FIGHTS WITH PIRATES.

Cleaning Out a Couple of Big Free-booting Gangs That Infested the Chinese Seas.

From the year 1852 to 1854 the Chinese sea, from Shanghai in the north to Singapore in the south, was infested with pirate craft, says a writer in the New York Sun. As for that matter, the sea had been the cruising-ground of pirates for a score of years previously, but I mention these two years for particular reasons. One was that I was engaged in a vigorous warfare against them, and the other that the close of 1854 witnessed the death of the leading spirits and broke up piracy as a trade.

In those far-back days comparatively nothing was known of China outside of a few seaports. Treaties were of little account, consuls were few and far between. Every merchant ship was expected to defend herself and the captain of every man-of-war had authority to bombard any town which refused to renew his water and provisions. All nations were trading with China, but aside from a few seaports all China hated all other people. At the docks at Hong Kong I could drink tea with the Chinese merchants. Half a mile away the people would have cut me to pieces. While the country wanted to sell its products it hated the men who bought them. While it wanted the goods of other countries it despised the makers and shippers. There is no doubt that the Chinese government tacitly encouraged piracy and, could the great mass of the population have had its say, not a single foreigner would have ever been allowed on land on the coast.

In the year '54 there was an association at Canton called "The Foreign Traders." It was composed of Americans, Englishmen, Germans, Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Russians, and numbered over sixty representatives. The capital represented amounted to millions, and the object was threefold. We had more power with the Chinese government than any foreign minister. We had rules and regulations regarding the tea trade. We could carry a point by protests and threats. Every pound of tea from a district five hundred miles square had to pass through our hands. We filed many protests against the pirates and the laxity of the government in hunting them down, and were finally officially informed that we were at liberty to take any steps we deemed best in the matter. That meant we could fit out a craft and go for the rascals right and left handed. We had been anticipating this, and had a craft ready at Hong Kong. She was an American schooner of excellent model and large spread of sail, and we knew that she could outsail anything, native or foreign, we had ever seen in those waters. We armed her with a long tom and four 24 pounders, having bought the salvage of a French man-of-war. Then we picked up a crew of fifty men—all foreigners and sailors—and when we went out of Hong Kong we were prepared to give the pirates Hail Columbia. I was nurser of the schooner, which was called the Revenge, and her captain was an Englishman named Wetherbee, who had served as a commissioned officer in the regular service. The first lieutenant was an American, and the other officers were divided up among the other nationalities. We flew the association flag, and, while we had liberty to go for pirates, we were warned that any mistakes would be made to cost us dearly.

The two boss pirates of that date were Shung-Wong and Chin-Lung. The first had a fleet of seven or eight craft, and haunted the sea from Spingapore north to the Tong-Kin islands. The second cruised from thence as far north as Shanghai, having his headquarters at Formosa island. He was reported to have a fleet of nine craft. That both were monsters we had a hundred proofs, and that both had grown rich and powerful it was easy to show by the long list of missing vessels hanging in the headquarters office. While we had kept our movements as secret as possible, we had no doubt that government officials had given us away, and that the pirates would be on the watch for us. To deceive them as far as possible, we ran to the south for three days, and spoke and reported to four ships bound for Canton. Then we ran toward the Philippine islands until we had a good offing, when we headed up for Formosa to get acquainted with old Chin-Lung.

During the next three days we did not sight a sail of any sort. Then early one morning we fell in with a lot of wreckage which showed us that a trader had been overhauled and burned. We were now to the east of Formosa, and fifty miles off the coast. Men were set to work to give the schooner the appearance of a vessel in distress, and under a light breeze we made slow headway towards the island. It was about 4 o'clock in the afternoon before anything approached us, although we saw a number of native craft at a distance. Then a small junk came out from a bay about five miles off and headed directly for us. Everything aboard of us seemed to be at sixes and sevens. A man was lashed to the mainmast, to represent the captain, everything aloft was askew, and the seven or eight men on deck were seemingly drunk and having a high old time. We had a man aloft to play a part, knowing that he would be hailed in English. Both of the boss pirates had Americans and Englishmen with them—rascals who had deserted their ships and voluntarily adopted the life of a pirate—and one of them was always put forward to hail a ship. The junk came steadily forward to within hailing distance before she came up into the wind. This was proof, whether she was honest or not, that our appearance had deceived her. The men on deck yelled and shook their fists as drunken men might do, but at the first opportunity a voice hailed us.

"Schooner ahoy! What schooner is that?"

"The Revenge, Capt. Thatcher, bound to Shanghai," answered the man aloft.

"What's the matter aboard?"

"Crew in a state of mutiny for the last three days. They have lashed the captain to the mast and driven me aloft."

"What's your cargo?"

"General merchandise?"

"Any arms aboard?"

"Only a few muskets."

There were a dozen men aboard the junk, but they dared not attempt to board. They chattered away among themselves for a while, and then the spokesman called out:

"Very well, we will bring you help."

With that the junk headed back for the bay, accompanied by the yells and curses of the apparently drunken crew. We had a native aboard called Shin Lee. He had been in headquarters office for several years, and could be depended upon. He gave it as his opinion that the junk was a spy boat sent out by the piriates, who never attacked a vessel by daylight without taking all due precautions. He said we would see the pirate fleet come out in case no sail appeared on the horizon, and his words were speedily verified. We had been gradually edging in shore, and were not over five miles from the land, when we caught sight of five junks coming out after us. There was a good working breeze, and now, as was only natural, we began to claw on. By seeming to want to get away very badly, but by carefully manipulating the helm, we were seven miles off the land before the fleet reached us. We were satisfied of their intentions long enough before. It was not to help a vessel in distress, but to take advantage of one almost helpless.

The junks kept pretty well together, and when within rifleshot each one raised Chin-Lung's flag and uttered a cheer. Each had a couple of howitzers, with which they opened fire upon the schooner, but no harm had been done when we were ready to spring the trap. At the word of command every man was on deck, the gun crews jumped to their stations, and things aloft were ship shape in a moment. Then we were round to get between the pirates and the bay and opened fire. A Chinese junk is a mere shell. One solid shot went through them as if they had been paper. The poor devils were unnerved as soon as they saw the trap into which they had fallen, and devoted all their energies to getting away. We could outsail any of the junks, but it was quick work with four of them. They were sent to the bottom one after another, and as we came up with the fifth we ran her down. Our stem struck her full on the starboard broadside and cut her almost in two. She had at least thirty men aboard, and there was one long, despairing shriek as they went down to watery graves. A few came up to clutch at the wreckage and beg to be taken aboard, but not one of them would the captain lend a hand to. Such as the sharks did not get hold of drifted out to sea with the tide. It was a fearful retribution, but these men were monsters. Inside of thirty minutes from the time we opened fire the fleet was at the bottom and at least a hundred pirates had paid the penalty of their crimes.

Our captain was lamenting the fact that he had not picked up one or two in order to secure information, when there was a row forward, and it was announced that a pirate had been found hanging to the chains. When brought aft he was ready to do anything to save his life. His name was Mung-Hang, and he had good cause to believe that we would reverse it. He was the captain of the junk we had run down, and was ready to tell us all about old Chin-Lung. The bay was his rendezvous, but his plunder was hidden on the coast near Foo Chow. There were barracks for men up the bay, and thirty or forty men there at that moment. They had captured a French brig several days before, and she was then at anchor in the bay wating for Chin-Lung's return, who was then up among Lioo Kiog islands with four junks to capture a large ship which had drifted into shoal water, but was not abandoned. If we would spare his life he would pilot us anywhere and prove his gratitude in any way. Shin Lee took him in hand for a few minutes and then announced that we could depend upon him. We ran into the bay, brought up alongside the brig, and sent forty men ashore to clean out the place. Not a pirate was to be seen, all having bolted for the woods. Everything which would burn was set on fire, and a prize crew was put aboard the brig to navigate her to Hong Kong. She reached the port safely and our salvage money went far to reimburse the company for its outlay.

When we sailed out of the bay it was to look for the boss pirate. He was nearer than we thought for. At 8 o'clock next morning we saw his fleet dead ahead, on its way back to Formosa empty handed, and by 10 we had the junks under fire. These were a braver lot of men. Knowing that they could not outsail us, and seeming to suspect that we were an enemy, they closed right in for a fight. It did not last long, however. We had one man killed by the fall of a block from aloft and three or four wounded by the bullets from their ancient fire-arms, and in return not a man of them escaped. In less than an hour's fighting altogether we sent nine junks and two hundred men to destruction. Batchery, was it? Well, call it so; but remember that in the previous twelve months the fleet of this old pirate had captured no less than ten foreign craft and six traders, and that every man, woman, and child aboard had been murdered. There was no sentiment about Chin-Lung. He thought of nothing but blood and plunder, and he would cut a child's throat with a smile on his face.

We were now ready to sail in search of Shung-Wong, who had less power, but was just as great a villain. These two leaders had divided up the territory and compelled all lesser pirates to join them and come under their control. So, then, we had only two men to strike at to down the whole lot. At the close of the third day, after hauling for the south, we came upon the track of the piratical fleet. A trader in woods and dye-stuffs had been overhauled about a hundred miles north of the northern group of Philippines, called the Little Philippines. The crew consisted of three men and a boy, and the vessel had only part of a cargo. Shung Wong had boarded her himself, and although the crew were native Chinese, he could not restrain his bloody hand. He demanded a sum equal to $300 in American money. There was only about $20 aboard, and he personally cut the captain's throat, had the others flogged, and went on his way to the bay of Luzon, which is on the west side of the island of that name. We spoke the trader, and received from her terrified crew the incidents above narrated, and then shaped our course for the bay. As luck would have it, an American ship called the Joseph Taylor was ahead of us, and as she passed down the coast was attacked by the fleet about seven miles off shore. We heard the rumpus about an hour before daylight. There was little breeze, and though greatly outnumbered, the crew of the Taylor beat the pirates off. At daylight the wind freshened, and we slid in between the junks and the shore just as they were preparing for a second attack. We were no sooner within range than we opened on them, and, seeing escape cut off, the fellows tried hard to lay us aboard. In thirty minutes from the opening of the fight we had run or sunk or run down every junk and disposed of every pirate, and only had four men wounded in doing it.

Our work had been done so promptly and well that it struck terror to the hearts of all evildoers in those seas, and it was several years before another act of piracy was committed. The Chinese government returned its thanks to the association, ship-owners sent in contributions of money to express their gratitude, and when we came to sell the schooner to the Chinese government as a cruiser, the company was financially ahead. It was probably the briefest cruise and attended with the greatest results recorded of an armed vessel.—[Chicago Mail.

Towed by a Whale.

The Cape Breton Advertiser says:—A letter has been received from the steward of the schooner H. B. Griffin, Captain George Nelson, now absent on the Banks, in which it is stated that they have met with an unusual experience, viz., that of being towed by a whale. The captain and steward were on board as usual, looking after the vessel and keeping an eye on the dories, when all at once they felt a sudden jerk, and saw the vessel was going through the water at a rapid rate and no motive power visible. It takes considerable to startle a fisherman, but this was something so uncommon, a vessel dashing through the water at a rapid rate with her sails furled and anchor down, that they began to look alarmed. Suddenly the cause made itself manifest, when a monstrous whale arose to the surface, with the anchor fast either in his jaw or blow hole. He tore through the water at a high pressure rate, and was fast taking the craft out of sight of the dories, thus leaving the crews exposed; and besides this, there was danger of the vessel being towed under. The only remedy was to cut the cable. This was done, and his whaleship went off with the anchor in tow. The jib and foresail were hoisted, and the vessel was soon engaged in picking up her dories, and on the way to Newfoundland, where a new anchor and cable were secured. There are but two other similar cases of which we have any record, which we have found in the files of our paper, viz.:—Schooner C. H. Price was towed a day and a half by a whale in 1873, when the fluke of the anchor broke and she was released. Then, again, on the 16th of Dec., 1874, while the schooner Sultana, Captain Peterson, was at anchor on the Grand Bank, a sudden motion was felt, and soon the vessel was speeding through the water at a twelve knot speed. The captain, not wishing to lose sight of the dorymen, cut the cable after he had been towed some distance, otherwise he thought he might have captured the monster. There was a companion whale which swam with the one who had the anchor, and he was evidently astonished at the predicament of his mate.

I pray you, O excellent wife! cumber not yourself and me to get a curiously rich dinner for this man and woman who have just slighted at our gate, nor a bed-chamber made ready at too great a cost: these things, if they are desirous of them, they can get for a few shillings at any village inn; but rather let that stranger see, if he will, in your looks, acents and behavior, your heart and earnestness, your thought and will, that which he cannot buy at any price in any city, and which he may travel miles and dine sparely and sleep hardly to behold. Let not the emphasis of hospitality lie in bed and board; but let truth and love, and honnor and courtesy, flow in all your deeds.

AGRICULTURAL.

THE RIPENING OF CREAM.

At the late (Winter) meeting of the New York Dairymen's Association, Prof. L. B. Arnold pronounced the proper ripening of cream as essential to the making of perfect butter. In explaining the two kinds of changes which go on in cream when ripening, and which are induced by two distinct causes, the change most readily noted is the development of acidity, which is the result of fermentation pure and simple, and is brought about by the growth of organic germs whenever the cream is warm enough to allow them to sprout and grow. The only direct effect of the fermentation is to change the milk sugar in the cream into an acid. The acid, when formed, coagulates the albuminous matters in the cream, separating them into a solid curd and serum. This facilitates churning, but has no effect whatever upon the fatty parts of the cream until the acid becomes strong enough to begin to eat the butter flavor, which is thereby reduced, to the injury of the butter.

It is generally supposed that souring developes butter flavor. No greater mistake could be made. It has no influence upon flavor at all until it becomes strong enough to commence injuring it. Butter flavor is increased while the cream is ripening, but it is effected by the action of the air upon the fat in the cream, and not at all by fermentation.

If a sample of sweet cream is divided, and both parts are kept at a favorable temperature for ripening, and the air is excluded from one and a free exposure given to the other, both will sour at the same time, but flavor will only be increased in the one exposed to the air. Churning in two parts will show this.

The free oxygen of the air under favorable conditions oxidizes at least some portion of the milk fats, with the result of developing butter flavor. Oxidation is most effective while the cream is sweet and at the churning temperature, or about 60 degrees. What is wanted, therefore, for highest flavor, is to give the sweet cream the longest and fullest exposure to the air at a proper temperature.

Those butter-makers who add sour milk or buttermilk to hasten the souring cannot have butter which reaches the highest perfection in flavor. The sooner the minds of dairymen are disabused of the idea that the ripening of cream and the development of high flavor in butter lie only in the souring of the cream, the better it will be. The importance of atmospheric influence in the ripening of the cream must be recognized by those who wish to produce the finest quality of butter.

The most advanced butter-makers maintain the perfect exclusion of the low cooled milk and cream from the air. Whenever warm air or air comparatively warm comes in contact with colder milk or cream or water, or any other liquid, the warm air, touching the cooled liquid, is condensed, and deposits moisture in the form of dew on the surface of the cold liquid. With the dew thus deposited go all the impurities the air may contain. In the case of milk and cream, these deposits impair, in a marked degree, the flavor and keeping quality of the butter made from them. It is not essential that air should be excluded from milk until its temperature falls to the temperature of the surrounding air, but when it drops to that point, exclusion from air is important.

Churning should be done at the first appearance of acidity. Do not wait until the cream gets intensely sour and stale. In churning, the butter should be granulated in the churn, instead of being gathered into a lump. It should be cleansed of buttermilk by washing and not by working. After lightly salting, it must be worked into a solid condition with the slightest working that will effect that end.

TEST OF A JERSEY COW.

A. D. Baker, in an interesting letter to the "Country Gentleman," says:—As I have become quite interested in Jersey cattle, I will report a test I have been making with Jus of Springbrook, No. 36776. She came in the 25th of April, and the last of May I tested her for seven milkings. She made 9 lbs. of unsalted butter. Her feed was grass and 4 quarts of corn, oats and bran, equal parts, in two feeds night and morning. I tested her again, commencing June 21, for seven milkings. She made 7¾ lbs. of unsalted butter, and it was drained dry. She had no grain since June 8th. I think without grain is the true test of the butter capacity of a cow. In her last test I forgot to mention she gave 110 lbs. of milk. The weather was excessively hot, so much so that the cows ate but little in the day time. I think she could be forced up to 25 or 30 lbs. per week, but I do not wish to do it, for she is a good breeder, having had all heifer calves.

I think the Jersey breeders should have a standard registry the same as the trotting horse has, and let the standard start at 14 lb. without grain. Then when one wished to purchase a good cow they would know where to find it. I think of coupling Jus with one of Exile's sons, and if she continues to have heifer calves I will soon have a herd of cows worth caring for. I wish that breeders would test their cows and report through your valuable paper.

PRESERVATION OF EGGS.

At the London Dairy and at the Birmingham Fat Stock Show, during the last two years, prizes have been offered for the best preserved eggs, says an exchange. These, as well as many private tests, have shown that the lime water system is, all things considered, the best. A pound of lime should be stirred with a gallon of water, and the eggs, perfectly fresh, immersed therein in barrels or jars. This excludes air and any germs that might cause mildew or mould, and prevents evaporation, so that the contents of the egg are not reduced in bulk. It is important to have a considerable excess of lime to replace any that may become carbonated. The vessels containing the eggs should be kept in a cool, well ventilated place.

A very successful variation in the process consists in imbedding new-laid eggs, warm from the nest, in a thick paste of lime and water. Eggs thus prepared, for six months could hardly be distinguished from those newly laid. The contents of eggs evaporate rather rapidly through the shell; and the object of the preserver must be to prevent this evaporation, and at the same time to allow for the expansion and contraction of the natural air-space in the egg, due to changes of temperature. The plan of coating the shells with wax or melted paraffine fails in the latter particular. Strong brine fails because the contents of eggs preserved in it become much reduced in bulk.—[American Stockman.

Have you Neuralgia!

If you are suffering the agonies of neuralgia, and have failed to get a remedy that will afford relief, we want you to try Polson's Nerviline. No remedy in the market has given any thing like the same degree of satisfaction. The Czar's Heir.

When the Czar Alexander II. was killed in 1881 by the explosion of a Nihilist's bomb, his son, who became Alexander III., was thirty-six years old. The new Emperor's eldest son, who became the Czarewitch or Crown Prince, was then a boy of not quite thirteen years old. Born on the 18th of May, 1868, the Czarewitch, whose name is Nicholas, has now completed his twentieth year, and the Russian people, always interested in the personality of their rulers, are taking note what sort of man their future autocrat has become.

He is, by all accounts, a different man in appearance and in many points of character from all his ancestors who have reigned in this century.

The young prince's father, Alexander III., is a man of large stature, with heavy features, a shaggy beard and almost a fierce expression of countenance. His grandfather, Alexander II, the victim of the Nihilist's terrible crime, was also a tall man, though his face was of a gentler and milder type than that of Alexander III.

Young Nicholas's great-grandfather, the Czar Nicholas, who died during the Crimean War, in 1855, was the tallest and handsomest sovereign in all Europe.

The young Czarewitch Nicholas is not tall, but he has a very agreeable face; he resembles the family of his mother, Marie Dagmar of Denmark. His eyes are very bright and piercing.

His mother's family, the royal family of Denmark, is noted for intelligence and personal tact, and the Czarewitch seems to have inherited these qualities. His natural brightness has been developed by laborious studies under eminent teachers. He speaks and writes perfectly, besides Russian, the English, French, German and Danish languages.

The Czarewitch has not travelled much. He lately represented his father the Czar at the funeral of the Emperor William of Germany, and this was accounted in Russia his "entrance into the world."

If the young Prince lives to succeed his father, he will ascend the throne of Russia under the title Nicholas II. As his father is now but forty-three years old, his succession may be long deferred, if the present Emperor goes to his grave in peace.

RULES FOR USING BOOKS.

The following embrace the substance of rules for the care and handling of books which are now quite extensively used, especially for circulating libraries :—

Never touch a book with damp or soiled hands.

Never pull a book from a shelf by the binding at the top, but by the back.

Never open a book farther than to bring both sides of the cover into the same plane.

Always place a large book upon a table before opening it.

Always open a large book from the middle, and never from the ends or cover.

Never hold a small book with the thumb pressed into the binding at the lower back, but hold it with the thumb and little finger upon the leaves, and three fingers upon the back.

Never hold a book near a fire.

Never drop a book upon the floor.

Never lean or rest upon an open book.

Never place another book or anything else upon the leaves of an open book.

Always keep your place with a thin bookmark.

Never close a book with a pencil, a pad of paper, or anything else between the leaves.

Never rub dust from books, but brush it off with a soft, dry cloth or duster.

Never touch a book with a damp cloth, nor with a sponge in any form.

Never attempt to dry a book accidentally wet by a fire, but wipe off the moisture with a soft, dry cloth.

Always keep any neatly bound borrowed book covered with paper while in your possession.

To avoid injuring the leaves of books never put a pencil mark in a library book.

Never turn down the corners of leaves.

Never cut the leaves of a book or magazine with a sharp knife, as the edge is sure to run into the print, nor with the finger, but with a paper cutter or ordinary table knife.

Never turn leaves with the thumb.

Always turn leaves from the top with the middle or forefinger.

Never write upon paper laid upon the leaves of an open book, as the pencil or pen point will either scratch or cut the book leaves.

Always keep your books out of the reach of small children, and in a clean, dry place.

Never lend a borrowed book, but return it as soon as you are through with it, so that the owner may not be deprived of its use.

Volcanic Eruption.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Aug. 18.—The steamer City of Sydney, which arrived last evening from Hong Kong and Yokohama, brings Japanese journals containing particulars of a volcanic eruption of Bandai-San. On the morning of the 15th ult, the smaller Bandai-San trembled and roared violently. Almost immediately afterwards ashes began to fall and the sky suddenly grew dark, and the rumbling sounds continued, accompanied by violent earthquake and flare of dazzling flame. The crest of the smaller Bandai-San appeared to be lifted bodily upwards and then to fall again with a tremendnous noise. Then followed showers of red mud, mingled with large stones. Above the mud fell a few inches of ashes. In the five villages of Iwase, Yosan, Wakamiya, Misato, and Hibara, the greater part of the houses were buried to a depth of from seven to twenty feet. The state of the bodies recovered is terrible. It is scarcely possible to distinguish between men and women. A few corpses were found suspended in the branches of trees, which had caught them as they fell. Up to the 17th the number of bodies recovered was 476. It is believed that 81 are still entombed. The wounded number 41. Eighty-seven houses were distroyed.

Sour Power.

Mr. Preece, in a recent lecture before the Royal Institution of Great Britain, stated that on a fine summer's day the sun expends an average of 1 horse-power on every 30 square feet of the earth's surface in this latitude or 1450 horse power per acre. This great gift of energy is neither utilised nor stored by man at present, though Nature presents us with some of it in waterfalls and flowing streams. The sun itself has been more generous. Ages upon ages ago it shone with resplendent glory on a grand luxuriant flora of a uniform but flowerless character in a climate warm and damp. England formed part of a tropical jungle or swamp, where grasses, mosses, ferns, and sedges, Coniferæ, Araucariæ, Equisetaceæ, Sigillariæ grew and flourished, perished and fell in situ, to be covered up by the following geological formations and compressed into those grand seams of coal that form now the principal source of England's greatness and wealth.

"How does the new girl strike you?" asked a citizen at dinner lately. "She hasn't struck me yet," answered his wife, meekly. "But she has done almost everything else."

News from the Skeena river relates that the troubles there are not so bad as it was feared they would be. The constable who shot the Indian is to be tried for manslaughter, and as a result the hostiles are said to be satisfied. While this information is brought down by a trader, the special constables are working their way up the river and "C" Battery is encamped at Fort Simpson awaiting orders to proceed. It is to be hoped that the affair may prove nothing but a scare. When over, it will be well for the Government to relieve the Indians of any grievance they may be labouring under.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XVIII.—COMPLICATIONS.

Elsie spent a full fortnight or even more, at Lowestoft; and before she vacated her hospitable quarters in the Relfs' rooms, it was quite understood between them all that she was to follow out the simple plan of action so hastily sketched by Edie to Warren. Elsie's one desire now was to escape observation. Eyes seemed to peer at her from every corner. She wanted to fly for ever from Hugh—from that Hugh who had at last so unconsciously revealed to her the inmost depths of his own abject and self-centred nature; and she wanted to be saved the hideous necessity for explaining to others what only the three Relfs at present knew—the way she had come to leave Whitestrand. Hungering for sympathy, as women will hunger in a great sorrow, she had opened to Edie, bit by bit, the floodgates of her grief, and told piecemeal the whole of her painful and pitiable story. In her own mind, Elsie was free from the reproach of an attempt at self-murder; and Edie and Mrs Relf accepted in good faith the poor heart-broken girl's account of her adventure; but she could never hope that the outer world could be induced to believe in her asserted innocence. She dreaded the nods and hints and suspicions and innuendoes of our bitter society; she shrank from exposing herself to its sneers or its sympathy, each almost equally distasteful to her delicate nature. She was threatened with the pillory of a newspaper paragraph. Hugh Massinger's lie afforded her now an easy chance of escape. She accepted it willingly, without afterthought. All she wanted in her trouble was to hide her poor head where none would find it; and Edie Relf's plan enabled her to do this in the surest and safest possible manner.

Besides, she didn't wish to make Winifred unhappy. Winifred loved her cousin Hugh. She saw that now; she recognised it distinctly. She wondered she hadn't seen it plainly long before, Winifred had often been so full of Hugh; had asked so many questions had seemed so deeply interested in all that concerned him. And Hugh had offered his heart to Winifred—be the same more or less, he had at least offered it. Why should she wish to wreck Winifred's life, as that cruel, selfish, ambitious man had wrecked her own? She couldn't tell the whole truth now without exposing Hugh. And for Winifred's sake at least she would not expose him, and blight Winifred's dream at the very moment of its first full ecstacy.

For Winifred's sake? Nay, rather for his own. For in spite of everything, she still loved him. She could never forgive him. Or if she didn't love the Hugh that really was, she loved at least the memory of the Hugh that was not and that never had been. For his dear sake she could never expose that other base creature that bore his name and wore his features. For her own love's sake, she could never betray him. For her womanly consistency, for her sense of identity, she couldn't turn round and tell the truth about him. To acquiesce in a lie was wrong perhaps; but to tell the truth would have been more than human.

"I wish," she cried in her agony to Edie, "I could go away and hide myself for ever in Canada or Australia or somewhere like that—where he would never know I was really living."

Edie stroked her smooth black hair with a gentle hand; she had views of her own already, had Edie. "It's a far cry to Loch Awe, darling,' she murmured softly. "Better come with mother and me to San Remo."

"San Remo;" Elsie echoed. "Why San Remo?"

And then Edie explained to her in brief outline that she and her mother went every winter to the Riviera, taking with them a few delicate English girls of consumptive tendency, partly to educate, but more still to escape the bitter English Christmas. They hired a villa—the same every year—on a slope of the hills, and engaged a resident governess to accompany them. But as chance would have it, their last governess had just gone off, in the nick of time, to get married to her faithful bank clerk at Brixton; so here was an opportunity for mutual accommodation. As Edie put the thing, Elsie might almost have supposed, were she so minded, she would be doing Mrs. Relf an exceptional favour by accepting the post and accompanying them to Italy. And to say the truth, a Girton graduate who had taken high honours at Cambridge was certainly a degree or two better than anything the delicate girls of consumptive tendency could reasonably have expected to obtain at San Remo. But none the less the offer was a generous one, kindly meant; and Elsie accepted it just as it was intended. It was a fair exchange of mutual services. She must earn her own livelihood wherever she went; trouble, however deep, has always that special aggravation and that special consolation for penniless people; and in no other house could she possibly have earned it without a reference or testimonial from her last employers. The Relfs needed no such awkward introduction. This arrangement suited both parties admirably; and poor heart broken Elsie, in her present shattered condition of nerves, was glad enough to accept her new friends' kind hospitality at Lowestoft for the present, till she could fly with them at last, early in October, from this desecrated England and from the chance of running up against Hugh Massinger.

Her whole existence summed itself up now in the one wish to escape Hugh. He thought her dead. She hoped in her heart he might never again discover she was living.

On the very first day when she dared to venture out in a Bath-chair muffled and veiled, and in a new black dress—lest any one perchance should happen to recognize her—She asked to be wheeled to the Lowestoft pier, and Edie, who accompanied her out on that sad first ride, walked slowly by her side in sympathetic silence. Warren Relf followed her too, but at a safe distance; he could not think of obtruding as yet upon her shame and grief; but still he could not wholly deny himself either the modest pleasure of watching her from afar unseen and unsuspected. Warren had hardly so much as caught a glimpse of Elsie since that night on the Mud-Turtle; but Elsie's gentleness and the profundity of her sorrow had touched him deeply. He began indeed to suspect he was really in love with her; and perhaps his suspicion was not entirely baseless. He knew too well, however, the depth of her distress to dream of pressing even his sympathy upon her at so inopportune a moment. If ever the right time for him came at all, it could come, he knew, only in the remote future.

At the end of the pier, Elsie halted the chair, and made the chairman wheel it as she directed, exactly opposite one of the open gaps in the barrier of woodwork that ran round it. Then she raised herself up with difficulty from her seat. She was holding something tight in her small right hand; she had drawn it that moment from the folds of her bosom. It was a packet of papers, tied carefully in a knot with some heavy object. Warren Relf, observing cautiously from behind, felt sure in his own mind it was a heavy object by the curve it described as it wheeled through the air when Elsie threw it. For Elsie had risen now, pale and red by turns, and was flinging it out with feverish energy in a sweeping arch far, far into the water. It struck the surface with a dull thud—the heavy thud of a stone or a metallic body. In a second it had sunk like lead to the bottom, and Elsie, bursting into a silent flood of tears, had ordered the chairman to take her home again.

Warren Relf, skulking hastily down the steps behind that lead to the tidal platform under the pier, had no doubt at all in his own mind what the object was that Elsie had flung with such fiery force into the deep water; for that night on the Mud-Turtle as he tried to restore the insensible girl to a passing gleam of life and consciousness, two distinct articles had fallen, one by one, in the hurry of the moment, out of her loose and dripping bosom. He was not curious, but he couldn't help observing them. The first was a bundle of water-logged letters in a hand which it was impossible for him not to recognise. The second was a pretty little lady's watch, in gold and enamel, with a neat inscription engraved on a shield on the back, "E. C. from H. M," in Lombardic letters. It wasn't Warren Relf's fault if he knew then who H. M. was; and it wasn't his fault if he knew now that Elsie Challoner had formally renounced Hugh Massinger's love, by flinging his letters and presents bodily into the deep sea, where no one could ever possibly recover them.

They had burnt into her flesh, lying there in her bosom. She could carry them about next her bruised and wounded heart no longer. And now on this very first day that she had ventured out, she buried her love and all that belonged to it in that deep where Hugh Massinger himself had sent her.

But even so, it cost her hard. They were Hugh's letters—those precious much loved letters. She went home that morning crying bitterly, and she cried till night, like one who mourns her lost husband or her children. They were all she had left of Hugh and of her day-dream. Edie knew exactly what she had done, but avoided the vain effort to comfort or console her. "Comfort—comfort scorned of devils!" Edie was woman enough to know she could do nothing. She only held her new friend's hand tight clasped in hers, and cried beside her in mute sisterly sympathy.

It was about a week later that Hugh Massinger, goaded by remorse, and unable any longer to endure the suspense of hearing nothing further directly or indirectly, as to Elsie's fate, set out one morning in a dogcart from Whitestrand, and drove along the coast with his own thoughts, in a blazing sunlight, as far as Aldeburgh. There the road abruptly stops. No highway spans the ridge of beach beyond: the remainder of the distance to the Low Light at Orfordness must be accomplished on foot, along a flat bank that stretches for miles between sea and river, untrodden and trackless, one bare plank waste of sand and shingle. The ruthless sun was pouring down upon it in full force as Hugh Massinger began his solitary tramp along that uneven road at the Martello Tower, just south of Aldeburgh. The more usual course is to sail by sea; and Hugh might indeed have hired a boat at Slaughden Quay if he dared; but he feared to be recognized as having come from Whitestrand to make inquiries about the unclaimed body; for to rouse suspicion would be doubly unwise: he felt like a murderer, and he considered himself one by implication already. If other people grew to suspect that Elsie was drowned, it would go hard but they would think as ill of him as he thought of himself in his bitterest moments.

For, horrible to relate, all this time, with that burden of agony and anguish and suspense weighing down his soul like a mass of lead, he had had to play as best he might, every night and morning, at the ardour of young love with that girl Winifred. He had had to imitate with hateful skill the wantonness of youth and the ecstasy of the happily betrothed lover. He had to wear a mask of pleasure on his pinched face while his heart within was full of bitterness, as he cried to himself more than once in his reckless agony. After such unnatural restraint, reaction was inevitable. It became a delight to him to get away for once from that grim comedy, in which he acted his part with so much apparent ease, and to face the genuine tragedy of his miserable life, alone and undisturbed with his own remorseful thoughts for a few short hours or so. He looked upon that fierce tramp in the eye of the sun, trudging ever on over those baking stones, and through that barren spit of sand and shingle, to some extent in the light of a self-imposed penance—a penance, and yet a splendid indulgence as well; for here there was no one to watch or observe him. Here he could let the tears trickle down his face unreproved, and no longer pretend to believe himself happy. Here there was no Winifred to tease him with her love. He had sold his own soul for a few wretched acres of stagnant salt marsh: he could gloat now at his ease over his hateful bargain; he could call himself "Fool' at the top of his voice; he could groan and sigh and be as sad as night, no man hindering him. It was an orgy of remorse, and he gave way to it with wild orgiastic fervour.

He plodded, plodded, plodded, ever on, stumbling wearily over that endless shingle, thirsty and footsore, mile after mile, yet glad to be relieved for a while from the strain of his long hypocrisy, and to let the tears flow easily and naturally one after the other down his parched cheek. Truly he walked in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity. The iron was entering into his own soul; and yet he hugged it. The gloom of that barren stretch of water-worn pebbles, the weird and widespread desolation of the landscape, the fierce glare of the mid-day sun that poured down mercilessly on his aching head, all chimed in congenially with his present brooding and melancholy humour, and gave strength to the poignancy of his remorse and regret. He could torture himself to the bone in these small matters, for dear Elsie's sake; he could do penance, but not restitution. He couldn't even so tell out the truth before the whole world, or right the two women he had cruelly wronged, by an open confession.

At last, after mile upon mile of weary staggering, he reached the Low Light, and sat down, exhausted, on the bare shingle just outside the lighthouse-keeper's quarters. Strangers are rare at Ofordness; and a morose-looking man, sourced by solitude, soon presented himself at the door to stare at the new-comer.

"Tramped it?" he asked curtly with an inquiring glance along the shingle beach.

"Yes, tramped it," Hugh answered with a weary sigh, and relapsed into silence, too utterly tired to think of how he had best set about the prosecution of his delicate inquiry, now that he had got there.

The man stood with his hand on his hip, and watched the stranger long and close, with frank mute curiosity, as one watches a wild beast in its cage at a menagerie. At last he broke the solemn silence once more with the one inquisitive word, "Why?"

"Amusement," Hugh answered, catching the man's laconic mannor to the echo.

For twenty minutes they talked on in this brief disjointed Spartan fashion, with question and answer as to the life at Orfordness tossed to and fro like a quick ball between them, till at last Hugh touched as if by accident, but with supreme skill, upon the abstract question of provisioning lighthouses.

"Trinity House steam-cutter," the man replied to his short suggested query, with a sidelong jerk of his head to southward. "Twice a month. Very fair grub. Biscuit an' pork an' tinned meats an' sich like."

"Queer employment, the cutter's men," Hugh interposed quietly, "Must see a deal of life in their way sometimes."

The man nodded. "An' death, too," he assented with uncompromising brevity.

"Wrecks?"

"An' corpses."

"Corpses?"

"Ah, corpses, I believe you. Drownded. Heaps of 'em."

"Here?"

"Well, sometimes. On the north side, mostly. Drift with the tide. Cutter's man found one only a week or two ago, as it might be Saturday. Right over yonder, by the groyne, to windward."

"Sailor?"

"Not this time—gal—young woman."

"Where did she come from?" Hugh asked eagerly, yet suppressing his eagerness in his face and voice as well as he was able.

"How should I know?" the man answered with something very like a shrug. "They don't carry their names an' addresses written on their foreheads, as if they were vessels. Lowestoft, Whitestrand, Southwold Aldeburgh—might 'a been any on 'em."

Hugh continued his inquiries with breathless interest a few minutes longer; then he asked again in a trembling voice: "Any jewelry on her?"

The man eyed him suspiciously askance. Detective in disguise, or what? he wondered. "Ask the cutter's man," he drawled out slowly, after a long pause. "Taint likely, if there was any jewelry on a corpse, he'd leave it about her for the coroner to claim, till he'd brought her up here, is it?"

The answer cast an unexpected flood of light on the seafaring view of the treasure-trove of corpses, for which Hugh had hardly before been prepared in his own mind. That would account for her not being recognised. "Did they hold an inquest?" he ventured to ask nervously.

The lighthouse-man nodded. 'But what's the good?—no evidence,' he continued. 'Not identified. They mostly ain't, these here drownded bodies. Jury brought it in "Found drownded." Convenient vardict—saves a sight of trouble."

"Where do you bury them?" Hugh asked, hardly able to control his emotion.

The man waved his hand with a careless dash towards a sandy patch just beyond the High Light. "Over yonder," he answered, 'There's shiploads of 'em yonder. Easy digging—easier 'an the shingle. We planted the crew of a Hamburg brigantine there in a lump last winter. Went ashore on the Oaze Sands. All hands drownded—about a baker's dozen of 'em. Coroner comes over by boat from Orford an' sits upon 'em here on the spot, so you may term it. That' consecrated ground. Bishop ran down and said his prayers over it. A corpse couldn't lie better or more confortabler, if it comes to that, in Kensal Green Simmetery."

He laughed low to himself at his own grim wit; and Hugh, unable to conceal his disgust, walked off alone, as if idly strolling in a solitary mood, towards the desolate graveyard. The lighthouse-man went back, rolling a quid in his bulged cheek, to his monotonous avocations. Hugh stumbled over the sand with blinded eyes and tottering feet till he reached the plot with its little group of rude mounds. There was mound far newer and fresher than all the rest, and a wooden label stood at its head with a number roughly scrawled on it in wet paint—"240." His heart failed and sank within him. So this was her grave!—Elsie's grave! Elsie, Elsie, poor desolate, abandoned, heart-broken Elsie.—He took off his hat in reverent remorse as he stood by its side. O heaven, how he longed to be dead there with her! Should he fling himself off the top of the lighthouse now? Should he cut his throat beside her nameless grave? Should he drown himself with Elsie on that hopeless stretchof wild coast? Or should he live on still, a miserable, wretched, self-condemned coward, to pay the penalty of his cruelty and his baseness through years of agony?

Elsie's grave! If only he could be sure it was really Elsie's! He wished he could. In time, then, he might venture to put up a headstone with just her initials—those sacred initials. But no; he dared not. And perhaps after all, it might not be Elsie. Corpses came up here often and often. Had they not buried whole shiploads together, as the lighthouse-man assured him, after a terrible tempest?

He stood there long, bareheaded in the sun. His remorse was gnawing the very life but of him. He was rooted to the spot. Elsie held him spellbound. At length he roused himself, and with a terrible effort returned to the lighthouse. "Where did you say this last body came up?" he asked the man in as careless a voice as he could easily master.

The man eyed him sharp and hard. "You seen precious anxious about that there young woman," he answered coldly. "She floated alongside by the groyne over yonder. Tide throwed her up. That's where they mostly come ashore from Lowestoft or Whitestrand. Current sweeps 'em right along the coast till they reach the ness; then it throws 'em up by the groyne as reglar as one o'clock. There's a cross-current there; it's that as makes the point and the sandbank."

Hught altered. He knew full well he was rousing suspicion; yet he couldn't refrain for all that from gratifying his eager and burning desire to know all he could about poor martyred Elsie. He dared not ask what had become of the clothes, much as he longed to learn, but he wandered away slowly, step after step, to the side of the groyne. Its further face was sheltered by heaped-up shingle from the lighthouse man's eye. Hugh sat down in the shade, close under the timber balks, and looked around him along the beach where Elsie had been washed ashore, a lifeless burden. Something yellow glittered on the sands hard by. As the sun caught it, it attracted for a second his casual attention by its golden shimmering. His heart come up with a bound into his mouth. He knew it—he knew it—he knew it in a flash. It was Elsie's watch! Elsie's! Elsie's! The watch he himself had given—years and years ago—no; six weeks since only—as a birthday present—to poor dear dead Elsie.

Then Elsie was dead! He was sure of it now. No need for further dangerous questioning. It was by Elsie's grave indeed he had just been standing. Elsie lay buried there beyond the shadow of a doubt, unknown and dishonoured. It was Elsie's grave and Elsie's watch. What room for hope or for fear any longer?

It was Elie's watch, but rolled by the current from Lowestoft pier, as the lighthouse-man had rightly told him was usual, and cast ashore, as everything else was always cast, by the side of the groyne where the stream in the sea turned sharply outward at the extreme eastern most point of Suffolk.

He picked it up with tremulous fingers and kissed it tenderly; then he slipped it unobserved into his breast-pocket, close to his heart—Elsie's watch!—and began his return journey with an aching bosom, over those hot bare stones, away back to Aldeburgh. The beach seemed longer and drearier than before. The orgy of remorse had passed away now, and the coolness of utter despair had come over him instead of it. Half-way on, he sat down at last, wearier than ever, on the long pebble ridge, and gazed once more with swimming eyes at that visible token of Elsie's doom. Hope was dead in his heart now. Horror and agony brooded over his soul. The world without was dull and dreary; the world within was a tempest of passion. He would freely have given all he possessed that moment to be dead and buried in one grave with Elsie.

At that same instant at the Low Light the cutter's man, come across in an open boat from Orford, was talking carelessly to the underling at the lighthouse.

"How's things with you?" he asked with a laugh.

"Pretty much alike, and that stodgy," the other answered grimly. "How's yours?"

"Well, we've tracked down that there body," the Trinity-House-man said casually; "the gal's, I mean, as I picked up on the ness: an' after all my trouble, Tom, you wouldn't believe it, but, hang it all, there ain't never a penny on it."

"No?" the lighthouse-man murmured interrogatively.

"No, not a farden," the fellow Bill responded in a disconsolate voice. "Wy should there be, neither? That's 'ow I put it. 'Tain't a nob's. Turns out she warn't nobody, after all, but one, o' these 'ere light-o'-loves down yonder at Lowestoft. Must 'a been a sailor's Poll, I take it. Throwed 'erself in off Lowestoft pier one dark night, might be three weeks gone or might be a fortnight, on account of a altercation she'd 'a bin 'avin with a young man as she was keepin' company with.—Never seen a more promisin' nor a more disappintin' corpse in my born days. Wen I picked 'er up, says I to Jim—"Jim," says I, as confident as a churchwarding, "you may take your davy on it she's a nob, this gal, by the mere look o' 'er, 'an there's money on the body."—Wy, 'er dress alone would 'a made anyone take 'er for a genu-wine lady. An' 'ow does it turn out? A bad lot! Just the parish pay for 'er, an' that in Suffolk. If it 'adn't bin for a article or two in the way of rings as fell off 'er fingers, in the manner o' speakin', an' dropped as I may say into a 'onest man's pocket as 'e was a carryin' 'er in to take 'er to the mortuary—wy, it do seem probable, it's my belief as that there 'onest man might 'a bin out a shillin' or soin 'is private accounts through the interest he'd 'a took in that there worthless an' unprincipled young woman.—Corpses may look out for theirselves in future as far as I'm concerned. I've had too much of them; they're more bother'n they're worth. That's about the long an' short of it."

A Party of Deaf Mutes.

I came upon a picnic party of deaf mutes in the woods along the Harlem river the other day. They were all young people, and some of the girls were very pretty. They were camped on the green sward in true picnic fashion, and had an abundant supply of solids in big baskets. To their invitation to join them, which was extended, I have no doubt, because they thought me an artist, for I had a sketch book in my hand, I complied so far as to drink a bottle of beer that they offered me. The uncanniness of the company became too oppressive, however. Amid the vocal beauty of nature, where everything had a voice, from the birds to the rippling water and the rustling leaves, the silence of my entertainers proved too much for my nerves. Turn wherever I might, there were faces that had expression, but lips that uttered no sound. The swift movements of their hands in the sign language only made matters worse. Perhaps if I could have used my hands as deftly I might have felt more at home, but I doubt it. The silence had something awful about it and I finished my beer, gave proper thanks for it and went away. I fairly yelled with relief when the thickets hid me from sight and then blushed at the thought that they might have heard me, if they had had ears. Foolish as the idea was it made me quite miserable and I should be ashamed to tell exactly how many glasses of beer were required to cause me to forget the encounter.

I actually realized that afternoon, at a waking moment, the dreadful sensation of a nightmare, when one struggles frantically for speech, and cannot find it, and while a nameless horrow weighs down one's body while it suffocates the soul. Talking over the experience that night with a medical friend he told me that my case was not an uncommon one. With people who can speech becomes a positive sensation. Many doctors cannot be got to assume duties in deaf and dumb asylums. They claim that the unnatural stillness completely upsets th nerves. Even the less imaginative and more stolid menial classes are difficult to be got for service in such establishments. Work under such unusual conditions wears them out faster than the serious and arduous labors of hospitals and insane asylums, and men and women who will toil for years amid the most distressing and depressing surroundings, will, on this account, reject opportunities for comparatively easy and comfortable service. After my picnic experience I certainly cannot blame them either.

A Boating Song.

Written at Lake St. Francis, July 1888. Music:—"Sailing o'er the Sea."

BY L. A. MORRISON, TORONTO.

When the vernal days are done
And the sultry summer sun,
Its languor over nature brings,—
Then some shady cool retreat
From the City's glare and heat,
Hath health and healing in its wings.

Chorus :—

(Treble) We are sailing glad and free,
(Alto) We are sailing glad and free. We are sailing glad and free.
(Tenor) We are sailing, sailing, sailing, sailing, sailing glad and free.
(Bass) We are keeping jubilee, we are keeping jubilee.

Oh 'tis not the burden'd brain,—
In its dull methodic strain—
Can flash the thoughts that breathe and burn;
Weary hands and feeble will
Can with but imperfect skill
Earth's wondrous gifts to profit turn.

So, where Lake St. Francis lies,
—Overarched by jewel'd skies—
In a cozy cottage on its banks,
'Neath the spreading maple trees,—
Fan'd by cool refreshing breeze—
We join with the linnets in our thanks.

Here "St. Lawrence" limpid green
Blends with "Fraser's" murky sheen,
While away through "The Cedars" it descends,—
Where it joins "Ottawa's" tide
And Mont-Royale's isles divide.
Till "Vercheres" make them undivided friends.

Here—in fateful days of old—
Dire Rebellion wrathful roll'd,—
Loyal sons conserved the Nation's fate,
And uprear'd "Glengarry's Cairn"
—On the "White-winged Dove's" return—
To express their devotion to the state.

So—refreshed—our nature sings,
Till, with songs, the welkin rings,
And the Lake—embowered in its green—
Gives—for body, mind and heart—
Added strength to do life's part.
From the sweet enchantments of the scene.

[Note :—Each line in the chorus is repeated four times, and if a number of voices can join in, the beauty of the chorus can be heightened by each part varying the wording.]

A Sweet Story.

LEIGH STURGEON

Once I thought her looks were haughty,
And her love was growing cold,
And her smiles were faint and weary;
And her faith was losing hold.

Then I slighted her on purpose,
And I treated her unkind;
And I scorned all her sorrows,
Till she faded, droop'd and pin'd.

We would always snarl together,
And then go with aching heart
Signing sore for one another,
To some solitude apart.

Till a nobler love came o'er me,
And I sought her lone retreat;
There our wild impassion'd story,
Ended most divinely sweet.

Boy-Like.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

From early dawn he roamed about
With glances inquisitorial,
And in the house, likewise without,
He left some sad memorial.

No one could tell, from those mild eyes,
What his remote intention was;
He loved to waylay and surprise,
And startling his invention was.

A violin he broke, in fun,
And afterward its brother flute;
To see what made the tune in one,
And also what made the other toot.

The sawdust in the dolly packed
For him a wild attraction had;
A watch he could not leave intact;
From this great satisfaction had.

He dug, to see how grasses grew,
A bicycle he took apart;
Folks locked up all their books—they knew
He loved to take a book apart.

A drum had wondrous charms for him
To see just where the noise came out;
With him around, the chance was slim
That unbroke any toys came out.

But as he prowled about one day,
With hungry curiosity,
And near the cradle chanced to stray,
He shook it with velocity.

Packed off to bed ere he could sup,
His lips a gentle sigh came from;
Because he stirred the baby up
To find out where the cry came from!

Master and Scholar.

The Rev. Samuel J. May taught a small school in Nahant, Mass., for one summer, and among his pupils was John Lothrop Motley. Forty years afterwards master and scholar met in Rome. "Mr. Motley," said Mr. May, "I think I am entitled to some share of your great reputation." "Very well," said the historian, "you may have all you can justly claim; prove property and take it away." Why," said Mr. May, "have you forgotten that I taught you to read?" "Did you," rejoined Mr. Motley; "then you must have done it well, for I have known how ever since."

Railway Accidents.

The returns to the English Board of Trade of the accidents occurring upon railway lines show that during the first three months of the present year 209 persons were killed and 934 injured. This is a decrease of 20 deaths and an increase of 91 injuries as compared with the corresponding period of last year. What are commonly understood by railway accidents—that is, collisions, running off the line, and so forth are only responsible for three deaths and 197 less serious mishaps. Twelve people lost their lives at level crossings, 18 committed suicide, and no fewer than 53 were killed in the act of trespassing. Accidents due to the movement of trains account for 91 fatal cases and 748 others. Of these the London and North-Western has one-sixth, with 16 deaths and 132 injuries. It is followed by the Midland with 10 deaths; after which come the Lancashire and Yorkshire, 9; the North-Eastern, Great-Eastern, and North British 6; the South Western, 5; the Great-Northern, 4; the Great-Western, the Brighton and South-Coast, and some other lines, 3; the South-Eastern, 2; and so on, until last among the important lines comes the London, Chatham, and Dover, which escaped with only four accidents, none of which proved fatal. Detailed reports are given of eleven collisions and two instances of trains leaving the rails. It is noticeable that five of the collisions and one of the other accidents occurred within the metropolitan area, happening, as they did, at Coborn Road, Euston, King's Cross, Portland Road, New Cross, and Tulse Hill.

The Pleasure of Dying.

I have seen a great many people die, some of them great sinners, even ruffians of the most degraded type, and I have never yet witnessed in any case the slightest fear of death or of a hereafter. I have also been present at the death-beds of many pious and worthy persons, and I have never known an instance among this class of the least abhorrence of death or apprehension in regard to the future. A person in sound health receiving intelligence that his death is to take place in a few moments would undoubtedly at first be greatly disturbed, and if religiously brought up, would probably wish to make preparations for departing this life. But the case is very different with those who have suffered from a long illness and whose perceptions therefore have lost their sharpness. I have often told such persons that they had but a few minutes to live, but the intelligence has never been received in any other than the most composed and resigned manner. Certainly this is a wise provision of nature. For if, as with his present knowledge it is impossible for man to escape death, it is well that he is so constituted as to be able to accept the inevitable with dignity and composure.—[Dr. William A. Hammond.

Now is the time to kill and eat spring chickens. This is the season of hard work on the farm and the farmer and his family should have the best of food. Chickens no longer command a fancy price, and now is the time to eat them. They are no more expensive than roast or corned beef and are vastly better food at this season.

A soldier who was seen to take off his cap while using the telephone, informed a questioner that he did so because he was talking to a superior officer.

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS

1st. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the Post Office, whether directed in his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for payment.

2nd. If a person orders his paper discontinued he must pay up all arrears, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and then collect the whole amount whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3rd. The courts have decided that refusing to take nepspapers or periodicals from the Post Office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

DUTTON, AUGUST 30, 1888.

RETALIATION.

The principal topic of discussion in the city newspapers of late has been the action of President Cleveland in asking Congress to give him power to put in force a retaliation bill against Canada. It will be remembered that the Senate, which has a Republican majority, refused to ratify the Fisheries Treaty, and President Cleveland, with a desire to catch the Irish vote (which appears to be a marketable commodity across the border), and also for the purpose of weakening the Republican party in the campaign, has resorted to this method.

If such a bill were put in operation it would be a serious blow to Canada, but would undoutedly prove almost as disastrous to the United States. The Mail says:

"We are free to admit that the step Mr. Cleveland advises Congress to take would be a grave one for us. The President is entirely and egregiously mistaken, we think, in supposing that the people of Canada can be coerced into a surrender of their fishery or any other rights. He recommends a course of action which, in his conscience, he must regard as utterly barbarous. We shall be hurt—perhaps severely hurt—but spirited and intelligent people are not to be overawed, still less brought to their knees, by the poor sort of weapons the President has taken in hand."

The Globe characterizes President Cleveland's action as "playing to the gallery," and the general opinion seems to be that it is nothing more than the artful device of an astute politician.

WEEKLY WEAVINGS.

FOUND.—A ladies' hand satchel. Owner can have same by calling at this office and paying for this notice.

THE Foresters of Dutton will attend divine serviee in a body on the 9th prox. Place and preacher given in our next.

I AM LENDING MONEY AT PRESENT IN LARGE LOANS ON GOOD FARM SECURITY AT 5½ PER CENT.—A. MCCRIMMON, ST. THOMAS.

THERE is a good chance for some active and trusty men to secure paying work at once by engaging with Jas. E. Whitney, Rochester, N. Y.

MRS. RICHARD JONES, of Campbellton, accidentally fell on a pitchfork one day last week, injuring herself very badly. Dr. McKillop dressed her wounds.

MR. B. CURTIS, of the Maple Leaf, and Miss Alma Fowler were married at Dutton lately. Mrs. Curtis now has "The Maple Leaf Forever."—Leamington Post.

MR. JAS. RIHILL lost a horse from inflammation, by feeding "shorts," one day last week. Mr. Rihill has procured a serviceable animal in its place and is prepared to do business at the old stand.

CONSTABLE MCRAE, of Dutton, and Detective Miller executed search warrants in Middlemiss recently, but without success. They were looking after the proceeds of the robbery last February from F. Drake, Dutton.

PAID HIS FINE.—J. Cavers, who was arrested for violating the Scott Act some months ago, and after spending a day in jail paid part of his fine, giving security for the balance, returned to Dutton last week after an extended business trip to San Francisco, where he had been looking after the shipment of some Chinese (?) Having been very successful in his venture Constable McRae requested him to pay the balance of the aforesaid fine, amounting to $24.65, which Cavers did. What Cavers' next speculation will be we know not.

ADAM AMOS is building a house off Nancy street.

SUPPLEMENT.—A supplement, partly to take the place of last week's ENTERPRISE, will be found in this issue.

REV. ARCHIBALD MCDIARMID will occupy the pulpit of Knox church, Dutton, Sunday next, morning and evening.

"NOTES by a Tourist," an interesting letter on Algoma, and "Attramp's" farewell letter will be found very interesting to our readers.

MR. WM. EUSTES has purchased the corner lot on Mary street from C. Doyle for $165, on which he intends erecting a shed.

BASEBALL.—The Dutton juniors played a return match with the Rodney club on Saturday last and were badly defeated, the score being 45 to 5.

HORSES KILLED.—A mare and colt belonging to C. W. Hodder, and a horse belonging to Scott Sutton were killed by a train during Tuesday night.

MR. JOHN MCCORMICK has purchased the property belonging to Duncan McIntyre on Nancy street, and will move to Dutton shortly, Mr. McIntyre moving on Mr. McCormick's farm.

GEO. MCGILL has puchased Mr. Thompson's interest in the harness business formerly carried on by them. Mr. McGill is a good mechanic and thoroughly understands the wants of all requiring anything in his line. Read ad. and give him a call.

THE proprietors of the Leamington Post, not satisfied with its present size and neat and tasty appearance, intend enlarging it and making it more newsy than ever. The Post is one of our best exchanges and we commend the push and energy of its proprietors, Messrs. Williams & Wigle.

IF there is one thing more than another that Angus McGugan delights in it is in making the printer's heart glad. Angus very seldom comes to town without leaving something with the printer as a reminder of his visit. Harvest apples and sweet corn are the latest things we are thankful for.

"LESSONS from the life of a man who did not want to be rich" will be the subject of Rev. E. Middleton's discourse in the Methodist chnrch next Sabbath evening. The rev. gentleman has become very popular with his congregation and the Sunday evening services are very interesting and profitable.

At Shedden on Saturday Mr. Thos. Hughes, school teacher, of Fingal, was charged before Squires Stafford and Turner with assault, it being alleged that he had unduly punished a little boy, the son of Stephen DeLacey. Mr. Hughes admitted having slapped the boy, but the magistrates deemed the matter of such a trifling nature that the case was dismissed.

THE Dresden Times reports a Dresden Anti-Bustlette as saying, "God never intended that I should wear a bustle, if He had He would have put one on there for me." But that reasoning is rather dangerous, isn't it? For example: If He intended you to wear clothing—but—well its too embarrassing quite.—Journal.

SOUTHERN COUNTIES' FAIR.—The ninth annual exhibition of the Southern Counties' Fair Association will be held at St. Thomas, on September 17, 18, 19 and 20. The management are sparing no possible pains to make this the best exhibiton ever held there. Farmers' premium race, team race, running race for farmers' horses, trotting race, 2:40 class, stallion race, etc., form some of the attractions. Cheap fares and late trains. Send to the secretary, John A. Kains, for all necessary information.

A COSTLY MELON.—Chauncey Peckam, of Cowal, bad Willie McIntyre, of the same place, up before Squire Hatton on Monday last for attempting to help himself to some of Mr. Peckam's melons. It seems that young McIntyre was returning from camp-meeting when he left his companion in the buggy, jumped the fence and was in the act of taking a melon whon he was caught and made to disgorge. The Squire cautioned the youth as to his future behavior, and upon pleading guilty was allowed to go by paying costs, amounting to $4.20.

SUNDAY morning a farmer of Southwold, living about eight miles from the city, drove in with a load of wheat, arriving about nine o'clock. The deserted appearance of the streets struck him as remarkable for a Saturday, but he didn't tumble to his mistake until a passer-by asked him what he meant by hauling wheat on Sunday. Then he drove into the Hutchinson House stable as quickly as he could, unhitched his horses, and rode home leaving the load in the stables. He explained that his neighbors were drawing in oats when he left, so he never dreamed that the day was Sunday.—Journal.

WE have been requested to intimate to the members of Dutton Home Circle the desirability and necessity of a full attendance of the officers and members at the meetings. There are several important matters regarding the welfare of the Circle which should have been attended to some time ago but have been neglected on account of the non-attendance of its members. At the regular meeting last Monday night there were not enough present for a quorum, and it was decided to call a special meeeting for next Monday evening. Let there be a full attendance at this meeting.

WE have heard several complaints against the Army lately regarding the frightening of horses caused by the noise of their instruments. It is the custom of the Army to use the sidewalk for their parades, and the horses being tied to the posts in front of our business places are thereby brought into very close quarters with the noise. One farmer was heard to remark that "it was enough to frighten an army mule, much less a domesticated farm horse." This has a tendency to awaken anything but a religious feeling in the breast of a farmer, however much good it may do to others. This applies particularly to Saturday evenings, when there are more than the usual number of teams in our village. True, the captain exercises great caution in this matter, but still there is room for improvement. There is the road. While on this subject there is another complaint to be mentioned, that is, the disturbance to preachers and congregations of other bodies by the Sunday evening's march. When the windows and doors of our churches are open the noise is anything but pleasant and soul-inspiring, especially if the hearer's attention is fixed attentively on the sermon. The Army has every reason to be proud of the manner in which they have been treated by the different congregations since the first shot was fired in Dutton, and ought to show a little charity in this respect. And we think they will. Let the Sunday evening's march be dispensed with, or let it take place farther away from the churches. We hope we will not be construed as being hostile to the Army. It is the privilege of each one to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, but other people have no right to be disturbed while exercising that privilege.

—H. Hollingshead, who represented Dutton Home Circle at the meeting of the Supreme Circle held in Hamilton, has returned. He reports the Order to be in a flourishing condition. Twenty-five new Circles were organized last year, with a membership of 1,050. The total membership of the Order numbers nearly 5,000.

—Jas. McDougall, merchant, has returned home from an extended visit to friends in Kansas and Nebraska. He expresses himself as being well pleased with the climate and soil of those States, but would advise those who are doing well in Ontario to remain. The only thing Mr. McDougall fails to uderstand is when the people out there talk about "going west."

A DISASTROUS FIRE.

On Thursday evening last, about 11 o'clock, Wallacetown was visited by another disastrous conflagration. The large grocery and hardware store owned by A. D. Urlin was burned to the ground, together with his dwelling-house, which formed a part of the building. The entire contents of both store and dwelling were consumed, nothing being saved. The fire was caused by the explosion of a lamp amidst some varnish and oil, causing the flames to spread very rapidly.

The post-office and Mr. Black's house were saved by the strenuous efforts of the citizens. The Ontario House received a severe scorching, but the replacing of some windows and a coat of paint will repair the damage. Damage was done to the contents of these buildings by removal and water.

Mr. Urlin carried a large stock which was valued at $15,000; insurance, $12,000, in the Western, British American, Hartford, Mercantile and Quebec. What Mr. Urlin's intentions are we know not, but he has procured a small stock and intends doing business in the brick store formerly occupied by Hockin & Pool for the present.

The result of this fire will prove a serious blow to Wallacetown, which has been rapidly on the decline for years. The correspondent of the Journal thus bewails the result: "Between fires, lightning, scandals and other villages' competition, it is a "doomed city," and the result is inevitable."

FERN DELL.

Robert Auckland, an old resident of the 4th concession, died on Thursday night. Deceased had been ailing for some time, and his death was therefore not unexpected. A large number of friends and acquaintances joined in the procession to the Wardsville cemetery on Sunday.

ONE picnic on Friday was well attended by people from Rodney, Bismarck, Dutton, Bothwell, Wardsville and Crinan, and was a grand success. After refreshments had been served by the ladies, T. E. Montague was called to the chair, which he filled in his usual happy manner. Addresses were delivered by Revs. Bristol and Keiffer, H. S. McColl, A. Carmichael, C. Palmer and P. Stalker. Songs and music in abundance by the Dutton string band, the school scholars and others.

MONEY.—Private funds to loan on good security at reasonable rates. Apply at this office.

If you desire to possess a beautiful complexion take Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It cleanses and purifies the blood, and removes blotches and pimples, making the skin smooth and clear, and giving it a bright and healthy appearance. Take it this month.

Lucan's rate of taxation this year is 19 mills on the dollar.

The best medical authorities acknowledge the value of Ayer's Pills, and prescribe them with the utmost confidence, as the most effectual remedy for diseases caused by derangements of the stomach, liver and bowels.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

There are 3,273 inmates in the various insane ayiums of Ontario; males exceed females by three only.

SUMMER TRAVEL

is usually subject to dangerous and sudden attacks of bowel complaints, diarrhœa, dysentery, etc., caused by change of food and water. The sovereign remedy and surest safeguard against all such troubles is Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. Never Travel without it

The harvest may be said ty be practically over. Only a field of oats, here and there, remains unhoused.

Hon. Wilfred Laurier, the leader of the Reform party received an ovation at Stratford by October 1st. There are to be 60 lights in all.

You Carry

A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."

Here is an instance of

who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:

"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."

John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,
Late U. S. Consul to Italy, author of "The Glory and Shame of England," "America's Advancement," etc., etc., etc., writes as follows:—
New York, August 1, 1886.
122 E. 27th st.
DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,
Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:
My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.
Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,
A Priceless Blessing
C. EDWARDS LESTER.

It can do no harm to try Freeman's Worm Powders if your child is ailing, feverish or fretful.

No Universal Remedy
has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.
Boils and Carbuncles,
which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.
Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.
That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.
All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.
Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

MANITOBA'S BIG CHANCE.
THE OLD WORLD SHORT OF WHEAT THIS YEAR.
LONDON, Aug. 31.—It now seems to be a fact that the old world needs from 70,000,000 to 80,000,000 bushels of wheat more than the harvest of the year will produce. To put it another way, the countries which always have to buy wheat must this year buy some 370,000,000 bushels, while the countries raising more than they consume will have about 25,000,000 bushels to sell. The annual international grain market, held in Vienna on Monday, gave estimates of the yield of the world, which varied only in a few particulars from those already given, the chief differences being in unimportant countries. On the other hand, the real state of the French harvest seems much worse than reported at Vienna, and the same is even more obviously true of England. Tuesday's terrific storm of wind and rain ended whatever chance remained of decent crops in Great Britain, and the English must now import at least 170,000,000 bushels. France, which, next to the United States, is the greatest wheat producer in the world, has one of the worst wheat crops ever reaped. A week ago it was estimated that she would need to import 68,000,000 bushels Now, since the fresh storm and the discovery by the threshings of the bad quality of the grain, the shortage is put at 80,000,000 by the Mercuriale des Halles, and at 96,000,000 by Bollack, Sarassin & Co. What makes the matter worse is that very little, if any, of this can be made good by Algiers, where the grass hopper has decimated the crop. Germany, Italy and the Netherlands must buy more wheat than usual this year from the great exporting countries.
The wheat market in England is still a curiously parochial affair, dependent upon all sorts of local conditions and influences. Liverpool generally follows New York and San Francisco, but London is more concerned in the Baltic trade and not so easily moved by American quotations, and, like Leeds, Rochester and Newcastle-on-Tyne, thinks most of the local crops and demand Hence prices for the past week have been much affected by the capricious weather, a bright day frightening buyers, a heavy rain stiffening sellers; but yesterday's storm has so knocked out what remained of the English crop that this can no longer be the case. Already we catch a glimpse of what the wheat shortage means by the discovery that bread has gone up a penny on a quartern loaf in many parts of London.

RESULT OF A SPREE.—Wm. Bishop, of Point Edward, drew his pay last Saturday morning, and afterwards went over the river and returned about 4 o'clock, much intoxicated and abusing every one he met. He was taken to his room in the Queen's Hotel, but he shortly afterwards reappeared, and was, if anything, more boisterous than before, and came in contact with one Smith, a boarder at the same hotel, who in trying to defend himself, cut Bishop's nose. Bishop was again taken away, and had his tea, after which he attacked John Burke a G. T. R. brakeman, by whom it is said, he was knocked down and kicked, and as he did not make any attempt to get up, some one tried to lift him up, when it was discovered that he was dead. Coroner Fraser was summoned, and he instructed Chief Windred, of Sarnia, to make an investigation. The deceased was identified as a man who had at various times applied at the police station for lodgings during last winter, and on searching his clothing a book was found, in which was written the following: "Whoever finds this book after I am dead, please write Mr. Hancliffe, London, Eng., and tell him I am dead. I am his nephew."

A TERRIBLE CALAMITY.
HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS, WIPED OUT BY A CLOUD-BURST.—THE STREETS TURNED INTO RAGING RIVERS.—THE CITY WRECKED AND RUINED.
LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Sept. 1.—The Gazette's Hot Spring special of yesterday's date says: To day is an epoch in the history of Hot Springs. The city is in ruins, wreck meets the vision everywhere, and nothing like it has been known. Last night's storm, which occurred to late too be telegraphed, was a water-spout, and the valley was swept with a tidal wave. The loss to property is fearful, while the sacrifice of human life is under certain appearances, appalling. Without warning, the people were awakened from slumber to find themselves threatened with destruction. Strange to relate, few people were conscious of this terrible disaster till they woke to look upon the desolate scene this morning and drag the drowned from the drifts. The storm struck the town about 11 o'clock from a northwesterly direction. It was acompanied by stiff winds, though not strong enough to produce damage. The rain fell in torrents from 11 to 1 o'clock without intermission, accompanied by vivid flashes of lightning. At the close of the storm a great and ominous sound, mingled with shouts of people and cries of distress went up from the valley, and such citizens as were in the vicinity of creeks and ravines went to render assistance. The flood on Central avenue, the principal street, assumed the appearance of an angry river whose rushing waters swept everything movable on its bosom. For over half an hour the avenue was a torrent 50 yards wide. Barrels, boxes and parts of houses came down on the tide and were left on the sidewalks. Many buildings were totally wrecked. Up to this hour six persons are known to be missing, five of whom have been found dead in a wrecked building. The damage to property cannot yet be estimated.
Parties from Hot Springs say that the desolation is beyond description. Thirteen people were drowned. Nine bodies have been recovered. The lost were mostly colored people. The houses all along Central street are badly undermined, and those damaged will have to be rebuilt.

A BALTIMORE BURNING.
SEVEN MEN ROASTED TO DEATH.
BALTIMORE, Sept. 2.—At an early hour this morning a fire broke out in the toy warehouse of Prior, Hilgenberg & Co., 107 South Sharp street. Before the firemen could get to work an explosion of fireworks wrecked the building and caused the flames to spread with alarming rapidity to the drug house of J. A. Williams & Co., on the north, and the hat house of M. S. Levy, on the south. Scarcely had the firemen entered the edifice occupied by the drug house when the inside of the building seemed to suddenly drop in. A terrific explosion followed and the immense building collapsed. The entire fire department had by this time reached the scene, and as the attention of the men was concentrated on the building under which their comrades were buried, the flames had a chance to spread, and spread they did with frightful rapidity.
In an incredibly short time the entire block, running from Lombard to Pratt streets, was a seething mass of flame. At the drug house the fireman worked bravely. Holes were cut through the pavement, and every effort was made to reach the imprisoned men, but they were buried under a great mass of brick and iron, and fierce flames were roaring around the spot. Awful groans came from the pile, which seemed to make the working firemen put forth superhuman efforts, and after more than an hour's work it became evident that some of the men were alive, and that they were being roasted to death. John Killey, of truck No. 2, managed to crawl out from the rubbish, and of the men who entered the building he was the only one who escaped with his life.

Divorced and Married in Fifteen Minutes.
A novel divorce suit has just terminated in the Owen County (Ind.) Circuit Court. The parties to the suit were John W. and Sarah J. Medaris, who had lived happily as husband and wife for seven years, with not a cloud to mar their domestic felicity. About two months ago a third party, named Elijah Startett, of Clay County, made his debut in the neighborhood of the Medaris household. He met Mrs. Medaris, and it was a case of love at first sight. A coldness sprung up between the husband and wife. The result was a suit for divorce by mutual agreement, which is best related as follows:
"The parties to this suit agree that they will separate by agreement and that each shall testify in behalf of the other." With this understanding they went into open court and testified in the case. The Judge granted a decree of divorcement, and within fifteen minutes the newly divorced lady, accompanied by Elijah Startett, presented themselves before the now astonished Judge and demanded that he say the marriage ceremony for them. Within fifteen minutes, and by the same Judge, Mrs. Medaris was the wife of Mr. Startett. The late husband witnessed the marriage ceremony.—Cincinnati Enquirer.
KILLED BY BEES.—A horse belonging to a resident of St. Marys got among a number of bee-hives, knocking some of them over. The bees resented the attack and stung the poor animal so badly that it died shortly afterwards.

LATE CABLE NEWS.

Boulanger More Popular Than Ever—The Queen in Scotland—Pursued by Gypsies.

The French voters have had their say, and Boulanger is a big man again. To assume that he would no more be heard of because of his duel with Floquet, was as absurd as the duel itself. The prediction made some time since that Boulanger would loom up victorious again was a perfectly safe one, for the French must shout for some one, and Boulanger had the start and the money to keep it. Now that he is on top again he will disappear from the scene for a little while. He has vigorously abused his adversaries, the moderate Republicans, disgusted the Royalists who supported him, and is now about to start off incognito on a trip through Norway and Sweden, to be gone until the reopening of the Chamber of Deputies. It will seem very strange to have him out of Paris for he has been the unceasing topic among Parisians for two years.

As usual, royal individuals continue to move about a lot and take up a great deal of public attention. Her Majesty Queen Victoria, of course, excites the most general interest, and just now she has stirred up the loyal Scotchmen at a great rate, She has been doing Glasgow and visiting the exhibition in her ordinary calm and dignified way, but the excitement has nevertheless been very intense. The Glasgow "Herald" takes twenty-three columns to tell what her Majesty had done and said and looked like. The Town Clerk has been made a knight and the Lord Provost a baronet, and all the poets up there are rhyming so much about the visit that the newspapers have given up in despair attempting to print it all.

Prince Henry of [illegible]enberg has been up in Scotland, too, and had an unusually good time. The Queen always keeps the Princess with her, and insists that a well-regulated husband should keep with his wife, which makes it rather monotonous for Prince Henry. The Queen, among other places, visited Paisley, where was born the founder of the Stuart race to which hers has succeeded.

The King of the Belgians is up there, too, along with Mr. William Mackinnon. The King is very friendly with Mr. Mackinnon, partly because that gentleman is one of the richest men in Scotland and can provide good shooting, but principally because he is a great African man, a director of the Suez Canal, and closely connected with the King in his enterprises in the Congo Independent State. Mr. Mackinnon was one of the principal promoters and financial supporters of Stanley's so-called relief expedition. The King of the Belgians is a very quiet man, and preserves his incognito so strictly that the Scotch did not even know they had a King among them until they read about it in the papers. He wears knickerbockers, thick stockings, and hob-nailed boots, and doesn't look the least little bit like a King.

Dr. Gowing Middleton, of London, is having an interesting time of it. Some time ago at Cordova a gypsy wanted to stab and rob him, so that he found it necessary to shoot and kill the gypsy in self-defence. Since then his life has been one of constant anxiety even in England. Spanish gypsies continue to follow him about, and the other day at Scarboro he detected several shadowing him. Dr. Middleton firmly believes that they have come from Spain to do him up, according to the plans laid in "Mr. Barnes of New York."

Mr. Button and the Bear.

In the "History of Madison County,' N. Y., is related a bear story which shows the perils to which the pioneers in that now thickly-populated region were subject. Bears and panthers, indeed, were plenty in Brookfield, and enough no person dared venture out far at night without a flaming torch to frighten these animals from the path, yet a man felt safe in the daytime, especially if he had his rifle.

John Button one day started for a raising, leaving his rifle hanging upon the rough ceiling of his kitchen. He followed up Mill Creek by a foot-path that wound its way among the stumps, and over fallen trees.

A few rods from his house, and at the head of his mill-pond a large log lay stretched directly across his path; one end of it lay in the stream. As Button mounted the log in his passage, a ferocious-looking bear rose up from behind it, and boldly confronted him. He was not yet much accustomed to these savage foresters, but having it remarked that a bear could be easily faigtened in the daytime by a shrill yell, he gave a most terrific shout, swung his hat, and dashed it into bruin's face! The black monster was not at all intimated; he rose upon his haunches, and made a move as though he would embrace his opponent. But at this instant, the little dog which accompanied Mr. Button began to worry him.

"Wife, wife," shouted the frightened man, and then as Mrs. Button appeared in the door, "let out Dash (a big dog) and bring me the two guns, here's a tremendous bear!"

In quick time Mrs. Button appeared on the scene, and her husband hastily grasped one of the guns, shot at the bear, and wounded it in the side. The next instant he seized the other gun from his wife, but not knowing that she had already raised the hammer, pulled it so sharply that the lock broke.

The wounded and enraged animal was upon the man in an instant. With the breach of the gun Mr. Button defended himself as best he could, while his wife ran for the axe.

Meanwhile the bear, though worried by the small dog—the large one had cowardly run away—fought and struggled terribly, pausing at intervals to staunch the flow of blood from its side, which he did by crowding into it hair torn from his body.

When the axe arrived, a few well-directed blows quelled Bruin's fierce wrath, and being near the bank of the creek he plunged in, and shortly breathed his last. His body was found to weigh four hundred pounds. Mr. Button had a few scratches which healed up in a week or so.

The little dog who had so bravely stood by in the contest was much praised and caressed, while the cowardly Dash soon after changed masters.

SOAPING A GEYSER.

A Favourite Nevada Amusement Tabooed at Yellowstone Park.

In the hot springs regions of Nevada, when a man wants to have a little fun no one objects to his putting a bar of soap in a boiling spring, but it appears that up at Yellowstone park it is different. There Uncle Sam's officials are on the alert, and there are strict rules against soaping a geyser and starting it on the rampage. Recently three or four scientists from the East were caught soaping a geyser in order to bring on a premature eruption, and were run out of the park. The park officials arrested the savants, escorted them to the boundary lines of the National grounds, and told them to "git."

It is bad to tie a kettle to the tail of a dog, but that is a mean trick on a small scale compared with the enormity of soaping a geyser. The antics of a soaped geyser are something fearful and tremendous, whereas to many persons the frantic capers of a kettled dog are merely laughable. A kettled dog only goes into fits, but a soaped geyser goes into convulsions. It roars, bellows, spouts hot water, hisses steam, vomits whole acres of mud, shakes the solid earth, and spatters the whole landscape with slumgullion.

AGRICULTURAL.

Dairying in Sweden.

In the journal of the British Dairy Farmers' Association, lately issued, Prof. John Nathorist of Sweden, gives some interesting particulars as to dairy education in Sweden. He says that in the year 1851 the Swedish government appointed two travelling dairy teachers for the whole of Sweden, paying them at the rate of $1.000 a year, and also giving them free tickets and $1.50 per day when travelling about. If a dairy maid desires to improve her practice, the teacher will go to the farm, staying as long as he is wanted, in order to instruct her in either butter or cheese making, and at the same time he will advise the farmer how to feed the cattle so as to produce the largest quantity of rich milk and the best butter. When these teachers reach sixty-five years of age they are pensioned off.

In connection with the two Royal Agricultural Colleges at Alnarp and Ultuna, the government started in the year 1883 two dairy colleges, giving a grant to each. Here pupils are admitted either as in-students or out-students, and all provision is made for their accommodation. This covers the greater extent of the tuition, but in addition, the government pays every year 32 girls $41.50 each for learning butter and cheese-making on good dairy farms. The government travelling teachers inspect these farms two or three times in the year. The girls must do all the work in the dairy, and also milk the cows and feed the calves. The farmer with whom these girls are placed must instruct them in dairy management, arithmetic, writing, reading, spelling, book keeping for dairy purposes, &c. For his teaching he receives $27.50 from each girl, they paying for their board with their work. In the North, where there are no good dairy farms, the Swedish government has started two dairy schools for girls, at each of which six are being educated, but these have been established so recently that their results are scarcely apparent. When we turn to the tables which accompany this article, the influence of this education is seen. In 1861 the export of butter from Sweden was 20,574 kilos., and the import 1,110,181 kilos. In 1885 the export was 11,446,189 kilos., and the imports 2,844,599.

Flax as an Exhaustive Crop.

In the Ohio Valley there is objection to flax on the score of injury to the soil. "It is hard on the land," is a common remark of correspondents. Such is the first greeting of the Statistician of the Department of Agriculture, December, 1885, to the flax industry of the United States—an industry which produced 12,000,000 bushels at Chicago's average price, $13 500,000) of seed the last year. Its several manufacturing plants in the West are valued at $6,000,000, with an annual output of $15,000,000. The right of discovery of the true character of the flax plant awarded to the Ohio Valley (in other words, State) is not quite correct. All intelligent writers on agriculture from the days of Pliny and Virgil—all cultivators of the plant from the date (1629) of the legal forced planting on Massachussets' sterile shores to the utilizing of its appetite for mineral manures in subduing the fresh-turned soil of Dakota—have conceded its soil-exhausting capabilities. There seems a lack of wisdom in political economy that forces the farmer to export the raw products of the farm, freighted as they are with the valuable manurial constituents of the soil, or causes the Western pioneer farmer to waste his own most valuable fibre (estimated at 162,500 tons), while to bind his sheaves he buys (estimated at 20,000 tons) twine made from the interior fibers of India.

Of Interest to Dairymen.

By an act passed by the New York legislature and approved by the governor, the dairy commissioner is directed to employ expert butter and cheese makers, not exceeding five in number, whose duty it shall be, under his directions, to examine and inspect butter and cheese factories and the methods employed therein, and attend to such agricultural fairs, institutes, meetings conventions within the state as shall be designated by the commissioner, to impart thereat information as to the best methods of making butter and cheese. Five thousand dollars have been appropriated for the purpose. On or before Dec. 15 next the commissioner must report the number of experts employed under the act, together with their compensation and expenses, and must include the whole in his annual report. Another appropriation of $2,500 has been made to the State Dairy association to be expended in holding a number of dairy conferences in various parts of the state to illustrate butter and cheese making.

To Keep Chinch Bugs from a Corn Field.

A great many remedies and preventives against chinch bugs have been suggested and published from time to time, the most of them emanating from good authorities, but very generally so difficult and impracticable in their application as to be of little general use. In their migration from one field to another, at the time they first appear on the side of a field of corn and before they have entered it, cut five or six rows of the corn and clean the ground, then plow a strip of land eight or ten feet wide, leaving a deep furrow in the center of the strip, with the perpendicular side of the furrow toward the field to be protected. Into this the bugs will fall, where straw may be thrown on them burned. Or the furrow may be covered with some of the stalks that have been cut while they were green, by laying across it, when the bugs will crawl under them into the furrow and remain there in the shade long enough for the stalks to dry and be burned.

A Stable Precaution.

The following we know from long experience to be an excellent plan for tying up horses in such a way that they cannot get entangled in the halter: Go to the woodshed and select a round piece of beech, oak, chestnut, or other hard wood, about three inches and a half in diameter; cut off pieces say three to four inches long, and shape off the corners with a knife, so as to make the pieces as nearly round as possible. Next, either bore a seven-eight inch auger hole through the piece or drive in a staple and ring. Take the pieces of wood to the stable, and, instead of tying your horses' halters to the mangers, run the halter strap through the hole in the manger, from the inside, so that the end comes out in front of the trough, and fasten the halter strap through the block or the ring you may have put in it. This is a great improvement on the fixed fashion of tying. It always keeps the halter strap taut, and thus the horse cannot throw himself by getting his leg over the slack of the strap, but yet, when he wants to lie down, has "rope" enough for comfort, without danger.

The Wool Taste in Mutton.

C. M. Clay, of Kentucky, writing on the very common belief that when sheep are killed for mutton with the fleeces on them the mutton is rendered unpalatable on account of the wool taste, says it is all nonsense about the wool affecting the taste of the meat. He explains that "the bad taste is caused by the excretions of the bowels going into the circulation when the sheep are killed that gives the wool the flavor. The intestines must be taken out as quickly as possible; then you may wrap it in wool and lay it on ice for days, and if there is any wool taste I will eat the sheep, skin, wool and all." Indiana Farmer, commenting on the above, says that if mutton is treated as Mr. Clay advises there need be no concern as to the wool taste

Rendering Posts Durable.

I should like to have the opinion of your readers as to the cheapest and best preparation to put on oak or chestnut posts, so as to make them last the longest, with the method of putting it on. I do not mean to dress the whole post, but merely the part that is in the ground.—J. C. Lynchburg, Va. [A number of applications have been tried for this purpose, but many years are usually required for the completion of the experiments, and as various external influences have operated in opposite directions, farmers who have made the trials have conflicting opinions. Probably one of the best is the mode given several years ago in the Country Gentleman, of applying petro leum by boring a slanting hole in the post downwards near the ground and occasionally filling it with the oil and keeping it plugged.]

Prize Sheep for Canada.

No fewer than 850 live sheep will leave Liverpool to-morrow for Canada in the steamer Oxenholme. This consignment is the largest ever taken from England by one vessel, and the animals include a great many of the finest sheep in the country. Nearly all of them are show animals, and in many cases the sheep have been exhibited at the Royal Agricultural Show held at Nottingham a few days ago, at which some of them were prize winners. The Oxenholme will convey the sheep to Montreal, from which place they will be drafted to various farm in Canada and the Western States. The sheep are mostly of the Shropshire down class, and some of them are exceptionally valuable. —[Manchester (Eng.) Examiner, July 23.

Hay for Hogs.

Very few are aware of the fact that hay is very beneficial to hogs; but it is true nevertheless. Hogs need rough food as well as horses, cattle, or the human race. To prepare it you should have a cutting-box (or hay cutter), and the greener the hay the better. Cut the hay short and mix with bran, shorts or middlings, and feed as other food. Hogs soon learn to like it, and if soaked in swill or other slop food, it is highly relished by them. In winter use for hogs the same hay you feed to your horses, and you will find that, while it saves bran shorts, or other food, it puts on flesh as rapidly as anything that can be given them.

Hogs as Producers of Manure.

One hog, kept to the age of one year, if furnished with suitable material, will convert a cartload per month into a fertilizer which will produce a good crop of corn. Two loads per year multiplied by the number of hogs usually kept by our farmers would make sufficient fertilizing substance to grow the corn used by them; or, in other words, the hog would pay in manure its keeping. In this way we can afford to make pork at low prices; but in no other way can it be done without less to the farmer.

Notes.

I have found in my practice that one pound of Paris green to 200 pounds of plaster does all that could be asked for, kills the potato bug without injury to the vine. A knowledge of this fact has saved me many dollars.

Stock farming must be the foundation of all long continued, successful farming. Any other system is one of slow exhaustion and ultimate sterility. Ignore the sheep, the hog and the cow, and the land will grow poor inevitably.

The union between scion and stock takes place by the inner bark and not by the cut surface of the wood; consequently the skill of the grafter is exercised to bring the inner bark of the scion in close contact with the inner bark of stock.

American orchardists must soon meet the competition in English markets, of apple growers in Australia and Tasmania. The imports of choice apples from these latter points has already increased to such an extent as to affect British fruit growers.

The bulletin of the Ohio Experimental Station for May reports that trees dusted with air-slaked lime in Michigan have yielded abundant fruit. It can be mixed with water and sprayed, or applied by means of a flat paddle from a barrel in a waggon which is driven along the rows of trees on the side toward the wind.

Insect Friends.—California fruit growers have recently imported some Austalian parasites warranted to kill fruit pests. These little bugs, no larger than flies, feed on insect pests and rapidly destroy them. Congress will be asked to sanction the importation of these parasites, in order to clear Calafornia orchards from insect pests that are increasing every year.

Vaseline makes a very clean, odorless application for light harness, riding bridles, saddles, etc. After giving it a chance to dry in, go all over the surface with a rag dipped in the white of an egg. This gives it a waterproof coating that will last for some time and prevents the oil from staining the hands or clothing. Have the leather perfectly clean before oiling.

An exchange says that the Hollanders could teach Americans something about dairy farming. Good Dutch cows are held at $150 each, and are kept on land which often brings a larger yearly rental than would buy good improved American farms outright, and yet these Hollanders pay rent and make money besides. They are a thrifty people, and know a good cow when they see her.

A Tiny Lass in Court.

There is a court quarrel in Detroit as to who shall be guardian of little Mary Middleton. Presumably she has a fortune, but the Detroit papers haven't informed us on that point. Says the "Journal":—

The case was up again before Judge Brevoort this (Thursday) morning. "The evidence is contradictory and bewildering," said the Judge, "and I will justly conclude the unhappy dilemma in which I am placed by learning whom the child favours as a guardian."

Little Mary was brought up to the Judge, and as he stroked her hair with his hand he asked her whether she desired to go with her stepmother or her grandmother.

"Well, I don't know," she replied, "I loves my mamma, I loves the baby, and I loves gran'ma."

"But don't you know which one you want to go with?" asked the judge.

"I want to live with mamma, my gran'ma, and the baby both," replied the sweet-faced little one.

"Do you mind mamma?"

"Not always," she replied, "but I tries to, and feel sorry if I don't. But I forgets sometimes. I love mamma, gran'ma and the baby. One wants me to go wif her, and the other wants me too. I don't know what to do." And she looked perplexed.

Her replies put Judge Brevoort in a greater quandary than before. Both parties think much of the child and are capable of caring for her. Judge Brevoort will decide later

The Cobden Club.

So much is written about the Cobden Club and its baleful influence upon American politics, says the New York "Herald," that it is well to remember that James A. Garfield and other conspicuous Republicans were members. The Cobden Club is devoted to free trade. It dines annually, and has a small publication fund to supply tracts and broadsides. This represents its material existence. So far as providing money to subsidise American newspapers is concerned, we take it that its managers have about as much as they can do to raise the money for their annual dinner. The Cobden Club always seemed to us to be a kind of mutual admiration society, composed of loquacious people, free of access to foreigners who would pay entrance fee. And this is probably the reason why Garfield, who was an easy going fellow, and his fellow-Republicans joined.

A Good Corn Sheller for 25 cents.

A marvel of cheapness, of efficacy, and of promptitude, is contained in a bottle of that famous remedy, Putman's Painless Corn Extractor. It goes right to the root of the trouble, there acts quickly but so painlessly that nothing is known of its operation until the corn is shelled. Beware of substitutes offered for Putman's Painless Corn Extractor—Safe, sure and painless. Sold by druggists.

Time is short, but he manages to cover the ground quite as expeditiously as he would if he were longer.

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN.

Can He Swim?

Can your boy swim No! Then do not trust him in any sort of boat until he has learned the art, and feels as much at home in the water as upon dry land. You might just as well send him out alone into a crowded street before he has learned to walk. He might possibly creep along all right, and reach home alive, or somebody might pick him up and care for him, but the chances would not be in his favor. So in boating, the boy who cannot swim may get along very comfortably for a while, and not suffer from this defect in his education, but the time will assuredly come when he will have cause to bitterly regret it. It is one of the simplest things in the world, too, [illegible] can be learned in three or four intelligently directed lessons, such as can be had in any city swimming school or from the experts in any country village. By all means talk swim to your boy before you talk boat, and stipulate as one of the conditions of his having a boat that he shall first be able to swim a quarter of a mile without resting.

Women Who Never Rest.

Many woman never rest. They seem not to understand what rest—real rest—means. To throw one's self down with a newspaper or a book is not rest; it is only a change of occupation. To sit down and keep the fingers flying over some sort of fancy work, as if one were pursued by a demon of unrest, is certainly not rest. But to lie at full length on a hard surface, arms extended at the sides, head back, with no pillow, eyes closed, all cares and worries dismissed—this is rest; this will smooth away wrinkles in face and in temper; this will give an air of repose to the tired, anxious, nervous woman; this will take away many an ache and straighten out rounded shoulders and craned out necks.

English girls who are famous walkers are taught to lie down for a few seconds whenever they come in from their tramps. If Canadians would learn the value of lying down frequently, say two or three times a day, they would have as much go ahead and power to go ahead as they are now famous for.

The Princess of Wales' Bath.

The Princess of England whose complexion is not only the finest, but who has best stood the wear and tear of time, takes her morning plunge regularly, and in water fairly cold but she is particularly careful to promptly make use of the flesh brush, using gloves of moderate roughness rapidly over the surface of the body, and, finally, the rough towel in a quick, general rub, occupying both for the bath and this massage, if one may call it such, twenty minutes in all. At night the same lady's bath is prepared tepid and of distilled water, the admirable advantage of which is not properly understood. Every particle of foreign matter is removed from distilled water, so that it is absolutely pure. It costs about twelve cents per gallon, and can be used, a quart at a time, for a quick sponge bath, with admirable effect, especially when combined with a little glycerine and rose water.

Inferiority of the Sterner Sex.

"A woman will take the smallest drawer in a bureau for her own private use, and will store in it dainty fragments of ribbon scraps of lace, foamy ruffles, velvet things for the neck, bundles of old love-letters, pieces of jewellery, handkerchiefs, fans, and things that no man knows the name; all sorts of fresh-looking, bright little articles that you could not catalogue in a column; and at any time she can go to that drawer and pick up anything else. Whereas a man, having the biggest, deepest, and widest drawer assigned to him, will put into it a couple of socks, a collar-box, an old necktie, two handkerchiefs, a pipe and a pair of suspenders, and to save his life he can't shut the drawer without leaving more ends sticking out than there are pieces in it." Such are the sober, wise reflections of our esteemed contemporary the Stroudsburg "Times."

Sound Rules For a Woman's Life.

A New Hampshire woman, who recently celebrated her 80th birthday, having prepared every article of food with her own hands, upon being asked how she had kept herself so vigorous, replied:—"By never allowing myself to fret over things I cannot help; by taking a nap, sometimes two, every day of my life; by never taking my washing, ironing, and baking to bed with me, and by oiling all the various wheels of a busy life with an implicit faith that there is a brain and heart to this great universe, and that I could trust them both." Sounder rules could not be framed. Many a woman would be happier and live longer through adopting them.

Chinese Superstitions.

A girl who is partaking of the last meal she is to eat in her father's houses previous to her marriage, sits at the table with her parents and brothers; but she must eat no more than half the bowl of rice set before her, else her departure will be followed by continual scarcity in the domicile she is leaving.

If a bride breaks the heel of her shoe in going from her father's to her husband's house, it is ominous of unhappiness in her new relations.

A piece of bacon and a parcel of sugar are hung on the back of a bride's sedan chair as a sop to the demons who might molest her while on her journey. The "Three Baneful Ones" are fond of salt and spices, and the "White Tiger" likes sweets.

Telegram.

Mr. Whitney, General Passenger Agent of the St. Paul and Minneapolis and Manitoba railway, telegraphs as follows to their Canadian agent:—

"St. Paul, Aug. 21, 1888.—The information is incorrect. While it is true that the slight frost was experienced in some parts of Minnesota and Dakota, yet it did no damage whatever.

"Crop of wheat in Dakota will be much larger than last year. Last year we handled thirty million bushels of wheat. This year we shall handle fifty million bushels.

"Prospects are bright, weather magnificent, and everything confirms the farmer in the opinion that this is the land of seed-time and never-failing harvest.

A Cure for Drunkenness.

The opium habit, œnomania, the morphine habit, nervous prostration caused by the use of tobacco, wakefulness, mental depression, softening of the brain, etc., premature old age, loss of vitality caused by over-exertion of the brain, and loss of natural strength, from any cause whatever. Men—young, old or middle-aged—who are broken down from any of the above causes, or any cause not mentioned above, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for Lubon's Treatise, in book form, of Diseases of Men. Books sent sealed and secure from observation. Address M. V Lubon 47 Wellington street East, Toronto Ont.

No matter what the school of physic,
They each can cure an ache or phthisic—
At least 'tis said they can;
But as science turns the wheel still faster,
And quacks and bigots meet disaster,
To us there comes a man
Whose merit hath won countless exlcts,
Who use and praise his "Pleasant Pellets."

The "Pleasant Purgative Pellets" of Dr. Pierce, though gentle in action, are thorough, and never fail to cure biliousness, diseased or torpid liver, and constipation.

Isn't it strange that little girls rather than little boys have sonny dispositions?

A Lovely Woman

overheard one say of her "By heaven! she's painted"! "Yes," retorted she, indignantly, and by heaven only"! Ruddy health mantled her cheek, enthroned on the rose and lily. Yet this beautiful lady, once thin and pale, with a dry, hacking cough, night-sweats, and slight spitting of blood, seemed destined to fill a consumptive's grave. After spending hundreds of dollars on physicians without benefit, she tried Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery; her improvement was soon marked, and in a few months she was plump and rosy again, the picture of health and strength.

If persons with princely incomes would draw the line at imperial outgoes, there would be fewer bankrupts in the world.

"An idler is a watch that lacks both hands;
As useless if it goes, as when it stands."

Alas! how many women, though household and children need their care, are necessarily idle, because of suffering from diseases peculiar to their sex. To all such Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a precious boon, speedily curing internal inflammation, leucorrhea, displacement, ulceration, tormenting periodical pains, prolapsus, "bearing-down" sensations, morning sickness, bloating, weak stomach, nervous prostration, and tendency to cancerous disease. In all these ailments called "female complaints," it is the most reliable specific known to medical science.

MRS. DART'S TRIPLETS.

President Cleveland's Prize for the three best babies at the Aurora County Fair, in 1887, was given to these triplets, Mollie, Ida and Ray, children of Mrs. A. K. Dart, Hamburgh, N. Y. She writes: "Last August the little ones became very sick, and as I could get no other food that would agree with them, I commenced the use of Lactated Food. It helped them immediately, and they were soon as well as ever, and I consider it very largely due to the Food that they are now so well."

Sham Antiques.

Now that the time is approaching when the summer resorts of Britanny and Normandy will be patronized by seekers after fresh air, it is well, the Paris correspondent of the London "Telegraph" remarks, to draw attention once more to an old subject. Among the English, as well as French, visitors to such places every year there are numerous antiquarians, collectors of ceramics, and those whom the American humorist facetiously called "bric-a brackers." Now the members, or rather imitators, of the "Black Band" are as numerous as ever in France, and they still take a diabolical and professional delight in entrapping unwary antiquarian tourists by offering sham curios, articles of vertu, pottery, coins, and medals for sale. These people cunningly distribute reputed antique bedsteads, chairs, bahuts, medallions, and pottery-ware in old farm houses near watering places. The guides, hotel touts, villagers, and similar folk are told to sound the praises of these things in the ear of the tourist, who is flattered and delighted at the prospect of being able to pick up a bit of genuine old china, a rococo cabinet, a jar of "Old Gaul," and perhaps a buckler of javelin owned by one of Cæsar's legionaries. The diplomatic guide or tout is never gushing about the antiquities; but he generally insinuates in an off handed, distant kind of way that he knows or has heard of some old woman living leagues off who had kept such things in her family for years. The amateur antiquarian goes to the bonne mère, who shows him her collection and narrates their history; how they were heirlooms from her mother, who had been in the chateau of a local magnate, and had hidden them at the time of the revolution, and so on. Of course, the bonne-mere could not, on any account, part with the things; but, as monsieur is so pressing she has no objection to letting him have some of them at a fair price. The amateur then goes on to bid for the articles, and finally departs with half a dozen old plates, a couple of jugs, or a rusty javelin, deeming himself lucky to have found his curios himself. Next day the bric-a brac dealer from Paris receives notice of the successful sale, and he at once proceeds to pocket the pelf, to pay the usual percentage to all his confederates, and to replace the curiosities sold to the innocent and unsophisticated stranger by others. Thus the trade in the sham antique, goes on from year to year, and, despite exposures, there are still numerous victims annually.

Jesus, the Holiest among the mighty, and the Mightiest among the holy, has lifted with his pierced hands empires off their hinges, has turned the stream of centuries out of his channel, and still governs the ages.

Mrs. Wiggins (incredulously)—And do you mean to say that although you've been married a year your husband has never once alluded to his mother's cooking? Mrs. Youngwife—Never, Charlie's folks always lived at hotels, you know.

An English woman is responsible for the suggestion that with other improvements to theatre seats, there be an arrangement by which they can be sunk through a trap in the floor into a saloon below so that men can go out between the acts and see a man without treading on the toes of all the women seated near them.

Consumption

that dread terror, a disease so long baffling science and the most skilled physicians, who knew of nothing to arrest, nothing to alleviate, nothing to cure. Now it is no longer an incurable malady even when given up by physicians, health can yet be found in OUR REMEDY, it heals and soothes the membrane of the Lungs, inflamed and poisoned by the ravages of this fell disease, and prevents the night sweats and tightness across the chest which accompany it.

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

Symptoms for which No. 8 should be used:—

Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse, or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short the spring or vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and mentally, from early indiscretions, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address for Lubon's Treatise, entitled "Chronique Scandaleuse," an account of follies and vices. This book will be sent sealed and secure from observation upon receipt of two 3c stamps.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON.

THE GREATEST LIBEL SUIT.

The Pall Mall Gazette Objects.

The Pall Mall Mall Gazette, commenting on the action of Mr. Parnell in bringing suit against The London Times in the Scottish Courts, says:—"Mr. Parnell's trick seems to please his supporters and has disquieted his foes, but it resembles playing fast and loose, and we doubt whether it will do its contrivers any good. If Mr. Parnell has discovered the forger who planned the letters published by The Times, then it is no trick but the execution of a determination long avowed. But his admirers' ground for applause is on the trick which will bedevil the Commission of Inquiry entirely. If this is Mr. Parnell's object it is a false move, and Mr. Parnell has changed front in the face of the enemy, which is dangerous. The tardy adoption of a course which he refused to take when it would have been useful to his English allies will not be understood. The commission will proceed with the work and Mr. Parnell cannot arrest it. If he refuses to testify before it, he will harm nobody so much as himself. As Mr. Parnell's case stands he has no motive to hold his tongue but to challenge inquiry."

THE LIBELS SPECIFIED.

The Tribune's cable letter has the following:—Mr. Parnell sues The Times on the letters and on The Times' articles relating to them. Nothing is alleged, and it will be certainly difficult for The Times to go into other charges against Mr. Parnell. The libels complained of are, first, The Times' assertion that he said Mr. Burke, when murdered in Phœnix Park, got no more than his deserts; second, that he urged Mr. Egan to murder Mr. Foster; third, that he gave Frank Byrne money to escape to France. The Times, both yesterday and to-day, writes in a tone which indicates surprise and vexation that the action should have been brought in Scotland and brought in this form. If you were going to sue The Times why did you not sue before? say Mr. Parnell's opponents, whom he does not take the trouble to answer. There are Liberal friends of his, who say that if he meant to take this step he might have given them a hint. Many of them argued in the House of Commons that he could not do what he has now done. One or two Liberal papers object rather strongly to his present course. These points, however, are not the main points, except so far as they relate to the commission and to Mr. Parnell's supposed intention of asking the commission to delay action because of the Scotch suit. There was, as I long since said, a time when he might have prevented the appointment of a commission by bringing an action. It is not at all likely that the action will now have any influence whatever in the proceeding before the three judges. Sir James Hannen, I hear, dislikes the task before him, but will go through it to the end and precisely as if politics had nothing to do with the matter.

The Unavoidable in Railroading.

Some railroad accidents, and happily they are very rare, may be rightly described as unavoidable, and the public, whether it will or not, must expect its share of them, without recourse. To wholly avoid such accidents, the operations of the railroads would have to be discontinued, and it would be equally reasonable to suggest that the travelling public might themselves avoid them by ceasing travelling.

The accident of the other morning upon the Erie Railroad belongs to this class of accidents. A rock fell in the night during a great storm and landed upon the eastbound track of the railroad. A freight train came along, struck it, and was derailed, the engine falling across the adjoining track. A passenger train was due at the moment, and there was no time to give it the customary warning of the wreck in its path.

It went down an embankment, with loss of life and loss of property. Here is a casualty whereof the blame may not be justly laid at the door of the company. It cannot be alleged that, upon the strictest reading of the laws which are supposed to govern good railroading, the company could have prevented it. The track was in good order. The machinery was sound. The trains were running upon regular orders, and in conformity with all the regulations that assure safety. It was not therefore an accident which any known system of provident management could have avoided.

It is possible that a railroad should so police and scrutinize its roadway at all times that it should detect, and be required to detect, and instantly remove, or guard against, an obstacle precipitated there by the unforeseen fury of the elements. It is true that the immediate hillsides by which the track runs should be denuded as completely as possible of all objects liable to be dislodged. Under conditions of storm and rainfall, or otherwise, every declivity that gives upon a railroad may have some rock or boulder liable to be detached and sent down upon the track beneath. To a certain extent, danger of this kind may be avoided, and we believe that upon the Erie Railroad, as upon other great railroads, nothing has been spared to reduce the danger from this source to a minimum.

It is not to be required of a railroad that it shall take into its protective scrutiny whole ranges of mountains, any more than that it should builda house over the entire length of its line. The one would be as unreasonable as the other, and it ought, in all fairness to intelligent railaoad management, to be recognized that there is a point at which the actual responsibility for accidents should cease. And it may be added that there is nothing that is more easy to determine than the point at which railroad responsibility should end. It may be discerned by the simplest application of common sense.

Our Editor's Troubles.

Our amiable and gentlemanly Sheriff entered our office day before yesterday in his usual urbane manner, and announced that he must serve papers on us. It was a notice of a breach of promise suit against us by the Widow Clixby, who alleges that we have been toying with her heartstrings, and that it will take $5,000 of our cash to settle her thoughts back in the old channel.

It is another move on the part of our enemies to down us.

We first met the Widow Clixby twenty-eight days ago in Carter's grocery. She asked our opinion of herrings, and we asked her's of soap. She invited us to call at the house and see some poetry she had written on the rise and fall of the mastodon. We complied. We called there three or four times afterward, but only as a friend. On one occasion the widow showed us a clipping from an Eastern paper, to the effect that it was better for a man who had passed the age of twenty-three to marry a widow, if he was to marry, but we didn't bite.

We know our gait. If the widow Clixby can prove to the world that we have toyed with her affections we'll cheerfully go to goal. We are not on the toy. The widow will find us no jack-rabbit, and the enemies who have encouraged this new move may hear something drop before the trial is over.

A Novel Railway Accident.

A peculiar accident befel a car load of passengers on a Northern Pennsylvania railroad the other day. A physician boarded the train carrying with him a jar, or vessel of some sort, full of laughing gas, to be used on a patient on whom he had to perform an operation. Through the jolting of the train, or through not being properly secured, the stopper got loose, the gas escaped into the car, and before the passengers were aware of it they were all overcome by the effects, and giggling and grimacing like inmates of a lunatic asylum. The conductor happened in, in the course of his duties, and before he could realize the cause of the hilarity he, too, fell a victim, dropped into an empty seat and joined in the chorus. Finally some of the passengers who escaped got hold of the brakesman, and the train was stopped, the windows opened, and the passengers gradually revived.

THE THREAD OF LIFE,

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XIX.

AU RENDEZVOUS DES BONS CAMARADES.

In the cosy smoking-room of the Cheyne Row Club, a group of budding geniuses, convened from the four quarters of the earth, stood once more in the bay window, looking out on the dull October street, and discussing with one another in diverse tones the various means which each had adopted for killing time through his own medicum of summer holidays. Reminiscences and greetings were the order of the day. A buzz of voices pervaded the air. Everybody was full to the throat of fresh impressions, and everybody was laudably eager to share them all, still hot from the press, with the balance of humanity as then and there represented before him.—The mosquitoes at the North Cape were really unendurable: they bit a piece out of your face boldly, and then perched on a tree to eat it; while the midnight sun, as advertised, was a hoary old impostor, exactly like any other sun anywhere, when you came to examine him through a smoked glass at close quarters.

Cromer was just the jolliest place to lounge on the sands, and the best centre for short excursions, that a fellow could find on a year's tramp all round the shores of England, Scotland, Wales or Ireland.

Grouse were scanty and devilish cunning in Aberdeenshire this year; the young birds packed like old ones; and the accommodation at Lumphanan had turned out on nearer view by no means what it ought to be.

A most delightful time indeed at Beatenberg, just above the Lake of Thun, you know, with exquisite views over the Bernese Oberland; and such a pretty little Swiss maiden, with liquid blue eyes and tow-coloured hair, to bring in one's breakfast and pour out coffee in the thick white coffee-cups. And then the flowers!—a perfect paradise for a botanist, I assure you.

Montreal in August was hot and stuffy, but the Thousand Islands were simply delicious, and black-bass fishing among the back lakes was the only sport now left alive worthy a British fisherman's distinguished consideration.

O yes; the yacht behaved very well indeed, considering, on her way to Iceland—as well as any yacht that sailed the seas—but just before reaching Reykjavik—that's how they pronounce it with the j soft and a falling intonation on the last syllable—a most tremendous gale came thundering down with rain and lightning from the Vatna Jokull, and, by George, sir, it nearly foundered her outright with its sudden squalls in the open ocean. You never saw anything like the way she heeled over; you could touch the trough of the waves every time from the gunwale.

Had anything new been going on, you fellows, while we were all away? and had anybody heard anything about the Bard, as Cheyne Row had unanimously nicknamed Hugh Massinger?

Yes, one budding genius in the descriptive-article trade—writer of the interesting series of papers in the "Charing Cross Review" on Seaside Resorts—afterwards reprinted in crown octavo fancy boards, as "The Complete Idler"—had had a letter from the Bard himself only three days ago, announcing his intention to be back in harness in town again that very morning.

"And what's the Immortal singer been doing with himself this hot summer?" cried a dozen voices—for it was generally felt in Cheyne Row circles that Hugh Massinger, though still as undiscovered as the sources of the Congo, was a coming man of proximate eventuality. "Has he hooked his heiress yet? He vowed, when he left town in July, he was going on an angling expedition—as a fisher of women—in the eastern counties."

"Well, yes," the recipient of young love's first confidences responded guardly; "I should say he had.—To be sure, the Immortal One doesn't exactly mention the fact or amount of the young lady's fortune; but he does casually remark in a single passing sentence that he has got himself engaged to a Thing of Beauty somewhere down in Suffolk."

"Suffolk!—most congruous indeed for an idyllic, bucolic, impressionist poet.—He'll come back to town with a wreath round his hat, and his pockets stuffed with ballades and sonnets to his mistress' eyebrow, where "Suffolk punches" shall sweetly rhyme to "red-cheek apple that she gaily munches," with slight excursions on lunches, bunchs, crunches, and hunches, all a la Massinger, in endless protusion.—Now then, Hatherley; there's a ballade ready made for you to your hand already. Send it by the first post yourself to your lady, and cut out the Bard on his own ground with the beautiful and anonymous East Anglian heiress.—I suppose, by the way, Massinger didn't happen to confide to you the local habitation and the name of the proud recipient of so much interested and anapæstic devotion?"

"He said, I think, if I remember right, her name was Meysey."

"Meysey! Oh, then, that's one of the Whitestrand Meyseys, you may be sure; daughter of old Tom Wyville Meysey, whose estates have all been swallowed up by the sea. They lie in the prebend of Consumptum per Mare.—If he's going to marry her on the strength of her red, red gold, or of her vested securities in Argentine and Turkish, he'll have to collect his arrears of income from a sea-green mermaid—at the bottom of the deep blue sea; which will be worse than even dealing with the Land League, for the Queen's writ doesn't run beyond the foreshore, and No Rent is universal law on the bed of the ocean."

"I don't think they've all been quite swallowed up," one of the bystanders remarked in a pensive voice: he was Suffolk born; "at least, not yet, as far as I've heard of them. The devouring sea is engaged in taking them a bite at a time, like Bob Sawyer's apple; but he's left the Hall and the lands about it to the present day—so Relf tells me."

"Has she money, I wonder?" the editor of that struggling periodical, the Night-Jar, remarked abstractedly.

"Oh, I expect so, or the Bard wouldn't ever have dreamt of proposing to her. The Immortal Singer knows his own worth exactly, to our places of decimals, and estimates himself at full market value. He's the last man on earth to throw himself away for a mere trifle. When he sells his soul in the matrimonial Exchange, it'll be for the highest current market quotation, to an eligible purchaser for cash only, who must combine considerable charms of body and mind with the superadded advantage of a respectable balance at Drummond's or at Coutts's. The Bard knows down to the ground the exact moneyworth of a handsome poet; he wouldn't dream of letting himself go dirt cheap, like a common every-day historian or novelist."

As the last speaker let the words drop carelessly from his mouth, the buzz of voices in the smoke-room paused suddenly: there was a slight and awkward lull in the conversation for half a minute; and the crowd of budding geniuses was stretching out its dozen right hands with singular unanimity in rapid succession to grasp the languid fingers of a tall dark new-comer who had slipped in, after the fashion usually attributed to angels or their opposite, in the very nick of time to catch the last echoes of a candid opinion from his peers and contemporaries upon his own conduct.

"Do you think he heard us?" one of the peccant gossipers whispered to another with a scared face.

"Can't say," his friend whispered back uneasily. "He's got quick ears. Listeners generally hear no good of themselves. But anyhow, we've got to brazen it out now. The best way's just to take the bull by the horns boldly.—Well, Massinger, we were all talking about you when you came in. You're the chief subject of conversation in literary circles at the present day. Do you know it's going the round of all the clubs in London at this moment that you shortly contemplate committing matrimony?"

Hugh Massinger drew himself up stiff and erect to his full height, and withered his questioner with a scathing glance from his dark eyes such as only he could dart at will to scarify and annihilate a selected victim. "I'm going to be married in the course of the year," he answered coldly, "if that's what you mean by committing matrimony.—Mitchison," turning round with marked abruptness to an earlier speaker, "what have you been doing with yourself all the summer?"

"Oh, I've been riding a bicycle through the best part of Finland, getting up a set of articles on the picturesque aspect of the Far North for the Porte Crayon, you know, and at the same time working in the Russian anarchists for the leader column in the Morning Telephone.—Bates went with me on the illegitimate machine—yes, that means a tricycle; the bicycle alone's accounted lawful; he's doing the sketches to illustrate my letterpress, or I'm doing the letterpress to illustrate his sketches—whichever you please, my little dear; you pays your money and you takes your choice, all for the sum of a sixpence weekly. The roads in Finland are abominably rough, and the Finnish language is the beastliest and most agglutinative I ever had to deal with, even in the entrancing pages of Ollendorff but there's good copy—very good copy.—The Telephone and the Porte Crayon shared our expenses.—And where have you been hiding your light yourself since we last saw you?"

"My particular bushel was somewhere down about Suffolk, I believe," Hugh Massinger answered with magnificent indefiniteness, as though minute accuracy to the matter of a county or town were rather beneath his sublime consideration. "I've been stopping at a dead-alive little place they call Whitestrand: a sort of moribund fishing village, minus the fish. It's a lost corner among the mud-flats and the salt marches; picturesque but ugly, and dull as ditch-water. And having nothing else on earth to do there, I occupied myself with getting engaged, as you fellows seem to have heard by telegraph already. This is an age of publicity. Everything's known in London nowadays. A man can't change his coat, it appears, or have venison for dinner, or wear red stockings, or stop to chat with a pretty woman, but he finds a flaring paragraph about it next day in the society papers."

"May one venture to ask the lady's name?" Mitchison inquired courteously, a little apart from the main group.

Hugh Massinger's manner melted at once. He would not be chaffed, but it rather relieved him, in his present strained condition of mind, to enter into inoffensive confidences with a polite listener.

"She's a Miss Meysey," he said in a lower tone, drawing over towards the fireplace: "one of the Suffolk Meyseys—you've heard of the family. Her father has a very nice place down by the sea at Whitestrand. They're the banking people, you know: remote cousins of the old hanging judge's. Very nice old things in their own way, though a trifle slow and out of date—not to say mouldy.—But after all, rapidity is hardly the precise quality one feels called upon to exact in a prospective father-in-law: slowness goes with some solid virtues. The honoured tortoise has never been accused by its deadliest foes of wasting its patrimony in extravagant expenditure."

"Has she any brothers?" Mitchison asked with apparent ingenuousness, approaching the question of Miss Meysey's fortune (like Hugh himself) by obscure byways, as being a politer mode than the direct assault. "There was a fellow called Meysey in the fifth form with me at Winchester, I remember; perhaps he might have been some sort of relation."

Hugh shook his head in emphatic dissent. "No," he answered; "the girl has no brothers. She's an only child—the last of her family. There was one son, a captain in the Forty-fourth, or something of the sort; but he was killed in Zululand, and was never at Winchester, or I'm sure I should have heard of it.—They're a kinless lot, extremely kinless; in fact I've almost realised the highest ambition of the American humorist, to the effect that he might have the luck to marry a poor lonely friendless orphan."

"She's an heiress, then?"

Hugh nodded assent. "Well, a sort of an heiress," he admitted modestly, as who should say, "Not so good as she might be." "The estate's been very much impaired by the inroads of the sea for the last ten years; but there's still a decent remnant of it left standing. Enough for a man of modest expectations to make a living off in these hard times, I fancy."

"Then we shall all come down in due time," another man put in—a painter by trade—joining the group as he spoke, "and find the Bard a landed proprietor on his own broad acres, living in state and bounty in the baronial Hall, lord of Burleigh, fair and free, or whatever other name the place may be called by!"

"If I invite you to come," Hugh answered significantly with curt emphasis.

"Ah, yes, of course," the artist answered. "I dare say when you start your carriage, you'll be too proud to remember a poor devil of an oil and color man like me. In those days no doubt, you'll migrate like all the rest to the Athenæum. Well, well, the world moves—once every twenty-four hours on its own axis—and in the long run we all move with it and go up together. When I'm an R. A. I'll run down and visit you at the ancestral mansion, and perhaps paint your wife's portrait—for a thousand guineas, bien entendu. And what sort of a body is the prospective father-in-law?"

"Oh, just the usual type of Suffolk Squire, don't you know," Massinger replied carelessly. "A breeder of fat oxen and of pigs, a pamphleteer on Guano and on Grain, a quarter-sessions chairman, abler none; but with faint reminiscences still of an Oxford training left in him to keep the milk of human kindness from turning sour by long exposure to the pernicious influence of the East Anglian sunshine. I should enjoy his society better, however, if I were a trifle deaf. He has less to say, and he says it more, than any other man of my acquaintance. Still, he's a jolly old boy enough, as old boys go. We shall rub along somehow till he pops off the hooks and leaves us the paternal acres on our own account to make merry upon."

So far, Hugh had tried with decent success to keep up his usual appearance of careless ease and languid good-humour, in spite of volcanic internal desires to avoid the painful subject of his approaching marriage altogether. He was schooling himself, indeed, to face society. He was sure to hear much of his Suffolk trip, and it was well to get used to it as early as possible. But the next question fairly blanched his cheek, by leading up direct to the skeleton in the cupboard: "How did you first come to get acquainted with them?"

The question must inevitably be asked again, and he must do his best to face it with pretended equanimity. "A relation of mine—a distant cousin—a Girton girl—was living with the family as Miss Meysey's governess or companion or something," he answered with what jauntiness he could ummon up. "It was through her that I first got to know my future wife. And old Mr. Meysey, the coming papa-in-law"—

He stopped dead short. Words failed him. His jaw fell abruptly. A strange thrill seemed to course through his frame. His large black eyes protruded suddenly from their sunken orbits; his olive-coloured cheek blanched pale and pasty. Some unexpected emotion had evidently checked his ready flow of speech. Mitchison and the painter turned round in surprise to see what might be the cause of this unwonted flutter. It was merely Warren Relf who had entered the club, and was gazing with a stony British stare from head to foot at Hugh Massinger.

The poet wavered, but he did not flinch. From the fixed look in Relf's eye, he felt certain in an instant that the skipper of the Mud-Turtle knew something—if not everything—of his fatal secret. How much did he know? and how much not?—that was the question. Had he tracked Elsie to her nameless grave at Orfordness? Had he recognized the body in the mortuary at the lighthouse? Had he heard from the cutter's man the horrid truth as the corpse's identity? All these things or any one of them might well have happened to the owner of the Mud-Turtle, cruising in and out of East Anglian creeks in his ubiquitous little vessel. Warren Relf was plainly a dangerous subject. But in any case, Hugh thought with shame, how rash, how imprudent, how unworthy of himself thus to betray in his own face and features the terror and astonishment with which he regarded him! He might have known Relf was likely to drop in any day at the club! He might have known he would sooner or later meet him there! He might have prepared beforehand a neat little lie to deliver pat with a casual air of truth on their first greeting! And instead of all that, here he was, discomposed and startled, gazing the painter straight in the face like a dazed fool, and never knowing how or where on earth to start any ordinary subject of polite conversation. For the first time in his adult life he was so taken aback with childish awe and mute surprise that he felt positively relieved when Relf boarded him with the double-barrelled question: "And how did you leave Miss Meysey and Miss Challoner, Massinger?"

Hugh drew him aside towards the back of the room and lowered his voice still more markedly in reply. "I left miss Meysey very well," he answered with as much ease of manner as he could hastily assume. "You may perhaps have heard from rumour or from the public prints that she and I have struck up an engagement. In the lucid language of the newspaper announcements, a marriage has been definitely arranged between us."

Warren Relf bent his head in sober acquiescence. "I had heard so," he said with grim formality. "Your siege was successful. You carried the citadel by storm that day in the sandhills.—I won't congratulate you. You know my opinion already of marriages arranged upon that mercantile basis. I told it you beforehand. We need not now recur to the subject.—But Miss Challoner?—How about her? Did you leave her well? Is she still at Whitestrand?" He looked his man through and through as he spoke, with a cold stern light in those truthful eyes of his.

Hugh Massinger shuffled uneasily before his steadfast glance. Was it only his own poor guilty conscience, or did Relf know all? he wondered silently. The man was eyeing him like his evil angel. He longed for time to pause and reflect; to think out the best possible non-committing lie in answer to this direct and leading question. How to parry that deadly thrust on the spur of the moment he knew not. Relf was gazing at him still intently. Hesitation would be fatal. He blundered into the first form of answer that came uppermost. "My cousin Elsie has gone away," he stammered out in haste. "She—she left the Meyseys quite abruptly."

"As a consequence of your engagement?" Relf asked sternly.

This was going one step too far. Hugh Massinger felt really indignant now, and his indignation enabled him to cover his retreat a little more gracefully. "You have no right to ask me that," he answered in genuine anger. "My private relations with my own family are surely no concern of yours or of any one's."

Warren Relf bowed his head grimly once more. "Where has she gone?" he asked in a searching voice. "I'm interested in Miss Challoner. I may venture to inquire that much at least. I'm told you've heard from her. Where is she now? Will you kindly tell me?"

"I don't know," Hugh answered angrily, driven to bay. Then with sudden inspiration, he added significantly: "Do you, either?"

"Yes," Warren Relf responded with solemn directness.

The answer took Massinger aback once more. A cold shudder ran down his spine. Their eyes met. For one moment they stared one another out. Then Hugh's glance fell slowly and heavily. He dared not ask one word more.—Relf must have tracked her, for certain, to the lighthouse. He must have seen the grave, perhaps even the body.—This was too terrible.—Henceforth, it was war to the knife between them. "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" he broke out sullenly.

"I have found you, Massinger, and I have found you out," the painter answered in a very low voice, with a sudden burst of unpremeditated frankness. "I know you new for exactly the very creature you are—a liar, a forger, a coward, and only two fingers' width short of a murderer.—There! you may make what use you like of that.—For myself, I will make no use at all of it.—For reasons of my own, I will let you go. I could crush you if I would, but I prefer to screen you. Still, I tell you once for all the truth. Remember it well.—I know it; you know it; and when both know we each of us know it."

Hugh Massinger's fingers itched inexpressibly that moment to close round the painter's honest bronzed throat in a wild death-struggle. He was a passionate man, and the provocation was terrible. The provocation was terrible because it was all true. He was a liar, a forger, a coward—and a murderer!—But he dared not—he dared not. To thrust these hateful words down Relf's throat would be to court exposure, and worse than exposure; and exposure was just what Hugh Massinger could never bear to face like a man. Sooner than that, the river, or aconite. He must swallow it all, proud soul as he was. He must swallow it all, now and for ever.

As he stood there irresolute, with blanched lips and itching fingers, his nails pressed hard into the palms of his hands in the fierce endeavour to repress his passion, he felt a sudden light touch on his right shoulder. It was Hatherley once more. "I say, Massinger," the journalist put it lightly, all unconscious of the tragedy he was interrupting, "come down and knock about the balls on the table a bit, will you?"

If Hugh Massinger was to go on living at all, he must go on living in the wonted fashion of nineteenth-century literate humanity. Tragedy must hide itself behind the scenes; in public he must still be the prince of high comedians. He unclosed his hands and let go his breath with a terrible effort. Relf stood aside to let him pass. Their glances met as Hugh left the room arm in arm with Hatherley. Relf's was a glance of contempt and scorn; Hugh Massinger's was one of undying hatred.

He had murdered Elsie, and Relf knew it. That was the way Massinger interpreted to himself the "Yes" that the painter had just now so truthfully and directly answered him.

Two Meanings.

Some remarks, made in all innocence, are capable of unfortunate interpretations. Take, for example, that of the boy who proudly said, in regard to some toy, that he "made it out of his own head, and had wood enough left for another."

A celebrated English bishop one day stopped to talk with some village children who were playing in the mud.

"Well, my little men," said he, "what are you doing there?"

"We're making a church, sir,"

"Oh, a church, are you? But where's the parson?"

"There ain't mud enough to make him, sir," replied an urchin, innocently.

Life in Central Africa.

Just now there is unusual interest in the work of Emin Pacha in Central Africa, as more than a year has elapsed since Stanley left Europe with a view of relieving him at Wadelai. There has recently appeared in England a volume entitled "Emin Pacha in Central Africa," which is in the main a translation of the German, and consists of the letters and papers of Emin Pacha, edited by several eminent men, and among them Professor Schweinfurth. The real name of Emin Pacha is Edward Schnitzer; and besides many other qualifications for scientific exploration, he possesses keen powers of observation in natural-history matters. He refers to the existence of a diminutive race of people of about 40 inches in height, of a brown color, and very much feared by the negroes. They shoot small poisoned arrows, feed on white ants and roots, live in caves and are very active. This account almost seemed like the revival of an old fairy tale. Emin remarks that among the tribes in the Equatorial Province cannibalism is as widespread as ever. Though there is more shame in avowing the practice. Hardly anyone is buried, but the bodies are bartered, and those who abstain from human flesh are exceptions. Another curious fact is that the lion in the Monbuttus is much less dreaded than the leopard.

The lions never attack man, and are believed to be under the control of one of the chiefs, a simple, good natured individual who always keeps two tame lions in his house, and so long as he receives occasional presents prevents the wild lions from doing any mischief. There is a general belief among the natives that a deadly enmity exists between lions and hyenas, and that whenever the latter conspire among themselves they always get the best of the lions. Speaking of the great African python, he says that one of these great snakes may often be seen as the privileged inmate of the houses of the Agar tribe, and they are favorites more particularly with the women, who rub them down with fat, and even pour small quantities down their throats. The snakes seem to be so much at home that they will not think of touching a sheep or goat of the people with whom they live, no matter how hungry they become, but they go to the forest where they sometimes pay their friends a visit and are always welcome.

Forty-two Years.

A correspondent of an English paper, writing from Moscow, tells the story of two Russian peasants who have waited forty-two years to be married. They met when the man was twenty and the woman seventeen, but, being serfs and miserably poor, set themselves to work and save, to earn money enough to wed.

Even after serfdom was abolished, so slow was their progress that, after these forty-two years, they only owned between them a small wooden house and three hundred roubles. With this fortune they think it safe to marry.

How many Canadians would persevere for nearly half a century in laying penny to penny before venturing on marriage?

A clergyman who has married hundreds of couples among the fashionable circles of our seaboard cities, said lately, "The criticism may seem uncharitable, but it is matter of sober fact that in half of the marriages which come under my observation, there was reason to suppose that the motive of either bride or bridegroom was to better her or his worldly condition."

The reason of this is not that the young Canadian is less capable of deep, unselfish fee

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS

1st. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the Post Office, whether directed in his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for payment.

2nd. If a person orders his paper discontinued he must pay up all arrears, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and then collect the whole amount whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3rd. The courts have decided that refusing to take nepspapers or periodicals from the Post Office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud

DUTTON, SEPTEMBER 6, 1888.

WEEKLY WEAVINGS.

