killed by a chief. Burton is the only important traveller who has passed through the terrible jungles of Uzaramo on his way inland.

A BLIZZARD ON THE CATTLE RANGES.

Several Cowboys Perish of Cold and Hunger in the Snowdrifts.

One of the results of the terrible blizzard which swept over eastern Colorado and northern New Mexico on Thursday and Friday of last week has reached Denver, from Folsom, N. M. On Thursday night Henry Miller, the range foreman for Col. R. G. Head, with several cowboys, camped near Sierra Grande with 1,800 beef cattle which they were holding for the purpose of loading in cars. At 4 o'clock that morning a blizzard from the northwest struck the herd, driving the cattle toward Pan Handle, Texas, the cowboys being unable to hold them. The snow was so blinding that it was impossible to see fifty feet ahead. Miller called his men together and they started to follow the herd and made an attempt to keep them bunched so far as possible.

The men became separated. On Friday night one of them wandered into Head's Home ranch half dead with cold and hunger. He told his story, and a rescuing party was immediately sent out, and at noon the frozen bodies of Henry Miller, Joe Martin, and Charley Solly were found lying on the open plains not far from Folsom. The other men succeeded in finding their way to camp before being overcome with cold.

Fast Time.

Passenger (on western freight train)—Do these freight trains, as a rule make pretty good time?

Brakeman—Pretty good time? Why, they had to take the headlights off of the engines.

What was that for?

Why, because we made such good time that the headlight would only light up the track in the rear of the train.

Missed Each Other.

Mrs. Gadd (who spent the summer on her aunt's farm)—"I did not meet you at any of the summer resorts, Mrs. Gabb."

Mrs Gabb (who summered on her uncle's farm)—"No-o; and, by the way, I don't remember meeting you in Paris."

It Was His Mistake.

"Look here, Mr. Higginbotton," said the grocer, by way of a joke, to the old farmer, "I found this stone, which weighs five pounds, in the bottom of that last crock of butter I bought of you."

"Lucy, consarn yer picter, this is your fault!" rejoined the man, as he turned to his wife.

"'Tain't neither! You handled the crocks!'

"But you must hev mixed 'em up down cellar."

"No, I didn't, though the gal probably did. She's just that keerless."

"Wall, Smith, I'll allow for it. The crocks got mixed. This was the one we were goin' to send to the preacher's donation party. and Iv'e bin horn swaggled out of a clean dollar. I orter hev put a lable on it."

The Coat Was All Right.

"See this coat?" he queried as he entered a York street clothing store the other day.

"Yes, I see dot coat. Vhas sometings wrong?"

"I should remark! See how it is all shrunk up!'

"I see. How did she come?"

"I got caught out in the rain."

"Oxactly. Did I sell you dot coat for waterproof?'

"No; but it hadn't ought to shrink up like this."

"Dot may be; but suppose dot coat swell out und vhas so big dot she vhas worth two dollars more—would you pay me extra?"

"Of course not."

"Oxactly. She vhas even. If she shrinks you doan' blame me; if she swells you doan' pay any more. Please doan' block cop der shtore, my frendt—dis vhas my busy day."

Only a Joke.

Husband (to wife); I expect Jokely will take a summons out against me. I have just given him a good hiding."—Wife: "What for!"—Husband: "He said that Gambet was a gambler, and that I was no better."—Wife (as a sudden thought comes to her): "Is it not likely that he was only joking? You know how witty he is sometimes. When he said that Gambet was a gambler, and you were no better, he meant just what he said—that you were no bet-tor—bet-tor, one who bets, or wagers."—Husband: "Confound him, yes, another one of his jokes. I was a little hasty, perhaps. I ought to have waited for him to explain."

An Estimable Parent.

First student—I saw you out walking yesterday with an elderly gentleman. Is he your father?

Second Student—He is; and let me tell you that he has risen in my estimation $150 since yesterday. That's the amount for which I have bled him.

POISON IS WOMAN'S WEAPON.

Strange Fatality Which Murderesses Evince for Drugs.

The trial and conviction of Mrs. Maybrick in Liverpool, which created such a sensation all over the world, has called the fact to mind that in seven cases out of ten where women have been guilty of murder poison has been their favorite weapon. In the time of the Roman Emperors we hear the name of Medea. Italy seemed at that time to be the cradle for female monsters. During the times of the Borgias, Pope Alexander VI. (Rodrigo Borgia) employed these women to get rid of his enemies. The cities of Ferrara, Ravenna, Bologna, Rome and Naples were, in the middle ages, the headquarters for these women.

The aqua toffana, which created such a fear among the people at that time, was invented by a woman named Monua Toffana, who carried on her business in Palermo. She afterward fled to Naples, where she sought refuge in a convent, but was arrested and convicted. She confessed to have poisoned over six hundred persons, and that she had been employed by the most aristocratic families in Rome and Naples. She was strangled to death in a prison in Naples, by order of Emperor Charles VI., in the year 1820. In France these women also played a conspicuous part. During the reign of Henry II. the name of Catherine Medici, the Queen of France, was connected with a great many of these mysterious deaths. The most noted of these women were the Marquise de Brinvilliers, Marie Madeleine Dreux d'Aubray. She was the daughter of a French officer, Chevalier Dreux d'Aubray. In 1651 she married a nobleman named Gobelin, Marquis de Brinvilliers. She soon grew tired of her husband, and fell in love with another officer, named Chevalier Gauden de Sainte Croix. They led a reckless life, and he was arrested and placed in the Bastile. While he was a prisoner he got acquainted with an Italian, named Signor Epili. The two were soon intimate friends and the former received some valuable information in regard to poison. When released he joined the Marquise de Brinvilliers, and carried on their nefarious business to such an extent that she was arrested. She fled to England, thence to Germany, but was arrested and taken back to Paris. She was placed before the inquisition, put on the bench of torture and after terrible suffering confessed to having poisoned her father and sisters and numerous others.

She was beheaded in Paris on the 16th of July, 1676. These murderers became so numerous that Louis the XIV. ordered a special court to try these offenders cour de poisons. Later a woman in Paris by name of Laffarge caused a sensation by her terrible acts, which gave the word in the French language laffarger.

IMPRISONED WOMEN.

How Feminine Vanity and Self-will Operate Behind the Bars.

Compulsion is the woman convict's drop of bitterness. The complete mortification of that harmless sort of vanity which fills so much of a woman's life, makes her durance doubly vile. All her fine feathers are sacrificed ruthlessly. Her hair, which she has apostolic authority for regarding as an ornament, is shorn of its last lock as soon as her cell has been allotted to her; and the face which has gazed with perfect passiveness, almost to rouse a country's admiration and the tongue that has been mute under the finding of jury and sentence of Judge, are raised to plead pathetically with the holder of the scissors, while the corridors sometimes ring again to the piercing cries for a sparing pity as the inexorable shearers gather their harvest of curls. But, Spring returns, and the hair renews itself, and before the next shearing day the girls grumbled that a thoughtless administration provides them with no hairpins. One woman whose hair continued to be suspiciously resplendent, as of macassar, after weeks, of incarceration, was an object of some wonderment, even to the chaplain, until she explained to him in confidence that she allowed her broth to cool and then skimmed off the fat to glitter in her crown of glory. Another girl certainly rouged, and rouge tells effectively on the pallor of prison confinement. Great was the envious indignation of her sisters in servitude against a frivolity so unattainable, but greater still, perhaps, was the curiosity to discover how the accomplishment of such a frivolity could be attained. At length it was discovered that the red threads woven among the blue shirts which she had to sew would, when drawn out and chewed yield the bloom yearned after by the cheek of beauty. The manner in which nearly every woman finds it possible to disarrange and double one of her underskirts and present the fascinations of a crinolette is so comic that it has been know to bring a smile from that gravest among men—a prison chaplain. And a woman without a looking-glass! Only the austerest and severest orders of nuns renounce that. And perhaps it is the female prisoner's most oppressive penance, for the relief of which she is even willing to risk the imposition of extra punishment—a task the more, a meal the less. By an accident, which she declares she will regret for a lifetime, she has broken a window. The hole is there, sure enough; but where is the detached glass? Days after this it is found concealed in a corner of her cell and behind it a strip of dark cloth, her substitute for quicksilver. And all for what? There are no male hearts to break and few male eyes to see—only those of governor, chaplain and doctor.

Never a Show for Him.

"No, sir," said the old tramp, sadly; "I can't get no work at my trade. I've tried hard, but it ain't no use.', Philanthropist—Your trade? Why, have you a trade?

Tramp (tearfully)—Yes, sir; I'm a winter waiter at a summer resort hotel.

Imitation

Is sometimes called the sincere form of flattery. This may account for the number of imitations of the original and only positive corn cure—Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. All such fall to possess equal merit, so when purchasing get the genuine "Putnam's." Safe, sure and painless. All druggists.

TO THE POINT.

When people see a man advertise they conclude he is a business man.

The who does not find advertising profitable generally finds business unprofitable.—Advertising is the rhetoric and not the logic of trade; it's business is to persuade and convince.

Newspaper advertising, rightly started, rightly stuck to, solidly backed up, ensures business success.

You do not, any of you, advertise enough. You are asleep and want your business to run itself. You ought to use printers' ink every day.

Care should be taken to see that every advertisement expresses a business idea clearly and definitely, so as to be easily remembered.

Was newspaper advertising a success with you last year? If not—why not? It pays others. It ought to pay you; and will, if wisely done.

Get a good article, advertise liberally but judiciously; advertise the truth; set forth the announcement in a neat, simple but pleasing way, and satisfactory results will follow.

No form of communication with the public is so cheap as newspaper advertising; no agent is so moderate in his charge and none so untiring in his work as the live newspaper.

Let the skeptic look around him in any city or business center, and note the most successful business men there. Who are they? The careful and judicious advertisers, invariably.

To reach the people and to hold before them your name and business in bones, advertisements pays. Promises not kept, or, to speak more plainly, dishonest advertisements, not only injure the advertiser's business, but also the paper that contains them.

There are hosts of honorable advertisers, the number of which is daily increasing, who would no more think of misrepresenting in their advertisement than they would in their own office or salesroom. It pays consumers to read the announcements of responsible and honorable firms for the sake of the business information they gain.

The Shady Side of Life.

Smith had been married a little over a year, and he was considered a man to be envied. For had he not the most delightfully angelic wife and the sweetest baby in town? Surely, his was the perfection of wedded bliss.

So thought Smith's bachelor friends. But one of them knows better now. Agreeably to Smith's urgent request he breakfasted with the young couple the other morning.

The wife was all smiles during the meal, which passed most pleasantly. The bachelor had already decided not to remain single any longer than he could help. But the breakfast ended and the trio arose, the husband to go to his office and his friend to accompany him. The following conversation took place between the dining-room, and the front gate:

"Now, Tom," began the fair wife, "you must stop at Brown & Brigg's and order me a sack of flour."

"All right, when do you want it?"

"This morning, don't forget it. And when you come to dinner, bring baby some soothing syrup."

"All right."

"Now don't forget to send the flour, Tom."

"I won't."

"Nor the syrup for baby."

"No."

"Are you sure you won't forget? Oh, yes, Tom, here are those stockings you got for the baby. Take them back and get a size smaller. Now remember."

The door was open now and the men were going out.

"Remember the flour, Tom, and baby's syrup and stockings."

The men were on the sidewalk now

"Oh, Tom!"

"Well, dear?"

"You won't forget the flour?"

"Certainly not."

A few steps were taken.

"Tom."

"Well, what else?"

"Nothing, only please don't neglect to send the flour."

"I am not likely to forget it, Fannie."

"Nor the syrup and the stockings?"

"No."

The two men started on up town. Suddenly a swift patter of little feet on the walk behind them attracted their attention, accompanied by repeated calls of "Tom? T—o—m! Stop, Tom!"

Tom stopped.

"Tom," she panted, "are you sure I hadn't better tie a string around your finger so you won't forget the flour? Oh, I nearly forgot it! Tom, please wait until I run back to the house and get Mary Miller's sleeve pattern. She wants it this morning and I promised to send it by you, as you went to the office. And you might get me a paper of pins and two nutmegs."

The sleeve pattern was brought and another start made.

"Tom, dear, you won't forget the flour." Then fainter, "Baby's stockings!" Fainter still, as they walked rapidly away, "pins!—"Two nutmegs?" An eloquent silence, then, "T—o—m!—f—l—o—u—r!"

A.

Fired!

Employer (to bibulous clerk)—Mr. Soaker, why are you not like a gun?

Soaker (who feels it incumbent on him to laugh) I (hic) don't know, sir!

Employer (meaningly)—Because a gun cannot be discharged when it is half cocked. You may get your salary from the cashier.

Bobby Burns Understood It.

"Many and sharp the numerous ills
Inwoven in our frame.
More pointed still we make ourselves
Regret, remorse and shame."

Among the most dangerous as well as vexing of ills "inwoven with our frame," are Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, colds and lung troubles generally. However, the timely use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery takes away their fearful consequences, but when neglected, leaves "regret, remorse and shame." But you need not be ashamed to ask for the "Discovery," as it has become a standard remedy, found at all the drug stores, where thousands call for it every day, and where it is recognized as the leading medicine for all lung and throat affections.

What it Means.

To the man or woman who has never been ill, the word "health" is meaningless. But to the one who has suffered and despaired, health appears as a priceless boon. To the thousands of unfortunate women who are suffering from some of the many forms of weaknesses or irregularities peculiar to their sex, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription holds forth the promise of a speedy restoration of this "priceless boon."

The body of a flying fish in variegated gold, with diamond and sapphire studded fins, is a handsome lace pin.

The spooks and goblins that delight
To fill with terror all the night;
That stalk abroad in hideous dreams
With which dyspepsia's fancy teems,
Will never trouble with their ills
The man who trusts in Pierce's Pills.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1889.

About the time of the millenium people will begin to have a faint idea that it is not safe to try to drive across the railroad track in front of an approaching train. Hundreds of tombstones are monuments to the fact that such attempts can only result in failure.

A. W. Campbell, P. L. S., states that the new sewer is practically of very little use to the streets as yet on account of the streets not being properly graded to allow of the water flowing into the catch basins, and unless this is attended to the sewer will be completely choked up with mud in a year or two and will have to be taken up and cleaned. Here is a pointer for those who said that the sewer was of no use because the water would not run up hill to reach the catch basins.

The wet weather is showing plainly the lamentable fact that we have only three or four street crossings in town that are at all navigable during the muddy season. Some effort should be made to place new crossings (after the style of those lately laid by W. H. Nelson) at the principal points on Main street at least. The sidewalk on Shackleton street is also in a very poor state of repair—a disgrace to this, the finest street in town—and should be laid anew. But who will do it?

Why don't some of our business men make an effort to relieve the Egyptian darkness which envelopes our principal streets at night? The lack of street lamps would not be so much felt if the sidewalks were in a good state of repair and not obstructed by boxes, barrels and other rubbish for the unlucky traveller to tumble over, barking his shins and calling forth any amount of decidedly unscriptural language. A few lamps placed at intervals along Main street would give the town a far more business-like appearance, besides adding greatly to the comfort of its citizens, and the cost would be nominal.

Complaints are made almost daily by shippers of freight that the management of that business at the M. C. R. station at present is anything but satisfactory to them. The trouble seems to lie in the fact that the agent lately settled here is totally ignorant of even the rudiments of freight business and does not get around early enough in the morning to have the miscellaneous freight delivered in good time. Several cars of freight were also delayed in shipping. The gentleman may be a first-class ticket agent and operator but is hardly competent to handle the large amount of business transacted at the Dutton station.

Referring to Comber village, which has been visited by another serious fire, the Windsor Record says that the inhabitants talk about forming a hook and ladder brigade, but the business men feel that the cost for securing anything like adequate means of fire protection will be too expensive for them to bear. If this be true, the business men of Comber had better go out of business. Merchandising that will not admit of such an expense as reasonable outlay for protection from fire is no fit occupation for an honest and able-bodied merchant.—[Monetary Times. How will this fit Dutton?

A Presbyterian church in Melbourne has introduced some innovations into its services, which, although happily blending patriotism and piety, would startle the sober-minded Scotchman at home. The choir, composed of gentlemen wearing the Highland kilt and girls attired in the costume of the Lady of the Lake, sing their hymns of praise to the music of the bagpipes. The ingenious parson who contrived these effects has his reward in greatly enlarged congregations.

Exactly so.

He who would thrive must rise at five.
So says the old proverb, though there is more rhyme than reason in it, for if—
He who would thrive must rise at five,
it must follow naturally—
He who'd thrive more must rise at four;
He who'd still more thriving be
Must leave his bed at turn of three;
And he this latter would out-do,
Will rouse him at the stroke of two.
And by way of climax to it all, it should be held good that—
He who'd never be out-done
Must ever rise at stroke of one
But the best illustration would be—
He who'd flourish best of all
Should never go to bed at all.

Mother (gazing at her daughter's dressing-cushion)—Why, where did you get so many gentlemen's scarf-pins? Daughter—I don't know myself. I find one in my hair almost every night after Gus calls, and to save me I can't imagine how they get there.

Mrs. Peterson—"That suicide of Farmer Brown is certainly one of the most inexplicable things. I suppose Mrs. Brown took on terribly." Farm hand—"Yes indeed; Brown had cut off a piece of the new clothes-line to hang himself with, and you never saw a madder woman in your life!"

"So," remarked the old gentleman to an aspiring son-in-law, "you want my daughter, do you? Well, you know she has lost her fortune, and is now to all intents and purposes a bankrupt." "That's all right," responded the brave young man, "you appoint me receiver, and I'll attend to the business."

Flossie is 6 years old. "Mamma," she asked one day, "if I get married will I have to have a husband like pa?" "Yes," replied the mother, with an amused smile. "And if I don't get married will I have to be an old maid like Aunt Kate?" "Yes." "Mamma"—after a pause—"it's a tough world for us women, ain't it?"

Mr. B—About nine months.

How long have you been at it?

Just nine months.

Boils, carbuncles, and other skin eruptions indicate that the system is endeavoring to reject poisonous acids, and that Ayer's Sarsaparilla is imperatively needed. It is the most reliable of all blood medicines. Ask your druggist for it, and take no other.

Just imagine your wife not being able to speak for ten days. What a change there would be in the house! what an unnatural silence! A case of this occurred in Hamilton some time ago, and one bottle of Wilson's Wild Cherry cured the afflicted lady in four days. This medicine has no equal for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough or Croup. Sold by R. A. Kirkland.

COLD IN HEAD CATARRH | THE 4 STAGES | CONSUMPTION DEATH.

There is positive danger to health and life in neglecting a case of Cold in the Head or Catarrh, and at this season with its changeable weather, unusual moisture and sudden changes from heat to cold, there is peculiar liability to cold in the head. A neglected case of Cold in the Head rapidly developes into Catarrh, and neglected Catarrh, just as certainly developes into Consumption and leads to premature Death. Medical testimony proves conclusively that a large percentage of the deaths occurring from Consumption had their origin in a neglected Cold, which by gradual stages, developed in Catarrh, and then into Consumption, that dread disesse with which medical science is as yet unable to cope successfully. If you are suffering from Cold in the head, or from any of the numerous symptoms of Catarrh, such as bad breath, dull oppressive headaches, droppings from the head into the throat, hawking and spitting, copious discharges from the nostrils, losing sense of smell, or taste becoming dull, hacking cough, or a general feeling of debility, husky voice, a wheezing or cracking sound in your chest when breathing, a feeling of dizziness, particularly when stooping, a feeling of tiredness and indisposition to exertion, a feeling of nausea in the morning when attempting to dislodge accumulations in the throat. Do not neglect them. These but a few of the many symptoms of Catarrh, and if you experience any, be warned in time. Do not permit them to run under the mistaken impression that the disease will eventually wear away. It will not, but on the contrary will wear you away as it has thousands before you. Procure at once a bottle of NASAL BALM, the only certain and speedy cure ever offered to the public for Cold in the Head and Catarrh. This is no idle assertion, but an unquestionable fact, which is verified by the thousands of testimonials in our possession telling of marvellous cures. These testimonials we have received from all parts of the Dominion, and we append a few, selected at random; as a fair sample of the whole:—

M. Alex. Burns, of Sudbury, Ont., says:—Gents, I may state that I have been affected with Catarrh for seven or eight years, and it was attended with consequent symptoms such as foul breath, constant dropping into the throat, hawking and spitting, partial deafness, ringing in the ears, and sickening pain in the head, directly over either eye. I have used powders and douches, but all to no effect, the only result arising from the use of such was temporary relief, followed by the usual symptoms in a more aggravated form. The results arising from the use of Nasal Balm are sweet breath, stoppage of droppings into the throat (consequently less hawking and spitting), clearness of hearing, and not once since I began its use have I had pain in my head. In fact it is my opinion that a careful and persistent use of the "Balm" will effect a cure in the worst case of catarrh.

James H. McLeod, Mink River Road, N. S., says:—I have tried other remedies for Catarrh, but received little or no good from them. Your NASAL BALM is certainly the BEST REMEDY I have tried, and all you claim for it. The fact that it is pleasant and convenient to use adds greatly to its value, but its chief worth lies in being a CERTAIN CURE for that unpleasant disease—Catarrh.

W. Chas. Hanley, postmaster, Spy Bay, N. S., says:—I submit the following to the public that any who may be afflicted may be benefitted by the same remedy. Two bottles of your NASAL BALM has RESTORED to PERFECT HEALTH a four year old child of ours, suffering from Catarrh.

Henrietta Blackwell, Parker, Ont., says:—Your NASAL BALM is the BEST REMEDY I have yet used for Catarrh. I can breath more freely than before and my breath has regained its sweetness. I consider NASAL BALM a boon to the suffering.

Miss Maggie M. Martin, Terwood, Pa., says:—Through a friend in Canada I became acquainted with your NASAL BALM. I have suffered for years with Catarrh, and it is the first remedy from which I have experienced relief, and I feel certain it will cure me.

Miss Minnie McNairn, Mille Roches, Ont., says:—Your bottle of NASAL BALM did me much good. The pain in my head disappeared before I had used the bottle, and I find myself receiving the greatest benefit. I am certain that NASAL BALM will cure my Catarrh if its use is perserved in.

Mr. John H. Adams, merchant, Brantford, Ont., says:—I have used NASAL BALM for Catarrh, and found it to be a CERTAIN CURE

W. A. Doyle, Beulah, Man., writes:—As a family medicine to check Catarrhal affections or Cold in the Head, NASAL BALM HAS NO EQUAL. We prize it highly.

Mr. A. Schlenzig, Toronto, says:—For a number of years my wife has been badly troubled with Catarrh. Dr. ——— here promised to cure her, but after using his remedy for six months she became weaker than before, and I found that I had spent $36 for medical treatment that did no good. My wife then began to use your NASAL BALM and has improved wonderfully, and she is better and stronger than for years. Your remedy is the best in the market and you can use this as testimony.

Emilie Pellitier, Grenville, says.—I can scarcely find words to tell how highly I prize NASAL BALM. Its effects in my case have been wonderful.

Alpha H. Dales, Tarbert, Ont., writes: Your NASAL BALM has made a new man of me. I have never used a remedy so satisfactory.

A CAUTION:—Beware of imitations. If your dealer has not NASAL BALM in stock do not let him persuade you to take any other remedy which he may say is just as good, but send direct to the undersigned and it will be sent you on receipt of price—50 cents and $1 a bottle.

Fingal.

Nov. 18.—Revival services are being conducted this week in the Methodist church by the Rev. Mr. Hamilton. The meetings held last week were a decided success. Rev. Mr. Staples, of Shedden, preached on Tuesday; Rev. Mr. Medd, of Iona, on Wednesday; Rev. Mr. Whiting, of St. Thomas, on Thursday, and Rev. Mr. McAlister on Friday. Prayer meetings were held each day from 10 to 11 a. m., followed in the afternoon and evening by regular services. Great good is expected to result from these meetings.

The funeral of the late Mrs. Caleb Basket took place to-day from her late residence in St. Thomas. The remains were brought to the family burying ground here. Mr. Basket and family have the sympathy of the whole village in their bereavement.

Mrs. W. H. Davis is very ill at present but is recovering under the care of Dr Marlatt.

The social tea held in connection with the Women's Missionary Society at the residence of Dan. Cattenach, was a grand success. The house was crowded and all spent a good time.

W. H. Davis has sold his blacksmith shop to James Miller, who has been in the employ of the foundry here for 27 years. We all wish Jim success.

Marriage bells still keep ringing in our village. This time it is Dr. Young who has taken unto himself a wife.

Iona Station.

Wm. McLandress shipped two decks of hogs on Wednesday, making over 1,000 hogs he has shipped this season, for which he has paid out about $11,000. He is now buying a carload of live poultry.

West Lorne.

Nov. 20.—Miss Ella Cahill left on Monday to attend the Chatham Business College.

Dan. Campbell has returned from a two months' trip to Manitoba and the Northwest.

Mrs. A. Shore, who has been visiting Mrs. D. Kirkpatrick, returned on Saturday to her home in Essex Centre.

W. J. Ward has removed his general store from this place and will engage in business on a larger scale at Niagara Falls.

The revival meetings are still going on in the Methodist church, and the membership of that body is being steadily increased.

Rumor has it that there are several weddings on the tapis in town. Full particulars later.

A number of young men have left for Essex Centre, where they have secured work with the force who are laying double track on the M.C.R.

The members of our Rifle Association went to Highgate on Monday last to shoot a match with Palmyra and sustained a defeat from that team, which they hope to reverse in the return match to be held here soon.

There will be a ball and supper at the Elgin House Friday evening next.

St. Andrew's Day will be celebrated by a supper at the Argyle House, Friday evening.

Now that the wet weather has set in the necessity of repairing the crossings on Main street becomes apparent. It is almost impossible to cross at any of them without becoming stuck in the mud.

Miss Maggie McEachren has returned to her home in Detroit.

A concort will be given on the evening of Tuesday, December 3rd, by the Young Ladies' Aid Society.

Middlemiss.

Nov. 19.—Our village is in need of a shoemaker very badly just now, as our old one, Mr. Ingham, left on Tuesday on a two months' visit to friends in England.

I wonder who got left in Middlemiss on Sunday night.

On Friday evening last a number of the friends and neighbors of Andrew Gowanlock gathered at his home to spend an evening with him prior to his departure from among them. About 9.30 they started tripping the light fantastic toe, which was kept up until the wee sma hours, when the crowd dispersed, feeling satisfied that it was the most enjoyable evening they had spent for a long while.

Willey's Corners.

Nov. 15th—The auction sale of farm stock at Alex. McIntyre's on the 15th inst, was well attended and stock sold well.

A ploughing match is talked of, and no doubt the competition will be keen as there are many professional ploughmen around this corner.

We are glad to report that Mrs. J. Shearing is able to be around the house again.

Mrs. D. McKillop is gaining very slowly.

Rodney.

Nov. 19—G. Schmeltz, of Middle st., was married to Mrs. Strom, of the same place, last week.

Mrs. A. Ruthven, living on Silver st., died and was buried last Tuesday.

The Presbyterians of this place intend giving a concert about the last of this month.

D. Patterson has improved his barn by building a long shed to it.

A surprise party took place at A. Leibner's last Friday evening. Quite a number were present and a good time was spent.

There is some talk of a joint stock company building a new grist mill here.

Miss Lizzie Middlemiss spent a few days with her brother H. Middlemiss last week.

Tale of an Esquimau.

An Esquimau sat on a chunk of ice,
In the land of the Northern Pole;
He cracked his heels and he whistled twice
At a sight that alarmed his soul.

For a stranger came over the fields of snow,
At a speed that was fearful, quite;
His cheeks were pallid and thin with woe,
And the frost on his beard was white.

"Oh, prithee, pause," cried the Esquimau
"From whence do you come so fast?"
"I come from a land weary leagues below
This realm with its storms and blast.

"I come from a land in the far off South,
And I've travelled ten thousand miles
Since last the sun like a beaming mouth
Turned loose on the earth its smiles.

"I've clambered the mountains, on raging streams
Full oft' I've been heaved and tossed;
I umpired a game for two base ball teams—
Alas! And the home club lost."

A Dog That Can Tell Time.

Samuel Reid, the truckman, is the owner of a very intelligent Irish setter, and he never tires of telling of the many wonderful performances of his pet. Last night Mr. Reid told his wife, in the presence of the dog, to arouse him at 6 o'clock this morning as he wished to go to the Rosedale dock to begin work on a large stock of freight which was awaiting his attention. This morning Mrs. Reid failed to awake at the hour named, and Mr. Reid was aroused by hearing his knowing dog scratching at his bedroom door. He instantly arose and upon looking at the clock discovered that it was three minutes past 6 o'clock. Mr. Reid says it would take considerable money to tempt him to dispose of the dog that seemingly so well understands the English language, and is withal so faithful and knowing.—Bridgeport Farmer.

A Close Competition.

"My papa's got some new horses and a nice new brougham."

"Well, my papa's going to buy a new yacht."

"And my mamma's got a lovely new piano."

"Well-w-well, my mamma's got a cook that has staid two weeks!"

A HAPPY SPOT ON EARTH.

No Money, no Individual Property and no Crime on Pitcairn Island.

The barque Mikado, Capt. Bunn, arrived yesterday from San Francisco with a cargo of dye wood, after a passage of 122 days. Capt. Bunn reports that on February 14th he hove to off Pitcairn Island and his vessel was visited by two boat loads of natives with whom he traded. This solitary little island in the Southern Pacific is the home of one of the happiest civilized communities in the world, and the rest of the world is always glad to get the latest news from it. The island lies out of the track of ordinary navigation in latitude 25 degrees south and longitude 130 degrees west, and its only regular communication with the outside world is once in eighteen months, when a British man-of-war touches there. It was settled by the ancestors of the present inhabitants ninety-nine years ago. Nine mutineers of the British ship Bounty founded the colony. They induced six men and twelve women from Tahiti to join them, and the descendants from the original 27 now number about 300. The only difficulty encountered was that finally the colony outgrew the producing capacity of the island, which is only two and one-quarter miles long and a mile wide. About thirty-two years ago the overcrowded condition of the island led Great Britain to offer the colonists the island of Norfolk for an off-shoot settlement. All the Pitcairnians moved there, but part of them returned, and the population of the island is now 115. The people elect annually a chief magistrate and a deputy. All property among them is owned in common, and money is not known on the island. The people live in native built cottages, raise all manner of fruits and vegetables in the balmy climate and catch fish in the sea. They have a church and school, and are fairly well educated and intelligent. Sickness and crime are practically unknown among them. Capt. Bunn says of his visit to the island:

"We hove to in Bounty Bay, the only landing place on the precipitous coast. Two large boats which they called the Queen Victoria and the Admiral Drew put off to us. Their chief, Russell McCoy, a splendidly-built stalwart man of middle age, welcomed us and offered the freest hospitality. He came on board clad in a suit of white, with a felt hat and wearing a red rose boutonniere. They brought us melons, yams, oranges, pineapples, vegetables and a beautiful bouquet. The only flowers in the bouquet that I had ever seen before were roses and a variety of geranium. I never met more courteous gentlemen than these natives of Pitcairn proved to be. I offered to pay for the supply of fruit and fish they provided, but they declined money, saying that it was of no use to them. I gave them some bacon, coffee, soap, and a suit of clothes. They gave me about twenty letters to be forwarded, most of them to Tahiti. Chief McCoy told me that everybody on the island was well and happy. I discovered that they used no liquor of any description and that they didn't smoke. We remained there only two or three hours, and none of us went ashore. When we left the two boats' crews gave us a round of ringing Yankee cheers.

Ayer's Hair Vigor

IS the "ideal" Hair-dressing. It restores the color to gray hair; promotes a fresh and vigorous growth; prevents the formation of dandruff; makes the hair soft and silken; and imparts a delicate but lasting perfume.

"Several months ago my hair commenced falling out, and in a few weeks my head was almost bald. I tried many remedies, but they did no good. I finally bought a bottle of Ayer's Hair Vigor, and, after using only a part of the contents, my head was covered with a heavy growth of hair. I recommend your preparation as the best in the world."—T. Munday, Sharon Grove, Ky.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for a number of years, and it has always given me satisfaction. It is an excellent dressing, prevents the hair from turning gray, insures its vigorous growth, and keeps the scalp white and clean."—Mary A. Jackson, Salem, Mass.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for promoting the growth of the hair, and think it unequaled. For restoring the hair to its original color, and for a dressing, it cannot be surpassed."—Mrs. Geo. La Fever, Eaton Rapids, Mich.

"Ayer's Hair Vigor is a most excellent preparation for the hair. I speak of it from my own experience. Its use promotes the growth of new hair and makes it glossy and soft. The Vigor is also a cure for dandruff."—J. W. Bowen, Editor "Enquirer," McArthur, Ohio.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for the past two years, and found it all it is represented to be. It restores the natural color to gray hair, causes the hair to grow freely, and keeps it soft and pliant."—Mrs. M. V. Day, Cohoes, N. Y.

"My father, at about the age of fifty, lost all the hair from the top of his head. After one month's trial of Ayer's Hair Vigor the hair began coming, and, in three months, he had a fine growth of hair of the natural color."—P. J. Cullen, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

CANADA'S MINERAL WEALTH.

Undeveloped Resources Which are Attracting the Attention of the World.

Those who are hopeful of an early stimulus being given to the development of the mineral resources of Canada point to what has been accomplished in the past two or three years along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway alone. Let us take three localities alone and we find the discovery at Sudbury of what promises to be the greatest copper region of the world; in the Port Arthur district of silver mines, the operations at which already place them in the front rank of silver properties; and at Banff, in the Rocky Mountains, unlimited quantities of anthracite coal have been found. The most valuable portion of

THE GREAT COPPER "FIND"

has been taken over and is being worked on a generous scale by United States capitalists, principally, we believe, from Ohio, although some Montreal and Toronto capital has gone into copper land in that quarter. The silver mines near Port Arthur are worked by United States capitalists almost exclusively. The anthracite property has passed from Canadian hands, at over $1,000,000, into the hands of English capitalists who are floating a $5,000,000 company. There can be no question of the extent and value of these several properties or of the probability of the existence in the early future of cities and a large population in those localities. And yet these are discoveries of the last two or three years only and they are but a few of many which might be named. The anthracite of the Canadian Rockies will in all probability be utilized by all of the British men-of-war in the Pacific ocean and by all steamships sailing to or from American ports on the Pacific, besides finding consumption along the entire American coast, and when

THE VAST COMMERCE

of the Pacific has attained its full proportions the demand for this Canadian anthracite will take on colossal proportions. The development of silver mining in the Port Arthur district is also still in its infancy. It is reasonable to anticipate that whereas hundreds of thousands of dollars of the precious metal are now taken out, at this initial stage of development, the future will see millions of dollars worth mined annually. As regards the value of the copper discoveries at Sudbury, Mr. Ritchie has stated publicly that the moneys disbursed in Canada at the copper and iron properties in which he and his friends are here interested, when smelting operations are in full blast, will equal the disbursements in Canada of the Canadian Pacific Railway itself, which spans the continent. And yet these great enterprizes are but of yesterday; they

REPRESENT BUT A FRACTION

of the mineral resources of Canada, to be found in every province of the Dominion. Nova Scotia and Ontario are full of iron; Nova Scotia, the North-West and British Columbia have bituminous coal in unlimited quantities. Quebec has copper, gold and the valuable phosphates, worth many millions of dollars. The gold mines of British Columbia have scarcely been touched. The country knows of mineral occurrences at hundreds of points, and yet we are only on the threshold of mineral discovery. Experts know, however, from the value of some of these deposits which have been tested, and in which capital has readily invested, what may be safely predicted of many others, and of the mineral possibilities of the Dominion as a whole. Take the Rocky Mountain region, for instance. It is known that the Stewart mine is not the only anthracite property there; that, in fact, the Government Park itself contains almost unlimited anthracite; that, in this region, also, petroleum abounds; that, in fact there are good reasons for believing that here Canada possesses a second Pennsylvania.

THE FUTURE WEALTH

of this region, of the unlimited coal measures of the North-West, of the iron country north of Lake Superior, and of those mineral regions which have been more familiar to us in the older provinces, is simply incalculable. No limit can be placed upon it. The great question that will presently force itself upon public attention is how to develop this vast natural wealth, how to secure the capital which, combined with skill and labor, is to produce from the bowels of the earth hundreds of millions of dollars of value, pouring through all our present industries a golden flood to fertilize every avenue of enterprise and labor. To this question it becomes the duty of our legislators and capitalists to address themselves, soberly, zealously, courageously.

Photographing a Flying Bullet.

A rifle bullet is a very small object, and the camera must be set very near its path in order to obtain a picture of sufficient size to be of use; but the nearer the instrument is placed to the moving object to be photographed the more rapid is the motion of the image over the plate, and no "instantaneous" or quick-acting shutter could possibly be made to operate with sufficient rapidity or at the proper instant to give a sharply defined picture. The desired end is accomplished, however, by the aid of electricity. The camera is provided with an extremely sensitive plate and placed in a dark room, through which the bullet is made to pass. The instant the bullet is in front of the camera it breaks an electric circuit, producing a spark which illuminates the bullet for an instant, and its image is impressed upon the sensitive plate. The duration of the electric spark is almost infinitesimal, and since the plate is affected only during the continuance of the spark, a well-defined photograph of an object moving at a greater velocity than that of sound is obtained. Such pictures show the condensation of the air in front of the bullet, the vacuum behind it, and the eddies and currents produced in the surrounding atmosphere by its motion; and they afford information which is of value in determining the best shape to be given to the projectile in order to reduce to a minimum the resistance which the air opposes to its flight, and so increase its range and effect.—[Scribner's Magazine.

{Charles Dickens writes of his father as an editor that it was impossible for him to be anything but thorough, or to engage in any work—or, for the matter of that, in any play either—to which he did not devote his whole heart and soul. To enlist promising recruits; to help forward rising merit; to further the development of latent ability, and, above all, to give every possible assistance to young writers who showed steadfast perseverance and any of his own capacity for taking pains in small things as well as in great; these objects were always foremost in his editorial mind."

DRINKING-WATER.

Some Conclusions as to the Value of Filtering of the Fluid.

Pure drinking-water, says Medical Classici, is one of the essentials of healthy existence. The reasons for this proposition multiply with every advance of our knowledge of health, of disease, and of morbific agents. Our recent knowledge of germs has given a new impetus to the study of drinking-water.

In many communities water is filtered because of its cloudy appearance, in others to get rid of some supposed unhealthful ingredients. The efficiency of ordinary filters has been frequently questioned, and as employed it remains an open question whether on the whole they do more good or harm.

Dr. Charles T. Curries gives us the results of some extended studies of water bacteriologically. As this bears upon the value of filters, we quote his results.

Boiling sterilized water within thirty minutes kills harmful bacteria. No chemical agents sterilize water when used in amounts that are safe.

The process of distilling water destroys all germs.

Ordinary filters, even if satisfactory as strainers, fail to remove all bacteria from drinking-water. It may, indeed, allow a more rapid multiplication of the micro-organisms in the filtering material itself. The finer the substance through which the water passes, and the lower the pressure, the more perfect is the action of the filter in holding back bacteria.

Porous rebaked porcelain, carefully selected, is the best of all substances for domestic filters. If thick and strong enough to allow the use of a large surface, and the substance remains perfect, this may yield a fair flow of clear water free from all bacteria. To insure the permanency of this action the filter should be occasionally sterilized throughout by steaming or other means.

Where filtering is really necessary it is, in general, best for the community that it be done carefully, on a large scale, through sand beds, upon which a fine layer of organic and inorganic matter is expressly produced by sedimentation, because of the valuable action of the latter in holding back the great majority of bacteria. A bad water filter is less desirable than pure water in its natural state. When, therefore, filtration is employed because of real danger of infection the filtered water should as a rule be boiled, as the entire absence of sediment and cloudiness does not insure that the bacteria of disease have not made their way through the filter.

The habitual drinking of boiled water would insure escape from sickness and death to thousands of the human race yearly.

Some Remarkable Toys.

Among the many curious articles exhibited by Austrian and Hungarian merchants at the Paris Exhibition this year, there is a case of toys which will bring special delight to the small folks. Older people, indeed, often stand with greatly amused visages, watching the surprising antics of those ingenious playthings, which appear not only to possess life—so cunningly are their internal parts contrived—but to be possessed, each, by some imp of mischief.

There is a gorgeous peacock, which not only walks with nodding crest and stately steps across a stage, but expands its broad, many-eyed tail in the most natural manner.

A small dog next dashes forth, barks furiously, then as if recognizing his master, wags his tail and frisks about, so true to life that one can scarcely believe he is an automaton.

A rabbit—a very lifelike little bunny—then comes out of his warren, pricks up his long, soft ears, stares timidly about for a few moments, and hops rapidly away.

Afterward a monkey drops down from his porch and performs a variety of amusing antics, which invariably set the children shoutingwith laughter.

But the most attractive toy of the exhibit appears to be a fat Chinaman, which is in reality a huge top. His large, round hat seems to he another top, a top atop of a top. The hat turns around upon the Chinaman's head while the Chinaman himself turns slowly around, nodding, and presently unfolding his large, gaily-colored fan, with which he fans himself in a most languid, but aristocratic, manner.

Ocean Flyers.

The attention of the public has from time to time been directed, during the past season, to the flying trips of the ocean greyhounds which run from New York to Liverpool. It is now the Parisian of the Allan Line of steamships which demands our praise. Her last voyage, completed on the 25th ult., was among the best on record. Letters and journals of the 17th reached their destination in Montreal in 8 days, a rate of speed which has been equalled only once in the case of mails via New York. Then to the fact of speed, another feature, unshared by her English rivals, must be added, viz., with the exception of about four days, the route is inland, a circumstance which insures greater safety, and provides the voyager with a constantly-changing and picturesque landscape, which cannot fail to afford the most unbounded pleasure. TRUTH commends this line to the patronage of the Canadian public on many grounds: the comfort and elegance of its principal vessels—the reliablity and courtesy of its officers and crews—the quickness of its voyages—and the exceptional beauty of the scenery which bounds so large a portion of the route.

The Way it Goes.

"It was ever so kind of you to bring me this box of candy," said the young lady to George. "I think you are exceedingly nice." "That's the way it goes," said George as he dropped another bonbon into her mouth. "Put a caramel into the slot and get some taffy."

An Honest Fisherman.

An Englishman visiting Lake Tahoe asked a native if there was good fishing in the lake. "Oh! yes, stranger." What kind of fish do you catch here?" Oh! all kinds, stranger." "What did the largest fish you ever caught here weigh?" "Wall, stranger, we don't take no weighing machines when we goes fishing, and I am an honest man and wouldn't like to say how much that last trout I caught would weigh. But I tell you, stranger, that when I pulled that fish out of the water the lake went down a foot."

THE SIEGE OF DELHI.

Incidents Recalled by an Eye Witness.

Major-General Webber D. Harris, late 104th Bengal Fusiliers, in the Illustrated Naval and Military Magazine, gives another instalment of his recollections of the siege of Delhi. The executions of captured mutineers, he says, were of almost daily occurrence. "I remember on one occasion, having directed an officer to do his duty, I went to the guard to see how things were going on. There were about 24 men to suffer, and as I came up a volley was fired at a row of them standing with their backs towards the firing party. All fell in a heap but one, and he sprang in the air and then fell backwards. On the next party being put up, it was found that, with the exception of this one man, all the others were untouched, but had fallen and LAY PERFECTLY STILL.

The officer had ordered his men to fire at their heads, which was too small a mark to hit with certainty with our old muskets even at ten paces, and the men were, I suppose, nervous, so we put them up again, ordering the men to aim at the centre of their backs. They fell. On another occasion we had directions to hang some men, owing, I believe, to a fear of our ammunition running short. There was no rope to be had for the purpose, so the men undid the ropes of their tents, and fastened them to branches of trees being afraid that if they gave the culprits a "drop," the ropes would not be strong enough. One man hoisted while another on the branch put the rope round the man's neck, and he was then allowed to swing off. The bodies were after a short time, litted out of the noose (to make way for the next, as there were not many ropes) and laid in a row, directions being given to bury them. While at dinner we heard a shot fired, but as this was a common occurrence no one remarked it. Presently another, then a third, when the orderly officer went off to see what it was. It proved to be the act of one of the sergeants, who was said to have been the first man up the breach at Delhi. He was deliberately firing into the heads of the lately hanged men. On being arrested, and asked why he was wasting his ammunition, he declared that the men were only half-hanged; that he had watched and seen some of them move, and knowing that if left they would be buried alive, he had

MERCIFULLY FINISHED THEMOFF.

A very wealthy native was caught and brought into camp. It was known that he had largely assisted the King with money and provisions, so his doom was sealed; but it was also known that he had concealed a number of rebels, and declined to tell where they were. Torture would not have done; but a rope was put round his neck with a fixed knot so as not to strangle him. The other end was tied to the saddle of one of Hodson's wild horsemen, who was directed to take him to the guard. This he did at a gallop. The man, who was very stout, caught the rope and followed with tremendous strides, but losing his feet, turned over, and was dragged some distance. He was half-hanged, and so frightened that he told the hiding-place of his friends, who were captured the next day."

The Telephone as a Cause of Ea Troubles.

As civilization advances new diseases are not only discovered, but are actually produced by the novel agencies which are brought to bear on man's body and mind. The increase of insanity throughout the world is unquestionably due to the "storm and stress" of our crowded modern life, and almost every addition which science makes to the convenience of the majority seems to bring with it some new form of suffering to the few. Railway travelling has its 'amaria aliquid' in the shape of slight, but possibly not unimportant, jolting of the nervous centres; the electric light has already created a special form of ophthalmia; and now we have the telephone indicted as a cause of ear troubles, which react on the spirits, and indirectly on the general health.

M. Gelle has observed, not in women only, but in strong-minded and able-bodied men, symptoms of what we may call "aural over-pressure," caused by the condition of almost constant strain of the auditory apparatus, in which persons who use the telephone much have to spend a considerable portion of each working day. In some cases also the ear seemed to be irritated by the constantly recurring sharp tinkle of the bell, or by the nearness of the sounds conveyed through the tube, into a state of over-sensitiveness which made it intolerant of sound, as the eye, when inflamed or irritable, becomes unable to bear the light. The patients suffered from nervous excitability, with buzzing noises in the ear, giddiness, and neuralgic pains.

In addition to these subjective symptoms, M. Gelle in some cases found objective lesions, such as a sub-inflammatory condition of the membrana tympani. A similar condition of things is often seen in persons who spend a large portion of their lives amid the jar and crash of machinery. All the trouble speedily vanishes if the ear is allowed a sufficient measure of physiological rest; this it can only obtain by the cause being withdrawn.

Some Newspaper Statistics.

A writer in the London "Times" sets forth some newspaper statistics collected in connection with the Paris Exhibition and collated by La Nature. According to these Germany publishes more periodicals than any other country in Europe, its number being 5,500, of which 800 are dailies. Next comes England and then France, the total given for Europe being over 20,000. China has only three journals, while Japan has 1,500. The United States is credited with 12,500, of which 1,000 are dailies. These figures, however, the New York "Sun" points out, are those of the census of 1880, and our contemporary estimates the present number of periodicals in the country at about 19,000, of which 1,700 are dailies. Other statistics given by the "Times" writer are calculated to create doubt as to the accuracy of any of them. For instance, Athens is said to have fifty-four dailies, an extraordinary number for a city of less than 100,000 inhabitants. It is stated that in Canada 700 journals are published, "most of which are French." This will be news to most Canadians.

A STRANGE DISAPPEARANCE.

What Became of Benjamin Bathurst?—A Mysterious Crime Not Yet Solved.

There is a good deal of curious information in the stories of "Historical Oddities and Strange Events" which Mr. Baring Gould has just brought out. Among other mysteries he tries to clear up is the disappearance of Benjamin Bathurst, in the early part of the century, the man who was supposed to have been secretly murdered by order of the first Napoleon. Bathurst was a relative of Earl Bathurst, and was sent on a secret mission to the Austrian Court at Vienna. After the Austrian troops crossed the frontier in April, 1810, Bathurst learned that Napoleon suspected him of having tried to bring about the declaration of war; and on being ordered to return to England shortly afterwards,

HE STARTED IN DISGUISE.

On the 25th November, 1809, about midday, he arrived at Perleberg, with post-horses, on the route from Berlin to Hamburg, halted at the post-house for refreshments, and ordered fresh horses to be harnessed to the carriage for the journey to Lenzen, which was the next station. Benjamin Barthust went to the Swan and ordered an early dinner; the horses were not to be put in till he had dined. He wore a pair of grey trousers, a grey frogged short coat, and over it a handsome sable greatcoat lined with violet velvet. On his head was a fur cap to match. In his scarf was a diamond pin of some value. As soon as he had finished his meal, Bathurst inquired who was in command of the soldiers quartered in the town, and where he lodged. he was told that a squadron of the Brandenburg cuirassiers was there under Captain Klitzing, who was residing in a house behind the Town Hall. Mr. Bathurst then crossed the market-place and called on the officer, who was at the time indisposed with a swollen neck. To Captain Klitzing he said that he was a traveller on his way to Hamburg, that he had strong and that his person was endangered, and he requested that he might be given a guard in the inn where he was staying. A lady who was present noticed that he seemed profoundly agitated, that he trembled as though ague-stricken, and was unable to raise a cup of tea that was offered him to his lips without spilling it. The Captain laughed at his fears, but consented to let him have a couple of soldiers, and gave the requisite orders for their despatch; then Mr. Bathurst rose, resumed his sable overcoat, and, to account for his nervous difficulty in getting into his furs again, explained that he was much shaken by something that had alarmed him. Not long after the arrival of Mr. Bathurst at the Swan, two Jewish merchants arrived from Lenzen with post-horses and left before nightfall. On Mr. Bathurst's return to the inn he countermanded the horses; he said he would not start till night. He considered that it to spin along the dangerous portion of the route by night, when Napoleon's spies would be less likely to be on the alert. He remained in the inn writing and burning papers. At seven o'clock he dismissed the soldiers on guard and ordered the horses to be ready by nine. He stood outside the inn watching his portmanteau, which had been taken within, being replaced on the carriage, stepped round to the heads of the horses—and was never seen again. The English Government offered £1 000 reward and his family another £1,000; Prince Frederick of Prussia, who took a lively interest in the matter, offered in addition 100 Friedrichs d'or for the discovery of the body or for information which might lead to the solution of the mystery: but no information to be depended upon ever transpired.

WELL GROUNDED SUSPICIONS

WOULD BE SAFER FOR HIM

A Cure for Diphtheria.

R. Munch, proprietor of a drug establishment in Leipsic, Saxony, publishes in the "Pharmacist," a medical paper, a remedy for diphtheria which has had surprising success. He urgently presses all physicians to try it for the benefit of all patients suffering from the disease, and also requests the press to publish it. He says:—"My little daughter, seven years of age, has had diphtheria twice within some weeks, with severe fever, about 105f. We gave with great success rectified oil of turpentine (oleum terebinth noe rectificatum.) Dose, one teaspoonful in the morning and the same at evening."

Adults should take one tablespoonful. Afterward drink a little lukewarm milk to allay the burning in the throat.

For children the second dose can be mixed with milk, which will render it easier to take.

The result is really marvellous. The inflammation of the abnormal diphtheritic spots in the throat grows lighter at the edges, and in this way they gradually shrink until in 24 hours they disappear entirely, leaving no sign.

To quiet the inflamed tonsils, the throat was gargled every two hours, and then every three hours, with the following gargle:—One ounce of chlorate of potash to forty ounces distilled water.

This remedy has been used with perfect satisfaction both by adults and children, not one case ending fatally. The Milwaukee "Volksblatt" quoted this remedy from the German paper, and afterward received a letter from a subscriber in Mitchell county, Iowa, saying that a child in the writer's family was attacked by diphtheria, treated by local physicians, and died; then four members of the same family were similarly attacked, treated by this remedy, and, I am happy to tell you, all recovered.

An Opportunity Missed

Polonius was a splendid bit of character work." "Yes, but he had his drawbacks. When he started off and said: "Neither a borrower nor a lender be,' he lost the best chance in the world to show off his wisdom." "How's that?" "Why he should have gone on and said: "if thou must do one or t'other, let it be borrowing. There's money in't.'"—[Harper's Bazar.

MURDERS BY POACHERS.

Gamekeepers in the Environs of Antwerp Attacked.

An Antwerp dispatch to the London "Standard" says: "Mr. Louis Lemme, who is a British subject, and until a few years ago was a banker at Antwerp, has offered a reward of £400 to any person or persons who will give information which will lead to the discovery of the murderer or murderers of the unfortunate English gamekeeper who was shot last week by poachers at Brasschaet. Up to the present, however, the offer of this munificent reward has brought with it no results, and the assassins are still at large. The well-known poachers who were arrested by order of the Procureur du Roi have been set at liberty, as sufficient evidence could not be brought against them. In consequence of this a most uncomfortable feeling of insecurity exists in the neighborhood where the murder took place, and it is feared that unless the criminals are shortly discovered they will escape punishment altogether.

"Another murder of a similar nature has since occurred at a place called Pulderbosch, which is also situated in the environs of Antwerp. A gamekeeper named Joseph Jacobs, in the employ of a M. Anthony, while going his rounds, was shot in the head and otherwise brutally maltreated by poachers. In this case it seems that a desperate struggle took place, as the victim was young and of a powerful build. Some arrests have been made, which are said to be of an important nature, and it is hoped that in this instance the police authorities will be more successful in bringing home the deed to those who committed it than they have been in the case of the unfortunate Englishman Shore."

WILL THERE BE A CORNER IN TEA?

Very Likely.

The position of the tea trade at the present is unique, or nearly so. China teas have for several years been deteriorating in quality, most of the really choice tea produced being immediately bought at the opening of the Hankow season for Russia, at prices which are prohibitive to English buyers. The Chinese, in allowing this deterioration of their crops, permitting their tea to be represented in our markets by thin and indifferent qualities, have till now loftily ignored the weighty competition which has arisen from India and Ceylon.

The visible stock of China tea, including that announced by telegraph to be afloat, is about 16,000,000 pounds short of the estimate. From India we have received about 2,000,000 pounds less than last year, instead of about 5,000,000 pounds more, as was estimated, and of Ceylon tea the deliveries were last month absolutely double the imports, while very small further shipments are coming forward.

Last year it was calculated that 7,000,000 pounds less tea of all kinds was imported into this country than was actually consumed, and if no alteration takes place—and it seems hardly likely there will be any—in the outputs from China, it is probable that this year the imports of tea will be some 25,000,000 pounds short of the quantity actually required for consumption. In spite of this shortness of supplies, common China Congou is almost as low in price as it has ever been known, and, had it not been for the terminal market values, would probably have fallen further.

This deficiency in the supply of common tea, at all events for some months to come, has lately attracted attention, and prices are steadily tending upward. The wholesale trade, the grocers and the packet firms, have long been accustomed to replenish their stocks whenever they needed, and to find plenty of any kind of tea just for the asking; but now that the shortcoming of common tea is apparent (the grades they mostly depend on to enable them to keep the low quotations they are accustomed to advertise), they must lay in a stock, even at the advance.

We are under the impression, from all that can be gathered, that some people who are always on the lookout for opportunities of this sort have already commenced operations in tea. These, if the signs of the times are to be depended upon, may shortly place this market in a similar condition to that of the cotton market in Liverpool, only the operation will be based on much sounder grounds, and will be justified by the existing conditions of supply.

A Queer Case.

In one of the law courts of Helsinborg, Sweden, a queer case of hypnotism has puzzled the judges. A young medical student brought suit against a practising physician in the town for having hypnotized him several times against his will, with the result that his nervous system was injured and his mind somewhat enfeebled. Several witnesses appeared for the plaintiff, and, to the astonishment of the court, they all appeared to be crazy, and gave the most contradictory astounding testimony. Hereupon a medical gentleman came upon the stand, and further astonished the court with the announcement that his confrere, the defendant, had hypnotized the witnesses and mad them say just whatever he liked. Finally the court adjourned the case, and appointed a commission to see if the entire crowd were not crazy.—[Philadelphia Ledger.

A ribbon of diamonds heart shaped, and surmounted by a ruby crown with pearl tips, is a lace pin that excites considerable admiration.

The old and homely proverb "no rose without a thorn," is about to receive signal confirmation in political circles in England. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, the distinguished politician and trusted lieutenant of Premier Salisbury, has lately intimated his intention to withdraw from political life. The reason he assigns is, that the abuse he receives is more than he can bear, or at least, is so great as to make him seriously question whether the "game is worth the candle." This step on the part of the Hon. gentleman will not fail to interest great numbers on both sides of the Atlantic. Besides, it ought to furnish food for reflection to those in humble spheres who are filled with the delusion that all they need to consummate their earthly happiness is to have people address them by some high sounding title, and to look up to them as persons of superior mould. This notion is a fatal snare. The balances of life are held by a more even hand than is supposed by such a view. There is no class to whom a monopoly of happiness is given, nor is there any lot which is absolutely unrelieved by any mitigating circumstances whatever.

SIAM.

A Remarkable Country as it Appears to Foreign Eyes—Magnificence and Squalor Mingled in the City of Beautiful Temples.

"A Canadian or European," says a gentleman who has spent some years in Siam, "finds Bangkok full of the strangest contrasts and oddest sights," He sees the river banks lined for miles and miles with floating houses, the homes of many thousands and the scene of busy trade. On one corner is the splendid palace of a nobleman, and on the next the hovels of the very poor. Here are groops of Buddhist priests in yellow garb shielding their faces with fans for fear the sight of a woman will induce unholy thoughts, and near them are gangs of the toughest of convicts clanking their chains as they toil in the streets. Here are lepers horribly repulsive, unrestrained, and clamorous for alms, and soon, perhaps the King passes with a brilliant retinue, sitting on his state chair of solid gold. Fine ladies have teeth as black as polished ebony. It is only the vast army of female outcasts whose teeth are white. When a member of the royal house dies cremation ceremonies cost a fortune, and while thousands are witnessing the imposing display vultures are tearing dead bodies to pieces in the heart of Bangkok, and the poor are burning their dead, a couple of armfuls of wood serving as the funeral pyre.

"One day I saw a priest in a crowded gambling house chanting prayers. I asked what he was doing, and was told he was engaged in praying for the success of the house. Gambling is of the Siamese, and it is a curious fact that among the hundreds of gambling houses in Bangkok many Buddhist priests are hired to pray that fortune may smile on the proprietors of these dens.

"The most conspicuous, and one of the most pleasing figures in Siam is the King himself. It turns out that the cable erred the other day in reporting that the King was visiting Paris. In fact he had never been further away from home than Calcutta. He is very popular among his people, and very progressive. He is not, however, inclined to mix with Europeans quite so freely as his old father did for a time. No European, unless a diplomat, can approach him except at the royal receptions. He paid James Gordon Bennett an unusual honor when that gentleman visited Bangkok. The King rigidly enforces his rule to grant no audiences on the Siamese Sunday. The only time he has been known to waive this rule was in favor of Mr. Bennett, who otherwise would have had to leave the city without seeing the King. When his Majesty is in state attire he glistens from head to foot with precious stones, worth over $1,000,000, and his comical hat, a solid mass of gems and gold, weighs twenty-seven pounds. If he did not sit rigidly erect the hat would topple off.

The King is never more happy than when, in the privacy of the palace, he is romping with his children. It is a merry group, and that roguish little boy who is clinging about his father's neck is the Crown Prince who, a while ago, with most was proclaimed the successor to the throne. Before the present King ascended the throne every Siamese had to crawl in the presence of the sovereign. The young King abolished all that. He wants his subjects to remember they are men, and none of them now crouches before him, though they often have to before the small fry nobles. While we were in Siam the Asiatic cholera raged, and superstitious peasants everywhere hung charms upon their persons. The King issued a proclamation commanding the people to throw away their charms, for they were worthless, and to thoroughly cleanse their premises, for this might save them. Then he sent boats far and wide on the rivers and canals loaded with European remedies for the dread disease.

On the King's birthday four years ago when all the nobles and diplomats were assembled at the King's annual ball, his Majesty astonished and delighted everybody by leading his pretty Queen into the room. It was the first time a King of Siam had appeared in public with his consort or in any way recognized her as his equal. It was the talk of all the nobilty for weeks. The Queen has an English tutor and, like her husband, she speaks English fairly well. Some of the ladies in our party at one of the royal receptions were very kindly treated by the Queen.

"One day I asked the King's Scotch physician how many wives and children the King had. He replied that if he knew he certainly would not tell me, but that he did not know. I believe he told the truth. The common report in Bangkok was that his Majesty had 300 wives and eighty-seven children. He was a father when he was 12 years old, and he is only 36 now. A Siamese has

ONE LEGITIMATE WIFE,

The others are subject to her will as well as his, are properly classed as concubines. The King's second wives, as they are called, attain, through their relation to him, a certain rank, or nobility.

Each is provided with separate apartments and her own servants. None of them can go outside the palace walls without the King's permission. They are guarded day and night by female police who wear a distinctive uniform, and no European is permitted to enter the harem except the King's physician and the wife of an English trader who carries in bric-a-brac and trinkets to sell to the royal wives. On every Siamese Sunday the King and his 300 wives take a romp in the beautiful gardens within the palace walls. It is easy for all Bangkok to know when the King and his goodly family are disporting themselves in the open air; for then the great wall is entirely surrounded by thousands of troops. The frailest of these pretty women have no chance to elope, and the most daring Lothario would be cut down before he reached the wall.

"The favorite daughter of the King, a rather pretty girl, is chiefly noteworthy for the richness of her attire. But her grandeur pales before the magnificence of the little Crown Prince in his state costume, weighted down as he is by over $1,000,000 worth of diamonds and other gems and gold. Treasure of all sorts in Siam seems to pour naturally through the palace gates into the royal abode. In the King's palace are several million dollars' worth of gold vessels kept in glass cases. It is amusing to observe the anxious care with which all the treasures are guarded by the underlings whenever a throng of Europeans is admitted. The King's state chair, in which he is borne through the streets on the shoulders of eight men, is a gorgeous affair of solid gold.

"An interesting characteristic of the King is the fact that, though the people can see little of him, he likes to introduce them, by means of photography, to many phases of his daily life.

IN THE PALACE GROUNDS

as beautiful little structure, the private retreat or trysting place of the King, No one is ever within sight of it except the King, the women of his court, and the attendants. No nobleman in the kingdom ever saw the place, and yet all Bangkok knows how it looks, for the King has had the pretty building, with its picturesque surroundings, its shrubbery and statuary, photographed. When the little Crown Prince was proclaimed heir to the throne a part of the proceedings was the sacred immersion. During the ceremonial, while many thousands waited outside, the only witnesses of the performances were the King, a priest and a photographer. His loyal subjects can buy if they choose a picture of the King's betel-nut set, including his gold cuspidor, and though they cannot see him in his private apartments, they can buy pictures of the rooms and of the King in the midst of his family.

"Next to the chief inmate of the palace the white elephants are, to the Siamese, at least, the most interesting objects in Bangkok. There are four of them now in the palace grounds. They are a sort of a dingy yellow in color, with some white spots, and are called white only because they are so much lighter than other elephants. It is a mistake to suppose that they are not worshipped by the Siamese. You know the Siamese, like other Buddhists, believe in the transmigration of souls, and they haven't the slightest doubt that the spirits of some of their deceased Kings make their abode in the bodies of these white elephants.

"These albinos are exceedingly rare, and as a goodly number of them in the royal stables is a sure presage of a long and glorious reign, you may readily see why they are valued above price. The present King is lucky enough to have four, each of whom has a fine stable to himself and a retinue of attendants. The King himself never comes into their presence without making a humble obeisance. They are held in the greatest honor and respect, but are not worshipped.

"We were frequently astonished at the intelligence exhibited by the elephants of Siam. Once when Mr. John S. Fretts of our party was building a telegraph line he had occasion to descend a steep mountain strewn with boulders. The elephant he rode carefully picked his way, anxiously testing the foundations of each stone before he trusted his weight upon it. He was four hours going down the mountain. Several times thereafter Fretts descended the same mountain, and each time the elephant made the the descent in about half an hour. After his first experience he seemed to know every inch of the road. We have often seen an elephant clasp with his trunk the unlighted end of a burning fagot from a brush heap and pass it over his head to the man on his back to light his cheroot.

"You would have to travel far to witness a more remarkable sight than that which is often seen in the very heart of Bangkok. A place of horror is where the bodies of human beings are thrown on the ground to be torn to pieces and devoured by vultures. This place is at the foot of a mound on which a great temple stands. The ground is covered with the bones of victims, and here is a leg from which the flesh has not yet been entirely stripped. Here is a man's body that was thrown on the ground only a minute before the picture was taken, and at a little distance the carrion feeders, standing on the ground and perched on the fence, are greedily eyeing it. That young man who is crouching over the body is while the photographer is taking the picture. Around him are a number of little boys who have gathered to see the disgusting spectacle. This is what they saw a few minutes later.

"All the vultures were allowed to light upon the body and tear it is they liked. For a while the great birds completely hid the corpse from view. Each tore off a large piece of flesh, and grabbing it with bill and claws flattered away a little distance to quietly eat without being jostled by its mates. They bolted the food like starving dogs, and it was not long before the bones had been stripped of everything eatable. Persons who die of contagious disease and many paupers and criminals are thus fed to the vultures.

"One would think that such practices in a great city would breed a pestilence. Here is a great capital in which nearly 800,000 people live who have absolutely no sanitary regulations. No quarantine guards the port against contagious diseases from abroad.

"The refuse of the kitchen is dumped in front of palaces and splendid temples. A wall surrounds these grounds, covered as they are with fine buildings, the scene of magnificence and splendor; and yet just outside this wall, on one side, is one of the pest holes of Bangkok, a squalid, odoriferous region where the most wretched of the people herd. It is another of the many striking contrasts one meets at every turn in the city of beautiful temples.

"These temples, by the way, are very striking objects seen from afar, and some of them are beautiful, but generally, as is the case with most things Oriental, distance lends enchantment to the view. Upon near inspection it is found that there is a great deal of tinsel about them, and their gaudy, cheap ornamentation does not favorably impress the European. They are not neatly kept, and the visitor picks his way to the temple entrances. Here come the people in swarms to pray and to listen to the monotonous chants of crowds of lazy priests. The lower part of the edifice contains the images of Buddha, and all around the pagoda are buildings devoted to the service of the priesthood. The most famous temple in all Siam is the Wat Cheng, opposite the royal palace. It lifts its sacred spire 200 feet from the ground, and every inch of its irregular surface is covered with glazed and colored ornamentation, while thousands of little bells hang from every possible projection, and every zephyr sets them tinkling.

THROUGH RUBBISH HEAPS

"Another famous temple contains the mammoth sleeping Buddha. The reclining statue is eighty-seven feet long. When I was in Bangkok this temple was kept locked, but a tip to the attending priests proved, in my case, an open sesame. They complained probably with good reason, that foreign relic hunters chipped off the gold veneering of the idol. The most interesting temple in Bangkok is, I think, the temple of the Emerald God, within the royal enclosure and devoted to the use of the King's family. It is most ornate, is filled with the rarest specimens of Oriental and European art, and crowning all is the little emerald Buddha, only a foot high, a solid mass of diamonds, sapphires, and other gems. Several far loftier temples in Bangkok cost $100,000 apiece, but the private temple of the King surpassing them all in magnificence, cost $1,000,000.

"In imposing grandeur, however, the ruins of some of the great temples that are scattered here and there over Siam surpass anything built there in modern times. For instance, Wat Ankor, many miles northeast of Bangkok. The grand pile, towering skyward was built of enormous granite blocks, which were most ornately carved. No one knows when this grand edifice was reared nor by what consummate engineering skill those enormous stone masses were raised to such a height. But there it stands, towering above the jungle, the eloquent witness of the advanced civilization of some long-forgotten age.

"We may here say a few words of the Buddhist priests, who in yellow garb are seen everywhere in Bangkok. They are not permitted to work, and many young fellows enter the priesthood simply because they are thus sure of an easy pampered existence. Each one carries a bowl with which he saunters out in the morning to collect his daily bread, or rather rice. When a woman ladles a few spoonfuls of rice into his bowl he hides his face behind a fan for fear the lady's charms may interrupt his contemplation of holy things. It is an act of great religious merit to give presents to the priest. And their bowls are always running over with blessings. Everybody gives them something and the better class of people are very liberal with their presents of rice, money, tobacco, yellow cloth, and other things. The priest is the educated man of the land. Everybody gets out of his way when he walks abroad, a fact that led to a small collision between a priest and one of our party who thought he was entitled to his side of the walk, and brushed up unceremoniously against a holy man who persisted in walking in the middle of the path. After that encounter the priest always gave that particular European plenty of passage way.

"One of the striking contrasts in Siam is that between the towering and many colored temples, suggestive of nothing in the western world, and the fine palaces inhabited by royalty and the nobility, which are examples of nothing else than European architecture. The King's palace is, of course, the finest residence in the capital and which is furnished with the richest specimens of European handiwork. Another palace, the residence of the King's progressive brother, is a good example of the present rage for European models in architecture. Foreign ideas are bound to make considerable progress in Siam. When I left Bangkok the King had granted a concession for a street car railroad to start from the palace and run about four miles along the river. They were to be drawn by native ponies not much larger than Shetlands, who have a decided will of their own, and it remains to be seen whether they will take kindly to such arduous service. Three years ago an Italian nobleman, Chevalier Lusetti, secured from the King a concession to open a gold mine south of Bangkok. A European company was organized, and the mine, I have reason to believe, is now being profitably worked. Many other concessions will doubtless be granted for the investment of foreign capital, but not unless the King sees clearly that they will benefit himself or his people. He is shrewd in such matters.

Insects Throwing Water.

A weeping tree is situated about one mile east of Howe, Texas, in a cow lot owned by Reuben Harrold. This phenomenon commenced three years ago, and it has been actually raining under the tree incessantly ever since. In cloudy weather there is always a heavy mist falling from the tree, but in hot, dry sunshiny weather large drops come down which would soon wet one's clothing through and through. The tree has always been a profuse bearer of leaves until this spring, when it did not bud out at all, and now it has every appearance of being dead, although the rain or whatever one may please to call it, continues to fall from the branches as usual.—[The Metropolis.

Every day last week what appeared to be a wonderful phenomenon was witnessed by hundreds of persons in the garden attached to the residence of Rev. Dr. Edmunds, pastor of the Presbyterian church at Sumter. Beginning at about 5 o'clock p. m. of each day, rain apparently fell continuously for about three-quarters of an hour in one spot about fifty feet in diameter, while elsewhere not a drop of rain could be observed. The weather was clear and fair and there were no trees overhead. Water unquestionably fell in the form of rain. Several persons stretched forth their hand and caught the drops as they fell and were convinced. Diligent investigations failed to discover anything that could suggest a rational explanation of the mystery. Dr. Edwards, however, has at last found what he believes to be the source of the mysterious water supply. He has discovered that on a fruit tree, not far from where the water falls, is a number of little insects that throw out jets of water from their tails. They evidently get the water by sucking the sap of the tree. When the water is thus emitted it forms into drops and falls in the manner of rain from vapor. The insect is described as a brilliantly variegated butterfly. This solution of the Sumter mystery satisfactorily explains the phenomena of the raining trees reported in various sections in this State in the fall of 1886, soon after the earthquake and by many superstitious people connected with that disturbance.—[Columbia Dispatch.

Always Ahead.

We take pleasure in announcing to the public in this manner that we have established still another enterprise in connection with the Kicker. We haven't got 14 web presses at work, nor can we afford to send an expedition to Africa—not yet. We have had for some time under our roof a newspaper office, a grocery, a feed store, and a glove factory. We have now added a butcher shop. While all these things will be run in connection with the Kicker, and by the same editorial staff, subscribers won't be obliged to take anything but the paper. We leave others to do the bragging, but we think we can justly point with pride to this mammoth aggregation of business, all edited by one centre head, all steadily improving in genuine merit.—Arizona Kicker.

He Was Misunderstood.

A Manhattanville lady was feeding hungry tramp, the other day, when she discovered that he was pocketing her silverware. Seizing a revolver, she exclaimed:

"Drop those spoons, you scoundrel, and leave the house; leave it instantly!"

"But, madam—"

"Leave the house, I say; leave the house," screamed the infuriated woman.

"I go, madam," said the tramp, "never to return, but before I do, I would like to say that I did not intend to take your house."

An Elephant's Politics.

Many stories are current of the remarkable intelligence of the elephant, but I have come across nothing so conclusive of the noble animal's sagacity as the story of the elephant which broke loose the other day at Leigh, in Lancashire. On gaining its liberty, this intelligent beast made straight for the Conservative Club, and did his best to demolish the front of the premises, after which he proceeded to the parish church and battered down a gate which barred the public access to the sacred edifice. Leigh is a strongly Radical town, and there can be little doubt, I take it, that this is a Radical elephant, who, inspired by the genius loci, determined to hold a political demonstration on his own account.

A Billet Doux.

While Brown is calling on Mrs. Bright, a letter is handed in to her which she hastily opens. "Ah! I see," said Brown, "a love letter." "Oh! it is only from my butcher," was the answer. "I have received many a tender line from him."

A Monster Chimney.

The monster chimney of the new Fall River (Mass.) Iron Works mill, "the largest in America and the fifth largest in the world," will be completed to-day. It is 354 feet above the ground. The base is square for a distance of about thirteen feet from the ground, then tapers up gradually for about eight feet, and from that up the chimney is cylindrical in form. The diameter at the base is thirty feet; at the narrowest part it is fifteen feet. The flue has a uniform diameter of eleven feet. The walls at the bottom are thirty-two inches thick and in the thinnest part twelve inches. The chimney is built of brick above the foundation, the number used being 1,700,000.—[Philadelphia Ledger.

Very Big Beer Barrels.

The vats at the establishment of Messrs. Barclay & Perkins at Bankside are nearly 200 in number, the smallest containing 600 barrels of beer and the largest 3,300 barrels, measuring 36 feet in diameter at the top, 40 feet at the bottom, 125 feet in circumference and 40 feet in height. Altogether they must hold more than 150,000 barrels.

He Wasn't a One-Horse Preacher.

Little Willie (to the minister at the dinner table)—"Was that your carriage you came here in?"

Rev. Mr. Frontpew—"Why, yes."

Little Willie—"There, papa; he drove two horses and you said he was a one-horse preacher."

"I am studying on a device for a telephone," said Mr. Edison to a reporter, "so that you can see the man you are talking to. I am almost sure I can make it a scientific success, but I doubt if it will ever be a commercial one."

It is understood the Vatican has withdrawn its threat of publishing diplomatic documents relating to the Italian Government schemes to infringe the rights of the Papal see under pressure of counter threats that the Government would reveal the intrigues of the Vatican.

The "Irish Times," Dublin, says Mr. Parnell has had a conference with the Speaker of the House of Commons relative to the best mode of executing his intention next session of trying to establish the complicity of the Government in the attacks made by the London Times on the Parnellite party.

