THE DUTTON ENTERPRISE, 1881-1891.

The Dutton Enterprise was founded on 29 December 1881 by Wilbur Franklin Phelps (Dec. 30, 1861 - Aug. 5, 1932) when he was turning twenty years old. It was a four-page weekly, independent in politics. With the issue of March 19, 1885, W. F. Phelps left the business which was taken over by his older brother Norman Phelps (June 16, 1852 - Dec. 23, 1927). At the end of 1888 Norman Phelps announced his withdrawal from the business, which was then assumed by R. Sutherland. In his "Valedictory" of Dec. 27, 1888, Norman Phelps noted,

> The ENTERPRISE was started seven years ago this issue by W. F. Phelps with premature appearance, but we are thankful that with economy and hard work we have made a living and increased the plant. W.F. Phelps conducted the business until 1885, when he withdrew, leaving ourselves with but little experience to manage alone. However, we overcame the difficulties as they presented themselves and have, we believe, the business at present in the best state of its existence.

With the issue of Feb. 14, 1889 (v. 8, no. 8) the format was changed from four large pages to eight small pages. The file available for microfilming ends with the issue of 19 Dec. 1889 (v. 8, no. 51), but the paper continued until November 5, 1891, at the latest, for in DUTTON, MAY 10, 1888.

WEEKLY WEAVINGS.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY one week from to-day.

MR. J. SMITH is moving his family to Highgate.

THE A. O. U W. members are all wanted to be present in their hall on Monday evening.

COURT OF APPEAL and other business of the council was done on Monday. Minutes in this issue.

REV. MR. GRANT will not be here next Sabbath, as he has gone home to move his family to this place.

THE house which D. McPherson is building on the corner of Centre and Mary streets is rapidly being enclosed.

A. H. SNIVELY has moved the old school-house to adjoin Mr. Black's stable, where it will be fitted up for a barn.

THE sidewalks are in a bad state and we hope that those who have the oversight of such work will put them in good order.

S. WILTON, the artistic, has made various changes and repairs about his dwelling which adds greatly to its comfort and appearance.

MR. D. SCHELL has bought a small piece of ground west of the village on which he will erect a house. He will carry on gardening, apiary and poultry raising.

MR. HOLLINGSHEAD shipped a carload of low grade flour this week. He is building another small store-room where he will keep the flour that is put in paper bags.

THE M.C.R. will issue return tickets on May 24th, good to return till 25th, for one fare, and on the 23rd and 24th, good to return until the 28th, for one fare and a third.

SIX Bismarck lads will be arraigned before Squire Schliehauff this week, on complaint of Detective Heenan, charged with pulling pins and tearing labels from sides of cars.

E. SMITH, of Rodney, has been charged by Inspector Beaton with a second violation of the Scott Act. The case will be tried by Police Magistrate Leonard at Rodney to-day (Thursday.)

THE new coins for 1888 are said to be in circulation, but they don't seem to affect us in any way. If the government will send us some we will see that they are thoroughly circulated in this immediate neighborhood.

THE Associations of the Baptist churches will be held this year as follows: Chatham, Tuesday and Wednesday, May 29 and 30; Elgin, and Dorchester, June 1 and 2; Woodstock, Springford, June 5 and 6; Middlesex and Lambton, Petrolia, June 6 and 7.

MRS. CAVANAGH, a lady aged 70, and a resident of Dutton for some years, departed this life last Thursday morning about 9 o'clock. She was taken suddenly ill the night previous and lived but a few hours. The remains were taken to St. Thomas on Saturday where the funeral was held. May she rest in peace.

IT is proposed that three minutes be allowed after the close of a sermon for the people to put on overcoats, wraps, etc., after which the doxology can be sung. It might look a little disrespectful, but it could not look more so than it does now in most churches when at least half the time of the closing hymn is spent in putting on wraps, and the balance in getting ready to hurry out before some one else.

AN exchange says:—A country editor is one who reads newspapers, writes on any subject, sticks type, folds papers, makes up mails, runs errands, saws wood, works in the garden, is blamed for a thousand things he never thought of, works hard all day, is subject to spring fever, helps people into office who forget all about it afterwards, and frequently gets cheated out of his earnings. He puffs up and does more for town and country than any one else, and the miser and the fogy are benefitted, yet they will not take his paper, but borrow it and cuss the fool of an editor.