THE High School pupils are anxiously awaiting the arrival of their new teacher.

A GOOD PRICE.—Mr. Wm. Kerr, of Dunwich, sold his handsome carriage team on Monday for $450.

HAVING sold my business, parties owing me will call and settle before the 15th of the month.—E. McDIARMID.

COMPLETED.—The new switch at the station is completed and affords great convenience to shippers and those receiving freight.

THE Ontario Gazette contains the appointment of Mr. Henry Clay, Barrister, Dutton, to be a Notary Public for the Province of Ontario.

"JONADAB, or the ancient mode of dealing with the liquor traffic," will be the subject of Mr. Middleton's discourse in the Methodist church next Sunday evening.

MR. J. JOHNSON, is building a house on his property, part of the Wallace farm. Mr. W. H. Nelson has purchased Mr. Johnson's property on Nancy Street.

CATTLE KILLED.—A couple of cattle belonging to M. C. Leitch got out of the pasture and wandering on the railway track were killed by a passing-train on Friday last.

ANNIVERSARY SERVICES.—The anniversary services in connection with the Methodist church will be held on Sunday and Monday, 16th and 17th. Further announcements later.

WILL one of our Eagle subscribers please stick a pin in our correspondent at that place and wake him up. Our correspondents have been a little neglectful of late, but now that the hot weather is over we hope to see a budget of news from them each week.

A SLIGHT MISTAKE.—In an item in last week's issue, referring to a Scott Act fine in which Cavers was interested, a slight mistake was made. Cavers was not in jail as stated, but was under arrest for 48 hours, and through the clemency of the constable was not put "in durance vile."

NEW HOTEL.—A. J. Leitch, has purchased the brick for a new hotel to be erected adjoining his handsome brick block. The work will be started at once, and the hotel, when finished, will be one of the best in Western Ontario. Mr. Leitch also purposes building a store between the butcher shop and McMillan's harness shop.

BOUND TO GET THE BEAR.—Whether the following, taken from the Algoma Advocate's account of a bear hunt, refers to the editor we know not, but, judging from other reports received, we are inclined to think it does. The last sentence reads thus: "The citizens often hear terrible fusilades, but Bruin still manages to elude the cunning of his would be exterminator."

TO HIGH SCHOOL PUPILS.—The following is a portion of a circular recently issued by the Educational Department: "In order that all reasonable facility should be granted to deserving pupils to proceed with the course prescribed for second-class certificates, head-masters may allow those who obtained an aggregate of 600 marks at the recent examination on third-class work (even if they failed to pass in the minimum marks required in each subject), to proceed with the work prescribed for a second-class certificate."

WHO OWNED THE DOG?—At the police court Friday morning Daniel and Neil Thody's dog case was again investigated. It will be remembered that Daniel was summoned for non-payment of dog tax and swore he had given the animal to his brother. Neil was then summoned and swore that his brother's statement was false. A number of witnesses were examined as to the ownership of the dog, after which the magistrate ordered the animal to be destroyed and Daniel to pay costs of action.—Jonrnal. Dan is well known in Dutton, having worked in the livery stables here.

MONEY.—Private funds to loan on good security at reasonable rates. Apply at this office.

FALL GOODS.—Hockin & Pool have received a large consignment of goods suitable for the fall trade. Read ad. and go and see their stock.

THERE is a good chance for some active and trusty men to secure paying work at once by engaging with Jas. E. Whitney, Rochester, N. Y.

MR. FRED. DOGGETT, of St. Thomas, has erected a $500 grey granite cottage monument to the memory of John Pierce in Tyrconnell cemetery.

FORESTERS' SERMON.—Rev. E. Middleton will preach to the Foresters of Dutton in the Methodist church next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Brethren from sister lodges are expected to be present.

LONDON'S NEW PAPER.—The Evening Times, London's new paper, has made its appearance. It is a neat and spicy journal, paying particular attention to the local news of its own city and surrounding country, and deserves success.

I AM LENDING MONEY AT PRESENT IN LARGE LOANS ON GOOD FARM SECURITY AT 5½ PER CENT.—A. McCRIMMON, ST. THOMAS.

FARMERS who carry insurances on their buildings or crops ought to carefully inform themselves upon the conditions of their policies as to threshing engines now. Many companies require a special threshing license to be issued before they will be bound by the policy to pay losses caused by fires which originate from threshing engines, and all require certain conditions to be observed. It is better to be sure than sorry. Look over your policies and see that you are safe.

BOOMING THE TOWN.—This is the way W. F. Phelps, of the Morrison Bud, booms his town: "Tell me not in mournful numbers that the town is full of gloom—for the man's a crank who slumbers in these bursting days of boom. Life is real, life is earnest, and the grave is not its goal, every dollar that thou turnest helps to make the old town roll. But enjoyment and not sorrow is our destined end or way; if you have no money, borrow—buy a corner lot each day! Lives of great men all remind us we can win immortal fame; let us leave the chumps behind us, and we'll get there just the same. In this world's broad field of battle, in the bivouac of life, let us make the dry bones rattle—buy a corner lot for wife! Let us, then, be up and doing, with a heart for any fate; still achieving, still pursuing, booming early, booming late."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Journal states that a large sized riot took place at Sheddon on Friday night. Indians have been working in the flax mill there at lower wages than their white brethren, and supplanting them, and the latter have been threatening for some time to exterminate the red men. Friday night a crowd got together and attacked the Indians, succeeding in driving them out of the village, after a short struggle, in which several revolver shots are said to have been fired. LATER.—The young men, it appears, had assembled for the purpose of showing their disapprobation of the conduct of a resident of the village, whose relations with a married woman, formerly residing there, it is alleged, were not what they should be. Becoming primed with Scott Act the crowd, the majority of whom worked in the flax mill, remembered their grievance against the Indians employed in the same mill, at lower wages, and they proceeded to stone the house occupied by the Indians. During the melee revolvers were brought into use and sixteen shots, it is stated by the Indians, were fired by the attacking party. The Indians have in their possession several of the bullets. Some of the number consulted Police Magistrate Leonard in the matter, but not being able to give the names of any of the attacking party no warrants were issued.

DOTLETS.

—News scarce.

—He who gives becomes rich.

—Silence is the fence around wisdom.

—He who is loved by man is loved by God.

—H. Hollingshead is paying 95 cents per bushel for wheat.

—The doctor who prescribes gratuitously gives a worthless prescription.

—Two pieces of coin in one bag make more noise than a handful.

—Mr. J. Hockin, of Strathroy, paid his brothers in Dutton a visit on Monday.

—Mr. Lindenman, of West Lorne, has closed his branch store in Tyrconnell.

—Miss Katie McCallum, of Dutton, is attending the Model School in St. Thomas.

—Rev. J. W. Mann, of Iona, occupied the pulpit of the Baptist church last Sunday.

—"It's never too late to mend." Which is why so many people postpone mending indefinitely.

—Canadians look upon the proposed retaliation over the fisheries matter as a cod.—Goderich Signal.

—Inspector Beaton and wife have returned from their trip to Auld Scotia. The inspector brought with him a Shetland pony and a cart.

—L. J. Willson bought 35,000 pounds of wool this year, being over three times the amount purchased last year. This speaks well for Dutton as a wool market.

—We are sorry to learn that Captain Hazlitt, of the Salvation Army is very ill. The Captain's many friends anxiously look for her speedy recovery.

—Mr. E. McDiarmid, who has been in business here for the past two years, has purchased a stock in Culloden, and will remove there shortly.

—The Farmers' Advocate says potatoes should not be hilled, that repeated experiments have shown that potatoes not hilled yield from 10 to 50 per cent., and in some cases even 100 per cent. in advance of those hilled.

A DOZEN YEARS.

"Dear Sir,—For twelve years I suffered from dyspepsia and liver complaint and was so weak I could not leave my bed for eight months, and had little hope of ever being cured. Three years ago I tried Burdock Blood Bitters, and am happy to say I now enjoy good health, and I advise all who are afflicted to try B B B." MRS. Harriett Hobbs, Muir Avenue, Brockton, Ont.

OBITUARY.

Mr. John McDonald died in Duart on Friday last. Mr. McDonald had long been a sufferer from rheumatism and other troubles. He was the most intelligent man in this district, being cram full of Highland folk lore, a great Gaelic scholar—reader, writer and translator. He was born in the northwest of Scotland on September, 2, 1801; died Aug. 30, 1888. His wife, Mary McColl, born February 12, 1803; died March 5, 1888. His son John was a great favorite and deeply lamented over a wide district. Born October 26, 1837; died August 30, 1888. Donald, born June 26, 1844; died March 27, 1877. Alexander, born October 5, 1846; died October, 1868. It will be seen that three of this family have died within six months, five sons and two daughters, seven in all, having died within twenty years. Two sons and one daughter survive him, James C., merchant, Duart, and Samuel, and Mrs. Allison, Muirkirk. Mr. McDonald was buried at Duart on Saturday. There was a large gathering. Rev. A. Currie officiated.—COM.

ASTRONOMY.

To the Editor:—

SIR,—In connection with my last article the following remarks may prove both interesting and instructive.

People who live in the same latitude south of the equator, as others north of it, are called Antœci. For instance, the Patagonians are our Antœci. When they have summer we have winter, etc. They are the reputed Antipodes of the Chinese, as we are their Periœci.

The present time is favorable to view the Polar star and the adjacent constellations, but, when viewing them, we should remember that, although they appear bright and beautiful to us, those living within the Arctic Circle do not see them because they are obscured by the more powerful light of the ruler of the day (Gen. 1-16.) It has been continual day at the north pole for some time, and will be until about the middle of September. Hence a very reasonable question can be asked, Can a person viewing the north star to-night, or any other star, which we know is obscured by the sun, see beyond the plane of obstruction? If not, one star cannot be farther away than another. To those who take an interest in such things I would say, if the weather be favorable on the eleventh of this month we may see the space in which the asteroids move, as then Mars and Jupiter will be in conjunction, and between their orbits the asteroids move.

WM. MONSON.

RETALIATION.

LONDON, Sept. 1.—The Times says Canada may certainly reckon that reprisals affecting transportation in bond will arouse a great clamor among the large population dependent upon the prosperity of certain American railroads. Retaliation will likely enough be wrecked upon some such rock as this without the Canadians lifting a hand against it.

We ventured to predict the other day that President Cleveland's message would only serve to stiffen the backs of the Canadian ministers. To show that we were not wide of the mark, these, the first public utterances of members of the Dominion government, may cause the President to realize how wantonly he has embittered the relations of the two great nations of North America for an indefinite time to come. So far from flinching from the encounter Canada courts it. What our people are looking to see is whether the Dominion government will take the trouble to meet this double-edged weapon with another of their own make.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

Soothes and Heals

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

Luxuriant Hair
Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.
Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.
Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."
A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.
The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

To Assist Nature
In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral

the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.
L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."
Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.
For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

MERCIER WILL FIGHT.—Friends of Mr. Mercier assert that he is determined to fight Sir John inch by inch on the veto question. The course he purposes following is to order the magistrates to continue sitting until a writ of mandamus is issued against them. This will eventually be taken to the Privy Council, where the Premier says the appointments will be maintained as perfectly constitutional.
A young clergyman having agreed to supply the pulpit of an older brother absent from home, escorted to church the daughter of the pastor, and having seen her safely to her father's pew ascended to the pulpit, unconscious that this natural attention to the young lady was sufficient to excite lively imaginations and inquiries in the audience. Upon reading the hymn to be sung, the young clergyman was surprised to perceive evident efforts in the congregation to suppress laughter. The daughter of his friend possesses the mellifluous name of Grace, and, all unsuspicious of that fact, he had chosen the hymn beginning with the words "Amazing grace," and proceeded with:

'Twas grace that taught my heart to fear,
And grace my fears relieved,
How precious did that grace appear,
The hour I first believed?

Through many dangers, toils and snares
I have already come;
'Tis grace has brought me safe thus far,
And grace will lead me home!

ATTEMPTED TRAIN WRECKING.
Meagre details of a fiendish attempt at train wrecking on the Grand Trunk railway are to hand. It appears an east-bound freight train, on reaching a point about three miles east of Bothwell, between eight and nine o'clock Sunday night, ran into an obstruction, but as the train was moving slowly, the only damage done was the derailing of the engine. The trainmen, on making an investigation, discovered that two heavy rails had been placed across the track.
The officials are confident that the object of the miscreants was to wreck No. 55 express for the purpose of plunder, but they were foiled, for that train was from one and a half to two hours late, and the freight had received orders to come on. Had the express been on time in all probability a terrible disaster would have been the result.
About one o'clock Monday morning an engine having on board Constable Logan and a posse from London, left for the scene with the object of locating the scoundrels. One arrest was made the same morning.

BUNCOMBE TALK.
WASHINGTON, Sept. 9.—The House of Representatives continued the discussion of the Retaliation Bill yesterday. Mr. White, of New York, claimed that the provision for the stoppage of shipment in bond would cause a loss of $2,500,000 per year to American workman if enfocred.
Mr. Wilson, of Minnesota, held that the 1887 bill was inadequate, and concluded as follows: "But should the Queen of England and the Empress of India, forgetting the lesson of her ancestors in the past, aim or discharge at us one untriendly gun from one of her gunboats, I predict that the echo which it would awaken would not cease to reverberate before Grover Cleveland, President of the greatest republic on earth, would salute Charles Stewart Parnell as president of the youngest republic on earth."
Messrs. O'Neill, Cockran, Bayne, McAdoo, Henderson and White also spoke.
The House at 5:20 passed the bill by a vote of yeas 176, nays 4. Messrs. Bayne, Dalzell, Lind and White voted against the bill.

RETURN TRIP FROM ALGOMA TO DUTTON.

Before starting we will give a further report of Algoma. On travelling through a portion of the district we find some excellent land and some farmers appear to be making good progress. The harvest is just being done. The country along the lake is badly broken by rock and swamp, but from three to five miles farther back are large tracts of country for miles with neither rock nor swamp, but the soil is a little lighter being sandy loam. The timber which has been choice pine is pretty well taken off for some miles.
The trip from Thessalon to the "Soo," which was made by the steamer Pacific, is one of the most interesting for scenery, being among rocks and islands.
We started on Thursday, 6th, about 9 a.m., stopping at Bruce Mines and other points on the route, reaching the "Soo" about 6:30 p.m. There was only one thing of special interest and worthy of mention above the rest, which was all grand, and that was in passing through Big Lake George we discovered a bear which appeared to be making from Sugar Island to the Canadian shore. The captain's attention being drawn to it, he had the boat stopped immediately and ordered a small boat to be lowered and manned, which soon started in pursuit of Bruin, and returned in about an hour and a quarter with the game. The captain, who is clever and sociable, at once ordered it to be skinned, cut up and cared for as he purposed taking it home.
Stopping at the "Soo" all night we boarded the Minnie M. on Friday morning at 7 for Mackinac Island. After stopping at three ports we reached the island about 3:30 and St. Ignace an hour later. Going across the head of Lake Huron we found a very rough sea, which caused the boat to roll and plunge heavily and some of the passengers to "heave" a little, although the writer was not effected.
Having to remain at St. Ignace all day we had an opportunity to look about the place. St. Ignace is a town of about 4,000 population yet it is incorporated as a city, but it has the appearance of being a place of some importance, as it is at the head of Lake Michigan and is one of the upper ports of Lake Huron and the bay affords a good harbor. It is also the terminus of the D. S. S. & A. Railway. It has three papers, the Republican, Democrat and Watchman, which, we presume, do not vary much in circulation. One is under the amount of the ENTERPRISE and the others about the same.
On Saturday night about 11 p.m. we boarded the steamer City of Alpena for Detroit, making only five stops on the route, and reaching Detroit at 3 a.m. Monday, then the M. C. R. mail train at 7:10 for Canada, reaching home at noon.

WEST LORNE.

We send you few items this week for fear it will be our turn for the pin.

Mr. F. J. Lindenman is still making improvements. He has put one of the finest signs in the county of Elgin on top of his new hotel. Fred is bound to lead.
Mr Beaton and wife have returned from Scotland looking hearty Mr Beaton brought with him a very fine Shetland pony and cart which attracts a good deal of attention from the boys
A very pleasant time was spent at the residence of Mr. John Blake on Monday evening in the way of a surprise party by a few of the members of the Methodist church. Mr. and Mrs. Blake were made the recipients of a handsome hanging lamp, accompanied by a well-worded address, which was read by the Rev. T. C. Scott, and to which Mr. Blake made a feeling reply. The ladies, as usual, provided the good things for the inner man. Mr. and Mrs. Blake intend moving to St. Thomas, but will leave many warm friends in West Lorne.

RODE TO HIS DEATH.
About 6 o'clock Tuesday morning James, son of Mr. William Maxwell, discovered the body of a man lying underneath the M. C. R. iron bridge across Kettle Creek, west of the city. Constables Sissons and Balsden were at once notified. About the same time the M. C. R west local, Conductor J. Lowry, passed over the bridge, and noticed pieces of a railroad jigger, or velocipede, on the bridge, and the body lying underneath, and on arriving at St. Clair Junction telegraphed to the officials of the company, and Dr. W. E. Smith, the company's surgeon, and Dr. Gustin, coroner, were at once notified. The body was at once recognized as that of Mr. Henry Smith, M. C. R. section foreman on the first section of the St. Clair branch who resides in the M. C. R. section house near the residence of Mr. Lyle, Southwold. Just how the accident occurred will probably never be known. The deceased come to the city Monday night on the velocipede telling his wife he had some business to transact with Mr. O. F. Jordan, M. C. R. roadmaster. It is known that he stopped around the city until nearly midnight, and then started for home taking the south track. On Kettle creek bridge he was run into by a train and thrown through the bridge to the ground beneath, his neck being broken by the fall. When found Tuesday morning the body was cold, and it is supposed that the deceased must have been struck by No 2 express from the west, which arrives at midnight, the same train that Thomas McGaw jumped from some months ago and lost his life near the same spot. Smith's body was found lying at the south side of the bridge under the fifth bent, from the west end of the bridge. The velocipede was all smashed to pieces, some of which were found lying upon the bridge, and some underneath. Coroner Justin decided that it was unnecessary to hold an inquest.

The death rate of the city of Montreal is something startling. According to the Board of Health returns, the total number of deaths in July was 691, which gives a death rate of 42.57 per thousand. This is the highest rate of mortality for cities on the continent. The filthy condition of the streets, the want of sanitary arrangements, and impure drinking water, are said to be the causes of the excessive mortality.

The demand for Canadian produce in England is enormously increasing. The sale of Canadian apples in Covent Garden market is growing steadily. Smoked hams from the Dominion now find a ready sale all over London. Canadian cheese is also growing in favour, and excellent makes are being retailed at seven pence per pound, and the general opinion of the consumer is that the Canadian cheese is as good as the dearer American and English cheddar, HUFF'S TERRIBLE EXPERIENCE.

Days and Nights in a Swamp, Hunted by Negroes Bent Upon Killing Him.

Leander Huff, the mate of the steamer Cochoma, arrived at Memphis the other day after a terrible experience as a fugitive on the river below. One Saturday night, while the boat was lying at Concordia Landing, 160 miles from Memphis, Huff shot and killed a negro deckhand who was making at him with a knife. A crowd of negroes on the bank immediately made a rush for the boat, yelling "kill him," and before the gangplank could be raised half a score of them were upon it.

Huff ran to the after guard of the boat and lowered a skiff. The mob was so close on him that he had barely time to jump into the frail craft and push off when the foremost of them struck at him with a hatchet and clipped a piece out of his left ear. Seeing that their prey was about to escape, the negroes ran ashore and got skiffs and put out after him. It was a race for life, and with a single oar he contrived to reach a low, swampy island, two miles down the river, before his pursuers could overtake him. They fired a number of shots at him, but without effect.

Abandoning the boat he fled into the jungle, closely followed by the howling mob. He had gone but a short distance when his feet were caught by a vine and he fell headlong into the mire.

THE ACCIDENT SAVED HIM,

for the tall marsh grass covered him, and the nature of the ground prevented the leaving of a trail. Several times the mob passed so close he could have touched them with his hand, but after a brief search they left, doubtless thinking that he had gone to the river bank, a short distance further on.

All that day and night and all the next day he lay in his hiding place, tormented by mosquitoes and in deadly fear of the moccasins that he could see in the grass. He could hear the voices of the negroes from time to time and was afraid to stir. At last they passed him on their return to the landing place, and he knew from what they said that they were satisfied that he had left the island.

When darkness came he crept down by the river bank and plunged in to swim to the Arkansas shore, half a mile distant. He reached the bank more dead than alive, and dragged himself along the levee all night, hoping to catch a boat. At daylight he reached the hut of a white fisherman, who gave him the first food he had tasted in three days. The fisherman's boat was gone to a point fifty miles below, which cut off any chance of escape in that quarter. He told that the levee above and below was patrolled for miles by armed negroes on the lookout for him.

Again Huff turned and plunged into the swamps. Weak and weary as he was, he was in order to make the wide circuit that would enable him to elude the dusky watchers.

About 5 o'clock the following afternoon he again reached the river. But no sooner had he mounted the levee than ten or fifteen negroes made their appearance and ran toward him with exultant shouts.

"Better drown than be killed by these black devils, was Huff's despairing thought. Gathering his little remaining strength for the effort, he ran down the bank and leaped into the stream, diving as far as possible to escape the bullets that he knew would be sent after him. How he managed to escape drowning is a mystery. "I was pastswimming," said Huff, in relating his experience to day, "and I do not remember anything that passed. The first thing I knew a log floated by me, and I crawled upon it. Some time during the night I hailed a passing boat, and was taken on board. Then I fainted away, and knew no more until a cabin boy waked me and said Memphis was in sight.

STATISTICS.

The total area under cultivation in corn, wheat, rye, and oats in the United States this year is about 140,000,000 acres, or nearly 219,000 square miles.

The number of oxen and bulls imported into Great Britain during the month of June was 32,227, against 36,262 in the corresponding month of 1887—10,240 being received from Canada, against 16,441, and 14,269 from the Atlantic ports of the United States against 11,745. The number of sheep imported was 86,686, against 98,371; including 56,366 from Germany, against 31,748, and 23,315 from Holland, against 58,594. The number of cows received was 5,432, against 5,463; calves, 5649, against 5,866; and swine, 4,293; calves, 5,649, against 5,803; and swine, 4,293, against 3,234.

Mr. Gould's fortune has enormously increased since six years ago, and the general opinion places his resources at $100,000,000. As nearly as can be estimated the amount is distributed as follows:—

Missouri Pacific securities	$20,000,000
Western Union Telegraph Co.	30,000,000
Manhattan Elevated Railroad Co.	25,000,000
Union Pacific Railroad Co.	3,000,000
Iron Mountain Railroad Co.	5,000,000
Texas Pacific Railroad Co.	1,000,000
Government bonds	10,000,000
Miscellaneous and cash	6,000,000
Total	$100,000,000

The mathematical fiend has recently been at work upon the human heart. His calculation, as printed in the New York Mail and Express, is a curious one, and gives the work of the heart in miles and beats. It is based upon the presumption that the pulsations of the cardiac organ are sixty-nine each minute, and the assumption that the force of each pulsation is nine feet. Computed thus according to his figures, the mileage of the blood through the body might be taken as 207 yards per minute, seven miles per hour, 168 miles per day, 61,320 per year, or 4,292,400 in a lifetime of three-score years and ten. The number of beats of the heart in the same long life would reach the grand total of 2,538,848,000.

Careful estimates place the wheat requirements of the United Kingdom for the crop season at 140,000,000 bushels, and of France at 70,000,000 bushels. The spring wheat crop of the United States is not assured yet, many unsatisfactory reports coming to hand within the last few days. It is generally thought that the total crop of fall and spring will be 425,000,000 bushels. This will leave a surplus of from 65,000,000 to 75,000,000 bushels for export. Russia will have about 80,000,000 bushels for export and India 30,000,000 bushels. Roumania, Turkey, Egypt, Chili and the Argentine Republic will have a surplus in the neighborhood of 28,000,000 bushels. Including deficiencies and surpluses in other wheat-growing countries, the net result is a deficiency of 70,000,000 to 75,000,000 bushels. This deficiency will be made up out of the reserve stocks in the United States, Russia and India. If these estimates are close, it is not astonishing that prices are going up.

The annual rental of the cultivated land in England is estimated at 50,000,000 pounds sterling. This is only one-twentieth of the total revenue of the nation, and, according to the latest calculations, the culture of the soil provides for the needs of 4,960,000 inhabitants. If, then, England, with a more fertile soil than Ireland, with double her superficies, with considerable capital at command, and perfected agricultural implements, cannot succeed in obtaining therefrom a living for more than about 5,000,000 inhabitants, landlords, farmers and cultivators, it is easy to conceive how miserable is the condition of 5,000,000 Irish, distributed over a surface of but one-half the extent, and dependent almost exclusively upon the tillage of the earth and what it brings in. Ireland possesses 1,000,000 inhabitants whom she knows not what to do with, and whom she cannot feed. The excessive poverty of the people is an insurmountable obstacle to industrial development; there is indeed, in the first place, a certain degree of individual prosperity before a people can create for itself new resources, and extract from the land it occupies all that the latter is capable of producing.

Encounter Between a Spider and a Wasp.

Many years ago (a correspondent of the "Field" says) the writer, who was then residing at Durham, heard a remarkably loud buzzing in an out house attached to his dwelling. On going to ascertain the cause, he saw a wasp attached by the foot of a hind-leg to a single thread of a spider's web, which hung down considerably below the geometrical network. The buzzing was occasioned by the rapid action of the insect's wings, in its effort to free itself from the above incumbrance, and it was marvellous how such an attenuated thread could withstand the strain of so comparatively heavy a weight, combined with the twisting to which it must have been subjected by all these innumerable gyrations. The spider, quite a small one, was patiently watching these struggles from above, far out of reach. But presently, observing that the wasp was endeavouring with the fellow-leg of the opposite side to free the one which was entwralled, the cunning little spider ran down its rope, and rapidly attaching a fresh noose to the foot of this leg also, coiled it close to the other, and in such a way that the legs were drawn together behind the wasp's back, the scales of which, moving only inwards and side ways, prevented it from darting its sting in that direction. Then the spider retreated again to its former secure position and watched the results of this last manœuvre. In vain did the wasp continue its severe exertions till it became exhausted and comparatively still, when the spider slipped down again upon the body of his captive, and inserted into it some poison of his own, at the same time neutralizing any remaining force in the wings by swathing them with fresh threads close to the body. The poison seemed to act rapidly; the wasp was soon bereft of all motion and life, and was with apparent ease dragged up by the victorious little spider to a convenient spot for being feasted upon.

War with Bulgaria.

Can it be that the dark war-clouds which have been so long lowering over Europe are about to lift and scatter without bringing deluge? So Lord Salisbury, at least, seems to think, and few men are better qualified to judge. He has declared, in a recent speech, that all the rulers of the world are now seeking peace. Whether the British Premier speaks with somewhat more than conjectural knowledge of the tenor of the interviews which have taken place between the mightiest potentates of Europe, can, of course, be only guessed. His words, if correctly reported by cable, are, to say the least, not inconsistent with the supposition that he has had a glimpse behind the scenes. The principal statesmen of Europe are, he says, beginning to think that the best thing to do with Bulgaria is to leave her alone. To the uninitiated this seems not only a wise conclusion, but one so exceedingly simple that the wonder is it should have taken wise men so long to reach it. Unfortunately, Lord Salisbury does not seem to say with absolute certainty that those upon whose action most depends have even now reached it. For England he can vouch; but no one, we fancy, ever suspected England of any design upon Bulgarian autonomy. For Germany and Austria, too, he ventures to speak, though in a tone of modified confidence; but neither of these nations has shown any special anxiety to interfere with Bulgaria, save by way of counter-check to Russia. And in regard to Russia's readiness to accept the let-alone policy, Lord Salisbury only "hopes," though lovers of peace will be tempted to suspect that the hope may have a more direct and reliable source than even the recent declaration of M. de Giers, that Russia had washed her hands of Bulgaria.

The White Pasha.

There seems no longer room to doubt that the rumors concerning the presence of a White Pasha, with a strong force, in the Bahr el Ghazel district, are founded on fact. The probabilities seem now to be decidedly in favour of the supposition that the adventurous leader is Stanley. As we have before observed, there is nothing inherently improbable in the theory. It would be quite in keeping with the resolute character of the fearless explorer to attempt the larger enterprise, especially seeing that its success would be the most effectual means of accomplishing the smaller—the relief of Emin Bey. Nor is it by any means inconceivable that he may be even now acting in concert with the latter, and the two forces co-operating in a movement against Khartoum. Nor would it be very surprising if the civilian, with his trained force of natives, should eventually succeed where a British military expedition failed. Irregular troops are often better adapted for such a service than those who are fettered by military rules and traditions. Another supposition is that Stanley is quietly laying the foundations of another State, on a basis similar to that of the Congo Free State, and that this, rather than the suppositional march to Khartoum explains the mysterious movements of the unknown White Pasha. Reliable news will be awaited with great interest, and cannot be much longer delayed.

What the Baby Thinks.

BY EMMA A. OPPER.

It's a funny place that they've put me in—
A peculiar place. Why, I can't begin
To tell all the curious things I see—
Things that are certainly new to me.

I think if I'd been consulted, I'd
Have arranged things more from a baby's side;
For as things are now no wonder we squall—
Babies don't have any show at all.

I know that I'm little and fat and red,
With toothless gums and a bare, round head;
But what's the reason they talk as though
I hadn't the brains of a lump of dough?

"Cute 'little sing!" "See it's eyes so b'oo!"
"Does it 'ove it's mamma? Tum, now does 'oo?"
"Just look at his dear 'ittle, pink 'ittle toes!"
Do they think I like such remarks as those?

Do they think I enjoy the rubber ring
They have tied to my bib with an old red string,
When my oldest sister plays most all day
With a doll that I want the very worst way?

I'm trundled about in a baby cart;
It's enough to break any baby's heart,
When other people have lots of fun
On velocipedes. Why can't I have one?

My Brother Tom and Cousin Ted
Go out and slide, with a big blue sled:
I wish to ask, and I want to know
If there's any reason why I can't go?

I'm fed on milk, while others—well,
They're really delicious, the things I smell!
I'm rocked to sleep when the sun is high,
But nobody else is—I wonder why?

I'm kissed and I'm bounced, and I'm tousled up...
I've a rattle of tin and a silver cup;
I'm fussed over daytimes and walked with nights—
But it counts for nothing; I want my rights!

An Unjust Law.

A most extraordinary application of a very unjust law of the State of New York was made the other day. One Joseph Weber was, when but a boy, sent to the Elmira reformatory, and was kept there till he reached the age of 21 years. Six years ago he was released, and has since led an exemplary life. He recently fell in love with a respectable girl, and made arrangements to marry her. Under the law, it seems, the reformatory authorities have a supervisory power over those who have once been under their charge up to the age of 30 years. Word was sent to the Elmira officials that Weber was going to be married, and the unfortunate young man was arrested, taken before a judge, and ordered back to the reformatory. A law which can be applied in this manner is a disgrace to a civilized community. It would be difficult to find a more flagrant instance of legal injustice, either in the records of the working of the old ticket-of-leave system in England, or in the fictitious history of Jean Valjean, as related by Victor Hugo in his novel "Les Miserables."

The butter which Senator Palmer, of Michigan, uses on his table is made from the milk of his own high-bred Jersey cows, and costs him $3 a pound. But the Senator is a millionaire many times over, and can afford such luxuries.

AGRICULTURAL.

LEAN MEAT VS. FAT.

There is no doubt but that, in a majority of cases, the hogs that are now being sent to market have a preponderance of fat over lean meat. The system adopted by a great many in feeding has transformed the hog into a veritable lard keg. It is true that a hog should be well fattened before being placed on the market, but there is a vast difference between a fattened and a well fed hog. When a farmer is feeding for his own use he has only his own taste and that of his family to consult, but when fitting for market it pays him to supply that which the market demands. The intelligent feeder will have noticed that there is a growing demand for a better class of pork. Bacon, hams and shoulders that have the most lean in proportion to the weight are what are needed, and good sized young hogs that can supply this want will invariably fetch the best prices. The excess of fat of which we speak is due in a great measure to the continual feeding of corn. We do not overlook the fact that, in some instances, it may be attributed to the method practised in breeding, but the kind and quality of feed is answerable for a great deal. During the growing period, at least, oats, clover, milk, peas or barley, or a combination of any of them, should be used to create a tendency towards the production of lean meat. Constant feeding of corn, on the other hand, is certain to produce an adipose condition. The wisdom of discreet feeding will be apparent from this, and the aim should be with every feeder who is desirous of making the most out of his hogs to start in first with lean producing food and leave corn to finish off on. Another important thing to be considered, in connection with this excess of fat, is the liability of hogs to be unhealthy when in such a condition. It is a known fact that any of the improved breeds will lay on fat more readily than scrubs, therefore the policy of feeding muscle and lean meat producing food at the start will be readily seen. A healthier condition will be promoted, a finer quality of meat produced, better prices obtained, and in the long run a larger profit will be made all the way round.—[Breeders' Journal.

STOCK ENSILAGE.

The Mark Lane Express (England), points out that it is as easy to make silage in stacks as it is to make hay in stacks—and more so in a rainy season, and it impresses upon its readers that those of them who have not silos on their farms in the shape of pits, bricked graves, converted barns, &c., need waste no time in making or converting any such receptacles, inasmuch as it has been proved to demonstration that a stack of silage may be commenced, built, and secured on any locality suitable for a stack of hay, with, practically, no more trouble and—all things considered—with little, if any, more expense. With regard to the construction of silage stacks it must be borne in mind that adequate continuous pressure of some kind or other is absolutely necessary, and that wet crops are best left until partially dry before hauling. This is essentially different from leaving them, after much labor in turning, etc., until they are fit to stack as hay. If the crop or crops which are to be made into silage stacks are wet, they do not need much pressure at first; the drier they are the more pressure they require. The pressure of whatever kind employed, needs to be continuous, and adapted to the nature and condition of the herbage ensiloed. This is really the whole principle in a nutshell; as the stack sinks, keep it pressed down.

RATION FOR DRIVING HORSES.

EDS. COUNTRY GENTLEMAN—Will Prof. Stewart give good ration for well bred driving horses with regular work? Will he state the amount for each horse? E. M. Olney, Md.

E. M.'s driving horses are presumed to be horses kept for regular driving, having a fair amount of speed, yet not kept simply to display great feats of speed. A ration for good drivers may be made up by grinding 2 parts corn with 5 parts oats, and with this let the ration for each horse be compounded as follows: 10 lbs. cut timothy hay, 6 lbs. oats and corn mixture, 5 lbs. wheat middlings and 2 lbs. linseed oil meal. Let this ground feed be all mixed together dry, and then mixed with the moistened cut hay and given in three feeds, but principally morning and evening. This is an excellent combination for health and strength. The oats and middlings and oil meal will furnish abundant food for the muscles, and replacing the waste of bone. The small amount of corn will make up a proper balance of carbohydrates, the oil meal will keep the bowels in fine condition, and give a fine glossy coat. If this ration is given by a careful feeder, M. will always find his horses in satisfactory condition. There is too little attention paid to the mineral constituent of food for horses. The strength of horses depends largely upon the quality of bone as well as muscle. The mineral elements of bran or wheat middlings, as at present manufactured, contain a large proportion of phosphoric acid and lime of the best quality for making healthy, springy bone as well as albuminoid matter for the muscles. This specific ration is given for medium sized horses of 1,000 to 1,100 lbs. If larger and the work is exacting, add 1 lb. to the corn and oats and 1 lb. to the bran or middlings.

Telegram.

Mr. Whitney, General Passenger Agent of the St. Paul and Minneapolis and Manitoba railway, telegraphs as follows to their Canadian agent:—

"ST. PAUL, Aug. 21, 1888.—The information is incorrect. While it is true that the slight frost was experienced in some parts of Minnesota and Dakota, yet it did no damage whatever.

"Crop of wheat in Dakota will be much larger than last year. Last year we handled thirty million bushels of wheat. This year we shall handle fifty million bushels.

"Prospects are bright, weather magnificent, and everything confirms the farmer in the opinion that this is the land of seed-time and never-failing harvest.

The Burdens of Womanhood.

Thousands of women are silently suffering untold misery, simply because they shrink from consulting a physician in those numerous complaints arising from functional irregularities and disorders. Many a modest girl or woman prefers to bear her heavy burden in silence rather than to go to the family physician for advice. All sufferers from this class of disorders can, however, find prompt and sure relief in Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It is a specific in such cases, and has brightened the lives of countless women by restoring them to perfect health.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

European Peace Threatened by France and Germany—The English Harvest.

It is tolerably clear now that the English harvest will yield less than 55,000,000 bushels. Rain fell heavily again nearly the whole week. European crops are 15 per cent. under the average, but India, Australia, and Africa give a good surplus. Prices have advanced 1 to 2 cents a bushel. The market closes quiet.

An important London daily is publishing, under the heading of "England in Danger," extravagant exaggerations about England's defenceless condition This newspaper would have one to believe that any country, even Liberia, might whip England with a little determination, and the Chinese may perhaps be silly enough to share the views of the newspaper in question.

It becomes more and more evident that if war comes France is determined it shall not be her fault. Premier Godlet's reply to the last insulting note on the Massowah difficulty sent by Premier Crispi of Italy is most temperate and patient, so much so that Italy cannot continue in her provocative course without alienating the sympathies of all the independent powers in Europe. The belief which is gaining ground that Bismarck warned Crispi that he could not rely on the support of the triple alliance if he provoked a war without cause strengthens the hope of peace aroused by France's moderation.

The real danger to European peace seems to be in the constant endeavor of Germany's young, ambitious and incapable Emperor to get himself and his country into trouble. Should Bismarck's restraining influence be removed, it seems certain that the new ruler would soon find a pretext to satisfy his greatest craving, the sight of his toy, the army, marshalled, covering and firing off its guns in bloody earnest. After irritating France with its gratuitous brag about 46,000,000 Germans lying dead on the battlefield before giving up a foot of conquered territory, he has allowed his mouth to endanger the peaceful understanding of his country with England.

Two Pertinent Questions

The New York "Herald," August 8th, says:—The resolution which Senator Cullom of Illinois, introduced yesterday into the Senate, as we understand it, contemplates a policy of resistance upon the part of our Government to the successful rivalry of the Canadian railways in the matter of the transcontimental Asiatic trade. The action is proposed in answer to the averment that we are allowing a subsidised British line to deprive our American roads of business. The American Pacific railways were subsidised by the Government in a magnificent manner. Millions upon millions, in bonds, money, privileges, lands, were bestowed upon the projectors to the end that they should do what the Canadian road is said to be doing, namely, carry freight at fair rates and maintain for us this Asiatic trade. What has become of those subsidies, and why is it that the Government is implored to do over again what it has already done with princely lavish hand?

Consumption

that dread terror, a disease so long baffling science and the most skilled physicians, who knew of nothing to arrest, nothing to alleviate, nothing to cure. Now it is no longer an incurable malady even when given up by physicians, health can yet be found in OUR REMEDY, it heals and soothes the membrane of the lungs, inflamed and poisoned by the ravages of this fell disease, and prevents the night sweats and tightness across the chest which accompany it.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES!

DISEASES OF MEN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC No. 8

CURES The terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED, AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

Symptoms for which No. 8 should be used:—

Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse, or marital excess—impotency, inanutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of heart, hysterical feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes unsuccessfully acquired. In short the spring or vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and mentally, from early indiscretions, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address for Lubon's Treatise, entitled "CHRONIQUE SCANDALEUSE," an account of follies and vices. This book will be sent sealed and secure from observation upon receipt of two 3c stamps.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XX.—EVENTS MARCH.

"Papa is still in Scotland," Winifred wrote to Hugh, "slaying many grouse; and mamma and I have the place all to ourselves now, so we're really having a lovely time, enjoying our holiday immensely (though you're not here), taking down everything, and washing and polishing, and rearranging things again, and playing havoc with the household gods generally. We expect papa back on Friday. His birds have preceded him. I do hope he remembered to send you a brace or two. I gave him your town address before he left, with very special directions to let you have some; but, you know, men always forget everything. As soon as he comes home, he'll make us take our alterations all down again, which will be a horrid nuisance, for the drawing-room does look so perfectly lovely. We've done it up exactly as you recommended, with the sage green plush for the old mantel-piece, and a red Japanese table in the dark corner; and I really think, now I see the effect, your taste's simply exquisite. But then, you know, what else can you expect from a distinguished poet! You always do everything beautifully—and I think you're a darling."

At any other time this naive girlish appreciation of his decorative talents would have pleased and flattered Hugh's susceptible soul; for, being a man, he was of course vain; and he loved a pretty girl's approbation dearly. But just at that moment he had no stomach for praise, even though it came from Sir Hubert Stanley; and whatever faint rising flush of pleasure he might possibly have felt at his little fiancee's ecstatic admiration was all crushed down again into the gall of bitterness by the sickening refrain of her repeated postscripts: "No further news yet from poor Elsie.—Has she written to you? I shall be simply frantic if I don't here from her soon. She can never mean to leave us all in doubt like this. I'm going to advertise to-morrow in the London papers. If only she knew the state of mind she was plunging me into, I'm sure she'd write and relieve my suspense, which is just agonising. A kiss from your little one; in the corner here. Be sure you kiss it where I've put the cross. Good-night, darling Hugh.—Yours ever, Winifred."

Hugh flung the letter down on the floor of his chambers in an agony of horror. Was his crime to pursue him thus through a whole lifetime? Was he always to hear surmises, conjectures, speculations, doubts as to what on earth had become of Elsie? Was he never to be free for a single second from the shadow of that awful pursuing episode? Was Winifred, when she became his wedded wife, to torture and rack him for years together with questions and hesitations about the poor dead child who lay, as he firmly and unreservedly believed, in her nameless grave by the lighthouse at Orfordness?—There was only one possible way out of it—a way that Hugh shrank from almost as much as he shrank from the terror and shame of exposure. It was ghastly; it was gruesome; it was past endurance; but it was the one solitary way of safety. He must write a letter from time to time, in Elsie's handwriting, addressed to Winifred, giving a fictitious account of Elsie's doings in an imaginary home, away over somewhere in America or the antipodes. He must invent a new life and a new life history, under the Southern Cross, for poor dead Elsie: he must keep her alive like a character in a novel, and spin her fresh surroundings from his own brain, in some little known and inaccessible quarter of the universe.

But then, what a slavery, what a drudgery, what a perpetual torture! His soul shrank from the hideous continued deceit. To have perpetrated that one old fatal forgery, in the first fresh flush of terror and remorse, was not perhaps quite so wicked, quite so horrible, quite so soul destroying as this new departure. He had then at least the poor lame excuse of a pressing emergency; and it was once only. But to live a life of consistent lying—to go on fathering a perennial fraud—to forge pretended letters from mail to mail—to invent a long tissue of successful falsehoods—and that about a matter that lay nearest and dearest to his own wounded and remorseful heart—all this was utterly and wholly repugnant to Hugh Massinger's underlying nature. Set aside the wickedness and baseness of it all, the poet was a proud and sensitive man; and lying on such an extended scale was abhorrent to his soul from its mere ignominy and æsthetic repulsiveness. He liked the truth: he admired the open, frank, straightforward way. Tortuous cunning and mean subterfuges roused his profoundest contempt and loathing—when he saw them in others. Up till now, he had enjoyed his own unquestioning self-respect. Vain and shallow and unscrupulous as he was, he had hitherto basked serenely in the sunshine of his own personal approbation He had done nothing till lately that sinned against his private and peculiar code of morals, such as it was. His proposal to Winifred had, for the first time, opened the sluices of the great unknown within him, and fathomless depths of deceit and crime were welling up now and crowding in upon him to drown and obliterate whatever spark or scintillation of conscience had ever been his. It was a hateful sight. He shrank from the effort to realise it.

And Warren Relf knew all! That in itself was bad enough. But if he also invented a continuous lie to palm off upon Winifred and her unsuspecting people, then Warren Relf at least would know it constantly for what it was, and despise him for it even more profoundly than he despised him at present. All that was horrible—horrible—horrible. Yet there was one person whose opinion mattered to him far more than even Warren Relf's—one person who would hate and despise with a deadly hatred and an utter scorn the horrid perfidy of his proposed line of conduct. That person was one with whom he ate and drank familiarly every day, with whom he conversed unreservedly night and morning, with whom he lived and moved and had his being. He could never escape or deceive or outwit Hugh Massinger. Patrice quis exrul se cucque fugit? Hugh Massinger would dog him, and follow his footsteps wherever he went, with his unfeigned contempt for so dirty and despicable a course of action. It was vile, it was loathsome, it was mean, it was horrible in its ghastly charnel-house falseness and foulness; and Hugh Massinger knew it perfectly. If he yielded to this last and lowest temptation of Satan, he might walk about henceforth with his outer man a whited, sepulchre, but within he would be full of dead men's bones and vile imaginings of impossible evil.

Thinking which things definitely to himself, in his own tormented and horrified soul, he—sat down and wrote another forged letter.

It was a hasty note, written as if in the hurry and bustle of departure, on the very eve of a long journey, and it told Winifred, in rapid general terms, that Elsie was just on her way to the Continent, en route for Australia—no matter where. She would join her steamer (no line mentioned) under an assumed name, perhaps at Marseilles, perhaps at Genoa, perhaps at Naples, perhaps at Brindisi. Useless to dream of tracking or identifying her. She was going away from England for ever and ever—this was underlined in feminine fashion—and it would be quite hopeless for Winifred to cherish the vain idea of seeing her again in this world of misfortunes. Some day, perhaps, her conduct would be explained and vindicated; for the present, it must suffice that letters sent to her at the address as before—the porter's of the Cheyne Row Club, though Hugh did not specifically mention that fact—would finally reach her by private arrangement. Would Winifred accept the accompanying ring, and wear it always on her own finger, as a parting gift from her affectionate and misunderstood friend,

ELSIE?

The ring was one from the little jewel-case he had stolen that fatal night from Elsie's bedroom. Profoundly as he hated and loathed himself for his deception, he couldn't help stopping half-way through to admire his own devilry of cleverness in sending that ring back now to Winifred. Nothing could be so calculated to disarm suspicion. Who could doubt that Elsie was indeed alive, when Elsie not only wrote letters to her friends, but sent with them the very jewelry from her own fingers as a visible pledge and token of her identity?—Besides, he really wanted Winifred to wear it; he wished her to have something that once was Elsie's. He would like the woman he was now deceiving to be linked by some visible bond of memory to the woman he had deceived and lured to her destruction.

He kissed the ring, a hot burning kiss and wrapped it reverently and tenderly in cotton wool. That done, gummed and stamped the letter with a resolute air, crushed his hat firmly down on his head, and strode out with feverishly long strides from his rooms in Jermyn Street to the doubtful hospitality of the Cheyne Row.

Would Warren Relf be there again, he wondered. Was that man to poison half London for him in future?—Why on earth, knowing the whole truth about Elsie—knowing that Elsie was dead and buried at Orfordness—did the fellow mean to hold his vile tongue and allow him, Hugh Massinger, to put about this elaborate fiction unchecked, of her sudden and causeless disappearance? Inexplicable quite! The thing was a mystery; and Hugh Massinger hated mysteries. He could never know now at what unexpected moment Warren Relf might swoop down upon him from behind with a dash and a crash and an explosive exposure.—He was working in the dark, like navvies in a tunnel.—Surely the crash must come some day! The roof must collapse and crush him utterly. It was ghastly to wait in long blind expectation of it.

The forged letter still remained in his pocket unposted. He passed a couple of pillar-boxes, but could not nerve himself to drop it in. Some grain of grace within him was fighting for the mastery of his soul. He shrank from committing himself irrevocably by a single act to that despicable life of ingrained deception.

In the smoking room at the club he found nobody, for it was still early. He took up the "Times," which he had not yet had time to consult that morning. In the Agony Column a familiar conjunction of names attracted his eye as it moved down the outer sheet. They were the two names never out of his thoughts for a moment for the last fortnight. "ELSIE," the advertisement ran in clear black type, "Do write to me. I can stand this fearful suspense no longer. Only a few lines to say you are well. I am so frightened. Ever yours, WINIFRED."

He laid the paper down with a sudden resolve, and striding across the room gloomily to the letter-box on the mantelpiece, took the fateful envelope from his pocket at last, and held it dubious, between finger and thumb, dangling loose over the slit in the lid. Heaven and hell still battled fiercely for the upper hand within him. Should he drop it in boldly, or should he not? To be or not to be—a liar for life?—that was the question. The envelope trembled between his finger and thumb. The slit in the box yawned hungry below. His grasp was lax. The letter hung by a corner only. Nor was his impulse, even, so wholly bad: pity for Winifred urged him on; remorse and horror held him back feebly. He knew not in his own soul how to act; he knew he was weak and wicked only.

As he paused and hesitated, unable to decide for good or evil—a noise at the door made him start and waver.—Somebody coming Perhaps Warren Relf.—That address on the envelope—"Miss Meysey, the Hall, Whitestrand, Suffolk."—If Relf saw it, he would know it was—well—an imitation of Elsie's handwriting. She had sent a note to Relf on the morning of the sandhills picnic. If any one else saw it, they would see at least it was a letter to his fiancee—and they would chaff him accordingly with chaff that he hated, or perhaps they would smile a superior smile of fatuous recognition and smirking amusement. He could stand neither—above all, not Relf.—His fingers relaxed upon the cover of the envelope.—Half unconsciously, half unwillingly, he loosened his hold.—Plop! it fell through that yawning abyss, three inches down, but as deep as perdition itself.—The die was cast! liar for a lifetime!

He turned round and Hatherley the journalist stood smiling good morning by the open doorway. Hugh Massinger tried his hardest to look as if nothing out of the common had happened in any way. He nodded to Hatherley, and buried his face once more in the pages of the Times. "The Drought in Wales"—"The Bulgarian Difficulty"—"Painful Disturbances on the West Coast of Africa."—Pah! What nonsense! What commonplaces of opinion! It made his gorge rise with disgust to look at them. Wales and Bulgaria and the West Coast of Africa, when Elsie was dead! dead and unnoticed!

A boy in buttons brought in a telegram—Central News Agency—and fixed it by the corners with brass headed pins in a vacant space on the accustomed notice-board. Hatherley, laying down his copy of "Punch," strolled lazily over to the board to examine it. "Meysey! Meysey!" he repeated musingly.—"Why, Massinger, that must be one of your Whitestrand Meyseys. Precious uncommon name. There can't be many of them."

Hugh rose and glanced at the new telegram unconcernedly. It couldn't have much to do with himself! But its terms brought the blood with a hasty rush in his pale cheek again: "Serious Accident on the Scotch Moors.—Aberdeen, Thursday. As Sir Malcom Farquharson's party were shooting over the Glenbeg estate yesterday, near Kincardine-O'Neil, a rifle held by Mr. Wyville Meysey burst suddenly, wounding the unfortunate gentleman in the neck, and lodging a splinter of jagged metal in his left tempie. He was conveyed at once from the spot in an insensible state to Invertanar Castle, where he now lies in a precarious condition. His wife and daughter were immediately telegraphed for."

"INVERTANAR: 10.40 A.M. Mr. Wyville Meysey, a guest of Sir Malcolm Farquharson's at Invertanar Castle, wounded yester day by the bursting of his rifle on the Glenberg moors, expired this morning very suddenly at 9.20. The unfortunate gentleman did not recover consciousness for a single moment after the fatal accident."

A shudder of horror ran through Hugh's frame as he realized the meaning of that curt announcement. Not for the mishap; not for Mrs. Meysey; not for Winifred; oh, dear no; but for his own possible or probable discomfiture.—His first thought was a characteristic one. Mr. Meysey had died unexpectedly. There might or there might not be a will forthcoming. Guardians might or might not be appointed for his infant daughter. The estate might or might not go to Winifred. He might or he might not now be permitted to marry her.—If she happened to be left a ward in Chancery, for example, it would be a hopeless business: his chance would be ruined. The court would never consent to accept him as Winifred's husband. And then—and then it would be all up with him.

It was bad enough to have sold his own soul for a mess of pottage—for a few hundred acres of miserable salt marsh, encroached upon by the sea with rapid strides, and half covered with shifting, drifting sandhills. It was bad enough to have sacrificed Elsie—dear, tender, delicate loving-hearted Elsie, his own beautiful, cursed, dead Elsie—to that wretched, sordid, ineffective avarice, that fractional worship of a silver-gilt Mammon. He had regretted all that in sackcloth and ashes for one whole endless hopeless fortnight or more, already.—But to have sacrificed Elsie for the privelige of being rejected by Winifred's guardian—for the chance of being publicly and ignominiously jilted by the Court of Chancery—for the opportunity of becoming a common laughing-stock to the quidnuncs of Cheyne row and the five o'clock tea-tables of half feminine London—that was indeed a depth of possible degradation from which his heart shrank with infinite throes of self-commiserating reluctance. He could sell his own soul for very little, and despise himself well for the squalid ignoble bargain; but to sell his own soul for absolutely nothing, with a dose of well deserved ridicule thrown in gratis, and no Elsie to console him for his bitter loss, was more than even Hugh Massinger's sense of mean self-abnegation could easily swallow.

He flung himself back unmanned, in the big leather-covered armchair, and let the abject misery of his own thoughts overcome him visibly in his rueful countenance.

"I never imagined," said Hatherly afterwards to his friends the Relfs, "that Massinger could possibly have felt anything so much as he seemed to feel the sudden death of his prospective father-in-law, when he read that telegram. It really made me think better of the fellow."

Breaking a Wild Colt.

"Bush-Life in Queensland" gives an interesting account of horse-breaking in that colony. The horses to be broken are each in turn driven through various yards, until they come to what is termed the "crush lane." This is a lane wide enough to permit only a single horse to make his way up it. The fences are made of the strongest timber, and are very high. Up this lane a handsome black colt was urged, despite his attempts to the contrary, until he came to the end. Two or three rails were then fastened behind him, to prevent his making his way backwards out of his close prison. The fences touched his sides. In front of him the end of the lane barred his progress. Wildly the terrified animal reared and plunged in the confined space when he saw beside him, for the first time, a human being. The beautiful eye dilated, and the colt shook with fear, while every unexpected motion on the part of the trainer produced a plunge and kick.

With rapid and practised hands, Jack and Charley threw the surcingle round the now sweat-dripping body, and hooked up the end of it under the belly by means of a bent wire. Standing high on the fence, holding the long, sweeping tail, tangled in a huge bush-knot, in one hand, Jack put the crupper round the butt, and buckled it with the other. A strongly plaited greenhide halter was now slipped over the head, after which the headstall, with the large breaking-in bit, followed. Side reins were attached to the headstall, and loosely buckled to the surcingle, which was once more tightened up. A gate, which formed at this place one side of the crush fence, was thrown open, and the now tackled colt allowed to escape into an adjoining yard.

This it signalized by putting his head down to the ground, in close proximity to its forefeet, and in making, with humped back, a series of active, vicious jumps or springs, varied occasionally by a lash-out of its hind legs, winding up by galloping round the yard, and kicking at the halter, which trailed alongside it.

The horse-breaker, Jack, now let himself quietly through the gate, and stood in the middle of the yard, causing the young horse to fly round faster than ever. This Jack permitted it to do, until want of breath compelled it to move at a slower pace. Its hind-feet, treading frequently upon the trailing halter, and consequently jerking the head back sharply as often as it did so, also contributed greatly to this result.

Jack now lifted the halter, and pulled sharply on it, causing the colt, whose nose was now rather tender, to stop, on which, getting in front of it, he made it go round the opposite way. This he continued doing for about half an hour, by which time the colt had become so far accustomed to control as to turn and move in the other direction upon seeing his master's uplifted hand, and hearing his tone of command.

The breaker now caused the colt to move in either direction, touching him with the whip in an irritating manner whenever the animal presented any portion of the body but the head to him.

The colt soon learned that upon facing his enemy all irritation ceased, he was addressed in soothing terms, the jerking of the halter was discontinued, and also the motions of the whip; but that upon endeavoring to turn away or gallop round the yard, a severe jerk of the nose, a cut of the whip, and an angry raising of the voice invariably followed. The consequence was that he preferred standing, and watching the being who exercised such power over him.

The colt was not allowed to stand still, however. Jack irritated him to move, pulling gently and firmly upon the halter, repeating the process over and over again until the perplexed animal made a step in his direction, upon which the voice became soothing, and all irritation stopped, and the colt began to perceive that there was peace in the neighborhood of the man.

Again and again the operation was repeated, until suddenly the colt trotted up, and stood trembling within a foot of his now acknowledged master, who, gently extending his hand, allowed him to smell it all over. Little by little the trainer succeeded in stroking the animal over the head and neck. Indeed, such a glamour had he apparently cast over the colt, that, walk where he liked in the yard, the high-spirited creature followed, and stood patiently waiting, champing the large breaking bit in his tender gums, and flinging snow-white flakes of foam over his breast.

Here the colt was allowed a rest; and another horse was taken in hand and was in turn forced to submission.

The next morning the colt's lesson was repeated and in the afternoon his breaking-in tackle was exchanged for a riding bridle and saddle. This was accomplished in the same cautious, gentle manner, which had distinguished his previous education.

First the saddle received a few pats, then it was moved gently backward and forward; then a foot was quietly inserted in the stirrup, and weight put on it, the colt being made to stand still; then the right leg was slipped over, and the rider sat on the back, which never before had felt a burden. Then he dismounted, and the same proceeding was repeated again and again.

Another horse well broken, with a rider now came into the yard, and side by side with the black colt moved round the yard. The colt broke into a jog once or twice, sawing a little at the bit, and shaking his head, but one steady, firm hand kept him to the walk, while the other caressed him soothingly, his rider addressing him in various terms of horsy endearment.

This lesson over, the colt was pronounced broken, and allowed his freedom with the other horses in the paddock.

When the National Convention of Photographers met in Minneapolis the other day the chairman rapped on his desk and said:—"The convention will please come to order, fix its eyes a little to the right of the camera and look pleasant."

"I have a theory," said a Pittsburg man, "which is not founded on anything that I ever read or anything that I ever heard anybody say. I believe that people of small stature are far better natured than those of average size. Did you ever see a small man who wasn't good-natured and inclined to take a rosy view of life? did you ever know a little woman who wasn't jolly and full of fun?"

ONE NIGHT'S EXPERIENCE.

A Telegraph Operator's Adventure.

In August, 1882, I went to visit a friend who kept a variety store and was, at the same time, a telegraph operator in Winfield.

Her place of business was over the local bank, and to it a wire had been looped from the railroad station, a half-mile away, for the accommodation of those in the village proper.

It was quite late in the day when I reached Winfield, and almost the first thing my friend said to me was:

"About an hour ago I received a note requesting me to come and see my brother who is quite ill in a town 20 miles distant from here. I am sorry to do so, but I know you will excuse me for leaving you under the circumstances."

"Certainly," I replied.

"This is my sleeping-room," opening a door, leading from her store. "Are you afraid to occupy it alone to-night?"

"No, indeed," I answered, though I must confess the prospect was not a pleasing one to me.

"If you are I will arrange for you to stop elsewhere or have some one come in and stay with you."

"You need give yourself no uneasiness on my account," I said with an air of bravado by no means mine.

At a few minutes past eight she bade me "goodby," observing that she should return at 5.30 the next morning.

So I was left alone, and, somewhat weary from my long journey, extinguished the light, and having locked the door, went to bed.

It was a very sultry night, and the heat, combined with the nervousness caused by a thunder shower and my isolated situation, rendered it impossible for me to sleep much. I would have a short nap and then wake to toss about on the bed.

Some time after I had heard the town clock strike 12, I rose, went into the store or "office," as you prefer, and seated myself beside an open window, whose blinds were closed. I had been seated there but a short time when voices beneath the window were audible, though in a low tone.

"Are you sure she has gone?' asked one.

"Yes" was the reply. "I sent her a note informing her that her brother was ill, and asking her to come to him immediately. Besides, I was at the station when she took the train for his place of residence, this evening at five minutes before nine it was thirty minutes late.'

"I believe she has a room mate," said a third person.

"Usually, but she is now out of town."

"Then you are positive that the building is deserted?" the first speaker, judging from the tone, enquired.

"Yes."

Ere long up through the register—by means of which the store was heated during the winter—came a confusion of sounds, and I knew the bank was being burglarized.

I hastily dressed myself—in the dark—wondering "What shall I do?"

I dare not attempt an escape from the building, feeling certain that there was a guard outside; that I should be seen, seized, and possible fatally dealt with.

"For the fun of it," I had learned enough of telegraphy to "send" fairly well and read from paper, as did the inexpert operator in the village where I lived, who used a "register"; to read by sound" I was unable.

I had learned one "call" on the line passing through Winfield, by reason of my friend having had to send a message to the office whose it was since my arrival in the place. Where it was or whether a "night" office, I was ignorant. But, grasping the key, I called "S" several times in rapid succession. The "sounder" clicked, I knew not what, and then I wrote:

"Burglars in the bank at Winfield. I am not an operator, but a prisoner in the office over the bank. Send me assistance if you can."

Again the "sounder" clicked—unintelligibly to me, as before.

A death like silence ensued, broken only by peals of thunder and the faint sounds stealing up from the back.

After the town clock had struck I—how long after I cannot say—heard the galloping of several horses, and they stopped in front of the bank building. Closely following were fearful imprecations and discharges of firearms in the bank.

Soon there was a rap on the door from the hallway to the apartment where I sat bathed in a cold prespiration, and I heard, "Let me in please." Confident that no harm was intended me, I opened the door and—fainted.

The strain upon my nervous system had been so severe that a "prostration" resulted from which I did not recover for many weeks.

Then I learned that calling "Sx" I was heard by a "night" operator 50 miles away who had asked: "don't you know that is not a night office?" a response which was not comprehended by me, as I have said; that hearing what I "sent" he had wired the information to a town where there was a "night" office, only six miles from Winfield, but not directly connected with it by rail or wire; that a number of men had immediately started from this town for Winfield, reaching it before the burglars had succeeded in opening the vault; that the manager of the "job," the one who sent the forged note to my friend, knew nothing of my existence, though he had carefully watched those entering and leaving the building the previous day; that during the fray in the bank, between the malefactors and their visitors, one of the former was seriously wounded; that all of them were in close confinement.

My courage (?) and presence of mind were more extensively paraded than, in my opinion, they should have been, and the president of the bank handed me $1000, saying:

"Please accept this token of our appreciation of your services, without the the least feeling of delicacy. But for you the entire contents of the vault—nearly $100,000—would have been taken, to be recovered—if at all—only at great expense."

Not burdened with this world's goods, what could I do but accept it—gratefully?

I would not, however, suffer again, as I did that night, for the wealth of any money king.

Beautiful Thoughts Have Wings.

BY LAURA BELL.

Beautiful birds have plumage,
Beautiful thoughts have wings;
Stars shine far above the sight
Of earth's vague wh sperings.
Under the earth's broad bosom
Never a beauty lies
But shall burn its way to the rim of day,
And flash to our wondering eyes.

Beautiful gems lie hidden
Under the fold of earth;
Even the slime hides a thought sublime
Till the time of the lily's birth.
Even the birds went creeping
Wingless and featherless,
Till plume by plume, like roses' bloom,
They borrowed the singer's dress.

Beautiful birds have plumage,
Beautiful thoughts fly high;
The poet's song cannot slumber long,
Its track is the boundless sky.
Under the infinite heaven
Never a wing unfurled
But shall find its way to the verge of day,
And flash on some wondering world.

If one person could have a monopoly of lying he might make his fortune in no time; but, unfortunately, there are so many in the business that the profits are ridiculously small, considering the amount that has to be invested.

A Sunday-school teacher was explaining the parable of the ten virgins to her class, who were mostly boys. When she had finished she asked: "Now, why were five of them foolish?" "Because they didn't get married," said one of the boys.

It is much the same in politics as in religion. We first make up our minds in which direction we will go and then spend our lives in the endeavor to convince ourselves that we have chosen the right path. And we refuse to admit any but exparte evidence; anything that tells against us is ruled out as irrelevant or unworthy of belief.

To his fond father, who has asked him where he is in his class now—"Oh, pa, I've got a much better place than I had the last term." "Indeed! Well, where are you?" "I'm fourteenth." "Fourteenth! you little lazy bones! You were eighth last term. Do you call that a better place?" "Yes; it will be nearer the stove this Winter."

MONEY.—Private funds to loan on good security at reasonable rates. Apply at this office.

THOSE who are indebted to this office either on subscription or otherwise would oblige by calling and settling.

HAVING sold my business, parties owing me will call and settle before the 15th of the month.—E. MCDIARMID.

A. D. URLIN, of Wallacetown, has received a cheque for $11,000, being the full amount of insurance for his recent loss by fire.

IT is reported that Clachan, Cowal and Middlemarch post-offices in West Elgin, and Seville, in the East, may be closed for want of postmasters.

ELGIN county council are paying a reward of $5 for every conviction of parties driving faster than a walk over county bridges.

THE wife of Rev. W. Grant received word on Monday that her mother had been burnt out at Harrietsville. She started on the midnight express for Harrietsville.

WE have received a press badge from the secretary of the Southern Fair, which is held at Brantford and has become very popular. The dates are 11, 12 and 13.

NEW STORE.—Mr. A. D. Urlin has opened out with a new stock of goods in the brick store in Wallacetown, formerly occupied by Hockin & Pool. New goods and low prices. Give him a call.

ON Monday while Mr. Bury, who works in Bake's butcher shop, was taking in ice he slipped, striking his back on the handle of the door. Mr. Bury was seriously hurt and at one time it was feared that paralysis would set in, but at last accounts no danger was expected.

CHEAPER THAN THE CHEAPEST.—W. I. Schultz & Son will not be undersold in their line. Coffins and caskets cheaper than any house in or outside of the combine. Furniture at lowest possible prices. See bills and ad.

BROKE HER ARM.—Mrs. McCallum, widow of the late John McCallum, is subject to fits. On Thursday last during one of these attacks she fell breaking her arm above the wrist. Dr. Leitch was called and attended to her injuries.

THE holiday season is drawing to a close. Picnic parties are out of date, and harvest homes have the call. Fall fairs, paring bees and pumpkin pie socials will soon engage the rural mind and moonlight promenades on the side-road be abandoned for sweet cider and doughnuts in the kitchen corner. Such is life. We are here to-morrow, and next week we may be in the same place.

THE Canadian Manufacturer, published in the manufacturing interests of the Dominion, is the most interesting trade journal that comes to our office. Its neat typographical appearance, and the interesting matter it furnishes its readers ought to insure it a large patronage among the manufacturers of the Dominion. The recent publication of a series of biographical sketches accompanied by very excellent artotype portraits of the leading "Captains of Industry," enhances its value.

GUARDING THE DEAD.—John Finlayson, of Campbellton, formerly a medical student in Dr. Leitch's office, Dutton, died recently, and was buried at Kerr's burying ground, near the river. His friends, from what cause is not known, conceived the idea that the medical fraternity desired to exhume the body for examination as to the cause of death. They have therefore watched the grave ever since the burial, and every night two sombre-looking figures, with muskets over their shoulders, keep silent guard over the grave. It would be a serious matter for any enterprising son of Esculapius to come around there.—Journal.

LARGE stock of envelopes and note paper, just arrived at the ENTERPRISE Office.

CREDIT SALE.—Peter Duncanson, auctioneer, will sell by public auction the stock and implements belonging to John H. McIntyre, on lot 21, concession 4, Dunwich, on Thursday, Sept. 20.

THE ancient proverb says: "You cannot get more out of a bottle than you put in it." That's an error. Besides what he put in, he can get a headache, a sick stomach and perhaps ten days in the lock-up.

THE St. Thomas Times says that the residence of one of Dutton's prominent citizens was entered on Sunday evening while the members of the household were at church and a quantity of jewelry stolen, and that a certain roving character is suspected of the theft.

FORESTERS' SERMON.—On Sunday last Court Nelson, accompanied by brethren from West Lorne, Wallacetown, Glencoe, Alvinston and Rodney Courts attended divine service at the Methodist church, where a sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Middleton.

THERE is a good chance for some active and trusty men to secure paying work at once by engaging with Jas. E. Whitney, Rochester, N. Y.

ACCIDENT.—While coming to Dutton on Sunday last an accident happened to Mr. Rapelje, Mr. Backus and Mr. A. D. Urlin and family. One of the bolts holding the shafts came out causing the horse to sheer to one side turning the rig completely over. Mr. Rapelje received a severe sprain to his ankle, but is able to be around on crutches. The other occupants escaped with a severe shaking up.

A NEW issue of ten dollar and five dollar bills was put in circulation on Saturday by the Bank of Commerce. Instead of the portrait of the late Senator McMaster, President of the Bank, the larger bill has a helmeted female head and the smaller a female form. The backs bear a picture of the new bank building printed in blue on the new $10 bill and in brown on the $5 bill. The face is printed in several colors. The notes are considered to be very handsome as well as durable.

I AM LENDING MONEY AT PRESENT IN LARGE LOANS ON GOOD FARM SECURITY AT 5½ PER CENT.—A. MCCRIMMON, ST. THOMAS.

THE editor of this journal was not much benefited by his trip to Algoma. While there he was on a scaffold giving some assistance about the gothic of a house, when the scaffold gave away and the three occupants went to the ground. Emanuel Holcombe escaped with slight bruises, John received a sprained ankle and a bruised chest. N. Phelps was the worst hurt, having lit fair on his feet and stopping so suddenly that he was pretty badly shaken up. He has now been poorly for two weeks, and it will likely be two weeks more before he will fully recover.

ANNIVERSARY SERVICES.—The anniversary services in connection with the Methodist church will be held on Sunday and Monday next. Rev. E. B. Lancely, of London, will preach in the morning at 10:30 and in the evening at 7. Rev. Mr. Barron, Presbyterian supply pro tem, will preach in the afternoon at 2:30. On Monday evening a grand harvest home tea will be served in Leitch's hall. Addresses by Revs. Lancely, Hamilton, Scott and others. Music by the choir. As the proceeds are to be applied in improving the church we bespeak a large attendance.

FALL FAIRS.—The Toronto exhibition was opened on Tuesday of this week by the Governor-General, Lord Stanley. The special attractions secured are the best that money could procure and this promises to be the grandest exhibition ever held in the Queen City.——The Western opens in London on September 20 and continues to the 29th. There will be larger prizes, grander attractions, more to see and more to learn at this than at any previous fair. The Indian tribes are preparing a grand exhibit of manufactured articles of all descriptions, relics, etc.——The Southern Counties opens in St. Thomas on September 17 and continues till the 20th. The entries are coming in fast, and with fine weather the fair is an assured success.——West Elgin Fair will be held at Wallacetown, October 2 and 3. Would it not be well for the management to secure some special attractions for this year and thus add to its well-deserved reputation of being the best local fair in Western Ontario?——Southwold and Dunwich fall show will be held on Saturday, September 29.

GORED BY A HEIFER.

A sister-in-law of James Sullivan, aged 20, was attacked on Tuesday by a vicious heifer, owned by Ainsley Cornwall, and gored in the lower part of the abdomen, the brute's horn entering the girl's body its full length. After throwing her down the brute repeated the charge again and again, and no doubt would have killed her had not Mrs. Sullivan, her sister, come to her rescue and with difficulty drove the animal away with a piece of rail. The girl now lies in a very critical condition, but Dr Leitch who is in attendance has hopes of her recovery if inflammation does not set in.

Mr. Sullivan at once put the heifer in pound and assessed damages at $25.

Colin Paterson was attacked by the same animal and saved himself with difficulty. Such vicious animals should be put out of existence at once. We believe that if the owners of such animals are aware of their viciousness they can be held responsible for any damage done by them.

It is said that Henry Taylor, of London, the latlely-imprisoned manager of the Ontario Investment Association has compromised with his opponents, paying R. M. Meredith $5,000, the Ontario Investment $5,000, dividing $5,000 among his creditors.

DOTLETS.

—Dr. Leitch intends building a bank barn on his farm.

—Sheriff Brown, of St. Thomas, was in Dutton Monday serving jurors.

—There is talk of a new drug store being started in town shortly.

—Mrs. T. Hockin, who has been ill for a week past, is slowly recovering.

—Mr. A. N. C. Black and wife are attending the exhibition in Cincinnati.

—We have received a press badge from the secretary of the Southern Counties' Fair.

—W. G. Young, of Sandusky, Mich., visited old friends in Dutton and vicinity last week.

—Captain Gardiner, of Morpeth, assisted in Salvation Army work Saturday evening and Sunday.

—Mr. A. McWilliam has rented the farm formerly belonging to J.H. McIntyre, but recently purchased by W. H. Nelson.

—The editor of the ENTERPRISE returned home on Monday from his trip to Algoma, having been gone about four weeks.

—Mr. and Mrs. Baker, of Clapperton Island, Algoma, are visiting at Mr. Hollingshead's this week. Mr. Baker is lighthouse keeper on that island.

—Mr. Wm. Gillespie, who was head miller in the Dutton roller mills for about two years, has moved back to his former home in Iroquois.

—J. M. Dales, of Guelph, late graduate of the Toronto University, has been engaged as assistant teacher in the Dutton High School for the balance of the year.

—John Patterson, formerly hotel-keeper in Dutton, has started in the business at Thessalon, Algoma. He reports business good, doing as high as $100 in one day.

—Mrs. A. Campbell has purchased the residence recently occupied by Arch. McWilliam. Mr. McWilliam has moved on his farm in the north part of Dunwich.

—We purpose sending out a large number of extra copies of the ENTERPRISE next week and we trust that many of those who receive a copy will become permanent subscribers.

—James Short, B.A., formerly a teacher in the High School here, has obtained a lucrative position in the schools at Cobourg. Mr. Short is a good teacher and may success attend him.

—Fred E. Leavens, an employee of this office two years ago, got married this summer. We suppose this explains why he did not come here in July as we expected him.

—Miss Johnson, milliner for Hockin & Pool, who was seriously hurt in a runaway accident at Dresden a short time ago, returned to Dutton on Monday. Miss Johnson has fully recovered from her injuris.

JONADAB,

OR AN ANCIENT METHOD OF DEALING WITH THE DRINK QUESTION.

The following is a synopsis of the sermon preached by Rev. Mr. Middleton on Sunday last.

The subject was announced as "Jonadab, or an ancient method of dealing with the drink question." (Jeremiah, 35:5 and following verses.)

The preacher said that much of Jonadab's life was left unrecorded and our knowledge concerning him was limited, yet there was sufficient recorded to enable us to form some estimate of his life and character. Hence from reading the chapter he inferred that Jonadab was an observant man. He kept his eyes open; studied the age in which he lived. He was a man that would endeavor to look into the nature of things—to examine carefully their tendencies, not enough to see what they are to-day but what will be their influence in coming years.

He was a man of marked individuality and of great force of character. Hence he thought for himself and slavishly followed no man, and having thought carefully he was prepared "to act out his thoughts." He would set himself against the men of his time, and, if need be, he would dare to be singular and stand alone. He was not afraid of the world's sneer and was perfectly heedless of its scorn. See his remedy applied to the drinking customs of the age, "Ye shall not drink wine," etc. That goes to the root of the evil, and in his own family, to the extent of his dominion, he endeavors to wipe away the great evil.

He did not recommend his sons to license the sale, to collect the fee, to regulate the traffic; the best regulation was to wipe it out. When will Christian governments follow his example?

Again the strength of Jonabab's character is seen in the effectiveness of his training and the impression he has made on humanity. He died, but his principles enforced by his example lived. His work endured, and the whole tribe was obedient to his command. There was not a drunkard among them all, and then you observe that on Jonadab's command and the tribe's obedience God stamped the seal of his approval. In conclusion the preacher urged the example of Jonadab on every husband and father

Pass a prohibitory law in the home. Protect that.

Unite our influence to protect our village, the province and the Dominion and may God Almighty give His aid.

THE BELL ORGAN.

Now the harvest is over, and all right-thinking people are thankful for bountiful crops, and, better still, the expectation for fair prices prevails, which will enable our hard-working and honest farmers to have a cash surplus. The question will naturally arise in many families, What can we invest our money in to best cheer the household generally and make them happier through the long and weary winter months? In most cases the decision quickly arrived at, more particularly where a taste for culture prevails, is an organ or piano. Consequently an organ or piano, according to circumstances and taste, is to be purchased and placed in a chosen corner of a certain room. The trouble now is to know which is the best make so as to have a really good and serviceable instrument. Careful inquiry is made about different manufacturers and the closer the investigation the surer the choice and the BELL is decided on, not only because they are the largest, wealthiest and most reliable manufacturers in the Dominion of Canada, but their instruments are giving universal satisfaction. The BELL organ or piano is found in the best families in the country and are giving grand satisfaction in many churches and lodge rooms. Having decided to purchase a BELL organ or piano, as the case may be, so as to run no risk they will be looked for at the fairs and an instrument chosen; or, if perchance they do not see them there, will go direct to J. M. JACKSON'S Music Store, Dutton, or apply to his nearest agent, but will have a BELL organ or piano anyway.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

CURES RHEUMATISM

FREEMAN'S WORM POWDERS
Are pleasant to take. Contain their own Purgative. Is a safe, sure and effectual destroyer of worms in Children or Adults.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

does sell." Prepared by

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,

PREPARED BY
Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by all Druggists. Price $1; six bottles, $5.

AN UNDOUBTED PROOF
of the beneficial qualities of Burdock Blood Bitters is found in the thousands of authentic testimonials published by the proprietors The origianal letters being in their possession, they can furnish proof positive as to to their genuineness at any time.

It can do no harm to try Freeman's Worm Powders if your child is ailing, feverish or fretful.

Wheat at $1 per bushel will make the farmer look more cheerful.

Canker humors of every description, whether in the mouth, throat, or stomach, are expelled from the system by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. No other remedy can be compared with this as a cure for all diseases originating in impure blood.

Leamington is to have a cigar factory.

AN OLD FAVORITE
that has been popular with the people for 30 years is Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for all varieties of summe complaints of children or adults. It seldom or ever fails to cure cholera morbus, diarrhœa and dysntery.

PROMPT RESULTS.
"I was very sick with bowel complaint last summer. I tried other medicines but all was of no use until I tried Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. The next day I was like a different man." Geo. H. Peacock, Stroud, Ont.

Woodslee Methodists have opened a new $1,100 church.

Take Ayer's Pills and be cured. Misery is a mild word to describe the sufferings of body and mind, caused by habitual constipation. A moderate use of Ayer's Pills will invariably regulate the bowels.

THE young lady, Mrs. J. Sullivan's sister, whom we mentioned last week as being gored and severely injured by a vicious heifer, died on Thursday last.

I AM LENDING MONEY AT PRESENT IN LARGE LOANS ON GOOD FARM SECURITY AT 5½ PER CENT.—A. MCCRIMMON, ST. THOMAS.

THERE is a good chance for some active and trusty men to secure paying work at once by engaging with Jas. E. Whitney, Rochester, N. Y.

AT the meeting of the London Presbytery held last week, Rev. G. Sutherland, moderator, presented a call from the congregation at Wallacetown in favor of Rev. Dr. Kelso, of the Presbytery of Kingston, promising a stipend of $750 and manse. The call which was stated to be unanimous, was sustained and forwarded to the Presbytery of Kingston to authorize the translation.

TWO HUNTERS killed a deer and sold it by the pound in the woods. They had no proper means of weighing it, but knowing their own weight—one 130 pounds, and the other 190 pounds—they placed a rail across a fence so that it balanced with one at each end. They then exchanged places, the lighter man taking the deer in his lap, and the rail again balanced. What was the weight of the deer?

REV. W. GRANT, Baptist minister, who has been in Dutton for some time, has resigned his charge in Dutton and will preach his farewell sermon on Sunday 30th inst. The rev. gentleman is one of the most popular among ministers, and the congregation regret his departure very much. We could recommend him very highly to any church desirous of obtaining an undershepherd.

IT seems that Mr. John Thompson, merchant, of Cowal, has lately, by order of the Attorney-General been reinstated as a justice of the peace for the county of Elgin. He was appointed in June, 1881, but left this county at the beginning of 1882, being absent four years. During his absence his name, for some unexplained reason, was erased off the list of magistrates, but this late action of the Ontario Government places him in his former position.

BURGLARY AT DUTTON.—On Sunday night, Sept. 9th, Mr. O. L. Soules, M. C R. agent here, after returning from church, retired to bed leaving his pants by the bedside, in the pockets of which was $107 in cash. On awakening, and looking for his pants he found they were gone. He at once instituted a search, and finally found them outside, but the pockets were empty—the $107 had disappeared. Investigation showed that some person had entered the house through the window and had carried the pants outside and rifled the pockets. Nothing else was disturbed and there is no clue as to who the burglar or burglars were. Mr. Soules has given the matter into the hands of the detectives. Mr. Heenan was up from St. Thomas on Monday.

WE would advise those visiting the butcher shop to purchase meat to observe two points, viz.:—1st, to know what they want; 2nd, to take what they first order prepared. By so doing they will avoid the wrath of the obliging man with the saw and knife. A young woman entered one of our butcher shops last week and ordered a piece of meat which was prepared. Then that did not suit, and another was prepared, which did not suit exactly, and the wrath of the obliging butcher was kindled and the would-be purchaser was given to understand that her custom was not desired and she departed, and after trying the door of the other shop, which was locked, left the town. Business people can put up with a great deal of inconsistency on the part of customers, who of course turn the world (in their own estimation), but patience ceases to become a virtue in many cases.

THE anniversary services of the Methodist church were held according to announcement on Sunday and Monday last. The sermons on Sabbath by Revs. Messrs. Lancely and Barron were appropriate and forcible, and in the evening the church was crowded, seats being put down the aisles. The tea-meeting in the hall was also succesful. Splendid provision was made by the ladies and all appeared to enjoy themselves. After tea the pastor assumed the chair and an excellent programme was presented, consisting of addresses by Revs. Barron, Grant, Hamilton, Scott and Lancely. The choir rendered several anthems efficiently. Instrumental selections were given by Master Middleton and Miss Jackson, a duet by Mr. and Mrs. Tremeer and a solo from Rev. Mr. Lancely, whose services were exceedingly well received. If he should visit us again we can assure him of a hearty reception. The pastor thanked all who had assisted in making the services successful, and especially the other churches who had withdrawn their Sabbath evening services. The church is prospering under the charge of Mr. Middleton, the choir is doing well, the people united and we wish them all success. Proceeds were a little over $50.

A single scratch may cause a festering cure. Victoria Carbolic Salve rapidly heals sots, wounds, bruises, burns and all sores.

The pocket book of Caza the Coteau murderer, containing $1,100 was found a few days ago by a scrub woman at Coteau Landing. Caza received the packet while in jail. He at once gave instructions to his friends to remit $200 to the woman as a reward for her honesty.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

ORCHARD DESTRUCTION IN THE NORTHWEST

There have been suggested many explanations of the well-nigh wholesale destruction of orchards throughout the Northwest during the past few years. One is, that some changes have rendered high ground unfit for orchards. Naturally, this has met with much opposition; for heretofore high ground has been considered the better by the rank and file of orchardists. The evidence that low ground is now the better, is not near so conclusive as many would have us suppose; nevertheless, in many cases low ground orchards have suffered the less fatality. It is not saying too much to affirm that high ground has become less adapted and low ground better adapted to orchard growth.

This being the case, it behooves us to discover what has wrought the change. My investigations have convinced me that it is not any peculiar climatic condition that is responsible. The cause lies in the soil. Orchard ground is very rarely manured sufficiently. An orchard given the manure it needs, is an exception. Trees are gross feeders, and as our orchards are planted the trees are a heavy draft on the fertility of the soil. But in addition, another crop is kept on the land. It is usually a cultivated crop (likely a vegetable crop that draws very heavily on the soil) while the trees are young, and afterward a grass crop. When land is occupied by too exhausting crops, it certainly should be well manured. Yet the orchard is the last spot to be manured; and when it is remembered, it gets only a slight coat and very likely of manure so poor that it is not desired to use it elsewhere. That this is a fair statement of the case, can not be successfully disputed.

Low lands are being continually enriched at the expense of the high lands. The rains carry the soil from the hills into the valleys; they leach out the fertility of the soil they do not carry away, and leave it in the valley soil as they sink into the earth. This has gone on for ages before the advent of the agriculturist. When he comes upon the scene, the process is accelerated; for cultivation loosens the soil, and the rains can therefore leech out more fertility and carry away more soil. All over the world it holds true that the valleys are more fertile than the hills; and the truth becomes more striking as the land has been longer in cultivation.

PRESERVING THE FROG.

Reference is here made to that very important cushion beneath the horses's foot—the frog, so-called. If, in seeking a horse, we take up the foot and find the frog well-preserved; the cushion, so to speak, wide, full and soft, the probability is that the remainder of the foot will be in good order. There may be an exception to this in the case of a used-up horse having been turned out to pasture for a period long enough to permit the frog to take on new growth. If the frog be fully protected and well maintained, the hoof will be found but little if at all contracted, for the very good reason that the hoof cannot readily contract if the frog be up to its normal size in every way. But it is the smith, the horse-shoer who ruins the frog; that is, very many of them do this. During the many years that the writer has driven horses, he has always made it a rule to be present during the shoeing, and has never permitted more than the slightest trimming of the frog, nothing more than the trimming off of insignificant parts, already detached. The smith can mutilate and seriously damage the hoof by the use of the rasp; but, fortunately the frog is proof against attacks by this instrument, and even the knife requires to be sharp, else the peculiar nature of the frog will resist. Fever in the feet is a prolific source of injury to the frog, and should be overcome at the earliest possible day. Confinement upon a dry, plank floor is damaging by keeping up too complete a state of dryness. Cutting the frog away at the time of shoeing, then setting the foot upon caulkins, in such a manner as to prevent the frog from pressing upon the ground, will, sooner or later, interfere with its development and usefulness. The most important function of the frog is to lessen the shock to the foot in its contact with the ground. This being the fact, it should be so maintained, and the shoe be so constructed that at every step the frog can come in for a fair share of the pressure upon whatever substance the horse is required to tread.

AVOIDING VERMIN.

A four years' trial of a basement room as a poultry house, [with from 50 to 100 hens, ought to be long enough to demonstrate the fitness of such rooms for the purpose of sheltering poultry. During the whole of this time my poultry have been free from all diseases, and have laid well — better, I think, than I ever had hens to do before. But what is the more remarkable, my poultry have remained clear of vermin all the time. Summer or winter it is the same; there are no lice. I believe it is all due to the kind of room in which I keep them. No extra pains are taken with my poultry or the room. They are fed regularly once a day with corn and oats, and have the run of the farm and fine pickings—corn, peanuts and field peas—in the fall. The house is kept clean by sweeping and the use of plaster. I save a good deal of excellent fertilizer from my hens, but doctor them little. In fact, there is no occasion for it. They are healthy and doing well, and I think it wise to "let well enough alone."

I am satisfied that my hens keep clear of vermin only because they are sheltered in a cellar. I do not know why. It may be because the walls—brick—are always slightly cool and damp, and perhaps this is repugnant to lice. Or it may be because of the uniform temperature of the room all the year round. Or it may be owing to some other cause that I have not yet found out. Be it as it may, my hens are clear of vermin, and have been for the past four years, or ever since I began to shelter them in this basement. I am disposed to think a cellar the proper place to keep poultry for several reasons.—B. W. J. Spottsville, Va.

APPLES ABROAD.

The English and Scotch crops are very poor, while our representative who has just returned from the apple districts on the continent reports about half average crop. This augurs well for Canadians, especially for good early apples, which will certainly make good prices. Quality is the great thing in our markets; anything a little better than another makes a big difference in price, more particularly at the beginning of the season.—James Lindsay & Son, Edinburgh, Aug. 7.

Our advices from 67 apple districts report the crop to be "below the average" in 46 districts; "poor" or "very light" in 9 districts; "medium" or "fairly good" in 7 districts; while in only five cases it is classed as "average" or "satisfactory." From this it will be seen that the English crop is at least a partial failure.

On the other hand, the continental crops promise well, and are likely to be both large and good. Notwithstanding this we look for a favorable reception during the season for Canadian and American fruit well packed and of good size and quality, but would strongly advise our friends to avoid shipping small or common fruit, as such is likely to yield poor results. The shipment of "summer" fruit is at all times attended with much risk, on account of its soft character, but small parcels of the best keeping varieties occasionally give satisfactory returns. J. C. HOUGHTON & Co.

Liverpool, Aug. 15.

A CRAB-APPLE TREE EXPERIMENT.

J. Q. A. McCormick, of Cass Co., Iowa, gives the following as his experience with a crab-apple tree:

A Hyslop crab stood six years in well-cultivated soil, and, though each year making a very vigorous growth, did not make a show of fruiting. The tree seemed to be entirely going to wood. A friend, horticulturally inclined, suggested root-pruning. This was done by digging at one side of the tree and cutting the main, central root, about three feet below the surface. This was done September, and the tree has not missed a heavy crop in nine years. At the time of the pruning, some old iron was thrown in among the roots, by way of experiment. A somewhat remarkable effect has thus been produced, in that the color of the fruit, is a much deeper red—indeed, almost black. The tree, when in fruit, is thus a puzzle to the average man of horticultural tastes. The same farmer has noticed a change produced in the color of blue flowers by putting charcoal at the root. The color is modified to a navy-blue.

PRUNING ORCHARDS.

I will give my method. The trees should not be allowed to go as they please. Keep them low so that a man on top of an eight foot ladder can pick all the fruit. Cut out the top and centre of the tree so that the sun can get into the centre of it. This will cause young branches to grow out all along the body and main limbs of the tree, and these, when they are not expected to fruit, should be clipped off to within an inch of the stem. For every one of these cut off, from two to six more will grow out. Thus you will have a fine lot of fruit-bearing branches all along the inside of the tree. A tree thus pruned can bear up all the fruit that will grow on it; it will bear more and the fruit will be of the first quality. Here in, I believe, lies the secret of growing fine peaches.

SQUARE SENSE.

From the paper our fellow-citizen, Mr. C. B. Goodrich, gave us at the Institute we abstract a short paragraph that every dairy farmer, and every man who simply raises cows to sell, should heed, when raising a calf and feeding a cow; for starvation makes a curse that may be transmitted to the third and fourth generation, unless arrested in its downward course with good victuals and drink. Mr. Goodrich says:

"I will never again buy a cow from a man who habitually starves his cattle. You might as well try to make a whistle out of a pig's tail, as to try to make a good milker of a cow that was starved, when young, and was descended from starved ancestors, no matter how good blood was in her."—[Hoard.

NOTES.

At our fairs it is a common thing to see several plates of apples which have no resemblance to each other, exhibited under one name. This is perhaps unavoidable, but it leads to endless confusion in the minds of amateurs. As Mr. Collins says apples from different sides of a tree may be so unlike as to deceive even an expert.

An English farmer who has been investigating the caterpillar pest, which is proving so destructive to the fruit and nut crops in Kent, has concluded that the eggs which produced the caterpillars were deposited by the swarms of butterflies which swept the coast last autumn, and which were supposed to have been driven over from the Continent by the storms.

Among the rules of a livery stable in New York where the animals of many wealthy men are kept, are the following: "No man will be employed who drinks intoxicating liquors. No man shall speak loud to any of the horses, or in the stable where they are. Horses of good blood are nervous, and loud excited conversation is felt by every horse who hears them, and keeps them all nervous and uneasy. No man shall use profane language in the hearing of horses." It would not be a bad idea if every livery stable adopted these rules. How is it in your barn, brother farmer?

How to keep milk cool without ice is a question repeatedly asked. Mr. Drummond Hay, Stockton, who has had considerable experience in Africa, has a plan that works capitally. He sets his Cooley can in a tub of water at the pump, right in the sun, lays a ply or two of blanket over it and pumps water on it. This cools off the milk as fast as if it were in ice water. Of course the blanket must not be let dry. He also takes the plan indicated by Prof. Robertson, putting in one sixth water among the milk and gets as much cream from that as if it were all milk. The skim milk is of course thinner.

I chanced to meet a lady the other day who had spent three hours in churning; and the butter had not come. The cream looked nice, was about acid enough, and only two degrees too warm, but come it would not. "You try your 'J. Jones' on this cream, won't you?" said she. I added about one half its bulk of water at 60 degrees, stirred it up thoroughly and let it stand about two minutes. The result was that the water set the butter free and it all came to the top. "Now churn on the top half of the churn," said I, and in no time she had a nice batch of butter. "Yes, that did the business," she said; but my mother always said that water in cream or butter spoiled it." What could I say? What mother "said and done" upsets all later ideas and investigations.

FOR NORTH WEST FARMERS.

Prof. Carpmael Suggests a Scheme of Protection From Frost.

Some time ago Prof. Carpmael, of the Toronto Observatory, in conversation with a friend suggested that a scheme for the prevention of the evil effects of frost in the North-west, such as that by which the French protect their vine crops, might be at least worthy of a trial. Yesterday afternoon an "Empire" reporter found the professor at his office and had a talk with him on the subject. Prof. Carpmael said it was no, new theory of his, but it was simply a plan adopted in France with successful results.

In order to protect the vineyards in that country from early frosts fires of brushwood, covered over with leaves, are made to the windward of the fields. It is not the fire that produces the desired effect, but the smoke which acts just as clouds do and turns the heat of the atmosphere towards the earth.

"I suggested," said the professor, "that a similiar protection might be advantageously adopted with regard to the wheat crops in the North-west. In Manitoba frost comes generally with light west or north-west winds, and should this plan be adopted I have no doubt it would answer in the cases of frost which were not very severe. As an instance of the effect of smoke on the climate, I have noticed that in Indian summer weather where bush fires have been raging the effect of them has been that the nights in their locality have been mild, while a distance away the air has been much colder. In considering the case of the North-west, of course the scarcity of fuel would have to be taken into account, but I certainly think the proposed remedy would be worth a trial." In answer to the question whether Prof. Carpmael had been, while away, talking over this scheme, the reply was to the effect that he had not, but had been spending his annual three weeks, holidays with his friends.

The New York Times' London correspondent estimates that Europe will need to buy from 70,000,000 to 80,000,000 bushels of wheat this year, and The Times thinks that the United States will be able to supply a very large proportion of that quantity.

"I'm Hurried, Child."

"O mother, look! I've found a butterfly
Hanging upon a leaf. Do tell me why
There was no butter! Oh, do-s a its wings!
I neve', never saw such pretty things—
All streak'd and stripped with blue and brown and gold—
Where is its house when all the days are cold?"
"Yes, yes," she said, in accents mild,
"I'm hurried child."

"Last night my dolly quite forgot her prayers;
And when she thought you'd gone down stairs
Then dolly was afraid, and so I said:
'Just never mind, but say 'em in the bed,
Because I think that God is just as near,'
When dolls are 'fraid, do you s'pose He can hear?"
The mother spoke from out the ruffles piled;
"I'm hurried, child."

"Oh, come and see the flowers in the sky—
The sun has left, and won't you by-and-by,
Dear mother, take me in your arms, and tell
Me all about the pussy in the well?
And then perhaps, about 'Red Riding Hood?'"
"Too much to do! Hush, hush! you drive me wild;
I'm hurried, child."

The little one grew very quiet now,
And grieved and puzzled was the childish brow;
And then it queried: "Mother, do you know
The reason 'cause you must be hurried so?
I gue-s the hours are littler than I,
So I will take my peanies and will buy
A big clock! oh, as big as it can be!
For you and me."

The mother now has leisure infinite;
She sits with folded hands, and face as white
As winter. In her heart is Winter's chill,
She sits at leisure, questioning God's will.
"My child has ceased to breathe, and all is night!
Is Heaven so dark that Thou dost grudge me light?
The time drags by."

O, mother sweet, if cares must ever fall,
Pray, do not make them stones to build a wall
Between thee and thy own; and miss the right
To blessedness, so swift to take its flight!
While answering baby questions you are
But entertaining angels unaware;
The richest gifts are gathered by the way
For darkest day.

Fainthearted.

I stand where two roads part
Lord! art thou with me in the shadows here?
I cannot lift my eyes to see.
Speak to me if thou art!
I tremble, and my heart is cold with fear;
Dark is the way thou hast appointed me.

From the bright face of day
It winds far down a valley dark as death,
And shards and thorns assail my shrinking feet;
An icy mist and grey
Comes to me, chilling me with awful breath;
How canst thou say thy yoke is light and sweet?

Nay, these are pals who go
Down the grey shadows; each one tired, and worn,
Bearing a cross that galleth him full sore;
And blood of this doth flow,
And that one's pallid brows are raved with thorn,
And eyes are blind with weeping evermore.

Still they press onward fast
And the shades compass them; now, far away,
I see a great hill shaped like Calvary;
Will they come there at last?
A reflex from some far fair perfect day
Touches the high clear faces suddenly.

Ah! yonder path is fair,
And musical with many singing birds,
Large golden fruit and rainbow colored flowers
The wayside branches bear;
The air is murmurous with sweet love-words,
And hearts are singing through the happy hours.

Nay, I shall look no more.
Take thou my hands between thy firm fair hands
And still their trembling, and I shall not weep.
Some day, the journey o'er,
My feet shall tread the still safe evening lands,
And thou canst give to thy beloved, sleep.

And though thou dost not speak,
And the mists hide thee, now I know thy feet
Will tread the path my feet walk wearily;
Some day the mists will break,
And sudden looking up, mine eyes shall meet
Thine eyes, and lo! thine arms shall gather me.

To the Singer.

BY WILLIAM RENTON.

Sister, the soul that wakes in thee
Hath in it something of the spring,
What time the sunny breezes swing
The daffodil beneath the tree;
I seem to sit beside the sea,
And hear a spirit in thee sing.

Thy voice makes many a pleasant place
To rest in, many a fragrant spot;
Blue eyes of the forget-me-not,
The charm of wistful maiden ways,
Bring back a hundred yesterdays
Of song, that may not be forgot.

If at an hour when storm-winds sway
The clouds through heaven from pole to pole,
The passion in thee seems to roll
In music to the Far-away,
Listen within thyself, and say:
'It is the soul, it is the soul.'

Shifting Shadows.

BY WILL T. JAMES.

Zenith past, the sun is stooping
In the Occidental sky;
Parched with drought, field-flowers are drooping,
Earth and grass are bleached and dry.
Down the lane and through the meadows
Quaintly cast from shrub and tree,
Stretch athwart my pathway shadows,
Shifting, lengthening changefully.

Just outside the straggling village,
Where the brooklets drone is heard,
'Neath where fleet-winged robbers pillage
Luscious fruit from the vineyard,
Close beside me, longer growing,
Till it intermingles mine,
Moves an inlaced figure, showing
An ensemblance—dearest, thine!

The Russian Harvest.

An Odessa letter to the London "Daily News" says:—The abundant harvest, brilliant weather, and extraordinary demand for field labor have this season the curious effect of denuding the chief populous centres of the Taurida and Don of domestic servants. In Rostoff, for instance, there is not a cook, kitchenmaid, housemaid, or nurserymaid just now available. All are out on the Steppe harvesting. The daily remuneration too, is greatly in excess of, and in many districts double, that obtained in any previous season during the last decade. The military commandants in the southern districts are inundated with applications for assistance, varying in the number required from 100 to 1,000 men. Here the landowners have made a free gift of portions of their crops to the poorer peasantry, simply that the grain might not be lost owing to the absence of field labour. Overworked peasants in whole families have been cutting these free gift crops by moonlight or the flickering illumination of bonfires. Owing to the rapidly approaching military manœuvres, the district commandants have only been able to give very limited assistance. It is always very reluctantly refused, as the lion's share of the result of the military labour goes in unequal shares into the pockets of captains, majors, and colonels, with a present to the general. Hence regimental officers in the black earth regions always display a lively solicitude for the safe garnering of an abundant harvest. The heat here during the week has been equatorial, with scarcely a breeze or passing thunder-storm. The night brings little relief. This extreme heat destroys all hopes of next year's hay harvest except by resowing. The grass roots are already burned and withered in the soil.

What's in a Name.

The name by which we know an article sometimes gives very little idea of its character. Take the following list as an illustration:

"Oil of turpentine" is not oil, neither is "oil of vitriol," nor "coal oil," nor kerosene. "Copperas" is an iron compound, and contains no copper. "Salts of lemon" have nothing to do with the fruit of the "Citrus limonum," but is the extremely poisonous oxalic acid.

"Carbolic acid" is not an acid, but a phenol. "Cobalt" contains none of that metal, but arsenic. "Soda water" has no trace of soda, nor does "sulphuric ether" contain any sulphur. "Sugar of lead" has no sugar, "cream of tartar" has nothing of cream, nor "milk of lime" any milk.

Oxygen means "the acid-makers," but hydrogen is the essential element of all acids, and many acids contain no oxygen. "German silver" contains no silver, and "black lead" no lead. "Mosaic gold" is simply a sulphide of tin.

This list might readily be extended, both in chemistry and other natural sciences, and it is only fair to state that these terms all come from the older writers, and are giving way to a more scientific nomenclature.

The Irish National League is urging that a Parnell defence fund should be raised in the States.

A Million of Years.

To the human understanding the vast stretches of time involved in geological history are utterly incomprehensible. It is not easy, indeed, to form an idea of what a period even a million of years is, though Croll tells how a striking impression of such a lapse may be conveyed to the mind. Stretch a piece of paper eighty-three feet four inches long around the walls of a room somewhat over twenty feet square, recall the events of life to give some conception of a hundred years, and then consider that a mark one-tenth of an inch broad at one end of the paper represents the century, while the whole strip gives place for only a million years! This illustration is worth trying.

Could we stand, continues the author of "Climate and Time," upon the edge of a gorge, a mile and a half in depth, that had been cut out of the solid rock by a tiny stream scarcely visible at the bottom of this terrible abyss, and were we informed that this little streamlet was able to wear off annually only one tenth of an inch from its rocky bed, what would our conception be of the prodegious length of time that this stream must have taken to excavate the gorge? We should certainly feel startled on finding that the stream had performed this enormous amount of work in something less than a million of years.

Value of Advertisements.

"Do I believe in advertising," said a prominent lawyer, a day or two ago. "Well, rather; and in the hidden advertisement more than in any other. I remember, one day, reading a very interesting story, that ended in what I took to be a puff for Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. I threw down the paper in a rage. Not a week after that I needed some medicine of that kind, and went and bought those same little pills." "Did I find them good?" "Why, yes, the best thing of the kind I ever saw, but that has nothing to do with the first question, and I only mention the joke on myself to shew that advertising does pay."

True goodness is like the glow-worm is this, that it shines most when no eye except those of Heaven are upon it.

Too well known to need lengthy advertisements—Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy.

Most men expend the early part of their lives in contributing to render the latter part miserable.

At first a little, hacking cough,
"'Tis nothing but a cold,"
They say, "Twill very soon wear off."
Alas, the story old!
The hectic cheek, the failing strength.
The grief that cannot save,
And life's wan flame goes out at length,
In a consumptive's grave.

If persons would use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, when irritation of the lungs is indicated by a cough, it would be an easy matter to avert consumption. Be wise in time.

TO OUR READERS.

We are sending out a large number of sample copies of the ENTERPRISE this week. They are free to whomsoever addressed, and we trust that many of those who receive a copy will become subscribers. The ENTERPRISE endeavors to give all the latest local and interesting news, the market reports, minutes of meetings of the council, and perhaps what is more profitable than anything else to our readers are the advertisements of our leading merchants and business men, who carry a large and well-assorted stock of goods, sell cheap and invite you to call and see them.

Some people are in the habit of comparing local papers with foreign and city papers, endeavoring to argue that according to size the local paper should be produced at about fifty cents a year, as some foreign papers are much larger and all remain the same price; when, on the other hand, it should be reversed. The local paper is worth double to a subscriber as a foreign, as that is the one in which he finds the home and most profitable reading. If a reader were to put an estimate on each item during the year that was of interest to him we think he would overrun many times the cost of the paper. Then, the cost of producing city weeklies, is very small, as they run dailies and simply use the matter for the weekly.

To those who are already subscribers we would consider it a great favor if each and every one would bestir themselves a little and endeavor to bring in a new subscriber and thus double our subscription list.

We have desired for some time to change the style and size of the ENTERPRISE and purpose doing so as soon as we receive sufficient encouragement. Our readers will at once see that it is in their power to receive a larger and better paper. We wish to take in more territory, and if our list is suitably increased we purpose issuing the ENTERPRISE semi-weekly this fall but the price will remain the same.

HOCKIN & POOL.

The leading business establishment conducted in Dutton is that of the above-named popular and enterprising firm. Messrs. Hockin & Pool have been established about six years with the result of a trade being developed which extends over the surrounding country. We may say that the business has exerted a marked influence in building up our mercantile interests and in drawing trade to the town. The members of the firm are each practical merchants and clever business men, and are in the very best position to meet the wants of the public in their lines. We have no hesitation in saying that this is one of the best equipped and most ably managed general stores in this section of the country. Their large brick establishement is literally packed with goods, consisting of everything in the line of general dry goods, dress goods, millinery, tweeds, worsteds, etc, hats and caps, gents' furnishings, ready-made clothing, carpets and house-furnishings, also boots and shoes, groceries, including crockery, glass, chinaware, etc. Special attention is given to the tailoring department which is kept to a high standard. The store has become deservedly popular for the excellence of the goods kept, and the ability of the firm to offer to the public all the advantages.

A BUSTLE INCIDENT.—The latest about the irrepressible bustle comes to the Orillia Packet from Cobourg. A stylish young lady had occasion to make a hasty toilette and do some shopping in an emergency, and strapped the posterior appendage over her dress, covering it with the inevitable ulster, which, it is said, like charity, covers a multitude of shortcomings. The shopping done, the lady returned home, and sometime later had occasion to go down town again. This time the lady sailed forth without her ulster, tripped gaily along forgetful of the fact that the new-fangled contrivance, shaped like a triplet bologna sausage, was carried astern, in view of all men. The best part of the fun was that many accepted the new departure as the latest fashion, and some people waxed righteously wrathful over the outrageous length to which the fickle goddess was leading her votaries.

All ages and conditions of people may use the National Pills without injury and with great benefit.

Peaches affected by the "yellows" are confiscated daily at Toronto as being injurious to health.

SHEDDEN STONE-THROWERS.

The railroads and those living along the line of railroads are continually harrassed and annoyed by the depredations and the destructive acts of tramps, but it is seldom that a more devilish act is committed than that committed by two young Sheddenites on Saturday night last. When No. 2 M. C. R. express, which arrives in St. Thomas about midnight, was a mile and a half west of Shedden, a large stone came crashing through the window of the smoking car, and a second later another stone came through a window of a first-class coach. Fortunately no one was injured by either missile, both of which were thrown from the north side of the track. Conductor Dawson's extra east was following No. 2, and half-way between Iona and Shedden a number of stones were thrown into the caboose. Detective Heenan and P. C. Catley at once went to Iona and walked all night through the mud and rain, but could not get on the track of the depredators.

The next day Detective Heenan succeeded in finding the guilty parties. They are two young men about 18 years of age, named Abraham Graham and Walter Parkes, and both reside in Shedden. On Saturday night they drank too much Scott Act, and became possessed of a spirit of recklessness that led them to wander around the country committing depredations, and having what they called fun. They broke a number of windows in the house of Mr. Daniel Anderson with stones, and also threw stones at the passing trains. They were arrested by Constables Francis and Horton, and brought before Squire Stafford Monday morning, who remanded them to jail. They were arraigned before Police Magistrate Leonard Monday morning on the charge of throwing stones at the M. C. R. express, elected to be tried summarily, and pleaded guilty to the charge. They were remanded till Friday for sentence. The charge of breaking windows in the house of Mr. Anderson was withdrawn on the accused paying $5 damages.

WILL FIGHT THE REPEAL.

A meeting of Scott Act workers was held in the First Methodist church, St. Thomas, Tuesday evening to consider the advisability of opposing the repeal vote, which is expected to take place next May.

Reports from different parts of the county were received and discussed, and the prevailing opinion was that a vigorous opposition to the repeal is commendable.

The following resolution was moved by Edward Miller, of St. Thomas, seconded by Hugh Lynn, of West Magdala, that another convention be called for the first Tuesday in November, and that all temperance organizations and church societies be requested to send delegates. At that convention the subject of repeal will be further discussed and a plan of action decided upon.

CAMPBELLTON.

HYMENEAL.—Leap year appears to have had its effects on one of the young men of our community, namely Mr. John McPherson, who, on the 11th inst., was married to Miss Jennie Searle by the Rev. J. H. Butes, of Glencoe. The bride was attended by her sister, Miss Beatrice Searle, and the groom by Mr. D. A. Crawford. After the ceremony was performed the happy couple took the 3:40 train east, intending to spend their honeymoon in Buffalo and Niagara. The thoughts of spending the long winter evenings at home instead of at singing school as heretofore causes our Campbellton poet to wail the following lines :—

Success to our worthy bachelor,
Who, tired of living alone,
Consented to take a companion,
To cheer up his lonely home.

But, sir, you have taken our teacher,
And now that the evenings are cool,
We will sadly miss our lessons
Given at singing school.

But yet she is still among us,
And although her profession may change,
We still have the consolation,
That our loss will be her gain.

Now, bachelors, all take warning;
Keep up this exercise;
Take the advice of the good book—
"Go thou and do likewise."

THE INTERLOCKING SWITCH.

Some time ago the Canada Southern Railway Company asked the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for permission to put in an interlocking switch at the crossing with the Erie & Huron railway at Charing Cross, and to apportion the cost between the two companies. The decision of the committee was that the Canada Southern could put in the switch at their own expense, and the American company who own the patent for the interlocking switch were informed that there were no objections to their introduciug the patent. The latter, however, would not proceed without being assured that they would be recouped for the work, and this was not forthcoming, as the Canada Southern were disinclined to lay down the switch at their own expense. It is stated that the Canada Southern will again bring the matter before the Railway Comittee at an early date, with a view of scuring an allotment of part of the cost on the Erie railway.—Ottawa Free Press.

The rate of Tilsonburg taxation this year is struck at 20 mills on the dollar.

Much interest is being centered at the Industrial exhibition in Edison's phonograph—the first ever introduced into Canada. Erastus Wiman delivered four speeches into the instrument before he left New York, which are heard by large numbers of astounded visitors to the fair. The modulations of Wiman's voice, his exact tone and his exact words are reprduced, and, as showing the great possibilities of the phonograph, Wiman had coughed twice while making one of his speeches and his coughing is reproduced just as naturally as if he himself was in the phonograph. The speeches were on reciprocal trade, the power of commerce, the telephone and the phnograph.

LARGE stock of envelopes and note paper, just arrived at the ENTERPRISE Office.

HYMENEAL.

A pleasant event took place at the residence of Mrs. Love, in Blenheim, at 8 p.m. on Wednesday, 19th inst., the centre of attraction being the marriage of her eldest daughter, Kate, to Sandford Shippey, of Detroit. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Fletcher. The bride was handsomely attired in cream cashmere and watered satin, and was supported by Miss Lizzie Humpidge, of Dutton, who was attired likewise. The groom was supported by Mr. C. Brown, of Windsor. After the ceremony the guests partook of a sumptuous repast, the tables being well loaded with delicacies. A goodly number of invited guests were present, those from a distance being from Dutton, Aldborough, Chatham, Windsor and Detroit. The presents to the bride were numerous, handsome and costly. The following is a partial list, as those from Detroit left their presents there, saving carriage and duty each way, the list of which we expect to publish next week:—

Scott's poetical works, J. T. Blue; painting, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Bell; silver teapot, J. Hockin and A. McFarlane; card receiver, Mr. and Mrs. N. Phelps; silver butter cooler, C. Doyle; silver sugar bowl and set of spoons, Mr. and Mrs. A. Love; pair of vases, Mr. and Mrs. Dr. Leitch; butter knife and pickle fork, Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Urlin; butter knife, Miss F. McIntyre; butter kniffe, Mrs. Dolson; egg set and cake plate, N., O. and B. Sinclair; lemonade set, Miss Barbara and Duncan H. Bentley; table linen, Mrs. J. Bell and brother; counterpane, Mr. D. and Miss McMillan; table linen and towels, Miss Annie Love; wall bracket, Miss McTaggart; sugar bowl, Miss L. J. Humpidge; bed spread and pair of blankets, Mr. M. and and Miss Jennie McKellar.

The happy couple left on Thursday morning for their future home in Detroit.

MUNCEY.

The fall exhibition of the Muncey Agricultural Society will be held on their grounds on Wednesday and Thursday, October 17th and 18th. Number of attractions on the first day and trials of speed on the second. Good brass band will be in attendance during each day.

A FEW FACTS ABOUT LONDON

—AND ITS—

Great 9 Days' Fair

25,000.00 appropriated for Prizes, Attractions, Etc.

London is the commercial metropolis and hub of Western Ontario.

Eight leading lines of railways converge into London, the business centre of the west.

The Western Fair Grounds and Buildings are valued at $132,000.00.

London is the centre of the finest agricultural portion of Canada.

Seventy-five thousand persons visited the Western Fair in 1887.

London is the largest and best cheese market in Canada.

THE GRANDEST AND MOST MAGNIFICENT DISPLAYS OF FIREWORKS ever witnessed in Western Ontario will be given three evenings by the world-renowned Pyrotechnists, Messrs Jas. Pain & Son, London, England. The displays will cost nearly three times that given at any previous Exhibition.

Grand International bench show of dogs. The leading prize-winners of Canada and United States will be present.

Great Indian Exhibit. By the courtesy of Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, L. Vankoughnet, Ottawa, Ont., the Indian tribes of the Province under the direction of twenty Indian agents are preparing a grand exhibit of manufactured articles in wood, leather, bark, etc., also relics and curiosities of the old hunting days.

Profs. Vandergrift and Bready will make four grand balloon ascensions. When at an altitude of several thousand feet they will make their wonderful and perilous leap from the balloon by aid of a parachute. This will be the greatest attraction of the year.

Miss McNeil, the great cornet virtuosa, who has delighted large audiences in the U. S. will preform daily in front of the grand stand.

The speeding programme will be such as will delight the hearts of the horseman, Lady Equestriennes, Lady Drivers, running and hurdle races, farmers' running and hurdle races, pacing, tandems, turnouts etc., etc.

Indian Band Tournament. Liberal prizes are offered to the Indian bands of the Province and from six to ten bands are expected to participate dressed in uniforms and native costume.

The Western Fair of 1888 will be the great event of the year.

ONE MORE FOOL.

NIAGARA FALLS, Sept. 16—There was no little furore of excitement here to-day when it was known that another attempt would be made by a human being to go through the whirlpool rapids in a boat, or more properly speaking, a barrel.

Charles Percy, a carriage trimmer, of Supension Bridge, N. Y., who has had his boat and himself on exhibition at Buffalo for over a week, performed the daring feat successfuly this afternoon.

At exactly 4.15 the little boat commenced its journey down the river, moving along slowly until it came under the railway suspension bridge, where it struck the swift water and started down at a fearful rate of speed. After going about 25 yards it turned completely over and remained in this position for nearly 250 yards, when it righted itself again and passed through the seething waters without any further mishap. As the craft sailed out into the whirlpool Percy opened the trap door and waved his handkerchief as a signal to his friends on shore that he was all right. Considerable diffculty was found in getting the boat out of the whirlpool, and it was not till eight o'clock that the efforts were successful.

At 8.30 Percy got into his boat again and started down the Queenston rapids at Lewiston, whence he leaves in the morning by steamer for Toronto, where his boat will be on exhibition at the Fair.

DR. H. S. TANNER.

CHICAGO, Sept. 15.—Dr. H. S. Tanner, who became famous eight years ago by fasting forty days, arrrived here yesterday from New Mexico. He is apparently in perfect healtlh at present. He eats two meals a day in summer and one meal a day in the winter. In an interview he said he had been in New Mexico four years pursuing investigations into the subject of suspended animation or counterfeit death. He is convinced that large numbers of people are annually buried alive all over the world, and from his study of various cases and the records of societies on the subject in Holland and elsewhere he is convinced that so subtle is the principle of life that no one can undertake to say that it is extinct until decomposition, the only sure sign, has set in. He declares that the dead of this country are buried with indecent, with criminal haste, and that burials of persons who are not absolutely dead are murders. The doctor is also pursuing another branch of semi-suspended animation, viz., hibernation. He declares that bears and other hibernating aninmals do not use their lungs during the hibernating season, and he is convinced that man can hibernate. He refers to the long trances of the Hindoo adepts, accomplished through long seasons of wasting, and declares it to be his belief that these trances are merely seasons of hibernation. The doctor says he is studying with a view to making some experiments in this line, and that the time may come when he may permit himself to be sealed up in an air-tight coffin and laid away until such time as he shall designate for it to be opened.

Mysterious Murder in Whitechapel.—Boulanger Disappeared.—Royalty Gossip.

Almost the only thing talked about is some mysterious murderer who has killed four women within as many weeks and defies all efforts of the police to capture him. The mutilated body of his fourth victim was found soon after daylight the other morning and the paper extras are filling the town with the horrible details. The woman's throat had been cut from ear to ear and the body cut open as by a dissecor. The heart lay on the ground and a portion of the entrails had been tied around the neck.

In Whitechapel, where all the four murders took place, people are in a state of panic, and extra police have been put on duty to control the excitement on the streets. The four women killed were all dissolute characters and lived in a wretched and densely populated part of the city. But the mystery that surrounds their death is so strange and impenetrable that the people can talk of nothing else. There is little doubt that the whole four murders were committed by one and the same man. The victims were all killed with a knife in an identical manner, and not only murdered but mutilated in a bloodthirsty way that suggests the savagery of Sioux Indians on the plains. The general opinion is that the murders are the work of a homicidal maniac—a sort of Mr. Hyde—too cunning to fall into the clutches of the police. He is, at any rate, a cool ruffian, carefully and shrewdly concealing every clue as to his identity. There is no indication of hurry or struggle in an of the four cases. Thus far the police are absolutely at sea. They do not even suspect anybody, except in a vague way a certain mysterious person nicknamed "Leather Apron." Their chief reason for suspecting him is that he used to carry a big knife and has not been seen lately.

It is believed that the Emperor, on his round of imperial visits will stop in London. That is sad for Queen Victoria, for he will come formally and pomposely, and she will have to come to town to receive him in full state, instead of packing him in some hotel, as she does with royal visitors usually. The visit is expected in November, as the Emperor wants to see the House of Commons in session.

When Gen. Boulanger disappeared from the public gaze, he announced his intention of travelling incognito. Whether he has travelled or not, he has carried out the incognito programme, for nobody knows where he is, though every one has a theory. It is doubtful whether he will be much alarmed at the only Boulangist news of importance, which is that some Frenchmen have organized the League of Republican Action, which is intended to fight him and his ways.

DISEASES OF MEN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC No. 8

CURES The terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED, AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

Symptoms for which No. 8 should be used:—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, nowadies, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, self-distrust, or loss of the semin-fluid—the result of self-abuse, or marital excess—impotency, imnutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, sometimes innocently acquired. In short the spring or vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and mentally, from early indiscretions, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address for Lubon's Treatise, entitled "CHRONIQUE SCANDALEUSE," an account of follies and vices. This book will be sent sealed and secure from observation upon receipt of two 3c stamps.

CHAPTER XXI.—CLEARING THE DECKS

Warren Relf had arranged for his mother and sister, with Elsie Challoner, to seek the friendly shelter of San Remo early in October. The sooner away from England the better. Before they went, however, to avert the chance of a disagreeable encounter, he met them on their arrival in town at Liverpool Street, and saw them safely across to the continental train at London Bridge. It chanced to be the very self same day that Hugh Massinger had posted his second forged note to poor fatherless Winifred.

Elsie dared hardly look the young painter in the face even now, for shame and timidity; and Warren Relf, respecting her natural sensitiveness, concentrated most of his attention on his mother and Edie, scarcely allowing Elsie to notice by shy side-glances his unobtrusive preparations for her own personal comfort on the journey. But Elsie's quick eye observed them all, gratefully, none the less for that. She liked Warren; it was impossible for anybody not to like and respect the frank young painter, with his honest bronzed face, and his open, manly, out-spoken manners. Timid as she was and broken-hearted still, she could not go away from England for ever and ever—for Elsie never meant to return again—without thanking him just once in a few short words for all his kindness. As they stood on the bare and windy platform with which the South-Eastern Railway Company woos our suffrages at London Bridge, she drew him aside for a moment from his mother and sister with a little hasty shrinking glance which Warren could not choose but follow. "Mr. Relf," she said, looking down at the floor and fumbling with her parasol, "I want to thank you; I can't go away without thanking you once."

He saw the effort it had cost her to say as much, and a wild lump rose sudden in his throat for gratitude and pleasure. "Miss Challoner," he answered, looking back at her with an unmistakable light in his earnest eyes, "say nothing else. I am more than sufficiently thanked already.—I know you wish this episode kept secret from every one: you may rely upon me and upon my mate in the yawl. If ever in my life I can be of any service to you, remember you can command me.—If not, I shall never again obtrude myself upon your memory.—Good bye, good-bye." And taking her hand one moment in his own, he held it for a second, then let it drop again. "Now go," he said in a tremulous voice—"go back to Edie."

Elsie—one blush—went back as he bade her. "Good-bye," she said, as she glided from his side—"Good bye, and thank you." That was all that passed between those two that day. Yet Elsie knew, with profound regret, as the train steamed off through the draughty corridors on its way to Dover, that Warren Relf had fallen in love with her; and Warren Relf, standing alone upon the dingy, gusty platform, knew with an ecstasy of delight and joy that Elsie Challoner was grateful to him and liked him. It is something, gratitude. He valued that more from Elsie Challoner than he would have valued love from any other woman.

With profound regret, for her part, Elsie saw that Warren Relf had fallen in love with her; because he was such an honest, manly, straight forward, good fellow, and because from the very first moment she had liked him. Yet what to her were love and lovers now? Her heart lay buried beneath the roots of the poplar at Whitestrand, as truly as Hugh Massinger thought it lay buried in the cheap sea-washed grave in the sand at Orfordness. She was grieved to think this brave earnest man should have fixed his heart on a hopeless object. It was well she was going to San Remo for ever. In the whirl and bustle and hurry of London life, Warren Relf would doubtless soon forget her. But some faces are not easily forgotten.

From London Bridge, Warren Relf took the Metropolitan to St. James's Park, and walked across, still flushed and hot, to Piccadilly. At the club, he glanced hastily at that morning's paper. The first paragraph on which his eye lighted was Winifred Meysey's earnest advertisement in the Agony Column. It gave him no little time for reflection. If ever Elsie saw that advertisement, it might alter and upset all her plans for the future—and all his own plans into the bargain. Already she felt profoundly the pain and shame of her false position with Winifred and the Meyseys; that much Warren Relf had learned from Edie. If only she knew how eagerly Winifred pined for news of her, she might be tempted after all to break her reserve, to abandon her concealment, and to write full tidings of her present whereabouts to her poor little frightened and distressed pupil. That would be bad; for then the whole truth must sooner or later come out before the world; and for Elsie's sake, for Winifred's sake perhaps even a wee bit for his own sake also, Warren Relf shrank unspeakably from that unhappy exposure. He couldn't bear to think that Elsie's poor broken bleeding heart should be laid open to its profoundest recesses before the eyes of society, for every daw of an envious old dowager to snap at and peck at. He hoped Elsie would not see the advertisement. If she did, he feared her natural tenderness and her sense of self-respect would compel her to write the whole truth to Winifred.

She might see it at Marseilles, for they were going to run right through to the Mediterranean by the special express stopping a night to rest themselves at the Hotel du Louvre in the Rue Cannebiere. Edie would be sure to look at the "Times," and if she saw the advertisement, to show it to Elsie.

But even if she didn't, aught he not himself to call her attention to it? Was it right of him, having seen it, not to tell her of it? Should he not rather leave to Elsie herself the decision what course she thought best to take under these special circumstances?

He shrank from doing it. It grieved him to the quick to strain her poor broken heart any further. She had suffered so much: why rake it all up again? And even as he thought all these things, he knew each moment with profounder certainty than ever that he loved Elsie. There is nothing on earth to excite a man's love for a beautiful woman like being compelled to take tender care for that woman's happiness—having a gentle solicitude for her most sacred feelings thrust upon one by circumstances as an absolute necessity.—Still, Warren Relf was above all things honest and trustworthy. Not to send that advertisement straight to Elsie, even at the risk of hurting her own feelings would constitute in some sort, he felt, a breach of confidence, a construction falsehood, or at the very best a suppressio veri; and Warren Relf was too utterly and transparently truthful to allow for a moment any faltering with essential veritics.—He signed a sigh of profound regret as he took his penknife with lingering hesitation from his waistcoat pocket. But he boldly cut out the advertisement from the Agony Column, none the less, thereby defacing the first page of the Times, and rendering himself liable to the censure of the committee for wanton injury to the club property; after the perpetration of which heinous offence he walked gravely and soberly into the adjoining writing-room and sat down to indite a hasty note intended for his sister at the Hotel du Louvre:

MY DEAR EDIE—Just after you left, I caught sight of enclosed advertisement in the second column of this morning's Times. Show it to Hester. I can't bear to send it—I can't bear to cause her any further trouble or embarrassment of any sort after all she has suffered; and yet—it would be wrong, I feel, to conceal it from her. If she takes my advice, she will not answer it. Better let things remain as they are. To write one line would be to upset all. For heaven's sake, don't show Her this letter. —With love to you both and kind regards to Her. Your affectionate brother. W. R.

He addressed the letter, "Miss Relf, Hotel du Louvre, Marseilles," and went over with it to the box on the mantel-shelf, where Hugh Massinger's letter was already lying.

When Edie Relf received that letter next evening at the hotel in the Rue Channebiore she looked at it once and glanced over at Elsie. She looked at it twice and glanced over at Elsie. She looked at it a third time—and then, with a woman's sudden resolve, she did exactly what Warren himself had told her not to do—she handed it across the table to Elsie.

Hugh's plot trembled indeed in the balance that moment; for if only Elsie wrote to Winifred, ignoring of course his last forged letter, then lying on the hall table at Whitestrand, all would have been up with him. His lie would have come home to him straight as a lie. The two letters would in all probability not have coincided. Winifred would have known him from that day forth for just what he was—a liar—and a forger.

And yet if, by that simple and natural coincidence, Elsie had sent a letter from Marseilles merely assuring Winifred of her safety and answering the advertisement, it would have fallen in completely with Hugh's plot, and rendered Winifred's assurance doubly certain. Elsie had sailed to Australia by way of Marseilles, then. In a novel, that coincidence would surely have occurred. In real life, it might easily have done so, but as a matter of fact it didn't; for Elsie read the letter slowly first, and then the advertisement.

"Poor fellow!" she said as she passed the letter back again to Edie. "It was very kind of him; and he did quite right.—I think I shall take his advice, after all.—It's terribly difficult to know what one ought to do. But I don't think I shall write to Winifred."