Some people fail to realize the extreme sensitiveness upon religious subjects which exists in the ordinary individual. In France an instance of this has arisen. A dramatic writer of Paris wanted to produce a play having for its central figure Mahomet, the founder of Islamism. It was accepted by the Theatre Francais, and was to be performed this season. The Turkish ambassador has, however, protested against it, as being offensive to all Moslems, and the French authorities are in a quandary. At first they reminded the Turkish ambassador that ministers of religion were often brought upon the stage, but he replied that Christians might treat their religion as disrespectfully as they liked, it was otherwise with the pious followers of Mahomet.

Ira Tripp, a millionaire coal operator, of Scranton, Pennsylvania, has for the past twenty years or more, done all his smoking by proxy. As a young man he was an inveterate smoker, and contracted an illness from this habit which only denying himself tobacco could cure. He could not, however, bring himself to do without the luxury of smelling smoke, so he hired a colored man to whom he paid a good salary and whom he provided with the best cigars, that he might smoke them and blow the smoke in his employer's beard. For ten years the darky followed the singular occupation of smoker for another man. Then he died, and now a white man has succeeded to the position. Mr. Tripp seems to be in the best of health, but his smoker is thin and sallow.

It will be matter for general regret that the health of the Prince of Wales is understood to be so precarious that grave doubts are entertained whether he will ever see this year out. It is said that the doctors have already officially announced that the Prince is hopelessly ill and that the Queen has also been notified. All this is very sad, for the Prince is undoubtedly a genial "good fellow," immensely popular and likely to do well when the time come for his wearing the purple. And now all these anticipations are likely to be disappointed, and Albert Edward is not likely ever to fill the throne. So goes the world, all that grandeur and all those brilliant prospects cannot keep in a little life.

Well Put.

Fasting and spare eating with plenty of outdoor exercise are good for both body and soul. In fact more people die of eating too much than of eating too little. But for the eating and drinking the doctors would have very little to do. An humble philosopher in the shape of a game keeper hits the whole situation very directly in the following homely yet pithy terms:—

"It's indoor, sir, as kills half the people; being indoors three parts of the day, and next to that taking too much drink and vittals. Eating's as bad as drinking; and there ain't nothing like fresh air and the smell of the woods. You should come out here in the spring, when the oak timber is throwed, and just sit down on a stick fresh peeled—I means a trunk, you know—and sniff up the scent of that there oak bark. It goes right down your throat, and preserves your lungs as the tan do leather. And I've heard say as folk who work in the tan yards never have no illness. I never eat but two meals a day—breakfast and supper, what you would call dinner—and maybe in the middle of the day a lunch of dry bread and an apple. I take a deal for breakfast, and I be rather lear (hungry) at supper; but you may lay your oath that's why I'm what I am in the way of health. People stuff themselves, and by consequence it breaks out, you see."

Yes, fresh air, plenty of exercise, frugal plain food and drink, the odour of the earth and the trees will give the average man at sixty the strength and vitality of early manhood. The old quaint doctor was about right when he thus plainly put it to a lady patient: "There are just four ways of it, madame, you must either take less food, or more exercise, or medicine, or be sick!" Of course!

A Falsehood Proven.

Mrs. Selfmade—What is the trouble, Melinda? You seem distressed about something.

Melinda—I have been insulted. I hear that Mrs. Grandergilt is circulating the story that papa carried a tin dinner pail till he was forty years old.

Mrs. Selfmade—And what did you say?

Melinda—I said it was a wanton and malignant falsehood.

Mrs. Selfmade—And you did quite right. Your father never carried a dinner pail; he just wrapped a sandwich in a piece of newspaper and slipped it in his overcoat pocket.

Willing to Carry Top Weight.

Sporting Boarder (to landlady)—Madam, the blanket on my bed is too thin.

Landlady—Why, Mr. Horsey, you must be losing your vitality.

Boarder—On the contrary, madam, I'm more than willing to carry weight for age.

Where Fife and Bride are.

Duff House, where the Duke and Duchess of Fife are now staying, has been closed for many years, except during its owner's annual Autumn visit, which never exceeded a month. The house is an immence quadrangular edifice, which was built about a century ago. The style is Roman Corinthian, the principal rooms are very large, and there is a fine collection of pictures. The grounds, which are very extensive, are undulating and well wooded and are bordered by the Deveron, on the banks of which, one mile further up the river, is Mountcoffer, the dower house of the Fife family. Duff House stands on the outskirts of the towns of Banff and Macduff, which are separated by the Deveron estuary.

Couldn't Agree.

Oldboy—How fine a thought it is that the smallest creature that lives was created for some purpose and could not be dispensed with.

Newwed—I can't agree with you there. I think that there are some animals that have been the cause of a great deal of envy, extravagance, and domestic strife.

Oldboy—What animal for instance.

Newwed (with his mind on a $500 dolman)—The seal.

Knew Woman's Nature.

Photgorapher (to sitter): "I saw you at church last Sunday."—Sitter: "Oh, did you?"—Photographer: "Yes and also your friend Miss Brown—if you could raise your chin a trifle, thanks—and what an atrocious looking hat she had on! (After a pause.) There, it is over, and I think we have caught a very pleasant expression.

Attic Salt from Boston.

Mr. Smart (as the church-goers pass)—"I'm surprised that Miss Sweet permits Bodworth to accompany her. He's about the freshest young fellow I know."

Mrs. Smart—"Perhaps that's the reason why she lets him carry her Psalter."—Boston Times.

The British-Guinea boundary question still agitates the minds of the Venezuelans, and they are indulging in very tall talk, insulting British residents, and threatening to go to war with England.

Charlotte Cushman, who saw more of society, and that of the best kind, through a long series of years than almost anybody of her time, used to limit herself to three dresses—a comfortable gray woolen dress for every day, a good black dress, and a light silk for "occasions." This left her a margin of money for doing many noble things.

Writing from Venice a correspondent says: "A few months will see all Venice lit up by electricity, and "Venice by moonlight" will be a thing of the past. Every canal, rio, and calle and campo, will have its quota of cold, clear light. Up till now electric lighting has been confined to one or two hotels, to the public gardens, and the Lido, but this vast extension was arranged for last night, when the contract for the city was formally signed and sealed. The work has been undertaken by a newly-formed Company, which calls itself "The Society for the Illumination by Electric Light of Venice."

F. J. Armstrong, late M. C. R. agent at Dutton, has secured a position on the Chicago and Northwestern Railway, and will leave town this week. His family will accompany him as far as Mt. Clemens, Mich., where they will remain until Mr. Armstrong is settled in his new place. We are sorry to see Mr. Armstrong leave us, as during his stay here he has proven himself an excellent citizen.

Among the things that perhaps are not generally known is the fact that the law compels each house-owner to furnish suitable ladders to each house so that, at any moment, the roof and chimnies may be accessible in the event of a fire or that snow or dangerous icicles may be removed. It is as well to draw attention to this fact, so that precautions may be taken before the winter regularly sets in.

A new scheme to get at the pockets of the farmers has been devised. A traveling agent sells a farmer a recipe for adding 50 per cent. to the weight of his wheat when he puts it on the market, the farmer signing a contract to pay the pedlar half of the money he made out of the extra weight given to his grain. The "contract" a little later turned up in the shape of a note for $300, which the farmer has to pay out of the proceeds of his wheat without any added weight from the dearly bought process.

In the High Court of Justice at Toronto, Common Pleas Division, on Monday, before Justice Rose, judgment was given in the interpleader issue of Cameron vs. Cusack, tried at St. Thomas. The plaintiff claimed certain goods seized by the Sheriff under a writ of execution upon a judgment recovered against the plaintiff's brother in an action of seduction. The plaintiff claimed under a sale of the goods to him by his brother, who has left the Province. The learned Judge finds as a fact that the brother of the plaintiff, knowing that a claim was to be made upon him arising out of the seduction of Annie Cusack, determined to dispose of his estate, to reserve at least $150 to himself, and apply the balance in payment of claims of creditors other than Wm. Cusack (the plaintiff in the action of seduction) and then to leave the country, and all this to avoid the payment of the claim. The learned Judge now holds that as defendant became a judgment creditor, and as a cause of action existed at the time of the transfer, and as the transfer took place with the intention of defeating the claim, the mischief existed which the statute was meant to prevent, and the plaintiff could not succeed against the execution of the defendant. The formal giving of judgment is suspended until evidence is given of the judgment obtained by the defendant in the action, the exemplification put in having been objected to. The evidence to be taken in Toronto. Glenn (St. Thomas) for plaintiff. C. McDougall, Q. C., for defendant.—Times.

The Helping Hand Society met at the residence of F. Millard on Friday evening last, and presented the following programme before a good audience, J. A. Shannon, L. D. S., occuping the chair:—Devotional exercises; instrumental, Jesse Middleton; recitation, "The Mischief," Miss Bertha Hill; solo, Miss Mary Sutton; violin solo, A. M. Ferguson; impromptu addresses, two minutes each, by L. J. Wilson on "Flirting," Rev. E. Middleton on "Poetry," Thos. Porter on "Steam," F. Millard on "The Labor Question," R. Sutherland on "Is Marriage a Failure;" solo, Miss Minnie Brown; impromptu addresses by Mrs. Middleton on "What would I do if I had a million dollars, C. E. Knight on "A Scene," A. W. Brown on "Blushing," violin solo, A. M. Ferguson, encored; Enterprise-Advance, read by Rev. Mr. Middleton; solo, Rev. Mr. Middleton. The society is in an excellent condition at present and promises to afford plenty of amusement and instruction to its members during the winter. The next meeting will be of a devotional character and will be duly announced.

HOGS WANTED.

Farmers, hurry on your store hogs and fatten them for the market from January to June. We have determined to abandon the packing of dressed hogs in order to make the packing of hogs a business throughout the year. We shall endeavor to buy, at whatever the price is, enough live hogs during these months to run our packing house. As this business is being neglected during the late winter and spring months, we think those who have hogs suitable for our requirements will reap a big benefit. We want hogs not less than 140 lbs., and not over 220 lbs., and will give a handsome price for the same. Recollect we shall not buy a dressed hog this winter, whereas we packed 15,000 dressed hogs after Jan. 1, last winter.

THE LATE PROF. PHELPS.

The above is a portrait of the late Prof. Edward E. Phelps, M.D., LL.D., of Dartmouth College, He was a strong, able man, who stood high in the literary and scientific worlds. It is not generally known, but it is, nevertheless, the truth, that Prof. Phelps was the discoverer of what is known to the Medical Profession and Chemists universally as Paine's Celery Compound, unquestionably one of the most valuable discoveries of this century. This remarkable compound is not a nervine, an essence, a sarsaparilla or any devised article, but a discovery, and it marks a distinct step in medical practice and the treatment of nervous complications. It has been freely admitted by the best medical talent in the land, and also by the leading chemists and scientists, that for nerve troubles, nervous exhaustion, insomnia, debility, senility and even the dreaded and terrible Paresis, nothing has ever been discovered which reaches the disorder and restores health equal to this discovery of Prof. Phelps

Paine's Celery Compound is now being prepared in quantities, and can be procured at any reputable druggist. An attractive bunch of celery is to be found on every wrapper. It has become specially popular among professional men, mind workers, ladies burdened with exciting social duties and frequenters of the leading clubs.

"Like Magic,"

THE effect produced by Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Colds, Coughs, Croup, and Sore Throat are, in most cases, immediately relieved by the use of this wonderful remedy. It strengthens the vocal organs, allays irritation, and prevents the inroads of Consumption; in every stage of that dread disease, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral relieves coughing and induces refreshing rest.

"I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children have been subject."—Capt. U. Carley, Brooklyn, N. Y.

"From an experience of over thirty years in the sale of proprietary medicines, I feel justified in recommending Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. One of the best recommendations of the Pectoral is the enduring quality of its popularity, it being more salable now than it was twenty-five years ago, when its great success was considered marvelous."—R. S. Drake, M. D., Beliot, Kans.

"My little sister, four years of age, was so ill from bronchitis that we had almost given up hope of her recovery. Our family physician, a skilful man and of large experience, pronounced it useless to give her any more medicine; saying that he had done all it was possible to do, and we must prepare for the worst. As a last resort, we determined to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and I can truly say, with the most happy results. After taking a few doses she seemed to breathe easier, and, within a week, was out of danger. We continued giving the Pectoral until satisfied she was entirely well. This has given me unbounded faith in the preparation, and I recommend it confidently to my customers."—C. O. Lepper, Druggist, Fort Wayne, Ind.

ELGIN COUNTY COUNCIL

The November session of the Elgin County Council convened at the court house on Tuesday of last week, all the members present, Warden in the chair.

Communications were read as follows: From Sheriff Brown, asking for settlement of account of $73.35 for rent of office; from Duncan McGregor, tendering resignation as trustee of Dutton high school; from Chas. Chamberlian, with reference to the Legislature passing a permissive act regulating the licensing of standard stallions; from the Simcoe County Council with reference to an independent body to stand between the public and railway companies re discrimination; from the county council of Welland respecting taxation of real and personal property; from Dr. Luton, surgeon House of Industry, enclosing his annual report. Referred to the various committees.

A letter was read from the county clerk of Huron, asking co-operation in petitioning the Legislature to compel all sleighs to be so constructed that the runners will be a uniform width of three feet nine inches apart from each other at the bottom. Referred.

The report of K. W. McKay, inspector of the Elgin House of Industry for the year ending 31st October, showed that there were 67 inmates in the House at last report, and 34 have been admitted during the year; there have been 7 deaths, 3 children sent out on trial, 9 discharged, 15 absconded, 2 sent to the Blind Institute, leaving 64 now in the House. Nine were admitted from Aldborough, Dunwich sent 1, Southwold 4, Yarmouth 2, Malahide 7, Bayham 10, and Aylmer 1. The nativity of the inmates committed during the year were: County of Elgin 2, Canada 14, Scotland 4, England 7, Ireland 4, United States 1, Germany 2. The various causes of pauperism were: Sickness, 15; destitution, 13; intemperance, 8; cripple, 14; old age, 8; blind, 8; idiotic, insane, etc., 21; all other causes, 16. The average number of inmates during the year was 73, and the number of weeks' board (with the keeper's family and hired help added), 4090. The total expenses during the year were $4,863.49, and the receipts from inmates, etc., $238.48, leaving the amount actually expended for the inmates, $4,625.01. The average expenses for each person per week was $1.10, and per year $57.20, or $69.16 with interest on total amount expended by the county on the House added. Of the $4,863.49 expended $111.16 was for hired labor, $140.18 for implements, $80 for stock, $65.85 for drugs, $479.50 for bread, $487,63 for groceries, $327,53 for dry goods, $104.16 for boots and shoes, $58.32 for hardware, $408 for wood, and the balance for salaries, incidentals, etc. During the year eight children attended school 1,027 days, or 51 months, which at 75 cents per month makes $38.25 due school section 14, Southwold. During the year $676.50 worth of produce was raised on the farm, and 400 articles of bedding and clothing made by matrons and inmates.

County Engineer Bell reported, recommending that a new stone and iron bridge be erected next year by the counties of Elgin, Kent and Middlesex, to replace the wooden structure across the Thames at Bothwell. The new bridge would cost $23,000.

WEDNESDAY SESSION.

Council met at 10 a. m., when Mr. Dancey, of Malahide, made enquires as to the amount received by the County Crown Attorney for attendance at magistrates courts under a resolution passed in 1880. The amounts received were:—

1886	$ 18
1887	35
1888	175
1889	360

Mr. Donahue addressed the Council and explained that he acted on a resolution passed at the November session of the council of 1880, which read as follows: That in future the County Crown Attorney for attendance at magistrate's courts of criminal suits be only allowed when ordered by the Judge as being in the interests of the Crown, and that the sum of $5 be allowed in each case.

Mr. Jackson presented the report of the Public Improvements Committee recommending that they be empowered to let the contract for rebuilding the Bothwell bridge, in conjunction with the counties of Kent and Middlesex; that the opening of the townline between Yarmouth and Southwold be laid over to the January session, the townships being urged to make some amicable settlement in the meantime.

A deputation from the 25th Battalion, consisting of Lieut.-Col. Lindsay, Surgeon Kains and Captains Jones and Stacey, addressed the council in support of $100 grant to the Battalion to assist in the purchase of hemlets. It was explained that $100 had been granted conditional upon a like sum being voted by the county. The grant was passed.

W. Backhouse presented the Finance report, recommending that Sheriff Brown be not paid, and that no tax sales be held this year.

Messrs. Stalker and Black addressed the council as a deputation from the Dutton high school, and upon motion it was decided to secure the opinion of the county solicitor as to the county's responsibility as to the legality of the formation of Dunwich and Aldborough into a high school district.

THURSDAY SESSION.

Council met at 10 a. m.

The Equalization Committee reported, recommending that the real property be equalized the same as last year, with the exception of Southwold, which is hereby reduced $2 an acre, and the township of Aldborough is increased $2 per acre.

The Educational Committee recommended that the accounts for high school entrance examinations be paid as follows: Vienna, $28; Aylmer, $71.76; Dutton, $59.23; and that the resignation of D. McGregor as trustee of Dutton high school be accepted. Adopted.

The attention of the council this afternoon was taken up in the discussion of Dutton high school district, and the liability of Aldborough and Dunwich to the support of such district.

On a vote of 18 to 7, it was decided to authorize the county council solicitor to submit to the courts the difficulty between Dutton high school board and the township of Aldborough, also to ascertain what municipalities constitute said high school district.

The clerk was instructed to notify the councils of Kent and Middlesex that the county of Elgin is willing to contribute one-fourth of the future expense connected with the Bothwell bridge, and that if the said counties do not agree to said proportion that S. S. Clutton be appointed arbitrator to act for Elgin.

Warden Goodwin notified the council that Sheriff Brown had caused a writ to be served upon him for $73 due for office rent.

Motions to pay the bills and to instruct the Warden to obtain legal advice as to the council's liability were both lost.

The proceedings of the council were brought to a close on Friday.

It was decided to defend the action entered by Sheriff Brown for office rent.

D. McGregor withdrew his resignation as trustee of Dutton high school.

Moved by J. L. Lambert, seconded by G. M. Smith, that the county solicitor be authorized to submit a case to the court for opinion to determine the following questions, providing that all parties supposed to be interested consent that such case be presented by the said solicitor for all parties:—(1) What municipalities constitute the Dutton high school district under by-laws Nos. 230, 259, 407, 408. (2) In any case is the township of Aldborough liable to the said board for the amount demanded by it for the present year. (3) Is the Dutton high school legally constituted. Carried.

The clerk was authorized to procure the usual supply of assessment and collector's books.

The sum of $50 was granted for extra services.

The thanks of the council were voted to the various officials and the council adjourned sine die.

A dwelling house on Flora street, St. Thomas, was destroyed by fire on Friday night.

Barney McConnel, a former resident of St. Thomas, was shot and killed in a bar-room row at St. John, Mich., a day or two ago.

The Michigan Central Railroad Company is having placed in position along the line at crossings snow-plough markers for the guidance of engineers on snow-ploughs.

R. Secord had his hand caught in the deadwoods while coupling cars in the St. Thomas yard on Saturday, and was so badly injured as to necessitate the amputation of a large portion of his hand.

The mill of D. McPherson, situated on the Tilbury and Mersea town line, was burned to the ground Thursday. The lumber piles near the mill were saved. Supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

The funeral of the late Mrs. Wm. Davis took place at Fingal Friday and was largely attended. Service were conducted by Rev. Messrs. Hamilton and Sutherland, the pallbearers being Messrs. Geo. Sutherland, Thos. Bake, J. McPherson, A. M. Bake, Geo. Wilton and M. Campbell.

A deputation of Tilsonburg business men and G. T. R. officials is reported to have quietly met the municipal council of Vienna with a view of ascertaining the extent that municipality would aid, financially, a railroad from Port Burwell to Tilsonburg. Very little encouragement was given.

Wm. Minhinnick, a prisoner confined in Elgin jail awaiting trial for robbing his employer, George Davidson, of Mapleton, escaped from the institution Saturday morning. Chief Turnkey Langan took Minhinnick in the yard to bring in the clothes. While Mr. Langan was fastening the corridor gate Minhinnick dashed through the yard gate and thence down the sidehill on the Spohn flats along which he ran to the Port Stanley road.

Marching Home for Christmas

A STORY OF THE EGYPTIAN WAR

CHAPTER I.

WE MET.

"Not till six o'clock, miss. The train starts from this platform, and you won't take above a quarter of an hour getting to Leylands."

"Thank you," said a girl's voice, weary but strangely sweet, as she turned away from the railway-porter and took refuge in a first-class waiting-room at Clapham Junction. She doubted if she ought to be there with her second-class ticket, but she was too tired to move, so she pocketed her scruples and sat down by the bright fire, resting her little cold feet on the fender, her elbow on her knee, and her chin on her hand. The glare of the fire fell full upon her pale refined face; the long dark lashes rested upon cheeks as soft as velvet; the pretty curved lips were pressed closely together as if painful thoughts were a habit not easily cast aside. Her dress was as simple as possible, but it set so well on her graceful figure that it produced as good an effect as if it had been made of a finer stuff. On her arm she carried a small black bag, to the handle of which a card was attached with a piece of silk cord, on which a name was neatly inscribed, "Miss Muriel Kerschoyle, 4, Burlington-villas, Leylands."

It seemed an odd thing for a young lady to go about ticketed like a dog or a portmanteau, but perhaps it had been done through the over carefulness of someone left at home, who would fain have been the companion of the lonely girl.

Anyhow, there it was, and to all who came near it explained that the quiet young thing in the small black bonnet trimmed with yellow chrysanthemums, was Muriel Kerschoyle. She had the waiting-room all to herself, at first, for it was a miserable afternoon towards the beginning of December and most people who were not driven out of doors by business or necessity, preferred to sit at home by their own firesides.

Presently an old gentleman walked in, followed by a footman, who set down an enormous bundle of rugs on the table and withdrew. His master walked briskly towards the fire place, rubbing his hands with a shiver. Miss Kerschoyle moved to one side without raising her eyes, but she was perfectly conscious of the searching glance cast at her from a under a pair of very bushy eyebrows.

"Don't disturb yourself, I beg. There is plenty of room for me," he remarked politely.

She only answered with a slight bow, and a more decided retrograde movement of her feet. Although he was perfectly silent, and apparently engrossed in the endeavour to warm himself, his close proximity annoyed her, and she was unable to pursue the thread of her thoughts under his glance.

"What was your mother thinking of to let you come out alone?" he asked abruptly, after a long pause.

Her eyes flashed resentfully.

"If you knew what you were talking about, sir, you would know that my mother"—and she said those two words with such a depth of loving pride—"went about for me a great deal longer than she ought. If she had not been always so anxious to spare me, she would not be so bad as she is now."

"Ah, then she is an invalid; that is an excuse to a certain extent, but it is no reason why she should blazon your name abroad to every chance comer."

A hot blush rose to her cheeks.

"That is my affair, not yours."

"Not mine indeed! what next?" in a gruff voice

"Only this," she said with a quiet smile, for his impertinence amused her, "I have been told not to talk to strangers"

"As if a child like you could get any harm from a man twice, if not thrice your age," with rough contempt. "You needn't be afraid of me, I've had children and grandchildren too, and I know how to talk to them by this time."

A pause, during which she leant back in her chair, folded her hands in her lap, and tried to look as if he were not there.

The old gentleman fidgeted and coughed. He had never been snubbed before, and he was not going to stand it from a chit like this. Also, he was in the habit of settling everybody else's business besides his own, and he felt it necessary once more to explain how shocked he was at any mother allowing a daughter to go about unprotected, so he returned to the charge.

"Do you know if I were your mother, and unable to accompany you, I would rather dress you in a blanket, than let you go shopping without me."

"But I have not been shopping," she said quietly, humouring him because he was so very old.

"Worse still if it was simple pleasure."

"Pleasure!" her lip curled; "looking for lodgings in all the mud and snow!"

"Lodgings!" he echoed in surprise, "Christmas time is a bad season to choose for changing quarters."

"But if there be no choice."

"I should stay where I was, till they turned me out."

"As they would very soon, if you couldn't pay the rent." She stopped abruptly, her pale cheeks growing pink.

"Are rents high in Leylands?"

"I do not see how the subject can interest you," very cold and grave.

"Perhaps I am a lodging keeper, myself," he said jocularly.

The footman came back at the moment, took up the rugs, touched his hat, murmured: "The train, sir," and walked out.

"Lodging-keepers carry their own rugs," with a quiet glance at the servant's back.

"Ah, so they do, quite right," with an approving nod. "I wish you were going by the same train as myself."

Whether the wish were reciprocated or not he could not tell, for already ashamed of having talked so much, she only answered with a slight bow.

He did not look like a man given to hesitation, and yet he took two steps towards the door, and three steps back to the fire.

"I should take it as a favour if you would let me send my man home with you," he said almost humbly.

Surprise brought a wave of color to her cheeks.

"Not on any account, thank you."

"Upon my word I wish you would," with great earnestness. "I would rather be without him myself."

"And so would I," and her dark eyes beamed with sudden laughter.

"I dare say you would," irritably. "But I might be better for you, nevertheless."

"I am the best judge as to that," she said gravely.

"A chit like you——" he began contemptuously; but the porter looked in to say that the train was up, and raising his hat, with a hurried "good evening," the old gentleman bustled away, muttering: "Burlington-villas, Burlington-villas—I mustn't forget."

Miss Kerschoyle, amused at his eccentric ways, leant over the fire, with a smile, wondering what her mother would have said, if she had appeared on the doorstep of her humble domicile with a dignified footman behind her. As she stretched out her hands, in their long, rather shabby black gloves, to warm the tips of her fingers, she heard a footstep behind her and looking over her shoulder, saw that a young man, completely enveloped in an ulster, had just come in.

With a slow step, he came up to the fireplace, and leant his arm upon the mantelpiece, looking down into the blaze with abstracted eyes. His face was peculiarly handsome, and there was a certain foreign grace in the attitude of his tall lissom figure, which could not be entirely hidden by the folds of his coat; but his expression was unutterably sad, and an impatient sigh was the first sound that passed his lips

Muriel Kerschoyle's own life had known so little joy that she felt an instinctive sympathy for any one in sorrow, and involuntarily she raised her large eyes to the stranger's face, with the sincerest pity in there hazel depths.

Turning suddenly, he met her gaze and smiled. His glance travelled from her beautiful upturned face, to the bag lying on her lap, and a look of intelligence crossed his features.

"What were you looking at?" he said slowly; "did you trace a likeness?"

"I—I—don't know what you mean," she answered confusedly, whilst a deep flush stole over the whiteness of her cheeks, and she moved back hastily into the shadow. But as she moved she upset her small umbrella, which had been leaning against her chair. It fell on the top of the red coals, and although the stranger rescued it as soon as he could, it came out in a deplorable condition.

With dismay she contemplated the six large holes burnt in the trumpery silk. It cost but nine and six to start with, but well she knew that months might come and months might go, before she would have another nine and six wherewith to buy a second.

The corners of her mouth drooped, as she held it out before her.

"What a miserable object," he said with a musical laugh. "It would be invaluable to Moore and Burgess."

"It was invaluable to me," she answered gravely, seeing nothing to laugh at, at all.

"You will have to get a new one, but fortunately it does not matter for this evening, for by the luckiest chance I have brought mine with me," and he looked at the table where he had deposited his own with a newspaper.

"It is lucky for you, but I shall have to walk home through the snow."

"Yes, with mine over your head."

"No thank you," blushing furiously, "I shan't mind at all."

"You will like it, no doubt," with a quizzical smile, "but there is a duty you owe to others as well as to yourself, and that is never to catch cold unless you can't help it. I think what a nuisance it is to have a cough brought into a house."

"A nuisance for the one who has it."

"And almost worse for the others who hear it. I could not help reading that very frank address written on your bag," he added with a smile, "I see that we are going to the same destination. Here's the train; what shall we do with these fragments—burn them?"

"Don't you think it might be covered?"

"Certainly, if it is a relic."

"Nothing of the kind," very quickly. "Pray throw it into the fire."

"But if there is a romance in the scorched wires?"

She turned away impatiently, and taking up her bag, with a slight inclination of her head, walked out on to the platform.

The stranger caught up his umbrella and paper, and hurrying in front of her, threw open the door of a first class carriage, and waited for her to get in.

But she shook her head gently.

"Of course," he said hastily, "It is much pleasanter in the second." And finding an empty carriage of the desired class next door, he handed her in, and took his place in the furthest corner.

Anxious not to seem to thrust himself upon her, he preserved a rigid silence till they stopped at Leylands station. The snow was falling fast, when side by side they reached the outer door, and looked out into the darkness.

He opened his umbrella, and held it out to her.

"I am afraid it is rather heavy for a lady."

"That will not matter, if you hold it."

"But I am going to leave it with you."

"Do you think I would take it from you, and leave you without?"

"Certainly. My coat would keep out a dozen storms like this. Please take it," attempting to put it into her hand, "it would only bother me."

"Would it bother you to hold it over me?" The gas-light fell on her face, as she looked up at him with a smile. "You said you were coming my way; and it would be so awkward with this bag."

"I should like it particularly," he said quickly; "but I thought you were anxious to get rid of me."

To this she vouchsafed no answer, so under the shade of the umbrella they walked down the hill through the snow, amicable but reserved.

"Good bye, and thank you very much."

They were standing in front of No. 4, Burlington-villas, and in the fulness of her gratitude, she put out a timid little hand. Shifting the umbrella on to the left side, he grasped it warmly.

"When next we meet, may it be under pleasanter auspices," he said slowly.

Then he turned round, rung the bell, and lifting his hat in a sweeping bow, he walked off and disappeared round the corner.

News has been received of the destruction by fire of the Negwenenang Indian missionhouse, in the Algoma District. Mr. Renison, the missionary, and his family lost everything.

Fashion.

There has been less change in fashion this autumn than during past seasons. The Empire and directoire styles, the gauzes and brocades, still furnish the motif of fashion. More attention is paid to preserving the natural lines of the figure, and the woman who drapes her form with classic effect stands first in the race for style. Trimming at present centres in the corsage for either house or street gown, and the tendency to conceal the darts by drapery is more than ever a feature of bodices. In some morning dresses the shoulder-seam is concealed by shirring the sleeves over this seam so that they appear to flow from the neck-band. A great many full velvet sleeves are being made up for particularly dressy gowns, even where no velvet is introduced in the skirts, and only a velvet vest in the corsage.

Extravagance holds high revel in ladies' underwear just now. Mrs. Langtry pays Felix $300 for each suit of underwear. Her petticoats are said to be ten yards wide, accordion pleated, and we all know what an amount of material can be used up in accordion pleats. No one wears white petticoats now, with thin dresses: they are voted countrified. In fact those who have adopted the dress reform, drop the petticoat altogether. Their undergarment consists of a suit of tights of silk or wool, stockings and a silk corset. In place of the petticoat women have lace and silk pleatings sewn inside the foundation skirts of their gowns, and the result is the same in appearance, besides the great comfort of being able, by one grip of your garments, to life everything over muddy crossing, instead of having skirts with a mass of mud on them rubbing against the top of shoes, and stockings as well. Sometimes a single petticoat, accordion pleated, is worn, that though pressed in a thousand pleats, outlines the curves of the figure gracefully and chastely.

High-necked night gowns are out of date, and the shawl-collar is a new feature in that garment. This collar falls to the shoulder-blades at the back with a full frill of lace all round, continuing in a soft jabot down the front. The sleeves are wide, with pretty bows of ribbon on the waist-band. I would not advise any woman with a scraggy neck to indulge in a garment of this kind, no matter what fashion says; but for those who glory in soft, round white throats; nothing can be more exquisitely becoming.

Japanese gowns are the correct things for the "slumber robe." These are made of heavy crepe, and are covered with most delicate needlework. They fall in soft, straight folds to the feet, and girded under the arms with a broad sash the same color as the gown, and embroidered with colors to match.

Ball dresses are much the same as last season. A Paris model has tulle skirts and a velvet bodice. Tulle skirts are very full and just touch the floor; the waist is round with a belt and bunch of ribbons in front. Tinted tulle is also much worn. A combination of pink tulle skirt with vieux rose velvet bodice looked extremely well, with soft bows of ribbon falling on the skirt Tan-coloured gloves have been relegated to the shades. The favourite tints are golden rod, china pink, and pale heliotrope. White gloves are not at all worn. In coiffures the Catogan loop or braid is very much adopted by young women. The front hair is combed up, and a trio of marabout feathers or a pretty aigrette holds it in place. If the hair is worn high, it must be waved a good deal and ornamented with fanciful pins or jewelled daggers. For young girls a pretty coiffure is the hair simply twisted in a coil that reaches a trifle over the dress collar, with a rose or some leaves or spray of maiden's hair fern caught low at one side. Blondes can wear heavier bangs than brunettes. The latter should wear a small wavy fringe pointed slightly.

The novelty of the season is the accordeon pleated cloak. It is of the peasant pattern, and falls in unbroken pleats from throat to feet. A beautiful cloak is of Spanish net—black or white—for the colouring of the gown beneath can be seen with good effect. These cloaks will be used during the winter season for throwing over ball dresses, which often shed hairs over satin and lace surfaces.

Leather is widely used in trimming dresses, and dainty little bonnets have kid crowns. Bodices of dresses should have a little of the throat showing: it gives an air distingue to the costume; the effect is piquante and chic. Boots and shoes must match gowns for the winter.

Life Worth Living

For 24 years I have travelled this Continent over and over. Best of all articles, meat or drink, to restore health, instil wholesome vigor, raise the spirits, and make life worth living, St. Leon Mineral water is Excelsior. Myself and family all use it. Would part with any other favorite rather than St. Leon. Joseph Simpson, Passenger Agent, 96 King St. West, Toronto. "Impossible to overrate its value," say physicians.

Visitors to the vaults of the Pantheon in Paris remember the echo which the guide used to produce by shouting and pounding a drum. This has been forbidden by the Minister of the Interior as "a desecration of the abode of the illustrious dead."

IDEAS IN IRELAND.

Fanciful Notions Which Still Linger Respecting Luck, Death Etc.

It is very unlucky to meet in the early morning a barking dog or a barefooted women.

Any three idle strokes of a stick in the ashes or a spade or other farm tool in the soil making a figure resembling a coffin is certain to portend death in one's family.

The linnet pours forth the most melancholy song of all Irish birds, and I have seen honest-hearted peasants affected by it to tears.

When the nest of the thrush or mavis is built unusually high in the thorn-bush this betokens a great calamity to a neighborhood.

A Day in London.

On the 24th of May, 1857, we, the senior class of Sunday School lads at Bethel Chapel, Sherrness, composed of dockyard apprentices with our teacher, took steamboat at 6 a.m., steaming up the Medway, passing men-of-war ships and ships laid up as useless, one, the "North Star," erstwhile the depot of the Arctic expeditions. Taking train at Strood we arrived at London Bridge at 7 30; crossing the bridge we came to Fish Hill and ascended the monument. We then sat down to breakfast, listening as our teacher informed us of the plague of London and the fire which terminated at this spot. From this elevation we could trace the windings of the Thames beyond the bridges via. Putney, Richmond, Hampton Court on the north, and to the south beyond Millwall and Blackwall. Descending we walked along King William street and came to the Mansion House, the residence of the Lord Mayor, the Bank of England and the Royal Exchange, with its statues of Elizabeth, Charles, Victoria and Wellington. What is the meaning of the grasshopper on the vane? A lady and child found a lone babe in the field, left there to die, the babe was cared for and became Sir Thomas Graham, who built the Royal Exchange, hence the grasshopper vane and conspicuously on a block of stone is cut the words, "The Earth is the Lord's and the Fullness Thereof." Passing the Bow Church of the Cockney we arrive at St. Paul's Cathedral, we enter and stand under the centre of the dome and immediately over the bodies of Nelson and Wellington who divide the post of honor between them. We walk around silently, admiring the statues of mighty men, Cornwallis, Howard and other warriors and philanthropists, but we see the chorister boys assembling for morning service to which we have no time to remain, therefore hastening through the forest of books in Paternoster Row and Ave Maria Lane to the meat market of Newgate and the old Baily House, we are shown the door through which murderers pass up to the scaffold to end their days. Happily this is done away with now, as is also the meat market, which is removed to the memorable Smithfield. Down Ludgate Hill and the Strand, past Exeter Hall, we arrive at Charing Cross. Here we enter the National Gallery where we are soon enchanted with the pictures of the Great Masters, one, especially, fixed our attention, viz., "Christ healing the sick," all the figures are life size and the countenances very expressive, in particular that of the Divine Physician. Coming out we stood on the steps where our teacher pointed out across Trafalgar Square towards Whitehall, where Charles I. lost his head, to Northumberland House and the Nelson Monument, to which has since been added the four Lions couchant at the base, also the monuments of Jenner and Havelock, we walk across the Square and enter St. James' Park. Here we are refreshed with cakes and milk. Then through the Horse Gardens, past the Admiralty, Scotland Yard and the Treasury, a short cut through Downing St, where our Cabinet Ministers assemble, up to Westminster, here we see the Houses of Parliament, the Victoria Tower, on the top of which flies a flag 60 x 40 on a staff three feet in diameter at the base, St. Marguerite's Church, Westminster Abbey and Hall, that Mausoleum of Kings and Poets. At the bridge we took a boat and steamed Southward, leaving Lambeth we pass under Hungerford, Waterford, Blackfriars, Southwark to London bridge. Then we visit the Fish Market at Billingsgate, along Thames St., arriving at the Tower in time to see a Royal Salute fired, here we could spend a long time seeing England's Regalia, the dungeons where the two Princes were smothered by order of their Uncle Richard, the spot where fell the heads of Dudley and Lady Jane Grey, but we hasten for a rush into and through the Thames Tunnel and back again to take train on the Blackwell Railway for the West India Docks and the East India Road. We were taken to our teacher's mother's house, here we had a good wash and sat down to tea, a goodly dozen of us, the sister of our teacher presiding at the table. We shall not forget Annie for a long time. We then entered the East India Import and passed through the Export Dock, coming out on the Brunswick Piers. Here we again embarked in a steam ferry for Greenwich where we visited the college for pensioned seamen, the school for young seamen with its ship built on staves, the Painted Hall in which is preserved the coat worn by Nelson at the Battle of Trafalgar, in the Park we saw the trained deer, at the Observatory we were instructed as to the Centre of Longitude. From thence we made for Blackheath where we engaged the donkey rides. Again taking train we arrived at Woolwich Common in time to see the soldiers in some part of exercise. Catching the last train we arrived at the Strand in time for the last boat steaming down the Medway we arrive home at Sheerness, having spent a day never to be forgotten in mighty London.

The idea of a national organisation of the colored people of the United States is taking shape. The members of the Afro American League have been summoned to meet at Nashville, Tenn, on January 18th of next year. The great and growing numbers of the Negroes would make the proposed union a very formidable element in politics. The social element makes the American race question a much more difficult one to deal with than is ours.

A SAILOR'S BRIDE LOST AT SEA.

The Captain of the Jennie Rosaline and His Wife Swept Overboard.

Five castaway sailormen, rescued from the Jennie Rosaline by some brave fellows of the schooner Flora Rogers, and landed at Charleston the other Sunday, brought the saddest tale yet told of the fearful havoc wrought by the last Atlantic gale. Their Captain, William E. Bartow, scarce 25 years old, married a few months ago Lottie Wicks, one of the prettiest girls in Port Jefferson, L.I., a daughter of Capt. Clark Wicks, who commands the schooner Mary C. Decker. The Jennie Rosaline was a large three-masted schooner, with a comfortable cabin, and the young wife, anxious to be near her husband, told him, as many another brave little woman has done, reared by the sea shore, that she was a good sailor, and could make the cabin her home. So the summer trips of the Jennie Rosaline proved a happy honeymoon for the young couple. It was arranged that after this trip to Charleston the young wife should stay ashore during the winter. But during the gale she and her husband were swept overboard from the water-logged schooner's deck and drowned.

The gale had lasted three days, till the schooner, with main and mizzen masts gone, her hull full of water, and drifting in the trough of a tremendous sea was a complete wreck. The crew of the schooner Flora Rogers rescued Mate Frank Maxson and the sailors James A. Runney, A. A. Pinckney, M. Heffron and George Smith. The steward, a colored man was crushed to death by the main boom. Mrs Bartow's brother generally went mate of the Jennie Rosaline, but he stayed ashore this trip.

When Fond Hearts Meet

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

A vision cross'd my path one day,
'Twas like a dream of pleasure,
And left a halo 'long life's way,
For memory to treasure!
Cross'd love can live a life of hope,
Nor all life's ills can kill it,
Though Love be blind yet he can grope
If fate doth only will it!

Time smoothes the furrows of our grief,
And Patience grows with sorrow,
The future brings a sure relief,
Let Care wait till—to-morrow!
Smile!—though thy heart be full of pain,
There's nothing gain'd by grieving,
A vision yet will come again,
All former ills relieving.

The rose that's left upon a tree
May be a thing of beauty;
But, oh! the Rose that pleaseth me
Counts sacrifice a duty!
When Love, and Truth, and Honour binds,
Fond hearts have their fulfilling,
No life is perfect till it finds
Its wealth of love distilling!

We Winna "Bide A Wee."

Oh! Lassie, dinna greet sae sair,
Ye maunna break my heart.
Thae puir auld folk shall want nae mair,
While I hae hame an' hairth.
Sae, Lassie, ainly say the wuird,
An' leave it a' to me.
Thae puir auld folk shall want nae mair,
We winna "bide a wee!"

My cot is newly thatched, my lass,
Thae kine are weel an' strang.
Thae corn shall never fail us, lass,
Gin life is spared me lang.
Sae, lassie, dinna greet sae sair,
But gie your hand to me,
Thae puir auld folk shall want nae mair,
We winna "bide a wee!"

They'll talk o' God wi'in our wa's,
An' bring a blessin' there,
An' 'till they're called to Heaven awa
Thae shanna know a care.
Sae, lassie, dree your bonnie een
An' gie yoursel' to me.
Thae dear auld folk shall want nae mair,
We winna "bide a wee!"

A scarfpin representing a fox poking his head through the curved pipe of a bugle is decidedly pleasing as well as unique.

On Monday last the New York Presbytery decided, by a vote of 67 to 15, in favour of revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith with the understanding that the word "revision" should be used broadly to comprehend any confessional changes. This action will have a strong influence, it is said, upon other presbyteries, and will thus do much to determine the important question, whether revision should be undertaken, which the General Assembly will consider at its next meeting. A strong party in the Church favours a new creed altogether, but so radical a proposition is scarcely likely to find general favour, and is, in fact, damaging to the revision scheme.

An old farmer in the Granite State one Sunday morning started to wind up his great silver watch, and found that the key was filled with dirt. Being unable to dig the latter out with a pin the farmer drilled a hole in the key, and with a single breath blew all the dust out. Then he sat down to think, and within a month had patented that hole. To-day in Lebanon, N. H., there is a large factory running by electric power wherein are manufactured daily thousands and thousands of watch keys of every possible size, shape and design. Each one of one of these keys contains the hole which had been patented by the farmer. The latter has already made a fortune.

Contemporaneously with the news that Dr. Carl Peters, the German traveller, has been slain in the interior of Africa, comes the news that the New York "Herald" who originally dispatched H. M. Stanley to recover the late Dr. Livingstone, has sent out a relief party to succor Stanley and Emin Bay, who appear to be in considerable peril, although a letter from Captain Wissman, another German explorer, would imply that up to a month or two ago they were all safe. Whatever the true situation in the Dark Continent may be, it is certain that just now it is shrouded in mystery and that the alleged official reports are not nearly so explicit and satisfactory as could be desired. One report has it that the intrepid pair, Emin and Stanley, may be expected to emerge once more into civilization about the middle of January next, but the foundation for such a belief is both shadowy and contradictory, although giving grounds to hope for the best.

THE DANGERS OF THE SEA.

How They Were Met by a Plucky Woman.

In the month of July, 1857, I ran away from a British ship which entered the port of Madras. I was a boy of 14, a runaway to sea, and Captain and mates had done their very best to take the romance out of me. They had succeeded so well that I slipped ashore, determined to die of starvation before I would return to a life on the deep. No effort was put forth to capture me, and two weeks later, when I sat in the shade of a wall one day, hungry and penniless and ready to give up, an English woman halted before me and began to question me. She was a small, slim woman, about 40 years of age, quick of speech and movement, and I got the idea at once that she was a sea Captain's wife. I was not far out, as she proved to be a sea Captain's widow, and was in command of a brig trading with the east coast of Ceylon. She happened to be in want of another hand, and after being told what I could do, she made a proposition that I gladly accepted.

I found the brig to be called "The Orient." She was small, but almost new, and a rapid sailer. The crew consisted of an English mate, two Norwegians, a French boy who and myself. Mrs. Sweet, the Captain, stood her watch, and this gave the mate himself, a man, and a boy in his watch, while she had a man and a boy only, though the cook had to turn out in her watch if required. The latter was a full blooded negro, big and powerful, and sailor enough to steer or go aloft. Mrs. Sweet, as all agreed, was a thorough sailor and a perfect lady, being able to navigate the brig anywhere, and thoroughly posted in every detail of ship work.

I saw on the brig's deck, almost as soon as I set foot aboard, a nine-pounder mounted on a carriage, and later on I ascertained that she carried a supply of small arms; but I gave the matter little thought and asked no questions. We got away next day after I joined, and we had a fine run down the coast to Cape Karikal, from which point we laid our course to the southeast. We had crossed the Gulf of Manaar, which separates the island of Ceylon from the southern end of Hindoostan when the wind fell to a calm one evening at 8 o'clock, and all night long we rolled about without making the least progress. Next morning there was a heavy mist on the water until after sunrise, and it gradually burned away without bringing the breeze we hoped for. When the horizon was clear we saw a bark-rigged craft of three times our size lying about three miles to the north of us. She had come down on the last of the wind, probably bound through the straits, and the currents had set her to the eastward during the night. Those were suspicious days, but the bark looked to be an honest Englishman, and we gave her no attention until about mid-forenoon. Then the French boy, who was aloft, reported that she had lowered two boats. The glass was sent up to him, and he soon made out that the boats were being and dark skinned fellows at that. This looked as if the bark had fallen into piratical hands, and no honest trader could have any honest purpose in arming his boats.

They took their time about it, and finally headed in our direction. Had there been any wind, they would doubtless have tried to lay us aboard. As soon as it was seen that the boats were headed for us Mrs. Sweet called us all aft and announced that the stranger was a pirate who meant our capture and destruction. She was a little paler than usual, but spoke in a low and even voice, and did not seem to be a bit frightened. She said it was a case where we must fight for our lives. They would cut our throats if we surrendered, and could do no more if we fought to the last. She seemed to accept it as a matter of course that we would fight, and she was the first to lend a hand to clear away the gun. The two boys of us brought up the muskets and loaded them, distributed the pikes along the rail, and then passed up shot and shell and cartridges for the big gun. Everything had been made ready for just such emergency. There were thirty solid nine-pound shot and twenty-two loaded shell in the magazine, as well as about thirty cartridges containing the proper quantity of powder. As I afterward learned, all had been purchased at the Government arsenal in Madras.

We were as ready as we could be before the boats had pulled a mile from the bark. The mate loaded the gun with a shell, and placed two others and several stands of grape near at hand. Our brig lay broadside to the north, headed to the east. The boats must therefore, pull bow on to us until close at hand, even if the plan was to separate and board from different points. This gave us a big advantage, as we could all lay along port rail. The gun was wheeled over, the decks cleared of every obstruction. And

THEN WE WERE READY

Mrs. Sweet had a double-barrelled English fowling piece loaded with buckshot. She was nearest the stern. The rest of us had Government muskets. I was pretty nervous, knowing what was at stake, and she noticed this, and kindly chided me, saying that I must take good aim, keep cool, and that we should surely beat them off. She called the French boy, told him the same, but there was no need of speaking to the others. They were as cool as if it was an every-day matter, and I heard the mate say to the cook that he was afraid the fellows would back out.

The boats came on to within half a mile of us and then stopped. Some sort of signal had been run up on the bark—probably a notification that we were ready for a stout resistance. They could have seen us preparing by aid of the glass. There was a consultation of about five minutes, and then a cheer as the boats moved forward. Mrs Sweet looked over at the mate, and he nodded his head sighted his gun, and after a long moment applied the port fire. There might have been some luck about it, though he was an old gunner, but his shell struck the easternmost boat plumb on the bows, exploded with a loud report, and she was wiped out so completely that we could not even see the fragments. I believe that every man in that boat was killed. This ought to have discouraged the other, but it did not. She was pulled for us as fast as possible, and the stand of grape fired at her went too high. After that discharge we with the muskets, and I hit one of the rowers and almost stopped the boat for a moment. While the mate and negro worked to load the big gun, the other five of us banged away, and we hit somebody at almost every shot. The boat came on, however, the wounded cursing and the unharmed cheering, and she was within 150 feet of our side when the nine-pounder roared again. She had fired a shell plumb into the boat. It had acted as a solid shot and gone right through her, killing and wounding and smashing, and when the smoke blew away only three men were swimming about on the surface. These we ordered aboard and made secure at once. The bark dropped another boat, but after coming I way it returned. About noon she got a riffle wind which did not reach us, and made off the west for the straits, to be seen no more.

When we came to question the prisoners, who were lusty looking cutthroats, we found that they belonged to the Maldive Islands, around in the Indian Ocean. They made no bones about admitting that they meant to capture us, and were surly and defiant over their repulse. They would not give us the name of the bark, and even after she was out of sight they boasted that she would soon return to release them. At sundown we got the breeze and stood away on our course. That night, during the mate's watch, the pirates disappeared. All knew where they went, but no one asked any questions. The two boats contained full two dozens of them, and their loss must have sadly crippled the bark and completely changed her plans.

The Curse of Heredity in David's Line.

The subject of heredity receives so much less study than it should, that it may not be amiss to call the attention of Sunday-school students to the fact that David's grievous sins in connection with Bathsheba, were but outcroppings of tainted blood received from his ancestor, Judah. My interest was reawakened by the following remarks in a recent parlor-lecture by Dr. Kate Lindsay, of the Battle Creek Sanitarium:

"When David lived in the open air in the fields among his flocks, familiar with toil and hardships which gave him the physical prowess for which he was so renowned then and afterward, he was pure and true—a man after God's own heart. But after he became king over all Israel and entered upon a life of idleness and luxury and self-gratification, this inherited tendency to licentiousness developed exceedingly, and culminated in a downfall which was followed by the severest bitings of remorse after Nathan opened his eyes to behold himself as God saw him. This predisposition to sensuality was intensified in Solomon, David's son, in some respects the wisest man that ever lived, and was repeated with still greater emphasis in the miserable Rehoboam, and a few generations later led to the blotting out of David's kingly line until it reappeared in the glorified Son of Man. The work of regeneration would be comparatively easy if a quarter of the money and a tithe of the work was spent in having children generated right which is now expended in trying to regenerate them."

Children are born with strong tendencies in the direction of some particular vice, but if kept under good influences, the early promise is often good for useful, honorable manhood and womanhood; yet in the hour of temptation and trial, their strength is small, and they fall, and the world is shocked at such outcroppings, perhaps in high places. What should be done in such unfortunate circumstances is to form double lines of fortifications in safeguards and a thorough enlightenment as to the tendency and its sure consequences if allowed to develop instead of being repressed and rooted out. The hotter the battle the greater the victory, and no man needs to go down to ruin simply because of a bad inheritance.

One of the best men whom the writer knows, was born with a longing for strong drink. He has never yielded to it except once or twice as a boy, and yet he confessed to me one day with tears in his eyes that the nasty, sour smell of a saloon was the most enticing odor which met his nostrils, and that with him, the warfare is perpetual. He has been for many years a minister of the gospel, loved and reverenced wherever known, an ardent temperance advocate, and yet forever under this ancestral ban. I have heard others bear testimony that upon conversion all desire for intoxicants was removed, but they probably had acquired the taste instead of inheriting it. Certain it is that the grace of God will be found "sufficient" in every case, if wisely sought. Hard work and an earnest purpose in life, are the best coadjutors.

The Place of Execution, Canton.

We pass now through a quarter given up to the hewing out of the solid, heavy coffins used by these people—fitting preparation for the place we are approaching—the execution ground of the Canton provinces, where every year some three hundred poor wretches are released from the misery which has been theirs from their first imprisonment. Ground is too valuable to be wasted, and when not required for it's ghastly purpose the enclosure is a veritable potter's field, where the huge clay stoves and pots, melded in the adjoining factory, are put out in the sun to dry. It is a space open among the houses, and open to the passing street at one end, a dead wall on the east and south, the potter's shop filling up the long west side. The whole ground is some forty yards by twelve in size, and a more innocent looking place could not be seen. Leaning against the wall are five or six decaying frames of deal, which the eye just takes in, but passes over with indifference, until it is explained that to these are bound the miserable wretches condemned to die by that most fiendish of death sentences, the Lingchi. To these rough boards the criminal is tied, and the callous crowd look on while the sharp and heavy sword of the executioner smites first an arm or finger, hand or shoulder, ear or foot, until, still living—if he have strength to live—the quivering victim has sufficient wounds to justify a fatal blow. This death is the portion of parricides, and of but few others, that crime being the most heinous in this nation of ancestor worshippers. The man under ordinary sentence simply kneels on the ground and stretches his willing neck to the blow, death being welcome after his experience of the mercy of the law.

Simply Got His Organs in Tune.

Up to age fifteen seemed growing weaker, weighed barely 100 pounds. For the past eighteen months have used St. Leon Water more or less, as I felt it steadily bracing me up. Women Who Make the Best Wives.

Members of a Boston debating society have almost come to blows over the question, "What women make the best wives"? Culture was claimed by many to be the first essential, love and fidelity the second, and knowledge of household duties and ability to properly perform them, the third. None of the debaters, however, thought to add that very necessary qualification—health—without which a wife is far from perfection. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will renew the hue of youth on pale and sallow cheeks, correct irritating uterine diseases, arrest and cure ulceration and inflammation, and infuse new vitality into a wasting body. "Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, UNDER A POSITIVE GUARANTEE from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

The French style of mourning is more generally adopted in this country than the English, because it is less heavy.

"Early to bed and early to rise Makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise,"— says the olden-time nursery rhyme, but we think that—

"Early to drink from the fountain of health,
Will bring both the wisdom and much-longed for wealth," and that fountain is to be found in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, the world-famed remedy for impurities of the blood. It cures Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Skin and Scalp diseases, Tetter, Salt-rheum and all blood-taints.

The election of a Democratic governor in Iowa, a state which not long since gave a Republican majority of about 80,000, is regarded by United States journals as a severe blow to the Republican party. The result is largely ascribed to prohibition, with which the Republican party in that state had identified itself for political purposes. The governor elect was a bold opponent of prohibition.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1889.

Aldborough Council.

Council met at West Lorne on Thursday; all members present; Reeve J. J. Stalker presided. The minutes were read and confirmed.

Thos. Knight, whose daughter is troubled with insanity, presented a petition signed by S. B. Morris and 45 others, asking assistance. D. McGregor explained the law in the matter and shewed how to proceed; that the county had to pay expenses; that two medical men would have to examine aud report, and if deemed best, the insane person, if in destitute circumstances, would be sent to the asylum.

Council rendered some assistance.

A deputation from Clachan, led by John McDonald, appeared to object to recent assessments in accordance with engineer's report. The trouble seemed to be that Dugald McLean had improved a creek through his lot and hence got clear of assessments; others felt they were too heavily assessed, The council had but one course in the matter and this they had carried out. Had the council proceeded so that other parties could be assessed the cost would have been more than double to those already assessed. The most economical course had been pursued for all parties concerned.

W. Campbell had a grievance. Water was being taken off Lamont's land and the road out of its natural oourse into a drain he and his brothers had paid most of cost of. The interested parties were advised to apply in the usual way to have a new drain constructed.

W. Marshall headed a deputation from Hogg-st., regarding a sewer pipe culvert which had recently been put on the road and charged to the Hookway drain. The culvert was declared good in every particular until it was found that it was charged against the drain, when a cheaper one would have answersd as well. The councillors were closely questioned as to whether sundry other culverts were charged to the drains.

The reeve said this was the proper course, and he believed it had been followed in every case this year. It was the right way and the just way, and the way council had decided it should be done.

Some members of the deputation said they would get a man next year to do otherwise, and have the township pay for the culverts over drains.

The reeve said perhaps they would. He believed this course the right one and he should endeavor to do right so long as he was there: he was put there for that purpose, and should endeavor to act impartially and without fear or favor.

The deputation then withdrew to the rear of hall and sympathized with each other in the matter.

John Schrintar, pathmaster, reported that Daniel Freeman had not done his road work, and that he had in cleaning a ditch thrown the dirt three and four rails high upon Aaron Lymburner's fence. Council said they had nothing to do with that, but that Freeman would be charged with road work when released by pathmaster.

D. Hillman claimed $25 compensation for injuries to horse opposite McLaren's mill, a sharp stick left on the road having run into the horse. It was not shewn that the council or any of its officials had knowledge of the obstruction, and hence were not liable for damages.

Andrew Hampton, who would neither swear nor affirm, said he had sheep injured by dogs last spring. No action taken. He was also assessed for three dogs and had none; also assessed for statute labor performed. Laid over.

McDougall, Lusty—That an order be granted for $52 in favor of Walter L. Henderson, being price of land purchased for new road to Wardsville bridge, and for $20, cost of an apple tree destroyed.

John Hanser was granted a tile drain loan of $100 for north-east ¼ 13, con. 12.

The reeve was empowered to sign an agreement for construction of drains applied for by E. Witherden, D. Stalker, John F. Schrader, John C. Schleihauf and W. Burr.

McGregor, Dymock—That the Zoller drain be cleaned out where necessary, provided all the parties sign an agreement, and that cost of such cleaning out be assessed against the lands benefited pro rata according to their assessment for the original construction. Councillor McGregor to be commissioner, etc.

Dymock, Lusty—That clerk and treasurer look into McDonald drain account and ascertain whether there is an unexpended balance still to the credit of the parties assessed for the construction of the drain.

Dymock, McDougall—That a special grant of $25 be made to gravel Graham road between cons. 4 and 7. F. Dymock to be commissioner, etc.

By-law 526 to levy special drainage rate on centre part of lot A, con. 5, was read and passed.

Lusty, Dymock—That whereas J. H. Greer has resigned his position as a member of the Board of Health, while regretting the step Mr. Greer has seen fit to take, this Council do accept the said resignation, and take this opportunity to express their appreciation of his services rendered this township, feeling that by his resignation this township will lose the services of a very efficient and painstaking official.

Temperance Talk.

SUPPLIED BY THE LADIES.

A WORD TO THE BOYS.

If we are to have drunkards in the future some of them are to come from the boys to whom I am now writing, and I ask if you want to become one of them. No; of course you do not.

Well, I have a plan that is just as sure to save you from such a fate as the sun is to rise to-morrow. It never failed; it never will fail; it is worth knowing. Never touch liquor in any form. That is the plan, and it is not only worth knowing, but it is worth putting into practice.

I know that you do not drink now, and it seems to you as if you never would. But your temptation will come, and it will probably come in this way: You will find yourself some time with a number of companions, and they will have a bottle of wine on the table. They will drink, and offer it to you. They will regard it as a manly practice, and very likely look upon you as a milk sop if you do not indulge with them. Then, what will you do? Will you say, "No, no; none of that stuff for me"? or will you take the glass, with your common sense protesting and your conscience making the whole draught bitter, and a feeling that you have damaged yourself, and then go off with a hot head and sulking soul that at once begins to make apologies for itself, and will keep doing so during all its life? Boys, do not become drunkards.

HOW SMALL EXPENDITURES COUNT.

Five cents each morning. A mere trifle. thirty-five cents per week. Not much, yet it would buy coffee or sugar for a whole family, $18.25 per year. And this amount invested in a savings bank at the end of each year, and the interest thereon at six per cent. computed annually, would in 12 years amount to $670. Enough to buy a good farm in the West.

Five cents before breakfast, dinner and supper, you'd hardly miss it, yet 'tis fifteen cents a day, $1.05 a week. Enough to buy wife or daughter a dress. $54.60 a year. Enough to buy a small library of books. Invest this as before, and in twenty years you would have over $2,000. Quite enough to buy a good house and lot.

Ten cents each morning; hardly worth a second thought; yet with it you can buy a paper of pins or spool of thread. Seventy cents per week; 'twould buy several yards of muslin; $36.50 in one year. Deposit this as before, and you would have $1,340 in twenty years; quite a snug little fortune. Ten cents before each breakfast, dinner and supper—thirty cents a day. It would buy a book for the children. $2.10 a week; enough to pay for a year's subscription to a good newspaper. $109.20 a year. With it you could buy a good melodeon on which your wife or daughter could produce sweet music to pleasantly while the evening hours away. And this amount invested as before, would, in forty years, produce the desirable amount, $12,000.

Boys, learn a lesson. If you would be a happy youth, lead a sober life; and if you would be a wealthy and influential man, instead of squandering your extra change, invest in a library or savings bank.

If you would be a miserable youth, lead a drunken life, abuse your children, grieve your wife, be a wretched and despicable being while you live, and finally go down to a dishonored grave, take your extra change and invest it in a drinking-saloon.

OUT ON THE PLAINS

the wonderful virtues of Nasal Balm, are known and appreciated. W. M. Armstrong, of the mounted police, Fort Saskatchewan, writes:—I have been using Nasal Balm as directed and find it to be all you claim for it—"A sure cure for Catarrh, easy to use pleasant and agreeable. It gave me relief from the first application. Everybody suffering from Cold in the Head or Catarrh should use Nasal Balm.

WHAT IS WANTED

IS something that will make a man sleep well, eat well and rise in the morning refreshed and strong, with none of the worn out, tired feeling sure to be found where constipation, dyspepsia or diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels and blood exist, Burdock Blood Bitters meets every indication expressed above.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

—There is an attractive young lady in Tilsonburg who is so fickle that she shakes a sweetheart every month. In her case we suppose love is a sort of intermittent fever.—Aylmer Sun. Some of the sweethearts (?) come from Aylmer, and no one can blame her for shaking them.—Tilsonburg Liberal.

THE BEST EVER MADE.

GENTLEMEN,—My trouble was heart disease and dyspepsia, but I took two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters and one of Burdock Pills and got well. I never felt better in my life. My brother has also tried B. B. B. and thinks it a splendid medicine.

MRS. JNO. EARLY, Hamilton, Ont.

A Chicago husband and wife both filed petitions for divorce on the same day, each without the knowledge of the other. This was a case where two minds thought as one after two hearts had ceased beating as one.

FOR FROST BITES.

THERE is no better remedy for frost bites, chilblains, and similar troubles than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It also cures rheumatism, lumbago, sore throat, deafness, and lameness and pain generally. Yellow Oil is used internally and externally.

Perhaps you are looking for a land flowing with milk and honey? If so, you should know that only one person in thirteen can drink milk in any quantity without becoming bilious, and only one in eleven can eat honey without having a touch of the colic. Just better stay right here in this land and get a blue-handled snow shovel ready for winter.

It is safe to use Freeman's Worm Powders. as they act only on the worms and do not injure the child.

"My!" exclaimed Mrs. Flagg, "I look like a perfect fright. I never had any idea I would get tanned so much in the course of one week." "Me, too, Ma," said Tommy, who had stayed at home to help his father keep house while his mother was enjoying her vacation.

"What are you doing now, Gus? said one young man, about town to another. "Oh, I write for a living." "On the daily press." "No; I write to father about twice a month for a remittance."

Prompt, potent and permanent results always come from the use of Milburn's Aromatic Quinine Wine.

"I hope you will pardon my late arrival," said the young man, as he seated himself in the easiest chair. "I forgot my umbrella, and had to stand in a stairway until the shower was over." That's one on you, Jennie," shouted Tommy, in great glee. "I told you so. Of course he had sense enough to go in when it rained." And the silence, like a soft hat, was plainly felt.

For all derangements of the Bowels' Liver and Kidneys, there is no medicine like Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters. It purifies the blood, tones the system, and regulates all the vital organs. Sold in large bottles at fifty cents.

Anxious Valet—Will the lieutenant wear his new uniform to the ball? Considerate Lieutenant—No. There are enough unhappy women in the city.

JOY IN JASPER.

I CAN recommend Burdock Blood Bitters as a sure cure for scrofula. I had it for four years, and was so bad at one time that I was almost a solid sore. I commenced taking B. B. B. last summer, have taken three bottles, and am entirely cured now.

MISS ELLEN PIPE, Jasper, Ont.

Sick headache caused by excess of bile or adisordered stomach is promptly relieved by using National Pills.

Just imagine your wife not being able to speak for ten days. What a change there would be in the house! what an unnatural silence! A case of this occurred in Hamilton some time ago, and one bottle of Wilson's Wild Cherry cured the afflicted lady in four days. This medicine has no equal for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough or Croup. Sold by R. A. Kirkland.

Mrs. Wickwire—If woman were given the credit she deserves, I don't think man would be quite so prominent in the world's history. Mr. Wickwire—I guess you are right. If she could get all the cred it she wanted, he'd be in the poorhouse.

IMPORTANT TO WORKINGMEN.

ARTIZANS, mechanics, and laboringmen are liable to sudden accidents and injuries, as well as painful cords, stiff joints and lameness. To all thus troubled we would recommend Hagyard's Yellow Oil, the handy and reliable pain cure for outward or internal use.

PARISIAN BALM.

Iona Station.

Thos. Burns, who has resided here for the past seven years, is taking his departure for St. Clair, Mich., where he has secured a position as section foreman on the railroad out there.

Mrs. J. A. Black has returned from visiting friends in London.

There is talk of the citizens building a hall for the convenience of the public.

Alex. Milligan is home from Chatham.

Mr. Arch. McLellan has returned from the Northwest.

Cowal.

The auction sale of farm stock at James H. McBride's on the 18th was well attended and stock sold well.

Miss Maggie Urquhart, of Chatham, is the guest of her brother, Rev. A. Urquhart.

Marriage bells still keep ringing in our midst. On Tuesday, at the Presbyterian manse, St. Thomas, Miss Lizzie McAlpine was united in the holy bonds of matrimony to Frederick Webster, a blind agent, of Brantford.

John Marsh, who has been living in Manistee Co., Mich., for the past four years, is visiting his parents.

It becomes our sad duty to report the death of Robert Fletcher, one of the oldest settlers of this community, who departed this life on Wednesday at 11 a. m. Deceased has been almost helpless for the past two years from injuries caused by falling off a load of grain and his death was not unexpected. The bereaved family have the sympathy of the community in their sad affliction.

West Lorne.

Miss Jennie Palmer has returned from St. Thomas.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Patterson, of Highgate, are visiting in town.

Two of the weddings which we mentioned last week have been celebrated, Thos. Daly and Dan. Mudge, jr., having taken unto themselves partners for life.

P. McGregor has completed the removal of his stock to the Beaton block.

Hugh McCallum has removed his tailor shop to more commodious premises in the McKillop block, lately vacated by Dr. Eaton, who has removed his family to Drumbo.

Jno. Hardiker, pumper M.C.R., has an assistant now, a young son having arrived to keep him company.

It is rumored that John McCallum, late bailiff, intends to open a store in the premises lately occupied by Wm. Ward. We wish him success if he does.

The ball and supper announced to take place at Lindenman's last Friday evening proved to be a failure, owing to the wet weather and bad roads.

Preparations are being steadily pushed at the Argyle House for the St. Andrew's supper.

Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Norris celebrated the tenth anniversary of their marriage with a supper given to their numerous friends. After supper had been partaken of those who wished had ample chance to trip the light fantastic toe in the old roller rink, adjoining the premises. With music, singing and dancing a very enjoyable evening was spent. The numerous presents, composed for the most part of tin, received by them showed the esteem in which they are held by their friends.

During the progress of the festivities at Mr. and Mrs. Norris' tin wedding an alarm of fire was raised from the adjoining premises, occupied by Mrs. Switzer as a millinery store and dwelling. The numerous guests next door came to the rescue and quickly extinguished the blaze, which fortunately only scorched the contents of one room. The fire was caused by the upsetting of a lamp, which immediately set fire to the curtains and carpet.

Fingal.

We regret to announce the death of Mrs. W. Davis, daughter of Charles Cattenach, of Fingal, which occurred at her residence on Wednesday of last week, at the early age of twenty-five years. The deceased lady had been ailing but a few days, being taken bad on Monday night. Drs. Marlatt and McLaughlin were called from the village and Drs. Wilson and Penwarden from St. Thomas, were sent for, but none could help her and on Wednesday, at 2 o'clock p. m. she breathed her last. She had been married about two years. She leaves behind her to mourn her loss husband, father, three brothers and one sister, all residing in the village excepting John and Charlie, who are butchers in Wallacetown. Louie, her only sister, will miss her the most as she had been a mother as well as a sister to her. Her enemies were few and her friends were many. The family have the sympathy of the whole village in their bereavement. The funeral services were conducted by the Revs. Hamilton and Sutherland. The pallbearers were Geo. Wilton, G. Sutherland, M. Campbell, J. McPherson, A. Bake and T. Bake.

Highgate.

Thos. McMacken met with a painful and serious accident here Monday. While turning heading in the factory his sleeve caught in the cogs of the turning machine and drew the muscular side of his arm into the machine before the mill could be stopped. The fleshy side of his arm from the elbow towards the wrist was literally chewed away in pieces and several of the main cords were also disconnected. As soon as the unfortunate man was released he was driven to his residence and Dr. Stalker, of Ridgetown, who had been telegraphed for, dressed the wound. The patient is now doing as well as could be expected for a man of his age, being upwards of 60 years.

Tyrconnel.

The jubilee of the Diocese of Toronto was celebrated last Sunday in St. Peter's Church, Tyrconnel, and in every other church in the five Dioceses, into which the Toronto Diocese has been divided, namely, Toronto, Huron, Ontario, Niagara and Algoma. The Diocese was formed in the month of November, in the year of our Losd 1839, and was then the only Diocese in the whole of Upper Canada, comprising the whole of the present Province of Ontario. The first Bishop of that vast Diocese was the Right Rev. D. Strachan, a native of Aberdeen, Scotland, and a college friend of the great Dr. Chalmers—in fact the friendship there formed continued through life. The celebration of the jubilee commenced in Torouto on Thursday and will continue until Thursday next.

Port Talbot.

Nov. 25,—S. W. McIntyre sold by auction to Jno. Brown, fifty acres of good land, owned a few years ago by the late Henry Bobier.

Another valuable farm was purchased by Wm. Gunn from T. McBeth, London. It is well known as the McBeth property. The soil being in an excellent condition made the price paid very reasonable.

Miss Paton has re-engaged to teach in this section for the coming year at an advanced salary, her work giving good satisfaction.

Thos. Gunn, formerly of this place, now a mechanic in Brantford, while at his work received a severe blow, causing him a long period of illness, is again slowly obtaining his usual strength. His many friends are pleased to learn of his recovery.

David Bobier, who has has not been enjoying his good health for some time is much better, and is again to be seen busily engaged in his farm work.

Mr. Lindsay has had his house remodelled, causing a little expense and extra labor, but making a vast improvement.

The editor of a Calcutta newspaper, in reminding his readers of the St. Andrew's anniversary said "there would doubtless be a goodly gathering from the Land o' the Leal." The honory secretary thereupon wrote to the editor, saying "that he read with awe the announcement that, in addition te those who were expected to be present in the body, the company would be augmented by a number of Scotchmen from the world of spirits."

St. Andrew's Nicht is Here.

Then come awa ta Ditton, Jock,
And sing a song ta me,
Bring ay ta min' the beauties, Jock,
O' the land we ne'er may see.

Gie me that hauud, sae leal an' true,
That I maun haud in mine,
An' we ll hae a crack atween us noo
O' the men gane hame lang syne.

Hame tae rest for aye, in the Land o' the Leal,
Where trials they had here, are there in glory's crown
Bright stars; just gaed tae a' whae for their fellows feel,
On they'll shine wi' a' the lustre o' the sun at noon.

Oh, Jock, we winna speak o' battles fought
Nor of deeds o' valor done
When a' the glory that they sought
Was wi' claymore and bayonet won.

For widowed wives wi' hairts wae,
An' puir bairnes wi'out sires,
For desolation's just the heritage o' ilka battle day;
An' ay, the brightest joy in sorrows' flood expires.

Frae north tae south heroic names
Frae mountain, glade an' glen.
For virtue, truth an' honor ay found hames
Amang the valiant sons an' men.

We needna speak o' Knox, o' Guthrie, or McCheyne,
Tho' each ane is ay revered in ilka hairt an hame,
O' Scott wi' his gran' bukes, o' Burns wi' sweet refrain,
For on history's page they've left a deathless fame.

But we'll just meet here thegither
An' be as brothers ought tae be,
Ever true tae ane anither
Whate'er oor place or calling be.

An' tae ithers wha join wi' us noo
We'll gie friendship's haund wi' cheer
Wi' a grasp which speeks a welcome warm an' true;
Isna this St. Andrew's, we'll hae naught but kindness here.

An' bessings noo on ane an' a' whae meet wi' us to-nicht,
May they ever battle manfully for verra truth and richt.
Sae that when oor gatherins here are done
We'll gather never tae pairt, an' miss o' us not one.

To our Subscribers.

The special announcement which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address to B. J. KENDALL CO., (and enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the horse it is indispensible, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenomenal sale throughout the United States and Canada, makes it standard authority. Mention this paper when sending for "Treatise." 6-2-0.

SLEEPLESS WORRY

Is often occasioned by a harassing, tickling cough which might easily be cured if the right remedy—Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam was made use of. Its soothing, healing and expectorant qualities make it wonderfully useful in every family for coughs and colds.

People Wonder

WHEN they find how rapidly health is restored by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. The reason is that this preparation contains only the purest and most powerful alteratives and tonics. To thousands yearly it proves a veritable elixir of life.

Mrs. Jos. Lake, Brockway Centre, Mich., writes: "Liver complaint and indigestion made my life a burden and came near ending my existence. For more than four years I suffered untold agony. I was reduced almost to a skeleton, and hardly had strength to drag myself about. All kinds of food distressed me, and only the most delicate could be digested at all. Within the time mentioned several physicians treated me without giving relief. Nothing that I took seemed to do any permanent good until I began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which has produced wonderful results. Soon after commencing to take the Sarsaparilla I could see an in my condition, my appetite began to return and with it came the ability to digest all the food taken, my strength improved each day, and after a few months of faithful attention to your directions, I found myself a well woman, able to attend to all household duties. The medicine has given me a new lease of life, and I cannot thank you too much."

"We, the undersigned, citizens of Brockway Centre, Mich., hereby certify that the above statement, made by Mrs. Lake, is true in every particular and entitled to full credence."—O. P. Chamberlain, G. W. Waring, C. A. Wells, Druggist.

"My brother, in England, was, for a long time, unable to attend to his occupation, by reason of sores on his foot. I sent him Ayer's Almanac and the testimonials it contained induced him to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After using it a little while, he was cured, and is now a well man, working in a sugar mill at Brisbane, Queensland, Australia."—A. Attewell, Sharbot Lake, Ontario.

KNITTING AND CROCHET.