SOME young lads were scuffling on the street in front of R. McGill's grocery on Sunday and broke a large light of glass.

WE have not heard from some of our correspondents for two or three weeeks. We would like them to brush up and not get rusty.

THE Ladies' Aid of the Presbyterian church will hold a grand soiree in the rink on the afternoon of the 24th of May. See bills.

THE subject for discussion in the Methodist church on Sunday at 10:30 a.m. will be "Systematic Giving as a Part of Religion."

THE Official Board of the Dutton Circuit meet in the Methodist church, Wallacetown, on Saturday evening, to complete the work of the year.

THERE is an effort being made amongst the merchants to adopt the early closing system. We may have a by-law to that effect next week.

REV. J. W. JACOBS has been commissioned as general organizer for the counties of Elgin, Middlesex, Essex, Kent and Lambton for "Canada's new party"—the Prohibitionists. Mr. Jacobs starts to work at once.

SOME young roughs came over from Glencoe last Sunday and created a disturbance in the Salvation Army meeting. We would advise these youths to stay at home when they are "full."

MR. DORLAND, who has occupied a dwelling from Urlin Bros for some time past, moved into a house south of the track, belonging to Mr. Luton, on Tuesday.

THE Home Circle which was started here a short time ago had a meeting on Monday evening and initiated three new members, and a special meeting on Tuesday evening when they initiated five.

E. S. SIFTON has gone into the brick and tile business again. He is with Mr. Telford this year. They have started the first tile kiln. Both brick and tile will be burnt on the Yankee system, making all one color.

D A. KIRKPATRICK, of West Lorne, has received the appointment of constable. We suppose he will be considered as chief and when the cage is compl ted will carry the keys. D. McGregor, deputy-reeve of Aldborough, can now attach J.P. to his name, and as a limb of the law we trust will do justice.

JOHN A. MCINTYRE has entered an action against Messrs. Hockin & Pool, merchants, for $200 damages, for wrongful dismissal. Mr. McIntyre claims to have been engaged for one year, which time expired on April 7th, 1888. He was relieved from further service on Dec. 4th, 1887, and sues to recover damages therefor.

THE annual meeting of the St. Thomas District of the Methodist church will open in the Methodist church, Dutton, on Tuesday, May 22, at 2 p.m., and will be in session the following day, when the work of the year will be reviewed. Between 25 and 30 delegates are expected to be present. L. J. Willson is the delegate appointed to represent the Dutton Circuit.

NOW that the new time table is in force there is considerable change in the running of trains on the London & Port Stanley branch: Trains will leave St. Thomas at 7:40 a.m., 11:25 a.m., and 5:35 p.m., arriving in London at 11:55 a.m., 5:35 p.m., and 7:45 p.m. Trains leave London at 9:55 a.m., 3:15 p.m. and 7:45 p.m., arriving at St. Thomas at 10:25 a.m., 3:45 p.m., and 9.25 p.m.

MRS. MCKENZIE, a middle-aged lady of Dunwich, met with what might have been a serious, if not fatal, accident here on Thursday. She and her son were driving into town in a wagon which had a high seat. Coming up to the store of McMillan & McLean the wheel passed over a projecting opening in the sewer, and she was thrown out on her head in a pool of water. She was picked up, but no bones were found to be broken, although she was very badly shaken up. It would be well if all the sewer openings were covered over with wrought-iron gratings.—Glencoe Transcript.

WM. SMITH has purchased another horse. He got a good, serviceable animal from Wm. McLandress, Iona.

IF the residents of Dutton are desirous of retaining the Salvation Army captain over the three months, they should have a petition out soon.

REV. J. S. HENDERSON, of Melbourne, dispensed the sacrament in the Presbyterian church here last Sabbath and preached at all the services.

A. M. MCINTYRE has purchased the narrow strip of land in front of his own place, lying between the street and railway, and leveled it and planted it thick with maple trees.

MISS MAGGIE PHILPOT, of Iona, and somewhat known from here to St. Thomas, is sueing the ex Mayor of Detroit (whose age is about 60 years), for $60,000 for breach of promise.

THE residents along Shackleton street leading to the station are making preparations for removing the sidewalk and street to the proper place. Messrs. McIntyre and cavers have moved their trees in about eight or ten feet.

IT is claimed that 500 have been converted at the revival meetings in St. Thomas which are being carried on by Revs. Crossley and Hunter. Miss Coates, lady evangelist, took part in the services with Rev. A. H. Munro last Sabbath.