Not for herself. She could bear the exposure, if it was to save Winifred. But for Winifred's sake, for poor dear Winifred's. She couldn't deprive her of her new lover.

Ought she to let Winifred marry him? What trouble might not yet be in store for Winifred?—No, no. Hugh would surely be kinder to her. He had sacrificed one loving heart for her sake; he was not likely now to break another.

How little we all can judge for the best. It would have been better for Elsie and better for Winifred, if Elsie had done as Warren Relf did, and not as he said—if she had written the truth, and the whole truth at once to Winifred, allowing her to be her own judge in the matter. But Elsie had not the heart to crush Winifred's dream; and very naturally. No one can blame a woman for refusing to act with more than human devotion and foresight.

Hugh Massinger had left the headquarters of Bohemia for twenty minutes at the exact moment when Warren Relf entered the Cheyne Row Club. He had gone to telegraph his respectful condolences to Winifred and Mrs. Meysey at Invertanar Castle, on their sad loss, with conventional politeness. When he came back he found to his surprise, the copy of the Times, still lying open on the smoking-room table; but Winifred's advertisement was cut clean out of the Agony Column with a sharp penknife. In a moment he said to himself, aghast: "Some enemy hath done this thing." It must have been Relf! Nobody else in the club knew anything. Such espionage was intolerable, unendurable, not to be permitted. For three days he had been trembling and chafing at the horrid fact that Relf knew all and might denounce and ruin him. That alone was bad enough. But that Relf should be plotting and intriguing against him! That Relf should use his sinister knowledge for some evil end! That Relf should go spying and eavesdropping and squirming about like a common detective! The idea was fairly part endurance. Among gentlemen such things were not to be permitted. Hugh Massinger was prepared not to permit them.

He passed a day and night of inexpressible annoyance. This situation was getting too much for him. He was fighting in the dark; he didn't understand Warren Relf's silence. If the fellow meant to crush him, for what was he waiting? Hugh could not hold all the threads in his mind together. He felt as though Warren Relf was going to make, not only the Cheyne Row Club, but all London altogether too hot for him. To have drowned Elsie, to be jilted by Winifred, and to be baffled after all by that creature Relf—this, this was the hideous and ignominious future he saw looming now visibly before him!

It was with a heavy heart that next evening at seven he dropped into the club dining-room. Would Relf be there? he wondered silently. And if so, what course would Relf adopt towards him? Yes, Relf was there, at a corner table, as good luck would have it, with his back turned to him safely as he entered; and that fellow Potts, the other mudbank artist—they hung their wretched daubs of flat Suffolk seaboard side by side fraternally on the walls of the Institute—was dining with him and concocting mischief no doubt, for the house of Massinger. Hugh half determined to turn and flee: then all that was manly and genuine within him revolted at once against that last disgrace. He would not run from this creature Relf. He would not be turned out of his own club—he was a member of the Committee and a founder of the society. He would face it out and dine in spite of him.

But not before the fellow's very eyes; that was more than in his present perturbed condition Hugh Massinger could manage to stand. He skulked quietly round, unseen by Relf, into the side alcove—a recess cut off by an arched doorway—where he gave his order in a very low voice to Martin, the obsequious waiter. Martin was surprised at so much reserve. Mr. Massinger, he was generally the very freest and loudest-spoken gentleman in the whole houseful of 'em. He always talked, he did, as if the club and the kitchen and the servants all belonged to him.

From the alcove, by a special interposition of fate, Hugh could hear distinctly what Relf was saying. Strange—incredible—a singular stroke of luck; he had indeed caught the man in the very act and moment of conspiring.—They were talking of Elsie! Their conversation came to him distinct, though low. Unnatural excitement had quickened his senses to a strange degree. He heard it all—every sound—every syllable.

"Then you promise, on your word of honour as a gentleman, you'll never breathe a word of this or of any part of Miss Challoner's affair to anybody anywhere?"

"My dear boy, I promise, that's enough.—I see the necessity as you do.—So you've actually got the letter, have you!"

"I've got the letter. If you like, I'll read it to you. It's hear in my pocket. I have to restore it by the time Mr. Meysey returns to morrow."

Mr. Meysey! Restore it! Then, for all his plotting, Relf didn't know that Mr. Meysey was dead, and that his funeral was fixed to take plac eat Whitestrand on Monday or Tuesday!

There was a short pause. What letter? he wondered. Then Relf began reading in a low tone: "My darling Winifred, I can hardly make up my mind to write you this letter; and yet I must; I can no longer avoid it."

Great heavens, it was his own forged letter to Winifred! How on earth had it ever come into Relf's possession!

Plot, plot—plot and counterplot! Dirty, underhand, hole-and-corner spy-business! Relf had wheedled it out of Meyseys some how, to help him to track down and confront his enemy! Or else he had suborned one of the Whitestrand servants to steal or copy their Master's correspondence!

He heard it through to the last word, "Ever your affectionate but heart-broken ELSIE."

What were they going to say next?—Nothing. Potts just drew a long breath of surprise, and then whistled shortly and curiously, "The man's a blackguard to have broken the poor girl's heart," he observed at last, let alone this. He's a blackguard, Relf.—I'm very sorry for her.—And what's become of Miss Challoner now, if it isn't indiscreet to ask the question?"

"Well, Potts, I've only taken any other man into my confidence at all in this matter, because you knew more than half already, and it was impossible, without telling you the other half, fully to make you feel the necessity for keeping the strictest silence about it. I'd rather not tell either you or anybody exactly where Miss Challoner's gone now. But at the present moment, if you want to know the precise truth, I've no doubt she's at Marseilles, on her way abroad to a farther destination which I prefer on her account not to mention. More than that it's better not to say. But she wishes it kept a profound secret, and she intends never to return to England."

As Hugh Massinger heard those words, those reassuring words, a sense of freedom and lightness burst instantly upon him in a wild rush of reaction. Aha! aha! poor feeble enemy! Was this all? Then Relf knew really nothing! That mysterious "Yes" of his was a fraud, a pretense, a mistake, a delusion! He was all wrong, all wrong and in error. Instead of knowing that Elsie was dead—dead and buried in her nameless grave at Orfordness—he fancied she was still alive and in hiding! The man was a windbag. To think that he should be terrified—he, Hugh Massinger—by such a mere empty boastful eavesdropper!—Why, Relf, after all, was himself deceived by the forged letters he had so cleverly palmed off upon them. The special information he pretended to possess was only the special information derived from Hugh Massinger's own careful and admirable forgeries. He hugged himself in a perfect transport of delight. The load was lifted as if by magic from his breast. There was nothing on earth for him, after all, to be afraid of!

He saw it all at a glance now.—Relf was in league with the servants at the Meyseys'. Some prying lady's maid or dishonest flunkey must have sent him the first letter to Winnifred, or at least a copy of it: nay more; he or she must have intercepted the second one, which arrived while Winifred was on her way to Scotland—else how could Relf have heard this last newly fledged fiction about the journey abroad—the stoppage at Marseilles—the determination never to return to England?—And how greedily and eagerly the man swallowed it all—his nasty second-hand servants'-hall information! Hugh positively despised him in his own mind for his ready credulity and his mean duplicity. How glibly he retailed the plausible story, with nods and hints and additions of his own: "At the present moment, I've no doubt she's at Marseilles, on her way abroad to a farther destination which I prefer on her account not to mention." What airs and graces and what comic importance the fellow put on, on the strength of his familiarity with this supposed mystery! Any other man with a straightforward mind would have said outright plainly, "to Australia;" but this pretentious jackanapes with his stolen information must make up a little mystification all of his own, to give himself importance in the eyes of his greedy gobemouche of a companion. It was too grotesque! too utterly ridiculous! And this was the man of whom he had been so afraid! His own dupe! the ready fool who swallowed at second-hand such idle tattle of the servants' hall, and employed an understrapper or a pretty subrette to open other people's letters for his own information! From that moment forth, Hugh might cordially hate him, Hugh might freely despise him; but he would, never, never, never, be afraid of him.

One only idea left some slight suspicion of uneasiness on his enlightened mind. He hoped the lady's maid—that hypothetical lady's-maid—had sent on the forged letter—after reading it—so Winifred would have time to think much about Elsie at present, in the midst of this sudden and unexpected bereavement: she would be too full of her own dead father, no doubt, to pay any great attention to her governess's misfortunes. But still, one doesn't like one's private letters to be so vulgarly tampered with. And the worst of it was, he could hardly ask her whether she had received the note. He could hardly get at the bottom of this low conspiracy. It was his policy now to let sleeping dogs lie. The less said about Elsie the better.

Yet in his heart he despised Warren Relf for his meanness. He might forge himself: nothing low or ungentlemanly or degrading in forgery. Dishonest, if you like; dishonest, not vulgar. But to open other people's letters—pah!—the disgusting smallness and lowness and vulgarity of it! A sort of under-footmanish type of criminality. "Pecca fortiter, if you will, of course, but don't be a cad and a disgrace to your breeding.

MANITOBA'S GREAT CROP.

Some idea of the immensity of the harvest in Manitoba may be gathered from the large demand for men existing there at the present time. A Westbourne, Man, despatch of August 27 says: Men are very scarce. We hear that $2.50 a day with board, is offered."

From Meadow Lea the report is: "Good farm laborers seem to be very difficult to get."

Mr. Metcalf, at the Intelligence office of the Dominion Government at Winnipeg, says he could place 700 laborers during harvesting operations if he only had them. The demand is very great, good men very scarce.

The Winnipeg Sun of August 25 says: "A number of farmers from the surrounding country are in the city daily looking for farm hands to assist in reaping the present crop. Good, experienced hands are scarce, and consequently high wages are being paid."

A. C. Fraser, mayor of Brandon, writes of that district: "Wheat will yield 25 to 35, oats 50 and upwards, and barley 40 to 50 bushels per acre. The present prospects for settlers in Manitoba are first-class. Our country has some drawbacks, but as far as my experience goes, is one of the best on the American continent. There are particularly good openings in this district for cheese and butter factories."

A. G. McDougall, secretary County Dennis Agricultural Society, Virden, says: "Wheat will yield about 36 bushels, oats 45 bushels, and barley 40 bushels per acre." Speaking of the present prospects for settlers in that part of the country, he says: "There are some homesteads open yet, but they are inferior. There is plenty of land for sale, at from $5 to $7 per acre.

Swift vs. Slow."

There are many things we can only understand by comparison. One of these is our idea of swiftness. The speed of the ant is swift compared with that of some other insects. That of man is swift compared with that of some animals, but slow compared with that of the blood-horse or greyhound.

Talk about quick transit and railway trains! Why in one minute we are whirled around on the outside of the earth by its diurnal motion a distance of thirteen miles. In the same space of time we shall also have been carried along with the earth, in its journey around the sun, 1,080 miles. Is this fast? Comparatively, yes. Yet the ray of light that meets your eye now, will in a minute be 11,600,000 miles away. How do we know all this? Ask the astronomer.

Compare this with the speed of an express train, 1 mile a minute; with that of the fastest trotter, less than 148 rods; that of the street car, about 32 rods, or the average walk of the pedestrian, 16 rods a minute.

"DON'T GO NEAR THE DWARFS"

The Smallest People in the World, but they Use Poisoned Arrows and are Cannibals.

None of the remarkable discoveries made by explorers in the depths of Africa has ever excited deeper interest than Schweinfurth's vivid description of the Akka dwarfs whom he found in the northeastern part of the Congo basin. Living among tribes of splendid physical development, these little people, from four feet to four feet six inches in height, are noted for their courage and agility, for their prowess as hunters, and for their unusual dexterity in the use of the bow and spear. In a recent lecture in London Prof. Flower, director of the Natural History Museum, described them as the smallest people in the world, and expressed the opinion, now generally held, that they and their relatives south of the Congo are the Pigmies who were known to the Greeks and of whom Herodotus and Aristotle gave descriptions that were long believed to be fanciful.

The industry of four great travellers, who took up the work of exploration where Stanley left it, has now supplied us with considerable information about the remarkable Batwa dwarfs, who are spread in little communities through the densely wooded regions south of the great northern bend of the Congo. They have been found in districts about 400 miles apart and in much of the intervening regions that are still little known. They have been studied by Wolf near the Lulua River, still further east by Wissmann in the interminable forests which sunlight hardly penetrates north of the Sankuru, by Grenfell and Von Francois on the Lubilash.

SOUTHWEST OF STANLEY FALLS.

These discoveries were made in the year 1885 and 1886, but the explorers were too busy accumulating facts to prepare them for public perusal, and we have had only the most fragmentary allusions to these unique and interesting little folks until the writings of Wolf, Wissman, and Von Francois were published in Germany this summer.

One day Dr. Wolf was pushing through the forest east of the Lulua River, when he suddenly came upon a little glade in which were about twenty tumbledown beehive huts, the homes of the Batwa. He had seen a few of these little people, kept as hunters at the towns of big chiefs, but this was the first time he had met them in their own poorly cared for villages. Some of them could speak the language of the Bakuba, the great tribe which claims this region, but they were so awe struck by the white man's sudden advent that they would hardly utter a word. A crowd of nearly a hundred coffee-brown little folks, none of them larger than children two-thirds grown, stood timidly at a distance and surveyed the visitors in wonder. Dr. Wolf won their confidence so far at last that they permitted him to approach, and, unobserved by the natives, he took the heights of many of them on a spear shaft. These and later measurements by Dr. Wolf of full-grown adults vary from four feet three inches to four feet seven and one-half inches. The average height, according to the several authorities, seems to be about four feet five inches. Unlike the Akka, the Batwa are not unusually prognathous, nor have they disproportionately large abdomens, but they are compact, well-built little creatures, without any physical peculiarity except their small size. Lieut. Wissmann, however, received quite an unfavorable impression of the Batwa from the few specimens he saw among the Bassonge, whom he describes as dwelling in tiny huts, despised by their neighbors, ill shaped, and woebegone specimens of humanity.

All through this great forest region may be found these nomad hunters. In little bands of eight or more families they build their grass huts live there a few months, and then move on to other hunting grounds. Here and there in the woods they dig pits about eight feet deep, which they cover with branches and turf, and in these traps they catch elephants, hippopotami, and buffaloes, which are often impaled upon sharpened stakes driven into the bottom of the pits. They also hunt large game with the bow and spear. They cannot kill an elephant at once with their weapons, but they seldom lose an animal they once wound. Von Francois says that, lying in ambush, they attack the largest game, and follow it if necessary for days. Whenever the wounded animal halts it becomes the target for a fresh shower of spears, and finally weakened by loss of blood it falls an easy prey. The cunning Pigmies incur small loss of weapons in these long chases after elephants and buffaloes. Their arrow and spear heads are barbed and cannot drop out of the wound, neither do they lose the spear shafts, for they are fastened by stout cords to the head, and if the animal in his flight brushes against trees, the shafts, instead of falling to the ground, merely dangle against his sides.

It is not usual for explorers to find the Batwa timid and undemonstrative, like the first villagers that Dr. Wolf met. They have earned the reputation of being very ugly and pugnacious little fellows. In war they use poisoned arrows. They take the warpath at night, steal noiselessly up to the sleeping village of the enemy, fire the huts, and kill the people with arrows and spears by the light of their burning houses. Their fallen foes and their prisoners become for the Batwa, like the Akka, are numbered among the anthropophagi of Africa. Their fame as fighters has travelled far, and the natives who accompanied Grenfell and Von Francois were panic stricken when they first saw a dwarf. One of their peculiarities is the fact that on their numerous marches they do not sleep by camp fires at night, like other natives, but stretch themselves on the branches of trees, which they clasp with arms and legs, and there peacefully and safely slumber, out of the reach of wild beasts.

"Don't go near the dwarfs," was the admonition of the Congo natives to Grenfell. "They permit no one to enter their country. They poison their weapons. They are the ugliest of mortals, and have great heads with bearded chins upon the smallest of bodies." Sure enough, Grenfell and Von Francois found beard on the face of many a Batwa, but the heads of the dwarfs are not disproportionately large, and their features not especially ugly. Unlike the Akka, who are nearly naked, the Batwa wear a wide strip of native cloth around their loins. Unskilled in any arts save those of war and the chase, they chiefly depend for their weapons, their grain, and vegetables upon the tribes of large people near whom they live, most of whom acknowledge their inferiority as hunters to the Batwa, and gladly encourage them to barter their loads of game for products of the garden, brass wire, and beads. The Batwa use these European and throughout the wide region they inhabit they are thus becoming gradually merged with the surrounding peoples. Not a few communities of pure Batwa have been found but mixed breeds are also common. The Batwa and the Akka it is believed, are the remnants of a once very numerous race, and both are gradually dying out, victims of the more powerful tribes around them and of their inferior attainments in the arts of living. Many of the Batwa children die for lack even of such imperfect care as most savage mothers give their offspring. There seems to be little maternal affection, and in flight the tiny mothers have often been known to abandon their babies to their fate.

At the furthest points reached on both the Bussera and Tchuapa Rivers, about 215 miles apart, the continued advance of the little steamer Peace was rendered impossible by the frantic hostility of the Batwa and their neighbors. Von Francois, one of the most graphic writers and accomplished geographers who have visited Africa, makes a lively picture of the bowling little demons on the shores of the Bussera, that, slimy with poison, dashed against the steel network which protected the steamer, or stuck in its wooden sun roof. He gives us a vivid idea of the agility and acrobatic accomplishments of these people 215 miles away on the Tchuapa. He saw the little warriors clambering along precipitous slopes above the river, where there seemed hardly a foothold; saw them swinging like monkeys from limb to limb of trees, and climbing out on branches overhanging the water so that they might speed their arrows at shorter range against the puffing and impertinent monster that had dared to intrude upon the privacy of the little folks. He heard their ear-splitting yells, which were wholly out of proportion to their physical insignificance. Grenfell is a man of peace, and, unlike some other explorers, he did not choose to shoot lead at them. A few blank cartridges, however, had an excellent moral effect when the enemy took to canoes and seemed bent on making a prize of the little vessel.

SHOWING HUNDREDS OF ARROWS

What is the past history of these most unique and extraordinary of African races? We are not likely to have a complete answer to this question. As yet we have had only a glimpse of them, and the study of their languages, traditions, and habits may throw light upon their past. All our present evidence points to the probability that they have descended from the earliest inhabitants of the continent. We know something of the migrations of the tribes, around them, and there may yet be found evidence to show the correctness of the hypothesis that the Akka north and the Batawa south of the Congo, the Doko of Abyssinia, the Obongo of the Gaboon, and the Bushmen of South Africaare remnants of one great family.

Good Readers.

While David Garrick, "the little player-actor," as Dr. Johnson dubbed him, was staying as a guest at an English country-house, he read the Litany of the Church of England, one Sunday morning, to his host and fellow guests. "In all time of our tribulation, in all time of our prosperity, in the hour of death, and in the Day of Judgment, Good Lord, deliver us!" read the actor, and such was the impressive fervor of his manner, that there was not a dry eye among his hearers when he had finished.

A rule of the Cunard Line ordains that the service of the Church of England be read on shipboard every Sunday morning while at sea. If a clergyman is not present, the prayers and lessons are read by the captain, the purser, or the surgeon. Several years ago a London journal, referring to this practice, said that "few passengers can have crossed the Atlantic frequently without wishing that they might oftener hear such readers as some among the captains of the Cunard Line."

Mr. Gladstone, when at his country-seat, often reads in the neighboring church the "Daily Lessons," and it is said that his expressive reading gives a deeper significance to the inspired words of Holy Writ than they have in the mouth of an ordinary reader.

A good reader does more than please his hearers; he instructs and stimulates them. Written or printed words embalm thoughts, but the reader gives them a living utterance. "The essence of language lies in the living utterance," says Wilhelm von Humboldt: and he adds, "It is only by the spoken word that the speaker or reader breathes as it were his

Why You Feel
So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,
"The Life of the Body."
Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?
Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:
G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."
Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."
Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best
Spring and Family Medicine
in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Martyrs to Headache
Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.
The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.
Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.
"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVean, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."
"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."
Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and bilousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."
When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

THE ST. CLAIR FLATS.
On motion of Senator Cullom the United States Senate has adopted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of State to inform that house as to whether the channel through the St. Clair Flats and the Detroit River is in Canadian or American waters. The Secretary of War may not be able to answer this question, but the archives of the American State Department most certainly could. The boundary line between Canada and the United States was laid down by Bayfield in 1822, and although there have been several disputes involving the location of the boundary line since that time, the correctness of Bayfield's line has never been questioned. This line runs from the centre of the channel at the head of the Detroit river to the centre of the channel at the head of the St. Clair river, and the whole of the St. Clair Flats canal is to the eastward of that line. That this is the case, and that the line as drawn by Bayfield is the correct one, has been expressly admitted by the United States Government. The canal through the St. Clair Flats was built for the United States by a Canadian named Brown, who had the contract for the entire work. He procured all the timber and other material necessary for the completion of the work in Canada, and was compelled by the United States to pay, under protest, $60,000 duties upon it. After he had fulfilled his contract Mr. Brown made a claim upon the United States for the return of the duties, on the ground that as the canal was entirely within Canadian waters, he had not imported any of the material in constructing it into the United States. A corps of American surveyors was sent to St. Clair Flats to disprove this statement, and upon their report the American Government restored to Mr. Brown his $60,000. The St. Clair canal is not, however, the only portion of the regular navigable channel through the great lakes which is in Canadian waters. The Lime Kiln crossing, near Amherstburg, is in Canadian waters, and from this crossing to Point au Pelee passage, the navigable channel through Lake Erie is entirely in Canadian waters. Any attempt on the part of the United States to exclude Canadian vessels from American waters could be met on the great lakes by an answer that would paralyze the commerce of the Great Lakes. The United States Senate is now taking the right course in asking for information upon such important subjects, but it would have been infinitely better if it had adopted this policy before it rejected the fishery.—Ex.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

INGERSOLL, Aug. 4—The present outlook for the farmer in this section has not been better for a number of years. The only crop that is not above average is fall wheat, which is always a lottery with any farmer and can never be relied on. Wheat, barley and hay are all in. Oats, spring wheat and peas are just about ready for harvesting. Corn and roots will be something that the dairymen have not had in such abundance for years. This being the great cheese producing district of Ontario, what with the price of cheese the farmer cannot help but make some cash this year.

They Hanged a Boy in Fun.
BALTIMORE, Md., September 25.—Samuel Thomas, colored, aged 15 years, was playing with some companions in the packing-room at the McMurray factory, at Frederick, when Tom Ross, colored, and several others suggested that they hang Thomas. A thin cord was procured and fastened about the boy's neck. Before the workmen in the room realized what was being done the loose end of the rope was thrown around the shafting. The rope caught in the revolving shaft and was rapidly wound up, carrying the struggling and frightened boy with it. He touched the shalt and was swung around it twice, when the cord broke and he fell to the floor. He was removed to his home, and late in the afternoon was attacked with hemorrhages, from which he died. No arrests have been made

CHARON'S SECOND VISIT.

BY GEO. INGLIS.

[In the Græco-Roman mythology Charon was the ferryman who carried the souls of the dead across the river Styx. Each passenger paid an obolus, a small coin of about two cents value. Mercury or Hermes, among other duties, was the herald of Jupiter, and the conductor of the shades to the banks of the river Styx. The Greek writer, Lucian, who was born about 120 A. D., in one of his inimitable prose dialogues, represents Charon as coming up to earth for a day's holiday. Mercury finds him laughing because a tile had fallen from a roof and killed a man who had just accepted an invitation to dinner. Charon persuades Mercury to show him round. The mountains, Pelion, Ossa and Olympus are piled on one another, and from that vantage ground the two view the world of men and pass comments thereon. Such was Charon's first visit.

Ho, there! Charon—glad to see you—shake old fellow—how d'ye do?
Up again, to look about you and this world of men to view?
Well! how's business? how's the ferry? does the little obolus
Clinking in his coffers, keep you all O K with Æcus?*
Did the shades in tearful chorus vex your philosophic mind,
Weeping as they crossed the river for the joys they'd left behind?
So, again did grim old Pluto† grant the ons poor boon you craved,
One more day's investigation why the shadows thus behaved.
What! Old Blear-Eyes! don't you know me? not remember Maia's son?
Mercury, who risked Jove's anger just to show you all the fun,
Mercury the psuchagogos nekropompos spirit guide,
Spirit driver, rather, erstwhile to the seven-fold Stygian tide.
Son of Erebos, do give that grizzled beard of yours a pull,
Jerk your straggling wits together; don't stand staring like a fool.
Think of Ossa on Olympus, Pelion on Ossa piled,
In that far off golden spring time, and of me, frail Maia's child,
How I sat alott beside you, showman of the wondrous show,
Pointing downward and commenting on the manikins below,
Ha, ha, ha! Come! laugh my hearty, as you laughed that day of yore,
When the tile so unexpected, hurled a shade to Pinto's shore.
Well, by Jupiter, O Hermes, you've surprised me, no mistake,
But I'm awful glad to see you, both for old acquaintance sake
And because I'm badly rattled—shade with an asthmatic cough,
Hardly more so things have altered since I had my last day off.
You yourself, my little Hermes, you have changed like all the rest,
Where's your cap, your golden sandals, where your staff with snaky crest?‡
Has the Thunderer discharged you for some new audacious theft?
Did you try to crib his ægis, or some bolt of mightiest heft?
So you too,§ from out Olympus did he kick off into air,
And did you lose the baubles in the downward drop from there?
O, my Hermes, do not leave me, 'tis your old companion begs,
If you do, he's done for, really, just as sure as eggs are eggs—
That's a phrase I once heard muttered by a nervous shade called Brown,
When the boat was overcrowded and he thought we'd sure go down.

All things change, my simple Charon, worthless things and things of price,
Tempora, you know, mutantur et mutamur in illis,
Cloud-compelling Jove no longer shakes Olympus with his nod,
As a deity, he's nowhere, a discredited old fraud,
All these mildewed smug Celestials, all but me, are long since dead,
Lack of adaptation killed them, their environment had fled,
Ox-eyed Hera, Aphrodite, glum Hephæstus, pug-nosed Pan,
Maid Minerva, damp Poseidon, wise Appolo, chaste Dian,
All are gone, and yours, my Charon, yours the same untoward fate,
If yourself to new conditions you cannot accommodate.
I've done that. As things have altered, I have managed to progress,
And Jove's herald now blooms radiant as a member of the Press.
I fit in like ball and socket, like a bottle and its cork,
I'm omniscience reporting for the Hustler of New York.
So come on, my friend, I'm with you; bless you, yes, I'll see you through,
"Busy!"—very; but, no matter, this will make an "interview,"
I'll just take and introduce you to old Benedict, our chief,
Such a "scoop" as this will be will tickle him past all belief,
But, my friend, as first essential, you must have a shave, and then
A bath will make you sweeter, too, for intercourse with men.
Yes, and then see, here's a tailor who will rig you out in style,
For where worth goes but a furlong, good appearance goes a mile.

. . . . . .

There, now, Charon, you look decent, neither eyes nor nose afflict,
Have a soda, then we'll toddle over and find Benedict,
After that we'll have some dinner, then I'll show you through the town,
And then once more we'll go aloft and do some looking down.

. . . . . .

You are civil, Hermes—very; you give orders, I'll obey,
All these modern improvements suit me nicely, I must say.
But now, tell me—what's a "drummer?"—I have never understood,
Yes, and by the bye, this also you must tell me—what's a "dude?"
For one day I ferried over shade with such outlandish tongue,
That it swept across his shoulder, and right o'er the gunwale hung,
Then his cheeks were just prodigious, and of quite a brassy hue,
He said he'd been a drummer" and had carried oil and glue,
He asked me if I'd ever seen the latest thing in boats,
Which a friend of his had patented, one Jeremiah Oates;
It had th' electric motor, was a lovely kind of goods,
And had lookers, where, if needful, I could pack away the "dudes."
Now what's electric motor? What's a drummer? What are dudes?
At your leisure you can tell me if you've seen that kind of goods.

. . . . . .

Certainly! with pleasure, Charon; not just now, though; later on.
We've enough on hand at present; come away; we must be gone.

. . . . . .

There! that's over; as I told you Ben'dict's tickled all to bits,
This thing's bound to be the biggest of my manifold big hits.
So in headlines will the Hustler blazon forth my Charon's name,
Immortality conferring, deathless, honour fadeless fame.
How would this sound, for example—HERE FROM HADES—in bold type?
Then, below, of somewhat smaller, less uncompromising stripe,
—Great Pluto's Famous Ferryman, Old Charon, of the Styx,
Has Come Earthward On A Jaunt From Tartarean Bailiwicks?—
And now this tricycle we'll mount; touch this button; there we go—
Driven by electric motor—sixty miles an hour is slow.
Wait until we've cleared the city, then I'll let her out a bit,
As a substitute for sandals, not so very bad, is it?
Electricity! my Charon, that gives wings so modern fleet.
Viewless as winds, than charlot steeds of Helios* more fleet.
Here we are, jump out and help me to inflate this small balloon,
No need of mountains nowadays, nor of incantations' croon,
There, all's ready, wait a minute, this machine of ours I'll hide,
Now, step in, I let her go—thus upward, birdlike, slow we glide.
And now we're high enough, I think, what do you say? will it do?
If you can't see just quite clearly, try these glasses—how's the view?
Why, my Hermes, this is splendid, all I could expect and more,
This is ever so much nicer than the way we did before,
I do so admire the motion, something quite unique; although
If I wasn't used to boating, I'd feel sickish, don't you know;
What a panorama, Hermes! what a grand, thrice glorious show!
I don't wonder that the shadows hate just awfully to go.
Mighty mountains! noble rivers! lakes!—like oceans infra dig,
Really, friend, I had no notion that the world was half so big,
But it's all so novel, Hermes, all quite new to me I vow,
I have never I'm quite certain, seen this landscape until now.

. . . . . .

No you never have, dear Charon; you ne'er said a thing more true,
This, if wholly fresh no longer, is yet new enough to you,
This is that great America, whereof you've doubtless heard
From obliging shades some rumours in the regions which you guard.
Look there where broad St. Lawrence rolls his burdens to the deep
Past the Royal Mount's proud glory and Quebec's historic steep,
There the mighty Mississippi labours southward to the sea,
And northward there Mackenzie's undisturbed sublimity,
While in the sunlight glinting there, like a band of burnished gold,
You may see, far south, the Amazon's vast lineaments unfold,
Then the lakes!—those giant mirrors, where the gods themselves might scan,
Ontario—Superior—Huron—Erie—Michigan.
Yes! on that landscape feast your eyes, thou boatman of the Styx,
For Demosthenes of Athens ne'er saw nobler from the Pnyx.†
Down yonder stately Hudson flows between pictorial shores,
And there's far-famed Niagara; just listen, how he roars!

L'ENVOIE.

The Ferryman's impressions of "the Falls" will ne'er be known
By the context what they "might have been" has possibly been shown—
For something must have happened in those regions of the air,
Mysteriously tragic—such things happen everywhere.
The omniscient reporter was found dead on the sea shore.
But of Charon to the Hustler cometh tidings nevermore.

A Clergyman's Predicament.

What has the clergyman to do when, in the middle of the celebration of a marriage service, he finds that the bridegroom is drunk? This problem presented itself the other day to the curate of St George's, Campden Hill. After the ceremony had proceeded some distance he discovered that the bridegroom was, as he says, "indisputably drunk," and unable to repeat the words of betrothal and wedlock with any approach of accuracy." His first impulse, he adds, was to stop, but that, recollecting the case of the bride who, being remonstrated with for bringing her betrothed to the altar drunk, replied that she could not induce him to come when sober, he proceeded and married the couple. In cases of ordinary contracts entered into in a state of intoxication the courts dissolve the contract. Surely this principle would apply to the contract of marriage. The curate thinks that the alteration of the hours of celebration had something to do with his difficulty.

Wife—John, dear, if it should be my misfortune to die before you do, do you think you would marry again? Husband—Well, I dinno, my love. Until it comes to him, no man can tell how he would be able to stand prosperity.

Selling a Chinese Girl.

A man named Menzies has been sentenced at Victoria, B. C., to eight months' imprisonment for selling a Chinese girl for $150 to a Chinaman. Menzies, who does not seem to have known the serious nature of the offence he was committing, took the girl to several of the clergymen of the city, but all refused to perform a ceremony which would be incomprehensible to the Chinese couple and therefore not binding upon their consciences. Menzies then gave the girl to the Chinaman and told them they were married. Judge Gray, in sentencing the accused, was very severe upon Menzies for trying to misuse a sacred ordinance of the Christian Church to carry out his unholy purpose, and declared: "If the contracting parties are heathens, let them be married according to heathen rites binding on their consciences, or if necessary that there should be a civil marriage let them go to a civil magistrate or the registrar. I cannot understand the sacred service of a Christian church being so prostituted and dishonored. It is no answer to say the Chinese buy and sell these women, and not regard marriage in the light we do. You belong to what we believe a higher scale of civilization and ought to feel that bartering children for prostitution, whether under the form of marriage or otherwise, is a disgrace as well as a crime."

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN.

HE TOOK HER BABY IN BATHING.

A recent issue of the New York Sun contained the following:—Among those who bathed at South Beach, Staten Island, the other day, was an athletic young man with dark hair and moustache. He wore a white gauze shirt and blue tights with a red belt around his waist. While he was walking up and down the beach a young woman, about 20 years old, dressed in a black jersey and light seersucker skirt, approached him. In her arms she carried a boy about one year old. The child was dressed in a short white muslin slip. Its other garments lay on the beach. She asked the young man if he would mind taking her baby out into the water and give him a dip. The young man blushed and hesitated, but as the eyes of several young ladies who had been admiring the baby and had heard the request were fixed upon him, he gallantly took the young charge on his arm and walked into the water. It was low tide, and he went out to where the water was about knee deep and dipped the youngster once or twice. He then started for the shore with the arms of the shivering and crying baby clasped close around his neck.

"Oh, go out further! go out further!" shouted the young woman from the shore. "Take him out into the deep water. It won't hurt him."

The water is very shallow there, and when the young man turned to comply with her request he had some distance to walk before any considerable depth could be reached. Here he again soused the infant, and then started for the shore once more. All this consumed about ten minutes. When he reached the shore the young woman was not in sight. He hunted up and down the beach for her, but could not find her. The baby cried loudly, and as the young man trotted up and down the beach in the cool northwest wind, with the baby in his arms, he was the object of much sympathy, but no one ventured to relieve him of his charge.

He endeavoured to get somebody to hold the infant while he dressed, but no one would do so. At length he sat down on the beach where the infant's clothes had been laid and dressed it himself. Then he tried to have the bathing-house keeper take charge of it while he dressed, but he was equally unsuccessful in this. Becoming desperate, he took the child into his bathing house while he dressed himself. One of the bath keepers stood on the outside to see that he did not leave it there. He came out with his fancy bathing suit in a strap in one hand and the baby on his arm, and started for the train. When last seen he was boarding the ferryboat Southfield.

SHE WAS ONCE A NURSE GIRL.

Mrs. Moses Fraley, of California, who is dazzling the fashionable world of Long Branch by her extravagance, is the wife of a former Baltimore newsboy. She is put down as the possessor of 48 trunks, 5 maids, 200 pairs of shoes, 6 dogs, and $1,000,000 worth of jewels. She changes her toilet five times a day, and never appears in the same dress twice. One of the dogs is a King Charles spaniel, for which Mrs. Fraley is said to have paid $1,300. This elegant pet wears a solid gold collar with her name, Favorita, set in diamonds, while a row of small gold bells attached to the collar makes music as she goes about. Favorita sleeps in an upholstered couch under cover of an elegant plush robe. The exclusive duty of one of the maids is to look after the dogs. A correspondent describes Mrs. Fraley as a remarkably handsome woman. "Her figure is simply perfect," he says. "She has an arm that would set a sculptor wild, and her neck is a dream of beauty." While an enraptured correspondent of the Baltimore Sun was talking with her a newsboy ran by, and Mrs. Fraley said:—"Do you know I have a lot of sympathy for these little fellows? My husband used to be a newsboy in Baltimore. He used to be a regular little wharf rat, and half the time he had no place to sleep. He was a hustler, though and kept working up. He made every bit of his money himself, and I am proud of him because he did. My people were very poor, and at 15 I was sent out as a nurse girl. I liked it, too, and I think I was as happy then as I ever was in my life."

A NEW FAD OF SOCIETY BELLES.

Tights, it is asserted, are the latest in underwear. The use of them by women in private life has so far established itself that enquiry shows that one or two of the largest dry goods houses are getting in special consignments for the delectation of society belles. Tights as worn under gowns are almost invariably black, as being more chic and more Frenchy than other hues. They are put on precisely after the actress fashion, that is, drawn up from the feet and smoothed over the figure. What particular feminine fancy such a light under a bushel arrangement ministers to it would be hard telling. One woman who has adopted the fashion says that hers are light, cool and comfortable, the best of garbs for hot weather. The decline of the bustle and return to straight draperies displaying the figure has something to do, probably, with the whim.

NOTES.

A woman suffrage club, a woman's press club and a woman's paper have just made their appearance in Cincinnati.

A Nevada man who had seven homely daughters got a newspaper to insert that he had seven kegs filled with gold in his cellar, and every girl was married in five months.

English girls are evidently determined to qualify themselves to become good housewives. The conviction is forced upon one by the statement made in an English newspaper that the London School of Cookery, presided over by Mrs. Agnes B. Marshall, was attended last year by 10,000 young ladies. It may be expected that dyspepsia will soon become an unknown disease in England.

In China girls are not obliged to go to school at all. Their position in the Empire is so insignificant that no provision is made for their education. Boys, on the other hand, begin their studies at the age of six and continue—many of them—until they are of age. Their course is particularly hard, beginning at daylight and ending at dusk. No honors are granted to the few women who, bursting their bonds, somehow obtain access to an occasional school.

FASHION NOTES.

In Paris the women are wearing a new kind of round hat which is in the form of a skull.

Ribbons retain their deserved popularity, especially the wider kinds, and stripes are by no means abandoned, combinations of colour and weaving—moire, satin, and grosgrain—being frequently seen in the same piece. Two-toned ribbons will also be used.

A fashion note says that felt hats, trimmed with simplicity, will be worn a great deal this fall. We don't believe it. No woman will trim her hat with simplicity when she can get other trimming that costs a good deal more than simplicity. Besides it may be difficult to find simplicity in all shades.

In millinery for early autumn, close fitting bonnets and various turban shapes—which are a sort of compromise between a bonnet and a hat—will be very popular in the new hats, crowns are only moderately high, and some are very low; and all tastes and types of beauty can be suited in the widths and arrangements of the brims.

To Cure a Corn.

There is no lack of so-called cures for the common ailment know as corns. The vegetable, animal, and mineral kingdoms have been ransacked for cures. It is a simple mattter to remove corns without pain, for if you will go to any druggist or medicine dealer and buy a bottle of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor and apply it as directed the thing is done. Get "Putnam's," and no other.

AGRICULTURAL.

ORIGIN OF THE CATTLE RANGE.

The origin of the range cattle growing industry in the United States dates back to about the Fifteenth century, when horned cattle were introduced from Spain by way of Mexico among the Pueblo Indians residing along the east bank of the Rio Grande. Later on the early colonists to the republic of Texas took with them herds of horned cattle, and in this way Texas became the mother of the range cattle industry in the United States. Here it was almost wholly confined until after the rebellion. Prior to the late war nearly the whole of Texas was given up to cattle growing. After the war the disbanding of the great armies lessened the demand and Texas swarmed with great herds in excess of the market demand and local consumption. Cattle were of little value and yet these herds were rapidly increasing. What was to be done? The more enterprising ranchmen of Texas began to look for new ranges and markets that would consume the enormous surplus. California then had but few cattle. The states of Kansas and Nebraska and the territories west of the Missouri river were sparsely populated. The vast region of magnificent grazing area to be found there, and upon which the buffalo roamed, readily offered the temptation for a field of experiment.

If the wild bison could subsist on these plants and in the valleys and parks of the Rocky Mountain country, why could not cattle? Winter and summer the buffalo found sufficient grass, and hence the more enterprising Texas cattlemen came to the conclusion that domestic cattle, bred and raised upon the prairie grass of Texas and left to their own exertions for a subsistence, would be adapted to the fine grasses of the plains of the west and northwest states and territories, and where at that time only the buffalo grazed. Thus the study of the life and habits of the buffalo led to the idea which has made this the greatest range and cattle growing country in the world. Not a few Texas men came, and some from California, and all drove their herds into this newer country. Their success caused others to follow, and eastern speculators were attracted by the fine opportunities for investment. Thus sprung up this wonderful industry, for soon the unoccupied territory of the plains country of the west was filled with great herds of grass raised cattle—that knew not home or master, and to which grain would have been almost a scarecrow. And with all this there came a cowboy, sui generis, about whom there clusters so much of romance.

FEEDING ALBUMINOIDS.

In the science of dairy farming, if it can be called a science, a very essential thing for the dairyman to know is how to feed for milk and butter. The progress of knowledge in this particular has taken us to a point where we learn that a certain proportion of albuminoid food is necessary each day. A few men have taken it upon themselves to be especial students concerning this albuminoid food, and have watched long and patiently to discover the laws which govern its digestion. First, they agree that albuminoids are slow and hard of digestion. This coincides with the common experience of people who long since have declared that eggs, cheese, peas, beans, and lean meat were slow of digestion. All these foods are particularly rich in protein which is but another term for albumen. Second, it has been learned that albuminoid foods digest much easier and to better effect when taken in a not concentrated form but rather dispersed or mixed with carbonaceous food.

Here are the conclusions that experience has arrived at. In feeding cows to the largest profit, we must give daily at least a proportion of one pound of albuminoid food to five of carbonaceous food. Second, in order that the albuminoids may digest most easily and properly, they should be mixed with or scattered over the carbonaceous food. In other words it pays best for to do this. Hence the wise dairymen cuts up his carbonaceous cornstalks, straw, ensilage or timothy hay, and sprinkles thereon the albuminoid bran, oil meal, cotton seed meal, pea meal or bean meal, in proportion, and thus secures better results from the cow. It pays richly for the dairyman to study the laws of digestion in his animals. In fact he is an engineer to a digestive mill, and certainly no engineer should be ignorant or stupid concerning his engine.

FIRMING THE SOIL

Peter Henderson, in Popular Gardening, says The present season, the valuable garden pea crop in Canada and Northern New York, embracing many thousand acres, is almost a complete failure, owing to an unprecedented drouth during May and June. Had the peas when sown been firmed in the soil, by the foot or otherwise, germination would have taken place within five days; without it—and probably it was not done in a single case—germination could not occur in the loose, dry soil under ten or twelve days, and in the dry, hot atmosphere, it was just delay enough to destroy the crop.

Many cases in point showing its practical value, occur every season. Last May we plan ted an acre in rows of a new kind of Lima bean. One row was missed being firmed with the brogan. While the other rows were above ground in ten days, this unfirmed row took twenty, and would, maybe, have failed altogether, has we not had rain. The consequence of this ten days' delay will probably be enough to completely destroy the crop, from being too late to mature. If "Firm the Seed in the Soil" was conspicuously printed at every crossroad and railroad station through the length and breadth of the land, and the advice acted upon, the mourners for loss or failure of crops by germination would be very few.

LAYING DOWN PEACH TREES.

Hon. G. W. Minier, President of the Illinois Forestry Association has been experimenting a little with trees that are not usually reckoned as belonging to forests. His experiments have proved to his mind than peaches can be raised in latitudes that of late years have been considered too cold for that purpose. This is the way he proceeds: before the tree is old enough to bear he lays it down and covers with earth during the winter. This he does year after year and finds that you can depend upon them doing well. This is the way it is done: Before the ground is frozen he digs a trench the width of the spade and two feet long on two opposite sides of the trees, cutting the small roots—the tap root and lateral roots of the other sides are uncut. The tree is then bent to the ground and covered with earth.

He is past seventy-five years old, but alone can lay down ten trees a day. He has one tree that has been laid down three winters, and two that have been laid down two. The three are loaded this season with splendid fruit.

RYE FOR POULTRY.

One of the most valuable of my poultry appliances is an eighth of an acre of rye, which I sow near the poultry-house every autumn. The hens begin to feed on it as soon as it appears above the ground—they feast on it all through the winter, and it is delicious "greens" for them in the spring long before a spear of grass peeps above the ground. Sometimes the patch is covered with snow, but as it is sheltered on the north side by a double row of trees, it is soon bare again. When grass comes the rye is beginning to get tough, and the hens leave it. As soon as it is fairly ripe it is cut and piled up close by the poultry yard, and a forkful is thrown over to the fowls every day. For two months or more it furnishes them the greater portion of their food, and they seem to thrive on it. The exercise afforded in scratching and thrashing out the grain keeps them healthy and out of mischief, and they lay right along. I never could fatten a hen on unthrashed rye, but a liberal supply of fire parts corn meal and one part wheat bran, wetted and mixed, in addition to the rye, will render poultry fat and useless in a very short time.

Caught by Guile.

When a lion shakes its mane and roars, those actions have a practical as well as a dramatic significance. Like a skilful orator, the lion not only uses the gestures appropriate to the occasion, but he uses them with a purpose. A traveller in Africa gives, in "Days and Nights by the Desert," the following description of the method adopted by lion in attacking cattle and horses.

Lions, as a rule, hunt in family parties. A very old lion not infrequently incapacitated from taking an active part in pursuing game, is generally to be found at the head of such a coterie, and on him devolves no unimportant part of the programme.

Down to leeward, a hundred or more paces below where the draught bullocks are made fast when a train halts for rest, the young and active males and lionesses place themselves behind what available cover is to be found. This being done, the old lion goes to windward of the encampment, and shakes out his abundant mane in the breeze, so that the odor from it may be carried down to the excited draught animals.

One sniff of the tainted breeze brings every ox to his feet, in a moment; then, standing, often trembling with fear, they gaze with dilated eyes into the impenetrable darkness. Closer and closer approaches the aged lion to his victims, shaking and reshaking the dense, tawny covering of his fore quarters.

Then if the traveller's harness be not strong, he may look out for a stampede. Should it ho'd temporarily, the aggressor, as a climax to his former manœuvre, gives utterance to his deepest and loudest roar, when the frightened beasts, if not secured by the stoutest fastening that can be obtained, will break free, and rush with inconceivable rapidity into the very jaws of their foes, secreted to leeward.

The Servian ladies generally sympathize with Queen Natalie, and say that the cause of her domestic trouble is the jealousy of her husband.

An Offensive Breath

is most distressing, not only to the person afflicted by it, but to those with whom he comes in contact. It is a delicate matter to speak of, but it has parted not only friends but lovers. Bad breath and catarrh are inseparable. Dr Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases as thousands can testify.

The Republicans of New York State declare for high license in nominating Warner Miller for Governor.

"'Tis better not to be, than to be unhappy," and no one can be happy whose system is deranged by poisonous secretions. Nearly all ills that flesh is heir to, arise from torpid liver and derangement of the digestive organs. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets correct irregularities of the liver, prevent constipation, and promote good health. Buy them of your druggist.

Rossi, the Italian tragedian, will soon retire from the stage permanently.

"Oh! where shall rest be found?"
The wo-n-out mother sighs:
Stockings to mend, and trousers to darn,
Dishes to wash, and butter to churn,
While my back feels to break, and you head and heart burn,
And life is a constant friction.
The summer came and went,
The matron no longer sighs;
Elastic her step, and rounded her cheek,
Work seems but play, life is not weak,
And the change was made in one short week,
By Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

MRS. DART'S TRIPLETS.

President Cleveland's Prize for the three best babies at the Aurora County Fair, in 1887, was given to these triplets, Mollie, Ida and Ray, children of Mrs. A. K. Dart, Hamburgh, N. Y. She writes: "Last August the little ones became very sick, and as I could get no other food that would agree with them, I commenced the use of Lactated Food. It helped them immediately, and they were soon as well as ever, and I consider it very largely due to the Food that they are now so well."

LATE CABLE NEWS.

The Whitechapel Murders—Sir Morell Mackenzie's Book—The Afghan Insurrection.

London presents an odd spectacle. It is waiting for murder to be committed. I firmly believe that murder will come, and it will come soon in a certain locality, and that it will be very horrible. One Whitechapel murderer, whose blood-thirsty methods of killing four women were described to you last week, has probably by this time become imbued with a firm conviction of immunity from police vigilance, and, unless he intends to let his average fall off, he must, within a day or two, do fresh killing more startling than any of his previous crimes.

Sir Morell Mackenzie continues to live in retirement, hard at work on his history of the late Emperor's illness. The greatest interest is felt in Mackenzie's work. The date of publication is not yet definitely fixed upon, but will not be much longed delayed.

The Ameer of Afghanistan is reported to be crushing the rebellion and preparing to punish rebels in true Asiatic fashion. The fact that the gout from which he has suffered on and off for years has now to all appearance become chronic will not sweeten the royal temper.

The Sultan of Morocco has got through with his rebels, meted out punishment to all, and is reported to have resumed the sport of making the ladies of his harem ride on bicycles.

The Sultan of Turkey, after imprisoning and exiling the cooks in the royal palace for presuming to grumble about arrears of pay, is expecting to get much solid fun out of an electric dog cart just built for him in London. Money could not be spared for the unhappy cooks, but it has been found for the expense of constructing special roads in the royal park for the aforesaid dog cart.

The murder of Major Barttelot, Stanley's chief Lieutenant, has greatly increased public alarm as to the safety of the famous explorer himself, but the best opinion seems to be that there is, as yet, no absolute cause for fear. It is very possible that Stanley, who thoroughly appreciates the romantic element of danger and uncertainty, purposely keeps any news of himself from leaking out.

TIPPOO TIB'S TREACHERY.

Sir Francis de Winton's suggestion that Tippoo Tib is not false and is not to be held accountable for the murder of Major Barttelott is not generally accepted. Those who do not accept it say that Tippoo Tib was amply able to furnish reliable followers to Barttelott, if he had been so disposed, but it has been shown that he placed the gallant officer at the mercy of wild carriers. The fact that Tippoo Tib's men returned without punishing the murderers would point to complicity. Stanley is also quite at the mercy of Tippoo Tib, and if the latter is treacherous, as is feared, then Stanley is doomed, if indeed he has not already perished.

Hawks Useful to Farmers.

The Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1887, recently issued, includes a report of the assistant ornithologist of the Department, Dr. A. K. Fisher, on the food of hawks and owls. This is based on the examination of one thousand and seventy-two stomachs of these rapacious birds, and will prove of special interest to farmers. In Massachusetts, for instance, the three commonest large hawks are the marsh hawk,—usually seen flying low over meadows and marshes, and conspicuous for its white rump,—and the red-tailed and the red-shouldered hawks.

The two latter are most often noticed soaring high in air, and among people generally are known as "hen-hawks," implying that they prey upon poultry.

Dr. Fisher and his associates examined the stomachs of three hundred and eleven red-tailed hawks, with the following results: Twenty-five contained poultry; four contained quails; five contained crows; thirty-five contained other birds—sparrows, etc.; two hundred and three contained mice; fifty-five contained other mammals; and twenty-four contained insects.

Of red-shouldered hawks, one hundred and two stomachs were examined. Out of this number, only one contained poultry, while six-y-one contained mice, twenty contained other mammals, and forty contained insects. No farmer ought to be long in deciding that such "hen-hawks" as these are friends rather than enemies. Two hundred and three stomachs of the red-tailed hawks contained two hundred and seventy mice. Such efficient farm-hands may surely be spared a chicken or two now and then.

Concerning our two other common summer hawks,—Cooper's and the sharp shinned,—the verdict is rather less favorable. Out of forty-six stomachs of Cooper's hawks, eight contained poultry, while only one contained mice. The larger part contained other birds, from pigeons to sparrows. Of sharp shinned hawks, forty-eight stomachs were examined. Only one contained poultry, four mice, and thirty-six sparrows, warblers, and other birds.

All in all, these figures are not very alarming, and for the present at least, after so many years of persecution, it seems that our hawks may safely be left alone, to "be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth.'

GOLDEN GRAINS.

Never think that you can make yourself great by making another less.

Beecher said if you do not love your garden enough to care for it as you would for a baby, better let it alone. Flowers will not be put off with arm's length cordiality.

Emerson said it is a part of prudence to face every claimant, and pay every just demand on your time, your talents, or your heart. Always pay, for, first or last, you must pay your entire debt.

Barrow says the fruits of the earth do not more obviously require labor and cultivation to prepare them for our use and subsistence, than our faculties demand instruction and regulation in order to qualify us to become upright and valuable members of society, useful to others, or happy in ourselves.

The Independent reminds its readers that it is always a bad mark for any one if his character will not bear the test of familiar acquaintance, and always a good mark if it will bear this test. It is only by this test that we really know what men are in the abiding principles which govern them.

A String Made of Salt.

Suspend from the ceiling a thread which has previously been soaked in very salt water, and then dried. To this fasten a light ring, and announce that you are about to burn the thread without making the ring fall. The thread will burn, it is true, but the ashes it leaves are composed of crystals of salt, and their cohesion is strong enough to sustain the light weight of the object attached to the thread.

Another form of the same experiment is to make a little hammock of muslin to be suspended by four threads, and after having soaked this in salted water and dried it, as before directed, to place in it an empty egg shell. Set the hammock on fire; the muslin will be consumed, and the flame reach the threads which hold it, without the egg falling from its frail support.

With great care you may even succeed in performing the experiment with a full egg in place of an empty shell, taking the precaution, however, to have it previously hard-boiled, that you may escape an omelet in case of failure.

During August the English imports increased £310,000, and the exports increased £1,400,000, as compared with August, 1887.

THE THREAD OF LIFE;

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXII.—HOLY MATRIMONY.

The way of the transgressor went easy for a while with Hugh Massinger. His sands ran smoother than he could himself have expected. His two chief bugbears faded away by degrees before the strong light of facts into pure nonentity. Reid did not know that Elsie Challoner lay dead and buried in a lonely grave at Orfordness; and Winifred Meysey was not left a ward in Chancery, or otherwise inconvenienced and strictly tied up in her plans for marrying him. On the contrary, the affairs of the deceased were arranged exactly as Hugh himself would have wished them to be ordered. The will in particular was a perfect gem; Hugh could have thrown his arms round the blameless attorney who drew it up; Mrs. Meysey appointed sole executrix and guardian of the infant; the estate and Hall bequeathed absolutely and without remainder to Winifred in person; a life-interest in certain specified sums only, as arranged by settlement, to the relict herself; and the coast all clear for Hugh Massinger.

Everything indeed had turned out for the best. The late Squire had chosen the happiest possible moment for dying. The infant and the guardian were on Hugh's own side. There need be no long engagement, no tremulous expectation of dead men's shoes now; nor would Hugh have to put up for an indefinite term of years with the nuisance of a father-in-law's perpetual benevolent interference and well-meant dictation. Even the settlements, those tough documents, would be all drawn up to suit his own digestion. As Hugh sat, deliciously lugubrious, in the dining room at Whitestrand with Mr. Heberden, the family solicitor, two days after the funeral, he could hardly help experiencing a certain subdued sense of something exceedingly akin to stifled gratitude in his own soul towards that defective breech-loader which had relieved him at once of so many embarrassments, and made him practically Lord of the Manor of Consumptum per Mare, in the hundred of Dunwich and county of Suffolk, containing by admeasurement so many acres, roods, and perches, be the same more or less—and mostly less, indeed, as the years proceeded.

But for that slight drawback, Hugh cared as yet absolutely nothing. One only trouble, one killjoy, darkened his view from the Hall windows. Every principal room in the house faced due south. Wherever he looked, from the drawing room or the dining room, the library or the vestibule, the boudoir or the billiard-room, the Whitestrand poplar rose straight and sheer, as conspicuous as ever, by the brink of the Chad, where sea and stream met together on debatable ground in angry encounter. Its rugged boles formed the one striking and beautiful object in the whole prospect across those desolate flats of sand and salt marsh, but to Hugh Massinger that ancient tree had now become instinct with awe and horror—a visible memorial of his own crime—for it was a crime—and of poor dead Elsie in her nameless grave by the Low Lighthouse. He grew to regard it as Elsie's monument. Day after day, while he stopped at Whitestrand, he rose up in the morning with aching brows from his sleepless bed—for how could he sleep, with the breakers that drowned and castashore his dear dead Elsie thundering wild songs of triumph from the bar in his ears?—and gazed out of his window at the dreary outlook, to see that accusing tree with its gnarled roots confronting him ever, full in face, and poisoning his success with its mute witness to his murdered victim. Every time he looked out upon it he heard once more that wild, wild cry, as of a stricken life, when Elsie plunged into the careering current. Every time the wind shrieked through its creaking branches in the lonely night, the shrieks went to his heart like so many living human voices crying for sympathy. He hated and detested himself in the very midst of his success. He had sold his own soul for a wasted strip of swamp and marsh and brake and sandhill, and he found in the end that it profited him nothing.

Still, time brings alleviation to most earthly troubles. Even remorse grows duller with age—till the day comes for it to burst out afresh in fuller force than ever and goad its victim on to a final confession. Days and weeks and months rolled by, and Hugh Massinger by slow degrees began to feel that Othello was himself again. He wrote, as of old, his brilliant leaders every day regularly for the Morning Telephone: he slashed three-volume novels with as much vigour as ever, and rather more cynicism and cruelty than before, in the Monday Register: he touched the tender stops of various quills, warbling his Doric lay to Ballade and Sonnet, in the wonted woods of the Pimlico Magazine with endless versatility. Nor was that all. He played high in the evening at Pallavicini's, more recklessly even than had been his ancient use; for was not his future now assured to him? and did not the horrid picture of his dead drowned Elsie, tossed friendless on the bare beach at Orfordness, haunt him and sting him with its perpetual presence to seek in the feverish excitement of roulette some momentary forgetfulness of his life's tragedy? True, his rhymes were sadder and gloomier now than of old, and his play wilder: no more of the rollicking, humorous, happy go-lucky ballad-mongering that alternated in the Echoes from Callimachus with his more serious verses: his sincerest laughter, he knew himself, with some pain was fraught, since Elsie left him. But in their lieu had come a reckless abandonment that served very well at first sight for real mirth or heartfelt geniality. In the old days, Hugh had always cultivated a certain casual vein of cheerful pessimism: he had posed as the man who drags the lengthening chain of life behind him good-humouredly: now, a grim sardonic smile usurped the place of his pessimistic bonhomie, and filled his pages with a Carlylese gloom that was utterly alien to his inborn nature. Even his lighter work showed traces of the change. His wayward articles "Is Death Worth Dying?" in the Nineteenth Century, was full of bitterness; and his clever skit on the Blood-and-Thunder school of fiction, entitled the Zululiad, and published as a Christmas "shilling shocker," had a sting and a venom in it that were wholly wanting to his earlier performances in the same direction. The critics said Massinger was suffering from a shallow spasm of Byronic affectation. He knew himself he was really suffering from a profound fit of utter self-contempt and wild despairing carelessness of consequence. The world moves, however, as Galileo remarked, in spite of our sorrows. Three months after Wyville Meysey's death, Whitestrand received its new master. It was strange to find any but Meyseys at the Hall, for Meyseys had dwelt there from time immemorial; the first of the bankers, even, though of a younger branch, having purchased the estate with his newly-gotten gold from an elder and ruined representative of the main stock. The wedding was a very quiet affair, of course; half mourning at best, with no show or tomfoolery: and what was of more importance to Hugh, the arrangements for the settlements were most satisfactory. The family solicitor wasn't such a fool as to make things unpleasant for his new client. Winifred was a nice little body in her way, too; affectionately proud of her captive poet; and from a lordly height of marital superiority, Hugh rather liked the pink and white small woman than otherwise. But he didn't mean to live much at Whitestrand either—"At least while your mother lasts, my child," he said cautiously to Winifred, letting her down gently by gradual stages, and saving his own reputation for kindly consideration at the same moment. "The good old soul would naturally like still to feel herself mistress in her own house. It would be cruelty to mothers-in-law to disturb her now. Whenever we come down, we'll come down strictly on a visit to her. But for ourselves, we'll nest for the present in London."

True, the young couple began life on a small scale, in a quiet little house—most æsthetically decorated on economical principles—down a side street in the remote recesses of Philistine Bayswater. But Hugh's coterie, though unsuccessful, was nevertheless ex officio distinguished: he was hand in glove with the whole Cheyne Row set—the Royal Academicians still in embryo; the Bishops Designate of fate who at present held suburban curacies: the Cabinet Ministers whose budget yet lingered in domestic arrears; the germinating judges whose chances of the ermine were confined in clear perspective to soup at sessions, or the smallest of small devilling for rising juniors. They were not rich in this world's goods, those discounted celebrities; but they were a lively crew, full of fun and fancy, and they delighted Winifred by their juvenile exuberance of wit and eloquence. She voted the men with their wives, when they had any—which wasn't often, for Bohemia can seldom afford the luxury of matrimony—the most charming society she had ever met; and Bohemia in return voted "little Mrs. Massinger," in the words of its accepted mouthpiece and spokesman, Hatherley, "as witty a piece of Eve's flesh as any in Illyria." The little "arrangement in pink and white" became, indeed, quite a noted personage in the narrow world of Cheyne Row society

To say the truth, Hugh detested Whitestrand. He never wanted to go near the place again, now that he had made himself in very deed its lord and master. He hated the house, the grounds, the river; but above all he hated that funereal poplar, that seemed to rise up and menace him each time he looked at it with the pains and penalties of his own evil conscience. At Easter, Winifred dragged him home once more, to visit the relict in her lonely mansion. The Bard went, as in duty bound; but the duty was more than commonly distasteful. They reached Whitestrand late at night, and were shown up stairs at once into a large front bedroom. Hugh's heart leaped up in his mouth when he saw it. It was Elsie's room: the room into which he had climbed on that fateful evening; the room bound closest up in his memory with the hideous abiding nightmare of his poisoned life; the room he had never since dared to enter; the room he had hoped never more to look upon.

"Are we to sleep here, Winnie?" he cried aghast, in a tone of the utmost horror and dismay. And Winifred, looking up at him in silent surprise, answered merely in an unconcerned voice: "Why, yes, my dear boy; what's wrong with the room? It's good enough. We're to sleep here, of course—certainly."

He dared say no more. To remonstrate would be madness. Any reason he gave must seem inadequate. But he would sooner have slept on the bare ground by the river side than have slept that night in that desecrated and haunted room of Elsie's.

He did not sleep. He lay awake all the long hours through, and murmured to himself, ten thousand times over, "Elsie, Elsie, Elsie, Elsie!" His lips moved as he murmured sometimes. Winifred opened her eyes once—he felt her open them, though it was as dark as pitch—and seemed to listen. One's senses grow preternaturally sharp in the night watches. Could she have heard that mute movement of his silent lips? He hoped not. No: it was impossible. But he lay awake till morning in a deadly terror, the cold sweat standing in big drops on his brow, haunted through the long vigils of the dreary night by that picture of Elsie, in her pale whitedress, with arms uplifted above her helpless head, flinging herself wildly from the dark black poplar, the gloom of evening, upon the tender mercies of the swift dark water.

Elsie, Elsie, Elsie, Elsie! It was for this he had sold and betrayed his Elsie!

In the morning when he rose, he went over to the window—Elsie's window, round whose sides the rich wistaria clambered so luxuriantly—and looked out with weary sleepless eyes across the weary dreary stretch of barren Suffolk scenery. It was still winter, and the wistaria on the wall stood bald and naked and bare of foliage. How different from the time when Elsie lived there! He could see where the bough had broken with his weight that awful night of Elsie's disappearance. He gazed vacantly across the lawn and meadow towards the tumbling sandhills. "Winifred," he said—he was in no good mood just then to call her Winnie—"what a big bare bundle of straight tall switches that poplar is! So gaunt and stiff! I hate the very sight of it. It is a great disfigurement. I wonder your people ever stood it so long, blocking out the view from their drawing room windows."

Winifred rose from the dressing-table and looked out by his side in blank surprise. "Why, Hugh," she cried, noting both his unwonted tone and the absence of the now customary pet form of her name, "how can you say so? I call it just lovely. Blocking out the view, indeed! Why it is the view. There's nothing else. It's the only good point in the whole picture. I love to see it even in winter—the dear old poplar—so tall and straight—with its twigs etched out in black and grey against the sky like that. I love it better than anything else at Whitestrand."

Hugh drummed his fingers on the frosted pane impatiently. "For my part, I hate it," he answered in a short but sullen tone. "Whenever I come to live at Whitestrand, I shall never rest till I've cut it down and stubbed it up from the roots entirely."

"Hugh!"

There was something in the accent that made him start. He knew why. It reminded him of Elsie's voice as she cried aloud "Hugh!" in her horror and agony upon that fatal evening by the grim old poplar.

"Well, Winnie," he answered much more tenderly. The tone had melted him.

Winifred flung her arms around him with every sign of grief and dismay and burst into a sudden flood of tears. "O Hugh," she cried, "you don't know what you say: you can't think how you grieve me.—Don't you know why? You must surely guess it.—It isn't that the Whitestrand poplar's a famous tree—a seamark for sailors—a landmark for all the country round—historical almost not to say celebrated! It isn't that it was mentioned by Fuller and Drayton, and I'm sure I don't know how many other famous people—poor papa knew, and was fond of quoting them. It's not for all that, though for that alone I should be sorry to lose it, sorrier than for anything else in all Whitestrand. But, oh, Hugh, that you should say so! That you should say, "For my part, I hate it."—Why, Hugh, it was on the roots of that very tree, you know, that you saw me for the very first time in my life, as I sat there dangling my hat—with Elsie. It was from the roots of that tree that I first saw you and fell in love with you when you jumped off Mr. Relf's yawl to rescue my poor little half crown hat for me.—It was there you first won my heart—my poor little heart.—And to think you really want to cut down that tree would nearly, very nearly break it.—Hugh, dear Hugh, never, never, never say so?"

No man can see a woman cry unmoved. To do so is more or less than human. Hugh laid her head tenderly on his big shoulder, soothed and kissed her with loving gentleness, swore he was speaking without due thought or reflection, declared that he loved that tree every bit as much in his heart as she herself did, and pacified her gradually by every means in his large repertoire of masculine blandishments. But deep down in his bosom he crushed his despair. If ever he came to live at Whitestrand, then, that hateful tree must for ever rise up in mute accusation to bear witness against him!

It could not! It should not! He could never stand it. Either they must never live at Whitestrand at all, or else—or else, in some way unknown to Winifred, he must manage to do away with the Whitestrand poplar.

(TO BE CONTINUED.

Chinese Laundrymen.

The question has frequently been asked by Americans, "Do these Chinamen wash clothes in China? How is it that nearly all who come here enter the laundry business? Do they love it?" No, they do not love it any more than any other kind of labor. They did not even know what the "Melican man's" shirt looked like, much less how to press one, before they came to America. Laundry work in China is invariably done by women, and when a man steps into a woman's occupation he loses his social standing.

They become laundrymen here simply because there is no other occupation by which they can make money as surely and quickly. The prejudice against the race has much to do with it. They are fine cooks, neat and faithful servants, and above all, very skillful mechanics at any trade they have a mind to try. In the western states, where their value is better understood, they are used in as many different positions as any other foreigners, and the laundry business is occupied only by those who fail to find other employment.

NO OTHER ALTERNATIVE.

But here in New York as yet there is no other alternative. Many an able minded man as well as skillful mechanic who came to America to better his condition may be found wielding the polishing irons in a New York Chinese laundry. It takes from seventy-five dollars to two hundred dollars to start one of these Chinese wash houses, and the way most of these laundries are started would give valuable tips even to an American Wall street deacon. The main expenditure in a Chinese laundry is a stove and a trough for washing and partitions for dry room and sleeping apartment, and a sign.

As a rule it requires $100 to open a laundry in New York. But this amount is a fortune to a newly arrived Chinaman, and unless he starts immediately into the laundry business, he would become a burden to some of his friends. The Chinese immigrant, unlike his European compatriots, never comes here unless he is safely surrounded by friends or relatives upon his arrival. These immediately initiate him into the mysteries of the laundry business. In some friendly laundry the newcomer is placed under a six months' apprenticeship, beginning at the wash tub, until he reaches the ironing table, and lastly the polishing board. An apprentices begins with $3 per week and board, and a gradual addition of $1 per week after the first month, until he is able to take charge of a laundry himself. Then if he has money he hires a place and hangs out his sign. If not he goes to one or two friends, and they will call a "whey" or syndicate for his benefit in the following manner.

MYSTERIES OF THE "WHEY."

Suppose I have an established laundry, and want to borrow $200 at a certain per centum premium, but I cannot find any one Chinaman who is able to loan me the amount. I put up a notice in Mott street that upon such and such a day I wish to make a "whey" of twenty men, who all are supposed to be situated like myself, each wanting to borrow $200. When we twenty borrowers all come together we each put down $10. Then each one secretly writes upon a slip of paper the amount of interest he is willing to give to get the $200. These slips are carefully sealed and thrown into a bowl. At a given time they are opened, and to the highest bidder goes the $200, less the interest, which is invariable deducted immediately from the principal.

Frequently as high as $4 is offered for the use of $10 for a single month. In such cases each of the nineteen other borrowers gives to the lucky one only $6 apiece for the $10 apiece which they make him pay next month. Then the next highest bidder gets the $200, less the interest he offered, and so on, until the entire twenty, at twenty different times, have obtained the use of this $200; but the one that comes the last, having offered the least interest of them all, reaps the harvest of the "whey." This method is adopted by most Chinese laundrymen in New York and other large cities to open new laundries. It partakes of the gaming flavor which is captivating to every true Celestial.

WIT AND WISDOM.

Smith (deaf)—What's the matter, Jones? Jones—I've got the headache. Smith (who mistakes it for the toothache)—Why don't you have it filled?

A boy's description of having a tooth pulled expresses it about as well as anything we have seen: "Just before it killed me the tooth came out."

"Stewardess, stewardess!" screamed the old lady in a storm, "my room is flooded; do, please, ask the captain to rent me one of those water-tight compartments. I declare this is perfectly dreadful."

"How is it, my dear," said a husband to his wife, "that while you and your sister Ellen are so much alike in most respects, you are married and she prefers to remain single. Surely she has had offers enough." "Yes, love, but Ellen was always more difficult to please than I."

Equal to the occasion. He (summering in the country)—"Shall I assist you over the wire fence, Maude?" She—"No, I can do very nicely by myself; and in the meantime, Charley, I wish you would study that bank of clouds in the west and tell me if it looks like rain."

Husband—I'm afraid, my dear, that this amateur theatrical entertainment is likely to prove a bore. Wife—It may, John; but, for heaven's sake, remember that it is an amateur entertainment, and when the curtain drops after each act don't pick up your hat and go out.

A Terrible Revenge.—Miss De Pink—No, Mr. Suitor, it can never be. I shall never marry a widower. The idea! Catch me walking in any other woman's shoes. Mr. Suitor (departing)—I had no intention, Miss De Pink, of offering you my late wife's shoes You couldn't get them on.

Woman (to tramp)—"If I give you a nice dinner will you help me put up some patent self-rolling window-curtains?"

Tramp—"No, ma'am. I'll saw wood, carry in coal, or dig post-holes, but I wouldn't help a woman on window-curtains if she gave me a Delmonico spread."

Mrs. O'Harrity: "Now put in another quart."

Grocer (putting in second quart): "Why didn't you ask for a half-gallon at first and have done with it?"

Mrs. O'Harrity: "Och, bless yer sowl! One quart is fer meself and the t'other is fer Mrs. Casey."

A Frenchman of this city having received the photograph of a lady, asked a friend what was customary under the circumstances. "Compliment it," said the friend. "Tell her its beauty is very rare." "I beg to make ze acknowledgmong, madame," he said to her at their next meeting, "Zee beauty of madame is vair scarce."

Everybody has been served but Tommy, whom his father has completely forgotten. Of course, he would not ask for his dinner, having been admonished not to ask for things at table. But presently his mother, requiring a plate, called the servant to fetch one, whereupon Tommy remarked timidly: "Take mine, mamma; you see it's quite clean."

A poorly-clad little girl came into the store of one our stationers recently. She wished to buy some writing-paper, and finally was shown some for five cents a quire. "How much will half a quire be?" she inquired in a half-fed, plaintive little voice. "Three cents," replied the clerk. "If you please I'll take the other half," was the quick response.

A MODERN TRUST.

Would-be customer—"Will you trust me for a few things for a couple of days?"

Grocer—"Come around in a couple of days and I will."

Would-be customer—"But I will have the money then."

Grocer—"Then is when I would trust you!"

Birds Transporting Birds.

"Do large birds transport smaller ones through the air?" is a question with which ornithologists are now occupied. Swans, coots, and moorhens carry their young on their backs whilst swimming, and, according to a writer in "St. James's Gazette," they transport them whilst flying.

The mallard has been known to convey its young from an oak twenty-five feet high, and a moorhen, which had its nest on a fir-tree, was seen to fly down with two of her brood, one in each foot.

But birds do not merely convey their young to the ground,—facts prove that large birds transport smaller ones in their yearly migrations. The woodcock, according to the writer above quoted, when it wishes to convey its young away from a place of danger, presses the tiny bird between her own feet and against her breast, and flies with it through the air.

The Cree Indians told Dr. Rae, the Arctic traveller, that a small bird, of the sparrow species, avails itself of the Canada goose to get a lift during its long journey. A thousand miles to the northwest, the doctor found other Indians who also spoke of the Canada goose as conveying tiny passengers.

In the East the opinion is common that cranes transport on their backs small birds across the Mediterranean and over mountains. Several ornithologists have confirmed this popular opinion by their own observations. One of them says that in the autumn flocks of cranes are seen coming from the North; as they circle over the cultivated plains of Palestine, little birds fly up to them, and the twittering of those already settled upon their backs may be distinctly heard.

Another observer saw smaller birds rise from the backs of cranes, at which a gun was fired. A Swedish traveller, while staying at Rhodes, saw flocks of storks come over the sea, and small birds rise from their backs.

Mr. Wilson, foreman on the South Gare Breakwater, at the mouth of the Tees, saw a short eared owl come "flopping" across the sea, and as it neared he saw something between its shoulders. The owl alighted on the gearing within ten yards of him; and directly it settled, a little bird dropped off its back, and flew along the gare. On the broad back of the owl it had safely ridden across the wild North Sea.

Ethics of the Lamp.

A lamp or oil stove should never be filled up so as to touch the tube through which the wick passes, and the wick, except when lighted, should never be turned above the top of the tube. As soon as the lamp is extinguished the wick should be turned down. Many people after filling and trimming a lamp leave the wick turned up ready to light. This should never be done. Once a week or fortnight the wicks should be removed and the tops thoroughly washed in hot soapsuds or strong pearline water. Follow the same rule with a stove and there will be no trouble from smell. Give the surface of the stove a thorough washing with a strong solution of pearline or soda, cleanse the tubes in the same way, be careful about filling, for a very little kerosene spilled will make a long and strong odor; put in fresh wicks and keep them turned down when not lighted, and you will never know that there is any kerosene in the house, an expert says.

"I say, Dumley," said Brown, "can you lend me forty dollars?" "Forty dollars!" exclaimed Dumly with a gasp. "Why, my dear friend, if I had forty dollars to lend I wouldn't be sober enough to count it out."

THE Detroit Journal sent out a numof printed postal cards a short time ago to Canadian publishers for publication, written as if produced by the Canadians, which we see some of the Canadian papers published We presume the Journal was trying for a feeler and will likely get it.

THE following we clip frcm the Little Rapids correspondence of the Algoma Advocate:—"Those of the scaffold disaster have all about recovered. The cause and particulars are as follows: In putting up the scaffold at Mr. Holcombe's new house a scantling, which had a large black knot, that almost cut it in two, leaving about one inch of solid wood, had been used. Mr. N. Phelps, publisher of the Dutton ENTERPRISE, Dutton, Ontario, was on the scaffold with Messrs. E. and J. Holcombe, giving some assistance and instructions about the gothic when the scantling gave way, letting the scaffold and occupants to the ground, a distance of about fifteen feet, all seemed to light on their feet, but not very light, as the former has been laid up for a week, John received a sprained ankle and a bruised chest, which he felt for a few days. Emannuel escaped with a few slight bruises."

A TERRIBLE CRIME.

OTTAWA, Sept. 21.—A case of poisoning is reported on the shores of Lake Temiscamingue, north of Mattawa, on Sunday afternoon last which resulted in the death ot a man named Boivin and his wife, aged 40 and 36 respectively. For some time past Mrs. Boivin has been anxious to get rid of her husband. The opportunity occurred on Sunday when the man complained of feeling unwell. His wife suggested a dose of epsom salts, but instead he prepared a dose of strychnine. He was suspicious of the mixture and refused to take it when, to satisfy him, the woman took a spoonful herself which induced him to take the full dose. The woman made the mistake in her own case of miscalculating the strength of the poison. When a man named Grenier called shortly afterwards the poison had affected her, as was indicated by the twitching of her face. Calling her husband to her assistance Grenier found that Boivin who was in another part of the house, was much worse than his wife, and was unable to assist her. Becoming alarmed Grenier started for assistance. Upon his return they were both dead.

MURDER NEAR STRATHROY.

A brutal and revolting murder was brought to light Saturday afternoon in Adelaide township. The victim was Jonathan Robinson, an old and inoffensive resident of the township, who lived alone in a small frame house on the farm of Mr. Harris, about four miles from Strathroy. He was an Englishman, a bachelor and 73 years old.

Robinson was last seen alive on the 13th inst. on his way to Strathroy, since which time the house had apparently been closed and the blinds down. the neighbors supposing he had gone to Michigan.

On Saturday, however, it was noticed that the back shed door was open and the key in the outside of the back door. Neighbors at once entered the house, when Robinson was found lying on the floor with his throat cut from ear to ear, his skull fractured and both arms broken. An inquest was opened at the house Sunday morning Coroner Lindsay and a jury empannelled but nothing was elicited regarding the murder. The whole affair is shrouded in great mystery.

Coal Discovered in Parrsboro'.

ST. JOHN, N. B., Sept. 21.—Mr. W. J. Jones of Parrsboro and Whitfield McCarthy of Springhill have for some time heen prospecting for coal at point about eight miles due north of the mouth of the Diligent River, where they found distinct indications of coal. Where the logs in stream driving wore away the banks the regular formation was exposed, and it was similar to that about Springhill. Very little work with the pick brought out coal which was covered by a fossil shale and rested on a bed of fire clay. More than a bushel of coal was dug out of the bank with but little labor. This was immediately tested by making a fire with it, which burned beautifully. In the process of combustion the coal seemed to run together, showing it to be highly bitumenous, and small jets of flame were emitted from it, a proof that it had much gas in it. The specimens of coal atrought into town by Mr. Jones are in tensely black, yet clean to the touch, bnd greatly resembled the famous Alhertite of New Brunswick. Some who have seen it pronounce it similar to the coal obtained at the old Pictou mine. Borings to discover the thickness of eam are to be commenced at once.

ASTRONOMY—THE EARTH.

To the Editor:—

SIR,—In the first place it may be proper to refer to the Scriptures of truth, which teach us the earth does not move. (See Job xxviii. 1-6; Ps. civ. 5, xciii. 1, etc., Modern astronomy contradicts these verses and teaches us the earth has a diurnal motion, by which day and night are formed and also an annual which gives us a succession of seasons. Therefore the highly important question arises, Whom shall we believe? Inspired men "who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost (II. Peter 1-21), or uninspired, who are called scientists, and who disagree among themselves, giving us no certain sound? One class advocates a centrifugal force and another denies this theory and says the motions of the earth and of the heavenly bodies are caused by purely magnetic influences. Under these contrary opinions those who seek truth should flee to Him from whom cometh every ray of light, every beam of intelligence, glimmer of reason, and indeed every good and perfect gift (Is. 1-17), that he may lead them into all truth. That the sun obscures the bright lights of heaven, I showed in my last article. Even the moon is not exempt. For a few days before new moon she is chameleon like, changed into the dark blue color of the sky. If during this time she crosses the sun's path within a certain radius, she retaliates by eclipsing him. This may be illustrated by a lamp which smokes its chimney. Were the earth a planet of course it would be a star, and, like other stars, subject to obscuration, so that we should never enjoy the blessings of daylight. For although the sun lightens the earth he darkens the stars. There are times when the same stars may be obscured by the sun and occulted by the moon.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

FARMYARDS YELLOW OIL
CURES RHEUMATISM
FREEMAN'S WORM POWDERS
Are pleasant to take. Contain their own Purgative. It is safe, sure and effectual destroyer of worms in Children or Adults.

No Universal Remedy
has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,
which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.
Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.
That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.
All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

CANNING TOMATOES.

Probably all housekeepers have experienced more or less failure in keeping canned tomatoes sweet, and with their natural, fresh and flavor retained. During the antiseptine fever, I tried the preserving qualities of the article, both with tomatoes cooked and uncooked, and yet there was no satisfactory result. Last fall I selected fair, nicely ripened tomatoes, removed the skins, and all defective places, with a sharp fruit knife, cut the tomatoes in pieces of sufficient size to slip readily in a fruit jar cooked, or rather heated them thoroughly in their own juices. In the meantime cans were tested to see if they were strictly air tight, and then placed in a can of scalding hot water in the stove's reservoir.

After the tomatoes became thoroughly cooked the pan was pushed closely to the other pan containing the hot cans. The water was drained from can as wanted, and the can filled to overflowing with tomatoes—the pieces being put in with a silver tablespoon—then the handle of a silver fork was pushed up and down the sides of the can to start up all the little air bubbles the rubber ring slipped on, one more spoonful of the tomato added to make it right plump, and the top was then screwed down tightly.

I always let my cans of fruit remain on the kitchen table until the following morning in order to screw down the tops from time to time as the fruit cools, as otherwise the contraction of the glass will prevent them from being air tight.

After the cans had become cold they were wrapped securely in several thicknesses of paper and tied with a cord, and taken to the fruit closet, or cellar, if it is cold and dry. The result was one that gave perfect satifaction.

It is quite necessary that all canned fruit should be kept in a dark, cool place; for "Light injures all fruit, but especially tomatoes, in which it causes the formation of citric acid, which no amount of sugar will sweeten."

In canning always use a porcelain-lined kettle or bright tin, and for paring and preserving fruit let the knife, fork and spoon be of silver, as steel discolors the fruit and that gives one a suspicion of a disagreeable flavor.

PRESERVING EGGS.

The following recipe comes from England, and is said to be very good. We give it for the benefit of those who have not been successful with salt.—

Procure a large earthenware jar which has a lid, in this put a pound of lime and one gallon of cold water, stir the contents well together, and repeat stirring several times each day for several days, until the lime is settled and cold. The eggs may then be placed in, gently, day by day until a hundred are in. Then take them out carefully, and give the mixture a good stirring, and when settled replace the eggs placing those previously at the bottom on the top. After this only take out those you require to use and cook them at once. The great precaution says the writer, is in preserving only those egg that are fresh. It is no use to put thin shelled eggs in lime, or it will penetrate the shells and spoil the contents for eating. Ordinary good sized ones, which are sound in every respect, and put in the pickle at once, not left lying about for hours, are suitable.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

BRIDGE OR TUNNEL.—"Yes," there is more or less talk about tunnelling the river, and some about bridging," said a Michigan Central officer recently. "We are constantly receiving proposals, of some kind regarding the crossings although I don't believe there is any special project just now under consideration. We need a tunnel, it is true, but only for the name of it. As a matter of fact, our present mode for crossing is cheaper and more expeditious than it would be with a tunnel. That is, of course, in summer. We have more or less trouble with ice in winter, but we are having a new steamer constructed at Cleveland which, I think, will simplify matters a good deal in the ice season. The new steamer works with both screw and paddle, and is so constructed that she will be better able to clear the slips than are the steamers now in use. That the ice can be overcome is easily shown by the success of the St. Ignace, and it is expected that the new steamer now being built will be as satisfactory here as the St. Ignace at the straits."—[Detroit Free Press.

THE MINISTER'S COW.

First "the farrer cow" put in an appearance. She was for sale on every hand. Twenty five dollars would buy her. She would give from a gallon to six quarts a day, and her great recommendation was the splendid frame of bones to lay meat on for sale in the spring. Certainly, if ever meat was needed, it was there. Out-door exercise agreed with her, and after snow was on the ground, you would see her standing on the solitary hillside, under a leafless tree, where a placard was tacked up advertising "Pure, Raw Bone," while she mused upon the mysteries of civilization.

Then came the recommendations of certain cows which "don't seem to have much bag, but when you begin to milk them, the milk comes." I am ready to testify that it doesn't come. A good cow, like a good business man, will have some visible assets. If she has much milk she will have a place to keep it in. She would have a good, generous udder, which is shapely after milking, its four sections keeping separate individuality and maintaining the "square" formation. If it falls together, like an old glove, she may have any amount of indorsements, but she won't have milk. At length I heard of "a staving good cow" that belonged to a doctor, who, however, asked "an awful price" for her—$50. I went to see her; a great, stately Shorthorn, mottled red and white, with just a dash of native blood from the "old Beck stock." She had the short horns of her race; head and limbs small for her size and finely formed; large, soft, kind eyes; deep chest and body with milk veins as large as her halter rope; and a bag with seven teats, five of which give milk. It seemed as if Nature had tried to double the ordinary milking capacity and almost succeeded. She—that is the cow, not Nature—had meat on her ribs; her hide was loose, her coat like velvet. She had never been starved nor abused since she was born, and had the sumptuous, patrician look, which even a well-bred animal gets from habitual prosperity. Then her record was of the highest. Never one of her calves had gone to the butcher. A neighbor had one of them, now a three year-old heifer, for which he would not take $75.

I paid the "awful price" and opened a dairy with one cow. When her beautiful calf came at Thanksgiving time, everything began to overflow with milk. Over and over again we measured it, thirteen quarts, or thirteen quarts and a pint—a safe average of more than six gallons daily. The cream does not separate quite as readily as that of the Jerseys. Her skim-milk is better than we can buy of the milkman. But the cream churns into butter of the finest quality and with great facility, so that churning is a joke in our family. Through the summer she kept up her four gallon average with little diminution, and through the succeeding winter did all that could rationally be expected. Now she is "fresh" again, and we have still the brimming pail and the choice butter, while the two calves she has given us are already winning reputation in the two towns to which they have gone at good prices.

It seems to me that here is a way out for many discouraged dairy farmers, who find that "it don't pay." They will promptly answer, "They can't afford to buy blood stock;" no, nor anything else, so long as they keep those cadaverous, cavernous receptacles capable of containing everything that can be produced on a farm except milk. Let them pick out two or three of the worst ones, and shut them up to fatten; feed them well and get through with them soon. Then they will have some money to buy something with and can buy one first-class cow of whose milking qualities they are perfectly sure. If possible, they should get one that is in condition to give a full mess immediately, or very soon, that the profits may begin right off. Then let them fall upon two or three more of those unprofitable servants and treat them better than they were ever treated before in their lives, asking no return till the butcher is ready to give it. Don't mind if the interior milker is young. That's all the more reason for getting rid of her, because there would be so many years to milk her at a loss. Besides, her beef will be ever so much better eating. Then let the farmer get another carefully picked cow. Soon he will have five or six first-class milkers that will give more than the whole herd sacrificed with half the feed and half the trouble. It's far easier, as well as pleasanter, to milk six cows than sixteen for the same amount of milk. He can then save all the heifer calves from these choice cattle, taking care that they inherit good qualities from both sides, and he will soon have a herd to be proud of, and that will "pay." It was quite amusing to have our new girl just from the country exclaim, as she lifted the great pail of milk to strain it off, "Mercy! Is all that milk from one cow?" Wouldn't it pay to have every cow on the farm like that one?—American Agriculturist for October.

About Preparing For Weddings.

Some persons have somehow conceived the idea that the groom expectant arranges many details, such as sending forth the cards, providing the carriages, etc. This is wholly wrong. He attends alone to little acts of courtesy—few or many as his disposition prompts—and the sole things which are expected of him are that he should present himself, together with his best man, at a fixed time; should send his bride, her attendants, and, if he is a wise young man, his prospective mother-in-law such bouquets as shall be agreed upon before hand. He is also allowed to make what presents he pleases to the bride and bridesmaids, and he must early bring his list of friends to be included in the wedding invitations. Nor should he feel hurt if asked to explain why he wishes each name on the list to be numbered among his future wife's acquaintance. A man is permitted to know anybody and everybody, but he should take pride in a mother who is particular as to whom her daughter shall know.

Any further absolute rights he has none, whether before or at the time of the ceremony; after that he can usually be trusted to do as he pleases, and what he considers his rights are attended to very promptly.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE.

An extensive inquiry into the whole subject of mutual or co-operative fire insurance among farmers has been conducted by the American Agriculturist, of New York. The first results of it will appear in a paper in the October number of that magazine. The paper gives many practical hints about the necessity of fire insurance and the best means of insuring. As to the cost, it appears that for every $100 paid to the old line stock companies for premiums, they paid $53.30 in losses on the average for the past six years, leaving a balance of 47 per cent. for expenses and profits. Farmers have rebelled against such expensive protection and now farmers' mutual insurance companies are quite common in Maine, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota, but are comparatively unknown in most of the other States and in some States are actually illegal. There are one thousand of these companies in the States named, insuring property to the amount of $650,000,000, at an annual saving of over $1,000,000. In other words it would cost the farmers in these co-operative companies over a million dollars a year more than it now costs them if they carried their insurance in the old line stock companies. Twenty years' experience in Michigan and other States is quoted to prove that it is not the result of a single favorable year, but that the system is safe when properly conducted. It is shown that the farmers of Michigan alone have saved nearly four million dollars in premiums, paying simply the actual cost of their insurance by carrying it their farm mutuals. There is, however, another side to the system and the lessons of costly experience, which are promised for the November Agriculturist. The first paper, in the October number, indicates thorough acquaintance with the subject, and an extraordinary amount of work in ascertaining and grouping the facts bearing upon it. These insurance papers promise to form one of the most important contributions ever made to the agricultural press, and not only farmers but village people should read them.

The other day a prominent citizen remarked: "Say I wish you would write down a nuisance that I and plenty of others in this city are subjected to." Then he proceeded to air his grievance. He said that certain firms systematically scan Canadian newspapers for announcements of deaths, and then send to the friends of the deceased samples of memorial cards with the name of the person, age, etc., and a little bit of verse printed on it which they offer you at so much per hundred. The gentleman referred to, whose child had died not long ago, said he had already received sample cards from three or four such firms, and one of them actually had, by mistake no duoubt, his own name inscribed as being the "dear departed." He further said that these American cheap John printers flooded Canada with their simple memorial cards, but as they were not the prevailing style in this country it generally amounted to nothing. This shows, however to what extremes some Americans will go in order to push business. They may be enterprising and all that but they are an unmitigated nuisance just the same.—Ex.

New York, August 1, 1886.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,
Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:
My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.
Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,
C. EDWARDS LESTER.

AGRICULTURAL.

Knowledge of the Subsoil.

Upon a question too little studied by many farmers, W. G. Waring, Sr., in the New York Tribune, pertinently remarks:

"A real acquaintance with the qualities of one's subsoil property may often prove to be of much value. I lately gained such useful knowledge about the soil of a part of my garden—a clayey slope that remains wet and cold in Spring, and is apt to become so hard as to be difficult to work. Lower down is open alluvial bottom resting on gravel, pleasant to work, productive and faultless, excepting that growth is checked by drouth sooner upon it than on the clay. But it gets more benefit from rains when they occur, for the water runs off the slope to it as from a roof.

Three years ago I cut an open ditch to lead off the surplus water from the highest ground, and with much apprehension for the result I put the heavy, sticky, yellow subsoil upon the bed alongside, and planted it later with peas and with strawberries between for the next crop. To my enjoyable surprise, I found the growth exceptionally fine, and it has continued so ever since. The clay thrown up is not of the unctuous potter's clay quality, but the clods break to pieces when dry, and the beaten surface does not shrink or crack much. Previous trials of the same process in a different soil, outwardly similar, had a most deleterious effect; the whole soil seemed to be poisoned, and the barrenness lasted for years. My disliked clay is now preferred to the mellow mould and gravel of the bottom, and the next move will be to carry some of it and its good properties of plant nourishment and water-retension to the more leaky bottom.

FROM A CAR WINDOW.

A farmer who seldom gets away from home takes more interest in the farms seen from the window than in the daily paper. One can learn many lessons by using his eyes at such times. One of the first things I noticed on a late journey was fields of sowed fodder corn. It seams strange that intelligent farmers will continue a practice which defeats the very end the farmer seeks to secure. Sowed corn seldom forms ears. There is, if the ground is rich and a large variety is planted, an immense growth of stalks, and I suppose farmers reason that a large growth of corn stalks means a large amount of fodder, but they overlook an important principle. In the fifth report of the Massachusetts Agricultural Experiment Station, Prof. Goessmann says: "The amount of vegetable matter in a given weight of green fodder corn cut at the beginning of the glazing of the kernels to be not only twice as large, as compared with that contained in an equal weight of green fodder corn when just showing the tassels, but it is also known to be pound for pound, more nutritious; for it contains more starch, more sugar; more of valuable nitrogenous matter, etc." Italics are his.

It was found that 100 pounds of fodder cut at the time of the first appearance of the tassel contained from 12 to 15 pounds of dry vegetable matter, and from 85 to 88 pounds of water; when cut at the time of the beginning of the glazing of the kernels, 100 pounds contained from 23 to 28 pounds of dry vegetable matter, and from 72 to 77 pounds of water. From this we deduce this rule. Plant corn for fodder and silage so that the kernels will begin to glaze before it is cut.

POINTS FOR REJECTION.

The English government has a code of rules for the guidance of their cavalry horse buyers. These rules are well worth studying as they bring out several points of great value not only to buyers but breeders as well. They say:

Reject a horse whose forelegs are not straight. They will not stand wear. Stand behind the horse as he walks away from you and you will be able to notice these defects, if they exist.

Reject a horse that is light below the knee, especially if immediately below the knee. The conformation is essentially weak.

Or a horse with long, short, or upright pasterns: long pasterns are subject to sprains, short or upright pasterns make a horse unpleasant to ride, and, on account of extra concussions are apt to cause ossific deposits.

Or a horse with toes turned in or out. The twist genrally occurs at the fetlock. Toes turned out are more objectionable than toes turned in. When toes turn out the fetlocks are generally turned in, and animals so formed are very apt to cut or brush. Both, however, are weak formations.

Reject a horse whose hind legs are too far behind; good propelling power will be wanting and disease as a result may be expected in the hocks. And a horse which goes either very wide or very close behind. And one with very straight or very bent hocks; the former cause undue concussion, the latter are apt to give way.

Reject a horse that is "split up"—that is, shows much daylight between his thighs, propelling power comes from behind, and must be deficient in horses without due muscular development between the thighs.

Reject a horse with flat or over large feet, or with very small feet; medium size are the best.

Also a horse with one foot smaller than another.

IN AND IN BREEDING.

Judicious in and in breeding, says The Southern Live stock Journal, does not run the stock out. The most perfectly developed and conspicuously valuable cattle in the world are those that have been skillfully and intelligently bred for generations with no intermixture of foreign blood. In and in breeding, to attain a high degree of success, requires the liberal use of brains interwoven with more than average judgment. Most of the ills that are predicted by agricultural writers for stock bred in and in are more imaginary than real.

The general principles of heredity and the laws of breeding are subjects of special interest to stockmen, and ought to be studied more carefully and extendedly. The only way we may hope to intensify and perpetuate a desired quality with reasonable assurance of success is by means of in and in breeding. All our prominent and most useful and valuable breeds of domestic live stock and poultry were molded in this way, and it is the only way to create new breeds that will transmit their personal characteristics and excellences to their offspring.

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

Tall corn is quite common this year, even in Northern Illinois. Sixteen-feet stalks are on exhibition in Kane County.

To date, the largest bunch of asparagus on record, has been on exhibition in a Courtland street, N. Y., seed store. It is 2 feet in height, 36 inches in circumference, and weighs 40 pounds, or nearly a pound aspike, all of which is edible.

It is estimated that the average age at which pullets begin to lay is as follows; Cochins and Brahmas, nine months; Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes, Langshans, Dorkins, and Javas, eight months; Dominiques, seven months; Leghorns, Hamburgs and Minorcas, six months.

One of the uses of giving cows salt, is that it acts as a preservative in the system. Every one accustomed to test milk can tell by its flavor whether the cows have been getting their salt. There is no doubt, however, that the neglect of "salting the cows" spoils the butter and injures the milk for the cheese factory.

The great want of the dairy over a large part of our country is not more cows, but better cows and better care and feeding. The times call for intense methods in conducting the dairy, and the call is far-reaching, going down to the roots of things, affecting the cow which produces, the feed and the method of dispensing the same, from which the milk is produced.

STATISTICS.

The population of Gibraltar is 24,200, including 5,240 soldiers.

Oil is now flowing through the Lima pipe line to South Chicago. The pipe line extends from Lima, Ohio, to a point on the lake shore about a mile south of Calumet harbor—a distance of 206 miles. The laying of the pipe was begun April 1. It is of wrought iron, eight inches inside diameter, and was constructed to stand a pressure of 1,000 pounds to the square inch. At Lima there are a number of immense iron tanks holding 35,000 barrels each, into which the oil flows directly from the wells. There will be five receiving tanks at South Chicago of the same capacity of 175,000 barrels. Two are now completed and the others will be finished inside of thirty days. Though Lima is 300 feet higher than South Chicago gravitation will not bring the oil here because of a high sandhill at Laketon, Ind. One immense pump at Lima is now at work forcing oil through the pipe at the rate of 8,000 barrels a day.

The report of the U. S. Commissioner of Pensions shows that there were during the year added to the pension rolls 60,252 new names (the largest annual increase in the history of the Bureau), making a total of 451,557 pensioners on the rolls, classified as follows: 326,835 invalids, 92,298 widows, minor children and dependent relatives. 37 revolutionary widows, 806 survivors of the war of 1812, 10,787 widows of those who served in that war, 16,060 survivors of the war with Mexico, and 6,104 widows of those who served in that war. The names of 2,028 previously dropped were restored to the rolls, making an aggregate of 52,280 pensioners added during the year. During the same period 15,530 were dropped from the rolls on account of death and various other causes, leaving a net increase to the rolls of 46,550 names. There have been 1,166,926 pension claims filed since 1861, and 737,200 claims to all classes have been alowed since that date. The amount paid or pensions since 1861 has been $963,086,444. fIncrease of pension was granted in 45,716 cases. The average annual value of a pension at the close of the year was $125 30, a decrease of $4.80.

The British Postmaster-General's annual report for the year ending with the last day of March furnishes some very interesting statistics. During the twelve months there were delivered in the United Kingdom 1,512,200,000 letters, 188,800,000 post cards, 389,500,000 book-packets and circulars, 152,300,000 newspapers, and 36,732,000 parcels. The magnitude of the record can be understood by dividing the totals amongst the number of inhabitants, and stating that every man, woman, and child received last year 41 letters, five post-cards, ten book-packets, four newspapers, and one parcel. Turning to the telegraphs, we find that record is increasing by leaps and bounds. Whereas in 1870 the gross total messages sent in the United Kingdom was 9,850,000, it now is 53,400,000, the increase in two years being no less than 14,000,000. At the savings' bank the number of accounts open in 1878 was 1,890,000; it is now 3,650,000. The sum deposited at the former date was £30,000 000; it is now close upon £54,000,000. In other words, the number of depositors has doubled in ten years. These latter figures indicate that the average condition of the working classes, contrary to the statements of protectionist journals, has improved during the past decade.

According to an article in the Economiste Francais of August 11th, by M. Rene Stourm, the national debt of France is the heaviest borne by any nation on the globe. M. Stourm's computation makes the total amount equivalent to $5,9 2,800,000. This is from $3:0,000,000 to $500,000,000 less than the sum at which it has been placed by some other computations, but the discrepancy is explained by the omission from M. Stourm's figures of $432,000,000 of life annuities, which are usually considered as part of the debt. The annual charge for interest and sinking fund, on the entire debt, including the annuities, is $258 167,083. Of the funded debt, $2,900,000,000 are perpetual three per cents., $1,537,660,000 perpetual four and a half per cents., and $967,906,200 redeemable bonds of various descriptions. Annuities to divers companies and corporations of $477,400,000, and $200,000,000 of floating debt make up the balance of M. Stourm's total. Next to France in the magnitude of the public debts come, according to M. Stourm's figures, Russia, with $3,605,600,000; England, with $3,565,800,000; Italy, with $2,226,200,000; Austria, with $1,857,600,000, not including Hungary which owes $635,600,000; Spain, with $1,208,400,000; and Prussia, with $962 800,000. Of all these nations England and Prussia are the only two which have revenues sufficient to guarantee a permanent equilibrium of the budget. Not only is the debt of France the heaviest absolutely, but it has increased more rapidly in the past than that of any other, and is likely, M. Stourm thinks, to do so in the future. In presence of these enormous figures we can readily see one strong reason why French statesmen should have listened to the recent declarations of Emperor William with such unwonted placidity.

Poor's Manual for 1888 contains some prodigious figures about American railroads. There are now 149,912 miles of road in the United States, of which 14,392 was built last year. The asserts of the companies are $9,000,000,000. Trains ran 643,978,896 miles during the year. Four hundred and twenty-eight millions of passengers were carried 10,570,000,000 miles, and 552,000,000 tons of freight were moved 60,061,000,000 miles. The roads earned $931,090,000, and the operating expenses were $600,000,000. In Massachusetts there is a mile of railroad for every 4 12 square mile of land and every 882 inhabitants. The average capital stock per mile throughout the country is $22,454, and the bonded indebtedness $29,062. Comparing different countries, the following is the length of railroad in kilometres:—

United States	201,770
All Europe	189,803
All Asia	20,768
All Africa	6 729
Australasia	12 142

This is reported as the greatest watermelon year the Georgians have had in a decade. A Savannah paper reports the number of carloads shipped from the State at 7,055. The average number of melons per carload is 1,100, making about 7,800,000 melons already shipped. The estimate for the remainder of the season is 35,000, making the total crop, besides home consumption, 7,835,000, melons, the total value of which is placed at $1,500,000.

Is long distanced by a 10 cent bottle of Polson's Nerviline, the newest and best pain remedy. It cures colds, cramps, colic, pain in the head, sciatica, pain in the chest: in fact it is equally efficacious as an external or internal remedy. Try a 10 cent sample bottle of the great pain remedy, Nerviline. Sold by druggists. Large bottles only 25 cents. Try a sample bottle of Nerviline, only 10 cents. Take no substitute.

Horace Greeley told this story of himself: Soon after he went to learn the printing business he went to see a preacher's daughter. The next time he attended meeting he was considerably astonished at hearing the minister announce as his text: "My daughter is being grievously tormented with a devil."

"My dear," said a fond New Haven mother to her boy, "why do you not play with the little Jones boy?" "Oh, he's horrid. He says bad, naughty words, just like papa does." Reform will begin at home in that family.

The Elephants of an Indian Prince.

Now we saw without his drapery, the elephant which had borne our howdah. He was very large, though not so tall as Jumbo, and had been captured when he was a wild little calf, and given to the Maharajah's great-grandfather, then a boy, and the elephant had been for nearly one hundred years the pride and pet of the stable and menagerie; no wonder that he was as much at home with the Maharajah and his keepers, as our most docile domestic animals are with us. In being groomed he was first lathered with soap, and then scraped and brushed by strong-armed men and sprayed off with fire-hose, enjoying his bath with all his might, for at the end he was allowed a plunge in a deep river or pond, where he swam about for hours under water, with only the tip end of his trunk coming up to the surface for air, and this bit of a trunk, skimming along, looked not bigger than a small frog on his travels, though there must have been a pretty big swirl underneath the wave.

He came and went at will without a keeper, and after being shown to us and taking some tea cakes very gently from our hands, he trotted off alone when he was bidden across the fields and under the palm trees, to his stable three miles distant.

An elephant fight now promised much excitement, if the natives were to be believed.

The great creatures stripped off all trappings and made ready to fight by having their tusks cut off short, were brought, two by two, into a wide open field. When let go, they ran at each other head formost, with their trunks in the air. The fight was very stupid, being simply a huge game of "push heads which is the toughest," where the stronger won and then drove the weaker off the field. They seemed good-natured, and also to enjoy the game.

Some ten or twenty other elephants looked on, apparently interested and amused, until one very strong, active elephant among the fighters ran after his vanquished antagonist with the evident intention of striking at his trunk, when all the other elephants became excited, and constituted themselves a company of umpires, and set up such indignant moaning that the keeper interfered.

We saw one beautiful elephant who was born in the Prince's province and had never seen a jungle, but had grown up in the pasture and stable, like any other cow. When she came to see us her own little calf paced by her side. The calf was the little counterpart of the cow, and was a very pretty creature, whom one would like for a pet. She wore draperies and frills and gold lace like her mother, with ear rings which nearly reached to the ground, and gold bangles. She walked jauntily along, "toeing out," stiffening her knees, and holding her chin down in the most approved manner. When we offered her a bit of sponge cake, she sidled nearer, like a pet lamb, lifted the little finger at the end of her trunk, and examined the trunk daintily before taking it; and apparently never having seen any before she turned towards her mother with a questioning look. The mother elephant seemed puzzled. She walked toward us with an expression of hesitation, anxious curiosity in her small knowing eyes, as one may see any cow do. She held out her trunk for the cake, and the little one dutifully gave it to her, whereupon the mother turned it over carefully, then held it up and looked at us as if for an explanation. We motioned toward the little one, to whom she promptly returned it, and then looked on contentedly while the calf enjoyed the tidbit.

This indulgence on our part seemed to gain the mother elephant's confidence, for she began showing off her offspring with unmistakable pride. She pushed the little one toward us, and turned it round and round with her great trunk. When the calf demurred she coaxed and caressed her, the cow was evidently vain of the calf's finery, and encouraged that spoiled elephantling to flaunt her furbelows and tinkle her ear-rings. She drew our attention to the big, little fat legs of the beauty, and finally wound her trunk affectionately round the small neck, lifted the little head, and showed us the beginning of her baby's first tusk.

We thought this gentleness and intelligence were due to training, as neither of these creatures had ever known the wild life of the jungle; but we had a chance later to learn that this was not altogether the case.

A wild elephant cow and calf lately captured were driven up to show us the difference. They were both darker and very rough, lean and hungry-looking in comparison with the domesticated ones. A strong chain tied the wild mother elephant's fore-legs together, and she was also fastened with a strong lariat to a tame elephant.

The wild baby-elephant kept close to its mother and stumbled along like a shy, awkward hobbledehoy. When the keepers tried to turn the wild calf toward us, and away from its mother, the little one threw back its head, struck up its chin, and cried out loud and piteously. The poor mother struggled toward her terrified calf, and managed to get her own ponderous body between the calf and the strange looking people. The little one refused to be comforted, and the mother's ways of protecting and soothing it were so tender and knowing as to seem almost human. She stroked it with her big trunk and shoved it lovingly behind her, and finally persuaded the little one to take some nourishment, when it threw back its small trunk dexterously, and drew the milk, smacking like any satisfied, hungry calf.

They became quieter when they saw that no harm was intended them, and then the little one was more amusing than ever, running under the mother and hiding behind her great legs, occasionally darting a shy, frightened peep from behind the shelter. If we looked, or went toward her, she dodged back and hid her face, and if we took no notice she came nearer, and even stepped one foot forward in a testing, gingerly fashion. Meantime the bold town-bred elephant youngster looked on with great interest, waggling her tail, jingling her ear-rings, and tossing her trunk in high glee, apparently much amused at her countrified sister's awkwardness and discomfiture.

WIT AND WISDOM.

When a dog growls over his food you may know that he likes it. When a man growls you may know that he doesn't.

"We can take your new furniture and make it look as though it had been made a century ago," advertises a cabinet-maker. "My children can do that," comments a reader.

Young Man (to jeweller)—Will the watch cost anything extra if I should want a little time on it? Jeweller—No, sir; you pay me $6 for the watch and I'll throw the time in.

Young Wife—"John, mother says she wants to be cremated."

Young Husband—"Tell her if she will get on her things I'll take her down this morning."

Proud Father (displaying twins to Mr. Oldboy)—"What do you think of them, old fellow?" M. Oldboy (who doesn't care for babies)—Er—are you going to try to raise 'em both?"

"I was paired five times last season," said the senator. "Good gracious!" exclaimed Miss Fairanthirty; and I haven't been paired once yet. What is the fare to Washington?"

"I can carry in some kindling wood if you insist on my doing it, ma'am," said the tramp, with a hurt look, "but it never did agree with me to take violent exercise just after eating."

"You are evidently worried over business matters," diagnosed a young physician "what you need is peace of mind." "My dear sir," replied the patient, "I get a piece of mind every day."

Bishop (on his semi-annual round)—So you don't remember me, Bobby? Bobby—N-no, sir. Bishop—I remember you very well indeed. Bobby—That so? Well, why didn't you bring me something?

Indians of the Territory.

"In five out of seven cases," said Col. Elias Boudinot, "the educated young Indian sees that land is the basis of wealth. He notes how high it is held in the States, and how prosperous are those who till it wisely in the territory. He claims a piece, gets some stock and a nice horse or two, and marries an Indian girl who has been to school in the States, or a white girl in St. Louis, Little Rock or some other place. The Indians have good schools, and from these schools the smartest boys and girls are sent to institutions for learning in the states. Often their parents send others. When I taught school I was amazed to find that full bred Indian boys who could not understand any English could read it by the page and entirely correctly. But the race is fading. Worthless and greedy white men see the chance the territory offers. Here is rich land that pays no taxes to be had for marrying of an Indian girl, and they seize the chance to get it."

Sweet Flowers.

The fairest buds are often the first to wither, and the ravages of disease make havoc with the beauty, as well as the strength and happiness of the fair sex. The prevalent disorders among American women are those of a most distressing description. These "weaknesses," as they are suggestively termed, insidiously sap the health, and the patient becomes pale and emaciated, the appetite grows fickle and feeble; she loses strength as the attacks increase in severity, and is in despair. There is relief for all such sufferers in Dr. Pierce's world-famed Favorite Prescription, which cures all "female complaints." Its use is followed by cessation of the "dragging down" pains, return of appetite, and in due course, vigorous health.

Dr. Paul Gabier, a young French physician, will start for Jacksonville next Saturday to make an exhaustive study of yellow fever.

No mortal yet has e'er foreseen
The moment that shall be his last, but Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets have forever settled the question of a comfortable existence until that moment does arrive, and put to flight the melancholy forebodings of sufferers from biliousness, headache, indigestion, constipation, and kindred ailments.

The Ameer of Afghanistan is said to be meditating a journey to England.

Effects oo Climate.

We hear a great deal said about the beneficial effect upon invalids of the climate of Colorado and other western localities, but when a man changes his place of residence in the hope of improving his health without first trying Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, he makes a great mistake. In nine cases out ten he might save his time and money. This great remedy owes its power over all affections of the throat and lungs, bronchitis, asthma, catarrh and even consumption, which is lung scrofula to the simple fact that it purifies and enriches the blood and invigorates the debilitated system.

Tramps were never so numerous in California as now.

"COME UNTO ME."

Weary and sad with toil and sin,
Beset on every way I flee,
With foes without and fears within
How can I come to Thee?

Worn out with heavy weights of care,
Heartsick of earth's poor vanity,
Of friend and lover in despair,
Where is the way to Thee?

Wert thou beside that lonely lake
Amid the hills of Galilee,
How soon my feet the way would take
That brought me unto Thee!

What weariness of night or day,
What tossing over land and sea,
What ill or anguish could dismay,
If I might come to Thee!

Come unto Me—how may I come
Thy face divine I cannot see,
Though as an exile thirsts for home,
I long to come to Thee!

Hark! Some sweet, tender voice I hear,
"My word is true for all—for thee,
Forget thy sorrows and thy fear,
There is a way to Me!

Speak from thy heart one fervent word,
'Take me, dear Lord, thy child to be,'
Thy prayer is answered as 'tis heard,
Thou hast come home to Me!"

A MAN'S A MAN FOR A' THAT!

The rich man's son inherits lands,
And piles of brick, and stone and gold,
And he inherits soft white hands,
And tender flesh that fears the cold,
Nor dares to wear a garment old;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

The rich man's son inherits cares:
The bank may break, the factory burn,
A breath may burst his bubble shares,
And soft white hands could hardly earn
A living that would serve his turn;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

What does the poor man's son inherit?
Stout muscles and a sinewy heart,
A hardy frame, a hardier spirit,
King of two hands, he does his part
In every useful toil and art;
A heritage, it seems to me,
A king might wish to hold in fee.

O rich man's son! there is a toil
That with all others level stands;
Large charity doth never soil
But only whitens soft white hands—
This is the best crop from thy lands;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being rich to hold in fee.

O poor man's son! scorn not thy state;
There is worse weariness than thine
In merely being rich and great;
Toil only gives the soul to shine,
And makes rest fragrant and benign;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being poor to hold in fee.

Kentucky has six counties that have never had a church within their borders.

The secrets of much success in this world are cash, confidence, cheerfulness and constancy.

The Prince of Wales distinguished himself at Homburg not long ago by drinking fourteen glasses of spring water before breakfast.

There are eight mission ships now cruising in the North Sea, each a combination of church, chapel, temperance hall and dispensary.

The London police have organised a brass band consisting of forty-one pieces. They are determined to drive the criminals out of the city in some way.

A man has just died in New Haven who has dug 2,500 graves during his long and useful career, and whose father had dug about as many before him.

The Emperor Franz Josef of Austria is also on his travels. It is very clear that some enterprising excursion promoter is offering reduced rates to crowned heads about this time.

Wages in Ontario.

Comparing the wages reported in 1884 with those of 1887, some interesting ups and downs are discovered. Bakers, for example, averaged $8 06 per week in the former year, and $9 65 in the latter. The wages of blacksmiths have gone up from $8 89 to $9 82; of helpers, from $6 58 to $7.20; of boilermakers, from $9.53 to $10 85; of bricklayers, from $14 87 to $15 75; of brass finishers, from $9 86 to $10; for marble cutters, from $9 84 to $13.09; of plumbers, from $10.84 to $11.45; of plasterers, from $14 31 to $4 53; of tinsmiths, from $8 84 to $9 22. These increases are, it will be observed, largely in the building trades. Speculation in real estate seems to have helped certain of the workers. While, however, plasterers, plumbers, and bricklayers have thus benefited, the brickmakers and carpenters have experienced losses. The wages of the brickmakers have gone down from $9 33, to $8 35, and of carpenters from $10.40 to $9.82. Lumber mill exployes have also experienced a decline. The comparative wages in 1884 and 1887 were as follows:

Callers	$9 14	$9 00
Edgers	9 00	9 00
Filers	13 50	10 21
Sawyers	8 92	8 63

Locksmiths' wages have also decreased. The average rate in 1884 was $12; it was in 1887 but $9 50. In manufacturing lines the movement has been unequal. Certain departments in given classes of industry boasts a raise; others have experienced a fall. In organ making alone has there been a general increase. The rates compare thus:—

	1884	1887
Action makers	$9 00	$10 34
Bellows makers	9 50	9 93
Tuners	11 00	18 00

The piano makers have had a mixed experience. The artisans who make the cases have recived lower wages, while those who make the interiors have had a slight rise. Tannery employes received a dollar a week more in 1887 than in 1884. Outside of these traders there has been a general decline. Thus, among axe factory employes the wages have gone down from $10 08 to $9 42. Cigar makers get $8 76 instead of $9 45; carriage trimmers $9 52 instead of $10 15; bookbinders $10 15 instead of 12 24; coopers $8 26 instead of $9 91; harness makers, $8 50 instead of $9.91; machinists $9 55 instead of $10 98; chairmakers $7 98 instead of $8 70; cabinetmakers $9 20 instead of $9 57; and saw makers $12 75 instead of 15 75. In the textile trades the skilled departments have rather more than held their own, while the general operatives have suffered decreases. A loom fixer in a cotton mill receives $11.38 where he had but $10.71 before; but the carders have experienced a decline of seventy-six cents, and the female weavers of fifty cents. The woollen finishers, dyers, and fullers have also received a slight advance, but the reelers, scourers, speckers, spinners, spoolers, warpers, and weavers have reduced wages.

A Disgusted Humorist.

Marshall P. Wilder, the humorist, in relating his recent experiences in London, said: "Sometimes it was dreary work trying to be funny. Once I went to a reception, or assembly, at which none but Greeks were present. I have never seen so many magnificent dresses at one time. The women were exceedingly beautiful and richly attired, and all the men were handsome. Well, I went through my programme and tried my best to raise a laugh, but the audience sat and listened without moving a muscle. Just as I was ending the hostess came to me and said sweetly:—'Now, Mr. Wilder, please do something funny!' They carried me out in a hand basket and I reached my rooms in a collapsed condition. It was simply crushing."

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN.

DRESS REFORM.

Mrs. Annie Jenness Miller, whom everyone knows as one of the hygiene dress reformers, is organizing "Dress Clubs" in different parts of the country. She has given up the older society and is bringing her weapons to bear on the younger portion. She hopes to induce girls to abandon their corsets or to grow up without any. Just now the leglette is her ambition and she is trying to rush that article of dress to the front. She says that already there are at least 5,000 of these garments in daily wear, and those who have worn it once will never go back to petticoats. Mrs. Miller, who has taken up her permanent residence in this city, is a fine-looking woman. Her movements and carriage are fine and easy and her manner dignified—all of which she attributes to the way she clothes herself. She says that Michigan is one of the States where women are beginning to see the advantage of high art in dressing and that they have organized nearly twenty "Dress Clubs" in the state, young as is the movement.—New York letter.

OLD MAIDHOOD.

There are many worse things than single blessedness, and the condition of the old maid is no less honorable to her than is that of matrimony to her wedded sister. The old maid may, if she will, and she generally does, bear a noble part in the good work of making the world a better and happier place. There are probably few who do not carry with them through life the tender memory of some old maid whose love and goodness cheered and blessed their early years. How often is she a ministering angel whose life is spent in acts of unselfish devotion to those around her? We cannot spare the old maid. She has an important role to pay in the human comedy, and the thing for her to do is to study it and play it well. The woman who worries because she sees old maidhood before her is without good sense. Let her be sure that there are thousands of wives who only wish that they had led single lives, and then she may find it easier to learn of the Apostle in whatsoever state she is therewith to be content. —[North American.

LADIES OF JAPAN.

An American exchange says:—A number of eminent ladies, headed by Mrs. Cleveland and Mrs. Garfield, have addressed an open letter "to Japanese women who are adopting foreign dress." The writers warn the Japanese ladies that there are many objectionable features in the dress of women of this side of the world.

From the standpoint of beauty, grace, and suitability (the letter goes on,) Japanese dress, modeled after the best Japanese standards, is both elegant and refined, and it would take years for Japanese ladies to adapt to themselves and wear with equal grace a costume to which they are entirely unaccustomed. As to economy, European dress, with its ample skirts and trimmings, requires a large amount of material, and even if native stuffs are used the expense of the costume will be greatly increased, to say nothing of the change and expenditure in household furniture necessary if Western dress be adopted. Foreign carpets, chairs, and tables must be added to foreign dress and shoes, and Japanese household interiors, now held up to the world as models of grace, simplicity and harmony, will have to be entirely remodeled.

But it is to the relations of foreign dress to health that the attention of the Japanese ladies is especially directed. Heavy skirts, dangerously close fitting dress bodies, "the insidious custom of wearing corsets, far more direful in its consequences than the Chinese custom of compressing the feet of women," are all commented on. Some of the writers think that the charges of immodesty sometimes made against the present Japanese dress could be met by the addition of underclothing.

All these observations are made "that Japanese ladies may be made aware of the dangers of such a course before adopting foreign dress, and that they may be led to stop and consider well before doing what will affect not only their own health, but that of their sons and daughters."

A POPULAR GIRL.

What qualities go to make a popular girl? Study the girl everybody likes, and see wherein lie the reasons of her popularity. Very often she is not pretty, or she is devoid of the clothes-wearing faculty we call style; she may not even be accomplished; but we all like her. The most popular girl we know is always called pretty, though her features are irregular and she belongs to no decided type. But the moment she meets one her whole face lights up with friendliness and her first speech is either some merry quip or bit of kindly sympathy. So you see it is not very strange that she is loved. She is not rich; her own lively fancy and nimble fingers must do much to provide her simple gowns, but son ehew she always has time to do so much for other people. Whatsoever her hand finds to do she does with all her might.

THE DOG CRAZE.

A wealthy New York woman is guilty of the latest and most nauseating phase of the dog craze. Her pet Skye terrier died the other day and she had him interred with as much pomp and solemnity as though he were a United States senator. A $600 casket held the body, a $250 plot in Woodlawn Cemetery was honored with all that was mortal of the unfortunate pet. While the "last sad rites" were being performed over this pup in his rosewood coffin, according to the paper which chronicles this bit of folly, a young mother was discovered penniless and starving in the streets, trying to get money enough to buy food and medicine for her sick baby. This is a queer world.

Forbidding the Bans.

Bessie is the one little tot in an otherwise grown-up family, and consequently a great pet and accustomed to much attention. Her older sister, Margaret, was about to be married and the family were all occupied in preparations for the wedding. Bessie came one day bearing in her arms a naked and forlorn-looking rag doll and asked her sister to dress it for her.

"Go away, Bessie," said her mother, "Margaret is busy. Besides she is going to be married and go away, so she cannot dress any more dolls for you."

The evening of the marriage arrived and Bessie was seated in the front pew at church with her parents.

Presently the minister asked if anyone in the church had cause to forbid the marriage. To the utter consternation of all the people Bessie got up on the seat, raised herself to the dignity of her full height, and said distinctly:

"Ma does. Tause me wants Marget to tay at home and dwess my dolly." Then she gravely sat down, and the ceremonies proceeded amid the smiles of the bridal party and guests. A day or two after the wedding Bessie received by express from her new brother a most beautiful doll, and with it came an elaborate wardrobe.

A Game of Grab.

When the Boston Wholesale Grocers' Association agreed recently not to charge less for sugars than from one eight to one fourth of a cent above refiners' prices, intending thereby to save themselves from positive loss, the Sugar Refiners' Trust promptly raised the price to Boston dealers one-eighth of a cent, so that the grocers were left just where they had been before. The Trust does not propose to permit anyone but its own officials to fix prices of either raw or refined sugars. While it continues to divide exorbitant annual profits, the middlemen and retailers are compelled to handle the product either without profit or at a positive loss. It is a huge game of grab, in which the biz fellows get all, and all the others get left.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXIII.—UNDER THE PALM-TREES

A lone governess, even though she be a Girton girl, vanishes readily into space from the stage of society. It's wonderful how very little she is missed. She comes and goes and disappears into vacancy, almost as the cook and the housemaid do in our modern domestic phantasmagoria; and after a few months, everybody ceases even to inquire what has become of her. Our round horizon knows her no more. If ever at rare intervals she happens to flit for a moment across our zenith again, it is but as a revenant from some distant sphere. She has played her part in life, as far as we are concerned, when she has "finished the education" of our growing girls, as we cheerfully phrase it—what a happy idea that anybody's education could ever be finished!—and we let her drop out altogether from our scheme of things accordingly, or feel her, when he invades our orbit once more, as inconvenient as all other rev nants proverbially find themselves. Hence, it was no great wonder indeed that Elsie Challoner should subside quietly into the peaceful routine of her new existence at the Villa Rossa at San Remo, with "no questions asked," as the advertisements frankly and ingenuously word it. She had a few girl friends in England—old Girton companions, who tracked her still on her path through the cosmos, and to these she wrote unreservedly as to her present whereabouts. She didn't enter into details, of course, about the particular way she came to leave her last temporary home at the Meyseys' at Whitestrand; no one is bound to speak out every thing; but she said in plain and simple language she had accepted a new and she hoped more permanent engagement on the Riviera. That was all. She concealed nothing and added nothing. Her mild deception was purely negative. She had no wish to hide the fact of her being alive from anybody on earth but Hugh and Winifred: and even from them she desired to hide by passive rather than by active concealment.

It was ordained, however, in the nature of things, that sooner or later Hugh Massinger must find out Elsie Challoner was really living. No star shoots ever beyond the limits of our galaxy. But this discovery might be postponed for an indefinite period; and besides, so far as Elsie herself was concerned, her only wish was to keep the fact secret from Hugh in person, not from the rest of the world at large; for she knew everybody else in her little sphere believed her merely to have left the Meyseys' in a most particular and unexplained hurry. Now, Hugh for his part, even if any vague rumour of her having been sighted here or there in some distant nook of the Riviera by So-and-so or Whats-his-name might happen at any time to reach his ear, would certainly set it down in his own heart as one more proof of the signal success of his own clever and cunningly designed deception. As a matter of fact, more than one person did accidentally, in the course of conversation, during the next few years mention to Hugh that somebody had said Miss Challoner had been seen at Marseilles or Cannes or Genoa or somewhere; and Hugh in every case did really look upon it only as another instance of Warren Relf's blind acceptance of his bland little fictions. The more people thought Elsie was alive, the more did Hugh Massinger in his own heart pride himself inwardly on the cleverness and far-sightedness of the plot he had laid and carried out that awful evening at the Fisherman's Rest at Whitestrand in Suffolk.

Thus it happened that Elsie was not far wrong, for the present at least, in her calculation of chances as to Hugh and Winifred.

The very day Elsie reached San Remo, news of Mr. Meysey's death came to her in the papers. It was a sudden shock, and the temptation to write to Winifred then was very strong; but Elsie resisted it. She had to resist it—to crush down her sympathy for sympathy's sake. She couldn't bear to break poor Winifred's heart at such a moment by letting her know to the full all Hugh's baseness. It was hard indeed that Winifred should think her unfeeling, should call her ungrateful, should suppose her forgetful; but she bore even that—for Winifred's sake—without murmuring. Some day, perhaps, Winifred would know; but she hoped not. For Winifred's sake, she hoped Winifred would never find out what manner of man she proposed to marry.

And for Hugh's too. For with feminine consistency and steadfastness of feeling, Elsie even now could not learn to hate him. Nay, rather, though she recognised how vile and despicable a thing he was, how poor in spirit, how unworthy of her love, she loved him still—she could not help loving him. For Hugh's sake, she wished it all kept secret for ever from Winifred, even though she herself must be the victim and the scapegoat. Winifred would think harshly of her in any case: why let her think harshly of Hugh also?"