FIG. No. 145 illustrates an insertion worked from the centre to the edge on each side. Make a row of ch the required length, on this work*, 1 d 1 t, passing the cotton 3 times around the needle, work this off half-way, keeping the last loops on the needle, 1 t into the 2d, and 1 t into the 4th sts of the foundation ch, work off the last loops of the d 1 r, 1 ch, 1 t into the head of the 2 ts, 1 ch, 1 t into the same st as the last, 1 ch, and repeat from * to the end.

On each side of this work as follows:—1st row. 5 t over t and ch of centre, 1 ch, repeat.—2d row. 3 t over 5 t, 3 ch, repeat—3d row. 1 t over centre of 3 t, 5 ch, repeat—4th row. 1 t, 1 ch, repeat.

FIG. No. 144 represents a shell pattern for a counterpane to be worked with knitting cotton No. 8 and steel needles No. 13. Cast on 30 sts or any number divisible by 6.—1st row. K 4, k 2 together, m 1, repeat.—2d row. Purl.—3d row. K 3, k 2 together,

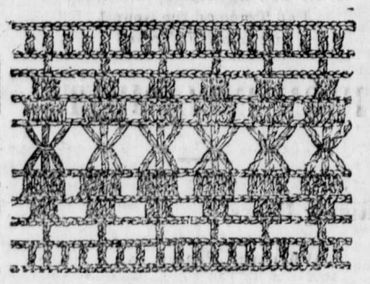

FIG. 145

The lace shown in Fig. No. 147 is crocheted the short way; when made of linen thread it is durable for trimming underwear. The foot of the edging, composed of a foundation ch and a row of 1 dc and 1 ch, is worked first in the length. The edging itself is crocheted in the width on this foot, and in the same way as tricoter, 1 s c is made in the foundation, and then 19 ch, and going backward the cotton is put over the hook and 3 d c worked in the 14, 13 and 12 ch. The meshes are only to be crocheted half the height.

Put the cotton over each time d c are worked in the 10, 8, 6, 4, and 2ch, and into he s c, then 1 d c into the 3 foundation ch. Every 2 of the loops on the hook are worked off together, putting the cotton over once. 5 ch and 1 d c in the last d c gives the picot at the edge. To this follow, putting the cotton over again, 3 d c in the 3 d c; the hook is to be put through the vertical thread, and also the st link always coming behind, and putting the cotton over 6 d c are worked into the next 6 d c, 1 d c in the foundation ch into which the last d c is crocheted and 1 d c in the 3 foundation ch; the work is now chained off going back.

When another picot has been made and the cotton put over, 11 d c are made close together going forward, the first 3 being worked into the 3 d c coming after each other, the following catching up alternately the mesh link between these and the next d c. The cotton is put over before each o the 4 open d c, and d c is the foundation c without single loops and all the loops and threads on the hook are then drawn off in the usual way.

In working now forward, 3 picots are joined to the upper picot, after 1 d c, in the 1st of the 11 close d c, each picot being separated 1 d c in the 3, 5, and 7 of the 11 closed d c. When the cotton has been put over once, 3 close d c are crocheted into the last 3 close d c and the remaining d c. The crochet is then cast off and a fresh division of the pattern begun.

Fig. No. 146 shows a crocheted jacket for babies a year old, but it can be easily enlarged. The model is worked in white and pale blue wool. The work is begun on the lower edge of the back and 45 ch are cast on with blue wool. The whole jacket is crocheted back and forward in 1 s c and 1 ch. The s c are worked in the first row into each second foundation ch, and later on around each ch.

The rows are begun with 3 ch, which answer for 1 s c, therefore each row consists of 24 s c, reckoning in these sts 48 rows doing up straight complete the back, to which is added on each side in a width of

3 s c, a front part 50 rows high, also worked quite straight.

The fronts and back are crocheted around when finished with 5 rows of white wool, working at each corner at the lower edge 2 s c separated by 1 c h, besides which, 2 s c each separated by 1 c h are worked in the first row in both corner sts, caught up already in beginning the fronts, to form the back part of the collar, this being repeated in the remaining rows.

Between these double sts 8 s c are worked, putting the hook into the edge. 4 rows of blue wool are crocheted into the white rows, and the increase is made in the same way. The edge of the jacket, left open 2¾ inches at each side between the front and back and ewed together the same length, is trimmed with small picots of 1 s c, 5 ch and 1 s c back into the 1st ch.

The sleeves are crocheted around the armsizes, each being 26 s c wide above and 24 below, and requiring 35 rows of blue wool, edged like the jacket with 5 of white and 4 blue rows with picots. A cord made of lengths of ch, each 13⅜ inches long, worked with one white and one blue thread, and small balls of the two colors tie the collar together.

The cape illustrated in Fig. No. 143 is made of cotton chenille knitted on small wooden needles. The foundation is of a straight piece knitted 1 yard and 10½ inches long, 36 meshes being cast on for the depth, 12¼ inches. The work is made back and forward in rows, knitting each mesh at the back.

An increase is only made 4 times at the beginning before the last mesh of the going forward by always taking up 1 mesh. With the remaining 40 meshes 156 rows are to be knitted, after which the worker has to decrease the meshes in 8 rows by knitting 2 meshes together the same number of times. The last 36 meshes are then cast off.

The upper edge, where the increase and decrease is made, is finished with a row of crochet composed alternately of 1 d c and 1 ch, through which is run a narrow ribbon, and also, like the front edges with crochet picots each of 1 s in the edge, 4 ch and 1 s back into the first ch.

For the fringe at the lower edge, the thread is fastened to the latter, looped twice over a strip of cardboard 3¼ inches wide, and the two loops joined to the cape by crocheting single, the cardboard being slipped close to the same for the purpose. The fringe loops are not cut open.

Knitted lace. Cast on 25 sts.—1st row. S 1, k 18, o, n, o, n, k 2.—2d row. K 8, p 13, t.—3d row. K 2, o twice, n, k 1, o twice, n, k 1, o twice, n, k 1, o twice, n, k 2, o, n, o, n, o, k 2.—4th row. K 9, p 13, make 1st of the two loops, k 5.—5th row. S 1, k 20, o, n, o, n, o, k 2.—6th row. K plain.—7th row. S 1, k 4, p 15, k 4, o, n, o, n, o, k 2.—8th row. K 24, t.—9th row. A crossover for a child of 6 years is easily knitted of single Berlin or Germantown wool on bone needles. First take the length of the little girl's back, from her neck to her waist then cast on 10sts and k a piece the length of her back, increasing at the beginning of every row thus: Wool over the pin, k (not slip) the next st (this forms a sort of open edge, which, when the crossover is quite completed, is secured by 2 rows of d c the whole way round, working 3 d c in one at all the corners); k plain to the end.

Every row is the same until you have knitted the depth of the child's back; then divide your sts into three parts, and k the first part (no increasings). Take your third pin and cast off the middle set of sts. This is for the back of the neck. Leave the first set of sts on the first pin, now k the remaining set of sts for 20 rows, and then k every row plain, decreasing 1 st at the beginning of each row, always at the neck end, by knitting the first two together, until only 2 sts remain, and you have knitted, in fact, to a point.

Do precisely the same on the other side to form the other front, and sew a ribbon on each point. After you have done the 2 rows or d c the whole way round, knot in a pretty fringe by taking two strands of the wool about eight inches in length and doubling them.

Tapestry stitch is very pretty for carriage and cradle covers, and looks like cross stitch worked on canvas; is prettier when made in two colors. Cast on an uneven number of sts and k one row plain; then begin the pattern.—1st row. S 1, * k 1, bring the wool to the front, s l as for purling, pass the wool back crossing the slipped st, repeat from * ending the pattern with k 1; k the last st.

—2d row. S 1, bring the wool forward, p 2, * pass the wool to the back, s l as for knitting, bring the wool forward, p 1, repeat from * ending by a slipped st, which will be knitted in the next row; k the last st. Repeat these two rows, which complete the pattern.

A simple insertion in crochet is commenced on a foundation of 26 ch.—1st row. 4 ch, 1 t in 26th of foundation, 2 ch, miss 2, 4 T, 2 ch, miss 3, 1 T, repeat 5 times, turn.—2d row. 4 ch, T on T, 2 ch, 10 T, 2 ch, 4 T, 2 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, 1 T, turn.—3d row. 4 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, 4 T, 2 ch, 4 T, 2 ch, 4 T, 2 ch, 4 T, 2 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, t, turn.

—4th row. Same as the 3d row.—5th row. 4 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, 10 T, 2 ch, 4 T, 2 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, 1 T, turn.—6th row. 4 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, 4 T, 2 ch, 1 T, repeat to end, turn.—7th row. 4 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, 16 T, 2 ch, 1 T, 2 ch, 1 T, turn, and repeat the pattern from the first row.

How Turkish Harems Are Filled.

The polygamous Turkish Beys and Agas, whose hitherto regular supply of Circassian girls from the Caucasus has ben cut off from them since the annexation of the province by Russia, have recourse now to a bold system of rape. They swoop down upon an Armenian village, with their armed acoytes, and carry off to their harems, by main force, as many goodlooking girls and women as they can lay hands on. This is permitted to them: and the modus operandi by which the abduction of Armenian girls is rendered legal by the Moslem Judges may be summed up as follows: When the relatives present themselves in court to claim the abducted victim, the ravishers are ready with a brace of Moslem witness (100 could be produced if wanted), who declare on oath that the kidnapped woman pronounced in their presence the regular formula of the Moslem faith: "There is no god but god, and Mohammed is his prophet." The Judge thereupon dismisses the case on the ground that the stolen and ravished girl has by that profession abjured her former faith and embraced Mohammedanism. And the verdict of these upright Judges is not to be set aside.

Health of the Cities.

OTTAWA, Nov. 28.—The mortuary statistics for October indicate a far healthier condition of the large cities than has been the case for some months past, and Toronto's proportion is astonishing, being but one per thousand, as against Montreal's 2 21, Quebec 2 61, Hamilton 1 55, Ottawa 1 53, Halifax 1.29, London 1.05, Winnipeg 1.71, Kingston 1.44, Brantford, 1 42, Belleville .81, St. Thomas 1 22, Guelph 1.42, Woodstock 1.72, Windsor 1.51, Chatham 1.29. The three lowest are: Victoria, B. C., 68, Peterboro 65, Brockville 56.

A Hint.

"You do not live very far from here," said Miss Pepperton to a young man who had let hour after hour pass without so much as looking at the clock.

"Not very; but why do you ask?"

"Because you never seem to have any fear of being late for breakfast."

Art in the Pulpit.

Lucy—Did you know that our new young rector is quite an artist?

Sneerewell—Ah, indeed! It is truly refreshing to find a preacher that can draw.

THE CHARGE OF THE SIX HUNDRED

Some New Points of a Different Nature, Given by a Survivor.

A correspondent of the "London Standard" writes to that paper as follows: The Charge of "The Light Brigade," called "The Six Hundred," took place Oct. 25, 1854, and is still a household memory with us, though thirty-five years have slipped by, and I have been asked by many to place on record this anniversary some occurrences other than mere galloping, cutting, thrusting, and strong language, all of which are very similar on like occasions, and are often told in prose and verse. Short and to the point is best suited to what is required of me. So to begin my story.

Maude's horse artillery, with me second in command, opened fire at daylight and kept in action until its ammunition was exhausted, when it retired a few yards down hill and remained there for awhile, screened from the Russian shot and shell, with the hope of giving confidence to some wavering Turks. Maude was seriously wounded by a shell bursting in his horse, and there were also several casualties among the officers, men, horses, and gun wheels. Some of our field batteries soon arrived and continued the cannonade.

In the course of an hour or so our two brigade of cavalry and horse artillery formed columns near the heights of the plateau of Sebastopol, when with supports in column, probably five thousand, poured down the grass slopes toward Balaklava, and were gloriously defeated by our heavy brigade of cavalry, under Gen. Scarlett.

In the pause that followed I deemed it desirable to learn what the Russians were doing, and as the horse I had ridden was wounded by the splinter of a shell, I mounted a baggage pony and rode up the grass slope to near the crest of the now famed valley, where I tethered him to a tent peg and crept on through the long grass until my telescope cautioned: Beware! The brushwood on the hills opposite was full of guns, and down the valley were troops by thousands. Cap. Charteris, one of Lord Lucan's aides de camp now rode by, but as he did not see me I hailed him with the information, when he replied: "The Light Brigade is ordered to attack;" and while we were speaking it hove in sight, advancing and deploying at the trot and canter. There was not time for warning, so I ran to my pony, and, getting back to the guns as fast as he could carry me, brought them up at full speed and placed them over the the ridge, where best to aid the remains of the Six Hundred in their inevitable retreat.

At this time Lord Cardigan reined up and told me what had happened, at the same time pointing to a long rent in his cherry overalls made by a Cossack Lancer, who had otherwise missed his aim. Others rode or ran up to the guns. Among the last was Capt. Godfrey Morgan, Seventeenth Lancers, now Lord Tredegar,

WHOSE HORSE HAD BEEN KILLED

and his helmet lost. However, he came to me, sword in hand, and, speaking as cool as he would on parade, said: "Is not this an awful business, Shakespear! What shall I do?" My reply was, "Quick; jump on a gun limber, and go to the rear with us, or to the front if we go into action, when you may help fight a gun."

We must not forget the volley from the Ninety-third Highlanders, which emptied many Russian saddlers near the entrance to the villege of Balaklava; nor the attack on the Russian artillery in the brushwood by the French cavalry on white horses. I can see them now, so conspicuous were they on the hill. So keen is memory formed on the battlefield that even now I fancy I see Nolan and his horse lying dead, like many others whose names I did not know.

Of my friend Charteris I have a remarkable foreshadowing of fate to relate. On the previous evening he and I, while taking a quiet ride, saw signs of a fight on the morrow, when he spoke very gloomily of it being his last. My saying, "Well we have been under fire together pretty often, and yet here we are again," did not cheer him. "No; it would be his last." A round shot killed him directly we parted on the ridge before named. As the spot was debatable ground my gunners buried him then and there. I am, sir, your obedient servant.

The Sultan's Closet Skeleton.

If things were done in Turkey as elsewhere the decease of the Sultan's mad half brother, Marsd V., would have been notified to the diplomatic body, and the Turkish Court would have gone into mourning. But it is forbidden to speak openly of the Sultan's female relatives or of the Sultan's heir. The man who will succeed Abdul Hamid is a wretched, lean, pale faced creature of five-and-forty, named Mohammed Reshad. He is the Sultan's own brother, and is kept a close prisoner in the palace grounds, lest he should conspire for his majesty's downfall. He has certainly no such intention, but usage requires that a Sultan's heir apparent should be treated as a suspected criminal, and Abdul Hamid is much too nervous a creature to innovate in this particular. He has a horrible fear lest his brother, Murad V., who became crazy from being raised to the throne too suddenly, should recover his senses, but of this there is no chance, and now that Murad's mother is dead who will there be to prevent the poor lunatic from being hurried to his end by "a pinch of something" in his coffee? Murad's mother, the Sultana Nadine, superintended his household and never left him. It would have been impossible to molest him while she was alive, but it would be only too much in keeping with Turkish traditions if the unhappy madman were now quietly removed in order that Abdul Hamid might sleep more soundly.

Upside Down in Australia.

Many things are reversed in Australia. It is summer there while it is winter in America. Trees shed their bark instead of their leaves; fruit has the stone of kernel outside; swans are black; there is a species of fly that kills and eats the spider, and a fish called the climbing perch walks deliberately out of the water, and, with the aid of fins, climbs the adjacent trees after the insects that infest them.—[Texas Siftings.

The horse show at Chicago was a great success. The horses on exhibition were valued at $2 500 000. The 1,500 entries included the $105 000 trotter Axtel and the fastest pacer in the world, Johnston. One stable alone, that of the Hamlins, of Buffalo, was insured for $400,000.

Swimming baths are becoming popular additions to English schools. The School Board contends that it is quite as important for a boy to learn to swim as for a girl to learn the art of cookery, and claims that the swimming bath adds to the comfort of the scholars and assists in the work of education.

The farmer is getting a good deal of attention from Governments in these days. Great Britain and the United States have recently established Departments of Agriculture. The British Minister is to have £300,000 a year to spend upon that Department. Germany spends £600,000 in the same work; but all these are exceeded in liberality by France, whose yearly expenditure is a million and a half.

Peter Havens, a Camden, N. J., man bought a monkey to bring sunshine into his darkened house. In order to see the monkey jump he snapped a revolver at him. A few days later, in order to see Peter jump, the monkey snapped the same weapon at him. This time it happened to be loaded, and the man got a bullet in the jaw.

A painting by Rubens, entitled "David and Abigail," which was purchased at the late Secretan sale for $21,000, was admitted to the States free of duty as an antiquity, while Millet's "Angelus" cannot be imported without the payment of $31,000 as custom duty. This curious application of the customs laws leads many to wonder if the import tax on works of art should not be repealed.

The late Prince of Monaco is said to have been of an adventurous disposition in his youth. For several years he was an actor and won considerable success in Paris. His cheerful disposition did not desert him even in his last years, when he had become blind. One day he said: "I am like Emperor Charles V., I never see the sun set on my dominions.' When he felt his last hour had come, he said: "Je crois etre a Monaco, car rein ne va plus."

An elephant in a menagerie at Coblenz recently broke out of his cage and wandered on till he found a house, inside the door of which was a sack of potatoes. He beat in the door, stamped the potatoes into a mash with his fore feet, and then settled down to enjoy his puree de pommes de terre, but was disturbed in the midst of it by the keepers, who, missing the elephant from the menagerie, traced him to his resort. He allowed himself to be quietly recaptured and led back.

Mr. Neville, the great baker of London, who died recently, like many other men who afterwards attained to wealth, made a false start in life, for his first venture ended in bankruptcy. He tried again, and soon became wealthy. He then invited each of the creditors he had been obliged to pay but partially to come to a dinner. Each guest found under his cover a cheque for the balance due, with interest up to date. Mr. Neville is said to have been offered and to have refused £800,000 for his business a short time before his death.

The lady who achieved an unpleasant notoriety while her name was Victoria C. Woodhull has been in retirement since her marriage to a wealthy London banker, Mr. Martin, but she has again brought herself before the view of the public by announcing herself as a candidate for the presidency of the United States in 1892. Her platform—"the emancipation of woman and the improvement of the race"—is a remarkable one for a woman who once preached free love. The probabilities are that Mrs. Martin will not be elected.

His Highness the Gaekwar of Baroda, a Bombay paper remarks, is a man whom fortune has smiled upon from his youth. The romance of his life would read almost like a dream from the "Arabian Nights." Taken from the hills a poor little herd boy, adopted by a princess he is clad in purple garments, decked with jewels, and has a sceptre thrust into his hands. With loyal and peaceful subjects, a beautiful stretch of country for his state, magnificent palaces, and well filled coffers from which he can afford to indulge his artistic tastes and his love for what is beautiful, he is a Prince whom even Princes might envy.

The great dealers of New York have sent to the Secretary of the Treasury a formal protest against the entry of Millet's famous picture "L'Angelus" free of duty for exhibition for six months. The picture was recently sold in Paris for $110,000, and the duty on it, if it were brought into the United States for sale, would be $33,000. One would think that the exhibition of so fine a work in New York would encourage the taste for art there, and thus indirectly benefit the dealers, but they seem to take a different view of the matter. The Philadelphia "Ledger" says of the tariff on pictures and sculptures: "The duty on art is barbarism which has a place in the political economy of no other nation under the sun except this one only."

The Perth "Western Mail," says that very few Australians are aware that certain parts of their own country (Northern Australia) have vast herds of buffalo (bos bubalus) careering over its plains and wallowing in its shady pools. The "Sydney Mail," states that the animals are massive and heavy, with splendid horns, and afford sport of sufficiently dangerous a nature to possess charms for the most daring hunter, a wounded buffalo being one of the most dangerous animals known, if not the most, his great weight, prominent horns, and splendid courage making him as well respected as sought for. The first buffaloes were landed at Port Essington, North Australia, about the year 1829, by the then Government on their forming at that place a convict settlement there. The celebrated and lamented explorer, Leichardt, arrived at Port Essington from one of his overland trips in the year 1845. He mentioned seeing a large herd of buffaloes at that early date, so some idea can be formed of the immensity of their numbers now after a period of 40 years' uninterrupted increase.

INTO COLD NORTHERN SEAS.

With a Pilot Aboard Who Piloted Th Bear—Scenes on the Way Out—Grim Scandinavian Gods—An Adventure Recalled.

BY DAVID KER.

At last we are off on our travels once more, a voyage which is to begin with the northeast corner of Newfoundland and to end, after a passing visit to New-York, with Borneo and other tropical islands away at the end of the world, beyond the southeasternmost corner of Asia. If all I hear be true, England's newly-acquired territory in North Borneo must be as well worth seeing as any spot on the face of the earth, and we may fairly look forward to a very enjoyable stay in a country which is lucky enough to have no news and no hotels.

A two days' run ought to carry us to St. John's at the southeast corner of Newfoundland, where we shall begin our coasting voyage up the eastern shore of the great island, with such a panorama before our eyes as I have not seen since I lost sight of the mountains of Abyssinia sixteen months ago. But our "furthest north" on this cruise will probably be Pilley's Island, for, with Java and Borneo waiting for us 20,000 miles away, I fear we shall have to wait till next Summer to run across the Belle Isle Straits and renew our acquaintance with our dwarfish friends, the Esquimau.

But if we had time for such a trip just now we could not make it under better guidance than that of the skipper who brought us here, brave Capt. Ash, who has written his name in the history of arctic voyages as ice pilot of the Bear during the Greely rescue expedition. It is enough to make any amateur voyager in feel very small indeed to hear the veteran talk so coolly and familiarly of that grim time when "we had only 25 men left fit for duty out of 280, the rest being all down with snow-blindness," or how, "when we were dodging through Smith Sound, you know, we had to pick our way through 700 miles of floating ice before we got into what you might call a safe sea"—the "safe sea" being probably what most men would call very unsafe indeed. In truth, one may see by the hero's weather-worn face and the deep lines on his broad forehead that what he has done was no holiday work.

But if anything could console a man for standing upon the threshold of such a region of wonders as the Arctic Ocean without being able to enter it, it would be the treat of such weather and such a series of views as we have had in our passage of Long Island Sound, the panorama of which, if less grand and romantic than that of the Hudson is nevertheless one of which America may well be proud. Certainly no great national highway upon earth, whether of the land or the water, could have a nobler gateway than the famous suspension bridge, with its massive towers standing up like two mighty Gothic windows of some unfinished cathedral, upon which I lately heard two Russian immigrants exhausting all the adjectives in their language.

As afternoon wanes into evening, the panorama of the coast line on either side of us is one that would gladden the eye of a painter. The sombre background of dark wooding, flecked here and there with the lighter green of the grass slopes—the broad patches of yellow that show where the crumbling away of the turf has left the earth bare—the narrow golden thread, shining in which marks the sandy beach that divides the green water from the darker land—the tiny fishing boats dancing merrily over the smooth bright sea, and the lustrous evening sky outspread over all—are wonderfully picturesque. As the sun goes down into the sea, the fast-falling shadows of night give to the long, curving shore of Connecticut a weird, lonely, dreary aspect suggestive of that far-off time when this pleasant region of railways, hotels, and Summer resorts was still "Quong-Eh Ta Kut," the wild forest land of mystery and peril, echoing with the war whoops of merciless savages, and red with the fell harvest reaped by scalping knife and tomahawk.

All this, however, is only the beginning of our cruise, and before it ends we shall probably have seen much that is well worth seeing. The northern seas have been the home of marvels and mystery ever since good Bishop Pontoppdan, ages ago, saw with the eye of imagination his gigantic "kraken," or cuttlefish—the undoubted ancestor of our modern sea-serpent—pulling down sailors out of the rigging like plums off a tree, and then dragging the ship itself to the bottom to be devoured at its leisure. Once within this strange region, any wonder seems possible. In the brightness of the midnight sunshine, you see a vast cathedral of glittering ice, higher than the spire of Strasburg, plunge downward into the sea like a wounded whale, with a crash mightier than the loudest thunder, and a shock that dashes up the whole sea into mountain waves, on the crest of one of which the largest ocean steamer would rock like a toy. Scarcely has it disappeared when another ice castle, crowned with a thousand shining pinnacles, comes flashing and sparkling up from the depths like some newly-created world, and an old sailor beside you explains the seeming miracle by saying simply: "That 'ere hiceberg's turned turtle," (i. e., ups'de down.)

And the further north you go, the more marvels spring up around you. No words can do justice to the weird attraction of this strange life beyond the bounds of the living world, where there is no sunrise and no sunset, but one endless unchanging day; where time, space, and established rules are alike unknown; where you breakfast at 4 in the morning, sup at midnight, dine whenever you please, and never go to bed at all; where men are no bigger than children, and children no bigger than dolls; where mosquitoes swarm where you find cattle the size of sheep, sheep the size of dogs, and dogs the size of rabbits; where one turns from watching the sea foam into whirlpools around a frolic some whale to see an eagle swoop from the brow of a perpendicular precipice 6,000 feet high; where phantom ships appear hanging upside down in mid-air, and instead of one sun you see four or five at once; where dwarfs live under the snow as in fairy tales, and the day of the week or of the month is a matter of glorious uncertainty from the beginning of the voyage to the end of it.

But when you pass from the limit of vegetation into the region of eternal emptiness beyond, the Polar Ocean is seen in its grimmest and gloomiest aspect. The brightest and clearest day can do little to soften the sternness of the cold, gray rocks and lonely, lifeless waters of "the land where all things are forgotten"; but when seen beneath the gloomy shadow of a gathering storm the desolation of the whole landscape becomes absolutely overwhelming. Not a tree, not a shrub, not even a blade of grass is to be seen upon the bare, craggy sides of innumerable precipices, heaving up their gaunt outline against the darkening sky, and the endless succession of barren mountains overhung by cold dead whiteness of the eternal snow, the sullen, lifeless waters beneath, the gray leaden sky overhead, the tremendous loneliness, the dead, unearthly, awful silence, all combine to crush you with an overpowering sense of utter and ghastly isolation, a weird nightmare feeling of being the only thing left living upon the face of a dispeopled earth.

It is from such scenery as this that one learns to understand the grim, mighty, granite-hewn figures of Scandinavian mythology, whose very heaven was no place of ease and softness and luxury, but a whirl of eternal battle. One can fancy how mean and paltry would appear, amid the silence and loneliness of these tremendous solitudes, the dainty divinities of soft, sunny, sensuous Greece—a curly-bearded Jove, a sleek Apollo, a dapper Mercury, a round-limbed Venus. Far different are the stern deities of the stormy North—Odin before the rush of this giant horse, Thor dashing the mountains in pieces at every stroke of his thunderbolt hammer, Ægir shaking the solid rocks to their foundations with the shock of his roaring waves, Heimdall making earth and sky echo to the blast of his war horn, and Surtur's fiery sword "melting the mountains in the day of his wrath."

It was in one of the countless rocky islets of this ghostly sea (a mere dot in the boundless waste of waters) that I once met with an adventure which, though I have already made some passing mention of it, is well worth telling over again. The island, which was one vast precipice on all sides but the southwest, terminated to the north in a bold turret-shaped headland more than one hundred feet in height, just beyond which towered an isolated crag of equal height, evidently torn from the main cliff by some mighty convulsion ages ago. This I climbed at the risk of my neck one afternoon, only to find that the natural bridge of rock by which I had reached it had been covered by the rising tide, and that my retreat was cut off. So there I was, fifty feet up a dangerous precipice, on a ledge just wide enough for me to stand on, with a raging sea below, and a coming storm blackening the horizon, which, as I well knew, would whirl me off my perch like a feather into the roaring waves beneath. My sole remaining chance of life was one from the thought of which I instinctively shrank, viz., to leap across the hideous chasm that separated me from the main cliff and alight upon the nearest ledge of the latter. It was indeed a fearful risk, which nothing short of the prospect of certain death could have nerved any man to face. The leap was a wide one, the shelf on which I stood barely large enough to give me space for a spring, and the ledge on which I meant to alight was so narrow and slippery as to make it an even chance whether I failed to reach it at all, or reached it only to fall back into

THE DREADFUL GULF BELOW.

But I knew that every moment of hesitation would only make matters worse, and that my only chance was to risk the leap before my nerves gave way altogether. I clinched my teeth and sprang out into the empty air, and the next moment I was safe on the opposite ledge.

So far so good; but even now my troubles were only just beginning. Far below me roared the chafing sea, and high above me towered a grim precipice, which I had always heard spoken of as absolutely unscalable. To all appearance there was no going either up or down; yet up or down I must go, and that speedily, for if I staid where I was the approaching storm would hurl me from my perch and dash me to pieces. Just at this moment I espied a cleft, or rather crack, running slantwise up the face of the cliff above me, the edges of which, frayed and roughened by spray and storm, offered just footing enough for a cat or an Alpine climber. A perilous scramble enabled me to reach it, and up I went inch by inch like a fly on a wall.

Not without a long and hard struggle, and more than one hair's breadth escape from instant destruction, did I at length drag myself wearily over the topmost ledge, spent, gasping, bruised, cut, and aching in every limb. As I did so, I caught sight of a man seated close to the edge of the cliff only a few yards away from me, seemingly busied with a sketch of the sea view. So completely engrossed was he with his work that he never heard the scraping of my feet against the rock as I scrambled up, till, as he happened to raise his eyes suddenly from the paper, there I stood like a ghost on the very brink of the precipice, a ghastly figure, right between him and the red, angry glare of the stormy sunset, which outlined me in all my terrors. My face and hands were black as ink, my clothes torn and stained with blood, while my wet, disordered hair, standing wildly out in every direction and interwisted with three or four stray tufts of seaweed, powerfully enhanced the horror of my appearance. For a moment he stood gazing as if suddenly turned to stone, and then, flinging down his sketch and implements with a yell worthy of an Ojibbeway Indian, flew away with such amazing speed that I could hardly see where he went to. I never had a chance of finding out what account he gave of his adventure, but I can pretty easily guess it.

According to the customs of Chinese society the wife of the Chinese Minister to America will comb her hair up from her forehead, to show that she is married. Her tresses reach to her feet, and so difficult is the task of dressing them that one arrangement lasts several days. For the preservation of the coiffure she lies while asleep on a willow pillow as finely woven as an imported bonnet, shaped like a loaf of baker's bread. The maids dress their back hair in a queue, and arrange a bang one and a half inches deep, from ear to ear. A bit of coquetry is displayed by allowing a single lock to float loosely in front of the face and over the shoulder. The hair of the Chinese girl is never cut, and, as a result of the splendid care bestowed, it grows luxuriantly.

Politics in the United States.

Last year the electors of the neighboring Republic substituted a Republican president for a Democrat, and the victorious party imagined they had another long term of office before them similar to that they enjoyed from 1864 to 1884, but the result of the state elections held last Tuesday is well reckoned to prove the delusive nature of any such calculations. All along the line very nearly, the Democrats were victorious, and where they did not actually come out on top, they at least made gains. In New York they elected the entire state ticket, in Ohio they won a signal victory by substituting Campbell for Foraker in the governorship, in Virginia General Mahone was over-thrown and the Democrats won by an overwhelming majority, in New Jersey the latter easily held their own, in Massachusetts they made gains, but in Iowa they carried all the State offices from their opponents. Of course it is said that the tariff had much to do with those results, but we believe that there are other and ulterior forces at work, not the least of which is probably the proof furnished by Patk. Egan's appointment to be minister at Peru of Mr. Blaine's intimate relationship with the extreme Irish faction. Local and personal causes undoubtedly had their share, but it is rather difficult to believe that the electorate at large would so pronouncedly retire from their verdict of last November on so easily an understood question as the national tariff.

A Machine for Hauling Logs.

OTTAWA, Nov. 28.—Messrs. Perley and Pattee are about to introduce a great innovation in the manner of hauling their logs from the felling ground to the streams by means of which they are to be brought down. This innovation consists of the introduction of a Glover steam logger. This is a giant machine 28 feet long, weighing 12 tons, that can be driven by steam on a snow road, and is estimated to draw as many as 30,000 or 40,000 feet of logs. The mechanism is simple. Nearly over the centre of the hind part of a double sled sits a small engine of 800-horse power, whilst the boiler is located in the centre. The boiler is of steel, 5½ feet in diameter, 7½ feet high and gauged to a pressure of 150 lbs.; either coal or wood can be used as fuel. There are four wheels on the driving axle, each four feet in diameter and weighing three tons, whilst a wheel in front acts as a helm. It will be a tremendous saving to the firm.

To Make Children Lovely.

There is just one way, and that is to surround them by day and night with an atmosphere of love. Restraint and reproof may be mingled with the love, but love must be a constant element. "I found my little girl was growing unamiable and plain," said a mother to us the other day, "and, reflecting on it sadly, I could only accuse myself of the cause thereof. So I changed my management and improved my opportunity to praise and encourage her, to assure her of my unbounded affection for her, and earnest desire that she should grow up to lovely and harmonious womanhood. As a rose opens to sunshine, so the child heart opened in the warmth of the constant affection and caresses showered upon her; her peevishness passed away, her face grew beautiful, and now one look from me brings her to my side, obedient to my will, and happiest when she is nearest me."—[Women's News.

Wanted a Chance.

"I'll tell you what I'll do with you," said one man to another, after a rather warm controversy. "I'll just bet you ten dollars to five that you can't tell the truth six times in succession."

"Pshaw," said the other, after a thoughtful pause. "You're no sporting man. Make the odds fifteen to one and I'll take the bet."

No romantic tale ever had so many incidents as that of a young woman of Bukowina. She was very beautiful, and all the men who were in the district fell in love with her. She had a hunderd offers of marriage before she accepted the 101st. Then her troubles began. Her first fiance died suddenly from an accident; the second was taken away with the army, likewise the third and fourth; the fifth and sixth were drowned; the seventh and eighth broke off on learning of the smallness of her fortune; the ninth got drunk on his betrothal day, and tried to beat the young woman, so she broke it off; the tenth seemed promising in every way, but as the marriage was about to take place it was learned that he had a wife and children in Bessarabia. The wedding was fixed for the eleventh, but he decamped for some unknown reason and thereupon the young woman gave it up and poisoned herself.

PERSONALS.

Henry Russell's song, "A life on the Ocean Wave," has been adopted as the royal march of Britain's marines. Mr. Russell resides in London, and is now a very old man. He is the father of W. Clark Russell, the sea story writer.

Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote so small a hand that he would often put fifteen hundred words on a page of ordinary letter paper. His son Julian writes a hand nearly as small as that. The son's manuscripts, however, are absolutely neat, which could not be said always of the father's.

Queen Victoria wisely provided that her children should be educated in the practical as well as the ornamental branches. They were given the best of teachers in languages and music, and then the princesses were taught how to sew, cook, and make butter and cheese, while the tool shops at Osborne gave the princes a fair knowledge of carpentering. Consequently the Prince of Wales is not only a good classical scholar and an accomplished performer on the piano and banjo but he is quite handy in the use of carpenter's tools.

The little Northamptonshire (England) village of Sulgrave, the home of George Washington's ancestors, has been aroused by the theft from the Washington slab in the nave of the parish church of two brass plates There were six of these plates, and they formed interesting memorials of the lives and deaths of Lawrence and Amy Washington, who died respectively in 1583 and 1564 The stolen brasses are believed to have been taken by two Americans, who, like many other of their countrymen, were supposed to be making a devotional pilgrimage to the place.

Mr. George Kennan, it seems, has not related all his thrilling adventures in the Century. It is said that on one occasion he was in a Nihilist's house with papers in his possession which if found would have cost him his life. He was informed that officers were on his track and would be at the house in five minutes. The question was what to do with the papers; he looked about, saw a hind glass lying upon the table, took it up, pried out the back with his knife, hastily put the papers in the frame and restored the back to its place just as the officers arrived. A search was made, the glass raised from the table, but the important papers were not discovered. The officers departed and left Mr. Kennan in possession of his documents and his life.

The death of Sir Tindal Robertson, the member for Brighton, by his own hand, is a lamentable event. His figure in the lobby of the House was a well-known one, and to see him arm-in-arm with his attendant recalled to many the times when Mr. Fawcett still lived and moved in the political world. Both lost their sight in early manhood, and both, nevertheless, fought their way into the House of Commons. But I fear the excitement and high-pressure life of the modern politician was too great for the Brighton doctor, whose mind must have become unhinged, probably from the depressing conviction that the new life he had chosen was too much for his physical powers. Nowadays a Parliament man must be made of steel, and have a constitution like iron.

Readers of George Eliot's life will remember the annoyance she suffered from a Warwickshire worthy who put himself forward as the author of "Adam Bede." The success in this country of "Thoth" and "A Dreamer of Dreams," has been equalled by their popularity on the other side of the Atlantic, where much curiosity was manifested as to their authorship. To remove doubts upon this subject, a young Canadian gentleman, aged 15 years, Mr Gerald Leslie Marston Pogue, of Little Britain, a small village near the town of Lindsay, and in Province of Ontario, modestly owned himself the author. Messrs. Blackwood, the English publishers, declared that the author was not "young Pogue," but Master Pogue persists in his claims, stating that he blindly disposed of the MSS. he knows not whither, and assures his friends that a third romance from his pen will shortly appear and establish his reputation.

Natural Scent of Flowers.

The modest looking mignonette flower, as is well known, is one of the most deliciously fragrant, with a fragrance of that class that is not overpowering, and that few can be found to object to. The same is true of the sweet briar, lemon-verbena and its class. With the old white lily, lily of the valley and Cape jasmine this is not so. Too much of either of these easily becomes nauseating, and in some cases causes sickness, but the former class probably rarely. It may not be known of the three former that the fragrance is so persistant and continuous that a sprig plucked and put in the pocket with a handkerchief, or among the clothes, like the lavender of our grandmothers' days, will leave a pleasant fragrance behind for many days. The next time you pass a bed of mignonette try it. Pluck half a dozen heads and put in the pocket below the handkerchief and, our word for it, the delightful scent will be there for some time.

Heard Him Once.

Bilks—Come up and hear our new minister to-day.

Nobbs—No, thanks; I heard him once and have always regretted it.

Bilks—Why, I guess you are mistaken.

Nobbs—Not a bit of it; he is the minister who married us.

meeting of the five Academies which form the Institute of France, the Comte de Franqueville, in his paper, said; "I wager that the political women will eventually win the day."

Three new ironclads will, as soon as possible, be in Italy's fleet, 14 000 tons and 20,000 horse power. Vessel, armor, guns, and all are to be made in Italy.

Anarchism is not unknown even in Japan. Details of a desperate attempt to assassinate the Japanese minister of foreign affairs, Count Okuma, have been received. The count was returning in a carriage from a cabinet meeting when a man named Tsunoki, dressed in European clothing, ran up and threw a bomb into the carriage. The explosion injured the minister so that amputation of one leg was necessary, and his face is disfigured. The Japanese are not so progressive as to take to innovations of this character with good grace. It is safe to say that if the would be assassin had not cut his throat he would have been given a chance to "meet death stoically" at the hands of the law.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Comte de Paris, being an exile, was unable to attend the funeral of the King of Portugal.

The French army officers are now all armed with revolvers; during the war of 1870 they had none.

Since the institution of the Victoria Cross it has been bestowed upon three hundred soldiers and sailors.

At the annual stud sheep sales at Melbourne, $3675 was paid for a single ram, and $2750 for a Scone sheep.

Correspondents of two London papers were recently expelled from Belgrade by order of the Servian Government.

The most interesting exhibition in Europe next year will be the Loan Exhibition of Tapestry at the Austrian Museum.

A monument has been erected to Xavier Jouvin, the original glovemaker, at Grenoble. He was also a great philanthropist.

In the British army, according to latest reports, there are at present 74,720 Englishmen, 13 594 Irishmen and 8949 Scotsmen.

A school is to be established at Finkenwerder, near Hamburg, for the training of young fishermen in the specialties of seafishing.

Chinese railway building has come to an end, because the French Goverment insists upon the fulfilment of the Tientsin treaty, by which France, it was agreed, was to supply the personnel and material of all Chinese railroads.

The stock of bunting in Greece being altogether insufficient for the requirements of the loyalists at the recent wedding festivities, several large consignments of flags were sent by one of the principal London firms to the Piræus in order to enable the inhabitants of Athens to make an effective display.

Denmark now grows more oats than any other cereal, as much barley as wheat and rye together, and five times more rye than wheat. Twenty-nine per cent of the acreage of this country is devoted to cereals, twenty per cent to pasture, and ten per cent to meadow. This year's harvest is considerably below the average.

A tigress in the Nagpur district of India has, during the first six months of this year, killed seven people, besides wounding others. In February last, in broad day-light, she carried off one of a gang of railroad men from under the eyes of his companions. She has been shot at many times and her cubs killed but she has got off scatheless.

Some weeks ago a resident of Waterloo, near Beaufort, Victoria, "picked up a stone to throw at some calves." Noticing that the missile was rather heavier than what he usually felt justified in chastising his calves with, he examined it, and found that about half of it was gold. When crushed at a neighboring battery it realised £32.

A man committed suicide in Paris recently by asphyxiating himself with charcoal fumes, and while dying he recorded his last impressions and sensations on a sheet of note paper. The first entry was: "My head is heavy;" and shortly afterwards appeared the words, "There are noises in my ears caused, no doubt, by the bad charcoal supplied, which gives too much pain." This went on for one hour and a quarter, the last inscription being, "It is too much to suffer."

Signor Vittorino Bocca, the eminent Italian engineer, proposes to join the Tyrrhenian Sea with the Adriatic by a ship canal which, crossing the peninsula from Montalto di Castro, province of Rome, in a north-easterly direction, would reach the east coast at Fano. The cost of construction is estimated at £25,000,000: maintenance and amortisation of debt, at about £1,600,000 per annum; receipts at £1,920,000, of which £1,280,000 would figure as tolls; leaving a net annual revenue of £320,000.

Probably the courts do not afford a more curious case than this: In 1859 Mme. Hardouin of Paris bought three tickets in a lottery, the capital prize of which was 100,000 francs. By presentiment she chose the number 40,634, putting the ticket away among her husband's effects. He became bankrupt, and all of his books were seized. The lottery was drawn in 1861, and 40,634 won the prize. Since then Mme. Hardouin has been accumulating evidence to show that she was the person who bought the ticket, and now expects the judgment in her favor every moment.

A hitherto unknown painting by Leonardo da Vinci has just been placed in the gallery of the Pinakothek in Munich, which, if genuine, is of inestimable value. The picture was bought not long ago for twenty two marks at an auction in a small town in South Germany and the buyer sold it at a good profit to the Pinakothek, which has had it well restored. It represents Mary with the infant Jesus in a room through the window of which one sees a hilly landscape. The Madonna, somewhat under life size, is visible down to the knees. On one side stands a glass with flowers. The picture is believed to be one of the earliest works of the great master.

A bronze statue is to be erected to the Emperor of Japan on an open space immediately outside the Imperial Palace in Tokio, and artists have been invited to send in designs. One of these represented the Emperor seated on his favorite charger, the horse being so placed that its feet should rest on either side of the entrance bridge. This is said to have been much admired by the officials of the Imperial Household; but when it was submitted to the Emperor it was immediately vetoed, on the ground that it was not in accordance with the principles of hospitality and politeness that foreign Princes and personages of distinction who came to visit him should have to pass under the feet of a horse bestridden by him.

A German periodical gives statistics concerning the frequency of thunderstorms in various regions of the world. Java has thunderstorms on the average 97 days in the year; Sumatra 86; Hindoostan, 56; Borneo 54; the Gold Coast, 52; Rio de Janeiro, 51; Italy, 38; West Indies, 36; South Guinea, 32; Buenos Ayres, Canada and Austria, 23. Baden, Wurtemberg and Hungary 12; Silesia, Bavaria and Belgium, 21; Holland, 18; Saxony and Brandenburg 17; France, Austria and South Russia 16; Spain and Portugal, 15; Sweden and Finland, 8; England and the the high Swiss mountains, 7; Norway 4; Cairo 3. In east Turkestan as well as in the extreme north there are almost no thunderstorms. The northern limits of the thunderstorms are Cape Ogle, northern part of North America, Iceland, Novaja, Semalja and the coast of the S. Arctic Ice Sea.

A large number of turkeys are being shipped by the American Express over the M. C. R. to New York.

The West Lorne St. Andrew's Society will hold their annual dinner at the Argyle House to-morrow evening.

A cow belonging to M. C. Leitch became entangled in a rope halter Friday night and was choked to death.

Rev. T. Wilson will preach a special sermon to young men in the Presbyterian church on Sunday evening next.

Preparations are being made for the annual entertainment in connection with the Presbyterian Sunday School.

Mrs. Crane lies very ill at her home in Tyrconnel. She is the widow of the late Peter Crane and is aged 73 years.

Several communications are unavoidably laid over for the present, owing to the extra pressure on our advertising columns.

Dr. Ling, of Wallacetown, was called to Rodney on Tuesday to hold a consultation with Dr. Dorland on a critical case there.

Copies of advertisements for the special edition of the ENTERPRISE must reach this office not later than Tuesday of next week.

Every man can do something for the benefit of the town in which he lives. Don't be a drone in the busy hive, and don't pull backwards.

J. H. Haines has removed his flour store to the "Rockbottom," one door south of McIntyre's bank, where he keeps on hand a full stock of flour.

There was a good attendance at the opening of the roller rink Saturday night. The proprietor intends flooding the rink as soon as the cold weather sets in.

D. Plewes, secretary of the Millers' Association, will address the meeting of the West Elgin Farmer's Institute on Wednesday Dec. 4th. Don't fail to attend.

D. McPherson has commenced buying pork, and will pay highest cash price for dressed hogs weighing from 120 to 180 lbs. Heavy hogs not wanted at present.

A party of juvenile minstrels attempted to give an entertainment in Leitch's Hall last Wednesday night. The crowd was small and the performance nothing extra.

Inspector Seath visited the Dutton high school on Thursday last. He expressed himself well pleased with the staff and school. His report will be published shortly.

The death occurred at Fingal Thursday, at the early age of 25 years, of Mrs. Elizabeth Davis, wife of Wm. Davis, and daughter of Mr. Cattanach. Deceased had been married about three years.

Detective Robert Miller, of Lawrence, went to St. Thomas Wednesday evening and while visiting a number of friends in the city, some unknown person abstracted a $10 and a $5 bill from his pocket.

The Ladies Aid Society of Knox Church will give a parlor social and oyster supper at the residence of Wm. Rothwell, B. A., to-morrow (Friday) evening. Admission 10 cents, oysters 15 cents extra.

The Household Troops' Band of the Salvation Army were in Dutton on Saturday and Sunday last. The band numbers about 30 pieces and their music was well appreciated as was shown by the large crowds which assembled in the barracks at each service.

The annual St. Andrew's dinner will be held in McIntyre's hotel on Monday evening, December 2. A large gathering is expected. Several prominent gentlemen who intend to be present will deliver addresses.

Several members of the A. O. U. W. visited Shedden on Monday night, where Dr. Hunsberger, D. G. M. W., of Delhi, held a lodge of instruction. A large number were present and a pleasant and instructive evening was spent.

While Mrs. A. J. Leitch was absent from home on Thursday last some one entered the house and stole a gold watch and chain off a dressing stand in one of the bed-rooms. Some jewelry on the stand beside the watch remained untouched, and nothing else was taken.

Court Tyrconnel, No. 99, I. O. F., will give an entertainment in the Wallacetown school house on the evening of Friday, December 6th. From the announcements already made an entertainment of unusual merit may be expected. Full particulars will be given next week.

Mr. Eckhart, a commercial traveller, stepped off the sidewalk one dark night recently and besides being pretty well shaken up had his clothing almost spoiled by the mud. The accident might easily have resulted more seriously than it did. Another argument in favor of having street lamps.

The Minister of Justice evidently does not take much stock in the insane plea in the case of Harvey, the Guelph murderer, and says that the law must take its course. There is one thing sure—if the murderer pays the penalty of his crimes on the scaffold there is no chance of his ever committing a like deed.

The session of Knox Church, are making arrangements for holding the anniversary services in connection with the church on the first Sunday in January, it being the anniversary of the settlement of Rev. T. Wilson as pastor of the congregation. The usual entertainment will be held on the following evening.

There are evidently one or more scoundrels in Dutton who make their living by stealing. They are not at all particular as to what they take either. Everything goes, canned fruit, groceries, dry goods, gold watches, money, etc., and last week they tried to capture some geese belonging to Dan. McAlpine, but were frightened away.

Yesterday's snow storm reminds us that winter is fast approaching, and also of the fact that the sidewalks will be again blocked with snow unless lazy residents can be induced to spend a few minutes work cleaning them off. A town the size of Dutton ought to be able to pay a man for the winter to do nothing but keep the streets in shape.

The local newspaper is generally looked upon as an index to the town in which it is published. This is one of many reasons why every business house, professional man and tradesman, institution and church in Dutton should keep an advertisement, let it be ever so small, in the columns of the ENTERPRISE. It helps the advertiser—it helps the town—it helps the printer.

Saturday morning Edward Hughes, son of David H. Hughes, Frome, happened with a serious accident, which may prove fatal. He jumped on a freight train to go home, and in jumping off at the Frome crossing in the dusk of the early morn, fell in a culvert. His head came in contact with the culvert, and he lies at his father's home in a dangerous condition, suffering from concussion of the brain.

A meeting was held in the office of the ENTERPRISE on Monday evening to consider the advisability of organizing a lodge of the I. O. O. F. in Dutton. The meeting was well attended and those present were unanimous in the opinion that a lodge of the order should be at once organized. The necessary number of names required in order to get a charter were obtained and a lodge will be formed at an early date.

The Reformers of West Elgin will hold a convention in Leitch's hall, on Thursday, Dec. 12th, for the purpose of selecting a candidate for the Local Legislature. Ward meetings will be held on Wednesday, Dec. 11th, to appoint delegates to attend the convention. The names of A. McCrimmon, Jas. M. Glenn and Dr. McLarty, are mentioned as aspirants to the the honors. Mr. Glenn appears to be the favorite at present.

Richard Morrish, one of the pioneers of the Lake Shore district, died at his home in Tyrconnel on Saturday at the age of 70 years. Deceased was one of the earliest setters of that place and was a member until his death of the English Church of Tyrconnel. He held the office of sexton of that church for a number of years and was noted for his strict attention to the duties of that office and his consistent Christian life. He was buried in the Tyrconnel cemetery on Monday, Rev. Jas. Chance preaching an appropriate sermon.

Residents of Iona are intensely excited over the elopement of Henry Watts, a prominent church member and business man of that place, with his sister-in-law, leaving his family behind him, and his business affairs in everything but a satisfactory condition. The woman in the case left Iona, where she had been visiting, on Saturday, saying she was going to London to see some friends and he left on Monday to transact some business at St. Thomas. Neither have since been heard of. The creditors have taken possession of the stock and Mrs. Watts is left out in the cold with a family of small children to support. Much sympathy is felt for the deserted wife and should either of the guilty pair have the effrontery to again appear in that neighborhood they will be summarily dealt with.

A ploughing match was held on the farm of John Mills, near Iona, on Tuesday. There were a large number of interested spectators present, but competition was not very keen. In the 1st class, for all comers, Ed. Young took the prize; 2nd class, for ploughmen who never won public money, Thos. Campbell; 3rd class, for boys, 1st, Duncan Carswell, 2nd, Frank Church, 3rd, — McTavish; 4th class, sulkey plows, all comers, 1st, John Campbell with Cockshutt "J. G. C." plough, 2nd Levi Pollard, with McSherry plow. The other plows used were chiefly of the McSherry make.

It is proposed to have during the Christmas holidays at Dutton and Wallacetown, under the auspices of the members of the Church of England, an exhibition of a grand Lime Light Panorama of the wonderful possessions of the Great British Empire all over the world, and also of scenes in other countries of Europe and Asia, including many interesting scenes in the Holy Land. The exhibition to be given by Prof Chapman, Ph. D., late of the Royal Polytechoue, London, England. The Professor has the most powerful lime light and the finest selection of views the world ever produced, and which will afford a most interesting, instructive and charming entainment. Further particulars will be given as soon as possible.

MOCCASIN TRACK HUNTING TOTEM OF HEALTH

Wm. Minhinnick, who escaped from the county jail Saturday, is again behind prison bars, having been captured by Constable Elliot near Copenhagen on Sunday night. The crime for which Minhinnick was awaiting trial was the larceny of money and clothing from his employer, Geo. McCollum, near Mapleton. With consummate cheek the scoundrel made straight for McCollum's, where he stole a new suit of clothes belonging to that much robbed man and concealing his prison garb in the woods, attired himself in McCollum's clothes. He then proceeded to Copenhagen and obtained shelter at the house of Thos. Oldfield. He claims that he arrived at Oldfield's about 7 o'clock Saturday night and remained there until Sunday afternoon. It is more probable that it was nearly midnight when he arrived at Oldfield's. Meantime a posse of constables were scouring the country. It was suspected that he would make for Copenhagen, and Constable Elliot, of New Sarum, and Mr. Peters, of Orwell, were despatched in that direction. As they were passing Oldfield's they caught sight of Minhinnick peeking around the corner of the house. They drove up and demanded his surrender, but Oldfield vehemently denied that the accused was there. He was unearthed hiding in one of the rooms, however, and promptly handcuffed and was returned to jail at 11 o'clock Sunday night.

Slowly but surely, the several states of the great Republic are coming to adopt what they prefer to call the Australian system of secret balloting. They prefer this name for it because they do not like to call it the Canadian system, which it really is. They seem to think that if they fetch it farther, it will be more tony and acceptable. They are quite willing wrongfully to call a noxious weed the Canadian thistle, though it is no more Canadian than it is French or German, but will not readily admit that our political system is, in any part of it, better than theirs. But Canada could teach Uncle Sam a good many other things beside the true method of voting by ballot. —Times.

HOGS WANTED.

Farmers, hurry on your store hogs and fatten them for the market from January to June. We have determined to abandon the packing of dressed hogs in order to make the packing of hogs a business throughout the year. We shall endeavor to buy, at whatever the price is, enough live hogs during these months to run our packing house. As this business is being neglected during the late winter and spring months, we think those who have hogs suitable for our requirements will reap a big benefit. We want hogs not less than 140 lbs., and not over 220 lbs., and will give a handsome price for the same. Recollect we shall not buy a dressed hog this winter, whereas we packed 15,000 dressed hogs after Jan. 1, last winter.

A Fact

WORTH knowing is that blood diseases which all other remedies fail to cure, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Fresh confirmation of this statement comes to hand daily. Even such deep-seated and stubborn complaints as Rheumatism, Rheumatic Gout, and the like, are thoroughly eradicated by the use of this wonderful alterative.

Mrs. R. Irving Dodge, 110 West 125th street, New York, certifies:—

"About two years ago, after suffering for nearly two years from rheumatic gout, being able to walk only with great discomfort, and having tried various remedies, including mineral waters, without relief, I saw by an advertisement in a Chicago paper that a man had been relieved of this distressing complaint, after long suffering, by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I then decided to make a trial of this medicine, and took it regularly for eight months. I am pleased to say that it effected a complete cure, and that I have since had no return of the disease."

Mrs. L. A. Stark, Nashua, N. H., writes: "One year ago I was taken ill with rheumatism, being confined to my house six months. I came out of the sickness very much debilitated, with no appetite, and my system disordered in every way. I commenced to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla and began to improve at once, gaining in strength and soon recovering my usual health. I cannot say too much in praise of this well-known medicine."

"I have taken a great deal of medicine, but nothing has done me so much good as Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I felt its beneficial effects before I had quite finished one bottle, and I can freely testify that it is the best blood-medicine I know of."—L. W. Ward, Sr., Woodland, Texas.

ST. ANDREW'S NIGHT.

IN DUTTON.

The anniversary of Scotia's patron saint was right royally celebrated in Dutton on the night of December 2nd. The committee had spared no pains to make the dinner of this year the best yet held in Dutton and such it was. The host had prepared a spread such as mortals are seldom permitted to partake of—haggis was at its best, so pronounced by the 100 guests who sampled its goodness. Among those present we noticed Messrs. Glenn, McLaws, McCrimmon and Barr, of St. Thomas; Kirkpatrick, Jell and Dorland, of Rodney, H. McCall, McMillan and D. Kirkpatrick, of West Lorne; P. Stalker and D. Laing of Aldborough; L. W. McIntyre, Wallacetown. The following gentlemen replied to the various toasts: President's address, S. Maccoll; "The Queen;" "The Governor-General," song, "He's a Jolly Good Fellow;" "The day and a' who honor it," D. McLaws and T. W. Kirkpatrick; "Learned Professions," H. Clay, H. F. Jell and Dr. Dorland; "Scotia's Patron Saint," Dr. Ruthven; "Dominion Parliament," A. J. Leitch and Jas. Pool; "The Land o' Burns," D. McLean; "The Army, Navy and Volunteers," L. W. McIntyre; select Scotch recitation, Dr. Cascaden; vice-president's address, A.N.C. Black; "The Lieut.-Governor," Dr. Cascaden and A. McCrimmon; "The Land we live in," Jas. M. Glenn; "Scotia's Poet," Wm. Rothwell; "The Land o' Cakes," Dr. Leitch; "Farming Interests," J. Galbraith and J. Beaty; "Municipal Interests," Messrs. Hiue, McKillop, Garbutt, L. W. McIntyre, McCallum, McDiarmid; "The Ladies," John McKay and C. St. C. Leitch; "The Press," R. Sutherland and J. D. Blue; "Our Visitors," A. McCrimmon and J. M. Glenn; "Host and Hostess," A. J. Leitch and Jas. Pool. The celebration was brought to a close in "the wee sma' hours" by singing, "Auld Lang Syne." During the evening Messrs. Barr, Gordon, McGeachy and Goldie favored the company with some stirring songs of the "Land o' the Heather," and D. McMillan was a host in himself with the incomparable bagpipes.

IN WEST LORNE.

The West Lorne St. Andrew's Society celebrated their anniversary by a dinner at the Argyle house. The attendance was the largest in the history of the Society, there being over 125 present. The supper was an excellent one and the tables, which were handsomely decorated, fairly groaned beneath the load of good things provided by the hostess, "Aunty" McMcMillan. Among those present from a distance were noticed Sheriff McKellar, of Hamilton; Jas. M. Glenn, Colin Macdougall, A. McCrimmon, W. Atkin, N. W. Ford and J. W. Cook, of St. Thomas; Geo. E. Casey, M. P.; Senator Palmer, from the State of Ohio, and many from Dutton and Rodney. The chair was occupied by Mr. T. W. Kirkpatrick, of Rodney, and C. Macdougall, Q. C., of St. Thomas, officiated as vice chairman. The following toasts were responded to:—"Governor General, N. W. Ford and J. W. Cook; "Army, Navy and Volunteers;" song, "Red, White and Blue," Dr. Dorland and H. F. Jell, Rodney; "Dominion Parliament," Geo. E. Casey, M. P., and Peter Stalker; "Local Legislature," Dr. Ruthven of Dutton, J. M. Glenn and A. McCrimmon, St. Thomas; "The day and a' who honor it," Sheriff McKellar of Hamilton, Samuel McColl and Colin Macdougall; "The land we live in," J. M. Glenn and H. Clay; "The land o' cakes," A. McCrimmon and Judge Palmer, of Ohio; "Municipal Institutions," J. J. Stalker, D. Laing and Duncan McGregor; "Literature of Scotland," Sheriff McKellar; "Educational Interests," Messrs. Cameron and Munro; Agricultural Interests," W. Ross and A. McGugan; "Learned Professions," Dr. Dorland, H. F. Jell, Geo. Wray, R. Sutherland and John Blue; "Host and Hostess," Colin Macdougall. Messrs. Geo. Wray, H. F. Jell and Dr. Dorland, of Rodney, contributed greatly to the evening's pleasure by their numerous well rendered songs.

The Newspaper Business.

First of all, I want to say that the newspaper business is, to my mind, a purely commercial enterprise. I do not believe that newspapers are published for the good of the public. That is to say, I do not believe that philanthropy enters into the question in the slightest degree. The newspaper business is carried on in much the same way as any other business—let us say the shoe business, for instance, by way of example. The man who sell shoes is anxious to get all the trade he can. He tries to buy a better article than his competitor, and he tries to sell it cheaper. By so doing he gains trade and many dollars. The newspaper editor aims to be more enterprising than his rival. He tries to get more and better news and special articles in advance of his neighbor, and in that way gives his newspaper a standing for enterprise and ability.—Foster Coates in Sunshine.

FEMININE FRIVOLITIES.

To lovers: Never put off till tomorrow what you can woo to-day.

A woman is like a phonograph in one respect. It is unwise to say anything unpleasant to her.

He—What a lovely—er—complexion Miss Slimlymme has! Her arms remind one of ivory. She—Or bone.

Clarisse—Did you attend Miss Smoothbore's pink tea? Mathilde—No; but I went to a blue dinner there once.

Lady—I thought I told you I wanted curried potatoes for dinner. Bridget—The hostler was busy, mum, and I'm no groom.

"What is the social status of that young Flibberty who comes to see our Mary?" asked Mr. Fangle. "O, he never stays later than 10," replied Mrs. Fangle.

Wife—"Where shall we hide the silver while we are away."

Husband—"Put it in the pockets of your dresses in the closet."

"First little boy—"And does your sister play the banjo?" Second little boy (proudly,—"Indeed she does; you just ought to hear her. She's a graduate of Vassar, she is."

Nagley—You wanted to get married bad enough, Lord knows, when I took you. You'd a married a fool. Mrs. Nagley (meekly)—Well, don't twit me with what I have done. We all make mistakes.

Jones—Congratulate me, old fellow. Miss Dashaway has agreed to marry me. Smith—I do, indeed, Jones. Glad you're coming into the family. Jones—Coming into the family? Smith—Yes; Dashy is a sister to me.

Mr. Acid—"What a remarkably homely woman Mrs. Plain is." Miss Suave—"Yes, but hers is a face that grows on you." Mr. Acid—"Heaven forbid that such a face should ever grow on one of my daughters."

It is said of a Canadian mother who died the other day: "She was a true wife, a fond mother, and so managed affairs as to marry off her nine girls before any other female in the neighborhood could even get a beau."

Enamored youth—"Your father seems worried about something to-night." Sweet girl—"Yes; poor pa has so many business cares." Little brother—"That ain't it. He's mad because the big dog he bought didn't come."

In some "Advice to Young Men" we read: "How to get rich—live up to your engagements." Five years ago a young man, who had $1,000 in the bank, lived up to his engagement, and he hasn't got a cent now. But he has a wife and three children.

"I'd rather," sighed Miss Away for the summer, pensively: "I'd rather be in the moon than here." "In the moon, Clara," echoed her mother; "why, what a queer idea." "Not at all," was the naive reply. "There's one man there, at least."

Old man (at the head of the stairs at half-past 2 a. m.)—Susie, what time is it? Susie (with a second look at Reginald, who loosens his grip)—A few minutes past 10, papa. Old man—Don't forget to start the clock again when you go to bed.

"Mrs. Tonay (after passing a newly painted house)—Good gracious! And I have been brushing close up to it all the way. Do please look, Mrs. Sharpe, and see if I've got any paint on me. Mrs. Sharpe—I don't think there is any on your clothing, Mrs. Tonay.

Temporarily Disabled.

Visitor—I don't see Signor Samson, the modern Hercules, here to-day.

Attendant—No, he tried to carry up a scuttle of coal for his wife last night and overexerted himself. Doctor says he'll be out in a week, though.

Prof. Bell's Unique House Boat.

Prof. and Mrs. Alexander Graham Bell will leave Monday for Nova Scotia with their children and two little cousins. Mr. Graham Bell has recently completed, in addition to a picturesque cottage at that place, a novel structure—a house boat—in which he will spend the greater portion of the summer, cruising about with a number of friends whom he has invited to be his guests at various times during the warm season.

This house boat, on the catamaran style, with spacious apartments, double parlors, billiard room, and every imaginable convenience, was built for the special accommodation of guests for whom Mr. Bell found it would be impossible to secure suitable quarters at any of the primitive farm houses about Nova Scotia. The structure is singularly unique, and will find no parallel in this country or England. It is built so that it can put in at any port. The most luxurious appointments prevail throughout. When the project of building was first started, Mr. Bell found that it was impossible to secure a model after which to copy, and he thereupon employed the services of a skilled architect from Baltimore, in conjunction with whom he drew the plans and details.—Boston Herald.

Marching Home for Christmas.

A STORY OF THE EGYPTIAN WAR.

CHAPTER II.

"DEATH AND LOVE."

Brian St. John Kerschoyle, thrown upon his own resources by a quarrel with his grandfather, awoke to the unpleasant consciousness that he was fitted for nothing in life but the stage or the army, as for any of the government offices he was too old, his last birthday having been his twenty-fourth; so in a fit of desperation he sallied out of the Carlton this bitter afternoon in December, determined to look up a theatrical friend who lived at Leighton Lodge, Leylands. He knew nothing of his movements, but started off on a wild-goose chase, which ended, as it deserved to do, in disappointment. Mr. Cosmo Bonnor was engaged on a provincial tour, and it was altogether uncertain as to when he would return. Mrs. Bonnor would be happy to forward any message, if the gentleman liked to leave one.

But "the gentleman" declined the offer, and turned his face bravely to the snow. Nursed as the old-fashioned novelists say "in the lap of luxury," Brian Kerschoyle was utterly unaccustomed to the hardships of life. Like Dives he had "fared daintily," lived extravagantly, and whiled away his time in the business of pleasure. Educated at Eton and Christchurch, he found himself at two-and-twenty absolutely unfettered as to fortune or occupation.

So long as he never crossed his grandfather's will, he was welcome to spend as much money, and waste as much time as he liked; but when he refused to marry the ill-favoured heiress whom Mr. Kerschoyle, senior, had chosen for his grandson's bride, the bitterest reproaches were hurled at his head. Furious at being called a spendthrift and a good-for-nothing idle scoundrel, he left No. 200, Berkeley-square, in a passion, and vowed that he would never enter the house again.

Standing outside Leighton Lodge in the cold east wind, with eight inches at least of snow on the ground, and a cloud of it falling still all round him, Brian Kerschoyle felt uncommonly angry with fate.

With a grimace at his exceedingly unpleasant surroundings, he walked on towards the station, his thoughts naturally turning towards London as the only place where he had been accustomed to find a home.

As he turned the corner into Burlington-villas, he saw a girl running as fast as she could towards him. When she was quite close, her foot slipped and she fell forwards on the snow, a bottle which she had apparently held in her hand smashing into fragments, as it hit against the lamp post.

Brian stooped and helped her up.

"You!" he exclaimed in surprise, looking down at Muriel's agitated face in great compassion. "What are you doing here? You have no business to be out again on a night like this."

"Mamma is ill; I was running to the chemist—sal-volatile," she gasped, with her hand to her side.

"And what was this bottle for?" touching the broken glass with his foot.

"To fetch it in. You get it cheaper, you know."

"Where does the chemist live? I shall go faster than you."

"Round the corner, the first turning to the left. But I oughtn't to trouble you."

"You don't. Now go back into your house and I will bring it you."

"Here's the sixpence."

He took it gravely, and hurried away, leaving his umbrella, before she was aware of it, in her hand.

She did not go back as he had suggested, but followed him at a distance, with a foolish idea that she would save time or trouble by this arrangement. When, after what seemed to her a long interval, she heard his footstep, she sprang towards him.

"Oh, thank you so much. Where is it?"

"Here, I am very angry with you. Why didn't you go home as I told you?" he said severely, taking the umbrella and holding it over her. "I suppose you thought I was going to embezzle the sixpence."

"I thought I might spare you the trouble of coming so far. But what a big bottle!" in dismay, as she could not help thinking of the expense.

"Is it? I never bought sal-volatile before."

"How much did it cost?" she asked pantingly, for she was almost running, whilst he kept beside her with his long strides.

"I gave him the sixpence, and he gave me the bottle," he said carelessly, not mentioning that he had added two shillings out of his own pocket. "Can you tell me of a decent inn, or decent lodging, anywhere here about? I don't see much use in going up to town in such weather as this and I might have to wait hours at the station."

"There is a room to let in the house where we are staying, but you would not like that."

"Why not? It's the very thing; you can introduce me to the landlady and save me from being taken for an adventurer."

"Then you must tell me your name," she said shyly.

"St. John," he answered, after a pause.

"Here we are," she sprang up the steps, and pushed open the door which she had left ajar. "How is mamma?" she asked eagerly, as a kind looking elderly woman in a black silk dress came out of the sitting-room.

"Better, and asking for you," looking dubiously over the small black bonnet at the tall form behind.

"Oh, I forgot,' and Muriel looked back over her shoulder with a smile. "Here is Mr. St. John, a gentleman who has been very kind to me, and he wishes to know if you can give him a bed, as the weather is too dreadful for him to get back to town."

With a bend of her head she opened the door of the sitting-room, and threw herself down on her knees by her mother's side. Mrs. Kerschoyle was very pale, there were grey shadows round her closed lids and pressed lips, through which the breath came in stertorous gasps. The dews of extreme exhaustion were on her forehead.

"Mother dear, speak to me,' whispered her child in pitiful entreaty; but there was no answer. Then she pulled at the cork of the salvolatile, but it stuck fast, and resisted all her efforts. She tried it with her small white teeth in desperation, but it never moved. With the tears pouring down her cheeks, she looked round for a corkscrew. Her heart was sinking with fear, for she had often seen her mother ill before, but never as bad as this. Just as she was raising the bottle in order to break its neck against the table, Kerschoyle who had been watching her in silent compassion from the hall, stepped forward and took it from her hand. With one turn of his wrist he took out the cork, and taking up a glass poured out a dose, and gave it into the little shaky fingers which were waiting so eagerly for it.

"Let me raise her," and gently as a woman he passed his arm between Mrs. Kerchoyle's head and the pillow. But the remedy came too late, the power to swallow it was gone, and the sal-volatile rolled down on to the front of her dress.

"Mother!" a breathless, frightened cry, and Muriel in an agony flung herself face downwards across her mother's breast. But the heart, that had beat for her, and her alone, was still; the voice that had been there to comfort in every hour of trouble was silent forever. And the love that had watched over her in sickness and health was wafted from earth to heaven. As the horror of desolation crept over her, and the future for an instant loomed darkly before her eyes, without the being who had made even poverty seem possible to bear, she raised her head in the defiance of despair. "I cannot do without you. You must come back, oh, mother!"

And then she slipped down upon the floor, a merciful faintness granting oblivion, if but for a few minutes, to the soul overburdened with sorrow.

With pitiful tenderness Brian Kerschoyle lifted the small form from the carpet, and looked round for some couch on which to deposit it, but there was none. At that moment, Mrs. Wilson, the landlady, came in, and after one glance at the still white face on the sofa, and the limp helpless form in the stranger's arms, she lifted her hands in sorrowful surprise.

"Dear! dear! dear! I never thought it would come to this! What will the poor lamb do without her?"

"Let me carry her to her room, she will be better there," said Brian in an eager whisper.

"You are right, sir. It would be enough to turn her brain to look upon this when she first comes to. I will show you the way."

Very slowly they proceeded up the narrow staircase, Brian holding the small face close against his breast for fear of knocking it against the wall. Gently he laid her down on the white bed, which she had shared with her mother only the night before. The empty pillow by her side seemed to have such pathos in it even to his comparatively indifferent eyes, that without a word to Mrs. Wilson, he carried it away with him outside the door.

"I need not ask you to be kind to her," he said huskily, for his feelings were stirred beyond their wont.

"No, sir, you needn't," said Mrs Wilson promptly, "I hope I know my duty as a Christian, and I should be worse than a Turk, I should, if I didn't do what I could for that poor young lady. Your room is ready for you, sir, and the fire is burning up nicely."

"Thank you. I wish I were a woman."

"Why ever do you wish that?"

"Because if I were I could go and sit by that poor child's side till she wakes. It would be horrible for her to find herself alone."

"Bless your heart, you needn't trouble about that, of course I am going there myself; but I'll go and make her a drop of coffee to comfort her. I never thought to ask you, sir, if you had had any dinner?"

"Not a bit. And I am ashamed to say I am disgracefully hungry."

"There now, and there's nothing in the house. I could send round the corner and get a chop——"

"Not on any account, on a night like this. Give me some cold beef—anything will do."

"I shall have to send her out, so it don't matter," murmured Mrs. Wilson, hurrying down stairs. On her way she stopped to shut the door of the sitting-room. A shiver ran through her substantial frame. "Oh, Lord! to think we must all come to this," she sighed as she turned away.

Brian placed his services at Muriel's disposal, and she, having no one else to turn to in the whole wide world, accepted them with gratitude. It was he who put the notices in the different papers, and made all the arrangements for the funeral; it was he, who with kindly insistance roused her from the apathy of despair, and tried to make her see that life was not necessarily a barren waste because her most treasured flower was gone. He stayed in Burlington-villas for a whole week, amongst surroundings which were utterly distasteful to him, because he could not bear to leave her alone in her sorrow. He ran up to town in the day-time, but he was always back again in the evening, generally with a bunch of violets in his hand to bring a smile of gratitude at least to the small face which never had been rosy, but was now white as any snowflake.

He followed her mother to the grave—a tribute of respect which he had always been loth to pay to rich relations, for whom he had not cared a straw. And there were tears in his eyes as he turned away, not for the dead, but the living.

The day after the funeral, he arrived from town by the 8.15 train, and found Muriel standing at the door of the sitting-room with a letter in her hand.

"I have heard from my grandfather."

"Ah, it has come at last!"

"What do you mean? How do you know?" raising her eyes to his face in surprise.

"I have been told that your grandfather was an eccentric old gentleman, who could not bear to be alone. He has lost the one who lived with him from a boy, and I thought he would hanker after you. Mayn't I come in, I am rather tired!"

"Oh, certainly; this is the most comfortable chair."

He dropped into the one she drew forward and rested his elbow on the small round table, leaning his head on his hand.

"He wants me to come and live with him; is it not strange?"

"Only strange that he should have waited so long."

Looking up at her graceful little figure draped in its sombre mourning, he tried to picture her as the presiding goddess of his old home, and a sudden longing came over him to go back, to be as he had been for years, the son of the house, the pride of the old man's heart!

But no. He had been scoffed at for his easy going indolence, and a life of work lay before him—work in the dull grey shade of poverty, such as he had never known before, and the sunshine and the golden rest were for this girl, his unconscious successor.

"When do you go?" he asked abruptly.

"To-morrow, he sends the carriage for me at three o'clock; he never seemed to doubt that I should come."

"So soon as that?"

"And, Mr. St. John, I wanted to ask you something." She stopped, her white cheeks flushing with sudden roses.

"Anything I can do for you?"

"Only this," and she fidgeted nervously with a paper-knife lying on the table. "You live in London, so it won't be much trouble. Will you come and see me sometimes?"

A change came over his face, a sudden light into his eyes, then he turned them resolutely away.

"No," he said very low, "I can't do that."

"If you don't wish to, never mind. And cut to the quick at the unexpected rebuff, she bit her lip to keep back her tears.