A. H. SNIVELY has moved Dr. Drinkwater's house a little over its width to the north and G. Duncan's barn its length to the north. G. Duncan has bought half a lot along side of his own from Dr. Drinkwater.

THE traveller who wanted to get a pass for himself and family from the mayor in St. Thomas to Windsor on Monday struck Dutton on Tuesday morning. In St. Thomas he was a cigar and shoe maker; in Dutton he was a mason.

A VERY large funeral procession passed through Dutton on Tuesday. The people of this vicinity were paying their last respects to the remains of the widow of the late Elder McMillan, of Largie, which were being conveyed to Wallacetown for interment.

THE scholars of the High School have organized a base ball club with the following officers: Hon. President, Sir John A. Macdonald; President, Jas. Short, B.A.; Vice-Pres., B. Graham; Manager and Captain, C. E. Knight; Treas., A Graham; Sec., C E. Humpidge. As the club has an efficient management and good material it hopes to be able to compete successfully with the neighboring clubs, from whom they are desirous of receiving challenges at once.

$2,500 DAMAGES.—The trial of the action brought by S. B. Morris, Rodney, against the C.P.R., for damages for injuries received at the Galt accident, he being a passenger on the local, occupied the attention of the court all day Friday and Saturday at the Middlesex assizes in London, and at 7:30 p.m. Saturday the jury returned into court with a verdict of $2 500 for plaintiff. It is stated that two jurors favored giving $6,000 and ten were in favor of $1,000, and the verdict returned was the result of a compromise.

A NUMBER of little scamps are in the habit of running up and down the stairs leading to the Salvation Army hall during the time of service. They should be kept at home with their parents, or, if they are allowed to go there, their parents should go with them and keep them in the meeting until a proper time and then march them directly home. On Tuesday evening the meeting was disturbed by some large scamps running up and down the steps and throwing objects and setting off firecrackers. A detective should be employed to give their names to the authorities that they might have the privilege of coming before the beak. If taken before L. W. we think they would dance to the tune of the highest note, which is $20. That would be about just.

Mr. John H. Carter, of Corbetton, Ont., writes as follows: "Hagyard's Yellow Oil has stood the test often when all others failed. Our house is never without it, and it will always find a welcome spot on the shelf."

SCOTT ACT CASES

ARE QUICKLY SETTLED IN DUTTON.

Last Thursday evening Chief Constable McRae, armed with the papers and documents, took Constable Johnson and proceeded to the Commercial House and arrested John Thomas on a charge of violating the Scott Act. Constable Johnson was left in charge of him and Constable McRae proceeded to the Nelson House and arrested W. R. Cook, who promptly paid his fine, amounting to $52.75. The constable then went back to the Commercial and Thomas paid his fine and costs, being the same as Cook's, $52.75. They had only the choice of two things—pay or lodge in the "fox hole" for the night and then take a trip to St. Thomas next day.

The fines recently imposed upon the violators of the Scott Act appear to have had no salutary effect upon them. Sunday was a drunken day in Dutton. Brawling and drunkenness were seen not only on the street but in places which carry with them a certain degree of sanctity even if some of us do not agree with the mode of procedure adopted therein "in toto." Such wanton desecration of the Sabbath is a disgrace to any civilized community. Can it be wondered that men who do not hold extreme temperance principles refuse to march to the polls with these open violators of the law? Perhaps the constables had better repeat the dose.

OBITUARY.

It is our painful duty to record the death of an esteemed friend and mother. The subject of this memoir is the relict of the late George Matthewson, who died about 12 years ago. She was born in Ross-shire, Scotland, and was brought up strictly in the Presbyterian faith. She was married in Scotland and emigrated to Canada about the year 1833, remaining for a short time in the vicinity of Toronto, from thence they removed to the Township of Dunwich and located on Lot 1, Con. 7, where she resided for about 45 years. She with a portion of her family resided for about two years in the village of Wallacetown, from whence they moved to the United States, and lastly settled in Detroit, where she died on the 15th of April, aged about 76 years. She was the mother of nine sons and two daughters, six sons and one daughter surviving her to mourn her loss. She was a kind and affectionate mother, who labored persistently for the rearing of her large family. She was a constant professor of religion which was inculcated in her in early age. While health and strength permitted her she was in regular attendance on the means of grace. She was very sensible of human depravity by the fall and relied wholly upon the atonement of her Lord and Master for justification, in whom she had implicit faith and trust, and not in any merit of her own, which she manifested in her consistent life. She was early in life taught in the doctrine of justification by grace which was clearly taught in the land of her birth, and which was so grounded and settled in her that it was a "lamp to her feet and a light to her path." Her remains were brought to Dunwich and interred in the family plot in the Black burying ground. Thus endeth the temporal career of an old acquaintance well striken in years to her eternal rest.