And so, in the Villa Rossa at San Remo, among that calm reposeful scenery of olive groves and lemon orchards, Elsie's poor wounded heart began gradually to film over a little with external healing. She had the blessed deadening influence of daily routine to keep her from brooding: those six pleasant, delicate, sensitive, sympathetic consumptive girls to teach and look after and walk out with perpetually. They were bright young girls, as often happens with their type; extremely like Winifred herself in manner—too like, Elsie sometimes thought in her own heart with a sigh of presentiment. And Elsie's heart was still young, too. They clambered together, like girls as they were, among the steep hills that stretch behind the town; they explored that pretty coquettish country: they wandered along the beautiful olive clad shore; they made delightful excursions to the quaint old villages on the mountain sides—Tegria and Cerians and San Romolo and Perinaldo—mouldering gray houses perched upon pinnacles of mouldering gray rock, and pierced by arcades of Moorish gloom and medieval solemnity. All alike helped Elsie to beat down the memory of her grief, or to hold it at bay in her poor tortured bosom. That she would ever be happy again was more than in her most sanguine moments she dared to expect; but she was not without hope that she might in time grow at least insensible.

One morning in December, at the Villa Rossa, about the hour for early breakfast, Elsie heard a light knock at her door. It was not the cook with the café-au-lait and roll and tiny pat of butter on the neat small tray for the first breakfast: Elsie knew that much by the lightness of the knock. "Come in," she said; and the door opened and Edie entered. She held a letter in her right hand, and a very grave look sat upon her usually merry face. "Somebody dead?" Elsie thought with a start. But no; the letter was not black-bordered. Edie opened it and drew from it slowly a small piece of paper, an advertisement from the Times. Then Elsie's breath came and went hard. She knew now what the letter portended. Not a death—but a marriage!

"Give it me, dear," she cried aloud to Edie. "Let me see it at once. I can bear it—I can bear it."

Edie handed the cutting to her, with a kiss on her forehead, and sat with her arm round Elsie's waist as the poor dazed girl, half erect in the bed, sat up and read that final seal of Hugh's cruel betrayal: "On Dec. 17th, at Whitestrand parish Church, Suffolk, by the Rev. Percy W. Blokersteth, M.A., cousin of the bride, assisted by the Rev. J. Walpole, vicar, HUGH EDWARD DE CANTERET MASSINGER, of the Inner Temple, Barrister at law, to WINIFRED MARY, only daughter of the late Thomas Wyville Meysey, of Whitestrand Hall, J.P."

Elsie gazed at the cutting long and sadly; then she murmured at last in a pained voice: "And he thought I was dead! He thought he had killed me!"

Edie's fiery indignation could restrain itself no longer. "He's a wicked man," she cried: "a wicked, bad, horrible creature; and I don't care what you say, Elsie; I hope he'll be punished as he well deserves for his cruelty and wickedness to you, darling."

"I hope not—I pray not," Elsie answered solemnly. And as she said it, she meant it. She prayed for it profoundly.

After a while, she set down the paper on the table by the bedside, and laying her head on Edie's shoulder, burst into tears—a torrent of relief for her burdened feelings. Edie soothed her and wept with her, tenderly. For half an hour Elsie cried in silence; then she rose at last, dried her eyes, burnt the little slip of paper from the "Times" resolutely, and said to Edie: "Now it's all over."

"All over?" Edie echoed in an inquiring voice.

"Yes, darling, all over," Elsie answered very firmly. "I shall never, never cry any more at all about him. He's Winifred's, now, and I hope he'll be good to her.—But oh, Edie, I did once love him so!"

And the winter wore away slowly at San Remo. Elsie had crushed down her love firmly in her heart now—crushed it down and stifled it to some real purpose. She knew Hugh for just what he was; she recognised his coldness, his cruelty, his little care for her; and she saw no sign—as how should she see it?—of the deadly remorse that gnawed from time to time at his tortured bosom. The winter wore away and Elsie was glad of it. Time was making her regret less poignant.

Early in February, Edie came up to her room one afternoon, when the six consumptive pupils were at work in the schoolroom below with the old Italian music-master, under Mrs. Relf's direction, and seating herself, girl-fashion, on the bed, began to talk about her brother Warren.

Edie seldom talked of Warren to Elsi she had even ostentatiously avoided the subject hitherto, for reasons of her own which will be instantly obvious to the meanest intelligence. But now, by a sort of accident of design, she mentioned casually something about how he had always taken them, most years, for so many nice trips in his yawl to the lovely places on the coast about Bordighera and Mentone, and even Monte Carlo.

"Then he sometimes comes to the Riviera with you, does he?" Elsie asked listlessly. She loved Edie and dear old Mrs. Relf, and she was grateful to Warren for his chivalrous kindness; but she could hardly pretend to feel profoundly interested in him. There had never been more than one man in the world for her, and that man was now Winifred's husband.

"He always comes," Edie answered, with a significant stress on the word always. "Indeed, this is the very first year he's ever missed coming since we first wintered here. He likes to be near us while we're on the coast. It gives him a chance of varying his subjects. He says himself, he's always inclined to judge of genius by its power of breaking out in a fresh place—not always repeating its own success. In summer he sketches round the mouth of the Thames and the North Sea, but in winter he always alters the venue to the Mediterranean. Variety's good for a painter, he thinks: though, to be sure, that doesn't really matter very much to him because nobody ever by any chance buys his pictures."

"Can't he sell them, then?" Elsie asked more curiously.

"My dear, Warren's a born artist, not a picture dealer: therefore, of course, he never sells anything. If he were a mere dauber, now, there might be some chance for him. Being a real painter, he paints, naturally enough, but he makes no money."

"But the real painter always succeeds in the end, doesn't he?"

"In the end, yes; I don't doubt that: within a century or two. But what's the good of succeeding, pray, a hundred years after you're dead and buried? The bankers won't discount a posthumous celebrity for you. I should like to succeed while I was alive to enjoy. I'd rather have a modest competence in the nineteenth century than the principal niche in the Temple of Fame in the middle of the twentieth. Besides, Warren doesn't want to succeed at all, dear boy—at least, not much. I wish to goodness he did. He only wants to paint really great pictures."

"That's the same thing isn't it?—or very nearly."

"Not a bit of it. Quite the contrary in some cases. Warren's one of them. He'll never succeed while he lives, poor child, unless his amiable sister succeeds in making him. And that's just what I mean to do in time, too, dear.—I mean to make Warren earn enough to keep himself—and a wife and family."

Elsie looked down at the carpet uneasily. It wanted darning. "Why didn't he come this winter as usual?" she asked in haste, to turn the current of the conversation.

"Why? Well, why? What a question to ask!—Just because you were here, Elsie."

Elsie examined the holes in the Persian pattern on the floor by her side with minuter care and precision than ever. "That was very kind of him," she said after a pause, defining one of them with the point of her shoe accurately.

"Too kind," Edie echoed—"too kind, and too sensitive."

"I think not," Elsie murmured low. She was blushing visibly, and the carpet was engrossing all her attention.

"And I think yes,' Edie answered in a decisive tone. "And when I thing yes, other people ought as a matter of course to agree with me. There's such a thing as being too generous, too delicate, too considerate, too thoughtful for others. You've no right to swamp your own individuality, and I say, Warren ought to have brought the yawl round to San Remo long ago, to give us all a little diversion, and not gone skulking like a pickpocket about Nice and Golfe Jouan, and Toulan and St Tropez, for a couple of months together at a stretch, without so much as ever even running over here to see his own mother and sister in their winter-quarters. It's not respectful to his own relation."

Elsie started. "Do you mean to say," she cried, "he's been as near as Nice without coming to see you?"

Edie nodded. "Ever since Christmas."

'No Not really?"

"Yes, my child. Really, or I wouldn't say so. It's a practic, of mine to tell the truth and shame a certain individual. Warren couldn't stop away from us any longer; so he took the yawl round by Gibraltar after—after the 17th of December, you know."—Elsie smiled sadly.—"And he's been knocking about along the coast round here ever since, afraid to come on—for fear of hurting your feelings, Elsie."

Elsie rose and clasped her hands tight. "It was very kind of him," she said. "He's a dear good fellow.—I think I could bear to meet him now. And in any case, I think he ought at least to come over and see you and your mother. It would be very selfish of me, very wrong of me to keep you all out of so much pleasure.—Ask him to come, Edie.—Tell him—it would not hurt me very much to see him."

Edie's eyes flashed mischievous fire. "That's a pretty sort of message to send any one," she cried, with some slight amusement. 'We usually put it in a politer form. May I vary it a little and tell him, Elsie, it will give you great pleasure to see him?'

"If you like," Elsie answered, quite simply and candidly. He was a nice fellow, and he was Edie's brother. She must grow accustomed to meeting him somehow. No man was anything at all to her now.—And perhaps by this time he had quite forgotten his foolish fancy.

The celebrated centreboard yawl Mud-Turtle, of the port of London, Relf, master, seventeen tons registered burden, was at that moment lying up snugly by a wooden pier in the quaint little French harbour of St. Tropez, just beyond the blue peaks of the frontier mountains. When Potts next morning early brought a letter on board, addressed to the skipper, with an Italian stamp duly stuck on the corner, Warren Relf opened it hastily with doubtful expectations. Its content made his honest brown cheek burn bright red. "My dear old Warren," the communication ran shortly, "you may bring the yawl round here to San Remo as soon as you like. She says you may come, and what's more she authorises me to inform you in the politest terms that it will give her great pleasure indeed to see you. So you can easily imagine the pride and delight with which I am ever, Your affectionate and successful sister, EDIE."

"Edie's a brick!" Warren said to himself with a bound of his heart; "and it's really awfully kind of—Elsie."

Before ten o'clock that same morning, the celebrated centreboard yawl Mud-Turtle, manned by her owner and his constant companion, was under way with a favouring wind, and scudding like a seabird, with all canvas on, round the spit of Bordighera, on her voyage to the tiny harbour of San Remo.

Fashion Notes.

Green in many distinct shades, from golden green to the deep moss and myrtle dyes, is a very conspicuous colour in millinery for the coming season. The rage for these art colours has not ceased, but rather gained in popularity. They will be used in conjunction with black, cream, jonquil yellow, terra cotta, old Roman red, Venetian bronze, and a number of neutral tints in plush, silk, and velvet shot with a vivid contrasting colour. The new shot moires are extremely rich and elegant in effect.

There are imported this season extra heavy jerseys, which are to be worn during the fall in lieu of a street jacket. They are stylishly and elegantly decorated. One London costume shows a skirt of plaided Isle of Wight serge in colours of green, bronze and terra cotta, the plaids crossed with a delicate line of gold. Added to this skirt, which is draped in a very original and unique manner, are two walking-jerseys with which to vary the costume—one of deep terra cotta, trimmed with rich broche galloons, whose colours repeat those of the serge; the other of laurel-green, decorated with narrow passementerie in bright gold.

Silk-cord passementerie, rare and expensive jet galloons in lattice-work patterns covered with sparkling pendants and narrow moire ribbons run through diamond-shape bands in gimp and cut jet, are the trimmings most popular for black corded-silk dresses. Soft surplice folds of the silk are draped across the front of the bodice, the pleats of the shoulders held by massive jet clasps with pendants. These folds, narrowing trimly at the belt, are kept in place by a similar jet ornament. Cut-jet belts, Swiss girdles, dog-collars, and wristbands are used upon black faille gowns designed for young ladies. Silver gimps, enriched with cut jet, is another elegant and expensive decoration for black silk dresses.

Very elegant morning dresses are made of India cashmere and faille in a contrasting colour; for instance, the cashmere of pale apricot, the corded silk of Parma violet. More elaborate than these are the increasingly magnificent tea gowns. The newest imported models are incredibly rich, and always in a degree picturesque and fanciful. The costumes of India, Persia, Turkey, Japan, and China have all been laid under tribute to furnish novel ideas for these luxurious gowns, and often, indeed, provide the materials themselves. Beautiful old laces satisfy the cravings of the majority of tastes for their garniture, but there are others who revel in elaborate gold or silver embroideries, expensive feather borders from the breasts of rare birds from Trinidad, antique coins, broche gimps in superb Oriental devices, and the most heterogeneous collection of objects.

Sponging in the Bahamas.

Off the Neapolitan coast and in other parts of the Mediterranean, where these elastic articles are found, diving is the approved method of getting sponges. In the clear white water of the Bahamas, however, cranes are used. Cranes are long poles, varying in length from twenty to thirty-eight feet, with curved prongs at one end, and are employed to detach the sponge from the rock to which it clings and so convey it to the boat in which are the fishermen. So clear is the water that, with the aid of a water glass, a pail or box with a glass bottom, fishermen can easily distinguish sponges from other forms of marine life at the depth of fifty or sixty or more feet. When first taken from their fastness sponges appear and feel like pieces of raw, soft liver, being slippery, elastic, ugly, and and repulsive. In color they range from dirty purple to dull chocolate.

Having been brought to the deck of the fishermen's schooner, the sponges are washed, rubbed, and dried. They are then strung on strands, a dozen to a strand, and are washed down with buckets of sea water three times a day until the schooner reaches one of its crawls.

Crawls are large, half-submerged stockades of saplings, generally sapodillas and unfamiliar sub-tropical growths bound together by manila and palmetto fiber. The catch is deposited in these, and kept under water until the vessel makes its final round and draws its deposits preparatory to taking them to Nassau.

Sponges are extraordinarily plentiful in this part of the globe. It may surprise anybody who has just paid a dollar or so for a bath sponge at a drug store to learn that he could duplicate it in Nassau for 7 cents, or buy a strand of similar sponges, fresh from a coral reef, for 60 cents. That is one reason why so many are taken home by sagacious tourists as "trifles I picked up in Nassau."

A sponge famine would be more disastrous in the Bahamas than the August hurricane. The trade amounts to over $250,000 annually and is more important than the fruit-growing industry. Over 5,000,000 sponges are annually dragged from the sea. The dusky aunties who preside over Bahama kitchens use the articles as dish rags and towels. Sponges are used impartially for household articles in ways sometimes startling. It is a novel sensation when sitting down in a chair to descend luxuriously, to be sure, but unexpectedly and precipitately, and discover that the cushion is a gigantic "Key Vester." The climax is capped when one of the dainty fingers of a cup sponge is offered as a cigar-holder.

Echoes to Order.

The "Popular Science Monthly" describes a curious and ingenious device called "The Echo-maker," to be used on ships at sea.

A flaring funnel is screwed to the muzzle of a rifle. When a supposed obstacle is near the vessel, the rifle is fired in its direction, and if the obstacle is there the beam of sound projected through the funnel strikes the obstacle and rebounds, and as the echo is more or less perfect in proportion as the obstacle is more or less parallel to the ship from which the gun is fired, and as it is near or remote, the position of the obstacle may be inferred.

The inventor says that a sharp sound projected at or nearly at an object, and only when so directed, will in every case return some of the sound sent, so that, theoretically, there will always be an echo, and the difference in the time between the sound sent and the echo, will indicate the remoteness of the object.

The Naval Board tried the Echo-maker, and found that a return sound could be heard from the side of a fort half a mile away; from passing steamers a quarter of a mile off, if broadside to; from bluffs and sails of vessels at about the same distance, and from spar buoys two hundred yards away.

A Foolhardy Feat.

The "New South Wales Daily News" says:—An announcement made by the crier on Wednesday evening that a man named William Samuels, a local innkeeper and the champion boxer of Wales, would enter alone a den of lions at Messrs. Wombwell's menagerie, now at Swansea, caused considerable excitement in the town and drew a great crowd to the show. At 9 o'clock the band played "For he's a jolly good fellow," and then Samuels, accompanied by Mr Bostock, the manager of the show, walked up to a den containing a lion and about a dozen lionesses. A great crowd at once assembled round the cage. Mr. Bostock mounted a platform and informed the public that his old friend Samuels had volunteered to perform a deed of daring such as had never been done in the menagerie since its establishment in 1835. Mr. Wiltshire had, he said, recently at Cardiff entered the cage in company with Mme. Salva, the lion tamer, and had by his action caused a great sensation in South Wales. But Samuels was going to surpass this feat, for, though urged to let Mme. Salva accompany him, he declined to enter the den at all unless allowed to do so alone. This he now was about to do. The announcement was received with great cheering, though it was evident that, on the part of many present, there was a feeling of considerable anxiety and alarm. Samuels, however, seemed to share none of these feelings of uneasiness. Attired as a prize fighter, and with a blue rosette on his breast he appeared at the entrance of the cage, and cudgel in hand boldly entered it. The lions appeared in no way to relish this intrusion, and it looked as though Samuels would have had a warmer welcome than he bargained for. Possessed apparently with nerves of steel the man walked undaunted up to the end of the cage, where the animals were huddled together awaiting only the slightest encouragement to spring on the intruder, and held his cudgel threateningly before the nose of the fiercest. Growls of rage greeted this act, but Samuels, in no way discomposed, walked among the animals and made them fly right and left before him. This he did several times, and on one occasion acted so rashly that grave fears were entertained for his safety by those in charge of the exhibition These—who, as a precaution, were armed with red-hot irons—were ready to act promptly, when Samuels again obtained the mastery over his savage companions, and showed his fearlessness of them by firing a loaded pistol at their faces. Then, his courage maintained to the last, he went to the gate of the den and waited in a dangerous position while Mr. Bostock presented him, amid the cheers of those present, with a unique chain composed of spade and crown, and with a certificate recording the fact that he had accomplished his purpose. Immediately afterwards the band played "See the Conquering Hero Comes," and Samuels was borne in triumph out of the menagerie and through the streets.

A British manufacturer of trout and other flies has discovered a way of colouring the scales of salt water fish so that the scales may be used instead of feathers in making flies. The new flies are said to be not only more attractive, but more durable.

Watt produced his first real working steam engine in 1776, the year of American independence.

An hour's rest is almost an hour added to a man's life, but too many hours devoted to rest will shorten life. The only safe rule is for one to take a rest when he is tired.

WE have two or three delinquent subscribers who have about outdone our patience, and we have resolved that after a short time we will publish their names in black faced type unless soon settled. This is all the notice we purpose giving them.

REV. W. GRANT resigned his position as superintendent in the Dutton Regular Baptist Sabbath School last Sabbath. The resignation was received with much regret by the school, as it has been carried on with harmony and much interest under his management. Mr. J. F. Berry was unanimously elected to fill the vacancy.

THE County Judge, Public School Inspector, Warden Turner, W. Backhouse, Deputy-Reeve, Bayham, and D. McGregor, Deputy-Reeve Aldborough, the arbitrators appointed by the county council to consider the appeal of D. McKellar and ratepayers of school section 10, Dunwich, re. formation of new school section in the township of Dunwich, will hold their first meeting at Dutton on Friday 5th of October.

WHILE contesting for the prize in the ring by lady drivers at Wallacetown on Wednesday, Miss Maggie Campbell, sister of A. P. Campbell, Lawrence Station, wasthrown out of her buggy and being entangled in the lines was rolled over twice, the front wheel, we are informed, passing over her neck. Although apparently not much hurt it was a frightful sight. Her dress was badly torn, but we believe she was not hurt beyond being bruised. The accident was caused by two of them running horses, and Miss Campbell's horse was reined in too much in turning the end, causing the wheel to strike the bank. Another evidence, in our estimation, that ladies are out of place.

REV. O. C. CAREY, of West Lorne, has returned from Dakota.

WE are a little late this week on account of the West Elgin Fair.

A NEW or second-hand New Home sewing machine, for sale cheap. Apply at this office.

THE receipts of the Dutton Presbyterian Ladies' Aid for the last month were a little over $15 including a gift of $5 from "A Friend."

A. D. Urlin, of Wallacetown, states that he has not yet received all his insurance; neither has he assigned, but on account of unfavorable reports some of his creditors sued him.

H. SHORES, baggage master at the station, a few days ago procured four or five little pigs from one of the cars of the hog train, but not being adapted to all the qualities of a nurse they all died.

MISS M. MCCORMICK, who has been dangerously ill at Stratford, is somewhat better and is thought to be out of danger. As soon as she is able she will come to Dutton to keep house for her brother.

THE West Elgin Fall Show was well attended on Wednesday, there being about 3500 persons admitted at the gates. The show was good throughout and we believe it was a success financially.

JOHN CATANACH, butcher at Wallacetown states that he disposed of twenty-four hundred of beef this week. He purchased an animal of J. T. Sifton that weighed 1450 lbs live weight and dressed 800. How is that for size.

MISS HENRIETTA J. MCRAE has received a third class certificate for which she wrote at the recent examinations, being only 14 years old. She will continue at the High School for another term and will then write for a second.

REV. W. GRANT preached an eloquent and impressive sermon to a large congregation on Sabbath last. We suppose that it will be his last for the present at least. The congregation would be much pleased if he would remain.

PETER ODELL, of this village, has disposed of his fine stallion, "Belmont Hambletonian" to Mr. Fitchit, of Dutton. The people of that vicinity are to be congratulated on securing such a fine stock-getter in their neighborhood. —Belmont Times.

MR. M. MILLER councillor of Aldborough, met with a severe concussion of the brain at a barn raising. A commander was thrown from the top of the barn and struck Mr. Miller upon the top of the head, leaving him senseless for some time

MR. J. SHORT, late teacher in the Dutton High School, needs to be complimented for the interest taken in the students even after his departure from here. He secured, under protest, a certificate for one of the pupils who was supposed to have failed.

MR W. H. NELSON has a large stock of gold and silver watches which he is offering very cheap. He was unable to show them to the public last Friday, having put them in the safe on Thursday night and not being able to unlock it on Friday morning. They stayed in the safe all day.

WHAT might have been a fatal accident occurred near Dutton last Friday. Mr. J. McCormick was driving to Dutton with a load of wheat. He had in company with him, his brother-in-law, Mr. A. C. Jones, of Stratford. They were seated on top of the load and one of the wheels dropped into a small hole causing the bag on which they were sitting to slide off, consequently bag, seat and occupants went to the ground. Mr. McCormick got off safely, but Mr. Jones was pitched over Mr. McCormick and was so stunned that he was unable to move for a few moments. On being rolled over he gasped and soon got his breath and in a short time they were able to proceed on their way. Mr. Jones purposed stopping until Monday but went home on Saturday accompanied by Mr. McCormick. He was somewhat better and considered out of danger on Monday.

IONA FAIR.

The Southwold and Dunwich Agricultural Society held their annual fair at Iona on Saturday last, and, as usual for the last two or three years, was interrupted by rain about the time vistors would or should be leaving their homes, and when they would be taking the weather into consideration whether they had better venture out or not. However the show itself was not a failure, the entries being over 1,000, 490 being in discretionary. The articles in the ladies' department in the hall were abundant and handsome, but we would intimate just here that it is monotonous to look at the same articles year after year. We believe it would be hard for the ladies of any community to surpass the taste and fine work of those of West Elgin. The canned goods were not in such abundance as in years past, but we presume the quality was as good.

The horticultural products were not full in every respect, but there were some excellent varieties.

The roots and vegetables were of excellent quality. Potatoes, we think, were the best that have been on exhibition for years. There was a good show of grain and seeds, but short of corn.

The usual number of entries were made in poultry, sheep, hogs and cattle. Some superior horses were shown, which proves that the farmers of West Elgin are fanciers of extra good stock.

Two buggies and a straw-cutter were shown by Wm. McLandress and two plows by J & A. McSherry. These plows take the lead wherever known. J. M. Jackson, of Dutton, had a space in the building where he had on exhibition some Bell organs and numerous small musical instruments which aroused the dull cares of those inside while the Iona brass band enlivened the proceedings outside.

W. A. Brush, photographer, of Dutton, accomodated those who desired with their photos, while Professor Brush entertained a large crowd with the antics of his trained horses.

As to the success of the fair financially we are not aware, but we presume there will be sufficient funds to pay expenses. The rains which seemed to come just at the time to most seriously effect the shows for the past three or four years have done much to cripple the society. We think there would be a surplus in the treasury but for that. The number of members this year is about the same as formerly and the managers and directors did all in their power to make things agreeable.

DUNWICH COUNCIL.

Minutes of a regular meeting of the municipal council of the township of Dunwich held in Brown's Hall, Dutton, on Monday Oct. 1st, 1888.

PEACH BORERS

Prof. Cook says this pest may be destroyed by digging out the borers late in Sept. and early in May. This is not a hard task, as the oozing gum tells quickly where the offender is. The September digging is wise, as some of the borers will be so large that to leave them will premit much damage; the May digging removes those too small to be seen in September. On the Michigan shore, fortunes have been made in raising this delicious fruit, universal and concerted action has almost banished this enemy from peach orchards. This shows what effort may do in the extermination of even our most dreaded insect foes.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

Why You Feel
So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,
"The Life of the Body."
Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?
Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:
G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."
Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."
Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best
Spring and Family Medicine
in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how Ayer's Sarsaparilla
does sell." Prepared by
Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Price $1; six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

CONSUMPTIVE TENDENCIES are often inherited but the disease itself may gain a foothold through impure blood, bad diet, unventilated rooms, etc., keep the blood pure and the circulation perfect by means of Burdock Blood Bitters, and ward off consumption which is simply scrofula of the lungs

FROM MANITOBA.
"I have been cured of chronic diarrhœa by the use of Dr Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. I used about 12 bottles of it and am now entirely free from the disease William McLaren Clearwater, Man.

AN UNDOUBTED PROOF
of the beneficial qualities of Burdock Blood Bitters is found in the thousands of authentic testimonials published by the proprietors The origianal letters being in their possession, they can furnish proof positive as to to their genuineness at any time.

Purity of ingredients and accuracy of compounding, make Milburn's Aromatic Quinine Wine the criterion of excellence.

PROMPT RESULTS.
"I was very sick with bowel complaint last summer. I tried other medicines but all was of no use until I tried Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. The next day I was like a different man." Geo. H. Peacock, Stroud, Ont.

Fall and Winter Feeding of Young Stock.

Boys, colts and calves need the most attention at a period when their personal attractions are the least. As calves pass out of their babyhood and assume a languid indifference to all about them but flies and grass, they are apt to be neglected; if they are, the loss is irreparable. A calf that has not made a good start by fall had better be disposed of at any price, while having made a good start, it must be kept constantly gaining at any cost within reasonable limits. The important point in stock feeding is to constantly bear in mind that a young animal gives better returns for feed consumed than an old one. A pound of meat or a pound of hay adds more to the weight of a calf than to the same animal when grown. A grown animal in thin flesh but vigorous, will swell out and fill up the tissue with water and seem to gain very heavily for a time when put on good feed and may give better returns for a given amount of feed than a young animal in good flesh, but under ordinary conditions for both young and old, the proposition I state is true.

For making thrifty calves, in my experience, oats come next to milk, either ground or whole, but preferably ground for young calves, since they will learn to like them quicker and masticate them better. To get a calf while yet on skim-milk to eat oats, it should be tied up; and as soon as fed milk, a handful of oatmeal, or whole oats even, put in its mouth; at first, it will dislike the treatment, but soon it will get the taste and readily dispose of a half-pint, placed in a little feed box conveniently located in front. Hay and grass follow naturally, and later bran can be used. During the pleasant fall weather the pasture will afford exercise and feed, but if flies are troublesome the gain from pasture is too small with young calves to pay for the loss they undergo from vexation and blood-flow. A feeding trough should be placed in the pasture and grain fed daily, morning and evening. With fair treatment, the calves will go into winter quarters gaining a pound and a half a day, which means a profit to the owner if he is ever to get one from them.

This leads me to another point: In my experience a calf born in fall or winter is worth two born in spring for profit. A spring calf is so young that it gets little good from pasture the first season, for by the time it can fight flies successfully and crop grass enough to really aid in nourishing it, winter is at hand and it is placed on dry feed. The fall-born calf comes out in spring-time large enough and sufficiently vigorous to fight its own battles and gets the benefits of the whole season's pasture. Whatever plan we pursue, let us bear in mind that it takes fully half the food an animal can consume to sustain it, and that our profits come from the last half only.—American Agriculturist for October.

AN OLD FAVORITE
that has been popular with the people for 30 years is Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for all varieties of summre complaints of children or adults. It seldom or ever fails to cure cholera morbus, diarrhœa and dysentery.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

You Carry
A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."
Here is an instance of
who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:
"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."
John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."
T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

A Shooting Incident in India.

Four Europeans who had been out after tiger in the Maimensing district, says a Calcutta paper, returning after a long day, and had almost reached the factory where they were to dine and pass the night, when the captain ordered a halt. The "line" at once pulled up, and he said: "I hate seeing loaded rifles taken into a house (it was the old muzzle-loading days), more especially where there are children. I propose that we fire ours off.' "All right," said another, "but we have not had a shot all day; what do you say to a 'pool?'" "There's nothing to fire at," observed a third. "There's that ghurrah," said the captain, pointing to an earthen vessel which some ryots who were working at a little distance had as usual brought their day's supply of drinking-water in. "Good," said the fourth, "but what with bad light and the distance, it's by no means an easy shot. I propose we each put a chick on." "How shall we decide as to the order of firing?" said one. "O," replied the captain generously, "commence at your end of the line."

The mark was by no means an easy one to hit, for the distance was well nigh a hundred yards, the guns smooth bores, and the light that deceptive kind which one gets just between daylight and dark. But, on the other hand, the hunters were exceptionally good men, all excellent shots, either of whom could hit a running deer from the back of an elephant twice out of three times.

"Fire away," said the captain. No. 1 grazed the right side of the vessel, and it was thought must have hit it. No. 2 went just over it. No. 3 went a little to the left. "Thank you, gentlemen," said the captain. "I'll trouble you for those twelve rupees." He raised his gun as he spoke, and the next moment the jar was covered with earth; the bullet had cut the ground beneath it.

Presently the vessel was seen to wriggle, and then to kick, while a feeble cry proclaimed it to be a baby. Consternation was depicted on every face. The elephants bolted, the Sahibs jumped down and rushed to the spot, the parents running from the opposite direction. The little mite hadn't been touched, and was carried off by the father and mother with great rejoicing. They also took the "pool" along with them, and right glad the Sahibs were, under the circumstances, to part with it.

Education in Toronto.

Toronto is steadily advancing in educational matters. The University has had two additional professorships endowed by the city, and is erecting a large and handsome building for the School of Practical Science; a new Ladies' College has been opened under the auspices of the Baptist University, and a College of Music has been opened under the direction of Mr. F. H. Torrington, who has been for sixteen years organist of the Metropolitan Methodist Church and conductor of the Philharmonic Society. In its system of teaching and the scope of its departments, the College resembles the University and provides a practical education, for both professional and amateur, in all branches of music.

A LAND OF ROMANCE.

Luxuries of Life in Paraguay—Bevies of Beautiful Women.

Paraguay is surely one of the most favored lands on earth. There no insane love of gold compels the heart to questionable deeds. No political situation harasses the mind. The very atmosphere breathes peace. The air is soft and balmy, inviting to repose, and prolific nature, throwing about everything her garment of rich vegetation, supplies man with all he needs and beautifies all that his eyes rest upon. Paraguay is, indeed, almost a fairy land of romance, so beautiful are its manifold attractions.

The native portion of the population is a remnant of the tribe of Guarani Indians, one of the loftiest tribes in the grade of civilization of all the American race. But nothing astonishes the visitor to Paraguay so much as the vast preponderance of the female over the male population. The proportion is something like nine to one. This is the result of a long and very fierce war, in which the Guaranians followed and supported a cruel and ambitious ruler through indescribable hardships and sufferings. This war ended only with the death of the man who waged it, and has reduced the whole population to about one-sixth of what it was twenty years ago, leaving only women and boys. These women (this writer continues) are as beautiful and fair to look upon as can be found in any part of the world.

They are of medium height, rather slight and lithe, with finely moulded limbs, small, pretty hands and feet and figures of matchless grace and beauty that would serve for models of the sculptor's art. Their carriage is so easy and natural as to be almost the poetry of motion, for the freedom from high heeled boots and tight clothing has left their step light, supple and strong. Their dress is of the simplest form; a short tunic or robe not unlike a skirt falling to below the knees and a shoulder covering not unlike a shawl,—both of pure white and adorned with pretty native lace. They are gracefully worn, and bewitchingly serve to half reveal and half conceal the form beneath. In the midday siesta they are fond of lying languidly in their hammocks, sipping their mate and singing in their low, sweet voices, yet sad and with a touch of melancholy, the "narancaros," or songs of the orange gatherers, or those other strange, weird songs of theirs whose words are all of love. Indeed, what need to do ought else in a land so blessed as theirs?

Living entirely upon fruits and vegetables that are secured with but little effort, unmoved by the ambitious schemes of the money making Europeans, upon whom they look with questioning wonder, and possessed of languid, voluptuous natures that are fostered by the climate, what else should they do save love, and dance, and sing? Dancing is their only pastime, and into that they throw the whole spirit of their joyous nature. The slightest excuse is all that is necessary for getting up a ball, at which the whole neighborhood at once assembles.

The girls and women are dressed only in the robes described. The men wear white linen trousers and red ponchos. The dances are in quaint, original figures, but nearly always very graceful. Sometimes the festivities will be kept up through the entire night, after which the participants will gayly return to their occupations, of whatsoever nature, always contented, always happy. Sometimes there will be a grand contribution picnic at some distant point, where the dancing will be kept up the round of a whole twenty-four hours. For truly these people live but to be happy through the livelong day.

After reading this one is not surprised to hear that many visiting Europeans, Englishmen among the rest, have settled down, in the country. "Who would not rather become a lotus eater among the lotus eaters and settle down upon the sunny hillside or shady river banks, amid fragrant and fruitful orange groves, to forget a regretted past and live only in the happy present, waited upon by the simple, white robed Indian woman—devoted, affectionate and surpassingly fair?'

A Shark's Dinner.

We had been fishing for sea bass in Great Egg harbor, and had hauled in our lines to eat luncheon, when, glancing over the port-quarter of the yacht, I encountered the eyes of a shark. His snout and head were there, of course, but I scarcely saw anything but the eyes. The water was as clear as glass, and he was not more than two feet above the surface. Such eyes! They hadn't the fire of a serpent's nor the glassy green of a mad dog's, but there was something so devilish in the way he stared at me—something so murderous and malignant—that I yelled right out and was made the butt of ridicule. One and all, except the sailor in charge of the boat, vigorously denied that I had seen a shark. When he was appealed to he soberly replied:

"I cannot say, but I know that man-eaters come in here."

We had with us a young man from Western Pennsylvania, a tall raw-boned, demonstrative chap, whose clatter no one could keep still when we had our lines out. When we had finished luncheon he uttered another sneer at my pale face, pulled off his coat and gaiters, and standing up on the rail he crowed like a cock and shouted:

"I'm going to give that shark a chance to get a good dinner!"

With that he sprang overboard and swam off about 50 feet. There was only a ruffle of a sea on, and he was a swimmer who would have thought nothing of a mile pull. The boatman shouted to him to come back, but the others laughed and the swimmer laughed with them. I was standing up in the cockpit, looking over and beyond the man, when I saw a black object riding on the surface. It looked to me like a small duck, and I was wondering how it moved so swiftly, when it suddenly disappeared. Five seconds later the swimmer heaved himself up breast high, flung his arms over his head and uttered a scream which yet rings in my ears. Then he disappeared, and the awful silence among us was broken by the voice of the boatman saying:

"He has been pulled down by a man-eater!"

The object I had seen flitting on the surface was the dorsal fin of a shark. There was the shriek—a splash—a swirl—and nothing more. The shark had his dinner.

Fighting Trusts.

The Telegram of N. Y. City published a few days ago some of the details of a move which had been originated by the wholesale grocers for the purpose of regulating the trade in sugars and other food products. It was not then thought that the retail dealers would to any great extent join in the combination, but now they are moving in the matter. Already the association has more than 2.0 names upon its membership roll. This includes more than half of the large wholesalers and not a few of the leading retailers in this city and Brooklyn. The call for the first meeting, held several weeks ago, was signed by sixty-three prominent firms. Many retailers feel that their business interests will be greatly retarded if they do not go in with the wholesalers.

The retailers have not as yet fully decided upon their program of action, but they have appointed a committee of five of their members to ascertain what is best to be done. It is expected that this committee will visit the managers of this newly organized wholesale grocery association and enter into negotiation for the protection of mutual interests. There is some talk in certain quarters of appealing to the State Legislature for the enactment of more stringent laws for the regulation of trusts and combinations. Mr. Roger A. Pryor, who was recently appointed assistant counsel to the Attorney General of the State for the prosecution of trusts, is preparing to take a test case into court, but he declined to say at present which of the combinations will be first attacked. It is conjectured that he will pay special attention to the so-called Sugar-Trust. Mr. Pryor thinks the existing law of the State is enough for all purposes.

"In Three Days."

BY L. A. MORRISON.

Jesus found in the Temple those that sold oxen and sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting, and he drove them all out, saying:—Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise. The Jews answered, what sign showest thou, seeing thou doest these things? Jesus said, destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up. John II. 14 to 21.

I thank Thee for this "Three Day" sign,
Thou "Son of Joseph," 'tis to me
A proof thou art the Man divine—
Whose glorious heritage 'twill be
To ransom and recover mine.
And set the sin-thrall'd nations free.

No baneful lust for sordid gain
May rule Thy Courts, or blind Thy Ways;
Thy Temples ever shall remain
Till Time is done, and Earth decays—
Free as Thy love, to all, who fain
Would thither bring their willing praise.

Free, in Thee, the promised hope
—The Spirit's "Law of Life" brings in—
That lifts the sin-bound human up
To Eden's measure and doth win
For man the power, with wrong to cope,
And foil the "Law of Death and Sin."

I know, from this, Thou hast the power
To thrill my resurrected dust,
And breathe—anew—the Spirit's dower
Of life, in all, who on Thee trust:
Thou earnest thither for this hour,
And through it, God may still be just.

This "Three-day" sign is proof for all
The promised blessings of thy Word;
A man—who suffered by "The Fall"
Hath here his heritage restored.
Beyond the Cross I hear Thee call
And know Thou art my risen Lord.

"THE ELMS," Toronto.

When My Ship Comes In.

White sandy shore before me lies,
From which swift surges backward slip;
And where blue ocean meets blue skies
In hazy blending shows a ship,—
Pale, indistinct, as barque of dreams,
On gliding, it unmoving seems.

Perchance a fairy craft it is,
With countless treasures in its hold,—
Bright gems and perfumes rare, I wis,
And untold wealth of shining gold.
A ship for which I've waited long,—
Ship writ in tale and sung in song.

A careless child upon the shore,—
A happy child with bared white feet,—
Pursues the waves and, through their roar,
Sings gladly near this couplet sweet:
"Life's grandest promise will begin
Fulfillment when my ship comes in."

The dim white sail glides slowly by,
Far, far next line of sky and sea,
Until it fades before my eye;
Yet, somewhere, know I that to me
A ship is sailing, bringing all
Of joy or pain that shall befall.

A phantom barque, with sails like wings,
It drifts along the tide of time,
And marvelling what fate it brings,
I listen to the happy rhyme:
"Life's grandest promise will begin
Fulfillment when my ship comes in."

Shadows at the Door.

In my childhood, I remember
How, one day in bleak December,
We bore Baby Nell
Past the tolling bell;
Leaving it, a sad tongue, sighing;
"Love and Hope and Youth are dying!"
Wintry blasts kept on replying,
As the pre cher
Read from Scripture,
Saying, "It is well!"

Ah! he could not feel the pressure our hearts bore,—
Saw no tiny shadow nestling at our door.

In the churchyard, gathered slowly,
Household tab ets, white and lowly,
Shone throughout the day—
Pure in sunset lay—
Till the unknown land seemed nearer,
Ever drawing our souls nearer,
Vanished voices sang the clearer
Through our narrowed way.
Many shadows waited for us now before
The dear, lowly lintel of our farmhouse door.

One gaunt shadow haunted ever,
Mocking every day's endeavor;
Dismal shade of life!
Curse and crown of strife!
Eared its fierce clutch from us never,
Bringing gleefully fat curses,
Stark in gayly-liveried hearses,—
Every curse threatening worse,
Cutting like a knife.—
Poverty, lean-featured, wolfish, howled before
The warm threshold of our homely homestead door.

Harry—brave and handsome brother—
Came one day and kissed our mother,
Eager for the fray,
War's fierce holiday!
Her face hushed our noisy sorrow
As we watched him, on the morrow,
Join the soldier crowd;
Heard his voice so loud:
"Coming, star-decked, home come day,
Just to make you proud!"
And he came—another way.
O, the army-red!
Union Jack a shred,
Could ye not have spared that shroud?
For clean soil enshrines his body evermore,
But his shadow lingers constant at our door.

Then one voice forgot its singing;
From the past loved tones were ringing
Silver trumpets clear
Sweetly drew her near,
Wooing her towards that twilight.
Day by day she faded white,
Passing, painless, from our home-light,
Love usurping fear!
All our ways grew chiller, gentler than before,
When she joined that group of shadows at our door.

Stealthy shadows, guilt engendered,
We e upon our home-life rendered,
Shades she flesh within;
Yet our souls were kin;
And their hands in firm clasp keeping,
Oft we washed with bitter weeping,—
Anxious guard kept e'en in sleeping.
But Death's mist crossed our tryist,
Veiling all the mighty anguish our hearts bore,
Leaving us still sadder shadows at the door.

All are resting with a headstone.
While I linger near the hearthstone
Dear-faced shadows come
To the olden home,
Peopling solitude—else dreary—
Making all my work less weary;
Showing life in phases cheery,
Which I seize
To appease
My mute longings for the past which comes no more,
Save in shadows from the portal of Life's door.

Simply a Matter of Business.

The statement that the Krupps are buying lands in Ekatorinoslaff, Russia, for the purpose of establishing a factory there in which to manufacture guns for the Czar's Government, may strike some Germans as indicating a want of patriotism. In reality it is simply a matter of business, precisely like that which now leads the great cannon makers to supply their guns to any nation willing to buy them at their price. It has become a custom for nations which propose to give large foreign contracts for either ships or guns to insist on having a branch establishment of the contractors established within their own domains. Thus the Armstrongs long ago established themselves elsewhere than at Elswick, and in like manner the Tyne firm of Hawthorn, Leslie & Co. are now engaged by Italy to establish a branch at Naples for the manufacture of the engines and boilers which they are to supply to Italian war vessels. So, too, Spain has arranged with the Barrow Company to build three new cruisers at Bilbao. Questions both of local pride and of the employment of home labour influence these matters. Doubtless the Krupp guns for Russia would be the same whether constructed at Essen or Ekaterinoslaff.

The Moon's Influence

Upon the weather is accepted by some as real, by others it is disputed. The moon never accracts corns from the tender, aching spot. Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor removes the most painful corns in three days. This great remedy makes no sore spots, doesn't go fooling around a man's foot, but gets to business at once, and effects a cure. Don't be imposed upon by substitutes and imitations. Get "Putnam's," and no other.

Discussion of Mrs. Mona Caird's recent proposition that marriage is a failure has brought out opinions from both Zola and Dumas. The latter says: "Marriage been an act which absolutely depends on the will of individual persons, let those who wanting get married do so, and let those who do not care for marriage abstain from it." Zola speaks at greater length: "So far as French is concerned I think that marriage is like the Church—an old and faulty institution. It will have to go on until something better be found to replace it. The "collage" system, as we call it in France, may be every bit as good as matrimony, provided the parties agree. There are cases of French couples who have carried on "collage" for thirty years, and have been as united as if in the bonds of wedlock. It all depends on the people themselves. But in any case marriage, as at present constituted in France, is a failure and a grievance. So, too, is everything in our modern society. We are all going to universal rottenness."

Cousumption Curable.

Since the fact that consumption is both preventable, and in its earliest stage curable, it has lost much of its terror. If the first symptoms are at once recognized, and the proper remedy applied, very few, if any one, need die of consumption, which is really lung scrofula. Like many other diseases this formidable one grows out of impure blood, and this, in turn, from a diseased liver. Hence, we have the hacking cough, the pains in chest, the inflamed lungs, and all the symptoms of hastening consumption, all the result of depraved blood and a diseased liver. The use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will arrest all such symptoms, restore the liver to healthy action, and send streams of pure blood into every organ. Of druggists.

Her Fault.

If she is made miserable by day and sleepless at night, by nervous headache, pains in the back, easily grieved, vexed or made tired, or is suffering from any of those wasting functional disorders peculiar to women, such as prolapsus, ulceration, leucorrhea, morning sickness, or weakness of the stomach, &c., a brief self-treatment with Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will convince her of the folly of enduring misery that can be so easily, pleasantly and radically cured. MRS. DART'S TRIPLETS.

President Cleveland's Prize for the three best babies at the Aurora County Fair, in 1887, was given to these triplets, Mollie, Ida and Ray, children of Mrs. A. K. Dart, Hamburgh, N. Y. She writes: "Last August the little ones became very sick, and as I could get no other food that would agree with them, I commenced the use of Lactated Food. It helped them immediately, and they were soon as well as ever, and I consider it very largely due to the Food that they are now so well."

MORMON MARRIAGE.

POLYGAMY AS A PART OF THE SAINTS' REVEALED RELIGION.

A Third Wife to Take Down the Airs of the Second—The Married Mormon Always in Society Looking for Another Partner.

Mormon plural marriage is both overrated and underrated as a part of the Mormon polity. It is overrated as the whole of the system, and without which it will dissolve or will be unobjectionable. It is underrated as a practice not essentially belonging to their system, and which they will easily abandon. In the first place, if polygamy were to cease, all the objections would remain to the Mormon system as a theocratic dominion of absolute powers, hostile to all other people, and by its very nature in antagonism to the national government. In the second place, plurality of wives has been given to the saints by revelation through the prophet and founder of their church, corroborated by the Jewish Scriptures, exemplified by the patriarchs of the chosen race, whose daily walk was close with God, made a Mormon duty by giving a higher being in heaven to the saint and his wives in proportion to their number, elevated by the suffering of persecution, and strongly worked into the social life.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD.

If they would give up polygamy, all objections to a Mormon state would remain. But they will not give it up. It is so much a part of their revealed religion that the first wife cannot refuse consent to another without renouncing the church. The system makes her give the second and the following to her husband in the secret rites of the Endowment house. And she finds it good to bring in a third to take down the airs of the second, and so on. Having had her turn in the man's love, she takes her turn in intrigue of spite and revenge. And the man, obliged by religious duty, watched over by the church authorities in case he can support another wife and does not gather her, and promised a higher being in the next world, where his wives are counted to his glory, finds also more social pleasures in plurality of wives in this world than is generally thought.

The common Gentile idea of the state of polygamous marriage is of the Bible patriarchs, and it is elevated above the social part. It thinks not of the difference between the monogamous marriage, by which the man "settles down," and the polygamous marriage in which the man still continues a marrying man—is more in the market than a single man, and is soon looking for new loves, instead of patriarchally presiding over his household. Thus it is that the married Mormon is a society buck, and that he continues a buck in society as long as he lives. The society customs are formed to promote this. The theater and the "Social hall" for balls and other parties, are regular means. Dancing is a means of polygamous grace. Etiquette requires the saint to dance once with each wife, and then he is free to go for the maidens, leaving the wives to beflower the wall.

ALWAYS A MARRYING MAN.

It is difficult to conceive the social difference made by a system in which the married man continues a marrying man and is always on the lookout for another. Without any compunction he goes about as a gallant or lover. He runs a courtship to any length and heat, while his wives are "enjoying themselves" at home. This liberty has evolved the custom of long courtships. How pleasant to the wives when the man dresses in his best and goes abroad seeking to devour. They cannot ask him where he has spent the evening. He is doing a saint's religious duty, and is thereby exalting their state of being in the next world. And the good man makes religious duty a carnal pleasure. This works a great deal of courting and many marrying chances to the girls. The old bucks and the young bachelors compete for them. And they accept the situation with alacrity, each thinking she will be the favorite wife and enjoying her triumph over the rest.

This is of polygamy at Salt Lake City, and among the rich and well to do. But it has all degrees and phases according to human conditions and human nature, down to that in which the taking of another wife is the addition of another servant to support the man. Nor is this limited to the poor. Naturally it hardens the heart of the man toward his wives, makes him insensible to their feelings, and puts them into a lower sphere. But besides being made a religious duty, it engages the pride, pleasure, passion and interest of the man. And they have no doubt of its righteousness. In conversation with one of the pioneers on their religion, the remark that polygamy did not seem essential, and that the dropping of it might promote peace and their welfare, brought the impregnable answer: "Do you believe the Bible?" They are a fearfully biblical people. Mormonism is a bigger problem than is thought. It has come to stay.—Samuel Rockwell Reed in Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

THE OLD MILL.

There's a tumble-down mill on the edge of the wood,
Where the brook madly leaps to the valley below;
The barberries grow where the miller's house stood,
And close to the doorstep the wild roses blow.

Long, long years ago, when my fancy was young,
I stood by the mill wheel and watched it go round:
I heard the strange song that the foaming flume sung—
The song of the brook that was oceanward bound

How dearly I longed that I too might be free
From the tasks of the schoolboy, the duties of home,
And sing my way to the beautiful sea,
With nothing to do but to sing and to roam!

Ah, little I knew of the ships and the mill—
The tasks of the waters that oceanward flow!
My life was the brook life far back in the hills,
And boyhood's bright visions were all I could know.

And now I've returned to the scenes that I loved,—
The tumble-down mill and the rock-fretted brook;
Oh, that the swift stream of my life had not moved,
Save over the mill-wheel, as backward I look!

I longed to be free, now I long to be bound,—
The river would fain be a brook on the hill,
Oh, could I exchange for the ocean's deep sound
The creak of the wheel in the tumble down mill!

A CHILD'S FANCY.

In the heavens rolled the thunder,
Nearer now, then far away;
Little Edna heard in wonder,
Left her blocks, and ceased her play.

Faded soon the look distressed,
Thoughtful grew the little face,
Cheek on dimpled hand was pressed,
With unconscious, child-like grace.

. . . . . .

While I uttured words consoling,
This is what the midget said:
"God, I fink, it's just a rollin',
Out each ang I's trundel-bed!'

Superstitious people of Keokuk, Iowa, were almost scared to death by a whistling buoy, which was placed in the river by the Government. They thought it was a ghost.

An elastic hat has been invented. It will be a great thing for the man who has been out all night and finds in the morning that his head cannot accommodate itself to the ordinary hat.

Martin Luther wrote:—"Music governs the world. It makes men better and softens their manners. Music is the true consoler of the afflicted; it refreshes the soul and restores it to happiness."

The richest and most influential Chinaman in Chicago is Hip Lung, the Mayor of the Celestial colony there and the laundry king of the city. He is a little man physically. His fortune amounts to $200,000.

As delicate a charity as I remember was the act of a gruff, taciturn old physician in a Colorado mining town. A poor, aged parson was carefully attended by the irritable doctor. When the preacher had sufficiently recovered to dispense with futher medical attention he asked for his bill. "Your bill? Here it is," said the doctor, opening his pocketbook and handing the minister's wife a ten dollar bill'.

"How I wish I was a boy!" There are girls who frequently utter this desire, and some of them are not to blame for it. A vigorous girl, with a healthy taste for active play, may have a mother who likes to see her dressed in clothes without a wrinkle, her hair in perfect order, her shoes brilliant and spotless. One of two things must happen: The girl or the mother must be unhappy.

He said the rooms are large an' airy, perfect steam heat, appurtenances fust class and the locality desirable in ev'ry way. O-d Mr. Bentley (half regretfully)—Well, now, Josiah, I'm a'most sorry we give it up.

THE MAKING OF TIME TABLES

One of the Most Difficult Branches of the Railroad Business.

A railroad time-table governing the running of trains on any road of considerable length is one of the most important things in the management. The preparation of such a table is a very ingenious as well as critical bit of work. The means employed are of the simplest sort—common pins and spools of colored threads, in connection with a large drawing paper mounted on an easel. This paper is called a time chart.

The chart is ruled either for two, five or ten minutes' time by horizontal lines or perpendicular cross lines. The "time" is marked above the horizontal lines, and the distances or stations and terminals down the first perpendicular line. For illustration, 12 midnight is the mark on the first horizontal line and each hour is marked until the twenty fourth or the following midnights hour is reached on the last horizontal line.

Between the hour lines the space is divided into minutes and graduated as fine as desired. On a two minute chart the space between the hours is divided into ten minutes time, and the ten minutes' time into two minutes' time. The hour lines are made heavy and the lesser time lines are of a lighter shade to distinguish them.

One terminus of the road is marked on the first line beside the first time mark 12 midnight. The other stations follow down the perpendicular line until the other terminal is reached. Then all is ready to prepare for the running arrangement, providing the pins and thread are ready.

A blue thread means a passenger train, a red thread a freight train, and if the trains of other roads use part of the track they are designated by a different colored thread.

It is calculated that the running time shall be, say twenty-five miles an hour, and for the purpose of illustration, the tracing of one passenger train will answer the purpose of explaining them all.

A passenger train leaves the first station say at 8 A.M. A pin is placed on the horizontal line at 8 A.M., time mark and the end of the blue thread fastened thereto.

If the train runs without stopping for fifty miles the blue thread is stretched over opposite the station at which the stop is made, and directly under the 10 A.M. time mark another pin is stuck and the blue wrapper about it to keep it taut.

If this is a stop say of forty minutes the blue thread is stretched to the 10:40 A. M mark in a direct line with the same station and another pin stuck and blue thread wrapped.

The train starts and its entire course is thus timed and distributed along the road.

If the railroad has many passengers and freight trains running daily the time chart, when it is completed, looks like a great spider's web stretched with pins. But little work remains to transfer the time and stations to the time table and the schedule is ready for the printer.

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXIV.—THE BALANCE QUIVERS

March, April, May passed away: anemones and asphodels came and went; narcissus and globe-flower bloomed and withered; and Warren Relf, cruising about in the Mud Turtle round the peacock-blue bays and indentations of the Genoese Riviera, had spent many cloudless days in quiet happiness at the pretty little villa among the clambering olive terraces on the slopes at San Remo. Elsie had learnt at least to tolerate his presence now: she no longer blushed a vivid crimson when she saw him coming up the zig-zag roadway; she wasn't much more awkward before him, in fact, than with other creatures of his sex in general; nay, more, as a mere friend she rather liked and enjoyed his society than otherwise. Not to have liked Warren Relf, indeed would have been quite unpardonable. The Relfs had all shown her so much kindness, and Warren himself had been so chivalrously courteous, that even a heart of stone might surely have melted somewhat towards the manly young painter. And Elsie's heart, in spite of Hugh's unkindness, was by no means stony. She found Warren, in his rough sailor clothes, always gentle, always unobtrusive, always thoughtful, always considerate; and as Elie's brother, she got on with him quite as comfortably in the long run as could be expected of anybody under such trying circumstances.

At first, to be sure, she couldn't be induced to board the deck of the busy little Mud Turtle. But as May came round with its warm Italian sunshine, Elie so absolutely insisted on her taking a trip with them along that enchanted coast towards Monaco and Villefranche, beneath the ramping crags of the Tete du Chien, that Elsie at last gave way in silence, and accompanied them round the bays and headlands and roadsteads of the Rivera on more than one delightful outing. Elie was beginning, by her simple domestic faith in her brother's profound artistic powers, to inspire Elsie, too, with a new sort of interest in Warren's future. It began to dawn upon her slowly, in a dim chaotic fashion, that Warren had really a most unusual love for the byways of nature, and a singular faculty for reading and interpreting with loving skill her hidden hieroglyphics. "My dear," Elie said to her once, as they sat on the deck and watched Warren labouring with ceaseless care at the minute growth of a spreading stain on a bare wall of seaward rock, "he shall succeed—he must succeed! I mean to make him. He shall be hung. A man who can turn out work like that must secure in the end his recognition."

"I don't want recognition," Warren answered slowly, putting a few more lingering microscopic touches to the wee curved frondlets of the creeping lichen. "I do it because I like to do it. The work itself is its own reward If only I could earn enough to save you and the dear old Mater from having to toil and moil like a pair of galley-slaves, Elie, I should be amply satisfied, and more than satisfied.—I confess I should like to do that, of course. In art, as elsewhere, the labourer is worthy of his hire, no doubt: he would prefer to earn his own bread and butter. It's hard to work and work and work, and get scarcely any sale after all for one's pictures."

"It'll come in time," Elie answered, nodding sagaciously. "People will find out they're compelled at last to recognize your genius. And that's the best success of all, in the longrun—the success that comes without one's ever seeking it. The men who aim at succeeding, succeed for a day. The men who work at their art for their art's sake and leave success to mind its own business, are the men who finally live for ever."

"It doesn't do them much good, though, I'm afraid," Warren answered, with a sigh, hardly looking up from his fragments of orange brown vegetation. "They seldom live to see their final triumph.

For praise is his who builds for his own age;
But he that builds for time, must look to time for wage".

As he said it, he glanced aside nervously at Elsie. What a slip of the tongue! Without remembering for a moment whom he was quoting, he had quoted with thoughtless ease a familiar couplet from the "Echoes from Callimachus."

Elsie's face showed no passing sign of recognition, however. Perhaps she had never read the lines he was thinking of; perhaps, if she had, she had quite forgotten them. At anyrate, she only murmured reflectively to Elie: "I think, with you, Mr. Relf must succeed in the end. But how soon, it would be difficult to say. He'll have to educate his public, to begin with, up to his own level. When I first saw his work, I could see very little to praise in it. Now, every day, I see more and more. It's like all good work; it gains upon you as you study it closely."

Warren turned round to her with a face like a girl's. "Thank you;" he said gently, and said no more. But she could see that her praise had moved him to the core. For two or three minutes he left off painting; he only fumbled with a dry brush at the outline of the lichens, and pretended to be making invisible improvements in the petty details of his delicate foreground. She observed that his hand was trembling too much to continue work. After a short pause he laid down his palette and colors. "I shall leave off now," he said, "till the sun gets lower; it's too hot just at present to paint properly."

Elsie pitied the poor young man from the bottom of her heart. She was really afraid he was falling in love with her. And if only he knew how hopeless that would be! She had a heart once; and Hugh had broken it.

That evening, in the sacred recess of Elsie's room, Elie and Elsie talked things over together in girlish confidence. The summer was coming on space now. What was Elsie to do when the Relfs returned, as they must return, to England?

She could never go back. That was a fixed point, round which as pivot the rest of the question revolved vaguely. She could never expose herself to the bare chance of meeting Hugh and—and Mrs. Massinger. She didn't say so, of course; no need to say it; she was far too profoundly wounded for that. But Edie and she both took it for granted in perfect silence. They understood one another, and wanted no language to communicate their feelings.

Suddenly, Elie had a bright idea: why not go to St Martin de Lantosque?

"Where's St Martin de Lantosque?" Elsie asked languidly. Her own future was not a subject that aroused in her mind any profound or enthusiastic interest.

"St Martin de Lantosque, my dear," Edie answered with her brisker, more matter-of-fact manner, "is a sort of patent safety valve or overflow cistern for the surplus material of the Nice season. As soon as the summer grows unendurably hot on the Promenade des Anglais, the population of the "pensions" and hotels on the sea front manifest a mutually repulsive influence—like the particles of a gas, according to that prodigiously learned book you teach the girls elementary physics out of. The heat, in fact, acts expansively; it drives them forcibly apart in all directions—some to England, some to St. Petersburg, some to America, and some to the Italian lakes or the Bernese Oberland. Well, that's what becomes of most of them; they melt away into different atmospheres. But a few visitors—the people with families who make Nice their real home, not the mere sun-worshippers who want to loll on the chairs on the Quai Massena or in the Jardin Public, retire for the summer only just as far as St. Martin de Lantosque. It's a jolly little place, right up among the mountains, thirty miles or so behind Nice, as beautiful as a butterfly, and as cool as a cucumber, and supplied with all the necessaries of life, from afternoon tea to a consular chaplain. It's surrounded by the eternal snows, if you like them eternal; and well situated for penny ices, if you prefer your glaciers in that mitigated condition. And if you went there, you might manage to combine business with pleasure, you see, by giving lessons to the miserable remnant of the Nice season. Lots of the families must have little girls: lots of the little girls must be pining for instruction: lots of the mammas must be eager to find suitable companionship! and a Girton graduate's the very person to supply them all with just what they want in the finest perfection. We'll look the matter up, Elsie. I spy an opening."

"Will your brother come here next winter, Edie?"

"I know no just cause or impediment why he shouldn't, my dear. He usually does one winter with another. It's a way he has, to follow his family. He takes his pleasure out in the exercise of the domestic affections.—But why do you ask me?"

"Because"—Elsie hesitated for a moment "I think—if he does—I oughtn't to stay here."

"Nonsense, my dear," Edie answered promptly. It was the best way to treat Elsie. "You needn't be afraid. I know what you mean. But don't distress yourself: men's hearts will stand a fearful deal of breaking. It doesn't hurt them. They're coarse earthenware to our egg-shell porcelain. He must just pine away with unrequited affection in his own way as long as he likes. Never mind him. It'll do him good. It's yourself and ourselves you've got to think of. He's quite happy as long as he's allowed to paint his own unsaleable pictures in peace and quietness."

"I wish he could sell them," Edie went on reflectively. "I really do. It's a shame a man who can paint so beautifully and so poetically as he does should have to wait so long and patiently for his recognition. He strikes too high a note: that's what's the matter. And yet I wouldn't like to see him try any lower one. I didn't understand him at first, myself; and I'm sure I find as much in nature as most people.—But you want to have looked at things for some time together, through his pair of spectacles, before you can catch them exactly as he does. The eye that sees is half the vision."

"My dear," Edie answered in her cheery way, "we'll make him succeed. We'll push him and pull him. He'll never do it if he's left to his own devices, I'm sure. He's too utterly wrapped up in his work itself to think much of the reception the mere vulgar picture-buying world accords it. The clink of the guinea never distracts his ear from higher music. But I'am a practical person, thank heaven—a woman of affairs—and I mean to advertise him. They ought to hang him, and he shall be hung. I'm going to see to it. I shall get Mr. Hatherley to crack him up—Mr. Hatherley has such a lot of influence, you know, with the newspapers. Let's roll the log with cheerful persistence. We shall float him yet; you see if we don't. He shall be Warren Relf, R.A., with a tail to his name, before you and I have done launching him."

"I hope so," Elsie murmured with a quiet sigh.

If Warren Relf could have heard that conversation, he might have plucked up heart of grace indeed for the future. When a woman begins to feel a living interest in a man's career, there's hope for him yet in that woman affections. Though, to be sure, Elsie herself would have been shocked to believe it. She cherished her sorrow still in her heart of hearts as her dearest chattel, her most sacred possession. She brought incense and tears to it daily with pious awe. Woman-like, she loved to take it out of its shrine and cry over it each night in her own room alone, as a religious exercise. She was faithful to the Hugh that had never been, though the Hugh that really was had proved so utterly bare and unworthy of her. For that first Hugh's sake, she would never love any other man. She could only feel for Warren Relf the merest sisterly interest and grateful friendship.

However, we must be practical, come what may; we must eat and drink though our hearts ache, So it was arranged at last that Elsie should retire for the summer to the cool shades of St. Martin de Lantosque; while the Relfs returned to their tiny house at 128 Bletchingley Road, London, W. A few pupils were even secured by hook and by crook for the off-season, and a home provided for Elsie with an American family, in search of culture in the cheapest market, who had hired a villa in the patent safety-valve, to avoid the ever unpleasant necessity for returning to the land of their birth, across the stormy millpond, for the hot summer. The day before the Relf's took their departure from San Remo, Elsie had a few words alone with Warren in the pretty garden of the Villa Rossa. There was one thing she wanted to ask him particularly—a special favour, yet a very delicate one. "Shall you be down about the coast of Suffolk much this year?" she asked timidly. And Warren gathered at once what she meant. "Yes," he answered in almost as hesitating a voice as her own, looking down at the prickly pears and green lizards by his feet, and keeping his eyes studiously from meeting hers; "I shall be cruising round, no doubt, at Yarmouth and Whitestrand and Lowestroft and Aldeburgh."

She noticed how ingeniously he had mixed them all up together in a single list, as if none were more interesting to her mind than the other; and she added in an almost inaudible voice: "If you go to Whitestrand, I wish very much you would let me know about poor dear Winifred."

"I will let you know," he answered, with a bound of his heart, proud even to be intrusted with that doubtful commission. "I'll make it my business to go there almost at once.—And I may write and tell you how I find her, mayn't I?"

Elsie drew back, a little frightened at his request. "Edie could tell me, couldn't she? That would save you the trouble," she murmured after a pause, not without some faint undercurrent of conscious hypocrisy.

His face fell. He was disappointed that he might not write to her himself on so neutral a matter. "As you will," he answered with a down-cast look. "Edie shall do it, her."

Elsie's heart was divided within her. She saw her reply had hurt and distressed him. He was such a good fellow, and he would be so pleased to write. But if only he knew how hopeless it was! What folly to encourage him, when nothing on earth could ever come of it! She wished she knew what she ought to do under these trying circumstances. Gratitude would urge her to say Yes, of course; but regard for his own happiness would make her say No with crushing promptitude. It was better he should understand at once, without appeal, that it was quite impossible—a dream of the wildest. She glanced at him shyly and caught his eye; she fancied it was just a trifle dimmed. She was so sorry for him. "Very well, Mr. Relf," she murmured, relenting and taking his hand for a moment to say good-bye. "You can write yourself, if it's not too much trouble."

Warren's heart gave a great jump. "Thank you," he said, wringing her hand, oh, so hard! "You are very kind. Good-bye, Miss Challoner." And he raised his hat and departed all tremulous. He went down that afternoon to the Mud-Turtle in the harbour the happiest man alive in the whole of San Remo.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Husband—(on his way to church)—I'll just skip on ahead, my dear, and get some change. I've nothing less than one dollar, and that's too much to give. Wife (on his overtaking her)—Did you get the bill changed? Husband—Yes. Wife—You will contribute half a dollar, John? Husband—I can't very well now. I happened to meet three or four friends, and I've only got a quarter left.

Home Education.

Children should not be compelled to take to the streets for sport. It should be a part of the household system to afford play, and to do it as surely and systematically as books and food. We have a good deal yet to learn about play. We should have our hours for sport and relaxation when the whole household join in games. As home education increases, and it must increase, these hours will be doubly necessary. I would not allow a child to study or read over an hour consecutively. Then let him play and exercise his body one hour. At what age should we cease to play? If fools, we may stop early in life. Only wise people never cease to love and enjoy games.

But the play room is not all. This is the age of manual culture. the grandest of innovations has occurred. Hereafter education will mean the culture of the whole body—handcraft as well as headcraft. It follows that each house that is intended for a home should have its provision for the education of the hand—a workshop, a tool room for every member of the family to find his chosen occupation. If necessary, a separate building should adjoin the house. Where there are five children there may be five separate occupations chosen. One of mine prefers carpenters' tools and engineering, another printers', and a third cares mainly for horticulture.

OUR SCHOOL SYSTEM FAULTY.

I am now advocating such household appurtenances purely on the score of health. Our school system is a blunder. No child should study from 9 till 12; and especially in rooms where they must sit. A child at study should, much of his time, be on his feet, or reclining if he chooses, and changing about. When you add the books taken home for evening study, you have shown up your common method, whereby, to perfection, we destroy the health, vigor, beauty and character of our children. Every one is damaged, and the majority are spoiled. I insist upon play as a duty, as a part of life, as in fact itself a part of study. A teacher of play would be far more sensible than the piano at $2 to $4 a lesson.

How about dancing? As a matter of health it is generally of no advantage whatever. It is no sooner acquired than night is turned into day, and then the play is disastrous I have watched this matter from a physician's standpoint, and object totally to three or four hours and especially to six or eight, devoted to hilarious dancing, and those hours the ones that nature devotes to sleep. There is another point I cannot overlook. It is the close contact of bodies in round dances—a contact unwholesome purely from a physical point of view The moral effect others may discuss, but I object to any delicate person being borne so closely into the atmosphere of grosser, coarser ones. The physical effect is not likely to be understood, but it is seriously evil. I do not, therefore, care for dancing, unless conducted as a part of home sport, as it is not likely to be.

A GOOD MORAL ATMOSPHERE.

It is, however, folly to talk of a healthy home that is not charged with a good moral atmosphere. I assure you the moral atmosphere is as real and tangible and efficient as the physical; and those who refuse or neglect to consider it will suffer accordingly. It is impossible for us to have about us, in close intimacy, those of gross temperament and physical sensuality, and not feel the effect on our bodies as well as on our minds. This holds good, of course, of our relation to ourselves. If we do not sustain a spirit of self-control and manly inspiration in our souls, our bodies are diseased as a consequence. One-half of all disease is the result of unsanitary mental conditions. Uniform honor, good faith, manhood, temperate desire, kindliness, will have a powerful effect in sustaining vigorous physical health.

I have a brother physician who insists that if all people would keep in the best of humor for one hour before eating, during meals and for one hour after, they would never be trouble with any disorders of digestion, or with headaches. He is a trifle crochety, but he is not far from right in his valuation of good temper as a foe to dyspepsia. At meal time it is peculiarly important that all should be decorous and kindly. The fashion of haste and fret at our meals is an indication of nervous irritation, and affects digestion directly. But in all other ways a house should be delivered from the destructive influence of immoral or unmoral habits. An habitual scold is not only a disagreeable termagant, but a destroyer of the physical health of her children. The effect on moral character is tallied by the effect on the features of the young. I have supposed some to be more sensitive to moral atmosphere than others, but on larger experience I am satisfied that all are influenced in this way, and to their serious detriment. The art of building a healthy home is dependent upon the art of being ourselves pure hearted and honorable, generous, just and adaptable.—[M. Maurice, M. D., in Globe-Democrat.

How the Dog Got Home.

A story is told of a dog which lived on ship. The vessel was anchored in the harbo of a foreign port. The dog often went ashore with the officers, and being occupied with various doggish amusements, often was left behind when the officers returned in their boat to the ship. The first time this occurred the poor dog knew not what to do when he found the ship's boat gone. He ran up and down the wharf barking and whining.

A boat was lying at the wharf in which a native was sitting. The dog suddenly stopped, jumped into the boat and gave several short barks, as if to say, "I want to go to that ship out there."

The man knew the dog, took in the situation, and doubtless thinking of a fee, he rowed the dog to the ship's side. The man got his fee, for the officers were glad to have their pet returned to them. After that the dog often got back to the ship in the same manner.

The following anecdote is somewhat similar in character, and speaks well for the dog's intelligence.

"You know how much I rush about in hansom cabs," said the narrator, "and Scoti, my collie dog, always goes with me,—we travel many miles in a week together in this way; but on one occasion I was walking and missed him.

"Search was in vain. The crowd was great, traffic drowned the sound of my whistle; and, after waiting awhile and looking elsewhere, I returned to my suburban home without my companion, and sorrowful, yet hoping that he might find his way back.

"In about two hours after my arrival a hansom cab drove up to the door, and out jumped Scoti. The cabman rang for his fare, and thinking he had somehow captured the runaway, I enquired how and where he found him.

"'Oh! sir,' said the cabby, 'I didn't hail him at all. He hailed me. I was standing close by St. James' Church, a-looking out for a fare, when in jumps the dog. 'Like his impudence,' says I. 'So I shouts through the window; but he wouldn't stir So I gets down and tries to pull him out, and shows him my whip; but he sits still and barks as much as to say, 'Go on, old man." As I seizes him by the collar, I reads his name and address.

"'All right, my fine gentleman, says I, I'll drive you where you're a-wanted, I dare say? So I shuts to the door, and my gent'eman settles hisself with his head jes-lookin out, and I drives on till I stops at this here gate, when out jumps my passenger, a-clearing the door, and walks in as calm as though he'd been a reg'lar fare.'"

A five-year-old boy of Auburn, Me., was to spend the afternoon at the house of a young woman who, he heard his mother say, had been married four years. He was advised to take some playthings for fear he would not be contented, and his answer was: "Well, if her husband could stand it to live with her for four years, I guess I can stand it one afternoon."

AGRICULTURAL.

Clean the Horse's Skin.

It is not enough that the groom should merely clean off the dry deposits that remain from the sweating process through which the horse may have gone. This, it is true, removes the apparent foulness, but it is far from meeting the work that comes under the head of "grooming." There is no way in which one can do the horse more real service in the way of keeping him healthy, than by washing his skin with water as hot as the hand will bear. Whether this is done immediately after a drive when the horse is perspiring freely, or when at rest and the skin is perfectly dry, a large blanket should be provided to cover the animal and keep it covered during the process of washing, keeping it on the shoulders while washing the hind quarters, and vice versa.

Provide yourself with a large sponge and a piece of good soap, or, instead of this, an ounce of aqua ammonia. Put this into a quart of water if it be of the highest strength, and into a pint if it be of low grade, and after moistening the hair and skin with the hot water, with a small sponge rub the surface over with the ammonia water, seeing to it that it reaches the skin. Then wash the hide and hair thoroughly, scraping the water out of the hair with a wooden or other scraper having a thin, smooth edge. Rub dry with a woolen cloth and cover with a dry blanket, keeping the horse out of a current of air, if this be cold. Be especially careful if the horse is exhausted by having had a hard drive.

Merely cleaning the dried sweat from the hair of a horse is a small item in the process of thorough grooming and cleaning. It should be remembered that it is the skin, and not the hair that carries on the process of eliminating such secretions as the body requires relief from; that is, such as escape through the pores of the skin. The intestinal tract and the kidneys and bladder present but a limited surface for the elimination of refuse from the body, as compared with the skin, yet, when a horse gets sick how ready men are to say, "give him a physic"—salts or aloes or "give him a diuretic"—nitre or pumpkin seed tea. An ounce of prevention is, as often stated, worth a pound of cure, and if, in conjunction with care in feeding—feeding enough and not too much, and of the right kind—that portion of the duties of the stable that comes under the head of grooming be carried out as here indicated, we would not so frequently as now need the internal agents referred to.

DISINFECTANTS.

A new era in poultry keeping was marked by the introduction of carbolic acid and petroleum. Before this time, lime was the only thing used for disinfecting, but this had to be employed very often to be of any avail, as its effects soon die out; but the addition of crude carbolic acid gives a lasting quality and strength. Crude petroleum is an excellent disinfectant alone; but using it to dilute carbolic acid is the most economical way of utilizing the acid. The mixture may be sprayed about walls, shelves, etc., and the perches may be coated with an old brush. These fluids leave a dark yellow stain on the walls, etc., kerosene leaves but little stain, and for the same purpose it is cleaner. The best way to use it is with a pair of spraying bellows which will send it all over the building in a fine spray, driving it into every corner. When the color is not objectionable a little carbolic acid may be added to make it more effective. No one who has any thing at stake in live poultry, need be told of the benefits of a liberal use of these articles; they drive away disease, lice, and the perch mites, and secure to the fowls an endurable existence.

IMPROVEMENT NEEDED IN HOG FEEDING.

Farmers are slow to learn and often pay dearly for this trait, but I believe the more intelligent among them are learning wiser methods of feeding swine, especially their breeding stock. It is not strange that cholera made pork production so precarious that it has been abandoned in many localities, but the wonder is that the genus has not become extinct. Do you ask why? Because an omnivorous animal which in a state of nature lived principally on coarse, bulky and succulent food, has for generations been reard on corn alone, and the stock grown, especially for breeding, has been stuffed and pampered more than any other. I am familiar with a large number of men who breed large numbers of pigs to be sold for breeding, and, without exception, they fatten the pigs on corn before shipping them. Because one shipper does this, the rest think they must do so or their pigs will not make so nice a show as those of their rivals. A look through the pens at any of our large fairs will show that all the hogs on exhibition are fat enough for the butcher. It is time to "call a halt" in exclusive corn feeding, and fattening of breeding hogs.

UNDER-GROUND MUSHROOM FARM.

A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune has paid a visit to the mushroom farm under the earth near La Salle, Ill., in the Utica Cement Company's abandoned tunnel. According to his account, they are marketing about 800 pounds of mushrooms a week, and expect shortly to increase this to one thousand pounds a day. The price obtained in Summer is 50 cents per pound; in Winter, $2. They are shipped first to Chicago, and thence to New York and all the large cities. These tunnels are said to be 40 acres in extent, 1,000 feet from the face of the cliff, and 200 or 300 feet from the top. The temperature does not vary over half a dozen degrees all the year round, starting about 60° in Summer and 54° in Winter. About 3 car loads of manure a week are used. It is not every locality that affords such a spot for such a purpose, and probably the only other similar place is in the catacombs of Paris. With a constant supply, such as the tunnel affords, a market will be forced, and by and by mushrooms will be asked for as regularly as any other vegetable.

MILKING EWES.

The following is taken from a foreign exchange: "In Iceland the custom is to milk the ewes for six weeks after the lambs are weaned, and it is recorded that 100 well-kept sheep easily realize from twelve to fifteen pounds daily. At Roquefort each ewe is estimated to produce twenty-four pounds of cheese in the year, besides suckling her lamb for two months. The cheese is worth 1s. per pound on an average, and the cost of milking and manufacture comes to only about half of the total sum yielded, so that a profit of 12s is netted from each ewe for her milk alone—not counting what the lamb takes. Though we do not suppose that this practice will ever be resuscitated in this country, it would be interesting to know how our improved breeds would compare with Iceland sheep in the yield of milk, butter and cheese."

The Importance of the Cow.

Were I asked to write upon the pages of history the name of the animal to which the world for her wealth owes the most, the animal which plays the most important part in the commercial industries of our great country, the animal which if blotted out of existence would throw fifty per cent. of the laboring class out of employment, side track one-half our freight trains, in fact the animal which, so to speak, is the king-bolt of commerce, I would take my pen and write high and above all others first, and pre eminently first, the name of the great American cow.

POULTRY NOTES.

Make your hen house warm and light. Have the window in the south.

Use tobacco dust in the nest boxes, and coal oil on the roosts to prevent lice.

Before winter furnish your hen-house with a dust-bath of road-dust, sand or coal ashes.

Give your fowls exercise. Cover the floor with a litter of cut straw or chaff and make them scratch for the grain.

To those who think the chicken business is "small," we commend these figures gathered by the minister of agriculture, in taking the census of the fowls of France: That country contains 45,000,000 hens, worth, on an average, fifty cents apiece. One-fifth of these hens and 2,000,000 roosters are killed annually, and they sell for $5,590,000 in the market. The other 36,000,000 lay about 3,060,000,000 eggs every year, worth 1.15 cent a piece; this sum nets up not less than $36,740,000. Therefore the chickens of France produce $67,200,000 a year.

THE GARDEN.

HOUSE FLOWERS IN WINTER.

Mrs. E B. F., Princeton, Ill., writes O. J. Farmer as follows: I have lately read of a physician who recommended the cultivation of house plants to those of his consumptive patients who lacked strength or means for travel. He did this believing that the exhalation from growing plants so purifies and oxygenizes the air as to arrest the tendency to lung diseases, if taken in time. I do not know how true this is, but it coincides so entirely with my own theory that the presence of plant life in a house promotes the health of the occupants, that I am quite ready to believe it. An instance when a florist's wife regained health by leaving the kitchen to hired help and spending her time in the greenhouse, has come under my own observation. It is now generally admitted by all intelligent observers that an atmosphere where plants cannot flourish, contains some elements of unwholesomeness for human life.

Some of our common annuals make such fine winter flowers, if grown from seed late in summer, that I always feel like saying a word in their favor. They require less heat and less petting than most greenhouse plants. Sweet Alyssum, the single varieties grown from seed, the double from cuttings, bloom profusely. Bronolia, blue and white, will be covered with flowers for many weeks and may be cut back to bloom again. Dwarf nasturtians in every shade of yellow and red, from creamy white to orange and dark crimson, are very desirable window plants. Some may not know how easily the last mentioned are rooted by placing the branches in water. This is the surest way to propagate the different varieties, as some of the choicest do not seed freely. Last September I found to my great chagrin, a beautiful plant of the variety called Empress of India, full of flowers, broken off just above the ground. I wrapped cotton batting around the stem, put it in an earthen quart bowl half filled with water, and it not only kept perfectly fresh and opened the buds already formed but grew and formed new buds. I soon found that it had put out innumerable little white roots which nearly filled the bowl. I was careful to keep it supplied with water and standing where it could get the sun. It was hardly without flowers during the winter and lent brightness and fragrance to many a little bouquet. In early spring I divided it into four parts, potted each and had four fine plants to set in the ground when the time came. I had learned something new, and nasturtians will occupy a prominent place in my collection of house plants in future, both for the advantage in keeping them over and having them ready to bloom early and for their winter blooming qualities.—[Garden and Lawn.

Pot Plants should be carefully looked over, and all that need it should be repotted It is much easier to do it now than after the plants have been taken into the house. Young plants especially that are wanted for winter-blooming should be encouraged by repotting, such as Fuchsias, Roses, Pelargoniums, Begonias, Carnations, Bouvardias, Streptosolen, Coronilla, and many others.

Plants in the ground intended for winter, use, as Roses, Carnations, Bouvardias, etc., should be carefully lifted and potted. They should be put in a shady place for a few days to recover, and carefully watered, but not soddened. Sweet Alyssum and Blue Lobelia, lifted from the border and potted will make good winter blooming plants. If large, they may be sheared off with a pair of scissors.

Some of the bulbs, such as Amaryllis, Nerine, Freesia, Oxalis, Lachenalia, etc., will need looking after. Some will want repotting; but large pots, especially of Amaryllis, Vallota, and Nerine, should be disturbed only at long intervals, as crowding of the bulbs promotes an abundant bloom. They are benefited, however, by a good top dressing. If they have been kept dry they should be regularly watered as soon as growth begins.

Progress of Manitoba.

"I visited Manitoba four years ago," said Prof. Fream, in reply to a question, "and on this my second visit I was very much struck with its progress. I had very little doubt then that agriculture would be successful there, and I have none now. I believe Manitoba and Eastern Assiniboia will prove most important factors in the European wheat market. I am glad to find that in Manitoba mixed farming is making rapid progress. It would be very unfortunate if the farmers of the North-west, by cultivating one crop exclusively, should bring their land down to the state of exhaustion and low yield which is seen in many parts of Minnesota and Dakota. Dairying is a growing industry. I visited a cheese factory at Minnedosa and I learned that there were factories at Birtle, Woolsley and Grenfell."

"What do you think of the country farther west?"

"I believe Alberta is a perfect mine of agricultural wealth. No town in Canada seems to be more happily circumstanced than Calgary. It is beautifully situated on the Bow River and encircled by low hills, and so rich is the surrounding territory in coal and timber that I was told fuel was cheaper in Calgary than anywhere else in the Dominion. The coal crops out on the river bank so that, in some cases, all the settler has to do is to take a pick and dig out enough for his own use.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

Germany's Sensation—Princess Maud—Official Rogues in Greece.

In all the trying and tragic year through which Germany has passed since it was settled that the Crown Prince's malady was fatal, that there has been nothing more sensational than the episode of the surreptitiously-published diary, followed now by Bismarck's demand for the prosecution of the offending magazine. The Chancellor' long-winded expressions of doubt as to the authenticity of the documents have been received with very little respect, for it is known that numerous copies of this diary exist, and nothing would be easier than to compare the publication with one of these undoubted originals. The real motive of the prosecution is supposed to be a desire to learn who gave the diary to the Rundschau, and when this is found out we are likely to have an effort at punishment compared with which the destruction of Count Von Arnim was a mere pleasantry. Bismarck's hostile references to England and the English entourage of the late Kaiser reflects, of course, his well-known hatred of the Empress Victoria, but it is expected also to refer to Duke Earnest of Cobourg-Gotha. Indeed, there is some notion that he is responsible for the publication. The matter has no important international bearings, at least in its present state, but it has violently shaken the German political structure and has reopened sectional questions that have been slumbering for years. Apparently no German editor will dare print further installments of the diary of which rumors already are heard; so they will doubtless appear, if at all, in Belgium or England.

The Prince of Wales has finished his visit to the Crown Prince Rudolph and left Vienna for Pesth. Interesting news now comes that his eldest daughter, Princess Maud, is to marry the Czarevitch of Russia. It is said that during the recent visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales and their daughters with the Czarina and Czarevitch to the Duke of Cumberland at Weidmannsruh the betrothal was arranged. The Czarevitch is a rather delicate young man of about 20, and his reported bride is quite his age. The announcement comes from Austrian papers, but is not verified as yet.

The British Museum authorities have made a rather startling discovery lately and are in a rather awkward position. Some time ago they purchased a magnificent marble bust of the Emperor Hadrian at a very reasonable price. In natural pride they invited a number of distinguished foreigners to view it, and all conceded that it was a priceless treasure of antique art. Among the spectators, however, was a member of the Greek diplomatic service, who instantly declared that he had seen the same bust in the Royal Museum at Athens. He notified his Government, and an investigation has followed, which reveals that not only the bust in question, but a large number of the most valuable specimens, have been stolen. Some high Greek officials are under suspicion, it being evident that the uhefts have been carried on systematically for a considerable time.

Rose Leaves and Wine Screens.

Most persons when they removed fade roses from their vases throw away these passe flowers, despite all the sentiment that poets have thrown around faded flowers, but the queen of flowers is so sweet even in its decay that it deserves more tender handling than to be cast into the trash pile. Let me recommend to my readers when they are going to replenish their vases with fresh flowers that they pick off the leaves of the faded roses and save them. They never lose their fragrance entirely, but will diffuse a sweet perfume long after they have become withered and sere. After they have become seasoned put them in bags of transparent muslin, and lay them in your bureau drawers, or on your wardrobe shelves, and every time you go into these receptacles you will be greeted by a faint, sweet odor, subtile as "a sweet thought in a dream." Fragrance seems to penetrate so entirely into the brain, stirring up the emotions and lifting up the thoughts that I think we do wisely to provide ourselves with as much pure, natural fragrance as possible. When the tired housewife, plying some homely task, is greeted through the open window by a fitful gust of perfume from the white star jessamine, or dainty tea roses in her flower garden, she, for the time, forgets her weariness and is lifted into a fairer, better world. But to return to the subject of faded roses, there is another use which can be made of these leaves. Steep them in vinegar, and keep adding relays of rose leaves till the vinegar becomes well permeated with the fragrance, then strain and bottle it, and you will find it a pleasant rustic cologne water. Speaking of flowers reminds me to say what a graceful and excellent device is a screen of vines for turning away the gaze of the public from the front windows of houses along a public road, or in a village, or in the suburbs of a town. I have seen the plan tried very successfully. The frame should be made a few yards in front of the window, and should be overrun with honeysuckle or any other pretty vines, though, of course, a flowering one is preferable. These screens are highly ornamental as well as useful, and are a real blessing to women living on a public highway where they are exposed to the

A. D. URLIN SKIPS.—HIS BROTHER THE HEAVIEST LOSER.

On Friday last Mr. A. D. Urlin, general merchant, Wallacetown, and Mr. W. G. Urlin, of Dutton doing business as a general merchant under the name and style of Urlin Bros., made an assignment to Sheriff Brown for the benefit of their creditors. A. D. Urlin is also interested in the Dutton business, and when he made an assignment as a consequence the Dutton firm had to do the same. The Wallacetown store, as our readers are aware, was recently totally destroyed by fire, there being some $11,000 insurance upon the stock. It was given out by Mr. A. D. Urlin and his friends before the assignment was made that he would be forced to take that step owing to his creditors pressing him for the payment of his accounts, and not having the patience to wait until he received the full amount of his insurance when he would have sufficient on hand to satisfy all claims and to spare. The assignment was therefore decided upon, it was stated, so as to save legal costs being added. In payment of his insurance Mr. Urlin received $1,485 from the Hartford, which he is said to have turned over to Wood & Leggatt, of Hamilton, in payment of an account, and $2,000 from the Western and $3,000 from the Mercantile. These sums Mr. Urlin, it is said, acknowledged to Mr. Scott, of Hamilton, solicitor for the creditors, that he had received, for, placing his hand over the breast pocket of his coat, where it is supposed his pocket-book was kept, he said to Mr. Scott that there was $5,000 in there, and if his creditors treated him rightly they would get it. The rumors that have been in circulation for the past couple of days that Mr. Urlin had left the country appear to be true. Mr. J. A. Kains, solicitor for Mr. Urlin, was seen by a reporter, and he declined to make known Mr. Urlin's whereabouts. He had received a letter from him since his departure, and was free to state that he had left the Dominion of Canada. Whether he would return or not Mr. Kains did not know. Being informed of the report that Mr. Urlin had $5,000 of insurance money with him he acknowledged that it did not look as if he intended to return, at least for the present. It is generally believed in Wallacetown that Mr. Urlin has gone for good.—Tuesday's Journal.

Through the perfidy of his brother Mr. W. G. Urlin has lost everything. Mr. Urlin has been in charge of the Dutton store since it was started and through his business ability and integrity had worked up a large trade. Living modestly and being attentive to his duties he was enabled to put a portion of his earnings into the business, which, up to the present, had amounted to considerable. Not satisfied with taking this money, his brother has, to a certain extent, ruined his credit. A few days ago Mr. W. G. Urlin was instructed by his brother to go to London to procure some goods, telling him that there was money lying in the bank to pay for them. Mr. Urlin did so and the goods were forwarded. The wholesale firm made a call on the bank but there was nothing there to meet it, thus placing Mr. Urlin in a bad light with the wholesale houses through no fault of his own. THE ENTERPRISE joins with Mr. Urlin's many friends in hoping that matters may be so arranged whereby he may be able to carry on the business which has formerly been conducted by him. A. D. Urlin has joined the Canadian colony of defaulters in the States, and, judging by the amount of boodle taken with him—some say $10,000—ought to become a very influential member of that society.

WEST ELGIN FALL SHOW.

The West Elgin Agricultural Society, held their twenty-eighth fall show on their grounds at Wallacetown on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week. The fair was, as usual, a success, both in exhibit and financially. The entries in horses were numerous and the horses of a crediable class. The exhibit of cattle, sheep and hogs was large and most of the stock well bred and in good condition. On the whole, we believe the stock of the county of Elgin will equal, if not eclipse, that of any county in the province. The exhibit of poultry was good, yet, we think, a little less in number than last year. The show in the root and vegetable building was good, the exhibit in grain, roots and vegatables being large and of an excellent quality—perhaps the best for years, especially the potatoes, which, we think, were the best that have been shown since Mr. R. McKenzie first introduced his many new varieties. We suppose that some of them have developed and proven to be of excellent quality. The exhibit in Agricultural implements was large and of every discription, indeed a farmer could get a full set out. Among the exhibits were a hay fork and slings from the Cochrane factory, St. Thomas, shown by Mr. McArthur, of Dutton; plows by McSherry Bros., sulky plows by Wm. McLandress, of Iona; the Chatham Fanning mill and the Erie Iron Works were represented by A. P. McMillan, who is capable of talking up the good qualities of any article. Mr. McMillan has been a successful agent. John A. Bobier, of Port Talbot, had a good exhibit of plows, harrows and other implements. A Massey steel binder No. 3 was shown by Mr. D. McIntyre & Son, of Lawrence Station. O. Peckham, of Cowal, had on exhibition a buggy which showed the working of his patent gear, although it is very simple and cheap, we presume that it will become popular and much used. Last, but largest, we must make mention of the large exhibit by J. T. & E. S. Sifton, Wallacetown, who had nearly everything that could be found on a farm, and many farms could be found with much less. We are unable to enumerate everything but will mention a few of the leading articles,—carriages and wagons of various kinds, binders, mowers, rakes seeders, cultivators, harrows, plows, hayforks, two or three kinds of churns, pumps and various kinds of scales, from steelyards to platform. One that is most useful to the farmer is a platform scale, with an extension which is placed on for the purpose of weighing stock. By this a farmer can have his stock weighed and when the buyer comes, he understands how to sell the animal, which may pay for the scales in one season.

The ladies' department and horticultural products. In the main building was the fancy work of the ladies, many articles of which were really fancy and artistiacally finished and the work of most of the really useful articles shewed considerable skill; but, as we said of the Iona fair, we do not care to see those few articles that are exhibited year after year. A quantity of milinery and fancy goods was shown by F. J. Lindenman, of West Lorne.

The fruit, though not in such abundance as last year, was a good exhibit, but the space not being near taken, on account of the scarcity of the varieties, there being only a few entries in peaches and some other delicious fruits.

The only exhibit in honey and working bees was made by John L. Pearce. Bees have not done well this year, there being a shortage in the flow of honey.

The Bell Organ was exhibited by J. M. Jackson, of Dutton, who had such music store that nearly everything in the line of music could be got from him.

The arrangement of quilts and spreads were a little out of the old style, which, under the management of Wm. McLandress, were scattered around the building, making a better pisplay and taking away some of the barren appearance that usually existed about the doors.

The usual number of money catchers were on the ground, some legitimate, some illegitimate. We have nothing to say against those who do a legitimate business, but we do think the officials should take care of the fakirs.

There was, we believe, only one accident. While driving in the ring for the ladies' prize Miss Maggie Campbell, Lawrence Station, was thrown out of her buggy when turning the end. Although not much hurt, she might have been killed or seriously injured.

The board of directors may be complimented on their management, and especially the secretary, Mr. Campbell, as we believe nearly half of the work to make the exhibition a success devolves on him.

The total receipts from all sources during the year are as follows:

Sale of tickets	$ 544 06
Large gate receipts	116 83
Concert first evening	11 60
Booths on grounds	30 00
Games on grounds	24 00
New members' fees	131 00
Entrance fee to speed races	30 50
Stall rent	15 50
Ground rent	33 00
Old members' fees	81 00
Advertising in lists	7 50
Government grant	700 00
Total	$1724 99

Although the show at Wallacetown, has been a success by way of visitors in years gone by, we believe that the time has come when it should be moved to Dutton. In this time of railways and great shows, it has become common for farmers to attend exhibitions in cities at a distance. Railway fare is low; admission just the same as county and township shows. People at a little distance, who are not particularly interested, will go to the large shows when the difference in the expense is small. By the time a passenger would pay his fare, say from Ridgetown or St. Thomas, on the train, then 50 or 60 cents bus fare and be denied about two hours in going from Dutton and returning, he would just as soon go to London, when if the show were in Dutton, visitors could have the two hours which are now spent in getting to and from the grounds to spend at the fair, and 50 cents that is spent for transportation would pay for a dinner and admission. For a proof of this we will take Rodney fair for an example. We believe there are fully six times as many visitors go by train to Rodney as go to Wallacetown, and prehaps many more, as we believe nearly half of their attendance is made this way. We estimate there were as many went from Dutton to Rodney last year as came from all stations to Wallacetown this year. Then, again a few years ago the attendance at Wallacetown was estimated at 5,000; thisyear it was estimated at 3,500, We believe the difference is mostly due to the location. Those in opposition to our views may think we are working for Dutton. While our article appears as such, our object is for the benefit of the show. Many are the expressions that are made by the members and others in reference to the location. We have not said much in the past, but the time has come, when we think the fair should be moved.

In order to move it systematically we would suggest that suitable ground be procured here (how, we will leave it for others to say), and that the grounds out there be sold and the proceeds used to put up suitable and respectable buildings. Let proper steps be taken, and that soon, so that the show may be held here next year.

Hammered Her Husband.

Proceedings for divorce have been commenced by James McKay against Sarah McKay. The plaintiff was married to defendant at Glencoe, Dak., Oct. 26, 1883. Shortly after the marriage plaintiff claims that Sarah, disregarding her marriage vows, became possessed of an ungovernable and dangerous temper, and while in that condition would amuse herself by pounding him with hammers, clubs, china dishes or other convenient articles of household use that came handy. August 10 she drove the plaintiff from his home, he retiring, fearing that his life was in danger. He also alleges that he has been beaten by the defendant in a cruel and barbarous manner.—St. Paul Herald.—Mr. McKay is a former resident of Dutton.

A PLAIN STATEMENT.

All poisonous waste, and worn out matter ought to escape from the system through the secretions of the bowels, kidneys and skin. B.B.B. cleanses, opens and regulates these natural outlets for the removal of disease.

When the fool goes to market the huckster gets money.

A GOOD NEIGHBOR.

"Late last fall I was laid up in bed three days with a very severe attack of diarrhœa and vomiting. Nothing benefited me till my neighbor, Mrs. Dunning recommended Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and brought me a half bottle, which she had in her house the vomiting was stopped, and I was able to sit up by night. I would not think of using any other medicine." Columbus Hopkins, Hamilton, Ont

When the goose trusts the fox then woe to her neck.

A TERRIBLE TEN YEARS.

Mrs. Thomas Acres, of Huntly, Ont., suffered all the tortures of liver complaint for ten years. Four bottles of B.B.B. entirely cured her, making her like a new woman again, after other medicines had failed to relieve her.

A single bad habit will mar an otherwise faultless character, as an ink blot soileth the pure white page.

Luxuriant Hair
Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.
Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.
Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."
A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.
The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.
Ayer's Hair Vigor,
Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by Druggists and Perfumers.

Mr. R A Hughes, of Chatham, has been nominated by the Minister of Inland Revenue as Deputy Inspector of weights and measures for Windsor district.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

THE VALUE OF APPLES.

There is scarcely any article of vegetable food more widely useful and more universally liked than the apple, says Prof. Faraday. Let every family in autumn lay in from two to ten or more barrels, and it will be to them a most economical investment in the whole range of culinary supplies. A raw mellow apple is digested in an hour and a half, while boiled cabbage requires five hours. The most healthful dessert that can be placed on the table is a baked apple. If taken freely at breakfast, with coarse bread, and without meat or flesh of any kind, it has an admirable effect on the system, often moving constipation, correcting acidities, and cooling off febrile conditions more effectually than the most approved medicines. If families could be induced to substitute the apple—sound, ripe and luscions—for pies, cakes, candies and other sweetmeats, with which children are so often stuffed there would be a diminution of doctors' bills sufficient to lay up a stock of this delicious fruit for a seasons use.

LIME IN FOOD FOR FOWLS.

It is certain that laying hens must have lime in some form to make eggshells. But it need not be given by itself, as lime in any form will answer. Nearly all kinds of food contain some lime. Clover is very rich in this mineral. Of the grains, peas and wheat excel as food for egg-production, and when these are given the lime itself will not be eaten. With corn, which contains less lime, some of the mineral will need to be given separately.

Early culling and close culling are the two pillars upon which rest, at least to no small degree, the success of the breeder of fine fowls, and the wise breeder will cull his flocks closely, and begin now to do it. "Well begun is half done," says the old adage, and early culling is more than half the battle.

DRAUGHTS ON THE ROOTS.

No matter how warm the weather may be, never allow the hens to roost in a draught of air. Admit all ventilation you may prefer in the summer, and have the poultry house as cool as you can, but let the roost be in some corner, or near the back, out of the way of the draughts. The draughts may come in but not across the hens, as the results will be swelled heads and eyes, especially if the weather is damp. —Mirror and Farmer.

POTATOES RAISED ON A BET.

NEARLY 600 BUSHELS PER ACRE.

Mr. E. S. Carman editor of the Rural New Yorker, conducts an experimental farm in the interest of his paper at River Edge, New Jersey. Here he has grown and tested all manner of farm crops and garden plants, and conducted many experiments in the way of different methods of cultivation. Of recent years he has obtained unusually large yields of potatoes by a method of culture known as the French system, and all of these large crops have been grown on a special plot of land which has been cropped with potatoes every year for the past twelve years. Last year Mr. Carman wagered $100 that he would raise potatoes this season on a part of this special plot of ground at the rate of more than 700 bushels to the acre, let the season be favorable or unfavorable. This was done to show the possibilities of profitable potato culture by the French system, and its superiority over the ordinary method now practised by farmers.

Mr. Wilmer Atkinson, editor of the Farm Journal, of Phildeldhia, accepted the wager for $50, the loser to pay the money to some charity to be named by the judges. The contest plot of land is level and the soil loamy and inclined to clayey, very good, apparantly well drained. During the past 12 years it has received occasional dressings of barnyard manure, averaging about four tons a year per acre; also liberal supplies of potato fertilizer, say at the rate of 1,200 pounds to the acre a year. Now and again lime, kainit, rawbone flour, and wood ashes in limited quantity have also been applied.

In the French system the drills are opened in the form of trenches 15 inches wide, and not in the way of simple furrows, as we usually prepare ground for potatoe planting. In this case the trenches are opened fifteen inches wide and six inches deep and three feet apart, measuring from middle to middle. Potato fertilizer, at the rate of 880 lbs to the acre, was then strewn in the bottom of the trenches, about two inches deep of loose soil drawn in over this, and all mixed well by drawing a hoe along in the trench. The potato sets were then planted a foot apart. Two inches deep of soil was drawn over the sets, and potato fertilizer, at the rate of 880 lbs to the acre, strewn over this and mixed as before. Also powdered sulphur, at the rate of 440 lbs to the acre was sown in the trenches, which were then filled up level. The sulphur was used as a prevention against wire worm, which Mr. Carman asserts, is the cause of the scab on the potatoes in his soil. The sets are mostly medium-sized potatoes cut in halves, each half having two or three good eyes. Summer care consisted in keeping the ground clean. The drills were not hilled up, but kept level. Shallow cultivation was practised. Paris green and plaster were used against the potato beetle.

Mr. Carman's theory about these trenches is that they conserve moisture and supply a yielding medium in which the tubers form and grow with little resistence, while the roots may penetrate at will the more compact soil between the trenches. Again, the rain penetrates the trenches readily, and is not shed to either side, as in the old system of hilling up. The water goes at once to where it is most needed

The contest plot was planted on April 20. Three kinds of seedling raised by Mr. Carman himself, and numbered respectively 2, 3 and 4, were grown. These were set out in rows 33 feet long. Of No. 2 only one row was planted, and of Nos. 3 and 4 two rows each were planted, the five rows in all making one eighty-eighth part of an acre or one row the one hundred and fortieth part of an acre, and so it was computed. The potatoes were dug in the presence of a committee of responsible gentlemen and expert judges, who measured the land and weighed the tubers as they were dug, allowing sixty pounds to the bushel. The row of No. 2 yielded at the enormous rate of 1,076 bushels per acre, of the No. 3 at the rate of 298 bushels, and the other row at the rate 253 bushels per acre, and one row of No. 4 produced at the rate of 683, and the other at the rate of 605 bushels per acre, or all five rows at the rate of 583 bushels of potatoes per acre. So Mr. Carman lost his bet.

Highwaymen in Mosa.

A daring highway robbery occurred in Mosa Saturday night. Wm. Hodge and D. McKenzie, two employes of the G. T. R. residing at Pratt's Siding were returning home from Glencoe on the railway track about 9 o'clock. A short distance from the village they were overtaken and passed by two strangers. Further on they were confronted by two men wearing white masks—presumably the same two who passed them a short time before. One of the men got behind Hodge, and throwing him down placed a revolver at his head while he rifled his pockets. In the meantime the other encountred McKenzie, who showed fight, and would have the highwayman earn his ill-gotten gain had not the other, having done with Hodge came to the assistance of his pal. After stunning McKenzie with a blow from a pair of steel knuckles the man made a search of his pockets, broke the watch chain and would no doubt have taken his watch had not Hodge exclaimed, "Here is some one coming!" This had the effect of frightening the robbers, who made off to the woods with little reward for their trouble, all the booty they secured being 7 cents and an empty purse. McKenzie's face is badly cut and bruised, but Hodge is unhurt. They cannot identify the robbers.

A crack of the whip made the horse jump from the grasp of the robber, and the frightened young men were soon conveyed beyond danger.

A SEVERE ATTACK.
Miss Bella Elliot, of Pontypool, Ont., writes—"My brother and I were both taken ill with a severe attack of Diarrhœa, having tried other remedies, we tried Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, which gave instant relief."

A case, the result of which, will be of interest to members of beneficiary societies, of all kinds, was tried at the Elgin Assizes last week. Minnie Wells, of Aylmer, brought a suit against the Independent Order of Foresters to recover an insurance of $1,000 on the life of her father, an Almer dentist, who died four years ago. The claim was contested on the ground that the local lodge at Aylmer had acted contrary to the constitution of the order in reinstating Wells as a member within a certain time after he had been suspended. Mr. Colin McDougal, Q C, who acted for the plaintiff, took the ground that it was the case of master and servant, and the action of the local lodge was binding upon the higher courts, in which view his lordship concurred, and entered a verdict for $1,000.

COUNTERFEITERS SENTENCED.

At the assizes in Sarnia, Saturday, Chas. Johnson, W. O. Parsons and Benj. McKenzie were tried together on a charge of passing counterfeit money, and their trial took up a whole day. The evidence for the prosecution was very strong. Brownlee, the Ailsa Craig jeweller, who had been arrested at London for passing counterfeits, gave evidence against the three. The important testimony was given by a man named Baines, of Indiana, who testified as to his purchase of several thousand dollars worth of counterfeit silver certificates. He swore that Brownlee had supplied him first with $200 of the certificates, and that afterwards he met McKenzie at Chicago, and got $2,200 in counterfeits from him paying him by a New York draft. Other purchases were made and New York drafts were given in payment. These drafts were in court, and two of them had McKenzie's endorsement, while one of them was endorsed by Parsons. Knight and Vance also gave evidence similar to that given on Friday. Evidence was given as to the previous good character of defendants Parsons and McKenzie.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty against Parsons and McKenzie. Johnston was given twelve years on his conviction of Friday, while Parsons and McKenzie were sentenced for four years—all to go to Kingston penetentiary. McKenzie has relatives in St. Thomas and is well known there.

The Eiffel Tower.

The highest structure in the world is now being built at Paris. The Washington Monument is 555 feet high, and has no rival at present, but the Parisians are priding themselves on the fact that by the 1st of January next they will have standing on the Champ de Mars a tower 1,000 feet high, built entirely of iron girders and pillars, in the simple construction of four great shafts consisting of four columns each, starting from the four corners of the base, and merging into the single great shaft which forms the main part of the tower. The whole tower when completed will weigh about 7,500 tons, or 15,000,000 pounds. The cost will be about $1,000,000, of which the French government pays about $200,000.

Naturally enough, M. Eiffel, the eminent French engineer who is building the tower, is proud of his tall enterprise. He says:

Consider its importance from a meteorological point of view. It is not every day that meteorologists can get up a thousand feet above the soil. This tower will enable them to study the decrease of temperature at different heights, to observe the variations of the winds, find out the quantity of rain that falls at different heights, and the density of the clouds. Indeed, in all that relates to temperature, hygrometry, air currents, and the composition of the air, the tower will afford opportunities for study and research many of which have hitherto been impossible. It will be equally useful to astronomers. Here experiments with the spectroscope can be carried on with great facility; the laws of refraction and the physical aspect of the moon, planets and nebula studied in most favorable conditions. Then there is its utility from a military point of view. In the event of another siege of Paris, see how important this tower would be. Communications could be kept up by means of optic telegraphy for a great distance around Paris; for from the summit you have a magnificent panorama extending from 120 to 130 kilometres. Paris by night, decorated and illuminated as it will be during the exhibition, is a sight which before was only within the reach of aeronauts. In fact, the tower will be the chief attraction of the exhibition. In our construction of the tower we have calculated on the force of the wind. We have calculated that the tower will normally withstand a wind pressure of 300 kilogrammes per square metre, which amounts to a total pressure of 2,250,000 kilogrammes. We have made this calculation on the most favorable hypothesis possible. We have reckoned the trellis work as full walls and made other allowances. And, as the strongest tempests known in Paris have never been beyond a pressure of 150 kilos per square metre, the tower is perfectly secure. Should a wind bearing a force of 300 kilos arise little would be left standing in Paris except the tower.

The tower will be fitted up on the inside of the shafts with elevators. There will be six or more connecting the first two galleries with the ground, and probably two which will goto the top.

My Soul, Come In.

BY L. A. MORRISON.

"While I was musing the fire burned."—Psalm XXXIX, 3.

My Soul! come in, from the world, to-night;
Thou art far too burdened with all its care,
Thou hast never a moment of sweet delight
Shut in from its din, with thy Lord, in prayer.
Come in! thou hast strayed too long abroad;
To thy "Holy of Holies" to-night return,
And hold communion—alone—with God,
And while thou art musing the fire will burn.

Come in, my Soul? Thou art all alone
In the busy mart, with its bustle and blare;
The chamber of prayer is best to the Throne,—
There is strength and healing and solace there.
Come in, and talk with thy risen Lord!
—He waits for thy coming, and will not spurn
Thy sterling trust in His Princely Word—
And while He is speaking the fire will burn.

Thou needest the "Fire" to purge thy dross,
To leaven with life, and to cast out sins,
The "Open Seam" for thee is "The Cross"
And prayer brings the "Fire of Pentecost" in.
Then wait on the Lord, thou soul of mine!
To repent the past can alone return
Thee in to the current of life divine—
There—while thou art musing—the fire will burn.

Thy Lord, on Tabor, at eventide,
Transfigured stood on the "Mount of Prayer,"—
And now in thy life, shalt be glorified
And the "Beauty" of Heaven shine clearly there
If thou wilt bow before God; my soul!
The world will know thou hast seen His face
And others will yield to His sweet control
By thy prayer-found fire of redeeming grace.

"THE ELMS" Toronto.

Infidelity.

'Tis foolish to affirm "there is no God,"
When all around us lies the evidence —
The smallest flower that gems the verdant sod
Speaks to us mutely of His Providence;
The starry firmament proclaims His might
While they defy our finite minds to know
The why and wherefore of the Infinite!
And all our calculations overthrow!
Oh! puny man! why dost thou upright walk
While other creatures crawl, or lowly bend,
As if in awe of God?—yet dost thou talk
Of wisdom, power, and knowledge without end!
Infidelity is spiritual blindness,—
God all around—yet will not Him confess!

Toronto, Ont. JOHN IMRIE.

At the Last.

The stream is calmest when it nears the tide,
The flowers are sweetest at eventide,
The birds most musical at close of day,
The saints divinest when they pass away.

Morning is holy, but a holier charm
Lies folded in evening's robe of balm;
And weary men must ever love best,
For morning calls to toil, but night to rest.

She comes from heaven and on her wings doth bear
A holy fragrance, like the breath of prayer
Footsteps of angels follow in her trace,
To shut the weary eyes of Day in peace.

All things are hushed before her, as he throws
O'er earth and sky her mantle of repose;
There is a calmer beauty, and a power
That Morning knows not, in the Evening's hour

Until the evening we must weep and toil—
Plough life's stern furrow, and dig the weedy soil—
Tread with sad feet the rough and thorny way,
And bear the heat and burden of the day.

Oh! when the sun is setting, may we glide
Like summer evening down the golden tide;
And leave behind us as we pass away,
Sweet starry twilight round our sleeping clay.

Reflection.

BY EMMA SCHILING, AGED 16.

I stood on the bridge at midnight,
When the moon was at its full,
And the timbers seemed like spirits,
And the silent air seemed full
Of forbodings of coming evil;
And I listened and trembled in fear,
But the city was wrapp'd in slumber,
And not a sound did I hear,
Save the river that rushed beneath me;
And, heid by some mystic power,
I stood on the bridge at midnight,
Alone in that silent hour.
And soon I took to watching
The lamp-light stream away,
Away down the tide to the ocean,
And out on the boundless sea.
I thought of the past and the present,
And what the future might be,
As I stood on the bridge at midnight,
Alooking toward the sea.

And the scenes and the song of my childhood,
And the joy, and the love, and the light,
Came back as I stood dreaming,
Alone in the solemn night
I knew not the present moment,
For the past was present to me,
As I thought of my childhood's companions,
And our gambols by the sea,
Of the familiar scenes around me,
And the home I was soon to leave;
And the future spread before me,
As the threads that I soon must weave
In the wonderful mystic web of life;
And I wondered whether they'd be
Bright as the stars above me,
Or black at the midnight sea.
And I thought of the friends and the loved ones
That I soon must leave behind;
And my heart was filled with sorrow;
And it seemed that an evening wind
Took up the tale of sadness
And bore it out to the sea;
And I suddenly woke from my dreaming,
And the present came back to me.

Long years have pass'd, but time
Ne'er effaced the love of my home,
Oh! the weary, weary sorrow,
From friends and loved ones to roam
Oh! night of nights, never shall thou never,
E'en once return to me?
Oh! to stand on that bridge at midnight,
Alooking toward the sea.

A Specific for Alcoholism.

A specific against drunkenness has often been sought, but as yet there has been found no remedy except that of moral determination. Although the reform accomplished in this manner is encouraging, there is a wide field for the use of some physical method for the reclamation of besotted individuals who cannot be reached by moral suasion. Dr. Portugslow, a well known physician and writer, declares that the desire for drink is a disease, and must be treated by means of therapeutics. He claims that as quinine is a specific against fever, so are subcutaneous injections of strychnine the absolute means of curing the passion for intoxicating liquors. It appears that so far back as 1873 this method of treating was employed, but it attracted little attention.

In 1884 the celebrated French physician, Dujardin-Boimetz, was a most zealous advocate of this method of treatment. The preparation and application of the injection is is quite simple. One grain of strychnine is dissolved in 200 drops of water, and the patient receives an injection of five drops daily for a week or ten days. The effects of the injections are surprising; after two or three of them the drunkard has an appetite and is able to sleep. If, after the expiration of several months, the desire for strong drink returns, the result of indulgence is so distressing, palpitation of the heart, headache and other equally disturbing effects, that it becomes impossible for the inebriate to touch another drop. It is recommended to make the injections during the drunken sleep, when the patient awakens in the full possession of his senses and will ask for a second or third application. It would be an admirable arrangement if the police surgeons would test this "cure" upon the intoxicated persons brought into the various stations. If this means of treating the deadly sin of intemperance be as successful as its advocates claim the family physician will be a powerful factor in the regeneration of society. It has been suggested by the Russian press that stations be established in every department of Russia for the salvation of the army of drunkards.

The Best Digester.

Talking at table is the very best digester. There is no tonic known equal to it, as it is of the kind calculated to promote hilarity and good feeling generally. Most parents are prone to prohibit their children from laughing and talking at the table. It is unphysiological; it is cruelty.

Joyousness promotes the circulation of blood, enlivens, invigorates it, sends it tingling to the remotest part of the system, carrying with its animation, vigor, life. The louder the little ones laugh, the better; the faster they talk the better, for then they eat less at a given time, consequently chew their food more thoroughly.

Mrs. Sarah Heald, of Chester N. H., a widow eighty-one years of age, mowed and put into her barn this summer one-half a ton of hay. For the last five years she has cut her own firewood and her barn is the best kept in the neighborhood.

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN.

GIRLHOOD.

Girlhood is the loveliest and sweetest period of life, according to the poets, yet how much we suffer during that transition period. Neither child nor woman, the young girl is in danger of being spoiled in both ways. There is always the danger either of awkward shyness or unlovely boldness. Doubtless the best remedy for awkwardness is unselfishness. When we think of others' comfort, instead of the impression we produce upon them, we are not likely to be awkward. Awkward shyness is certainly painful, but it is not really so objectionable as the rough or pert forward manner we unhappily see in many young girls. If they only knew the impression it gives they would surely drop the slangy speech and insane giggles with which they enliven conversation among themselves. Girls of the present day need not adopt the formal speech and manner of a bygone age, but they should learn to display the simple dignity which always marks a gentlewoman. Loud talking in public places, careless misuse of language, and pushing manners may all be noticed among girls from whom better things might be expected; it is not strange that foreigners form such unfavorable opinions of our women. Mrs. John Sherwood laments the lack of refinement shown at the great summer resorts, where many of the women seem anxious above everything that they should be remarked, and this is certainly an outcome of their early training. It is just as easy to be a refined gentlewoman as the reverse; it all depends on early training and habits of thought.

THE GENEALOGY OF A QUEEN.

Queen Victoria is the niece of William IV., who was the brother of George IV., who was the son of George III., who was the grandson of Geo. II., who was the son of George I., who was the cousin of Anne, who was the sister-in-law of William III., who was the son-in-law of James II., who was the brother of Charles II., who was the son of Charles I., who was the son of James I., who was the cousin of Elizabeth, who was the sister of Mary, who was the sister of Edward IV., who was the son of Henry VIII., who was the son of Henry VII., who was the son of Edward I., who was the son of Henry III., who was the son of John, who was the brother of Richard I., who was the son of Henry II., who was the cousin of Stephen, who was the cousin of Henry I., who was the brother of William Rufus, who was the son of William the Conqueror, or 800 years ago.

A SENSIBLE GIRL.

A fast young man decided to make to a young lady a formal offer of his hand and heart—all he was worth—hoping for a cordial reception. He cautiously prefaced his declaration with a few questions, for he had no intention of "throwing himself away." Did she love him well enough to live in a cottage with him? Was she a good cook? Did she think it a wife's duty to make home happy? Would she consult his taste and wishes concerning her associates and pursuits in life? Was she economical, etc.? The young lady said that before she answered his questions she would assure him of some negative virtues she possessed. She never drank, smoked or chewed; never owed a bill to her laundress or tailor; never stayed out all night playing billiards; never lounged on the street corners and ogled giddy girls; never stood in with the boys for the cigars and suppers. "Now," said she, rising indignantly, "I am assured by those who know, that you do all these things and it is rather absurd for you to expect all the virtues in me, while you do not possess any yourself. I can never be your wife"; and she bowed him out and left him on the cold doorstep, a madder if not a wiser man.

WOMEN MAKE GOOD SWIMMERS.

The records of the humane societies on both sides of the Atlantic show that of late years a fair proportion of their medals fall to the lot of girls. There were several notable instances of rescue from drowning last summer by girls under twenty. Many women are accomplished swimmers. This is but natural. As their bones are generally lighter than those of men, and their flesh more buoyant, they have less difficulty to overcome in acquiring the art. Some of them could float at their first attempt, if they could acquire the requisite faith in the power of the water to hold them up. Swimming is very much an art of faith, for it is generally the case that when a person believes sufficiently in the buoyancy of the water to trust to it his precious body, lo! he is a swimmer. There were young girls at Newport, last summer, who could float on the surface of the ocean with no more difficulty than they experienced in lying upon a sofa. They could have floated for hours if necessary. Some of the most famous swimming feats have been accomplished by very young women.

DANGER FROM PET DOGS.

One of the most noted physicians has discovered a new danger that menaces ladies who keep pet dogs. There is an invisible worm that rubs of the dog's tongue. These worms work their way into the flesh of human beings, and it is extremely dangerous for a dog to lick even a lady's hand. This fact was discovered by one of our best physicians, and was made public by a gentleman who is the husband of one of the ladies who has had a nest of dog worms removed.

A wealthy lady residing in Brooklyn had a strange lump growing on her cheek, and she consulted her family physician. The doctor informed her that she had a nest of dog worms imbedded in her cheek. He explained that he had treated a number of ladies for the same ailment, and had operated successfully on them. The doctor frankly explained the cause of his patient's ailment. The lady told her husband what the doctor had said on his return home that evening. The disgusted man took his revolver and his wife's pet pug to his stable, and shot the dog.

A MODERN DIANA.

Speaking of the reigning family of Austria a recent writer says:—"Empress Elizabeth, who was fifty last Christmas has long been renowned as a huntress, and, although at present in bad health, has not yet retired from the field in which both her hunting and skilful equestrianism have been greatly admired. She has followed the chase on every chosen ground in Ireland, Scotland, England, France, Germany, Italy, and at home, and makes pets of the equine and canine races wherever met. Fondness of this kind of sport has been her specialty during the better part of her life, although at court she was considered beautiful enough to eclipse all other beauties."

FASHION NOTES.

At several English weddings this season, the bridesmaids have worn plain white muslin dresses and have carried white kid prayer books, given them by the bridegroom.

The college hat, or mortar board, is becoming fashionable for street wear by London women. Leather belts of great size and coarseness, with steel buckles, are also showing up.

Pale girls can wear the new and fashionable shades of green, the olives, to great advantage, and a green hat wonderfully brightens a girl who has but little color in her face.

A woman was bathing in Cork harbor when the tide carried her out beyond her depth. She was in great danger of drowning when Miss Murphy, daughter of Alderman Murphy of Cork, sprang in and succeeded in dragging her on to a rock in the harbor. There the two were compelled to stay until some men on the cliffs saw them, and, swimming out, brought them safely to shore.

Alpine hats of striped or checked cloth and exceedingly low-crowned turbans of felt are worn by stylish young women who adopt English fashions, and with these the back hair is arranged with a Psyche knot. The Alpine hats are simply bound and banded with heavy corded ribbon. Loops of handsome moire ribbon, glittering ornaments set with mock gems, and flat stiff birds' wings are the trimmings for the turbans, all of which show a facing of velvet.

The last extravagance in French hosiery is a tinted lace stocking in pale colours of apricot, lilac, tan, bebe blue, strawberry, terracotta, and light almond. These expensive hose copy very closely the most delicate and intricate patterns of point, Chantilly, duchesse, and other rich laces, and are to be worn over a second pair of spun-silk stockings of a delicate cameo or flesh colour. Roman sandals of bronze, showing one slender strap over the instep, are worn with these hose, the strap tightly held by a small silver slide.

The new autumn Jerseys are made of fabrics of a degree of fineness they have never before obtained. Some of the English-woven models are richly embroidered in Oriental designs; others are decorated with fine gold or silver braidwork or braid in soutache, this in two distinct colours, the braids lying side by side on the outline of the intricate patterns. Costly French Jerseys are exhibited, these nearly covered with bands of silk passementerie in arabesque and scroll designs. The handsomely-trimmed Russian waists are also made of silk-warp light-weight Jersey cloth, with Russian sash of the same, knotted at the left side, the long peplum ends falling low on the dress skirt.

My love was like a lily fair
Low drooping in the sultry air,
My heart was rent with grief and care.
I loved her well.

But lo: The wonder grows and grows;
My love's now like a blooming rose
How bright her face with beauty glows,
I dare not tell.

The wandering bee would stop to sip,
The nectar of her perfect lip,
'Twas Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription wrought the spell.

A ray of light travels 11,160,000 miles in a minute.

"He most lives who thinks the most,
Acts the noblest, feels the best,
And he whose heart beats quickest
Lives the longest, lives in one hour
More than in years do some whose
Pat blood sleeps as it slips along their veins."

These lines describe that condition of perfect health which all men and women wish to enjoy. To be able to think clearly, to incline to do noble acts, to live long and joyously, we must be free from the domination of disease. By taking Dr. Pierce's Medical Discovery we may, by purifying the blood, escape consumption, general debility, and weakness, and all blood and skin diseases, and verify the truth of poetry as well as fact.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

The Tariff bill prepared by the Republicans in the United States Senate abolishes the tax on tobacco. This will reduce the revenue about thirty millions. The tax on sugar has been cut down fifty per cent., which will decrease the revenue by twenty-five millions more. Ten millions additional are to be saved from the tax on alcohol used in the arts, and five millions from various articles placed on the free list.

Sunday is observed after the American plan in British Columbia, though Victoria, the capital, is in other respects exceedingly English. The excuse for the non-observance of the day of rest is the circumstance that there is no other occasion in the week for recreation. To meet this plea the Saturday half holiday is to be introduced. The newspapers advocate the reform, but they do not propose to drop their Sunday editions.

British Columbia is not entirely oblivious to the big business it can do in supplying fruit to the districts lying east of it. The Victoria "Colonist's" advices from Chilliwack, which is situated in a very fertile agricultural part of the province, say that "a thousand boxes of plums have been already shipped East this season, and last year apples were shipped to Japan. Peaches and pears, and fruit of all kinds are raised in great abundance, and prove a source of more than ordinary profit to many."

A Kingston clergyman explained on Sunday to his congregation that in Winnipeg whenever a one cent piece is found on the collection plate it is assumed that a person from Ontario has been to church. This is libellous, because everybody knows that Ontario people place five cents pieces on the plate, largely because there is no smaller silver coin. But, joking aside, it is remarkable what a large assortment of small change finds its way into the church treasury. The phenomenon should perhaps be attributed to the strong desire to imitate the example of the widow who gave her mite.

There appears very good reason to believe that the late Professor Proctor fell a victim to the unmanly fright of the New York Board of Health. The doctors who performed the autopsy state that they are unable to find any traces of yellow fever. As the Professor was removed by force from his hotel to an hospital in the dead of night during a violent storm, and while he was in a state of collapse, the inference is that he was was killed by official ignorance and incapacity. The yellow fever scare seems to have terrified many people out of their senses. In all such cases the inherent selfishness of human nature comes to the surface, and every consideration is sacrificed to that of self preservation.

The publication of the late Emperor Frederick's diary will confirm the general belief in his generosity, magnanimity and sagacity, the latter quality being especially evidenced by his intention to liberalise German institutions and by his opposition in 1870 to the scheme for partitioning France and placing the Belgian King on her throne. The revelation that this project was entertained, and may be revived by another German conquest, will of course nerve France to prepare most thoroughly for the coming war, to fight it out even more desperately than in 1870, and to impose harsh terms on Germany in case of the not wholly improbable French success. For these reasons, and because the diary exposes Prince Bismarck as the prime mover in the anti-Papal crusade, the publication of the diary may well give serious annoyance to the Iron Chancellor and his young master.

How to "Gait" a Horse.

A writer in the Horseman gives the following points as to how to give a horse an easy and graceful gait: The lumbering, awkward gait of a horse can generally be attributed to the manner in which he was handled when first put to work. Naturally feeling uncomfortable in harness, it is not to be wondered at that the first actions of a horse in such positions should be awkward and clumsy. As far as future comfort in handling is concerned, the first few weeks in harness is a critical time in the training of a horse. In most cases gaits are then formed that last during life, and it they are the kind that are not desirable they will operate strongly against the value of the animal. As it is always easier to teach a horse to do what you want him to do than to break up habits that have been established, the importance of starting out the right way is apparent. A driving horse is always the better for once having been trained by an experienced driver, or "tracked," as it is generally expressed, because it is the business of a good trainer to break up all the awkward and unnatural gaits at once, if it can be done. A horse of ordinary appearance will attract the attention of a buyer of good judgment quicker if he shows a good square gait, whether at a walk or trot, or whether it be a draught, carriage or driving horse, than if he should present a fair amount of style, combined with a good appearance otherwise, and have a lumbering, unpleasant, awkward gait. The proper thing, then, to do when first harnessing a young horse is to take the time necessary to develop a good, straightforward walk, with a good rate of speed. The walk is the foundation of all the other gaits, and without beginning at the foundation all future developments will be unsatisfactory. If it should take a few weeks to get a young horse to feel comfortable in harness, and to establish a stride that will add to his appearance and value, it is time well spent, if nothing else is done. After raising good horses it is foolishness not to give them the finishing touches that will make it a pleasure to use them afterward.

Politeness of the Japanese.

The petty tradesman whose shop you enter carries on the process for about two minutes before he can be induced to begin business; the rickshaw coolie to whom you pay a mere trifle for a toilsome drive, stands at the railway station, dripping from heat, mopping and bowing, until, if you be a new comer, you rush away in convulsions of laughter.

On leaving the hotel, I distributed backsheesh through the landlord to the various employes. One after another they came trooping up, smiling, and flopping down on the floor, thumping their heads repeatedly against the ground, mumbling their gratitude; while as for beggars—who by the way are not numerous—they sprawl on the earth, and in an extremity of self-abasement literally rub their heads in the dirt.

Again, on arriving at a teahouse, the landlady first brings in tea, which she delivers crouching on the floor, and then the entire family comes on in succession, and kneeling at your feet, go through the process of bumping their foreheads.

Nor is the bowing restricted to inferiors or to the lower classes. Many a time have I watched the ceremonial of two friends, from among the upper orders, parting in the street. Backward and forward they sway their bodies at right angles, as if they worked on pivots, until one wonders when they will cease. Over at last, I think. Not a bit of it. They separate for a few paces, and then, as if a sudden omission had struck them, they rush back, and go through the whole ridiculous business again.