"I should always like to come wherever you are," constraining himself to outward calm, although his heart beat furiously; "but I should not be welcome in Berkeley-square. Stay, here are some violets which I brought you."

"I don't want them," and she dashed them down on the floor. "You are most unkind, and I wish I had never known you." Then she buried her face in her hands and burst into a passion of tears.

He rose to his feet, and came towards her, moved by an ungovernable impulse. 'Muriel,' he began in a tone of the utmost tenderness, as his eyes rested lovingly on her bowed head. He stretched out his arms, as if to gather her to the honest shelter of his breast, but the recollection came over him that he was a pauper, without prospect or career, and his arms dropped down by his side, a chill came over the glow of passion, and with a face as white as death he looked down at her, longing to speak, but held back by the curb of his honour.

There was a silence, broken only by her fast subsiding sobs and the patter of the raindrops against the window.

"Good-bye," he said very gently. "When you want a friend, I hope you will think of me."

She started from her seat.

"Oh, Mr. St. John, can you forgive me?"

"Yes, and remember that I am very glad to have known you, however sorry you may be!" Then he hurried to the door, not trusting himself to look into her face.

"Oh let me shake hands with you, or I shall think you are angry still," and she came after him with two little hands held out, like a penitent child.

No use struggling against fate; if she would have it so—so it must be. He turned and caught them in both his own, holding them in so tight a grasp that it was absolute pain.

"I shall never—never forget how good you have been to me," and her sweet mouth quivered and tear-drops glistened on her lashes. "If it hadn't been for you, I must have gone mad, or died. Do think of me sometimes, even if you never come."

A knife seemed to pierce his heart, his chest heaved.

"Child, I shall always think of you," he answered brokenly, "till I'm under the sod." Then he stooped and kissed her forehead with the gravity of an elder brother, and dropping her hands quickly, left the room. He was afraid to trust himself another moment within sight of her lovely troubled face, lest his control should give way.

CANADA'S "SOO" CANAL.

She Will Have an Independent Route to the Atlantic.

The New York "Times" thus speaks of the canal now under construction at the Canadian "Soo":—

The Dominion Government is constructing a three-million-dollar canal on the Canadian side at Sault Ste. Marie. Two years more will witness Canada in the enjoyment of an independent route from the head of Lake Superior to the Atlantic sea-board. The United States cannot enjoy the same advantage, as American vessels sailing from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario are dependent on the Welland Canal, a waterway traversing Canadian territory.

This great canal now under construction at the "Soo" will be a triumph of engineering skill. It has been clamored for by politicians for two generations. Even the Government organs admit that no pressing necessity for the canal exists, but in the completion of the last link in the Canadian route they all see an evidence of the determination of Canada to work out her own destiny on the American continent. What the future has in store for Canada time alone will tell. Whether Canada becomes an independent republic or seeks absorption in the United States, the fact remains that the dominion Government is wasting no opportunity to develop the latent germ of nationalism.

The "Soo" Canal will rank with the canals on the American side. The engineers are to overcome great obstacles, and deserve no ordinary praise for the boldness of their design. The canal is to traverse Ste. Marie Island in St. Mary's River. It's length will be 3,500 feet. The canal proper is to consist of a channel way, massive pier work at both entrances, and a lifting and a guard lock. The prism of the canal will be sunk to a depth of 18 feet below the lowest known stages of the river, above and below the guard lock. The summit level will possess a mean width of 150 feat, or a bottom width of 145 feet, the sectional area of water being 2, 700 square feet.

The plans provide for a look 600 feet long between its gates, with a mean width of 85 feet in the chamber, diminishing at both ends but on opposite sides, to a mean width of 60 feet at the gates. The walls will form a height of 41½ feet. The gates are to be opened by hydraulic power nearly similar to that used on the American side, but the mode of filling and emptying the lock will be different.

A trench will be built on both sides of the canal for its full length down to the level of the bottom and will be filled with puddle up to the water surface

It is proposed to establish direct steamship communication between Arbroath and London.

LONDON OF OLD.

A Glimpse of the Great City in the Earlier Centuries.

London is one of the oldest cities in the world, and no authentic date can be assigned to its foundation. Many treatises have been written since Tacitus on the one hand and Milton on the other severally propounded their Trojan, Celtic, and British theories. Its name, legends, and renown, together with its marvellous growth, have awakened many an historic echo, and inspired eloquent and poetic pens.

It is a startling thought, as we look on the myriad buildings, churches, and warehouses, with the rushing crowds which surround them, that there was a time when forests came down to the margin of the river Thames, and wild beasts roamed about in them—when the rising grounds and partially cleared glades were occupied by rude huts scattered here and there, and skin-clad aborigines herded their cattle and mended their nets on the site of the greatest city the world has ever seen.

The record of the gradual growth of London abounds with interest, whether we regard the causes or their operation. Its history is closely connected with civilization, liberty, and art; and many a landmark remains by which we can trace its progress and recall its ancient features. Our imagination is enabled to rebuild its massive walls and to re-people its civil and ecclesiastical edifices—to follow the footsteps of Britons, Romans, Danes, and Normans, as they successively lorded over it, and thus to learn something of their habits and customs; and although the fragments are fast vanishing before the march of modern improvements, enough remains to afford pleasure and profit in our researches. We can disinter noted spots and describe their hallowed memories; can explore their highways and byways; and can adduce much collateral evidence as to men and things connected with the Great Metropolis.

It is impossible at the present time to define the beginnings and endings of London. 'As well," says a writer, "might we try to determine the lines of demarcation in the distinct yet blended colors of the rainbow." The suburbs melt and fade into the country, and each year the circle around the city grows wider. It has been said that the inhabitants of the mighty conglomeration of houses, streets, squares, and warehouses which make up the royal city have hardly more definite ideas of its vastness than have the fishes of the wide Atlantic of the immensity of the ocean in which they swim.

Our minds cannot adequately grasp the enormous area, or properly apprehend the meaning of a circuit of one hundred and twenty square miles, containing more people than the whole kingdom of Scotland. Were the houses set less than a yard apart, the line would reach from Land's End to John o' Groat's, thence to the South Foreland, and back again along the coast to our starting place; in all, a vast triangle of about two thousand five hundred miles.

It is not, however, the London of to-day to which we seek to introduce our readers, but the London of medieval times. We will suppose that our first traveller hails from the Continent—perchance a soldier returning from the wars of Germany, France or Italy. He may be a scholar or learned doctor from Padua, or a merchant from the Low Countries, Genoa, or Venice. He has crossed the narrow sea, and being a man of knowledge and intelligence, has gathered folklore as he journeyed from Dover through the pleasant fields and gardens of Kent. It is summer-time, and the orchards, vines, crops, and flowers are in full bloom or promise amidst the quiet beauty of the landscape. He has marked with the keenness of the archæologist and the reverence of the Christian the many village churches, which add charms to every succeeding prospect, and which well repay close and careful examination. Then, as now, the chime of their sweet and sonorous bells sounded through the quiet air. He sees the gabled cottages with clustering vines and creepers, the picturesque rambling farmhouses, with tall chimneys and far projecting eaves—the more substantial granges with quaint oriels, bold porches, and high roofs, surrounded by moats, now dry and green—and the stately mansions of England's chivalry, bristling yet with battlement and bastion, but becoming pierced by external openings for exit and for light—sure sign of dawning security and peace.

As he passed through Canterbury, our traveller pauses to pay his devotions in the majestic cathedral, venerable in age and associations. He has knelt before the glittering shrine of St. Thomas a Becket, soon to be despoiled; and has provided himself with relics as mementoes at Harbledown. He pursues the well-trodden pilgrim-way under the white cliffs and the breezy downs, through many a straggling village and sleepy town, till he reaches Dartford, the first posting station out of London. Here all is activity night and day with relays of post and pack horses prompt for service of courtiers, couriers, and merchants. Black—then Bleak—Hill is reached and left behind, and Eltham's royal palace in the height of its splendour—now, alas! a farmhouse, and its high festal Hall a barn. Many conventual buildings repose around with full array of monastic appurtenances.

Entering the Kent Road or Street, he arrives at the boundary of London ries, like St. Thomas-a-Watering, the precise spot being at the present junction of Albany Street with the old road. Hither the Lord Mayor and sheriffs were wont to come annually in civic state to inspect the boundaries, and, as a stream flowed over the road, the citizens used jocularly to speak of "going over the water." This spring was dedicated to St. Thomas of Canterbury, and gave the place its name. King Henry V. was here welcomed on his triumphant return from France after the victory at Agincourt; and Hall records "the solemn procession landing and praising God for the high honour and victory to Him given and granted." A gallows was erected near at hand, on which frequent executions took place. One of the quarters of the unfortunate and misguided Sir Thomas Wyatt, who led the Kentish men against Queen Mary, was exposed at St. Thomas-a-Watering in 1554; and the last execution took place in 1760. All signs of the locality have long been obliterated, and few among the passers-by have any knowledge of those scenes of pageantry and of blood. Gerarde, the great herbalist and botanist, who died in 1607, says the wild willow-herb is to be found nigh to the place of execution at St. Thomas-a-Watering.

Southwark begins where the country road ends, and comprises an area larger than the city itself. It was in far-off times mostly a dull and dreary marsh or swamp, where the wildfowl and bittern found a home, and extended from the river southward to those rising grounds now known as Clapham, Streatham, and Brixton. Islets rose above the waste of ooze and water; and a straggling forest, affording lurking-places for evil doers, grew around. In 1578 there was a presentment made to Burleigh by Fleetwood the Recorder, who urges that "the south side is dark and shadowed with trees, affording an admirable place for such doings a bower for conspirators," &c.

The Roman had embanked the shore of the Thames, had formed the broad highways of the Watling and Ermine Streets through the morass and forests, and had probably constructed a bridge to connect the shores. Remains of villas and other buildings, together with arms, urns, tiles, and coins, have been found in abundance all along the road in the stratifications of two thousand years. The Danish vikings afterwards moored their war-galleys in the creeks and along the shore, when, in their frequent and audacious descents, they ravaged London, carrying desolation and dismay alike into the home, the palace, and the church. The Saxons subsequently fortified the suburb, using the old Roman material, whilst they in their turn were dispossessed by the conquering Norman William in 1066, who speedily bestowed the best and richest portions of the land on the priests. From Lambeth westwards, to Bermonds-Eye on the east, nearly all belonged to the Church, as did also about two-thirds of the city of London. Then arose abbeys, priories, and monastic institutions of all kinds, stately edifices and palatial dwellings, with all the appurtenances of ecclesiastical domination and wealth.

The name Southwark has been spelled by chroniclers in twenty-seven different ways; but the meaning is the same—the south work or fortification of London. The place has a share in the great history of the times, and was the avenue along which most foreigners came. Many notable personages are associated with its chronicles; and innumerable processions, regal, civil, ecclesiastical, and military, have flitted in rapid succession over its raised causeway.

At the time of our traveller, disorders abounded, and the neighborhood was rendered unsafe by reason of a loose and riotous class inhabiting the rude hovels scattered around the low-lying districts on each side of the highway. The reputation of Southwark has always been more or less questionable. In the reign of Edward III. the manor was bestowed on certain religious fraternities, "that they might take order, with the lawless population, and bridle the naughtiness of the said malefactors." Sundry prison-houses had been called into existence, to aid in this laudable mission; and as years went by, they multiplied on every hand. There was the Clink in the liberty of that name, belonging to the bishops of Winchester, situated westward of their palace; the clink, or prison, being especially provided for "the incarceration of those who would bray and babble, or otherwise break the peace of our lord the king." This dismal prison was near to the Bankside, the street still called by its name recalling the site. Near by dwelt Beaumont and Fletcher, Massinger and Oliver Goldsmith, the last of whom in later times had earned a scanty and precarious living as a doctor. Many a righteous man was confined in this noisome jail, and endured with high constancy unjust and cruel treatment; and some prisoners of note languished for years unpitied and alone.

The Marshalsea was so called "as pertaining to the Marshals of England." Offences committed within the verge of the Court, and matters of contempt and of debt, were purged here, often with the whole life of the offender and forfeiture of all his property. The White Lion, also an old hostelry, was one of the many jails; and Stow tells us that it had been so since 1559, and was generally filled with murderers and malefactors; and in the seventeenth century, with those oftentimes misguided though sincere men known as Puritans and quakers. Outside these abodes of horror, filth and starvation clamored in array of utter vagrants, gathered in numbers, to ply by day and by night, the trade of theft and beggary, wandering about either singly and silently, or in companies when robbery upon a larger scale was designed. Through such scenes and amidst such uproar our traveller makes his way, never heeding the scowling looks of evil-disposed men gathered round the doors of low taverns, or under the pent roofs of the stalls scattered sparsely along the highway, a good quarter staff, a stout heart and a strong arm standing him instead amidst the scenes of and lawlessness.

At a football match played last week on the grounds of the North Western University at Evanston, Ill., the captain of one team had an eye so badly injured that he will probably lose it, while one of the opposing team had his jaw badly smashed. There is reason to believe that in the days of Macaulay's New Zealander people will look back upon some of the sports of the present age with much the same feeling that we have with regard to the gladiatorial pastimes of the old Romans.

The tallest chimney in the world is now building near Freiberg in Saxony. It will be 460 feet high, with an inside diameter of 23 feet at the bottom, and 16 feet 6 inches at the top. It will take a million and a half of bricks and the cost is $30,000.

The German naval authorities are said to have been making experiments lately with a torpedo boat built of compressed paper. The vessel is eleven feet long and was found to show great strength and more elasticity when rammed by another boat.

The gala coach in which the Princess Sophie, recently married to the Crown Prince of Greece, rode to her wedding was built for the Count de Chambord in expectation of riding in it to his coronation. The King of Greece bought the coach for 26,000 francs.

A great scandal exists at Bologna in regard to its staple, sausages, which have lately been fraudulently made of diseased horse meat, mixed with pork. Foreign importers refused to take such stuff, and the city's brand in this specialty now stands below par.

The debt of the city of Paris amounts to 790 francs for every man, woman, and child within the city limits. In Frankfort the debt is equivalent to 317 francs per head, in Milan to 218, in Berlin to 154, in the Hague to 136, in Brussels, the most heavily indebted of all European cities, to 1,605.

A Parisian architect, proud of his magnetic powers, sent the bonne amie of one of his friends to sleep the other day, and could not rouse her. Two hours' hard work by a chemist were necessary to bring her to consciousness, and then the amateur mesmerizer and his friends found themselves in custody.

Since 1882 eighty two miles of streets have been built, paved, and drained in Rome, at a cost of $30,000,000, and 3,000 houses erected in large, modern blocks, where old quarters formerly stood, and five new bridges thrown across the Tiber. In consequence of these improvements the old city has been so changed that the visitor of twenty years ago would hardly recognize it.

The profits of the tables at Monte Carlo last year were greater than in any previous year; in fact, they were so satisfactory that the company decided to enlarge the Casino, and the work has been proceeding rapidly all through the summer. So far there have been very few visitors to Monte Carlo this season, and only five tables in the centre room are being played at.

The Convent of Trappists at Mont des Cats, near Lille, France, has been suppressed by the Government, and those of its inmates who are aliens have been ordered to leave the country within twenty-four hours. The measure, though perfectly legal, has aroused the indignation of the leading Catholic organ. Its motive is that there were too many foreigners in the brotherhood.

American wild turkeys have been successfully acclimatized in Austria on that portion of the estate of Count Breuner which is known as the Danubian meadows, and great flocks of them are to be seen in his forests. It is said that a brown Norfolk turkey in England may be made to resemble the American wild bird in color and flavor by cramming it with walnuts, soaked in water, for a week before it is killed.

Baron Dounczal, a French officer proposes that France and Germany should fight on a new principle, each country to have 100,000 men on its side only. At the same time, he is liberal in his offers to Germany, and says that that country may have 10,000 Italians to help it. Of course the Baron is certain that France would remain master of the field. Germany would then have nothing to do but give up Alsace-Lorraine and her standing armies.

The Czar is said to be in constant dread of assassination, and this state of ever present fear, added to the hereditary melancholy of the Romanoff family, has so utterly shattered his nerves that for days together he is practically not responsible for his actions. He also smokes incessantly, and not only endeavors to sustain his spirits by copious libations of champagne and brandy, but has taken to drugging himself with chloral.

MAN-EATING TIGERS.

Facts About them Accumulated in India.

At the last meeting of the Bombay Natural History Society, Mr. Gilbert, a well-known shikaree, read a paper on man-eating tigers, of which a brief report is given in the London Times. He says that the popular idea of the man eater is wholly incorrect. He is commonly supposed to be "an old brute, more often decrepit than otherwise, perhaps lamed from some former wound, with his teeth broken and his skin always mangy, unable from his infirmities to kill game, but obliged to conceal himself near a village path and then to pounce on some solitary human being and devour him, never attacking when there are more then two or three persons together, and always displaying great cunning."

Sir William Hunter takes this view, and describes the man-eater as generally an old beast disabled from overtaking his usual prey, and who seems to accumulate his tale of victims in sheer cruelty rather than for food. Sir William Hunter mentions a man-eater who was known to have killed 108 people in three years, and another which killed an average of 80 persons a year for the same period. A third caused 13 villages to be abandoned and 250 square miles of land to be thrown out of cultivation. A fourth killed 127 persons in a year and stopped a public road for many weeks.

Mr. Gilbert, however, says that these views as to the man-eater are quite erroneous. They are not different from the ordinary tiger which lives on game and bullocks, but he does not say why they become man-eaters. Sir Joseph Fayrer suggests that it is by the accident of having once tasted human flesh and then finding all other flesh insipid.

Mr. Gilbert mentions certain famous man eaters. One, a tigress, in the Nagpur district, has a fondness for the employes of the Bengal-Nagpur Railway, frequents a tract of country only about nine square miles in area, and is possessed of extraordinary cunning and audacity. This year, up to June, she had killed seven people, besides wounding others. She lives in a rocky and precipitous spur, in which there is a heavy bamboo and other jungle. Several springs of water rise at the foot of the scarps, and there is a cave which shows many signs of being used by her and her family. A big stone just outside the entrance is scored deep and long with many scratches of their claws. In February last, in broad daylight, she carried off one of a gang of permanent-way men from under the eyes of his companions. She has been shot at many times and her cubs killed but she has got off scatheless. Sometimes the man-eater traverses very long distances. Thus the Jaunsar man-eater, which was killed by an officer of the Forest Department, after killing a man in one place, would kill another twenty miles off the next night. This one, also a tigress, frequented a belt of the Himalayas 5,000 to 10,000 feet high, was eventually killed 8,000 feet above the sea. But none of the man-eaters recorded by Mr. Gilbert were decrepit or worn out. They were strong, handsome beasts in their prime.

A European in New Guinea.

The late Dr. Maclay, the Russian ethnologist had some of the most remarkable adventures among the New Guinea natives that have befallen any modern explorer. He was a rather peculiar man, and though he had a thrilling story to tell, nothing could induce him to write a popular account of his experiences. He was engaged when he died in preparing a purely scientific account of his long investigation among the savages of the Pacific, and nobody would ever have known of his hair breadth escapes if he had not told them to friends who gave them currency.

Considering Dr. Maclay's character it is rather amusing to hear from Dr. Finsch of the undignified expedients to which Maclay had to resort to get along with the savages he was the first to visit on the Maclay coast, New Guinea. Finsch learned the facts partly from the natives, whom he recently visited. Maclay had excellent reason for a while to believe that he would be killed unless he could maintain the character of a supernatural being. He thoroughly convinced the natives that he dropped from the moon. He had some fireworks with him, and now and then when he could do so without being closely observed he would set off a piece. The natives gave him credit for being able to spout fire whenever hepleased. They were sure also that he could fly, for sometimes when they left him at one village he was the first to greet them when they reached another. He had taken pains to inform himself of various short cuts through the timber, and when he knew a travelling party intended to make a little detour he would clip it through the woods for the sole purpose of creating a sensation. In many other ways he made a sort of mountebank of himself, all of which must have been decidedly distasteful to one who thought it beneath him to write a popular account of his travels.

A Poisonous Practice.

If housekeepers everywhere would start and maintain a crusade against the sale of undrawn poultry in the markets or by farmers it would work a most wholesome hygienic reform. It is a vicious practice, an abuse, in fact, that people have endured as they have many other abuses, because there is no remedy except in concerted action or legislation. It is impossible to keep undrawn poultry even a few hours, without the beginning of putrefaction from the effects of the gases from the undigested food in the "crop" and intestines. The longer it is kept, the more of the poison goes into the flesh, and in the majority of cases the poultry that reaches the kitchen from the market is actually unfit for food. Housekeepers could well afford to pay a larger price to have the poultry dressed immediately upon being killed—they pay for much weight that is thrown away, as it is, besides having left a mass of poisoned flesh. It is urged that some people prefer the flavor of undressed poultry, but that fact only makes the matter the more alarming, since it indicates that we are cultivating a taste for putrid meat. Can we not have a reform?—[Good Housekeeping.

The greatest beer drinkers are those of Munich. They drink 492 litres per year, against Vienna's 296, London's 254 Berlin's 240, and Paris's 22. This costs the Munich inhabitants on an average $30 a head annually, OCEAN RACERS TO BE LAID OFF.

Doesn't Pay to Run the Atlantic Liners in the Winter.

In sympathy with the decrease in the passenger carrying business all the big European steamship companies are preparing to take off the best boats of their service. The new Teutonic, of the White Star line, will make another trip to this side, and on her return to the Mersey will be laid up in Liverpool harbor for the winter. The City of New York, of the Inmans, will continue her regular transatlantic trips until the holidays, when a few weeks of tinkering will be given her. Her sister ship, the City of Paris, which has will remain in service throughout the winter, next spring and summer. The experiment of running vessels of the size and type of the Paris and New York is occasioning a great deal of interest in maritime circles. The agents of rival lines are a unit in the opinion that the experiment will not pay. It costs more to run the Paris and her consort than any other two racers on the Atlantic, and these rival companies think the winter season cannot produce a sufficient amount of passenger trade to make the candle worth the burning.

SMASHED ALL RECORDS,

The Messrs. Wright, who are the New York agents for the record breakers, do not concur in this belief, and are quite willing to lose or win in the speculation. It will be the first instance of ocean racers being sent across the pond throughout the cold term, and the rival lines will await the result with interest. They are not slow in saying that, aside from the promising reward, there will be great danger and possible disaster in navigating such speedy craft in wild seas and tempestuous weather such as the Atlantic is noted for during the winter.

The Aurania, of the Cunard line, will be dropped from the list in the first part of January. The Gallia will take her place. The Etruria will tie up during February, the Bothnia using her sailing days. The Servia will be hauled off the latter part of February and the Umbria in March. These four vessels are the and each will undergo a five weeks' overhauling in the Liverpool docks. It is expected that the Etruria is to have her compound engines replaced with others of the triple expansion type, but the agents on this side deny any knowledge of the truth of the report. They insist that the Etruria can hold her own with her present machinery, and they do not see the necessity, they say, for a change. La Champagne of the French line will be docked at Havre during December for a general overhauling and La Normandie will take her place. That big white elephant, the city of Rome, has already gone into winter quarters on the other side, and she will not be returned to the Anchor Line service until the spring. Of the Norddeutscher boats the Eibe has been docked for the winter, the Eider has undergone some repairs at Bremen, and the Werra will be tied up about the holidays.

Mere Matter of Form.

"Why do the girls of the period lace so tightly?"

"I don't know—a mere matter of form, I suppose."

A gentleman employed at a colliery near Glasgow had a dog called "Jimmy," which he parted with to a friend at a colliery some miles distant. The collieries are connected by telephone, and on a recent morning the gentleman rang up his friend and asked how Jimmy was doing. "Oh, he's fine," was the answer' "He's at my feet just now, I'll hold him up and see if he knows your voice." This was done, and the former owner shouted over the wire, "Hillo, Jimmy!" Jimmy made no sign of recognition, but on being set down again he at once made for the door, and when his old master went home to dinner the dog was there to welcome him.

John Matthews, a [illegible]monger at Mile End, New Town, Middlesex, dropped dead recently while in the act of committing suicide. The medical man who was called in stated at the inquest that there was a knife wound on deceased's neck, but that it was not sufficient to cause death. The face was congested, and witness believed that the man died instantaneously from an apoplectic fit, while in the very act of cutting his throat.

The sewage settling basin at the disposal works of the city of Southampton, Eng., which has a capacity of about 811,000 cubic feet, has been divided into two parts, thus enabling a continuous treatment, one basin being emptied while the other is filling. The precipitated matter is led, through pipes, to a mixing chamber, where it is mixed with the street sweepings by means of machinery, and is finally sold as fertilizing material. The city's garbage is burnt in what is known as a "destructor."

Not to be outdone by any of their numerous competitors, in the way of granting privileges to their policy holders, the General Board of Directors of the Confederation Life Association has adopted a resolution to free their policies from all restrictions and limitations in regard to residence, travel, and occupation (excepting military service in time of war) after they have been in force for a period of three years. Of this change they have notified their policy holders in the following terms:—"Indisputability. That after this policy shall have been in force for a period of three years it shall, subject only to the conditions regarding military service, proof of age and the due payment of the premium, be thence forward indisputable." Intending insurers will find it to their advantage to acquaint themselves with the workings and rates of this exceedingly popular Company before they finally decide.

Abbotsford is still so popular a resort that the fees paid by tourists usually exceed £400 a year, so that it is twice as profitable to show the place as to let it, for the rent paid by Mr. Thorburn, who has taken it for five years, is only £200 a year.

There is a growing feeling among English churchmen that the remedy for ritual disputes may be found in a bill to facilitate the creation of chapels of ease in parishes where a considerable minority of church people are dissatisfied with the services provided in their parish church.

For two years past there has been an insurance company against burglaries, flourishing in London. According to the regular rates you can insure the contents of your residence from damage to it through burglary, or any special article you desire.

One of the results of the French Exhibition has been to make the London hansom cab very popular in Paris, where it has heretofore been in no special favor.

For many years the Wesleyans have been endeavoring to purchase a site for a chapel at Hatfield, where Lord Salisbury owns almost all the land. He wouldn't sell to them for any price, but at last they have been suited by purchasing from another owner, and have celebrated their victory by a grand fair.

According to recent information cannibalism is very prevalent in some places in west Africa near to the British settlement, if not actually in the protectorate itself, and so serious and frequent has become the kidnapping of individuals who have gone out alone that in some parts persons dare not venture beyond their own town for fear of capture. Several cases are reported to have taken place on the broad road from Bendoomah to Dodo and Kibbim. Six persons were reported to have been killed and eaten.

Morning

See—where the brooding night,
Like a Covering Angel of love,
Enshadows the sleeping Earth from sight,
While her star eyes watch above—

Close—where the curtain fringe
Of her sable draperies seem
To lift from the nestling hills—a tinge
Like the smile in a Seraph's dream;

So faint and far away,
But a glimmer wins the sight,—
A tremulous, sprinting, sparkling spray
From the jewell'd wings of light:

While, from the tassell'd hills—
Where a fairy zephyr plays
In rhyme with the rune of rippling rills—
Comes a low, sweet strain of praise.

Up—like a flash of flame
From Aurora's crystal dome—
Sweeps a herald beam of light, to claim
The waiting earth for a home.

Cloudlets—that seem to lie
By the low horizon's rim,
And float on th' verge of the opening sky,
Far off in the dawn-light, dim—

In crimson frilling glow,
And—like outpost warders, high—
Signal afar to the lands below
Of the glory drawing nigh:

Each radiant hill replies
With a greeting for the light,—
The vales awake, and—enrobed—arise
From the vestal couch of Night:

The nestled songsters wake
In tune with the whispered strain
Of the rustling winds over wood and brake,
And join in the sweet refrain:

The perfumed meadows breathe
Their odorous balms abroad:—
So the birds, the breeze, and the flowers wreathe
A morning hymn to God.

And lo! A moment's hush,
While the shadows flee away—
And life and beauty bloom in the flush
Of the glorious King of day.

LLEWELLYN A. MORRISON.

"The Elms," Toronto.

Unforgotten.

You stepped awhile outside with me;
The night was magical with stars,
And through the curtains fitfully
Came the last waltz's dying bars;
You paler than your dainty lace,
Or that camellia in your hair—
There seemed a spell upon the place,
And nothing but the night was there.

I knelt upon the garden-ground;
Caprice or pity made you stay;
But still my heart ran o'er and drowned
The foolish words I tried to say:
One moment, one, I held your hand,
Ah! fair cold hand! and made my moan;
And then I grew to understand
How men seek bread and find a stone.

But still that waltz is in my head,
Now high, now low, it ebbs and flows,
And still the stars are overhead,
And still I see your scentless rose:
The record rests within my soul
Like lines upon the granite traced;
Though no man's eyes behold the scroll,
It keeps its legend undefaced.

EDWARD SYDNEY TYLEE.

A DEATH DEALING GUN.

The Zalinski Dynamite Projectile.

Even supposing that Lieut. Zalinski does not find some means of increasing the range of his gun, and that a mile remains its limit, the fact that within that limit dynamite projectiles can be used with precision and effect is staggering enough. In the first place land defenses will be given an enormous advantage in any contest between them and ships. In attacking forts in harbors and estuaries, the iron-clads are often obliged to come within a mile of the shore. But if the land batteries are armed with guns throwing dynamite shells, to do so will mean

DESTRUCTION FOR THE SHIPS.

Such projectiles do not merely injure the vessel struck; they extinguish her. Under ordinary circumstances, an armored war ship, though she may run a considerable risk of being disabled by forts if she comes within their fire, has a very fair chance of keeping afloat even if struck. The bombardment of Alexandria, for instance, showed that ships could be hit again and again without serious damage being done to them. But as some experiments made a few months ago with the Zalinski gun proved, the effect of its fire is very different. One of its projectiles was dropped on the deck of a vessel and the explosion that ensued was sufficient to totally wreck the whole structure. Nor were even the misses harmless. So great a column of water was raised by the explosion as to do a great deal of damage in its descent on the object of attack. If, then, the forts at the entrance of the Thames were armed with the dynamite gun it would be impossible for any hostile squadron to force the passage. The batteries could not be destroyed by ships out at sea, as they would be protected by the turns of the river, and whenever they were attacked from close quarters they would be able to reply with far greater power than that possessed by their assailants. In fact the Zalinski gun makes it possible to fire torpedoes through the air, and with the accuracy of rockets. If, then, the effect of the new discovery be such as we have described it, the problem from attack will be immensely simplified. Floating batteries which can be towed to the most convenient points in a harbor or at a river's mouth would soon put places like Liverpool and Newcastle-on-Tyne out of all danger of being raided. A hostile cruiser obliged to keep two miles out to sea, though it might set fire to a few public bulidings, would not be a very formidable enemy. It can, however hardly be supposed that the invention will stop where it is. Everything seems to point to the fact that we shall soon discard ordinary gunpowder for the filling of projectiles. Up till now there has been a difficulty in discharging dynamite and similar compositions form an ordinary cannon, and therefore pneumatic guns, which are comparatively safe, have had to be adopted, in spite of the short distance over which they will throw a shell. Methods of getting over this are, however, being diligently sought for, and we may be certain that before long either the pneumatic guns will be improved, or, what is more probable, some means will be devised for firing dynamite from ordinary artillery.

HOW TO DEFEND OUR COAST

Oriental Justice.

Dr. Henry M. Scudder reports the decision of a case in an Eastern court, in which the nice discrimination of the bench was conspicuous.

Four men, partners in business, bought some cotton bales. That the rats might not destroy the cotton, they purchased a cat. They agreed that each of the four should own a particular leg of the cat; and each adorned with beads and other ornaments the leg thus apportioned to him.

The cat by an accident injured one of its legs. The owner of that member wound about it a rag soaked in oil. The cat going too near the fire, and, being in great pain, rushed in among the cotton bales, where she was accustomed to hunt rats. The cotton thereby took fire and was burned up. It was a total loss.

The three other partners brought an action to recover the value of the cotton against the fourth partner, who owned that particular leg of the cat. The judge examined the case and decided thus:

"The leg that had the oil rag on it was hurt; the cat could not use that leg; in fact, it held up that leg and ran with the other three legs. The three unhurt legs, therefore, carried the fire to the cotton, and are alone culpable. The injured leg is not to be blamed. The three partners who owned the three legs with which the cat ran to the cotton will pay the whole value of the bales to the partner who was the proprietor of the injured leg."

The Pardon Came Too Late.

Recently a man was executed at Ossuna, in Andalusia, for murder. Up to the last moment the wretched convict, who had been placed in the chapel for 24 hours with a priest from a Hermandad of Peace and Charity, according to Spanish custom, expected a reprieve, because the local authorities and corporations, even in Seville, had made powerful efforts to induce the Government to advise Queen Christina to commute the death sentence into one of penal servitude for life. Now it seems that the Government not only recommended the reprieve, but that the Queen Regent actually signed it, and orders were telegraphed to insert her decision in the Madrid "Gazette," and to forward it to Ossuna. The authorities caused the usual delays, and the telegram that announced the reprieve arrived only when the convict had already been executed. The shocking affair has created a painful impression at Ossuna and Seville, and is commented upon in the severest terms by several Madrid papers as a terrible illustration of the defects of the telegraph service, which prevented the Royal pardon from being sent in proper time.

To fill the office of Judge in the horse-ring at the larger fairs is not now the easy position it was a very few years ago. A prominent horseman remarked at one of the late shows that it required a thorough knowledge of all points in the horse to determine the best animal now, so much has breeding improved. This is as it should be, and time will show that care in selecting sires of the best blood is the most profitable for the breeder notwithstanding the apparent extra expense.

The offices of the Fourth Division Court seem likely to be fixed permanently in Dutton at no distant day. The clerk of the court, A. N. C. Black, is a permanent resident of Dutton, and the bailiff, D. McGregor will no doubt move here shortly. The business has been arranged so that the clerk will have his office in Dutton three days in the week in future. The change will make it far more convenient for the officers and the public, and the sooner it is made the better.

The local newspaper should be found in every home. No children will grow up ignorant who can appreciate the home paper. It is the stepping stone to intelligence in all these matters not to be learned in books. Give your children a foreign paper which contains not one word about any person, place or thing they ever saw or perhaps ever heard of, and how can you expect them to be interested? But let them have the home paper and let them read of persons whom they meet and of places with which they are familar, and soon an interest is awakened which increases with every weekly arrival of the local paper; thus a habit of reading is formed and those children will read the papers all their lives and become intelligent men and women, a credit to their ancestors, strong in their knowledge of the world as it is to-day.

Some time ago it looked as if one or two continental countries were disposed to monopolize the newly-invented smokeless powder, but it turns out to be a regular article of commerce, and the United States Government has followed the example of Great Britain and arranged with the German company that controls the patent for a full supply at an early date. No matter how the battles in the future begin, they will not wind up in smoke.

Toronto Saturday Night's Christmas Number just issued is the most artistic Christmas number ever printed in Canada. It consists of forty pages of pictures, song and story, all original and illustrative of Canadian life, and one which when mailed to friends in the old land will not compare unfavorably with the best productions of London and Paris. A dozen full-page illustrations, all by Canadian artists and engraved and lithographed without regard to expense, will lend a great attractiveness to the edition, and in every page some charming picture relieves the text. A host of poets, fiction writers and essayists have contributed, while sketches, fairy tales and many charming things for children are provided by other contributors. This holiday number so far surpasses the one issued last year by Saturday Night that no comparison can be made. If you wish to send a Christmas souvenir to a friend abroad, nothing will be more appreciated than Saturday Night's holiday number. The art pictures are not copies of Old Country engravings, nor a job lot of lithographs, but exquisite photogravures of Canadian subjects. Not a line of reprint nor a copied picture appears in the whole forty pages. The paper throughout is heavily glazed; the printing cannot be excelled, and the cover with its heavy gold margin, contains a realistic Rocky Mountain sketch. Price, thirty cents at all book stores or address: THE SHEPPARD PUBLISHING CO., 9 Adelaide St. West, Toronto.

TEMPERANCE TALK.

CONTRIBUTED BY THE LADIES

The constant warfare going on between truth and error, good and evil, is brought clearly to view in connection with the fight against the liquor traffic. Our forefathers knew little of this battle; they looked upon liquor as a necessity, and called it a "good creature of God." They drank at weddings, baptisms and funerals; in times of gladness and in seasons of sorrow; when they met to make a bargain or to have a social chat; at all times and places it seemed right to take a glass. In spite of this many lived to a good old age and filled honorable positions in society; but, alas! how many fell a prey to evil habits, lost their manliness and honor, and early filled a drunkard's grave. Did you ever think how much larger our population would have been; how much more industrious; how much more clear-brained if the devil had never got any of his agents to make liquor? And is it not probable that the drinking customs of a former generation are partly to blame for the over-full asylums of to-day? Thank God! we have clearer light on this question than had our fore-fathers; they did not see its evil as we see it; had they done so many of the noble and true would have abstained from all intoxicants rather than transmit to future generations the seeds of weakness and disease. But how is this battle going? Will the truth win the day. Most surely. Sometimes a temporary defeat may check the enthusiam of those engaged in the battle, but

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers,
While Error, wounded, writhes in pain
And dies amid her worshippers."

If we want to see what has been accomplished let us compare the customs of to-day with those of fifty years ago. Then the decanter was in every cupboard, to-day, in the great majority of Canadian homes, it is not thought necessary to use liquor as a beverage. If kept at all it is used only as a medicine in cases of great need. In the olden time people were thought mean who could not offer a caller a glass; now respectable people would not think of doing so. While people think the Scott Act has been a failure (?) it put liquor selling under the ban of the law and that made liquor drinking somewhat less respectable, We might note many ways in which the truth is leavening society, but must not take up too much space. Let not temperance workers be discouraged, we are on the side of God and right and we must conquer.

"'Tis coming up the step of time
And this old world is growing brighter;
We may not see it dawn sublime,
Yet high hopes make the heart throb lighter.
We may be sleeping in the ground
When it awakes the world in wonder;
But we have felt it gathering round
And heard its voice in living thunder.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming"

A. H. Hewetson, an English engineer, who has been inspecting the Panama Canal, believes that it would be impossible to complete the work on a paying basis. He estimates that to finish the canal on a level, with merely a tide-lock, would cost $400,000,000. Even French believers in this gigantic fraud must experience a shattering of their faith when such showings are made by men who know whereof they speak.

COLD IN HEAD — CATARRH — THE 4 STAGES — CONSUMPTION — DEATH.

There is positive danger to health and life in neglecting a case of Cold in the Head or Catarrh, and at this season with its changeable weather, unusual moisture and sudden changes from heat to cold, there is peculiar liability to cold in the head. A neglected case of Cold in the Head rapidly developes into Catarrh, and neglected Catarrh, just as certainly developes into Consumption and leads to premature Death. Medical testimony proves conclusively that a large percentage of the deaths occurring from Consumption had their origin in a neglected Cold, which by gradual stages, developed in Catarrh, and then into Consumption, that dread disesse with which medical science is as yet unable to cope successfully. If you are suffering from Cold in the head, or from any of the numerous symptoms of Catarrh, such as bad breath, dull oppressive headaches, droppings from the head into the throat, hawking and spitting, copious discharges from the nostrils, losing sense of smell, or taste becoming dull, hacking cough, or a general feeling of debility, husky voice, a wheezing or cracking sound in your chest when breathing, a feeling of dizziness, particularly when stooping, a feeling of tiredness and indisposition to exertion, a feeling of nausea in the morning when attempting to dislodge accumulations in the throat. Do not neglect them. These but a few of the many symptoms of Catarrh, and if you experience any, be warned in time. Do not permit them to run under the mistaken impression that the disease will eventually wear away. It will not, but on the contrary will wear you away as it has thousands before you. Procure at once a bottle of NASAL BALM, the only certain and speedy cure ever offered to the public for Cold in the Head and Catarrh. This is no idle assertion, but an unquestionable fact, which is verified by the thousands of testimonials in our possession telling of marvellous cures. These testimonials we have received from all parts of the Dominion, and we append a few, selected at random; as a fair sample of the whole:—

Mr. Alex. Burns, of Sudbury, Ont., says:—Gents, I may state that I have been affected with Catarrh for seven or eight years, and it was attended with consequent symptoms such as foul breath, constant dropping into the throat, hawking and spitting, partial deafness, ringing in the ears, and sickening pain in the head, directly over either eye. I have used powders and douches, but all to no effect, the only result arising from the use of such was temporary relief, followed by the usual symptoms in a more aggravated form. The results arising from the use of Nasal Balm are sweet breath, stoppage of droppings into the throat (consequently less hawking and spitting), clearness of hearing, and not once since I began its use have I had pain in my head. In fact it is my opinion that a careful and persistent use of the "Balm" will effect a cure in the worst case of catarrh.

James H. McLeod, Mink River Road, N. S., says:—I have tried other remedies for Catarrh, but received little or no good from them. Your NASAL BALM is certainly the BEST REMEDY I have tried, and all you claim for it. The fact that it is pleasant and convenient to use adds greatly to its value, but its chief worth lies in being a CERTAIN CURE for that unpleasant disease—Catarrh.

W. Chas. Hanley, postmaster, Spy Bay, N. S., says:—I submit the following to the public that any who may be afflicted may be benefitted by the same remedy. Two bottles of your NASAL BALM has RESTORED to PERFECT HEALTH a four year old child of ours, suffering from Catarrh.

Henrietta Blackwell, Parker, Ont., says:—Your NASAL BALM is the BEST REMEDY I have yet used for Catarrh. I can breath more freely than before and my breath has regained its sweetness. I consider NASAL BALM a boon to the suffering.

Miss Maggie M. Martin, Terwood, Pa., says:—Through a friend in Canada I became acquainted with your NASAL BALM. I have suffered for years with Catarrh, and it is the first remedy from which I have experienced relief, and I feel certain it will cure me.

Miss Minnie McNairn, Mille Roches, Ont., says:—Your bottle of NASAL BALM did me much good. The pain in my head disappeared before I had used the bottle, and I find myself receiving the greatest benefit. I am certain that NASAL BALM will cure my Catarrh if its use is perserved in.

Mr John H. Adams, merchant, Brantford, Ont., says:—I have used NASAL BALM for Catarrh, and found it to be a CERTAIN CURE

W. A. Doyle, Beulah, Man., writes:—As a family medicine to check Catarrhal affections or Cold in the Head, NASAL BALM HAS NO EQUAL. We prize it highly.

Mr. A. Schlenzig, Toronto, says:—For a number of years my wife has been badly troubled with Catarrh. Dr. ——— here promised to cure her, but after using his remedy for six months she became weaker than before, and I found that I had spent $36 for medical treatment that did no good. My wife then began to use your NASAL BALM and has improved wonderfully, and she is better and stronger than for years. Your remedy is the best in the market and you can use this as testimony.

Emilie Pellitier, Grenville, says.—I can scarcely find words to tell how highly I prize NASAL BALM. Its effects in my case have been wonderful.

Alpha H. Dales, Tarbert, Ont., writes: Your NASAL BALM has made a new man of me. I nave never used a remedy so satisfactory.

A CAUTION:—Beware of imitations. If your dealer has not NASAL BALM in stock do not let him persuade you to take any other remedy which he may say is just as good, but send direct to the undersigned and it will be sent you on receipt of price—50 cents and $1 a bottle.

West Lorne.

Dec. 4th,—The concert given by Prof. Church and the leading local talent in McKillop's hall Tuesday evening was better patronized than the affair deferved, as the performance was hardly up to the general standard.

Our Gun Club has sustained another defeat at the hands of the Palmyra Rangers.

About 2,30 this morning an alarm of fire was raised by the M. C. R. night operator here. The fire was found to be in a frame building adjoining the Commercial hotel, owned by B. Partridge and used as a store room and workshop. The upper story was occupied by the Masons as a lodge room. The citizens responded nobly to the call and kept the fire from spreading to the hotel proper. The losses will be in the neighborhood of $800, which is partly covered by insurance, but the exact amount cannot be ascertained at present.

OCEANS OF MILK.

An Estimate of One of the Great Industries of this Country.

"There are $2,000,500,000 invested in the dairying business in this country," said a citizen with a predilection for statistics. "That amount is almost double the money invested in banking and commercial industries. It is estimated that it requires 15,000,000 cows to supply the demand of milk and its products in the United States. To feed these cows 60,000,000 acres of land are under cultivation. The agriculture and dairy machinery and implements in use are worth over $200,000,000. The men employed in the business number 750,000 and the horses over 1,000,000. The horses and cows consume annually 30,000,000 tons of hay, nearly 90,000,000 bushels of cornmeal, about the same amount of oatmeal, 275,000,000 bushels of oats, 2,000,000 bushels of bran, and 30,000,000 bushels of corn, to say nothing of the brewery grains, sprouts, and other questionable feed of various kinds that are used to a great extent. It costs $450,000,000 to feed these cows and horses. The average price paid to the laborer necessary in the dairy business is probably $20 a month, amounting to $180,000,000 a year.

"The average cow yields about 450 gallons of milk a year, which gives a total product of 6,750,000,000 gallons. Twelve cents a gallon is a fair price to estimate the value of this milk at, a total return to the dairy farmers of $810,000,000, if they sold all their milk as milk. But 50 per cent. of the milk is made into cheese and butter. It takes 27 pounds of milk to make one pound of butter, and about 10 pounds to make one of cheese. There is the same amount of nutrition in 8½ pounds of milk that there is in 1 pound of beef. A fat steer furnishes 50 per cent. of boneless beef, but it would require about 24,000,000 steers, weighing 1,500 pounds each, to produce the same amount of nutrition as the annual milk product does."—Philadelphia News.

Celebrating his 115th Birthday.

William Johnson Barnes, for eight years past an inmate of the almshouse, and for many years a most familiar character about the streets of Louisville, came in from that institution yesterday to celebrate, in a quiet way, his 115th birthday. With the mercury in the vicinity of the nineties, the aged negro plodded his way up five flights of the stairs to the top floor of the Courier-Journal building, wearing two great coats and clothed as if for the dead of winter. When asked why he wore such heavy garments on such a warm day, he replied that it was an "awful chilly" day to him, and he didn't want to catch cold. The old man shook hands with several gentlemen he knew in his younger days, forty or fifty years ago, and said that he would not be around till next year, when he would celebrate again. He declared that he was 115 years of age and claims to have papers at the almshouse substantiating his statement.

Barnes, according to his assertions, was born in Snowhill county, on the eastern shore of Maryland, in 1774. He came to Louisville when there were but seven brick houses here, with Mr. Richard Barnes and his family, by whom he was owned. He was freed by Mr. Barnes and went to Mobile, where he shipped as pantryman on one of the immense steamers out of that port. After the war he came to Louisville and shipped as pantryman and barkeeper on one of the largest boats plying between this city and New Orleans. He ran on two boats with Capt. Frank G. Carter, and was also for some time pantryman of the Louisville Hotel. Eight years ago his age began to show itself, and dragged down by phthisic, neuralgia, rheumatism, and suffering with cataracts over both eyes, and with badly frozen feet, he went to the almshouse to spend his remaining days.

Sufferers

FROM Stomach and Liver derangements—Dyspepsia, Biliousness, Sick-Headache, and Constipation—find a safe and certain relief in Ayer's Pills. In all cases where a cathartic is needed, these Pills are recommended by leading physicians.

Dr. T. E. Hastings, of Baltimore, says: "Ayer's Pills are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of my profession."

Dr. John W. Brown, of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I have prescribed Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

"For a number of years I was afflicted with biliousness which almost destroyed my health. I tried various remedies, but nothing afforded me any relief until I began to take Ayer's Pills."—G. S. Wanderlich, Scranton, Pa.

"I have used Ayer's Pills for the past thirty years, and am satisfied I should not be alive to-day if it had not been for them. They cured me of dyspepsia when all other remedies failed, and their occasional use has kept me in a healthy condition ever since."—T. P. Brown, Chester, Pa.

"Having been subject, for years, to constipation, without being able to find much relief, I at last tried Ayer's Pills, and deem it both a duty and a pleasure to testify that I have derived great benefit from their use. For over two years past I have taken one of these Pills every night before retiring. I would not willingly be without them."—G. W. Bowman, 26 East Main st., Carlisle, Pa.

"Ayer's Pills have been used in my family upwards of twenty years, and have completely verified all that is claimed for them. In attacks of piles, from which I suffered many years, they afforded me greater relief than any medicine I ever tried."—Thomas F. Adams, Holly Springs, Texas.

PASSING NOTES.

The New York brewers have subscribed nearly half a million dollars for the purpose of securing the World's Fair. There is something touching in this simple trust that the visitors to the World's Fair will drink beer.

The American Consul at Fort Erie complains in his last official report of the Canadian system of appraisement for duty. He says the official valuation set upon imports is far in excess of the actual value at the point at which the goods are purchased.

Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote so small a hand that he would often put fifteen hundred words on a page of ordinary letter paper. His son Julian writes a hand nearly as small as that. The son's manuscripts, however, are absolutely neat, which could not be said always of the father's.

A young man who died in Winnipeg recently left $2,000 of life assurance to a young woman whom he loved. The young woman did not reciprocate his love, but she has no objection to the $2,000, which she has formally claimed. It will strike the casual observer that she is not lacking either in assurance or policy.

A clergyman in Minneapolis recently horrified his congregation by denying his belief in the Bible and Christianity. And then when he had got everybody on the tenter-hooks of suspense, he closed his sermon by saying that his denial was a little ruse for the purpose of waking them up and arousing their interest. That clergyman would be much more useful in a minstrel troupe than in the ministry.

The English papers have not been slow to note that by the deposition of the Emperor Pedro of Brazil the American continent has got rid of the last of its sovereigns. The New York Post points out that Pedro's manner of disappearing shows how commercial is the age in which we live. He agreed to take a sum in cash and an annuity for his "divine right," and, having got both, stepped on board ship and was gone.

A typically ignorant juryman has been found in Iowa. He could name only eight States of the Union and three presidents. He was firmly of the opinion that England is in Africa, and that Canada is "out somewhere beyond California." This juryman should be thoroughly competent to give a prisoner a fair trial. He has not got his head filled with the nonsense which the Common Schools put into people's heads.

In the year ending September 30, 1889, the New York elevated railway cars carried 179,497,433 passengers. This is an average of about one hundred trips for every man, woman and child in New York. The fares amounted to nearly nine million dollars. Since the roads were opened the number of persons carried was 1,202,920,332. This represents receipts of sixty million dollars. Here seems to be a chance for New York to make money by owning these roads.

Wherever the World's Fair of 1892 may be held—either in Chicago or in New York—it appears to be taken for granted that one of the features of the show must be a colossal structure of some sort which will cast the Eiffel tower in the shade. In the meantime, however, St. Paul proposes to do something in this line at her next winter carnival, the present scheme being the construction of an ice tower 150 feet in diameter at the base and 250 feet high. What is Montreal going to do about this? Is there to be a carnival at all there this winter?

Lord Armstrong says, in reference to the recent criticisms of the great guns that the 110 ton gun principally considered has been unfairly tried by the British Government, as it had been fired with charges amounting to over a thousand pounds of power, or more than the maximum charge calculated for a battle. He does not say that the great guns are judicious weapons, but the injury which would incapacitate them will come from the erosion of the bore from the excessive powder charges rather than from the strain of the explosion.

Our countrymen should not be singled out alone for criticism of their apparent lack of sympathy and reverence for the antique, the historic and sentimental. During the present year the English allowed the house in which Byron was born to be pulled down, and the French permitted the cottage at Barbizon to be razed to the ground where Millet lived for the greater part of his life. The lease to Mme. Millet having run out, the owner of the ground would not renew it, owing to the rise of values consequent on the fame brought upon the village by Millet, Rousseau, Corot, and their friends and admirers.

There will be no ice palace at St. Paul this season. Instead of it there will be an ice tower, 150 feet in diameter and 250 feet high. Forty feet from the ground, outside the tower, is a gallery, the starting point of the toboggan slide, which proceeds spirally about the tower to the base, where the toboggan, having a tremendous impetus, may shoot over the surface of the ice on the river 3,000 or 4,000 feet. The portion of the toboggan slide round the tower is protected on the outside by a high ice balustrade, which will keep the toboggan from jumping the track. A spiral toboggan slide may be a brilliant idea, but we are harassed with anxiety for the heads and stomachs of the sliders.

Complaints of injury to business by reason of the lack of freight cars are quite as loud and as frequent in the United States as in Canada. For some weeks past the rolling stock of nearly every railroad in the country has been entirely inadequate to meet the demands made upon it. On one line it is estimated that 2,000 additional cars could have been used, while an official of another states that he has been short 400 cars per day for through freight alone. The Pennsylvania and some other Eastern roads made preparations to accommodate the rush of autumn business, but even they have not been able to move their freight as fast as they intended.

Our neighbours are about to show the world that they have a brand new navy In a few days the four recently completed cruisers—the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Yorktown—will set sail for the Mediterranean under the command of Rear-Admiral John G. Walker, late Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. The squadron will be the most formidable that has ever left an American port, we are told, and it is going abroad "for the double purpose of showing foreigners that the United States does have a navy, and for exercising officers and men in the 'evolutions of a squadron,' which now for the first time can be attempted with the new ships of war." Uncle Sam is very proud of the fact that he has at least a fleet which will not provoke the derision of the effete monarchies of the World.

ENGLAND'S FUTURE QUEEN.

The Young Woman Who Will Probably Wed Prince Albert Victor.

I hear from a high English source, says a Paris letter to the New York "Tribune," that the Princess Feodore of Schleswig-Holstein, who did the Eiffel tower the other day, chaperoned by her elderly maiden aunt, Amelie, of the same house, is in all likelihood the coming Princess Albert Victor of Wales. She is a sister of the German empress and a niece of Prince Christian, the dull old husband of the best of Queen Victoria's daughters, is going on 16, looks a good sort of girl, and is almost pretty. But she is not likely to improve when the bloom of youth departs, and she wants winsome graces. Evidently she has not come to her full height. When she does she will probably be as tall as her imperal sister.

The queen would like to secure her the crown of Great Britian, because she is descended from her majesty's mother, the duchess of Kent, whose first husband was Prince Leiningen. Princess Feodore has been a great deal here with a party of aristocratic English friends, some of whom are connections of her aunt-in-law on the maternal side, Countess Gleichen. Count Gleichen abandoned his high-born German status to marry Laura Seymour, and is a professional sculptor, high in the queen's favor. Against German etiquette she has been latterly styling them both serene highnesses. An objection to the proposed royal match is that the young lady's mother is in a madhouse. There is already more than a touch of insanity in the royal family of England.

The Future of Cities.

We can draw no reliable inferences for this age beyond the present century as to the growth of cities. The growth of cities of this century is without parallel or precedent in previous ages. Rome reached a population variously estimated from 500,000 to 2,250,000 (say 1,000,000), and was the only great city in Europe according to a mordern standard. Alexandria with a population of between 500,000 and 1,000,000 was the one city of the first rank in Africa. Jerusalem was alone in Asia. In the Middle Ages there was no city of great size. London 300 years ago was much smaller than Boston; 200 years ago it had 670 000 people—less than Chicago claims. It was not until the American Revolution that London was as large as Philadelphia is to-day. Fifty years ago it did not equal present New York and Brooklyn. In 1880 the population was 5,500,000. The growth of European cities during the present century has been marvellous. While hundreds of square miles in Scotland have been depopulated the cities grow. Three Scotch men out of every four live in the city.

In 1881 England and Wales had 60 per cent. of their population in cities, and the rate of increase the last two decades has been two and a half times greater for the city than for the rural population, and this despite the former reason for the existence of cities, which has disappeared in the security from savage beasts and bands of robbers, and while railways and telegrams have modified the loneliness and desolation of the country home, and while the appreciation of the attractions of mountain, field and wood has greatly increased. The present is the age of great cities, the future will be the age of greater cities.

While Belgium has increased 11 per cent. in population, its capital, Brussels, has gained 20; the increase of the capital of Denmark to the increase of the whole country as 2 to 1; in Sweden that of its capital is as 4 to 1, and in Norway as 10 to 1. With a stationary population in Prussia, the increase in Berlin is 25 per cent., and the same in St. Petersburg and Russia, and in France and Paris.

In the last 120 years preceding 1800, London increased in population only 50 per cent. or one-half of 1 per cent. In the eighty-six years since 1800 it has increased 500 per cent. The average annual rate of increase between 1861 and 1881 was 2.39 per cent.

French Housekeeping.

In an article on "A French Woman at Home" in the "Ladies Journal," Dorothea says:—She helps to cook the dinner she has bought—for servants are wasteful with the charcoal and she knows to an inch how little she can use. In that marvellous place—a French kitchen—where two or three little holes in a stove cook such delicate dishes, and perform such culinary feats as our great roaring coal fires have no conception of—she flits about like a fairy, creating magical messes out of raw material of the most ordinary description.

Yes, though a lady born and bred, refined, elegant, and agreeable in society, a belle in her way, yet she does not think it beneath her dignity to lighten the household expenses by practical economy and activity.

The dinner of a French family is cheap and simple. There is always a soup, the meat of the stew-pan—sometimes, if not strict in expenditure, another plate of meat—generally two vegetables, dressed and eaten separately, and sometimes, not always, a sweet dish; if not that, a little fruit such as may be the cheapest and in the ripest season.

But there is very little in each thing, and it is rather in arrangement than in material that they appear rich. The idea that the French are gourmands in private life is incorrect. They spend little in eating and they eat inferior things though their cookery is rather a science than a mere accident of civilization. At home the great aim of the French is to save any self-sacrifice that will lead to this result is cheerfully undertaken, more especially in eating than in the mere luxury of mere idleness.

No French woman will spend a cent to save herself trouble. She would rather work like a dray horse to buy an extra yard of ribbon or a new pair of gloves than lie on the softest sofa in the world in placid fineladyism, with crumpled gauze or bare hands.

A Remarkable Dog.

"That's a good dog you have there," said one travelling man to another.

"Very good, indeed."

"Ratter?"

"Well, he isn't much on rats, but he's a great race dog."

"A race dog?"

"Yes, sir. He can come out ahead of a rat at any distance."

Proof.

"That's a great mine. I tell you there's money in it."

"How do you know there is?"

"Well, I put fifty thousand in it myself."

Love's Miracles.

Ah, love, they know not, they who teach
That deep between the dearest souls,
That cling together each to each,
A barren sea forever rolls;

That from bleak, separate shores they lean,
What time the homesick winds make moan,
With eyes that strain to the unseen,
With hearts that yearn to the unknown;

That clothed in utter loneliness,
Through life they mourn life's greatest loss,
The skill to make the distance less,—
The power to build a bridge across.

Sad legend, writ for us in vain:
Have we not known, have we not felt,
The same thought tingle in each brain,
The some mood make our hearts to melt?

When the sore burden of our race
Some moment shows without disguise,
I see my pain within your face,
Your tears are rising to my eyes.

Once, in my veins the tide ran low;
But when I felt my hand entwine
With yours, how warm the overflow
Of your strong life poured into mine!

Your strength was mine, my joy was yours
Nay, rather, strength and joy were ours
Alike for us while life endures
Come rain and sun, and thorns and flowers.

Whether we pore the written page,
Or pace June-haunted paths at eve,
Or watch the pale moon's pilgrimage,
Or hear afar the night-winds grieve,

Or wander years and miles apart
The streams shall re unite again;
My love shall still renew your heart,
Your words shall quicken all my brain.

For us abides one life, one thought,
One melody that never dulls;
The arch-magician Love has wrought
This miracle of miracles.

The Ten Travellers.

Ten weary, footsore travellers,
All in a woeful plight,
Sought shelter at a wayside inn
One dark and stormy night.

"Nine rooms, no more," the landlord said,
"Have I to offer you;
To each of eight a single bed,
But the ninth must serve for two.'

A din arose. The troubled host
Could only scratch his head,
For of those tired men no two
Would occupy one bed.

The puzzled host was soon at ease—
He was a clever man.
And so to please his guests devised
A most ingenious plan:

| A | B | C | D | E | F | G | H | I |

In room marked A two men were placed,
The third was lodged in B,
The fourth to C was then assigned,
The fifth retired to D.

In E the sixth he turned away.
In F the seventh man,
The eighth and ninth in G and H,
And then to A he ran.

Wherein the host, as I have said
Had laid two travellers by;
Then taking one, the tenth and last,
He lodged him safe in I.

Nine single rooms, a room for each,
Were made to serve forsten;
And this it is that puzzles me
And many wiser men.

The explanation of the above puzzle, which we find credited to the Pittsburg Bulletin, is very simple, though it may not at first sight occur to the reader. If man No. 1 and man No. 2 were the only ones placed in room A, man No. 10 could not be taken from there in room 1. Obviously, therefore, there must have been three men originally there or else one of the three was "left out in the cold."

Lord Brassey on the Colonies.

On behalf of the funds of the Grosvenor Museum at Chester, Lord Brassey recently delivered a lecture in the music hall of that city on "Our Colonial Empire." The Duke of Westminster presided, and the Duchess of Teck was one of the audience. Lord Brassey said he had visited as a yachtsman every part of that Great British Empire on which the sun never sets; and having seen so much of that vast Empire it was natural to cherish a patriotic hope that we should not by any failure of statesmanship or want of sympathy allow those branches to be severed from the grand old trunk. (Cheers.) During the 50 years succeeding the accession of her Majesty, the area governed by the Queen, exclusive of Great Britain, increased from 1,100,000 to 8,400,000 square miles. The European population of the colonies increases from 2,000,000 to 10,000,000: the colored population from 98,000,000 to 262,000,000; and the state revenues of our possessionr beyond the seas from £24,000,000 to £122,000,000 a year. Of our over-sea trade, one-third was carried on between the colonies and the mother country; and of our trade in manufactured goods one-half was conducted with our colonial customers. In short, in spite of protective barriers, we found the most sure markets in our colonial possessions.

TRADE FOLLOWED THE FLAG;

but the colonial connection was a reserve of strength for the maintenance of the Empire, as well as an outlet for our commerce. If we in our little Empire were to hold our own against the fleets and armies of our powerful neighbors, it was essential that the British nation should remain undivided. (Cheers.) Every step to consolidation and unity strengthened the defence of the Empire. In support of this view, he reminded his audience of the offers which we had from time to time received of assistance from our various colonies, spoke of the hearty volunteering spirit amongst their population, and showed how this could be utilized for reserves of Imperial strength. As yet, the colonies had not looked beyond their own local selfdefence; but hereafter they would, he thought, do more.—[Edinburgh Scotsman.

A Great Race.

"The human race is a great one," said he.

"Yes," said the widow to whom he was engaged; "I am now on the second lap."

STOWAWAYS.

Twenty-Five of Them on One Boat—How They Finally Escaped.

The ship was hardly well out on the ocean, says a writer in Chambers' Journal, when two stowaways made their appearance, and later in the day five more. The next morning six more came up, and during the two following days they kept coming up in twos and threes until they numbered twenty-five all told. The ship seemed to be teeming with stowaways, and the officer on watch was fairly bewildered. There was a plaintive pleading in his voice as he said to the last comer: "Say, hadn't you better send the rest up at once?" "They are all up now, sir," replied the stowaway with repressed cheerfulness, and the officer gave a sigh of relief. When the vessel arrived at Quebec the captain sent a dispatch ashore with the pilot boat to be forwarded to Montreal, asking that a detachment of the harbour police be at hand when the vessel came alongside to arrest the men. The police were in readiness on the wharf, but the steamer stranded in midstream, and lighters had to be sent off to relieve her of part of the cargo. One of the lighters was alongside when darkness came on and she had to lie to until sunrise. When the lighter was fully loaded she drew to the wharf to discharge, but hardly was she moored when there was a movement among some sacks and a stowaway leaped out and made a break for the wharf. Another immediately sprang out from the other side and in another instant the whole deck of the lighter was alive with stowaways, running up the wharves and leaping over the obstacles that came in their way. The captain was powerless with amazement and did nothing but stand and look on in a dazed sort of a way. When the last of them had cleared the vessel's side and things had quieted down a bit he recovered himself, and walking over to the sacks he poked carefully about among them, but finding nothing he resumed his former position. Suddenly another stowaway, who had been unable to get out with the rest, jumped up and cleared. This was too much and the captain shouted: "If there's any more passengers going ashore they had better go now." But the whole consignment had escaped free of duty.

Something New.

Solomon was very nearly right when he said, "There is no new thing under the sun." But I think that even Solomon would have to admit that he had never seen or heard of such a thing as a Dress Album! In fact, I think no one ever did, until this year when they have sprung suddenly into fashion among English girls. A Dress Album is made by having a blank-book of good thick paper (such as is made for mounting photographs), and in it pasting a scrap, about two inches square, of each new dress which the owner of the album purchases. Under each sample is written the date when the dress was first worn, and the cost may also be added in cipher, for private reference. There are some great advantages attending this new hobby, but first let us look at it from the side of sentiment only.

Imagine for a moment that your mother had always kept such a record; could anything be more fascinating than to turn over its pages and look with pleased interest at a bit of the pink gingham which she wore to her first picnic, or the scrap like the lavender silk which she had on the day when she met your father for the first time! Could anything be more delightful to children than stories of their mother's youth thus illustrated? And would not tender love and sympathy fill their childish hearts as they came to the little square of black bombazine which marked their mother's grief for the baby brother who died before they were born? The power of association would bring back many a scene to the mother's mind, as she turned over the old book, and thus allow her to add to the list of those much-loved home stories which begin, "When I was a little girl."

Now for the practical side. If a girl starts a Dress Album and keeps it carefully, I am sure that the result will be to make her more prudent and economical in her purchases, as she sees before her such a faithful mirror of her expenditure. Will not her heart sink for shame as her eyes fall upon a sample of the heliotrope nun's veiling which she insists on buying, against her mother's advice, and which one bright sun faded beyond remedy? An object lesson like this will do more good than a thousand lectures! A thoughtful girl will begin to consider, as she looks over her album, whether she is doing right to spend so much money on her dress, when so many good causes are standing still for lack of means, and before she buys a new dress she will ask herself, "Do I really need it?" not "Will it be becoming?"

A good and lasting lesson in prudence may be learned from the pattern of the thin dress which was worn on a yachting excursion in spite of grave remonstrance from those older and wiser, and which resulted in an attack of bronchitis and three weeks spent in bed. So by all means begin to keep a Dress Album, and do not fail to learn from its lessons in prudence and economy which it will teach to a thinking mind. As you show it to your friends I think that you may safely say (notwithstanding Solomon's assertion), "See this is now."—[Julia B. Schauffler.

Dom Pedro.

Dom Pedro II. of Brazil, whose personality recent events have again made interesting, was born December 2, 1825, and was crowned "Emperor and Perpetual Defender of Brazil," April 7, 1831. His father, the head of the royal house of Braganza, had achieved the independence of Brazil from Portugal, but his leaning toward absolutism brought about a crisis which compelled his abdication, and establishing his son on the throne under a regency, he retired to Europe to spend the remainder of his days in quiet. It was a peaceable revolution, and until 1841 the infant head of the ancient house of Braganza was the subject of his tutor and the Regent Minister. On July 18, 1841, Dom Pedro II. was crowned with due solemnities in Rio Janeiro, being then only sixteen years old. The full name of the Emperor is Pedro John Charles Leopold Salvador Vivien Francis Xavier Francis de Paul Leocardio Michael Gabriel Raphael Gonzague d'Alcantara. All of these names have some historical significance, and are derived either from family patron saints or from a long line of ancestors that extends back to "the twilight of fable." Pedro Segundo was the son of Pedro Primero, Emperor of Brazil, and of Leopoldina, Archduchess of Austria. The coronation of the young Emperor was answered by the republicans of Brazil with a rebellion, which, however, was put down after eighteen months of turmoil. From the beginning of his reign Dom Pedro has been the friend of liberty, and through the efforts of the young Emperor a Brazilian contingent fought with the Argentines for the independence of that country from Spain in 1851 and 1852.

In 1843 Dom Pedro married Theresa, daughter of Francis I., titular King of Naples and the two Sicilies. By her he had two daughters, Leopoldina and Isabella. The principal events of his reign have been the troubles with England in 1862, which were arbitrated by the King of the Belgians; the war with Paraguay, beginning in 1866, and ending in 1870; and the decree providing for the gradual emancipation of the slaves in Brazil, promulgated in 1871. The war with Paraguay was long and bloody, and it was in this war that the imperial navy, under the great Admiral Barrosso, won its first laurels. Since that the Emperor has, until the outbreak of last week's "revolution," reigned in peace, disturbed only by the intrigues of politicians and the natural cares that encompass a throne. A more astute politician never wielded a sceptre. Never did a monarch see such changes in the country and the people he governed. When in the throne-room of the old palace in Rio, the fair-haired boy of sixteen first felt the pressure of a crown, his vast empire was an unexplored wilderness, with squalid cities strung along its coast. The capital itself reeked with fever, and was a tangle of narrow, ill-paved, undrained streets. Now the smoke of sugar refineries hangs over the Bay of Rio, and the noise of the cotton-mill is heard by the walls of Maranham. Throughout the entire length of the Amazon the busy steamboats ply, and every harbor is crowned with commerce. A navy has been created which ranks only after the navies of the great European powers. Every art and every science has a home in Brazil, and the capital is one of the finest cities in the world.

LETTER FROM STANLEY

Interesting News from the Great Explorer

LONDON, Nov. 30.—Chairman Mackinnon, of the Emin relief committee, has received another letter from Henry M. Stanley, written at the camp of Kazinga Uzinja, August 17. Stanley says Emin, with Zelim Bey, seven officers and sixty-five people, arrived at his camp on February 17. Lieut. Stairs arrived on the 18th with his column from the Sturi. At a meeting on the 18th Zelim, who had retaken Duffle from the Mahdists, killing 250 of them, stated on behalf of the deputation that they had come to request time to allow the equatorial troops and their families to assemble at Kavalli. Stanley continues: "I explained through Emin the object of my expedition, and offered them a promise written in Arabic, to wait a reasonable time for them to join me. The deputation replied that my offer was satisfactory. They said they would proceed to Wadelai and proclaim it, and commence the work of transportation. The deputation started for Wedalia on the 26th. Emin return on the 27th with his little daughter Ferida and a caravan of 144 men, He and I agreed that twenty days was a reasonable time. He offered a written undertaking, which I declined. The interval was occupied by Surgeon Parkes in healing our sick. So devoted and skilful was he that I was able on April 1st to turn out 280 able-bodied men, whereas in February it would have been difficult to muster 200."

Stanley then bitterly complains of the immense loads of property the refugees brought in, entailing endless work upon his men to bring it to the plateau, and which was practically rubbish, because it must be abandoned on the march. On March 1st he ordered that stuff be stopped from being brought to camp. Thirteen hundred and fifty-five loads had already been brought in. A month after Zelim's departure a letter arrived from him announcing that rebels, officers and everybody were unanimous in their desire to depart for Egypt under Stanley's escort.

A COUNCIL CALLED.

Stanley now finding great delay likely in assembling the refugees, called a council of the officers and stated in detail the position of the case, also the danger of trusting the rebels implicitly, as Emin was inclined to do, when they had already boasted of their intention, with cajoling words, to entrap Stanley and strip his expedition. Finally Stanley asked the officers whether he would be justified in waiting beyond April 10. Each officer replied in the negative. Stanley continues: "There, pasha," I said, "you have your answer. We march on the tenth." In reply to Emin's question I said we could certainly in our conscience acquit him of having abandoned the people if they had not arrived. Then a few days latter Emin was troubled by Cassatis' scruples as to whether they were justified if they abandoned the people.

Stanley deals at length with these difficulties, convincing Emin that food was plentiful and the Egyptians living in concord. The natives showed no disposition to depart. On April 5 Emin informed me that but few of his servants would go. "Here was a disappointment," exclaimed Stanley. "Out of 10,000 only a few were willing to accompany me. We all had our eyes opened. It was a farce on the part of the Wadelai force. It was clear that the pasha no longer had authority. Yet Emin was obstinate in his belief in them. But now the pasha said, "I can do with two servants as well as fifty." "At this time," continued Stanley, "I discovered conspiracies in the camp. The Egyptians tried to steal the rifles of the Zanzibaris and the number of malcontents kept increasing. Emin also had received news of a bad state of things at Wadelai. Therefore, I decided upon immediate action. I formed a square of rifles, and assembled all the pasha's people within it. Those who refused to come were arrested and placed on irons, and some were flogged. All denied any knowledge of a plot. I told all who desired to accompany me to stand aside, and though the pasha threatened to exterminate them wholly if there were any rebellious tricks, they promised religious obedience. This muster consisted of about 600 persons. On the 10th we started, numbering 1,500 people, including 350 newly-enrolled native carriers. On the 12th we encamped at Mazambonis, and that night I was struck down with a severe illness. The intercepted letter of Zelim revealed another plot to attack the expedition.

On May 7 a letter was received from Zelim containing various insolent charges against us and an appeal to wait longer for them, the rebels having again robbed them of all their ammunition. Stanley replied, offering to go slowly, so as to enable them to overtake him, but he never heard any more from Zelim.

We resumed the march, says Stanley, on May 8, and adopted a route skirting the the Balegga mountains 40 miles from Nyanza. Arriving at the southern end of the mountains, we had a successful encounter with the king of Ungoro, which cleared the route as far as the Semliki river.

Then follows a description of a snowy range seen the year before in the valley of the Semliki, with its enormous grass plain. The ripening grasses made the people, and even one of Stanleys own officers, mistake it for a vast lake. Stanley described the Semliki as a powerful stream 80 to 100 yards wide. Crossing the river, he says, the Warasmas attacked the expedition with a well-directed volley, but fortunately without casualty. He gives a picturesque description of the snowy mountain, which he estimates at between 18,000 and 19,000 feet high. It took nineteen marches to reach the southwest angle of the range. The huts of the natives were seen at an altitude of 8,000 feet above the sea. All the officers wanted to climb the mountain, but were not in condition to do so. Emin attained the height of a thousand feet above the camp. Stairs managed to climb 10,677 feet, only to find two deep gulfs between him and the snowy summit. He collected a number of plants and Emin was happy in classifying them.

Princess Isabella of Brazil.

The Princess Isabella, the daughter of Dom Pedro Segundo, is a woman of strong and peculiar characteristics. The Princess was born in 1846, and is now, consequently, forty-three years old. She was married in 1864 to to the Conde d'Eu, son of Louis Philippe. This marriage was a complete extinguisher for the Count. He was given a few empty titles by the Emperor, and then sank gracefully and quietly into innocuous desuetude as the husband of his wife. That role he has played with monotonous success ever since.

The Princess Isabella has had occasion to try her hand at government. When, in 1876, Dom Pedro left his country for a trip to the United States and Europe, Isabella was made Regent of the empire. Some discontented spirits, taking advantage of the Emperor's absence, began to foment discord. But they soon found that the thousands of miles of sea which separated the old Emperor from his dominion were an illusory advantage, for the Princess Regent nipped that rebellion in the bud in a manner which will long be remembered by Brazilians of revolutionary tendencies.