Education in Toronto.

Toronto is steadily advancing in educational matters. The University has had two additional professorships endowed by the city, and is erecting a large and handsome building for the School of Practical Science; a new Ladies' College has been opened under the auspices of the Baptist University, and a College of Music has been opened under the direction of Mr. F. H. Torrington, who has been for sixteen years organist of the Metropolitan Methodist Church and conductor of the Philharmonic Society. In its system of teaching and the scope of its departments, the College resembles the University and provides a practical education, for both professional and amateur, in all branches of music.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXV.—CLOUDS ON THE HORIZON.

The Massingers pitched their tent at Whitestrand again for August. Hugh did is best indeed to put off the evil day; but you sell your soul for gold, you must take the gold with all its encumbrances; and Winifred's will was a small encumbrance that Hugh had never for one moment reckoned upon in his ante-nuptial calculations of advantages and drawbacks. He took it for granted he was marrying a mere girl, whom he could mould and fashion to his own whim and fancy. That simple, childish, blushing little thing had a will of her own, however—ay, more, plenty of it. When Hugh proposed with an insinuating smile that they should run down for the summer to Barmouth or Aberystwith—he loved North Wales—Winifred replied with quiet dignity: "Wales is stuffy. There's nothing so bracing as the east coast. After a London season, one needs bracing. I feel pulled down. We'll go and stop with mamma at Whitestrand." And she shut her little mouth upon it with a snap like a rat-trap. Against that solid rock of sheer resolution, Hugh shattered himself to no purpose in showery sprays of rhetoric and reasoning. Gibraltar is not more disdainful of the foam that dashes upon its eternal cliffs year after year than Winifred was to her husband's running fire of argument and expostulation. She never deigned to argue in return; she merely repeated with naked iteration ten thousand times over the categorical formula, "We'll go to Whitestrand."

And to Whitestrand they went in due time. The plastic male character can no more resist the ceaseless pressure of feminine persistence than clay can resist the hands of the potter, or wood the warping effect of heat and dryness. Hugh took his way to dull flat Suffolk when August came, and relinquished with a sigh his dreams of delicious picnics by the Dolgelly waterfalls, and his mental picture of those phenomenally big trout—three pounds apiece, fisherman's weight—that lurk uncaught in the deep green pools among the rocks and stickles of the plashing Wnion. The Bard had sold himself for prompt cash to the first bidder: he found when it was too late he had sold himself unknown into a mitigated form of marital slavery. The purchaser made her own terms: Hugh was compelled meekly to accept them.

Two strong wills were clashing together in serious matters, neither would yield. Each must dint and batter the other.

They did not occupy Elsie's room this time. Hugh had stipulated with all his might for that concession beforehand. He would never pass a night in that room again, he said; the paint or the woodwork or the chairs or something made him hopelessly sleepless. In these old houses, sanitary arrangements were always bad. Winifred darted a piercing look at him as he shuffled uneasily over that lame excuse. Already a vague idea was framing itself piecemeal in her woman's mind—a very natural idea, when she saw him so moody and preoccupied and splenetic—that Hugh had been really in love with Elsie, and was in love with Elsie still, even now that Elsie was away in Australia—else why this unconquerable and absurd objection to Elsie's room? Did he think he had deceived and ill-treated Elsie?

A woman's mind goes straight to the bull's eye. No use pretending to mislead her with side issues; she flings them aside with a contemptuous smile, and proceeds at once to worm her way to the kernel of the matter.

August wore away, and September came in; and Hugh continued to mope and to bore himself to his heart's content at that detestable Whitestand. To distract his soul, he worked hard at his "Ode to Manethe" but even Manetho, audacious theme, gave him scanty consolation. Nay, his quaint "Ballade of Fee-Faw-Fum" that witty apologue, with its grimly humorous catalogue of all possible nightly fears, supplied him with food but for one solitary morning's meditation. You can't cast out your blue-devils by poking fun at them; those cerulean demons will not be laughed down or rudely exorcised by such simple means. They recur in spite of you with profound regularity. The fons et origo mali was still present. That hateful poplar still fronted his eyes wherever he moved: that window with the wistaria still haunted his sight whenever he tried to lounge at his ease on the lawn or in the garden. The river, the sandhills, the meadows, the walks, all, all were poisoned to him: all spoke of Elsie. Was ever Nemesis more hideous or more complete? Was ever punishment more omnipresent? He had gained all he wished, and lost his own soul; at every turn of his own estate some horrible memento of his shame and his guilt rose up to confuse him. He wished he was dead every day he lived: dead, and asleep in his grave, beside Elsie.

As that dreaded anniversary, the seventeenth of September, slowly approached—the anniversary, as Hugh felt it, of Elsie's murder—his agitation and his gloom increased visibly. Winifred wondered silently to herself what on earth could ail him. During the last few weeks, he seemed to have become another man. An atmosphere of horror and doubt surrounded him. On the fifteenth, two days before the date of Elsie's disappearance, she went up hastily to their common room. The door was half locked, but not securely fastened: it yielded to a sudden jerk of her wrist, and she entered abruptly—to find Hugh, with a guilty red face pushing away a small bundle of letters and a trinket of some kind into a tiny cabinet which he always mysteriously carried about with him. She had hardly time to catch them distinctly, but the trinket looked like a watch or a locket. The letters, too, she managed to note, were tied together with an elastic band, and numbered in clear red ink on the envelopes. More than that she had no chance to see. But her feminine curiosity was strongly excited; the more so as Hugh banged down the lid on its spring-lock with guilty haste, and proceeded with hot and fiery fingers to turn the key upon the whole set in his own portmanteau.

"Hugh," she cried, standing still to gaze upon him, "What do you keep in that little cabinet?"

Hugh turned upon her as she had never before seen him turn. No longer clay in the hands of the potter, he stood stiff and hard like adamant then. "If I had meant you to know," he said coldly, "I would have told you long ago. I did not tell you, therefore I do not mean you to know. Ask me no questions. This incident is now closed. Say nothing more about it." And he turned on his heel, and left her astonished.

That was all. Winifred cried the night through, but Hugh remained still absolute adamant. Next morning, she altered her tactics completely, and drying her eyes once for all, said never another word on the subject. She even pretended to be cheerful and careless. When a woman pretends to be cheerful and careless after a domestic scene, the luckless man whose destiny she holds in the hollow of her hand may well tremble, especially if there is something he wants to conceal from her. She means to egg it all out, and egged out it will all be, as certainly as the sun will rise to-morrow. It may take a long time, but it will come for all that. A woman on the track of a secret, pretending carelessness, is a dangerous animal. She will go far. Hanc tu, Romane, caveto.

On the seventeenth, Winifred formed a little plan of her own, which she ventilated with child-like effusion at lunch-time. "Hugh, dear," she said in her most winning voice, "do you happen to remember—if you've time for such trifles—that to-morrow's a very special anniversary?"

Hugh's cheek blanched as if by magic. What deviltry was this? What deliberate cruelty? For the moment his usual courage and presence of mind forsook him. Had Winifred, then, found out everything?—A special anniversary, indeed! As if he could forget it!—And that she, for whose sake—with the manor of Whitestrand thrown in—he had done it all and made himself next door to a murderer—that she, of all people in the world, should cast it in his teeth, and make bitter game of him about Elsie's death!

"Well, Winifred," he answered in a strange low voice, looking hard at her eyes: "I suppose I'm not likely to forget it, am I?"

Winifred noted the tone, silently. Aloud, she gave no token in any way of having observed his singular manner.—"It's a year to-morrow since Hugh proposed to me, you know, mamma dear," she went on, in her quietest and most cutting voice, turning round to her mother, "and he does me the honour to say politely he isn't likely to forget the occasion.—For a whole year, he's actually remembered it. But it seems to make him terrible grumpy.—Never mind, Hugh; I'll let you off. I'm a sweet little angel, and I'm not going to be angry with my great bear: so there, Mr Constellation, you see I've forgiven you.—Now, what I was going to say's just this. As to-morrow's a special anniversary in our lives I propose we should celebrate it with becoming dignity."

"Which means, I suppose, the ordinary British symbol of merry-making, a plum pudding for dinner," Hugh interposed bitterly. He saw his mistake with perfect clearness now, but he hadn't the tact or the grace to conceal it, with a woman's cleverness under a show of good humour.

"A plum-pudding is banal," Winifred answered with a smile—"distinctly banal. I'm surprised a member of the Cheyne Row set should even dream of suggesting it. What would Mr. Hatherley say if he heard the Immortal One make such a proposition? He'd detect in it the strong savour of Philistia; he'd declare you'd joined the hosts of Goliath.—No. It isn't a plum-pudding. My idea's this. Why shouldn't we go for a family picnic, just our three selves, in honor of the occasion?"

"A picnic!" Hugh cried, aghast—"a picnic to-morrow!—On the seventeenth!"—Then recollecting himself once more, he added hastily: "In this unsettled weather! The sandhills are soaked. There isn't a place on the whole estate one could arrange to seat one's self down on comfortably."

"I hadn't thought of the sandhills," Winifred answered with quiet dignity. "I thought it'd be awfully nice if we all bespoke a dry seat in Mr. Relf's yawl——"

"Relf's yawl!" Hugh cried aloud, with increasing excitement. "You don't mean to say that creature's here again?"

"That creature, I'm in a position to state without reserve," Winifred answered chillily, "ran up the river to the Fisherman's Rest late last night, as lively as ever. I saw the Mud-Turtle come in myself, before a chipping breeze! And Mrs. Stannaway told me this morning Mr. Relf was lying off the hard, just opposite Stannaway's. So I thought it'd be a capital plan, in memory of old times, if we got Mr. Relf to take us down in the yawl to Orfordness, land us comfortably at the Low Light, and let us picnic on the nice dry ridge of big shingle just above the graveyard where they bury the wrecked sailors."

Hugh's whole soul was on fire within him; but his face was pale, and his hands deadly cold. Was this pure accident, mere coincidence, or was it designed and deliberate torture on Winifred's part, he wondered? To picnic in sight of Elsie's nameless grave, on the very anniversary of Elsie's death, with every concomitant of pretended rejoicing that could make that ghastly act more ghastly still than it would otherwise be in its own mere naked brutality! It was too sickening to think upon. But did Winifred know? Could Winifred mean it as a punishment for his silence? Or had she merely blundered upon that horrible proposition as a sheer coincidence out of pure accident?

As a matter of fact, the last solution was the true and simple one. The sand hills, or Orfordness, were the two recognised alternative picnicking places where all Whitestrand invariably disported itself. If you didn't go to the one, you went as a matter of course to the other. There was no third way open to the most deliberate and statesmanlike of mortals. The Meyseys has gone to Orfordness for years. Why not go there on the anniversary of Winnie's engagement? To Winifred, the proposal seemed simplicity itself; to Hugh, it seemed like a strangely perverse and cunning piece of sheer feminine cruelty.

"There's nothing to see at Orfordness," he said shortly—"nothing but a great bare bank of sand and shingle, and a couple of lighthouses, standing alone in a perfect desert of desolation.—Besides, the weather's just beastly.—Much better stop at home as usual by ourselves, and eat our dinner here in peace and quietness! This isn't the sort of season for picnicking."

"Oh! but Hugh," Mrs. Meysey put in, with her maternal authority, "you know we always go to Orfordness. It's really quite a charming place in its way. The sands are so broad and hard and romantic. We sail down, and picnic at the lighthouse; and then we get a man to row us across the river at the back to Orford Castle—there's a splendid view from Orford Castle—and altogether it makes a delightful excursion, of its kind, for Suffolk. We ought to do something to commemorate the day.—If we weren't in such deep mourning still"—and Mrs Meysey glanced down with a conventional sigh at her crape excrescences—"we'd ask a few friends in to dinner; but I'm afraid it's a little too soon for that. Still, at anyrate, there could be no harm—not the slightest harm—in just running down to Orfordness for a family picnic. It's precisely the same as lunching at home here together."

"Do you remember, Hugh," Winifred went on, musingly, putting the screw on, "how we walked out that morning, a year ago, be the water-side: and how you picked a bit of forget me-not and meadow-sweet from the bank and gave it me; and what pretty verses about undying love you repeated as you gave it?—And in the evening, mamma, I had to go out to dinner, all alone with you and poor dear papa, to Snade vicarage! I recollect how angry and annoyed I was because I had to go out and leave Hugh that particular evening! and because I'd worn that same dinner dress at Snade vicarage three parties running!"

"Yes," Mrs. Meysey continued, with another deep-drawn sigh; "and what a night that was to be sure! So full of surprises! It was the night, you know, when poor Elsie Challoner ran away from us. You got engaged to Hugh in the morning, and in the evening Elsie disappeared as if by magic! Such a coincidence! Poor dear Elsie! Not a year ago! A year ago to-morrow!"

"No, mother dear. That was the eighteenth. I was engaged on the Wednesday, you recollect, and it was the Thursday when we found out Elsie had gone away from us."

"Thursday the eighteenth when we found it out, dear," Mrs. Meysey repeated in a decisive voice (the maternal mind is strong on dates); "but Wednesday the seventeenth, late in the evening, of course, when she went away from us.—Poor dear Elsie! I wonder what's become of her! It's curious she doesn't write to you oftener, Winifred."

Were they working upon his feelings, of malice prepense? Were they trying to make him blurt out the truth? he wondered. Hugh Massinger in his agony could stand it no longer. He rose from the table and went over to the window. There, the poplar stared him straight in the face. He turned around and looked hard at Winifred. Her expressionless blue eyes were placid as usual. "Then, if it's fine," she said, in an insipid voice, "we'll ask Mr. Relf to give us a lift down to Orfordness to-morrow, in the Mud-Turtle."

"No!" Hugh thundered in an angry tone. "However you go, Relf shan't take you. I don't want to see any more of Relf. I dislike Relf; I object to Relf. He's a mean cur! I won't go anywhere with Relf in future."

"But, children, you should never let your angry passions rise. Winifred murmured provokingly,

Your little hands were never meant
To tear each other's eyes.

If he doesn't want to go in Mr. Relf's boat, he shan't be made to, then, poor little fellow. He shall do exactly as he likes himself. He shall have another boat all of his own. I'll order one this evening for him at Martin's or at Stannaway's."

"If it's fine," Mrs. Meysey interposed parenthetically.

"If it's fine, of course," Winifred answered rising. "We don't want to picnic in a torrent of rain.—Whatever else we may be, we're rational animals.—But how do you know, Hugh, what Orfordness is like? You can't tell. You've never been there."

"I went there once last year," Hugh answered sulkily; "and I saw enough to the beastly hole then to know very well you don't desire its further acquaintance."

"But you never told me you'd been over there."

Hugh managed to summon up a sardonic smile. "I wasn't married to you then, Winnie," he answered, with a savage snarl, that showed his projecting canines with most unpleasant distinctness. "My goings-out and my comings in were not yet a matter of daily domestic inquisition. I hadn't to report myself every time I came or went, like a soldier in barracks to his commanding officer.—I went to Orfordness one day for a walk—by myself—unbidden—for my own amusement."

All that afternoon and late into the evening, Hugh watched the clouds and the barometer eagerly. His fate that day hung upon a spider's web. If it rained to-morrow all might yet be well; if not, he felt in his own soul they stood within measurable distance of a domestic cataclysm. He would not go to Orfordness with Winifred. That much was certain. He could not picnic, on the anniversary of Elsie's death, within sight of Elsie's nameless grave, in company with those two strange women—his wife and his mother-in-law. Ugh! how he hated the bare idea! If it came to the worst—if it was fine to morrow—he must either break for ever with Winifred—for she would never give in—or else he must fling himself off the roots of the poplar, where Elsie had flung herself off that day twelve months ago, and drown as she had drowned among the angry breakers.

There would be a certain dramatic completeness and roundness about that particular fate which commended itself especially to Hugh Massinger's poetical nature. It would read so like a Greek tragedy—a tale of Ate and Hubris and Nemesis. Even from the point of view of the outer world, who knew out the husk, it would seem romantic enough to drown one's self, disconsolate, on the very anniversary of one's first engagement to the young wife one meant to leave an untimely widow. But to Hugh Massinger himself, who knew the whole kernel and core of the story, it would be infinitely more romantic and charming in its way to drown one's self off the self same poplar on the self-same day that Elsie had drowned herself. No bard could wish for a gloomier or more appropriate death. Would it rain or shine? On that slender thread of doubt his whole future now hung and trembled.

The morning of the seventeenth dawned at last, and Hugh rose early, to draw aside the bedroom blinds for a moment. A respite! a respite! It was pouring a regular English downpour. There was no hope—or no danger, rather—of a picnic to day. Thank Heaven for that. It put off his fate. It saved him the inconvenience and worry of having to drown himself this particular morning. And yet the denouement would have been so strictly dramatic that he almost regretted a shower of rain should intervene to spoil it.

At ten o'clock he started out alone in the blinding downpour and took the train as far as Aldeburgh. Thence he followed the shingle beach to Orfordness, plodding on, as he had done a year before, over the loose stones, but through drenching rain, instead of under hot and blazing sunlight. When he reached the lighthouse, he sat himself down in pilgrim guise beside Elsie's grave in the steady drip, and did penance once more by that unknown tomb in solemn silence. Not even the lighthouse man came out this time to gape at him in wonder; it poured too hard and too persistently for that. He sat there alone for half an hour, by Elsie's watch; for he had wound it that morning with reverent hands, and brought it away with him for that very purpose. A little rusty, perhaps, from the sea, it would keep good time enough still for all he needed. At the end of the half-hour he rose once more, plodded back again over the shingle in his dripping clothes, and catching the last train home to Almundham, reached Whitestrand just in time to dress for dinner.

Winifred was waiting for him at the front door, white with emotion—not so much anger as slighted affection. "Where have you been?" she asked, in a cold voice, as he arrived at the porch, a dripping, draggled, wearied pedestrian, in a soaking suit of last year's tweeds.

"Didn't I say well I was bound to report myself to my commanding officer?" Hugh answered tauntingly. "All right, then; I proceed at once to report myself. I may be as well tell you as leave you to worry. I've been to Orfordness—alone—tramped it."

"To Orfordness!" his wife echoed in profound astonishment. "You didn't want to go with us there if it was fine. Why, what on earth, Hugh, did you ever go there in this pelting rain for?"

"Your mother recommended it," Hugh answered stiffenly, "as a place of amusement. She said it was altogether a most delightful excursion. She praised the sands as firm and romantic. So I thought I'd try it on her recommendation. I found it damp, decidedly damp.—Send me my shoes, please!" And that was all the explanation he ever vouchsafed her.

The Late Emperor's Diary.

Nothing could be more superfluous than the announcement authorized by the Emperor of Germany that the extracts from the diary of the late Emperor were published "without his knowledge and against his wish." The announcement is a trifle confused in form, but of course it means that if he had known of the publication he would have objected to it. A more explicit condemnation could not be had than the diary contains of his ideas and methods of government. It is said that Prince Bismarck declares his disbelief in the genuineness of the diary. It is unlikely that he has gone as far as that, though it is altogether probable that he would like the impression to prevail that the diary as published was either forged or garbled. Contradictions and denials in regard to such a matter are not altogether safe. If Prince Bismarck were to declare that the conversations with himself reported in the diary never took place, he would give occasion to the custodian of it to explain how it came into his possession, and to publish the whole of it. According to the circumstantial stories that have been told the copy from which the printed extracts were made is one of several given to friends by the late Emperor. While the possessors of these might refuse consent to their publication, they could scarcely resist a direct appeal to know whether or not the version of the diary alleged to have been garbled corresponded or did not correspond with their own copies. Prince Bismarck is not likely to make a denial in such a form as will raise such an issue.

Affairs in Suakim.

The situation of the British garrison at Suakim has become so serious that reinforcements have been hurried to its aid under General Grenfell and Colonel Kitchener, who have had abundant experience in Nubia and the Soudan. The "rebels" have been shelling the British works from intrenchments thrown up very near them. What they are after is the wells, knowing that with the capture of the water supply the garrison will be in a bad plight.

An Adventure With a Panther.

A correspondent sends to an Indian paper an account of an adventure with a panther. It appears that the inhabitants of Faizpore, a village situated about a mile from the forest bungalow at Kalesar, had been much troubled by a large panther which periodically killed their cattle. Mr. E. A. Down, of the Forest Department, was asked by a village to shoot the panther over a cow which had been killed. He went, but the animal got wind and would not approach the kill. He again tried next day. On approaching at half-past six o'clock in the evening he met the brute in the open. It made off, and the sportsman then took a position close to the kill, shortly after which some cattle came out of the forest, on the rear one of which the panther sprang and killed it. While he was busily engaged Mr. Down knocked it over, but it got away badly hit under cover. Some villagers and one of the forest guards then came up and made a cast round for the panther. This is what transpired: "One of the men suddenly pulled up short, pointing to the beast lying within a couple of yards of me. We all thought him dead. However, not being sure, I ordered the men back. Having got to a safe distance, as I thought, I threw a stone into the bush, when I was promptly charged. I received the brute at close quarters, hitting him in the chest; he reared up on his hind legs and knocked me down, seizing me in the right thigh, lacerating the big muscle and tearing it from the bone. I also received six claw wounds in the hands. The villagers had fortunately all cleared out; but the forest guard was less lucky, although he tried to get away. The panther dropped me and made for the retreating guard; he brushed past me; then I gave him the remaining barrel, catching him in the stomach and blowing a hole as big as my head on the opposite side. I had hoped to stop him with this; but he seized the guard who called to me for assistance. As soon as I could reload I went to the poor fellow, whom I found on the ground with the panther lying on him. It was quite dusk, and I had to get within about ten paces before I could see well enough to make sure of my shot. I saw the panther turn in his direction, and I fully expected another charge; but he funked me and turned to make off, when I hit him in the shoulder and killed him. I picked up the poor guard, who was badly mauled. No bones were broken, so we managed to reach the village."

Yzaloo.

The volcano of Yzalco, in San Salvador is for many reasons the most wonderful mountain upon the globe. It rises several thousand feet high, almost directly from the sea, and is surmounted by an immense column of smoke broken by masses of flames, a thousand feet in height, and rising with such regularity that the mountain has been called "The light-house of San Salvador."

Rumbling and explosions are constantly going on within Yzalco, and are audible at the distance of a hundred miles. Its discharges are very regular, but it is chiefly remarkable as being the only volcano which is known to have originated in America since its discovery by Columbus.

In 1769, the region now occupied by it was a level plain, forming the coffee and indigo plantation of Senor Don Balthazar Evazo. In December of that year, the gentleman was absent from home, and his servants became so alarmed by frequent earthquakes that they fled from the place. When they returned, a week or two later, it was to find that large craters had been opened in the ground, giving vent to smoke and flame.

On the twenty-third of February, 1770, a series of terrific explosions took place, the crust of the earth was lifted several hundred feet, while flames and lava issued from the rent in its surface. An hour later there was another convulsion, which hurled into the air rocks weighing thousands of tons, and elevated the earth about three thousand feet.

Discharges of lava and blistered stone continued for several days, and in less than two months, the level field had become a mountain of a very considerable height. Constant discharges from its crater have since raised it over four thousand feet above the sea.

The Temperature of the Skin.

The experiments of Davy long ago demonstrated irrefutably that the temperature of the interior of the body varied little in man with race, climate or season; yet it is familiar to all that the temperature of the skin varies considerably in different parts, the extremities, for example, and those parts of the skin in which the circulation is feeble being cooler than other parts. Quite recently some interesting experiments to determine these variations of the surface have been made by Prof. Kunkel at Wurzburg. Taking the skin of the face in the first instance, he finds that in men from 20 to 30 years of age it varies from 85 to 89 deg. F., with an approximate average of 88 deg. The skin of the more exposed parts of the body, as the tip of the nose and the ear, in which the circulation is slow and feeble, exhibited a lower temperature, not succeeding in many instances 75 deg. The skin covering the muscular portion of the body is warmer than that over the bones and tendons. Contraction of the muscles caused the temperature of the superadjacent portion of the skin to rise 1 deg. or more. The decrease of temperature from the skin to the outer covering in a room at a temperature of 63 deg. was as follows: On the skin 88 deg., on the linen shirt 82 deg., on the vest 75 deg., and on the coat 72 deg. The highest temperature was found to occur in men in the full vigor of life. As a singular fact, Dr. Kunkel states that children otherwise in perfect health showed a much lower degree of surface temperature—from 77 to 85 deg.—than adults. He does not appear to have followed out Prof. Lombard's observations on the temperature of the head.

A Bird Without a Nest.

The term nighthawk is commonly applied to several species, all of which have certain peculiarities. From its peculiar cry one is called chuck-will's-widow, this call being uttered so loudly by the bird that it has been heard for nearly a mile. About the middle of March they come back from their winter pilgrimage; and, unlike most of the birds, they have no housekeeping to keep them busy, as they build no nests. While the robins, humming birds, thrushes, and others, are busily scouring the country for material with which to build their nurseries, the chuck-will's-widow is fast asleep in some out-of-the-way corner, only coming out in the afternoon and evening to gather its supply of food. When the time comes for laying, our seemingly lazy bird selects some secluded spot, and deposits her eggs anywhere on the ground; and the very first glimpse, if we are fortunate in finding them at all, explains why she builds no nest. The eggs are almost the exact color of the surroundings, and so mottled and tinted that only by the merest accident are they discovered; and when the two little chuck-will's-widows finally come out they are even more difficult to find than the eggs. Being very sleepy little fellows they rarely move, and, though standing within a few inches of them, the observer might suppose them to be two old brown leaves or a bunch of brown moss, so deceiving is their mimicry.

The new corduroy fabrics are called Bedford cords, and show novel patterns in silk and wool, which have proved very popular abroad. One imported costume made at a West End house in London has a skirt of moss-green corduroy or reps, with a stripe of velvet in rich golden brown. Above this is a stylish redingote in Directoire style, this of plain green reps. A second gown in blue Bedford cord of a shade known as the Princess of Wales blue, dark, but unmistakably blue, is striped with the deepest Roman red velvet, the stripe hair-lined at the edges with a vivid gold-coloured thread. There is an English surtout of plain blue cord, with wide lapels of blue velvet braided with gold, the immediate front of the coat showing a narrow vest of the stripe below the fifth button from the top.

AGRICULTURAL.

Feeding Corn.

The Western Rural says: We met a man a few days ago in Chicago, who is engaged in the wholesale cracker business, and keeps three teams. In the course of the conversation we learned he was formerly a farmer, and finally the conversation turned upon horses. He said he used to feed corn altogether, and had more or less sickness among his horses. Now he fed no corn at all, and had not for years, and never had any sickness in his stables. Sometimes people appear to think that if a horse is worked hard, it must have corn. It is an error. Now these horses are driven from four o'clock in the morning until seven at night, and they look well and feel well. In this connection we are reminded of an article that is going the rounds of the press, headed a "Cheaper Way to Feed Horses." The article gives one man's experience. He feeds twelve quarts of oats and twelve quarts of bran a day and he says that his horses are always in good flesh, in the best working order and in a healthy condition. Of course. The paper originally publishing the experience, talks as if it had got hold of a very novel thing. That is the kind of feeding The Rural and Stockman has been teaching for years. Still it is well enough to say that part of a horse's ration may be composed of corn without detriment. It is a very common thing among the most careful feeders to feed half oats and half corn and such a ration does very well for a horse at work. Three parts oats and one part corn, however, would be better.

Yield and Weight of Eggs.

The standard yield and weight of eggs from the different varieties of the domestic fowl, according to the N. Y. World, may be taken as follows: Light Brahmas and Partridge Cochin's eggs, seven to the pound; they lay according to treatment and food, from 80 to 100 per annum: sometimes more if kept well; Dark Brahmas, eight to the pound, and about 70 per annum; Black, White and Buff Cochins, eight to the pound, and 100 is a large yield; Plymouth Rocks, eight to the pound, and they lay 100 per annum; Houdan, eight to the pound, and lay 150 per annum, being non-sitters; La Fleche, seven to the pound, and produce 130 per annum; Black Spanish, seven to the pound, and lay 150 per annum; Dominiques, nine to the pound, and lay 130 per annum; Game fowls, nine to the pound and lay 130 per annum. Creves, seven to the pound, and 150 per annum; Leghorns, nine to the pound, and from 150 to 200 per annum; Hamburgs, nine to the pound, and 150 per annum; Polish, nine to the pound, and 150 per annum; Bantams, 16 to the pound, and 60 per annum; turkeys lay from 30 to 60 eggs per annum, weighing about six to the pound; ducks' eggs vary greatly with different species, but range from five to six to the pound; geese, four to the pound, and 20 per annum; Guinea fowls, 11 to the pound, and 60 per annum.

Transporting Live Stock.

A Cheyenne dispatch, dated Sept. 22, says a new era in transporting live stock to the Atlantic seaboard has been inaugurated by a New York company, and the first train of Idaho beef cattle to make the run through was loaded Sept. 20, at Soda Springs, by the Soda Springs Land & Cattle Company. This shipment consisted of 360 head of fine steers, averaging about 1,350 pounds each, and were loaded in the new improved palace-cars, having a compartment for each animal. The stock is watered and fed in transit. The first train left Soda Springs Thursday at 5 p. m.; Rawlins at 6:05 a.m. Friday; Laramie 10:05; arrived at Cheyenne at 1:45 p. m., and Omaha Saturday noon, making 1,025 miles in about forty-three hours.

The Pear Crop.

The New Jersey pear crop, says good Secretary Williams in the weekly press, is nearly a total failure this year. One of the three largest pear growers in Essex County remarked recently that while they usually aggregated about 6,000 bushels annually between them, if they harvested 200 bushels this season it would be all he could expect, and they were so scattered that the gathering would cost more than they were worth. This means a good market and better prices for more favored localities. The cause assigned is unfavorable weather at the time of fructification. The trees are getting a rest that may prove beneficial.

Tulips and Strawberries.

There is a very odd idea which E. P. Powell proposes to the readers of Popular Gardening: "Having immense quantities of tulips, I thrust one down at the root of every strawberry plant when I plant a new bed; and you ought to see my strawberry garden in spring. Long before the berries ripen it is a vast tulip garden; hundreds waving all colors in the wind. They do no harm whatever to the strawberries or plants. Try it. Nothing multiplies faster than tulips, you know, and fifty bought for two dollars, will in a few years make a hundred

Mr. Justin McCarthy indignantly denies that a single Irish leader has profited pecuniarily from the Nationalist agitation.

President Chamberlain, of the Iowa Agricultural College, does not believe in permanent pastures, preferring a regular rotation of crops, with clover and timothy meadow for two years of the rotation. The land under rotation, is in better heart, and you got more grass, relatively

The Israelites of old could not make brick without straw, and the hen of to day cannot make eggs without suitable material. Broken bone or crushed oyster shells are almost essentials, and are used freely in the fowl-houses of those who make egg-producing and market-poultry a success.

A lady grange-essayist, of Maine, well says of farmers: "They not only give us wheat for our bread, and all other needful things to eat, but they raise the very best crop of men, the noble, great and wise men that have filled our nation and the earth with the glory of their deeds."

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

Emperor William's Journey.—An Expedition to Egypt.

If you are tired of reading about William the Highflyer then the foreign echoes of the week must be vanity and vexation of spirit, for there is nobody else in Europe just now but William. He does more than bestride the situation like the familiar Colossus of metaphor. He is the situation, and it must be conceded that it is a picturesque and highly spectacular affair, taken all in all. There is always a large personal element in big public movements and manifestations, even when we have all the accessories of palaces, thrones, and imperial pageantry provided with troops and courtly equipages. There must be a live man inside the royal robes or the thing falls flat on the popular imagination. Young William is very much alive. There is, it is true, a suspicion of histrionism attaching to his methods, but they are very effective all the same. He fairly threw himself into the arms of the Austrian Emperor when the train came to a stop in the Vienna station, and the two kissed each other over and over again. The emotional attitude thus established has been maintained steadily.

We are likely soon to see some kind of agitation in London for another expedition to Egypt and the Soudan. Gladstone's Nile adventures made the policy of meddling in Egypt so unpopular that heretofore nobody had dared to say a word about repeating the attempt, but should there be a serious fight at Saukin the situation might easily change. News has come in from Khartoum that there is much dissension and great suffering there, and that the new Mahdi is so arbitrary and despotic that the Christian invaders would be welcomed as deliverers.

Sir Charles Dilke, who has left London with Lady Dilke for an Indian trip, has nearly finished a new edition of his "Greater Britain," which is so expanded and rewritten as to be practically a fresh book.

There are many contradictory stories about the German scheme of an Emin relief expedition, so many in fact that it is impossible to guess whether the thing is going to start or not. Here in England the enterprise is generally regarded as masking a scheme for the seizure of a lot of African territory. The "Kolnische Zeitung" threw cold water on the plan by printing a statement that Emin was born a Jew and his real name is Isaac Schnitzler.

MISS EUPHEMIA, daughter of the late Widow Black, north part of Dunwich, who has been ailing for some time, died suddenly on Monday morning. The funeral took place on Tuesday, the remains being interred in Black's cemetery. Deceased was aged 17 years, and had been a student of the Dutton High school.

A MEETING of the creditors of Urlin Bros. who recently assigned, was held in St. Thomas on Tuesday. We understand that nothing definite was arrived at, more than the summing up of the assets and liabilities. The liabilities of the two places appear to be about $6,000 and $9,000—$15,000—with $5,000 insurance in favor of the creitors, that with the two stocks of goods and book accounts should make the creditors pretty safe.

A GREAT BARGAIN.—We have made arrangements with the great agricultural weekly, Farm and Fireside, by which we are able to supply our subscribers with that paper to the end of 1889, and the Weekly Mail to the end of 1889, and our own paper for one year for Two dollars. Farm and Fireside is a large 7 column, 4 page weekly, two pages being devoted to agricultural matters and two pages to stories by the best authors. It is well illustrated throughout and has a large circulation at 75 cents a year. The low price at which we give it and the Weekly Mail is a special arrangement.

FROSTS are advertising the coming of winter in russet and gold lettering on the once green walls of the woods. The icy promise of coming coldness breathes in every breeze. The Campbellton correspondent to the Journal, writes as follows:—Vigilance is being continued unabated to preserve the grave of the late John Finlayson, whose interment was effected six weeks ago last Saturday, from being desecrated by the disciples of Esculapius. A tent has been constructed composed of canvas, which is occupied by two stalwart men who are regaled with refreshments every night by friends of the deceased.

WHEN A. D. Urlin, the bankrupt Wallacetown merchant, now in the States, told a lawyer in St. Thomas that he had paid $1,800 to Wood & Legatt, of this city, being a part of his insurance money, he drew the long bow in a most decided manner. Urlin has paid Wood & Leggatt nothing, but as he only owes the firm $80 they are not so badly off as some of the other creditors. It was a clever scheme of Urlin's to pick up the insurance and walk away with it.—Hamilton Times.

Toronto Telegram: "We trust the day is not far distant when the newspaper men will shut down on the promiscuous deadhead business, and apply exactly the same rule to his columns as the merchant does to his yard of cotton, or the grocer to his pound of tea. The deadhead vampires who haunt newspaper offices should be told that they are not wanted, unless they have cold cash in their pockets. They are anxious that the newspaper man should give away his space, although it is very noticeable that in nine cases out of ten the class of persons referred to have nothing to give away except good advice."

A VERY quiet and pleasant wedding took place Wednesday morning, 17th inst., at the residence of Mr. O. L. Soules, station-master. The interested parties were Mr. F. W. Drake, merchant, and Miss Mary E. Black, sister of Mrs. Soules. The ceremony was performed by Rev. W. Grant. With the exception of a few, the invited guests were the relatives of the bride and bridegroom. A number of very beautiful presents were presented to the bride, a fine family Bible deserving special mention. The newly-married couple left on the mail train for the east on their wedding tour amid showers of rice and old slippers.

OUR WANTS.

To the Editor of the ENTERPRISE:—

Will it be out of place to call attention to a few of the wants of our progressive village. There are many things in connection with the village of which we have no need to feel ashamed, notably our school buildings, which would be a credit to a town much larger than this; so also the large mill and other things that might be mentioned. Still we really do need some few things more. For example, it would be a decided improvement if the pathmaster would give immediate attention to the sidewalk on Shackleton street, especially in the neighborhood of the ENTERPRISE office, or some night the editor or city reporter will be breaking his legs and then there will be the doctor to pay, the leg to replace with a new one, and, worse and worse, no editorial for a week or two. Thus saith your correspondent. Amend your ways. A little prevention may be more valuable than a great deal of anxiety and regret after damage is done. We will call attention to another want next week. Yours, etc.,

WATCHMAN.

RODNEY FAIR.

The Aldborough Branch Agricultural Society held its fall show on its grounds in Rodney on Saturday last.

The exhibits in some departments were not so numerous as last year, which was accounted for by the disagreeableness of the weather, it having rained hard all day and night previous and most of Saturday; however the show was good considering the weather.

The entries in all classes of horses were not full, but some were represented by a good class of stock. The exhibit of cattle and sheep was large and the stock well bred, especially the sheep, which appear to be the favorite stock of the yoemanry of Aldborough. There was a fair exhibit of swine which were also of good stock. The show of poultry was also good, there being some fine birds on exhibition. There was not much of an exhibit in agricultural implements, there being only a few pieces. The Chatham wagons were shown by Mr. Carter, who is agent for that firm. Mr. Matthews had some carriages ready but on account of the unfavorable weather did not take them out.

The exhibit in the main building was not so large as last year, there being less in most every department. The show of grain was large and of good quality, especially the corn. Roots and vegetables, potatoes and apples, few but of excellent quality; other fruits very few.

The show in needle work by the ladies was not so large as formerly, but some of it showed great skill in finish.

F. J. Lindenman, of West Lorne, and one of the milliners of Rodney made displays of millinery. Noah Dodd, taxidermist, of West Lorne, made a fine display of stuffed birds and animals and took first prize in each.

There were a few paintings which would attract the eye of the artist.

Messrs. J. J. Mistele & Co., merchants, Rodney, made a fine display of their store goods in the hall which reflected much credit on the business capacity of that enterprising firm

The Bell Organ Company was represented by J. M. Jackson, of Dutton, agent for this section, who had on exhibition some grand instruments, the make of that company.

The fair is supposed to have been a success financially. The attendance was estimated at from 2,500 to 3,000, and the receipts at about $600. Had the weather and roads been favorable the attendance might have reached 5,000.

The eyes were satisfied in self-admiration by W. A. Brush, photo. artist, of Dutton, who had his photo. car on the ground. The curious were satisfied with the side show, "Punch and Judy." The eye was also satisfied and the brain aroused in the other side show, "The Litte World," which is a marvelous piece of mechanism and well worth the small admission of ten cents. The pocket was satisfied by the fakirs, who carried off a good supply of the fools' hard-earned cash. We say the fakirs should be taken care of. Some would say that people should not be such fools to chance their money with them. We say the fools should be protected. We believe Rodney show beats any in the county for money-catchers and gamblers.

RODNEY.

Mr. Patterson's new hotel was largely patronized the day of the fair.

E. J. Schmid, jeweler, has moved into one of the stores in Eberhardt's new block. He has a convenient and handsomely furnished store.

J. Gray, tailor, was home from Tilbury Centre on Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. Johnson has closed the cheese factory for this season and will give his whole attention to his baking and confectionery business.

The brickwork of the other two stores in the Eberhardt block is nearly done.

There was a great deal of drinking done here on the day of the fair. It showed itself in some individuals during the day and very loudly during the evening.

A number of Dunwichites exhibited at the fair here last Saturday. A. J. Leitch, reeve, took second prize on his carriage team.

Mr. Eberhardt is carrying on business in his new store There is a striking difference between his present shop and the one in which he started working a few years ago.

Hugh, youngest son of Dr. McDonald, of Rodney, is attending the Western University at London. He spent Saturday and Sunday home with his parents.

The gentleman who has been Mr. Porter's tinsmith for the past few years has started in business for himself.

WHAT IS A SLEEPER?—The Boston Journal of Commerce puts the question and then answers it thus: A sleeper is one who sleeps. A sleeper is that in which the sleeper sleeps. A sleeper is that on which the sleeper runs while the sleeper sleeps. Therefore, while the sleeper sleeps in the sleeper the sleeper carries the sleeper over the sleeper, under the sleeper, until the sleeper which carries the sleeper jumps the sleeper and wakes the sleeper in the sleeper by striking the sleeper under the sleeper on the sleeper, and there is no longer any sleeper sleeping in the sleeper on the sleeper.

Monday morning a gang of between thirty and forty men went to work on the Canadian Pacific railway extension, in the neighborhood of the Chapter House, London. As soon as work in that locality is completed the force will be removed across the river, when the number of men will be considerably augmented.

A WOFUL CALAMITY.

MANY EXCURSIONISTS KILLED ON THE LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD.

WILKESBARRE, Pa., Oct. 11.—The fifth division of the Father Matthew excursion train on the Lehigh Valley Railroad, rturning from Hazelton, was wrecked above Pennahaven yesterday morning, and the cars piled in one shapeless mass, one being stood upon its end. All the cars were crowded and the fatalities will run into woful figures. All the physicians from Whitchaven and near-by points are at the wreck, as are all the Lehigh officials from this city. The number killed is variously reported at from 25 to 80 persons.

The accident on the Lehigh Valley at Mud Run, near Pennahaven, is beyond all question the most awful disaster that ever happened in this portion of the state. Though no details can be learned, there is no doubt that the number of killed will reach nearly 80 and the injured nearly double that. The trains were excursion trains returning from the celebration at Hazleton, the annual parade of the Catholic temperance societies of the Scranton diocese. Thousands of people went down to Hazleton from the towns of Luzerne and Lakawanna counties. Seven trains with the cars piled to the doors passed through Whitchaven this morning taking the old route by Pennahaven. On the return the first train passed Hazleton about 5 p.m., the others following as rapidly as deemed safe. The first three sections came through without accident, the disaster happening to the fourth and fifth sections.

For some reason not explained the fourth section was standing on the track near the little station of Mud Run, five miles below Whitehaven, when the fifth section dashed around a curve close behind and crashed into it. The cars were smashed and broken and hurled off the track. The road lies close beside the Lehigh river, a steep embankment sixty feet high running down to the water Several of the cars rolled down this and others were crushed against the cutting on the other side. No direct communication has been established with the scene of the disaster and the railroad officials, if they know anything, absolutely refuse to give any information.

Reports about the accident are very conflicting. It is known, however, from dispatches received at the depot that the accident is quite as bad as first reported and that at least thirty are killed. Most of the injured are said to be from Scranton and Lackawanna counties.

A HEAD COLLISION.

Saturday afternoon No. 9 M. C. R. express for the east and No. 12 for the west were considerably delayed. No. 12 was delayed through a car and its contents being ditched two miles west of Highgate through an axle breaking. No. 9 was delayed through two freights coming together a mile and a half west of Cornell. Mr. R. W. Greene, agent and operator at Cornell, had orders to hold Conductor Kilgour's extra west, and Conductor Hill's extra west for Conductor Garbutt's extra east. Conductor Garbutt had orders to go into the side track at Cornell, which is the only station where east-bound trains take the side track. Mr. Green forgot to put out the order board, and Conductor Kilgour's train passed on. A few minutes afterwards he heard a crash and, realizing his neglect, put out the order board and held Hill's train. Fortunately the approaching trains saw each other, and the east-bound train was at a standstill when the collision took place. The west-bound train consisted of thirty-four cars and was going at about four or five miles an hour. Both engines were slightly damaged, one derailed and knocked off its trucks. Only one car loaded with spirits fermenti was wrecked, though a number of draw-heads were broken. The wrecker went down and the blockade was soon removed. Mr. Green has been operator at Cornell since December 24, 1880, and has been agent for the past six years. It is the first charge against him during his eight years of service. He is a married man and has a family.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and bilousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

A PLAIN STATEMENT.
All poisonous waste, and worn out matter ought to escape from the system through the secretions of the bowels, kidneys and skin. B.B.B. cleanses, opens and regulates these natural outlets for the removal of disease.
The Transcript is agitating for a public market for Glencoe.

A GOOD NEIGHBOR.
"Late last fall I was laid up in bed three days with a very severe attack of diarrhoea and vomiting. Nothing benefited me till my neighbor, Mrs. Dunning recommended Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and brought me a half bottle, which she had in her house the vomiting was stopped, and I was able to sit up by night. I would not think of using any other medicine." Columbus Hopkins, Hamilton, Ont

W. H. Pray, of the Alvinston Stave Works, shipped twenty car-loads of orange barrels to Cuba.

A TERRIBLE TEN YEARS.
Mrs. Thomas Acres, of Huntly, Ont., suffered all the tortures of liver complaint for ten years. Four bottles of B.B.B. entirely cured her, making her like a new woman again, after other medicines had failed to relieve her.

"Say, country, have you got any hayseed in your hair?" cried a city chap who was walking with his companions down the street, just behind a farmer. "Wall, I guess there is lots of it there, seein' how the calves run arter me," was the satisfactory answer.

No Universal Remedy
has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,
which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.
Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.
That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.
All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.
Ayer's Sarsaparilla,
PREPARED BY
Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by all Druggists. Price $1; six bottles, $5.

Out in Iowa, at the fairs last year, there were 38 couples married, and they captured some valuable prizes for the publicity of their nuptials. Of the 38 couples married, 37 were divorced within thirteen months.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

The journal is agitating for a roller mill at St. Marys.

Charles Tomlinson, night-watchman of the Plewes, mill, Holmsdale, had recently a roll of bills to the value of $177 stolen out of his coat, which he had thrown off, by the rats. After a diligent search he recovered the money near a rat hole, some of it being considerably gnawed.

Mr. Peter Stock, of Kinkora, shot a huge black bear on his farm on the 8th concession of Ellice, recently. He was working in a field adjoining the woods when bruin bobbed out. Mr. Stock repaired to the house, secured his rifle and dispatched his bearship, which weighed over 300 lbs. There are, it is said, several bears yet remaining in the Ellice swamp.

AN OLD FAVORITE
that has been popular with the people for 30 years is Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for all varieties of summre complaints of children or adults. It seldom or ever fails to cure cholera morbus, diarrhœa and dysentery.

The Christian Guardian says of "Rev." Wad el-Ward, who has been lecturing in St. Thomas: "We are informed that an imposter, calling himself Dr. Wad-el-Ward, has been deceiving our ministers and others in the western part of this Province. He pretends to be a Jerusalem Hebrew Christian. He is an unprincipled adventurer, and should be given a wide berth."

NEARLY A TRAGEDY.—Woodstock was nearly being the scene of a tragedy as mysterious as the Whitechapel murders or the Galt candy affair. The other evening a lady was walking up Dundas street with a parcel under her arm. When nearly opposite the Sentinel-Review office the paper wrapping of the parcel exploded with a muffled, rumbling sound. Simultaneously with the explosion a curiously shaped missile shot out from under the lady's arm and passing through the atmosphere with a whirring sound, fell ker-plunk on the street. A curious crowd collected around the strange looking object and various were the conjectures as to what it really was. Some thought it might be an infernal machine let loose by some blood-thirsty Fenian; others thought it might be some celestial communication to Prof. Butler with reference to the weather. But no one was sufficiently courageous to verify his opinion. Finally the lady from whose arms the horrid thing had escaped, pushed her way through the crowd, fearlessly picked up the alleged monstrosity, and asking the excited spectators if they never saw a bustle before, walked off.—Woodstock Sentinel-Review.

"GIVE, GIVE."

CHURCHES AS WELL AS PEOPLE SHOULD PAY AS THEY GO.

The following pertinent remarks from the Wallaceburg Herald are applicable to a good many churches all over the country;

Down near Blenheim a minister has created quite a discussion because he asked the people of his congregation to go down into their pockets and build as fine a church as their neighbors have. The congregation is not large, and claim not to be very wealthy, therefore unable to build a fine church. We do not claim to know anything of the circumstances of this particular case, but it is an undeniable fact, nevertheless, that mortgaged churches are too numerous. Worshipping congregations are becoming a prey to a weakness for architectural millinery. One seeks to excel in grandeur the other church, and the fierce breezes of competition have sent them all sailing on the seas of extravagance. Too many churches, like too many people, live beyond their means. They are building upon their confidence in the future. This faith may be founded upon a rock, but the church of to-day would be just as powerful in the work of winning souls if its places of worship were simple in construction. Churches, like individuals, ought to pay as they go. Laymen are generally unwilling to assume burdensome obligations, but their good pastors in their zeal sincerely desire to glorify God by rearing stately piles of brick and mortar. They often compare the glories of Solomon's temple to the ragged exteriors and plain interiors of their own churches, until the worshippers are shamed into raising money to erect gorgeous edifices in honor of Him "who dwelleth not in temples made with hands." They get their new church. It has a graceful spire, red cushioned seats and a mortgage. The old, old story is heard from the pulpit less and less, and appeals for contributions towards the church debt more and more. The sum spent to spread the Gospel amongst the heathen does not compare with the amount paid in interest upon borrowed money every year. Pastors and people are so busy organizing schemes to wipe out the debt, that the church must turn aside from the more blessed work of lifting up the fallen and preaching the Gospel to the poor. Hungry souls are not satisfied with sermons upon the duty of giving. Yet the text of the preacher in the mortgaged church must be "Give, Give." And money goes into bricks and mortar, though women starve and little children stray out on the path to the jail and to the gallows. Their miseries are too often passed unnoticed. True, earnest Christian men and women do all that is done to uplift the fallen; but how their power for good would be increased if a fraction of the money spent upon the architectural embroidery of buildings—that are of less eternal consequence than one human soul—was used in doing such work as the Master did on earth! The church must come near to the people. It would still be a conquering force if its temples were plain tabernacles in which thousands could hear the teachings of Christ.

A HORRIBLE PRESENT.

LONDON, Oct. 20.—George Lusk, a builder, is the head of a Whitechapel vigilance committee. Late on Tuesday night the parcel post delivery left a box at his house. Upon opening it he discovered a meaty substance which smelled very strong, and which he judged to be the half of a kidney belonging to some animal. Enclosed in the box was the following letter: "I send half of the kidney I took from one of the women. I preserved it for you. T'other piece I fried and ate. It was very nice. I may send you the bloody knife that took it out, if you will only wait a while longer." Mr. Lusk at first regarded the whole thing as a joke. But remembering that such an organ had been taken from the Mitre square victim, he took the box to the London hospital. Dr. Openshaw examined the enclosure, and said that it certainly came from a full grown woman, and had been divided longitudinally. Subsequently the box and letter were taken to Scotland yard, and the detectives are trying to find out in what postal district the parcel was handed in. The handwriting in the letter bears no resemblance to the handwriting of the letters of "Jim the Ripper," found some time ago.

THE GALT POISONING CASE.

GALT, Oct. 21.—Detective Murray on Saturday afternoon arrested a girl named Hannah Boyd, at Thorold, on a charge of being implicated in the Galt poisoning case. At the time of her arrest she was passing under the name of Hannah Boyd. She was brought to Berlin, taken before D. Spiers, J.P., and remanded for a week. She is now in Berlin jail.
When arrested she was employed as a servant at the house of a prominent citizen of Thorold, where she had been working for some months past. Mr. Murray returned to Toronto this morning. No further facts can be obtained at present, as the authorities consider it most important that the knowledge in their possession should, in the interests of justice, be withheld for a few days, otherwise the investigation may be materially obstructed.

It is useless to attempt the cure of any disorder if the blood is allowed to remain impure. Neuralgia and rheumatism are traceable to a disordered condition of the blood, and in numberless cases have been cured by taking a few bottles of Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Adam A. Wigle, a well-known resident of Kingsville, is dead, a victim of typhoid fever.

The gas well at Thorold is now down 1,600 feet, but no gas has yet been struck.

The experience of years furnishes the most convincing evidence that thousands of lives are annualy saved by the use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. It speedily cures all affections of the throat, bronchial tubes and lungs.

An East Oxford man who was out in Dakota this fall attended a county fair of the regulation Dakota kind at Plankington. The exhibition consisted of a bull and a pumpkin. The bull got loose and ate up the pumpkin and the fair ended right there.—Woodstock Times.

James F. Farley was sentenced to death at the Peterboro' assizes last week for shooting and killing Simon Elijah, a half-breed Indian, of St. Thomas, at Peterboro', on the 24th of June last, while Howe's circus was showing there. The murderer and his victim were both attaches of the circus, which started from St. Thomas last May. Bad feeling had existed between them for some time and the shooting was deliberate. Farley is to be hanged on the 8th of November.

COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

AN AGED AND AMOROUS FARMER CHARGED WITH INDECENT ASSAULT.

Mr. Joseph A. Doan, farmer, Southwold, and who also owns a farm in Aldborough, was arrested Thursday, on a warrant charging him with indecent assault upon Mrs. Gilbert, wife of Mr. John Gilbert, an Aldborough farmer. The hearing took place Friday morning before Mr. D. McGregor, J. P., at West Lorne. Mr. George McCarter, the of county attorney's office, appearing for prosecution, and Mr. H. F. Jell, of Rodney, for the defence. The defendant is said to be 65 years of age, and the fair plaintiff has seen but twenty-two summers. It is charged that the defendant made improper proposals to her and afterwards attempted to compel the plaintiff by force to accede to his requests. After hearing the evidence the accused was committed for trial, being released on bail, $500 on himself and two surities of $250 each.

THE SCOTT ACT.

THE VIOLATORS PAY THEIR FINES.

Wm. Wilson, bartender for Mrs. W. Smith, Rodney, for whose arrest a warrant was issued by Police Magistrate Leonard, pleaded guilty to a first violation of the Scott Act on Friday last and and was fined $50 and costs. J. McIntyre, Dutton; F. Lindenman, West Lorne; August Decow, Eagle, and David Patterson, Rodney, have also pleaded guilty to first offences and been fined $50 and costs. W. Eustes, Dutton; Thomas Oliver, Shedden; John McMillan and Benjamin Partridge, West Lorne, have pleaded guilty to second offences and been fined $100 and costs. Mrs. W. Smith, Rodney, will defend the charge.
The twenty-three St. Thomas hotelkeepers charged with a second violation, and one with a first violation, acknowledged the corn and were fined $50 and $1 35 costs for first offences, and $100 and costs for second offences. The city treasury will therefore be replenished to the extent of $2,382.40 by this raid.

SOME LIQUOR STATISTICS.

LONDON, Oct. 17.—Among the transactions of the recent Church Congress at Manchester, which has not received as much attention as it deserved, was a paper by Rev. Grant Mills on "The Liquor Traffic Among African Natives." Among other interesting facts contained in this paper it appears that the total exports of spirits to Africa by the leading exponents of civilization during 1887 amounted to 6,628,055 gallons. The quantity was divided among the different nations in the following proportions: Germany, 5,481,000 gallons; United Statts, 747,030 gallons; Great Britian, 398,980 gallons, and Portugal, 646 gallons. Germany, therefore, stands facile princeps in the pious work of exterminating the nigger, and princeps in quality as well as quantity, I should say, for all the German liquor is exported from Hamburg and Bremen, and we all know what that implies. The gin and rum are said to be occasionally used by printers for turpentine. It is recorded that a gorilla, which had been procured at the Gaboon River, oied on the way home, and in order to preserve the body properly it was placed in a cask of trake rum, but that when the cask was opened at Liverpool it was found that the hair and skin of the gorilla had been burned as if by vitriol, and that the body was in a terrible state of putrefaction.

CANADIAN GOLD FIELDS.

R. J. Macconnell, of the geological survey staff, has just returned to Ottawa after making a geological exploration of the Yukon and Mackenzie rivers. The Yukon he discribes as a river of immense size and volume, 2,300 miles in length and navigable for fully 2,000 miles. The Yukon runs through about 300 miles of the gold range, and the precious metal may easily be seen by the naked eye in the ledges of the rocks that bound either bank, but so far all mining for gold is done in placers, miners washing out at the bars on the river from $10 to $20 a day. But this can only be carried on for about two months in the year, owing to the high water, and frost comes early and stops all operations.

The Michigan crop report for October indicates that the wheat product of Michigan for the present year amounts to 23,581,504 bushels, an average of 13.8 bushels per acre. This is about 858,000 bushels greater than the crop of 1887. It is estimated that the average yield of corn for the State is about 30 bushels of shelled corn per acre. Potatoes and winter apples are about two thirds of a full average crop.

RECEIVED FOUR YEARS.—James Drmmond, who killed D. L. Brault, at Essex Centre on the 8th of August, while both were intoxicated, and who was convicted of manslaughter at the Sandwich Assizes last week, was taken before Justice Falconbridge, at Sandwich, on Saturday, for sentence. The prisoner's council Mr. Blackstock, made an eloquent and effective appeal on his behalf. Sheriff Her stated he had known Drummond from the latters infancy, and he had never known anyseriously derogatory to his character previously, and that he believed the prisoner morally incapable of comitting intentional murder. Drummond himself made a statement to the court solemnly declaring his innocence of the desire or any intention to kill his opponent, but that proved fatal in what he believed to be self-defence. Nearly everybody in the court-room was visably affected. The judge sentenced the prisoner to four years in the penetentiary

Dr. Bohmert, under the title of "Emperor Frederick as a Friend of the people," has published a sixty page pamphlet containing contributions from the chief promoters of philanthropy in the kingdom, who met Emperor Frederick in that connection. The contributors included Van Bunzen, Curtius, Eberty, Gneist, and Schrader. The pamphlet gives trustworthy information regarding the sentiments, aims, and acts of Emperor Frederick. Prof. Curtius says that the trait of magnanimity was characteristic of the late Emperor from childhood. Bunzen writes:—"With nothing was the soul of Frederick more deeply penetrated from his earliest years than with the desire for the welfare of all classes of the people."

Ingersoll Played Out.

The "boss infidel" is played out, even as a politician. For several years he had two sources of fame and revenue. He roamed up and down the land lecturing in public halls against the Bible and those who love it, never failing to charge as high prices as he could get for tickets of admission. He also hired himself out during political campaigns to make political speeches. One line of operations seemed to help the other. His blasphemous harangue in one place called attention to him and helped to draw hearers to his political address somewhere else. And in turn the stump speech quickened curiosity to hear what he had to say against the doctrines and principles of Christianity. In course of time people got tired of paying fifty cents or a dollar apiece to hear him make sport of sacred things, but they still were willing to listen to one of his political speeches, paid for by a campaign committee. Now the latter source of income has been shut off for the most part and the voice of the once noted orator is rarely heard in public places. He was an orator for revenue only and he has ceased to command the cash. Down in New York his plans for making a number of campaign speeches have been checkmated by leading men of the very party whose cause he wanted to champion. Up in Minnesota a report having got abroad that he was to be sent there under pay to stump the State an emphatic protest against his appearance was entered. That protest was signed by men who had the interests of their party at heart and did not want them jeopardised by the advocacy of a godless speaker. And so the fellow's favorite occupation's gone.

BIRD COURTS OF JUSTICE

Several writers have given descriptions of proceedings of assemblies of birds of various species which they regarded as formal "trials in court." While this view of the nature of the transactions noticed can not yet be accepted as established by competent observation, they are certainly of an interesting character, and reveal a peculiar phase of bird life. Dr. Edmondson describes regular assemblies of crows of the hooded species—"crow-courts" they are called—which are held at certain intervals in the Shetland Isles. A particular hill or field suitable for the business is selected, but nothing is done till all are ready, and consequently the earliest comers have sometimes to wait for a day or two till the others arrive. When all have come, the court opens in a formal manner, and the presumed criminals are arraigned at the bar. A general croaking and clamor are raised by the assembly, and judgment is delivered, apparently by the whole court. As soon as the sentence is given, the entire assemblage, "judges, barristers, ushers, audience and all, fall upon the two or three prisoners at the bar, and beat them till they kill them." As soon as the execution is over, the court breaks up, and all its members disperse quietly.

The Rev. Dr. J. Edmund Cox has given the particulars of a trial by rooks which he witnessed between fifty and sixty years ago. He was riding along a quiet road in the vicinity of Norwich, England, when he was startled by sounds of an extraordinary commotion among the inhabitants of an adjacent rookery. Securing his horse to a gate, he cautiously crawled for a hundred feet or so, to a gap in the hedge of a grass-field, to investigate proceedings. A trial by jury was seemingly going on. The criminal took "at first appeared very perky and jaunty, although encircled by about forty or fifty of an evidently indignant sable fraternity, and assailed by the incessantly vehement cawing of an outer ring, consisting of many hundreds, each and all showing even greater indignation than was manifested by the more select number." Even the scouts, although hovering about in all directions, were so deeply absorbed in the proceedings that they failed to notice their uninvited spectator. After a short time, the manner of the accused was seen suddenly and completely to change; his head bowed, his wings drooped, and he cawed faintly, as if imploring mercy. The inner circle closed in upon him and pecked him to pieces in a few moments, leaving nothing but a mangled carcass. The whole assembly then set up a tremendous screaming and dispersed; some seeking the adjacent rookery, but the greater number flying away across the fields. It is commonly known that rooks are addicted to pilfering, and that if the robbery is detected the offender is punished. It has been noticed that young rooks will often pilfer twigs or other useful materials from the nests of their elders, with which to build their own domiciles quickly; and although they are too cunning to be caught in the act, only committing their thefts when both the owners of the neat are absent, the robbery seems always to get known. When the crime has been discovered and proved, eight or ten rooks are apparently deputed to act on behalf of the whole community; they proceed to the convicts' nest, and in a few moments reatter it to the winds.

An Alpine tourist relates that, during an excursion in the Swiss mountains, he accidentally came upon a small secluded glen, which was surrounded by trees, and became the unexpected witness of a singular spectacle. About sixty or seventy ravens were ranged in a ring round one of their fellows, evidently reputed a culprit, and, with much clatter of tongues and wings, were engaged in discussing his alleged delinquencies. At intervals they paused in their debate, in order to permit the accused to reply, which he did most vociferously and with intense energy; but all his expostulations were speedily drowned in a deafening chorus of dissent. Eventually, the court appears to have arrived at the unanimous conclusion that the felon had utterly failed to exculpate himself; and they suddenly flew at him from all sides, and tore him to pieces with their powerful beaks. Having executed their sentence, they speedily disappeared.

Sparrows also are said to hold judicial inquiry into the conduct of, and mete out punishment to, their fellow-sparrows, but without the formalities which the rooks seem to observe. When a misdeed has been brought home to any one of their community, a force of four or more sparrows is deputed to carry out the execution of the verdict. In their hurry to discharge the decree, they all tumble over one another with the greatest pugnacity, uttering a violent clamor. The castigation is soon over, and "the unfortunate sufferer having endured the penalty," says Mr. G. Garratt, in his "Marvels of Instinct," "is as well received afterward by the community as if it had committed no transgression at all."

Mr. Garratt repeats the following story from Father Bougeant: "A sparrow, finding a nest that a martin had just built, possessed himself of it. The martin, seeing the usurper in her house, called for help to expel him. A thousand martins came full speed, and attacked the sparrow; but the latter being covered on every side, and presenting only his large beak at the entrance of the nest, was invulnerable, and made the boldest of them that dared approach him repent of their temerity. After a quarter of an hour's combat, all the martins disappeared. The sparrow thought he had got the better, and the spectators judged that the martins had abandoned their undertaking. Not in the least. They immediately returned to the charge; and each of them having procured a little of that tempered earth with which they make their nests, they all at once fell upon the sparrow, and enclosed him in the nest to perish there, though they could not drive him thence."

Another equally tragic story is recorded by the Rev. G. Gogerly in "The Pioneers," his narrative of the Bengal mission: "The flamingo," he remarks, "is common in the low, marshy lands of Bengal. My friend Mr. Lacroix—the well known missionary—when once sailing in his boat up the Hooghly, went on shore. His attention was shortly directed to a large gathering of these peculiar-looking birds in a field some little distance off. Knowing their timid character, he approached as near as he could without being observed or exciting alarm; and, hiding himself behind a tree, noticed all their proceedings, which were of a most remarkable character. After a good deal of noisy clamor, they formed themselves into a circle, in the center of which one of their number was left standing alone. Again there was a considerable amount of screeching bird oratory, when suddenly all the birds flew on the unhappy solitary one and literally tore him to pieces." The conclusion to which Mr. Lacroix came to was, that one of these flamingos had committed an offence against the rules of their order, that he had been tried by a kind of court-martial, was found guilty, and had been adjudged, and met with immediate punishment.

The following stories concerning storks seem to indicate that they have views concerning the purity of their race, and act upon them: Bishop Stanley relates that a French surgeon at Smyrna, being unable to procure a stork, on account of the great veneration entertained for them by the Turks, purloined all the eggs from a stork's nest, and replaced them with hen's eggs. Ultimately chickens were hatched, greatly to the surprise of the storks. The male stork speedily disappeared, and was not seen for two or three days, when he returned with a large number of other storks, who assembled in a circle in the town, without paying any attention to the numerous spectators their proceedings attracted. The female stork was brought into the midst of the circle, and after some discussion, was attacked by the whole flock and torn to pieces. The assemblage then dispersed, and the nest was left tenantless.

A somewhat similar case has been cited by the same author as having occurred in the vicinity of Berlin. Two storks made their nest on one of the chimneys of a mansion; and the owner of the house inspecting it, found in it an egg, which he replaced by one belonging to a goose. The storks did not appear to notice the change until the egg was hatched, when the male bird rose from the nest, and, after flying around it several times with loud screams, disappeared. For some days the female bird continued to tend the changeling without interruption; but on the morning of the fourth the inmates of the house were disturbed by loud cries in a field fronting it. The noise proceeded from nearly five hundred storks standing in a compact body listening, apparently, to the harangue of a solitary bird about twenty yards off. When this bird had concluded its address, it retired, and another took its place and addressed the meeting in a similar manner. These proceedings were continued by a succession of birds until eleven in the forenoon, when the whole court arose simultaneously into the air, uttering dismal cries. All this time the female had remained in her nest, but in evident fear. When the meeting broke up, all the storks flew toward her, headed by one—supposed to be the offended husband—who struck her violently three or four times, knocking her out of the nest. The unfortunate stork made no effort to defend herself, and was speedily destroyed by the troop, who also annihilated the hapless gosling, and left not a fragment of the contaminated nest.

The Rev. F. O. Morris, in his anecdotes of "Animal Sagacity," cites the following instance of a care which ended less tragically: "Some hens' eggs," he says, "were placed in a stork's nest, and the others removed. The female, not aware of the change, sat patiently the appointed number of days, till the shells were broken and the young chickens made their appearance. No sooner were they seen by the old birds, than they testified their surprise by harsh notes and fierce looks; and, after a short pause, they jointly fell upon the unfortunate chickens and pecked them to pieces, as if conscious of the disgrace which might be supposed to attach to a dishonored nest."

A singular case of almost poetic justice among storks is noticed even in so old a work as Goldsmith's "Natural History," into which it was imported from Mrs. Starke's "Letter in Italy." "A wild stork," runs the tale, "was brought by a farmer in the neighborhood of Hamburg into his poultry-yard, to be the companion of a tame one he had long kept there; but the tame stork, disliking a rival, fell upon the poor stranger, and beat him so unmercifully that he was compelled to take wing, and escaped with difficulty. About four months afterward, however, the latter returned to the poultry-yard, in company with three other storks, who no sooner alighted, than they fell upon the tame stork and killed him."

The Emperor's Diary.

While Prince Bismarck and his partisans seek to discredit the published extracts from the late Emperor Frederick's diary by declaring them apocryphal, it is not a little significant that the Chancellor's newspaper organs are assailing the memory of the dead Kaiser, and are vilifying him, both his character and intellect. One journal refers to him as a self-complacent idealist, rich in beautifully phrased generalities, but poor in the qualities of a practical statesman. If the published extracts from the diary are not genuine there can be no excuse for the attempt to belittle the statesmanship of the late Emperor. The policy of the Chancellor's organs will be accepted generally throughout Europe as an admission that the published diary is authentic.

New serges, camel's-hair goods, cashmeres, and vigognes are exhibited, with stripes, checks, plaids of large size, and odd borderings in Persian and Japanese patterns. These are likely to be very popular, but while this is the case, it does not follow that either style will predominate over the other handsome patterns in market, for there are many novel and attractive gowns made entirely of plain unpatterned fabrics. A large number of the imported tailor costumes have a wrap to match, these grading from the long stylish English "overall" of Queen's tweed, with turban or Princess of Wales cap to correspond, to the diminutive pelerine fastened with a pretty silver clasp.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

Immense Destruction by the Floods—Cholera Still Raging.

Late Chinaa advices, via San Francisco, state that the whole of the new embankment of the Yellow river at Chang Chow, begun last autumn and carried on at a cost equal to over $9,000,000, has been completely swept away by the recent flood. The waters are pouring through the immense gap into Honan unchecked. From 800 to 1,000 laborers, who were on the bank, were swept away and drowned. A disastrous flood in the Province of Monkden, 350 miles northeast of Pekin, caused the death of hundreds of natives, the utter annihilation of many homes, destruction to crops and the prospect of a general famine during winter.

The cholera is still raging at Hong Kong. The daily average of new cases ranges from forty to fifty, most of whom die.

The storm on the 30th at Nokajorie, in Japan, caused the following damage: Number of houses demolished or half destroyed, 3,000; vessels totally lost, 85; vessels wrecked, 500; number of persons wounded, injured and receiving public assistance, 52,000.

Land Tortoises.

The Greek tortoise, such as furnished the shell to Mercury for the making of the lyre, is still to be found on the coast of Asia Minor. Dr. Wilde gives an account of this curious creature as he observed its habits of life:

Here, and still higher up the mountains, I found numbers of land tortoises, several of which were upwards of eighteen inches in length, and were busily engaged in rooting for their food among the stones and decayed vegetable matter.

This the animal does with great adroitness with its horny snout; but if it wishes to raise a stone that is too heavy for its snout, it withdraws the head, and placing the front part of the shell against the obstacle, converts itself into a lever by raising and pressing forward the hind legs. In case it finds this effort ineffectual, it converts itself into a battering ram, and knocks at the rock with great force till it is overturned.

I have watched those curious animals for hours, and have been astonished not only at the extraordinary strength displayed by them, but at their instinct as well

Should Consult Their Parents.

One is often tempted to smile at some of the questions relating to etiquette, asked through the columns of the press by young men and women. The answers are so obvious—to persons of more mature age and experience—that one cannot help wondering why these young people do not consult their parents, for, making due allowance for the case of orphans, many of those who seek information in this way must possess fathers and mothers. Alas! it has probably never occurred to these young people that they should consult their parents in kindred matters; and viewed in this light, the subject becomes both a sad and a serious one.

The fathers and mothers of our day are certainly to blame for this state of things; they have, in many cases, allowed their children to grow up much like unbroken colts, in the matter of social discipline and restraint, and when they at last begin to see for themselves the necessity of finding out and obeying social laws, they turn away from their parents to seek other sources of information, because they have never been taught to take counsel of their natural guardians.

Many mothers seem to think that if they attend to the details of housekeeping, provide there children with clothing and pay their school bills, they have done all that can be required of them. Others, again, forget that what is so familiar to them is unknown ground to their children, and the latter are only too willing to assume control of all their own actions, till by and by, some blunder causes them pain and mortification, and they perceive that the world polite, like every other world, has laws which cannot be violated with impunity.

In nine cases out of ten the best rule is to "ask mother." She may not always be able to tell her daughter the newest "fad," but newest fads are not always desirable—are followed often by a certain fast set only. Mother can almost always tell about the old ways, and one should know about these first, just as a lawyer must read Blackstone and Coke before he can understand modern statute law.

Instinct in Brutes.

Few things are more wonderful than the instinct that guides the brute in the choice of its food and medicine. In India the mungoose, when bitten by the deadly cobra, is said to seek among the grass for some unknown herb or substance which it swallows and is thereby enabled to counteract the effect of the poison. Man, when his system is deranged by the accumulated poisons engendered by constipation or a sluggish habit of body, should seek relief in Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, which will at once establish a permanently healthy action of the liver, stomach and bowels.

New waterproof garments come in the form of loose fitting Raglans and Newmarkets with capes, and in plaids, checks, and stripes, with fine velvet finish.

$500, or a Cure.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are thoroughly responsible financially, as any one can easily ascertain by inquiry, have offered, through nearly every newspaper in the land, a standing reward of $500 for a case of chronic nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy is mild, soothing, cleansing, and aseptic, and healing. Sold by all druggists, at 50 cents.

The favorite style for the cloth gown is the Directoire, but dressy toilets of silk, broche, moire, and plush demands the dressier lines and fulness of the Empire styles.

"Taken In."

"I used often to read the newspapers aloud to my wife," said Bert Robinson, "and once I was fairly taken in by a patent medicine advertisement. The seductive paragraph began with a modest account of the sea-serpent, but ended with setting forth the virtues of a certain Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery which, it was alleged, was a sure cure for all throat and lung troubles and would even cure consumption, if taken in time. The way I was taken in was this: I had a lung trouble and I bought a bottle of the remedy. I was a stranger to it and it took me in—and cured me.

The ends of ribbon bows and the fringes of cut cloth are given the finish of passementerie spikes or balls on many of the dressiest garments for big and little people.

Civil War in Samoa.

New Zealand steamers which recently arrived at San Francisco brought the news that civil war had broken out in Upolu, the chief island of the Samoan group, the followers of the exiled King Malietoa having risen in rebellion against Tamasese, the King placed upon the throne last year by the Germans. A battle took place on the 12th ult., which resulted in the defeat of Tamasese and the capture of the capital, Apia, by the revolutionists. At latest accounts the King and his Prime Minister, with their few remaining followers, were hemmed in on a ship of German corvette and a force of sixty five sailors intrenched on the shore. The German consul accuses the captain of a United States steamer and the American vice-consul general of encouraging the insurgents, and the matter has been brought to the attention of the authorities at Washington.

The origin of these Samoan troubles is briefly as follows: For years Great Britain, Germany, and the United States have had an agreement that the autonomy of the Islands should not be disturbed. Two years ago the Germans began to make things unpleasant for King Malietoa, who represented a dynasty that had been in power for five centuries. The United States consul then established a sort of protectorate on his own account, sheltering Malietoa under the Stars and Stripes. Last year, however, a German war vessel visited Apia and dethroned the monarch, the main reason given for this high handed performance being that some natives had thrown stones at a party of Germans who had become unduly exhilarated over the celebration of the Emperor William's birthday. It was also alleged that the King's judges had failed to properly protect Germans. For these wholly insufficient reasons Malietoa was deposed and Tamasese, who had for some years been a pretender to the throne, put in his place. The dethroned monarch made numerous ineffectual attempts to secure the assistance of British and American ships which visited Apia, and was finally carried off as a prisoner to Germany, where he now is. Tamasese appointed as his Premier a German named Branders, who had command of the royal forces in the recent battle and to whose tyrannical measures the outbreak of hostilities is attributed. The natives, a very large portion of whom were intensely dissatisfied with the change of rulers, were at last driven to revolt by the heavy taxation imposed upon them by Branders, and by his demand that the name of Malietoa should be conferred upon Tamasese. Their appeal to arms, as we have already stated, has so far been sucessful, and their newly elected King Mataafa is now in possession of the capital. A recent despatch from Berlin stated that the German Government had decided to release and restore Malietoa. This action, no doubt, is intended to prevent the injury to German interests in the Islands which might follow the overthrow of Tamasese, but it will not end the matter. The United States Government has at last taken umbrage at Germany's flagrant violation of the agreement as to Samoan Independence, and intends calling that country to account therefor. President Cleveland and his advisers have had the matter under consideration for some days past, but no announcement has yet been made as the course which they intend to pursue.

The Whitechapel Horrors.

The series of unspeakably revolting murders which have been committed, and which may be said to be now going on, in Whitechapel, London, are sending thrills of horror throughout Christendom. Hitherto public sentiment, both in England and elsewhere, has been mainly divided between the sickening sensations produced by the shocking barbarity of the crimes, and a species of wondering indignation at the failure of the police authorities to detect the perpetrator. In a very forcible letter to the London "Times," a writer, over the familiar initials "S. G. O.," calls attention to another aspect of the case, which is still more deserving of public attention. His position is, in a word, that these crimes are related to the social conditions amidst which they are taking place, as effect to cause. They are the perfectly natural and legitimate results of a state of things which exists and is tolerated under the eyes of all London. In his own expressive words, "The tilled garden is fast producing the crop sown; in its ripening, it affords ample evidence of the nature of the seed; its fruit is just that which such seed, under such tillage, was certain to produce." The nature of soil, seed and tillage are indicated in the statement that "within a walk of palaces and mansions," with all their appurtenances of luxury and refinement, there exist "tens of thousands of our fellow creatures, begotten and reared in an atmosphere of godless brutality, a species of human sewage, the very drainage of the vilest production of ordinary vice; such sewage is ever on the increase, and in its increase forever developing fresh depths of degradation." As "S. G. O," whom the Times describes as "a social student of life-long experience," goes on to indicate, the powers of imagination, untaught by observation or experience, are utterly unable to picture the surroundings of child life under these conditions. What can be expected of human beings begotten and brought up in an atmosphere devoid of the commonest decency, accustomed to a conversation in which every word reeks with obscenity and blasphemy, familiarized from the very first with things inexpressibly corrupt and bestial? Such deeds were as another Times correspondent says, "bound to come." The important question, a question infinitely more important than that of the detection and punishment of the foul fiend who is doing these butcheries, is, will the conscience of Christian London awake at last to a sense of the public guilt and responsibility in this terrible business? And will other cities in both hemispheres, which have their dark corners in which vice in its most hideous forms holds nightly orgies, and where no decent citizen would dare to set foot, unless under police protection, take warning before they, too, "reap the whirlwind?"

For Life

Little Bobby, whose mother believes in cautioning her children against the consequences of foolish acts, has often said to him:

"If you get before the train, or fall into the water, you may be killed; and when one is dead it is for a long time."

One day Bobby, while walking with his uncle, took pains to keep at a safe distance from the shore of the river.

"If I should fall in, I should be drowned," he exclaimed; "and when you're drowned, you're dead; and when you're dead, it's for life!"

One Original Servant a Week.

The Independent says:—"It is said that the Bishop of Ely proposes to license his deacons to preach only one original sermon a week, the other sermon to be selected from such volumes of homilies as he may authorize to be used. His idea is that two sermons a week requires too much labour of young men who should be giving their time to study. That is an excellent reason; but those who study the most are just the ones who will find it easiest to prepare two sermons of twenty minutes each a week. More men suffer from not doing enough work at composition than from doing too much."

The plague which extended with varying degrees of intensity from Persia to Gaul in the reign of Justinian, lasted no less than thirty years, and distroyed (according to an estimate which the historian Gibbon did not consider extravagant) no fewer than a hundred million of human beings—a number not much less than the entire population of great Britian and the United States.

Husband (who has advertised for a type writer expert)—Did many call to-day, my dear, in answer to the advertisement?

Wife—Yes, quite a number; but there was only one applicant whom I told to call again. He seems very bright, and I am sure you will like him.

Husband—What was the trouble with the rest?

Wife—They were all young women.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER—XXVI. REPORTING PROGRESS.

Warren Relf spent many days that summer at Whitestrand, cruising vaguely about the mouth of the Char, or wandering and sketching among the salt-marsh meadows; but he never happened to come face to face, by accident or design, with Hugh Massinger. Fate seemed persistently to interpose between them. Once or twice, indeed, Winifred said with some slight asperity to her husband, "Don't you think, Hugh, if it were only for old acquaintance' sake, we ought to ask that creature Relf some day to dinner?"

But Hugh, who was yielding enough in certain matters, was as marble here: he could never consent to receive his enemy, of his own accord, beneath his own roof—for Whitestrand, after all, was his own in reality. "No," he growled out, looking up from his paper testily. "I don't like the fellow. I've heard things about him that make me sorry I ever accepted his hospitality. If you happen to meet him, Winifred, prowling about the place and trying to intercept you, I forbid you to speak to him."

"You forbid me, Hugh?"

"Yes"—coldly—"I forbid you."

Winifred bit her lip, and was discreetly silent. No need to answer. Those two proud wills were beginning already to clash more ominously one against the other. "Very well," the young wife thought in silence to herself; "if he means to mew me up, seraglio and zenana fashion, in my own rooms, he should hire a guard and some Circassian slaves, and present me with a yas hmak to cover my face with."

A day or two later, as she strolled on some errand into the placid village, she came suddenly upon Warren Relf, in his rough jersey and sailor cap, hanging about the lane, sketch book in hand, not without some vague expectation, as Hugh had said, of accidentally intercepting her. It was a painful duty, but Elsie had laid it upon him; and Elsie's will was law now. Naturally, he had never told Elsie about the meeting with Hugh at the Cheyne Row Club. If he had, she would never have imposed so difficult, delicate, and dangerous a task upon him. But she knew nothing; and so she had sent him on this painful errand.

Winifred smiled a frank smile of recognition as she came up close to him. The painter pulled off his awkward cap awkwardly and unskilfully.

"You were going to pass me by, Mr. Relf," she said, with a good-humoured nod. "You won't recognise me or have anything to do with me, perhaps, now I'm married and done for!"

The words gave him an uncomfortable thrill; they seemed so ominous, so much truer than she thought them.

"I hardly did know you," he answered with a forced smile. "I've not been accustomed to see you a black before, Mrs. Massinger.—And o say the truth, when I come to loc at you you're paler and thinner than when I last met you."

Winifred coughed—a little dry cough. Women always take sympathetic remarks about their ill health in a disparaging sense to their personal appearance. "A London season!" she answered smiling; yet even her smile had a certain unwonted air of sadness about it. "Too many of Mrs. Bouverie Barton's literary evenings have unhinged me, I suppose. My small brains have been overstimulated.—You've not been up to the Hall yet to see us, Mr. Relf. I saw the Mud Turtle come ploughing bravely in some three or four days ago, and I wondered you'd never looked up old friends.—For of course you know I owe you something: it was you who first brought dear Hugh to Whitestrand."

How Warren ever got through the remainder of that slippery interview, gliding with difficulty over the thin ice, he hardly knew. He walked with Winifred to the end of the lane, talking in vague generalities of politeness; and then, with some lame excuse of the state of the tide, he took a brusque and hasty leave of her. He felt himself guilty for talking to her at all, considering the terms on which he stood with her husband. But Elsie's will overrode everything. When he wrote to Elsie, that letter he had looked forward to so long and eagerly, it was with a heavy heart and an accusing conscience; for he felt somehow, from the forced gaiety of Winifred's ostentatiously careless manner, that things were not going quite so smoothly as a wedding-bell at the Hall already. That poor young wife was ill at ease. However, for Elsie's sake, he would make the best of it. Why worry and trouble poor heart-broken Elsie more than absolutely needful with Winifred's possible or actual misfortunes?

"I didn't meet your cousin himself," he wrote with a very doubtful hand—it was hard to have even to refer to the subject at all to Elsie; "but I came across Mrs. Massinger one afternoon, strolling in the lane, with her pet pug, and looking very pretty in her light half mourning, though a trifle paler and thinner than I had yet known her. She attributes her paleness, however, to too much gaiety during the London season and to the late hours of our Bohemian society. I hope a few weeks at Whitestand will set her fully up again and that when I have next an opportunity of meeting her, I may be able to send you a good report of her health and happiness."

How meagre, how vapid, how jejune, how conventional! Old Mrs. Walpole of the vicarage herself could not have worded it more baldly or more flabbily. And this was the letter he had been burning to write: this the opportunity he had been so eagerly awaiting! What a note to send to his divine Elsie! He tore it up and wrote it again half-a dozen times over, before he was finally satisfied to accept his dissatisfaction as an immutable, inevitable, and unconquerable fact. And then, he compensated himself by writing out in full, for his own mere subjective gratification, the sort of letter he would have liked to write her, if circumstances permitted it—a burning letter of fervid love, beginning, "My own darling, darling Elsie," and ending, with hearts and darts and tears and protestations, "Yours ever devotedly and lovingly, WARREN." Which done he burned the second genuine letter in a solemn holocaust with a lighted fuse, and sent off that stilted formal note to "Dear Miss Challoner" with many regrets and despondent aspirations. And as soon as he had dropped it into the village letter-box, all aglow with shame, the Mud Turtle was soon under way, with full canvas set, before a breathless air, on her voyage once more to Lowestoft.

But Winifred never mentioned to Hugh that she had met and spoken to "that creature Relf," with whom he had so sternly and authoritatively forbidden her to hold any sort of communication. This was bad—a beginning of evil. The first great breach was surely opening out by slow degrees between them.

A week later, as the yawl lay idle on her native mud in Yarmouth harbour, Warren Relf, calling at the post-office for his expected budget, received a letter with a French stamp on it, and a post-mark bearing the magical words, "St Martin de Lantorque, Alpes Maritimes," which made his quick breath come and go spasmodically. He tore it open with a beating heart. "Dear Mr. Relf," it said simply—"How very kind of you to take the trouble of going to Whitestrand and sending me so full and careful an account of dear Winifred. Thank you ever so much for all your goodness. But you are always kind. I have learnt to expect it.—Yours very sincerely,

ELSIE CHALLONER."

That was all; those few short words; but Warren Relf lived on that brief note night and morning, till the time came when he might return once more in his small craft to the South and to Elsie.

When he did return, with the southward tide of invalids and swallows, Elsie had left the first poignancy of her grief a year behind her; but Warren saw quite clearly still, with a sinking heart, that she was true as ever to the Hugh that was not and that never had been. She received him kindly, like a friend and a brother; but her manner was none the less the cold fixed manner of a woman who had lived her life out to the bitter end, and whose heart has been broken once and for ever. When Warren saw her, his soul despaired. He felt it was cruel even to hope. But Elsie, most cheerful of optimists, laughed him to scorn. "If I were a man," she cried boldly, and then broke off. That favourite feminine apositopesis is the most cutting known form of criticism. Warren noted it, and half took heart, half desponded again more utterly than ever.

Still, he had one little buttress left for his failing hopes: there was no denying that Elsie's interests in his art, as art, increased daily. She let him give her lessons in water-colours now, and she watched his own patient and delicate work with constant admiration, among the rocks and bays of the inexhaustible Riviera. During that second sunny winter at San Remo, in fact, they grew for the first time to know one another. Warren's devotion told slowly, for no woman is wholly proof in some last corner of her heart against a man's determined and persistent love. She could not love him in return, to be sure: O no; impossible: all that was over long ago, for ever: an ingrained sense of womanly consistency barred the way to love for the rest of the ages. But she liked him immensely; she saw his strong points; She admired his earnestness, his goodness, his singleness of purpose, his worship of his art, and his hopeless and chivalrous attachment to herself into the bargain. Its very hopelessness touched her profoundly. He could never expect her to return his love; of that she was sure; but he loved her for all that; and she acknowledged it gratefully. In one word, she liked him as much as it is possible for a woman to like a man she is not and cannot ever be in love with.

"Is that right yet, Miss Challoner?" Warren asked one day, with a glance at his canvas, as he sat with Edie and Elsie on the deck of the Mud Turtle, painting in a mass of hanging ruddy-brown seaweed, whose redness of tone Elsie thought he had somewhat needlessly exaggerated.

"Why 'Miss Challoner?'" Elie asked with one of her sudden arch looks at her brother. "We're all in the family, now, you know, Warren. Why not 'Elsie?' She's Elsie of course to all the rest of us."

Warren glanced into the depths of Elsie's dark eyes with an inquiring look. "May it be Elsie?" he asked, all tremors.

She looked back at him, frankly and openly. "Yes, Warren, if you like," she said in a simple straightforward tone that disarmed criticism. The answer, in fact, half displeased him. She granted it too easily, with too little reserve. He would have preferred it even if she had said "No," with a trifle more coyness, more maidenly timidity. The half is often better than the whole. She assented like one to whom assent is a matter of slight importance. He had leave to call her Elsie in too brotherly a fashion. It was clear the permission meant nothing to her. And to him it might have meant so much, so much! He bit his lip, and answered shyly, "Thank you."

Edie noted his downcast look and supressed sigh. "You goose!" she said afterwards. "Pray, what did you expect? Do you think the girl's bound to jump down your throat like a ripe gooseberry? If she's worth winning, she's worth waiting for. A woman who can love as Elsie has loved can't be expected to dance a polka at ten minutes' notice on the mortal remains of her dead self. But then, a woman who can love as Elsie has loved must love in the end a man worth loving.—I don't say I've a very high opinion of you in other ways, Warren. As a man of business, you're simply nowhere; you wouldn't have sold those three pictures in London, you know, last autumn if it hadn't been for your amiable sister's persistent touting; but as a marrying man, I consider you're A1, eighteen carat, a perfect hundred-guinea prize in the matrimonial market."

Before the end of the winter, Elsie and Warren found they had settled down into a quiet brotherly and sisterly relation, which to Elsie's mind left nothing further to be desired; while to Warren it seemed about as bad an arrangement as the nature of things could easily have permitted.

"It's a pity he can't sell his pictures better," Elsie said one day confidentially to Edie. "He does so deserve it; they're really lovely. Every day I watch him, I find new points in them. I begin to see now how really great they are."

"It is a pity," Edie answered mischievously. "He must devote his energies to the harmless necessary pot-boiler. For until he finds his market, my dear, he'll never be well enough off to marry."

"O Edie, I couldn't bear to think he should sink to pot-boiling. And yet I should like to see him married some day to some nice good girl who'd make him happy," Elsie assented innocently.

"So should I, my child," Edie rejoined with a knowing smile. "And what's more, I mean to arrange it too. I mean to put him in a proper position for asking the nice good girl's consent. Next summer and autumn, I shall conspire with Mr. Hatherley to boom him."

"To what?" Elsie asked, puzzled.

"To boom him, my dear B double o, m—boom him. A most noble verb, imported, I believe, with the pickled pork and the tinned peaches direct from Chicago. To boom means, according to my private dictionary, to force into sudden and almost explosive notoriety.—That's what I'm going to do with Warren. I intend, by straightforward and unblushing advertising—in short by log-rolling—to make him go down next season with the money-getting classes as a real live painter. Their gold shall pour itself into Warren's pocket. If he wasn't a genius, I should think it wrong; but as I know he is one, why shouldn't I boom him?"

"Why not, indeed?" Elsie answered all unconscious. "And then he might marry that nice good girl of yours, if he can get her to take him."

"The nice good girl will have to take him," Edie replied with a nod.—"When I put my foot down, I put it down. And I've put it down that Warren shall succeed, financially, artistically, and matrimonially. So there's nothing more to be said about it."

CHAPTER XXVII.—ART AT HOME.

That same winter made a sudden change in Hugh Massinger's financial position. He found himself the actual and undoubted possessor of the manor of Whitestrand. Winter always tried Mrs. Meysey. Like the bulk of us nowadays, her weak points were lungy. Of late, she had suffered each season more and more from bronchitis, and Hugh had done his disinterested best to her to go abroad to some warmer climate. His solicitude for her health, indeed, was truly filial, and not without reason. If she chose Madeira or Algiers or Egypt, for example, she could at least be well out of her new son's way for six months of the year; and Hugh was beginning to realize, as time went on, a little too acutely that he had married the estate and manor of Whitestrand with all its encumbrances, a mother-in-law included; while if, on the other hand, she preferred Nice or Cannes or Pau, or even Florence, or any other continental resort, they could at anyrate have an agreeable place to visit her in, if they were suddenly summoned away to her side by the telegraphic calls of domestic piety. But Mrs. Meysey, true metal to the core, wouldn't hear of wintering away from Suffolk. She clung to Whitestrand with East Anglican persistence. Where was one better off, indeed, than in one's own house, with one's own people to attend and comfort one? If the March winds blew hard at the Hall, were there not deadly Mistrals at Mentone and gusts of foggy Föhn at dreary Davos Platz? If you gained in the daily tale of registered sunshine at Hyeres or at Bordighera, did not a superabundance of olive oil diversify the stews at the table-d'hote, and a fatal suspicion of Italian garlic poison the fricandeaus of the second breakfast? Mrs. Meysey, in her British mood, would stand by Suffolk bravely while she live; and if the hard grey weather killed her at last as it killed its one literary apologist in our modern England, she would acquiesce in the decrees of Fate, and be buried, like a Briton, by her husband's side in Whitestrand churchyard. Elizabeth Meyseys of the elder stock—in frilled ruffs and stiff starched head-dresses—smiled down upon her resolution from their niched tomb in Whitestrand church every Sunday morning: never should it be said that this, their degenerate latter day representative, ran away from the east winds of dear old England to bask in the sunlight at Malaga or Seville, among the descendants of the godless Armada sailors, from whose wreckages and pillage those stout old squires had built up the timbers of that very Hall which she herself still worthily inhabited.

So Mrs. Meysey stopped sturdily at home; and the east wind wreaked its vengeance upon her in its wonted fashion. Early in March, Winifred was summoned by telegram from town: "Come at once. Much worse. May not live long. Bring Hugh with you." And three weeks later, another fresh grave rose eloquent in Whitestrand churchyard; and the carved and painted Elizabethan Meyseys, smiling placidly as ever on the empty seat in the pew below, looked forward with confidence to the proximate addition of another white marble tablet with a black epitaph to the family collection in the Whitestrand chancel.

The moment was a specially trying one for Winifred. A month later, a little heir to the Whitestrand estates was expected to present himself on the theatre of existence. When he actually arrived upon the stage of life, however, poor frail little waif, it was only just to be carried across it once, a speechless supernumerary, in a nurse's arms, and to breathe his small soul out in a single gasp before he had even learnt how to cry aloud like an English baby. This final misfortune, coming close on the heels of all the rest, broke down poor Winifred's health terribly. A new chapter of life opened before her. She ceased to be the sprightly, lively girl she had once been. She felt herself left alone in the big wide world, with a husband who, as she was now beginning to suspect, had married her for the sake of her money only, while his heart was still fixed upon no one but Elsie. Poor lonely child: it was a dismal outlook for her. Her soul was sad. She could n't bear to brazen things out any longer in London—to smile and smile and be inwardly miserable. She must come back now, she said plaintively, to her own people in dear old Suffolk.

To Hugh, this proposition was simply unendurable. He shrunk from Whitestrand with a deadly shrinking. Everything about the estate he had made his own was utterly distasteful to him and fraught with horror. The house, the grounds, the garden, the river—above all, that tragic, accusing poplar—were so many perpetual reminders of his crime and his punishment. Yet he saw it would be useless to oppose Winifred's wish in such a matter—the whole idea was so simple, so natural. A Squire ought to live on his own land, of course: he ought to occupy the ancestral Hall where his predecessors have dwelt before him for generations. Had not he himself fulminated in his time in the georgeous periods of the Morning Telephone against the crying sin and shame of absenteeism? But if he went there, he could only go on three conditions. The Hall itself must be remodelled, redecorated, and refurnished throughout, till its own inhabitants would hardly recognize it: the grounds must be replanted in accordance with his own cultivated and refined taste; and last of all—though this he did not venture to Winifred—by fair means or by foul, the Whitestrand poplar—that hateful tree—must be levelled to the soil, and its very place must know it no longer. For the first two conditions he stipulated outright; the third he locked up for the present quietly in the secret recesses of his own bosom.

Winifred, for her part, was not wholly averse, either, to the remodelling of Whitestrand. The house, she admitted, was old-fashioned, and dowdy. Its antiquity went back only to the "bad period." After the æsthetic London drawing-rooms of the Cheyne Row set, she confessed to herself, grudgingly—though not to Hugh—that the blue satin and whitey-gold paint of the dear old place seemed perhaps just a trifle dingy and antiquated. There were tiny cottages at Hampstead and Kensington that Whitestrand Hall could never reasonably expect to emulate. She didn't object to the alterations, she said, so long as the original Elizabethan front was left scrupulously intact, and no incongruous meddling was allowed with the oaken wainscot and carved ceiling of the Jacobean vestibule. But where, she asked, with sound Suffolk common-sense, was the money for all these improvements to come from? A season of falling rents, and encroaching sea, and shifting sands, and agricultural depression, with Hessian fly threatening the crops, and obscure bacteria fighting among themselves for possession of the cattle, was surely not the best-chosen time in the world for a country gentleman to enlarge and complete and beautify his house in.

STATISTICS.

The French grain harvest this year amounts to 98,000,000 hectolitres, as compared with the annual average yield of 108,000,000 hectolitres.

During the month of August 12,894 immigrants arrived in Canada, and the total arrivals from January 1st where 116,027, or an increase of nearly 14,000 as compared with the same period last year.

The cotton crop of 1888 is the largest ever grown in America, exceeding that of 1882-3, hitherto the largest on record, by 96,000 bales. The total crop this season is 7,046,833 bales.

The Porte has obtained a loan of £1,000,000 at 7 per cent., from the Deutsche Bank, granting in return a concession for the extension of the Scutari Ismid Railway to Angora.

In the clothing trade of the City of New York there are 241 manufacturers, of whom 234 are Hebrew firms. Over 600,000,000 cigars per annum are manufactured in New York by Hebrew firms, employing over 8,000 hands and whose yearly transactions reach $15,000,000.

During the eight months endiog with August there came to the United States nearly 400,000 immigrants (392,937), or about 30,000 more than in the first eight months of last year. It is worth noting that while England and Wales sent us 2,000 less than last year, and Ireland only 700 more, Scotland sent 2,100 more. The Germans were slightly less, but in all other nationalities there was an increase. Of the total immigration for the eight months every 100 was made up substantially as follows:—British 31; German, 19; Bohemian, Austrian, Hungarian, Polish, and Russian, 18; Scandinavian, 15; Italian, 10, and other countries, 7. Of the British immigrants 43 per cent. were Irish, 42 per cent. English and Welsh, and 15 per cent. Scotch. During the eight months the most remarkable increase was in the Russian, Hungarian, and Polish, which reached 75,000, an advance of 17,500 over last year.

The yellow fever has visited the United States in eighty-eight different years. The first known case of the fever in America was in 1693.

AGRICULTURAL.

STILTON CHEESE.

A description of the method followed by Mr. Thomas Nuttall, a celebrated maker of prime Stilton cheese, is given in English exchanges, as follows:

The milk is emptied into a large strainer, from which it passes into the cheese tub, fourteen feet long by four feet wide, made of wood lined with tin and capable of holding 6,000 gallons. By means of steam or cold water the temperature of the milk is brought to 79 deg. Fahrenheit, space having been left between the wood and tin to admit either. Then the rennet made from green cured skin, eleven ounces to ten gallons of water, is added and thoroughly mixed with the milk, which curdles in about one hour and thirty minutes. Next four persons remove the mass of curd with shallow tin bowls, into cloths, which are placed in tin drainers six by two by one-half feet, Iron bars are fastened across these at intervals of one and one-half feet to hold the sides of the cloths. Two of these drainers are placed in a frame two feet apart, one above the other, when the full frame is removed to make room for an empty one, the whole tub being emptied in about twenty-five minutes. The cleansing of the tub and utensils is done chiefly with steam, obtained from a boiler which works a five horse power steam engine, used to pump the water from a well to a reservoir on the top of the building, and to heat the rooms, grind the curd, etc. The cloths containing the curd are loosely tied by the four corners allowing the whey to separate partially for one hour, when the taps of the drainers are turned and the whey is drained off altogether. Then the cloths are tightened and placed close together in a large drainer of about the same size as the cheese tub, in which they remain twelve hours. The cloths are again tightened and the curd placed in other coolers. After a while the cloths are removed, the curd is cut up, and in eighteen hours it is coarsely ground. The morning's and evening's curd are thoroughly mixed with one another, and with fine salt in a proportion of one to sixty. The mass is then put into tin hoops with perforated sides, twelve inches deep by eight inches in diameter, and the filled hoops are arranged on shelves in a brick floored room of 65 deg. Fahrenheit. In six days the whey will have run off and the cheeses are then removed from the hoops and taken to the binding-room. Here they are shaped with a knife and strong calico bandages pinned round them daily for twelve days, when they get firm and are removed to drying-rooms of 65 deg. Fahrenheit. The cooling is effected by means of water trickling from a perforated pipe, and the heating by steam pipes. Ten pounds of curd placed in the hoops produce five pounds of cheese. Stilton cheese is made twice a day from new sweet milk from the cow, but without the addition of extra cream, as some people seem to think. If one thing requires greater care than another, it is the constant and precise regulation of the temperature and the avoidance of waste during the various stages of the manufacture.

A NEW INDUSTRY.

It is reported here that a buyer is stationed at Oshawa to purchase wild mustard seed, and that farmers are hauling it in large quantities. From the seed a valuable oil is crushed. Now, if these things be true, a thriving industry is already fairly developed among us. Everybody knows there is no further expense about growing wild mustard besides gang plowing and harrowing the land. It will seed itself. In fact a good deal of land within twenty miles of here is already seeded for the next fifty years. A great advantage of this mustard growing will be that it will help the bad farmer most. The bad farmer can always grow more mustard on a field than the good farmer can on his whole farm. And some farmers we know of can really grow nothing else but mustard. It will be at bonaza for them. All we regret is that these Oshawa buyers had not taken up buying burdocks and thistles as well as mustard. That would enable us to make a few thousands a year out of the graveyard behind the office, where we inter delinquent subscribers after the blood-spiller of the staff has finished their careers. One comfort is that we may live in hope of everything turning into gold since wild mustard has.—Whitby Chronicle.

FORESTS AND WATER SUPPLY.

When man resorted to the soil as the source of his food, he began to clear away the forests and by tillage to destroy the spongy covering of the earth which they created. With the advance of civilization, all the great valleys on the northern temperate zone have been to a considerable extent deprived of their forest covering. In this new state of the surface, the rain water is no longer held back as it was of old, but flows quickly over the surface of the soil and enters the waterways. The result is that all the old channels bear, in times of flood, a body of water far greater than that which was put into them before the forests were cleared away. They have been compelled to widen their channels by cutting away a strip of the alluvial land on either side. Thus, in the case of the Ohio River, the bed occupied by the flood-waters has, since the beginning of the present century, been widened to the amount of about one fifth of its total diameter. Despite this widening, it is now unable to bear away the flood waters yielded to it by the extensive tilled surfaces of its basin. In times of flood it rises higher than of old and spreads devastation over a wider area of the alluvial plains. In times of drought the stream shrinks within its waste of encumbering sands and becomes unnavigable.

A HOME MADE APPLE PICKER.

Take a hard-wood board one inch thick, mark on it a circle seven and one-half inches in diameter, inside of this draw another circle six inches in diameter, between the two circles bore one-fourth inch holes one and one-half inches apart, cut the wood away from the outside circle, and you have the back of the apple picker. Next, make enough round hard, wood pegs, six inches long, to fill the holes. Before driving in the pegs fasten the handle to the back. The handle should be a light, strong pole, six or eight feet long. Now drive in the pegs or teeth, be careful not to drive too hard and split the back.

When it is finished it looks so simple that you wonder you hadn't thought of it long ago. With it you can pick the choicest apples, which always grow on the top branches, without bruising; and instead of standing on a ladder all day you can pick most of your apples from the ground.

DO SKUNKS EAT POTATOE BUGS?

H. I., Batavia, N Y.—In the R N.Y., of Sep. 8, Mr. T. H. Y. of Alexandria, Pa asks the above question, and in answer I would say that I believe they do. Indeed I was convinced of this several years ago. Finding many bugs on well grown potatoes in the back part of the field, I visited them two or three times a week, thinking that if they increased I would have to kill them; but I was surprised to find them decreasing in numbers, and I found many holes in the ground around in the tops of the hills, holes large enough to insert an awl-handle 2½ inches. This and the diminution of the bugs were quite a mystery until I became satisfied that both were due to skunks as they ate bugs from the vines, and extracted them from the ground where they had burrowed.

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

Clean culture destroys many hiding-places of injuries insects.

The potato-beetle is said to have more than twenty species of parasites that prey upon it.

Pick up and destroy all fallen fruit under plum, apple and peach trees, and by so doing destroy hosts of curculio and codling-moth larvæ.

Cut-worms are killed by digging them from their hiding places; also by fall-plowing, which exposes them to the action of frost and to the attack of birds.

Wood-peckers are great enemies of the borers; they never make a mistake about the place in which to dig. Pity men do not allow them the freedom of the orchards

Borers are cut from the bark with a knife or killed in their holes with a sharpened wire. Better still, wash the trees with a strong solution of soap in June or July, and kill the eggs before any damage is done.

If the feed in the cow pasture is beginning to dry up and become short, feed the cows some kind of fodder at the barn if you wish to keep up the flow of milk. When the flow is once decreased at this season, it is hard to increase it.

Allow the stock free access to the salt at this season, as it assists in counteracting the effects of a grass diet. Should scours appear keep the stock up for a day or two and give each animal a warm bran mash. Salt is necessary at all seasons.

It is claimed that five hundred pounds of onion seed can be grown on an acre of land, the price varying from thirty cents to one dollar per pound. The receipts from an acre of onion seed are usually large, but the crop calls for quite an expense in labor, much of which is hand-weeding.

Sweet potatoes in winter require a temperature of sixty degrees. They will not suffer exposed to a temperature of fifty-six degrees, but it should not be allowed to fall below that. When first stored in the cellar they must be kept at seventy degrees until well dried, when it may fall to sixty.

DAIRY NOTES.

As high as $35 per year is often paid in Holland for an acre of pasture land for cows.

An average of 10,000 cans, eight gallons per can, of milk are received in Chicago daily.

Six thousand pounds of milk is the amount that it is claimed a good cow should produce.

A raw egg broken into milk given calves to drink, is said to be an effectual remedy for scours.

Appreciation.

Love of appreciation seems to be instinctive in the whole animal creation. Whoever does good work is encouraged and strengthened by merited praise. Well does the writer remember a good farmer, whose sleek, fat team horses were admired by all the neighbors round about. This good condition was not a result of their not being worked hard, for the farmer did much of the heavy trucking of the village, over a hilly road. There was a long, steep hill between the station and the village, and here the horses were allowed several resting spells on the way up.

Mr. Small always carried a chunk of wood, with which to block the wheels during these rests. Before he started he always rubbed their noses, patted them encouragingly, and when he gave the word, up they went with a will, till the driver stopped them for another breathing spell.

When they pulled well, he always petted and praised them, telling them they were good fellows; and they seemed so pleased at this little act of appreciation, that they would hardly wait to rest, so eager were they to prove themselves worthy of the praise.

Children, and grown people, too, are not less susceptible to the influence of encouraging words.

A little fellow of five years of age was doing something which his father disapproved.

"My son, you must not do that," said his father.

It happened to be something which the child wanted to do, and for an instant he hesitated, as if questioning what would be the consequence if he persisted. Finally his better self triumphed, and he replied, "All right, papa; I won't do it any more."

Perhaps most of us would think that was all there was to be said about it, and so the father thought; but the little fellow evidently had different ideas, for not long after he spoke out:

"Papa, why didn't you tell me 'That's a good boy?' An' 'twould 'a' been easier to be good next time."

No Smoking.

Persons who cannot abide tobacco may be glad to know of one town, it is in Pennsylvania, where not only are smoking and chewing prohibited, but the prohibition is actually carried into effect. The story is told by a writer in the American Magazine.

Alighting from the train at the handsome modern station house of stone, close by the riverside, we start up the roadway leading over the bluff to the village. A middle-aged German accosts us, smiling.

"Welcome," he says, pleasantly "I shall be delite. I haf many peoples shown Economy."

He laughs and we laugh; there is a general shaking of hands. No other introduction is necessary. As we resume our walk, one of our party lights a cigar.

"Vat you do?" asks the guide, stopping, with eyebrows raised with surprise.

"Smoke," replies the astonished gentleman.

"Ve smoke not tobacco here," says the guide.

"But I use it."

"So? Vell, not in Economy. Ve haf no use mit tobacco."

Objections are useless; the cigar is thrown away. The guide places his foot on it in triumph. For many years no tobacco has been used in Economy, except by stealth. An edict was issued against it because the practice was deemed an evil one, and these sturdy Germans must have credit for self-sacrifice, as it is a national characteristic dearly to love a pipe.

Russell Sage will leave $60,000,000 when he dies.

Alaska Cliff Dwellings.

In pre-historic times, human beings often dwelt in pens, and caves of earth, as much for safety from their numerous enemies as for shelter. Cave towns were even excavated in the sides of cliffs with what must have been, considering the rude tools employed, an enormous expenditure of labor. The evidences of this custom are numerous in Asia Minor, in Italy, and in our own South-west Territories. To-day the most notable instance of cave houses, on this hemisphere, at least, is to be seen on what is termed King's Island, to the south of Cape Prince of Wales in Bhering's Sea, on the west coast of Alaska.

This small island is an elevated tableland of basalt. Its shores consist of nearly vertical cliffs, fronting the sea, and ranging in height from fifty to seven hundred feet.

The island is inhabited by a tribal family of the Mahlemoots or Eskimos, about two hundred in number, who gained a subsistence by walrus-hunting, seal-hunting and whaling. They pursue the creatures in kyaks, or canoes, which they are very expert in launching through the surf, and navigating in rough water.

The summer houses of the islanders are so many little platforms, attached to the face of the sea-cliffs, and composed of whale rib bones, or shoulder-blade bones, fastened by thongs of sinew to large pegs of bone driven into the interstices of the basalt. The platforms are guarded around the outer side by a rail, and are large enough for the family to lodge upon. They thus serve at once the purpose of a habitation and a sentry-box, for which the hunters may keep a lookout for walrus and seals.

Fires are kindled on them, and all the ordinary affairs of life are pursued often at a height of a hundred and fifty feet above the ocean swells, which thunder on the rocks beneath. Not even a bird, a bank swallow, or an eagle could have a more airy habitation. Like the eagle, the King's Islanders have placed their eyries on the cliffs, to serve as lookouts for their prey.

The oddity of these singular habitations does not end here, however, since these platform houses are but the summer abodes of the hunters.

The winter houses are even more remarkable. To escape the winter storms, the islanders have excavated caves in the shattered and seamed basalt—in many cases caverns of considerable depth and size. During eight months of the year these cave dwellings constitute comfortable retreats from the inclement weather, and also serve as storehouses for the rude wealth of the family.

There are, it is stated, forty or fifty such cave houses, corresponding to the number of families, and to the platforms of summer. In some cases, the platform-house is at the mouth of the cave house, so that the shift from summer to winter quarters can be easily and speedily effected.

It is difficult to conceive of the character of such a life, on the face of a crag, with the ocean surges beating far below, and the open sky all around. What must be the thoughts and ideas of a child, born and nurtured amidst such strange surroundings.

United We Stand.

Bees and ants may be called civilized animals. They live in cities, and understand the value of cooperation. Indeed, they could give men some valuable lessons upon one of the oldest, the best known, and the truest of human proverbs,—"In union there is strength."

Ants show wonderful intelligence, and the "driver ants" not only build boats, but launch them, too; only, these boats are formed of their own bodies. They are called "drivers" because of their ferocity. Nothing can stand before the attacks of these little creatures. Large pythons have been killed by them in a single night, while chickens, lizards, and other small animals in Western Africa flee from them in terror.

To protect themselves from the heat, they erect arches, under which numerous armies of them pass in safety. Sometimes the arch is made of grass and earth, and gummed together by some secretion, and, again, it is formed by the bodies of the larger ants, who hold themselves together by their strong nippers, while the workers pass under them.

At certain times of the year, freshets overflow the country inhabited by the "driver," and it is then that these ants go to sea. The rain comes suddenly, and the walls of their houses are broken in by the flood, but, instead of coming to the surface in scattered hundreds and being swept off to destruction, out of the ruin

1st. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the Post Office, whether directed in his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for payment.

2nd. If a person orders his paper discontinued he must pay up all arrears, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and then collect the whole amount whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3rd. The courts have decided that refusing to take nepspapers or periodicals from the Post Office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud

Patrons of the Enterprise.

The auctioneer is your servant. Instruct him to have your sale bills printed at the ENTERPRISE office, and see that he does so; or, better still, send your list of articles to us and we will make arrangements with the auctioneer. Remember, it will pay you to have your bills printed at this office. Free notices given in the paper till date of sale.

DUTTON, OCTOBER 25, 1888.

PAY UP.

We intend sending out a large number of accounts shortly and we hope those who receive them will give immediate attention thereto. The amount due us from each one is small, but in the aggregate these amounts reach several hundred dollars, which represent the editor's living.

We have been very lenient with our subscribers in the past, seldom asking for a subscription until the subscriber is a year in arrears. Some appreciate this favor and pay promptly on receiving notice thereof; others do not. To the latter we would say that their day of grace is about ended and unless payment is made forthwith, we purpose publishing their names and date of arrears in black-faced type, "top of column, next to reading matter."

This may seem a harsh measure, but it is our last resort. We have repeatedly asked them for the amounts due us, and as often have we been refused.

Now, we are merely asking for what is our own, and intend to have it. The above measure will be strictly carried out without regard to person. Will your name appear there?

MARRIED FOR FIFTEEN CENTS:—A Woodstock preacher was lately presented with twenty-five cents as a reward for performing a marriage ceremony by bridegroom, who seemed to think the service worth not more than that. The minister put it in his pocket and handeh back ten cents.

WHERE IS HE?—In a communication to the Journal, a correspondent signing himself "Wallacetown," says that "A. D. Urlin is not airing himself in glorious climate of California," and hints that when the proper time arrives he will show himself and make it warm for his maligners. The communication savors very much as being inspired. If Mr. Urlin is as innocent as "Wallacetown" would make people believe he is, why did he not face his creditors like a man instead of "crawling into his hole" and waiting for the storm to subside?

THE Globe Publishing Company, of Toronto, purchased a new book press and new type which is being used to do the work on the Christmas number of the Globe. The company purpose issuing the most handsome and expensive Christmas number this season than has ever been issued in Canada. It will contain 36 pages or over, and will be illustrated and have a beautiful cover as the managers purpose making this surpass anything ever before issued in Canaka, every person should get one. Price only 25 cents each. Can be had from all clubbing agents. Leave your order at this office.

WE received a correspondence from Wallacetown last week, too late for publication, and as the writer took good care to write his signature, or would-be signature, so illegible, that we cannot make anything out of it, we refuse to insert it this week. While we are anxious to get news and correspondence, we must insist on the writer's name attached. We have published two or three articles without the writers'names, but supposing at the same time we understood the case. Now, we wish it understood once and forever, that we must insist on the contributor's name being attached to the correspondence.

AN exchange says a couple of plausible men are travelling through Ontario these days on a new swindling expedition. They are "well up" on the sheep question, and being home-spun in their general talk and conversation, are want to disarm suspicion. They are after lambs. They are devoted exclusively to breeding and selling lambs, but can never get as many as they can dispose of. They sell a ram for $500 cash on the understanding that they will purchase at a good figure all the lambs of his get the following season at the weaning time. The sale is effected, the ram delivered and paid for, and the two frauds never turn up again the second time.

LITTLE ONES.

Boys put in their spare time now gathering nuts.

—Jas. McPhedrain is building a house on Nancy street.

Two car-loads of cabbage passed east over the M.C.R. on Monday.

—Hunting parties are quite the rage and the sound of the gun is heard on every concession.

Rev. T. T. George, of Iona, occupied the pulpit of the Methodist church last Sunday evening.

Sportsmen from Buffalo are hunting near the river. Quail and partridge appear to be plentiful this season.

—James G. Blaine passed on Monday over the M.C.R. in General Alger's private car, en route from Detroit to Buffalo.

—Farmers receive more for their wheat in Dutton than is given in adjoining places. Wheat sold in Ridgetown and Glencoe last week at $1.10 while $1.12 was paid in Dutton.

—"The Two Dans" was enacted in Leitch's hall last Saturday evening to a slim house by a barn-storming actor and actress. The show was remarkable for nothing except its shortness.

—Here is some sound advice from the Ridgetown Standard anent the chance business at fairs: "If a man asks you to risk $5 on a guess at 'under which shell is the pea,' don't do it. The pea is always under the other shell."

Fifteen violators of the license law were recently convicted at Hamilton on two charges each, and four on one charge each.

HYERS' COMEDY COMPANY.

The above company will give one of their delightful entertainments in Leitch's hall on Saturday evening of this week. Wherever this company have appeared the press has spoken of them in words of praise. In other colored companies a certain amount of vulgarity and unseemly language is introduced in their performances, but the Hyer Company is an exception to the rule, and the management assures us that nothing will be said or done to offend the most fastidious. The stage will be equipped with the necessary scenery, and "The Blackville Twins," together with the musical part of the programme, will furnish one of the best entertainments the people of Dutton have had for some time. The Petrolia Advertiser says of this company:—

"The Hyers' Colored Musical Comedy Co. have occupied the Oil Exchange Hall during the past week, and their performances have only to be seen to be appreciated. If they have not been greeted with the houses they deserved they have succeeded in captivating those of our citizens who have had the pleasure of hearing them. Mrs. Hyers' has, without exception, one of the finest contralto voices we have ever heard, while as a reciter, we can only compare her to Mrs. Scott Siddons. Her rendition last evening (by special request) of the favorite "Curfew Bell" was received with storms of applause, and her singing of "Swanee River" brought down the house. The support is also good. Miss Gertrude Revels has a very sweet voice, and filled her part (either in chorus or solo) in a very creditable manner. Tom Davis and Billy Cook, in their specialties, never failed to bring down the house, while C. T. Small is one of the finest bassos we have ever heard. Should this troupe ever visit Petrolia again, and we hope they will, we think they will be greeted with a big turn out of our citizens."

WALLACETOWN.

Thomas Campbell succeed in carrying off first prize on his Percheron colt at the Highate fair last week. Value of prize, $20.

Messrs. Schleihauf Bros. are preparing to ship a quantity of lumber next week.

Miss Shaw has resigned her position as assistant in the school, resignation to take effect on Nov. 1st. She takes the Cowal school, now being taught by Miss Geddes.

A number of the ladies of the Presbyterian congregation are busy preparing the manse for the reception of their pastor, Mr. Kelso, next week.

The following is the standing of the 3rd class in an examination in arithmetic in order of merit:—Frances Ruthven, Albert Gow, Duncan Forbes, Edgar Rapelje, Evans Gunn, Wilbert McKee, Clara Thomas, Ada McAllister, Eddie McPherson, Verna Shepherd.

Mr. W. Morrison, formerly in the employ of Messrs. Cameron as tailor, has returned to the village and intends opening a shop of his own on Talbot St.

P. J. Henry has purchased the livery business of Mr. McKellar, Glencoe, and has gone thither for the purpose of carrying on the business. Success to him.

IONA.

Apple pickers are busy in this locality at present.

The new station house is to be dedicated this week.

Rev. Mr. Mann is at present attending convention at St. Catharines.

Mr. Wm. McLaadress shipped a carload of hogs to Buffalo on Monday.

Messrs. Britton and Robertson shipped another car-load of flour to Halifax on Tuesday,

Mr. John McCallum, tailor, is slowly recovering from a serious attack of inflammation.

Miss Libbie Rodgers, of Iona, was married to Mr. Johnson, of Essex Centre, at her home near Iona at 11 a m on Wednesday of this week.

WANTED—A MARKET.

"Watchman" thinks that one of the present wants of our growing village is a market twice a week—say Wednesdays and Saturdays—where our farmers could bring their butter and eggs, poultry, fruit, vegetables, etc. The residents of the village would, we are sure, very much appreciate such an institution, and it would also be quite a convenience to the farmers. Could something be done? Let us, if possible, give it a trial. Some people may think there is no need for it as yet. We think, however, it would tend to bring more people to trade with us, and everything that will tend to bring legitimate trade to our doors will increase our prosperity. There is a building now standing idle a good part of the time that would serve in the meantime, viz., the skating rink. Let our citizens try and secure it and we think it would soon be a paying institution.

That sidewalk is not yet repaired. Will you, Mr. Editor, blow the horn at the pathmaster's door?

More by-and-by. WATCHMAN.

The Salvation army at Ruthven has disbanded owing to the removal of their captain.

Gilbert Stewart, a young man arrested on the charge of robbing Byran & Co., of Blenheim, of $900, and sent for trial by the J. P., broke out of the lockup by the assistence of friends and went to Ridgetown. While there he went to the telephone office and cooly asked his brother to bring him his clothes. This was done and young Stewart took the train and vamoosed. An hour later the constable arrived, but the culprit was gone.

Never allow the bowels to remain constipated lest serious evil ensue. National Pills are unsurpassed as a remedy for constipation.

In presenting a revolver to each of its subscribers the Toronto Mail has an eye to business. It proposes to devote a special column to suicides, murders and didn't-know-it-was loaded casualties.

WEST LORNE.

Most of our people attended the world's fair at Rodney and returned with a favorable report.

Dr. Eaton is comfortably settled and is conducting the drug store in connection with his profession.

Mr. J. E. Paterson, of Wallaceburg, spent Sunday with his family here. Jim reports business good in the meat line.

Mr. John Paris, of Wardsville, is spending a few days with his brother.

Hunters from Buffalo are storming the country at present.

We had a kind call from Mr. Phelps, editor of the ENTERPRISE. He reports business fair in his town.

Mr. George Baker has returned from the Northwest and expects to take up his abode in our midst. We welcome George back again.

My. T. E. Montague is building a house to let. We want a few more such men as Mr. Montagne.

Mr. Thomas Harris has some parlor sets in plush and hair-cloth left, and will for the next ten days sell away down to make room for winter goods. Come early and secure bargains as the goods must be sold.

Quite an accident took place in town on Monday of last week. While Mr. Watson, of Clearville, was passing through town, leading a colt behind his buggy, some dogs ran out and frightened the colt. The buggy was upset and Mr. Watson thrown to the ground. No serious damage was done.

Grandmont, sire of McKillop's Solitaire, recently made a record of 2.20¼ in Italy. This, under the European system of trotting, is better than a 2.20 record in America. He left only two colts in America, the one owned at West Lorne, the other by Captain Moore, of Kentucky. Messrs. McKillop & Sons are to be congratulated, as the record of Grandmont adds considerable to the value of their handsome two-year-old.

The tea-meeting in connection with the Methodist church was a success both intellectually and financially. Several speakers took the platform, among whom were the Rev. C. Bristol, Rodney, and Rev. E. E. Scott, Belmont, both able platform men. Mr. Bristol described the smallest man in the world as the man who refused to pay for his local paper. We think it hit several. Anything like this makes our editor smile and so it should. The following is the programme which was well carried out: Opening exercises; chairman's address; music, choir; reading, Dr. Eaton; song, Miss Spencer; address, Rev. C. W. Bristol; duet, Miss Spencer and Mr. Scott; reading, Mr. Teetzel; music, choir; address, Rev. E. E. Scott; song, Miss Spencer; reading, Dr. Eaton; music, choir. The proceeds from all sources were over $40.

Thursday morning of last week, Miss Paddon, waiter in the M.C.R. dining-room, St. Thomas, on awakening from her sleep was horrified to find that during the night part of her hair had been cut close to the scalp. When she retired the night before her hair, which reached nearly to the ground, was done up in three plaits, and in the morning when she arose about one half fell to the ground. It is supposed that Miss Paddon is a somnambulist and while in that state spoiled her beautiful tresses with her own hands.

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

Why You Feel
So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,
"The Life of the Body."
Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?
Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:
G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."
Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."
Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

—THE—
RURAL CANADIAN INCORPORATING
THE FARM JOURNAL, CANADIAN FARMER AND THE DAIRYMAN.
AN ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY
—FOR—
THE FARM AND HOME.
36 pp. and cover $1.00 per year.
On the 1st of January next the RURAL CANADIAN will enter on its TWELFTH YEAR of publication. During the past eleven years it has received with growing favor by an ever increasing number of readers, and in the the coming year no efforts will be spared likely to enhance its value to the intelligent agriculturist.
A statement of the Regular Departments in the RURAL will best convey an idea of the scope of the publication.—Farm and Field; Horses and Cattle; The Dairy; Sheep and Swine; Garden and Orchard; Bees and Honey; Poultry and Pets; Rural Notes; Home Circle; Household Hints; Scientific and Useful; and two full pages of Music.
Rural Canadian, Globe and ENTERPRISE, each dollar papers, all for $2.25.

Milburn's Aromatic Quinine Wine fortifies the system against attacks of ague, chills, bilious fever, dumb ague and like troubles.

NOT FAR FROM HOME.

Tilsonburg is now lighted by street lamps.

Burglars have been operating in Ridgetown but without success.

Victoria Carbolic Salve is a wonderful healing compound for cuts, wounds, bruises, burns, scalds, boils, piles, pimples, &c.

William Brooks, bricklayer and contractor of Tilsonburg, has skipped, leaving numerous creditors behind. One of his employes is the heaviest loser.

A TERRIBLE TEN YEARS.

Mrs. Thomas Acres, of Huntly, Ont., suffered all the tortures of liver complaint for ten years. Four bottles of B.B.B. entirely cured her, making her like a new woman again, after other medicines had failed to relieve her.

The Christian Guardian has retracted its utterances in reference to Wad-el-Ward, whom it denounced as an impostor. The Guardian now admits that it was misinformed and regrets the publication of the article.

A PLAIN STATEMENT.

All poisonous waste, and worn out matter ought to escape from the system through the secretions of the bowels, kidneys and skin. B.B.B. cleanses, opens and regulates these natural outlets for the removal of disease.

A reward of $500 has been offered by the Provincial Government to the person or persons giving information resulting in the arrest and conviction of the person or persons who murdered Johnathan Robinson in the towhship of Adelaide, near Strathroy in September last.

It is reported that a farmer in the vicinity of Duart has carrots of such a length that a logging chain and team were used in removing them from the ground, and that brimstone can then be smelt on the ground which was in the earth. We vouch not for the truth of the statement.—Plaindealer.

Skin diseases cannot be successfully treated by external applications. The proper way to cure complaints is to purify the blood with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Under the vitalizing influences of this medicine all the functions of the body are brought into healthy action.

FOUND DEAD.—On Thursday evening William Brownlee, of Exeter, about 65 years of age, was found dead in his house by Constable Creech. It appears that he had been sawing a stick of wood placed on two chairs in the house and had fallen back and died. He has been living alone in a small house in the north end of that village for several years.

AN OLD FAVORITE

that has been popular with the people for 30 years is Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for all varieties of summre complaints of children or adults. It seldom or ever fails to cure cholera morbus, diarrhœa and dysntery.

Mr. John Rose, Ridley, last year offered to sell James White three acres of land at $80 per acre, and measured out the ground. Mr. White, after considering the offer, declined it, but put the land this season into beans on shares. He and Mr. Rose marketed on Friday last off the 3 acres 129 bushels of beans at $1.42 per bushel, realizing $183.18.

Hundreds of persons who have used Ayer's Hair Vigor attest its value, as a stimulant and tonic, for preventing and curing baldness, cleansing the scalp, and restoring the youthful color to faded and gray hair.

A London lady not long since found a cuff-button on her parlor floor. She knew it was not her husband's and asked the neighbors and callers if it belonged to them. No one claimed it, and it was a mistery to her how it got in the house till the other day, when she sat down to play her melodeon, and found that some sneak thief had entered and stolen the interior of the instrument. This is one of the most novel robberies on record.

DEAFNESS CURED. A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness. Noises in the head. How they may be cured at home. Post free 3d.—Address DR. NICHOLSON, 30, St. John Street, Montreal.

DIED AMONGST STRANGERS'—Mr. Watson Welding, farmer, Yarmouth on Saturday received a telegram that his son Byron Welding, had died and been buried at Watkin, Washington Territory. His brother Howard Welding, left for Watkin on Thursday last. The deceased left here with $2,000 a few years ago. and invested it at Vancouver, B.C., where he lost everything in the fire two years ago. He never informed his relatives of the amount of his loss, but made his way to Watkin, where he opened a fruit store in a small way, and managed to make a living until both feet became paralized. Mr. Robbins late of the Dominion hotel, who heard of the case in Wisconsin, brought first news of his illness here.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

A SEVERE ATTACK.

Miss Bella Elliot, of Pontypool, Ont., writes.—"My brother and I were both taken ill with a severe attack of Diarrhœa, having tried other remedies, we tried Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, which gave instant relief."

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

Worms cause much sickness among children. Freeman's Worm Powders prevent this, and make the child bright and healthy.

The city of Cleveland is bankrupt, owing to Treasurer Axworthy skipping out with all the funds.

Natives of Venezuela followed a wagon for nearly a week to see if the hind wheels would catch up to the front ones. As they did not the vehicle was pronounced a fraud.

TRIED AND PROVED.

"I have used Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for summer complaint, and proved it, after a fair trial, a sure cure both in my own case and others of the family." Lauretta Wing, New Dundee, Waterloo Co., Ont.

Detectives have ascertained who the two persons were who hired the Harrow livery rig seen leaving the farm of Wilson Holton immediately after the murder. They expect shortly to apprehend them, as they are well known residents of South Essex.

CONSTIPATION

is nearly always induced by neglecting to keep the bowels regular, and is also a frequent sequel to dyspepsia or indegestion. Burdock Blood Bitters, which is certain to promptly relieve and ultimately cure the worst cases of constipation.

There is a report that three Americans claiming to be spiritualists have got King Charles of Wartemberg under their special control, he fully believing in their tom-foolery. It may be true. He would not be the first king who was a chump.—Tizer.

A GOOD NEIGHBOR

"Late last fall I was laid up in bed three days with a very severe attack of diarrhoea and vomiting. Nothing benefited me till my neighbor, Mrs. Dunning recommended Dr Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and brought me a half bottle, which she had in her house the vomiting was stopped, and I was able to sit up by night. I would not think of using any other medicine." Columbus Hopkins, Hamilton, Ont

Mr. W. Boult's tailor shop, St. Thomas, was entered on Friday morning and a pair of tweed pants stolen. In his order book, which had been left lying on the counter, was found the following, written in a large hand, covering the entire page of the book: "Boston Billy, en route to Chicago." Nothing modest about Billy.

The Brandon, Manitoba, Sun mentions the case of a farmer living in the vicinity of that town, who this year had an eighty acre field of wheat which will realize $2,768. Placing his expenses at $7 per acre, and they will not be that, as he did most of the work without hired help, he will have a balance of $2,260, or a profit of $28 per acre. Another farmer living north of Alexander will clear in the neighborhood of $4,500, and sold his wheat at 90 cents per bushel.

Brantford has voted $185,000 towards the enlargement of its waterworks system and the securing of pure water.

ON THE FLY.—A young lady a day or two since at the Hamilton station, performed a feat which elicited hearty cheers and laughter. The train was moving out when a young gentleman friend rushed up to the window of the moving car to say good-bye. Up went the window, out came a head and in a trice the brave youth accepted the mute challenge and a flying kiss was exchanged which may have been sweet, but which was certainly brief.

A WIFE MURDER IN CHURCH.—A sensational wife murder occurred at Fulton, Mo., on Wednesday night of last week. Jackson Emerson entered the Pilgrim's Rest church and without a word of warning drew a revolver and fired at his wife Nina, missing her. A second shot entered the back of her head, coming out over the right eye and she fell dead. The congregation stampeded and the preacher jumped out of a second story window. Emerson is in jail and there are strong threats of lynching. The parties are colored.

The Reason Why
Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.
In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:
"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."
Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia
and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:
"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."
The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

The Sarnia Sun speaks very truthfully in a very terse style when it remarks. "The town will have a show of becoming a city when some of what are called prominent men are fired into the eternity of forgetfulness. There's no snap in them; what good are they to a town? There isn't enough public spirit in them to help any one or any project but themselves or their own."

Women Who Smuggle.

It takes twenty very zealous and careful women of keen perception, great force of character and considerable nerve to keep Uncle Sam from fairly being cheated out of his eyes by other women. Smuggling is the way the latter do it, and do it well. Women like to smuggle, it would seem. They have an elastic conscience in the matter that really seems to tempt them to what is, of course, swindling the government, but to themselves an act of no special harm and of little consequence. Of course there is the genuine woman smuggler who knows just what she is doing, just what trouble she is liable to get into and what the result will be. It is business with her, and she considers it an ordinary business risk. But she is caught just as certainly as the other little woman is, who doesn't think it any special harm just to save a little by tucking away a few pair of gloves which only make her leg a bit plumper, if they don't slip down and give her a queer shaped ankle, or filling her corset with some rare and dainty lace, that if purchased here would cost a pocketful of money on account of the duty.

Women are far more wary than men in smuggling, and their devices for bringing in goods of a dutiable nature are many. It is usually the case that the inspectress can tell by the face and contour of the person. As a general rule, the woman who has goods hid away will look the searcher of her luggage calmly in the face, seldom turning away, and if the searcher politely informs her that she thinks that she has dutiable goods on her person, she will, of course, be greatly insulted and invite a careful examination. She gets it—and a little trouble in the bargain. The self assurance that a woman smuggler has is of such great quantity that it will lead her to do the most foolhardy deeds, whereas, if she had less, perhaps she would not rely so much upon its carrying her through, and would, therefore, be more careful. The bustle is a godsend to the woman who wants to smuggle. They are made large and roomy, are of iron framework, and in them may be safely carried yards of the most valuable goods.

The most absurd thing for a woman to do who has goods hid about her person is to wear a heavy ulster when it is too warm for one. She will have to refuse to remove it when graciously asked if it is not a bit warm, and such refusal of course results in a necessary investigation on the part of the inspectress. The manners of the women smugglers are always very charming, and therefore it is in such a kindly way that they inform the tired inspectress that she is really tired and needs a little rest, therefore need not examine their trunks, as they will tell the inspectress what is in them and save her so much extra trouble. But she doesn't look at it in that light, and does inspect the trunks, much to the regret of the owner. These smugglers possess a quiet and careless air, but the inspectress can always tell them by the way they attempt to sit down. Their bodies then have a stiffness that is hardly in keeping with the manner in which they carry the head and arms, and of course they are immediately suspected of having goods concealed somewhere about their skirts. There are many curious places of concealment, and it can hardly be improbable that many thousand dollars' worth of dutiable goods are brought through by smart tricks. For instance, diamonds and other precious jewels have been brought over fastened in the front and in the plumes of the bonnet. They are generally wrapped in black cotton and securely fastened in such a manner that it would be necessary to take the hat apart to find them. The heel of the shoe is another queer but secure place where jewels have been carried. The heel is false, having a hollow place in the center, where, packed in cotton, the gems rest safely.

Sometimes a woman is found with lace wrapped around her form. Yard after yard of it in thus securely carried until the eye of the inspectress looks with suspicion upon the peculiar shape of the wearer and she examines her. In the bustle have been found toilet bags filled with all sorts of odds and ends, such as silks, gloves, hat frames, yards or rather hundreds of yards of ribbon, stockings and everything dear to the eye of the female. To a lean woman the curvatures in their corsets offer a snug resting place for quite a number of dutiable goods that can be carried safer there than almost anywhere else. One woman was found with lace curtains pinned under her dress, taking the place of her usual underskirts. Silk has been found worn in the same manner, and ribbon has been wound around the legs and body until yard upon yard was concealed. When a discovery is made the woman smuggler of course attempts a bribe, but the amount is absurd, always very much smaller than a man would for a moment think of offering. A woman will offer the inspectress $1 and consider it a big amount. Ten dollars would break them all up. A man's bribe is hardly ever less than $10, and frequently as high as $50. The women inspectors will accept no such favors, however. When a woman is suspected the inspectress informs the suspect of the necessity of undergoing inspection, and she is requested to go to her stateroom. Then she is ordered to remove her outer garments, then the bustle, and, if the inspectress considers it necessary to go further, she removes the remainder of her clothing.

It is said that a good deal of solid information regarding smugglers is furnished by many dressmakers. During the season these dressmakers send their forewomen abroad to purchase goods. They keep their eyes open, know all the women who go abroad to buy goods in the hope of evading duty on them, and send the information straight to New York. Another source of information is the stewards and stewardesses on the big steamship lines. They receive a percentage on all goods seized, and they will most remorselessly disclose the names of passengers who are smugglers. They almost always know.—[New York Star.

The Indians of Ecuador.

While the Indians are under the rule of the priests, and have accepted the Catholic religion, three hundred and fifty years of submission has not entirely divorced them from the ancient rites they practiced under the pre-historic civilization. Several times a year they have feasts or celebrations to commemorate some event in the Inca history. They never laugh, they seldom smile; they have no songs and few amusements, their only semblance to music is a mournful chant which they give in unison at the feasts which are intended to keep alive the memories of the Incas. They cling to the traditions and the customs of their ancestors They remember the ancient glory of their race, and look to its restoration as the Aztecs of Mexico look for the coming of Montezuma. They have religious relics which they guard with the most sacred care, and there are two great secrets which no tortures at the hands of the Spanish have been able to wring from them. These are the art of tempering copper so as to give it as keen and enduring an edge as steel, and the burial place of the Incarial treasures.

The Caribou on Ice.

After the ice has broken in November it is soon followed first by snows, and then by thaws or rain. The latter converts the snow into slush, resting on the firm ice beneath. Now, any sensible creature would keep away from such a mess. But not so the caribou, for to it this makes the very gala time of the year. The herd go out upon the ice in single file, then scatter, and each one falls to pawing up the slush with its fore feet. After they have tired of this performance they fall upon their knees, and seem to lap the ice with their tongues. Why they do this, as far as the writer has been able to learn, is a mystery. It certainly is not thirst, since they have crossed a dozen open brooks in their morning ramble. Perhaps, to use one of those slang expressions so happily indefinite in leaving ambridled liberty of detail to the imagination of the hearer, "they do it for grandeur." This is the most simple, and indeed at times it seems the only explanation of many of the vagaries of this most singular creature.

After a while one will suspend operations, seem to think things over generally, then go gravely over to where another has mined down to a piece of ice of extra flavor and prod and poke it with the utmost vigor. The assaulted party rises to its feet and meekly resigns its place to the intruder, which immediately drops upon its knees and continues the operations of its predecessor, while the ousted either passes along the compliment by routing out another or proceeds to dig a new spot for itself. Then perhaps all will lie down for a while, and though one would think the bed about as congenial as the inside of an ice cream freezer, chew the cud in apparently the acme of bovine comfort. Next, one will slowly rise to its feet, round up its back, and stretch itself, survey its comrades to select the one which seems most comfortable, and then, actuated by that perversity of disposition we so often see and anathematize in the human early riser, proceed to stir it up with hoof and horn, until it too gets upon its legs and joins in the game.

Soon all are on their feet, and, falling in one behind the other, move for the woods in single file, headed by the leader—always a bull, though not invariably the largest in the herd. They move off at a walk, their heads hanging down precisely like cows driven to pasture. Suddenly one will become possessed of a devil, and, breaking from the ranks with a hop, skip and a jump, charge through the line again and again, until it is thrown into complete disorder. Then it will as suddenly fall into place, as demure as a cat, saying, as distinctly as an attitude can speak, "What! you do not mean to charge this untimely disturbance to me, do you?" The march is then resumed and all may disappear at the meekest kind of a walk in the surrounding forest; or, without the slightest apparent cause, the herd will break into a run at a pace so keen you almost fancy you can hear them whiz as they cleave a passage through the air. This burst of speed may last for a hundred yards it may be kept up through thick and thin for five miles; the one is about as likely as the other.

Must Everything Fade?

BY ROSA EVANGELINE ANGEL.

"Must everything fade and grow old?" I smiled,
As I turned to answer the beautiful child,
With her wide gray eyes and her wonderful hair—
A cloud of light with its sun-tints rare.

"Yes, darling," I said, "in this world of ours,
From the baby birds and the baby flowers,
The song sun falls and the blossom must fall,
And the boys and the girls grow strong and tall!"

"But I do not want to grow old," she said,
And the smile I loved from the quick tears fled;
So I gathered her close in my arms and sought
To comfort the pain that my words had brought.

"You will never grow old, my precious one,
There is one sweet thing since the world begun
That hath known no age; 'neath the stars above,
All treasures of earth grow old, except Love.

"And you are Love, and the poets all say
Love is young and most fair and sweet alway;
And so my wee darling can never be
Or ugly, or old, she is Love, you see!"

I kissed her bright hair, and her eyes and chin,
Till the tears fain must let the sunshine in,
And sent her to play, the pet lamb of the fold;
I heard her sing "I shall never grow old!"

Ah me! All my hungering heart is stirred
With the memory now of each love-taught word
That day all unwitting I spake the truth—
My beautiful Love hath eternal Youth!

Kiss Her and Tell Her So.

BY LILLIE SHELDON.

You've a little wife at home, John,
As sweet as you'd wish to see;
As faithful and gentle-hearted,
And fond as wife can be;
A genuine home-loving woman,
Nor caring for fuss and show,
She's dearer to you than life, John;
Then kiss her and tell her so.

Your dinners are promptly served, John,
As, likewise, your breakfast and tea;
Your wardrobe is always in order,
With buttons where buttons should be.
Her house is a cosy home nest, John,
A haven of rest below.
You think she's a rare little treasure;
Then kiss her and tell her so.

She's a good wife and true to you, John,
Let fortune be foul or fair;
Of whatever comes to you, John,
She cheerfully bears her share.
You feel she's a brave, true helper,
And perhaps far more than you know,
'Twill lighten her end of the load, John,
Just to kiss her and tell her so.

There's a cross-road somewhere in life, John,
Where a hand on a guiding-stone
Will signal one "over the river,"
And the other must go on alone.
Should she reach the last milestone first, John,
'Twill be comfort amid your woe,
To know that while loving her here, John,
You kissed her and told her so.

The Night.

BY T. FERGUSON.

How beautiful the Night is when the golden stars are shining
And the world is full of restfulness and dreams,
When the hearts that have been broken in the struggle cease repining,
And the moon in all her silent glory gleams!

You can catch the silvery babble of the busy brook untroubled,
And the murmur of the ocean to the shore:
You can hearken to the night-bird till the melody seems doubled
Of all the day's sweet singers sang before.

You can almost think you listen to the breathing of the roses
While the faint wind flings their fragrance in your face,
And the dim and dewy gardens where each sleeping flow'r reposes
Are full of nameless quietude and grace.

And, if—as in my fancy I can picture you—as lovers
You walk and talk together hand in hand,
You will find how half Love's tenderness the Night alone discovers,
And all his gracious secrets understand.

With words of holy passion you will paint your love immortal
As the starry lights above you; you will see,
With souls grown keen of vision, all that lies beyond the portal
That hides the deeper ecstasies to be.

Many gifts the bounteous Giver to His glorious world has given—
Warmth and beauty, and the sun's unshadowed light—
But the purest and divinest of the joys that fall from Heaven
Are the stillness and the sweetness of the Night

How He Knew It.

The Boston "Herald" says:—After the parade the other day a well-known Bostonian, who is unfortunate in having a face calculated to stop a clock, approached an officer of the cadets in a patronizing sort of way and said:—I saw your company to-day, old man. It looked very well, very well, indeed." "It was just as we turned into Commonwealth avenue, was it not?" asked the officer. "Yes, but how did you know? Did you see me?" "No," said the officer, "but I noticed the company shied at that point."

AGRICULTURAL.

FAILURE OF THE WHEAT CROP IN DAKOTA.

Two days after my report of Aug. 16, we had a heavy frost all through the Red River valley, which has done us untold damage, and thousands of acres of wheat are not worth harvesting. Some farmers are plowing the straw under, and others are burning it off, and the larger portion that has been cut will little more than pay expenses. Some who have thrashed and taken a load to market as it came from the threshing machine, got 40c. per bushel, and were docked 20 pounds per bushel. Nine-tenths of the wheat raised in the West is sold as it comes from the threshing machine. There were some sections that escaped the frost, and even some farms escaped, while all around them were damaged. One farm in my neighborhood on which was raised last year over five thousand bushels, this year produced on the same land seven hundred bushels that will not stand grade.

I have just returned from the Territorial fair held at Grand Forks, and while there conversed with farmers from all parts of Northern Dakota and Northern Minnesota and Manitoba, and all agree that their different sections of country are damaged to an extent that is not yet known, and will not be until after the threshing season is over. Two months ago Manitoba claimed she would have 30,000,000 bushels of wheat for export; it is now thought she may have 10,000,000 bushels. Northern Dakota's prospects before the frost were good for 40,000,000 bushels for export. If we export one-quarter that amount now it will be the outside figure. Still farmers are pushing forward fall ploughing, and back-setting the new summer's breaking, as if nothing had happened to this season's crop. We must go forward; we cannot stop—wheat is our great staple for export, and should we be favored with a good crop next season, we will astonish the world with the number of bushels we will send to the seaboard from Northwest. Many farmers now acknowledge that we must go more into diversified farming. We cannot afford to take such fearful chances and have all swept away at one blow.

We have very fine weather here just now for threshing and all kinds of farm work.

CARE OF SHEEP.

Mr Editor:—There are but few places where sheep have no enemies, although each State or locality has its peculiar enemy. Iowa has its share, such as dogs, wolves, grub in head, tapeworm, and so on. I think there is little excuse for men letting scab or foot-rot damage the sheep in Iowa, and by using pine tar in troughs and on the nose of sheep once a week during July and August, the grub in the head can be greatly reduced. But the tapeworm often gets a hold on our lambs in July when we are busy with haying, and especially in rainy weather. When fungus is rusting wheat and timothy, the sheep undoubtedly eat the eggs. This is the third time in fifteen years that my sheep have suffered much loss from this source. I find it no new thing, however, for in Indiana and Illinois sheep men often have to put their sheep in dry lots or in a brush patch and feed oats or else lose half the lambs. In most cases the lamb scours. I have used copperas mixed with their salt, also wood ashes and sulphur, with good effect. Where it can be obtained, the male fern found in bottom timber, boiled into a strong tea and mixed with tannin of any kind, is excellent, but in all cases change of pasture is necessary and a brush pasture is the best. How greedily they devour oak or hazel leaves for a few days after leaving blue grass or timothy pasture.

Charlisle, Iowa. ANDREW HASTIE.

A NEW SWINDLE.

A sleek chap is taking in the staid Pennsylvania farmers with a new scheme, or rather a new form of an old one. He agrees to furnish seventy-five pear and seventy-five plum trees, enough for one acre, or he will furnish quince trees and grape vines enough for part of an acre for $125 and contract to take the fruit for five or ten years at the rate of five cents per pound for the grapes and $2,50 per bushel for pears, plums and quinces, the purchaser giving his note without interest for one year, renewing it the second year without interest, but paying three per cent. interest the third year.

He is said to be catching plenty of farmers on this bare hook, but none who will stop to think that they are paying four times the cost of the trees to begin with, that they are giving a negotiable note which will pass speedily into the hands of the "innocent purchaser" at a heavy shave, and that the agent is in no sense bound by the contract. It is the Bohemian oats scheme over again. When will farmers learn that it is not safe to sign any kind of a note or contract at the solicitation of entire strangers?

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

Here is one man's experience. He says: "I got more eggs last year from twelve pure Leghorns, than I did from eighteen common hens."

Sow a "patch" of rye; it will furnish green food for the fowls this fall, next winter when the snow happens to be off, and in the spring before the grass starts.

Envy has a mean shipirit, but if my neighbor's cabbages has bigger ash nine, it has natural dot I has glad it his baby has cross-eyed.—Carl Dunder.

Many recommend sheep for feeding in orchards rather than swine. They leave no safe cover for insects to breed, and will keep the orchard healthy and the trees manured.

The average life of the city horse is said to be six years. In view of the enormous number of horses used in cities, it is no wonder the demand for good ones is so large and steady.

Wheat bran, being light, apparently has but little value, yet a ton of it contains forty-seven pounds of nitrogen and over sixty pounds of phosphoric acid, with a large proportion of potash.

The farmer who thinks that to make money he must go where land is cheaper, should consider well whether he would not make more money by making the land he has deeper and richer.

Chicks from a cross between Light Brahmas and White Leghorns make fine broilers at ten or twelve weeks. In these, as in crosses between the large and the small breeds, the male bird should be of the smaller breed.

Corn, when in silk and tassel, ordinarily yields both honey and pollen in good quantities. The honey is of fair quality. In some localities and seasons it has been the sole honey-producer upon which bees could work in the fall, and build up for winter.

The coming law which our farmers will support almost to a man, will require the owner of a dog to give bonds to the amount of $1,000 for the good behavior of the cur, on which bond he may be sued for all damage to life or property which his worthless animal may cause.

Hon. Lafayette Funk, of Shirley, Ill., has succeeded in getting a calf from a buffalo bull upon a grade Short-horn cow. This cross has been very successfully made, we believe, by the great buffalo breeder, Jones, of Southern Kansas, although the reverse cross, has, we believe, usually failed.

A lousy chicken will not grow. Examine them, searching especially about the top of the head and under the wings. A little Persian, Dalmatian or Carbolic insect powder, dry sulphur, fresh lard or sweet cream will be found useful. As you dust the chickens the lice will "get up and dust."

Practical tests go to show that late-sown oats make a capital winter mulch for strawberry-beds. Clean the beds of weeds and sow oats on them in time to make about six inches growth before winter weather kills them down. They do not blow off; they hold the snow and protect the plants, and in Spring help to keep the berries clean.

Mr. Robert J. Burdette, the genial humorist, has been licensed to preach by the Baptist Church, to which he belongs. He has hitherto frequently preached and undergone all the experiences of a preacher from pastoral visits to a donation party. He didn't want the latter, but they forced it upon him in lieu of a salary which he positively refused to accept. All he took away from the donation party was one silver dollar, which he preserves as a memento.

There ain't any blemishes about this animal?" asked the would-be purchaser of a cow. "No, she is all right: but I must tell you candidly that sometimes she kicks when she is being milked," replied the owner of the cow. "That's of no consequence. My wife does the milkin'."

My love was like a lily fair,
Low drooping in the sultry air,
My heart was rent with grief and care,
I loved her well.

But lo! The wonder grows and grows;
My love's now like a blooming rose.
How bright her face with beauty glows,
I dare not tell.

The wandering bee would stop to sip,
The nectar of her perfect lip.

"He must lives who thinks the most,
Acts the noblest, feels the best,
And he whose heart beats quickest
Lives the longest, lives in one hour
More than in years do some whose
Fat blood sleeps as it slips along their veins."

These lines describe that condition of perfect health which all men and women wish to enjoy. To be able to think clearly, to incline to do noble acts, to live long and joyously, we must be free from the domination of disease. By taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery we may, by purifying the blood, escape consumption, general debility, and weakness, and all blood and skin diseases, and verify the truth of poetry as well as fact.

Our objection to the foolhardy man is not that he is a fool, but that he is hardy. He never seems to die.

STATISTICS.

The principal fishing grounds of Newfoundland, the Grand Banks, are 600 miles long and about 200 wide with a bottom of shifting sands.

Striking was one of the paincipal occupations of the labourers of the United States in 1887. The total number of strikes for the year was 858, involving 340,854 labourers.

Excluding the islands, the area of Africa may be estimated at about 11,000,000 square miles. There at the most only 4,500,000 that are not more or less directly attached to some European power. Of these 4,500,000 some 2,300,000 are occupied by the unattached Sahara.

Wood fibre for paper is manufactured in 21 States of the American Union. The capital employed is about £4,000,000; number of men employed, 21,000; tons of fibre made, 225,000 ground wood and 112,500 chemical wood, value £2,475,000; cost of wood on the stump, £247,000, and the remainder of the cost largely labour. In Maine alone there are 84,000 lb. of ground wood fibre and 188,000 lb. of chemical wood fibre made daily.

The total area of Europe laid out in forest—exclusive of Turkey, Bulgaria, Bosnian and Herzegovina—is about 708,862,000,000 acres; that is, about 18·7 per cent. of the total area of Europe is forest-land. In proportion to its total area, Great Britain and Ireland has of all countries in Europe the least extent of forest, amounting to only 4 per cent. of its surface, and, in proportion to the number of its inhabitants, enjoys by far the least allotment of forest, amounting to only 0·080 acre—i. e., considerably less than the tenth of an acre to each inhabitant.

The population of the Russian Empire in 1884-85 amounted to 109,000,000, the male sex slightly exceeding the female. The density of population was as follows—19·3 per verst (about two thirds of an English mile) for the fifty governorships of European Russia, 71·4 for Poland, 17·9 for the Caucasus, 0·4 for Siberia, 1·8 for Central Asia, and 7·6 for Finland. There were 1,300 towns and 524,000 other inhabited localities. Four towns contained a population exceeding 200,000, nine more than 100,000, and twenty-three over 50,000. The annual total of births averages 3,400,000. The death total is 2,500,000. In 1885 there were 867 hospitals in towns, with 47,000 beds, and 800 country hospitals, with 11,000 beds, not included lunatic asylums, of which there are 77, with 15,000 inmates. More than 11,000,000 sick persons were supplied with medicine.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

A man may say too much, even on the best subjects.

Keeping God's commandments is better and more pleasing to Him than building churches.

Calumny and detraction are but sparks which, if you do not blow them, will go out of themselves.

Failure after long perseverance is much better than never to have striven and so have incurred failure.

The great thinker is seldom disputant. He answers other men's arguments by stating the truth as he sees it.

No man ever yet made one single thing grow by the storms of winter, and nothing on earth can prevent things growing under the sweet influence of the summer sun.

The shortest and the surest way of arriving at real knowledge is to unlearn the lessons we have been taught, to remount to first principles and take nobody's word about them.

As by flattery a man is usually brought to open his bosom to his mortal enemy, so by detraction and a slanderous misreport of person he is often brought to shut the same even to his best and dearest friend.

So far from duty and happiness being antagonists, they are necessary each to each for their perfect development. There can never be a just and true and righteous life where the element of happiness is ignored or contemned, and there never can be true happiness where a life of duty is scorned or avoided.

HELP YOUR WIFE.

A Man's Part in Good Housekeeping.

A man should first of all help his wife in planning her work. Let every husband give his wife the benefit of his practical business experience, and advise with her how she may best arrange and time her several duties that they may least conflict.

In the second place, the husband should give the wife the full amount of money necessary properly to care for the home.

Third, he should see that she has the best tools that can be had to lighten her labor.

Fourth, he should by every possible means shorten her hours of labor. If he finds that she is obliged to work earlier and later than he, then he should at once give, or procure for her, such assistance as will make their working hours equal.

Fifth, realizing that for her labor she receives no direct compensation, he should, at the least, be careful to give continually with reward of cordial praise which costs him nothing and so much pleases her.

Finally, the man must recognise that many of the domestic duties are essentially proper to him, and not to the woman; such are all that requires great physical exertion. Therefore, not only should proper implements be generously furnished for the woman's use, but all the materials she must use should be provided and made easily accessible. Plenty of coal, wood and kindlings should be kept near the place where they are to be burned, water should be supplied so as to be handy and abundant, plenty of hooks, shelves, closets, etc., should be arranged to the best advantage.

At house cleaning time the man should either move, or get moved, the heavier articles of furniture; he should attend to the cleaning and putting down of carpets, the setting up of stoves and the like; in other words, he should assume the responsibility for all the heavier and more disagreeable duties connected with good housekeeping, and be willing on occasion to take a hand in those which are lighter.

But if he won't do these things that he ought to do, let him, at least, have grace enough to keep out of the woman's way while she is doing them for him, and refrain when they are done from rewarding his overworked helpmate with cross and complaining speech.

Money to Elections.

In answer to a correspondent who asks what becomes of the money contributed for campaign purposes the New York "Herald" says:—Money is required for many purposes. In no canvass has so much been expended as in the present, so much betting, so many urgent and continuous appeals for money. Some goes to the purchase and dissemination of tracts and caricatures, some to keep up starving newspapers, a great deal for beer! Money sends eloquent statesman to the village country groceries to whoop things up and arouse the masses. This means beer—and beer costs money. Then lamps, banners uniforms, medals, music, and more beer—all to be paid for. Champagne at the various headquarters, cigars and extras, hacks (by the hour), flowers, unlimited beer—and of course the more money the more beer. Little of this money is stolen, we believe, although Colonel George Bliss had startling theories to the contrary four years ago. The election would go on just as well without the money, but there would not be so much beer, nor so many idle statesmen howling around bar rooms. It is not a bad thing to have this money in circulation. The boys have only a chance in four years at unlimited beer, and so we advise liberal subscriptions. After the elections moral reflections upon money in elections would be in order, but just now there is so much fun on hand that one does not care to be the mummy at the Egyptian feast. By-and-bye—after election!

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXVII.—(CONTINUED.)

"Pooh!" Hugh answered, in one of his heroically sanguine moods, as he sat in the diningroom with his back to the window and the hated poplar, and his face to the ground-plans and estimates upon the table before him. "I'm an to go up to town for the season always, and to keep up my journalistic connection in a general way; and in time, no doubt, I shall begin to get work at the bar also. I shall make friends assiduously with what a playful phrase absurdly describes as "the lower branch of the profession." I shall talk my nicest to every dull solicitor I meet anywhere, and do my politest to the dull solicitor's stupid wife and plain daughters. I'll fetch them ices at other people's At Homes, and shower on them tickets for all the private views we don't care about, and all the first nights at uninteresting theatres. That's the way to advance in the procession. Sooner or later, I'll get on at the bar. Meanwhile, as the estate's fortunately unencumbered, and there's none of that precious nonsense about entail, or remainders, or settlements, or so forth, we can raise the immediate cash for our present need on short mortgages."

"I hate the very name of mortgages," Winifred cried impatiently. "They suggest brokers' men and bailiffs, and bankruptcy and beggary."

"And everything else that begins with a B," Hugh continued, smiling a placid smile to himself, and vaguely reminiscent of "Alice in Wonderland." "Why with a B?" Alice said musingly.—"Why not?" said the March Hare.—Alice was silent.—"Now, for my own part, I confess, on the contrary, Winifred, to a certain sentimental liking for the mortgage as such, viewed in the abstract. It's a document intimately connected with the landed interest and the feudal classes; it savours to my mind of broad estates and haughty aristocrats, and lordly rent-rolls and a baronial ancestry. I will admit that I should feel a peculiar pride in my connection with Whitestrand if I felt I had got it really with a mortgage on it. How proud a moment, to be seized of a mortgage! The poor, the abject, the lowly, and the landless don't go in heavily for the luxury of mortgages. They pawn their watch, or raise a precarious shilling or two upon the temporary security of Sunday suits, kitchen clocks, and second-hand flat-irons. But a mortgage is an eminently gentlemanly form of impecuniosity. Like gout and the lord-lieutenancy of your shire, it's incidental to birth and greatness.—Upon my word, I'm not really certain, Winnie, now I come to think upon it, that a gentleman's house is ever quite complete without a History of England, a billiard table, and a mortgage. Unencumbered estates suggest Brummagem; they bespeak the vulgar affluence of the nouveau riche, who keeps untold gold lying idle at his bankers on purpose to spite the political economists. But a loan of a few thousands, invested with all the glamour of deposited title deeds, fore-closing, engrossed parchment, and an extremely beautiful and elaborate specimen of that charming dialect, conveyancers' English, carries with it an air of antique respectability and county importance that I should be loth to forego, even if I happened to have the cash in hand otherwise available, for carrying out the necessary improvements."

"But how shall we ever pay it back?" Winifred asked, with native feminine caution.

Hugh waved his hands expansively open. When he went in for the sanguine, he did it thoroughly. "One thing at a time, my child," he murmured low, "First borrow; then set your wits to work to look around for a means of repayment.—In the desk at home in London this very moment lies an immortal epic, worth ten thousand pounds if it's worth a penny, and cheap at the price to a discerning purchaser. Ormuz and Ind are perfect East Ends to it. It teems with Goloondas and Big Bonanzas. In time the slow world would most surely discover that this England of ours still encloses a great live poet. The blind and battling must open their eyes and look at last placidly about them. They'll then be glad to buy fifty editions of that divine strain, varying in character from the large paper edition de luxe in antique vellum at ten guineas—five hundred numbered copies only printed, and issued to subscribers upon conditions which may be learnt on application at all libraries—to the school selection at popular prices, intended to familiarise the ingenuous youth of this nation with the choicest thoughts of a distinguished and high-minded living author.—While, I'm tired to death of hearing people say when I'm introduced to them: "Oh, Mr Massinger, I've wanted to ask, are you descended from the poet Massinger?' I mean the time to arrive before long when I can answer them plainly with a bold face: "No, my dear sir, no madam, I am not; but I am the poet Massinger, if you care to be told so."—When that time comes, we'll pay off the mortages and build a castle—in Spain or elsewhere—with the balance of our fortune. Meanwhile, we have always the satisfaction of knowing that nothing on earth could be more correct or squirearchical in its way than a genuine mortgage."

"I'm not so sure as I once was, Hugh, that you'll ever make much out of your kind of poetry,"

"Of course not, my child; because now I happen to be only your husband. A prophet, we know on the best authority, is not without honor, et cætera, et cætera. But I mean to make my mark yet for all that; ay, and to make money out of it, too, into the bargain."

So, in the end, Winifred's objections were overruled—since this was not a matter upon which that young lady felt strongly—and the money for "improving and developing the estate" having been duly raised by the aid, assistance, instrumentality, or mediation of that fine specimen of conveyancers' English aforesaid, to which Hugh had so touchingly and professionally alluded, a fashionable architect was invited down from town at once to inspect the Hall and to draw up plans for its renovation as a residential mansion of the most modern pattern.

The fashionable architect, after his kind, performed his work well—and expensively. He spared himself no pains and Hugh no money on rendering the Hall a perfect example on a small scale of the best Elizabethan domestic architecture. He destroyed ruthlessly and repaired lavishly. He put mullions to the windows and pillars to the porch, and moulded ceilings to the chief reception-rooms, and oaken balustrades to either side of the wide old rambling Tudor staircase. He rebuilt whatever Inigo had defaced, and pulled down whatever of vile and shapeless Georgian contractors had stolidly added. He "restored" the building to what it had never before been: a fine squat old-fashioned country mansion of the low wind-swept East Anglian type, a House Beautiful everywhere, without and within, and as unlike as possible to the dingy Hall that Hugh Massinger had seen and mentally discountenanced on the occasion of his first visit to Whitestrand. "You give an architect money enough," says Colonel Silas Lapham in the greatest romance—bar one—in the English language, "and he'll build you a fine house every time." If Hugh Massinger gave his architect money enough, or at least credit enough—which comes at first to the same thing—and he got a fine house, as far as the means at his disposal went, on that ugly corner of flat sandy waste at forsaken Whitestrand.

When the building was done and the papering finished, they set about the furnishing proper. And here, Winifred's taste began to clash with Hugh's; for every woman, though she may eschew ground-plans, elevations, and estimates, has at least distinct ideas of her own on the important question of internal decoration. The new Squire was all for oriental hangings, Turkey carpets, Indian darrees, and Persian tiling. But Mrs Massinger would have none of these heathenish gewgaws, she's demmly declared; her tastes by no means took a Saracenic turn. Mr Hatherley and the Cheyne Row men would make fun of her, and call her house Liberty Hall, if she furnished it throughout with such Mussulman absurdities. For her own part, she renounced Liberty and all his works: she eschewed everything east of longitude thirty degrees: inlaid coffee-tables were an abomination in her eyes; pierced Arabic lamps roused no latent enthusiasm: the only real thing in decoration was Morris: and on Morris she pinned her faith unreservedly. She would be utterly utter. She had a Morris carpet and Morris curtains; white ivory paint adorned her lop-sided overmantels, and red De Morgan ware with opalescent hues ranged in long straight rows upon her pigeon-hole cabinets. To Hugh's poetical mind this was all too plaguy modern; out of keeping, he thought, with the wide oaken staircase and the punctilious Elizabethanism of the eminent architect's façade and ceilings. Winifred, however, laughed his marital remonstrances to utter scorn. She hated an upholsterer's house, she said, all furnished alike from end to end with servile adherence to historical correctness. Such puritanical purism was meant for slaves. Why pretend to be living in Elizabethan England or Louis Quinze France, when we're really vegetating, as we all know, in the marshy wilds of nineteenth century Suffolk? Let your house reflect your own eclecticism—a very good phrase, picked up from a modish handbook of domestic decoration. She liked a little individuality and lawlessness of purpose. "Your views, you know, Hugh," she cried with the ex cathedra conviction of a woman laying down the law in her own household, "are just the least little bit in the world pedantic. You and your architect want a stiff museum of Elizabethan art. It may be silly of me, but I prefer myself a house to live in."

"The drawing-room does look so perfectly lovely, you remember," Hugh quoted quietly from her own old letters. "'We've done it up exactly as you recommended, with the sage-green plush for the old mantel-piece, and a red Japanese table in the dark corner; and I really think, now I see the effect, your taste's simply exquisite. But then, you know, what else can you expect from a distinguished poet? You always do everything beautifully!' Can you recollect, Mrs. Massinger, down the dim abyss of twelve or eighteen months, who wrote those touching words, and to whom she addressed them?"

"Ah, that was all very fine then," Winifred answered with a pout, arranging Hugh's Satsuma jars with Japanesque irregularity on the dining room overmantel. "But you see that was before I'd been about much in London, and noticed how other people smarten up their rooms, and formed my own taste in the matter of decoration. I was then in the frankly unsophisticated state. I'd studied no models. I'd never seen anything beautiful to judge by."

"You were then Miss Meysey," her husband answered, with a distantly cold inflection of voice. "You're now Mrs Hugh de Carteret Massinger. It's that toast makes all the difference, you know. The reason there are so many discordant marriages, says Dean Swift, with more truth than politeness, is because young women are so much more occupied in weaving nets than in making cages."

"I never wove nets for you," Winifred cried angrily.

"Nor made cages either, it seems," Hugh answered with provoking calmness, as he sauntered off by himself, cigar in hand, into the new smoking-room.

Their intercourse nowadays generally ended in such little asperities. They were beginning to conjugate with alarming frequency that verb to nag, which often succeeds in becoming at last the dominant part of speech in conjugal conversation.

One portion of the house at least, Hugh succeeded in remodelling entirely to his own taste, and that was the bedroom which had once been Elsie's. By throwing out a large round bay window, mullioned and decorated out of all recognition, and by papering, painting, and refurnishing throughout with delicate severity of design and detail, he so completely altered the appearance of that baneful room that he could hardly know it again himself for the same original square chamber. Moreover, that he might never personally have to enter it, he turned it into the Married Guest's Bedroom. There was the Prophet's chamber on the Wall for the bachelor visitors—a pretty little attic under the low eaves, furnished, like the Shunammite's, with 'a bed,' and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick;" and there was the Maiden's Bower on the first floor, for the young girls, with its dainty pale green wardrobe and Morris cabinet; and there was the Blue Room for the prospective heir, whenever that hypothetical young gentleman from parts unknown proceeded to realise himself in actual humanity; so Hugh ventured to erect the remodelled chamber next to his own into a Married Guest Room, where he himself need never go to vex his soul with unholy reminiscences. When he could look up at the Hall with a bold face from the grass plot in front, and see no longer that detested square window with the wistaria festooning itself so luxuriantly round the corners, he felt he might really perhaps after all live at Whitestrand. For the wistaria, too, that grand old climber, with its thick stem, was ruthlessly sacrificed; and in its place on the left of the porch, Hugh planted a fast-growing new-fangled Ampelopsis, warranted quickly to drape and mantle the raw stone surfaces, and still further metamorphose the front of the Hall from what it had once been—when dead Elsie lived there. All was changed, without and within. The Hall was now fit for a gentleman to dwell in.

Only one eyesore still remained to grieve and annoy him. The Whitestrand poplar yet faced and confronted him wherever he looked. It turned him sick. It poisoned Suffolk for him. The poplar must go! He could never endure it. Life would indeed be a living death, in sight for ever of that detested and grinning memorial. For it grinned at him often from the guarled and hollow trunk. A human face seemed to laugh out upon him from its shapeless boles—a human face, fiendish in its joy, with a carbuncled nose and grinning mouth. He hated to see it, it grinned so hideously. So he set his wits to work to devise a way for getting rid of the poplar, root and branch, without unnecessarily angering Winifred.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—REHEARSAL.

Meanwhile, when the house was all finished and decorated throughout, Hugh turned his thoughts once more, on fame intent, to his great forthcoming volume of verses. Since he married Winifred, he had published little, eschewing journalism and such small tasks as unworthy the dignity of accomplished squiredom; but he had been working hard from time to time at polishing and repolishing his magnum opus, A Life's Philosophy—a lengthy poem in a metre of his own more or less novel, and embodying a number of moral reflections, more or less trite, on the youth, adolescence, maturity, and decrepitude of the human subject. It exactly suited Mr. Matthew Arnold's well-known definition, being, in fact, an exhaustive criticism of life, as Hugh Massinger himself had found it. He meant to print it in time for the autumn book-season. It was the great stake of his life, and he was confident of success. He had worked it up with ceaseless toil to what seemed to himself the highest possible pitch of artistic handicraft; and he rolled his own sonorous rhymes over and over again with infinite satisfaction upon his literary palate, pronouncing them all, on impartial survey, of most excellent flavour. Nothing in life, indeed, can be more deceptive than the poet-aster's confidence in his own productions. He mistakes familiarity for smoothness of ring, and a practised hand for genius and originality. It is his fate always to find his own lines absolutely perfect; in which cheerful personal creed the rest of the world mostly fails altogether to agree with him.

In such a self-congratulatory and hopeful mood, Hugh sat one morning in the new drawing-room holding a quire of closely written sermon-paper stitched together in his hand, and gazing affectionately with parental pride at his last-born Stanzas. Winifred had only returned yesterday from a shopping expedition up to town and was idling away a day in rest and repair after her unwanted exertion among the crowded bazaars of the modern Bagdad. So Hugh leaned back in his chair at his ease, and, seized with the sudden thirst for an audience, began to pour forth in her ear in his round manner the final finished introductory prelude to his Life's Philosophy. His wife, propped up on the pillows of the sofa and lolling carelessly, listened and smiled as he read and read, with somewhat sceptical though polite indifference.

"Let me see, where had I got to?" Hugh went on once, after her frequent and trying critical interruptions. "You put me out so, Winnie, with your constant fault-finding! I can't recollect how far I'd read to you."

"'Begotten unawares:'" now go ahead," Winifred answered carelessly—as though it were some other fellow's poems he had been pouring forth to her.

"'Or bastard offspring of unconscious nature, Begotten unawares,'" Hugh repeated pompously, looking back with a loving eye at his much-admired manuscript. "Now listen to the next good bit, Winifred; it's really impressive.—

XXXII.

When chaos slowly set on fun or planet,
And molten masses hardened into earth:
When primal force wrought out on sea and granite
The wondrous miracle of living birth;
Did mightier Mind, in clouds or glory hidden,
Breathe power through its limbs to feel and know,
Or sentience spring, spontaneous and unbidden,
With feeble steps and slow?

XXXIII.

Are sense and thought but parasites of being
Did Nature mould our limbs to act and move,
But some strange chance endow our eyes with seeing,
Our nerves with feeling, and our hearts with love?
Since all alone we stand, alone discerning
Sorrow from joy, self from the things without;
While blind fate tramples on the spirit's yearning,
And floods our souls with doubt.

XXXIV.

This very tree, whose life is our life's sister,
We know not if the ichor in her veins
Thrill with fierce joy when April dews have kissed her,
Or shrink in anguish from October rains;
We search the mighty world above and under,
Yet nowhere find the soul we fain would find;
Speech in the hollow rumbling of the thunder,
Words in the whispering wind.

XXXV.

We yearn for brotherhood with lake and mountain,
Our conscious soul seeks conscious sympathy;
Nymphs in the coppice, Naiads in the fountain,
Gods on the craggy height or roaring sea
We find but soulless sequences of matter;
Fact linked to fact in adamantine rods;
Eternal bounds of former sense and latter;
Dead laws for living gods.

"There, Winifred, what do you say to that now? Isn't that calculated to take the wind out of some of these pretentious fellows' sails? What do you think of it?"

"Think?" Winifred answered, pursing up her lips into an expression of the utmost professional connoisseurship. "I think 'granite' doesn't rhyme in the English language with "planet;" and I consider 'sentience' is a horribly prosaic word of it's sort to intro duce into serious poetry.—What's that stuff about liquor too? 'We know not if the liquor in her something.' I don't like 'liquor.' It's not good; bar-room English, only fit for a public-house production."

"I didn't say 'liqior,'" Hugh cried indignantly. "I said 'ichor' which of course is a very different matter. 'We know not if the ichor in her veins.' Ichor's the blood of the gods in Homer. That's the worst of reading these things to women: classical allusion's an utter blank to them.—If you've got nothing better than that to object, have the kindness, please, not to interrupt me."

Winifred closed her lips with a sharp snap while Hugh went on, nothing abashed, with the same sonorous metre-marked mouthing.

XXXVI.

"They care not any whit for pain or pleasure
That seem to men the sum and end of all.
Dumb force and barren number are their measure:
What can be, shall be, though the great world fall.
They take no heed of man, or man's deserving,
Rock not what happy lives they make, or mar,
Work out their fatal will, unswerved, unswerving,
And know not that they are.

"Now, what do you to say that, Winifred? Isn't it just hunky?"

"I don't like interrupting," Winifred snapped out savagely. "You told me not to interrupt, except for a good and sufficient reason."

"Well, don't be nasty," Hugh put in, half smiling. 'This is business, you know—a matter of public appreciation—and I want your criticism; it all means money. Criticism from anybody, no matter whom, is always worth at least something."

"Oh, thank you, so much. That is polite of you. Then if you want criticism, no matter from whom, I should say I fail to perceive, myself, the precise difference you mean to suggest between the two adjectives 'unswerved' and 'unswerving.' To the untutored intelligence of a mere woman, to whom classical allusion's an utter blank, they seem to say exactly the same thing twice over."

"No, no," Hugh answered, getting warm in self-defence. "'Unswerved' is passive; 'unswerving' is active, or at least middle: the one means that they swerve themselves; the other, that somebody or something else swerves them."

"You do violence to the genius of the English language," Winifred remarked curtly. "I may not be acquainted with Latin and Greek, but I talk at least my mother-tongue. Are you going to print nothing but this great, long, dreary, incomprehensible 'Life's Philosophy' in your new volume?"

"I shall make it up mainly with that," Hugh answered, crest-fallen, at so obvious a failure favourably to impress the domestic critic. "But I shall also eke out the title-piece with a lot of stray occasional verses—the "Funeral Ode for Gambetta, for example, and plenty of others that I haven't read you. Some of them seem to me tolerably successful." He was growing modest before the face of her unflinching criticism.

To make mastic-varnish from gum-mastic, dissolve the gum-mastic in turpentine enough to make it of the proper consistency.

Two Lions In a Tunnel.

An exciting Montana story is told in the Minneapolis Tribune by Station-agent Brown of the Northern Pacific Railroad, describing a night's adventure in the great Mullan Tunnel, in the spring of 1885.

It was Brown's 'watch off' that night, and he was preparing to sleep at the station when "Jim," the tunnel-walker on duty, rushed in, the picture of fright, gasping out, "There's some kind of a critter in that tunnel that cries like a baby—and, howly St. Patrick, what a yell!"

Agent Brown went to the tunnel, and coaxed his courageous big dog Tip to go in and investigate. The dog's courage cost him his life. A minute after he disappeared, there was a chorus of frightful yells, and—that was the last of poor Tip!

Satisfied that there were mountain-lions in the tunnel, and impressed with the idea that they must be got out before the midnight passenger-train came along, the agent collected all the force he could command, and prepared to hunt the "varmints." Brown and his "section crew" together numbered seven men, reinforced by several dogs, and the arms of the party were a shot-gun and two rifles, and four revolvers.

Lighted by three huge torches made of oily cotton-waste, they crept into the darkness of the tunnel, and slowly advanced, until the dogs stopped and whined. Peering ahead through the gloom, the men soon saw four fiery eyes. What happened next is told in Agent Brown's own words:

"I kept the torch-carriers in front, for I was certain they would run after the first fire, for they had nothing but pistols.

"'Now, boys, be steady, just as if you were firing at a mark for fun, and you men with the torches, don't move back when we fire; hold your ground, for your life depends on it. I'll take those two eyes on the left, you men those on the right; shoot square to hit between the balls of fire, and the battle's over. I'll give the order. All ready? One, two, fire!'

"One of the brutes gave a death yell, but the other didn't, and, with the courage of the guns behind them, the noble dogs rushed in.

"The fight was on in an instant. I knew the dogs could only get killed, and I also knew well if the fight began to approach us, my entire force of hunters, torches and all, would desert. Whatever was done had to be done in a moment, or both brutes might be upon us.

"'Now, boys, quick! All take aim at that mass of dogs and lions, and blaze away!'

"Three pistols and two rifles answered. The fight wasn't over yet, but was getting weak. 'Give it to 'em again, boys!' and all hands responded.

"'Now, boys, advance slow; there is no particular danger now, unless we get too close to their claws.' It was fully five minutes before I could get the torches up close enough to see that the dogs and lions were all dead or fatally hurt."

A hand-car was brought as soon as possible, and the dead lions and dogs were piled upon it, and the men had the track clear in ample time for the midnight train to pass.

Blatherskite Ingalls.

Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, the wild Western twister of the British lion's tail, whom the Republican party delights to honor and who now fills the responsible and honorable position of President of the United States Senate, has been indulging in his favrite amusement. This man, who appears to have the reasoning powers of a parrot, the knowledge of affairs of a Comanche Indian, and the discretion of a monkey, has been pleased to state publicly through the press his opinion that the "overflow" of population from the United States will absorb Canada in a few years. This is not all, however, for he is pleased to characterise the loyalty of Canada to British connection as an "intrusion" on the part of England into the politics of this continent, and this intrusion is an "intolerable impertinence," "dictated by deliberate hostility to the United States," a "studied affront," which is the duty of the United States to resent. Nay more, if "British men-of-war continue to haul down the flag of American fishermen without protest, then will our volunteers march on Montreal and Quebec and take possession of the Canadian Pacific and the St. Lawrence." If Mr. Ingalls did not occupy an official position in the United States, the self-evident fact that he does not know what he is talking about would deprive his mouthings of any significance. As it is, he is a Republican, one of the men who direct the course of that party—and he does not know that no British warship ever took part in enforcing the 1818 treaty—and the Canadian and British voters in the United States should not forget this when the ballots are cast for the election of President.

Slavery Among the English.

Samuel Smiles, in his note book called "Thrift," says:

Slavery long existed among ourselves. It existed in Saxon times, when Cæsar landed. It existed in Saxon times, when the household work was done by slaves. The Saxons were notorious slave dealeres, and the Irish were their best customers. The principal mart was at Bristol, from whence the Saxons exported large numbers of slaves into Ireland, so that according to Irish historians, there was scarcely a house in Ireland without a British slave in it. When the Normans took possession of England they continued slavery. From that time slavery continued in various forms. It is recorded of the "good old times" that it was not till the reign of Henry IV, (1399-1412) the villeins, farmers and mechanics were permitted by law to put their children to school, and long after that they dared not educate a son for the church without a license from the lord. The kings of England, in their contests with the feudal aristocracy, gradually relaxed the slave laws. They granted charters founding royal burghs, and when the slaves fled into them and were able to conceal themselves for a year and a day they then became freemen of the burh and were declared by law to be free. The last serfs in England were emancipated in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but the last serfs in Scotland were not emancipated until the reign of George III, at the end of the last century. Before then the colliers and salters belonged to the soil, and were bought and sold with it. They had no power to determine what their wages should be.

Tender Care.

The depth and tenderness of the poet Goethe's heart, while he was yet a child, was evinced at the death of his little brother Jacob.

To the surprise of his mother, Johann Wolfgang did not shed a tear over the sad event, for he believed, with a child's simple trust, that God had taken little Jacob to live with Him in heaven. His mother, not understanding the cause of his calmness, asked him: "Did you not love your little brother, then, that you do not grieve at his loss?"

He ran up to his room, and from under the bed drew a quantity of papers, on which he had written stories and lessons.

"All these I had written," he said to his mother, "that I might teach them to little Jacob."

Bad Times in Cochin Chin

Things are not improving in the French colony of Cochin China. Merchants, both Chinese and French, are failing in all directions, and for the six months up to the end of June the revenue had fallen off to the tune of nearly £250,000. The Governor has accordingly had to stop the making of roads, the building of bridges, and other public works; and his action is making the state of affairs still worse, as it has thrown so many coolies and Chinese out of work. No wonder, then, that M. Constans is anxious that M. Floquet should accept his resignation. If the Premier does this, it is suggested he should send in the place of M. Constans as Governor-General the present active and not too scrupulous French President-General at Madagascar, M. le Myre de Vilers.

FALL FOLLIES.

After a poor man has succeeded in climbing the ladder of fame nobody notices the patches on the dome of his trousers.

It was complained at a child's party where grown-up people were in the majority, that it was too much adult, erated.

"So it is Mike Robe who made the people sick in Florida," exclaimed Mrs. McGinness, "shure he must be a baste."

A middle name does not do much toward making a man great, but it is the basis of many the claim to greatness that a good many men possess.

Muskoka owes its popularity to the salubrity of its air. It is a sort of millinaire that people go there for, particularly if they have marriageable daughters.

"So your name is Dorothy! Well, Miss Dorothy, do you know that you are the perfect image of your papa?" "Oh, yes! I am often taken for my papa."

Impecunious Lover—"Be mine, Amanda, and you will be treated like an angel." Maiden—"Yes, I suppose so. Nothing to eat and less to wear. No, I thank you."

Ethelinda is a very pretty name for a girl, but it shuts her out forever from eating beans, unless she is willing to be an anachronism, or to eat her beans in solitude from the pantry shelf.

Mabel (a stranger in town)—"Is Maude Hilly a girl who cares much for style?" Mamie—"Style? I should think so. Why, they say the affected thing eats her meals off a fashion plate!"

"Your husband, Mrs. Murphy, is suffering from a complication of diseases. I must first make a diagnosis—" "Kin yer make it out of ould muslin, doctor? I haven't a bit of flannel in the house."

Enraged Husband—"Maria, I can endure this existence no longer. I am going to blow my brains out!" Wife (calmly)—"Don't attempt it, John. You have never had any success in firing at small targets."

Phosphorescent Waters.

Lieutenant Habasham, in his account of the North Pacific Surveying and Exploring Expedition, describes some strange appearances of the water seen about the Cape of Good Hope. The whole surface of the harbor would at times be covered by a greasy, frothy, variously colored substance, that gave the water a most uncleanly appearance during the day, but which at night caused it to resemble a cake of molten gold.

How deep it extended we could not tell, possibly the whole depth of the harbor. We had observed the same phenomenon while approaching the coast, and had at first been at a loss to what to attribute it. The whole sea was sprinkled with the variously hued patches, and as we sailed through them, we left a wake of fire that was apparent even under the midday sun.

It was like sailing over a painted sea in the daytime; and at night, when the seas lifted up their lambent crests in all directions, the effect was truly grand. We subsequently attributed their existence to the presence of vast masses of a migrating infusoria, the minute and phosphorescent forms of the largest of which we could readily detect in a drop of the water by placing it under an ordinary magnifier.

All About It.

How interesting it is to hear an account of a wedding from the lips of the happy, chattering little bride herself, as she recounts the whole affair to one of her intimate friends, who listens eagerly while the bride says:—

"And, oh, everything went on perfectly lovely. There wasn't a single hitch from beginning to end, although I was dreadfully nervous, and Will was so nervous himself that I was in mortal terror all the time for fear he'd drop the ring or make some horrible mistake when he came to saying, 'I, William, take thee, Annabelle, etc.,' but he didn't, although his voice trembled and so did his hand when he took mine. It's a mercy we didn't drop the ring between us! What if we had? What if we had? I'd have died? But we got through the ceremony without a single mistake. And, oh, the church was lovely! Then came the reception and all that—and the congratulations. And it did sound too funny to hear Will saying 'my wife' at first—he'd give my hand a little squeeze every time he said it, and I'd come awful near giggling right out, and what if I had? Then the supper! Oh, it was elegant! Everything went off perfectly beautiful! And as for the presents—oh, oh o-oh! They——

The short time allotted to our readers fors their sojourn on this terrestrial globe move us to cut this story short.—Time.

The Normans.

The Mormons, who are now moving into Mexico and Canada, probably find no difficulty in leaving their peculiar institution of polygamy behind them. It appears that those who have settled in the North-West Territory have expressly declared that they will not attempt to violate the laws of the Dominion in this respect or countenance such a violation. Doubtless the same prudent decision will be taken by the Mormons now establishing themselves in Chihuahua. The latter have been for several years quietly examining the country, buying land, and founding experimental colonies. Now they are joined by their fellow-disciples in large numbers, and the beginning of what will probably prove a large and influential settlement is made. Yet they are under the laws of the State of Chihuahua, and an attempt to practise polygamy might bring upon them prompter and severer penalties than any enforced in Utah. All this shows the dilemma of the rank and file. If they are willing to give up polygamy, which is really practised only by a small minority, they ought not to be compelled to go to Canada or Mexico to do it. But the unwillingness of a few leaders to renounce formally and utterly destroy this system commends residence out of Utah to those who care nothing for polygamy, and do not propose to sacrifice their lives to it.

THEY READ FUNNY NOW.

A List of the Famous Connecticut Blue Laws.

According to the Boston "Record," these laws were enacted by the people of the "Dominion of New Haven," and became known as the blue laws because they were printed on blue paper. They were as follows:

A man who strikes his wife shall be fined £10.

No food or lodging shall be offered to a heretic.

The Sabbath day shall begin at sunset Saturday.

No one shall cross a river on the Sabbath but authorized clergymen.

No one shall kiss his or her children on the Sabbath or fasting days.

Whoever brings cards or dice into the dominion shall pay a fine of £2.

A woman who strikes her husband shall be punished as the law directs.

No one shall travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep houses, cut hair or shave on the Sabbath day.

When people refuse their children convenient marriages the magistrate shall determine the point.

Each freeman shall swear by the blessed God to bear true allegiance to this dominion, and that Jesus is the only King.

No one shall eat mince-pies, dance, play cards or play any instrument of music except the drum, trumpet or jewsharp.

No man shall be a freeman or have a vote unless he is converted and a member of one of the churches allowed in the dominion.

No dissenter from the essential worship of this dominion shall be allowed to give a vote for electing of Magistrates or any officer.

No gospel minister shall join people in marriage. The Magistrate may join them in marriage, as he may do it with less scandal to Christ's church.

Whoever wears clothes trimmed with gold, silver or bone lace above 1 shilling per yard shall be presented by the Grand Jurors, and the Selectmen shall tax the estate £300.

No man shall court a maid in person or by letter without obtaining the consent of her parents; £5 penalty the the first offense, £10 for the second, and for the third imprisonment during the pleasure of the Court.

The Governor and Magistrates convened in general assembly are the supreme power, under God, of this independent dominion. From the determination of the assembly no appeal shall be made.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

"Portieres" and all curtains must have frequent shakings, or moths will be sure to lodge in their folds.

Messrs. Judd & Co. of Sidcup, Eng., have introduced a "carbo-eucalyptic" salt for baths. It produces a fragrant smelling bath, and is, moreover, useful where the water available for washing is very hard.

There is no better mode of cleansing dirty glass bottles than by paring a raw potato, cutting it into small bits, and putting them into the bottle with cold water. Shake it smartly till the fur is quite gone, and then rinse with clean water.

A gentleman who has made a study of the eye says, for the benefit of people who have to earn a livelihood with the pen, "Never write on white paper if you can get yellow. A sheet of paper or card of the same shade placed on the wall over the desk will assist in giving the eye rest, and this will facilitate the work."

Mr. Stockhardt of Leipsic has recently patented a process of treating ordinary soft wood so as to be fit for these purposes for which lignum-vitæ has hitherto been almost exclusively used. The soft wood in question is first impregnated with oil, after which it is subjected to great pressure, causing a considerable increase in the density of the material. Thus prepared the artificial is said to have all the properties of good lignum-vitæ.

THE CELLULOGRAPH.—This beautiful style of photograph was lately exhibited before the New York Society of Amateur Photographers, and is made by Mr. C. Theo. Cain, of Owensboro, Ky. A positive is made on glass with collodio-chloride emulsion, toned in the usual way, and then transferred on to a sheet of white celluloid. The process is quite simple. The resulting picture looks very similar to the well-known ivorytypes. The sheet of celluloid can be easily embossed, shaped, and moulded into beautiful designs. It makes a very novel and durable picture.

Professor Brown-Sequard has recently been making experiments to determine whether the human breath was capable of producing any poisonous effects. From the condensed watery vapour of the expired air he obtained a poisonous liquid which, when injected under the skin of rabbits, produced almost immediate death. He ascertained that this poison was an alkaloid, and not a microbe. The rabbits thus injected died without convulsions, the heart and large blood-vessels being engorged with blood. M. Brown-Sequard considers it fully proved that the expired air,

THE London Advertiser celebrated its 25th birthday by issuing a handsome "Quarter Century Edition," containing 44 pages and cover. In this edition is given an interesting historical description of the Advertiser and the city for the past 25 years. The neatness of the typographical work and the interesting matter furnished reflect great credit on the management of the paper. One needs only to compare the Evening Advertiser issued in 1863—an engraving of which appears on the cover of the "Quarter Century Edition"—with the Advertiser of 1888 to note the wonderful advancement made during the past 25 years until it now enjoys its well-deserved reputation of being the leading daily paper in Western Ontario.

THE Buffalo hunters, who were hunting here last week, succeeded in shooting a large number of black squirrels, they having shot 80 on Thursday of last week.

FARQUHAR MCRAE is working on the new railway that runs through Kingsville. A fire got started in this boarding house and burned some of he spare clothing.

D. C. CLAY, municipal clerk, is preparing a map of the village of Dutton. In the past it has taken about six maps to cover the village, now it will be complete in one.

A NUMBER of passenger trains on the M. C. R. are now heated by steam, and as soon as the necessary changes can be made all the passenger trains will be heated this way.

MR. F. A. HUMPIDGE has drawn a plan of Mr. Peckham's buggy gearing, which, together with the model, will be forwarded to Ottawa for the purpose of having the gearing patented.

SOME miscreant recently placed a plank across the sidewalk before the march of the Salvation Army and Cadet McKay stumbled over it receiving a bad tumble. Such depredations might do great harm.

A ROMANCE WITH A MORAL.—A lady teacher of music inserted her professional card in a certain local paper. It was seen by her old lover in Chicago, who at once hunted her up, explained his absence of a quarter of a century, and married her.—Acton Free Press.

WE have received from the office of the Toronto Weekly News a very fine etching of Munkacsy's famous painting, "Christ Before Pilate," 28in. x 21in., which the News is presenting to its subscribers. It is faithful copy of the great work of the Hungarian artist of which so many have heard, but which so few in Canada have seen; and, aside from its merit as a work of art, should be valued for the majesty of the theme which it treats.

THE CHAMPION MEAN MAN.—A man, living in this county, who owes nearly four years subscription, put his paper back in the post-office last week marked "refused." We have heard fo many mean men—there is the man who used the wart on his neck for a collar button, and one who pastured his goat on his grandmother's grave, the one who stole coppers from the dead man's eyes, the one who got rich by giving his five children a nickle each to go to bed without their supper, and then stealing the nickles after the children were asleep—but for pure downright cussedness, the man who will take the paper four years, mark it "refused" and then stick it back in the post office, is entitled to the first premium. Please send us your picture—we want to hang it up in the office to keep the mice from eating the paste.—Watford Advocate.

A REPLY TO "YEOMAN."

To the Editor of the ENTERPRISE:—

In the Journal, St. Thomas, of Tuesday evening, "Yeoman" thinks our suggestion for a market "funny" and premature, and suggests that one farmer could drive from the lake shore and glut the market, etc., etc. He urges, however, that the village should offer inducements to outsiders in the shape of village lots at reasonable prices. With this "Watchman" is in perfect accord, and thinks it would abundantly repay owners of real estate, not only to sell at a lower figure, but to put up at auction some twenty or twenty-five lots in an eligible situation, and sell without reserve. "Watchman" has heard of several people complaining of the price at which lots are held, and it is certainly almost impossible to obtain a comfortable house to rent at a reasonable figure. Gentlemen, put your lots on the market; advertise in the ENTERPRISE. It would almost pay to give away a few lots to encourage people to come and build.

New industries will be considered in a week or two. Meanwhile we are looking for "Yeoman's" democrat with butter, eggs, poultry, etc. Bring it on. Honestly "Watchman" thinks people will be glad to see him. WATCHMAN.

SIR,—It is refreshing sometimes to see a fellow show his true colors. The Rodney Mercury says, respecting a comment on the Rodney fair by the ENTERTRISE, that other "fakirs and swindlers besides the fellow from Dutton (the ENTERPRISE), found that the Rodney fair was the only fair worth attending in the county." Does he mean the representatives of the Times, Journal, Globe and Mail, as well as those of the Provincial and Dominion Governments and bankers, lawyers, doctors, ministers, merchants and fellows with their best girls, not even excepting the editor of the Mercury? Fakirs and swindlers! Oh, dear.

But, never mind; go it, Mercury, and bring the Rodney fair up to the standard of the regulation fair held in Dakota last year, where there were two entries, a bull and a pumpkin. The bull got loose and ate the pumpkin and the fair ended right there.

Yours,
SCRIBE.

HIS LAST SIGNAL.

It is a long time since a fatal accident has taken place in the M.C.R. yards, but on Saturday night the record was broken, when Mr. Richard O'Malley, M.C.R. switchman, met a frightful ending. The unfortunate young man has been employed as night switchman, his helper being C. Laing. About 9 o'clock a yard engine proceeded up the coal shute in front of the station to bring down four empty coal cars. The engine proceeded up the shute pilot first, O'Malley being in the pilot of the engine. He made the coupling and signalled with his lantern to the engineer that all was ready. Though engines are reversed and sand used in coming down the shute, the grade of which is very steep, the speed cannot be regulated or the engine stopped till the level track is struck. Just as the bottom of the shute had been reached Helper Lang noticed O'Malley's lantern fall and Engineer Bryne and the train men and others around the station were alarmed by hearing O'Malley cry out. Every effort was made to stop the engine and cars, but they could not be stopped until a short distance from Ross street, when the lifeless body of the unfortunate young man was found under the wheels of the second car from the engine. It was found necessary to raise the car with jacks before the body could be got out. It is supposed that when near the bottom of the shute the deceased had attempted to climb from the pilot of the engine on to the flat car and had fallen under the wheels.

SHEDDEN.

Mr. James Black assumes his duties as teacher of Shedden school on Thursday. Mr. H. Lockhart, the presett teacher, has resigned, and leaves on Thursday for Kingston Medical School.

Mack Campbell, employed in the flaxmill, engaged a rig from Burwell's livery on Saturday and drove farther than he agreed to, and abused the horse. Campbell was arrested and placed in the lock-up remaining there over Sunday. On Monday morning he paid damages and was released. Riley Dunn, who interfered with Constable J. Horton while arresting Campbell, has left for parts unknown. Had he stayed, the authorities intended taking proceedings against him.

DIED.

DUNCANSON.—At J. P. Duncanson's, Dunwich, on the 27th ult., the widow of the late Peter Duncanson, aged 80 years.

IT PAYS TO ADVERTISE.

The following testimonials are from leading business houses who are large advertisers:—

"Advertise in the best newspapers largely and well, and returns are sure. The stronger the advertising the larger the returns."

"Without the aid of advertising I could have done nothing in my enterprise. Advertising is the royal road to business."

"We have tried almost every sort of medium in advertising, and long ago became convinced that the results were largely in favor of the fresh and varied columns of the newspaper."

"An experience of many years has demonstrated to us the great value and benefit derived from carefully prepared and properly displayed advertisements in well established and influential newspapers."

"According to the character and extent of your business, set aside a liberal percentage for advertising, and do not hesitate to keep yourself unceasingly before the public."

"If what you have to say be strictly true, say it in a good newspaper. Its readers are intelligent, will appreciate a bargain, and of such customer you make an advertiser."

"The policy of every man in business, and who must live by the public, should be to let the public hear of him. His best speaking trumpet is the newspaper advertisement. In a populous community, and a rapid age like this, every trader must make himself heard and known, otherwise he will fall behind the progress of his neighbors."

"Of all methods open to the merchant for advertising his business, an experience of nearly half a century enables us to unhesitatingly declare in favor of the newspaper. It is without exception, the most economical, persistent, painstaking and successful canvasser any business firm can secure for the purpose of bringing their goods to the attention of the consumer."

AUCTION SALES.

JOHN TELFORD, of Wallacetown, will have a sale of brick an tile on Friday of next week.

PETER DUNCANSON will sell by public auction on lot 8, con. 3, near Campbellton, for Angus Leitch, stock, implements, etc.. on Tuesday next, Nov. 6th.

PETER DUNCANSON will sell all the loose property, consisting of live stock, implements, poultry, straw, etc., beionging to D. McAlpine, near Dutton, by public auction, on Thursday next, November 8th. The property will all be disposed of as the proprietor has rented his place.

Cleveland, Ohio, is about bankrupt. City Treasurer Axeworthy, has cleared out of the country with all the funds, and is said to be a defaulter to the extent of half a million dollars. One despatch says: "Treasurer Axeworthy's shortage amounts to $529,437. The The police pension fund and fireman's relief fund, which was unsecured, are gone, and $102,000 of the board of education fund goes into the shortage. This last item is secured by a bond of $250,000. It is believed that Axeworthy's vessel property and real estate will inventory nearly half a million, and the bondsmen are secured. The city will probably lose nothing as the bonds are good. It is said Axeworthy lost heavily in the recent wheat squeezes." A later one says: "There is about $450,000 belonging to the city deposited in half a dozen banks, but the bondsmen of Thos. Axeworthy, the defaulting treasurer, have attached it, and the result is that the city is bankrupt. Kaufman Hayes, a member of the council, has been placed in charge of the office and will continue to act as treasurer until Axeworthy's successor is elected. At present there is only $3,000 in the city's vaults and when that is paid out the treasurer's office will be closed for financial repairs."

THE BURGLARS WERE TOO SOON.—A daring robbery was committed Friday night in the village of Harrow. The store of R. Flood & Co. was entered by burglars, the safe blown open and about $25 taken. Flood was treasurer for the township and collector of taxes, and was expected to have made his first deposit on Friday, but failed to do so. They were after the money, as nothing else in the store was disturbed.

Martyrs to Headache
Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.
The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."
"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."
Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."
When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. A Suit Between Two Brothers.

Twenty years ago, John Gunn, a Canadian merchant, failed in business, and owing to some controversies was arrested by his creditors. Alex. Gunn, a brother, learning of John's misfortune, went immediately to his relief, and settled an indebtedness of £675 for £800, and John was released. Alex. then commenced to survey the situation, and after determining to settle with his brother in some way, and failing, had John arrested. John then agreed to a settlement, which was effected by his giving a bond of £200 to secure Alex. for the advances he had made. The brothers then separated, and John went to Kansas, where he remained until a few years ago, when he removed to Detroit. As soon as he reached Detroit Alex. commenced a suit against him on the bond, and on a trial of the case, which was concluded Saturday before Judge Reilly, he recovered the amount secured by bond, together with interest, amounting to £400.—Detroit Free Press.

A GOOD NEIGHBOR
"Late last fall I was laid up in bed three days with a very severe attack of diarrhœa and vomiting. Nothing benefited me till my neighbor, Mrs. Dunning recommended Dr Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and brought me a half bottle, which she had in her house the vomiting was stopped, and I was able to sit up by night. I would not think of using any other medicine." Columbus Hopkins, Hamilton, Ont

A PLAIN STATEMENT.
All poisonous waste, and worn out matter ought to escape from the system through the secretions of the bowels, kidneys and skin. B.B.B. cleanses, opens and regulates these natural outlets for the removal of disease.

A. E. Burley, of Leamington, recently sent his hired man to Comber to dispose of a load of grapes. Not returning in due time, Mr. Burley became uneasy and search was made for the aforesaid hired man. At Comber he found that his trusted servant had disposed of the grapes and skipped with the proceeds, amounting to $35.

Avoid the harsh, irritating, griping compounds so often sold as purgative medicine, and correct the irregularities of the bowels by the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills. They are invaluable as a family medicine.

A most heart-rending drowning accident occurred at Galt on Saturday. The three children of Dr. Reid, dentist, two girls and a boy, were amusing themselves on the banks of the Grand river. One of them fell into the river, and the others in trying to make a rescue also got into the water. The alarm was soon given and willing rescuers soon arrived. The boy was saved but the two girls were drowned.

The chief did not relish the joke and thinks an exauple sholud be made of the perpetrators. In view of the excitement caused by the recent poisoning affair in Galt such jokes should not be tolerated.

A MYSTERIOUS DEATH.—On Saturday an old woman named McConville was found in a field on her husband's farm, which is situated on the Middleton side of the townline between Middleton and Walsingham, near Guysboro, some eight miles south of Tilsonburg. An inquest was held on Sunday, but no marks of violence were found except a slight bruise on the temple and one arm of the deceased. McConville and his son deposed that they had been in Tilsonburg on Friday, and after they returned home in the evening the old lady retired to her room while they were sitting at the tea table. McConville ate his supper, and after having a smoke he started for bed but found the door fastened. He then burst the door open, but his wife was not to be found in the room, and the window was open. Search was made but the body was not fonnd till Saturday afternoon. The jury returned a verdict of death from exposure. Great excitement exists in the neighborhood, and all kinds of rumors are afloat. As the deceased was a cripple it is asserted that she could not have got out of the bedroom window unaided.

PROSTRATE POLES.

Last week the citizens of Essex Center decided upon having electric lights in the village, and since then the Reliance and the Ball Companies have been fighting as to who shall get the contract. The former company was getting the best of it, and the Ball Company decided upon a novel way of getting there first. Friday night or Saturday morning when the majority of the citizens were asleep the company got a gang of men, put up their posts and strung the wires, and when the morning came the astonished people saw an electric system all ready but the dynamo. They became enraged at the action of the company, and the same evening sawed every pole down. The streets are now covered with fallen poles and wires, and there is every prospect of lots of trouble.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

The Ontario Government will pay $1,000 reward for information that will lead to the conviction of the Galt poisoner or poisoners.

BROKE HIS NECK.—Thursday night as a car of the Garfield avenue and State street line was passing Center and Osgood streets, Chicago, John Miller, a striker, wearing a driver's badge of the North Chicago City Railway Company, threw a stone which struck the driver and went through the car window. Officer Patrick Rice jumped off the car and fired a shot after Miller who disappeared, and was afterward found in a hole with his neck broken and a bullet wound in his right leg His pockets were filled with stones. He fell while trying to escape.

Frank Day, a young Canadian, was stabbed and killed at the corner of Clark and Jackson streets, Chicago, Monday night, by an unknown man. Day with two friends was on his way to Polk street depot. Just before they reached Jackson street they were met by another party of three, all more or less intoxicated. As they passed the strangers shouted, "Hurrah for Cleveland!" Day shouted back "What's the matter with Harrison?" The strangers immediately assaulted him and several blows were struck. A moment later one of the strangers plunged a knife into Day's breast, and the latter sank to the pavement with a groan. His assassin escaped, but one of his comrades was arrested.

PITHILY PUT.

Kind treatment is an equivalent to food.
The greatest enemy of agriculture is ignorance.
If you would have your boys profit by your mistakes, don't repeat them.
Some farming is like an old jacket—frayed at the edges and very thin elsewhere.
Growing a boy on a farm is a mighty good foundation preparation of him for any honorable business.
There is this difference between the poor and the good farmer: One complains of the bad seasons, the other rejoices in the good seasons.
Two horses of one kind will do as much work as four horses of another kind, and it ought not to be hard to determine which is the more profitable.
When a man comes half a mile to borrow a hoe or fork, you may depend on his coming some day to borrow money, but never coming to pay it back.
Perhaps it can't be remedied, but it is, nevertheless, a pity that a person flattered by the nod of a politician casts a vote that counts as much as the ballot cast by a true man.—American Agriculturist for November.

HOW TO HAVE HEALTHY SWINE.

Carefully abstain from giving any medicine whatever.
Keep large and small separate and not more than ten in a lot.
Feed regularly and liberally a variety of wholesome food, always some bulky food, and let each feed be eaten up clean before more is given.
Give wallowing places, ashes, charcoal and salt, and plenty of exercise in timber pasture yielding shade, roots, nuts, acorns, etc. But no doubly soured slops.
Provide ventilated shelters from wind, rain and snow, but no litter. Hogs with litter get too warm. If you wish disease, put your hogs to the straw pile.
Maintain cleanliness in all things. Breed only mature animals, and never from a show herd. The offspring of immature or pampered animals is predisposed to disease.
Give pure water, from deep wells protected from surface water. Well water is not freezing cold in winter nor lukewarm in summer. Water from creeks (unless fed by springs), ponds or pools is disease-breeding.
Pigs should be farrowed in early spring and kept on only growing foods—milk, bran, slop, oats, green rye, grasses, clover, sweet corn—until late fall; then fatten rapidly, on corn mostly, but also green rye, blue grass, pumpkins, boiled potatoes and turnips with bran, steamed clover hay, etc. —American Agriculturist for November.

A SEVERE ATTACK.

A SURPRISE BY THE I.O.F.

A very unexpected yet pleasant gathering took place at the Methodist parsonage on Thursday evening last, when the Foresters' lodge in this village marched in regalia and paid Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Middleton a visit, bringing with them a very beautiful easy chair for Mr. Middleton and also a ladies' dressing-case in old gold plush, lined with satin, for Mrs. Middleton. The secret had been well kept, and Mr. Middleton was quite surprised at such a visit. The following address was read by the secretary, signed by quite a number of the brethren:—

Rev. E. Middleton, Dutton.

DEAR AND RESPECTED SIR,—On behalf of the members of Court Nelson, Number 174, I.O.F., of the village of Dutton, we desire to tender our sincere thanks for the very able manner in which you recently conducted the anniversary services of our Order. Permit us to assure you we fully appreciate your kind words of counsel and instruction, feeling under the inspiration of your eloquent discourse the bonds of brotherhood are no mere forms, but among the most potent factors in the advancement and unification of mankind. As a further expression of our regard for you, we humbly beg that you accept of this chair as a slight recognition of your worth, not only as an ambassador of the Most High but also as a fellow-man. Do not think, however, that our esteem for you can find expression in gifts alone, but we trust in years to come when perchance your lot may be cast midst other scenes, this slight token may serve to recall the pleasant moments spent this evening. In conclusion we sincerely hope you may long be spared to advance the grand work you are now so zealously engaged in, and may a benign Providence crown your efforts with victory unbounded. On behalf of the above Order.

Mr. Middleton replied briefly, thanking them for their kindly words and valuable presents and wishing the Order great success and prosperity. After spending a little time in conversation and music, the brethren retired, leaving a happy family in the parsonage wondering why such service had received such a reward.

THE GALT MYSTERY.

ANOTHER MYSTERIOUS BOX ADDRESSED TO MRS. CHERRY, POSTED IN TORONTO.

On Saturday afternoon a new and startling development in connection with the Galt poisoning case was learned. The matter had been kept very quiet by the authorities, but the secret accidentally leaked out. Investigation showed these facts early in the week. A pasteboard box, similar in appearance to those intimately connected with the fatal tragedy, was posted in one of the Toronto west end boxes. It was addressed to Mrs. John Cherry, Galt, and within was a slip of paper stating that it was a gift from Meta's murderer, together with sundry warnings, winding up with the suggestion that certain persons had better be careful how they acted. Within the box were several chocolate candies. On one was a slip of paper, on which was written, "This is safe;" on another, "This contains poison." It is stated that the candy last referred to does actually contain strychnine. If this be so, it would tend to show a terrible significance on the part of this package. Here is a peculiar and perhaps important point. The handwriting on this package is identical with the address on the package of candies sent to Mr. J. K. Inksetter, of Paris, some weeks ago, and which, no doubt, had a connection with the Galt case. The post office authorities in Toronto seized the package, and after a consultation with the Attorney-General's office, handed it over to Detective Murray, who is understood to be in Galt at present working on the case. The whole matter would tend to show that the murderer of Meta Cherry feels so secure that he or she can afford to taunt those who escaped. If this is not the case, some one is playing a game that will probably land him either in the penitentiary or the insane asylum. It may be mentioned that within the box was written a most infernal suggestion intended for the eye of the bereaved mother.

Hon. Mr. Pardee is hopelessly ill with disease of the kidneys at his home in Sarnia.

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,
Late U. S. Consul to Italy, author of "The Glory and Shame of England," "America's Advancement," etc., etc., etc., writes as follows:—
New York, August 1, 1886.
122 E. 27th st.
DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,
Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:
My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.
Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,
C. EDWARDS LESTER.
Ayer's Cherry Pectoral,
Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

Bremen has joined the German Zollverein.

The native porter who murdered Major Barttelot has been hanged.

Father McFadden, of Gweedore, Donegal has been released from gaol.

The London Times indicts as Fenians 64 Irish members of Parliament

Lieut. Wissman, of Berlin, believes that Stanley has joined Emin Bey.

M. de Lesseps says the Panama Canal will be open for traffic in July, 1890.

The report is confirmed that Emperor William intends to visit Madrid and Lisbon.

Mr. Parnell's defences in the libel suit against The Times in Scotland have been entered.

Emperor William is said to be an incessant smoker of cigarettes, heavily charged with opium.

Paris is shortly to have an immense ice chamber for the preservation of meats in case of a siege.

M. Peytral, French Minister of Finance, has presented a bill to impose a nominal tax on incomes.

The British Company in Zanzibar has been successfully started, and has conciliated all classes of natives.

The price of coal in London has advanced two shillings a ton, owing to the strike of miners.

A celebration of Father McFadden's release from gaol ended in a row between the police and the people.

The German consul at Havre has been insulted, for which the French authorities have tendered apologies.

Mr. Labouchere says Mr. Parnell has obtained overwhelming evidence that the Times letters are forgeries.

A French officer who attended the recent Italian review has a very poor opinion of the discipline of the soldiers.

Sixty-four Irish members of Parliament and several outsiders connected with the League are indicted by the Times.

Dr. Mackenzie denies the report of a German publisher that Empress Frederick revised the English proofs of his book.

A movement is talked of to provide a new building at Westminster for monuments to distinguished dead, the Abbey being nearly full.

The St. Petersburg newspapers again urge that an "entente cordiale" with England opportune, owing to the coolness between Germany and England.

It is reported that the differences of opinion among the English Currency Commission have been settled, and the report will be decidedly in favour of bi-metallism.

Meetings in memory of Emperor Frederick were held in fifteen German towns on Thursday, and the Berlin palace in Unter den Linden was draped with crape.

The Berlin Supreme Court has refused to release Prof. Genfincke, who is under arrest for furnishing the Deutsche Rundschau with extracts from Emperor Fredrick's diary.

Dr. Peters, of Berlin, believes that the rising in East Africa has a close connection with the Mahdi movement, and that both are a struggle of Mahomedism against Christianity.

Official returns show that the effect of the system instituted in the British army last year, of greater lenity in the matter of punishment, has been attended with very satisfactory results.

While the bloodhounds, for the capture of the Whitechapel murderer, were being exercised on Thursday morning, they followed a scent that had been laid for them, got out of sight, and were lost.

Doctors Bergmann and Gerhardt do not advise that Dr. Mackenzie and his German publishers should be indicted for libel, but Dr. Bergmann is quite prepared to fight a duel with the English specialist.

Emperor William visited Pompeii yesterday morning, and while there an excavation was made in his presence, and some bronze ornaments were presented to him. The Emperor and King Humbert returned to Rome in the afternoon.

Mr. John Finucane, M.P. for East Limerick, will bring an action against the London "Times," for libel for stating that in a speech he had advised the farriers in Ireland, upon shoeing land-grabbers' horses, to drive the nails into the quick.

Prof. Virchow and Dr. Waldeyer say that the post mortem examination of the late Emperor contradicts Dr. Mackenzie's two statements that cauterization was employed, or that Dr. Bergmann made a false passage while attempting to insert a canula.

AGRICULTURAL.

CLOVER HAY.

Clover rained upon loses about 7 per cent. of albuminoids and the same amount of carbo-hydrates. These materials represent the soluble and best parts of the plant, and those which make fodder palatable. To avoid such loss, mow after the dew is off, use the tedder before noon or immediately after, and draw at once to the barn, even in the early period of cutting hay. All hay drawn in put into one mow and trodden very compactly, and is much better than the old way to put green food or undried hay in scattered amounts, as it secures greater exclusion of the air and prevents heating. Timothy cut at visible seed formation, in good weather, tedder being used, may be drawn the same day. Clover needs special care in drying, otherwise its value is heavily reduced by the loss of the overdried leaves which break off easily, often literally covering the ground. The tedder can never be justifiably used on clover after the leaves dry so as to break from the stems. At this stage it should go into heaps, and the leaves will absorb the moisture from the stems and toughen so as to be opened or handled without loss. Some allow the clover to "sweat," as it is called, in the heap and then open. I do not look with especial favor on the sweating process, as it occurs through heating and at the expense of the fodder, but commend the slow process of partially drying clover in open cocks, or in greater mass than it would be in when spread out in the field. While it will cost more it will be worth more, and being more palatable and nutritious, will be more readily consumed by stock. To sum up, avoid excessive drying, rains and dews.—["Prof. Sanborn."

MILK

Strain the milk as soon as drawn from the cow, so as to keep the amount of dissolved filth at the minimum.

Set the can or other receptacle where the microbes and fungus germs from the stable or cow yard will not fall into it, to taint the milk and hasten decomposition.

So long as the milk is warmer than the surrounding atmosphere, it is throwing off vapor and is therefore purified. It will not then absorb odors, but the germs of fungi and other microscopic life may fall into it and do it injury.

As soon as the milk gets colder than the atmosphere, the vapors in the air will condense on the surface, as dew gathers on a cold pitcher, and the impurities and odors from the atmosphere will be absorbed by the milk or the cream on it.

The warmer the milk when set, the more complete will be the separation of the cream from the milk at any given lower temperature; and the more rapidly the temperature falls, the more rapid will be the separation of the cream from the milk. Cream rises best when the temperature is falling; very slowly when the temperature is stationary; and little or not at all when it is rising.

THE RAIL AS A LEVELER.

I tried the rail as a leveler on a rough field plowed out of grass. I found it too heavy a job for four horses, and worked it with two three-horse teams, drawing the rail lengthwise with the furrows. I hardly expected it to work well, but I was surprised at the result. After going over the ground twice on an angle with the furrow, the rail left the field as level as a billiard table, and had packed the sod so firmly that it is now (three weeks after) well rotted and will cross-plow as easily as stubble.

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

The New York hay crop promises to be 30,000 bales short; that of the Pacific coast will be larger than usual; the crop in England is light.

Our caster-oil plants, growing where a manure heap had been for six months or more, reached the height of 17 feet when they were cut down by frost.

We have been feeding apple pomace to the cows. "The neighbors" thought it would make cows shrink in their milk. It hasn't done so yet.

The California Fruit Union has 700 members, and controls the crop of immense areas of prolific fruit lands, extending nearly the whole length of the State.

Consider the fact that in every working season there are 50 or 60 working days so rainy or disagreeable that a man cannot do full work out of doors. The farmer who plans for profitable work indoors on these days is an economist in the true sense of the word.

Nearly all strawberry-growers agree that good wood ashes can be applied to the strawberry plants with benefit. One hundred bushels can be applied to the acre with profit, under ordinary circumstances. They should be thoroughly incorporated with the soil on the suaface.

Cottonseed meal produces the largest yield and the richest cream of any other food that can be used, according to the "Live Stock Record." Begin feeding a quarter of a pound per day, and increase to a pound twice per day; never more, as it is very rich and might cause scours if fed in larger quantities.

One horse may feel and do better on a much less ration than another, and if you are able to find out the exact requirements of each animal on your place, it may do away with the old-accustomed habit of "a dozen ears of corn three times a day, and a mangerful of hay," which has cost the farmers of the county more money than they would be willing to admit.

The frequent failure of red clover of late compels farmers to look for a substitute for pasture. Nothing better than rye. Sow it after wheat, early potatoes, or oats. It gives late feed and early feed. Land intended for corn next year will afford two months' pasture in the fall and one month in the spring and a green crop to turn under—better than weeds.

It is a waste of cow-force, says Hoard, to turn her out where she roams over several acres of land. She will be doing it most all day if there is no fence to stop her, and will be sure to do it if the pasture is thin because things do not go just right on the farm; kind words and mild usuage will do far more towards subduing a vicious animal than angry words and heavy blows. Farmers should cultivate the habit of looking upon every phase of their work, whether it goes right or wrong, in a calm and a common sense manner; this can be done and should he done.

An English writer observes that "the best bred and thinnest-skinned horses have very little mane; it is only thin and fine, but the hair is short. A heavy, matted mane means a low-bred, coarse brute. I am inclined to think that in a state of nature the mane divides upon both sides of the neck, though Virgil writes of the dense mane of the young colt falling upon the right shoulder.

Lime may not show its beneficial effects on the soil for a year or two, as the character of the soil must be considered. Lime adds but very little valuable plant food to the soil, as all soils contain lime, but its chemical action on the inert matter of the soil liberals other substances that would not be otherwise available. Is should be applied as regularly as manure, in order to secure its assistance in decomposing the plant food already existing in the soil.

The Raw, Cutting Winds

Bring to the surface every latent pain. A change of even a few degrees marks the difference between comfort and pain to many persons. Happily disease now holds less sway. Science is continually bringing forward new remedies which successfully combat disease. Polson's Nerviline—nerve pain cure—has proved the most successful pain relieving remedy known. Its application is wide, for it is equally efficient in all forms of pain, whether internal or external. Ten and 25 cents a bottle, at druggists.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

Nothing New from Whitechapel—Emperor William—Boulanger's Plans.

The Whitechapel murderer is decidedly losing ground. Public interest is waning, and if the murderer does not come out with some fresh horror soon his popularity among his morbid admirers will be gone. The only incident of the week has been the sending a petition to the Queen, signed by 5,000 working women of the murderous district. They humbly beg her Majesty to make her officials fix things, particularly by closing the disreputable houses of the neighborhood.

The young German Emperor vies with his rival, Boulanger, in his efforts to be the most picturesque figure in Europe. His movements as chronicled day by day show most marvellous energy. He is hunting in one place to-day, giving audiences to-morrow, shooting in another next day, and so on continually. The fact that he is to visit Prince Bismarck at Friedrichsruh is now discussed with great excitement. It seems comical that a little man who has never done anything should be able to honor the greatest statesman in the world by simply stopping over night at his house. But so it is, and the German papers cannot sufficiently exclaim at the Emperor's condescension. In one way the visit is important, as it may fairly be interpreted as an absolute denial of the rumors of ill-feeling between the Chancellor and his sovereign.

Boulanger is still everything over in France and must be talked about. His examination this week by the Committee of Revision proves quite plainly two things—one in his favor and one not. The first is his ability to hold his tongue when the questioners reached a point for which he was not prepared and where a less cautious man might have blundered on trusting to luck. His reply was: "Perhaps I have formed a plan, but I keep it to myself." The other fact developed was that the brave General does not create his own political plans nor write his own manifestoes. Questioned concerning the latter, he was obliged to refer the committee to publications concerning them. They were too long to remember, which sounds odd from a man supposed to have spent weary hours grinding documents out of his head.

FASHION NOTES.

A comfortable, if not luxurious, living is now made by women in New York by going from house to house combing and caring for the hair of invalid or ease-loving women.

Mrs. E. Vasmer, the wife of the district clerk of Harris County, Tex., is his deputy clerk. A Texas paper says that "her punctuality and correctness make her one of the best officers that ever honored the office."

Miss Nellie Monroe, of Camden, N. J., is an enterprising young lady who is determined that the horrid men shall not show a superiority in the matter of marrying. Within five years she has accumulated four husbands.

It is said that there are now orders ahead in the shops of Paris and London for all the golden hair that can be purchased in the next five years. With the dissemination of intelligence peasant girls are growing more and more reluctant to parting with their hair.

It is pretty generally known that not a few young women use belladonna to give brilliancy to their eyes, but it is not so well known that a large majority of those who thus injure their sight and brave the danger of becoming blind are women who have light eyes. Dark eyed women either have more sense or think that their eyes are well enough as they are.

The daughter of the King of Shoa has recently married the eldest son of King John of Abyssinia with a splendor unparalleled in modern ceremonies. The crown worn by the bride is regarded as the one which decked the head of the Queen of Sheba. According to the native records, it has been in the possession of the Ethiopian kings for 25 centuries.

A new feature of picnics and lawn parties has broken out in England, suggested by the Prince of Wales. It consists of wheelbarrow races, only the conditions are that each gentleman shall take a lady in his wheelbarrow, and the two who come in first get a prize. The novelty may be expected to strike this country about next season. It is just about idiotic enough to please the confirmed Anglomaniac.

They Registered.

On Tuesday Mrs. Cynthia Leonard and Miss Anna Johnson, each wearing a blue silk badge inscribed "Lockwood and Love," entered a New York cigar store where sat the members of a registry board. Mrs. Leonard, who was dressed in black, with a round hat trimmed with yellow flowers, inquired:

"Is this the place to register?"

Chairman White was a little scared, but he managed to answer:

"This is the place for "gentlemen" to register."

"Are they all gentlemen who register here?" was Mrs. Leonard's next question. There was irony in it, and the men winced. Mrs. L. continued: "We are citizens and we are persons, and we came here to register as such." So, sure enough, the ladies were allowed to register—the first on the list in New York city.

A Way They Have in Turkey.

"Mahmud Djelladellen Pasha, the late Minister of Finance at Constantinople, has narrowly escaped strangling," says London "Truth." "He came into office a few years ago when a very poor man, but by means of systematic swindling of the most outrageous kind he has realized a fortune of 350,000 Turkish pounds. The sultan, on being informed of his fraudulent practices, ordered his arrest, and announced his intention of having him strangled and of confiscating his savings. It then turned out that Mahmud had been sufficiently farsighted to invest his fortune abroad, so that, if he were strangled the Sultan would not gain a piastre; and, after much negotiation, it has been decided that he is to pay a fine of 120,000 Turkish pounds and to be banished from the vicinity of Constantinople. This fine will not be employed to compensate the officials who have been robbed by Mahmud, but it is to go into the Sultan's private purse.

Burglars and thieves are getting so bold in Chicago that the policemen are having their silver-plated badges sewed on.

The suggestion which comes from Germany that Dr. Bergmann would not be unwillinging to meet Dr. Mackenzie on the field of honor shows the deference which is still paid to the absurd custom of duelling on the continent of Europe. If Dr. Mackenzie wished to make himself ridiculous in the eyes of his countrymen, he could choose no more certain way of bringing about that result than by an acceptance of this hostile proposition. The meeting of these two gentlemen, armed either with swords or pistols would no doubt be an exciting incident, but it could not be claimed, even by the German advocates of the practice of duelling, that the slaughter of either one or both of the combatants would in any way settle the question at issue. If Dr. Mackenzie was a citizen of the French republic, he would no doubt welcome the proposal as one calculated to enable him to obtain both personal and national vindication. As it is, like a sensible Englishman, he will conclude that his opponent is pretty severely pressed when he has to resort to this means of establishing his professional reputation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Portions of the North-West of Canada abound in feathered game in countless thousands, but they are being slaughtered too indiscriminately and with such persistence that it is feared they will go the way of the buffalo in a few years if the pot hunters are not restricted in their business. The Calgary "Herald" says that game is already getting scarce around the town and in the vicinity of the settlements, and calls upon the Legislature to protect the prairie chickens, snipe and duck.

Mormon missionaries are making such progress in the rear townships that Rev. A. E. Whatham, the Church of England clergyman in Cardiff and Monmouth, has found it necessary to meet them on the platform and to challenge them to a discussion of their doctrines in print. Mr. Whatham now makes a very fair proposal to the Saints. He says he will combat them in the columns of their own official journal, and will leave it to a committee composed of four professors of divinity, two nominated by himself and two nominated by the Mormons, to say who comes out best.

The citizens of Detroit are complaining of the nuisance of overcrowded street cars, from which Toronto has suffered so long and is still suffering. A correspondent of the Detroit "Journal" suggests a resort to a well-equipped line of Herdic coaches. One advantage of the coach is that when halted it is driven up to the kerb, and the passenger thus avoids the dirt and danger of going to or coming from the middle of the street. It seems to us that there would be little objection to the street railway system if the City Council could be prevailed upon to enforce a law forbidding overcrowding.

So jealous are the people of the Pacific coast of Chinese encroachments that even the employment of a Chinese cook on the Government steamer Sir James Douglas is made the subject for complint against the Dominion authorities. The Celestial is much to be pitied. Rejected by Australia, the United States, and Canada, he has no encouragement to settle in Christian lands. But though Christians will not fraternize with him on earth they have not lost interest in him altogether. We are sending him missionaries to expound to him the principles of the religion we profess, in the hope that we may meet him on equal terms hereafter.

In a few days an addition will be made to our long list of legislative bodies. Ever since it has been under Canadian control the North-West has been ruled in certain minor local matters by a council under the Lieutenant-Governor. At first the council was composed of nominated members, all of whom were officials; then, as population crept in, representatives were admitted, until the council was half nominated and half representative. At the last session of Parliament the council received its quietus, and a legislative assembly with somewhat restricted powers was created in its place. The Assembly has been elected, and it is to meet at Regina this week.

The German officers say that the war of 1866 was won by the infantry, the war of 1870 by the artillery and the next war will be won by the cavalry. All agree that the first shock of the contending armies in the next war will be a tremendous cavalry battle. Each nation, the very instant war is declared, will launch her entire cavalry force into the enemy's country to prevent mobilisation and concentration. These vast hordes of cavalry will undoubtedly come into collision, and the result will be a cavalry battle of such vital importance that whoever wins it will be pretty certain to come out victor in the whole war.

There has been a good deal of satisfaction expressed over the news transmitted by cable, that No. 1 Manitoba hard wheat is the highest-priced wheat on the British market. A Montreal journal says, however, that "the people of Manitoba would rather have the standard lowered, as they are not satisfied with the proportion of the whole crop which reaches that standard. They think that if the standard was lowered a very much larger quantity of wheat would reach it, and bring a price very little if any lower than the price paid for the comparatively small quantity which reaches the present high standard. The Manitobans prefer the material advantage of higher prices to the honour of having their wheat head the market lists."

In a recent sermon Rev. Dr. Talmage attributed the suicidal epidemic to two causes, viz., infidelity and insanity. Medical statistics prove that insanity and religious mania lead to many cases of self destruction, for it is very much to be questioned that infidels, at any rate in America and Great Britain, are more prone to commit suicide than other classes of the community. The assumption has been that agnosticism, by depriving death of the terrors of the orthodox hereafter, fosters the suicidal tendency. It has been shown over and over again that the ratio of suicides in every country is governed by the existing social conditions. It may be expected, for instance that with dear coal and bread this winter the percentage of suicides will be increased. Suicide is often resorted to as a refuge from starvation.

There is an American Philistine as well as an English Philistine, and the former is not one whit less offensive than the latter. The American Philistine abroad is thus hit off by Prof. Boyesen; "He brags of his opulence, patronizes the effete monarchies whose manners (which he designates as 'frills'), customs, and institutions fill him with a grand patriotic contempt. He discourses loudly in the reading rooms of the banks and exchanges on the superiority of the United States and all that appertains to them to Europe and all that appertains to it; spits on the floor (as an illustration of the national superiority), and makes himself generally obnoxious. To Europe he represents America, is the typical American, and cheerfully accepts his representative character." The American Philistine is a familiar figure in Canada.

Wheat From Seed 5000 Years Old.

The Cincinnati "Enquirer" says:—A most interesting experiment culminated today in the raising of some wheat grown from wheat as old as the exodus. The experimenter is David Drew, who last year received from a friend in Alexandria, Egypt, some grains of wheat taken from a mummy exhumed near the ruins of Memphis, and belonging, it is believed, to the period of the ninth dynasty, which would make it grown about 3,000 years B. C., or nearly 5,000 years old. He planted the seed early in the spring and carefully nursed it. It grew rapidly, and at the time of cutting measured from six and one-half to seven feet high. The leaves alternate on the stalk like common wheat, but the product of the plant is the most singular part of it, for instead of growing in an ear like modern corn there is a heavy cluster of small twigs in place of the spindle, which hangs downward from its weight, and each twig is thickly studded with kernels, each of which is in a separate husk. From what is thrashed a larger crop will be grown next year, as the result proves this to exceed in quality anything modern grain can grow.

Rash Choice.

"Now Gus," said a boy to his playmate, we've got this dog in partnership, and half belongs to each of us. We'll call one end mine, and one end yours, and you can have just which end you like."

"All right," replied Gus. "You can have the front end (persuasively), with the eyes and the ears and the mouth and the collar and the teeth, or the rear end, with just the tail."

"I'll take the front end."

"All right; you will have to feed him, then."

Oscar Wilde has made a success of his fairy stories, but he has totally failed to popularise knee breeches and long hair.

Those women who are exercising their minds on the subject of dress should turn their attention to the making of sleeves, for in that direction there are many novelties. The dominant idea is to give the appearance of one sleeve over another, and many gowns of composite materials have the upper sleeve of the plain stuff to the elbow, turning up with a cuff and a tight undersleeve of other stuff to the wrist. Bows of ribbon are often placed at the elbows, and high epaulets are formed of loops of ribbon like those of the Tudor period. Sleeves are also slashed on the outside of the arm, and contrasting material puffed through. Others, again, have a pointed slashing from the shoulder, while, especially for dinner gowns, a short sleeve is often fulled over a tight under one at the shoulder. In washing dresses most of the sleeves are full and smocked at the elbow and wrist.

What Ails you?

Do you have obstruction of the passages, discharges from head and throat, sometimes profuse, acrid and watery, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid and offensive; dull, heavy headache most of the time, with occasional "splitting headache"; are your eyes weak, watery, or inflamed; is there ringing in the ears, with more or less deafness; do you have to hack, cough and gag, in your efforts to clear your throat in the morning; do you expectorate offensive matter, scabs from ulcers, perhaps tinged with blood; is your voice changed and is there a "nasal twang" to it; is your breath offensive; are your senses of taste and swell impaired? If you have all or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common and dangerous of maladies—chronic nasal catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, which is sold by druggists at only 50 cents, will cure it. The manufacturers of this wonderful remedy offer, in good faith $500 for a case of this disease which they cannot cure.

The voyage from maiden fair to womanhood is often attended with many perils. Mothers should insist upon their daughters being prepared with every means of safety. Universally acknowledged as the reliable "Life-preserver" on this rough sea of uncertainties, is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It has averted many a disaster. It has rescued many a periled life! This popular remedy is prepared especially for Woman. It is the only remedy of its class sold by druggists under a positive guarantee to give satisfaction. This guarantee has been faithfully carried out by the manufacturers for many years.

Girls, Learn Something.

There is something very sad in the remark lately made by a lady who is interested in the welfare of girls who earn their living "at the mercy of the world" to the effect that out of every hundred girls there are not ten who can sew on a button straight or help themselves in any way. But sad as such a remark is its sadness has in it truth. Those who most thoroughly and most widely know the facts of the case will be the readiest to say that is just so. Another lady on being told what the other had said replied: "You would be surprised if you saw girls as I have seen them, to find how little they are taught at home. Mothers who have worked hard seem determined that their girls shall not. Mothers who are the wives of laboring men spare their daughters the learning of the simplest sort of sewing. They send them to school. They give them useless courses of geometry and trigonometry, and the only course of sewing they get is the youthful training of the lower classes at the grammar school, where one hour each week is devoted to such work." The remark was made by an English woman about English girls but it is as true of Canadians as of their sisters on the other side of the water. A good many of them of course can sew, and sew well. A good many of them can keep house and keep it well, but multitudes have never been taught how. Many go out as domestic servants who know not the veriest elements of the plainest cookery, who can scarcely make up a bed and who have not the first idea of what constitutes a tidy room. They marry. God help them! and God pity their husbands! Their fathers or their husbands die and beggary or infamy stares them in the face. Who is to blame for all that? Those who, it might be, sought that they might know all "ologies" but never thought it worth while to teach them how to cook or how to sew. It is the same thing with multitudes in what are called the better or higher classes. Why should these not be as able to make their clothes as to "entertain?" Would it make them less attractive? Not with any whose good opinion is worth having. The power of self help may be of infinite importance when the "entertaining," as that word is often understood, is gone forever. Besides, let it never be forgotten, that the girl who can help herself and is proud enough to do it in an emergency is safe in the world. She is not of the kind that falls before a villain's wiles or sinks into infamy for fear of wanting bread. She finds, as thousands have found before her, that God in strict truth does help those who help themselves. Mere doll faces soon cease to please, and helpless know nothings who can read a novel are their most serious business, but cannot cook a dinner or mend a shirt, soon become tiresome to even the most forbearing husbands, and by and by wear out the patience even of the most loyal and long suffering friends. "Can do," let it be said for the thousandth time, is easily carried. How easy it is not to do if there is no demand, but how terrible such inability when stern necessity stares one in the face!

The Corset Questions.

In the Biological Section of the British Association at Bath recently the vexed question of stays and tight lacing was discussed in a separate department. The attendance of the fair sex was especially large. The general expectation which they apparently entertained that the paper would condemn the wearing of stays was, however, agreeably disappointed. Mr. C S. Roy, professor of pathology at Cambridge, and J. G. Adams, university administrator of pathology, who had announced a joint paper "On the Physiological Bearing of Waistbelts and Stays," blessed instead of banning these articles.

They have lately been making some pathological experiments, and had found that a good deal of blood stored uselessly in the abdominal veins is, by slight pressure, placed advantageously at the disposal of the muscles, brain and skin. This explains how men, as well as women, instinctively employ some method of abdominal compression, wearing waistbands or belts, or the more elaborate corsets, at periods of increased activity. No doubt fashion has sometimes led to distortion of the female figure by means of stays, but if not laced too tight the modern corset, by clasping the waist and supporting the bosom and back, constitutes a convenient combination of the different forms of girdle which have been found useful by the women of all civilized nations from the remotest times. Of course during sleep they are put off, but during hours of exertion, social or otherwise, reasonable tight lacing is fitted to increase mental and physical activity. They, however, cautioned young ladies against carrying this to an injudicious extreme.

Loss and Gain.

I sorrowed that the golden day was dead,
Its light no more the country side adorning;
But whilst I grieved, behold!—the East grew red
With morning.

I sighed that merry spring was forced to go,
And doff the wreaths that did so well become her;
But whilst I murmured at her absence, lo!—
'Twas summer.

I mourned because the daffodils were killed
By burning skies that scorched my early posies;
But whilst for these I pined my hands were filled
With roses.

Half broken-hearted I bewailed the end
Of friendships than which none had once seemed nearer;
But whilst I wept I found a newer friend,
And dearer.

And thus I learned old pleasures are estranged
Only that something better may be given;
Until at last we find this earth exchanged
For heaven.

From the Jewish Point of View.

Ask the Jewish housewife, the Jewish mother, whether marriage is a failure! She will not understand you. She will stand bewildered in the face of such a question, and if you explain to her what you mean she will tell you that a Jewish mother sees in marriage the acme of happiness, because of womanly duty; that all these newfangled notions are simply the outcome of the brain of some man or woman who missed the true mark of life, and whose life is a failure. She will point to her children, as Cornelia of old did. She will extol her husband as the ideal of her life. She may not have read as much as the girl of the period, may not be as accomplished, nor figure as a speaker in assemblages for the advancement of woman suffrage, but she will exemplify to you how a true woman lives, how a true mother, a devoted wife, arranges her life, and you will find that true happiness is found in such a family, and that marriage is the most sacred bond in existence, which to question is to lay a sacrilegious hand upon the rock upon which society rests.

Work no Hardship.

There is no hardship in true work. It is as far removed from drudgery as is the free movement of clouds in the upper air from the cheap imitations of sky scenery on the stage of a theatre. True work has something of play in it; it is the joyous overflow of a full nature, the natural outgoing of a full heart that cannot contain its own life, but must find speech for itself in manifold activities. It is only after we drive ourselves after the natural impulse is spent, when we urge ourselves to the task after the joy of it is gone, that work becomes monotonous, and then wearisome, and finally dangerous. Working days are spent in dealing with human adaptations and means and in perfecting human skill. Vacation days ought to be spent in unbroken fellowship with divine truth and beauty. They are the recurring Sabbaths which leave an open road heavenward through our years of toil.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHATER XXVIII.—(CONTINUED.)

"Read me Gambetta," Winifred said with quiet imperiousness. "I'll see if I like that any better than all this foolish maundering Pailosophy."

Hugh turned over his papers for the piece "by request," and after some searching among quires and sheets, came at last upon a clean written copy of his immortal threnody. He began reading out the lugubrious lines in a sufficiently grandiose and sepulchral voice. Winifred listened with careless attention, as to a matter little worthy her sublime consideration. Hugh cleared his throat and rang out magniloquently:

"She sits once more upon her ancient throne,
The fair republic of our steadfast vows;
A Phrygian bonnet binds her queenly brows;
Athwart her neck her knotted hair is blown,
A hundred cities nestle in her lap,
Girt round their stately looks with mural crowns:
The folds of her imperial robe enwrap
A thousand lesser towns."

"'Mural crowns' is good,' Winifred murmured satirically; 'it reminds one so vividly of the stone statues in the Place de la Concorde."

Hugh took no notice of her intercalary criticism. He went on with ten or twelve stanzas more of the same bombastic, would-be sublime character, and wound up at last in thunderous tones with a prophetic outburst as to the imagined career of some future Gambetta—himself possibly:

"He still shall guide us toward the distant goal;
Calm with unerring tact our weak alarms;
Train all our youth in skill of manly arms,
And knit our sires in unity of soul;
Till bursting iron bars and gates of brass
Our own Republic stretch her arms again
To raise the weeping daughters of Alsace,
And lead thee home, Lorraine.

"Well, what do you think of that, Winnie?" he asked at last triumphantly, with the air of a man who has trotted out his best war-horse for public inspection, and has no fear of the effect he is producing.

"Think?" Winifred answered. "Why, I think, Hugh, that if Swinburne had never written his Ode to Victor Hugo, you would never have written that Funeral March for your precious Gambetta."

Hugh bit his lip in bitter silence. The criticism was many times worse than harsh; it was true; and he knew it. But a truthful critic is the most galling of all things.

"Well, surely, Winifred," he cried at last after a long pause, "you think those other lines good, don't you?—

And when like some fierce whirlwind through the land
The wrathful Teuton swept, he only dared
To hope and act when every heart and hand,
But his alone, despaired."

"My dear Hugh," Winifred answered candidly, "don't you see in your own heart that all this sort of thing may be very well in its own way, but it isn't original—it isn't inspiration; it isn't the true sacred fire: it's only an echo. Echoes do admirably for the young beginner; but in a man of your age—for you are getting on now—we expect something native and idosyncratic.—I think Mr. Hatherley called it idiosyncratic.—You know Mr. Hatherley said to me once you would never be a poet. You have too good a memory. "Whenever Massinger sits down at his desk to write about anything," he said in his quiet way, "he remembers such a perfect flood of excellent things other people have written about the same subject, that he's absolutely incapable of originality." And the more I see of your poetry, dear, the more do I see that Mr Hatherley was right—right beyond question. You're clever enough, but you know you're not original."

Hugh answered her never a single word. To such a knock-down blow as that, any answer at all is clearly impossible. He only muttered something very low to himself about casting one's pearls before some creature inaudible.

Presently, Winifred spoke again. "Let's go out," she said, rising from the sofa, "and sit by the sea on the roots of the poplar."

At the word, Hugh flung down the manuscript in a heap on the ground with a stronger expression than Winifred had ever before heard fall from his lips. "I hate the poplar!" he said angrily; "I detest the poplar! I won't have the poplar! Nothing on earth will induce me to sit by the poplar!"

"How cross you are!" Winifred cried with a frown. "You jump at me as if you'd snap my head off! And all just because I didn't like your verses.—Very well then; I'll go and sit there alone.—I can amuse myself, fortunately, without your help. I've got Mr. Hatherley's clever article in this month's Contemporary.

That evening, as they sat together silently in the drawing room, Winifred engaged in the feminine amusement of casting admiring glances at her own walls, and Hugh poring over a serious-looking book, Winifred glanced over him suddenly with a sigh, and murmured half aloud: "After all, really I don't think much of it."

"Much of what?" Hugh asked, still bending over the book he was anxiously consulting.

"Why, of that gourd I brought home from town yesterday. You know Mrs. Walpole's got a gourd in her drawing-room; and every time I went into the vicarage I said to myself: "Oh, how lovely it is! How exquisite! How foreign-looking! If only I had a gourd like that, now, I think life would be really endurable. It gives the last touch of art to the picture. Our new drawing-room would look just perfection with such a gourd as hers to finish the wall with." Well, I saw the exact counterpart of that very gourd the day before yesterday at a shop in Bond street. I bought it, and brought it home with exceeding great joy, I thought I should then be quite happy. I hung it up on the wall to try, this morning. And sitting here all evening looking at it with my head first on one side and then on the other, I've said to myself a thousand times over: 'It doesn't look one bit like Mrs. Walpole's. After all, I don't know that I'm so much happier, now I've got it, than I was before I had a gourd of my own at all to look at.'"

Hugh groaned. The unconscious allegory was far too obvious in its application not to sink into the very depths of his soul. He turned back to his book, and sighed inwardly to think for what a feeble, unsatisfactory shadow of a gourd he had sacrificed his own life—not to speak of Winifred's and Elsie's.

By-and-by Winifred rose and crossed the room. "What's that you're studying so intently?" she asked, with a suspicious glance at the book in his fingers.

Hugh hesitated, and seemed half inclined for a moment to shut the book with a bang and hide it away from her. Then he made up his mind with a fresh resolve to brazen it out. "Gordon's Electricity and Magnetism," he answered quietly, as unabashed as possible, holding the volume half-closed with his forefinger at the page he had just hunted up. "I—I'm interested at present to some extent in the subject of electricity. I'm thinking of getting it up a little."

Winifred took the book from his hand, wondering, with a masterful air of perfect authority. He yielded like a lamb. On immaterial questions it was his policy not to resist her. She turned to the page where his finger had rested and ran it down lightly with her quick eye. The key-words showed in some degree at what it was driving: "Franklin's Experiment"—"Means of Collection"—"Theory of Lightning Rods"—"Ruhmkorff's Coils"—"Drawing down Electric Discharges from the Clouds."—Why, what was all this? She turned round inquiringly. Hugh shuffled in an uneasy way in his chair. The husband who shuffles betrays his cause. "We must put up conductors, Winnie," he said hesitatingly, with a hot face, "to protect those new gables at the east wing.—It's dangerous to leave the house so exposed. I'll order them down from London to-morrow."

"Conductors! Fiddlesticks!" Winifred answered in a breath, with wifely promptitude. "Lightning never hurt the house yet, and it's not going to begin hurting it now, just because an Immortal Poet with a fad for electricity has come to live and compose at Whitestrand. If anything, it ought to go the other way. Bards, you know, are exempt from thunderbolts. Didn't you read me the lines yourself, 'God's lightnings spared, they said, Alone the holier head, Whose laurels screened it,' or something to that effect? You're all right, you see. Poets can never get struck, I fancy."

"But 'Mr. Hatherley said to me once you would never be a poet,'" Hugh repeated with a smile, exactly mimicking. Winifred's querulous little voice and manner. "As my own wife doesn't consider me a poet, Winifred, I shall venture to do as I like myself about my private property."

Winifred took up a bedroom candle and lighted it quietly without a word. Then she went up to muse in her own bedroom over her new gourd and other disillusionments.

As soon as she was gone, Hugh rose from his chair and walked slowly into his own study, Gordon's "Electricity" was still in his hand, and his finger pointed to that incriminating passage. He sat down at the sloping desk and wrote a short note to a well-known firm of scientific instrument makers whose address he had copied a week before from the advertisement sheet of Nature."

WHITESTRAND HALL,
ALMUDHAM, SUFFOLK.

GENTLEMEN—Please forward me to the above address, at your earliest convenience, your most powerful form of Ruhmkorff Induction Coil, with secondary wires attached, for which cheque will be sent in full on receipt of invoice or retail price list.—Faithfully yours,
HUGH MASSINGER.

As he rose from the desk, he glanced half involuntarily out of the study window. It pointed south. The moon was shining full on the water. That hateful poplar stared him straight in the face, as tall and gaunt and immovable as ever. On its roots, a woman in a white dress was standing, looking out over the angry sea, as Elsie had stood, for the twinkling of an eye, on that terrible evening when he lost her for ever. One second, the sight sent a shiver through his frame, then he laughed to himself, the next, for his groundless terror. How childish! How infantile! It was the gardner's wife, in her light print frock, looking out to sea for her boy's smack, overdue, no doubt—for Charlie was a fisherman.—But it was intolerable that he, the Squire of Whitestrand, should be subjected to such horrible turns as these.—He shook his fist angrily at the offending tree. "You shall pay for it, my friend," he muttered low but hoarse between his clenched teeth. You shan't have many more chances of frightening me!"

CHAPTER XXIX.—ACCIDENTS WILL HAPPEN.

During the whole of the next week, the Squire and a strange artisan, whom he had specially imported by rail from London, went much about together by day and night through the grounds at Whitestrand. A certain air of mystery hung over their joint proceedings. The strange artisan was a skilled workman in the engineering line, he told the people at the Fisherman's Rest, where he had taken a bed for his stay in the village: and indeed sundry books in his kit bore out the statement—weird books of a scientific and diagrammatic character, chokeful of formulæ in Greek lettering, which seemed not unlikely to be connected with hydrostatics, dynamics, trigonometry, and mechanics, or any other equally abstruse and uncanny subject, not wholly alien to necromancy and witchcraft. It was held at Whitestrand by those best able to form an opinion in such dark questions, that the new importation was "summat in the electric way;" and it was certainly matter of plain fact, patent to all observers equally, that he did in very truth fix up an elaborate lightning-conductor of the latest pattern to the newly thrown-out gable-end at what had once been Elsie's window. It was Elsie's window still to Hugh: let him twist it and turn it and alter it as he would, he feared it would never, never cease to be Elsie's window.

But in the domain at large, the intelligent artisan with the engineering air, who was surmised to be "summat in the electric way," carefully examined, under Hugh's directions, many parts of the grounds of Whitestrand. Squire was going to lay out the garden and terrace afresh, the servants conjectured in their own society: one or two of them, exceedingly modern in their views, even opined in an off hand fashion that he must be bent on laying electric lights on. Conservative in most things to the backbone, the servants bestowed the meed of their hearty approval on the electric light: it saves so in trimming and cleaning. Lamps are the bugbear of big country houses: electricity, on the other hand, needs no tending. It was near the poplar that Squire was going to put his installation, as they call the arrangement in our latter-day jargon; and he was going to drive it, rumour remarked, by a tidal outfall. What a tidal outfall might be, or how it could work in lighting the Hall, nobody knew; but the intelligent artisan had let the words drop casually in the course of conversation; and the Fisherman's Rest snapped them up at once, and retailed them freely with profound gusto to all after-comers.

Still, it was a curious fact in its own way that the installation appeared to progress most easily when nobody happened to be looking on, and that the skilled workman in the engineering line generally stood with his hands in his pockets, surveying his handicraft with languid interest, whenever anybody from the village or the Hall lounged up by his side to inspect or wonder at it.

More curious still was another small fact, known to nobody but the skilled workman in propria persona, that four small casks of petroleum from a London store were stowed away, by Hugh Massinger's orders, under the very roots of the big poplar; and that by their side lay a queer apparatus, connected apparently in some remote way with electric lighting.

The Squire himself, however, made no secret of his own personal and private intentions to the London workman. He paid the man well, and he exacted silence. That was all. But he explained precisely in plain terms what it was that he wanted done. The tree was an eyesore to him, he said, with his usual frankness—Hugh was always frank whenever possible—but his wife, for sentimental reasons, had a special fancy for it. He wanted to get rid of it, therefore, in the least obtrusive way he could easily manage. This was the least obtrusive way. So this was what he required done with it. The London workman nodded his head, pocketed his pay, looked unconcerned, and held his tongue with trained fidelity. It was none of his business to pry into any employer's motives. Enough for him to take his orders and to carry them out faithfully to the very letter. The job was odd: an odd job is always interesting. He hoped the experiment might prove successful.

The Whitestrand labourers, who passed by the poplar and the London workman, time and again, with a jerky nod and their pipes turned downward, never noticed a certain slender unobtrusive copper wire which the strange artisan fastened one evening, in the gray dusk, right up the stem and boles of the big tree to a round knob on the very summit. The wire, however, as its fixer knew, ran down to a large deal box well buried in the ground, which bore outside a green label, "Ruhmkorff Induction Coil, Elliott's Patent." The wire and coil terminated in a pile close to the four full petroleum barrels. When the London workman had securely laid the entire apparatus, undisturbed by loungers, he reported adversely, with great solemnity, on the tidal outfall and electric light scheme to Hugh Massinger. No sufficient power for the purpose existed in the river. This adverse report was orally delivered in the front vestibule of Whitestrand Hall; and it was also delivered with sedulous care—as per orders received—in Mrs. Massinger's own presence. When the London workman went out again after making his carefully worded statement, he went out clinking a coin of the realm or two in his trousers' pocket, and with his tongue stuck, somewhat unbecomingly, in his right cheek, as who should pride himself on the successful outwitting of an innocent fellow creature. He had done the work he was paid for, and he had done it well. But he thought to himself, as he went his way rejoicing, that the Squire of Whitestrand must be very well held in hand indeed by that small pale lady, if he had to take so many cunning precautions in secret beforehand when he wanted to get rid of a single tree that offended his eye in his own gardens.

The plot was all well laid now. Hugh had nothing further left to do but to possess his soul in patience against the next thunderstorm. He had not very long to wait. Before the month was out, a thunderstorm did indeed burst in full force over Whitestrand and its neighbourhood—one of those terrible and destructive east coast, electric displays which invariably leave their broad mark behind them. For along the low, flat, monotonous East Anglian shore, where hills are unknown and big trees rare, the lightning almost inevitably singles out for its onslaught some aspiring piece of man's handiwork—some church steeple, some castle keep, the turrets on some tall and isolated manor-house, the vane above some ancient castellated gateway.

The reason for this is not far to seek. In hilly countries the hills and trees act as natural lightning-conductors, or rather as decoys to draw aside the fire from heaven from the towns or farm-houses that nestle far below among the glens and valleys. But in wide level plains, where all alike is flat and low-lying, human architecture forms for the most part the one salient point in the landscape for lightning to attack: every church or tower with its battlements and lanterns stands in the place of polished knobs on an electric machine, and draws down upon itself with unerring certainty the destructive bolt from the over-charged clouds. Owing to this cause, the thunder-storms of East Anglia are the most appalling and destructive in their concrete results of any in England. The laden clouds, big with electric energy, hang low and dark above one's very head, and let loose their accumulated store of vivid flashes in the exact midst of towns and villages.

This particular thunderstorm, as chance would have it, came late at night, after three sultry days of close weather, when big black masses were just beginning to gather in vast battalions over the German Ocean: and let loose at last its fierce artillery in terrible volleys right over the village and grounds of Whitestrand. Hugh Massinger was the first at the Hall to observe from afar the distant flash, before the thunder had made itself audible in their ears. A pale light to westward, in the direction of Snade, attracted, as he read, his passing attention. "By Jove!" he cried, rising with a yawn from his chair, and laying down the manuscript of "A Life's Philosophy" which he was languidly correcting in its later stanzas, "that's something like lightning, Winifred! Over Snade way, apparently. I wonder if it's going to drift towards us?—Whew—what a clap! It's precious near. I expect we shall catch it ourselves shortly."

The clouds rolled up with extraordinary rapidity, and the claps came fast and thick and nearer. Winifred cowered down on the sofa in terror. She dreaded thunder; but she was too proud to confess what she would nevertheless have given worlds to do—hide her frightened little head with sobs and tears in its old place upon Hugh's shoulder. "It's coming this way," she cried nervously after a while, "That last flash must have been awfully near us."

Even as she spoke, a terrific volley seemed to burst all at once right over their heads and shake the house with its irresistible majesty. Winifred buried her face deep in the cushions. "O Hugh," she cried in a terrified tone, "this is awful—awful!"

Much as he longed to look out of the window, Hugh could not resist that unspoken appeal. He drew up the blind hastily to its full height, so that he might see out to watch the success of his deep-laid stratagem; then he hurried over with real tenderness to Winifred's side. He drew his arm round her and soothed her with his hand, and laid her poor throbbing aching head with a lover's caress upon his own broad bosom. Winifred nestled close to him with a sigh of relief. The nearness of danger, real or imagined, rouses all the most ingrained and profound of our virile feelings. The instinct of protection for the woman and the child comes over even bad men at such moments of doubt with irresistible might and majesty. Small differences or tiffs are forgotten and forgiven: the woman clings naturally in her feminine weakness to the strong man in his primary aspect as comforter and protector. Between Hugh and Winifred the estrangement as yet was but vague and unacknowledged. Had it yawned far wider, had it sunk far deeper, the awe and terror of that supreme moment would amply have sufficed to bridge it over, at least while the orgy of the thunderstorm lasted.

For next instant a sheet of liquid flame seemed to surround and engulf the whole house at once in its white embrace. The world became for the twinkling of a eyen one surging flood of vivid fire, one roar and crash and sea of deafening tumult. Winifred buried her face deeper than ever on Hugh's shoulder, and put up both her small hands to her tingling ears, to crush if possible the hideous roar out. But the light and sound seemed to penetrate everything: she was aware of them keenly through her very bones and nerves and marrow; her entire being appeared as if pervaded and overwhelmed with the horror of the lightning. In another moment all was over, and she was conscious only of an abiding awe, a deep-seated afterglow of alarm and terror. But Hugh had started up from the sofa now, both his hands clasped hard in front of his breast, and was gazing wildly out of the big bow-window, and lifting up his voice in a paroxysm of excitement. "It's hit the poplar!" he cried. "It's hit the poplar! It must be terribly near, Winnie! It's hit the poplar!"