The Princess combines the religious fervor of her great namesake of Castile with the strength and energy of her ancestress Maria Theresa. In her the Bourbon and Hapsburg blood is more strongly marked than that of the house of Braganza. As the Princess Imperial, she has held her state in two palaces—one in Botofogo, that unrivalled section of palaces in Rio de Janeiro, and one for the hot season at Petropolis, the beautiful Brazilian summer city among the mountains. At the palace in Botofogo it has been her custom to give throughout the season a series of magnificent entertainments, and never men strove for fame or fortune more eagerly than did the young nobility of Brazil for the honor of leading the german at the Princess's. A devout and rigid Catholic, the Princess has oscillated between the state and festivities of a court and the ascetic life of a penitent. One night a stranger in Brazil, who had the entry of the court circle, might have seen the heiress of an empire surrounded by the music and the lights, the state and splendor, of the Botofogo palace. The next day, visiting some dim lit church, he would see a plain-faced woman in a coarse gown sweeping the flags of the paved floor, and people would whisper to each other and say, "There is the Princess."

The full name of the Princess is Isabella Christina Leopoldina Augustina Miguel Gabriella Raphaella Gonzague. She has three sons—Pedro d'Alcantara Louis Philippi, Prince Imperial, born October 15, 1864; Louis Maria Philippi, born 1878; and Antonio, born 1881. The Empress has no brothers, and her only sister, the Princess Leopoldina, wife of the Duke of Saxe-Coboug-Gotha, died in 1871.

In July, 1887, the Emperor, feeling the weight of years and the cares of state heavy upon him, went with his aged wife to Europe, leaving the Princess Imperial as Princess Regent. While he wandered from court to court and from watering-place to watering-place, getting what enjoyment he could from the twilight of his life, the Princess managed the affairs of the empire. She has always been an ardent advocate of the abolition of slavery, and not content with the slow processes of emancipation which her father had established. In April, 1888, she dismissed the cabinet which her father had left her, and appointed one pledged to immediate action. The Brazilian cabinet is modelled after that of England, and like that holds office until a vote of censure is passed by the legislative body. Therefore the bold and almost unprecedent action of the Princess Regent in summarily dismissing her ministers occasioned excitement in political circles in Brazil. The sentiment of the people, however, was with the Princess. The politicians saw in it another evidence that Isabella was determined to both reign and rule.

A Wicked Daughter.

LONDON, Dec 5.—William Rowlands, a man with half a dozen aliases, has been arrested and sent for trial on a charge of abducting a 15-year-old daughter of William Taylor, of Biddulph. The girl has given her father a good deal of trouble, and it is alleged has maintained improper relations with two or three men, including one Howe, who has disappeared. She is in gaol on a charge of stealing her father's wheat, and is in an interesting condition.

An Insurance Clerk's Good Fortune.

It isn't often that a young clerk still in his teens has $15,000 placed in his hands to do with as he pleases, and to use as his fancy may dictate; yet this was a little event that occurred last week to Roe Grant, a young man who lives on Vine street with his parents and who is employed in the offices of the Hartford Life and Annuity Insurance Company, in this city. Young Grant held one-twentieth of ticket 63 856, which drew the first capital prize of $300,000 in the drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery Company on the 15th of October. The lucky young man was questioned by a newspaper man and he emphatically denied having won the $15,000, but expressed himself as being willing to receive such a sum. Since the interview the newspaper man has learned that Grant did receive the money; that it was paid to him by the manager of the Adams Express Company in this city, and that two supernumerary policemen guarded the house the night the money was kept therein. All this was done without the knowledge of Grant's parents, but when they, too, found out how fortunate the son had been, immediate efforts were made to suppress its publication.—Hartford (Conn.) Times, November 18.

Gift To The University of Toronto.

TORONTO, Dec. 5.—Mr. Julius Rossin, a graduate of the university, who took his B. A. in 1864, has just given substantial proof of his attachment to his alma mater by announcing to the president of the university a gift of $1,000, to found a scholarship in the modern languages. Mr. Rossin is now a prosperous merchant in Hamburg, but has not, it seems, forgotten the pleasant associations of his undergraduate years in Toronto.

An experiment in journalism is to be tried in London, and if it can be a success anywhere it ought to be one there. This is the publication of a daily illustrated paper by the conductors of one of the already successful illustrated weeklies for which London is world famous. It is proposed to put the price as low as one penny, which brings it within the reach of all. With a constituency of from five to ten millions quite close at hand the paper ought to succeed.

Beauty Without Paint.

Anniversary services will be held in the Presbyterian church on Sunday, Jan. 5th, 1890. Rev. L. Cameron, of Thamesford, will preach. The Ladies' Aid will hold their annual tea meeting on the following Monday evening, when an extra good entertainment may be looked for.

Notification has been received from President Ledyard of the M. C. R. to the effect that it is his intention to this winter extend the double track on the M. C. R. from the St. Clair Junction west to Iona, and from Yarmouth east to Springfield. Each stretch is ten or twelve miles in length.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Conover returned from their honeymoon on Saturday last. The happy couple have the best wishes of all their friends here for unclouded happiness in their new relations.—Leamington Post. Mrs. Conover is the sister of A. C. Crosby, B. A., principal of the Dutton High School.

Judge Hughes adjourned the Court of Revision on the Yarmouth voters' list at Sparta until December 6th. There are no appeals in Dunwich or Southwold, consequently no courts will be held. Courts will be held in West Lorne and Rodney for Aldborough list, and at Highgate for the Orford list.

The sale of the Christmas number of the Montreal Star has commenced. The rush for copies is described as altogether unprecedented in the history of holiday pictorials. Every copy has 44 pages and three beautiful art supplements—a lovely Christmas souvenir to send to friends. The price is only fifty cents.

A gentlemen was in Rodney last week prospecting with a view to the establishment of a canning factory. He also visited West Lorne and Glencoe with the same object.—Mercury. If the gentleman will come to Dutton he will find the best town in the country for his business and will find a people ready to talk business with him.

A stack containing five tons of hay belonging to Wm. Rothwell was burned at noon on Monday. The stack stood in the centre of a field and there was no fire within a long distance, neither could any foot prints be found which would lead to the belief that some mischief-maker had purposely set fire to it. The cause of the fire will likely remain a mystery for all time.

Police Magistrate Holms, of Welland, Friday, sentenced Henry Weaver, the train wrecker, to seven years' imprisonment. Weaver misplaced a switch at Stevensville on the M. C. R. on Sunday, November 17th, ditching Conductor Kitts train. About a dozen cars were destroyed, 180 sheep killed and two or three trainmen injured. The object of the miscreant was to plunder the wrecked cars and he pleaded guilty to four charges of robbing the wreck.

When Jas. Lugsdin returned home from the party at the residence of Rev. J. W. Mann on Monday evening, about 12 o'clock he discovered two men endeavoring to enter his house by means of the summer kitchen and on asking them what they were doing was told that they wanted a lunch. Mr. Lugsdin ordered them away and after a time they left, using some of most profane and abusive language ever heard. The tramps were no doubt under the influence of liquor at the time.

A bright little boy, not more than nine years old, sat alone in the waiting room of the Michigan Central depot one day last week. None of the depot officials could make themselves understood to him, but when a young Dane happened into the waiting room and spoke a few words to him, the boy's face brightened up wonderfully. The young man spoke the same language as the boy, and through him it was learned that the lad had came all the way from Denmark alone. He left home a month ago, and a ticket stitched to his breast requested conductors and everybody who met him to try and keep him on the correct route to Alpena, Mich.—Times.

One of the most brutal and disgusting rows that has ever disgraced our town took place on Monday night. Several notorious toughs, spoiling for a fight, came into town during the day and proceeded to fill up preparatory to starting the rumpus. They started about nine o'clock and kept it going nearly all night, drawing several more peaceable persons into it and creating a general pandemonium. Black eyes, bruised faces, and broken furniture were the order of the night.

Chas. E. Maitland, a painter who has been around Dutton occasionally this year, on Thursday stole a watch and chain locket, a fine meerschaum pipe and several other articles from J. H. McIntyre, of the McIntyre house. A warrant was sworn out for his arrest and placed in the hands of Constable Philpott. The man was arrested at West Lorne by the constable there and handed over to Philpott, who brought him to Dutton. None of the goods stolen were recovered. While in the hotel on Sunday Maitland quietly walked out of the house and away, leaving the constable behind. Search was almost immediately made for him, but up to the present time he has not been recaptured.

Amongst the victims of the fire which destroyed the Tribune office at Minneapolis, Minn., on Sunday last, appears the name of Harry Colwell, a compositor. The young man was a son of Rev. Henry J. Colwell, formerly pastor of the Congregational church in St. Thomas. Mr. Colwell left for Minnesota some three years ago, and his son Harry, who was then employed in the ENTERPRISE office followed him a few months later. A few weeks ago J. C. Hawkins, of St Thomas, received a letter from the Colwells, in which it was mentioned that Harry was employed in the Tribune office, so that there can hardly be a doubt but that it was he who was burned alive in Sunday's fire. The young man was 20 years of age, and while working at his trade of printer was prosecuting his studies with the object of entering the ministry.

For some months the action of frost and sun will try wood and metal exposed to their influence. Have all the implements in use in the field been placed in weather-tight premises? Thrift shown in the care of farm machinery adds so much to the profit of the crop.

A liberal diet of sliced carrots and linseed meal with a mixture of oats and bran, slightly wetted, is recommended for horses showing signs of heaves. The hay used should be of the best quality, fed in small quantities, and slightly wetted before being placed in the feeding box.

To our Subscribers.

The special announcement which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address to B. J. KENDALL CO., (and enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the horse it is indispensible, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenomenal sale throughout the United States and Canada, makes it standard authority. Mention this paper when sending for "Treatise." 6-2-0.

HOGS WANTED.

Farmers, hurry on your store hogs and fatten them for the market from January to June. We have determined to abandon the packing of dressed hogs in order to make the packing of hogs a business throughout the year. We shall endeavor to buy, at whatever the price is, enough live hogs during these months to run our packing house. As this business is being neglected during the late winter and spring months, we think those who have hogs suitable for our requirements will reap a big benefit. We want hogs not less than 140 lbs, and not over 220 lbs., and will give a handsome price for the same. Recollect we shall not buy a dressed hog this winter, whereas we packed 15,000 dressed hogs after Jan. 1, last winter.

Prof. Loisette's MEMORY

DISCOVERY AND TRAINING METHOD

In spite of adulterated imitations which miss the theory, and practical results of the Original, in spite of the grossest misrepresentations by envious would-be competitors, and in spite of "base attempts to rob" him of the fruit of his labors, (all of which demonstrate the undoubted superiority and popularity of his teaching), Prof. Loisette's Art of Never Forgetting is recognized to-day in both Hemispheres as marking an Epoch in Memory Culture. His Prospectus (sent post free) gives opinions of people in all parts of the globe who have actually studied his System by correspondence, showing that his System is used only while being studied, not afterwards; that any book can be learned in a single reading, mind-wandering cured, &c. For Prospectus, Terms and Testimonials address

MANY A LIFE

HAS been saved by the prompt use of Ayer's Pills. Travelers by land or sea are liable to constipation or other derangements of the stomach and bowels which, if neglected, lead to serious and often fatal consequences. The most sure means of correcting these evils is the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills. The prudent sailing-master would as soon go to sea without his chronometer as without a supply of these Pills. Though prompt and energetic in operation, Ayer's Pills leave no ill effects; they are purely vegetable and sugar-coated; the safest medicine for old and young, at home or abroad.

"For eight years I was afflicted with constipation, which at last became so bad that the doctors could do no more for me. Then I began to take Ayer's Pills, and soon the bowels recovered their natural and regular action, so that now I am in health."—Mrs. C. E. Clark, Tewksbury, Massachusetts.

"I regard Ayer's Pills as one of the most reliable general remedies of our times. They have been in use in my family for affections requiring a purgative, and have given unvarying satisfaction. We have found them an excellent remedy for colds and light fevers."—W. R. Woodson, Fort Worth, Texas.

"For several years I have relied more upon Ayer's Pills than upon anything else in the medicine chest, to regulate my bowels and those of the ship's crew. These Pills are not severe in their action, but do their work thoroughly. I have used them with good effect for the cure of rheumatism, kidney troubles, and dyspepsia."—Capt. Mueller, Steamship Felicia, New York City.

"I have found Ayer's Cathartic Pills to be a better family medicine for common use than any other pills within my knowledge. They are not only very effective, but safe and pleasant to take—qualities which must make them valued by the public."—Jules Hauel, Perfumer, Philadelphia, Pa.

West Elgin Farmers' Institute.

The first meeting of the West Elgin Farmers' Institute for this winter was held in Leitch's hall, on Wednesday, Dec. 4th. There were present, at the least calculation, 500 farmers, showing that they are taking a great interest in their calling, and are anxious to gain information on subjects of value to them. The chair was taken by Mr. Beaty, president; and Dan. Black acted as secretary. The secretary gave a rehearsal of last winter's meetings, stating that they had been of profit to himself and urged on the farmers to turn out and hear for themselves. He had attended the three meetings held, and was greatly pleased to hear the farmers intelligently discuss important subjects. The meeting held in Shedden was a credit to the farmers, as they had prepared most of the papers themselves. The election of officers for the following year took place after the president's address, and resulted as follows; President, Dug. McColl: first Vice-president, R. Jordan; second vice-president, Mungo McNabb. Directors of Dunwich—A. McKirdy, Joseph Pierce. Southwold—Mr. Steele, Mr. McNeil. Aldborough—Mr. Ferguson, Smailes. Secretary-treasurer, Daniel Black. Dug. McColl and Daniel Black were appointed delegates to attend the Provincial Institute at Toronto.

The meeting tendered a vote of thanks to the retiring president, Mr. Beaty, for the able and courteous manner in which he had filled that position. Mr. Beaty made suitable reply.

Mr. Plewes, secretary of the Miller's Association, was then called on to address the meeting. In the first place he said he was not a politician, and was not going to discuss the N. P., as he was bound by the association not to take politics up. All he asked of the farmers was to back millers in their demands on the Government, and by so doing it would be to their interest, and would put money in their pockets. He had addressed several Farmers' Institutes, and they had passed the resolution that he would ask this meeting to vote on at the close of his address. They wanted the Government to put a duty of $1 a barrel on flour, but the Government said that would make flour in the lower Provinces higher. He agreed that it would, but he said in defence that the farmers here were compelled to pay more for their binders and machinery on account of the National Policy, and he could not see but it would be fair to make that loss up by putting this duty on flour. While Mr. Plewes was speaking, Prof. Robertson entered the hall and was heartily welcomed by the meeting. Mr. Plewes was asked several questions by those present, and he then read the following resolution:

Moved by Robert Jordan, seconded by ——, That this Farmers' Institute, of West Elgin, assembled at their annual meeting in Dutton, having heard David Plewes, secretary of the Dominion Millers' Association explain the disabilities that the millers of the Dominion are under by the duty on flour coming in from the United States being only 50 cents per barrel, while the duty on wheat is 15 cents per bushel, as equal to 71¼ cents per barrel on flour, thereby giving a bonus of near $60,000 annually to the United States millers to grind part of the breadstuff for our Dominion, and such preference to the American miller by the present unfair tariff is a cause of depression to our milling interest and against the agricultural prosperity of this province. Therefore, resolved, that this Institute ask the Dominion Goverment (through their member, Geo. E. Casey) to rectify the above unfair tariff against our milling industry by placing a similar duty on flour coming into this Dominion as the United States place on flour going into the United States viz., $1 per barrel.

Jas. Beaty, after hearing the resolution, said, as far as he was concerned, he was not in favor of it, as he was not willing to tax his fellow-beings in the lower provinces for the sake of putting a little money in his own pocket. The resolution was laid over to be discussed at some other meeting.

Prof. Robertson was now called on, and took for his subject, Dairying and Hog-Raising." The Prof. had charts along with him, showing the different properties of all grains and how best to supply the plants so as to produce a large crop. He referred to underdraining as being a profitable investment so as to carry off the surplus water. The water soaking down through the soil that imparted properties to it that were of great benefit to plants. He urged upon the farmers the benefits to be derived from feeding the land. For instance, he said, you can buy two tons of bran and put it on the land, but it will be of no value. If fed to cattle the manure will that way contain just what the land needs. The Professor was questioned by Messrs. Spencer, Thompson, Gow, Pearce, Beaty and others.

The meeting then adjourned until the evening, when Prof. Robertson was again called upon. His subject was, "Skill in Farming. He said the farmers should work with their head as well as with their hands, for no farmer would be successful that did not use skill in his work. He did not know if there were any silos in this part of the country or not, but he urged on the farmers to get them. They could be built very cheaply on the inside of their barns at an outlay of about $70, and then they could derive better results from the raising of corn. In regard to planting corn he found that the best plan was to use a seeder and stop the holes so as to plant about 3½ feet apart, and the seeder would drop a kernel about every eight inches. He spoke at length on the subject, and was listened to by the farmers very attentively, all being well pleased with his address, and considered him the best speaker on the subjects they had heard. At the close of the meeting a vote of thanks was tendered the Prof. The next meeting will be held in West Lorne on Friday, the 20th of Dec.

WEST ELGIN REFORMERS.

A convention of the Reformers of West Elgin was held in Leitch's hall to-day for the purpose of selecting a candidate to contest the riding in the next election to the Local Legislature. Ninety-six delegates were present from the different municipalities, besides which large numbers of others attended the meeting during the day. At 10.30 a. m. the president, Mr. Galbraith, took the chair and called the mee ting to order, after which the credentials of the delegates were received. Following is a list of those present:—

McGregor, Duncan Thompson, J. J. Stalker, Duncan Brown, Daniel Laing, A. N. C. Black. All those proposed declined except Messrs. McCrimmon, Glenn, McColl, Turner, Cranston and Thompson. Mr. McCrimmon received the nomination on the eighth ballot, by a majority of 10 over Mr. Glenn. Mr. McCrimmon's nomination was made unanimous on motion of S. B. Morris, seconded by W.W. Disher. Congratulatory addresses were delivered by a number of the gentlemen present and after a vote of thanks to the chairman and cheers for Mowat, the Queen and the candidate, the convention adjourned.

The Reformers are to be congratulated on having such an able and popular gentleman as Mr. McCrimmon and if they stick by him as they should they can, no doubt, easily carry the day.

We regret this week to announce the serious illness of Malcolm Leitch, merchant. One evening last week he fell in going down the cellar stairway of his his store, and laid on the floor for some time, until his clerk, becoming anxious at his long absence, found him. On being lifted up and taken upstairs it was found that he was suffering from a severe paralytic stroke, the whole of one side of his body being completely paralyzed. Since the accident Mr. Leitch has not been able to speak except occasionally in a whisper, and has been gradually sinking. At the time of writing the doctors hold out no hopes of his recovering.

Arch. Ruthven, is laid up at present on account of having caught cold in a bad cut which received on one of his fingers last June, while running a shaping machine.

Rumors of weddings to come are plentiful at present. One thing is certain, our dressmakers are all kept busy, and are daily adding to the number of hands employed.

Dutton has been growing so rapidly lately that country people cannot keep track of the new buildings, and got lost occasionally. Several cases of this kind are reported.

A young son of Jno. A. Kerr received a severe wound in the face on Tuesday by being struck with a shovel which his father was using. Dr. Ruthven attended to his injuries.

W. C. Crawford, of Tilbury Centre, was in town on Tuesday. He was much pleased with Dutton and its surroundings, especially with the lively business appearance of the town.

Andrew Clanahan, who was severely hurt at Glencoe a few weeks ago, by falling in the new Presbyterian church, is slowly recovering from his injuries, but is still unable to be around.

Missionary services will be held in the Methodist church on Sunday next. The pastor, Rev. E. Middletown, will preach in the morning and Rev. E. Kershaw, of Talbotville, in the evening.

Dan. McCallum, of Ekfrid, was in town on Saturday, looking for a hired man who skipped out from his brother's place the day before, taking with him a suit of new clothes, several shirts and other articles of wearing apparel. He found no trace of his man here.

At Tuesday afternoon's meeting of the London Presbytery, Rev. J. Ballantyne presiding, the resignation of Rev. Dr. Proudfoot, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, of London, was accepted, the Presbytery expressing their full appreciation of his faithful services and unquestioned ability. The call from the Appin Church to Rev. Mr. Henderson, of Hyde Park, was sustained.

In the list of business houses on another page we overlooked the agricultural implement depot of Sifton Bros., which is one of the most lively business places in town. This firm deals in all implements, machinery, and repairs for the same, which are necessary for use on the farm, besides grain, seeds, etc. Farmers cannot do better than call and look through their store when in town.

As the M. C. R. pay car was returning west this morning Mr. James, sr., crossed in front of it, barely escaping being caught by the engine, which touched his clothing in passing. Had he been one second later in getting across he would undoubtedly have been killed. Those who saw the affair say that the train was running at a terrific speed, the fastest they had ever seen, and say that the old gentleman had a terribly narrow escape.

On the 10th of May, 1888, the store of Geo. Simons, of Middlemiss, was burglarized and a quantity of tobacco, tea and general merchandise stolen. Suspicion fell on Hiram Beach, a young man residing in the village, and a warrant was issued for his arrest, but he fled to Michigan. The warrant has ever since been in the hands of Detective Fairbrother. Beach returned to Middlemiss the other day, and Friday morning was taken into custody by Detective Miller and brought to St. Thomas jail. A charge will also be preferred against him of stealing an Astrachan jacket from the store of Fred. Drake, of Dutton.

To our Subscribers.

The special announcement which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address to B. J. KENDALL CO., (and enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the horse it is indispensible, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenomenal sale throughout the United States and Canada, makes it standard authority. Mention this paper when sending for "Treatise." 6-2-0.

Explanations Were in Order.

"My wife, Mr. Perkins," said the husband across the isle of the street car.

"Ah! Glad to see you, Mrs. Winters. Why, how you have changed in two weeks."

"Changed? No one else has spoken of it," she blankly replied.

"Why, when I saw you with your husband at the theater two weeks ago to-night you seemed to be a girl of about 16."

"At the theater! You—you—you—!"

Her husband had been winking and winking, but nearsighted Mr. Perkins had seen nothing. The wife settled back, figured it out that she was home alone with the toothache that night, and the frozen stare she turned on her husband as they got off covered the platform with a glare of ice. She has asked for explanations ere this.—Detroit Free Press.

HOGS WANTED.

Farmers, hurry on your store hogs and fatten them for the market from January to June. We have determined to abandon the packing of dressed hogs in order to make the packing of hogs a business throughout the year. We shall endeavor to buy, at whatever the price is, enough live hogs during these months to run our packing house. As this business is being neglected during the late winter and spring months, we think those who have hogs suitable for our requirements will reap a big benefit. We want hogs not less than 140 lbs., and not over 220 lbs., and will give a handsome price for the same. Recollect we shall not buy a dressed hog this winter, whereas we packed 15,000 dressed hogs after Jan. 1, last winter.

WHY COUGH,

WHEN a few doses of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral will relieve you? Try it. Keep it in the house. You are liable to have a cough at any time, and no other remedy is so effective as this world-renowned preparation. No household, with young children, should be without it. Scores of lives are saved every year by its timely use.

Amanda B. Jenner, Northampton, Mass., writes: "Common gratitude impels me to acknowledge the great benefits I have derived for my children from the use of Ayer's most excellent Cherry Pectoral. I had lost two dear children from croup and consumption, and had the greatest fear of losing my only remaining daughter and son, as they were delicate. Happily, I find that by giving them Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, on the first symptoms of throat or lung trouble, they are relieved from danger, and are becoming robust, healthy children."

"In the winter of 1885 I took a bad cold which, in spite of every known remedy, grew worse, so that the family physician considered me incurable, supposing me to be in consumption. As a last resort I tried Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and, in a short time, the cure was complete. Since then I have never been without this medicine. I am fifty years of age, weigh over 180 pounds, and attribute my good health to the use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral."—G. W. Youker, Salem, N. J.

"Last winter I contracted a severe cold, which by repeated exposure, became quite obstinate. I was much troubled with hoarseness and bronchial irritation. After trying various medicines, without relief, I at last purchased a bottle of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. On taking this medicine, my cough ceased almost immediately, and I have been well ever since."—Rev. Thos. B. Russell, Secretary Holston Conference and P. E. of the Greenville District, M. E. C., Jonesboro, Tenn.

No Wonder He Grieved.

Mr. Isaacson—Mr. Oppenheimer ish a sad looking man.

Mr. Blumenthal—No vonder. He lost his vife year pefore last. She fell dot steam boat off and her poty vas never recovered.

"And Oppenheimer vas grieving apout dot vife vat was drowned year pefore last?"

"Of course, he vas veeping yet. She had all her tiamonds on ven she was drowned."

The Wise Druggist.

"Well, sonny, what is it?" asked the drug clerk, peering over the counter at the three-foot mite of humanity.

"Mamma sent me to get a piece of soap—cast-iron, I think she said."

"We don't keep any summer hotel soap here," returned the clerk; you must have mistaken the metal. Wasn't it Castile?"

Last Year's Wardrobe.

There still remain to memory dear—
And not yet lost to sight—the laces
I wore so gayly at the pier,
At Newport hops, and Long Branch races.

Some slippers, too—some boots—a few
Chic gowns, still fresh enough for service
With alterations—yet 'tis true
Their contemplation makes me nervous.

I ought to be rejoiced to know
My wardrobe did outlast the season;
Yet still I can but grieve, and O—
It is not without ample reason.

Gowns, laces, boots remain; but then,
This truth a mournful question covers—
Where, where, O where, are last year's men,
Dear last year's lovers?

—Madeline S. Bridges in Judge.

Time by the Forelock.

Alderman McShwim—Oi want ye t' lay boi an office fer me brother.

Mayor Grantall—I did not know you had any brothers in this country.

Alderman McShwim—Oi'ave not, but wan av them is comin'.

A Proper Inducement.

Young preacher—Mr. Soaque, will you not honor me and my church by attending service to-morrow?

"No, sir."

"I would like you to hear me preach."

"No, sir."

"The sermon may interest you."

"No, sir."

"The text is: 'Take a little wine for thy stomach's sake.'"

(Radiantly)—"I'll be there."

An Injured Veteran.

Journalist—I would like to get a pension

Pension agent—Were you injured while you were in the army during the war?

"Yes. I was a newspaper correspondent and I did so much hard lying that I strained my conscience, and as everybody connected with the army is getting a pension I thought I'd just file my claim."

Mr. Batcheller—"So you're married at last, Jack. I hear your wife is an energetic woman, and keeps things stirred up. You married for love of course?" Jack (bracing up)—"Love? No; I married to cure my dyspepsia."

DUTTON.

THE BUSINESS TOWN OF THE WEST.

The village of Dutton has been in existence but a very short time, it owing its birth to the building of the Canada Southern railway, some seventeen years ago. Shortly after the road was started Messrs. A. J. Leitch and D. McLaws, the former of whom is now postmaster here, and the latter clerk of the court at St. Thomas, started clearing the site for the new village, and from that time on it has had a steady growth, until now it takes its place with the best of Western Ontario villages in all kinds of business. But for the building of the new railroad Dutton would never have been heard of, and it was a great blow to the neighboring village of Wallacetown when the line went through. The citizens of that place at first smilled at the efforts of the gentlemen named to start another village so close, and christened the new place "Monkey Run," some gifted Wallacetownite sending to Messrs. McLaws and Leitch comic sketches, representing them as staking out town lots in a swamp with numerous monkeys jumping over and becoming entangled in the chain. However, they soon saw that the new place was bound to go ahead in spite of their opposition, and like sensible people most of them picked up their goods and helped to swell Dutton's population.

The buildings erected up to the year 1885 were mostly frame. In the summer of that year, however, W. H. Nelson erected the three brick stores on the east side of Main street, and after the first large fire, which took place in October of that year, destroying the principal business houses on the west side of Main street, all the burned buildings were replaced with handsome brick stores. A second large fire took place four months later—on Feburary 7th, 1886—destroying a number of stores on the east side of Main street, causing a loss of about $10,000. These places were also replaced with brick blocks. In 1887 A. J. Leitch also erected four handsome brick stores on Main street, and now Dutton can boast of having more handsome brick blocks than any other town of its size in the west. During the year 1889 several very handsome buildings were erected, including two hotels, one store and a number of private residences, a list of which will be found below.

The educational institutions are represented by the high school, of which A. E. Crosby, B. A., is principal, and Thos. Porter and A. E. Morrow, assistants, and the public school, of which H. O'Malley is principal, with Misses Fitzgerald and McCallum, assistants. Both have comfortable and commodious buildings and are at present in a most satisfactory condition. The Presbyterian church, of which Rev. Thos. Wilson is pastor; the Baptist church, Rev. J. W. Mann, pastor; the Methodist church, Rev. E. Middleton, pastor, and the Salvation Army represent the religious denominations. The secret and benefit societies are represented by Cameron Lodge, A. F. & A. M.; Court Nelson, I. O. F.; Dutton Lodge A. O. U. W., the Canadian Home Circle, and a lodge the of I.O.O.F. is being organized. J. M. Glenn, L.L. B., whose office is under the charge of C. St. Clair Leitch, and H. Clay represent the legal profession. Private banks are conducted by A. N. C. Black and A. M. McIntyre. The newspaper business is managed by R. Sutherland and J. D. Blue. The medical profession is represented by Drs. McKillop, Leitch and Ruthven, and Dr. Drinkwater, V. S. Besides these there are two livery stables, three hotels, three dry goods and general stores, two groceries, one bakery, one fruit and confectionery store, two jewelry stores, two furniture stores, one hardware store, two drug stores, one stationery and fancy goods store, one merchant and two custom tailoring establishments, two harness shops, one housefurnishing store, two shoemaking establishments, a music store, flour and feed store, butcher shop, and other business houses, besides the Dutton flour mills, woolen mills, iron and pump works, stave and heading factory, planing mills, blacksmith and carriage shops, cooper shops, agricultural implement dealers, etc., more particular mention of which will be found in another column.

The situation of Dutton is excellent, East, North and South are some of the finest farms in Canada, the produce from which finds a ready market in town. The great Dunwich marsh, as it used to be called, will very soon be a thing of the past. Hundreds of acres have been reclaimed during the past few years and the work is still going on. The soil is the richest to be found anywhere and in a very few years this part of the township will be even better than others.

The shipping facilities of Dutton are as good as are required. We have only one railway, but no one has any reason to grumble at the rates charged by the road. The only difficulty appears to be in getting cars to accommodate the large amount of business done. The shipments are principally of flour, grain, staves, lumber, baled hay and fish. At one time during this fall the shipments of all classes averaged 60 cars per week.

As a place to live in Dutton takes the cake. We have good society, excellent educational privileges, good churches and smart preachers, excellent stores, where you may buy everything needful, the best drinking water in the world to be had for the digging, and as for health, the people need none of Dr. Brown-Sequard's elixir of life to keep them alive. They don't die until they get tired of living. There have been only two deaths this year, one of a lady 83 years of age and another of a month's old infant.

Dutton is the largest place between Ridgetown and St. Thomas and has now a population of over 1,000. It has often been remarked by the travelling public that it is the liveliest and most enterprising village for its size in Western Ontario, and a person has only to stop here a short time to be convinced of the fact. We need a few more manufactories to help us along, however, and the prospects are that these will not be long in coming, as there are few places with as many advantages to offer this class of man than Dutton. There is already talk of a canning factory being located here at an early date.

Our town has many advantages and offers a splendid chance to manufacturers who are looking for a place to commence business.

ONE YEAR'S PROGRESS.

NEW BUILDINGS ERECTED DURING 1889.

Below we give a list of the buildings erected during the year. From our list it will be seen that the town is going ahead rapidly:—

Three-story brick hotel, erected by A. J. Leitch, building and fitting up, $8,000. Two-story brick hotel, erected by Wm. Eustes, building and fitting up, $3,000. Brick residence for H. Hollingshead, $4,000. Brick residence for L. J. Willson, $1,800. Frame dwelling for Wm. James, $800. Frame dwelling for J. Crane, $1,000. Frame dwelling for M. L. Miller, $800. Frame dwelling for Geo. Wilkie, $800. Brick veneered residence for Jas. Wilkie, $2,000. Frame storehouse and dwelling for A. D. Urlin, $1,100. Frame dwelling for A. D. Urlin, $700. Frame dwelling for Chris. Davis, $600. Improvements on two dwellings for N. Phelps, $800. Improvements on house for J. Ferguson, $250. Dwelling for H. Somers, $700. Improvements on McIntyre House, $200. Stable for A. J. Leitch's hotel, $500. Stable for Thos. Hockin, $200. Dwelling for Jas. Muirison, $1,200. Finishing of brick store for A. J. Leitch, $500. Improvements on Methodist church, $700. Residence for Dr. Ruthven, (finished in 1889) $1,400. Improvements on residence for Dr. Ling, $500. Other buildings and improvements $3,400. A total of $40,000.

A number of new buildings are already spoken of for next season, the material for which will be placed on the ground this winter. Among the number are a new brick livery stable and brick residence for Colin McGregor, of Wallacetown, who intends removing here in the spring, and a residence for Angus McWilliam. The prospects are already good for another big year's work in the building line.

Never treat superiors with servility or inferiors with arrogance. Speak as kindly to a day-laborer as to one occupying a high position.

"Say," said the hotel-keeper to the reporter, "if there is one thing I do get tired of it's the way people have of telling me how to run a hotel. One fellow says I ought to do this and another says I ought to do that. By the way, it's a wonder you fellows don't write that kind of people up. It's just the thing you ought to do. If I was the editor of a newspaper you bet I'd—well, what are you grinning at, I'd like to know?"—Boston Post.

Miss Kate Field, in the interesting prospectus of her forthcoming journal, says: "From an impartial public I hope for support in the welcome guise of subscription, advertising and suggestion." A long experience in journalism warrants us in assuring Miss Field that if she will hustle around and get the subscriptions and advertising the public will take great pleasure in keeping her supplied with suggestions.—Washington Post.

Manufacturer of the Famous

CHATHAM FANNING MILL.

CHATHAM - ONTARIO.

BAGGING ATTACHMENT FOR THE CHATHAM FANNING MILL.

The above cut represents a new machine which is an attachment for bagging the grain as it comes from the Fanning Mill. It is complete in every respect, and will give the best satisfaction to those who use it. A few points in its favor are these:

1st.—It turns easily. 2nd.—Takes up very little extra room on the floor. 3rd.—Fourteen square inches on the floor will hold the machine, and any farmer can spare that fron his barn or granary. 4th.—Will bag any kind of grain, from the finest seed, such as timothy and clover, up to the coarsest grain, such as beans and corn. 5th.—Will bag from 60 to 80 bushels of wheat per hour, 100 bushels of oats per hour. 6th.—Your grain does not go to the floor, thereby saving considerable waste. 7th.—Two men with the Bagger will do the same as three men without it. 8th.—It can be attached to any Chatham Mill manufactured during the last four years.

This machine is worthy the inspection of all farmers. For prices and full particulars apply to

WHERE TO BUY.

PRINCIPAL BUSINESS HOUSES IN DUTTON.

A glance at the advertisements in this issue will tell you where you can buy the best and cheapest lines for the Christmas trade, and during the year as well. Our reporter was struck with the active business appearance of all the places when on his rounds, everyone appearing to be making ready for a lively holiday trade. Below we give a list of some of the principal business places, and can recommend them to the purchasing public. We should like to give more extended notices of each business but space will not permit it. There is no occasion for anyone to go away from home to make purchases when there are so many reliable houses in town as shown in this issue of the ENTERPISE.

HOCKIN & POOL.

A walk through the immense establishment of this well-known firm will well repay any person. They occupy two fine large brick stores with plate glass fronts on Main street, in one of which are the grocery and crockery departments, and in the other the dry goods, fancy goods, millinery and boots and shoes, the carpets and housefurnishings being on the second floor. The grocery department, which is under the supervision of D. Campbell, is replete with the finest lines of teas, sugars, coffees, spices, raisins, currants, canned goods and everything needful, and they are showing some extra nice lines for the Christmas trade. The crockery and glassware is shown at the rear of the grocery, and here you may find a very large assortment of crockery for all purposes, besides some handsome hand painted breakfast, dinner and tea sets and Bohemian colored glassware, very handsome goods for Xmas or New Year's presents. In the boot and shoe department, presided over by Wm. Hockin, will be found fine and coarse boots, shoes slippers and rubbers to fit all sizes, from the infant up to the biggest man in five townships. In the millinery department, presided over by Miss Johnston, everyone is busy turning out hats and bonnets of the latest New York and Parisian fashions to supply the large demands made upon them. The sales in this department show a decided increase this season over any previous year. Misses McLean and Ribill have charge of the fancy goods counters, at which may be found an immense stock of everything needed to add attractiveness to the forms of Dutton's fair ones. A finer assortment of these goods has never before been shown in Dutton than can be found on these counters. Joe Hockin takes charge principally of the general dry goods department, which is full to overflowing with the best goods in the market. In ordered clothing this firm takes the lead for quality, price and fit, their tailor, Joe Dagon, being an expert cutter and employing none but first-class workmen. In housefurnishings are shown some lovely patterns of carpets in Brussels, tapestry and oil cloth, besides lace curtains, curtain poles and roller blinds. The business of the firm in all departments shows a decided increase this year over any previous season and has necessitated putting in a railway cash system and a cashier. There are now some 18 persons employed in the different portions of their establishment. Don't miss calling on them when in town.

DUTTON MILLS.

There is no industry in the town that is of so much benefit to it as the Dutton roller mills. Since these mills passed into the hands of Mr. H Hollingshead, the present proprietor, they have been steadily improved, and now turn out a brand of flour "White Cloud" which cannot be surpassed. The flour finds a ready market in the Maritime Provinces, where most of it is shipped, and is in great demand in neighboring cities. The mills use up the greater part of the wheat grown in this territory, paying the highest prices for the grain, so that there is but little wheat shipped from this station. The mills also do a large custom trade, many farmers coming as far as 15 miles with their grists, and is a rare thing to hear a complaint about either the quantity or quality of the flour given.

KIRKLAND'S DRUG STORE.

At the Old Reliable Drug Store you can find something to suit each one of your family. There are books and toys, fancy glassware, toilet sets, Xmas cards, pipes, fancy goods and a thousand other articles suitable for the Xmas trade. Kirkland's Drug Store has a large trade and a good reputation, and all who deal there will find prices right. You will also find there the largest and most complete assortment of drugs, chemicals, patent medicines, dye stuffs and druggist's sundries that can be found anywhere west of Toronto.

A. E. WHITE.

There is no excuse for anybody being cold this winter when A. E. White is selling stoves so cheap. Mr. White has one of the most complete stocks of shelf and heavy hardware, stoves, tinware, etc., that can be found anywhere and his prices are right. He keeps none but first-class workmen and those who patronize him are sure to be satisfied.

FERGUSON'S LIVERY.

A. M. Ferguson can supply you with the best livery outfit in town if you want to take your best girl out for a ride on Xmas or New Year's day. He gives special attention to commercial work and is always ready for business.

D. C. LEITCH, M. D.

Dr. Leitch recently opened out a new drug and book store in the Leitch block and has thoroughly stocked it with everything usually found in a first-class store of this description. He is already doing a good trade. You may find there the latest and most handsome lines in plush goods, toilet sets, gift books, pocket books, purses, pipes, etc., besides a full supply of school books and stationery, spectacles and eyeglasses and druggist's sundries of every description. Call and examine his stock and if you don't see what you want ask for it.

J. C. HERTEL

Young men, don't fail to read J. C. Hertel's advertisement! If you are not married already you may be soon, and you will need a wedding suit. He is just the one that can give you what you want at a price that will suit the thinnest pocket-book. If you are married or don't intend to be call and see him anyway. You must have clothing and you want to procure ft where you can buy the cheapest and best. Mr. Hertel has, by steady attention to business and keeping up with the fashions besides, being courteous and agreeable to all customers, gained a solid business, and one that would do credit to any city establishment. His business now gives employment to 8 persons, the utting department being under Mr. Hertel's personal supervision, and he has found it necessary this fall to enlarge his premises, now using both flats of his building. Don't fail to call on him when you want anything in the way of clothing.

J. B. CRAWFORD.

Mr. Crawford is a new candidate for public favor and starts in Dutton in a new business, that of housefurnishing. It will pay you to take note of his advertisement which will be found on another page, if you need anything in his line. Mr. Crawford is an energetic young man and comes to us well recommended. We trust he may prosper in his new venture.

J. C. PRICE.

Everyone wants to buy Xmas presents for their friends, and no better place can be found than Price's Bookstore. He has the fullest assortment of books, toys, stationery, etc., that has ever been shown in Dutton, and you cannot help finding what you want. Mr. Price is an old and reliable business man and scarcely needs any recommendation from us as he is well known to all our readers. It will be well worth your while to call and see his immense stock.

W. H. VOGT.

Vogt, the jeweler, will furnish you anything you like in the way of jewelry at reasonable rates. If you want to make your best girl an elegant present call on him. His repairing is always promptly attended to by an experienced watchmaker.

W. A. BRUSH.

What will suit your friends better for a Christmas gift than a photo of yourself? and where will you get better satisfaction than from Brush? Mr. Brush has lately taken several views of residences and business places, which for clearness and finish cannot be excelled by any city production. Don't forget him when going your rounds.

URLIN BROS.

This old established firm are, as usual, to the front this year with all manner of good things for holiday season. Choice nuts and candies of every description are in their store in abundance, and their other departments fully stocked. In glassware and crockery they show an excellent variety suitable for Xmas and wedding presents, at very low prices. Their large staff of clerks are kept continually busy waiting on customers and the amount of business done at their store is enormous. It will do you good to call and see their stock whether you buy or not. They will always be happy to show you anything in their large stock. Call and see them.

D. M'MILLAN.

A walk through Mr. McMillan's harness shop will convince one that he is doing an immense trade in harness this season. The reason is not hard to find. Good workmanship, and a large stock to select from, with fair prices and honest dealings have established Mac's business od a firm footing and he evidently intends to keep it there. There is no excuse for a man driving around with a dilapidated and worn out harness on his horses when he can get a new set as cheap as Mac offers.

A. N. C. BLACK.

If you have any banking business to do or want to borrow money call on Mr. Black who will be pleased to accommodate you. Any business you may leave with him will be promptly attended to, and you will have no reason to growl at the rates he will give you.

W. H. NELSON.

Mr. Nelson will show you the largest and best assortment of wedding rings, watches, clocks, brooches, pins, collar, cuff and sleeve buttons, silverware and society jewels and emblems you have ever seen. It will well repay you for your trouble to visit his elegant store. His repairing is all attended to by first-class workman.

DUTTON WOOLEN MILLS.

L. J. Willson & Co., the energetic managers of the Dutton Woolen Mills, are doing the best business in their line of any firm in the west. They purchased this season more wool than all St. Thomas buyers together, paying the highest prices for the same. They carry in stock a full line of yarns and knitted goods, manufactured at their own mills, besides a stock of blankets, tweeds and gents' furnishings. It will pay you to call.

NEW : HARDWARE : AND : FURNITURE : STORE.

Hardware, Stoves, Tinware, and Household Furniture.

BOUGHT FOR CASH and will be sold for cash at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES. Prices that will compare favorably with any in Western Ontario. Being interested in the DOMINION FURNITURE WORKS, of Tilbury Centre, places us in a position to give our Customers goods in that line at prices that will defy competition.

We will "OPEN THE BALL" by offering an A1 Bedstead complete, with Patent Side-rail, for $1.98.

WE MEAN BUSINESS. WAIT FOR US.

J. B. CRAWFORD, DUTTON.

R. M'GILL.

All the people, young and old, rich and poor, want nuts and candies for Xmas, and there is no place in town where a better assortment at reasonable prices can be found than at R. McGill's. Bob also keeps in stock the finest lines of tobaccos and cigars, and receives fresh oysters daily. Don't forget to call on him.

C. E. DOYLE.

Our popular tonsorial artist, Charlie Doyle, is the best that can be found anywhere, and if you don't believe it just come and give him a trial. He will fix you up so nice that you will always patronize him.

A. C. GRAHAM.

Our old friend A. C. Graham is still manufacturing all kinds of office and household furniture at the old stand, and the best proof of the quality of his work is that he is always busy. His work will stand the closest inspection. Mr. Graham is also a first-class undertaker and does not belong to the combine. Don't fail to see him.

WM. HALES.

Now for Christmas meats! If you go to Hales' shop you will find there just what will suit you, whether turkey, goose, chicken, duck, beef, pork or sausage. Mr. Hales is evidently the right man in the right place, as since coming here he has worked up a splendid business. He understands his business thoroughly and deserves your best patronage.

C. W. HODDER.

Our baker will give you bargains in all kinds of Xmas cakes, candies, nuts, fruits, etc., Charlie is doing a good business and is sticking to it well, for though many have tried none have succeeded in keeping up in opposition to him.

OTHER ADVERTISERS.

The above list does not embrace all the business places or industries of the town, but only those who have special advertisements in this issue of the ENTERPRISE.

Don't fail to call and see the fine stock of lamps, cutlery, silverware, etc., at Wm. Cusack's hardware store, Wallacetown. He has an elegant assortment and will give you bargains.

S. Jones, who has recently started a new bakery and confectionery store in Shedden, is a young man who is sure to please his customers and we can recommend him to all the people of that district.

Wm. Bristow, dealer in hardware, tinware, etc., at Rodney has something to say to you in this issue. He can give you juit as good bargains as any of the city houses, and it will pay you to examine his stock before purchasing.

We would call the attention of our readers to the announcement of Messrs. Mistele & Co., of Rodney, which appears in this issue. They are energetic business men and have an immense trade. The firm is thoroughly reliable, and you may depend upon getting the best satisfaction.

Dutton High School.

DEAR SIR,—Since my appointment as principal of the Dutton High School I have been a silent listener to the agitation going on in regard to the school. But being somewhat startled by the action of certain members of the High School Board, at their last informal meeting, viz., to dismiss the present staff and close the school for a time, if not entirely, I feel it my duty to break the silence. Surely if the members referred to have read the law they must know that the High School Board has no authority to close the school, for chap. 226, sec. 7, of the school law reads as follows:

"Every county council, at or before its June session in any year, but not later, may, with the approval of the Lieut. Governor, on the report and recommendation of the Minister of Education, change the location of or discontinue, at the end of the civil year, any existing high school in any part of the county within their jurisdiction."

Furthermore, I find that this High School belongs to the county, and is known as such, for sec. 2 of the same chapter says: "There shall be a high school or high schools in every county and union of counties, to be distinguished by prefixing to the words "High School" the name of the town or village within the limits of which the High School is situated, but such high school, shall nevertheless be deemed one of the high schools of the county and within the municipal jurisdiction of the county council," or in other words, under the control of the county council.

The High School Board is a corporation invested with certain powers for the management and maintenance of the school. These duties are carefully prescribed but not a sentence is to be found authorizing them to discontinue the school for a shorter or longer period.

Again, the above-mentioned members of the Board (for some unknown purpose, for surely they know better) are fearful lest they will be held personally liable for the support of the school. I turn to the school law again and what does it say? "Trustees shall not be liable to any prosecution or the payment of any damages for acting under any by-law of a municipal council before it has been quashed." And again, "In case a by-law, order, or resolution of a municipal council is illegal, in whole or in part, and in case anything has been done under it, which by means of the illegality gives any person a right of action, no action shall be brought until one month has elapsed after the by-law has been quashed or repealed." "Every such action shall be brought against the municipal corporation alone, and not against any person acting under the by-law, order or resolution," which, if it means anything, means that the council will stand by the board until such time as they (the council) deem it expedient to discontinue the school.

Now a word or two in regard to the present condition of the school. It appears that the worst enemies of our school are right in our midst and therefore the more dangerous. Queer as it may seem to a stranger, there are men in and about Dutton so lost to the best interests of the village and vicinity, so regardless, shall I say, of their own private interests and vested rights as to discredit and bring into disrepute by every means possible the High School. When I came here, having been engaged in good faith by the High School Board, every man of which I expect to stand by me, I was told that I would meet with considerable opposition, and I found it to be true. Several pupils, instead of coming back and giving the present staff a fair trial, went to other schools; some two or three stuck their heads in for a day or half-day and departed in disgust, having, as they deemed, sized up the school and staff and found them wanting.

Then the cry was raised and carried throughout the country that the school was going down, down, down, and on the top of this came the word that Aldboro refused to make her levy; then great was the cry sent forth. "The school must go, sure." Now, let me ask the fault-finders a cool question, do you really expect any school to flourish under such opposition? Add to this the fact (and I say it with no intention to bring discredit upon the ability of any previous teacher) that the candidates for examination during the past two years did very poorly in proportion to the number trying and in respect to the success of the surrounding schools, and we have another strong reason why the school is not so well attended at present. I have had letters from some and others have told me that their past failures have totally discouraged them and so they have given up.

But what is the present attendance and how does it compare with other years? Well, here it is. There are 61 registered pupils, all of whom have been in attendance for part of the session at least. We have at present 50 pupils who are in regular attendance (not 30, nor between 30 and 40.) In 1886, for the whole year, there were 61 pupils, all told, with an average attendance of 28, 7 are reported to have left for mercantile or farm life or other occupations. For 1887, total attendance, 104; average, 62. Total who left for mercantile life or other occupations, 45. The report for last year has not, I think, been issued. It can thus readily be seen, and every one must candidly admit, that our school at present compares much more favorably than ought to be expected from the many serious drawbacks with which it has been meeting.

The pupils now attending are, on the whole, faithful, hard-working students. Mr. Seath, the High School Inspector, during his late visit, spoke well of the work done and of the staff, and expressed very strongly the hope that the school would pass safely through its present crisis, asserting that this was the place for the school.

In conclusion permit me to exhort all, since this school cannot by any means die before a year from this December, all the people of Dutton and vicinity to lay aside all past differences and rally to the support of an insititution that should be the pride of the place. Let every one who has a child to send help to swell the attendance at the beginning of the year and use that powerful weapon, the tongue, in its favor, and I will venture the assertion that when another year shall have passed away no one will dream of doing away with an institution that is not only educating the youth but bringing trade and money into our village.

HEAD MASTER.

Our Diminishing Forests.

To the Editor of the ENTERPRISE:

Sir,—All are aware that throughout Ontario at present that both cord wood and timber are rapidly besoming scarce, and much loss and inconvenience will shortly be occasioned the thereby. As one passes along the road he sees on every hand, where patches of forests are still retained, that while the larger trees are being taken away for fuel and other purposes no smaller trees are growing up to replace them in consequence of cattle being allowed to make a pastare ground of the bush, the result being that in a few years there will remain no wood on the farm. It appears to me if our county councils in older parts of Ontario would legislate as to exempt bush land from taxation a great deal of benefit would accrue to the country at large. This remedy has been frequently suggested and seems to be the only feasible plan of preserving some forest. If some method of the sort be not adopted the difficulty will only become greater year by year. There are now many small reserves of timber which such a law would preserve, while if delayed till most of them are gone there would be little use in framing it.

Yours etc.,
R. W. PHIPPS.

He Missed His Stimulant.

Said a New Haven business man last evening: "On my way to the office this morning I felt miserable, and when I took my seat at my desk I hadn't energy enough to hold a pen. I had slept well and had not been out of health in any way and could not account for the condition in which I found myself. After doing a little work that was imperatively necessary I started for a walk, hoping that exercise would help me. I dragged myself along until I had walked three miles and then again tried to attend to business; but it was no use, and at noon I went home, doubting whether I should be able to come down town again. On the dinner table I found the cup of coffee I had forgotten in the morning. Down it went the first thing, and from then until now I have been feeling like a bird."—New Haven Palladium.

Marching Home for Christmas

A STORY OF THE EGYPTIAN WAR

CHAPTER III.

JUST TOO LATE.

George Kerschoyle, one of the richest commoners in England, possessed besides his large fortune, which to a certain degree made the happiness of his life, a terrible temper, which in several instances had already proved its curse. He had quarrelled with his young son because he chose to marry a pretty governess of gentle birth, who had nothing but her beauty and almost angelic nature to recommend her; and he had turned his grandson out of the house because he dared to disagree with him in his matrimonial views. But when Brian was gone, the old man's heart misgave him, and although he would not have confessed it for the world he missed him terribly. As day after day passed by, and he sat down to his lonely dinner unbrightened by the handsome face, the ready tongue, which had always cheered him in the darkest fit of the "blues," a chilly fear came over him lest he had at last offended him beyond forgiveness, and "the boy" never meant to come back at all.

It was on the very day of the quarrel that he met his grand-daughter for the first time in his life at Clapham Junction, when he was on his way to a friend's country house near Epsom. Her pretty face and forlorn position appealed irresistibly to his compassion; and when he saw the notice of her mother's death in the Times expressly for his benefit, he resolved to offer her the place in his heart and home so recently vacated by his grandson.

"Welcome, my dear, he exclaimed, holding out his hand in cordial greeting, as Muriel came forward with a hesitating step into the brilliantly lighted drawing-room. "You never thought to find a grandfather in the impertinent old man you snubbed so unmercifully at the station."

She stepped back in surprise, a painful blush rising to her cheeks.

"Oh, why did you not tell me?"

"Never mind, I rather enjoyed the joke. I suppose you won't object to giving me a kiss now, as I am no longer a stranger," and he chuckled at the remembrance of her snub.

She put up her face at once, and he kissed it affectionately. After all it was almost worth while to be old, to have the privilege of touching such a soft fair cheek as hers.

When they parted for the night, after a pleasant, somewhat disjointed chat during the long formal dinner and in the drawing-room afterwards, he said, with a smile, "Ah, what a life of it you will lead when Brian comes back. He will chaff you out of all your little scrupulous, fidgeting ways. He has no respect for anything but his own opinion, like most of the young stars of the present day, but if you give in to him in everything, he will swear that you are an angel. So now, I've given you a hint."

"Which I sha'n't take. I don't know who Brian is."

"A graceless young idiot, who took himself off in a huff, because he was offended by some good advice I took the trouble to give him. But let him stay away if he likes. I've had you here on purpose to show him that I can do without him. Now don't be vexed, I wanted you for your own sake, you may be sure," looking kindly into her face with his twinkling grey eyes. "I couldn't get you out of my head," he added gruffly. "A child like you, alone, and with my name on your bag."

"Ah, that's why——"

"Yes, my dear, that's why," he interrupted hastily; "no need to talk about it. You've had your troubles, but please God they are all over. Now why on earth should you cry?"

"I'm not sorry," she faltered, as she took her bedroom candlestick from his hand. "But—but——" with a sob.

"There, now go to bed, you will be better in the morning," and in a terrible fright he hurried her out of the room.

"Plague on the women!" he muttered to himself as he resumed his former position on the hearthrug. "They never lose a chance of turning on the water-works, and I detest it. Now Brian," he went on reflectively, with his hands in his pockets, "he would go dry-eyed from one year's end to another, and yet take him on the whole, if it weren't for his infernal pride, you couldn't find a better-natured fellow anywhere. Why the deuce didn't he understand that I never meant it? We had quarrelled hundreds of times before, and he never took me up so sharp then. Well, we must bide a bit, and when the supplies run short, he'll be glad enough to have a comfortable roof over his head, and a good dinner with nothing to pay."

Having come to this satisfactory conclusion, he threw himself down in an armchair, took up the "Globe," and stretched his feet out to the fire. No use to have a game of billiards by himself, so with a grunt of regret he settled his head for a nap.

Christmas was a dismal affair that year for the household in 200 Berkeley-square. There was abundance of good cheer, but neither plum-pudding nor champagne would make up for the absence of the one who had always been the life and spirit of every festival. The servants felt it almost as much as their master, and Cameron, the butler, declared that for his part he much preferred Good Friday with "Mr. Brian" to Christmas Day without.

Of course to Muriel, the desolate orphan, it was the saddest of all days, because it reminded her so bitterly of former anniversaries spent with her gentle loving mother. She could do little to enliven Mr. Kerschoyle, and in a horrible temper he went to bed half an hour earlier than usual, in order to get the day over.

Winter changed into spring, spring into the gorgeous fulness of beauty which we call summer, and still the old man listened to every rap at the door with an unspoken hope in his heart, a look of expectancy in his small grey eyes, which he would have died rather than acknowledge.

The supplies had run short, as Mr. Kerschoyle had predicted, but Brian would rather have starved than gone back to his grandfather as a beggar.

He had been told politely by the manager of the——Theatre that he had no aptitude for the stage; and not being particularly anxious to appear on the boards as a mark for the pungent criticisms of his friends, he had let himself be discouraged by one man's verdict. Hanging about town was pleasant enough with plenty of money in his pocket, but when half-sovereigns began to fail, how could he join a game of whist at the club, or a lot of young fellows on a drag going down to the Derby?

He could no longer do as the other men of his set were in the habit of doing, so he quietly dropped out of it, and in the hurry of London life, was very soon forgotten.

As the season advanced he kept more and more to himself, letting the world go by as it would, without moroseness, only with a quiet sort of endurance which might have been resignation if there had been more content in its tranquility. But how was it possible for him to be content suddenly deprived of everything that made life worth having, with nothing to do, nothing to earn, no home and no hope? All that he had to support himself on was a wretched annuity of a hundred a year, left him by his father after he had squandered thousands at the gaming-table. Of the liberal allowance given by his grandfather he would not touch a penny, though the old man had never rebuked him for exceeding its limits, as happened pretty frequently in the past.

Unaccustomed to economy in any shape, ninety pounds went before the month of leafy June; and in the middle of the season he found himself with the remaining ten in his pocket as the whole of his revenue for the rest of the year. No one wanted his services as a clerk; no one would have accepted him if he had ventured to propose himself as a tutor. He soon found that it was an uncommonly easy thing for a man to be on the borders of starvation with two strong arms ready to work for his support, and heaps of friends driving past him day after day in their carriages.

"I cannot dig, to beg I am ashamed," he thought to himself with a grim smile as he walked down Parliament street, with no particular object in view.

Many of his friends had told him in the days gone by that he was more ornamental than useful; and he began to suspect it was true. In fact he had come to such a pass that he looked after a hump-backed labourer carrying a hod over his shoulder, with a pang of envy.

A placard hung outside the Horse Guards arrested his attention.

"Two hundred volunteers wanted for the war in Egypt."

The colour rushed into his face, a light flashed from his eyes. Here was a way of earing a living with a dash of glory thrown in to make it more than palatable. Without a moment's hesitation he decided to offer himself at once.

A polite official explained to him that they wanted trained soldiers from other regiments, not raw recruits who had never handled a musket in their lives.

With some eagerness he denied that he was a raw recruit, having served in the Eton volunteers, the Christ Church corps, and the Yeomanry Cavalry, down in Blankshire. With a bland smile, which he felt sure was meant to soften refusal, he was told that he might call again.

Then it was that he set to work with energy. Having a definite object in view, he roused himself from his habitual indolence, and resolved to leave no stone unturned until it was accomplished.

The colonel of the 1st Life Guards was an old friend and he had several acquaintances amongst the other officers. He applied to each in turn, and all promised to exert themselves on his behalf. Perhaps he might not have succeeded after all, if his fine soldierly figure had not spoken volumes in his favour; but no sergeant with a spark of esprit de corps in his breast could lose the chance of enrolling a man of such splendid physique amongst the troopers of his regiment.

It was all settled at last; the doctor passed him without hesitation, his name was entered on the rolls of the 1st Life Guards, and he was ordered to present himself at the Knightsbridge barracks at ten o'clock the next morning.

With a brisker step than usual, he walked down Piccadilly on the way to his lodgings in Davis-street. Passing Hatchard's, he found himself by the side of his grandfather's carriage and turned around anxious to avoid recognition by the coachman and footman, who had their backs towards him.

He though the carriage was empty, and a voice he had not heard for many months, a voice that sent a thrill through his heart, called out, "Mr. St. John," and he wheeled round involuntarily. An eager little face was thrust throught the window; the appeal in the soft dark eyes was utterly irresistible. He stretched out his hand, and took hers into his strong grasp, looking at her with a glance so longing and infintiely tender, that she scarcely dared to meet him.

"You've kept your word—you never came," she said breathlessly, so glad to have caught him, so anxious not to let him go.

"No, and I never shall," with great decision. "Tell me, are you happy?"

"He is kind as possible, so I ought to be," but a little sigh belied her words.

Although very low, his quick ears caught it.

"Then why aren't you?"

"I am, sometimes; but you won't understand; you will think I ought to be satisfied with everything that I wish for given me at once, but I daresay as a man, you don't know what it is to feel lonely," and she lifted her wistful eyes to his.

"Don't I!" with a curious smile. "Never mind, you will get over it before long. You must have made plenty of friends by this time."

"But none so kind as you," in the softest of whispers.

He drew back with a frown of pain.

"Good-bye, I must be off.

"Stay a moment, grandpapa is in the shop,"

If she wished to detain him, she could not have made a more unfortunate remark. Casting a horrified glance over his shoulder, he pressed her hand tightly, and with another long lingering look at her agitated face, hurried away, raising his hat mechanically as he did so.

Five minutes too late, Mr. Kerschoyle came out of the bookseller's with a new periodical in his hand.

"Mr. Brian, sir," said John the footman, flushed and eager, bursting with the news.

"Where?" and the old man stood stock still on the pavement, the colour surging up into his withered cheek.

"Only a minute ago, sir, he stood by the carriage just the same as usual."

"Then why the deuce did you let him go?" he thundered in bitter disappointment; "you should have held on to him by main force if necessary, anything to keep him here. Drive after him, like the devil. I suppose, if you've eyes in your head, you know which way he went."

Trembling with rage, he scrambled into the carriage, heedless of the passers-by, who had been astonished by the outburst. John sprang on to the box, and the brougham started on its quest.

Muriel not having caught the footman's words, was utterly bewildered by the scene. Full of passionate delight at the unexpected meeting with her lost friend; she presently observed:

"Grandpapa, I have just seen Mr. St. John!"

"Hang your Mr. St. John!" was the gruff response. "If you had kept your eyes open, and not let that boy give me the slip, I should have been obliged to you."

"I would if I could," forgiving his rudeness at once, because of his evident disappointment; "but you see I don't know him by sight."

"Humph!" He sat forward with his grey head almost out of the window; but at last when further perambulation of the streets seemed useless, he called out an imperative "Home!" and sank back into the corner of the carriage.

He was not one to talk of his feelings, but Muriel guessed what they were, when she saw the violent kick he gave to the book which had caused him to miss "his boy."

Preparing the Christmas Dinner.

Many of the extra preparations can be sandwiched in among the regular duties of each day, and Christmas eve will find you fresh and vigorous for the next day's work.

Plan to have part of the baking done early in the week. Mince pies can be made the week before, but the pumpkin and apple pies should not be made before Tuesday. On Monday select and cook the meat, and while that is simmering stone the raisins, and prepare the fruit for the pies and pudding; also pound and sift the sweet herbs for the stuffing, and see that you have some bread that will be stale enough for it by Tuesday. If you have time chop the meat and apples and mix all the ingredients for the mince meat.

MONDAY

Mix the white bread and also the brown bread. Stew the pumpkin, and make the pastry. The plain pastry, if properly made is rich enough for any pie, but, if you prefer, you may make puff paste for the rims and upper crust and use the plain pastry for the lower crust. Make the pies and while they are baking, roll the crackers for the pudding. Bake the bread.

TUESDAY.

Make the plum pudding. The crackers and raisins having been previously prepared, it can be put together in a short time. Bake it and set it away ready to be warmed over the next day. Stew the cranberries and make the hard sauce for the pudding. The pudding and chicken pie can be baked on Christmas day if you are so fortunate as to have a range in which you can bake them in the lower oven. Boil the chicken for the pie. Clean the turkey, stuff and truss it that it may be ready to be put into the pan the next morning. Stew the giblets till tender, and put them where they will not become hard and dry, but do not chop them until Wednesday. There are usually children or gentlemen at any such gathering, who are glad of the chance to crack the nuts for you on Christmas morning, but, if you must do the work yourself, it is pleasant occupation for Christmas eve. This reduces the actual labor for Christmas day to the making of the crust for the chicken pie, the cooking of the turkey and the vegetables, and the making of the gravy and tea and coffee.

CHRISTMAS MORNING.

Make the chicken pie, and bake it as soon as possible after breakfast. It can be warmed in twenty minutes, while the turkey and vegetables are being prepared. Then wash and pare the vegetables, and put the celery in a cool place. Lay the table, and get every thing ready that will be needed.

All these preparations made, you will be ready to change your dress and greet your guests, who, at a "Canadian Christmas Dinner," are not expected to wait until the dinner hour, before they present themselves.

An hour before dinner will be sufficient time to cook and prepare all the vegetables, to reheat the pudding and put the finishing touches to the arrangements of the table. Lay your table with your largest plates; small dishes will be needed for those who do not wish the cranberry sauce or onions on a plate with the meat. Put the bread, butter, cranberry sauce and celery on the table, and arrange the fruit, nuts, puding-sauce and pies ready to be brought on when needed. The vegetables are to be pared, and cooked in boiling, salted water about half an hour. The squash may be steamed over the potatoes, and the water on the onions should be changed twice. The squash and turnip should be drained, mashed and seasoned with butter, salt and a little pepper. A speck of sugar will improve the squash. The onions should be drained, heated again in milk enough to cover them, and seasoned with salt, butter and pepper. The potatoes may be drained, beaten up thoroughly with a fork, sprinkled with salt and piled lightly in a dish.

Keep each vegetable warm in the dish in which it has been cooked, while you prepare the gravy, put fresh water on to boil for the tea, and heat the plates and dishes for serving.

The pudding may be set into a large kettle of boiling water on the back of the stove. Chop the giblets and put them over the teakettle to warm. Make the gravy, and serve half of it plain, and half with the giblets.

Make the tea and serve it with the dinner, as your elderly guests will perfer it then. Those who wish coffee will doubtless prefer that after the dessert, and it need not be made till the first course has been served.

It is always wise to allow ample time for a dinner, but it is imperative on Christmas day. Doubtless your guests will understand how to add to your enjoyment of the dinner, by so curbing their own, that you will not be compelled to make a pretense of eating to avoid being "left behind in the race."

Of course your "better half" needs no hints about carving. And if you have no help in the kitchen we hope he has the happy tact of so diverting the attention of your guests that your necessary work in changing for the second course may not be done with the consciousness that every eye is upon you.

If a delightful custom of Christmas day in the olden time be not forgotten, there will be a spirit of kindness and informality among your most familiar guests, that will prompt them to vie with each other, as to who shall have the honor of helping you in that usually dreaded task, etc., the clearing up after the Christmas dinner—a time when, if ever, is proved the true of the old saying, "Many hands make light work."

At Daybreak in London.

We doubt not there are many people in London that have never walked its silent streets at daybreak; and many residents out of town that would like to know what aspect the streets of the greatest city in the world present at this early time of day—hence this paper, which was written after a ramble through the streets one Sunday morning. Sleeplessness and a bad headache induced us to turn out of bed, dress, and slip quietly out into the street about half past three o'clock. Daylight had fairly broken out upon the sleeping city; and inhaling the keen morning air, we went in the direction of the river. As we passed down Southampton Row and Drury Lane, we met four persons, two cabs and thirty cats. Cats and waste paper seemed to have taken possession of the streets; and with what a reproachful look these cats eye you, as if they highly resented your intrusion upon their domains at that early hour. It was a trifle uncanny walking down Drury Lane with only black cats, waste paper, and a dark form huddled together in its rags here and there up a side court for company. From Drury Lane we reached the Strand.

What a contrast the Strand presented now to what it was at midnight, when the theatres had poured out their thousands, and the restaurants or bars had disgorged their votaries into this important highway, teeming with human beings, some hurrying homewards on foot, others trying to obtain a seat in an omnibus, or hail a cab, or hurrying off to catch a train, amidst the yelling and shouting of men selling extra special editions, and the whistling and shouting for carriages and cabs. Now the stillness and the deserted appearance strike one vividly, for you see the curves, elevations, or declines of the roadway, which it is impossible to notice when covered with teeming life and traffic; and no life to be seen excepting a few men busy in carting the Sunday newspapers, and a slouching man or two, the inevitable man in blue, and a very sleepy-looking cab-horse, attached to its vehicle, wherein the driver was fast asleep.

We turned down Wellington street to Waterloo Bridge, where we stopped at the coffee stall and awoke the old lady there, who was snatching a short period of sleep. How well practiced these women must be to be able to sleep and awake every few minutes on hearing the footsteps of customers! Her helpmeet was there also, and we tried to engage him in cheerful conversation; but he would not be wooed that way, for mumbling an incoherent reply in grumbling tones, he fell at once into the arms of Morpheus. Dickens' fat boy should have kept a coffee stall.

We descended the steps of Waterloo Bridge and walked on to the Embankment. There, an interesting scene—at the same time inconsistent with our advanced views of humanity—drew our attention. Reclining on the seats by the river, in all sorts of positions, were men who could not afford to pay for a night's lodging. Some seats were occupied by persons sleeping in a perfectly upright position; others were shared by sleepers more fortunate than their fellow-out-casts in annexing places, for some had half a seat to lay their care-worn bodies on, and hugging their rags, endeavored to close up the air-holes. As we passed by each seat of outdoor sleepers, who preferred, or had to prefer, the cool shroud of nature's covering to the stifling rooms of common lodging-houses, some of them were stretching their arms and legs; and one young man was actually absorbed in the pretty lyrics of the opera "Dorothy." One seat was occupied by four awakened politicians, engaged in an argument on the amount of German blood in the royal family. Would our queen feel flattered to know that four of her humblest subjects, with hardly a copper in their pockets, had still interest enough in imperial affairs to criticise her family and court at four a. m. on the Thames embankment?

Westminster bridge was now in our immediate vicinity, and stepping on to the bridge, we looked away out to the far East, and watched the rising of the sun behind the great dome of St. Paul's. Here was a modern day picture for any artist to paint. A cold gray coloring pervades the whole scene, the gray stonework of the bridges and embankment, the gray coloring of water touched up with the reflection of the little fleecy golden clouds stretching across the pale-blue sky, which received their delightful tints from the golden rays shot up from behind the sombre dome of St. Paul's. The whole scene was indeed charming in harmony of color—cold gray, lit up with gold. In this study of early morning tints, the artist who will paint this scene must not forget the human element in it— a scene more impressive than coloring of light, stone and water; for there, against the end of the stone parapet of the Embankment, on the top of the steps leading down to the river, stood a haggard-looking young man, and at his feet sat his wife and two infants. He looked as if he had stood there on guard the whole night, with contracted brows and now fiercely staring at the rising of the sun in the east. Perhaps that golden ray of light was the only sign to him of God's presence in the whole world. But it was touching to see how this hard, fierce-looking man, out of work and moneyless, gently propped up his infant child as it showed signs of dropping forward in sleep against the cold and hard buttress.

Should this meet the eye of some thinking philanthropist, we trust he will see what a splendid opening there is here to effect a real and lasting good to the poor outcast humanity of London. A large building might be erected in this city with washing facilities, so that these poor persons might obtain a night's lodging for a penny and a thorough wash in the morning. This healthy arrangement might relieve the work in London hospitals.

Turning our back to the bridge, we passed by the Houses of Parliament and the Abbey, and so emerged into the sidewalks of St. James' Park, where everything looked beautifully fresh and green, and we passed through Spring gardens, and issued out into Trafalgar Square. Here, too, had men and women been sleeping, and some were now performing their morning ablutions in the fountains; and some were slouching off in all directions. But where do they slouch to? We must say slouch, for verily they do slouch, dragging one leg wearily after another, with hands imbedded in the bottom of their pockets, without seemingly the least idea or care where they go to.

In the Strand, on our homeward way, we saw a pitying sight—an intoxicated woman well advanced in years, with haggard face and bleared eyes, and dressed in black rags and crape. Drunkenness and vice were written in every line of her face and in every curve in the folds of her dress. All the men and women we had met this morning had an appearance of health and strength enough to go on battling with in this world; but on this poor aged creature, hopeless despair in this world was branded.

One pleasing sight we must mention in conclusion, and that was the little bird-cages hung outside the windows of the Industrial Buildings in Drury Lane; there the little songsters were welcoming the coming of day with thrilling delight.

The Pumpkin Pie.

Take a sharp knife—the best of its kind—
And pare off the pumpkin's golden rind;

Then cut into cubs-shaped blocks of buff,
And slowly simmer till soft enough.

Run through a sieve—the best to be bought—
Till you have of the sifted pumpkin a quart.

Oh, the "cropple-crown" hen will mourn today
For her rifled nest in the scented hay.

For ere your pumkin pies you can bake
Out of her nest you must nine eggs take.

Beat yolks and whites in a separate dish
Till both are foamy and light as you wish.

White sugar, one cup and a half you take,
And two quarts of milk your pies to make;

Then of cinnamon, nutmeg, and mace, each one;
You take a teaspoonful ere you are done.

Next spices, sugar, eggs, pumpkin, and milk,
You must beat together till "smooth as silk"—

(That is the curious, homely phrase,
My grandmother used in those old-time days.)

Now a dozen of raisins, more or less,
To each pie will add flavor, you must confess.

The whole must be baked in a shell-like crust,
And, just as it hardens, with sugar you dust.

If you follow this rule, when done you'll cry:
"Here's a genuine, old-time pumpkin pie!"

LIZZIE M. HADLEY.

A Child's Gift.

"The most trifling gift is often the one to be valued most, and I have one that a king's ransom could not purchase," writes a gentleman who was once a teacher in a country school district. "I had among my pupils some years ago a singularly beautiful and winsome little girl named Mary. Her parents were dead, and she had the misfortune to live with a distant relative who made the child most unhappy by his cruel treatment. His wife was even more cruel to the helpless child, who was the most obedient and submissive of children.

"They allowed her to come to school three months during the winter weather. She was always thinly clad, and I fear that her little tin lunch-pail seldom contained anything better than dry bread and cold potatoes.

I tried to be very kind to her. I hope that I was. "But I had a large school of bad boys and mischievous girls who sorely tried my patience, and who took up all my time, even at noon and recess hours.

"Mary was shy and sensitive, making few friends, and saying nothing when certain thoughtless and heartless girls ridiculed her shabby clothes.

"She had a way of twisting her thin white fingers together, and glancing around in a frightened, timid manner when she was thus taunted.

"I always went to the rescue as soon as I could, and am not at all sorry now because I boxed certain ears very smartly on Mary's account.

"The week before Christmas she fell ill. I went to see her every evening after school and her gratitude for these visits shone forth in her eyes. I feared from the first that she would never be well again, and I think she felt so herself, and was not sorry.

"I took her a few little gifts on Christmas morning, and after I had given them to her, she slipped one thin white hand up under the pillow, and said,—

"'I've got a little of something for you. It aint anything hardly. I'm most ashamed to offer it; but it will do for you to remember me by, and its all I've got to give."

"Her little all consisted of a small carnelian ring that could not have cost more than five cents.

"'I'd like to have you keep it,' she said in a whisper.

"And I have kept it among the things I treasure most.

"In another hour she was raving in delirium.

"'I wish, I do wish they'd stop it!" she cried. "I wish they'd not point at my old clothes so! I hate so to put them on! I wish, I do wish, I could have new—ones—some time!"