Winifred opened her eyes with an effort, and saw him standing there, as if spellbound, by the window. She dared not get up and come any nearer the front of the room, but, raising her eyes, she saw from where she sat, or rather crouched, that the poplar stood cut, one living mass of rampant flame, a flaring beacon, from top to bottom. The petroleum, ignited and raised to flashing-point by the fire which the induction coil had drawn down from heaven, gave off its blazing vapour in huge rolling sheets and forked tongues of flame, which licked up the crackling branches of the dry old tree from base to summit like so much touchwood. The poplar rose now one solid column of crimson fire. The red glow deepened and widened from moment to moment. Even the drenching rain that followed the thunder-clap seemed powerless to check that frantic onslaught. The fire leaped and danced through the tall straight boughs with mad exultation, hissing out its defiance to the big round drops which burst off into tiny balls of steam before they could reach the red hot trunk and snapping branches. Even left to itself, the poplar, once ignited, would have burnt to the ground with startling rapidity; for its core was dry and light as tinder, its wood was eaten through by innumerable worm-holes, and the hollow centre of mouldering dry-rot, where children had loved to play at Hide-and-seek, acted now like a roaring chimney flue, with the fierce draught that carried up the circling eddies of smoke and flame in mad career to the topmost branches. But the fumes of the petroleum, rendered instantly gaseous by the electric heat, made the work of destruction still more instantaneous, terrible, and complete than it would have proved if left to unaided nature. The very atmosphere revolved itself into one rolling pillar of fluid flame. The tree seemed enveloped in a shroud of fire. All human effort must be powerless to resist it. The poplar dissolved almost as if by magic with a wild rapidity into its prime elements.

A man must be a man come what may. Hugh leaped towards the window and flung it open wildly. "I must go!" he cried. "Ring the bell for the servants." The savage glee in his voice was well repressed. His enemy was low, laid prone at his feet, but he would at least pretend to some spark of magnanimity. "We must get out the hose!" he exclaimed. "We must try to save it!" Winifred clung to his arm in horror. "Let it burn down, Hugh!" she cried. "Who cares for the poplar? I'd sooner ten thousand poplars burned to the ground than that you should venture out on such an evening!"

Her hand on his arm thrilled through him with horror. Her words stung him with a sense of his meanness. Something very like a touch of remorse came over his spirit. He stooped down and kissed her tenderly. The next flash struck over towards the sandhills. The thunder was rolling gradually seaward.

Hugh slept but little that eventful night; his mind addressed itself with feverish eagerness to so many hard and doubtful questions. He tossed and turned and asked himself ten thousand times over—was the tree burnt through—burnt down to the ground? Were the roots and the trunk consumed beyond hope—or rather beyond fear—of ultimate recovery? Was the hateful popla really done for? Would any trace remain the barrels that had held the tell-tale petroleum? any relic be left of the Ruhmkorff Induction Coil? What jot or tittle of the evidence of design would now survive to betray and convict him? What ground for reasonable suspicion would Winifred see that the fire was not wholly the result of accident?

But when next morning's light dawned and the sun arose upon the scene of conflagration, Hugh saw at a glance that all his fears had indeed been wholly and utterly groundless. The poplar was as though it had never existed. A bare black patch by the mouth of the Char, covered with ash and dust and cinder alone marked the spot where the famous tree had once stood. The very roots were burned deep into the ground. The petroleum had done its duty bravely. Not a trace of design could be observed anywhere. The Ruhmkorff Induction Coil had melted into air. Nobody ever so much as dreamed that human handicraft had art or part in the burning of the celebrated Whitestrand poplar. The "Times" gave it a line of passing regret; and the Trinity House deleted it with pains as a lost landmark from their sailing directions.

Hugh set his workmen instantly to stub up the roots. And Winifred, gazing mournfully next day at the ruins, observed with a sigh: "You never liked the dear old tree Hugh; and it seems as if fate had interposed in your favour to destroy it. I'm sorry it's gone; but I'd sacrifice a hundred such ree any day to have you as kind to me as you were last evening."

The saying smote Hugh's heart sore. He played nervously with the button of his coat. "I wish you could have kept it Winnie," he said not unkindly. "But it's not my fault.—And I bear no malice. I'll even forgive you for telling me I'd never make a poet; though that, you'll admit, was a hard saying. I think, my child, if you don't mind, I'll ask Hatherly down next week to visit us.—There's nothing like adverse opinion to improve one's work. Hatherley's opinion is more than adverse. I'd like his criticism on A Life's Philosophy before I rush into print a last with the greatest and deepest work my lifetime."

That same evening, as it was growing dusk, Warren Relf and Potts, navigating the Mud Turtle around by sea from Yarmouth Roads, put in for the night to the Char at Whitestrand. They meant lie by for a Sunday in the estuary, and a walk across the fields, if the day proved fine, to service at Snade. As they approached the mouth they looked about in vain for the familiar landmark. At first they could hardly believe their eyes: to men who knew the east coast well, the disappearance of the Whitestrand poplar from the world seemed almost as incredible as the sudden removal of the Bass Rock or the Pillars of Hercules. Nobody would ever dream of cutting down the glory of Suffolk, that time-honoured sea mark. But as they strained their eyes through the deepening gloom, the stern logic of facts left them at last no further room for syllogistic reasoning or a priori scepticism. The Whitestrand poplar was really gone. Not a stump even remained as its relic or its monument.

All the way up to the "Fisherman's Rest" he repeated again and again below his breath: So much the worse in the end for Whitestrand.'

Dr. Mackenzie's Book.

Public interest in the Whitechapel murders was speedily, if but temporarily overshadowed by the excitement due to the appearance of Dr. Mackenzie's Book of Defence of himself and his treatment of the late Emperor against the attacks of the German physicians. According to this book of his the famous Scotch specialist was a grievously persecuted man against whose pre-eminent skill the jealous hosts of professional Philistines rose up in wrath but fortunately for him and the Emperor, rose up in vain. The book has of course received no end of attention, hostile and otherwise. The German police have done it the very stupid honor of seizing all copies of it on which they could lay their hands. It has been the occasion of tremendous enterprise on the part of one New York newspaper, and of humiliating disappointment to at least another because of the terribly awkward slip between the cup and the lip of which it was the victim. Then there has been mourning and lamentation in the camp of a publishing firm because of the bad faith of somebody which has made their commercial venture anything but the success it might have been had things gone in the way they expected. All Europe and America has been turned into a battle ground of conflicting professional opinion in which learned doctors not only disagree, but give the lie to one another in a way which does not encourage the merely lay mind to place that reliance on scientific knowledge and skill which might be desirable. The unprofessional mind enjoys the fight, but wonders more and more why science can persist in sneering in so consciously superior a manner at the Odium Theologicum, which has so long been the object of its wonder and contempt.

He Stuck at the Cigar.

Doctor—Now, you must rise by daylight, go to the springs and drink the waters, eat plain food only, and be very careful about your diet. And, mind you, one cigar a day, no more, be particular about that. I'll call again in three days. If you want me sooner send for me. On the third day the doctor returns. Well, says he, how are you getting along? Patient—Very satisfactorily, doctor. Doctor—You don't find the regimen hard to adhere to, do you? Patient—It wouldn't be if I didn't have to smoke the one cigar a day. I never could bear tobacco.

He who waits to do a great deal at once will never do anything.

While on voyage between Batavia and Singapore, Landgrave Frederick Wilhelm of Hesse fell overboard and was drowned.

Electric Search Lights.

Every modern man-of-war is now provided with powerful electric search-lights. They are of the arc pattern, usually ranging from 8000 to 30 000 candle-power, so arranged with reflectors that their rays can be concentrated into a single beam and thrown in any desired direction. With one of these lights of only 8000 candle-power no difficulty is experienced in illuminating a target more than two miles distant, rendering firing at night as easy and accurate as by the day. But, as its name suggests, one of the chief uses of the search-light is to search for an enemy. In war-time, vessels at night in the proximity of an enemy would constantly sweep the surrounding waters with the search-light to detect the approach of hostile ships or torpedo boats.

The search-light is also employed in signalling at night, where the distance over which a message is to be sent is very great. The manner of using it for this purpose is somewhat novel. It is simply flashed against the clouds for long and short periods, according to a prearranged code, the letters of which are indicated by various combinations of flashes of different durations. Messages are said to have been successfully sent by this method, between vessels of the English navy, a distance of thirty miles. Plans have also been devised for signalling over shorter distances by means of the ordinary incandescent, or glow, lamps. One of the most successful of these is that in use in the navies of Italy and Germany, known as the Conz system. Its practical working was recently illustrated on board the new steel cruiser Atlanta, at Annapolis, Md., by Lieutenant W. H. Beehler, of the United States navy. The essential feature of this system is the display of various combinations of red and white electric incandescent lights, of about fifty candle-power each.

It is, of course, necessary in practice that the lights should be placed in some elevated position above the ship's deck, where they can be plainly seen from a distance, and that the electric current connected with them should be under complete control to an operator by means of a key board and switches, in order that the lights may be ignited or extinguished at will.

Like most of the patent logs for ascertaining the speed of a ship, electric logs depend for their action upon the revolutions of a fan attached to the end of a line and trailed through the water astern of the vessel. The velocity with which the fan revolves for each given speed through the water has been previously determined by experiment. Its revolutions periodically open and close an electric circuit, which action is suitable mechanism to a register, or dial, so graduated as to show the corresponding speed of the ship in knots and tenths.

How to Obtain Sleep.

Blessings on the man that invented sleep and three and four times blessings on the man who will say to the sleepless man, be still, and who can rock his senses in forgetfulness. The advices to such luckless folks have been beyond all estimate. Every one has his own particular fad. TRUTH does not take much stock in the various "cures" but the following suggestions are so sensible that somewhat lengthy though they be, many will be thankful to have them in all the prominence of editorial place and type:—

The question of habit, in relation to sleep, is so important, that this phase of the question deserves to be duly enforced on the reader's mind. The man accustomed to go to bed at a given hour, as we have seen, knows when his time of repose approaches by the feeling of somnolence he experiences. Once past that hour, he can with difficulty woo sleep to his couch. Hence a primary piece of advice to those troubled with sleeplessness is to cultivate a habit of regularity in the time of retiring to rest. For a few nights the plan of curing sleeplessness may not be over successful, but its practice is bound to tell in the long run. We are creatures of habit, it is true; therefore lot us make habit, use, and wont sub servient to the ways and works of health. To people who "can't sleep," as the phrase goes, I firstly say, examine your daily life well, as regards food, exercise, recreation, and the other items included in the run of ordinary existence, and alter your life, if need be, in the direction of securing your retirement to rest at a given hour. Again, a notable but often unsuspected and overlooked cause of sleeplessness is found in the defective ventilation of bed-rooms. It is impossible to sleep soundly and healthily in a room charged with carbonic acid, where-in we rebreathe our own breath. That we should see to the ventilation of our sleeping apartments is, therefore, a piece of sound philosophy in a health sense. Adopt Hincks Bird's plan, and leaving the upper half of the window shut raise the lower sash of the bed-room window four or six inches on a piece of wood running the whole length of the frame and fitting closely on the window sill, and fresh air will come in, without draught, between the two sashes. Again, always leave the damper of the grate unclosed, so that the chimney may act as a ventilating shaft, in some degree at least. Do away with those æsthetic abominations in the shape of fire-place ornaments in bed-room grates, and leave free access for air by grate and chimney. In this way many a sleepless night will be avoided. If you rise in the morning unrefreshed and wearied (providing you are not a supper-eater at unwholesome hours and are otherwise a careful liver), rest assured the carbonic acid from your own lungs is at the root of your troubles, and that you have unconsciously been converting your bed-room into a Black Hole of Calcutta. Thus from the stand-point, firstly, of food and habit, and, secondly, of fresh air, many cases of sleeplessness may be successfully treated.

Magistrate—"What is the charge against this man?" Officer—"He threw a photograph lens at a baby and cut its head." Magistrate—"Are you a regular photographer?" Prisoner—"Yes, your Honour. I had been trying for two mortal hours to take a picture of that little imp—I mean little baby, your Honour—and—" Magistrate—"You are discharged. I used to be a photographer myself."

A Horse's Mane.

An English writer observes that "the best bred and thinnest skinned horses have very little mane; it is only thin and fine, but the hair is short. A heavy, matted mane means a low-bred, coarse brute. I am inclined to think that in a state of nature the mane divides upon both sides of the neck, though Vigil writes of the dense mane of the young colt falling upon the right shoulder. Long as the horse has been domesticated and carefully groomed, this habit of wearing the hair is not overcome, and the mane has to be carefully coaxed to the right side, where for the thousands of years man has resolved it should be worn, though the horse himself insists upon parting his hair in the middle. Ancient authorities write of training the mane the right, but all the horses represented in the Elgin marbles show the mane close-cropped, or, as to say, 'hogged.' I think it is clear that the right side, now the 'off' side of the horse, was the 'near' side to the ancients. The best horsemen use no 'off' side or 'near' side, except to conform to their harness. I think a man should teach his horse to be familiarly approached and allow his stall to be entered on either side of him. Horses driven in pairs should frequently change sides, as the mouth becomes hardened on one side and the muscles of the neck become affected by the unequal pull of the double reins. Coarse hair about the heels is natural, but I confess to a prejudice against it, and have it carefully clipped. Hair growing in a thick tuft inside the ear must never be touched. Ignorant and officious grooms will remove it with scissors, but it is a great defence against the flies that would, in its absence, secure lodgement upon the sensitive skin inside the ear. Long, coarse hairs upon the muzzle and eyebrow are often plucked away. No horseman should allow this to be done. These hairs are not superfluous, they are like the whiskers of the feline race, having sentient power, and conveying impressions to the brain."

The Yellow River.

It is reported from China that the whole of the new embankment of the Yellow river, which was commenced last autumn at the spot where the old embankment gave way, has been completely swept away by the summer floods. It is said to have cost about 2,000,000 sterling (9,000,000 of taels). As the flood rose, it was seen that the strain was becoming dangerous, and Li Hang-tsao, the high official in charge of the work, was sent for in not haste, but before he could arrive the whole bank went down before the flood, and of the 8,000 feet of river-wall lately completed not an inch remains, and the waters are pouring unchecked through the immense gap into the Honan province. From 800 to 1,000 labourers who were on the bank were also swept away and drowned. It is reported from Pekin that all the officials concerned are being severely punished. Li Hang-tsao and the governor of the province are being dismissed and degraded; another high official is being banished to Mongolia, and the late High Commissioner of the Yellow river is to be banished to the Amoor. The disasters can scarcely stop as they are now, because the volume of silt-laden waters will create shallows which will still further increase the inundated area, and may cause an overflow into the Yangtze which will make the conservation of that great water-way a matter of urgent importance.

A Financial Troubl

A reporter recently "interviewed" M. Barthelemy St. Hilaire on current politics. M. Thiers's secretary is now in his eighty-fourth year, but in the enjoyment of very good health. His interest in public affairs is still undiminished. He was very sarcastic on the attitude of the Minister of Public Instruction inaugurating statues and singing the praises of Danton and his virile acts! His virile acts! "Why, all the virile acts of Danton," he observed, "consisted in making heads fly. Not that M. Lockroy has any desire to cut off heads; but it makes a sad impression. Then, there is the financial trouble. Do you know," he asked, "what the deficit amounts to

Patrons of the Enterprise.

The auctioneer is your servant. Instruct him to have your sale bills printed at the ENTERPRISE office, and see that he does so; or, better still, send your list of articles to us and we will make arrangements with the auctioneer. Remember, it will pay you to have your bills printed at this office. Free notices given in the paper till date of sale.

DUTTON, NOVEMBER 8, 1888.

WEEKLY WEAVINGS.

MONDAY was Guy Fawkes day.

PREPARE your Thanksgiving turkey.

FOR fancy goods etc., call at Price's.

LARGE official envelopes at the ENTERPRISE office.

THE walls of J. Muirison's new house are rising in the second story.

WHITE and cream ladies' calling cards at the ENTERPRISE office.

D. C. CLAY'S lot and new residence are being enclosed with a picket fence.

A NEW or second-hand New Home sewing machine, for sale cheap. Apply at this office.

OVER 200 bushels of chestnuts have been shipped from West Lorne. Three dollars per bushel was the price received.

W. FLETCHER will move into his new residence soon, of which the planning and work reflect much credit on the contractor, M. Cochrane.

THE Rural Canadian is a valuable agricultural journal and should be in every house. It is one dollar per year. See our clubbing rates.

PETER DUNCANSON will sell the stock, implements, etc., by auction, on this Thursday, for D. McAlpine, near the station, Dutton.

MR. HOLLINGSHEAD shipped this week five carloads of flour to Halifax, two carloads of shorts—one to Ottawa, one to Quebec—and one carload of bran to Toronto.

A. GUNN, clerk for M. C. Leitch, has been laid up with sickness at his home in Wallacetown for about ten days. We are pleased to state that he is on the mend.

A. C. Graham has moved into his new shop in the Wallace block and has got in a quantity of nice, new furniture, consiting of fancy parlor suits, bedroom suits and all classes of furniture.

ORDERS for the Christmas number of the Globe received at this office Price only 25 cents.

PROF. J. H. LEBLONDE purposes conducting a vocal class in Dutton and one in West Lorne this winter, together with the one now organized at Middlemiss. Instrumental lessons will be given as in the past.

A MEETING of the Farmer's Institute will likely be held in Leitch's Hall, Dutton, about the 5th of Dec., when the Hon. Charles Drury is expected to be present and address the meeting. Further information will be given soon.

SCHLEIHAUF BROS., Wallacetown, are talking of putting hoop machinery in their mill during the winter and getting in a stock of material so as to be ready to manufacture hoops in the spring. We believe they will find this a paying industry.

ALL HALLOW'EN was observed in the usual manner in Dutton by small boys and big boys. Gates, buggies, signs, and almost everything movable were found in the most ludicrous positions on Main street. Considerable annoyance was caused but not much damage was done.

MR. A. D. URLIN, of Wallacetown, who left, acting under bad advice, and while excited through losses, has returned, and Friday morning handed over to Messrs. Gibbons, McNab and and Mulkern, solicitors for creditors, several thousand dollars, and will pay his creditors in full.—[London Free Press.

"WILL you take stamps, Charlie?" asked one of our town boys of our baker, after putting a nickle's worth of chestnuts in his pockets. "Yes" was the quick reply, and the boy patted his foot a number of times on the floor and left the shop, leaving the bewildered baker wondering where the profit was going to come from on the sale. Hereafter Charlie will demand spot cash from tricky boys.

LOYALTY AT HOME.—The prosperity of a town is guaged not by the wealth of its inhabitants, but by the unanimity with which any important undertaking is to be accomplished. A man with $5,000 at his command and a love for his town in his heart can do more for the building up and improving of it than a millionaire who locks up his capital and snaps his finger at home progress. Holding on to your money or spending it at a distant centre is not consistent with good cittzenship, and the man who spends nothing at home is but a cipher, a unit in the census and othing more.

TOYS in endless variety at Price's.

R. A. Kirkland is having his store re-shingled.

A LARGE stock of envelopes and note paper at the ENTERPRISE office.

C. W. ALLEN has completed the fence around the public school grounds.

WANTED.—5,000 men, women and children to buy Xmas goods at Price's.

THE new M.C.R. time-table will come into effect on Monday, November 16.

MR. DAGAN, tailor, has moved his family into the building recently occupied by Miss Yates.

IT IS expected that some more of Dutton's young people will have the nuptial knot tied soon.

A. N. C. BLACK has received word that he has been appointed clerk of the fourth division court of Elgin.

L. W. talks of building a grand stand on the fair grounds next year. What if he should not get there?

MRS. HOLLINGSHEAD and daughter Fanny have gone to Dumfries, Waterloo county, on a visit to friends.

ALL papers furnished at the ENTERPRISE Office. If you desire one that is not in our list, call and ask for it.

The melancholy days have come,
The forest leaves are dead;
The wintry blasts are whistling
"Up Goes the Price of Bread."

MR. W. G. URLIN is away purchasing a new stock of goods which he will open out in the Brown block shortiy.

A. D. URLIN returned from his trip in the States, last Friday, and has again opened out business in Dutton and Wallacetown.

UNITED STATES ELECTIONS.—The Democrats claim the victory in Tuesday's election and Cleveland elected as President.

AUCTION sale of stock belonging to Arch. McVannell, lot 8, con. 4, Dunwich, on Thursday, Nov. 15. Peter Duncanson, auctioneer.

THE great feast of Mandona will eventuate on Thursday evening, November 15, in Leitch's hall, under the management of the ladies of Knox church. Come one, come all.

JOHN L. BLACK, brother of A. N. C. Black, of this place, was elected Probate Judge in Port Huron on Tuesday. Mr. Black, although but a young man, has held public office in Pt. Huron for some years.

THE Band of Hope gave a concert in Leitch's hall on Tuesday evening which was well attended and a long programme well carried out. The children did their part well, which reflected much credit on Miss Kane for their training.

SIGNING SALE NOTES.—There has been trouble sometimes at the auction sales about signing sale notes. Following is the law in the matter:—If a man makes a purchase at a sale, refuses to give his note therefor, the articles may be re-sold, and the first purchaser sued for the difference, if any.

THE Rev. A. Urquhart, of Cowal, moderated a call to the Rev. Thomas Wilson, of Tottenham, to Knox church Dutton, on Monday of this week. The call was very unanimous. Salary $900 and free manse. The Rev. Mr. Wilson signified his intention of accepting the call.

A THANKSGIVING service and tea-meeting will be held at Wallacetown on Thanksgiving- day. Sermon in the Methodist church at 3 p.m. Tea served in Drumgold's hall from 5 to 7 o'clock. Public meeting in the church; music by the choirs of Dutton, Wallacetown and Tyrconnell Methodist churches. Further particulars see bills.

THE first page of last week's Scientific American was taken up with illustrations of the new dynamite cruiser, "Vesuvius," which was launched at Cramp's ship yard, Philadelphia, in April. A description of the vessel is given in the same number of the paper. The vessel is rapidly nearing completion and will be given a trial trip in a few weeks. This is supposed to be the best iron-clad the American Government has.

GOOD ADVICE.—And now it is time for the didn't-know-it-was-loaded lunatic and his cousin, who drags his gun by the muzzle over the fence and through the woods in search of the succuleat game, to be abroad. The safest plan for those who go "gunning" and think they are mighty Nimrods, when, in reality, they are risking the lives of themselves and companions or their fellow-sportsmen, whom they try to shoot for a deer or partridge, would be to stay at home and confine their prowess to the ducks and pigeons in the barnyard.

TRAVELERS through the rural districts report this season an unusual number of turkeys. The farmers are taking largely to this branch of the business, which ought to be a very profitable one. These birds need little care in summer and fall, and if they require pretty full feeding a few weeks before Christmas, the price they bring is a fair compensation. There is a high market in England for all that may be sent there; and were our farmers to devote a good deal more attention to turkey-raising, so as to produce first class birds, large and well-fatted, there would be money in it.

DIED.

MCMILLAN.—In Dunwich, west of Dutton, on the 5th inst., R. P. McMillan, aged 27 years.

BORN.

MANN.—In Dutton, on 4th inst., the wife of Harry Mann, of a son.

Three young women of St. Thomas attired themselves in masculine costume on Hollowe'en and made a tour of a part of the city. They went into a place where liquor is sold and called for whiskey which they drank down with evident relish.

SURPRISE AND PRESENTATION.

(RECEIVED TOO LATE FOR LAST WEEK.)

On Saturday evening, 20 ult., the residence of Mr. Alex. McMillan, Campbellton, was thronged with a large and representative gathering from the congregation of Duff's church, Largie, of which Mr. McMillan has been precentor for years, assembled for the purpose of shewing by a tangible token their appreciation of his services as precentor, and also the esteem in which himself and his estimable wife are held in the community. During the evening Mr. James Beattie was called upon to preside, and after a few well-chosen remarks, Mr. James Muirison, in behalf of the congregation, presented Mr. and Mrs. McMillan with a beautiful silver water-pitcher, tray, goblet and cup, the whole valued at $35. The presentation was accompanied by a suitable address and was appropriately acknowledged by the recipients.

The remainder of the evening was taken up with music, speeches, etc., after which the ladies prepared a liberal and abundant oyster supper to which the party did ample justice. Mr. and Mrs. McMillan are about to depart to their new home in Windsor, to which they will carry with them the good wishes of a wide circle of acquaintances.—COM.

HYMENEAL.

On the 31st ult. a happy event took place at the residence of the bride's mother, Mrs. Galbraith, the occasion being the marriage of Mary, her second daughter, to Mr. Jas. R. Leitch, by Rev. Mr. Pollard, all of Dunwich. The bride looked charming, attired in a dress of ruby satin, and was supported by Miss Mary McIntyre, and the groom by A. N. Paterson. After the ceremony the guests repaired to the dining-room to partake of a bounteous repast prepared by the kind hostess. The following is a list of the presents tendered the bride:—

Silver sugar bowl and spoon-holder, Mr. and Mrs. James Buchanan; six bottled silver cruet stand, Mr. and Mrs. Forbes; gold cuff-buttons and pin, Miss Jane Forbes; colored tea set, F. W. Drake; silver butter cooler and pair vases, Mary and John McIntyre; cut-glass water pitcher, John McArthur: glass cheese dish, Amelia McArthur; cut-glass butter plate, Angus McArthur; silver butter knife and table linen, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Goldie; glass pickle dish, James Goldie; silver pickle cruet and fork, Jasper and Gustin Welch; half-dozen napkins and cheese dish, Mary Ann Welch; silver pickle cruet and fork, Dan Leitch; table-cloth and napkins, Mrs. Dan Leitch; glass bread plate, Flora D. Leitch; silver butter knife and pickle fork, Archie Paterson; canary-colored fruit dish and nappies, Mr. and Mrs. D. F. Gillis; plush match safe, Angus Gillis; cream lace curtains, Anabella Gillis; parlor lamp, Katie and Archie McPherson; water pitcher, Mrs. Campbell; plush sofa pillow and arasene tidy, Miss B. Erskine; colored glass cruet, John Thomson; silver cake basket, Maggie Galbraith; table-linen, Mrs. Dewar; embroidered table cover, Mr. and Mrs. Angus Leitch; colored glass syrup dish, Archie Leitch; silver tea-knives, Bella Galbraith; table linen, Lachlin Currie; silver butter cooler, James McPhedrain; bedroom and dining-room set, Angus Galbraith; parlor lamp, Mr. and Mrs. D. McPherson.

The happy couple departed for the west the following morning to spend their honeymoon.—COM.

WANTED

FOR OUR CITIZENS A MECHANICS' INSTITUTE AND READING-ROOM.

To the Editor:—

For our young men especially and for the citizens generally there is a real need for a reading-room, where in the evening we could drop in and see the leading daily papers, secure the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the very best of magazine literature, and also put on the shelves for general circulation real first-class literature, embracing Fiction, History, Biography, Science, etc., and all this is very easily within our reach. Are there not one hundred of our citizens who would willingly become members at one dollar per year? Then, if properly organized, I think the Government will supplement it with a grant of $100.

Sec. 25, sub sec. (c) of "An Act Respecting Mechanics' Institutes and Art Schools" is as follows:—"In addition to the sums in the preceding sub-sections mentioned, every Mechanics' Institute shall receive for its library the sum of $1 for every dollar expended on books as provided by this Act, but so as not to exceed the sum of $150 for library purposes: provided that the said sum of $150 expended for library purposes not more than twenty per cent. thereof shall be expended in works of fiction; for its reading-room the sum of $1 for every dollar expended for newspapers, magazines or other periodicals, but so as not to exceed the sum of $50 for reading-room purposes."

"Watchman" asks the leading citizens to co-operate in this matter. Our teachers, clergy, physicians, try and take hold of this at once. We are having long evenings and such a place of resort would be a boon to the people of the village. Could our High School Principal, Wm. Rothwell, help us here? Of all our wants this is one of the most pressing.

Another next week.

WEST LORNE.

Rev. T. C. Scott, who was called to Chicago to see his sick brother, has returned. He states that his brother is improving.

The Methodists of this place intend overhauling their church. The building will be veneered with brick and otherwise repaired, and, when completed, will be a credit to the people.

Mr. Beaton and Mr. Mettam attended the temperance movement held in the First Methodist church, St. Thomas, recently.

Mr. Thomas Harris was in the city Tuesday on business.

F. J. Lindenman raises his barn on Thursday. Everybody come.

Mr. James Robinson, our station agent, has resumed his duties after two weeks' holidays.

Dr. Brock received a handsome present in the form of a bouncing baby girl the other day. The Doc. gives us pleasant smiles over it.

Mr. Ed. Chaill is building an addition to his wagon shop. Improvements still go on.

There is talk of T. E. Montague coming in the field as reeve for the Township of Aldborough. Nothing like being on time.

Messrs. P. McGregor and W. J. Ward shipped a carload of potatoes to Detroit last week.

Messrs. McKillop & Sons are putting a new boiler and making other improvements in their mill.

Mr. James Waing has moved into town over the furniture store. Still they come.

A single bottle of Ayer's Sarsaparilla will establish the merits of this medicine as a blood purifier. Many thousands of people are yearly cured of chronic diseases by the faithful use of this remedy. It is unequaled for the cure of scrofula.

INSURE your buildings in the Waterloo. Risks taken on the cash or mutual system. N. Phelps, agent.

Rev. Dr. Mockridge, Episcopalian minister of Hamilton, has declared his firm belief in free pews. The rev. gentleman holds pew rents responsible for only four hundred people being present, where one thousand could be accommodated. It might be treading on dangerous ground to remark that in some cases the pulpit as well as the pew-renter is blameworthy, but there is no room for question that the principle laid down by Mr. Mockridge is sound. If the Gospel is free the hearing of it should be free also. The exclusiveness of many of our "society" churches, with the stony stare that seeks admission to the preempted pew, are sufficient to convince the wayfarer that Christianity is not what he thought it was, or that there is none lying around loose in this beautiful edifice into which he has been unfortunate enough to wander.

No Universal Remedy
has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,
which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.
Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.
That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.
All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.
Ayer's Sarsaparilla,
PREPARED BY
Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by all Druggists. Price $1; six bottles, $5.

VALUABLE TO KNOW.

Consumption may be more easily prevented than cured The irritating and harrassing cough will be greatly relieved by the use of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam that cures coughs, colds, bronchitis and all pulmonary troubles

Tilbury Centre is expecting a boom. A bonus will be given to Smith Bros., of Wheatley, to establish a hoop and handle factory in that village.

CURED BY B.B.B. WHEN ALL ELSE FAILED.

Mr. Samuel Allan of Lisle, Ont., states that he tried all the doctors in his locality while suffering for years with Liver and Kidney trouble; nothing benefited him until he took Burdock Blood Bitters, four bottles of which cured him.

Hon. Edward Blake will argue before the Supreme court at Ottawa the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the matter of the Red River Valley crossing. Hon. O. Mowat holds the brief of the Red River Valley railroad and the Province of Manitoba.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

It is safe to use Freeman's Worm Powders, as they act only on the worms and do not injure the child.

The Leamington Post says the Salvation Army are without a barracks and are gradually growing weaker in that place.

Sick headache caused by excess of bile or a disordered stomach is promptly relieved by using National Pills.

A corpulent, full-faced, heavily-moustached tramp registered at the Peterboro police station Thursday night as Grover Cleveland, Buffalo; occupation, tramp.

If people, troubled with colds, will take Ayer's Cherry Pectoral before going to church they will avoid coughing. The Pectoral soothes the irritated tissues, and controls all disposition to cough.

Harrison and Morton, the Republican candidates, were elected as President and Vice-President of the United States, respectively, in the elections held last week.

Kansas city was visited with a severe snow storm on Friday of last week. Trains were all delayed and telegraph wires prostated. Six inches of snow fell in Quebec the same day.

THE MODUS OPERANDI.

The mode of operating of Burdock Blood Bitters is that it acts at once and at the same time upon the Stomach, Liver, Bowels, Kidneys and the Blood, to cleanse, regulate and strengthen. Hence its almost universal value in all Chronic Complaints.

The Canadian Pacific are negotiating for the purchase of the Great Western division of the Grand Trunk from Komoka to Windsor, but if the purchase price cannot be agreed on the Canadian Pacific will construct an independent line.

Painful burns, bruises, scalds and cuts are quickly soothed and healed by Victoria Carbolic Salve.

Brodie, the bridge-jumper, ascended the top of the Poughkeepsie bridge, Newburgh, N.Y., on Friday morning, and divesting himself of his clothing and donning a rubber suit jumped into the river. When taken out of the water it was found that he was seriously injured and will probably die. He jumped on a wager of $500 and for the $500 gold medal of the Police Gazette.

A QUARTER OF A CENTURY.

For more than twenty-five years has Hagyard's Yellow Oil been sold by druggists, and it has never yet failed to give satisfaction as a household remedy for pain, lameness and soreness of the flesh, for external and internal use in all painful complaints.

A disastrous mine explosion occurred in Pittsburg, Kansas, last Friday. One hundred and sixty men are imprisoned, and are supposed to be dead, as rescuing parties are unable to reach the entombed men owing to the foul air. A theory is advanced that it is probable the men in the lower levels of the mine are buried beneath tons of slate. Black damp is supposed to have caused the explosion.

Three new cases of small-pox are reported at Sarnia. The health authorities are taking every precaution to prevent the spread of the disease.

A RARE COMBINATION.

There is no other remedy or combination of medicines that meets so many requirements, as does Burdock Blood Bitters in its wide range of power over such chronic diseases as Dyspepsia, Liver and Kidney Complaint, Scrofula and all humors of the blood.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla acts directly and promptly, purifying and and enriching the blood, improving the appetite, strengthening the nerves, and invigorating the system. It is, in the truest sense, an alterative medicine. Every invalid should give it a trial.

A LONG RIDE.—Mr. Geo. Pryor, of Sparta, who returned the other day from Wyndham, McPherson county, Kansas, drove all the way with a team of horses. The distance in round figures is 1,500 miles, and it took Mr. Pryor eight weeks to make the journey, the outlay for feed for horses and his meals being about $70.

DEAFNESS CURED. A very interesting 132 page Illustrated Book on Deafness. Noises in the head. How they may be cured at home. Post free 3d.—Address DR. NICHOLSON, 30, St. John Street, Montreal.

A FEMALE INCENDIARY.—Amy Young, a young woman sixteen years of age and employed by Mrs. McCrone, St. Thomas, was arrested Friday on a charge of arson. Miss Annie Malloy, a young lady attending the Collegiate Institute, is a guest of Mr. McCrone, and Miss Malloy found it necessary to complain that she could not get her breakfast in time to get to school, and for this Amy declared she would have revenge upon Miss Malloy, saying that though it took the last cent she ever earned she would get even with her yet. About ten days ago Mr. McCrone found it necessary to check the girl, and all the household were afraid that she would do some damage. When Mr. McCrone left the house on Friday afternoon his wife was lying on a lounge, and when he came in, about 4:30 p.m., he noticed a smell of smoke. An examination upstairs showed one of the rooms to be full of smoke. When the window was opened and the smoke cleared away somewhat, it was discovered that the clothes closet was on fire. It was extinguished, three pairs of pants, the carpet and door being burned. A fire had been built in the clothes closet directly under a $35 sealette jacket, the property of Miss Malloy. The prisoner had built the fire directly under Miss Malloy's sealette jacket, so that it might be burned and satisfy her desire for revenge. The girl accused Miss Malloy of having started the fire, but when taken to the police station confessed her guilt, having committed the rash act to secure revenge. Amy's parents reside in Glenwilliams, Haldimand county.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

Thomas Axworthy, the defaulting city treasurer of Cleveland, who left that city $400,000 short in his accounts and with $150,000 of other people's money, has written Mayor Babcock a letter explaining the reason of his defalcations. He had been loaning money to parties whom he supposed to be worth millions and had received the interest regularly. On demanding the principal he was dumbfounded on learning that they could not pay it. He has given his entire belongings in full to the city to make amends as far as possible for his defalcations. Axworthy is an exile in Montreal.

Twelve lives were lost in a fire in Rochester on Friday. The pecuniary loss will amount to $250,000. The building was approachable only on one side, and the firemen had only a narrow alley to work in. The building stood on the edge of the upper falls of the Genesee river. The falls are 96 feet high. When the firemen arrived the windows on the street side of the building were filled with men calling for help. There were 65 men inside. The firemen answered them telling them not to jump, they would soon be rescued. The men paid no attention to the encouraging cries, and soon the air was filled with falling human bodies. At least twenty men jumped from the third storey. All of them were more or less injured. Four of them died of their injuries before they could be removed. Twenty one men are missing and are supposed to be dead in the ruins.

"JACK, THE RIPPER," AGAIN.

ANOTHER LONDON HORROR.

LONDON, Nov. 10.—The murder fiend has added another to his list of victims. At 11 o'clock yesterday morning the body of a woman cut in two pieces was discovered in a house in Dorset-street, Spitalfields. The body was disfigured in the same horrible manner as those of the women murdered in Whitechapel.

The appearance of the remains was frightful, and the mutilation was even greater than in the previous cases. The head had been severed and placed beneath one of the arms. The ears and nose had been cut off. The body had been disembowled and the flesh was torn from the thighs. The skin had been torn off the forehead and cheeks. One hand had been placed into the stomach.

The victim, like all the others, was a fallen woman. She was married, and her husband was a porter. They had lived together at spasmodic intervals. Her name was Lizzie Fisher, but to most of the habitues of the haunts she visited she was known as "Mary Jane." She had a room in the house where she was murdered. She carried a latch-key, and no one knows at what hour she entered the house on Thursday night, and probably no one saw the man who accompanied her. Therefore it is hardly likely that he will ever be identified. He might easily have left the house at any time between 1 and 6 o'clock yesterday morning without attracting any attention. The doctors who have examined the remains refuse to make any statement until the inquest is held.

Three bloodhounds belonging to private citizens were taken to the place where the body was and placed on the scent of the murderer, but they were unable to keep it for any great distance and all hope of running the assassin down with their assistance has been abandoned.

The murdered woman told a companion Thursday evening that she was without money and unless she obtained a supply would commit suicide. It has been learned that a man respectably dressed accosted the victim and offered her money. They went to her lodgings on the second floor of the Dorset street house.

NUPTIALS.

A pleasant event took place at the residence of Mrs. Walker, in Rodney, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 6, the attraction being the marriage of her daughter Kate to William S. Marshall, of Chatham. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Francis. The bride was handsomely attired in white and wore the bridal veil, decorated with orange blossoms. The bridesmaids were Miss Maggie McCallum, London, and Miss Mary A. Shaw, Rodney, who were attired in cream cashmere and lace. The groomsmen were Ivie B. Hope and Samuel Glenn, Chatham. After the ceremony the guests partook of a sumptuous repast, the tables being well loaded with delicacies.

The presents to the bride were numerous and costly. The following is a list of a few of the principal ones: Groom's present, silver tea set; Mrs. John Marshall, table cruet; parlor lamp, Miss M. A. Shaw; Mrs. W. McCallum, table linen; Misses Taylor, crystal water set; Messrs. Graham and Hope, silver card receiver; Mr. Duncan, table linen; Miss McKellar, silver pickle cruet; Dan. Jamieson, silver butter cooler; Isaac Stolliker, crystal water pitcher and bowl; D. L. McKellar, silver oyster spoon; Miss Shaw, hand-painted banner; Mr. and Mrs. D. Brown, Strathroy, whisk-holder and photo. album; Messrs. D. and A. Taylor, set glassware; Thomas Brown, London, hand painted panel; Mr. D. Shaw, silver salt cellar and spoon; Miss McCallum, set glassware; Ella Marshall, glass fruit dish; Mr. L. J. Marshall, set glassware; Miss McCallum, London, pickle castor.

After spending a pleasant evening the happy couple departed amid showers of rice and were accompanied to the station by the wedding party where they took the 10:11 express for the east.

DAMAGES FOR SEDUCTION.

AN ACTION ENTERED FOR $2,000 DAMAGES AGAINST A. CAMERON, WALLACETOWN.

Macdougall & Robertson, solicitors for Mr. W. Cusack, tinsmith, Wallacetown, have entered an action against Mr. A. Cameron, furniture dealer, of Wallacetown, for $2,000 damages, for the seduction of his daughter Annie, a young woman 20 years of age, and formerly employed as telegraph operator in that place. The young woman was taken to Detroit some two or three months ago, where she gave birth to a child, a girl. Cameron left Wallacetown and is believed to be in Chicago, his father now running his store in the former place. It was supposed Cameron would return, so that he could be served with a notice of action, but not returning, on Friday last, at Osgoode Hall, an order for substitution of service was obtained, and his father and brother will be served. The case will be tried at the spring assizes.

You Carry
A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."
Here is an instance of
A Physician
who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:
"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."
John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."
T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

THE MEN OF MOOSOMIN.

A Sketch of Life on the Prairies.

Sitting on the rear platform of the car we saw Winnipeg recede and recede and finally vanish on the broad rim of the prairie. Now we are in another world, a world of heaving brown grasses, dotted here and there with tiny yellow dark-centred sunflowers, bearing as its outposts now and then, distinct against the horizon, the low-set shanties of the first comers. All day long we sped across it on two lessening parallel straight lines that seem to end from infinity to infinity. All day long we chase the sun, who laughs gloriously at us over the yellow prairies, and mocks us with a lengthening shadow, fleet as we are.

The little station is full of men moving about, the lantern light showing the brass buttons of line officials, the knee-high boots of Moosomin farmers, the red coats and white helmets of Mounted Policemen. They all vanish rather spectrally into Moosomin when the train goes out; and we are left contemplating our impedimenta and the station master, more in sorrow than in wrath perhaps, but in a good deal of uncertainty at all events. The station master rises to the occasion, however, a "Jim" is called in from the outer darkness and we follow Jim, portmanteau laden, shawl-strapped and hampered, to the "hotel." The hotel is named as usual, with something of the appropriateness it would have rejoiced in as the Ocean House. It is a quiet house, with no loafers about, in testimony to the fact that prohibition is by no means a farce out here. Naturally enough it is the sort of place where they do not understand extravagance in towels, where the beds have home-made comforters and the knives are silvered over with that pale composition that is defied by the tissues of ordinary beefsteak, yet the rooms are very clean, the host hospitable and the food good of its kind, though the kind is disappointing. We hope a supper of wild duck, venison steaks or prairie chicken, we get exactly the same "tea" we should get at a similar hostelry in any country town of Ontario without a single variety of pickle omitted. It is the same story everywhere, the traveller is never regaled with the fish, the fruit, the game of the part through which he passes. A desperate and usually unsuccessful effort is always made instead to give him an imitation of the fare he has at home.

WHAT THE COUNTRY IS LIKE.

A good deal of the life of the country gathers into one of these little Northwest hotels. We see it in the morning when we come down to breakfast at half-past six and find the tables filled with collarless, heavy-coated, high booted men, bronzed and deep chested and muscular. Not a woman in the room except the waiting-girl; travelling is too arduous a pleasure for pioneer femininity, what there is of it. Even the knights of the plough-share themselves have left their broad acres and come to the metropolis of Moosomin, in only under pressure of some urgent need—binding-twine, lumber, mechanical repairs. The talk is all of these, of the wheat yield and its price, of the frost, the shooting, and of a popular gentleman mentioned as "the judge." Plenty of English voices and faces, some from Ontario, but fewer. By and bye when the tables begin to thin out we fall into chat with one of these latter who looks fairly typical, a sun-burned young fellow of twenty-two or thereabouts. He tells us that when they first came out he and his brother "bached" for a year or two alone, the nearest "lady" three miles away, with an uncertain claim to the title. Then when the ground was broken and the earth was yielding her fruit and the first hardships were overpast they had sent word to the clergyman-father in Ontario and the mother and the sister, that the new land of promise was ready for occupation; and these had come and brought with them the cushions and curtains and comforts of the most the stronger birds had flown from. And now the sister likes it "pretty well," rides about a good deal on her pony, and writes a neat many letters to her friends in the East; and they are all very happy and comfortable, and have splendid health. He hopes it won't rain, he has forty miles to go with a load of lumber to build a granary. It is dreary enough without the rain, walking beside the waggon and meeting perhaps one person on the whole journey. No, they were not lonely in the winter, there was too much to do, cutting wood at the bluffs and looking after the stock. On the whole they liked the life and thrive on it. The success of a few manly fellows like this ought to prove a correction of that widespread desire for clerkships and professions, underpaid and overcrowded, among the

YOUNG MEN OF THE OLDER PROVINCES.

Up stairs in the tiny sitting-room there is a canary and a small new girl baby, who vie with one another in making things cheerful for the sojourner. I commend this fact to anybody who finds fault with our Winnipeg impressions, which were confided to paper and ink with this double accompaniment. The father of the pink morsel, our burly young host, pokes it awkwardly under the chin and addresses it as "old fellow," the inaccuracy being due to the embarrassment of our presence. He is a good specimen of a North-Wester, broad shouldered, with a kindly round face and a hearty laugh, good-tempered and obliging. "You might think it queer," he says, "me carryin' a gun through here into a bedroom, but fact is folks have a kind of way of borry vin' a gun 'thout askin,' if they see it lyin' round down stairs 'bout this time o' year, an' I'm 'bliged to hide it." He is enthusiastic about the climate. "I suppose, says Louis, "nobody is ever sick here." "Well," he replies, smoothing his chin with his hand in smiling, puzzled deprecation, "sometimes they do be sick. They was a graveyard started here only 'bout a year back, an' you'd be s'prised to see how many they got a'ready."

"Moosomin is bound to make a success of everything it undertakes," we venture. "Is that it?" Whereat he slaps his broad thigh and laughs prodigiously.

Moosomin interested us from the fact of its being the centre of a number of settler experiments. Here along the undulating bluffs of the Pipe Stone Creek, crofters are settled, each with his little sod, or log, house in the midst of his quarter section, his realization of lairdship and his dreams of the time when prohibition shall be a tale that is told, and free whisky add the one exhilaration lacking to his alien soul. Very canny are the crofters, very PRACTICAL AND THRIFTY ALL.

Hungarians and Bohemians are taking root twenty miles away, the Hungarians, slow, uncivil and dirty by repute, the Bohemians tidy and polite, desiring to kiss the stranger's hand. Closer than any, within three miles of the town, are the East Londoners, the people taken as you will remember, from the slums of London four years ago by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and sent over here, the most unpromising of colonists, to get a different living in a different way. Their benefactress gave them fifty pounds apiece, the North-West Land Company lent them fifty more under chattel mortgage of the implements and stock the whole enabled them to procure, and apparently a most unpractical and impossible scheme of philanthropy reached its second stage. The Londoners knew nothing but their native alleys and avocations some of them had never seen the country, some knew a plough from a hand organ, and that was about all. They had no bucolic antecedents or connections; their forefathers ate sold cat's meat and swept chimneys. Only utter failure must have been predicted of a plan to turn these people loose each on one hundred and sixty acres of unbroken land in a strange country, and say to them "this territory is yours, farm it." Yet of the twenty families that came, twelve have stuck to their farms and succeeded, five have given them up and "bettered themselves" by working at various small crafts in town, and three only have drifted away into the irresponsible wretchedness in which they were born. From a selfish point of view, it is to be hoped that the remarkable success of this experiment will not prompt more of the same sort in the breasts of benevolent English gentlewomen. Whatever these people have accomplished, the right sort of immigrants could have done on a scale many times better, larger and more profitable both to themselves and to the country, to say nothing of the social, moral and intellectual future of the Territories, which might be laid on a more promising foundation.

The keen North-West air rolls in, billow after billow of it, over the undulating prairie so vigorously that we turn our fur collars up, in the middle of this twenty-fourth day of September, as we start out behind a team of spirited little bronchos to see the Londoners on the soil of their adoption. We are indebted to the Land Company's agent for this pleasure, a gentleman to whom large numbers of westward bound travellers are under similar bonds of gratitude.

It is our first ride over the prairie. I might tell you that we never shall forget it after the manner of correspondents generally, but for the conviction in my mind that that statement conveys nothing specially interesting or instructive to yours. But I will and you, perhaps quite as impotently, to shut your eyes and try to see stretching away to the right, to the left, before, behind, miles on miles of rolling yellow-brown country, the black, velvety track winding across it, the blue dome of the sky springing from all its outskirts, the fibrous grasses paling in the swathe of the strong wind. Here and there like a pocket looking glass dropped on the prairie, with a score or so of wild ducks swimming in it, or a slight round hollow where a pond used to be, with the wild duck flying high. Now and then a dash away from the track, when the grasses part for the horses' feet and curl and close up again like shallow beach waves. Before we come to the first London we get some general information. They cannot leave in a fit of discontent and go through to the States because nobody in Moosomin will buy their mortgaged effects, and these form their whole capital. The company made all their initial investments for them, otherwise an unnecessary amount of the loan would have been spent in foolish luxuries for immediate consumption, after the manner of the improvident everywhere. In some cases additional loans were advanced at a rate two per cent. less than any other settlers in the Territory could obtain them. At its own expense the Company had sent a practical man among the Londoners when they came out, to teach them the rudiments of farming, shew them how to build their houses and how to manage an ox. One man who could not make this animal understand what was required of it, was discovered disciplining it by tying it to a tree and soundly belaboring it. There were all types among the lot, honest and dishonest, patient and unreasonable, hardworking and lazy, prosperous and unprosperous. Most of them had fifty acres under cultivation now, and some had made repayment already of special loans, though the main debt was unpaid in every case so far. The most profitless human investment the Baroness and the Company have made we come to first; at she agent's approach it turns and shuffles indifferently out of earshot. The man, we are told, is utterly and helplessly lazy. Of his hundred and twenty acres two or three are scratched into ragged cultivation, he has no stock, his neatly planned little home is squalidly unfinished. He began with the rest and under the same conditions, but beyond the requirements of his appetite he will not work.

"One winter he fell ill for a time and needed milk for nourishment," our guide tells us. "He came begging to me for a cow, got the cow, milked her dry and then deliberately starved her. She was skin and bone when I got her back, I had hard wark getting her round at all." But this is the worst and the worst of a great deal. The next place is that of the "parson," who came out in charge of the rest, really only a lay reader, but a person of a certain superiority. He has left "parsoning," says our informant, and taken to crops and cattle, and he is independent now. His ricks are mellow in the sun, his oxen switch their tails reposefully, his longhaired dog barks at us as we drive past in a way that shows easy mastery of democratic principles. But we do not alight till we get to "John's." I can't tell you John's other name lest he should rise to the dignity of a leading.

MEMBER OF ASSINIBOIAN SOCIETY,

and sue the paper for dealing lightly with his domestic affairs. Perhaps after all it doesn't matter. John looks, as he stands among his prairie assets, without the least disrespect to that body, like a just received member of the Salvation Army. His complexion has a large foreign element about it, his clothes hang loosely, leaving ample room for the development of his immediate personal estate, his eyelids droop, he has adopted the Blackfoot idea of hair cutting, and he radiates cunning enough to supply political sagacity to the whole Council of Assiniboia. I have mentioned his assets. They include a wooden house of perhaps three rooms in close juxtaposition with a warm sod construction for his poultry and a log stable, sheltered by a couple of hay ricks. A good many bushels of wheat lying stacked about, several acres in sight, two well fed oxen, plenty of hens and ducks. Item one dog, mongrel snapping. Item one wife, a degree more agreeable to look at. Item eight children, barefooted and squalid but rosy and content, one of whom will probably be mayor of Moosomin some day.

"Yes, ther's sight," says their proprietor not without pride. "An' ther's a bit more of a chance o' gettin' a crust fer 'em in this country, an' a good thing it is, fer I'm gettin' quaite a crop of 'em now. Ere Luke, you 'old up your 'ead for the laidy." He picks Luke, aged four, up by the back of her waistband and holds her limp and dangling for inspection. "Git the balby, waife. There naow," as a fat feeble little head was uncovered to the scorching wind, "that un was jist born a week was ystiddy, look at 'er."

"But cover it up; cover it up;" we shriek at its mother.

"Oh she'll do well enough, we begin 'ardisin' of 'em early. She'll git used to it. They're all thrivin'. An she'll soon be useful too. That 'un there's only three an' she kin run after 'er father an' the plough an' pick up potatoes with any of 'em. We soon turns 'em to somethin' an' they're worth all they cost."

John is jocular. "Ther's one thing," he says "as I'm thankful fer, an' that is that none o' the neighbors kin come to me an' say as one o' my boys 'as broke 'is winder with a stone. An' ther's no school board down on me fer keepin' 'em out o' school. Ner no rent to pay. 'Ome, if ye'd scrape a bit up to buy bread with, slap 'alf of it 'ud go every Monday mornin' fer the rent 'er else ye'd be turned out. Them three things I 'ave got to be thankful fer." Yet in three minutes he is complaining about the section's lack of a school. We ask about the prosperity of his farm, and John's face at once assumes a depression directly traceable to the presence of the

ONE CREDITOR THE WORLD HAS

for him. "Well, yes, I won't say but we're doin' pritty fair on the 'ole, but its 'ard scratchin', an wot wi' the frost an' my calf breakin' of 'er neck, we won't be able to do nothing on the debt this year, though I'd laike to git it paid, an' nobody better. She was allers a leadin' of the others hoff an' makin' trouble fer me, so I got a rope an' tied 'er up, little thinkin' she'd break 'er neck on me with it. An' wi' that 'an the frost I've 'ad a slaice o' bad luck like, but we're gettin' on pritty fair I must say, an' next year we 'opes to do better on the debt. Beginnin' with one ox, an' we couldn't afford no more, was a set back laike, but naow I've got two it's a sight easier."

You must supply for yourself the indescribable upward inflection of the Cockney, the twinkle and the grimace.

The next Londoners are wholly different. A fresh-faced woman, with a wholesome voice and smile, welcomes us, her arms covered with flour from the kneading bowl, apologises for the bare feet of her tidy children, talks intelligently about the crops and prices, and tells us her hope of a "cayuse" pony this year, it is so slow, three hours, going to town with her butter and eggs behind the oxen. "He" is outside tossing sheaves from the wain, and making a mellow picture with his red oxen against the evening sky. Both are hopeful and contented, and the children are drawing in the breath of the prairie and growing heartily on its generous forth-bringings. And nobody, whatever the petty complaint of the moment, is really dissatisfied or wants to change. They "get homesick sometimes" especially the women, and long for the odds and ends of household furnishing they sold before leaving London, but none would return if they could, and that is the best test. They live in the main upon their own produce, supply small needs with their butter and eggs and poultry; and regard the price of their wheat as so much to put by. Their delight at seeing its representative, notwithstanding their professed inability to meet any part of "the debt," convinced me that they receive all the advice and assistance from the Land company that it is possible to give them. There can be no doubt about their own ultimate independence, and their children's future of honest effort and fair recompense. It is good for them to be here.

There is time for a walk before supper, and we wander to the outskirts of Moosomin. A single Indian, wearing his blanket as an Italian officer might his cloak, walks before us, tall and dignified, looking this way and that for something, a friend, perhaps, or his pony. When we turn he is still standing solitary against the burning sunset, looking across the land of his disinheritance.

We are quite in the suburbs, but the sound that calls us back is the ringing of the table bell of our hotel. When Moosomin is a prairie city this will be reminiscence.

GARTH GRAFTON, in "Montreal Star."

How to Live to a Good Old Age.

The first lesson to be taught and learned:—that all disease is the result of broken law; that much of it might easily be avoided by the observance of the laws of health on the part of the individual; that much more, which is beyond the reach of individuals, might be prevented by the combined efforts of communities and the state; and that these diseases which are entailed upon this generation by the law of heredity, might by obedience to law be gradually stamped out of existence, and future ages be freed from their curse.

The next thing to be taught is the laws themselves—and with the laws, and of even greater importance, the habit of obeying them. We know a great deal more than we put in practice. This is the fault of the common modes of health teaching. Our newspapers and periodical literature contain a vast deal of popular instruction in these matters. They are treated of in an abundance of well written books which are within easy reach of all who care to read them. Our schools are taking hold of the good work, and instruction in hygiene is fast coming to be recognized as an essential part of even an elementary education. But all these do not reach the evil, or if they do, they only touch it on the surface.

Our schools are full of good grammarians who do not use respectable English in common conversation. So, too, they may be full of glib reciters of the laws of health, who do not observe a single one of the laws they have learned. The main point is to secure obedience. The greatest criminals are usually well versed in the laws of the land; but their knowledge does not avail to keep them out of the penitentiary when they have broken these laws. Neither will a knowledge of the laws of health keep a man from being sick, so long as he does not live up to his knowledge.

We are creatures of imitation. Example counts for more than precept. The parent knows the law, and the child knows it too. When the parent keeps it, then the children will keep it also. It does little good for a child to learn at school that the food should be properly masticated, when three times every day at home he sees a hungry group crowd about the table like pigs around a trough, and bolt their food as nearly whole as it can be made to go down. The child whose mother gives it a bite of something to eat every time it cries for it, will not be in a condition to profit from an understanding of the law that food should not be taken between meals, until it is too late for the knowledge to be of much service. The law of pure air and proper ventilation may be taught over so plainly in the text-books, but to the boy who is brought up to sit and sleep in a close, unventilated room, foul with the breath of living beings, and to shun fresh air as he would a plague, the knowledge will be of little avail. While his father's cellar is filled with decaying meat, vegetables, and all manner of filth, and the cesspool smells to heaven from beneath the kitchen window, all the teachings of the schools will not prevent his having typhoid fever, or diphtheria, or some form of filth disease, when the summer sun calls into activity the germs of disease which are latent there. If liquors are kept upon the sideboard and wines are served upon the table in his home, not all the teachings of all the temperance text-books in the land can be relied upon to produce in him habits of sobriety and total abstinence.

It is the practice of the principles of hygiene in our homes, and this alone, which will lessen the rate of disease and death today, and develop a stronger race to-morrow. The child who has learned the laws of health from his father and mother, by seeing them continually and persistently applied, will come to follow them in his own case, as naturally as he will conduct himself properly in good society, if good society has been his birthright, and gentlemanly conduct has become habitual.

Murder for Money.

The "Wild West," in its wildest and most lawless days, was never disgraced by a fouler murder than one which recently occurred near Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania. It furnishes another proof that the mere surface veneer of culture and refinement which passes under the name of civilization, is of little value as a controlling force when pitted against the baser passions of humanity. Some of the worst crimes, perhaps a majority of them, are committed in the greatest centres of the highest civilization. Not very comforting doctrine for these persons who substitute evolution upward for the doctrine of a Fall from a state of innocence. In the case referred to, two men, going home from Wilkesbarre with a large sum of money wherewith to pay the laborers on a railroad, were waylaid and shot down in cold blood by highwaymen who evidently knew their movements and were determined to get possession of the booty at all hazards. They had no squeamishness about making murder the stepping stone to robbery. They knew that their victims were bold men and well armed, and that they would defend their trust to the bitter end, and therefore they were not going to risk their own lives when well directed rifle shots from a covert would do the business. The murder has caused intense excitement, and every nerve is being strained to secure the murderers. If the right men are caught it is to be hoped there will be no maudlin sentimentality about the way in which they are to be dealt with. Society owes a duty of self protection to itself, not merely extenuation and reformation to criminals of that class. We are not called upon to be more tender-hearted in our dealings with deliberate murderers than the God who made them, and therefore the great law of punishment by death for murder should be most rigorously enforced.

Corn Sowing

Is a process conducted by the agency of tight boots all the year round. Corn reaping is best conducted through the agency of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor, the only safe and sure pop corn cure. Putnam's Extractor is now widely imitated. Beware of all poisonous and sore producing substitutes.

It was the lady who thought she was going to swoon who had a faint suspicion.

"A Word to the Wise is Sufficient."

Catarrh is not simply an inconvenience, unpleasant to the sufferer and disgusting to others—it is an advanced outpost of approaching disease of worse type. Do not neglect its warning; it brings deadly evils in its train. Before it is too late, use Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It reaches the seat of the ailment, and is the only thing that will. You may dose yourself with quack medicines till it is too late—till the stream-let becomes a resistless torrent. It is the matured invention of a scientific physician. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

If a word spoken in its time is worth one piece of money, silence in its time is worth two.

Style.

The most fashionable color, at present, is the hue of health, and it will never go out of style. Its shades and tints are various, but all of them are exceedingly becoming. It is perfectly astonishing what a change is being daily wrought by Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription in the looks of sickly women. Sufferers from any sort of "female weakness" or irregularity, backache or nervous prostration should give it trial. All druggists.

The thief who finds no opportunity to steal considers himself an honest man.

Rattlesnakes as Food.

It was said of a strong political partizan that he would swallow rattlesnakes if party interests demanded it. It is only men of this sort who, without protest, swallow the large, old-fashioned pills. Sensible people, requiring medicine to cleanse their systems, invariably use Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They are unrivaled in all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels.

"The Racer" Thin Back, Lance-Tooth, Cross-Cut Saw

The Maple Leaf Racer and Lance Cross cut saws are now sold in all parts of the world. The quality of these saws is unequalled. Their excellence is wholly due to their superior temper, the process of which is kept a profound secret by Shurly & Dietrich, the manufacturers of these saws. One of the best evidences of their superior quality is that other saw manufacturers put on the market as close an imitation of these saws as they are able to produce, and represent it to be as good as the Maple Leaf saw. They run their saw upon our name until they become familiar with its inferior quality, then change the name, in order to humbug the another season, all of which is the very best evidence of the superior quality of the Maple Leaf saw, as it is not the custom to counterfeit a poor article. These counterfeits are sold for a much lower price than the Maple Leaf saw can be bought for: the dealer, of course, endeavors to sell them at nearly the same price, thereby realizing a larger profit. And some of the more unprincipled dealers, in order to sell the counterfeit saw, will tell untruths of various kinds regarding the quality of both the genuine and the counterfeit. Good goods are always cheap, poor goods are dear at any price. A saw, like a knife, will not cut fast unless it will hold a keen cutting edge. Price $1.00 per foot. Manufactured only by SHURLY & DIETRICH, SAW MANUFACTURERS,

LATE CABLE NEWS.

The Accident to the Czar.—Big Storm.—General Matters.

Europe is full of speculation as to whether it was a successful Nihilist attempt that wrecked the Czar's train and nearly killed the Czar, or whether the train just went off the track naturally, as Russian trains frequently do. Almost universal opinion points to Nihilism, but though Nihilists are undoubtedly very active just now, there is reason to doubt their responsibility in this particular case. It seems the Czar's heavy train was going forty-three miles an hour on a bad Russian track accustomed to light trains going fifteen miles. The fact that deep secrecy was maintained as to details of the accident means nothing, as deep secrecy is always maintained whenever the Czar is concerned. The that fact a great railway official has written to the Czar and committed suicide since the accident would be more significant but for the fact that the official in question had nothing to do with the particular track which went wrong. The only way to form a valuable opinion is to watch closely what persons are next hanged or sent to Siberia. Congratulations have been sent to the Czar from all rulers, and divine services and thanksgivings offered up for the escape in every European capital.

NORTH SEA WRECKS.

Considerable damage was done in several English counties by the late gale in its true northeasterly course, and the rain, which fell in torrents, rapidly filled the watercourses. A strong gale from the east-northeast reached the Tyne and all along the northeastern coast thereabouts. A tremendous sea was running, so that vessels could not leave harbor.

Owing to the storm diving operations in connection with raising the screw steamer Triumph, of Sunderland, which sank in Shields harbor, were stopped. Rain also fell heavily. A telegram from Hull states that no fewer than five vessels have been wrecked off Withernsea, near Hull, during the night. No lives from the vessels were lost, but a man in going to render assistance was blown over the cliff into the sea and drowned.

The Channel crossing especially near the French coast, was heavy.

The Emperer of Germany continues his wonderful activity, going from place to place reorganizing his army and navy, snubbing German burgomasters, or flattering foreign ministers, with wonderful zeal. It is now announced that he is going to visit solemnly the courts of the Saxon duchies of Weimar, Meiningen, and Coburg in a few days, and then is to examine and suggest improvements in numerous of his fortifications.

A great deal of mystery is observed about the condition of the King of the Netherlands. Something is wrong with his throat, but the exact nature of the disease has not transpired. It is believed to be very serious. Prof. Rosenstein, who gets the advertisement of this particular case, declares there is no immediate danger, but adds, wisely, "apart from sudden complications." The official bulletins from the palace are mistrusted and strangers are kept at a careful distance.

The young gentleman, aged six and a half, who is now Crown Prince of Germany, and will be Emperor when the present young Emperor is dead, is already being turned into a soldier. Every day he is compelled for over half an hour to move his chubby legs and hold his immature body according to military discipline, and is severely drilled by an ancient Sergeant-Major. He wears the regulation uniform, and returns the salutes of aged Generals with dignified nonchalance.

16 CARIBOU IN 16 SECONDS.

The Wonderful Exploits of Jim Porter, a Famous Canadian Hunter.

"The greatest hunting feat I ever knew of," said Col. John Butler of Lindsay, Canada, "was the killing of sixteen caribou in as many seconds by a single hunter. That hunter was Jim Porter of Thibert's Creek, Victoria, and the comparative scarcity of caribou in that game-favored province is due to the way that hunter has used his Winchester rifle during the past six years. He bought that rifle in 1882; in the January following, in company with Charles Cameron of Cameron Lake, he first tried his skill in handling it.

"It was New Year's Day and the thermometer was 40° below zero at the lake, but Porter and Cameron were not deterred by a trifling depth of mercury like that, and started up into the mountains. The timber line is at an elevation of 750 feet in that country, and they climbed clear above that yet before they came on any sign of caribou. Porter discovered where a band had been browsing in the brush. He told his companion to remain on the spot, while he himself made a detour around a ridge, on the other side of which he calculated that the caribou were then feeding.

"He was right. As he rounded the ridge, the wind being in his favor, he came in sight of the band, which contained thirteen caribou. Porter crept to within 150 yards of them, when he noticed that they were giving signs of feeling that an enemy was near. Porter took no further risk, but picked out the biggest bull in the band and fired. The bull dropped in its tracks. The other twelve started on a run. Before they got beyond range Porter dropped eight more of them and wounded another. The nine caribou were killed in nine seconds. The survivors of the band bore off around the ridge and passed by Cameron, but more than 300 yards distant. Cameron dropped one of them at that distance. Every one of the nine caribou that Porter killed was shot a few inches behind the shoulder. The two men hunted no more that day. When the carcasses of their caribou were brought in they found that they had over 2,500 pounds of meat.

Another day in the same month a visiting sportsman from Quebec, named Bernard Sullivan, was taken out on a little trip after caribou. They went up into the mountains at the head of Dease Creek. These mountains are about as rough and rugged a portion of the earth's formation as can be found on this continent. The caribou manages to get about on its rocky sides and though its deep ravines with ease and comfort, but the hunter who seeks that game in these mountain fastnesses has to mind his eye.

"On the day Porter and Sullivan went up there to try their luck, Porter came in sight of a band of sixteen fine caribou, feeding on the side of a steep and much exposed hill. The prospect was so open, in fact, that Porter had big doubts of being able to get within gunshot of the wily and wary animals, but he made the effort. He crawled along through the brush and over the rocks, watching every movement of the suspicious band, until he got within 500 yards of the game. Then an opening of 200 or 300 feet, bare of vegetation, intervened between him and the band, and he knew that it would be impossible for him to clear that without stampeding the caribou. Jim felt it in his bones that he could drop at least one of the band at that distance, and thought there might be a possibility of bagging two before the caribou got out of range or under cover.

"He selected the one in the bunch that presented the best shot and banged away. The caribou fell. The rest were off instantly. Jim kept on drawing bead and sending lead after them, and so dexterously and unerringly did he manipulate his gun that he had the satisfaction of killing six others of the band before they could get out of the way. Porter says that he does not believe that he was more than five seconds in dropping the seven caribou, but is willing to allow a second to each one. Porter and Sullivan bagged two more caribou that day on their way home."

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXX.—THE BARD IN HARNESS.

"I never felt more astonished in my life," Hatherley remarked one day some weeks later to a chosen circle at the Cheyne Row Club, "than I felt on the very first morning of my visit to Whitestrand. Talk about being driven by a lady, indeed! Why, that frail little woman's got the Bard in harness, as right and as tight as if he were a respectable cheesemonger. It's too surprising. The Bard's done for. His life is finished. There the Man stops. The Husband and Father may drag out a wretched domestic existence yes for another twenty years. But the Man is dead, hopelessly dead. Julius Cæsar himself's not more utterly defunct. That girl has extinguished him."

"Are there any children, then!" one of the chosen circle put in casually.

"Children! No. There was a child born just after old Mrs. Meysey's death, I believe; but it died, and left the mother a poor wreck, her own miserable faded photograph. She was a nice little girl enough, in her small way, when she was here in town; amusing and sprightly; but the Bard has done for her, as she's done for the Bard. The fact is, this is a case of incompatibility of disposition. You can't stop three days at Whitestrand without feeling there's a skeleton in the house somewhere!"

The skeleton in the house, long carefully confined to its native cupboard, had indeed begun to perambulate the Hall in open daylight during the brief period of Hatherley's visit. He reached the newly remodelled home just in time to dress for dinner. When he descended to the ill-lighted drawing-room, five minutes late—Whitestrand could boast no native gas supply, and candles are expensive—he gave his arm with a sense of solemn obligation to poor dark-clad Winifred. Mrs. Massinger was indeed altered—sadly altered. Three painful losses in quick succession had told upon that slender pale young wife. She snowed her paleness in her deep black dress: colours suited Winifred: in mourning, she was hardly even pretty. The little "arrangement in pink and white" had faded almost into white alone: the pinkness had proved a fleeting pigment: she was not warranted fast colours. But Hatherly did his best with innate gallantry not to notice the change. Fresh from town, crammed with the last good things of the Cheyne Row and Mrs. Bouverie Barton's Wednesday evenings, he tried hard with conscientious efforts to keep the conversation from flagging visibly. At first he succeeded with creditable skill; and Hugh, looking across at his wife with a curious smile, said in a tone of genuine pleasure: "How delightful it is, after all, Winnie, to get a hold of somebody, direct from the real live world of London, in the midst of our fossilised antediluvian Whitestrand society! I declare, Hatherley, it does one's heart good, like champagne, to listen to you. A breath of Bohemia blows across Suffolk the moment you arrive. Poor drowsy, somnolent, petrified Suffolk! "Silly Suffolk," even the aborigines themselves call it. It's catching, too. I'm almost beginning to fall asleep myself, by force of example."

At the words, Winifred fired up in defence of her native country. "I'm sure, Hugh," she said with some asperity, "I don't know why you're always trying to run down Suffolk! If you didn't like us, you should have avoided the shire; you should have carried your respected presence elsewhere. Suffolk never invited you to honour it with your suffrages. You came and settled here of your own free will. And who could be nicer or more cultivated, if it comes to that, than some of our Suffolk aborigines, as you call them? Dear old Mrs. Walpole at the vicarage, for example."

Hugh balanced an olive on the end of his fork. "An amiable old Hecuba," he answered provokingly. "What's Hecuba to me, or I to Hecuba? Her latest dates are about the period of the seige of Troy, or, to be more precisely accurate, the year 1850.—My dear Hatherley, when you come down, I feel like a man who has breathed fresh air on some high mountain—stimulated and invigorated. You palpitate with actuality. Down here, we stagnate in the seventeenth century."

Winifred bit her lip with vexation, but said nothing. It was evident the subject was an unpleasant one to her. But she at least would not trot out the skeleton

Next morning Hugh showed Hatherley round the Whitestrand estate. Hatherley himself was not, to say the truth, in the best of humours. Mrs Massinger was dull and not what she used to be: she obviously resented his bright London gossip, as throwing into stronger and clearer relief the innate stupidity of her ancestral Suffolk. The breakfast was bad; the coffee sloppy; and the dishes suggested too obvious reminiscences of the joints and entrees at last night's dinner. Clearly, the Massingers were struggling hard to keep up appearances on an insufficient income. They were stretching their means much too thin. The Morris drawing room was all very well in its way, of course; but tulip pattern curtains and De Morgan pottery don't quite make up for a rechauffe of kidneys. Hatherly was an epicure, like most club-bred men, and his converse for the day took a colour from the breakfast table for good or for evil. So he started out that morning in a dormant ill-humour, prepared to tease and "draw" Massinger, who had had the bad taste to desert Bohemia for dull respectability and ill-paid Squiredom in the wilds of Suffolk.

Hugh showed him first the region of the sandhills. The sandhills were a decent bit to begin with. "Æolian sands!" Hatherley murmured contemplatively as Hugh mentioned the name. "How very pretty! How very poetical! You can hardly regret it yourself, Massinger, this overwhelming of your salt marshes by the shifting sands, when you reflect at leisure it was really done by anything with so sweet an epithet as Æolian."

"I thought so once," Hugh answered dryly, with obvious distaste, "when it was the property of my late respected father-in-law. But circumstances alter cases, you know, as somebody once remarked with luminous platitude; and since I came into the estate myself, to tell you the truth, I can't forgive the beastly sands, even though they happen to be called Æolian."

They walked along in silence for a while, each absorbed in his own thoughts—Hatherley ruminating upon this melancholy spectacle of a degenerate son of dear old Cheyne Row gone wrong for ever: Massinger reflecting in his own mind upon the closer insight into the facts of life which property, with its cares and responsibilities, gives one—when he suddenly halted with a short sharp whistle at a turn of the path. "Whew!" he cried; "why, what the dickens is this? The poplar's disappeared—at least, its place, I mean."

"Ah, yes! Mrs. Massinger told me all about that unlucky poplar when you were gone last night," Hatherly answered cheerfully. "The only good object in the view, she said—and I can easily believe her, to judge by the remainder. It got struck by lightning one stormy night, and disappeared then and there entirely!"

"This is strange—very strange!" Hugh went on to himself, never heeding the babbling interruption. "The sand's collected on this side of late. There's a distinct hummock here, like the ones at Grimes's.—I wonder what on earth these waves and mound of sand can mean?—The wind's not going to attack this side of the river, too, is it?"

"Ah, Squoire," a man at work in the field put in, coming up to join them, and leaning upon his pitchfork—"ah 'm glad yo've come to see it yourself, maow. That's jest what it be. The sand's a-driftin'. Ah said to Tom, the night the thunderbolt took th' owd poplar—ah said: "Tom," says ah, 'that there poplar were the only bar as stopped the river an' the sand from shifting. It's shifted all along till it's reached the poplar; an nsow it'll shift an' shift an' shift till it gets to Lowestoft or mayhap to Norwich."—An' if yo'll look, Squoire, yo'll see for yourself—the river's acshally runnin' zackly where the tree had used to stand; an' the sand's a-driftin an' a-driftin', same as it allays drift down yonner at Grimes's. An' it's my belief it'll never stop till it's swallowed up the Hall and the whole o' Whitestrand."

Hugh Massinger gazed in silence at the spot where the Whitestrand poplar had once stood with an utter feeling of sinking helplessness taking possession at once of his heart and bosom. A single glance told him beyond doubt the man was right. The poplar had stood as the one frail barrier to the winds and waves of the German Ocean. He had burnt it down, by wile and guile, of deliberate intent, that night of the thunderstorm to get rid of the single mute witness to Elsie's suicide. And now, his Nemesis had worked itself out. The sea was advancing, inch by inch, with irresistible march, against doomed Whitestrand.

Inch by inch! Nay, yard by yard. Gaining across to the opposite bank, and roughly measuring the distance with his eye, Hugh saw the river had been diverted northward many feet since he last visited the site of the poplar. He always avoided that hateful spot; the very interval that had elapsed since his last visit enabled him all the better to guage at sight the distance the river had advanced meanwhile in its silent invasion.

"I must get an engineer to come down and see to this," he said shortly. "We must put up a breakwater ourselves, I suppose, since a supine administration refuses to help us. I wonder who's the proper man to go to for breakwaters? I'd wire to town to night, if I knew whom to wire to, and check the thing before it runs any farther."

"What's that Swinburne says?' Hatherly asked musingly. "I forget the exact run of the particular lines, but they occur somewhere in the Hymn to Proserpine:

Will ye bridle the deep sea with reins? will ye chasten
the high sea with rods?
Will ye take her to chain her with chains who is older than all, ye gods?

I don't expect, my dear boy, your engineer will do much for you. Man's but a pigmy before these natural powers. A breakwater's helpless against the ceaseless dashing of the eternal sea."

Hugh Massinger almost lost his temper—specially when he reflected with bitter self-abasement that those were the very lines he had quoted to Elsie—in his foolish pre-territorial days—about Mr. Meysey's sensible proposals for obtaining an injunction against the German Ocean. "Eternal sea! Eternal fiddlesticks!" he answered testily. "It's all very well for you to talk; but it's a matter of life and death to me.—We've got to build a breakwater, that's what it comes to. And a breakwater'll run into a pot of money."

"Pity the old tree ever got burnt down, anyhow, to begin with," Hatherley murmured low, endeavouring, now he had fairly drawn his man, to assume a sympathetic expression of countenance.

They walked back slowly to the Hall in silence, passing through the village out of pure habit. Hugh was evidently very much put out. Hatherley considered him even rude and bearish. A man should restrain himself before the faces of his guests. At the door, Hatherley strolled off round the garden walks and lit a cigar. Hugh went up to his own dressing room.

The rest Hatherley never knew; he only knew that at dinner that night Mrs. Massinger's eyes were red and sore with crying. For when Hugh reached his own room—that pretty little dressing room with the pomegranate wall paper and the pale blue Lahore hangings—he found Winifred fiddling at his private desk, a new black-walnut desk with endless drawers and niches and pigeonholes. A sudden something rose in his throat as he saw her fumbling at the doors of the cabinet. Where had she found that carefully guarded key?—Aha, he knew! That fellow Hatherley!—Hatherley had taken a cigar from his case as they went out for a stroll together that luckless morning; and instead of returning the case to its owner, had lain it down in his careless way on the study table. He always kept the key concealed in the case.—Winifred must accidentally have found it, and tried to worm out her husband's secrets.—He hated such meanness in other people. How much, he wondered, had she found out now after all for her trouble?

Ah!

They both cried out in one voice together; for Winifred had opened a pigeon-hole box with the special key, and was looking intently with rigid eyes at—a small gold watch and a bundle of letters.

With a wild dart forward, Hugh tore them from her grasp and crunched them in his hand; but not before Winifred had seen two things: first, that the watch was a counterpart of her own—the very watch Hugh had given to Elsie Challoner; second, that the letters were in a familiar hand—no other hand than Elsie Challoner's.

She fronted him long with a pale cold face. Hugh took the watch and letters before her very eyes, and locked them up again in their pigeon-hole, angrily. "So this is how you play the spy upon me!" he cried at last with supreme contempt in his voice and manner.

But Winifred simply answered nothing. She burst into a fierce wild flood of tears. "I knew it!" she moaned in an agony of slighted affection. "I knew it! I knew it!"

So, after all, in spite of her flight and her pretended coolness, Elsie was corresponding still with her husband! Cruel, cruel Elsie! Yet why had she given him back his watch again? That was more than Winifred could ever explain in her simple philosophy. She could only cry and cry her eyes out.

CHAPTER XXXI.—COMING ROUND.

When Warren Relf steered back his barque to San Remo and Elsie that next autumn, he had not yet exactly been "boomed," as Edie had predicted; but his artistic or rather his business prospects had improved considerably through the intervening summer. Hatherley's persistent friendly notices of his work in the "Charing Cross Review," and Mitchison's constant flow of rhapsodies about his "charming 'morbidezza'" in West-end drawing-rooms, had begun to bring his scapieces at last more prominently into notice. The skipper of the Mud-Turtle had gone up one. It was the mode to speak of him now in artistic coteries, no longer as a melancholy instance of well-meaning failure, but as a young man of rising though misunderstood talent. His knowledge of "values" was allowed to be profound. To be sure, he didn't yet sell; but it was understood in astute buying circles that people who could pick up an early Relf dirt cheap and were prepared to hang on long enough to their purchase, would be sure in the end to see the colour of their money.

That winter at San Remo was the happiest Warren had yet passed there; for he began to perceive that Elsie was relenting, In a timid, tremulous, shamefaced, unacknowledged sort of way, she was learning little by little to love him. She would not confess it at first, even to herself. Elsie was too much of a woman to admit in the intimacy of her own heart, far less in the ear of any outside confidante, that having once loved Hugh she could now veer round and love Warren. The sense of personal consistency runs deep in woman. They can't bear to turn their dead selves, even though it be in order to rise to higher and ever higher plans of affection and devotion. Still, in spite of everything, Elsie Challoner grew by degrees dimly aware that she did actually love the quiet young marine painter. She had a hard struggle with herself, to be sure, before she could quite recognize the fact; but she recognized it at last, and in her own heart frankly admitted it. Warren was not indeed externally brilliant and vivid, like Hugh; he didn't sparkle with epigram and repartee. But while Hugh scintillated, Warren Relf's nature burned rather with a clear and steady flame. It was easy enough for anybody to admire Hugh; his strong points glittered in the eye of day; only those who dip a little below the surface ever reached the profounder depths of good and beauty that lay hid in such a mind as Warren's. Yet Elsie felt in her own soul it was a truer thing after all to love Warren than to love Hugh; a greater triumph to have won Warren's deep and earnest regard than to have impressed Hugh's fancy once with a selfish passion. She felt all that; but being a woman, of course she never acknowledged it. She went on fighting hard against her own heart, on behalf of the old dead worse love, and to the detriment of the new and living better one; and all the while she pretended to herself she was thereby displaying her profound affection and her noble consistency. She must never marry Warren, whom she truly loved, and who truly loved her, for the sake of that Hugh who had never loved her, and whom she herself could never have loved had she only known him as he really was in all his mean and selfish inner nature. That may be foolish, but it's intensely womanly. We must take women as they really are. They were made so at first, and all our philosophy will never mend it.

She couldn't endure that any one should imagine she had forgotten her love and her sorrow for Hugh. She couldn't endure, after her experience with Hugh, that any man should take her, thus helpless and penniless. If she'd been an heiress like Winifred, now, things might perhaps have been a little different; but to burden his struggling life still further, when she knew how little his art brought him, and how much he longed to earn an income for his mother and Edie to retire upon—that she couldn't bear to face for a moment, She would dimiss the subject; she would make him feel she could never be his; it was only tantalising poor kind-hearted Warren to keep him dangling about any longer.

"Elsie," he said to her one day on the hills, as they strolled together, by olive and pinewood, among the asphodels and anemones, "I had another letter from London this morning. The market's looking up. Benson has sold the 'Rade de Villefranche.'"

"I'm so glad, Warren," Elsie answered warmly. "It's a sweet picture—one of your loveliest. Did you get a good price for it?"

"Forty guineas. That's not so bad as prices go. So I'm going to buy Edie that new dinner dress you and I were talking about. I know you won't mind running over to Mentone and choosing some nice stuff at the draper's there for me. Things are looking up. There's no doubt I'm rising in the English market. My current quotations improve daily. Benson says he sold that bit to a rich American. Americans, if you can once manage to catch them, are capital customers—'patrons,' I suppose, one ought to say; but I decline to be patronised by a rich American. I think 'customer,' after all, a much truer and sincerer word—ten thousand times as manly and independent."

"So I think too. I hate Patronage. It savours of flunkeydom; betrays the toadyism of fashionable art—the 'Portrait-of-a Gentleman' style of painting.—But oh, Warren, I'm so sorry the Rade's to be transported to America. It's such a graceful, delicate, dainty little picture. I quite loved it. To me that seems the most terrible part of all an artist's trials and troubles. After you've learned to know and to love it tenderly—after it's become to you something like your own child—an off spring of your inmost and deepest nature—you sell it away for prompt cash, to a rich American, who'll hang it up in his brand-new drawing-room at St Louis or Chicago between two horrid daubs by fashionable London or Paris painters, and who'll say to his friends with a smile after dinner: 'Yes, that's a pretty little thing enough in its way, that tiny sea-piece there. I gave forty guineas in England for that; it's by Relf of London.—But observe this splendid 'Cleopatra' over here, just above the sideboard; she's a real So-and-so'—torture itself will not induce the present chronicler to name the particular painter of fashionable nudities whom Elsie thus pilloried on the scaffold of her high disdain—'I paid for that, sir, a cool twenty thousand dollars!'"

Warren smiled a smile of thrilling pleasure, and investigated his boots with shy timidity. Such sympathy from her outweighed a round dozen of American purchasers. "Thank you, Elsie," he said simply. "That's quite true. I've felt it myself.—But still, in the end, all good work, if it's really good, will appeal somehow, at some time, to somebody, somewhere. I confess I often envy authors in that. Their finished work is impressed upon a thousand copies, and scattered broadcast over all the world. Sooner or later it's pretty sure to meet the eyes of most among those who are capable of appreciating it.—But a painting is a much more monopolist product. If the wrong man happens at first to buy it and to carry it into the wholly wrong society, the painter may feel for the moment his work is lost, and his time thrown away, so far as any direct appreciation or loving sympathy with his idea is concerned.—Still, Elsie, it gets its reward in due time. When we're all dead and gone, some soul will look upon the picture and be glad. And it's a great thing to have sold the Rade, anyway, because of the dear old Mater and Edie.—I'm able to do a great deal more for them now; I hope I shall soon be in a position to keep them comfortable.—And do you know, somehow, these last few years—I'm ashamed to say it, but it's the fact none the less—I've begun to feel a sort of nascent desire to be successful, Elsie."

Elsie dropped her voice a tone lower "I'm sorry for that, Warren," she answered shyly.

"Why so?"

Elsie dissimulated. "Because one of the things I most admired about you when I first knew you was your sturdy desire to do good work for its own sake, and to leave success to take care of itself in the dim background."

"But, Elsie, I've many more reasons now to wish for success.—You know why—I've never told you, but I begin to hope—I've ventured to hope the last few months—I know it's presumptuous of me, but still I hope—that when I can earn enough to make a wife happy"——

Elsie stopped dead short at once on the narrow path that wound in and out among the clambering pine-woods, and fronting him full, with her parasol planted firmly on the ground, cut him off in a desperately resolute tone: "Warren, if I wouldn't marry you unsuccessful, you may be quite sure success at anyrate would never, never induce me to marry you."

It was the first time in all her life she had said a single word about marriage before him, and Warren therefore at once accepted it, paradoxically but rightly, as a good omen. "Then you love me, Elsie?" he cried, all trembling.

Elsie's heart fluttered with painful tremors. "Don't ask me, Warren, she murmured, thrillingly. "Don't make me say so. Don't worm it out of me!—Dear Warren, you know I like you dearly. I feel and have always felt towards you like a sister. After all I've suffered, don't torture me more.—I can never, never, never marry you?'

"But you do love me, Elsie?"

Elsie's eyes fell irresolute to the ground. It was a hard fight between love and pride. But Warren's pleading face conquered in the end. "I do love you, Warren," she answered simply.

"Then I don't mind the rest," Warren cried with a joyous burst, seizing her hand in his. "If you love me, Elsie, I can wait forever. Success or no success, marriage or no marriage, I can wait for ever. I only want to know you love me."

"You will have to wait for ever," Elsie answered low. "You have made me say the word, and in spite of myself I have said it. I love you, Warren, but I can never, never marry you!"

"And I say," Edie Relf remarked with much incisiveness, when Elsie told her bit by bit the whole story that same evening at the Villa Rossa, "that you trested him very shabbily indeed, and that Warren's a great deal too good and kind and sweet to you. Some girls don't know when they're well off. Warren's a brick—that's what I call him."

"That's what I call him too," Elsie answered half tearful. "At least I would, if brick was a word ever applied to anybody anywhere. But still—I can never marry him!"

"Thank goodness," Edie said, with a jerk of her head, "I wasn't born romantic and hysterical. Whenever any nice good fellow that I can really like swims into my ken and asks me to marry him—which unfortunately none of the nice good fellows of my acquaintance show the least inclination at present to do—I shall answer him promptly, like a bird—Arthur, or Thomas, or Guy, or Walter, or Reginald, or whatever else his nice good name may happen to be—Mr. Hatherley's is Arthur—and proceed to make him happy for ever. But some people seem to prefer tantalising them. For my own part, my dear, I've a distinct preference for making men happy whenever possible. I was born to make a good man happy, and I'd make him happy with the greatest pleasure in life, if only the good man would recognise my abilities for the production of happiness, and give me the desired opportunity for translating my benevolent wishes towards him into actual practice. But good men are painfully scarce nowadays. They don't swarm. They retire bashfully. Very few of them seem to float by accident in their gay shallops toward the port of San Remo."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

WIT AND WISDOM.

Pastor—"Thomas! Don't you think your parents would feel very sore if they knew you were fishing on the Sabbath?' Thomas "Yes, sir; but not half as sore as I'd feel if they found it out."

Putting it delicately—"I hope you appreciate the fact, sir, that in marrying my daughter you marry a large-hearted generous girl." "I do, sir (with emotion); and I hope she inherits those qualities from her father."

Mamma (with much show of indignation)—"I have called you three times. I am very much annoyed." Charlie (who is fond of Bible stories)—"Well, the Lord called Samuel three times and He didn't get mad about it, did he?"

Myrtle—Florence, is that Fred Dumley's handwriting? Florence—Yes, dear I'm engaged to him, you know. Myrtle—Yes, I know it. I was engaged to him last summer. Florence—The dear boy, I wonder who will marry him, eventually.

Says an old Yale College man: "I never knew whether to attach any significance to it or not, but when I was in college the law school adjoined the jail, the medical college was next the cemetery and the divinity school was on the road to the poor house."

Thrifty mother—"Ellen, why will you persist in eating the soft part of your bread and leaving the crusts under the edge of your plate? Some day you may be glad to get even crusts to eat." Thoughtful daughter—"Yes, mother, that's what I'm saving them for."

Dinguss—"Shadbolt, can you spare five dollars?" Shadbolt—"Certainly, Dinguss; here it is." Dinguss—"Thanks; I'll just give you my note for the amount." Shadbolt (who knows him)—"No use wasting paper, Dinguss. I told you I could spare the five dollars."

There is truth in the remark that a bag, if empty, hangs loosely by its string, but the more there is put in it the closer is the mouth drawn and the harder it is to get anything out. So, often, as men have more means to give, is it more difficult to obtain money from them.

"I notice in the paper," said Mrs. Barracks, pouring out Mr. Barracks' coffee, "that a Brooklyn clergyman says that women should be permitted to whistle." "Yes," retorted Mr. Barracks, agreeably. "He is right. We should surely not deny to woman a privilege we accord to tug boats and locomotives."

One day a small boy was urging his grandpa to sing, contrary to the wishes of the old gentleman, who did not know one note from another. The entreaties of the child finally induced him to try, and his efforts after a few strains were rewarded by the following—"Grandpa, I guess you had better talk it."

"Every rose has its thorn, you know, Mr. Willbe," remarked Miss Everglade, as she refused him after a year's courtship. "I know," was the stricken man's reply; "but roses don't eat caramels, go to the theatre and wear jewellery, and I think I'll make my next venture after about twenty years' meditation."

Scenes in a Spanish City.

The antiquities of Toledo are not the only interesting things. The sights from day to day on the streets and in the family circle are peculiar. The very children have queer sports. One of their favorite pastimes is to parade in a dark hall with slow step and drone a chant in imitation of a church festival service. Boys are also fond of playing bull fights, "the bull" part being taken by some lad not distressed by rough handling. Owing to the narrow streets, everything seems mixed up together—wine shops, vegetables, children, citizens, cadets, loafers and beggars mingling in one mass.

The people generally are simple and good natured. The chief street is shaded by awnings, and every public doorway is screened by a striped curtain. Foreigners visiting the town are dubbed the "Strangers," and so referred to on every occasion when designation is necessary. The leading place of amusement is called the "Grand Summer theatre." It is within the ragged walls of a once grand building, now half torn down. It is quite a common thing in the evening to hear guitar duets in the narrow, dark streets, being given as serenades to ladies in the house before which the playing is done.

The skill displayed by some of the players is marvelous, and the music is delightful. The treble is carried on a small instrument called a "mandura" that makes a most pleasing combination with the guitar. Often professional players are hired to go and play before a house, and will thrum out native airs for several hours, smoking cigarettes assiduously all the while.

A Lesson to Learn.

There are other things besides speech in the pursuit of which men, once fairly launched, often do not know when or how to stop. A man begins business with every promise of good success. He has energy and judgment to start with, and perseverance to overcome the obstacles which may meet him. His ventures are successful, his employes are faithful, his future looks bright. All would be well did he but know just when or where to stop, or, knowing this, did he have the resolution to enforce it upon himself. But he presumes upon his past good fortune, continues to make ventures too long and too heavily, and failure overtakes him. Or he presumes on his physical strength, and does not take needed rest—his powers give way, and he is left a wreck. Not a business man alone, but men of every occupation, with energy and ambition, need to learn this lesson when to stop, if they would not make failures of their lives.

Very Muscular Christianity.

The seamy side of the English Establishment is revealed in an advertisement which recently appeared in the London "Times," and which read as follows:—"To Noblemen and others.—A young clergyman, fond of riding, driving, shooting, hunting, cricket, and all out-door sports, would be glad to hear of a good living. Address, Ivanhoe, 147 Chancery Lane, W. C."—[New York Tribune.

AGRICULTURAL.

OFFICIAL GRADES OF GRAIN.

At a meeting last week of the committee on grain at a New-York Produce Exchange the following official grades of grain were established:

Winter Wheat.

Extra white winter wheat shall be bright, sound, dry, plump and well cleaned.

No. 1 white winter wheat shall be sound, dry and reasonably clean.

No. 2. white winter wheat shall consist of sound white winter wheat unfit to grade No. 1.

No. 3 white winter wheat shall consist of sound white winter wheat unfit to grade No. 2.

No. 1 red winter wheat shall be sound, dry, long berried and well cleaned.

No. 2 red winter wheat shall be sound, dry and reasonably clean, weighing not less than 58½ lbs., Winchester standard, and shall not contain more than 10 per cent white wheat.

No. 2 red winter wheat shall consist of sound winter wheat unfit to grade No. 2.

Extra red winter wheat shall be sound, dry and clean, weighing not less than 59½ lbs. to the measured bushel, Winchester standard.

No. 4 winter wheat shall include all sound winter wheat unfit to grade No. 3 red.

Mixed winter wheats shall be all white and red wheat mixed, and shall be equal to No. 2 red in all other respects.

[NOTE.—No. 1 red and No. 2 red wheats that grade steamer shall be graded steamer No. 2 red.]

Oats.

Extra white oats shall be bright, sound, reasonably clean and free from other grain, weighing not less than 32 lbs. to the measured bushel.

No. 1 white oats shall be bright, sound and reasonably clean and free from other grain, weighing not less than 31 lbs. to the measured bushels.

No. 2. white oats shall be seven-eights white and equal to No. 2 oats in other respects, weighing not less than 28 lbs. to the measured bushel.

No. 3 white oats shall be mainly white, reasonably sound, reasonably clean and reasonably free from other grain, weighing not less than 25 lbs. to the measured bushel.

No. 1 oats shall be bright, sound, reasonably clean and reasonably free from other grain, weighing not less than 31 lbs. to the measured bushel.

No. 2 oats shall be reasonably sound, reasonably clean and reasonably free from other grain, weighing 28 lbs, and over to the measured bushel.

No. 3 oats—all merchantable oats unfit for any of the above grades, shall be graded No. 3.

Rejected oats—all oats damp, unsound, dirty or for any other cause unfit for No. 3, shall be graded rejected.

SOILS.

The soil is that portion of the earth's surface that contains a mixture of animal, vegetable and mineral substances in such proportions as adapts it to the support of vegetation. The common standard divides these into nine different kinds. Six of these have reference to the amount of sand or clay which they contain, and the other three to the amount of lime which they contain, although nearly or quite all soils contain more or less lime.

Some soils retain moisture much better than others. Some contain a larger per cent of available plant food than others, and some contain the materials necessary to secure a good growth of one class of plants and some of others.

Before selecting a farm, the kind of crops intended to be grown should always be determined, and so far as possible a variety of soil selected that is best adapted to grow the desired crops.

The classification commences at pure clay of which there is but a small amount compared to soils that contain no more than ten per cent of pure clay. A clay loam, a loamy soil, and a sandy loam are the three most generally found, and they may include to a more or less extent the last three, viz: marly soils, calcareous soils and vegetable molds.

A clay soil is usually wet and cold; is more largely benefited by under-draining, by fall plowing, and needs frequent stirring to keep in a loose or mellow condition. It is generally heavier to plow and cultivate, and requires more work to get into good tilth. A sandy soil, on the other hand, dies out rapidly, and is usually easily worked into good tilth, and is greatly benefited by dragging or rolling to make more compact.

The best treatment for clay soil would be the reverse of a sandy soil, and to a considerable extent plants or varieties of crops that thrive best in the one will not grow so well in the other. Soils undergo more or less changes, and can be changed to a more or less extent by the application of different materials. Ashes, lime, sand and other materials can be readily applied in sufficient quantities to make a material change in the character of a soil.

It is the difference in the character of the soil that makes different treatment necessary.

DIGGING AND STORING ROOTS.

Roots should not be topped too soon after digging. The tops should be given a few hours to wilt, after which the juices will have become more solidified. If topped at once, before they have time to prepare for the change, there will be more or less bleeding from the portions cut, to the detriment of the roots.

After being topped, they should not be long exposed to the sun and wind. They should be piled in heaps of ten or twelve bushels, and covered with coarse wild grass or some such material that will exclude rain, but still allow the sweating process to go on unimpeded.

They need not be removed from these temporary pits until quite late in autumn, when heavy freezing begins. Their final housing can thus be done at a time of leisure, or after the rush of the other work is over.

Roots are easily kept in pits through the entire winter. A long, narrow pit or trench may be dug, large enough to contain the amount to be stored, and this filled in sections of three or four feet in length, with walls of earth a foot or so in thickness, between the sections. When so arranged, a section may be taken out at any time without disturbing the rest. The top covering should be alternate layers of straw and earth, and should extend several feet over the sides of the trench to prevent freezing from underneath.

THE RAIL ON A SUMMER FALLOW.

I kept a summer fallow free from weeds, destroying a heavy crop of thistles and Couch grass this season with one plowing in June and one in September. Before I could turn the plows into it in the spring the weeds and grass had formed a heavy crop at least 15 inches high. They were turned under by fastening a chain to the plow beam. I harrowed and then allowed it to stand until the second crop of weeds began to show up. It was then worked with the steel rail to or three times during the summer, and the young weeds torn up by the roots, fell back over the rail and withered in a short time in the hot sun. The result is a thoroughly clean field this fall with the least possible outlay of time and labor. I have had very little experience in agricultural operations, and my experiments with a steel rail may contain nothing novel or instructive to readers. But as far as I can ascertain I am the first in this district at least to utilize railway iron for cultivating the soil, and my new way of working my fields has excited some comment among older farmers, sometimes not quite complimentary to myself.

A VALUABLE AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT.

It occurred to me last spring that a steel rail would be an efficient implement to spread manure, and I borrowed one from the Canada Atlantic R. R. Co. with which to make the experiment. The manure, a large proportion of it night soil, had been deposited on a four acre field. I hitched two heavy teams to the rail, about four feet from each end, and started them, taking a sweep of 30 feet each time. It worked admirably. The field was level, and after going over it four times with the rail, which was done more quickly than once with the harrow, I had the satisfaction of seeing the manure not only evenly spread but well incorporated with the surface soil. In half a day, with two men and two teams, I had spread as much manure as 20 men could have done in the same time with forks and shovels.

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

A window facing south in the poultry house this winter will pay in increased eggs.

From a careful experiment of a Massachusetts farmer, it is shown that the manure from eight hens in one year is as valuable as that from a cow during the same time.

The present average rate of monthly wages for farm labor in the United States, according to the department of agriculture, is $18 24 without board and $12 35 with board.

One reason that there are so many mortgaged farms is because so many farmers sell corn, oats, and hay early, and then have to buy the same class of articles before the next crop is raised.

It often happens that autumn is the best time to apply manure to fruit trees. The soluble portions of the manure sink into the soil during the months before the commencement of growth in the spring.

Fowls that are confined to yards and kept warm in cold weather will give better results the entire year than when they are allowed to roam at will, sensibly remarks an experienced poultry keeper. The hens that have free range will sometimes lay more eggs in summer than will those that are confined; but the hens that are properly cared for during the c

WANTED.—5,000 men, women and children to buy Xmas goods at Price's.

A COURT OF REVISION on the voters' list is to be held in Dutton on Thursday, 29th. See advt. in this issue.

C. W. ALLEN, of the Dutton Iron Works was called to Rodney on Tuesday to repair some mill machinery.

MR. HOLLINGSHEAD is shipping this week one carload of bran and two of shorts to Ottawa and four carloads of flour to Halifax.

MESSRS. HUMPIDGE & GRAHAM shipped a carload of staves to Simcoe and one to Welland this week. They cannot get G. T. R. cars as fast as wanted.

THE tendency in the wheat market is downward, as flour in the east has dropped over 25 cents a barrel in a few days.

THE ladies of the Presbyterian church will give a corn feast in Leitch's hall on this Thursday evening. The menu will consist of corn served in all its forms.

A. N. C. BLACK has been appointed clerk of the Fourth Division Court, and the initiatory work is going on. He expects to be installed and to take charge next week.

IT is expected that W. G. Urlin will receive his stock of groceries in a few days, which he will open out in the Brown block. He will occupy the residence opposite the Baptist church, belonging to James Smith.

THE Methodist church of Wallacetown will hold a Thanksgiving service and give a social in connection with the church this Thursday evening. We understand that it is the intention to carry passengers from Dutton free.

WM. EVANS, of London, father of Wm. Evans, baker, of Dutton, died at the residence of one of his sons, near Wardsville, on Tuesday, last week. The remains were interred at London on Thursday. Deceased was 64 years of age and leaves a grown-up family.

THOSE of our subscribers who receive the ENTERPRISE in single wrappers will please notice the label which marks the date to which their subscription is paid. To those we do not send receipts, unless specially requested, as the date on the label is always changed.

THE London Evening Times became defunct on Saturday. The paper was started by Paul & Harris and had only been running eleven weeks. Cause of death, poor circulation. The principal mourners are the reporters and typesetters, whose wages have not been paid for several weeks.

MR. GOLDIE, tax collector, has nearly completed his rounds, and now he gives notice that he will be in Dutton on the days of the two next council meetings, i.e., on the 26th inst. and the 17th prox., to receive taxes, and all unpaid after that date will be collected with costs. Those of us who have not yet received our bills may expect a call from him soon.

THE GLOBE CHRISTMAS NUMBER.—With new type, new press, the finest quality of paper, the best workmen, the most finished literary work and the most perfect illustrations, the Christmas number of the Globe may well be looked forward to as the best and handsomest holiday paper ever issued in Canada. The issue of this grand publication will be one of the chief features of the holiday season in Canada this year. It is a noteworthy fact, as showing the enterprise with which the work is conducted, that with every paper which costs but twenty-five cents and is worth far more, there will be given three fine colored plates, and one of them a faithful reproduction of a painting by Mr. L. R. O'Brien, the famous Canadian landscape painter. The Globe does wisely in placing this number before its readers so early, as it will be a valuable souvenir to send to friends at a distance. Orders may be sent to the Globe direct or placed with any news agent. Place orders early as there is certain to be a tremendous demand and the edition is limited.

MR. CARTER, butcher, has been sick for a few days and has given up business in Dutton. He has sold out to M. McNulty, who will commence business in the same shop. Mr. McNulty is well known in this section and will likely receive a good share of the patronage.

THE week of self-denial amongst the Salvationists throughout the world began on Monday. Dutton corps are holding a service in the morning and at noon of each day as well as the evening services. The money raised this week will be used to carry on Army work in Germany.

JOHNSON CLARK, a tramp shoemaker, was arrested on Tuesday evening and placed in the "Fox Hole" by Constable McRae. He was brought before Squire Leitch on Wednesday morning and was fined one dollar and costs, but on pleading that he had no money, he was allowed to go, on promising to leave the place.

IT is reported that Mr. McIntyre, principal of Rodney public school, has secured second position in the new high school at Glencoe, which is to be opened at New Years. The loss of Mr. McIntyre is much regretted as he is an excellent teacher, and Glencoe is to be congratulated in securing such a teacher for their new school.

AN old man, very much addicted to drink, who has been working for Mr. McCallum, shoemaker, became very abusive to his employer on Tuesday evening, threatening to cut his throat and perform various other surgical operations. Constable McRae was sent for, and with the assistance of James Muirison, jr., he was taken to the lock-up.

THE Rural Canadian is a valuable agricultural journal and should be in every house. It is one dollar per year. See our clubbing rates.

C. DOYLE, our tonsorial artist, started for a drive eastward, on Wednesday afternoon with Miss McMillan, sister of Mrs. Campbell, in company. They purposed calling on the Rev. Mr. Sutherland in Fingal to have the nuptial ceremony performed, so they twain may be made one. They will be away two days, and have the congratulations of the ENTERPRISE.

AT the conclusion of the division court, Dutton, Thursday, a discussion took place in an hotel regarding the case of Cusack vs. Graham, and Cusack passed a remark insinuating that the defendant had not told exactly the truth. Defendant's brother vigorously resented the insult, and got in a couple of retaliations on Cusack's head and face before they were separated.

ALL papers furnished at the ENTERPRISE Office. If you desire one that is not in our list, call and ask for it.

CHRISTMAS Cards and all foreign Christmas Papers are completely put in the shade in Canada this year by the publication of the grandest Christmas Paper ever published. Those who know, say the Christmas Number of The Montreal Star will take the public completely by storm. For sending away to friends and to preserve at home it will be the most taking thing ever seen in this country or in Europe either.

THE house of Mr. T. Hockin was entered last Friday afternoon. Mrs. Hockin had been up town for about an hour, and on returning found that some individual had entered by the back door, which was fastened with an ordinary lock, and abstracted a pocket-book, containing about two dollars in change, from the cupboard drawer, also a few chestnuts. The thief then proceeded to their private bedroom and picked two rings from the jewel case, leaving the gold watch, locket and chain. Suspicion rests upon a female as the tracks about showed.

What the People Want to Know.

Who will be reeve?

Who will contest the wards?

Who will compose the next council?

Who is the next couple to jump the broom-stick?

Whether the church troubles will soon be ended?

Whether an assessor is eligible for election as councilior?

Whether Dutton is going to have better train accommodation?

Whether the villagers of Dutton will always have to go to the four corners of the township to vote?

Whether the sidewalk on Shackleton street is going to be repaired this fall, or be left through the winter and probably throw the municipaltity in for $500 or $1,000 for a broken leg?

Replies are in order.

DIVISION COURT.

Fourth Division Court was held in Dutton on Thursday last, His Honor Judge Hughes presiding

Cusack vs. Graham.—Mr. Richard Cusack, cattle dealer, St. Thomas, sued Mr. Duncan Graham, farmer, Dunwich, to recover $15 deposit paid on ten head of cattle purchased, and for $20 damages for non-fulfilment of contract to deliver same. It appears that Mr. Cusack purchased, from the defendant, ten head of cattle at 4½ cents per pound and paid a deposit of $15 thereon, the cattle to be kept till August 10th. A week after the date the parties met and Mr. Graham asked for $100 more deposit, as Mr Cusack had not come for the cattle on the date fixed. Mr. Cusack ordered Mr. Graham to bring the cattle to Dutton on August 20th, which was not done, the animals being otherwise disposed of. The case was tried before a jury, who gave a verdict for amount claimed. D. J. Donahue for plaintiff, J. M. Glenn for defeadant.

Monson vs. Worthington.—Wm. Monson, tailor, Wallacetown, sued Mrs. Robert Worthington, to recover the price of a suit of clothes for a hired man named McBlain. The plaintiff claimed that Mrs. Worthington had come into his store with McBlain and agreed to become responsible for the clothes The judge held that a wife could not contract a special debt for which the husband would be responsible. McBlain was then made the defendant and a verdict given against him. E. McIntyre (Macdougall & Robertson) for plaintiff, H. Clay for Mrs. Worthington.

Ecker vs. Wellman.—An action to recover amount of wages claimed to be due by plaintiff Verdict for plaintiff. H. Clay for plaintiff.

Paterson vs. Wellman.—Suit to recover amount of grocery bill incurred by defendant. Verdict for plaintiff. J. M. Glenn for plaintiff, J. Kains for defendant.

The case of Carter vs. Newel was adjourned to Bismarck in January. J. M. Glenn for plaintiff.

BORN.

JOHNSON.—Near Dutton, on November 2, the wife of J. Johnson of a son.

MITTON.—In Dutton, on Nov. 13, the wife of W. J. Mitton of a daughter.

DIED.

MCKILLOP.—At Shedden, on November 9th, Alexander McKillop, father of Dr. McKillop of this village, aged 73 years.

CURRIE.—In Dunwich, on 11th inst., Archibald Currie, son John Currie, aged 22 years.

Deceased was formely a student of the Dutton High school.

WANTED—NEW INDUSTRIES.

Can something be done to establish any new industries among us? "Watchman" is not in favor of bonusing persons to establish themselves amongst us, but is it not possible for our citizens to commence the establishment of industries that will amply repay them and be a great help to the village itself? Is there money in a flax mill in Dutton? Just a little from the village there is the large marsh we should think well adapted for the cultivation of flax, and if we had a mill in the village it would give considerable employment and bring considerable money into the village, and hence be a benefit to the entire community. Let our citizens be alert; lose no opportunity to advance the reputation of the village. Endeavor to make it as attractive as possible and secure for ourselves all the prosperity we can.

WATCHMAN.

AN OLD FAVORITE.

The Detroit Commercial Advertiser has just made some important additions to its old-time attractions that will make it doubly popular as the best family newspaper in the west.

Several famous writers are now contributing to its pages, among them being:

Bill Nye, the prince of humorists, whose mirth-provoking sketches are specially illustrated and warranted to make a man laugh even if he has a "bile" on his neck.

Blakely Hall, the most popular general writer on the New York press, is each week describing the lives of some of the naughty and prominent people of the world.

Shirley Dare, another New York journalist of renown, is writing a series of articles on the care and training of children. These are of great interest to fathers and mothers.

"Ouida," the world-famous novelist, is contributing a series of articles on various subjects, among them "Grotesque Dress of Men," "Artistic Dress of Women," "The Desecration of Biographies," etc.

Mrs. Fannie B. Ward, whose personal explorations in Central America and other out-of-the-way countries have made her famous, continues her interesting letters of travel; and other prominent writers will be secured from time to time.

In addition to these, many talented, if not so well known writers, contribute to the pages of the Detroit Commercial Advertiser from week to week, for all who have anything to say and can say it well are cordially welcomed by the editor.

A new serial began in the issue of November 15; its title, "Magdalen's Daughter," but faintly indicates the tragic story that tells of a life wrecked by the folly of a moment.

The department pages, "Hours at Home and "Farm Fixings," are well filled with matter of interest to the folks at home and the farmer and his boys. The news and editorial pages are well filled with timely notes and items, and a column of reliable market reports make the Detroit Commercial Advertiser of great value to the storekeeper and buyers generally.

Why You Feel
So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,
"The Life of the Body."
Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?
Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:
G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."
Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."
Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best
Spring and Family Medicine
in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how Ayer's Sarsaparilla
does sell." Prepared by
Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Price $1; six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

VALUABLE TO KNOW.

Consumption may be more easily prevented than cured. The irritating and harrassing cough will be greatly relieved by the use of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam that cures coughs, colds, bronchitis and all pulmonary troubles

Bells were rung and salvos of artillery fired in Copenhagen on November 15 in honor of the twenty fifth anniversary of King Christian's ascension to the throne.

CURED BY B.B.B. WHEN ALL ELSE FAILED.

Mr. Samuel Allan, of Lisle, Ont., states that he tried all the doctors in his locality while suffering for years with Liver and Kidney trouble; nothing benefited him until he took Burdock Blood Bitters, four bottles of which cured him.

IT COMES HIGH.—An estimate of the cost of the proceedings before the commission to enquire into the charges made by the London Times is $15 a minute during the sittings.

THE MODUS OPERANDI.

The mode of operating of Burdock Blood Bitters is that it acts at once and at the same time upon the Stomach, Liver, Bowels, Kidneys and the Blood, to cleanse, regulate and strengthen. Hence its almost universal value in all Chronic Complaints.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

Typographical errors make newspapers say very many curious things. They made our esteemed contemporary in its last issue say that the relatives of a deceased extended their "shanks" to the assisting friends. Somebody feels, probably, like extending his shanks to the extent of about four horse power to the proof reader, if there be one, of that sheet.—Eaton Rapids Journal.

A RARE COMBINATION.

There is no other remedy or combination of medicines that meets so many requirements, as does Burdock Blood Bitters in its wide range of power over such chronic diseases as Dyspepsia, Liver and Kidney Complaint, Scrofula and all humors of the blood.

No woman can be contented and happy if her skin is covered with pimples and blotches. These disfiguring eruptions are easily removed by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine is perfectly safe to take, and is a thoroughly reliable blood purifier.

Another accident has occurred on the Cornwall Canal. About 5 o'clock Saturday afternoon, while the barge Cleveland was entering through Gilles' lock the gates gave way, causing a stoppage to navigation. A force of men was put to work immediately to repair the damage and will be kept at it until it is completed.

A THANKSGIVING SUICIDE.—Thursday afternoon a man named John Aikey, Newmarket, after getting as drunk as the money he had would allow, deliberately mixed five grains of strychnine in whiskey, drank some and died. Drink and continuous quarrels with his wife were the causes of his suicide. He had no children. He recently served a term in Barrie jail for some petty crime.

The notorious "Dr." Griffin, formerly of London, says a Victoria, B.C. dispatch, who is wanted by the authorities of Los Angeles, Cal., for embezzlement, was arrested here charged with sending letters to Hon. R. Dunsmuir, threatening to kill him. His present wife, formerly Miss Lennox, of London, Ont., has been beaten by him lately. The other day he kicked her in the stomach, though the woman is enciente. When Evangelist Moody was here he professed conversion and spoke at their meetings, but Moody would have none of him.

STRUCK BY A TIDAL WAVE.—The Eturia, which arrived at New York, Sunday, experienced one of the worst passages in her history. On Tuesday last a tidal wave swept over the big steamer, and one man, a sailor, was killed, five more or less severely injured. The passengers were terribly shaken up. The sailors injured were on duty at the time the tidal wave struck the steamer, and like logs the brave sailors were jammed in a heap against the deckhouse. One was killed, the others injured. The wave washed the steamer fore and aft.

France and Italy Must Fight.

ROME, Nov. 12.—The Ezrcete Italiano (War Office organ), in an article on the relations between France and Italy, signed by the editor, a high authority in military matters, says: Both France and Italy with perfect good faith, protest that they do not intend to make an attack. Nevertheless, war is inevitable on the first occasion. France must sooner or later endeavor to burst the iron circle in which the unity of Germany and Italy has bound her. Let no one blame her for such an effort. Italy cannot do otherwise than continue in alliance with Germany because the success of the French arms, facilitated by Italian neutrality would soon be bitterly felt by Italy. After a victorious war with Germany war against Italy would be inevitable. Italian statesmen who have failed to recognize this would lead the country to destruction.

THE Bad Debt Collecting Agency, in big letters, has received a set-back. The Postmaster General has just issued orders to all postmasters in Canada that these letters are not to be transmitted through the mails in future, but sent to the dead letter office Ottawa. Now, if the Government could only do something that would prevent bad people contracting debts which they never intend to pay, the country would welcome the innovation with open arms.

The miracle of casting out devils was performed at the Salvation Army barracks on Saturday night. The unruly spirits in this case were printers' devils, who could not retain their hilarity, and were seized straightway by the Chief Bouncer and fired out of the synagogue.—Watford Guide-Advocate.

E. C. Lewis, proprietor of an hotel south of Essex Centre, was attacked by a man Friday night and badly beaten. The assailant evidently meant to murder Lewis, but hearing some one coming he fled before completing his work. Martin Wright, a citizen of the above burg, has been arrested charged with the crime.

Mr. J. G. Crosby, hardware merchant, Highgate, was startled the other evening by finding that the back wall of his store was bursting into flames. His coal oil barrels were contiguous and a big conflagration seemed to threaten. The villagers turned out on an alarm from the school bell and by superhuman exertions extinguished the flames.

MINUS BOTH WHIP AND COW.—A cow belonging to Mr. R. C. Lye, Haysville, got an apple stuck in its throat, so he thought he would push it down with a buggy whip, but the cow did not like to be treated in such a way, and gave a jerk, breaking about a foot of the whip in her throat, and as it was too far down to reach with his arms he had to kill the beast to get the piece out of her throat, and now he is minus both whip and cow.

On Monday Mr. O Kenney, of Otterville, was greatly surprised to learn that his wife had left her home, taking the two children and her clothes. Mr. K. at once concluded that there was a man in the case, and on making search he learned that his widowed brother-in-law, Mr. John Vener, had arranged to follow Mrs. K. and meet her in Montreal, from which place they were to ship to England. Mr. Kenney had him arrested and placed in the lockup. He was brought before J. P.'s Durkee and McFarlane on Tuesday, but he asked for an adjournment, and the trial was fixed for Thursday. Mr. V.'s trunks, which are said to contain Mrs. Kenny's clothes, are at the Norwich station, from which place he was to take the train.

THEY "PIED" THE TYPE.

There was a fracas in the Speaker office, London, Wednesday, of no small proportions. The management, it is said, is behind with the pay of the men considerably, and three of them entered the composing room and refused to let the foreman send two pages of type which were ready for press. A dispute followed, when the men seized the forms and "dumped" them on the floor, "pieing" all the type. They then left the building. The "pieing" of a form will temporarily cripple any establishment and it is therefore a very serious thing for the Speaker.

Bailiff Burns got into the Times office Tuesday while the bailiff on behalf of the bank was momentarily outside. He now has it thoroughly barricaded, and has a man to relieve him so that the building is always occupied. Fresh attachments have been issued by the builders and plumbers who have been left in the lurch. Mr. Johnston, who claims to have a manufacturers' lien, has not as yet produced the document, although he sold a press to the Free Press Co. They will not be allowed to remove it until the necessary authority is given.

AN old Indian, named Daniel Kennedy, aged 77 years, was found dead in the corn-field of John Lyle, Southwold, last Sabbath. It appears that three Indians, named Daniel Kennedy, William Nicholas and Cornelius Hill, were in St. Thomas last Friday and got on a spree. On the way home Kennedy and Hill went into Mr. Lyle's corn-field and laid against some corn-stalks, where deceased died, Nicholas having left them. On Saturday Hill left the dead man in the field and returned to the city, continuing on the spree. Kennedy and Nicholas had a drunken quarrel and Nicholas struck him, but it is supposed that he died from the effects of whiskey and exposure.

WHAT THE GOOSE BONE SAYS.

AN ELABORATE STUDY SHOWS THAT THERE IS GOING TO BE A HARD WINTER.

The foreshadowing of the approaching winter, as it is read from the dots and the lines on the goose bone, is not a cheerful story. The promise given forth of sleet, snow and cold, is a gloomy picture for the poor to look upon, and the many whose short purse will not permit them to lay in a bountiful supply of fuel will shiver at the thought of the kind of weather that the little bone foretells for the next four months. There will be more cold and wet weather than the people of this latitude have experienced for many a winter, and the cold spells will be longer and more severe than usual. The bone is dark at both ends, which indicates a long winter. Winter weather we will have in November, and the ice and snow will be familiar sights far along into March.

The goose from whose bone this study was taken was hatched in April, and killed after the ides of September. The bone is wonderfully marked, and the dotes and breves and lines mingle all along the keel, thus indicating very changeable weather, but the breves mostly turn down and are heavy, showing that the general character of the winter will be falling, cold weather. We may expect severe weather between the 20th and 26th of November, and at any time between this period blustering snows and unseasonably cold weather may be looked for.

The first danger period in December extends from the 1st to the 5th, after which there will probably be a few days of sunshiny weather. The heaviest storm period of the month centers in the Christmas holidays, beginning on the 18th and passing to the 27th. At the opening of the holidays we will have very foul and probably some of the coldest weather of the season, and these cold lines run along the bone until the middle of January. Watch this period, but above all prepare for it. It is more than probable that the earth will be covered with snow when Christmas dawns and that a cold north wind will be blowing, so that Christmas fires will have to be bright and big for comfort. The 24th and 25th of December will be the darkest storm days of the month. On the bone all the indications of wet, cold and stormy weather meet about that time. It is a curious clustering of bad signs, such as is seldom seen on the bone, and a mixture of weather may be looked for, with wet and cold predominating. During the long spell of bad weather some of the dots on the bone are very dark, which means very cold, and we need not look to see the mercury far away from zero during the holiday week.

The new year will come in cold and clear, with the first danger period commencing on the 4th. There are three storm periods in this month, the second commencing about the 14th and the last one about the 23rd of the month. The dots that appear on the bone up to the middle of the month are heavy, from about the 10th to the 15th especially so and during this period very cold weather may be looked for. During December and January the mercury will frequently be below zero, probably remaining there for days.

For February short storm periods run all along the bone, and the general character of the month will be stormy and blustering, with some very cold days at the first of the month and again at the close. These severe spells and continued cold weather will keep the ice and the snow in the mountains, and the first spring months will be as hoary as old winter. As the bone ends very dark, it is very probable that March will be a repetition of November. In that case the farmers will find it very difficult to break ground, and all kinds of vegetation will be very late in getting a start. It will not be safe to put things in the ground too soon, as such a winter will likely be followed by killing frosts far into April. The writer remembers to have seen only one other bone to compare with the one this year, and that season there were frosts as late as May. Every indication from the reading of the bone points to a backward spring.—Louisville Times.

Last week, while James Butler was trying to cut staves in McMackon's mill, Highgate, he had the points of two fingers cut off, which will lay him up for a while. Rather slim for a professional.

Luxuriant Hair
Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.
Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."
Ten Years Younger.
Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."
A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.
The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

Courtship in Kafirstan.

A frontier correspondent of the Civil and Military Gazette of Calcutta describes the courtship among the remote tribes of Kafirstan as follows:—A Kafir, having fixed his affections upon some female, acquaints his parents with his intentions. They apply to the girl's parents, and if the latter do not consent to the union a fight is inevitable. If the parties agree, the next proceeding is to appoint two expert female negotiators, who obtain access by stratagem to the house with the object of broaching the subject to the young lady. They carefully avoid any sudden or abrupt mention of the awful subject of their mission, but launch out in praises of the man who seeks her hand. They speak of his possessions, his courage and accomplishments. The girl, pretending to be affronted even at these remote hints, grows refractory and runs away, tearing the ringlets of her hair as she retires. The female ambassadors, having got the consent of the parents, drag her from her concealment and carry her by force to the house of her destined husband, and there leave her. She is compelled to remain here for several days, silent and dejected, refusing food, till at last, if kind entreaties do not prevail, she is made to submit by blows to the union. The Kafir who has the reputation of having committed a number of murders of Mahomedans enjoys exceptional privileges; he is respected by all the neighborhood, and experience little or no difficulty in procuring a wife. The Kafir woman is doomed to a life of toil and drudgery, and the husband can discard her whenever he feels so disposed.

Made Blind Through Vanity.

About a year ago one of the most lovely girls in the State lived at 40 Orange avenue, in Evansville. A pair of large liquid blue eyes set off a face that would put any picture to shame, and her form was simply perfect. The young lady was highly educated, and possessed all the qualities that go to make up a society belle. Her parents are well-to-do, and she has wanted for nothing since she was old enough to prattle. But she had one fault, and that fault has proved her undoing. It is called vanity. She fairly worshipped her own eyes, and did everything in her power to make them more beautiful than they were. She used numerous drugs before she found what she wanted. This last drug made her eyes sparkle like diamonds, and she used it to such an extent that her right eye began to shrivel. This brought her to her senses, and the family physician was called in. But he came too late, and informed the poor girl that she must lose one of her eyes sure, and probably both. The right eye was taken out some time ago, and she has lost all sight in the left, and will be blind for life.

Funeral Reform.

Funeral reform is strongly advocated by Rev. A. McGillivray, of Brockville, who in a recent sermon said:—"Going into mouring is a fashion that should go out. Sorrow is of the heart and need not be proclaimed in dress.' 'When I have received my discharge,' said a dying saint, 'sing and put on your white and beautiful garments, for I will be in glory with God.' Affectionate remembrance is of the heart and life. To honour our dead in our life is to honour them indeed, and the nobility of out lives is quite independent of the colour or quality of the garments we wear. Why should we tolerate, much less encourage, a practice that constrains a widow to get black garments for herself and fatherless children, when at that very time they may be lacking the necessaries of life?" We are the slaves of a great many customs that will not bear the test of reason, and the crape custom is perhaps one of them. But it is the fashion, and people will and must conform to it; though they do say it is not so thoroughly observed now a-day as it was formerly.

A Thanksgiving Dinner that Never was Served.*

It was Thanksgiving day, and from grandchild to sire,
All were chatting and laughing, with face to the fire;
For outside 'twas gloomy and bitterly cold,
And snow clouds were gathering, fold upon fold.

The soft firelight played, through the wide folding door,
On a long table, bright with a shining galore
Of silver and plate, and a breath of good cheer
Gave token that dinner would shortly appear.

What a sweet, subtle sense of something to come,
A joy still untasted, a future still dumb!
A hope all expectant, yet calmly reserved,
Attends on a Thanksgiving dinner unserved!

How the hope gathers strength as the slow moments fly,
And the hungry ones, faint for the sweet by-and-by,
Greet the dishes that enter, and the great horde of sweets
That hover to rest near the still empty seats!

It chanced at the meeting a queer little pet
Was present, and made all the children forget
How impatient they were, whilst his odd little wiles
Kept all quite delighted and brimming with smiles.

It was Uncle Will's monkey,—an old sailor's gift,—
Named Jock, who to-day was permitted to drift
When and where he desired; and, too late, to be plain
Such distinction had turned Jock's weak little brain.

For at length, as though tired of such lavish attention,
And wishing some fun of his own small invention,
Jock sprang from the circle still drawn to the grate,
And mounted a cornice, to plot, and to wait.

So hardly the turkey steamed high on his platter,
When a puff! and a shriek! and a quick "What's the matter?"
A stamping, a running, and shouts of dismay,
Told the house was on fire! on a Thanksgiving day!

The rest of the townsfolks, surprised at their feasts,
And still grasping their forks, came by hunderds at least,
To add to confusion, and get in the way
Of the engines, that soon began to play.

Far out in the gardea, but huddled quite safe,
Sat a queer little shuddering, shivering waif,
With his hips sadly burned, and his hair singed in patches—
Sir Jocko it was—after playing with matches!

For' twas only a match, by his sly touch ignited,
That had spoiled a Thanksgiving, and balefully lighted
A town to the sight of a house turned to tinder!
And its Thanksgiving dinner reduce to a cinder!