"Before the day was done, she had put on new clothes that never will wear old, nor lose their heavenly beauty; garments not fashioned by earthly hands."

A Dubious Compliment.

He—How beautiful these flowers are. They remind me of you.

She—But they are artificial flowers. There is nothing real about them.

He—Yes, I knew that as soon I looked at them.

When a convivial gentleman can say without a stutter at the close of a champagne seance, "What lovely chrysanthemums!" he has a voice that a Prince might envy.

A CRUEL DEATH.

A Dakota Sheriff Tells How It Feels to be Hanged.

James E. Morgan, sheriff of Sherman county, South Dakota, is a native of this city, says the New ork 'Star,' who has been in the west over thirty years. He is here on a visit to his relatives on Staten island.

"I find," said the sheriff to me the other night, "that the question whether a man should be hanged or executed electrically has been settled. I am glad to find that electricity has carried the day, for I assure you that death by hanging is intensely painful."

"Why, sheriff," I said, "is it possible that you were hanged?"

"Quite so, and it was no joke. When the war closed I went west to seek my fortune, and had a pretty hard time before I found anything even resembling it. One hard winter two others and myself went into Wyoming on a prospecting expedition, and had to maintain ourselves chiefly by hunting. Antelope were very scarce just then, and we suffered considerably from hunger. One morning we separated, the better to scour the country, agreeing to meet on a distant hill at noon. My companions were hardly out of sight when I shot a steer, and was in the act of cutting it up when three fierce-looking cowboys swooped down upon me. I am, as you see, swarthy, and they took me for a Mexican. As they also were dirty looking, I made the same mistake, and saluted them in the little Spanish I had picked up. It happened that a tall cotton tree was conveniently close, and, without saying a word, one of the men threw the lariat around my neck, tossed the other end of the rope over a stout limb; his two companions pulled upon it, and I was in the twinkling of an eye going through all the agonies of hanging. The pain was frightful. There was a tremendous rushing through my ears, the sky and everything else turned blood red, pins and needles seemed to be sticking into every part of my body, and at the same time the back of my head felt as if it were being sandbagged at the rate of forty strokes a second. How long it lasted I couldn't tell. To me it seemed hours. When I regained consciousness one of my friends was pouring whiskey down my throat and the other was rubbing my chest with the same liquid. It appeared that my comrades had returned in time to cut me down before life had fled, but just then I wished they had let me be. The process of resuscitation was if possible, still more agonizing than the hanging, but, as the man condemned by law does not suffer in that regard, there is no use in dwelling upon it."

"But why did they hang you?"

"They were driving a herd of cattle to Idaho and it was one of their steers that I had shot. When my friends arrived and explained, the cowboys cut me down and when I was ready to receive them they were profuse in their apologies.

"That is how I know that hanging is one of the most cruel deaths to which you can put a man."

The Perils of Buffalo-hunting.

On the occasion in question, my brother and cousin were on their way homeward. They were just mounting one of the long, low swells into which the prairie was broken when they heard a low, muttering, rumbling noise, like far-off thunder. It grew steadily louder and, not knowing what it meant, they hurried forward to the top of the rise. As they reached it, they stopped short in terror and amazement, for before them the whole prairie was black with madly rushing buffaloes.

Afterward they learned that another couple of hunters, four or five miles off, had fired into and stampeded a large herd. This herd, in its rush, gathered others, all thundering along together in uncontrollable and increasing panic.

The surprised hunters were far away from any broken ground or other place of refuge; while the vast herd of huge, plunging, maddened beasts was charging straight down on them not a quarter of a mile distant. Down they came!—thousands upon thousands, their front extending a mile in breadth, while the earth shook beneath their thunderous gallop, and as they came closer, their shaggy frontlets loomed dimly through the columns of dust thrown up from the dry soil. The two hunters knew that their only hope for life was to split the herd, which, though it had so broad a front, was not very deep. If they failed they would inevitably be trampled to death.

Waiting until the beasts were in close range, they opened a rapid fire from their heavy breech-loading rifles, yelling at the top of their voices. For a moment the result seemed doubtful. The line thundered steadily down on them; then it swayed violently, as two or three of the brutes immediately in their front fell beneath the bullets, while the neighbors made violent efforts to press off sideways. Then a narrow wedge-shaped rift appeared in the line, and widened as it came up closer, and the buffaloes, shrinking from their foes in front, strove desperately to edge away from the dangerous neighborhood; the shouts and shots were redoubled; the hunters were almost choked by the cloud of dust through which they could see the stream of dark huge bodies passing within rifle-length on either side; and in a moment the peril was over, and the two men were left alone on the plain, unharmed, though with their nerves terribly shaken. The herd careered on toward the horizon, save five individuals who had been killed or disabled by the shots.—[From "Buffalo-Hunting," in St. Nicholas for December.

Effects of Close Shaving.

Do you know what a close shave means? I never did until I looked at a face the other day, through a microscope, which had been treated to this luxurious process. Why, the entire skin resembled a piece of raw beef. To make the face perfectly smooth requires not only the removal of the hair, but also a portion of the cuticle; and a close shave means the removal of a layer of skin all around. The blood vessels thus exposed are not visible to the eye, but under the microscope each little quivering mouth holding a minute blood drop protests against such treatment. The nerve tips are also uncovered and the pores are left unprotected, which makes the skin tender and unhealthy. This sudden exposure of the inner layer of the skin renders a person liable to have colds, hoarseness and sore throat.—[Medical Classics.

A PAINFUL DEATH.

The Horrible Fate of a Doctor in a Hospital in Vienna.

"A most distressing case has," writes a Vienna correspondent, "caused a wing of the general hospital to be closed for a time and the nurses to be kept out of contact with any one not belonging to the hospital. In the month of August a man was brought to the hospital suffering from a terrible disease called glanders, which he had taken from a horse similarly afflicted. He soon died, and a military surgeon, Dr. Rowski, who has spent many years examining bacilli of all kinds, undertook to subject the dead body to a close examination. This was in itself a most dangerous piece of work.

"By the aid of the microscope he soon succeeded in finding the bacillus, which he reared, to watch the manner of its growth and its vitality. An ambitious young physician, Dr. Hoffmann, expressed his doubts as to whether the bacillus reared artificially had still in it the power of infection. Dr. Rowalski gave him one of his families, and Dr. Hoffmann soon saw that the poison still had the most deadly power. All the animals he injected with it died of the horrible malady. At the beginning of October Dr. Hoffmann caught cold and felt acute pains in his side. The pain increased and Dr. Hoffmann tried to cure it by injecting morphia. He did it with the syringe which he had used for injecting the glanders poison into the doomed animals.

"Although it had been disinfected in glowing heat some particles of the poison must have still been in it, for Dr. Hoffman grew worse every day, and last Monday his friends took him to the hospital. His colleagues were horrified when they saw him, the whole body being covered by terrible ulcers, which, when they were examined, proved to be filled with glanders poison. The case touches the whole medical profession to the heart; 200 doctors are busying themselves with it, and all the great professors visit the patient often. Until the 22d Dr. Hoffmann was in great pain, but he then happily lost all consciousness. He knew perfectly well what was the matter with him, and gave a cool account of what he had done and what the consequences were likely to be. Later in the night Dr. Hoffmann died without regaining consciousness."

"Left Yesterday."

As Christmas approaches it is well for disunited friends and families to think of getting together again. Life is too short and too full of trouble for us to waste any of it in hate, or even in indifference. A loveless life is death, without the quietude and rest of death. We live only while we love.

You have been deeply wronged and your family disgraced, but at this season of the year it is good to remember that the doer of a wrong is far more unfortunate than the sufferer of a wrong. The man whose pocket-book is stolen can reckon up his loss and put it down upon paper in figures, but no one can reckon or express the calamity of the man who stole it. Though he be man enough to repent and be ashamed, he has degraded himself for ever in his own esteem; if he is not, it were better he had never been born. What is the wrong he has done you compared with the wrong he has done himself? You lose ten dollars. He has made himself a thief!

There was an incident at a prison the other day which brings home the duty of forgiveness in a very affecting manner. The prison post-master related it. Holding up a letter, he said:

"Here is a letter that will never accomplish its mission. The one to whom it was written looked anxiously for it for nearly two years. He had written home, but no answer had ever been received. Every day he was waiting for one, and as I saw the look of sadness grow deeper, and despair gradually displace expectancy, it became a sad duty for me to pass his cell.

"On the last morning he said to me, 'It's all over now; my childhood and my childhood's home are gone. I guess my folks never want to hear from me again, and they never will.'

"He left the prison yesterday, and today this letter came. It contained several family photographs, but came one day too late."

The man had taken a westward train, could not be traced, and the letter had to be returned to his family in New England, bearing the words, "Left yesterday."

It is very probable that the family had purposely withheld this token of forgiveness until the end of his term, thinking perhaps to enhance the beneficial effect of his punishment by thus increasing its severity. It was a pity. A long term of imprisonment, to a person not totally depraved, is misery enough, and it has no regenerating power except through its alleviations—a warder's encouraging word, a privilage purchased by good conduct, a wisely ordered Sunday service, the visit of a friend, kind letters from home.

That letter and its photographs would have flooded the poor fellow's cell with hope, if it had come sooner.

Two of a Kind Got Acquainted.

"This," said the man who was travelling on the cars, as he opened his valise and took out a bottle, "is a mixture called Dr. Jenkinson's Indispensable. I never travel without it. It is the best and most agreeable tonic now on the market, by all odds."

"I am not so sure about that," replied the man who was occupying the seat with him. "I have here"—and he opened his own valise and took out a bottle—"a tonic called Dr. Rybold's Extract, which I have used for several years and consider the best preparation ever made. No man ought ever to—"

"I have no doubt it is a fairly good medicine in its way," broke in the other, "but if you had ever tasted Dr. Jenkinson's Indispensable you would throw that stuff of yours away."

"I know all about Dr. Jenkinson's nostrum, and I know exactly what it's made of."

"You do, eh?"

"Yes, sir, and I know Dr. Rybold's extract is made from precisely the same formula only from pure materials instead of the vile and adulterated ingredients old Jenkinson uses."

"It's made from the same formula, is it?"

"Exactly the same."

"You lying old ignoramus, how do you know what it's made of?

"How do I know, you insulting old scoundrel? I'm Dr. Rybold, sir?"

"I am glad I have found you out, you infernal villain. I am Dr. Jenkinson?"

Home for Christmas.

The good old family festival of Christmas is approaching. The housewives of Canada have their rows of mince-pies ready on the pantry shelves; the farmers drive their flocks of fattened turkeys gobbling through the village street; the prize pumpkin and the mammoth squash are regarded no longer as things of beauty, but are forced to share the fate of common vegetables, and give their golden bulk to swell the abundance of the festive season. Everywhere it is the time of good cheer.

Wherever an enterprising Canadian has pentrated and taken his abode, he carries the memory of Christmas with him, and celebrates with each returning year the honored festival of his fathers. If he must, he celebrates it generously and merrily in his new home; if he can, he returns to keep it lovingly and tenderly in the old one.

Perhaps he is no longer a young man. He may be a father, coming with his children to visit the old folks at home. He may be a grandfather even, bringing a brood of wide-eyed Western youngsters back to some squarh, white farmhouse, in which there are no old folks now, to show them where he lived when he was a boy; the attic where he slept, the barn where he played, the trees in the orchard—bigger and gnarlier since that day—that he used to climb in search of sweet bough-apples or bright-streaked Gravensteins.

This is the season when Ontario spreads her table, writes Welcome above her door, and sits down to hold a great "At Home." Everything is in readiness, and all comers are welcome—strangers, friends, neighbors, kindred. There is a kind word and a slice of pie for all.

Which is the more delightful to behold who can say—the tremulous joy of those who recognize old scenes once again, or the ardent, affectionate curiosity of children to whom the old is also new? To them, who have always known and loved it through the stories of their parents' childhood, the actual sight of certain historic trees and rocks and ponds is like nothing short of fairyland come true.

"That is the tree mother fell out of when she was a little girl. There is the cleft in the boulder where Uncle John and father found the five little chipmunks. That must be the very pool where father caught the five-pound trout!"

Leafless and chilly and dreary though these spots may look in the dark December weather, they are precious to the eyes of the children, who still talk of them, and ask endless new questions concerning them when they return to the house and kneel before the wood fire, roasting apples on a row of twisting strings.

Perhaps they talk too much, and are sent away to the garret to amuse themselves by overhauling the old trunks, in which event, after an hour of seclusion, they clatter down the stairs in uproarious procession, decked out with long-tailed coats, short-waisted gowns, bead-bags and green calashes, to show themselves to the elders.

No disapproval greets them, though sometimes a lower voice is heard amidst the laughter, murmuring, "Your Aunt Nancy had that flowered Indja muslin the day she was sixteen!" or "Well, it looks funny now, children, but I thought that bonnet mighty fine when I wore it to your mother's wedding!"

Soon they race away again to play at hide-and-seek, while the grown folks remain gathered around the hearth talking of old times which they all remember, and listening to tales of times still older from the lips of the ancient, white haired mistress of the house. They hardly notice how time slips away. When the tall clock slowly chimes the hour, it is later than they thought and they have to break the circle to seek the tired children, still at their game, though the youngest are dropping asleep in the corners where they hide.

Such is Christmas in many a fine old homestead of Ontario. Such are the memories of the gay and gracious season the Home Day of Canadians which are carried thence in many hearts to cheer and ennoble countless other homes throughout the whole broad country.

There Was a Change in His Demeanor.

Two or three gentlemen, including amongst them a director, were traveling together on the London and Northwestern Line, when the train drew up at Wigan station.

One of the passengers, ignorant of the particular locality, put his head out of the window and seeing a porter passing politely said:

"What station is this, my good man?"

"Wigan, to be sure," replied the porter in a very surly tone.

The director, hearing what passed, was much annoyed, and, turning to his companions, remarked:

"This sort of thing will never do—we must have more civility on this line. Will you," addressing the gentleman who had not yet spoken, "kindly put the same question to the porter when he comes this way?

Soon the man appeared and the gentleman said: "Porter, will you be good enough to tell me the name of this station?"

"Wigan, to be sure," again come the answer, with a frown and in a surlier tone than before.

"Now," said the director, "I will speak to him and you will see the change in his demeanor."

Conscious of his importance and of the paralyzing effect his presence would have on the railway official, he looked out of the carriage window and pompously asked, "Porter, what place may this be?"

"Find out, you old idiot!" came the answer that almost took his breath away.

The Old Story.

"How is your furnace?"

"First-rate. We manage to get it warm every day, but it is a little selfish about letting any of the heat get away from it."

Too Too.

"Been writing?

"Yes."

"Who to?"

"Oh, dear! Why don't you speak grammatically? The idea—'Why to'! You should say 'To whom to,'"

White Crysanthemums.

Born of the clouds and darkness,
Of the frosts and early snow;
When the Summer blooms have faded
The beautiful Christ flowers blow.
All through the budding Springtime,
All through the Summer's heat,
All through the Autumn's glory,
They hide their blossoms sweet;
But when the earth is lonely
And the bitter north winds blow,
With a smile of cheer for the dear old year
The Christmas blossoms blow.

Sweet as a dream of Summer,
White as the drifting snow;
When our hearts are filled with grieving,
The beautiful Christ flowers blow.
Not all the south wind's wooing
Opens their secret heart;
Slender they grow and stately,
Guarding their life apart.
But when the earth is dreary
And the heavy clouds hang low,
With their tender cheer for the wayworn year,
The Christmas blossoms blow.

Sweetest of all consolers!
Fairest of flowers that grow!
When hopes and flowers have faded
The beautiful Christ flowers blow.
Bright in the cottage window,
Sweet in the darkened room,
Fair in the shortened sunlight
Cheering the dusky gloom.
Oh, when our hearts are lonely
And clouds of care hang low,
With blessed cheer for the dying year
The Christmas blossoms blow.

A Christmas Carol.

Far, far and near, o'er sea and land,
The rippling bells of many a chime
Peal forth, at love's divine command,
The joy, the grace of Christmas time,
Poor sinners we, we bend the knee,
We bow the heart in humble need:
"Lord, let us live anew to Thee,
For Christ, Thy Christ, is born indeed."

Ah, let the lowliest heart rejoice
And claim its kingly brotherhood,
And let the proudest fix its choice
In humble paths of doing good.
No palace decked with costly art,
With gold and gems, doth shine so fair
As the low chamber of the heart
When Christ, the Prince of Peace, is there.

What though the fields are white with snow
And breath of Winter chills the earth?—
Blithe troops of children come and go,
With gentle faces bright with mirth.
Their merry Christmas greetings ring
Like songs of birds when Summer smiled:
Our gracious Master and our king
Was born to earth a little child.

Whose heart so cold it shall not stir
When Christmas emblems, far and wide,—
The gifts that household loves prefer,—
Are sent abroad at Christmas tide?
Whose heart so cold, whose heart so old,
But swells with joy and childlike mirth
To see sweet charity enfold
Her royal mantle round the earth?

Now each shall find the gift deemed best.—
The baby's ring and shining ball,
The soft-haired doll so quaintly drest,
Skates, sweetmeats, books,—yea, gifts for all,
Ah, barren fir, cold juniper,
Lift high your branches, spread them wide!
Your day hath come; break forth in bloom
And clustered fruit at Christmas tide.

But dearer than the best of gifts
That e'er by mortal hand was given,
The gracious charity that lifts
Our human nature nearer heaven.
Love, heavenly love on earth below!
Let all things go if love abide!
Forget no friend, forgive each foe,
For Christ was born at Christmas tide.

The Better Land.

It is not far;
The swallow knows,
That flies beyond the evening star,
And sees the everlasting rest
Of peace and sweet content stretched far
In lines of gold. From out the west
Soft banks of rose
And amethystine cloudlets fly.
Straight on to where the white gates swing
Apart and let dead hours float by.
Upon eternity's dark wing—
It is not far!

It is so far!
The mother knows,
Who sees the waves creep o'er the bar
And bear away her precious barque,
Wherein loved eyes, that shadows mar,
Stare to the night. The river, dark,
Still swiftly flows
On toward the angel-guarded gate
Though which the cold, dead hours are borne,
And near which yearning mothers wait,
And cry out in their grief, forlorn,
"Lord, it is far!"

Her Answer.

They sat in the light of the moon,
"Dearest Susy," he said,
As he bent o'er her head,
"Do you really think me a spoon?"

Then she picked up her hat,
And pretended to sigh,
As she made this reply:
"Yes, and a 'brass' one at that."

M. S. Langley, who was Thackeray's private secretary, kept a diary in 1860, which has been offered for sale. The record of daily events is a full one. Notes of the great author's conversation and remarks have been jotted down day by day, and his opinions on all sorts and conditions of men and events are in the chronicle, and his personal peculiarities have also been noted.

John D. Gill, of Victoria, Vancouver's Land, possesses one of the largest and finest collections of old and rare coins in the world. His name is know among numismatists in every country on the earth, and his collection, which he has spent a lifetime in perfecting, is visted by thousands. He is a quiet, modest gentleman, with a mustache and goatee. He is now making a tour of this country.

Tholuck's Christmas-Tree.

The Christmas-tree is sometimes called Christ's tree, by the Germans. Their children usually speak of it as the Sugar-tree. For, in their eyes, its attractiveness is due to the candies and sweetmeats which it brings.

The tree has taken root in our land. But its growth will be promoted, if we surround it with the simple tastes and quiet "amusableness" which have made it grow as luxuriantly in its native soil.

An English clergyman, while a student at the University of Halle, was invited to celebrate Christmas Eve at the house of that eminent Christian scholar, the late Prof. Tholuck. His description exhibits the simplicity and childlikeness of mind with which the Germans enjoy their Christmas-tree. He says:

"Down each side of the room into which we entered—there were sixty students invited—was a long table. In the middle of each table was placed a large Christmas-tree, profusely lighted up with little wax tapers and decorated with colored and gilt papers.

"On each side of the two tables were ranged plates filled with small cakes and sweetmeats. Before each plate lay a kind of plum loaf, and at the side a book or books.

"This room opened into the professor's study, in which there was also a table. On it were a Christmas tree, a miniature representation of the shepherds tending their flocks, of the appearance of the angels, and of the manger, with its heavenly child, with Mary and Joseph standing near. There also were plates with cakes, books and small articles of dress.

As soon as the visitors had greeted their host and hostess, four students struck up a choral.

"When they ceased, Prof. Tholuck reminded his guests of the great gift which the festival commemorated, and begged them to accept the little gifts he had laid by their plates.

"Each one was then requested to look for his plate and book, which was indicated by a slip bearing his name. On every slip Tholuck had also written an aphorism, such as:

"'Thou, O God, hast made us for Thyself and our heart is restless, until it rests in Thee;' 'We can only know God by living a divine life;' 'First receive the kingdom of God as a little child, then press into it as a man.'

"Tea was then handed around, and the company separated into small groups, for conversation. After they had thus spent the hours, Tholuck read a few verses in the New Testament, commenting on them, and closed the evening with a brief prayer.

"The guests then gathered their cakes, loaves, sweetmeats, and books, and bidding host and hostess good-night, departed, filled with a quiet delight."

The Microbe of Electricity—A Mystery.

With all the paraphernalia of the modern physical and electrical laboratory, the instruments of precision that will handle a millionth of an inch as readily as a laborer his pick and shovel; with all the evolution going on through generations of scientists, and the almost incessant wresting of secrets from the bosom of nature, we doubt if science is any closer to the isolation or attenuation of the microbe of the magnet. It is absurd to suppose that a primary energy is impressed upon a piece of hardened steel once for all. The transfer of that energy into actual work would destroy the magnetic power, yet such a destruction not only does not take place, but the very exercise of the power strengthens the magnet. A horseshoe of steel may be magnetized in ten seconds by the current of a few amperes from a battery, a ridiculously small amount of energy all told, and such magnet can lift many pounds of iron in contact. But without contact it may lift and hold a pound of iron easily. It will hold that pound for an eternity, and every second of that time without end the magnet is expending energy until it foots up an almost inconceivable total of actual power. Not alone that, but the magnet of one pound lifting power to-day may and will be stronger to-morrow.

Where does all this really tremendous amount of energy come from? By what inscrutable process does the mere magnetization of a bar of steel make of it a machine for the transformation of energy? Not a reactionary or storage device, which, like a steel spring, honestly gives back approximately all it has received, but a perpetual transforming or converting machine. There is a hidden process going on of some kind; energy is going into the magnet all the time it is doing work—energy in some form. Where does it come from—gravity? atmosphere? solar rays? earth current? Who can say? It is a great problem, worthy of a life-time of indefatigable research. It is a microbe, and it will be discovered and the discovery will make electricity the queen of nature's forces, and steam will become a dim vision of the dark ages of the past.

How It Did Blow.

The latest story that has been sprung on an anxious public relates to a parrot that was sold into a good moral family and shocked the household very much by using profane language. Its vocabulary of indecent expletives was extensive and its utterance of them lavish. After the parrot had sworn the minister out of the house one day the indignant purchaser took it back to the original owner and said:

"Heavens, man, I can't keep this bird. He swears too much."

"That's all right," said the original owner, "you can cure him. As soon as he swears the next time seize him by the tail and whirl him around and you'll break him of his habit."

The opportunity came as soon as the purchaser reached home and he caught the unlucky bird by the tail and violently sawed the air in circular fashion with it. When he got through the parrot straightened out its ruffled feathers and looking at its owner, said: "Judas Cripes, didn't it blow!"

Did't Take the Hint.

"Delightful air up here, Miss Ancient."

"Yes, indeed; so embracing!"

It is seldom that muscular Christianity is made a pulpit theme. One of the rare cases occurred in Montreal last week, when some of the clergy spoke in favour of the continuation of the athletic club. There can be no doubt that religion and athletics are not antagonistic. A sound body, kept sound by proper exercise, is the temple of a sound mind.

THE FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.

Marvellous Stories Found in the "Gospel of the Infancy."

It was not possible for the active imagination of the early Christians to rest content with St. Matthew's short and plain record of the Flight. They must know more about it—how the pilgrimage was made, through what places the Holy Family passed, what marvels and portents happened by the way, and where they found a resting-place. And so the process of myth-making and legend-building began in answer to the questions of naive and childish curiosity. The brief record of the fact was enlarged and embellished and embroidered with fancies. The literature of the Flight unfolded itself in the apocryphal gospels of the second and third centuries, and continued its growth through the poems and chronicles of the Middle Ages. Nothing can be more clear than the difference between the simple statement of St. Matthew that the journey was made—a statement which bears every mark of being historical, and reads as if it were merely a transcript of the Virgin Mary's rememberances of that hurried and dream-like episode—and the of later times. And yet I think these fanciful stories, which were told so often at the fireside, in the tent, at the resting-place of the reapers, and by the camp fires of the caravan, are worth reading, because they are so fresh and childlike, and sometimes so pretty, and because they have had such an influence upon art.

* * * * * * *

But the greatest fund of marvellous stories about the Flight is found in the "Arabic Gospel of the Infancy," which was current among the Christians of the East, and was undoubtedly used by Mohammed in the composition of the Koran. It is an Oriental variation upon a sacred theme—an Asiatic embroidery full of all kinds of strange beasts, a sanctified Arabian Nights Entertainment. It tells of a dumb bride, restored to speech by taking the infant Jesus in her arms; and a crazy woman who would not wear any clothes brought to her right mind by the compassionate look of the Lady Mary; and a girl with the leprosy cleaned by washing in the water in which the child had been bathed; and sundry other household miracles even more

INGENUOUS AND ASTONISHING.

It describes the dwelling-place of the Holy Family at Matarea, a town a little to the northeast of Cairo, where any sceptical person may still see the aged sycamore which sheltered them, and the "fountain of Mary," in which she washed her child's coat. But the most wonderful tale of all is the story of the enchanted mule, which runs on this wise:

As the Holy Family were entering into a certain city they saw three women coming out of a cemetery, and weeping. And when the Lady Mary saw them, she said to the girl who accompanied her (the same who had been cleansed of her leprosy): "Ask them what calamity has befallen them." But they made no reply to the girl's questions, asking her in their turn: "Whence are you? and whither are you going? For the day is spent, and night is coming on apace." "We are travellers," said she girl, "and are seeking a house of entertainment." They said: "Go with us, and spend the night with us." Accordingly the travellers accepted the courteous invitation, and were brought into a new house, richly furnished. Now it was winter, and the girl going into the apartment of the women, found them again weeping and lamenting. Beside them stood a mule, covered with housings of cloth of gold, and sesame was put before him, and the women were kissing him and feeding him. And the girl said: "What is all this ado, my ladies, about this mule?" They replied with tears: "This mule, which thou seest, was our brother, born of the same mother with ourselves. When our father died he left us great wealth, and this only brother. We did our best to get him married, and were preparing his nuptials after the fashion of our country. But some women, moved by jealousy, bewitched him, unknown to us; and one night, when the door of our house was shut, we saw that this our brother had been turned into a mule, as thou now beholdest him. And we are sorrowful, as thou seest, having no father to comfort us; and there is no wise man or magician in the world that we have omitted to send for, but nothing has done us any good." And when the girl heard this, she said: "Be of good courage, ladies, and weep no more; for the cure of your calamity is near; yes, it is presently in your own house. For I also was a leper. But when I saw that woman, and along with her that young child, whose name is Jesus, I sprinkled my body with the water wherein his mother had washed him, and I was cured. I know that he can deliver you from your affliction also. But arise, go to Mary my mistress, bring her into your own apartment, tell her your secret, and supplicate her to have pity upon you." When the women had listened to the girl's words they hastened to the Lady Mary and brought her into their chamber, and sat down before her, weeping and saying: "Our mistress, Lady Mary, have pity upon thy servants, for no one older than ourselves, no head of our family, is left—to live with us; but this mule which thou seest was our brother, whom women have bewitched into this condition. We beseech thee, therefore, to have pity upon us." Then grieving at their misfortune, the Lady Mary took up the Lord Jesus and put him on the mule's back, and she wept with the women, and said to Jesus Christ, "Alas, my son, heal this mule by thy mighty power, and make him a reasonable man as he was before.' And when these words were spoken, the shape of the mule was changed, and he became a young man of engaging appearance. Whereupon there was great joy in the household, and the grateful sisters immediately concluded to marry their brother to the girl who had been the means of bringing him so great a benefit.

A LITTLE BEFORE DAYBREAK,

NEITHER FATHER NOR BROTHER—

All this, especially the happy marriage, is quite in the style of Scheherezade. It is no more like the sober records of the evangelists than a display of fireworks is like the silent stars; and the very contrast goes far to prove, or at least to illustrate the historical character of our four gospels.—[Henry van Dyke, in Harper's Magazine for December.

A Faithful Ex-Slave.

The superintendent of census comes nearer the throbbing heart of poor humanity than any other official in Washington, says a letter to the New York "Tribune." Of all the departments his alone is not governed by civil-service laws, and consequently that class of people whom Victor Hugo sweepingly described as "Les Miserables" turn to the census bureau. Some who apply are gentlewomen of middle age who can not pass a civil-service examination, because when they were young, girls were taught to be housewives and no provision was made for a widowhood or adverse circumstances when they would be forced to earn their own and their children's bread. Mr. Porter, the superintendent, says there is always one question that he is forced to put to applicants that goes through them like a knife.

It is the simple and legitimate question. "What can you do?" Marvelous it is the number of people in the world who have no definite idea of their own capabilities. When the question doesn't bring tears it is usually followed be a wringing of the hands and a helpless "I cannot tell," but rarely by a direct confident answer. One of these cases is unmatched in pathos. Mr. Porter boarded for a time after coming to the capital at a hotel where he noticed that his waiter was unusually attentive. The man did not seem to care for fees, nor did he ask anything for himself. For a month or two this dumb admiration was carried on until finally Mr. Porter said:

"What is it, Wallace? You seem to have something on your mind."

"Yes, sah: Ise been studyin', sah, as how like nuff dey mout be some place in the census for my young missis. She's desarvin' but is to proud to ask foh anything. Ise been studyin' nigh a yeah how Wallace could get somethin' foh de missis, and when de head waitah, sah, sent you to my table, I jest said, de Lawd will provide."

"Who is the woman, Wallace?" Mr. Porter asked.

"She's de only chile of my ole massa 'fo de wah. Massa was kild an' missis an' de chile came norf when dey loss' all. Dey lib above Great Falls, an' doan tell it, sah, but dey's ver' poah."

As Wallace finished some one came up to talk with Mr. Porter and the matter was forgotten. Wallace knew how to wait, and it was not until another fortnight that he said, hopefully;

"My young missis, sah, I fohgot to say dat she ver' intellectual an'do everything consciously."

Wallace had the darky's aptitude for sounding words and passed among his colleagues as that mysterious Titian, a "college graduate." There was a ludicrous pedantry about him that made one think he must have been born a college graduate. It was his elect destiny. Mr. Porter received further confidence from the honest fellow, who could do what few white people would do in this selfish world—ask a favor for some one else before himself, and, in this case, for the daughter of the man under whom he had suffered bondage.

Promising to remember the "young missis," Mr. Porter left and might have forgotten her if it had not been for the faithful, ever-watchful Wallace. Finally one Saturday night he said:

"Well, Wallace, I have something for your young mistress. Tell her to come around to the census bureau next week and there will be some work for her."

Later he learned from the lips of the "young missis" that Wallace had walked fourteen miles through the rain that Saturday night after his work was done to tell her the good news of her appointment. She had not known that he was seeking the place for her, although for some weeks he had remarked mysteriously "De Lawd am providin'."—[Chicago Mail.

Not So Bandy-Legged as He Looked.

They sat on the sofa. They had just come to a mutual understanding, and he had measured her finger for the engagement ring and they were in the first throes of tender reminiscence.

"You do not remember," he said in a trembling voice. "You do not remember when you first saw me."

"Yes, I do."

"Did any little thrill or throb tell your heart this happy moment would come? No, that could not be expected."

"Yes. Something did seem to whisper that we might become man and wife."

"My darling—," he said, and he kissed her fondly.

"Yes, I remember, I saw you from the window leaving the house, and I thought you were bandy legged, and I thought how awful it would be to marry a bandy-legged man but it was only the glass in the window that was uneven and made you look so."

To Battle With the Smoke.

The Limited Liability Company, dear to the British heart, after exhausting every other resource, has now appeared in a concrete form to make London smokeless and the £150,000 of shares offered to the public to-day ought certainly to tempt thousands of the suffering inhabitants to become subscribers. A chemical compound, it seems, has been discovered which, sprinkled upon the coal, will prevent the millions of chimney pots in London from belching forth the carboniferous gas, and London, if an anti-fog campany can be found, will shortly rejoice in blue skies and sunshine, and will set up as a rival of Constantinople.

The Browns.

Brown has a home full of girls and boys,
Rosy and healthy and full of noise.
They are sprightly at work and bright at their books,
And are noted for smartness and wit and good looks.
Brown is healthy, his wife is fair,
And their faces are free from wrinkles of care.
They spend no money for powders and pills,
And never a dollar for doctor's bills.

The reason is that they begin in the right place. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, by keeping the springs of life pure, the blood free from impurities, wards off all those diseases which spring from bad blood. The use of the "Discovery" prevents liver and kidney troubles, dyspepsia, consumption or lung scrofula, stomach and bowel troubles, and forestalls the beginning of disease. That is why the Browns are so healthy. It is also guaranteed to cure these ailments if taken in time and given a fair trial, or money paid for it will be refunded.

W. C. MACDONALD, ACTUARY. J. K. MACDONALD, MANAGING DIRECTOR.

John Rawlston's Two Christmases.

"Fred, you're an idiot!

"Thank you, father."

And the two men regarded each other for sometime in silence. The younger, cool, determined, not defiant, but resolute. The elder, boiling with rage and spleen.

What was the cause of this conflict between father and son? Nothing new, nothing novel—only the old, old story, almost as old as life itself. The story of love—only this, and the story—almost as old—of paternal disapproval.

This father was one of those men who are not to be trifled with, and his son knew it.

John Rawlston, stock-broker, was acknowledged by his associates to be one o the shrewdest men "on the street." A man who never made mistakes. His own opinion of his attributes did not conflict with the popular one. And so, when he had mapped out a career for his only son, he expected him to follow it.

But the boy preferred books to business, and clung to his choice so tenaciously, that at last he had his way.

But this was not the bitterest draught for the father. He was ambitious for him socially as well, and now that he had reached an age when he might choose a partner for life, his old perversity reasserted itself, and he exhibited an exasperating indifference to the bevy of moths about him.

His father understood only when he discovered that he carried in his breast pocket a carte-photo of little Nellie Fry—a nobody—who had been his classmate at school.

He had counseled him not to involve himself, and now he had the effrontery to tell him that he expected to make her his wife.

He had been too easy with the boy. He would rectify the error now, and, if possible, save him from this rash act.

Had he looked honestly into his own heart he would have found another motive than fatherly solicitude—a stubborn pride.

It was because of this that he stood there now, grasping and choking with choler, and said again through his clenched teeth, "That s what you are, brainless idiot."

To which the young man again quietly replied. "Thank you, sir."

The father thought he read a new meaning in the words, for he fairly exploded, "What do you mean, you insolent ingrate? Heaven knows I have tried to beat some sense into your empty pate. Haven't I lavished money upon you? Given you every opportunity to mingle with men, that you might learn to read them through and through? And yet you have chosen to waste such chances. And now you propose to cap the climax with this mad freak. Your mother has feared this. It will grieve her deeply."

He made this last appeal with a sense of its unfairness. He knew the boy's love for his mother to be his most vulnerable point. But his son saw the trick, and it did not move him.

"I am sorry, sir," he said, "but I cannot think it just that you should condemn my choice without good grounds. I am sure, father, if you would look at this matter fairly——"

"Bah! Don't be a fool! I know my own mind."

"And I, sir, must lay claim to a like sagacity."

"Well, sir, it is your own work. You are wrecking your own prospects. You must take the consequences. I hope you understand me."

"Yes, sir, I think I do.

"Well, if you persist, you must go your own gait."

"Father," the young man said, "I have looked the matter squarely in the face. I am ready to meet them. By your own conditions I shall not see you soon again. It may seem impertinent, but when you make mother's happiness a lever to turn me from my purpose, I must remind you that you have it in your power to make her happy. You know how fondly she reverts to the happy days before you became so engrossed in money-getting. You forget everything in the maddening excitement of speculation. And what does it all amount to? Who is bettered when you win your wager on the rise of wheat? If there is any good in all this piling up of gold, it is that you may enjoy it, and help her to enjoy while there is yet time."

"Very pretty, sir, very pretty! But you are a fool if you think to convert me to your shallow ways."

"And I must say, sir, that you do not seem to me to exhibit the wisdom of Solomon in your persistent efforts to make me belie my best impulses."

"I shall try no more, you impetinent ingrate. Follow your impulses and see where they will lead you."

"And you, sir, stick to your gambling, and see where it will end."

And so they parted.

The young man remained under the home roof only long enough to say a reassuring good-bye to his mother—a weak, gentle woman who, through years of submission to a stronger will, had come to have none of her own. Her mother-heart cried out against this putting forth of her boy, but never doubting the wisdom of her husband, she tried to believe that, somehow, it was for the best.

And then Fred Rawlston went forth penniless to take up the burden love laid upon him—to fight that unequal fight made so unequal by his former circumstances.

His father sent his effects after him, including his purse, which he found had, somehow, grown fatter since he left it on his dresser. But Fred sent them back with thanks.

It was a strange thing to him, this dwelling in garret, subsisting off such employment as he found among strangers. He would accept no aid from former friends, for he felt that it was proffered in charity.

He paid frequent visits to his mother, concealing from her his want, telling her harmless falsehoods of success.

Only once did he see his father, and that was when he came to look, for the last time, upon his mother's face—not on the dear eyes full of mingled anxiety, and pride, and love; but on a cold face of clay.

News had been sent him of her sudden death—heart-disease, the physician said. It might have been a thunder-bolt for any premonition. And with like terrible force it smote the hearts of husband and son. Its cruel fire ought to have welded them. It must have done so but for the demon, pride, that would not let the son leave the possible imputation of taking advantage of the calamity to crawl back into his father's favor. Pride that would not let the father, broken by his bereavement, for he loved his wife, lean for consolation on his son, whom he began to feel he had misused. And so, as by common consent, they turned their wretched faces from each other as one yielded his place at the side of the silent figure to the only other mortal who could share his woe.

Fred took his last leave there alone. He would not thrust himself in his way on the day they bore her to her rest but, he hung back in the shadow of a clump of shrubbery, near which the sad line must pass, and watched the heavy casket out of sight, only dimly conscious of the one mourner, sitting bolt upright in his carriage, his lips compressed like a vice, and his eyes staring straight on before.

Once back in his dismal lodgings, Fred began to realize how much his efforts to quell his mother's anxiety had helped to sustain him; he seemed now so utterly alone. His inability to accumulate as he had hoped, the little required to warrant marriage, discouraged him. He felt like a criminal in permitting Nellie to love him and wait for him, and, if he was to be a failure, now was the time to release her.

He tried to say as much to her, but a firm little hand barred the words, and a firm little voice assured him, in accents he could not doubt, that that could never be; that by their mutual love, by all that was best worth living for, they were already one for better, for worse. She was not afraid of poverty, only so that they might bear it together, and since they were so wedded in heart they ought not to wait for prosperity.

And, in spite of his better judgment, he acquiesced.

And so they were married. "And lived happy ever after?" Hardly. They were married, and he paid the penalty of his weakness in self-condemnation, as the woman he loved went her dull round of work; paid it in guilty qualms, as he saw the roundness and color leave her cheek; cursed himself as unworthy to be the father of the big boy-baby that came and took possession. Almost felt sometimes like challenging him as he so coolly, so presumptuously, tugged his mother's tired life away by littles, seeming to thrive off her very weariness.

Through it all, Fred never saw her discontented nor complaining, though every thing he tried failed under him.

His bookish, absent ways, so mysteriously to them, so plainly to everyone else, failed to find out success. Sometimes his self-hate would rise so dominant that he would break out in self-chiding. At such times she would say: "Do not blame yourself. Indeed, I am happier so than I should be in ease without you. Keep up your courage; we will win yet."

At last he found a hobby. The abstract problems over which he had pored so long took practical shape.

He conceived a new application of that wonderful form of force of which we know so little. He explained it all to Nellie, and she grew enthusiastic over it.

Then they began to spend a part of their poor earnings on its realization.

Fred would come home with beaming face, carrying mysterious-looking packages. There were weeks of unremitting work, and then a table, loaded with strange devices, that vibrated, and whirled, and clicked, and hammered under the potent influence that crept up the wire from the strong box in the corner. There were great times of trying and testing, and finding it almost right and then more anxious, eager work, changing, modifying, keeping up hope; always, too, the scanty fare; then, again, a holding of their breaths and—disappointing failure; a tired head laid on a pair of nerveless arms, a light, caressing hand upon it, tender words of encouragement and love, a shower of kisses, until the faint heart gathered strength to laugh at it all with her, and go out again to earn means for further experiments and further failure.

And so the days went by, until they seemed to him a line of ghostly enemies that cried, each as it passed, "Failure!" until at last there came a time when even his wife's brave cheer could not rally him, and, sick at heart, he sank down in utter despair, hearing the swelling cry of "Failure!" as the dread army seemed to trample him and his under foot, and faintly, but clearly, above the tumult he heard his father's words: "Follow your impulses, and see where they will lead you." Then all seemed over.

But what of John Rawlston during all these years?

Not much worth the telling. He has shut his firm lips a little tighter day by day; has frozen his old associates a little further off; has plied his gaming at the exchange a little more assiduously; has added a million to the great bulk of his credits, and hopes to add another. And is content? Well, possibly not.

He gets on well enough the six days in the week with their busy whirl; but the Sabbaths, with their stillness and their memories, are very dreary.

Sometimes the nights will not bring him rest, and the waking dreams, as he lies all alone through the long hours, are harder to bear than the troublous ones he encounters when he falls asleep.

One night is unusually full of terror.

It is on Christmas Eve, and he is tossing and turning on his pillow, trying to evade the pictures memory conjures up of other Christmas Eves.

At last he falls asleep, and dreams a dream—a sleep-memory of the early days, when he and Jennie were living in the little three-roomed house, and Fred was a baby in frocks; his coming home from his day's work, bringing a big basketful of the things to delight a baby's heart, for it is Christmas Eve in his dream as well—smuggling it into the closet away from his curious eyes; sitting down with his cheery wife and chubby boy to a plain supper that tastes so good; romping Freddie tired; helping him to hang up his stocking; tucking him away into his little trundle bed; bringing out the basket, and, tiptoeing about with Jennie, filling the little stocking, and putting the rest of the contents of the basket here and there, where they will greet the wondering eyes, a succession of baby surprises; looking again and again to make sure those same eyes are not shamming; and now—he laughs a merry dream-laugh over it—each hanging up a stocking for the other, and taking turns at hiding their eyes and filling them.

And now they are calling to Freddy, "A Merry Christmas!" It does not wake him, and, in his boyish exuberance, he hangs the new drum about his neck and marches to and fro, beating it loudly—"rub-a-dub-dub!" While Jennie watches for the lifting of the heavy eyelids, he sees her fall forward in a swoon. In an instant the light and joy are gone. He gropes his way through the darkness—so slowly, so laboriously, it seems an age to reach them—only to find that both are dead!

And then he wakes in an agony so intense, so real, that he springs up involuntarily, looking for the figures and the trundle-bed, and sinks back in a paroxysm of weeping as he realizes that waking does not mend the dream.

And so he lies there, till he becomes aware it is only his poor old heart pounding away in its pain. Lies there until he can endure it no longer; then rises and dresses, and, ringing for the housekeeper, orders breakfast.

He gives orders for the coachman to drive to the office for despatches. He tries to read, but cannot; and at last he goes to the window, and stands there, staring drearily out at the new-fallen snow, unable to forget, yet scarcely able to believe, that it is Christmas morning.

What an empty life it is! What is there in it to cling to? Why not end it? Ah, he dare not. How he longs for some one love. If he only dared go to Fred. Too late; he cannot.

His gloomy reverie is interrupted by the sight of his spanking span dashing into the drive. Ah, the morning despatches. Yet why should he care what news they bring?

He does not lapse into his former dismal state, for his curiosity is suddenly aroused by the strange appearance of a bundle rolling out of the cutter and sticking upright in the snow.

He cannot make it out at first; but in a moment it begins to move, and he then finds it to be no less than a little, round, apple-faced urchin, knee-deep in the downy covering.

The little fellow looks about him wonderingly, with an indescribable air, in which are mingled timidity and assurance.

His hands are thrust deep in his pockets, as when he rolled plump on to his feet without their aid, and as he takes his bearings, he chafes one of his tingling ears with his shoulder.

"Here, boy; what are you doing here?" the broker shouts at him.

The animated dumpling stares in a bewildered way at the house, and catching sight of the stern face at the window, manages to ejaculate, after a courageous effort to swallow the lump in his throat:

"Don't you want your walks cleaned?"

"No!" is the gruff answer.

"I'll clean 'em cheap," the boy persists,

"No, I tell you. Where did you pick up that gamin?" he asks the coachman, as he hands in the package of telegrams.

"I dunno, sir. I didn't see him till you hollered."

"Well, that will do. Keep your eyes open hereafter. Do you suppose I want these rag-tag, dirty imps taking possession of my cutter? Now, put out the horses, and then clear away the snow from the walks as soon as possible, or we'll be overrun with these beggars."

"Here, boy! Where are you going?" he calls, as he sees him moving off.

The boy, hands still in his pockets, makes a compound gesture of head and elbow, meant to indicate the next house, and ploughs away down the drive.

Perhaps the bright, rosy face reminds the broker of the long ago—so dim, so long ago—when a snowfall was a joyous thing to him; when it was pure fun to kick about in the feathery depths.

Perhaps he foolish fancies that in calling back the child he will call back the blithesome spirit of his own childhood.

Whatever his motive, he cannot let him go, so he raps upon the window pane till he turns about, and then beckons to him.

The little figure ploughs back again, and coming to a halt before the window, fires another round:

"Do you want me to clean 'em?

"Come in here," the broker says, and pens the door.

The child hesitates: "You going to give me the job?"

"No. I want to talk to you. Come in."

"I haven't got time, unless you give me the job."

He smiles at this persistancy, and at the eager face turned up to him; "Well, come in, and I'll give you something to do."

The boy pulls off his little cap, and, climbing the steps with alacrity, stamps the snow off his shoes on the mat and enters, staring about for a moment in pleased amazement at the splendor all around, then goes to the window and looks out upon the snow.

"I haven't any shovel," he says. Have you got a shovel?"

"Never mind the shovel," the broker replies.

"Come over here by the fire."

"I ain't cold."

"You're not"

"No sir."

"Then what makes your hands so red?"

"I dunno. Can I do it now?"

"Don't be in a hurry. Come and warm your feet.

"They are warm."

"Then why do you stand with one on top of the other in that way?" And the broker sees, with somehow a sense of responsibility, that the little shoes are full of holes.

"Oh, just to keep 'em warm. How much you going to pay me?"

"Oh, a dime."

"No, sir; it's worth more than that."

"Well, how much?"

This is a puzzler for the young contractor; but he makes the best of it.

"How much do you pay other boys? I'll do it for that."

The old man's heart warms at the guarded manner of the boy. "Ah," he thinks, "I could make a financier of him." What if he could persuade this boy to stay with him? Maybe he has no home, and would be glad to come "Have you had your breakfast?" he asks, as the bell rings.

"No, sir."

"Then come with me."

"I don't want any," the boy insists. "Please let me have the shovel; I'm in a hurry.

"See here. What are you in such a hurry about?" the broker asks.

"'Cause I want to get as many jobs as I can before they're all taken up, Won't you please get me the shovel? I could 'a' had it most done."

"What do you want to do it for, anyway?"

"For the money."

"What do you want of money?"

"Buy medicine."

"Medicine? You young rascal! You don't need any medicine."

"For my father."

"Ah," the broker thinks, "only a professional beggar after all."

"Here, you little scoundrel!" he says, tossing a coin onto the carpet. "Now cut it."

But the boy does not heed him. He is looking from the window in disappointed surprise; after a moment he turns, and with all the withering, contemptuous reproof of which his little being is capable, says: "There's a man cleaning 'em" and moves dejectedly towards the door.

"Here, take this," the broker says, softening a little, and indicating the coin with his foot.

"I don't want it unless I earn it," the boy replies.

"H'mp! Where did you get that nonsense? Here, come back and I'll give you a chance to earn it."

"Will you?" and he eagerly picks it up.

"Yes. Come in here and get your breakfast, and I'll go and see your father. I want to talk to him."

"He can't talk, he's too sick. Is this enough to get some medicine?"

"Yes I'll go and see him anyway." With a wicked half hope that he may die and leave the boy on his hands. "Where do you live?"

"I dunno the name of the street we just moved there, but it's right straight down this way and then up this way till you come to that place where the big statue is on the stone horse, where I got into your sleigh. Then it's right over this way where I rode on the cart, and then up there past the big market," indicating the zigzag course with his shabby shoe on the tasselated floor.

"Why, you rascal, that's five miles away."

"Is it? Well, I can find it easy enough."

"Sit up here and then we'll see," and the broker puts a rich hassock on a chair at the table and lifts the boy onto it. "Mary, another plate—breakfast for two.

"What are you going to be when you're a man?" he asks.

"Oh, I guess, I'll be what my father is."

"And what's that?"

"He's a crank."

"A what?"

"A crank."

"What's a crank?"

"Oh, he's getting a great invention and making apparatuses and 'sperimenta, and all kinds of funny machines like that."

"And they call him a crank, do they?"

"He calls himself that. Mamma says he's a scientific or something, but, I guess, he knows."

The old man smiles as he flourishes a muffin temptingly on his fork, and says: "Have another —er— what's— your—name—what shall I call you?"

"You can call me Johnny. My name's John Rawlston."

Down go fork and muffin onto the table. Down goes John Rawlston, broker, into his chair in a heap—clutching at the tablecloth in a hepless way, gasping and staring at the apple-faced boy as if he were an intruding demon. When at last he gets his breath he stammers, "Wha'—what is your father's name?"

"Frederick Rawlston—we call him Fred."

"Did he send you here?"

"No, sir."

"Did he know you were coming?"

"No, sir; he's too sick to know anythink."

"Did your mother know it?"

"No, sir: why, I didn't know it myself till the sleigh stopped."

"And they named you after"—the old man checks himself. "Who did they name you after?"

"After my grandpa."

"What for?"

"'Cause my papa said he wanted me to be a man."

"But you all hate him, don't you?"

"No, sir. I wish I could go and see him—I'm going, too, some time. Pap can't go 'cause my grandpa's so rich and he'd think we were after his money. But we wouldn't touch a cent of it if we were starving."

For a moment the small boy is confronted by a picture of confused indecision he cannot understand, then his host dives through a door and attacks the telephone, ringing it frantically.

"Hello! Give me three-thirty-one—three-thirty-one! Doctor Howorth's residence. Doctor Howorth? Doc., this is John Rawlston. Meet me in the park—at the monument. Heh? Yes—corner Rag Alley and Louisa lane, y' understand? Quick as you can drive there. Don't spare horseflesh—it's a case of life and death—you won't fail me? Right!" And the old man darts through the room again.

"Mary, where's Thomas?"

"In the kitchen, sor."

"Send him here quick—get me my hat and boots—yes, and my overcoat—never, mind I'll get them myself. Thomas, why don't you come when I send for you? Are the horses in the cutter?"

"No, sir; I put them out."

"What did you do that for?"

"You told me to, sir."

"Well, don't stand there parleying—get them up quick and—drive 'round to the door. Don't be all day about it."

The boy does not understand why the meal is so suddenly terminated, nor why he is plied with questions so thick and fast; but he knows it means help for his father, and he is glad to be hurried into the cutter and spun along at that lightning speed.

Away they go down the avenue, John Rawlston, stock broker, and John Rawlston the apple-faced, sitting silently side by side; both with lips compressed, leaning anxiously forward; both unmindful of the cutting snow in their faces.

The child and the man, like shoots from the same family tree, only of different growth.

From time to time the old man breaks forth in impatient urging of the horses and driver, both already doing their utmost.

Fortunately the streets are unusually clear this early holiday hour and their course is unimpeded.

"Which way now?" he asks, as they rear the corner.

"Right down that way."

He passes the direction to the driver, and they turn the corner with a swift, swinging slide, that ploughs up the snow and envelopes them in a whirling cloud; as they emerge the broker rises off his seat, and beckons wildly to a muffled figure sitting compesedly among the robes of his light cutter, before which a span of flyers with red, flaring nostrils and steaming coats, are pawing and prancing, and now the two are tearing on toward the Bowery, ignoring the wild gyrations and vociferous protest of the policeman who vainly tries to intercept them.

"We'll soon be there, my boy," the broker says; "It'll be all right yet," and, then, as if under a sudden impulse he cannot repress, he puts his arm about him, hugs him close—asks: "Do you know who I am?"

"No, sir."

"I am John Rawlston, too. I am your grandfather."

A look of amazement from the big, round eyes, then a little curly head slips under an old elbow, a little hand comes out of a little trousers pocket, and releasing its grip on a shining coin, drops it among the wraps. The animated bundle rolls for the second time out of the cutter, regardless of its speed, which ends in tumbling over and over in the snow. It rights itself like a teetotum, however, and its pair of little legs go bounding away down a by-street.

The broker stops his cutter, and leaping out gives chase to the fugitive. It is an amusing spectacle, this dignified old man chasing this chubby urchin through the snow, overtaking him, falling over him, and, at last, breathlessly, but triumphantly, bearing him back to the cutter.

"What's the matter, John?" the doctor asks.

"Never mind, come on," he pants. And again they are flying on.

He soon succeeds by force of arms and argument in convincing his prisoner of the wisdom of yielding gracefully and pointing out the way.

By familiar landmarks he guides them now this way, now that, now they dip into the regions of dilapidated tenements and narrow noisome streets, where the air seems thick and dark, and the snow is darkened with it; where it would seem the moral atmosphere must be as foul.

"Here it is, that's where I live," the boy exclaims, and they rein up suddenly before one of the gloomiest of the row.

"Get out and come in quick, Doc.! My boy is in here, sick, dying maybe!"

"Its up two stairs," the boy says, and he leads the way up through the dark passages.

The boy bursts unceremoniously into a room at the farthest end of the hallway, and is met by a matronly little woman, her eyes red with weeping, who falls on her knees, her arms about him.

"Oh, sirs, how can I thank you enough. You naughty boy, where have you been? Where did you find him?"

The boy evidently thinks both questions addressed to him and only the latter worth notice, for he replies:

"I found him at his own house, and he's my grandpa, and this is the doctor for papa."

"Yes, ma'am, true," the broker says, briefly. "Where is he? Show us to him."

"It needed no showing but the incoherent muttering of the sick man in his delirium to guide the doctor.

He is already at his side. "Brain-fever," he says, as they enter. 'Overwork and worry."

The sick man turns uneasily, and mutters "Failure, failure—money, money, money. It ought to work, but it won't, it won't."

His father bends over him, touching his burning brow with his fingers tenderly.

He speaks to him and his voice is quivering and broken.

"Oh, my boy! Fred—Fred!"

The sick man fires his firey eyes upon him, then the wildness seems to fade and die out of them. His hands reach up weakly. His father takes them in his and sobs.

"Fred, have I killed you?"

The sick man's eyes close restfully, and muttering, "It's all right," he falls asleep.

And it is all right. Dr. Howorth says so. He will get well. But he must have care and nursing, and he has them, from fatherly hands that, after all, have not forgot their cunning—from a little woman who never tires.

The cutter flies back and forth, bringing the long list of things the doctor and the broker have ordered for the patient's comfort, for necessities and luxuries as well, and then, while the sick man sleeps, three people sit down round a little, rickety table to a very sober, quiet little Christmas meal, and in spite of the watchful eyes of the young snow contractor, Rawlston, broker, for the second time in his life, falls desperately in love—so desperately that he waits impatiently till Fred is well enough, that he may bear his second love and incumbrances to his home.

Another swing of this little ball around the sun, and again the broker—not in a fading dream this time—tiptoes about, filling little nothings, and playing happy surprises.

And now, again, it is Christmas morning, and again the snow flies, as it does on all well-regulated Christmas mornings, and once more the animated bundle (returned from a round of charitable calls with his father) rolls out of the cutter. Not now with patches and mittenless hands—and as he looks up at the window, the broker meets him with a merry "Hello," and flings wide the door, for he is monarch here.

The holiday runs on in the great house—not the broker's house now, but the inventor's. For the wheel of fortune (as well as the wheel of time, has gone round.

Disastrous investments have pauperized the broker, while success surpassing hope has crowned the inventor.

His scheme has worked at last, and a great syndicate has paid him his price. He rests to-day, and as the preparations go forward for the Christmas dinner, his eyes follow, in a worshipful way, a happy little woman, who was so hopeful and true in the dark hour, and bustles about, full of important business and hopeful words, and good generalship. While a very grand, very happy old man sits in a cosy corner and exchanges wisdom with an apple-faced boy, nestling the while on his breast a little baby girl that, for his sake, they call "Jennie." He lays his face caressingly against her warm, silken head, and as his bosom swells with a measureless content, he tells her confidently that sometimes even smart men, like himself, make mistakes.

A New Explosive.

The Australians, it would seem, have taken hold of a new and valuable explosive called ecrasite. It is the invention of two engineers named Liersch and Kubin. It is impervious to damp, shock, or fire. Its power is to dynamite as 100 to 70, and it can be carried from place to place with the utmost safety. It emits a thick, black smoke, and the detonation is louder than that of gunpowder, but shorter, sharper, and clear. It can be used for rifle cartridges or as priming for cannon. A bombshell loaded with it exploded with such terrific force that experiments against palisades representing 100,250, and 500 men at ranges of 300, 750, and 1,200 meters recorded marks in very division of the palisades standing for a soldier.—[N. It Made Mother Strong

"My mother has been using PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND for nervous prostration, accompanied by melancholia, etc., and it has done her a world of good. It is the only medicine that strengthens the nerves.' G. H. BEERS, Orbisonia, Pa.

"I am in my 64th year. Have been afflicted in several ways—could not sleep, had no appetite, no courage, low spirits. I commenced using Paine's Celery Compound, and felt relief from the third day after using it. I now have a good appetite and can sleep well. My spirits and courage are almost like those of a young man." S. C. KINKAID, D. D., Gonzales, La.

Paine's Celery Compound

Strengthens and builds up the old, and cures their infirmities. Rheumatism, indigestion and nervousness yield quickly to the curative power of Paine's Celery Compound.

A Perfect Tonic and Invigorator, it GIVES NEW LIFE.

"I am now 69 years old and have tried several remedies, but none had any effect until I used Paine's Celery Compound. I feel entirely different for the short time I have used it. I can walk nearly straight, sleep sound and well, and feel as though there was new life and energy coming into my whole system." H. MYLIUS, Cleveland, Tenn.

Paine's Celery Compound is of unequaled value to women. It strengthens the nerves, regulates the kidneys, and has wonderful power in curing the painful diseases with which women so often silently suffer.

TEMPERANCE TALK.

CONTRIBUTED BY THE LADIES.

Wishing You A Merry Christmas.

I wish you a merry Christmas,
My brother temperance men,
Who every day are striving
The tide of drink to stem.
We've spent a happy Christmas
Without strong drink before,
And this year without the monster
We hope to spend one more.

I wish you a merry Christmas,
Dear readers, one and all,
And this can be obtained, we know,
Without King Alcohol,
For he doth cause continually
Distress and many a sorrow,
Make wounds upon a Christmas day
And headaches on the morrow.

I wish you a merry Christmas,
But midst your joys let's think
How many hearts are desolated
Through the accursed drink.
I wish you a merry Christmas,
And friends around shall see
Without the firey water
How happy we can be.

I wish you a merry Christmas
To every child and man,
Indeed, to every woman, too,
Who practices our plan.
In such a godly warfare
Right onward let us steer;
So I wish you a merry Christmas
And a happy coming year.

"Don't Step There."

A man started out for church one icy Sunday morning, and presently came to a place where a boy was standing, who, with a choking voice, said: "Please, don't step there."

"Why not?"

"Because I stepped there and fell down," sobbed the little fellow, who had thus taken upon himself to warn the unwary passerby of the danger into which he had fallen.

There are many men in the world who have good reasons for giving such a warning as this. The man who has trod the slippery paths of intemperance, as he sees the young learning to take the first glass of spirits or wine or beer, has good reason to say to them, "Don't step there; for I stepped there and fell down." The man who has indulged in gambling till he is despised by others and abhorred by himself has good reason to say to young men when they are entering on the same course, "Don't step there; for I stepped there and fell down."

How many are there to-day in prisons and convict settlements with reputations ruined and lives blasted who could say to the young man tempted to enter the paths of dishonesty and wrong-doing, "Don't step there; for I stepped there and fell down."

Let us be warned ourselves and lift a warning voice to others.

There is no more common or unpardonable form of mendicancy than that which asks alms of newspaper publishers. The average publisher is not avaricious; on the contrary he gives liberally to all enterprises. But a man pursues his business for a livelihood and the support of his family, and he determines for himself the amount and direction of his gifts and charities. This is what the church or other society forgets which asks a newspaper to give it space for nothing. There is no more reason why a newspaper should give its space than that a merchant should be requested to furnish a pair of boots, a suit of clothes or a barrel of flour. A member of one of these committees in his private capacity as merchant negotiates with another merchant for a piece of cloth or a case of shoes. But he finds that he has miscalculated the market, or there is some mishap, and he loses by the bargain. Does he thereupon repair to the other merchant, and say to him he hasn't made as much as he expected by the venture; that, in fact, he lost money, and that in view of that sad mischance the merchant will perhaps take half of the price agreed upon? No; he has never been guilty of that. If he cannot take the chances of trade he is not fit to be a trader, and yet that is precisely what they say, not to the shoe dealer or the cloth merchant, but to the newspaper merchant. Have you or have you not said to him that you were very sorry that the crowd had been so small and the expenses so large, and the treasury so low that perhaps—perhaps—in view of everything—that—that in fine the manager would perhaps take of half the price stipulated because you have not made as much out of your speculation as you hoped to make? To decline to do this, I do not hold to be a mercenary view of the newspaper man's calling. If it is not mercenary for the baker to ask six cents for his loaf, or the milkman a fair price for his milk, neither is it mercenary for the newspaper man to ask an equally fair price for his commodity and his labor. It is indeed open to any man to give bread and milk to his neighbors without price. But he cannot support his family by that course. All the merchants in town, if they choose, may give away all their goods. But they cannot be reproached with venality if they prefer to sell instead of give. Those who request a newspaper to renounce half its advertising fee are unquestionably well-meaning, but they are unmindful of the laws and usages of honorable business.

Always give precedence to elders, visitors and superiors. Offer them the best seat at the table, the best place by the fire and the first of everything. Go farther than mere form and see that they are comfortable and happy.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

To Mrs. J. Buchanan.

Close the shutters, Birdie, dear, shut out the light of day
I cannot bear the sunlight as it falls across my way,
Its very brightness grieves me, for joy has faded from my sight
And the long fair day of happiness has closed in darkest night.

Oh, the future looks so dreary in its dismal colors drest,
And my heart is in the grave, where they laid him down to rest;
Oh, why so hard and heavy has the hand been on me laid?
Might not the fell destroyer's blade a little while be stayed?

Just when life was in its zenith and every prospect bright,
Hope's richest buds just opening to be withered by a blight;
Oh, this load of desolation, more than broken heart can bear,
To be where everything speaks of him and he himself not there.

And when the shades of the evening gather and the darkness coming on
I in silent anguish listen for a voice forever gone,
And I try to stay the craving of my wild and wayward heart,
But his place is ever empty, and the bitter tears will start.

Oh, have I been cruel, Birdie, dear? filled your little heart with pain,
I have striven with my sorrow, but the strife has been in vain
For of him who labored for us, with heart so leal and brave,
There is naught to us remaineth but a memory of loving words he gave.

Oh, child, when I in sorrow veiled my head in silent gloom
As we laid our youthful treasure, our first born in the tomb,
Oh, how that brave heart could comfort, though 'twas like to break,
He in silence bore his sorrow, hid his suffering for my sake.

Dear lonely widowed one, may the Sun of Righteousness now shine
And dispel the cloud of darkness from that sad heart of thine;
'Twas He, Himself, who gave, 'Twas He, Himself, who took,
And for a covert in a storm 'tis unto Him alone that we must look.

He can heal the broken hearted, can wipe away each tear,
Show 'twas good to be afflicted if His voice we will but hear,
So cast your burden on Him, take it to the Lord in prayer,
And He'll give to you true comfort, will all your your burdens bear.

SYMPATHISER.

Hired Help.

Many of the best farmers started, perhaps, as boys at $8 per month, saving all the time till they could purchase homesteads of their own. These men who have an ambition to push themselves forward to independence will prove profitable men at advanced rates over the men whose highest ambition is to attend the neighborhood dances, be away when they please, and have a drink every month. A way exists to exterminate the latter class, viz., do not hire them. Have no man at work for you who is not temperate, or will not promise to abstain from "fire-water" while in your employ. Then when you get a good man, do not treat him so that he will escape as soon as his time is up, and act toward you while he stays as though you and yours were his personal enemies. Take an interest in him and he will take an interest in you.

There is nothing like a systematic change of rations for hired men, as for beasts or fowls. Feed your men as well as you feed yourself. Give a good room, a good bed, clean towels often, first-class reading matter, and if they wish, provide means and opportunity for attending church. Again, the average farmer hardly ever keeps a hand more than eight months of a year, and then makes a change. This is a mistake, and it is what ails a great many men who would be first-class were it not for the fact that they have worked in so many places as to have half-learned a dozen farmers' methods of doing farm work. When you get a good hand keep him year after year, and advance his pay a little from time to time—enough to stimulate his aspirations and keep him alive to your interests as his own case.—[The Country Gentlemen.

A Correspondent Set Right.

To the Editor of the ENTERPRISE:

Dear Editor,—Just allow me space to say that the report given of the concert held in McKillop's hall, on Tuesday, 3rd inst., by your correspondent from West Lorne, must have been written by one who had other motives to serve than honest critism. I am informed by competent judges that nothing better, from local talent, has been presented to a West Lorne audience for a long time. Personally, I think great credit is due to the various participants for the able manner in which they sustained their parts, and much especially is due to Mr. Church for the great variety of music and performance he helped to secure. The only inference to be drawn from such an unfair report is that the writer must have had some special object for disparaging this entertainment.

Respectfully yours,
C. T. SCOTT.

VICTIMS OF INSOMNIA.

THEY FORM A VERY LARGE MAJORITY OF MANKIND.

Torturing Delusions That Haunt the Sleepless When Wooing Tired Nature's Restorer.

The inexperienced observer, thinking the matter over, will be very apt to conclude that going to sleep is the most simple and easiest thing in the world.

In fact, under the average condition of men, women and babies, it is no more difficult than "rolling off a log." A person undresses yawningly, slips into the robe de nuit, gets into the bed, draws up the covering, breathes a deep sigh of satisfaction, shuts his eyes, opens his mouth and begins snoring. This is the popular view of going to sleep. And yet this popular view is not of universal application. There are those of us afflicted wretches to whom the attainment of a substantial store is what the coy "yes" of a sweet young thing is to the impassioned lover.

"ONE O'CLOCK; GUESS I'LL RETIRE." "NOTHING LIKE A HOP PILLOW FOR SLEEPLESSNESS."

Let me relate a little personal experience in this matter. It will serve to ventilate the afflictions of a class of whom my own case will be representative.

I.

We, the sleepless, are a larger body than is known by the majority. As we are mainly beyond the reach of medicine, we ask humbly the prayers of the pious and the sympathetic.

The victim of insomnia never lacks for commiseration and advice, more especially the latter. Any man or woman who sleeps straight through ten hours without a break is always ready to suggest a certain remedy for the sleepless.

"You are looking thin and pale; what's the matter with you?"

"Nothing in particular. I don't sleep very well."

"Is that all? You can cure that easy enough."

"You can, can you? How, for instance?"

And now come the suggestions.

"You must take a glass of ale just before you go to bed."

Then follow prescriptions ad infinitum. Each listener has his own remedy:

A hop pillow.

A glass of whisky just before bedtime.

Soak the feet in hot water.

Put bags of ice on the head.

Take lupeline.

Try bromide of potassia.

Hyoscyamous is a sure cure.

A preparation of belladonna is the best thing out.

"A BOTTLE OF ALE HELPS ME AT TIMES." "FATIGUE IS GOOD PRODUCER OF SLEEP."

Why don't you try morphine?

A dover powder will send you to sleep.

Take some laudanum.

Take a hot bath in the evening.

Use a bath of nitro-muriatic acid.

Don't drink coffee.

Don't smoke.

Smoke a cigar just before you go to bed.

Don't eat a hearty meal after 3 o'clock.

Eat a moderate meal just before retiring.

And so on. These are not more than one-thousandth part of the remedies that I was the recipient of. Every human being who is a sound sleeper knows how to cure sleeplessness. I tried as many of the suggestions as I could, and found none of the slightest value. I consulted several eminent physicians, who took their honorarii, and I took their advice and their prescriptions. All useless.

II.

The man who doesn't sleep either retires very early or very late. He adopts the latter under the vain delusion that the longer he remains from bed the more he narrows the space which separates him from dreamland. This is no more sensible than the act of the intoxicated person who leans against the corner of his room waiting for his bed to come around where he is.

Sleep seems to have the ability to sit and stay awake as long as you. The man afflicted by insomnia, who is the last to leave the billiard-room, late at night, is no nearer sleep than he would have been had he gone away six hours earlier.

This poor devil retires, say, at 10 p. m. He does so from the hope which springs eternal in the breast of the man who fails to sleep that to-night he will sleep. He is very sleepy just before he retires. He is careful not to disturb the bit of somnolency. He disrobes himself as gently as if he were a slumbering infant. He tries not to think. He often falls into a doze when he has gotten into bed, when he awakes in a second or two with the idea that he's about to go to sleep, a conviction which shocks like a piece of ice on his spine. He comes in an instant to full consciousness. His eyes unclose and are glued open. It may be that he has not slept a single minute during the preceeding three nights, and yet he is as wide awake and no more sleepy than if he had just been aroused from a sound slumber of ten hour's duration.

"NOW, WHO WAS IT RECOMMENDED A HOT FOOT-BATH?" "NOTHING HAS SUCH A QUIETING INFLUENCE AS ONE OF THESE POWDERS."

III.

Now, the man who doesn't sleep finds himself with the wide staring eyes; and he at once commences, seriatim, a thousand idiotic operations. I have lain and counted. I have counted all there is to count, forward and backward, by fives, tens, fifties and in every other possible way. I have added them, subtracted, multiplied them and extracted their square and cube roots.

I have started sheep over a fence, counting each as it sprang over. I have continued this until the sheep counted would more than cover a farm of 10,000 acres. I am fully pepared to swear that the sheep counting business, as a means of inviting slumber, is a mean humbug. With me it is played out.

The man who doesn't sleep has other resources than counting the nimble sheep as they jump a fence. He follows the advice of his grandmother who tells him to hold his pulse and count its beatings. Bah! I've counted my pulsations till I ran short of numbers to note the amount.

"I WISH THE FELLOW WHO RECOMMENDED THIS ICE PACK TO SLEEP WITH IT." "AH, THIS HOT WHISKY TAKES THAT BLASTED CHILL OFF."

Another cure for insomnia is to fasten the eyes immovably on a speck in the wall. At a hotel in Saratoga one night, I had exhausted the sheep and pulse business and all other available remedies save the speck-cure. As a dernier resort I fell back on this remedy. Conveniently and directly above me on the ceiling I caught sight of what seemed the black head of a nail. On this I fastened my vision with the intensity that a mariner would fix his gaze on a lamp in a distant lighthouse, to lose a view of which would be instant destruction.

IV.

It was well toward dawn when I became fevered and "nervous" with the intermediate vigils of the night. The furniture of the room assumed enlarged and distorted forms, and the atmosphere took on visibility and shuddered with swift vibrations. Just while in this abnormal condition, the nail-head on the ceiling became possessed of motion. It vibrated for a moment as if in harmony with the atmosphere, and then divided into three parts, each of which glided away from the others.

Each of these particles seemed to enlarge till they reached the dimension of toads, or thus appeared to my strained vision. A peculiar redness colored the room, and as these phenomena developed I believed that I was growing blind. The swollen, moving things on the wall I thought to be an optical delusion, and that it, in connection with the scarlet tint of the apartment, the flashes of flame that filled my vision, and the distorted shapes of the furniture, was evidence that I was going blind, or losing my reason. Filled with a terrible horror, I jumped from the bed and turned up the gas.

Fearfully I turned toward the ceiling and saw that one of them had begun to descend the wall. I watched it till it came close to me, and then knew that it was an enormous—it——

"ANIMALS SLEEP WITH A FULL STOMACH; WHY CAN'T I?" "A GOOD CIGAR HAS THE DESIRED EFFECT."

The reader who knows anything of the cimex lectularius will understand, if not, let him ask his landlady the old conundrum: Why do your beds resemble a small and very common vehicle for riding? Since that night, trying to stare a nail out of countenance is as much played out with me as counting the bounding sheep and pulses.

V.

The man who doesn't sleep is never at the end of his resources. Trying to look mentally at the end of his nose is one of the panaceas highly recommended to produce sleep. Another method is to tie a handkerchief about the hand. Watching intently, as if seeing your breath come and go, has its ardent adherents. There are some hundred others which poverty of space forbids the mention in detail.

Ah! the indescribable, wretchedness and horror of chronic insomnia! It is filled with torturing delusions. The wide-awake victim will hear the clock strike the hour, and after an age will fall into a slumber. He wakes suddenly with a glad feeling. He has slept for hours. It must be daylight, and he looks eagerly at the windows to see if there are any indications of dawn. The solemn clock begins to strike. The last hour struck was 10. "One!" It's 1 o'clock, sure! He has slept nearly three hours. Glory, hallelujah! "Three!" It is 3 o'clock, and his heart swells with satisfaction. "Four!" Better and better! The horrible nightmare which has bound him is suddenly wrenched from him as were the tentacles of the devil fish which inclosed the body of Gilliatt. "Four!" He is cured. Glory to God "Five!" Six hours' sleep! His soul overflows with an ecstatic joy. "Six!" Why, it must be past daylight. The curtains must be all closed to shut off the light!

"GUESS I'LL MUFFLE THAT DARNED CLOCK." "GREAT CÆSAR! SEVEN O'CLOCK! I'M DUE AT OFFICE AT 8."

"Seven!" What, no light yet? He eagerly scans the blackness. Let me once more see the blessed day. He rushes to a window, pulls back the curtain and gazes. Nothing but darkness, profound, impenetrable. A pressure falls on his heart and grows weightier as the inexorable clock strikes "Eight!" "Nine!" "Ten!" "Eleven!" "Twelve!" It is midnight and his sleep, his recuperative slumber, did not extend over more than a single minute.

VI.