Let us turn from the scene, for what pen can portray
The dark disappointments of that fateful day?
Though our memory linger, with sadness unswerved
Round that Thanksgiving dinner that never was served.

Fact

In Demand.

There is an Eastern proverb to the effect that "bats are the birds of birdless villages." Undoubtedly the value we put upon anything is raised by its scarcity, and it is not too much to say that in California's early mining days, when men were accustomed only to the presence of one another, a woman did not require youth and beauty to become an object of general admiration.

She was a woman; that was enough. She represented the home delights and gentler affections, which those rough men still reverenced, though they had abandoned them.

A party of Forty-Niners, while tramping from one place to another once found an old bonnet on the road. By a common impulse, they dropped picks and shovels, clasped hands, and capered in a hilarious ring about that suggestive bit of head-gear.

There was a time, not so very long ago, when a woman walking along the streets of San Francisco excited a degree of interest which would probably astonish even an acknowledged queen of beauty in our own pressic days. Men stared at her, reverently follow her steps and were glad to linger near the house she entered.

One day, while a sale was going on in a crowded auction-room of San Francisco, some ore shouted, in a momentary pause of the auctioneer's voice:

"Two ladies going along the sidewalk!"

In an instant the room was emptied, while the street was thronged with eager woman-worshippers. Desire of a bargain was quite secondary to the pleasure of seeing once more two of the beings whose presence recalled the past joys of domestic life.—[Youth's Companion.

The Songs of Labor.

There is scarcely an occupation, certainly none that demands unity of purpose and regularity of attack, that has, or has not had, its own peculiar kind of song or accompanying chant. The anvil, the loom, the dairy, the field, the wharf, the plantation, ay, and even the collier's dreary world, are each in themselves an incentive to some kind of music, and their laborers in all parts make for themselves, if not a pleasing recreation, at any rate a soothing monotony by crooning, or humming, or chanting, some rhythmical measure. Athenæus has preserved the Greek names of different songs as sung by various trades, but unfortunately none of the songs themselves. There was one for the corn-grinders, another for wool-workers, another for weavers; the reapers had their carol, the herdsmen a song composed by a Sicilian ox-driver; the kneaders, the bathers, and the galley-rowers were not without their chant. It is still the custom of Egypt and in Greece to carry on an immense labor by an accompaniment of music and singing; hence the story of Amphion building Thebes with his lyre. In Africa to this day the laborers on the plantations at Yaoorie work to the sound of a drum.

Almost all these old Grecian trade songs have their counterpart at the present time in some land, if not universally. The corn-grinder's song is imitated on the Russian wharves, where the women sing in chorus as they crush the grain for exportation; the weavers in Ayshire, where are still to be found the almost obsolete hand-looms, croon some weird Highland tune as they sit at their work; the reapers in Russia have their wheat chorus and rye chorus, and the haymakers in many countries have special songs of their own.—[Nineteenth Century.

Royal Bear Hunting.

The Prince of Wales, a month or so ago, during his visit to Austria, was initiated into bear shooting in Transylvania, a region that has been thickly populated with bears and many other wild beasts for many centuries. He was the guest of the Crown Prince Rudolph, and the hunting was done upon the Crown Prince's estate of Gorgeny-Szent-Imre, which has been fitted up especially for such royal hunting parties. It is sixteen hours by rail from Vienna, and then five or six hours by carriage to the castle. Every luxury that could be desired is provided at the castle, but the hunting itself is hard, even for royalty. The hunters, royal or otherwise, must rise at 6 in the morning and ride for two hours up hill, through thick woods, over stony and marshy ground on small horses with peasant saddles fastened with ropes, and without stirrups or bridle, a piece of cord serving for rein. It must have been rainy for two or three days before or there will be little chance of finding the bears. The most experienced Transylvanian hunters profess to be unable to track a bear over dry ground. The bears inhabit the dense upper forests, rarely entered by man, while they live upon beechnuts, acorns, and oak apples. As the season advances, however, they descend to the lower woods and make nocturnal excursions into the level country. From the 10th to the 15th of October bears by the hundred are to be found in the lower part of the forest.

In hunting them a small army, generally about 100 or 150 men, is employed to beat up the game. These form a circle about the locality where bear tracks abound, a place being chosen where there is high ground sloping down to a ditch or path. The beaters scare the bears toward a centre, and then start them up the hill. The hunters, usually twelve or fifteen in number, are stationed on the high ground, and about eighty paces apart. Each one stands alone, hidden in the brush, with only his gun for protection. Experience has shown that two persons together, either by talking or in some other way, are certain to disclose their presence to the keen-scented and quick eared bears, who will avoid the spot, although the hunters may be perfectly hidden. When enough bears are thought to have been gathered in the space before the hunters, the beaters set up a tremendous noise, shouting and blowing horns and trumpets. The terrified bears start to run. Usually they go up hill, away from the sound. If they go the other way the beaters turn them back. The hunters blaze away whenever they see one, but it sometimes happens that out of thirty or forty bears every one will escape. More frequently a few are killed. Five have been brought to the castle in one day, and the Crown Prince has a record of three in a day.

Generally there is little danger of a bear attacking a hunter, but sometimes one that has been wounded, and is unable to escape rapidly, will turn and attempt to kill a hunter. Only once at Gogeny-Szent-Imre has a bear attacked a man without being first wounded. That time it was a gigantic she bear, whose two young had been killed. Another time a huge beast that had been shot at by a hunter rushed down the slope and attacked one of the beaters, tearing his gun from him and clawing him so terribly that he was nearly killed. A companion smashed the bear's head with a blow of his rifle, and saved the wounded beater's life. The Crown Prince once saved his brother-in-law, Prince Leopold of Bavaria, from a wounded bear, Leopold having been so frightened at its attack as to be unable to use his knife, a weapon that all the hunters carry as a last resort. One great danger of the sport is that when two hunters firing at the same bear passing between them, one of them may miss the bear and wound the other.

This sort of bear hunting is comparatively a new thing, having been introduced by the Crown Prince nine years ago. He is regarded as the chief of the hunts, and is called the best bear shot in Europe. The party with which he received the Prince of Wales consisted of about thirty nobleman, including seven Archdukes. The Prince of Wales had already tried his hand on lions and tigers, but this was his first go at the bears.

Saved by a Cat.

There are so many stories of dogs who have saved human lives, and so few anecdotes of pussy's helpfulness in times of emergency, that we gladly publish the story of a cat's intelligent devotion: During the Crimean War, a little cat followed a young French soldier when he left his native village. The lad's heart clung to this dumb creature, and he gave her a seat on his knapsack by day on the march, and a corner of his couch at night.

When the regiment was first ordered into action, he left her in charge of a sick comrade. He had marched about a mile, when he saw puss running beside him. He lifted her up on her usual seat, and soon the engagement began.

Twice the soldier fell, but the cat clung fast hold.

At last, a severe wound stretched him bleeding on the field. No sooner did pussy catch sight of the blood, than she seated herself upon his body, and began to lick his wound in the most assiduous manner. Thus she remained for some hours, till the surgeon carried the lad off to the tent for the wounded. When he recovered consciousness, his first question was, "Shall I live?"

"Yes, my good fellow," was the surgeon's answer, "thanks to your little cat. If she had not used her tongue so intelligently, you would have died from loss of blood."

Contrary to all regulations, pussy was allowed to accompany the young soldier to the hospital, where she was regaled with the choicest morsels from his plate, and became a very distinguished character.—[Illustrated Christian Weekly.

A Very Indirect Compliment.

Mr. Marshall P. Wilder tells that at a big reception in London he got into conversation in a corner with a quiet, steady, middle-aged gentleman; and Mr. Wilder deplored the lack of interest he felt in the crowds of titled people around him. "I would rather talk to a plain person like yourself," he said, "in a quiet fashion, than to the Duke of Teck, who I believe is here." And then they went on exchanging opinions about England and America. Mr. Wilder found later on that his quiet companion was the Duke of Teck himself.

Your heart, sir, we'll soon be running the press."

The senior smiled as he passed her by,
And a semi-triumphant look blazed in his eye.
"You may do all you say, my confident maid,
And still we men will be far ahead;
For the time you girls will lose your nerve
Will be when you try to pitch a curve!"

My Toothache

Is an exclamation heard every hour in the day. Toothache is the most common ailment of young and old, and in the aggregate inflicts more suffering than perhaps any other single complaint. Will Not Leave Us.

It having been rumored that Mr. W. H. Riddell, the able and popular Secretary of the Ontario Mutual Life, had accepted a similar position in Toronto, we are authorized to say that the position of Secretary of the Manufacturers' Life Assurance Company and Manager of its Head Office, was offered to him, but for reasons not necessary to state here, he refused at present to become an applicant, notwithstanding the fact the salary would be very handsome and that other very tempting inducements were held out to him. While we would be pleased to announce his preferment we but voice the unanimous feelings of our citizens when we say his departure from Waterloo would be sincerely regretted, not only by the Company he has so long and efficiently served, but by a host of friends and acquaintances to whom he has endeared himself during a residence of seven years in their midst, by his genial and obliging disposition and other qualities which go to make up the successful business man and worthy citizen.—[Waterloo Chronicle, Nov. 1st.

Vital Wicks.

"There are three wicks to the lamp of a man's life: brain, blood, and breath." Thus writes an eminent American author. The most frequent derangements occur in the blood and in the liver, by which, when in healthy condition, the blood is purified. Look out for the terrible chain of diseases that owe their inception to torpid liver and consequent impure blood. When the symptoms of liver and kidney troubles, consumption (Lung-scrofula), bronchitis, and dropsy, make their appearance, the system is in immediate need of a course of Dr. Pierce's Golden Discovery. Its marvelous effects have been tested and proven in the cure of tens of thousands of cases. It purifies and enriches the blood, restores lost vitality and effectually eradicates the seeds of the worst maladies that afflict mankind.

Ills, Wills and Pills.

An odd mixture of words, but the sufferer from constipation, indigestion, impure blood billiousness, and other such ILLS, can be cured if he WILLS, without taking the horrid, old-fashioned PILLS. These are superseded in our day by those wonder-working, yet tiny, little globules, known as Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. No griping, no drastic purging: do not cause costiveness afterwards, as the old style pills do. One little Granule a dose.

FISHING FOR AMBER.

The World's Supply Caught in the Waves of the Baltic Coast.

The bulk of the amber supply of the world comes now from the region known as Samland, on the East Prussia coast of the Baltic, says the New York Sun, about half way between Kurisches Haff and Frisches Haff, and from the lighthouse at Brusterot can be seen with the naked eye the whole stretch of coast on which the precious petrifaction is now found, and from which it has come for 3 000 years. The belt of "blue earth" in which the detached fragments of amber are found lies from 20 to 30 feet below the surface of the beach. The amber can be, and is to some extent, obtained by mining, but under the water the vein comes much nearer to the surface, and is frequently exposed entirely by the action of the waves, so that fishing for the amber is easier than digging, and most of it is obtained in that way.

The amber fishermen are not Germans but a Samaite race of Kurish origin, ancient foes of the Cossack and the Russ. They are a vigorous and hardy race, and need to be to carry on their business. They work in stormy weather, when the waves have loosened masses of amber from the ocean bed and are rolling it about in the surf, mingled with great masses of seaweed. The fishermen, with long hook forks and hand nets, wade shoulder deep into the water. The women stand along the shore as near as they can to the waves. The men with their forks poke up the masses of seaweed, and drag them toward the shore as much as possible. With the nets they endeavour to gather in pieces of amber that may be floating about in the water. As fast as the seaweed is got to the shore it is passed to the women, who pick from it the bits of amber that cling to it, and put them into bags to be sold to the dealers. Some dealers stay about the beach while the fishing is going on, hoping to catch up some particularly valuable specimen before any one else has a chance at it.

After the storm is over there remains the most profitable part of the harvest to be gathered. The amber that can be got while the storm is raging is mostly in small pieces, but large blocks of it disentangled by the waves are too heavy to be washed within reach of the fishermen. When the sea is smooth enough for the bottom to be seen through from five to fifteen feet of water, the fishermen row out and look for these blocks, recovering them by long pronged forks and nets.

The amber is also obtained in more systematic fashion from the reefs, some three quarters of a mile off shore, where the meeting of different currents has caused it to be heaped up with immense quantities of seaweed and rubbish. For ten months in the year a little fleet of black boats is anchored over these reefs, the largest and most valuable of which is 600 feet long by 400 feet wide, and divers sent down, one from every boat, are poking about amid the seaweed, discovering blocks of the amber and raising it to the surface. Each diver remains under water for five hours at a stretch, and the labour is said to be very trying. Sometimes blocks so large are discovered that it takes two or even three men to bring them to the surface. Such masses as this bring fancy prices, from $75 to $150 each, the ordinary amber bringing only about $4 50 a pound. The water during most of the fishing season is icy cold, and the divers have to endure great hardships.

What will We do in Heaven?

An enterprising New York interviewer lately asked Dr. Talmage about what people would be doing in Heaven, and got in return for his pains and his impudence quite a number of wrinkles about the heavenly activities. And all in that glib, irreverent way which Talmage so much affects and which is so dear to the typical interviewer's heart. Here is a specimen of the way in which the Brooklyn Tabernacle man spread himself:—

"The Bible says that in Heaven there are many mansions, which I take as meaning rooms. There will be the reception room, the music room, the family room, the throne room. I suppose after that the musician has found his own loved ones who have gone before him he will see Beethoven and Mozart and Handel and Mendelssohn and all the great earthly exponents of that art. The painter will pass a few happy hours with his kin and then go into the presence of Rembrant and Raphael and Rubens and Claude and Titian and all the other great souls et painters whose fame we revere on earth. I suppose great wits—and the best Christians I have ever found or met are the Christian wits—they will come into communion with the Sidney Smiths, the Christopher Nerths, the Shakespeares, and so on, with other men and women.

"Shakespeare, you know, in his last will and testament, dedicated his soul to God through the Lord Jesus Christ, and he was as thorough a Christian as he was great as a dramatist.

WE WILL FIND OUR TRUE VOCATION.

"I could talk to you forever on the subject of heaven, for it is one we all are interested in. My ideas of Heaven are greatly changed. When I first entered the ministry I had imagined a poetic heaven: now it has become to me a home circle. We can do there whatever we please; our nature is enlarged there; we will enjoy more freedom a higher state of existance, and go on improving through eternity. We have an imperfect nature in this world, and here we cannot do as we please. We are bound down; our best moods have no scope, no freedom; we are tied down in a great many instances to uncongenial pursuits to which we have become devoted by accident or the force of circumstances. In heaven all this will be changed. Locomotion will be rapid, and, to use a material idea, we shall be able to fly like the bird—that is, if we want to go anywhere the mere wish will accomplish it. To day you and I have to walk or ride in the cars to the Bridge, or we pass hours in a train on our way to a city in the West. In heaven we would be at our destination in the twinkle of an eye. Space will be annihilated—time will be as nothing.

All this may be just as well as something else but we tell Talmage that he knows nothing about what he dogmatizes with such glibness and such flippancy. It looks very much as if both the interlocutors spoke as if they had their tongues in their cheeks and were quietly smiling in true Roman Augur fashion. Why will people continually presume to be wise above what is written and fly off into space as if they were little divinities and diamond editions of omniscience? Another of the learned pundits puffed away at cigarettes all the time he was laying down the law about the upper regions and spoke as glibly of God and planets and outlying regions of space as if he knew all about it and had come but recently from the very presence chamber of the Almighty. It was all very much in the same style as was remarked about another New York doctor when he once preached in Toronto. "There were three persons," said the somewhat critical hearer on that occasion, "Evidently on very intimate terms—God, Moses and Dr. ——." Such disjointed declamatory blague is apt to bring both religion and its official expounders into contempt.

Who are the Lucky Ones?

After all, what is luck? She is the hand maiden of every man at one time or another She is ever by one's side, ready to give a helping hand. The blind do not see her; the timid or irresolute decline to take her outstretched hand. The unlucky man is the man who forgets to strike when the iron is hot. The lucky man is the one who takes advantage of proffered fortune. Circumstances, it is to be confessed, throw more of such proffers in the way of one than another. But if one will follow the footprints of the lucky men of the world it will be found that at the points where they seized fortune at the flood there are tracks which show there were many faltering and hesitating ones near by, any one of whom had within his reach the same opportunities as the fortunate one had.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXXII.—On Trial

Matters at Whitestrand had been going meanwhile from bad to worse. Winifred never spoke another word to Hugh about Elsie's watch; her pride prevented her. She would not stoop to demand an explanation. And Hugh had no explanation of his own to volunteer. No ready lie rose spontaneous to his lips. He dropped the subject then and for ever.

But the question of the encroachments could not be quite so cavalierly dropped: it pressed like it insidiously and silently upon Hugh's attention. An eminent engineer came down from London to inspect the sand-drifts, shortly after Hatherly's visit. He stroked his chin and remarked cheerfully with a demonstrative smile that currents were very ticklish things to deal with on their own ground: that when you interfered with the natural course of a current, you never could tell which way it would go next; and that diverting it was much like taking a leap in the dark, as far as probable consequences to the shore were concerned. After which reassuring vaticinations, the eminent engineer proceeded at once with perfect confidence to erect an expensive and ingenious breakwater off the site of the poplar, which strained the slender baldoon of Hugh's remaining credit to the very verge of its utmost bursting-point. A year passed by in the work of building and throwing out the breakwater; and as soon as it was finished, with much acclamation, a scour set in just round its sides which ate away the grounds behind even faster than ever.

The estate, in fact, was simply doomed. Æolian, Pactolian, indeed: ah me, the irony of it! Those Æolian sands were overwhelming Whitestrand. The poplar had formed its one frail support. In destroying the poplar, Hugh had simply outwitted himself. No earthly science could now repair that fatal step. Physicians were in vain. Engineers and breakwaters were of no avail. The cruel crawling sea had begun remorselessly to claim its own, and day after day it claimed it piecemeal.

Nor was that all. Hugh's affairs were getting more and more involved in other ways also. Those were the days of the decline of Squiredom. Agricultural depression had told upon the rents. Turnips were a failure; mangolds were feeble; Hessian fly had made waste straw of old Grime's wheat crops; barely had never done so badly for years. Foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro pneumonia had combined with American competition and Australian mutton to lower prices and to starve landlords. Rents came in worse and worse at each successive Whitestrand audit. The interest on the mortgage was hard to raise; and the servants' wages at the Hall, it was whispered about, had fallen into arrears for a whole quarter.

Clearly the young Squire must be short of funds; and nothing was afloat to help his exchequer into safer waters.

But drowning men cling to the proverbial straw. For his own part, Hugh had high hopes at first of his Life's Philosophy. He had trimmed his little bark most cunningly, he thought, to tempt the stormy sea of popular approbation. There was the big long poem for heavy ballast, and the ballades and occasional pieces in his lightest vein for cork belts to redress the balance. Sooner or later the world must surely catch glimpses of the truth, that it still enclosed a great unknown Poet! He waited for the storm of applause to begin; the critics would doubtless soon set up their concerted pæn. But one day, a few weeks after the volume was published, he took up a copy of the By stander, that most superior review—the special organ of his own special clique—and read in it with hushed breath—a hostile notice of his new and hopeful volume. His heart sank as he read and read. Line after line, the sickening sense of failure deepened upon him. It had not been so in the old days; then, the critics had hasted to bring him butter in a lordly dish. But now, all that was utterly changed. He read with a cheek flushed with indignation. At last, the review touched bottom

"Mr. Massinger," said his critic in concluding his notice, "has long since retired, we all know, into Lowther Arcadia. There, among the mimic ranges of the Suffolk sandhills—a doll's paradise of dale and mountain—he has betaken himself with his pretty little pipe to the green side of a pretty little knoll, and has tuned his throat to a pretty little lay, all about a series of pretty little ladies, of the usual insipid Lowther-Arcadian style of beauty. These waxen-faced damsels somehow fail to interest us. Their cheeks are all most becomingly red; their eyes are all most liquidly blue; their locks are all of the yellowest; and their philosophy is a cheap and ineffective mixture of the Elegant Extract with the choicest old crusted English morals of immemorial proverbial wisdom. In short, they are unfortunately stuffed with sawdust. The long poem which gives a title to the volume, on the other hand, though mollusooid in its flabbiness, is as ambitious as it is feeble, and as dull as it is involved. Here, for example, selected from some five hundred equally inflated stanzas, are the modest views Mr. Massinger now holds on his own position in the material Cosmos: the scene, we ought to explain, is laid in Oxford: the time, midnight or a little later; and the Bard speaks in propria persona.

> The city lies below me wrapped in slumber:
> Mute and unmoved in all her streets she lies:
> Mid rapid thoughts that throng me without number
> Flashed the phantom of an old surmise.
> Her hopes and fears and griefs are all suspended:
> Ten thousand souls throughout her precincts take
> Sleep, in whose bosom life and death are blended,
> And I alone awake.
> Am I alone the solitary centre
> Of all the seeming universe around,
> With mocking senses, through whose portals enter
> Unmeaning phantasies of sight and sound?
> Are all the countless minds wherewith I people
> The empty forms that float before my eyes
> Vain as the cloud that girds the distant steeple
> With snowy canopies?
> Yet though the world be but myself unfolded—
> Soul bent again on soul in mystic play—
> No less each sense and thought and act is moulded
> By dead necessities I may not sway.
> Some mightier power against my will can move me:
> Some potent nothing force and overawe:
> Though I be all that is, I feel above me
> The godhead of blind law!

"Seven or eight pages of this hysterical, cartilaginous, invertebrate nonsense have failed to convince us that Mr Massinger is really, as he seems implicitly to believe, the hub of the universe, and the sole intelligent or sentient being within the entire circle of organic creation. Many other poets, indeed, have thought the same, but few have been so candid as to express their opinion."

Hugh crushed the Bystander in his hand with a burning sense of wrong and indignation. The measure he himself had often meted to others, therewithal had it been meted to him: and he realised now in his own person the bitterness of the stings he had often inflicted out of pure wantonness on endless young and anonymous authors. Cheyne Row had clearly cast off her rascal errant son. He was to it now an outcast and a pariah, a wicked deserter to the camp of the Philistines.

Winifred was seated on the sofa opposite, but he did not pass the paper to her. He flung it from him. He was too vain to ask for her sympathy; and perhaps he was not quite sure that he had any claim upon it. They were leading a life of mutual avoidance, as far as possible: communicating only on strictly practical topics, when occasion demanded, and not even in the most amicable spirit. They were not in touch with each other; but who was to blame? Not surely Hugh—the wise, the brilliant, the immaculate! And yet—and yet—how little he understood a woman's heart. While he had been reading in bitterness of spirit what the Bystander said of him, Winifred was also reading—in the Charing Cross Review, and the subject was that same volume of her husband's. The criticism here was ten times more galling and bitter than that under which Massinger had just been writhing, and she knew how it would pain him were he to read it. Had she been as heartless as her husband, she would have passed the paper to him and enjoyed his humiliation and discomfiture. But she was not as heartless as her husband was—in many ways. She was as many another woman, with a proud and selfish and unsympathetic husband, has been. She had loved him once and in a measure loved him still, and therefore would not pain him by inflicting another wound, as it were with her own hand. She buried the paper deep beneath the sofa cushions; and Hugh never knew the bitter things which the Charing Cross Review had said about him. It would have been all the more galling to his wounded spirit had he known further that that review was signed with the initials A. H.—Arthur Hatherley

Winifred lifted the paper which Hugh had flung from him, skimmed the Bystander review in haste. But she said never a word in any way about it. "Shall I accept Lady Mortmayne's invitation?" she asked with chilly unconcern.

Bohemia had clearly turned against them; but Philistia at least, Philistia was left to console their bosome. If one can't be a poet, one can at any rate be a snob. In the bitterness of his heart, Hugh answered: "Yes. Go anywhere on earth to a body with a handle.' Then he tried to rouse himself, to put on a cheerful and unconcerned manner. "I like to patronise art," he went on with a hard smile, "and as a work of art I consider Lady Mortmayne almost perfect."

Winifred laid down her paper on the table. "What shall I say to her?" she asked glassily. She was a timid letter-writer. Even since their estrangement, Hugh most often dictated her society notes for her.

"Dear Lady Mortmayne, we shall have great"—Hugh began with vigour.

"Isn't "we have great pleasure" better English, Hugh?" Winifred asked quietly, as she examined her nib with close attention.

"No," Hugh blurted back; "certainly not. She'll have great pleasure's quite good enough for me, so I suppose it's good enough for you too; isn't it?" He was getting positively cruel now. "If you can write so well," he muttered between his clenched teeth, "write it yourself. 'Great pleasure in accepting your kind invitation for Thursday next.'"

"Thanks. I think I'll put it my own way. 'And will bring the dahlias she promised.'"

"Who promised?—Lady Mortmayne?"

"Oh, bother! I mean, 'the dahlias I promised, which I would have brought before; but I was unfortunately prevented by my gardener having quite inadvertently.'"

"For Heaven's sake, split it up into short sentences," Hugh cried, on tenter-hooks. "I couldn't let such a note as that go out of my house—I mean, our house, Winifred—if my life depended upon it. A man of letters allow his wife to make such an exhibition of impossible English!"

"I wish I was clever," Winifred said, growing red, "and then I could write my own letters without you."

"'Be good, my child, and let who will be clever:' Charles Kingsley," Hugh answered provokingly. "'An honest man's the noblest work of God:' Alexander Pope. (I think it was Pope; or was it Sam Johnson? A placid woman runs him close, eood: Hugh Massinger. Bood's a powerful weak rhyme, I admit, but what can you expect from a mere impromptu? I only wish all women were placid. Well, the moral of these three immortal lines, selected from the works of three poets in three different ages born (Dryden), is simply this—you do very well as you are, Winifred. Don't seek to be clever. It doesn't suit you. Take my advice. Leave it alone.—For it you do, you'll find it in the end a complete failure."

"Hugh! You insult me."

"Very well then, my dear. You will be able to exercise Christian patience and resignation in pocketing the insult—as I have to do from you very often."

Winifred shut down her writing-case with a bang and burst, not into tears, but into an uncontrollable fit of violent coughing. She coughed and coughed till her face was purple and livid with the effort. Hugh watched her silently, as hard as adamant. She had often coughed this way of late. The habit was growing on her. Hugh thought she ought to cure herself of it.

"I shall go up next week again to consult Sir Anthony Wraxall," she said at last, when she recovered her breath, gasping and choking. "Will you go with me, Hugh?

"We've no cash now to waste on junketing and gadding about in town," Hugh answered gloomily. "A pretty time to talk about riotous living, with the servants' wages all overdue, and duns bothering at the door for their wretched money! My presence could hardly give you any appreciable pleasure. You can stop at the dingy old lodgings in Albert Row, and Mrs. Bouverie Barton will help gad about with you. You can traipse together over half London."

Winifred bowed her poor head down in silence. Her heart was sick. It was full to bursting. This was all she had bought with the fee-simple of Whitestrand.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—An Artistic Event.

"Mr. Warren Relf,' said the daintily etched invitation card, "requests the pleasure of a visit from Mr. and Mrs. Bouverie Barton and friends to a Private View of his Paintings and Water-colour Sketches, on Saturday, October the 3rd, from 2.30 to 6 p. m., at 128 Bletchingley Road, South Kensington."

Such a graceful little invitation card never was seen, neatly designed by the artist himself, with a bold flight of sea-gulls engaged in winging their way across the upper left-hand corner; and a stretch of stormy waves bestridden by a fishing-smack in full career before the brisk breeze occupying the larger part of its broad face in very delicate and exquisite outline. When Winifred Massinger saw it carelessly stuck aside amoung a heap of others on Mrs. Bouverie Barton's occasional table in South Audley Street, she took it up with a start and examined it closely. "Mr. Warren Relf!" she cried, in a tone of some surprise. "Then you know him, Mrs. Barton?" I didn't remember he was one of your circle. But there, of course, you know everybody. —What a sweet little etching!"

"What? Mr. Warren Relf!—O yes, I know him. Not I'm afraid, a very successful artist, as yet; but they say he has merit—in his own way, merit. I'm going to see these new pictures of his on Saturday, if I can sandwich him in edgeways between the Society for the Higher Education of Women and the Richter concert or tea at the MacKinnon's. I've only five engagements for Saturday. Quite an empty day.

"Have you got a card for the private view yourself, dear?"

"No," Winifred answered with a slight blush.

"Well, then, would you like to go with us, dear?" Mrs. Bouverie Barton asked kindly.

Winifred turned over the card with as wistful look. "It says, "Mr. and Mr Bouverie Barton and friends," she repeated with emphasis. "So of course you can take whoever you like with you, can't you, Mrs Barton?—Saturday the 31 from 2 30 to 6 P. M.—I think I might.—I'll risk it anyhow.—That'd suit me admirably. My appointment with Sir Anthony's for two precisely."

"Your appointment with Sir Anthony?" Mrs. Barton echoed in a grieved undertone.

Winifred coughed—such a nasty dry little hacking cough. 'Why, yes. Sir Anthony Wraxall," she answered checking herself with some difficulty from a brief paroxysm of her usual trouble. "I've come up this week, in fact, on purpose to consult him. Hugh made me come, my lungs have been so awfully odd lately."

"My dear," Mrs. Bouverie Barton put in tenderly—everybody knows Mrs. Bouverie Barton, the most charming and sympathetic hostess in literary London—"you hardly seem fit to go running about sight-seeing at present. Does Mr. Massinger seriously realise how extremely weak and ill you are?—It scarcely seems to me you ought to be troubling your poor little head about private views or anything of the sort with a cough like that upon you."

"Oh, it isn't much, I assure you, dear Mrs. Barton," Winifred answered, the tears coming up into her eyes as she spoke at the touch of sympathy. "Hugh doesn't think it's at all serious."

At 128 Bletchingley Road, the ancestral home of all the Relfs—for one generation—a tiny eight-roomed London house in a side-street of intense South Kensington—all was bustle and flutter and feverish excitement. Edie Relf to day was absolutely in her element. It was her joy in life, indeed, to compass the Impossible. And the Impossible now stared her frankly in the face in the concrete shape of a geometrical absurdity. She had undertaken to make the less contain the greater, all the axioms of Euclid to the contrary notwithstanding. What a respace and time to a clever woman. Of no more importance in her scheme of things than to Emmanuel Kant or to Sandwich Hodgson. The Relfs had issued no fewer than three hundred and twenty separate invitation cards, each with that extensible india-rubber clause, "and friends," so capable of indefinite and incalculable expansion. Now, the little front drawing-room at Bletchingley Road could just be induced, when the furniture was abolished by Act of Parliment, and the piano removed up-stairs to the back bedroom to accommodate at a pinch some thirty five persons, mostly chairless. "My dear Edie," Mrs. Relf cried in a voice of despair, "we can never, never, never pack them in anyhow."

"Herrings in a box would find themselves comparatively roomy and comfortable," Warren murmured, with a glance of black despondency round the four scanty walls of the tiny drawing-room. "How on earth could you think of asking so many?"

"Nonsense, my dears!" Edie answered with a confident smile that presaged victory. "Leave that to me. It's my proper business. I see it all. The commanding officer should never be hampered by futile predictions of defeat and dishonour. Of course they won't come, the greater part of them. They never do rush, I regret to say, to inspect your immortal works, Warren. But still we must arrange, for all that, as if we expected the whole united British people—in case of a rush, don't you know, mother. Let me see. We've only sent out cards, I think, for a poor trifle of three hundred and twenty."

"No," Warren corrected gravely. "Three hundred and twenty cards, you mean, for six hundred and forty wives and husbands."

"Some of them are bachelors, my dear," Edie answered with a sagacious nod; "and some old maids, who never by any chance buy anything. And what's two hundred? A mere trifle! I declare it affords no scope at all for a girl's ingenuity. Like our respected ancestor, Warren Hastings, I stand aghast at my own moderation.—I really wish, mother, now I come to think of it, we'd sent out invitations for a thousand."

"Six hundred's quite enough for me, I'm sure," Warren replied, glancing round the room once more in palpable doubt. "How do you mean to arrange for them, Edie?"

"Oh, easy enough. Nothing, could be simpler. I'll tell you how. First of all, you throw open the folding-doors—or rather, to save the room at the sides, you lift them bodily off their hinges and stick them out of the dining-room window into the back garden."

"They won't go through," Warren objected, measuring with his eye.

"Rubbish, my dear! Won't go through, indeed! You men have no imagination and no invention. You manufacture difficulties out of pure obstructiveness. If they won't go through whole, why, just take out the panels and unglue the wood-work, that's all.—Very well, then; that throws the drawing-room and dining-room into one good big reception-room, from which of course we remove all the furniture. Next, we range the chairs in a long row round the sides for the old ladies—the old ladies are very important; keep 'em down stairs, or else they'll prevent their husbands from buying—and let the men and the able-bodied girls stand up and group themselves in picturesque clusters here and there about the vacant centre. What could be easier, simpler or more effective? A room treated so furnishes itself automatically with human properties. With tact and care, we could easily squeeze in some seventy or eighty."

"We could," Warren answered, after a mental calculation of square area.—"But how about the pictures?"

"Hear him, mother! Oh, but men are helpless! Where should the pictures be but up in the studio, stupid! We wouldn't take all the people up to see them at once, of course. You and I would go around, looking very affable with a professional smile—so, you know—perpetually playing about the corners of our mouths, and carry off the men with the most purchasing faces in constant relays up to admire the immortal master-pieces. Meanwhile, mother and Mr. Hatherley, down below here, would do the polite to the old ladies and undertake the deportment business. Or perhaps Mr Hatherley'd better be stationed on guard up-stairs, to fire off some of his gushing critical remarks from time to time about the aerial perspective and the middle distances. Mr. Hatherley always knows just what to say to weigh down the balance for a hesitating purchaser."

"Edie," Warren cried, flinging himself down with a disgusted face upon the dining-room sofa, "I hate all this horrid advertising and touting, for all the world as if one were the catchpenny proprietor of a patent medicine, instead of an honest, hard-working British artist!"

"I know you do, my dear boy," Edie answered imperturbably; "and that's all the more reason why those who have the charge of you should undertake to push you and tout for you against your will, till they positively make you achieve the success you yourself will never have the meanness to try for.—But, thank goodness, I don't mind puffing. I'm intriguer enough myself for the whole family. If it hadn't been for my egging you on, and pestering you and bullying you and keeping you up to it, we should never have got up this private view of your things at all.—And now, having started and arranged the entire show, I mean to work it my own way without interference. If there's anything on earth I love, it's a jolly good muddle."

And jolly as the muddle undoubtedly was, Edie Relf did pull them through in the end with triumphant strategy. Saturday the 3rd was a brilliant success. Bletchingley Road, that mere surburban byway, had never before in its checkered career beheld so many real live carriages together. The six hundred, or at least a very fair proportion of them, boldly they drove and well, down that narrow side street. All the world wondered. The neighbors looked on and admired with vicarious pride. They felt themselves raised in the social scale by their close proximity to so fashionable a gathering. Number 128 itself was a changed character; it hardly knew its own ground-plan. Edie alone had reigned supreme. And as two of the clocks chimed from Kensington church tower on that eventful afternoon, she murmured aside to her mother, with an enraptured glance at the scarlet and green kemonos on the wall of the staircase: "My dear, there's not a speak of dust in this house, nor a bone in my body that isn't aching."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Wanted to See the Postmaster.

"Where's the postmaster?" demanded a long, bony woman with a freckled face, who presented herself at one of the delivery windows in the postoffice the other day.

"What is it you wish, madam?" inquired the clerk.

"Are you the postmaster?"

"No, ma'am, but—"

"Thought you didn't look old enough. It's the postmaster I want, young man. I don't want no truck with you. Will you go and tell him I'd like to see him?"

"He is busy now, but if you will state your business perhaps I can attend to it. You are keeping other people wait—"

"Young man, I've walked eleven blocks to get here, and I pay as much to support this postoffice as any woman of my means in the city. I'm going to get what I came for or I'll raise the biggest row you ever saw. You're a-listening to me, are you, young man!"

"I am, madam. Will you please tell me what you wish?"

"I want to get a letter I mailed this morning to Mrs. Edward Felix Winterbottom, Newburyport, Essex County, Mass. She's my cousin——"

"What do you want it for?"

"I want to write 'in haste' on the back I forgot to write it when I dropped it in, and the letter's important."

"I can't do such a thing as that for you, ma'am. Besides, it isn't necessary."

"It ain't, hey! Perhaps you know more about writing letters than I do. Perhaps you're 55 years old and have carried on a correspondence with friends in the East for thirty-seven years, young man! You long-legged, tallow-haired dude, if you don't go and fetch the postmaster——"

But the post office policeman gently led her from the building.

France Wants a New Game.

A prize of 5,000 francs has been offered for a new game suitable for the students of French schools. France has no national game, and wants one sadly. M. Pasteur will probably recommend inoculation as a charming diversion. M. de Lesseps will doubtless suggest the digging of canals. Gen. Boulanger's voice will perhaps be raised in favour of the building of barricades. Some people have supposed that duelling was the national game of France. It appears, however, that there is lacking that spice of danger which renders English football and American baseball so attractive. These English and American games are not deemed suitable to the climate of France, although attempts are now being made to introduce them. The French public is coming to the conclusion that some popular outdoor sport for boys is necessary to build up their physical systems. The youths of that nation are singularly deficient in healthful open-air amusements. The climate and the temperament of the race may offer insurmountable obstacles to the introduction of any athletic sport of northern countries. The experiment with football, baseball, and cricket, however, is well worth trying, and may lead to important results.

The Fraser Canon.

While this vast gorge has not towering vertical walls, like the true canons of Colorado and Utah, its steep, bristling mountain sides of rock often bulge into headlands projecting like buttresses, and these, as a rule, must be pierced by a tunnel. Everywhere between them the roadbed is hewn out of rock or lodged along slopes of sliding fragments upon abutments of massive masonry, after a plan that would have staggered railway men a few decades ago; but sometimes the promontories are only a few rods apart, and are separated by deep gullies. Here to each tunnel succeeds a bridge, and to the bridge another tunnel, until, looking back, you can count six or seven such alternations within sight at once. Far above the tremendous torrents on one side and overshadowed by stony walls and snowy peaks on the other, the traveller is at a loss which to admire the more—nature's savage force or man's conquering audacity and skill.

The Early Use of the Flag.

The flag was once merely used as a signal, waved to the right or left, without distinction of color or nationality. Down to a comparatively late period it was not the flag, but the figure-head, that was the emblem, the carved image of the prow, of which Herodotus gives us an instance in the wild boar of the Samians, sawn off on defeat by the Æginetans and deposited in the temple of Minerva. No naval standard has been discovered among the Egyptians or Assyrians; either their sails were embroidered with different emblems, or flag-like streamers, something like the bargeman's whiff, were displayed below the staff. The Romans had their vestra, as all the world knows; among whom markedly in consequence of their universal conquest on land, the art of naval war gradually died out, and any flags carried by ships then or for long after were probably as mere ornaments, emblems of religon or superstition, of personal vanity, or party triumph.

Bear Discipline.

A traveller who was crossing the Rocky Mountains, overheard a teamster tell the story of a mother bear and her cub, giving what he called a good example to human mothers in family government. This teamster was going up the mountain for pine logs, driving a wagon. On the top of a large rock by the side of the road was a young bear. The mother had started up the mountain as the team approached.

"The cub looked so cute," said the teamster, "lying there with its paws dropping over the edge of the rock, watching the horses as they came up. Presently, the old bear came bounding back to the cub, and, giving it a nudge with her nose, started up the mountain again, expecting the 'young one' to follow.

"But the cub made no move. The old bear then came back the second time, and taking up the cub in her arms, gave him several cuffs.

"This time the cub obeyed orders and followed the old bear in a gallop, up the side of the mountain.

"He knew, that cub did, that he'd better mind, for that old bear wouldn't stan' any more foolin'."

Cured by an Earthquake.

There is a well-known lady in this county who has enjoyed perfect health since the earthquake of two years ago. For several years up to that time her health had been declining, and she was then quite feeble. The physicians said the trouble was that she never perspired. When the great earthquake occurred she was considerably frightened and in a few moments the perspiration came freely from every pore. She began to improve from that moment and soon entirely regained her health. —[Washington (Ga.) Gazette.

The new Austrian army bills maintain the war strength of the army at 800,000.

Emerson once spoke of Bronson Alcott as "an incarnate piety." Alcott himself asserted a sublime sense of his identity with the Supreme. On one occasion he remarked to Henry James, in his time the wittiest of the Bostonians: "I can say with Jesus, 'I and my father are one.'" The response of Mr. James was: "Did you ever get anybody to believe you?"

AGRICULTURAL.

The White Guinea.

The Guinea fowl is a native of Africa, and is sometimes called African Pintado or Galenia. They have never out-grown their wild nature enough to be closely confined. When bred for domestic use they are peculiarly a farm table fowl, as they seldom find their way to market.

They are very profitable on farms, as they are industrious foragers and excellent insect destroyers. Will destroy more insects than all other poultry combined, and are not destructive to growing crops.

On the great Landreth seed farm near Philadelphia, Penn., they are the only fowl kept. They are given free access to all the fields. They can be kept without coat, but it would be better to give them an evening meal when young, to entice them to come up to the roost at night.

The White Guinea is not a polygamist, but has but one mate. They are abundant layers of very fine, rich-flavored eggs. The young being hardy and easily raised, the eggs are set under common hens. It requires about four weeks to hatch out the young. The flesh of the White Guinea, unlike that of its speckled relations, is very tender and toothsome. As a table fowl they come nearer the wild game birds than any of our domestic fowls. Their scarlet trimmed heads and beautiful snow white plumage attract many admirers.

The White Guinea grows rapidly, and for broilers excel young chickens, and farmers that want to raise something pretty as well as toothsome would do well to raise a flock of these pretty little birds. They will well reward him for the small outlay for breeding stock.

JASON ELEARS.

VARIETY FOR FOWLS.

Variety in feeding, says the "Poultry Yard," is not only highly appreciated by poultry, but in the experience of those who have tried this plan, as well as the most general system of feeding out whole grain only as a regular food, it has been found that the former is much the best toward keeping domestic fowls constantly in good thrift. By variety, we mean both raw and cooked food—meat, vegetables, scraps, green food, corn, oats, rice, barley, wheat, pounded bones, etc. Either for laying fowls, for breeders, or for growing stock, the varied feeding plan is always most beneficial.

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

The New York hay crop promises to be 30,000 bales short; that of the Pacific coast will be larger than usual; the crop in England is light.

The Royal Agricultural Society has issued a new list of prizes for preserved fruits, jams and jellies, made exclusively from fruit of the British Islands.

In consequence of the generally bad crops and bad weather in England, the farming population is giving more attention to fruit growing than formerly.

One of the reasons why so many beginners in poultry raising fail to make poultry pay, is because they crowd 100 fowls into the space which half that number require.

Where persons have fancy fruit to ship, it pays to have the name of it printed neatly and laid in the case on top of the fruit. Buyers are pleased with this idea, and it helps to sell it.

When large quantities of roots are to be stored, and there is no root cellar, it is far better to construct pits than to fill the cellar of the dwelling house with them to vitiate the air of the entire house.

The great preponderance of testimony shows that soft food is better for cattle than is dry feed, and that in the dairy it is no trouble, with plenty of ensilage, to keep up a summer flow of milk all the year.

Lawns are best made by following nature's suggestions. If she has made a swale so be it. If she has rolled up a mound let it alone. We have only to remove roughnesses and inequalities.

In Holland thirty-six dollars yearly per acre is often paid as rent for land on which cows are kept. Yet the Holland dairymen are supposed to make large profits. They hold their cows at a high valuation—an average of $150.

Sunflowers are used in Wyoming Territory for fuel. The stalks, when dry, make a hot fire, and the seed-heads with the seed in are said to burn better than hard coal. An acre of sun-flowers will furnish fuel for one stove for a year.

Healthy fowls pick up their food quickly and relish it. When they go at it lazily, pick up a grain or two and then stop, there is something wrong. At this season it is well to examine closely for lice, and if they are found get rid of them.

A vegetable and small fruit grower of Arlington, raised on less than half an acre, $800 worth of strawberries, besides what were used in the family. The fruit was sold at wholesale rates, and the varieties were Sharpless and Belmont.

Foundation walls for barns and stables should go down deep on low soils that are not well drained. Many walls go to ruin by failure to go a little deeper for the foundation. An exceptionally cold winter may cause damage from frost, and it is always well to bank up as much as possible.

New chestnuts are now to be had. If you wish to plant some select large ones, and if the ground is ready to receive them, plant at once where they are to grow. In planting, put two nuts in a place, using a light iron bar to make the holes, which should be about two or three inches deep. Plant in straight rows three feet apart, each way, so as to use the cultivator for a few years while the trees are young. If you are not ready to plant them now, pack in sand in earthen vessels and keep in a cool cellar.

The sapient warriors who edit the pages of the New York Herald have printed several pages of matter showing how easily Bermuda and Halifax could be captured in case of war. In the case of Halifax it seems there would be two armies of attack. One of them would go by rail, and the other would be thrown across the Bay of Fundy. Dynamite and nitro-gelatine would complete the work of destruction.

LATE CABLE NEWS.

Antecedents of the Last Whitechapel Victim—The Blustering German Emperor.

Nothing more, of course, is known regarding the Whitechapel murder. The newspaper reporters, who might do something, are baffled by police obstruction. London is waiting for a new murder and theorizing about those already committed.

While the women grow more and more terrified, the men, who plainly see they are safe, speculate philosophically as to when the murderer will betray himself. The opinion is growing that the murderer is not insane, and that he is a sailor who commits murders on his periodical returns to town. Many think him a Malay robbed, perhaps, of his savings by some fallen woman, and taking revenge in Malay fashion. Many blood curdling accounts are printed as to the Malay system of running amuck and Malay bloodthirstiness generally.

I have had a talk with Joseph Barnett, alias Kelly, with whom the murdered woman had lived some time before she was killed. He was a very wretched specimen of the human race. The dead woman's real name, he said, was Marie Jeannette Kelly. She was born in Limerick, was 24 years of age, married a coal miner named Davis at 16, and took to street walking in Cardiff after an explosion killed her husband at the end of two years of married life. She went with a ship Captain to France, stayed there some time, came back pretty and well dressed, established herself in the West End of London, drifted to the East End under the influence of drink three years ago, took up with Barnett, alias Kelly, a year after, and was, Kelly tearfully said, a very good girl as long as they lived together. He left her because she was too tender hearted and would allow poor miserable women whom she knew to come in occasionally.

Many who know the present German Emperor as a student, and who have always cherished a poor opinion of that august monarch, will be glad to hear that a young woman of excellent and impartial judgment shares their view. This is a description which this young lady, who saw the Kaiser at Leipsic, gives to him. In the first place, she declares that he is decidedly knock-kneed, which is absolutely true, and which is evident even in many of his photographs, for which his attitudes are carefully studied. He is not tall, and he is not robust. On the contrary, he is slightly built, and gets a more considerable share of his military build and square shoulders from his military tailor than from nature. His deformed arm, for which, of course, he is not responsible, keeps him constantly nervous, appears quite stiff, and is never moved. The welcome given him was not enthusiastic, except that which came from the crowds of military young men. On the whole, he is not anybody's ideal of a conquering hero. This young monarch now poses successfully with a tremendous army as a background for his braggadocio speeches, but it seems, for the present at least, much safer to predict disaster than glory for him when Bismarck dies.

Floods and Droughts.

In the present condition of the Mississippi valley, floods and droughts seriously affect the interests of man. There, as in all other civilized countries, the great seats of population tend to gather on the river-banks. The alluvial lands are in all cases singularly fertile; and the streams themselves afford natural ways of transportation, the value of which does not seem to become lessoned by the great extension of railway systems. In the present condition of these valleys, the fitness of these streams for navigation is progressively diminishing, for both in times of flood and in periods of drought they are unsuited to the uses of commerce. Moreover, in the flood periods, the streams are a very serious menace to all the towns which are gathered along the river-banks. As yet, we have only seen the beginning of these evils; for notwithstanding the extensive settlements in the Mississippi valleys more than half their original forest cover ing remains. When, with the rapid increase of population, these river-basins become as thoroughly subjected to the uses of man as are those of Europe, we have yet greater ills to apprehend.

Prices a Century Ago.

Prices in England in 1788 were, upon an average: Meat, 5d. per lb: baead, 4d. or 5d a quartern loaf; eggs, in spring, 16 or 18 for 4b., fowls, in summer and autumn, 1s.

DUTTON, NOVEMBER 22, 1888.

WEEKLY WEAVINGS.

AND now for Christmas!

MISS M. MCCORMICK returned home last week.

GRIP'S Comic Almanac ready December 1st. Price 10 cents.

MR. JAMES J. CAMPBELL has been appointed postmaster at Iona Station.

THE Feast of Mandomin was partaken of by a large crowd, who seemed to enjoy it immensely.

A NEW or second-hand New Home sewing machine, for sale cheap. Apply at this office.

LARGE quantities of apples are being brought to Dutton for shipment. The apple crop this year exceeded the expectations.

THE question was asked last week if an assessor was eligible for councillor. We are requested to state this week, that he is.

AND still the Elgin Regitrarship is vacant. Coyne or Casey? To Be or not to Be. Do you C the point.—Ridgetown Standard.

D. GILROY, of Shedden, has purchased the farmers' grist mill from J. Lodge and is having it repaired at the Dutton Iron Works.

THANKSGIVING DAY was very generally observed in Ontario. The people of Western Ontario, as a rule, have good cause for thankfulness.

THE sidewalk on Shackleton street has been somewhat repaired and widened, which adds much to the convenience and safety of pedestrians.

WHILE unloosing a dog which was tied up at Commercial stables on Friday, Duncan Paterson was bitten by the viscious brute in the hand. Dr. Leitch dressed the injured member.

J. M. KENNEDY, formerly editor of the Essex Centre Liberal, has sued about fifty subscribers to his paper who have refused or neglected to pay. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

WE would ask each aspirant to municipal office to place an address to the electors in the ENTERPRISE and let us know who are coming out, and their views on the various questions.

DR. LING of Wallacetown, bought Mrs. McPherson's place in Dutton last week, the consideration being $2100. We expect the Dr. will become a resident of Dutton before many months.

REV. MR. GRANT has received a call from the Port Burwell, Malahide Berean and Jubilee Baptist churches, and has accepted it. Enough money has already been pledged to give him a remunerative salary.

A GAME of football was played between the Collegiate Institute club, of Ridgetown, and the High School club in Dutton on Saturday. The game resulted in an easy victory for the home team by 2 goals to 1.

MESSRS. HOCKIN & POOL have just received a case of original Bohemian glassware, in satin and other patterns, which they have added to their large stock of glass and china ware. They ask a call from those who love beauty.

FRITZ H. BEST, baker, brought action against W. M. Evans for the recovery of wages, before L. W. McIntyre, J.P., on Saturday last. The justice gave an order for the payment of $14, being a portion of the claim. C. St. Clair Leitch, of J. M. Glenn's office, appeared for the defendant.

MR. ALBERT PATTERSON, formerly a student of the Dutton High Shool, now attending the Model School, St. Thomas, has been engaged as teacher for the Tyrconnel school for 1889. Mr. Patterson is to be congratulated on his appointment and will, no doubt, be a worthy acquisition to our southern neighbor.

THE new M.C.R. time-table came into effect on Sunday last. The principal alteration is in the mail train, which now leaves Dutton (going east) at 9:09 a m. (slow time.) The express trains still remain the same. The local arrives at 6.34 a.m., but leaves the same as usual, 1 p.m. The morning express does not stop here now.

DR. MCDONALD and lady, of Rodney, spent last Thursday in Dutton. They gave us a call and expressed themselves as being well pleased with the appearance of the village, it being far ahead of their expectations. They heard from their son Hugh recently, and state that he is making good progress in the Medical College, London.

THE SCAFFOLD GAVE WAY.—On Wednesday morning of last week as three men were shingling on a scaffold on Mr. F. J. Lindenman's large stable, West Lorne, it suddenly gave way Mr. Lindenman was on the scaffold at the time and went down with it, a distance of sixteen feet, accompanied by 250 feet of lumber. He fell amongst the timbers below, injuring his side and back, and cutting his left hand badly. The wonder is that he was not killed. He will be all right in a few days. Mr. Trigger and Mr. McFate, who were also on the scaffold, saved themselves by catching on to the girts and escaped with a few bruises.

SEE our new advertisements in this issue.

RETURN of the favorites next Tuesday evening.

THE Hyers Comedy Company appear in Leitch's hall again next Tuesday evening.

MR. JOHN E. ALLISON, Lawrence, has been appointed teacher in S.S. No. 4, Dunwich, for 1889 at a salary of $325.

BOOKED.—Hyers'Comedy Company, Tuesday, 27th; Farmers' Institute meeting, Dec. 5th.

COUNCIL meets next Monday, 26th, and again on Saturday, December 15, according to the new municipal law.

A. N. C. BLACK, the newly appointed Fourth Division Court clerk, went to West Lorne and took charge on Tuesday, 20th.

C. ST. CLAIR LEITCH was at Sarnia this week, and he states that it was reported to him that there were twelve cases of small pox there.

MISS HAZLITT, Captain of the Salvation Army, and Cadet McKague farewelled with the Army here last night and leave to-day for other parts.

D. MCCALLUM, of West Lorne, son of the bailiff, and well known in this section, died very suddenly last week. The funeral took place last Sabbath.

C. DOYLE returned from his wedding trip last Friday. He has bought the house and lot of Mr. Campbell on Centre street and has commenced housekeeping.

WOOD.—In the language of the Arthur Enterprise will those who promised "please bring us some wood—wooden wood," and "would" you do it at once.

WHILE playing in the house on Tuesday, Georgie, son of Sam Wilton, fell, striking his head on a sharp corner of some piece of furniture, inflicting a nasty gash above his eye. Dr. McKillop put a stitch in the wound.

WE invite correspondence from all parts of the county on matters of public interest. A young man or woman can spend an hour each week with profit to themselves in jotting down items of interest in their localities for this paper.

THE Colored Comedy Co. that gave an entertainment in Dutton a few weeks ago will return on Tuesday. They were unable to give their best play that time on account of Mrs. Hyers, one of the principal actors, being sick. She having improved, we believe the audience will be carried away with their next appearance.

A MEETING of the Farmers' Institute will be held in Leitch's Hall, Dutton, on Wednesday December 5. The Hon. C. Drury, Minister of Agriculture, will be present and deliver an address. Papers will be prepared by local talent. The farmers of West Elgin should turn out well to these meetings, as they are profitable and in their interests.

REV. W. GRANT occupied the pulpit of the Baptist church last Sabbath evening. Owing to it not being announced until during the day, the unfavorable weather and there being three other services at the same time, the house was not so well filled as usual, but, we presume, those who were there were glad to hear him again. Mr. Grant purposes moving this week to Port Burwell, where he has been engaged.

MR. HOLLINGSHEAD states that he recently received a letter from a large grain dealer in Glasgow stating that the old country grain market will be ruled by the imports from Russia this year—not what the Americans sell at, but what the English can buy Russian wheat at; they would set the price on the imports from America, just by way of retaliation, as it were. This dealer had bought a million bushels which were to be shipped to his port.

JAMES CURRIE, farmer, of Dutton, aged 30 years, was committed to jail by Mr. D. McGregor, J. P., of West Lorne, on Saturday, on the charge of being insane and dangerous to be at large. He has of late been threatening Mr. John J. Stalker, using foul and insulting language to him, stoning his house and otherwise acting in a decidedly cranky manner. Currie will be examined by Dr. VanBuskirk, jail surgeon.—Journal.

THE Lyons correspondent of the Belmont Times, in a purile attempt to be "funny," reported the marriage of a young couple of that place when such was not the case. The editor has been subject to censure and a good deal of annoyance through the would-be smartness of his addle-pated correspondent. Correspondents, when writing under a nom-de-plume, think they have a certain liberty not possessed by others, but such is not the case, and they can be made directly responsible for their own utterances.

JOHN VENER, the man who was arrested as being implicated in the Otterville elopement case, has been sent for trial by the Otterville magistrates. He is now in Woodstock jail. The female in this case is the wife of Oliver Kenney, a mason, who worked in Dutton for a few weeks three or four years ago. Vener is Kenney's brother-in-law, his wife having been Kenney's only sister, who died some time ago. Vener and Kenney's wife are both English, and it appears they were starting for the Old Country.

THE Thanksgiving services and teameeeting, held at Wallacetown on Thursday last under the auspicies of the Dutton, Wallacetown and Tyrconnell Methodist churches, was a decided success. An eloquent and instructive sermon was preached in the afternoon by the pastor, Rev. E. Middleton, after which tea was served in Drumgould's hall, and which was partaken of by a large number. In the evening an entaiment was held in the church. Speeches were made by Revs. Middleton and Kelso, and Meredith Conn. Music was furnished by the united chiors of the three churches. Dr. Ruthven occupied the chair. Proceeds $55, to be applied to the parsonage fund.

LEG BROKEN.—In the football match between the town and High School on Thanksgiving Day a sad accident befel one of the High School players, Arthur Leitch, son of Dr. Leitch. It appears that Arthur had the ball, and in attempting to check J. Grant, who was about to kick it, put out his foot, when he received the full force of the kick on his leg, breaking it above the ankle. He was immediately conveyed to his home and his injuries attended to. The accident is sincerely regretted by all, but by no one more than the young man who so innocently caused it.

THE Feast of Mandomin, or corn festival, given by the ladies of the Presbyterian church in Leitch's hall, on Thursday evening of last week, was well attended, and the corn prepared in its many ways made the tables look very tempting. Not being qualified to give the menu in full, we will let that pass, but believe all who attended "vash glad they vash there." The programme of the entertainment was not fully carried out, owing to the accident which happened to A. E. Leitch in the morning. Other talent was supplied which proved very acceptable, while all did well. We make special mention of Miss A. McIntyre for the commendable manner in which she gave two recitations and J. Dagan, who delighted the audience with his songs. He was on the programme for only one piece, but when heard he was encored, and by request gave another song and was again encored. We believe that in future, Mr. Dagan will have plenty of chances to display his musical talents. James Pool occupied the chair to the satisfaction of the audience. Proceeds, $35.

WHY THEY GAVE THANKS.

The Farmers.—Because wheat is $1.10 a bushel.

Small Boy's Mother.—Because the gun didn't explode.

"Watchman."—Because the Shackleton street sidewalk has been repaired.

Charles E. Doyle.—Because——Well, everybody knows why Charlie gave thanks.

The Hotel-keepers.—Because the Scott Act is not enforced as some would like it to be.

A. N. C. Black.—Because the Division Court clerkship has been satisfactoriiy settled.

The Editor.—Because the wood pile is still holding out, and a few delinquents are "returning home."

Successful Merchants.—For the satisfactory results which have followed from a liberal use of printers' ink this fall.

Everybody.—Because "our lines have fallen in pleasant places."

What the People Want to Know.

If there will ever be an incorporated village in West Elgin?

If there is not a good chance for Dutton to hold the proud distinction of being the first?

How long our merchants intend tolerating "squatters" in their places of business?

If Dutton will not soon be well supplied with doctors?

Why the law for the prevention of cruelty to animals is not enforced in Dutton?

Who will get the West Elgin registrarship?

Who the female is that has such a penchant for jewelry?

Who will succeed the present S. A. officers?

If we are going to have a hard winter?

TO HELP YOUR TOWN.

Talk about it.
Write about it.
Beautify your streets.
Be friendly to everybody.
Keep your sidewalks in good repair.
Sell all you can and buy all you can at home.
If you are rich, invest it in something; employ somebody.
Be courteous to strangers that come among you, so that they can go away with good impressions.
Always cheer on the men who go in for improvements. Your portion of the cost will be nothing but what is just.
Don't "kick" at any proposed improvement because it is not at your own door, or because your taxes will be raised 50 cents.

TO HURT YOUR TOWN.

Oppose improvements.
Mistrust its public men.
Run it down to strangers.
Go to some other town to trade.
Refuse to advertise in your own paper.
Do not invest a cent. Lay your money out somewhere else.
Be particular to discredit the motives of public-spirited men.
Refuse to see the merit in any scheme that does not directly benefit you.
Lengthen your face when a stranger speaks of locating in your place.
If a man wants to buy your property charge him two prices for it.
If he wants anybody else's, interfere and discourage.

IONA.

Mr. S. Piper has been engage as teacher for 1889 in S.S. No. 5, Dunwich.

Mrs. William Lumley of Tilbury, is at present visiting friends in this vicinity.

J. W. Brown has been re-engaged as teacher at Iona Station for 1889.

Messrs. D. McLean and D. Black are mentioned as candidates for councillor in ward No. 4, Dunwich.

Charles Lumley, who had his fingers badly mangled in a corn husker recently, is doing as well as can be expected.

McIntyre Bros. have added much to the appearance of their farm by opening a new lane and building a bridge at the road.

WEST LORNE.

Everybody reports business good.

The roads are very bad at present here.

Snow fell last week here. Look out for cold weather.

The Rev. C. T. Scott was made the recipient of a bouncing baby girl on Monday last. His reverence smiles over it.

Rev. O. C. Carey was made the recipient of a $55 hair cloth parlor suit, purchased by his admirers recently from T. Harris.

F. J. Lindenman has his new barn about completed. It is a fine one, and when painted will be an ornament as well as being useful.

Mr. Ed. Chail has his new wagon shop about completed. He intends putting another fire in his blacksmith shop. This is an indication that business is good. Mr. W. Clark will have charge of the blacksmith shop.

We are sorry to report the sudden death of Mr. Duncan McCallum, of this place. The funeral took place on Sunday last and was largely attended, showing the esteem in which he was held in the community. His remains were interred in the Gillies cemetery.

PERSONS who hold strayed animals in their premises, and which have not been advertised, are running the risk of a heavy fine. The law requires all strayed animals to be advertised for three weeks in a local paper and the failure to comply leaves the holder of the animals liable. Not only is it right, but it would be a great convenience if strictly followed out, for then the loser of an animal would save days and weeks of sometimes useless hunting for them, by reading his paper.

THE person who furnishes items to the newspaper is always a valuable friend to the editor. Many persons hesitate about sending personal notes to the newspaper regarding the movements of their friends, lest the newspaper men would think them anxious to see their names in print. He will think nothing of the kind, but, on the contrary, he is glad to obtain such notes. Many seemingly unimportant items, when printed, are news to a large number of readers.

Sick headache caused by excess of bile or a disordered stomach is promptly relieved by using National Pills.

One hundred and thirty six convictions have been secured by Mr. Robertson, the Scott Act Inspector for West Middlesex, since February 1st, 1887.

CURED BY B.B.B. WHEN ALL ELSE FAILED.
Mr. Samuel Allan, of Lisle, Ont., states that he tried all the doctors in his locality while suffering for years with Liver and Kidney trouble; nothing benefited him until he took Burdock Blood Bitters, four bottles of which cured him.

Dr. N. D. Gunn, of St. Marys, has been appointed Canadian correspondent of the American Journal of Medical Science.

Consumption may be more easily prevented than cured. The irritating and harrassing cough will be greatly relieved by the use of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam that cures coughs, colds, bronchitis and all pulmonary troubles.

Vandegrift, who will be remembered as the the intrepid actor, who with his companion Bready made the balloon ascensions at the Western Fair in September last has met a tragic fate. While making a balloon ascension at Columbus, Ga., on Friday the balloon suddenly burst when it had reached an altitude of half a mile and began to descend to the ground rapidly. Vandegrift cut the rope which held the parachute and for a time it seemed that he would escape death. The parachute fell near the centre of the Chattahoochie river, and Vandegrift was drowned in spite of the efforts of two men in a boat to save him.

Martyrs to Headache
Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.
The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.
Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.
"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."
"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."
Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."
When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Ayer's Pills are always ready for use. They are sugar coated, easy to take, and sure to bring relief and cure. They are effectual in all disorders of the stomach and digestive organs.
WILL COST A COOL MILLION.—It is now stated that the Times' share of expenses in the Parnell Commission will reach at least £100,000. Mr. Parnell's expenses fall not far short of that figure. How he will meet them is puzzling, as only £23,000 has thus far been subscribed for the use of the Irish leader.
Do you suffer from indigestion, or loss of appetite? Are you troubled with liver or kidney complaint? Take Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This preparation purifies and vitalizes the blood, thus restoring health and strength to the digestive and assimulative organs. Try it.
Three Mormon elders had an interview with the Canadian Minisiter of Customs on Wednesday, the 14th. The delegation asked, among other things, an assurance from the Government that those who had three or four wives should be left in peace if they brought them into Canada, but they were quickly told they would receive no such assurance and must conform to the law.
Two London hotel-keepers, Edward Panton and Henry Brimsmead, were each fined $20 for selling liquor during prohibited hours. At Glencoe Monday P. M. Noble inflicted the following fines, with costs, for violation of the Scott Act: D. Kelly, Mosa, $100; C. McCraig, Strathburn, $50; F. McNulty, Melbourne, $100; H. Simpson, Glencoe, $100.

THE MODUS OPERANDI.
The mode of operating of Burdock Blood Bitters is that it acts at once and at the same time upon the Stomach, Liver, Bowels, Kidneys and the Blood, to cleanse, regulate and strenthen. Hence its almost universal value in all Chronic Complaints.
A young man named Ernest Mills, 18 years of age, was struck by No. 9 M.C.R. express at Woodslee station one day last week and instantly killed. Mills had been standing on the crossing, together with a number of young men, and stepped off as the train approached. He then started wrestling with one of his companions and in endeavoring to break loose ran against the engine of the express train, which knocked him into the ditch.
A QUARTER OF A CENTURY.
For more than twenty-five years has Hagyard's Yellow Oil been sold by druggists, and it has never yet failed to give satisfaction as a household remedy for pain, lameness and soreness of the flesh, for external and internal use in all painful complaints.
The post office department will soon issue a new style of postal card. It is much like the double card of the present pattern. The back folds are split diagonally and open like a pointed star. The four corners are folded and joined in the centre, when the card is ready for mailing, with a piece of gummed paper. The card weighs less than half an ounce, and will contain no more writing than the present card, the only advantage being greater privacy.

What Constitutes a Faithful Employe.
An exchange says: Every faithful employe will constitue himself the guardian of his employer's property. The man who will either wilfully waste what is intrusted to his care, or encourage such waste in others, is unworthy of confidence, and, should he ever become the head of a business, will deserve to be treated the same way.
There is a vast deal of truth in the above, adds the Industrial World, and yet how many workmen there are who squander not only the property of their employers, but, what is equally valuable the time which the latter pays for.
Workmen do not seem to know that the prosperity of a manufacturing concern oftentimes depends upon the observation of the closest economy. The enlargement of the wage fund depends on this economy, and any fair minded employer would rather expend in wages the amount saved by economical observance than have the amount wasted. A little waste here and there that seem so trivial to the workman, when scattered through a great number of hands amounts in the total to a large sum. When a workman, sees the first evidence of a machine getting out of order, by drawing the attention of the proper parties he may save an expensive bill of repairs and also a considerable loss consequent upon the idleness of the machine while undergoing repairs. The careless workman says, "It is none of my business whether the machine gets out of repair or not," and so lets it run on until it is entirely disabled. A workman observes a quantity of material carelessly left where it will deteriorate or be spoiled. Instead of taking care of it, or notifying the manager or superintendent, he allows it to remain and be destroyed or injured, consoling himself with the thought that "it his none of his loss anyway." Perhaps he observes a brother workman willfully wasting or injuring the material upon which the latter is working. Duty would tell him to inform the foreman of such a direliction on the part of his fellow-laborer, but he does not, for lack of interest in his employer's welfare. He may see where a saving could be made in the manipulation of the material upon which he is working, yet from lack of interest he refrains from making any suggestions leading to the discovery of that fact. Not infrequently the workman refrains from protecting his employer's rights and property because by so doing it will entail additional care or labor upon himself, or impose a responsibility which he does not care to assume. Some seem to think there is no obligation incurred by them when engaging themselves to work except such as is included in the rule of "doing the least work for the most pay." Such men shuffle through their labors, slighting the work here, wasting material there, squandering all the time they can, and thinking of no one's interests save their own. This class of workmen are the first to be dismissed when hard times come. Self-interest teaches the manufacturer to give the best places and the largest remuneration to his most faithful workmen. This is not only natural, but right and commendable. The employe who thinks most of doing his work well and of subserving his employer's interests, and less of combinations and strikes, will succeed the best and rise the highest and most rapidly in the scale of prosperity.

To Assist Nature
In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral
the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.
L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."
Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with Lung Trouble.
For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

The White Ants of Africa.

The white ant is blind; it has many enemies, and can never procure food until it comes above ground. How does it solve the difficulty? It takes the ground out along with it. I have seen white ants working on the top of a high tree, and yet it was underground with them to the tree-top; just as the Esquimaux heap snow up, building it into the ice tunnel huts in which they live, so the white ants collect earth, but for some depths underneath the ground, and plaster it into tunnelled ways. Occasionally these run along the ground, but more often mount in endless ramification to the tops of trees, meandering along every branch and twig, here and there debouching into large covered chambers which occupy half the girth of the trunk. Millions of trees in some districts are thus fantastically plastered over with tubes, galleries and chambers of earth, and many pounds' weight of subsoil must be brought up for the mining of even a single tree.

Peering over the growing wall one soon discovers one, two or more termites of a somewhat larger build, considerably longer, and especially of the mandibles. These important-looking individuals saunter about the rampart in the most leisurely way, but yet with a certain air of business, as if, perhaps, one was the master of works and the other the architect. They are posted there as sentries, and there they stand, or promenade about, at the mouth of every tunnel, like Sister Ann, to see if anybody is coming. Sometimes somebody does come in the shape of another ant—the real ant this time, not the defenceless neuropte on, but some valiant and belted knight from the warlike formicide. Single, or in troops, this rapacious little insect, fearless in its chitonous coat of mail, charges down the tree trunk, its antennæ, waving defiance to the enemy and its cruel mandibles thirsting for termite blood.

The worker white ant is a poor, defenceless creature, and blind and unarmed, would fall an immediate prey to those well-drilled banditti who forage about in every tropical forest in unnumbered legion. But at the critical moment, like Goliath from the Philistines, the soldier termite advances to the fight. With a few sweeps of its scythe-like jaw it clears the ground, and while the attacking patry is carrying off its dead, the builders, unconscious of the fray, quietly continue their work. To every 100 workers in a white ant colony, which numbers many thousands of individuals, there are perhaps two of these fighting men. The division here is very wonderful, and the fact that besides those two specialized forms there are in every post two other kind of the same insect, the kings and queens, shows the remarkable height to which civilization in these communities has attained:

These mounds are built into a mesh-work of tunnels, galleries and chambers, where the social interests of the community are attended to. The most spacious of these chambers, usually far underground, is very properly allocated to the head of the society, the queen. The queen termite is a very rare insect, and as there are seldom more than one, or at most two, to a colony, and as the royal apartments are hidden far in the earth, few persons have ever seen a queen, and indeed most if they did happen to come across it, from its singular appearance, would refuse to believe that it had any connection with the white ants. Her one duty in life is to lay eggs, and it must be confessed she discharges her function with complete success, for in a single day her progeny often amounts to many thousands.

"IN THE SOUP."

Two Theories as to the Origin of this Latest Bit of Popular Slang.

Everybody who is running for office, together with every party that is running a candidate, is, according to one statement or another, "in the soup." Outside of politics, the same fact is observable. Everything and everybody that doesn't just suit everybody else is sure to be consigned by somebody or other to "the soup." The world, in fact, seems to have become an immense tureen, and all its inhabitants are floating around like chopped vegetables in a julienne. Why this should be so, and why the "in the soup" idea should be uppermost now in the mind of every citizen who wants to say something funny, is not more apparent than was, awhile ago, the reason for every one being inclined to tell every one else to "Let her go, Gallagher." The origin of both expressions is involved in obscurity.

"In the soup" first achieved classic authority, so far as can now be ascertained, in one of the picturesque stories of what are called "sporting" events. The event was the arrival in America last fall of Kilrain, the pugilist. The situation was that the big Cunarder Etruria, with the pugilist aboard, lay in the darkness off Quarantine, waiting for morning, and a tug with Kilrain's friends aboard, was hovering about, anxious to get Kilrain off and bring him up to the city. The Captain of the Etruria had announced with a severity that seemed unnecessary that no such drunken crew should come anywhere near his vessel. The disconsolate but not unhappy crowd on the tug had to content itself with howling greetings to Kilrain across a watery gulf that separated the two vessels. One of the men on the tug, Johnston by name, was so anxious to get as near Kilrain as possible that he tumbled overboard. One of his companions, witnessing this act, instead of assailing the still depths of the darkness that brooded over the waves by shouts for help, or shocking the calm stars overhead with frantic cries for a rope, simply balanced himself against the rail and called out:

"Ho! Johnston's fell in de soup!"

The sublime audacity of the comparison of the great Atlantic to a plate of soup was wasted on the drunken crew that heard it, but the waves chuckled gleeful ripples against the tug's sides, the stars twinkled merrily, and next morning, when people read about it, it tickled the public fancy so that the new slang became quickly the pet expression of the day, and by this time it has attained just about ripeness enough to make it ready to pick any lay a way along with Mr. Gallagher and other slang once of repute.

Nobody knows just where this "in the soup" expression came from, but two ingenious theories have been broached to a reporter who attempted to trace the "soup" to its lair—to its kettle, as it were. Mr. Gaffney, who is the language sharp of the "Police Gazette," says that the expression first became current in sporting circles about eight or ten months ago, but that for long before that he remembered to have heard the street gamins cry after a drunkerd man that he was "full o' soup" and he also thinks that among criminals the expression "he's got in soup" was used to express the idea that a person has fallen into the hands of the law, and was locked up. From using "soup" to express the idea of drunkeness the step was to make it cover the misfortune to which drunkenness led, and so to convey the idea of any misfortune, so that "in the soup" came to have its present significance.

The police, on the other hand, say that they never heard of the expression "in soup" being used by criminals to mean imprisonment. They derive the phrase, "in the soup," from an entirely different source, the theatre, and make his original spelling 'supe." "He's the supe," according to this theory, was first a contemptuous designation of an actor's place, classing him among the supernumaries, and then a general expression of contempt for anything, so growing naturally into its present significance.

Neither of these theories of the derivation of the slang may be right. They fit suspiciously well, and have a "made to order" air about them. But any body who thinks he has a better theory is welcome to try it on.

The Mocking Bird on Guard.

This amusing songster, so highly esteemed in the countries to which it is imported, is almost as common in some parts of Central America as the robins are in our country lanes. Free in the woods they learn to imitate a number of birds so correctly as to deceive any one. The mocking bird is by no means weak or timid, and can defend itself against a score of other birds, as we have more than once had occasion to see. They are quarelsome, living alone, except at certain seasons when they seek mates, soon to separate again.

The mocking bird selects some tree, particularly that called palma real, or royal palm, and makes it its headquarters as soon as the fruit is ripe, appearing like clusters of golden berries beneath the broad waving leaves. The bird in possession of the tree devotes his time and attention to guarding the fruit. He cannot possibly eat it all, but will allow no other a share of it, and this is not so much because he thinks of the morrow as because he loves to dispute. He pretends to be not at home while all the time he is lying in wait. He will perch on the roof of the nearest house, or if away from habitations, on another tree, keeping as silent as a mouse does when a cat is hard by, not even indulging in "forty winks." The instant some bright winged songster alights among that yellow fruit, down swoops the watcher, and trouble ensues, generally ending in the unwelcome visitor being driven off as hungry as he came, temper and feathers both ruffled. Then back to the housetop or tree flies the mocker to await patiently another adversary.

The natives of Honduras and adjoining countries take the fledglings from their nest and bring them up on corn, boiled, ground, and mixed with water to the consistency of dough. They thrive well on it, and having had one wing clipped, are left free in house and garden, subsisting on earthworms and other insects; but they generally become in the end the prey of cats.

Destructive School Methods.

The originality and native precocity of youth are often lost in the automatic drills of the class-room. Incipient talent and genius must die out in the mind of the possessor from sheer lack of appreciation and sympathy on the part of those to whom the youth trustingly looks for aid and encouragement. Perhaps it would be regarded as extravagant to assert that the end of a long course of instruction leaves nine-tenths of graduates wholly at the mercy of the world which they have been taught to believe themselves fitted to enter and conquer. They may soon discover, however, that the wide fields of experience and knewledge are yet before them, and that the inclination and disposition for their further pursuit have been left dull and apathetic by the scholastic training received. Books and literature are now distasteful to them. They will be but too happy to ignore the classics; history has been studied too much. Admit that their minds have been filled with the elements of knowledge, that their intellectual powers have been disciplined and strengthened till they are sinewy and tough, how is it that the mind which comes to the tasks of life with a training and knowledge gained out of the schools, by reading, private study, and self-help, often measures up to, nay, out strips the college-bred mind? The question is easily answered: The methods of the schools destroy originality and versatility of mind by anticipating and preventing the self-help necessary to give every mind self-reliance and independent power.

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN.

Care of the Complexion.

Quite a discussion has been held lately, in some of the New York papers, relative to the proper care of the complexion. Advice has been given by a lot of the most prominent actresses and "beauty women," telling how to preserve or purify the skin. But they all agree on one point at least—that is, that good health is the first requisite for a good complexion. "Out-door exercise and plentiful bathing," says one pretty singer. A good many of these women, however, say that they never actually wash their faces, a peculiarity we should be very slow to copy. There is no doubt, however, that to preserve a delicate bloom one should be sparing of ice-cold water, it should be tepid water; either very hot or very cold should be avoided. Rubbing a lather over the face is injurious to many delicate skins; a little in the water should be sufficient for cleanliness, and the skin is softer if it is rubbed with the hands, instead of a coarse wash-cloth.

To keep the face and lips soft and smooth, they should be annointed daily with cold cream or glycerine and rose water—a little experience will prove which is best suited to one's use. But a clear and rosy skin not only means good health; it is often the index of good temper into the bargain. Bad temper, fretting and worrying are usually quite as detrimental to the complexion as bad health. We can't all be angelic in disposition, but we can at least take life easily. Advice to the girl who wants to cultivate or to keep a good complexion may be easily summed up: Don't fret. Don't chew gum. Don's stay in-doors more than you can help. Don't drink too much tea or coffee. Don't eat all manner of trash, and too much of it at that. Don't neglect regular and frequent bathing. Don't stay up late, but have regular hours for sleeping as for everything else. Bear in mind all these "Don'ts," and you will have little use for powder.

A Warning to English Women.

A correspondent of a London paper writes as follows: Allow me to utter an oft-repeated and oft-neglected warning to English girls about to marry Frenchmen. It does not yet seem to be understood, as it ought to be, that though a woman may be married to a Frenchman according to all the forms of English law, she is not necessarily married in France. The French law still requires that the absurd and antiquated form of asking the head of the bridegroom's family to consent to a marriage shall be gone through; and if this is omitted the marriage is invalid. A very sad case came under my own cognizance recently. A young Frenchman, visiting in this country, became engaged to a young English lady. Enquiries were made, the gentleman's position and prospects appeared satisfactory, the affection was mutual, and the marriage was duly solemnized in the parish church and before a registrar. The latter precaution was taken because it appears to have been thought by the bride's friends that only a civil marriage was recognized in France. But nobody had thought of enquiring whether the bridegroom, a man of independent means, twenty-seven years of age, had troubled to ask anyone's leave before he got married. The man took his wife over to France, and a couple of years afterwards coolly informed her that they were not married at all! Apparently there was no redress for the unmarried wife who had to return to her relatives with this indelible stigma upon her. For the credit of human nature we may hope that such cases are rare; but English parents and guardians ought to know that it is possible for them to occur.

Neatly Nabbed.

A lady and gentleman were travelling together on an English railway. They were perfect strangers to each other. Suddenly the gentleman said: "Madam, I will trouble you to look out of the window for a few minutes. I am going to make some changes in my wearing apparel." "Certainly, sir," she replied with politeness, rising and turning her back upon him. In a short time he said: "Now, madam, my change is complete, and you may resume your seat." When the lady turned she beheld her male companion turned into a dashing lady, with a heavy veil over her face. "Now, sir or madam, whichever you like," said the lady, "I must trouble you to look out of the window, for I also have some changes to make in my apparel." "Certainly, madam," and the gentleman in lady's attire immediately complied. "Now, sir, you may resume your seat." To his great surprise, on resuming seat, the gentleman in female attire found his lady companion transformed into a man. He then laughed and said: "It appears that we are both anxious to avoid recognition. What have you done? I have robbed a bank!" "And I," said the whilom lady, as he dexterously fettered his companion's wrists with a pair of handcuffs, "I am Detective J——, of Scotland Yard, and in female apparel have shadowed you; now," drawing a revolver, "keep still!"

Notes.

In beas, now so fashionable, the longer they are the better. They should almost touch the ground.

Catarrh is not simply an inconvenience, unpleasant to the sufferer and disgusting to others—it is an advanced outpost of approaching disease of worse type. Do not neglect its warning; it brings deadly evils in its train. Before it is too late, use Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It reaches the seat of the ailment, and is the only thing that will. You may dose yourself with quack medicines 'till it is too late—'till the streamlet becomes a resistless torrent. It is the matured invention of a scientific physician. Rattlesnakes as Food.

It is said of a strong political partizan that he would swallow rattlesnakes if party interests demanded it. It is only men of this sort who, without protest, swallow the large, old-fashioned pills. Sensible people, requiring medicine to cleanse their systems, invariably use Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They are unrivaled in all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels.

Style.

The most fashionable color, at present, is the hue of health, and it will never go out of style. Its shades and tints are various, but all of them are exceedingly becoming. It is perfectly astonishing what a change is being daily wrought by Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription in the looks of sickly women. Sufferers from any sort of "female weakness" or irregularity, backache or nervous prostration should give it trial. All druggists.

"The Racer" Thin Back, Lance-Tooth, Cross-Cut Saw

The Maple Leaf Racer and Lance Cross cut saws are now sold in all parts of the world. The quality of these saws is unequalled. Their excellence is wholly due to their superior temper, the process of which is kept a profound secret by Shurly & Dietrich, the manufacturers of these saws. One of the best evidences of their superior quality is that other saw manufacturers put on the market as close an imitation of these saws as they are able to produce, and represent it to be as good as the Maple Leaf saw. They run their saw upon one name until the public become familiar

The Measure of Wealth

There are very few rich men in this world, from the standpoint of the possessor of wealth. The term rich is comparative only, and the possessor of property is never rich in his own opinion, while there are others who have more than he has. In the piling up of money the builders of fortunes are apt to cultivate a sense of pleasure in mere possession; and then for them, there is no end to the race for more.

At varying intervals there are noted the deaths of some individuals whom the world deemed poor, but who in reality died in possession of large fortunes. A month ago one Daniel Lee died at Plainfield, N. J., in a tumble-down shanty, and left for a brother who lived in poverty with him fully $500,000. With persons of this character the enjoyment of the possession of money exceeds the pleasure and comfort which money can purchase. Lee was a miser; but he was a miser only to the extent of his denial to himself of the comforts which money can purchase. In the purchase of luxuries one cannot go beyond the limits of his wants—when satiety is reached the extreme value of money has been attained, and beyond that point the miser of Plainfield, N. J., is no more a miser than other possessors of money beyond their own personal needs who do not put it to commercial or benevolent uses.

To have more than somebody else may make a man feel happy, but the richer of the two may be unable to enjoy more, or even obtain more, of the world's comforts than the other. In the light of reason, the man who enjoys the world's good things as he goes along through life is the rich man. When he pays nature's last debt his will may divide less money among his heirs than that of the man who denies himself luxuries and gives rein to his pleasure in mere possession; but he will die rich in the knowledge that he got out of his earthly existence about as much as life can give to any man.

The merchant and the manufacturer who find life's pleasure in extending their business and employing large numbers of their fellow beings are richer even than he who enjoys life and pays little heed to the accumulation of more than a competency. For them there is enjoyment in living for the comfort that money can purchase for them individually, and for the good they can do for others with wealth in excess of the amount necessary for their every personal want. Men of this commendable spirit are the truly rich men of this world, and the money they possess is happily earned.

Children and children's children cannot be insured against want with millions of money. If they are improvident wealth will slip through their fingers, and the last dollar of the bank account will finally be reached. Money has been a curse and the lack of it a blessing to many young people; therefore when one equips his children with healthy bodies and a good education he prepares them well for the race in life which many of them will make better without than with a big financial start.

Pancakes.

How dear to my heart is the food of my childhood
When poor hotel dinners recall it to view:
The chickens, the partridges shot in the wild wood
And all kinds of jam that my infancy knew.
The plump fat old turkey with cranberries nigh it,
The mince pies which often I ate with such joy,
But best of them all and I cannot deny it,
Were those good buckwheat pancakes, I ate when a boy.

Those good buckwheat pancakes, those excellent pancakes.
Those unrivaled pancakes I ate when a boy.

That old pancake griddle I nailed as a measure,
For at noon or at night, when returned from my toil,
I found it the source of an exquisite pleasure,
Far better than food that you roast, bake or boil.
How ardent I seized them with countenance glowing,
And unto the table did bear them with joy.
And soon to my mouth mighty fragments were going
Of those good buckwheat pancakes I ate when a boy.

Those good buckwheat pancakes, those excellent pancakes
Those unrivaled pancakes I ate when a boy

How nice from the griddle right hot to receive them,
To swallow them quickly and then call for more,
Not even ambrosia would tempt me to leave them,
When once they had entered my mouth's open door.
And oft when pursuing my way through life's wildwood,
And learning a bit of it's sorrow and joy,
My fancy returns to the scenes of my childhood
And those good buckwheat pancakes I ate when a boy.

Those good buckwheat pancakes, those excellent pancakes
Those unrivaled pancakes I ate when a boy

The Coal Miner's Strike.

If the coal strike in England actually takes place, it will be the most formidable movement of organized labor that has ever occurred. It has been estimated that it would throw out of work 240,000 men and boys, representing with their families, quite 1,000,000 people. The object of the proposed strike is to secure an increase in wages of 10 per cent., this corresponding to the reduction in wages that was made three years ago. At the time of the cut down the coal trade of England was in an exceedingly depressed condition, and it was generally admitted, even by the miners themselves, that a reduction in wages was inevitable. But within the last twelve or eighteen months the coal business has improved, though the owners of the mines assert that the improvement consists in larger sales, but not in increased prices. However, there seems to be a difference of opinion on this subject, for the mine owners in Lancashire offered to increase the pay of their men 5 per cent. without condition, and even 10 per cent. if the mine owners in other parts of England made corresponding increase. But the conditions of mutual support made it impossible for the Lancashire miners to accept this proposition, though it was understood that quite a number of them were favorable to it. The trouble with coal mining in England is that prior to 1875 the prices of coal were abnormally high, which led to the opening and developing of a large number of mines, so that the average output has frequently been considerably greater than the ordinary consumption, thus leading to an inevitable decline in prices.

Spiritual Freedom.

Take away ignorance, misunderstandings and forgeries remain and the naked truth,—not a spectre, thank God! carefully to be veiled, but an image of divine beauty, radiant with eternal truth. Break down the bars which separate us from the communion of the primitive church—I mean, free yourselves from the letter of later canons, and conventional abstractions—and you move unshackled in the open ocean of faith. You hold fellowship with the spirits of the heroes of Christian antiquity, and you trace the stream of unity as it rolls uninterruptedly through eighteen centuries, in spite of rocks and quicksands.

CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Comprehensive Talkers.

Comprehensive talkers are apt to be tiresome when we are not athirst for information, but, to be quite fair, we must admit that reticence is a good deal due to lack of matter. Speech is often barren; but silence does not necessarily brood over a full nest. Your still fowl, blinking at you without remark, may all the while be sitting on one addled nest-egg; and when it takes to cackling, will have nothing to announce but that addled delusion.

GEORGE ELIOT.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—(CONTINUED)

When the hired man from the mews behind flung open the drawing-room door in his lordly way and announced in a very loud voice, "Mrs Bouverie Barton and Mrs. Hugh Massinger," neither Warron nor Edie was in the front room to hear the startling announcement, which would certainly for the moment have taken their breath away. For communications between the houses of Relf and Massinger had long since ceased. But Warren and Edie were both up-stairs. So Winifred and her hostess passed idly in (just shaking hands by the doorway with good old Mrs. Relf, who never by any chance caught anybody's name) and mingled shortly with the mass of the visitors. Winifred was very glad indeed of that, for she wanted to escape observation. Sir Anthony's report had been far from reassuring. She preferred to remain as much in the background as possible that afternoon: all she wished was merely to observe and to listen.

As she stood there mingling with the general crowd and talking to some chance acquaintance of old London days, she happened to overhear two scraps of conversation going on behind her. The first was one that mentioned no names: and yet, by some strange feminine instinct she was sure it was of herself the speakers were talking.

"Oh Yes," one voice said in a low tone, with the intonation that betrays a furtive side-glance; "She's far from strong—in fact, very delicate. He married her for her money—of course: that's clear. She hadn't much else, poor little thing, except a certain short-lived beauté du diable, to recommend her. And she has no go in her; she won't live long. You remember what Galton remarks about heiresses? They are generally the last decadent members, he says, of a moribund stock whose strength is failing. They bear no children, or if any, weaklings: most of them break down with their first infant; and they die at last prematurely of organic feebleness. Why, he just sold himself outright for the poor girl's property; that's the plain English of it; and now I hear, with his extravagant habits, he's got himself after all into monetary difficulties."

"Agricultural depression?" the second voice inquired—an old man's and louder.

"Worse than that, I fear; agricultural depression and an encroaching sea. Besides which, he spends too freely.—But excuse me, Dr. Moutrie," in a very low tone: "I'm afraid the lady's rather near us."

Winifred strained her ears to the utmost to here the rest; but the voices had sunk too low now to catch a sound. Even as she did so, another voice, far more distinct, from a lady in front, caught her attention, with the name "Miss Challoner." Winifred pricked up her ears incontinently. Could it be of her Elsie that those two were talking?

"Oh, yes," the second lady addressed made answer cheerfully; "she was very well when we last saw her in April at San Remo. We had the next villa to the Relfs on the hillside, you know. But Miss Challoner doesn't come to England now; she was going as usual to St Martin de Lantosque to spend the summer, when we left the Riviera. She always goes there as soon as the San Remo season's over."

"How did the Relfs first come to pick her up?' the other speaker asked curiously.

"Oh, I fancy it was Mr. Warren Relf himself who made her acquaintance somewhere unearthly down in Suffolk, where she used to be a governess. He's always there, I believe, lying on a mudbank, yachting and sketching."

Winifred could restrain her curiosity no longer. "I beg your pardon," she said, leaning forward eagerly, "but I think you mentioned a certain Miss Challoner. May I ask, does it happen by any chance to be Elsie Challoner, who was once at Girton? Because, if so, she was a governess of mine, and I haven't heard of her for a long time past. Governesses drop out of one's world so fast. I should be glad to know where she's living at present."

The lady nodded. "Her name's Elsie," said he with a quiet inclination, "and she was certainly a Girton girl; but I hardly think she can be the same you mention. I should imagine, indeed, she's a good deal too young a girl to have been your governess."

It was innocently said, but Winifred's face was one vivid flush of mingled shame and humiliation. Talk about beaute du diable indeed; she never knew before she had grown so very plain and ancient. "I'm not quite so old as I look, perhaps," she answered hastily. "I've had a great deal to break me down. But I'm glad to learn where Elsie is, anyhow. You said she was living at San Remo, I fancy?"

"At San Remo. Yes. She spends her winters there. For the summers, she always goes up to St Martin.,,

"Thank you," Winifred answered with a throbbing heart. "I'm glad to have found out at last what's become of her.—Mrs Barton, if you can tear yourself away from Dr. and Mrs. Tyacke, who are always so alluring, suppose we go up-stairs now and look at the pictures."

In the studio, Warren Relf recognised her at once, and with much trepidation came up to speak to her. It would all be out now, he greatly feared: and Hugh would learn at last that Elsie was living. For Winifred's own sake—she looked so pale and ill—he would fain have kept the secret to himself a few months longer.

Winifred held out her hand frankly. She liked Warren; she had always liked him; and besides, Hugh had forbidden her to see him. Her lips trembled, but she was bold, and spoke. "Mr Relf," she said with quiet earnestness, "I'm so glad to meet you here to-day again—glad on more than one account. You go to San Remo often, I believe. Can you tell me if Elsie Challoner is living there?"

Warren Relf looked back at her in undisguised astonishment. "She is," he answered. "Did my sister tell you so?"

"No," Winifred replied with bitter truthfulness. "I found it out." And with that one short incisive sentence, she moved on coolly, as if she would fain look at the pictures.

"Does—does Massinger know it?" Warren asked all aghast, taken aback by curprise, and unwittingly trampling on her tender feelings.

Winifred turned round upon him with an angry flash. This was more than she could bear. The tears were struggling hard to rise to her eyes; she kept them back with a supreme effort. "How should I know, pray?" she answered fiercely, but very low. "Does he make me the confidante of all his loves, do you suppose, Mr. Relf?—He said she was in Australia.—He told me a lie.—Everybody's combined and caballed to deceive me.—How should I know whether he knows or not? I know nothing. But one thing I know: from my mouth at least he shall never, never, never hear it."

She turned away stern, and hard as iron. Hugh had deceived her; Elsie had deceived her. The two souls she had loved the best on earth! From that moment forward, the joy of her life, whatever had been left of it, was all gone from her. She went forth from the room a crushed creature.

How varied in light and shade the world is! While Winifred was driving gloomily back to her own lodgings—solitary and heart-broken, in Mrs. Bouverie Barton's comfortable carriage—revolving in her own wounded soul this incredible conspiracy of Hugh's and Elsie's—Edie Relf and her mother and brother were joyfully discussing their great triumph in the now dismantled and empty front drawing room at 128 Bletchingly Road, South Kensington.

"Have you totted up the total of the sales, Warren?" Edie Relf inquired with a bright light in her eye and a smile on her lips; for the private view—her own inception—had been more than successful from its very beginning.

Warren jotted down a series of figures on the back of an envelope and counted them up mentally with profound trepidation. "Mother," he cried, clasping her hand with a convulsive clutch in his "I'm afraid to tell you; it's so positively grand. It seems really too much.—If this goes on, you need never take any pupils again.—Edie, we owe it all to you.—It can't be right, yet it comes out square. I've reckoned up twice and got each time the same total—Four hundred and fifty!"

"I thought so," Edie answered with a happy little laugh of complete triumph. "I hit upon such a capital dodge, Warren. I never told you beforehand what I was going to do, for I knew if I did, you'd never allow me to put it into execution; but I wrote the name and price of each picture in big letters and plain figures on the back of the frame. Then, whenever I took up a person with a good, coiny, solvent expression of countenance, and a picture buying crease the corners of the mouth, to inspect the studio, I waited for them casually to ask the name of any special piece they particularly admired. "Let me see," said I. "What does Warren call that? I think it's on the back here." So I turned round the frame, and there they'd see it, as large as life: "By Stormy Seas—Ten Pounds;" or, "The Haunt of the Sea Swallow—Thirty Guineas." That always fetched them, my dear. They couldn't resist it.—Warren, you may give me a kiss, if you like. I'll tell you what I've done: I've made your fortune."

Warren kissed her affectionately on the forehead, half abashed. "You're a bad girl, Edie," he said good-humouredly; "and if I'd only known it, I'd certainly have taken a great big cake of best ink-eraser and rubbed your plain figures all carefully out again.—But I don't care a pin in the end, after all, if I can make this dear mother and you comfortable."

"And marry Elsie," Edie put in mischievously.

Warren gave a quiet sigh of regret. "And marry Elsie," he added low. "But Elsie will never marry me."

"You goose!" said Edie, and laughed at him to his face. She knew women better than he did.

And all this while, poor lonely Winifred was rocking herself wildly backward and forward in Mrs Bouverie Barton's comfortable carriage, and muttering to herself in a mad fever of despair: "I could have believed it of Hugh; but of Elsie, of Elsie—never, never!"

CHAPTER XXXIII.—THE STRANDS DRAW CLOSER.

"I feel it my duty to let you know," Sir Anthony Wraxall wrote to Hugh a day or two later—by the hand of his amanuensis—"that Mrs Massinger's lungs are far more seriously and dangerously affected than I deemed it at all prudent to inform her in person last week, when she consulted me here on the subject. Galloping consumption, I regret to say, may supervene at any time. The phthisical tendency manifests itself in Mrs Massinger's case in an advanced stage; and general tuberculosis may therefore on the shortest notice carry off with startling rapidity. I would advise you, under these painful circumstances, to give her the benefit of a warmer winter climate: if not Egypt or Algeria, then at least Mentone, Catania, or Malaga. She should not on any account risk seeing another English Christmas. If she remains in Suffolk during the colder months of the present year, I dare not personally answer for the probably consequences."

Hugh laid down the letter with a sigh of despair. It was the last straw, and it broke his back with utter despondency. How to finance a visit to the south he knew not. Talk about Algeria, Catania, Malaga! he had hard enough work to make both ends meet anyhow at Whitestrand. He had trusted first of all to the breakwater to redeem everything: but the breakwater, that broken reed, had only pierced the hand that leaned upon it. The sea shifted and the sand drifted worse than ever. Then he had hoped the best from "A Life's Philosophy;" but "A Life's Philosophy," published after long and fruitless negotiations, at his own risk—for no firm would so much as touch it as a business speculation—had never paid the long printer's bill, let alone recouping him for his lost time and trouble. Nobody wanted to read about his life or his philosophy.

Of Winifred's health, Hugh thought far less than of the financial difficulty. He saw she was ill, decidedly ill, but not so ill as everybody else who saw her imagined. Wrapped up in his own selfish hopes and fears, never really fond of his poor small wife, and now estranged for months and months by her untimely discovery of Elsie' watch, which both he and she had entirely misinterpreted, Hugh Massinger had seen that frail young creature grow thinner and paler day by day without at any time realising the profundity of the change or the actual seriousness of her failing condition.

He went out into the drawing-room to join Winifred. He found her lying lazily on the sofa, pretending to read the first volume of Besant's last new novel from Mudie's. "The wind's shifted," he began uneasily. "We shall get it warmer, I hope soon, Winifred."

"Yes, the wind's shifted," Winifred answered gloomily, looking up in a hopeless and befogged way from the pages of her story. "It blew straight across from Siberia yesterday; to-day it blows straight across from Greenland."

"How would you like to go abroad for the winter, I wonder?' Hugh asked tentatively, with some faint attempt at his old kindness of tone and manner.

His wife glanced over at him with a sudden and strangely suspicious smile. 'To San Remo, I suppose?' she answered bitterly.

She meant the name to speak volumes to Hugh's conscience; but it fell upon his ears as flat and uninpressive as any other. "Not necessarily to San Remo," he replied, all unconscious. 'To Algeria, if you like—or Mentone, or Bordighera.

Winifred arose, and walked without one word of explanation, but with a resolute air, into the study, next door. When she came out again, she carried in her two arms Keith Johnston's big Imperial Atlas. It was a heavier book than she could easily lift in her present feeble condition of body, but Hugh never even offered to help her to carry it. The day of small politenesses and courtesies was long gone past. He only looked on in mute surprise, anxious to know whence came this sudden new-born interest in the neglected study of European geography.

Winifred laid the Atlas down with a flop on the five o'clock tea table, that staggered with its weight, and turned the pages with feverish haste till she came to the map of Northern Italy. "I thought so," she gasped out, as she scanned it close, a lurid red spot burning bright in her cheek. "Mentone and Bordighera are both of them almost next door to San Remo.—The nearest stations on the line along the coast.—You could run over there often by rail from either of them."

"Run over—often—by rail—to San Remo?' Hugh repeated with a genuinely puzzled expression of countenance.

"Oh, you act admirably!' Winifred cried with a sneer. "What perfect bewilderment! What childlike innocence! I've always considered you an Irving wasted upon private life. If you'd gone upon the stage, you'd have made your fortune; which you've scarcely succeeded in doing, it must be confessed, at your various existing assorted professions."

Hugh stared back at her in blank amazement. "I don't know what you mean," he answered shortly.

"Capital! capital!" Winifred went on in her bitter mood, endeavouring to assume a playful tone of unconcerned irony. "I never saw you act better in all my life—not even when you were pretending to fall in love with me. It's your most successful part—the injured innocent:—much better than the part of the devoted husband. If I were you, I should always stick to it.—But it's very abrupt, this sudden conversion of yours to the charms of the Riviera."

"Winifred," Hugh cried, with transparent conviction in every note of his voice, "I see you're labouring under some distressing misapprehension; but I give you my solemn word of honor I don't in the least know what it is you're driving at. You're talking about somebody or something unknown that I don't understand. I wish you'd explain. I can't follow you."

But he had acted too often and too successfully to be believed now, for all his earnestness. "Your solemn word of honor!" Winifred burst out angrily, with intense contempt. "Your solemn word of honour, indeed! And pray, who do you think believes now in your precious word or your honour either?—You can't deceive me any longer, thank goodness, Hugh. I know you want to go to San Remo; and I know for whose sake you want to go there. This solicitude for my health's all a pure fiction. Little you cared for my health a month ago! Oh so, I see through it all distinctly. You've found out there's a reason for going to San Remo, and you want to go there for your own pleasure accordingly."

An idea flashed suddenly across Hugh's mind. "I think, Winifred," he said calmly, "you're labouring under a mistake about the place you're speaking of. The gaming tables are not at San Remo, as you suppose, but at Monte Carlo, just beyond Mentone. And if you thought I wanted to go to the Riviera for the sake of repairing our ruined estate at Monte Carlo, you're very much mistaken. I wanted to go, I solemnly declare, for your health only."

Winifred rose, and faced him now like an angry tigress. Her sunken white cheeks were flushed and fiery indeed with suppressed wrath, and a bright light blazed in her dilated pupils. The full force of a burning indignation possessed her soul. "Hugh Massinger," she said, repelling him haughtily with her thin left hand, "you've lied to me for years, and you're lying to me now as you've always lied to me. You know you've lied to me, and you know you're lying to me. This pretence about my health's a transparent falsehood. These prevarications about the gambling tables are a tissue of fictions. You can't deceive me. I know why you want to go to San Remo!" And she pushed him away in disgust with her angry fingers.

The action and the insult were too much for Hugh. He could no longer restrain himself. Sir Anthony's letter trembled in his hands; he was clutching it tight in his waistcoat pocket. To show it to Winifred would have been cruel, perhaps, under any other circumstances; but in face of such an accusation as that, yet wholly misunderstood, flesh and blood—at least Hugh Massinger's—could not further resist the temptation of producing it. "Read that," he cried, handing her over the letter coldly; "you'll see from it why it is I want to go; why, in spite of all we've lost and are losing, I'm still prepared to submit to this extra expenditure."

"Out of my money," Winifred answered scornfully, as she took the paper with an inclination of mock-courtesy from his tremulous hands. "How very generous! And how very kind of you!"

She read the letter through without a single word; then she yielded at last, in spite of herself, to her womanly tears. "I see it all, Hugh," she cried, flinging herself down once more in despair upon the sofa. "You fancy I'm going to die now; and it will be so convenient, so very convenient for you to be near her there next door at San Remo!"

Hugh gazed at her again in mute surprise. At last he saw it—he saw it in all its naked hideousness. A light began gradually to dawn upon his mind. It was awful—it was horrible in its cruel Nemesis upon his unspoken crime. To think she should be jealous—of his murdered Elsie! He could hardly speak of it; but he must, he must. "Winnie," he cried, almost softened by his pity for what he took to be her deadly and terrible mistake, 'I understand you, I think, after all. I know what you mean.—You believe—that Elsie—is at San Remo.'

Winifred looked up at him through her tears with a withering glance. 'You have said it!" she cried in a haughty voice, and relapsed into a silent fit of sobbing and suppressed cough, with her poor wan face buried deep once more like a wounded child's in the cushions of the sofa.

STATISTICS.

No better illustration of the wonderful wealth of the United States is furnished than the figures which David T. Day, of the division of mining statistics of the United States geological survey, gives regarding the immense mineral output of the country for the past year. They show that the total value of all minerals raised that year amounted to $538,000,000. This is $70,000,000 more than the output during the previous year, and more than $100,000,000 greater than that of 1885. The last year's output is not only the greatest ever raised in the United States, but is at least $100,000,000 greater than the output of any other country, and leaving out England is greater than that of all Europe put together. Verily we are living in a marvellous country, which the ready ingenuity of the people is doing more and more to develop.—Springfield Republican.

Professor Chandler Roberts estimates the weight of the smoke cloud which daily hangs over London at about 50 tons of solid carbon, and 250 tons of carbon in the form of hydrocarbon and carbonic oxide gases. Calculated from the average result of tests made by the Smoke Abatement Committee, the value of coal wasted from domestic grates reaches, upon the annual consumption of 5,000,000 people, to £2,257,500. The cost of cartage on this wasted coal is calculated to be £268,750, while the passage of a large number of horses through the streets in drawing it adds considerably to the cost of street cleaning and repairing. There is also the cost of taking away the extra ashes, £43,000 a year. Summing it all up, the direct and indirect cost of the wasted coal is set down at £2,600,000, plus the additional loss from the damage done to property caused by the smoky atmosphere, estimated by Mr. Chadwick at £2,000,000—the whole amohnting to £4,600,000 or $23,000,000.

For matinees and breakfast dresses there are charming new cloth-finished flannels in small Japanese patterns over either a light or dark ground. The newest fashion for this style of dress is to have the back arranged in three or four double plaits from the neck to the feet: while the fronts, also plaited, open to show a plastron and shirt-front of finely plaited silk or cashmere. A double cord finished with tassels goes round the waist and is tied in front.

WHEAT SPECULATORS.

WRITTEN BY THE MAN WHO SOLD SHORT.

Here is a man whose millions are so many that, by the most profligate extravagance—if he were isolated to the excesses of more generous natures—he would be unable to endanger his financial security; to whom additional wealth can be of no more practical use than the same bulk of waste paper, who deliberately concocts a scheme to use that wealth so as to bring ruin and suffering upon as many people in as many walks of life as he can by any ingenuity compass in his meshes, and all to add a few more useless millions to an enormous fortune that he only utilizes for mischief. So speaks our able contemporary, Life. To accomplish this benevolent purpose, he, early in the summer, begins secretly to purchase all of that most important food staple, wheat, that he can lay his covetous hands upon. So deep-laid is this scheme, so vast is his wealth, and so large his commercial experience, that he is enabled to secure entire control of the cereal upon which the nation so largely depends for its food for the next few weeks.

And now his sport begins. The first to feel the effects of his machinations are his business associates, men with whom he has held friendly relations, whom he meets daily in the streets and in the places of trade. They have sold wheat short for delivery within a certain time, and knowing when that time expires, the arch conspirator withdraws the grain from the market, and so forces a tremendous increase in price. The speculators have got to fill their orders, or else go to ruin, and the conspirator calmly looks on as they bid his goods up far beyond their value, and counts his daily gains by the millions.

If the mischief wrought by the arch conspirator only stopped at that point, it would be brutal enough. But it does not stop here. The millers begin to run short of wheat wherewith to make their flour, and the bakers run short of the flour wherewith their bread must be made. There is plenty of wheat to feed the people, but the conspirator still controls it at the ruinous advance in price he has brought about. The baker is obliged to pay the exorbitant price for his flour, and the small baker, who bakes for the poor, must pay the most, since he purchases in smaller quantities and is unable to keep a stock on hand.

And this is the second cruel result: In both city and country, where the very poor live in wretchedness and squalor, where bread is largely the food supply and money is hardest to get, the price of bread goes up two and three cents per loaf or else the loaf is reduced in weight from three to four ounces. Many who come for bread go home without it, or purchase stale crusts to satisfy their hunger, and the hunger of innocent children and helpless invalids in the tenement houses. Hundreds and thousands of men and women and children suffer a daily deprivation in order that one man may add to his millions.

But it should be borne in mind that the conspirator has brought about these results by strictly legal means and that he has violated no commercial statutes. He has only taken advantage of the opportunities he possessed to rob his fellow-men without giving the law any hold upon him. He has caused more actual misery and suffering in one week than all the criminals in the country in a year, and yet his honor is untainted and his reputation unsmirched. There are plenty of men who admire him for his very callousness and indifference to others in carrying out a great scheme. If he had climbed into the window of one of the grain speculators at night, and stolen his watch, the conspirator would be disgraced forever; and yet it is difficult to discover any greater degree of moral depravity in obtaining the same speculator's money by legalized hook and crook, and yielding him no return for it.

After all, however, the grain thief is little, if any, worse than the other capitalistic rascals of his time. The man who wrecks a railroad and beggars its stockholders for his own gain is considered an able financier, and he generally belongs to a church.

A fair-minded man gives even "Old Nick" his due; why shouldn't "Old Hutch" have his? For years he has been noted both in the Chicago and Milwaukee markets as a bold, long-headed, shrewd, "nervy" speculator in produce. He has lost several fortunes and made several. When he lost he neither asked nor received much aid or sympathy; when he won he has never been boastful nor nearly as hard on the "boys" as Armour, Plankington, or several other mammoth operators in the wheat, corn or pork pits. It is only a few years ago that rumor was widespread that he had "gone broke" in an attempt to corner wheat in company with several other large speculators. Well, it is supposed that he "dropped" a million or two then into the claws of the bears, whereupon wheat dropped to the lowest figure it has ever reached in late years; but who executed the bears who had pulled down the price of the Northern farmer's chief "money crop" far below its intrinsic value in the markets of the world? Did the price of bread decrease with the price of wheat then? Certainly not. Was there a general howl from the press because it didn't? Not a howl; scarcely an occasional murmur. An eminent English statistical authority on agricultural matters estimates that the wheat crop of the United States in that same year—1885—was grown at a loss of from $80,000,000 to $170,000,000, and this loss was suffered by the farmers of the country—the hardest-working, most temperate and economical class in the community. Yet was there a single voice raised in the public press in denunciation of the wholesale robbery of the most deserving of all classes by the unscrupulous speculators who unduly depressed the price of their wheat? That year the "bears" were nearly uniformly triumphant in all our wheat markets. With exultant shouts they dragged and pounded down, over and over again, the price of the product, in New York, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, Minneapolis and other great receiving centers. The "bulls" could see that the article was often selling below the cost of production, but they seldom had any show when attempting to raise prices. Where were then the virtuous howls at gambling in produce that now resounded on all sides when the other side holds the winning hand. The Rural New-Yorker, I remember, more than once raised a vigorous protest; but few of the other agricultural papers, and none of the political papers that came to my notice, had a word to say against the bare-faced robbery.

It is now over three months ago since "Old Hutch" came to the conclusion that wheat was selling a good deal below its intrinsic value. In this country there was a very heavy shortage in this year's crop, and the surplus on hand from old crops at the beginning of the cereal year, was unusually small. The best authorities declared that there was a shortage of several hundred million bushels in the aggregate wheat crop of the world. As usual, the bears' policy was to throw discredit on all such statements and beat down the price of wheat until most of it had gone from the producers' hands into their own; then to turn bulls and put up prices, putting all the difference into their own pockets. "Old Hutch," however, began to buy in wheat even before the present crop began to move, and kept steadily buying during all the early weeks when it began to move to market. Usually as the new crop starts for market prices begin to go down, and continue to descend till most of the crop has passed from the farmers' hands; this year, owing mainly to "Old Hutch," the reverse was the case. It should be borne in mind that the only kind of wheat handled for speculation is No. 2, and this was the only kind touched by Hutchison.

From a file of the "Rural" I see that on June 30 last No. 2 spot wheat at Chicago was 79c. and No. 3 nominal. On July 28, No 2 had advanced to 81c. and there was still little or no demand for No. 3. About August 25th, "Old Hutch's" operations began to influence the market, and No. 2 was quoted at 88½c., and no. 3 at 83. On September 1, the former went to 93½c., and the latter to 85. Wheat fluctuated considerably for the next three weeks, ranging, on Sept. 22, from 95½ for No. 2, to 83½ for No. 3. Towards the end of the next week, the last day of which was the day of settlement, the "boys" at length realised that "Old Hutch" had them "cornered." On September 28 No. 2 went from $1.16 to $1.25 and No. 3 went up to 91c. Next day No. 2 jumped up to $1 65, and on September 30, it touched $2. Be it remembered that during the entire time when "Old Hutch" was cornering "No. 2 September wheat," for the purpose of "bullying the market" or raising the price in accordance with what he and hundreds of others considered its intrinsic value, the bears were selling the same grade of wheat "short" for delivery by Sept. 30, in the full expectation that before that date they would be able to buy it at a lower figure than that at which they had sold it, and all the time they were on the outlook for any pretext, however unscrupulous, for lowering prices and bamboozling the farmers who had wheat to sell. If they had been successful wheat would have sold at the ruinous figures which beggared so many farmers in 1885. Many keen observers honestly believe that wheat is really worth upwards of $1.25 per bushel. After the close of the corner, prices naturally tumbled, so that on October 6, No. 2 was only $1.09½ and No. 3 98c. On October 13, however, prices had again mounted to $1.14 for No. 2, and 99c. for No. 3, and to-day—October 30—quotations in Chicago are $1.17½ for No. 2.

To prevent the taking up of too much room, I have given quotations only for "spot" or "cash" wheat; that is, for wheat deliverable at once. Putting the present price of this non speculative kind at, say, $1.17, it has gone up 38 cents a bushel in Chicago since June 30 and 28½ cents since August 25. There is little doubt that even if there was no "corner," wheat would have steadily risen in price; but it would have done this so slowly that the farmers of the country would have gained comparatively little by the rise. As the case stands, the advance in the price of the product just at the time it occurred, has put many millions of extra dollars into the pockets of the farming community, especially in the West and Northwest. Thousands who have been struggling bravely but almost hopelessly along during the late years of depression in wheat, and who would have been inevitably ruined had prices this year been low, have been saved by the timely advance. Thousands whose decreased yield would have caused distress or ruin, have been relieved by the increase in price. It has replaced despair and distress by hope and relief. It has clothed half-naked children from the severities of winter. It has laid up unexpected stores of fuel to keep out frosts and blizzards. It has lifted mortgages or paid interest on them and deferred or prevented foreclosure. It has made of a year of apprehended disaster one of comparative prosperity. Nor are the good effects of the advance in the price of wheat likely to be confined to farmers. When farmers are prosperous, every other industry thrives because there is a demand for their wares. Laborers and artisans are relieved because they find profitable work. Railroads are busy transporting the products of the soil and of the workshop. Should the other products of the farm bring remunerative figures a prosperous season for all classes is before us. The advance in the price of wheat-bread is not general, and it is at most a mere trifle. The outlay for bread is a comparatively small item in any family. Three years ago wheat was down so low that farmers lost by its production; now it is up to its intrinsic value in the markets of the world, and farmers are making a fair profit from it. "Old Hutch's" manipulations of the market were doubtless selfish but they have accomplished an excellent result for the largest and most deserving industry in the country: and why should farmers revile the old speculator who merely succeeded where hundreds of the loudest denouncers have failed? Why clamor so vociferously when the farmers' products go up to their legitimate value, and remain so mum when they are dragged down far below their real worth?

I feel no inclination whatever to canonize "Old Hutch," but the farming community at least should give the old man his due.

To sum up: the late Chicago corner in wheat was a struggle between the "bulls" and the "bears," the former trying to raise prices, the latter to depress them. For the last nine years, in similar contests, the bears have been nearly always successful, and little or no clamor was made at their victory now, for once, the bulls have triumphed, and the welkin rings with indignant uproar. Had the bears won, the bread-eaters would have been the gainers; while the victory of the bulls makes the bread-producers the winners. For the last nine years the case has been generally the reverse; but surely "turn about is fair play." The fact that the price of wheat a month after the close of the corner, persistently remains nearly 50 per cent. above its price at the opening of the "deal," and that all grades of wheat went up and have stayed up with the cornered grade, is a strong indication that wheat now is really worth about 50 per cent. more than its price in June last. It is really this fact much more than the conduct of Mr. Hutchison, which has raised the price of wheat, flour and bread. The old man perceived the true state of the case before others had done so, and in helping himself to a profit by his foresight, he helped the wheat raisers of the country also at a very timely moment. Just before the end, he warned his opponents of what would occur, thus enabling them to settle up at a moderate figure, and after the close of the corner he was unusually "easy" with those who persisted to the last in opposition, as is proved by the fact that there were much less bankruptcy and ruin among the losers in this 'deal' than among those in any previous one of equal size. Yes, farmers, at least, the greatest beneficiaries of Hutch's corner, should give the old man his due.

Feed your horses regularly three times daily, but never over-feed. Water before feeding, but not while the horse is hot from work. Use the whip very little, and never when the animal shies or stumbles. Never leave a horse standing unhitched. It is the way to make them runaways. Do not storm and fret. Be quiet and kind, and the horse will be so too in most cases.

AGRICULTURAL.

MUSHROOMS EASY TO GROW.

It is a little singular, to put it mildly, that such a delicacy as the mushroom, one that is such a general favorite, also did not be more generally cultivated—or rather grown, as it needs no cultivation—so plentifully that every owner of a pasture lot or moderate sized lawn can have sufficient for family use when first gathered and for pickling and canning for winter's use. To grow mushrooms in order to have them fresh during winter is quite an expensive undertaking and a practice that cannot become general because of the cost. Modern improvements in the modes of preserving vegetables have made this vegetable a necessity rather than a luxury. How can they be grown in quantities at a trifling expense is the question, and it is an easy one to answer. All that is necessary is to obtain some spawn at any reliable seed store (it is not expensive), break it into small pieces, say the size of an egg and plant it in lawn or meadow.

The method of planting is simple and may be performed as follows: Take a spade and lift the sod just sufficient to get the spawn under it; then let drop back to its place and press it down firmly, so that the lawn will not show signs of any disturbance. Without further care an abundant supply of mushrooms can be obtained from August until November. In a favorable season an ordinary lawn or farmer's dooryard will yield sufficient for winter's use.

The spawn should not be put in until about July 1, when the ground is warm and dry; if put in earlier it is liable to rot. The distance apart of the planting will depend upon circumstances; if there is plenty of room, as in the pasture lot, 6 to 8 feet apart would be better. If room is limited put the pieces 1½ feet apart each way. One person can easily plant an acre in half a day, and the cost of spawn will not be more than $3. Try it, as we have tried it, and get more delicious vegetables than you can from the garden at ten times the cost.

PACKING BUTTER IN BRINE.

Last season we packed our surplus butter on the following plan and found when we sold in December, when the butter was unpacked for sale, it came out just as fresh and well tasted as it was when packed, says the "Dairyman." We adopted the following method:

Bought new pork barrels, scalded them out thoroughly with boiling water three different times, the last time covered the barrel with a cloth to keep in the steam. Let stand until the water cools, then rinse out the barrel with cold water, and the barrel is ready for use. We made a strong brine, by boiling, that would float an egg, skimmed off any scum that was on top, and let stand over night. In the morning the brine would be as clear as crystal. Butter was salted in the usual way, one ounce to the pound. Made into five or six pound rolls, wrapped carefully up in cheese cloth and tied with cotton wrapping twine to keep the cloth in place. The rolls were then placed into the barrels and covered with the brine and kept covered. The air is not allowed to come in contact with it again until unpacked. And my opinion is, right here is where the secret lays in keeping the air excluded, no foul odors can get to it. Some might think the butter would get too salty in such strong brine. Not one bit of danger, if the butter has been properly handled before going in the barrel. We make our butter on the granular plan and press it solidly together. We packed several barrels in this way, and it was in the brine four or five months, and not a fault found to a pound of it. I have no doubt that butter packed in this way can be shipped to any market in the United States or Europe, if ordinary care is taken not to let it lay outside, exposed to the hot sun. Butter can be packed in this way in firkins or in any vessel that will hold the brine.

THE Baptist Sabbath school have decided to hold their annual entertainment in Leitch's hall on Friday evening, December 28th. The Methodists have decided to hold theirs on Christmas evening, December 25th, and are now making preparations.

MRS. A. MCRAE, who has been on a two months visit with her son John, in Nebraska, returned on Wednesday night of last week. She is not enjoying good health, caused by drinking the water of that state, which is alkaline. By the way, John's wife has a young son.

A. N. C. BLACK, clerk of the Fourth Division court has made arrangments to receive or do business in connection with the court for this section at Dutton. Business for Alborough will be done at Aldborough just the same.

REV. E. MIDDLETON is preaching a series of sermons on the "Prodigal Son" in the Methodist church. The subject for next Sunday evening is the "Prodigal's Return." Judging from the large congregations of late, the Methodists will soon have to be thinking about enlarging the seating capacity of their church.

A LARGE crowd gathered at the station last Thursday morning to bid farewell to a number of friends who were taking their departure on the mail train, among whom were Rev. W. Grant and family and the officers of the Saivation Army. When the train was about to start quite a sensation was caused. A conspicuous person in female attire was pouring forth all possible blessings on the captain, whereupon a lady bystander accosted the speaker thusly : "You old Jezebel !" From the roars of laughter which took place we will leave the reader to judge the balance.

THE HYERS' COMEDY CO.—That the Hyers' Colored Comedy Co. are at their best in minstrelsy and variety sketches was proven by the manner in which their return engagement was received by the audience assembled in Leitch's hall on Tuesday evening. The inimitable end men, Tom Davis and Billy Cook, are a host in themselves and kept the audience in roars of laughter with their funny sayings and grotesque situations. The support throughout was fully up to the standard. The singing of Miss Lucas and Miss Revels was much admired, while Chas. Small in his bass solos and delineations of the old negro character, proved himself capable of sustaining his reputation. We are sorry the hall was not filled so well as we would liked to have seen it, in keeping with the merit of the show. The usual number of "yahoos," which appear to be a necessary adjunct to every Dutton audience, were present.

THE following we clip from the Tilsonburg Liberal :—A CORN BREAD EXPERT.—Mr. Norman Phelps, formerly of Springford, but now proprietor of the Dutton ENTERPRISE, is gaining notoriety in a new role. A Dutton correspondent writes to the St. Thomas Journal as follows :—The corn festival, under the auspicies of the Ladies' Aid of the Presbyterian church, on Thanksgiving night, was a grand success. The bill of fare was unique and good. Everything that could be made of corn, from Johnny cake to mush and milk, was furnished by the fair caterers to tickle the palates of the guests. Considerable merriment was occasioned by the worthy editor of the ENTERPRISE, Mr. N. Phelps, baking cornmeal pancakes, at which he appears to be an expert.

Received by postal:—

DELAWARE, Nov. 23, 1888.

MR. GRANT'S FAREWELL.

The Rev. W. Grant, who has been pastor of the Regular Baptist Church, Dutton, for over a year, but has resigned and moved to Port Burwell, was agreeably surprised on the eve of his departure last week. While with his family at Deacon J. McCormick's on Wednesday evening, 21st, the door was abruptly opened and a large crowd who had gathered began to enter the house to the extent of about 50 or 60 of the church congregation, among whom were seven children. They immediately made themselves at home. The object of the gathering was to bid the rev. gentleman farewell and donate him a present that he might go on his way rejoicing. The donation consisted of $20 including purse, which was given by some of his many friends in this place. The purse was presented by D. McKee and the following address was read by James McDougall :

DUTTON, Nov. 21, 1888.

To the Rev. W. Grant :—

DEAR BROTHER,—As you have resigned your charge as pastor of the R. B. Church, Dutton, and are about to depart to labor in God's vineyard elsewhere, we feel that we could not part with you without presenting you with a small token of our affection and esteem. You have labored faithfully and sincerely with us, and we have been helped, strengthened and encouraged while listening to you expound the Word of Life to us, bringing therefrom treasures new and old. Your daily walk has been in keeping with your profession ; your kind words and genial manner have won for you not only the respect and esteem of your own congregation, but the respect and esteem of the other congregations and the villagers generally. No wonder, then, that we feel sorry at parting with you, but our prayers and best wishes follow you and your partner in your new field of labor, and may God help you so that you may be an instrument in His hands of leading many from Nature's darkness into the marvelous light of the Gospel. We will now present you with this purse as a token of our love and esteem, wishing you again Godspeed in your new field of labor and many kind friends to assist you.

Presented to you on behalf of your many friends and the congregation.

JAS. MCDOUGALL,
DANIEL MCKEE.

After which Mr. Grant made a very feeling and suitable reply. Eatables were then served and the balance of the evening was spent in social chat. The church and citizens are very sorry to part with the rev. gendleman, but their loss is others' gain. We congratulate the Port Burwell and Malahide churches in their choice of an efficient pastor, who was highly esteemed by a great majority of the church, the adherents and the citizens.

To the Editor of the ENTERPRISE :—

SIR,—A few weeks ago "Watchman," in a communication to the paper, spoke of a Mechanics' Institute and Library as one of the "wants" of the village.

With "Watchman" we are perfectly agreed, and trust some steps will be taken to secure for our citizens such a valuable boon, especially when it can be secured at such a small cost. Think, that for the payment of $1 annually, if a goodly number of subscribers can be obtained, in a few years the village would have a large and valuable library, easy of access and available to many who could not afford to place many volumes in their homes.

In Strathroy there is an Institute and Library in vigorous and lively operation and it is invaluable to the town, and in one place with which I am acquainted, right in the country—not even a postoffice close by—there was an Institute with large and valuable library circulating among the farmers of the township.

By all means let us have one in Dutton, if possible, and let us organize as soon as possible. I am, sir,

Yours respectfully,
E. MIDDLETON,
Methodist Minister.

CAMPBELLTON.

Miss Searle has been re engaged as teacher for 1889 in S. S. No. 10, Dunwich.

We had a heavy snowfall here on Monday, but it is prophesied that we will have an open winter.

A. Patterson, of this place, has secured the Tyrconnell school for the year 1889.

The young people of this vicinity, being unable to procure a singing school, recently organized a Literary and Debating Society.

Alex. D. Finlayson, of this place, has gone on a trip to Ashfield. He reports business favorable so far.

Miss McPherson is at present visiting friends in Southwold.

Messrs. J. McDiarmid and R. Hine are busily engaged in canvassing this ward. These two gentlemen were also candidates for councillor last year.

Angus McIntyre's new house on the first concession is completed.

MIDDLEMISS.

The concert held in the village school on Friday evening was a grand success. Much credit is due to Mr. Campbell, the teacher, and also to the committee for the active part they took in managing the affair. Mr. McNish, a rising young lawyer of Glencoe, occupied the chair. Addresses were delivered by Dr. McAllister, of Melbourne ; Wm. Griffin and Jno. Dodds, of Middlemiss; D. A. McNabb, of Cowal, and James McVicar, an old teacher who has taught in the adjoining section. Miss Baskette, of St. Thomas, gave a reading which was well rendered. A dialogue, entitled "Testing Her Scholars," in which Miss Marshall acted as teacher, was well performed. Another dialogue, called "Jemima's Advertisement," was received with loud applause, Miss McLachlin acting the part of Jemima to the satisfaction of all present.