Insomnia is not pain; that is, physical pain. It is something in the true nature of a blank, a dead, level, sandy desert on which there rests a dull glare. One thinks incessantly and incoherently. An impression inserts itself in the vagrant thoughts to the effect: "If I don't sleep soon, it is idiocy, heart disease, or death." Under the influence of this impression, the insomnia, which, at the outset, was the symptom of some local disorder, becomes itself a disease.

One lies with open eyes staring into the darkness. The dire possibilities of the future, the interruption to business, the ardent, intense desire to sleep, all flit through the night, like dim and menacing phantasms. The days are oppressive. The body is weak, the brain confused, the blood sluggish. An overpowering tendency to sleep possesses the tired frame. He throws himself down on a bed with the impression that he must and will sleep for a week; he drops into a doze and an instant later wakes with a start, and then is as wide wake as ever; if a wicked man he flings off the covering with a bitter malediction, and with tired frame and dulled soul resumes his daily task.—Poliuto in Chicago Herald.

PRINTERS' INK.

A JOURNAL FOR ADVERTISERS.

Is issued on the first and fifteenth days of each month, and is the representative journal—the trade journal of American advertisers. It indicates to the inexperienced advertiser how, when, and where he should advertise; how to write an advertisement; how to display one; what newspapers to use; how much money to expend—in fact, discourses on every point that admits of profitable discussion. Advertising is an art practised by many but understood by few. The conductors of PRINTERS' INK understand it, and their advice is based on an experience of more than twenty-five years in placing advertising contracts for many of the largest and most successful advertisers. A year's subscription costs but One Dollar: sample copies Free. Address:—

The Safest

AND most powerful alterative is Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Young and old are alike benefited by its use. For the eruptive diseases peculiar to children nothing else is so effective as this medicine, while its agreeable flavor makes it easy to administer.

"My little boy had large scrofulous ulcers on his neck and throat from which he suffered terribly. Two physicians attended him, but he grew continually worse under their care, and everybody expected he would die. I had heard of the remarkable cures effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and decided to have my boy try it. Shortly after he began to take this medicine, the ulcers commenced healing, and, after using several bottles, he was entirely cured. He is now as healthy and strong as any boy of his age."—William F. Dougherty, Hampton, Va.

"In May last, my youngest child, fourteen months old, began to have sores gather on its head and body. We applied various simple remedies without avail. The sores increased in number and discharged copiously. A physician was called, but the sores continued to multiply until in a few months they nearly covered the child's head and body. At last we began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In a few days a marked change for the better was manifest. The sores assumed a more healthy condition, the discharges were gradually diminished, and finally ceased altogether. The child is livelier, its skin is fresher, and its appetite better than we have observed for months."—Frank M. Griffin, Long Point, Texas.

"The formula of Ayer's Sarsaparilla presents, for chronic diseases of almost every kind, the best remedy known to the medical world."—D. M. Wilson, M. D., Wiggs, Arkansas.

NAMES THAT ARE FAMILIAR IN EVERY HOUSEHOLD IN AMERICA.

The Author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" Heads the List, of Course—Mrs. Whitney, Who Wrote "We Girls" and Others.

A few years ago a woman novelist was regarded as something of a curiosity, not to say a monstrosity. But the fact is now proved, and easily, that a woman can earn her living with her pen and still preserve her womanliness. So says a writer in Demorest's.

MRS. STOWE.

Mrs. Stowe was born at Litchfield, Conn., June 14, 1812, and is, therefore, now in her 78th year. She came of the best and most vigorous Puritan ancestry, her father being the famoud divine, Dr. Lyman Beecher, who was the father also of Henry Ward Beecher. She taught school in Hartford for several years, and at the age of 20 married Prof. Calvin E. Stowe, then of Cincinnati. Her first literary venture—which was not successful—was "The Mayflower." Two years after she began "Uncle Tom's Cabin." She has since published a good many novels and sketches, among the most famous of which are "Oldtown Folks" and "Sam Lawson's Fireside Stories." She is now much enfeebled by age and infirmities, and is calmly awaiting the end of a long and useful life at her charming home in Hartford, Conn. The picture accompanying this article represents Mrs. Stowe as she appeared at the time "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was written.

Among our older story-writers is Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, author of "Faith Gartney's Girlhood." "We Girls," and "The Other Girls" so dear to thousands of young American women. Adeline D. Train was the daughter of Enoch Train, an old and well-known shipowner of Boston in the days when shipping interests were a profitable source of income. She was educated in the best Boston schools and society, and is a highly cultivated as well as an earnest and beneficent woman. She married Mr. Seth D. Whitney of Milton, Mass., and has lived in that pleasant old town (ten miles from Boston) most of the time since her marriage. Her writings are marked by a rare spiritual element and purity of purpose, and it is impossible for a young girl to read her stories of other natural and womanly girls without imbibing therewith new and elevating impulses, or to close her charming books without high-minded resolves to lead better and worthier lives.

MRS. A. D. T. WHITNEY.

Augusta C. Evans, the author of "Beulah" and other works, made a fine reputation and quite a fortune from them. Near the outbreak of the war she published "Macaria," a novel of excellent literary merits, but too strongly imbued with Southern principles and sympathies to become at all popular in the Northern States. Sectional feeling, however, has died away in a great measure; and when she published a new novel about a year ago, the old friends and admirers of Miss Evans welcomed it with cordial approval. All of us who read "Beulah" and "St. Elmo" accord their author her full need of appreciation, both on account of her literary style and skill and her thorough scholarship and culture.

AUGUSTA EVANS WILSON.

Mrs. Evans Wilson has lived for many years in Mobile, Ala. She was born near Columbus, Ga., in 1836. During her childhood her parents moved to Texas, and from there removed to Mobile. She married L. M. Wilson in 1868.

Mrs. Saran Orme Jewett, more than most authors, knows how to deal with the common place and prosaic in such a way as to teach us their underlying interest and charms, and the truth and sincerity of the simple country hearts.

MISS JEWETT.

Miss Jewett was born at South Berwick, Me., Sept. 3, 1849, and still lives at the old homestead during the summer months of every year. Her winters are passed in Boston with Mrs. James T. Fields, the widow of the famous Boston publisher.

Miss Jewett's grandfather was an old sea captain who afterwards became a shipowner at Berwick, and it is easy to see where she got "material" for her inimitable sketches of the older seafaring men. Her father was a physician, and so was her mother's father. Her best known novels are "A Marsh Island," "A Country Doctor" and "Deephaven."

Probably not since George Elliot's time has there been so much feminine ability hidden behind a masculine nom de plume as has been revealed in the writing of Charles Egbert Craddock. When her strong, characteristic sketches of Tennessee mountain life began to appear in the Atlantic Monthly, about ten years ago, there was not a doubt in the public mind of the writer's being a strong masculine individuality. Even her handwriting carried out the deception, and the editor of the Atlantic never mistrusted that his new contributor was a woman. Finally one pleasant winter morning a card was brought into his editorial sanctum with "Charles Egbert Craddock" inscribed thereon. When the new author was ushered into his presence he was so taken aback that for a moment he could not speak. He revenged himself, however, schoolboy fashion, by "playing a trick on some other fellow," and invited three prominent Boston literary men to meet "Charles Egbert Craddock" that evening at a dinner, and by seeing all three struck speechless with surprise. One of them actually could not for a moment acknowledge the introduction.

All the world now knows, however, that the real name of the writer is Mary Noailles Murfree, and that she is a descendant of the old and well known Murfree family of North Carolina and Tennessee. Her birthplace was the battlefield of Murfreesboro. Her home is in St. Louis.

A literary critic wrote a few years ago: "We have a Gaborian (we were almost tempted to say a greater than Gaborian) in our own tongue." This was just after the appearance of "The Leavenworth Case"; and public opinion, agreeing with the critics for once, still estimates at that standard the powers of Anna Katharine Green. "The Leavenworth Case" is universally considered to be one of the best detective stories ever written. The technical knowledge of law and its intricacies displayed therein is pronounced by our best lawyers something wonderful; and the most remarkable fact of all is that the book was written by a woman, unassisted by any man.

ANNA KATHARINE GREEN.

Among the many previous lives sacrificed in the War of the Rebellion was one which at a time darkened the whole future and nearly ended the life of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. But by the strength of her own nature she was compelled to rise from her seeming defeat, and, taking up her pen again, wrote her conceptions of the world whose gates had been left ajar for her, and her idea of her lover's possible condition. Her book lay two years in the publisher's hands, but was finally brought out in 1868. It was pronounced morbid, unhealthy, unorthodox, and even "heathenish," by carping critics. But, nevertheless, it has reached a sale of over 100,000 copies, and been translated into German, French, Dutch and Italian; and it has brought comfort to many a lonely, bereaved heart, to whom the old crude and meager idea of Heaven seemed unsatisfying. There is no doubt that it touched the sympathies of humanity at large, and is one of the books which will live for many decades to come. Afterward Miss Phelps wrote "Beyond the Gates" and "The Gates Between," both of which were well received and ran through numerous editons. Her other best works are "Men, Women, and Ghosts," "The Story of Avis," "Hedged In," "The Old Maid's Paradise," and "Burglars in Paradise. Her first story was written when she was 13 years old. "Gates Ajar" is what brought her first to notice. She was born in Massachusetts in 1844.

ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS.

What young girl has not read and delighted in "Nelly Kinnard's Kingdom," "Seven Daughters," "Sydnie Adriance," "Stephen Dane," and "Hope Mills"? The author of these pure and helpful books is Miss Amanda M. Douglas, of Newark, N. J. Miss Douglas was born in New York City, and, with the exception of a few years passed on a farm a few miles above Newark, she spent her childhood and school days in New York. She came of the best old Scotch and French Huguenot blood.

MISS DOUGLAS.

One of the oldest and certainly the most voluminous of woman writers is Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth. Probably no one else now engaged in the pursuit of literature has written so many novels. She has published forty-four in book form and twenty-three more as serials, making sixty-seven in all.

MRS. SOUTHWORTH.

Mrs. Southworth derives a handsome income from the products of her pen, the sum being estimated as high as $10,000 per annum. "Ishmael" is her own favorite among her books, although there is no doubt that "The Hidden Hand" had the greatest "run" during its publication. The latter has recently been published in book form, and is meeting with a good sale.

AMELIA RIVES.

Of Miss Rives (Mrs. Chanler) there need be little said now. She is a recent light in the literary sky, and has been recently discussed and preached about.

To lovers: Never put off till tomorrow what you can woo to-day.

A woman is like a phonograph in one respect. It is unwise to say anything unpleasant to her.

The Dutton Enterprise

Elgin's Leading Local Paper.

THE ENTERPRISE is published every Thursday morning, in time for the earliest mails, from the office in Brown's Block, Main Street. It contains all the latest home and district news, correct market reports, Gaelic contributions, council minutes, choice miscellany, and everything of local interest.

The Dutton Enterprise

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1889.

OUR FIRST YEAR.

It is now almost a year since the ENTERPRISE changed hands, and we hope our readers have seen no reason as yet to regret the transfer. We have endeavored during the past year to publish a live, local paper, for the good of the public and our own pockets, one which would bring the many advantages of our town before the outside world, give interesting reading to all our subscribers and, at the same time, deal justly with all, and a proof of our success is shown in the large increase in the subscription list—the circulation of the ENTERPRISE having almost doubled during the past eleven months—and in the many complimentary remarks heard on all sides of the management of the paper.

We believe we have made many warm friends and but few enemies since coming to Dutton. The former we shall endeavor to retain, the latter concern us not. We tender our thanks to those who so heartily welcomed us here and have given us their liberal support during the past year, and promise during the coming year to endeavor to constantly improve the ENTERPRISE and, should business warrant it, further enlarge the paper.

The job department will also be steadily improved and will be always prepared to turn our excellent work in all kinds of letter press printing, no matter how intricate or large the job. Our steam presses and large outfit enable us to compete with the best city offices.

We like Dutton and have come here to stay, and will always do right by the people if they do right by us.

If you are in need of any article of merchandise which your dealer does not have in stock tell him of it and he will order it for you. He will be able to order it specially and sell it to you even cheaper than you can buy it in the city. There is no occasion for our citizens to go outside of the town to procure anything they may need, and we are pleased to see that many who formerly used to buy nearly all their goods in St. Thomas have lately given up the practice entirely. Let us all work together in everything of a business character and the result will be greatly added prosperity. We have no use for the illiberal man, who because he has a little money, buys everything away from home to the detriment of his own town. Every dollar that you spend at home instead of sending abroad is that much towards building up home institutions.

From the number of new buildings erected and improvements made in our town this year, a list of which will be found elsewhere, it will be seen that Dutton has made very rapid progress. There is also as much business of all kinds done in Dutton as in any two or three other villages on the M. C. R. between St. Thomas and Ridgetown. All this indicates that Dutton has a bright and prosperous future before it, and that it is bound to take the lead among all Western Ontario villages. But there are many improvements still needed ere we can take our proper rank among other places. Good sidewalks, better streets, street lamps, fire protection and some good manufacturing industries are all needed, but most of all, if we intend that the town shall have a name for respectability and order, some means must be taken to put a stop to the drunken rows which are becoming altogether too common of late. These are not taken part in to any great extent by residents of the town, but by rowdies who come in from other places to fight out their battles, because they are sure of not being interfered with. These people have got the idea that they can run the town and it is about time that they were taught different.

The little folks and their mothers and their aunts have all been planning for some weeks back about the Christmas presents of this year. First it has to be settled what things can be made by the kind hands by which they are to be given. Such are always the most welcome both from their associations and from the evidence they give of long forethought. Next comes thought for those far away. Those who want to send messages far must be thinking of them soon. Lastly comes the selection of presents which must be bought at the shops. This part has its agony as well as its pleasure, especially if left to the last. The desire to give something that will be appropriate and appreciated finds itself fighting at the last moment with a whirl of business and social duties, and the frantic need of purchasing at random because something must be bought. The dealers are at it earlier and earlier each year, as they find that they are likely to be forestalled if they do not take Santa Claus by the forelock. Before we know it the boom is upon us, and not a bit too soon, considering, too, that most buyers of presents do not know what they want, and hate to be hurried, and crowded, and flustered, as they cannot help being when all of the Christmas buying is done on the last few days, to say nothing of being led at times by their haste into most regrettable bargains. Call early at the business places of those who advertise in the ENTERPRISE and you cannot help being satisfied.

Good Manners.

Never try to outshine, but to please.

Never press a favor where it seems undesired.

Never intrude ill health, pains, losses or misfortunes.

Never intentionally wound the feelings of a human being.

Never talk or laugh aloud in public places or upon the street.

Never urge another to do anything against his desire unless you see danger before him.

Do not ask another to do what you would not be willing to do under similar circumstances.

Never omit to perform a kind action when it can be done with any reasonable amount of exertion.

Never needlessly wound the vanity of another or dilate unnecessarily upon disagreeable subjects.

Make no witticisms at the expense of others which you would not wish to have made upon yourself.

Remember that good manners are thoughts filled with kindness and refinement and then translated into behavior.

Be not ostentatious in dress or deportment; nothing can be more vulgar. See that costumes fit the time and occasion.

Be rude to none; rudeness does not harm even the humblest and poorest to whom it is directed, but it injures the exhibitor.

CHOW-CHOW.

"PECTORIA" will cure that cold.
"PECTORIA" has no equal.
"PECTORIA" loosens the phlegm.
"PECTORIA," put up in 25c. bottles.
"PECTORIA," the people's remedy.

Dry dirt and plenty of it is not a bad thing for the pig pen or even for the floor of stalls.

National Pills are a mild purgative, acting on the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, removing all obstructions.

THE NEW WORD.

EUPEPSIA is derived from the Greek, and means a condition of perfect digestion. This condition is always attained by those who use Burdock Blood Bitters, the only guaranteed medicine for all forms of dyspepsia, constipation, biliousness, rheumatism, scrofula and all blood diseases.

It is better to sow a little plaster frequently, than a great deal at one time. There is much question which time is the best for this operation, and by repeating the sowing some one will be just right. The cost is slight. Plaster is everywhere the cheapest manure for clover, and 100 pounds per acre, if finely ground, is enough at one time.

A NIGHT ALARM.

I AWOKE last night to find my little boy so bad with croup that he could hardly breathe, but on giving him some Hagyard's Yellow Oil on sugar, and rubbing his chest, throat and back with it also, he soon was sleeping quietly and awoke next morning completely cured, JOHN ELLIOT,
Eglinton, Ont.

Cellars where roots are kept should be as cool as possible without freezing. Should any tendency to rot be observed, quicklime scattered over the piles has been found to be of good service. It keeps the roots drier and, should the cellar be underneath the dwelling, by disinfecting the air, aids in maintaining the health of the family.

"PECTORIA" has no equal as a remedy for coughs and colds. Try a bottle and cure that cough. 25 cents a bottle.

A BIG NUGGET

OF gold may make a man rich, but it cannot make him healthy. If afflicted with any form of dyspepsia; biliousness, constipation, scrofula, bad blood, kidney complaint or skin disease, the remedy that will make you well is Burdock Blood Bitters. It is the best blood cleanser known.

Pine boughs fed to sheep once or twice a week are said to create appetite, prevent disease, and improve their condition.

To invigorate both the body and the brain, use the reliable tonic, Milburn's Aromatic Quinine Wine.

Stix mends Glassware, China, Crockery etc.

EXPERIENTIA DOCET.

Mr. J. H. Hourigan, after using Wilson's Wild Cherry in his family for eight years, writes us that it has never failed to cure Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough or Bronchitis. Be wise, profit by the experience of others, and use Wilson's Wild Cherry when afflicted with any such troubles. Sold by R. A. Kirkland.

Farmers are becoming more and more of the opinion, says the Rural World, that it is the early plowing and not so much the early sowing that brings the best wheat.

Stix mends everything. Price 15c.

Expel the worms by using the safe and reliable anthelmintic Freeman's Worm Powders.

Wild Cherry Bark, Elecampane, Hoarbound and Senega. These are the remedies with which Dame Nature has supplied Canada for the cure of Colds, Coughs, Croup, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Loss of Voice. All these are contained in Wilson's Wild Cherry in their most active form, and with other medicines constitute this most reliable cure for all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs. Wilson's Wild Cherry is sold by R. A. Kirkland.

Rock salt in large lumps is the most economical to use for the feeding box or trough. A supply should always be available where the animals on the farm can get it as often as they want it.

NOT ONLY FOR MAN.

I CAN say that your Hagyard's Yellow Oil is the best thing I ever saw for croup; coughs, colds, cuts or burns, and it is good for man or beast. MISS E. M. HOPKINS, Claremount, Ont. Yellow Oil cures rheumatism, neuralgia and all pain.

Victoria Carbolic Salve is a great aid to internal medicine in the treatment of scrofulous sores, ulcers and abscesses of all kinds.

A prosperous farmer remarks that when he raises a crop he has to ship it to a market to obtain a sale for it; but when he raises a horse the buyer comes to him and buys his product. A little horse sense of this character will open the eyes of hundreds of farmers in Canada, and not before it is needed, either

VALUABLE TO KNOW.

CONSUMPTION may be more easily prevented than cured. The irritating and harassing cough will be greatly relieved by the use of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam that cures coughs, colds, bronchitis and pulmonary troubles.

When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

Timothy, orchard grass and other hardy grasses may be sown early in autumn, if the ground is sufficiently moist and mellow, and clover in the spring. Copious seeding on well prepared ground will give the best growth of grass. Blue grass makes a small growth the first year, and it may be better in your locality to sow in the spring.

A PLAIN STATEMENT.

ALL poisonous waste and worn out matter ought to escape from the system through the secretions of the bowels, kidneys and skin. B. B. B. cleanses, opens and regulates these natural outlets for the removal of disease.

During rainy spells it is an excellent time to overhaul the cellar. All decaying wood and vegetable matter should be removed, every hole and corner thoroughly cleaned and a liberal coating of whitewash given to the walls and shelves. A few hours now and then spent in cleaning up may save days of illness and loss from a foul cellar.

It is good news to read the reports of the Farmer's Review and learn that the potato crop of 1889 is in excess of any previous year in the United States. We fancy our crop is not going to do quite so well. Patience and Paris green assisted by favorable surroundings will yet get ahead of the bug.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with the pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP and take no other kind.

J. O. Lumley is moving into his new store this week.

A Christmas entertainment is to be held in the Baptist church on Xmas night and, as usual, it is expected to be a big success.

Eagle

We expect a grand time at our tea meeting to be held on Wednesday evening.

D. Frick has arrived home from the upper lakes.

Miss Grace Stewart, of Morpeth, is visiting her brother here.

An addition is being put to the Eagle school house, and an additional teacher will be procured.

The fence in front of the church will soon be completed.

The Disciples have begun a series of meetings in this place.

Muncey.

Robert Logan died on Monday night, after a lingering illness from consumption. For the past two years he was unable to do any work. His age was 42 years and 6 months.

West Lorne.

John Liddell, who was formerly head clerk in Lindenman & Co's store, has gone to London, where he has secured a situation.

Miss Egan has returned to St. Marys. She will be greatly missed in her circle of friends.

Miss Anderson, of Eagle, has been engaged for the junior department of the West Lorne public school and Miss Jane Pettit, of Belmont, the second deparment. Mr. Cameron has been re-engaged as principal.

R. Mogg has opened a candy and fruit store in the premises adjoining the Argyle House.

T. Harris, we are glad to state, is able to be around again after a short period of illness.

Miss White, of Chatham, is visiting at Rev. C. T. Scott's.

Our roller mills, which have been shut down for some days, have commenced operations again after undergoing general repairs for the winter.

Owing to the open state of the weather the lumber season has not opened yet and a number of men are idle as a consequence.

A number of young men went out to the farm of Jos. Holland, sr., one day recently and cut about 30 cords of wood for use of the Methodist church. Report says that the day brought out some phenomenal workers.

Last Saturday night a number of youths undertook to serenade Daniel Mudge, but the elder Mudge did not take kindly to the racket and drove the boys away. But not to be left in their intentions they removed their forces to Tom Daley's residence and proceeded to annoy him and his bride. After enduring a half hour of torture Tom got tired and proceeded to buy them off. Such scenes are a disgrace to the town and a stop should be put to them at once.

Dr. McKillop, of Detroit, visited his parents here for a few days this week.

Rodney.

A. Strieb, of Melbourne, was in town Sunday.

Joseph Stinson has returned from Ridgetown and is running the barber shop here.

The Presbyterian congregation held a surprise party at the residence of the Rev. G. A. Francis last Friday night. A large crowd gathered and an enjoyable time was spent.

A. S. Rendelli has left town.

Elder Wilson, Baptist minister, occupied the pulpit in the Presbyterian church last Sunday night, owing to Mr. Francis being away.

A surprise party took place last Wednesday night at the residence of Dr. J. S. Munger. Quite a number were present.

Mr. Runsthein, who lived near Duart, died and was buried in the Catholic cemetery on Middle street last week.

Look out, boys. George is making preparations. By all appearances some clergyman will have a job of tying the knot.

J. C. Stinson, who was ill for about two weeks, died last Tuesday night. He will be buried in the Patterson cemetery.

The many friends of our genial barber, H. Middlemiss, will be sorry to hear that he is leaving Rodney. He commences business in Chatham this week. Mr. Stinson is his successor.

A number of our townsmen left Tuesday morning for St. Thomas to give evidence in the Ed. Smith case.

E. C. Harvey displays an immense stock of Xmas novelties.

Fred. Brown has sufficiently recovered to be about the streets.

Port Talbot.

T. McBeth, London, spent Sunday here visiting friends.

J. Ford and F. Pellit while out driving one day last week had quite a narrow escape. Their horse become unmanageable, throwing them out and breaking the buggy.

Mr. Kelso, of Wallacetown, held a prayer meeting and baptism at W. Lunn's residence last Tuesday evening, baptising nine persons and affording to the people assembled a very intellectual service.

There is a great deal of illness in our neighborhood, but under the skilful attention of Dr. Ling they are recovering.

Mr. Brown has completed his fall work on his new farm, plowing, with two plows, over thirty acres in ten days.

Coyne's Corners.

Misses McGugan, of Clearville, are the guests of Wm. Farr.

Miss Mary Taylor returned from an extended visit to friends in St. Thomas.

D. Gow, M. D., and wife spent a few days in this neighborhood visiting friends.

A number of the young people of this vicinity spent a very pleasant time at Mr. Farr's Tuesday evening. Vocal and instrumental music and games were enjoyed by all.

Coyne's Corners Literary and Debating Society met Friday last to re-organize for the coming season. It was decided not to hold any meetings till after New Year's.

Mrs. Erskin, of Campbellton, is visiting her sons at present.

Mr. Atkin, P. S. I., visited our school Friday last.

The trustees of our school met on Wednesday night to choose a teacher for the coming year.

Campbellton.

James Forbes, of St. Thomas, is spending a few days with his uncle, J. R. Leitch.

Peter Campbell, who left here last spring for Moosejaw, Man., returned home Friday. He says that the average yield of the wheat crop there was about 12 bushels to the acre, and that the prairie fire which was raging there this fall burned much of it.

Miss McKenzie, of Glencoe, is visiting friends near here.

D. Campbell, of Crinan, and Kate Patterson are visiting friends in Yarmouth.

D. P. McPherson sold his valuable prize team to P. Henry, of Glencoe, for $320.

A number of the young people around here attended the concert at Wallacetown on last Friday night.

Miss Black, of Iona, spent Sunday with friends near here.

A number of the farmers around here have threshed their clover, but the yield falls below their expectations, the average being about 2½ bushels to the acre.

TheCampbellton Literary and Debating Society will furnish an excellent programme for next Friday night as the meeting will be open to all. The following was the programme for last Friday night: Readings, D. L. McKellar, Jno. McIntyre and P. McPherson; instrumental music, J. Squire, M. Hood; songs, A. Love, K. Hood; dialogue, K. Hood, M. Patterson, D. Stewart, C. Shaw and A. Forbes; debate—"Resolved that married life is preferable to single life," aff., D. L. McKellar, D. Finlayson and D. Graham; neg., P. McPherson, W. Thompson and J. McIntyre. Chairman, J. McPherson.

Thos. Griffin has started his mill again for the convenience of the public.

A large party gathered at the residence of Wm. Salmon on Wednesday evening to witness the marriage of his daughter, Mary, to J. Hodder. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Thos. Wilson, of Dutton. The bride was attended by her sister, Lizzie, and the groom by J. S. Carruth. The bride received many valuable presents.

John March, of Mich., who has been visiting friends in this section for the past two weeks, left for his home on Monday.

Joe Leslie is spending a few weeks in London with his brother.

Wallacetown.

The Foresters' concert Friday evening was very successful. Details would occupy too much space, there being such a variety of songs, recitations, etc. Receipts, $53.

Dr. Gow and bride returned to their home after spending two weeks in this vicinity.

Miss Fullerton is still very ill. Her physicians consider her case critical.

Miss McCorkell, who has been visiting at Wm. Hunter's, returned to her home at Port Stanley.

Miss Alice Lillie returns to her home in Detroit next week. She will be greatly missed by her young friends.

Miss Annie Lyons and Geo. Clay, both attending the Model school, are engaged to teach the coming year; the former at Coyne's Corners and the latter at a school below Iona.

Mr. Barclay, of London, was in town on Monday. His many friends here are always pleased to see his cheery face.

The Presbyterian Sunday School entertainment will be held New Year's night, and the Methodist's Xmas eve.

The people of this village regret that Mr. Patton did not re-engage to teach the coming year, being so well liked by his pupils and so popular with all who have become acquainted with him.

Mr. McCrimmon was in town on Monday, electioneering. Legislative and municipal honors are the order of the day.

A. McFarlane is much better.

Observer on Rowdyism

Mr. Editor,—From the number of public meetings held in Dutton to transact business affecting the county and township one is impressed with the fact that this village is an important centre in both. At these public meetings we have delegates from a distance What then is our duty as villagers? Is it not to try and give the village as good an appearance as possible so that these delegates may go away with a good impression? What a reflection rests on us when men come from other parts of the county, as they did last week to attend St. Andrew's supper, and leave in perfect disgust. The rowdyism of the place that night was such that no man with any degree of moral tone could tolerate without pain to himself. It is said that the disturbance was not caused either by the members of St. Andrew's Society or by their invited guests, and I believe it, for being among the number I can testify to the good behavior and right royal spirit shown by those in attendance. It is also said that the disturbance was not caused by residents of Dutton, but by outsiders; so much the more to the discredit of insiders—to the resident of Dutton. Such scenes as these create much talk and are the means of making it a public resort for rowdies. If all these disgraceful rows, which are becoming more and more frequent, are caused by parties outside of the village, who have no respect for themselves nor regard for us, then it is time that we had some means of bringing the offenders before the proper authorities that they may receive their reward, and if a few were dealt with as they should be it would not be long until they would find this climate so hot that they would seek refuge elsewhere. Let us seek to keep up the moral tone of the place. Let every man who loves the place we call our home make it his personal duty to put a stop to such conduct. If such things continue to increase, before very long the place will be ruled by a mob of ruffians. Let us nip it in the bud e'er the place looses all the virtue it possesses, for strangers do not ask, who are these who cause the disturbance, but what is the name of the village where such conduct is tolerated?

Greeting from Hockin & Pool

As we are now approaching the joyous Christmas season we wish to thank our patrons for the generous patronage with which we have been favored during the past year, for, notwithstanding the general complaints about the stagnation of trade in surrounding villages and cities, we have been favored with a larger increase in our business than in any previous year. This bespeaks two things:—1st. That our village is becoming a commercial centre for a larger extent of country. 2nd. That our magnificent stock, close quotations and our general system of doing business are becoming better known, better appreciated, by the purchasing public. It is particularly gratifying to us to be able to speak in this way and it certainly is a great stimulus to make, if possible, greater exertions for the coming year.

We extend our greetings to our patrons, wishing them a joyful Christmas season, and suggest to the purchasing public as one of their good resolutions for the coming year, that they will certainly do their business with

Th Care of Cows.

The season of the year has now arrived when many of the cheese factories will close for the season. Many farmers will have a considerable quantity of milk for six or eight weeks to come, from which to make the most of their milk by making finest butter, it will be necessary to observe carefully the following points.

1st. They must have clean and well ventilated stables for their cows. Unless cows have pure air to breathe, their milk will be impure, and so will be the butter. When cows have plenty of air to breathe, their blood is purified, thereby when pure air is inhaled into the lungs and comes in contact with the blood, it acts as a purifier by the blood absorbing part of the oxygen of the air inhaled, and by the air absorbing carbon, or what may be called carbonic acid, which the blood, in passing through the lungs, throws off and is carried away in the breath. It will be easily seen from this, if a cow has not pure air to breathe, she cannot have pure blood, and consequently cannot have pure milk. A great many of the causes of bad butter begin in the stable with the cows, hence the necessity of having well-ventilated stables—either by having ventilators well up in the side walls as near the ceiling of the building as possible, which keeps the draft off the cows and carries off the exhausted air.

2nd. Cleanliness.—Cow stables should be cleaned twice a day so long as there are any cows giving milk kept in them, and it would pay to use some absorbent of the ammonia to fix it in the manure. Any dry, light substance will absorb; some use gypsum, some plaster of Paris, and some dry black earth (moss or swamp earth dry), even saw-dust, where it is easily gotten, but many use nothing at all, but allow the urine from the stable to go to waste and pollute something else outside.

3rd. Feed.—The cows should be fed with good, sweat clean food, and plenty of it. It is a well known fact that food has a good deal to do with the quality and character of the milk which the cow gives; certain kinds of flavor to the milk. Any kind food that has a strong or rank flavor in itself will impart it to the milk unless the food is cooked. Food for milk cows should be well seasoned with salt, or at least in some way let them have all the salt they wish, and so ought horses to have salt as regular as the cows.

The harsh, drastic purgatives, once deemed so indispensable, have given place to milder and more skilfully prepared laxatives; hence the great growing demand for Ayer's Pills. Physicians everywhere recommend them for costiveness, indigestion, and liver complaints.

One of the most curious inventions of 1868 was that of a safety coffin, intended to obviate the results of premature burial, and invented by M. Vester, a German. The coffin was made larger than required by the size of the body; it had at the head a movable lid communicating with the open air by means of a square trough from the bottom of the grave. The arrangement was such that a person might thus really escape from the tomb. The inventor proposed to place refreshments in the coffin as a prudent precaution against starvation!

What will the man of the 29th century—that is to say, just one thousand years hence—be like? Will he be stronger or weaker, taller or shorter, more intellectual or less clever? Will his life be longer or less? Will he develop new powers and faculties, or will he, on the other hand, lose the use of, and consequently, by slow degrees, cease to possess, certain organs and senses?

To sum the whole matter up in a very few words—the future man (and woman) will be very much indeed like the present man (or woman). Probably slightly taller and more robust—certainly more healthy, and consequently longer lived, having all the same organs and senses, only slightly, if at all, modified—much more learned and versed in arts and sciences; but to all intents and purposes so much like ourselves that, if one of the Pharaohs, an Englishman of the 19th century, and our man of the future could meet, neither would excite surprise in, or call for remark from, the other.

It is a fact that in Great Britain the Jews are, taken collectively, far more wealthy than the remainder of the population. Some little time ago figures were published which showed that the average yearly income of the Jewish inhabitants of London was £106, while that of the whole of the inhabitants of the kingdom taken collectively amounted to only £35, that is to say, the Jews are nearly three times as wealthy as the non-Jewish residents of Great Britain. Putting it in another way, the Jews form only one seven hundred and fiftieth part of the population, but have between them one two hundred and fiftieth of the national wealth. The following figures show the matter looked at from another aspect: One Jewish family in every hundred has an income of $50,000 a year or more. A similar income is only enjoyed by one family in every 2,500 among the rest of the population. One Jewish family in every twelve has an income of over $2500 a year, while among the Gentiles the proportion is only one in 75.

Sharp, Trebene, Man., says—I am delighted to be in a position to say that Nasal Balm is helping me wonderfully, although I have been using it but a very short time. It speedily cleared out the head and stopped the disagreeable droppings into the throat. For some time I have suffered severely from catarrhal headache, Nasal Balm has removed every trace of it. I have every confidence in its completely curing me. It is deserving of you claim for it: "A Positive cure for Catarrh. Easy and pleasant use." I hope it will soon be for sale in every town and village in Manitoba.

Ayer's Hair Vigor

IS the "ideal" Hair-dressing. It restores the color to gray hair; promotes a fresh and vigorous growth; prevents the formation of dandruff; makes the hair soft and silken; and imparts a delicate but lasting perfume.

"Several months ago my hair commenced falling out, and in a few weeks my head was almost bald. I tried many remedies, but they did no good. I finally bought a bottle of Ayer's Hair Vigor, and, after using only a part of the contents, my head was covered with a heavy growth of hair. I recommend your preparation as the best in the world."—T. Munday, Sharon Grove, Ky.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for a number of years, and it has always given me satisfaction. It is an excellent dressing, prevents the hair from turning gray, insures its vigorous growth, and keeps the scalp white and clean."—Mary A. Jackson, Salem, Mass.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for promoting the growth of the hair, and think it unequaled. For restoring the hair to its original color, and for a dressing, it cannot be surpassed."—Mrs. Geo. La Fever, Eaton Rapids, Mich.

"Ayer's Hair Vigor is a most excellent preparation for the hair. I speak of it from my own experience. Its use promotes the growth of new hair and makes it glossy and soft. The Vigor is also a cure for dandruff."—J. W. Bowen, Editor "Enquirer," McArthur, Ohio.

"I have used Ayer's Hair Vigor for the past two years, and found it all it is represented to be. It restores the natural color to gray hair, causes the hair to grow freely, and keeps it soft and pliant."—Mrs. M. V. Day, Cohoes, N. Y.

"My father, at about the age of fifty, lost all the hair from the top of his head. After one month's trial of Ayer's Hair Vigor the hair began coming, and, in three months, he had a fine growth of hair of the natural color."—P. J. Cullen, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

Dunwich Council.

Minutes of a regular meeting of the Municipal Council of the Township of Dunwich, held in Brown's hall, Dutton, on Monday, Dec. 16th, 1889.

All the members present.

Minutes of last meeting were read, approved of and signed.

Moved by R. Hine, seconded by P. J. McCallum, that H. Garbutt be appointed to examine and endeavor to settle the matter complained of by Silas Brown. Carried.

Moved by H. Garbutt, seconded by R. Hine, that, whereas Messrs. H. L. Sutton and A. C. Sutton state to this council that Joseph Marr has taken water out of its natural course and run said water across the public highway, and whereas the said H. L. Sutton and A. C. Sutton state that the taking of said water out of its natural course causes water to back up on their lands; be it therefore resolved that if what is stated by the Suttons is correct, that this council is of opinion that the said Marr has no right to run said water across the road allowance, and would therefore authorize H. L. Sutton to block up the tile and prevent the water running out of its natural course. Carried.

By-law 373, to open the original allowance for road between the 9th and 10th concessions, opposite lots 14 and 15, was read a first, second and third time and finally passed.

By-law No. 374, to appoint the place for holding the nominations, the places where polls will be opened and the deputy-returning officers who shall preside, was read a first, second and third time and finally passed.

Moved by D. McLean, seconded by H. Garbutt, that P. J. McCallum be appointed commissioner to repair the Deadfall bridge. Carried.

The following cheques were granted:

Dutton Public School.

Following is a report of the Dutton public school promotion examinations for the fall term of 1889. Those promoted from 3rd to 4th are—Rose McWilliam, Hattie Welch, Annie Leitch, Finch Jackson, Peter Duncanson, L. Hertel, Alice Ruthven, Mabel Nelson. From junior to senior 3rd (from the 2nd room to the senior)—E. James, D. Kane, E. Brown, C. Cane, O. Rothwell, A. McKellar. From 2nd to 3rd.—B. McCaffery, H. Hollingshead, M. Fletcher, C. Fitchit, C. Marshman. From 1st book, part 2nd, to 2nd book (from the junior to the 2nd room)—F. March, M. McDonnell, L. Waite, K. Fletcher, L. Wooldridge, C. Axford, R. McPherson, J. Black, E. Lacey, J. Lodge, J. Balkwill, M. McCaffery, P. McCallum. Following is the report of the school for the year:—Number on the register 259, number passed the entrance 11, number promoted from 3rd to 4th class, 16, number promoted from 2nd room to senior 18, number promoted from 2nd to 3rd book 13, number promoted from Junior to 2nd room 28.—H. O'MALLEY, principal.

The cost of the recent sessions were as follows: Grand jurors, $187.80; petit jurors, $403.50; constables, $78.95; crown witnesses, $232.65. Total, $902.90.

It is reported that a young girl named McNeil, hailing from Alvinston, has been arrested at Detroit on a charge of throwing her babe into the river at Port Huron.

Capt. Jones, of St. Thomas, had received permission for Orderly Stinson, of the 25th Battalion, Rodney, to attend the Infantry School at London, and by the same mail received a notice of Mr. Stinson's death.

Three of the prisoners on trial for the murder of Dr. Cronin in Chicago, have been found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary, one was sentenced to three years' imprisonment and one was acquitted.

Detective Miller, of Lawrence, has been called upon by County Attorney Hutchinson, of Middlesex, to explain why he took Hiram Beach, arrested by him for larceny, to St Thomas instead of to London. It is claimed that Beach had been previously arrested by County Constable Jas. Bedford, and arraigned before Squire Dodd. Mr. Miller says he knows what he was doing.

A sensational scene occurred at the sessions of the county court Saturday during the trial of Hiram Beach for burglarizing the store of Geo. Simmons, of Middlemiss. After Simmons had given his evidence he was cross-examined by prisoner's counsel, Mr. T. W. Crothers. "Did you not enter into a conspiracy with one Wrightman and others to burn a building in Middlemiss?" was asked. "No," was the reply. "Did you not leave your coal oil can outside?" continued the lawyer. Hardly had the question been propounded when the witness was observed to sway violently to and fro, and Mr. Crothers slipped rapidly behind the witness box and caught the witness in his arms as he fell back in a dead faint.

It seems that some of our young ladies prefer a kiss from lips o'ershadowed by a moustache. At least it looks that way when one of them sends the following recipe to her sweetheart for growing the desired moustache:—"About 9 p. m. place a glass of water on a chair near the bed, rub a little salt on the upper lip and get into bed. Lie facing the water and pretend to be asleep, but keep one eye partly open and you will soon see a little hair come out in search of a drink, the salt having made it thirsty. Watch closely and suddenly tie a knot in it to prevent it from going back. Renew the pretence of sleep and treat the succeeding hairs in the same way, if there be any. If you are watchful and quick by morning you will have a nice little moustache.—Alvinston Free Press.

Marching Home for Christmas.

A STORY OF THE EGYPTIAN WAR.

CHAPTER IV.

THE MOONLIGHT CHARGE.

"Look here, St. John," said a stalwart trooper of the 1st Life Guards, throwing himself down on the hot sands of Egypt to catch a few minutes' rest before the hour fixed for the reveille, his head pillowed on his saddle-bags, his pipe screwed into the corner of his mouth, "if I'm done for this time, as may be my luck as well as anyone else's, just drop a line to my people—you know their address—and I'll do the same for you if it's your turn instead."

"Thanks, I should just like her to know why I never came back," and his eyes wandered dreamily over the long row of tents to the starlit heavens above. "If I'm hit in the back," with a short laugh, "you needn't mention it."

"No, and if you run away, which seems probable," with good-natured sarcasm, "I'll keep it dark. But where does she hang out, and what's her name?"

"There is no 'she' from your point of view," said Brian bastily; "and after all, it is only to the old man I ought to send a word. Tell him how it came about, and that I hoped it was all right between us—my love, and that sort of thing. Good night." He turned over, as if he were drowsy, but sleep did not visit his eyes for some time. The sweet pale face of Muriel Kerschoyle rose before his mental vision, as he had seen it last at the window of his grandfather's brougham, the same expression in the wistful eyes which had haunted him ever since. "No," he said to himself, as if in answer to the longing which had seized him to send her a message. "I have tried to say nothing to her which could stand between her and her future happiness. I will not sadden her young life with a useless regret."

One hour later the whole camp was astir. Arabi's forces were advancing in formidable numbers, and the Household Cavalry were called out to drive them back. Brian rode amongst the first in the famous moonlight charge, and his sword was as active as any other in sweeping the rebels from the face of the earth. With the resistless force of a whirlwind, the gallant brigade came down on the Egyptian hosts, swords and helmets gleaming with unearthly lustre in the brilliant moonbeams, their horses snorting with excitement, there right arms uplifted ready to strike. Like a herd of deer frightened at the first shot of the sportsmen, the rebels scattered to right and left, leaving many of their comrades gasping in the sand and calling on Allah to save them. A knot of Bedouins, fiercer than the harmless fellahs, who have to be driven on to the battle-field at the point of the bayonet, had gathered round a young viscount and were pressing him hard. Seeing that he was in danger, Brian promptly dashed in to his rescue, without a thought for his own personal risk. His sword flashed in the air and descended on the head of the nearest Bedouin, cleaving it in two. The unfortunate rebel fell prone under his horse's hoofs but his comrades threw themselves upon the Life Guardsman with a savage yell.

Cutting right and left he forced his way to Lord Melton's side. The latter's thorough bred had been shot under him, but pale and undaunted, with nothing but a broken sword in his maimed right hand, and a revolver in his left, he managed to hold his own for a few seconds against his assailants. Another minute and he must have succumbed, but just as he was almost sinking from faintness, Brian caught him by the shoulder and with a stirrup hoisted him up before him. Slashing at the nearest Bedouin with the whole strength of his right arm, he spurred his horse over the prostrate bodies of those who had fallen in the melee, and carried the young Guardsman from under the very noses of the Egyptain guns into safety. His gallant feat had not passed unnoticed; Colonel——called out: "I shall remember this, St. John," as he passed by him to regain his place in the ranks.

"A mere nothing," he returned with a smile; but, as if to give the lie to his words, his tall form lurched to one side, and he would have tumbled off his horse if a trooper had not caught him by the arm.

The fight was over. The brilliant charge had done its work, the Egyptian gunners were silenced in the most effectual manner, and in the first blush of radiant dawn the wounded were carried back to camp.

Brian was laid on a bed in the hospital-tent. Lord Melton stood on one side of him with his own right hand tied up in a voluminous bandage, the surgeon by the other.

"There isn't a doubt that he will get over it!" The young officer look into Dr.——'s grave face as he asked the question, but the surgeon shook his head.

"You see the loss of blood was frightful. He must have absolutely continued to use his sword arm whilst the blood was pouring from his side like a bucket of water."

"I don't believe he thought of it at all; he only thought of me," and Lord Melton's lip trembled. "But I say," he added quickly, "you must cure him; you don't know who he is. He and I were chums together at Eton; he only enlisted for a lark."

"That won't make it easier to cure him. However, we may pull him through," as he laid his hand on the patient's pulse. "As soon as he can be moved, he must be sent back to Ismailia. The hospital arrangements are a little less execrable there than here. I must be off. The unfortunate thing is that our chloroform is running out," as he stopped to roll up a bandage, "and I have two or three serious cases waiting for amputation."

"I have some in my dressing-case. I never travel without it, for I am a martyr to neuralgia. My man shall find it for you in two minutes if you really want it," and Lord Melton turned away towards the door.

"I shall be infinitely obliged if you can spare it."

"And is there anything I can do for him?" with a jerk of his head towards Brian's motionless form. "Remember, I might have been worse off than he is. I owe him something for that."

"I will let you know. Whilst he is unconscious there is nothing to be done. You had better go and get some rest; you want it badly," and with a friendly nod they parted, the surgeon bustling off to his "other cases," the young officer languidly betaking himself to his quarters.

The heat was intense all through that long day. The sun beat down upon the barren waste of sand with such intensity that the parched grit scorched the soles of men's feet as if they had been walking on a bed of glowing cinders. Not a breath of a penetrated the tent where some of the wounded were lying. The surgeons and their staff had their hands full, and so long as wounds were properly attended to, bullets extracted, and bones set, they were obliged to leave the patients' smaller wants to a certain extent unsupplied.

"Water, water!" gasped a poor wretch who had been tied to his bed in a fit delirium. He could not move either or foot, his lips were dry and burning his eyes fixed in a longing stare on the at a little distance. "Water—water—God's sake a drop of water, or I shall go mad!" he moaned perpetually, but the hours wen by and nobody came.

Brian awoke, but, very weak, was intolerably fidgeted by the thristy trooper on his right.

"Why the deuce can't he hold his tongue?" he thought wearily, as he twisted his head round to have a look at him.

"Water—water!" he cried again, and his eyes began to roll feverishly round the tent. "I feel as if I was in hell already! Water, it'ull be all up with me. Water, I say! can't one of you fellows get it for me? If I weren't trussed up like a fowl, I'd be out of bed like a shot."

Brian was already considering the matter, in a sleepy sort of way. The jug was on the table, only two yards from the end of his own bed, and close to that of Atkins, the thirsty man. He thought that if he summoned all his energy, he might just be able to manage it, but his energy had gone and his long legs seemed to have no more strength than a baby's. With immense difficulty he rolled off his mattress on to the floor where he lay panting like a grampus. Atkins watched him with avidity, his fettered hands shaking to help, his glittering eyes roaming to the water-jug.

"Now, don't give in," he said expostulatingly. "it will be worse than if you never tried."

Brian gave him a nod—he felt too tried to speak; slowly he crawled to the table, raised his arm to get the jug; his face turned white as a sheet.

"There, take it," he said, hastily thrusting it close to Atkins' eager face.

The trooper seized it, and emptying it at a draught, let it fall down on to the coverlet, with a gasp of relief.

"St. John, you're a brick," he said as he licked his lips with an air of satisfaction, and able to rest at last, he turned his head and fell fast asleep.

A few minutes later 'Lord Melton came in, stepping softly, so that he should not wake any of the sleepers. Brian's empty bed caught his eye at once.

"Strange," he thought, "that they should have moved him so soon."

Having no particular interest in the others and seeing that they were all pretty quiet, he turned away, intending to ask the surgeon what had become of St. John, when his feet touched against something on the floor. Looking down in a moment he saw what it was, and his heart almost stopped beating, as stooping low, he gently raised the heavy head. The face was more than pale—it was ashen grey—and without a vestige of life in the closed lips. Good God! he was lying in a pool of blood; the bandage had slipped!

"Ah, this is his death-warrant," said Dr.——, who had come in to find Melton crouching on the floor, with Brian's head resting on his knee, and a look of hopeless despair on his good-natured young face. What madness possessed him to move?"

"I asked him to get me some water, sir;" and Atkins, suddenly roused to knowledge of what had happened, peered round in abject contrition.

"Then your drop of water has cost the life of one of the best soldiers in Her Majesty's service," the surgeon said with an angry grunt. "Place your hand here," to Lord Melton, "don't let it slip for God's sake. There, that's the best I can do," tugging at the bandage. "Now for the brandy, quick. Here Forster, fetch Smith and Brown; we must lift him on to the bed without a shake."

It was done as carefully as possible, and the patient never uttered a groan as his head fell back on to the pillow. Ah, if his grandfather could have seen him then, the handsome face which had brightened his old heart, haggard and wan, with the dews already gathering on the broad brow, the dark mustache wet with his lifeblood.

Lord Melton's head sank on his folded arms. If it had not been for this brave fellow, he would have been lying out there in the sands, possibly mutilated, assuredly a corpse, and now when his heart was bursting with gratitude, he could do nothing for him; he could not stay the hand of death, or by one word of sympathy make the last journey easier to start on. Some one touched him on the shoulder. He only answered with a groan.

"You must not stay here; the order to march is given"

"Not really?" starting up and rubbing his eyes with the back of his left hand. "And what will become of him?"

The surgeon shrugged his shoulders. "A grave at Ismailia."

The young Guardsman stopped over the bed, and placed his hand caressingly on the cold forehead. "Good-bye, dear old friend," he whispered with a strangled sob, and then walked slowly from the tent.

"Stop a bit," cried the doctor, hurrying after him: "I forgot your wound. You are not fit to fight."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Melton in great disdain, "do you think a scratch on my hand could keep me back from Tel-el Kebir?"

. . . . . .

"Trooper St. John dangerously wounded. Mr. Kerschoyle looked up from the paper, where he just read a glowing account of the action at Kassassin. "Is that your good looking friend, Miss Muriel?"

"No grandpa," and she laughed at the thought of it. "My friend might be a lieutenant or a captain, but never a trooper. He was a gentleman, and he looked quite a swell," with a blush and a sigh.

"Ah, we shall see what you say to Brian; when the boy's tired of sulking, I suppose he will condescend to come home," and also with a sigh, he returned to his paper.

As the days passed on the longing to see "his boy" grew so intense, that he could settle to nothing. He had found out from his bankers that Brian had not drawn a farthing of the liberal sum he had placed to his credit, and he tortured himself with conjectures as to his means of subsistence. A paltry annuity of one hundred pounds a year would not be likely to last him longer than two or three months, and when it was gone his wretched pride might bring him to actual starvation, but never to asking forgiveness for what he would not consider a fault. Oh, if some one could only tell him that everything was forgiven, and would be forgiven till seventy-times seven, that he might marry the kitchen-maid if he liked, if he would but come back, and make the dull house bright with his presence.

He had not been to the club for months, or paid the annual subscription. Mr. Kerschoyle did that for him, and stooped to asking the porter if he had seen anything of his grandson.

"No, sir, not for many a long day," with a shake of his head. "He hasn't gone to the war, I suppose?" as a sudden idea struck him.

"No; he never was a soldier. But why do you ask?" looking at him sharply.

"It's nothing, sir; only, as I was standing on the steps when the 1st Life Guards went by one of the troopers looked me straight in the face, and his was the mora of Mr. Brian Kerschoyle's. I thought nothing of it at the time, but you asking me after him, as if he was missing, put it into my head again."

"I did not say that he was missing—nothing of the sort; and as to that likeness with a common trooper, it must have been purely accidental," and Mr. Kerschoyle walked loftily away; nevertheless, he took care to enquire at the Horse Guards if any body of the name of Kerschoyle had enlisted in the Household Brigade.

The lists were examined, and an answer in the negative returned.

"Surely Brian can't hold out much longer," he said to himself as he warmed his hands over the fire one chilly day in October; "ten months of insulted dignity is enough for any man. If I treated the fellow as he deserves, I should lock the door in his face for giving me such a time of it; but I don't think I shall do it, with a curious smile. "Life isn't long enough for a grudge like that, and I shouldn't like to go off with him away."

"Shall I never, never, never see Mr. St. John again?" and Muriel dropped her crewel-needle with an impatient sigh. "What is the good of having everything I want without a single friend I care for over-much? I think he must have forgotten me—though he vowed he never would."

The Origin of "Hurrah."

Writing to the London Times with reference to the remark of its Berlin correspondent that the exclamation of "Hurrah!" "is is said to be of Slavonic origin," Dr. C. A Buchheim of King's College, London, says: "I presume your correspondent must have some authority for this assertion, but I hope you will allow me to point out that, as far as I know, the word is of purely German origin. It is generally assumed to be derived from the imitative interjection hurr, describing a rapid movement, from which word the middle High-German hurren, 'to move rapidly,' or rather to hurry, has been formed. Hurrah is, therefore, nothing else but an enlarged form of hurr, and, as I said, of purely Teutonic origin. In Grimm's 'Worterbuch' we find the interjection quoth from a Minnesinger. It also occurs in Danish and Swedish, and it would be interesting to know when it was first introduced in this country in the Anglicised form of 'hurry.' In Germany it was frequently used during the Napoleonic wars by the Prussian soldiers, and marshal songs of those days. Since then it seems to have been adopted also by other nations, even by the French in the form of hourra. That the interjection did not become so popular in Germany as a cheer at convivial gatherings as in this country is probably owing to the circumstance that preference was given there to the brief exclamation Hoch!' forming respectively the end and the the beginning of the phrases 'er lebe hoch' and 'hoch soll er leben.' Of late the word hurrah seems to have become rather popular in Germany. It is just possible that the English reimported it there or that it was revived through the magnificent poem of 'Hurrah, Germania!' written by the poet laureate of German people, Ferdinand Freiligrath."

Evening Wrap.

An exquisite evening wrap, and one in the best taste, is of ivory plush, lined with pale yellow silk and edged with ruches of yellow ostrich feathers. A long boa of soft yellow plumes finishes the neck and extends down either side of the front. A silk crepe fan of pale yellow, painted with pansies, goes beautifully with this cloak. I was favoured with a private view of some new and very chic ladies' collars which are being made by Messrs. Williams, Greene & Rome. They are called the Byron collar, and are very much worn by New York and Parisian elegantes. This collar is turned down over the neck-band of the dress, and fastened in front with a small stud; it is just the thing now that bodices are no longer made with the high, stand-up, English neck-band, for fashion decrees that it is most distingue to show a little of the throat. It is the prettiest, most graceful novelty I have seen in the way of linen collars, and is, I find, not at all difficult to wear, as at first sight one might suppose it to be. On the contrary, it is most becoming, novel, and very effective when a soft bow of ribbon is added in front.

She Wanted Delay.

Adorer—"As we are to be married in January, should we not announce our engagement?"

Sweet Girl—"No, no; not yet, not yet."

"My own, I would not hasten to make known the sweet truth to all the world were not the time so short. Can you not bring yourself to acknowledge your betrothal without further delay?"

"No no. Wait, I beg of you."

"But why, my shrinking little angel?"

"Wait until all the Christmas presents are in, or half of them will be held back for wedding presents."

They have an effective way of dealing with habitual drunkards in Norway and Sweden. They put them in jail and feed them entirely on bread and wine. The bread is steeped in wine for an hour before it is served. The first day a man will take it, but before many more he will have the sight of it. After an incarceration of this sort many become total abstainers.

HOW MONKEYS ARE CAPTURED.

Their Curiosity is the Thing That Makes Them an Easy Prey.

Most all monkeys which one sees in this country come from Gorgona, a little village, which is situated a short distance from the Panama Railroad. The inhabitants of this district are mostly native negroes, for no white man could bear the climate without drinking plenty of whisky and almost continually swallowing quinine. The whole region is marshy and covered with extremely profuse tropical vegetation. At night there arises a thick vapor laden with fever, which hangs over the woods like a cloud.

This region of wood is the paradise of the monkeys. They travel in troops around the woods, led by an older monkey. When the people receive the information that the "traveling monkey troops" are near the village they repair to the woods in crowds in chase of them. Their plan is very simple. They cut a hole in a cocoanut large enough for a monkey's paw. The nut is then hollowed out and a piece of sugar is placed in it. A piece of string is then fastened to it and it is placed in the road of the approaching monkeys. It is known monkeys are very inquisitive animals. Soon enough they see the "lonesome" cocoanut in the grass and hurry to examine it thoroughly. It is a curious sight to see how they climb from the trees, chattering, to take a good view of the concern.

It does not take them long to find out that the inner part contains a piece of sugar. One of the boldest and greediest sticks a paw into the nut to get the sugar and grasps it as tightly as he can. But his fist is so large that he cannot draw it out of the hole again with the sugar, which he holds fast to, cost what it may. The negroes now pull the string until nut and monkey arrive in the vicinity of their ambuscade. In the meantime the other monkeys wonder what is the matter with their comrade. They hurry to see where he is being pulled to with his paw in the cocoanut. They crowd around him, chattering and gesticulating to their hearts content.

Now the great moment has come. The negroes have a large net ready, and they spread it out over the unsuspecting monkeys, and before they know it they are prisoners. They are sold to the employes of the Panama Railroad, and reach the North American market through commercial dealers.

Everyday Cookery.

WHITE BREAD.— One pint of lukewarm milk, one fifth of a cake of compressed yeast softened in a little of the milk, a piece of butter the size of one-half a hen's egg, two even tablespoonfuls of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt. Put all together in the mixing bowl and add flour enough to mix sufficiently stiff to knead but do not knead it. Place where it is warm enough for it to rise light in from ten to twelve hours. I do not think it improves bread any to hasten the time of its first rising. Cut it down thoroughly with a knife and let rise again, then divide into three parts. Knead each part with only flour enough to keep from sticking and place side by side in a common bread tin. Let rise and then place in a moderately hot oven and bake from three-fourths to one hour or till done, as ovens vary. This is a rule for one large loaf. Make graham bread the same as white bread after sifting the graham.

RYE AND INDIAN OR BROWN.—Two cups of rye, two cups of indian sifted, then add two even teaspoonfuls of soda, sift again. Add three-fourths of a cup of molasses, one teaspoonful of salt, and mix thoroughly with milk or water thick enough to pour slowly into a pail. Cover tightly, allowing room enough for the bread to rise and steam two hours, then remove the cover from the pail and place it in the oven one-half hour to dry off.

WHITE BREAD.—I have never been able to make good bread without spending a good deal of time on it, when I do not it is almost a failure. In cold weather set the flour in a warm place previous to mixing. Allow one pint of liquid for a loaf, half milk and half water. Scald the milk summer or winter, and for each pint of liquid use a small teaspoonful of butter and a pinch of salt, and for three loaves use only one-half a yeast cake. Put all these in the mixing bowl and with the hands mix in the flour, slowly working and stirring all the time. Never use a knife or spoon. Knead on a board till the dough will not cling to the hands, let it rise over night, in the morning cut it down as soon as possible, mould up and put in tins after having chopped it with a chopping knife till all the bubbles of air are out of it and never hurry it to rise the last time. In the hottest weather set the bread to rise over night in the refrigerator. Sour bread is unfit to eat.

WHITE BREAD.—One loaf of bread, one quart of flour, one tablespoonful of butter, slightly rounding, one tablespoonful of sugar, a little salt. Mix with half milk and water. Scald the milk in warm weather as it is liable to sour if not scalded. Mould until it does not stick to the hands.

BROWN BREAD.—Two cups Indian meal, one cup of rye meal, two cups of white flour, a teaspoonful of salt, two-thirds cups of molasses, one pint of milk either sweet or sour with one teaspoonful soda beaten into it until it is foamy, put it into a tin pail or brown bread steamer and tie the cover on tight and steam three hours and then turn out and set in the oven for half an hour.

CORN CAKE.—Sift two cups of corn meal, one cup of wheat flour, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, two tablespoonfuls cream tartar, dissolve one teaspoonful of soda, wet it up with milk, beat in two eggs, make it thin enough to pour in a well greased pan. It is delicious for breakfast or dinner, with sweet butter. I have made it like light sponge cake. Set it on the bottom of a hot oven.

CREAM SPONGE CAKE.—Break two eggs into a cup, fill it up with sweet cream, if the cream is very thick add three tablespoonfuls of sweet milk, one cup of sugar, a little salt and a cup and a half of St. Louis flour into which have been sifted two level teaspoonfuls of cream tartar and one of soda; lemon or vanilla can be added if desired; bake moderately; do not beat the eggs, but stir cream, sugar, eggs and flour together briskly one minute.

WHITE BREAD.—One pint of milk, one-half cup of yeast, one half teaspoonful of salt with enough flour for a stiff batter. Knead well; let it rise, then knead into a loaf. The milk should be boiled thoroughly and allowed to cool until luke warm, then add yeast, salt and stir in flour.

The One-Thousand-Pound Bank Note.

Bank notes for £1,000 are not so common but that the adventures of this one may be worth a brief narration. They connect themselves with a sad tale of the dangers incurred by inheriting a fortune. Edward Gillet, the last owner of the subject of this memoir, was a bricklayer, who, in his old age, became possessed of considerable wealth. Thereupon he followed the example of the man who was told that the authenticity of the Three Heavenly Witnesses had been disproved, and "took to drinking." In December, 1879, he received the note as part of his legacy, and kept it in his pocket a month. The pocket of an elderly drunkard is no place for a respectable note to remain in; and at the end of the month this specimen of portable property took its flight. At the time of the escape Gillett was helplessly intoxicated, and he spent the evening of his days in Darenth Asylum. Mr. Gillett is described by his daughter, with filial insight and candor, as "childish self-willed, obstinate, and hardly ever sober." He was in the habit of "flourishing the note about," and the only wonder is that it was not speedily flourished into the pocket of somebody else. The son gave the number to the police, the note was stopped at the bank, and nothing more has been heard of it from that day to this. At last the Gilletts have succeeded in getting another. The bank kindly offered to invest £1,000 for them in consols and pay them the interest. But the Bills of Exchange act, passed in 1822, gives the public better terms than these. It provides that where a bank note has been lost the holder may obtain a similar one by giving an indemnity in case the note should turn up and should have to be cashed. This the Gilletts were willing to do, and the bank has been therefore ordered to pay them the sum demanded. This is obviously fair, for nobody loses, whereas if the plaintiff had failed, there would have been a dead loss to the family of £1,000.

HISTORICAL NOTES.

The use of firearms in war in England was introduced as early as the reign of Edward III. (1327).

Windmills were not known in England at the conquest, but were introduced in less than a century afterward.

A trade with Norway is known to have been carried on by the Scotch in the beginning of the thirteenth century.

The coast of Connecticut was first explored by one of the early Dutch navigators, Adrian Block, who, in 1614, was the first European to sail through Hell Gate.

The principal legislative acts in the reign of Henry III. of England are his confirmation of the great charter and of the charter of the forest. There are also some additional laws of this king yet extant which much polished the common law.

Gloves appear to have been very rare among the Anglo-Saxons. Among the representations of male figures they are never met with, but from a law of Ethelred the Unready it may be inferred that at the close of the tenth or the beginning of the eleventh century they were great rarities, five pairs forming a considerable part of the duty paid by a society of German merchants for the protection of their trade.

How to be honest—keep out of politics.

Farewell performances—Good means.

The Lawrence churches have a system of interchangeable girls. When one church gives an entertainment each of the other churches lends a girl or so to help the festivities along. This secures the floating trade of a dozen or so young men who are attached to no church but who are attached to the girls.—[Lawrence, Kan., Journal.

A female gymnast, whose act has been to roll a ball up a spiral path to the top of the theatre, fell off the ball the other night, but clung to the platform. Two nights after that she again slipped, and this time fell into the walls beneath, breaking her arm, but hurting no one.

Mme de. Valsayre, the champion woman's rights woman of France, has retired from the French Women's League, because the latter resolved that men shall be excluded from their assemblies.

A man's faith in his fellows bears little or no relation to his own moral character, the best men being often the most distrustful. But the better a woman is, the more she believes all other women to be both good and kind, a phenomenon not hitherto explained, though frequently observed. —[Frank Marion Crawford.

DOUGHNUTS.—Two cups of new milk, one cup of sugar, one egg, a little salt, two heaping teaspoons cream tartar, one of soda sifted in a quart of flour; then add as much more flour as is necessary to mould without sticking; have the lard just so they will boil when dropped in and turn constantly. The secret of good doughnuts depends largely on the frying, if richer ones are desired add a tablespoonful of cream and another egg.

The Boston port bill, a law passed by England to close the port of Boston, went into effect June 1 1774. The day was observed in Hartford, Conn., as a day of public mourning. The town house was hung with black, a copy of the bill was posted on it, and bells were tolled all day. Even so far off as Virginia the house of burgesses attended a solemn religious service on the occasion, and heard a patriotic sermon from the chaplain.

The two colonies formed by colonists who came out under Gov. John Winthrop, the Plymouth and Massachusetts bay, were for many years independent of one another; but the Plymouth colony, though the older of the two, grew far more slowly than the other, and was at last united with it in 1692 under the name of Massachusetts, the name being taken from one of the tribes of Indians inhabiting the soil. The meaning of the word is said to be "Blue Hills."

There is some talk of a revival of trotting in England chiefly on account of the fact that Splae, the great trotting driver, is over just now with Barnum. "No doubt," says the "Sporting Telegraph," "we may see some improvement made in the conducting of the pastime, but our own turf is so difficult to keep in order already that it would be risky to bring in any system of racing which allows a horse to be stopped for two heats to win heavy bets in the third. In France and Italy trotting has become very fashionable of late, the Orloff or Russian trotters well, holding their own against the American importations."

A BOY'S LONG TRAMP.

From Cardiff in Wales to London, Seeking Work.

Recently a little boy, who gave the name of Thomas Prince, was charged before Mr. Bridge, at Bow-street in London, with being destitute and having no settled home. Mr. Stevenson, Rescue Officer of the Reformatory and Refuge Union, Charing-cross, stated that the lad was taken to the offices of the union by the Rev. C. F. Seymour, of St. Thomas's Church, Westminster Brigde road. In answer to the questions put to him the boy told the following story:

He said that his father and mother had lived at Hainworth, near Cardiff, but they were both dead. His mother died three years ago, and his father twelve months ago. During his illness his father was nursed by his sister in law, but after his death she returned to her husband, a carpenter, living ar Newport. The furniture in the house was seized by the landlord for rent and the defendant was turned away. A neighbor took compassion on him and kept him for some time, but her means prevented her from continuing to do so, and she advised the lad to obtain wark. This he decided to do, and trudged to Cardiff.

He staid there for some few weeks, and appeared to have obtained a very precarious living. He then determined to make his way to London, and proceeded on foot from village to village, seeking at each place to obtain work. He appeared to have met with sympathy and help from the farmers and villagers, who gave him food. At times he slept on haystacks and by the wayside. He continued his journey, sometimes on foot, and again getting a friendly lift on a brewer's dray or farmer's cart. He received great kindness from railway officials at wayside stations. They had given him meals and had allowed him to rest while the stations were open. At some places he was enabled to earn some amounts of money by carrying parcels for passengers, and where he could do this he staid a few days, and in getting such employment he expressed his indebtedness to railway porters.

Acting up to his original idea, he tramped on toward the metropolis, passing through several large towns, and obtaining food in the manner described. At length he reached London, but found existence very precarious. He frequented Lambeth, and visited the Strand and other places with the idea of obtaining work. In the neighborhood of Lambeth he met with kindness from a lady, who gave him some clothes and food. The keeper of a coffee stall named Whitefield of Robert-street, Lambeth, also took compassion on the lad, and fed and sheltered him for some time. He eventually brought the lad's case under the notice of the Rev. Mr. Seymour with the result stated above. Mr. Stevenson said that the society had undertaken to make inquiries into the lad's statements, and would be prepared to look after his future welfare.

The Drunkard.

"All right!" a drunk man said, "all right!"
But wiser people said "He's tight!"
And he seemed spoiling for a fight,
'Twas all through cursed drink,

"All right, all right!" as, reeling home,
With bloodshot eyes and mouth all foam,
All o'er the side-walk he doth roam,
Blind drunk through greed of drink!

"All right!" he swore and stumbling fell,
One awful word he said, 'twas "Hell!"
Then, surely, he was 'neath its spell,
And all through love of drink!

Though oft he slipped upon the road,
At last he reach'd his poor abode,
And sank upon the floor a load,
Scarce human—crazed by drink!

His children fled from him in fear,
His wife, heart-broken, dropped a tear,
His very dog it came not near,
All feared him when in drink!

Hark! yet he says, "all right, all right!"
Though all his future's dark as night,
Upon his home there seems a blight,
The consequence of drink!

Toronto. JOHN IMRIE.

New Year's Eve.

Silent we stand 'neath the wintry sky;
The minutes are flying fast;
When out on the midnight air there rings
The sound of the bells at last;
Clashing and chiming the Old Year out,
As we stand at the New Year's door,
Waiting with half reluctant steps
To cross its threshold o'er.

Full of changes the Past has been;
And changes will come again,
Bringing their wealth of untold joy,
Or a wealth of infinite pain;
Loosening our hold on earthly things
And pleasures, so transient here;
Welcoming in fresh loves and lives,
And parting with those held dear.

As we look back with a lingering glance
O'er bygone months and days,
How little we find for murmuring,
How much we find for praise!
Should we, then, hesitate to cross
And enter another year,
Rich in that all sufficing love
That casts out every fear?

Hush! For one moment silence reigns;
Stilled in the merry din;
Quietly let the Old Year go,
And let the New pass in;
Only an instant, and then, with a rush,
As if all the bells on earth
Had caught the sound and lent their voice,
Is welcomed the New Year's birth.

What is Needed

By every man and woman if they desire to secure comfort in this world is a corn sheller. Putnam's Corn Extractor shells corns in two or three days and without discomfort or pain. A hundred imitations prove the merit of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor, which is always sure, safe and painless. See signature of Polson & Co. on each bottle. Sold by medicine dealers.

A Doubtful Conquest.

"Won at last!" he exclaimed, triumphantly. "Yes, Charlie," said she, shyly, "but only on the strict condition you know, that I am to be the one."

The Winter.

Ha! here you come to make us wheeze,
I see your fingers on the trees,
And hear you shouting on the breeze
The storm clan's slogan.

You'll soon be here to nip my toes,
And paint my cheeks with sunset glows,
And fresco this old chin and nose
With blue and purple.

I hear you've been, you roving fellow,
Among the Australasians yellow,
And scaring with your blatant bellow
The far Fuegians.

You're getting rough; I fear you pass
Your time too much with Boreas,
And that star-mantled gypsy lass,
The dark-eyed Solstice.

Old friend, together many a year
We've journeyed on through foul and clear,
And now, old comrade, lend an ear
To my petition.

This year, I pray you, leave your blows
In cold Arcturus with the snows;
Oh! winter gently come to those
Who have no shelter.

Oh, touch them kindly, kindly deal
With those who most your rigors feel,
In windowed raggedness they kneel,
And crave for mercy.

Bluster around the rich man's door,
Make him unlock his golden store,
Each year increasing more and more
His deeds of kindness.

Roar 'round the miser till he quakes,
Nip him and strip him till he shakes,
Freeze him and squeeze him till he makes
A big donation.

And in the cause of science, pray
Keep out the ice from Baffin's Bay,
So polar heroes win their way
To frozen glory.

Let those we love, though they abide
Far from us now, come to our side
Happy and well at Christmastide,
And we will bless you.

GUY H. AVERY.

Portugal Speaks Out.

Portugal, we are told, intends to oppose Great Britain's claim to Mashonaland in Africa. Many years ago the Portuguese were hardy adventurers, and some of them permeated into certain portions of the interior of the Dark Continent. Of course, wherever they went they hoisted the flag of their country. They also established settlements, but in time those settlements ceased to exist, and only relics were left to prove they were ever there. Of course, the Portuguese flag went with the people, and the country for many more years remained unclaimed. Across this state of things, Great Britain steps in, and wherever she sets a foot, if there is nothing visible to prove white men have been there before, she hoists her banner and claims possession. In the present case Portugal objects and has appealed to the powers, at the same time declaring that she is determined to have her rights. May be she will get them by the aid of the other European powers who are overwhelmingly jealous of England's sway and aggression in Africa; but by her own efforts it is certain Portugal will never succeed, for an appeal to arms would come very near being the realization of the old nursery rhyme:

Three Thousand Barrels of Gunpowder Exploded.

MARSEILLES, Dec. 10.—A terrible explosion this evening caused widespread terror throughout the city. The three-masted ship Ville de Marseilles, with a cargo of 3,000 barrels of powder, shipped for Mozambique, caught fire. An attempt was made to blow up the ship with dynamite without success. The fire in a short time reached the forehold, where there were 1,000 barrels of powder. A terrific explosion followed. All the windows for a mile around were shattered. Fragments of the ill-fated ship were picked up 500 metres away from the scene of the disaster. No lives were lost. The ship belonged to Messrs. Singlar & Co., Marseilles.

A Hard Time of It.

The hardships suffered by the frontier itinerant preacher are not all matters of ancient history. Dr. W. A. Spencer writes to the North-Western Christian Advocate of a Methodist pastor in Kansas who in the last three quarters of a year has travelled 1,000 miles, preached about sixty times, and received from the people $10.75, of which $7.25 was due on last year's account. But the reported failure of the crops for three successive years, and the consequent poverty of the people, make his condition little if any worse than that of his congregations.—[N. Y. Tribune.

A Business-like Offer.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy have offered, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists at only 50 cents. This wonderful remedy has fairly attained a world-wide reputation. If you have dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; if the eyes are weak, watery and inflamed; if there is wringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice being changed and has a nasal twan; the breath offensive; smell and taste impaired; sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility, you are suffering from nasal catarrh. The more complicated your disease, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

Proven by the Sale of Half a Million to be the most popular, because written in language plain, forcible and instructive. Practical presentation of Medical Common Sense. Valuable to Invalids who are weak, nervous, and exhausted, showing new means by which they may be cured. Approved by editors, critics, and the people. Sanitary, Social, Science Subjects. Also gives a description of Specific No. 8. The Great Health Renewer, Marvel of Healing and Koh-i-noor of Medicines. It largely explains the mysteries of life. By its teachings, health may be maintained. The Book will teach you how to make life worth living. If every adult in the civilized world would read, understand, and follow our views, there would be a world of Physical, intellectual and moral giants. This Book will be found a truthful presentation of facts, calculated to do good. The book of Lubon, the Talisman of Health! Brings bloom to the cheek, strength to the body and joy to the heart. It is a message to the Wise and Otherwise. Lubon's Specific No 8, the Spirit of Health. Those who obey the laws of this book will be crowned with a fadeless wreath. Vast numbers of men have felt the power and testified to the virtue of Lubon's Specific No. 8. All Men Who are broken Down from overwork or other causes not mentioned in the above, should send for and read this Valuable Treatise, which will be sent to any address, sealed, on receipt of ten cents in stamps. Address all orders to M. V. Lubon, room 15, 50 Front Street E., Toronto, Canada.

A new kind of cord for stay-laces has been invented. To prevent the frequent breaking, and render it more durable it is interwoven with fine gold.

WATEROUS E.W. Co. BRANTFORD, CANADA.

JOSEPH MADDAUGH WRITES FROM MORRISON P.O. Nov. 26th, '89.

Now that I have purchased from you one of your Standard French Burr Chopping Mills, turning in on it as part payment my Iron Grinder, I have no objection to tell you that the Plates used in the Iron Grinder cost $2.00, and latterly but $1.00 per pair. I used over $50.00 worth last winter. Occasionally a Plate would last a week, but sometimes not over two or three hours.

The price of the Mill was $65.00, much cheaper than yours, but in the end it was a very much dearer Mill. I am satisfied that Iron Grinders are only suitable for farmers who have a very small amount of Chopping to do for their own use.

J. COMEAU, MANIWAKI, QUE., WRITES: Nov. 23rd, '89.

I would feel inclined to apologize for not writing sooner had I not been too busy, and my desire to give the 20-inch Standard Mill a fair trial before writing.

I am the most happy to state that I am entirely satisfied with the Mill—it is doing splendid work.

FOR SALE.

What is Expected.

The following poetical advertisement indicates humorously, but very truthfully, how much man expects of his wife:

Wanted—A wife who can handle a broom
To brush down the cobwebs and sweep up her room;
Can make decent bread that a fellow can eat,
Not the horrible compound you everywhere meet;
Who knows how to boil, to fry, and to roast,
Make a good cup of tea and a platter of toast,
A woman that washes, cooks, irons and stitches,
And sews up the rips in a fellow's old clothes,
And makes her own garments—an item, too, which is
So horrid expensive, as every one knows;
A common-sense creature, and still with a mind,
To teach and to guide—exalted refined;
A sort of angel and house-maid combined.

Slightly Mixed.

Jones bought a mare from a farmer who recommended the animal as gentle, alleging that Jones' wife, for whom the mare was dought, would have no difficulty in driving her. Nevertheless, the first time Mrs. Jones tried to drive the animal it ran away with the buggy and almost broke the fair driver's neck. Jones, in a furious mood, hunted up the farmer and said angrily:

"What do you mean by selling me that brute? You told me my wife could drive her, but as soon as she was in the buggy she shied, and taking the bit between her teeth, she——"

"What! your wife?"

"No; that wretched crow-bait of a mare with which you have swindled me. She wouldn't be held in, but just reared up——"

"Your wife reared up?"

"No, the mare, you fool. She nearly killed my wife. She kicked up with her hind legs——"

"You don't mean to say your wife kicked?"

No; the wretched mare. My poor wife is half dead with fright and anxiety. She hasn't eaten a bite since yesterday, but lies on the sofa with her eyes shut, moaning and crying——"

"The mare does that?',

"No; wife. I have half a notion to murder you. We have to give her a teaspoonful of brandy every half hour.''

"The mare?"

No; my wife, donkey. This beast that you have sold me should be killed. She is liable to run away at any moment, first chance she gets."

"You mean your wife ?"

"No, your darned old mare. I want my money back."

"Why didn't you say you wanted the mare for your wife ? You merely said you wanted the animal for a lady. I thought perhaps you wanted something for your mother-in-law to drive."

"Now I see how I can make some money out of that brute."

"Out of your mother-in-law ?"

"No, the mare. I'll tell a newspaper reporter about the mare running away but say that, instead of my wife, it was my mother-in-law who was driving. The married men of my acquaintance will pay any price for her. So you see it's all right. Good morning." —Texas Siftings.

One of the most interesting features of the American Agriculturist Prize Crop Competition is the carefully-conducted experiments of John M. Smith, President of the Wisconsin Horticultural Society, who raised 404 bushels 39 pounds of potatoes on one acre dressed with stable manure, and from 426 to 455 bushels on three other acre-plots, respectively manured with special potato fertilizers. All but two of the prize-winning crops were also grown on fertilizers, yielding an average of 500 bushels per acre. The results, as given in the very complete summary of the potato contest in the forthcoming January issue, indicate the superiority of special potato manures over ordinary barnyard dressing. The American Agriculturist's grand prize of $500 in gold coin was taken by Charles B. Coy, of Aroostook county, Me., for a yield of 738 bushels 25 pounds of the Dakota Red variety, cut to two eyes, dropped 12 inches apart, rows two and three-fourths feet apart, on a strong clay loam, fertilized with 1100 pounds of Stockbridge potato manure in the drill, and 900 pounds worked into the soil at the first hoeing. This crop also took 600 gold dollars additional, offered by the manufacturer of the fertilizer.

TEMPERANCE TALK.

CONTRIBUTED BY THE LADIES.

WHAT WILL WE DO ABOUT IT.

A poor little girl sat shivering one bitter cold night in midwinter upon the steps of a bakery where her mother used to send her for bread.

The snow was falling fast, and her thin, tattered garments barely covered her emaciated form.

She was weeping as if her little heart would break, and as she drew her old shawl tighter around her, she took one end and wiped away the tears which were streaming down her face.

"Oh, dear," she murmured, "I am so cold and so hungry. What shall I do? I shall have to die, like mamma did, I guess."

"What are you doing here, little one!" asked a policeman who was just then passing that way. "Why are you not at home at this time of night?"

"I have no home to go to, Mr. Policeman," replied the child, somewhat affrighted. "My mamma was buried to-day, and the people where we lived said that they could not keep me, I must take care of myself."

"Have you no father to take care of you?"

"Yes, sir, I have a father, but I don't know where he lives," sobbed the poor distressed child.

"Have you no friends, little one, to whom you can go?" asked the man, kinkly.

"I don't know where my friends are," answered the child, innocently.

"How old are you, my child?"

"Eight years, I think, sir."

"Well, come with me. I will find you a home. Give me yonr hand, and I will help you over the snow."

In a short time poor little Bessie was snugly sleeping in a good warm bed in one of the "Homes" provided for such little, helpless, neglected children.

Tears ran down the good, kind-hearted matron's face when she saw the poor, almost famished child greedily eating a large bowl of hot milk and bread before going to bed.

This poor child and her mother had a comfortable home at one time, but it was ruined by rum! And the rum was sold by a man who paid for the right to sell it; and the man who bought it and drank it knew that he was robbing his family and ruining his own prospects in this life as well as in the life to come.

Not only does the drunkard know what harm the poisonous stuff will do him, and what sorrow and misery it will bring upon his family, but the saloon-keeper knows it also, and those who sell him the license know it as well, but they do not care.

If the drunkard can only satisfy his appetite, day after day, with the drink which costs the price of his children's bread, he cares for nothing else. His children may starve, his wife sicken and die, his home totter and fall, but he cares not.

If the saloon keeper can make his fortune easily by standing behind his counter dealing out liquid destruction, when he ought to be earning his living like an honest man, he cares not what are the consequences.

And if the country can gather the gold into its coffers by the hundreds and thousands, which are annually paid for these licenses, the saloon keepers may still continue their respectable (?) business of making drunkards and peopleing the orphanages and alsmhouses to their hearts' content.

This crying evil of the nineteenth centuary is the most formidable with which we, as christian people, have to contend.

Shall we crush the rum traffic out of existence, and that right early, or shall we let it go on, year after year, spreading ruin and misery all over our fair and otherwise happy land.

If this curse is ever to be driven from our land, every christian man and woman must be "up and doing." Each one has a work of some kind to perform. What our country needs to-day and what our country wants to-day is willing hearts. Let us give them to our country in this great battle for the right, and the work will soon be accomplished.

Among our pulpits and by the very side of our preachers it is safe to say that the dram shops lead as many downward as the churches lead upward. We are asked then to license an institution which provides nothing useful or beautiful; causes and encourages idleness; teaches tippling and drunkenness; breeds disorder, vice, poverty and crime; antagonizes our homes, schools and churches. Can we, dare we, call such institutions into existence, set them up in our midst, sanction their work and protect them in it? Are the interests of our homes, our society, our children and our neighbors to be sacrificed to such demands? And for whose interests? That one in five hundred may become a dram seller and make a lazy living at the expense of all we hold dear; that the other four hundred and ninety-nine may bear the burden and suffer the misery.

Mothers, keep alcoholic liquors out of your kitchen. Baking may expel the alcohol from the brandy you put in your pie-meat, but alcoholic liquors in cooking are bad for the cook, who has to taste her preparations, bad for the children, who want to look into the mysteries of cooking; bad for your stomachs, and bad for your morals. A case of wine in your cellar closes your mouth against the vice of drinking, makes you sour and surly when the subject of temperance is broached, and leads you to denounce the advocates of abstinence as fantastic in the presence of your children, and thus prejudices them in favor of dangerous customs, to their hurt and your sorrow.

A LITTLE SPARK

MAY kindle a great fire, just so dyspepsia and bad blood give rise to countless complaints which cannot be cured until the dyspepsia is removed, and the blood purified. To do this is the work of Burdock Blood Bitters, a medicine which always cures dyspepsia, bad blood and all complaints of a similar origin.

A woman may fear a mouse, but not a moustache.

No remedy for blood disorders can equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Though concentrated and powerful, this medicine is perfectly safe, and may be taken by children as well as adults. Physicians recommend it in preference to any other. Price $1. Worth $5 a bottle.

ROSE ISLAND REPORTS.

I CAN state that we have used Hagyard's Yellow Oil with great benefit for colds, sore throat, cuts, burns, chapped hands, etc. We can recommend it to be very useful and good in many different ways.

"PECTORIA" has no equal as a remedy for coughs and colds. Try a bottle and cure that cough. 25 cents a bottle.

Poor people with too many naughty boys in their family should send some of them to a nautical school.

Nearly all colds are slight at first, but their tendency is to so lower the system that the sufferer becomes a ready victim to any prevalent disease. The use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, in the beginning of a cold, would guard against this danger.

COLD IN HEAD — CATARRH — THE 4 STAGES — CONSUMPTION — DEATH.

There is positive danger to health and life in neglecting a case of Cold in the Head or Catarrh, and at this season with its changeable weather, unusual moisture and sudden changes from heat to cold, there is pecullar liability to cold in the head. A neglected case of Cold in the Head rapidly developes into Catarrh, and neglected Catarrh, just as certainly developes into Consumption and leads to premature Death. Medical testimony proves conclusively that a large percentage of the deaths occurring from Consumption had their origin in a neglected Cold, which by gradual stages, developed in Catarrh, and then into Consumption, that dread disease with which medical science is as yet unable to cope successfully. If you are suffering from Cold in the head, or from any of the numerous symptoms of Catarrh, such as bad breath, dull oppressive headaches, droppings from the head into the throat, hawking and spitting, copious discharges from the nostrils, losing sense of smell, or taste becoming dull, hacking cough, or a general feeling of debility, husky voice, a wheezing or cracking sound in your chest when breathing, a feeling of dizziness, particularly when stooping, a feeling of tiredness and indisposition to exertion, a feeling of nausea in the morning when attempting to dislodge accumulations in the throat. Do not neglect them. These but a few of the many symptoms of Catarrh, and if you experience any, be warned in time. Do not permit them to run under the mistaken impression that the disease will eventually wear away. It will not, but on the contrary will wear you away as it has thousands before you. Procure at once a bottle of NASAL BALM, the only certain and speedy cure ever offered to the public for Cold in the Head and Catarrh. This is no idle assertion, but an unquestionable fact, which is verified by the thousands of testimonials in our possession telling of marvellous cures. These testimonials we have received from all parts of the Dominion, and we append a few, selected at random; as a fair sample of the whole:—

Mr. Alex. Burns, of Sudbury, Ont., says:—Gents, I may state that I have been affected with Catarrh for seven or eight years, and it was attended with consequent symptoms such as foul breath, constant dropping into the throat, hawking and spitting, partial deafness, ringing in the ears, and sickening pain in the head, directly over either eye. I have used powders and douches, but all to no effect, the only result arising from the use of such was temporary relief, followed by the usual symptoms in a more aggravated form. The results arising from the use of Nasal Balm are sweet breath, stoppage of droppings into the throat (consequently less hawking and spitting), clearness of hearing, and not once since I began its use have I had pain in my head. In fact it is my opinion that a careful and persistent use of the "Balm" will effect a cure in the worst case of catarrh.

James H. McLeod, Mink River Road, N. S., says:—I have tried other remedies for Catarrh, but received little or no good from them. Your NASAL BALM is certainly the BEST REMEDY I have tried, and all you claim for it. The fact that it is pleasant and convenient to use adds greatly to its value, but its chief worth lies in being a CERTAIN CURE for that unpleasant disease—Catarrh.

W. Chas. Hanley, postmaster, Spy Bay, N. S., says:—I submit the following to the public that any who may be afflicted may be benefitted by the same remedy. Two bottles of your NASAL BALM has RESTORED to PERFECT HEALTH a four year old child of ours, suffering from Catarrh.

Henrietta Blackwell, Parker, Ont., says:—Your NASAL BALM is the BEST REMEDY I have yet used for Catarrh. I can breath more freely than before and my breath has regained its sweetness. I consider NASAL BALM a boon to the suffering.

Miss Maggie M. Martin, Terwood, Pa., says:—Through a friend in Canada I became acquainted with your NASAL BALM. I have suffered for years with Catarrh, and it is the first remedy from which I have experienced relief, and I feel certain it will cure me.

Miss Minnie McNairn, Mille Roches, Ont., says:—Your bottle of NASAL BALM did me much good. The pain in my head disappeared before I had used the bottle, and I find myself receiving the greatest benefit. I am certain that NASAL BALM will cure my Catarrh if its use is perserved in.

Mr. John H. Adams, merchant, Brantford, Ont., says:—I have used NASAL BALM for Catarrh, and found it to be a CERTAIN CURE

W. A. Doyle, Beulah, Man., writes:—As a family medicine to check Catarrhal affections or Cold in the Head, NASAL BALM HAS NO EQUAL. We prize it highly.

Mr. A. Schlenzig, Toronto, says:—For a number of years my wife has been badly troubled with Catarrh. Dr. ——— here promised to cure her, but after using his remedy for six months she became weaker than before, and I found that I had spent $36 for medical treatment that did no good. My wife then began to use your NASAL BALM and has improved wonderfully, and she is better and stronger than for years. Your remedy is the best in the market and you can use this as testimony.

Emilie Pellitier, Grenville, says.—I can acarcely find words to tell how highly I prize NASAL BALM. Its effects in my case have been wonderful.

Alpha H. Dales, Tarbert, Ont., writes: Your NASAL BALM has made a new man of me. I nave never used a remedy so satisfactory.

A CAUTION:—Beware of imitations. If your dealer has not NASAL BALM in stock do not let him persuade you to take any other remedy which he may say is just as good, but send direct to the undersigned and it will be sent you on receipt of price—50 cents and $1 a bottle.

Elgin County Court.

Michel Kelly was placed on trial on a charge of obtaining $33 under false pretenses. The facts are familiar to our readers. Kelly handed McKillop a cheque for 33 cents issued by the car wheel foundry and was paid $33, McKillop not discovering his mistake until he presented the check at the bank. After the evidence for the prosecution had been heard the judge declined to allow the case to go to the jury, holding that there was not sufficient testimony to establih a prima facie case of fraud.

Thomas Havercroft was placed on trial, charged with having on the night of June 1st, 1887, assaulted Richard Cusack on Wilson avenue and rifled his pockets of $295. The case is familiar to our readers. Cusack was en route home at midnight when he was knocked senseless with a stone wrapped in a handkerchief. Two respectable citizens were arrested for the crime but were honorably acquitted. The police now claim that the robbery was committed by Havercroft and a young man named Bur. Beach, at that time employed on the M. C. R., but who was killed a few months afterwards while switching on the Wisconsin Central at Stevens Point.

Richard Cusack described the particulars of the assault and robbery. He admitted under cross-examination that the only thing which made him change his mind that the robbery was committed by the man he originally accused was hearing of certain confessions Havercroft had made that he was the assailant.

William Minhinnick was arraigned on two charges of larceny from his employer, George McCallum, near Mapleton. Minhinnick was arrested for stealing a watch and money from McCallum and awaiting trial escaped from jail. He was recaptued in a day or two at Copenhagen but had meantime visited McCallum's house again and stole another suit. He pleaded guilty to both charges. Sentence reserved.

The grand jury returned a true bill against Hiram Beach for the larceny of a quantity of tea and tobacco and other merchandise from the store of George Simmons, of Middlemiss, in May, 1888. The principal evidence against Beach was supplied by hi own act. When the robbery occurred, suspicion fell upon the prisoner. Simmons interviewed Beach, when he admitted the theft and gave a note of $25 in settlement for the goods taken. He then skipped out, having somehow become acquainted with the fact that Simmons' object in inducing him to sign the cheque was not to secure the value of the goods, but in order to obtain evidence sufficient to connect the accused with the burglary.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty in the case of Thomas Havercroft, charged with highway robbery, after an absence of two minutes.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty in the case of Hiram Beach charged with stealing from Geo. Simons, of Middlemiss.

The court adjourned till Thursday at 10 a.m.

Shipping Dressed Poultry.

First see that all poultry is well fattened, as there is a great difference between the price of fat and that of poor poultry, and, in a fully stocked market, good poultry, well fatted and well dressed, will always command ready sale and good prices, while poor, badly dressed, is slow of sale at low prices. Therefore there is not only gain in weight by having poultry properly dressed, but also in price. Corn is the best for finishing off poultry, as it gives a firmer flesh and yellower color than buckwheat and other grains. Feed nothing from twelve to twenty-four hours before killing, so that the crops will be perfectly empty.

In killing, use a sharp, narrow-bladed knife, inserting it in the mouth as far back as the ear, and cutting the vein. Then hang it up by the legs, until thoroughly bled. The water for scalding should be at boiling point. Take the fowl by the legs and head, dip it in the water two or three times, letting the hot water through the feathers to the skin. Then strip off the feathers clean, pin-feathers and all. If the heads are dipped in the water the scalding will make them look stale and shrunken. After thoroughly picking, dip in clean scalding water, then plunge in clean cold water, letting it remain about ten minutes. Take it out and hang up in a cool, dry place, in a current of air, but do not let it freeze. Do not draw it, or take the intestines out. Leave the head and legs on, and use great care in dressing not to rub or tear the skin, bruise the flesh, or break the bones. The above hints are for scalded poultry, which is in most demand.

For dry picking, kill by bleeding in the mouth, and immediately strip the feathers off clean while the fowl is warm, using great care not to tear or bruise the flesh. Then hang up by the legs to cool off, the same as for scalded fowls. Some also do what is called half-scalding, which is, after dry-picking cleanly, to dip in scalding water, then in cold. Turkeys, ducks and geese go through the same process in dressing as fowls, both scalding and dry-picking. Some persons, after the ducks and geese are picked, to more thoroughly free them from pin-feathers, rub them over with powdered rosin; dip in scalding water and rub off the rosin and pin-feathers; then wash thoroughly with warm water and brush with soap; then rinse in cold water and hang up until cold and thoroughly dried.—American Agriculturist for January.

FROM SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS OF THE ENTERPRISE.

Highgate

Dec. 14th,—A number of the Masonic fraternity attended the funeral of their late brother Stinson at Rodney yesterday. Mr. Stinson died of consumption.

Mathew Powell, who has been ailing for several weeks back died last evening. He leaves a wife and three small children to mourn his loss. Mr. Powell was sober and industrious and was respected by all who knew him.

T. McMackon is recovering from his injuries received while working in his factory some time ago. The probabilities are that he will not lose his arm.

Chicken-pox has been raging in our town for several weeks.

Mr. Mattice is seemingly very happy over the new addition to his family.

Rumors has it that we are to have an oil or gas well soon. We may not get the former but we are quite sure of the latter.

Mr. Wickham, of Pennsylvania, is visiting his friends here this week.

L. Bailey left last week for Cleveland, where he intends making his home for a time.

Hen thieves visited R. C. Scott's henhouse a few nights ago. Xmas is close at hand you know.

Mrs. Nickle is visiting her daughter Mrs. J. Tolson at Melbourne.

R. H. Reycraft is slowly recovering from an attack of inflammatory rheumatism.

Markets—Wheat still quoted 75 to 78 cts. per bush; beans, $1 10 to $1.15; oats, 27 to 28c.

Port Talbot.

A number of the young people in this locality assembled at Wm. Bobier's on Thursday evening last where a most enjoyable time was spent. About twelve o'clock a sumptuous table was spread and after doing justice to the good things all indulged in tripping the light fantastic toe until the "wee sma' hours.

Mrs. Smith, of Union, is home for a week visiting her parents.

The Port Talbot Xmas tree will be held at Wm. Bobier's on Monday, Dec. 3rd, where a good large crowd is expected.

The forest once more echos in the distance with the sound of the woodman's axe.

Coyne's Corners.

The Misses McGugans returned home after an extended visit to friends in this vicinity.

The trustees of S. S. No. 3 have not engaged a teacher for 1890 yet. Applications will be received up to the 25th.

It is reported that P. Gilbert will oppose H. Garbutt in municipal matters for the coming elections. If so we will have it much more interesting.

We regret to announce the death of E. Page, which occurred at his residence on Tuesday last. The deceased, who was one of the oldest settlers of community, had been unwell for the past two years. He leaves behind him to mourn his loss a wife and sister, Mrs. Morris, residing in Iona. They have the sympathy of the entire neighbors in their bereavement. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. E. Middleton. The pall-bearers were Wm. Ford, H. Braddon, H. Garbutt, H. McPherson, J. Welch and J. Patton.

Willey's Corners

Dec. 16th, —N.D. Gunne, of St. Marys paid a flying visit to his sister Mrs. Mary Graham on Wednesday last.

A party was held at the residence of Jno. McLean last Friday night. They tripped the light fantastic till 3 o'clock in the morning, when all left for home after thoroughly enjoying themselves.

Miss Colwell is visiting her sister, Mrs. Thos. Shearing.

Fingal.

Dec. 17th,—The several services that are being held in the Methodist church are to be brought to a close to-night. Great good has come out of them.

The Sunday school anniversary comes off next Monday night. All are looking for a good time.

While Mr. Harris was returning home with his horse and buggy, the night being dark and his horse blind, the rig was capsized, throwing him and Mrs. Eustes out in the ditch. Both escaped without much injury, more than a good shaking up.

J. G. Nunn sold all the farm stock and implements of D. D. Campbell on Wednesday of last week, realizing about $1,700. The farm was not sold as the highest bid did not reach the reserve bid which was $14,000. We understand the farm has been sold privately for that amount.

W. H. Davis has purchased the blacksmith shop and good will of Sam. Bancroft, of St. Thomas, and intends to take his departure from our village shortly.

Louie Cattenach is visiting in St. Thomas with her aunt, Mrs. D. Drake.

Miss Sanders, of St. Thomas, has been engaged to teach the junior department of our school for the coming year at a salary of $275.

Mrs. Davidson is engaged to teach S. S. No. 13, below the village, for the same salary.

Mr. Whitton's little boy, who got a bead in his ear some time ago, has not had it taken out yet.

Tyrconnel.

Farmers are rejoicing over the fine late fall weather, giving ample time for ploughing.

The fall wheat looks well and continues to improve. A large quantity was sown this fall, being above the average of many years.

W. J. Moore is contemplating erecting a sawmill on the flats. He is again prepared to purchase wood and bolts.

M. Conn is again purchasing wood and bolts. We understand he has made contracts at the upper dock for a large quantity of both.

The fishermen have again got their nets on shore. They report a good average season's fishing.

Our neighborhood was awakened from its monotony by the ring of the wedding bell. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather of the 10th inst., at the residence of the bride's father, Mr. Vidi Shipley and Miss Julia Parks were united in the happy tie of married life. The bride was richly attired in cream satin and lace. The presents were numerous and costly. After a sumptuous repast and some little chit chat to wear away the weary hours of the wet night the company retired. Next morning the happy couple started on an extended wedding trip east to Tyrconnel, where they took up a permanent residence. We wish them all prosperity and as much happiness as married life can afford. We advise some other couples to follow suit, as courtship when carried into years becomes hazardous.

Eagle.

The union tea meeting, which was held last Wednesday evening, proved a grand success financially as well as socially. In the absence of the expected chairman, Dr. Ruthven, of Dutton, Wm. Mowbray, of this place, very ably filled the chair. The programme, which consisted of speeches, recitations and music, was expressed by everyone as not dry and tiresome, as so often are tea meeting programmes. Proceeds, $35, to be applied to the repairs of the church.

Mrs. D. Buchanan, of Attica, Indiana, is visiting Mr. Buchanan's relatives here.

Miss Melissa Anderson, of this place, has been engaged to teach the junior department of the West Lorne school.

The sailor boys are fast returning home. Those who have already arrived are:—James Buchanan, Neil Campbell, Duncan Leitch and David Frick. The others are expected in a few days.

Hector Lang, who has been attending Model school in St. Thomas, is home for his holidays, having successfully passed the final examination. He will take up his duties as teacher of the townline school at the beginning of the year.

The Disciples still continue their series of meetings here.

Wallacetown.

Miss McCrank is visiting friends in London.

Parties are the order of the day. There was one every evening last week and it bids fair to be the same this week.

A surprise party took place at the residence of Jno. McLean, Back street, last Friday evening.

L. W. McIntyre, Esq., is visiting friends in Chatham.

Mrs. McCrank is ill with sciatica.

C. G. Henry, Clearville, spent a few days with friends in this place.

The annual entertainment of the Presbyterian Sunday School will be held in church on January 1st, the proceeds to be devoted towards procuring a library for the Sunday School.

People Wonder

WHEN they find how rapidly health is restored by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. The reason is that this preparation contains only the purest and most powerful alteratives and tonics. To thousands yearly it proves a veritable elixir of life.

Mrs. Jos. Lake, Brockway Centre, Mich., writes: "Liver complaint and indigestion made my life a burden and came near ending my existence. For more than four years I suffered untold agony. I was reduced almost to a skeleton, and hardly had strength to drag myself about. All kinds of food distressed me, and only the most delicate could be digested at all. Within the time mentioned several physicians treated me without giving relief. Nothing that I took seemed to do any permanent good until I began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which has produced wonderful results. Soon after commencing to take the Sarsaparilla I could see an in my condition, my appetite began to return and with it came the ability to digest all the food taken, my strength improved each day, and after a few months of faithful attention to your directions, I found myself a well woman, able to attend to all household duties. The medicine has given me a new lease of life, and I cannot thank you too much."

"We, the undersigned, citizens of Brockway Centre, Mich., hereby certify that the above statement, made by Mrs. Lake, is true in every particular and entitled to full credence."—O. P. Chamberlain, G. W. Waring, C. A. Wells, Druggist.

"My brother, in England, was, for a long time, unable to attend to his occupation, by reason of sores on his foot. I sent him Ayer's Almanac and the testimonials it contained induced him to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After using it a little while, he was cured, and is now a well man, working in a sugar mill at Brisbane, Queensland, Australia."—A. Attewell, Sharbot Lake, Ontario.

HEALTH

Bathing Sick Persons.

A sick person should be bathed every day, unless for some special reason the doctor forbids it. The skin cannot properly perform its function of carrying off the waste matter from the body unless its pores are kept open. In fever, sponging with cold water is one of the recognized means of lowering the temperature. It is therefore important to know how to give a bath to a person in bed as easily, speedily, and effectually as possible. Before beginning, everything that will be required should be collected at the side of the bed. Two blankets are needed, two towels, a basin of water (if the bath is to be a warm one, a pitcher of hot water to replenish the basin) and a sponge. If the bath is given every day, soap is unnecessary; when it is used, a cloth should be substituted for the sponge, as soap spoils the latter. If the night dress and sheet are to be changed, the fresh ones should be put to air, and warm at the fire. This precaution should never be neglected, as damp linen might give a fatal chill.

Double the blankets end to end, move the patient to one side of the bed, push the bed-clothes towards him, keeping him covered, and, on the cleared space, lay the folded blanket, draw the bed coverings over it, and under their shelter move the patient on it. Lay the second folded blanket over the spread, and draw all the bed-clothes from beneath it, leaving the patient covered with it alone. Remove the night-dress, squeeze the sponge so that it will not drip, and bathe the face, neck and ears, wiping them carefully afterwards. Pass the hand holding the sponge under the blanket, and wash the arms, drying each as soon as done; then bathe the body, and wipe it dry; turn the patient on the side, and bathe the back, then the legs to the knees; turn again on the back, and finish the legs and feet. The points to be remembered are not to expose the patient to cold by letting the blanket slip aside, not to wet too large a surface at once, and to wipe thoroughly dry. Replace the night dress and bed clothes, draw out the upper blanket, move the patient off the lower blanket, and pull it out. Hang both the blankets to dry. They will be damp, but not wet, if the bath has been properly given.

Why Run Up-Stairs.

We do not run in the street, nor in the park or garden; why then run up-stairs, and then complain that the stairs are so high? It is difficult to answer this question; nevertheless, Canadian people generally do run up-stairs, while foreigners are well satisfied with walking up. Servants frequently complain of the height of the stairs, and leave their places in consequence. Houses of six and eight storeys are now being built here, as they are in other countries. Now, there is really but little more difficulty in ascending several flights of stairs more than there is in walking a straight line, provided we take sufficient time to do it; which should be about twice as long as should be in walking the same distance in the street. Walk up-stairs slowly; rest at each landing; again walk steadily; and you will reach the top flight without exhaustion or fatigue.

Rules for Health.

A Scotch philosopher says that if you wish to preserve your health never eat anything but oatmeal. Wear the thickest boots. Walk fifteen miles regularly every day. Avoid all excitement; consequently, it is best to remain single, for then you will be free from all household cares and matrimonial troubles and you will have no children to worry you. The same rule applies to smoking, taking snuff, playing at cards, and arguing with any one. They are all strong excitements, which must be rigidly avoided, if you value in the least your health. By attending carefully to the above rules, there is every probability that you may live to a hundred years, and that you will enjoy your hundredth year fully as much as you did your twenty-first. Our Scotch friend is trying an experiment, and in forty years' time will be able to announce the final result.

Disordered Perspiration.

Nature has expended much labor on the perspiratory system—has constructed for each of us many miles of tubing and millions of secreting glands, each furnished with its tiny blood-vessel regulated by its microscopic nerve.

Not only does this system perform an essential service in keeping the bodily temperature down to the normal point of safety, ninety eight degrees Fahrenheit, by the evaporation of the perspired fluid but it is also an organ of elimination like the kidneys and the lungs.

An adult excretes a full pound of sweat daily and this may be increased to three or four pounds. From this fact may be understood both the danger of suddenly checking the outflow of the poisonous material, and the advantage, when one has taken cold, of the Russian bath. The quantity and character of the fluid render a frequent change of clothing a matter of no small importance.

Some diseases, as acute rheumatism, phthisis, general debility, are accompanied by excessive perspiration, which is also sometimes purposely induced by the use of certain drugs called diaphoretics. As we are all aware, the amount of perspiration is abnormal in hot weather. The heat of a muggy day is aggravated and made more oppressive by the slow evaporation from the surface of the body. The atmosphere is too fully charged with moisture to vaporize the sweat.

Excessive sweating is sometimes partial, being limited to the soles, palms, or to one-half of the face, head or body, and that, too, without any discoverable cause. The touching of one side of the tongue with salt will sometimes cause a profuse perspiration upon the corresponding side of the body.

Perspiration may also be deficient. This is generally the case in diseases of the kidneys, in the early stages of fever, and in certain skin diseases. When the sebaceous or oil secretion is deficient, there is apt to be a like deficiency in the perspiration, rendering the skin dry and rough.

Perspiration may have an offensive odor, specially that which is secreted by arm-pits, feet and toes. The sweat and the sebaceous secretion undergo a chemical change into the fatty acids, some of which are like those found in rancid butter. This condition is sometimes due to lowered vitality of the system. The affected parts shoud be repeatedly washed with tar soap, and the linen frequently changed. The soles of the stockings should be daily disinfected with a saturated solution of boracic acid. Cork soles should be worn in the shoes, and be similarly disinfected.

Five Millions of Soldiers.

Some years ago an idea suggested itself to an obscure workman of Belleville, an idea that since then has engendered an army, amply qualified, were it a question of numbers alone, to realize the dream of eternal peace, by keeping in check the assembled armies of Europe. He sets on foot 5,000,000 soldiers a year. These soldiers are of humble origin, but so was Napoleon. They spring from old sardine boxes. Relegated to the dust hole, the sardine box is preserved from destruction by the dustman, who sells it to a rag merchant in Belleville or in Buttes Chaumont, who in his turn disposes of it to a specialist, by whom it is then prepared for the manufactories. The warriors are made from the bottom of the box, the lid and sides are used for guns, railway carriages, bicycles, etc. All this may seem unimportant at first sight, but the utilization of these old sardine boxes has resulted in the foundation of an enormous manufactory, at which no less than 200 workmen are employed. I went there the other day, and, no one suspecting me of being a political correspondent, I was admitted without difficulty to a view of the great arsenal and its 5,000,000 warriors. The poor workman, out of those heard the armed tin soldier sprung—via the sardine box—is now a rich man, and what is more, an eager and keen-sighted patriot, who in his sphere deserves the gratitude of his country. After retreating for years, the French tin soldier takes the offensive again; every year the German spiked helmets retire from positions conquered in French nurseries, and the time is not far distant when the tricolor shall wave over the Berlin toy shops—a slight revenge en attendant the great.—[Blackwood's Magazine.

House Work in Buenos Ayres.

Servants are unmanageable in Buenos Ayres. General houseworkers are unknown. For the smallest family one needs a cook, a housemaid, and, instead of a maid-of-all work, a boy of any age from ten years, and I have seen even younger on duty in native households. Besides these no washing can be done at home. There was, I am told, at one time even a law against the drying of clothes in one's own patio or on the roof. At any rate a laundress is an almost impossible person to get, and clothes are given out to the lavanderas, who support themselves by the pursuit of that profession alone. They wash in the river, which is very wide, and very shallow on its southern shore, and rising only when gales are blowing from the sea, leaves on its retiring great pools of water in the hollows of the beach. These pools are the wash tubs for the whole city, and flat stones are used as boards, the clothes being rubbed between two such; so it is not to be wondered at that all kinds of wash goods want frequent replacing. The same women who wash do not iron. They are themselves employed by the person engaged by one's self, who usually is the ironer and who receives the pay for the whole. I found this arrangement very unsatisfactory, for there was no one person who seemed to be responsible for the return of the things and for the manner in which they were done. —Good Housekeeping.

OLD NAPLES CRUMBLING AWAY.

Many of Its Ancient Structures Undermined by the Recent Floods.

The term inundation does not correctly express the effect of the two violent storms of rain which burst over Naples on Sept. 25 and on the 19th inst. It is not possible for Naples to be inundated in the common sense of that word, for no water can lie in any part of the city. But the defective water courses which carry off the water from the hills which surround the town, and the fact that on a large tract of land on the summit of the Vomero at the west end, an entirely new quarter has sprung up, the drainage of which is as yet incomplete, have caused a real torrent of water to burst many of the drains on that side of the city. A veritable river of water heavy with earth and stones, after each of the two storms, and on its way destroyed gardens, threw down walls, filled cellars and ground floor dwellings, and covered the Riviera di Chiaia with a sort of alluvial deposit two or three feet deep. It is in this quarter that Sig. Crispi's house is situated, and it was on both occasions seriously damaged.

RUSHED DOWN THE HILL,

After the first storm a water course was made for the water from the Vomero, so that it might not follow the disastrous course it took in September. But it did still greater damage, as no precaution had been taken for carrying off the water, and the consequence was that it carried away about a hundred yards of the beautiful Via Tasso, a road which winds along the side of the Vomero higher up and parallel to the Corso Vittorio Emanuele. The road was destroyed from side to side, leaving the foundations of a palace on its edge exposed, so that it threatened to fall. The debris were precipitated by the rushing water, which was as yellow as the Tiber, on to the gardens below; they blocked the Corso Vittorio Emanuele; they burst a portion of the causeway and destroyed the wall of Prince Amedee's palace on their way through Sig. Crispi's house to the sea. At the same time the newly-built buttress which supports the tottering rocks at Posilipo was damaged, and there also cellars were filled with water and all traffic was stopped, while an innumerable points in the city drains fell in and homes were inundated. There were not sufficient "pompieri, muncipal guards, or military sappers and miners to respond to the calls for help.

But these storms, though they served to show how badly the city is protected from the effects of heavy rain, are not the most destructive agents at work. Scarcely a day passes without some outwardly seeming solid house falling in, and the aspect of the city, with some hundreds of large "palaces" propped with beams or buttressed with stone is hardly reassuring While a new Naples is gradually being built the old Naples is crumbling away, and in many streets the people are half panic stricken. A Commission has been appointed by the Syndic to examine the

and it has already presented a report, embodying a scheme of reconstruction and repair. Work is to be begun immediately. There is no doubt that the defective pipes of the new water works, together with the fact that the taps in the houses are carelessly allowed to run all day into drains not fit to hold the water, which consequently percolates and undermines the foundation, and the neglect of the old water cisterns, and probably also an imperceptible but constant vibration of volcanic soil, all contribute to the rapidly increasing crumbling of houses which has been observable since the year 1884, when the new water works were inaugurated. But all the damage done owing to these causes and accelerated by the late heavy rains certainly might have been prevented by forethought and honest work, but those are two things difficult to be met with in that land of "far niente."

FOREIGN NEWS.

Nearsightedness is overrunning the French people as much as the Germans. Among the senior boys in the different French colleges more than 46 per cent. are nearsighted.

In a little town of Schleswig-Holstein there is a tax exemption for dogs "that sleep with their masters and mistresses and so preserve them from gout, rheumatism and like pains."

The consumption of horse flesh in Berlin is increasing. Last month the Berliners ate 816 horses against 610 in same month of 1888. For various reasons, however, the working people in the Prussian capital do not eat so much horse as the poorer classes of other German cities. Konigsberg, for instance, with about the same population as Rochester, consumed 340 horses last month.

French animosity against the Germans bubbled up vigorously at the recent election of a successor to the late Baron de Witte, the Foreign Associate of the Institute. Prof. Momsen, the historian of Rome, and Prof. Curtius, the historian of Greece, both Berliners, were the competing candidates. Both were pretty searchingly discussed, from an essentially French standpoint, and at last Curtius was elected.

The power of one of the greatest political figures of the day, perhaps of all time, is said to be on the wane. The Empress Dowager of China has been shorn of her prestige by the rebellious independence of the young Emperor. He refused to see the bride which she forced upon him, and has been issuing vigorous decrees on his own account. He has been censuring the old Minister right and left, particularly Chang Chi Tung.

Three hundred and fifty thousand six hundred and sixty-six persons are now under sentence in the German empire for offences against the law. Sixty-one thousand eight hundred and six of these offended against State, religion, and the public peace; 134,670 against the person, 152,652 against property, 552 were sentenced for "insulting majesty," 482 for arson, 475 for bribery, 258 for offences against the anti Socialist law, and 969 for adulterating food.

A young man of Warsaw ordered a dress suit from a tailor, who agreed to deliver it on a certain day. The latter failed, and hence a curious lawsuit. The plaintiff alleged that he had arranged to go to an evening party at which he had resolved to offer his hand to the daughter of the house. Because of the failure of his dress coat he could not go, but his rival went, proposed, and was accepted, and the plaintiff considered himself damaged to the value of the lost bride.

A CRUISE IN THE ENGLISH CHANNEL.

A soft southerly breeze is blowing up Channel and the Corisande is slipping along, close hauled, through the summer seas. The outline of the lovely South Devon coast is shimmering in the heat, and the musical murmur of the waves upon the pebble beaches of many a cove comes like the song of far-off Naiads. Away to the left, Start Point rises in the haze; its white lighthouse tower standing out against the sky, and its jagged sides sloping like a steep-pitched roof. On the right, Berry Head marks the whereabouts of Tor Bay, on whose northern shore Torquay—loveliest queen of watering-places—clusters between and upon her lofty limestone hills. Ahead is a gap in the wall of cliff towards which we are steering, where the river Dart rolls its current to the sea.

"How is the tide, Elliot?"

"About slack, sir.—Keep her a bit closer, sir, if you can."

The burly skipper gets a pull on the main-sheet, and then walks forward to give an order to one of the hands; and we watch the land rapidly nearing as the foam from the cutter's bows he flung off and left behind. Ten minutes later the blue-jacket comes aft again with "Keep her away now, sir; we can run slap in."

The boom swings steadily out, the sheets are eased handsomely, and the Corisande lifts herself with a steady roll. There are finer and grander pictures, no doubt, but few lovelier ones than that which greets the yatchsman as he stands in from seawards for the Dart. On the headland at the

are the remains of Dartmouth Castle, that "stronge and mightie and defensyve tower," which Edward IV. stipulated should be built; and within them the church new of St. Petrox, of Early English work. High above is a height known as "Gallant's Bower," about which are curious old-world entrenchments and earthen ramparts. On the north bank are the villas of Kingswear; and below Brookhill—a noble mansion, whose dining-room contains a portion of the chimney-piece in whose nook the great Sir Walter Raleigh indulged in the first pipe of tobacco smoked in this country—are the ruins of "Gomerock Castle;", and the groove still exists in the rock where the huge chain was swung across to Dartmouth Castle as part of the defences of the olden time.

Gliding steadily onwards, we pass Warfleet Creek and its singing stream, and then suddenly "Beautiful Dartmouth"—as Her Majesty Queen Victoria termed it when the royal yacht was driven hither by stress of weather—lies before us in all its picturesqueness, with its noble harbor at its feet so land-locked you can almost fancy it a lake. But no lake ever saw such a fleet of vessels as are lying here to-day. Crack yachts are legion—cutters, yawls, and schooners—roomy cruisers and lean racers, stout five-tonners and flying fifties; from whose forest of masts flutter the burgess of every club of worthiness and note; grim collier steamers are alongside the Kingswear quays; puffing steam-launches dart hither and thither; a smart cruiser rides majestically in mid-stream fully conscious that the white ensign that streams above her is the symbol of the mistress of the sea, and that she is there the monarch of all she surveys. In sharp contrast to her low-lying hull with its stumpy funnel and raking masts are the lofty, old three-decker line-of-battle ships the "Britannia" and "Hindoostar," whose ports and within whose wooden walls are trained some hundred naval cadets, the future officers of England's navy. Steep hills clothed with thick oak-woods form a fine background to the whole; and behind them the Dart winds away with many a curve and sinuous turn up to Totnes and its weir, to become thenceforward a brawling silvan streamlet haunted by fisherman and artist.

GLISTEN IN THE SUN,

Of all old fashioned places, Dartmouth is one of the quaintest; and as soon as the "Corisande" is at her moorings, we lower away the gig, and tumbling in, scull over to the landing-stairs to explore it. Few towns of the brave West-country are more ancient, though its neighbor opposite boasts that

Kingswear was a market town
When Dartmouth was a furzy down.

In the days of the Norman kings it was a flourishing place, and William Rufus is said to have embarked here when he went to raise the siege of the castles of Le-Mans. It was evidently a port of note in Chaucer's time, for he tells how, amongst his Canterbury pilgrims,

A Shipman was ther, woned far by West:
For ought I wote, he was of Dartthmouth.

In 1190 it was the rallying-point for crusaders who followed the "Lion-heart" to Palestine; and suffered severely by the departure of that monarch overseas, for during his absence the French stormed and sacked the town. In 1338 the Dartmouth mariners had their revenge, for they captured five French vessels and put their crews to death; and then, nine years later, they fitted out "thirty-one shippes" to take part in Edward III.'s expedition against Calais. In 1377 the Frenchmen paid off these scores by taking and burning the town;

AN INSULT WIPED OUT

when, in 1403, a fleet of Dartmouth vessels sailed across the Channel, captured forty-one sail in the Seine, and returned laden with rich booty. But the crowning triumph came in the following year, when Du Chastel made another descent upon the Dart, and was ignominiously beaten off by the Devon sea-dogs, and their no less gallant wives, who helped, by hurling flints and missiles, to complete the rout, in which "three lords and twenty knights of note" were taken and sent up to London.

Thus ended the duel between Dartmouth and France, much to the glory and renown of the staunch little town. That it was well to the fore when Spain's Armada threatened England's liberties is only to be expected, and it right loyally supported good Queen Bess with men and ships and money. When Charles I. and the Commons fell out, it again saw hard fighting and the horrors of war for it was taken and retaken several times by the rival forces. It had also the questionable honor of giving the title Baron Dartmouth to one of Charles II.' sons, and, moreover, entertained that monarch for a week when he kept his court here in 1671.

There is a tradition that King John granted the privilege of "Mairalte" to Dartmouth; but the first charter extant is that of Edward III., dated 1341, which gives the town the right of self-government under a mayor and corporation on condition that it provided the king with two ships of one hundred and twenty tons whenever he needed them. One of the ancient rights of the place was that of coinage, and some of its halfpence are still in existence, having on one side the words, "A Dartmouth halfpenny," and on the other the town's arms, the figure of Edward III. standing in a ship supported by two lions.

The Dartmouth of to-day is a curious blending of old and new—its shops and older quarter cluster down by the water-side, where the hills bend back and its villas and newer part stretch along the wooded heights on each hand. Narrow streets, tortuous alleys, and steep stairways add to the picturesqueness of the whole, and remind one somewhat of the old town of Edinburgh.

The two most interesting bits are the "Butter Walk" and the church of St. Saviour's. The Butter Walk runs at right angles up from the quay-side, and though modern "improvements" have swept away most of its grandeur, it has yet a few of the fine old houses, with their richly-carved pillars, timbered gables and overhanging stories, in which once dwelt its merchant princes; and the royal arms in the black oak mantel-piece of one of them recalls the days when the Merry Monarch held his court here and walked up and down the piazza with his spaniels and fair ladies. But though these weathered fronts tell of the wealth and magnificence of their once owners, the interior of St. Saviour's Church speaks yet more eloquently of the piety and liberality of these old Dartmouth traders. Its noble rood-screen and gloriously sculptured stone pulpit, rich in colour and rare in workmanship, once seen will never be forgotten; and the carved seats, and the front of the west gallery emblazoned with the arms of many a noble Devonshire family, recall the worshippers of long ago, who are sleeping under the stones beneath, but whose spirits still lives in every deed of ENGLISH ENTERPRISE AND DARING.

To the memory of one of them—worthy of all reverence—stout John Hawley, a brass yet remains in the chancel floor, dated 1408, and represents him in armour, between his two wives. The lady on his right is holding his hand; whilst she on the left has hers folded in prayer. Was she a pious devotee? —or less loved than the other? or is it merely a variation of artistic treatment? The old knight was so famed for his vast and lucky ventures in even those days of bold enterprises, that there arose a local saying:

Blow the wind high, or blow it low,
It bloweth fair to Hawley's Hoe.

But though a merchant, he was no mere money-grubber; for when the Dartmouth men "manned forth a few ships at their own peril and charge," and captured a French fleet in its own waters, he was in command, and took his full share of the fighting. Nor was he a mere selfish trader; for when Richard II., out of admiration for his bold deed, asked him to choose the favour he should receive, he would have no personal honour, but some bounty for his native place. It was thus that Dartmouth obtained the royal "leopards" as supporters in its arms.

The south doorway of the church has a beautiful and curious design in metal-work representing the spreading branches of a tree, whereon we leopards or lions are mounted, with the figures 1631. The date is said to be of later work than the design, which some hold to have been wrought in celebration of the granting of the royal "supporters."

But the evening is drawing on apace, and the gig is waiting to take us back to the Corisande, and dinner. There she lies, our floating home, in mid-stream, with every spar and rope looking a veritable picture yacht for sunshine and smooth tides; and now the staunch cutter which, with canvas snugged down, has driven through tearing squalls and staggering seas.

MIRRORED IN THE STILL WATER,

Lounging upon the graceful counter, under the calm evening skies, listening to the tide swirling softly softly beneath, and watching the after-glow kiss the hill-tops around, we recall some of the famous men who are associated with the Dart: Newcomen, one of the fathers of the steam-engine; Flavel, the divin John Davis, the bold navigator; Sir Humphrey Gilbert, fearless adventurer and pious commander; and not least, Sir Walter Raleigh, dauntless soldier, intrepid seaman, courtly scholar, and gallant gentleman.

And we realise, too, the changes which time has brought, for round the point which saw the pinnaces and "carraks" and fighting ships of bygone days drop down with the tide to plunder the Frenchman and harry the Spaniard, there glides majestically one of the stately steamships of the Clan line on her way to the Cape with her peaceful company of colonists and emigrants. And yet even in the midst of this scene of peace and happiness, there drifts the shadow of death, for over yonder a dripping form has just been lifted into a boat, one of the ebbing stream:

O river of Dart, O river of Dart,
Every year thou claimest a heart.

Suddenly, a gun wakes the echoes of the hills, and from our truck and from scores of other taut masts burgees come fluttering down, for the Royal Dart Yacht Club has given "gunfire" to all the pleasure craft on its station; and the yachtsman's day is over, for nautical etiquette is punctilious in the extreme, and rigidly observed.

No Prayer To-night.

No prayer to night! No golden head
To lie in my lap with glittering light;
But a broken heart, and a sigh instead—
Ah me! ah me! no prayer to-night.

No lisping tongue, no dimpled hands,
To sing and strike in keen delight;
No hair to plait in glistening strands—
Ah me! ah me! no prayer to-night.

No prayer to-night—no bright eyes shine;
No cradled head to catch my sight;
No rosy lips pressed close to mine—
Ah me! ah me! no prayer to-night.

No trusting love; no pearly tears;
No smile: no laughter loud and bright;
No little voice to tell its fears—
Ah me! ah me! no prayer to-night.

No prayer to-night: an aching heart,
A life that is full of care and blight,
A life that has sorrow in every part—
Ah me! ah me! no prayer to night.

A Christmas Plea.

Christmas! Blessings on the word. Although my step is less elastic than it once was, and a heavy burden of life's cares are on my shoulders, at the very thought that Christmas is but a short time in the future, I feel myself growing young again.

Such associations as it revives! A child in a happy home; fond parents, loving sisters and brothers, all eager to contribute their share to make that happiest and most mysterious of all times one of joy.

Such expectations as Christmas brings! What can equal the eagerness, the impatience the unsatisfied joy that a child feels just before the presentation of his gifts? And is there any such unalloyed happiness on earth as that of the child as he holds in his hand a stocking, stuffed to the brim with unexplored riches? Such hilarity; such exclamations of joy and surprise as each gift, simple though it be, is taken out!

Yes, blessings on Christmas time; and blessings on those parents who have not permitted narrow dogmas and worldly desires and cares to cause them to forget the joys that Christmas brought to their childhood, and to ignore the childish hearts that are in their care.

It would seem that an appeal for Christmas, in behalf of the little folks, in this land of christendom and our high state of civilization, would be needless. I would have thought so, years ago. But contact with the world shows character in variety, and I have seen homes where a number of little hearts beat high in exultation as Christmas approached, only to meet with a disappointment which blackened their very lives, for the time being, as they witnessed the joy of other children of happier homes.

A few years ago I went to a man who was the head of a family, a Protestant church member, wealthy and learned. I asked for a donation for a public Christmas festivity for children. He replied that he did not believe in Christmas. That there was nothing really authentic that Christ was born on that day. That any other day of the year could be celebrated with equal propriety as his birthday.

"Well, laying aside that belief, then," I said, "you would like to see the little hearts made happy once a year, would you not? Christmas is truly the children's day, and is the brightest spot in a child's life. And every one should do something to add to their joy at this time."

"No," he said, "I consider the distribution of gifts and the festivities of Christmas as pure nonsense. It is just a waste of time and money. Children should be taught sometimes of the stern realities of life, instead of indulging in such frivolities."

I left that man with his hard, practical ideas. Just as though the little hearts would not soon enough taste of life's bitterness? His boyhood and all the feelings incident to youth were as entirely forgotten as though they had never been. The sordid things of life had closed his heart to the sweet influence of child nature, and he had lost all appreciation of the keen, joy-loving spirit that belongs to childhood.

I can point to another home, where are eight growing boys and girls. The house is large; between three and four hundred acres belong to the fine farm. A hundred head of cattle graze the pasture, a dozen horses are needed for the immense amount of work. The bank account grows every year, and abundance reigns everywhere. But, ah, pity and shame! In that household there is no joy and cheer. A stern, hard father, and a sedate mother, govern the house.

There is no time for anything but work and the accumulation of riches. While other houses around rejoice in gifts and a happy time, Christmas with them is only one of the other hard days of the year. The children witness the pleasures in other households, and gloomily and unhappily must submit to the close rigid rules of their parents.

Children's joy is perfectly infectious. They are so demonstrative and merry when they are happy, that the whole household feels the influence. I went to a child's show the other evening. In the room was a little ten year old boy, who had the merriest, most musical laugh I ever heard. At the occurrence of anything amusing, that child's laugh rang through the house, and the whole audience would join. It was perfectly irresistible.

It is just so in the home. Only make the children merry, and their joy will be diffused like sunshine.

I do not recommend extravagance, but I do urge parents, now that Christmas is so near, to open both heart and purse and give the little ones a happy season. You have no idea how it will brighten up your own life. You will really wonder if the years are going backward and you are growing young again. You will ask yourself, over and over again, where that headache and that touch of rheumatism, and those blue days are gone to. Such things will fly during the excitement and joy of Christmas festivities.

And then—"the poor ye have always with you." Wherever we are we will find unfortunate ones in life. Do not forget them. Our own pleasures will be all the sweeter to know that others are, too, rejoicing through our instrumentality.

An old fashioned Methodist revival is in progress at the jail in Cincinnati.

The Orient express train, running between Paris and Vienna, seldom has an applicant on Fridays for the thirteenth compartment of the ladies' Pullman sleeping car. The cars are always reserved beforehand, but the numbered tickets are only distributed at the last moment. In spite of this precaution, however, No. 13 of the ladies' tickets on that day of the week is almost invariably returned, and the train, although otherwise crowded, has to travel with one berth empty. Ladies have got so far that they will dare No. 13 alone or Friday alone, but the two together they cannot swallow.

Dueling still flourishes furiously in Continental Europe and the Hungarians appear to gather in the largest crops in the fields of honor. The biggest contract on record in this business was recently undertake in Pesth by Count Victor Orssitch. He challenged forty gentlemen and nobles to mortal combat because they criticised rather severely some statements of his made in a club room. One of his invited victims was Count Francois Esterhazy, a gentleman with no less than seventy duels and six dead men upon his conscience. He positively refused to be counted among the proposed cadavres, and gave no reason for the refusal. It is fair to suppose that he has retired from the field.

NUMBER OF PEOPLE SINCE ADAM.

A Great Many More Than Could Stand on the Earth at Once.

Did you ever make a calculation of the number of people that have inhabited this globe since the beginning of time, asks a writer. No doubt you will say that such calculations involve a loss of time and are, after all, barren of results, but as we are engaged in giving curious readings and odd calculations just take a few minutes' time and approximate, with a certain degree of accuracy, at least, the number of souls that have been ushered into and out of this sinful world since the time when it was not good for Adam to be alone. At the present time it is believed that there are 1,400,000,000 human beings on our globe; but let us suppose there has been but an average of 900,000,000 living at one time since the creation. To give room for any possible doubt as to the average length of life, we will put it down at 50 years. (It may have been longer than that during bible time); it has been much shorter, however, since.) With the average length of life reckoned as above we have had two generations of 900,000,000 each every century for the last 6,000 years. Taking this for granted we have had about 66,627,843,237,075,266 inhabitants on this globe since the beginning of time.

Admitting that there is a great deal of guess-work about this calculation and that it has been hastily and perhaps inaccurately done, it will be perceived, nevertheless, that our earth is a vast cemetery. On each rood of it 1,283 human beings have found a burial-place. A rood being scarcely sufficient for ten graves each grave must contain the remains of 129 persons. The whole surface of the globe, if all peoples bury within the earth as we do, has been dug over 120 times in order to get room for burial-places.

A LONG-TRIED SUIT.

Russian Justice Occupies Four Centuries on One Case.

A Russian paper notes the termination of a lawsuit begun in 1490, or four centuries ago. The litigation was over a forty-acre tract of uncultivated land, has been handed down through numberless generations, and curiously enough has been finally settled by peaceful arbitration. This protracted litigation, as well as the satisfactory manner of its termination, reminds us of the celebrated case described by Rabelais, in which Pantagruel acted as umpire. This classic lawsuit had lasted many years between two French nobles.

Innumerable law papers had been prepared on both sides, and all the courts had been gone through, with the result of utterly befogging and mystifying the claims of both parties. The umpire above mentioned being appealed to agreed to decide the matter provided that all the papers and documents should be burned up and the claimants then should plead their own cause personally before him. As, owing to the lapse of time, they had both forgotten altogether what was the origin of the controversy, their respective arguments were made up of blind and incoherent repetitions of such of the legal jargon as they could recollect from reading the documents drawn up by their lawyers.

Therefore, Pantagruel gave his decree in language equally unintelligible as the pleaders' statements. Both parties were fully content with the incomprehensible sentence he passed, neither of them seeing anything in it to make him think he had lost his cause. When this satire of Rabelais was published, somewhere about 1534, the Russian lawsuit had already been progressing over fifty years.

Father Christmas.

It is a question if the children who believe in Santa Claus are happier than those who know that loving human hands fill up their Christmas stockings. At all events, among little people whose hearts are in the right place, it is never the value of the gifts brought by the holy time, but the tenderness prompting them which ensures their grateful welcome. Says the celebrated author, George Sand, of her Christmas festival:

I have not forgotten the absolute belief I had in the descent down the chimney of Old Father Christmas, a good old man with a snowy beard, who, during the night, as the clock struck twelve, was to come and place in my little shoe a present, which I should find upon awaking.

Twelve o'clock at night! that mysterious hour unknown to children, and which is represented to them as the impossible limit to which they can keep awake. What incredible efforts did I not make to resist my tendency to sleep before the apperance of the little man!

I felt anxious yet afraid to see him; but I could never keep awake long enough, and the following morning my first anxiety was to go and examine my shoe in the fireplace.

What emotion did I not feel at sight of the white paper parcel! for Father Christmas was exceedingly clean in his ways, and never failed to wrap his offering carefully.

I used to jump out of bed, and run barefooted to seize my treasure. It was never a very magnificent affair, for we were not wealthy. It used to be a little cake, an orange, or simply a nice rosy apple; but nevertheless it seemed so precious to me that I scarcely dared eat it.

A GREAT SURGICAL FEAT.

A Delicate and Difficult Operation Successfully Performed.

BALTIMORE, Md., Dec. 10—The surgeons at the city hospital have performed an operation which is said to be one of the most remarkable in the annals of surgery. The patient is a German, John F Bersenbruch, and he is 14 years of age. His disease is due to the ova of a peculiar kind of worm which inhabits the dog and other animals. The ova finds its way into the stomach of man in drinking water, thence it is carried to the liver by the blood vessels. The egg is about 160th of an inch in diameter, and the parts which develop it are found in the water on the ground, and stick to the surface of vegetables, and thus it is possible in eating vegetables uncooked to take these ova into the body. The animal from these ova, however, is not developed in man. The eggs once in the stomach of man increase at an enormous rate. From the stomach they are absorbed by the blood vessels leading to the liver. Here the ova form cysts, or little bags, around themselves, like the caterpillar in its cocoon. When this cyst is taken into the stomach of the dog it develops into the full-grown hydatid, which is one quarter of an inch in length, with a head one-sixteenth of an inch furnished with numerous little hooks and suckers. Bersenbruch was a laborer at the Jesuit college at Woodstock, and had complained of a dull but severe pain in his right side since last spring. He had wasted away and lost nearly forty pounds of flesh. Pro. Bevan, who diagnosed the case, made an incision in the wall of the right side of the abdomen, just below the ribs, and about a gallon and a half of pus was taken from the man's liver. The method of removing the hydatid cysts is by means of draining the liver, which operation is very modern surgical art. The pain of the patient before the operation was intense, the tumor in his right side having distended his liver nearly fifteen inches. The great pain seemed to leave him shortly after the operation, and he now appears to be recovering from his terrible disease.

Isabella, the Vagabond Queen.

It is difficult to understand why the Spaniards, a proud, sensitive people, should have submitted so long to a ruler whom they could not respect; her good-hearted, happy-go-lucky nature seemed to cast a charm over them. Her total lack of reticence appealed to them; they could follow so easily all the workings of her mind, whether, with childish petulancy, she was reproaching her ministers with betraying her, or confessing with remorse she had wronged them. If her sins were open so was her repentance. Year by year, when Holy Week came round, this woman, who for the other 51 weeks had been outraging every law, human and divine, kneeled in church for the hour together, and, with loud sobs and groans, proclaimed her sorrow for the past, her resolution to make atonement in the future. Her subjects, seeing her sorrow, sorrowed too, and, when Easter Day arrived, were as convinced as she was that a new era in her life was at hand. The Maundy Thursday ceremony never failed to win for her hearty adherents. She washed the feet of the beggars with such manifest zeal; spoke to them such kindly, loving words; served them with food as if she thought it a privilege to do so, and, at the close of the feast, cleared the table with a dexterity that showed her heart was in her work. Her splendid robes—she always wore full court dress upon these occasions—seemed to enhance the touching humility of her attitude, and, although the free-thinking part of the community scoffed at what they called the popish mummery of the whole affair, that was not the feeling with which the bulk of the population regarded it. One year, while she was serving at table, a diamond fell from her head-dress on to the plate of one of the beggars. A dozen hands were stretched out to restore the jewel, but the Queen motioned to the man to keep it, remarking simply: "It has fallen to him by lot." Her generosity was unbounded; it is not her nature to say "no" to a beggar; while the one point upon which she made a firm stand against her Ministers was insisting upon her right to exercise mercy, and the hardest struggle she ever had with them was apropos of a pardon granted at the request of Ristori. A queen has many chances of doing little gracious acts, and Isabella never failed to seize each one as it came in her way; not, however, for the sake of winning popularity, but simply to follow the bent of her own nature, which, as she showed the other day, is still unchanged, for she of all Paris was the first to remember that Prado's victim needed help and comfort.—[Gentlemen's Magazine.

A trial has begun in Gallicia against sixty-five men for fleecing emigrants during ten years past. Among the accused were persons of all ranks, the first on the list being District Governor. The Gallician peasants are so simple that such a device as a little alarm clock served to telephone to the "Emperor of America," who was regularly asked whether he would accept a particular emigrant; and a favorable answer was always paid for highly.

African Slavery—International Conference at Brussels.

On Monday, civilization, as represented by fifteen Powers meeting in Brussels, will be girding its loins and gathering its whole strength to strike a death blow at the African slave trade, in the hope that the great century which has witnessed the introduction of railways, shall see the last of the odious traffic in human flesh.

Those who may view this attempt as a piece of maudlin sentimentalism, should remember that civilization was primarily, and remains solely, responsible for the terrible evil it means to uproot.

Enlightened Europe invented the barbarous African slave hunting three centuries ago, when it began colonizing North and South America, and felt the want of cheap labor, and sun hardened laborers to cultivate the soil of the New World and build up its great British, Portuguese and Spanish Republics. Europe even patented its invention.

Who can forget the time when the Spanish and Portuguese Governments chartered regular slave raiding companies, which undertook to provide annually 10,000 or 20,000 "tons of negro" (aye, that was the way they spoke) from the Guinea Coast; the time when the Portuguese Bishop of Angola, on the West Coast of Africa, stood upon the beach and gave the blessing of the Catholic Church to the slave laden and slave groaning vessels sailing out to the lands of forced labor?

Who can forget that hardly a century ago the great Liverpool and London merchants were still making a tremendous business in providing the United States with "Uncle Toms and Topsies"; that within the first decade of the present century Cuba received no fewer than 12,000 black wretches intended for the cultivation of its tobacco, and that, as recently as 1820, the Brazils likewise bought 50,000 unfortunate negroes, to capture which the human flesh hunters had been compelled to fight and kill about as many again?

And yet, as in the case of Lady Macbeth the perfumes of Arabia fail in "sweetening this little hand." In spite of ourselves, the slave raiding and slave owning crime which we invented is going on still throughout Central Africa and even spreading further. During three centuries, civilization caught the coast Africans to invade the interior of the Dark Continent and enslave their brethren for the purposes of civilization itself. Now that the coast Africans have lost our custom, they are practising that terrible sport and trade on their own account. The slave traffic has removed its markets from Christian to Mahomedan or heathen markets—that's the only change.

SLAVERY UP TO DATE. A MACBETHIAN STAIN.

Of course, all this is over now. Ever since 1794, when our consciences were aroused to shame by the splendid outburst of a great revolutionary and abolitionist Frenchman: —"Let our colonies perish rather than our principles of human freedom ('Que les colonies persissent plutot qu'un principe!') —ever since then the civilized world has been slowly endeavoring to cleanse the bloody slave stain from its hands, and the great American Secession War, followed by last year's final unfettering of the slavery bondage in the Empire of Brazil, have been the crowning incidents of this general white washing process.

The principal slave hunting ground stretches from west to east, from the Niger to the Blue Nile, right through the Soudan, over an expanse of something like 3,750 miles, very nearly connecting the Atlantic with the Indian Ocean, and extending southwards through the Niassi Main country, right down to the northern frontier of the Congo Free State. And even this portion of the picture doesn't say the whole truth. Since Mr. Wauters has drawn up his map, we have got from Stanley the terrible news that the Mahdists, coming down from Khartoum, have invaded and captured Emin's province, where the traffic was dying out, so that the salvery canker now again extends southwards, right down through the Unyoro and Uganda countries, to Witu, that portion of the East Coast where the English, under Mr. Mackenzie, and the Germans, under Captain Wissmann, are striving to establish European domination.

Then going backwards from the East Coast, there is a second wide slave hunting ground, which begins in the neighborhood of Stanley Falls on the Upper Congo, and expands through the Manyema country, Ujiji, and the borders of Lake Tanganyeka, right down to the northern bank of the Zambezi eastwards and to the Lounda country westwards, covering and far outspreading the whole central and southern portion of the Congo State territory, which Europe has allowed to King Leopold, but up to which the Belgian sovereign has not yet had either the time or the means to carry his flag and his civilizing efforts.

The wonder is, how can such immense tracts of country be so easily invaded, where are their unfortunate population taken to, and to what use can all this human flesh be put?

WHAT THE SLAVES ARE WANTED FOR.

The tracings of the slave convoy routes on Mr. Wauter's map will show that the coast Arabs who overrun the western portion of the great Soudanese hunting ground carry their booty through the immense Sahara wilderness, northwards to the Ouaddan, where the negroes are used for home consumption, as ivory carriers, domestics for the local Sultans, and so forth; to Morocco, where there are several slave markets concealed from the European Consuls, and to Tripoli, where a negro is used as currency as an equivalent to the American dollar, the English sovereign or the African beads or cloth. From the eastern portion of the central hunting ground, the caravans of weeping, bleeding, heart-broken black martyrs are dragged and whipped towards Nubia, Berber, Khartoum, the Mahdi's dominions, the males for domestic purposes, the females to satisfy the lust of the polygamous chieftains of Darfour and Kordofan, or else shipped across the Red Sea to Persia, Arabia, and the Turkish Sultan's Asiatic provinces.

A peculiarity of this Eastern trade is that many of the male slaves captured for the purpose have been expressly and horribly mutilated either in early youth or as the very time of shipment, in order that they may be fitted to play the part of eunuchs in Oriental seraglios and harems. Until about seventy or eighty years back black slaves were almost unknown in the Turkish Empire.

The largest number of servants were of the type of poor witty hunchbacked Æsopus, drawn from Greece, Cyprus, or other Eastern Mediterranean islands. But civilization having conquered and closed these sources of supply, the Turk then resorts to the new slave hunting grounds opened up in Africa by civilization itself, and—this is a fact not very widely known—not only do the Sultan's subjects consume thousands of negroes as house and harem servants or janissaries, but also hundreds of them as future Mussulman missionaries, who are taught the Koran, converted to the Moslem faith, and then sent back to Africa to spread it throughout the pagan people of the Dark Continent, so that Christendom, while opening up that portion of the world to the Turkish slave commerce, has at the very same time been fostering a regular crusade against its own religious creed and increasing tenfold the difficulty of educating the blacks into the religion of the civilized West.

As to the "tons" of "slaveryware" kidnapped in the second great hunting ground comprised between the Upper Congo, the Lounda country, and the northern bank of the Zambezi, it supplies the neighboring chieftains with domestic slaves or with martyrs to be massacred on the altars of the pagan gods in the religious ceremonies of heathenism, while a portion of the captured wretches are also shipped southwards to Madagascar, the Comores and other large islands of the Indian Ocean.

It was in the upper part of this district that Dr. Nachtigal, the German explorer, witnessed terrible slaughter hardly three years ago, and shed tears of admiration and grief at the sight of mothers strangling their own children or throwing them amidst the flames of the burning huts, in order that they should not live to know the horrors of bondage. And it was in the lower portion of this district that as recently as last June some Scotch missionaries living in the Nyassa-Tanganika plateau witnessed similar scenes, and afterwards discovered that the attacking Arabs were nearly all armed with rifles of English manufacture, stamped "Tower," showing that civilization is not only guilty of having taught the Arabs their first lessons in slave raiding, but has also provided, and is still providing them with the weapons wherewith to carry on their horrible negro chases.

HOW THE CONFERENCE WILL BE COMPOSED.

Such, according to the most recent eye-witnesses and authorities your correspondent has consulted and to the last documents, published or unpublished, is the present condition of the black flesh traffic which in Livingstones time made half a million victims annually, and now, according to Cardinal Lavigerie, makes two million victims—a figure which may have been exaggerated some months ago, but which, thanks to the capture of Emin's province, will soon be below the truth if the "African curse" be not quickly put a stop to.

And now the civilized nations are going to put all their heads together to stamp out the hideous evil, not only from sentiment and because they feel their moral responsibility concerning a plague of their own creation, but also from self interest, because, at the time when the overcrowded Old World is seeking to get out of its social troubles by preparing African outlets for its commerce and its surplus population, it is confronted and arrested on every side by its pupils the slave traders and slave hunters, who likewise wish to shut out Germany from the Zanzibar coast, England from the Somali coast, the Belgians from the Upper Congo, and light and progress from every point of the Dark Continent. And this is what has prompted Belgium, at the suggestion of Lord Salisbury, to convene a great Anti Slavery Congress which is now in session in the Conference Hall of the Foreign Office, in Brussels.

HOW THE AFRICAN CURSE IS TO BE REMOVED.

What anti slavery measures will be proposed neither President Carnot, Lord Salisbury, the King of the Belgians nor Prince Bismarck could probably say exactly themselves at the present moment seeing that no previous agreement has been come to, that each one is in the dark as to the other one's plans, and that the delegates will probably have to telegraph daily to their respective Governments for fresh instructions while the Conference is proceeding.

But several suggestions are already in the air which are likely to be brought forward. One of them is to render general the system carried out last summer by England and Germany on the East Coast—i. e., a blockade of the whole African seaboard, from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic, from the Red Sea to the Indian Ocean. Each country's men-of-war would be empowered with the right of searching trading vessels for slaves, under whatever flag they may be coursing; and as a corollary to this, an International Court, composed of the Consuls, would sit, try and severely sentence all slave parties caught red hot handed.

Another idea, which will probably be mooted by the Portuguese, will be that civilization should summarily close all the slave markets of Morocco, Tripoli, the Eastern countries and Africa itself, by armed force, if required, and at whatever cost of money and blood the enforcement of this measure might cost.

Other delegates will suggest that all States possessing territories in Africa should be compelled to levy small flying armies and create watch stations, in order to keep the slave raiders in check or to give them chase, while all regularly constituted States, such as Turkey, Morocco, Tripoli, Madagascar, where domestic slavery has become a national necessity and has created vested rights, should be constrained to proclaim that "anyone desiring to be free, is free, and only such slaves remain slaves as wish to."

Then, again, there is a talk of proposing to institute a large international State fund for the creation of narrow gauge African railways and steamboats, which would naturally become substitutes for negroes as regards the carriage of ivory and other goods, and at the same time hasten the spread of education. And of course the importation of firearms may be prohibited, and also a heavy duty on the maddening spirit trade, which renders the negroes such an easy prey to the slave raiders.

Some of those ideas sound as though they came from the land of Utopia; others are sure to create great differences, and yet something may come of them, Lady Macbeth being so anxious to rid herself of the bad smelling stain.

Prayers may go begging for an answer but "What'll you have?" never does.

It is quite natural that the man who steps on a tack should be hopping mad.

A Kansas Sunday paper devotes a column editorial to "Morality in Chicago." It might have started off like the Irishman's essay on snakes in Ireland, "There are no snakes in Ireland."

HOGS WANTED.

Farmers, hurry on your store hogs and fatten them for the market from January to June. We have determined to abandon the packing of dressed hogs in order to make the packing of hogs a business throughout the year. We shall endeavor to buy, at whatever the price is, enough live hogs during these months to run our packing house. As this business is being neglected during the late winter and spring months, we think those who have hogs suitable for our requirements will reap a big benefit. We want hogs not less than 140 lbs, and not over 220 lbs., and will give a handsome price for the same. Recollect we shall not buy a dressed hog this winter, whereas we packed 15,000 dressed hogs after Jan. 1, last winter.

DR LOW'S WORM SYRUP

DESTROYS AND REMOVES WORMS OF ALL KINDS IN CHILDREN OR ADULTS SWEET AS SYRUP AND CANNOT HARM THE MOST DELICATE CHILD

MANY A LIFE

HAS been saved by the prompt use of Ayer's Pills. Travelers by land or sea are liable to constipation or other derangements of the stomach and bowels which, if neglected, lead to serious and often fatal consequences. The most sure means of correcting these evils is the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills. The prudent sailing-master would as soon go to sea without his chronometer as without a supply of these Pills. Though prompt and energetic in operation, Ayer's Pills leave no ill effects; they are purely vegetable and sugar-coated; the safest medicine for old and young, at home or abroad.

"For eight years I was afflicted with constipation, which at last became so bad that the doctors could do no more for me. Then I began to take Ayer's Pills, and soon the bowels recovered their natural and regular action, so that now I am in health."—Mrs. C. E. Clark, Tewksbury, Massachusetts.

"I regard Ayer's Pills as one of the most reliable general remedies of our times. They have been in use in my family for affections requiring a purgative, and have given unvarying satisfaction. We have found them an excellent remedy for colds and light fevers."—W. R. Woodson, Fort Worth, Texas.

"For several years I have relied more upon Ayer's Pills than upon anything else in the medicine chest, to regulate my bowels and those of the ship's crew. These Pills are not severe in their action, but do their work thoroughly. I have used them with good effect for the cure of rheumatism, kidney troubles, and dyspepsia."—Capt. Mueller, Steamship Felicia, New York City.

"I have found Ayer's Cathartic Pills to be a better family medicine for common use than any other pills within my knowledge. They are not only very effective, but safe and pleasant to take—qualities which must make them valued by the public."—Jules Hauel, Perfumer, Philadelphia, Pa.