A SEVERE TRIAL.

Those who endure the torturing pangs of neuralgia, rheumatism, sciatica, lumbago, and similar painful complaints are severely tried, but there is a speedy relief in Hagyard's Yellow Oil, as thousands who have used it testify joyfully. It banishes pain and lameness quickly.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

The new boat house at Port Stanley for the life boat crew is about completed.

MANITOBA WHEAT IN DEMAND.—Mr. Dyke, Government agent at Liverpool for Manitoba spring wheat. Any offered is promptly snapped up. Ross & Smith paid at the Liverpool exchange 7s 1d per cental for a parcel, being 3½d more than the price of No. 1 California or for wheat of any other country.

BILIOUSNESS.

"I should not think it right did I not give my testimony of what I know to be the value of Burdock Blood Bitters. Being a sufferer from biliousness I took one bottle of B.B.B. and it gave me immediate relief. I recommend it as a cure for biliousness. ANNIE McLEAN, Woodville, Ont.

Mr. Fields, of Essex Centre, has struck a good fortune. A rich relative in the old country died lately leaving £1,500,000 sterling, or nearly $7,500,000. There are eighteen for this amount to be divided with, so that each one will receive about $450,000. Some of the family live in Chatham and some in Essex Centre.

Whether on land or at sea, on the prairie or in the crowded city, Ayer's Pills are the best cathartic, being convenient, efficacious and safe. For torpid liver, indigestion and sick headache they never fail.

On Saturday the House of Commons at Ottawa rushed a great many bills through their final stages, among which were the C. P. R. monopoly bill, the $25,000,000 loan bill and the bill giving authority to reduce savings bank interest. Owing to the rapidity with which business is being rushed in the House of Commons, there are hopes of a speedy prorogation.

TO THE DEAF.—A person cured of Deafness and noises in the head of 23 years' standing by a simple remedy, will send a description of it FREE to any person who applies to NICHOLSON, 30 St. John St. Montreal.

ANOTHER ACTION FOR DAMAGES AGAINST THE G. T. R.—Messrs. Farley & McDonald, solicitors for Mr. F. Griffin, have entered an action against the G. T. R. to recover $750 damages by the destruction of the warehouse and contents by the fire caused by the collision of the L. & P. S. excursion train with an M. C. R. freight at the crossing on July 15th last.

BAPTISM BY A METHODIST MINISTER. Rev. A. C. Courtice, B.A., pastor of the Parliament street Methodist church, Toronto, Friday evening baptized three young ladies by immersion in the Parliament street Baptist church, the use of the baptistry having been courteously granted for the occasion. The service was peculiarly interesting, the interest being heightened, no doubt, by the fact that the administrator presumably had not only been immersed himself, but at least held sprinkling to be equally valid.

The listless flush, pale, hollow cheeks and precarious appetite, indicate worms. Freeman's Worm Powders will quickly and effectually remove them.

MILL-DAMS AT AYLMER SUDDENLY GIVE WAY.—A very serious disaster occurred last week at the extensive roller flour and saw mills belonging to Messrs. White & Son, four miles from Aylmer. The late rains had slightly swollen the creek, but not to such an extent as to cause any apprehension, and when suddenly, without any warning, and before any alarm was felt, the upper dam gave way, it struck with disway all in the neighborhood. The saw mill is about half a mile above the flour mill, and when the dam broke, the mater with a mighty rush carried off a half a million feet of logs and 20,000 feet of lumber. This immense mass striking the lower dam, soon also carried that away, and the flood rushed on carrying devastation with it. The loss is estimated at $20,000. The dams will not be rebuilt until fall.

Glencoe narrowly escaped a big fire on Thursday afternoon. Sparks from a locomotive set fire to some inflammable material under McRae's hotel, the side of the building had just caught when it was discovered and put out. Shortly afterwards some parties were looking at the place were the fire started when they discovered fire under the building in some sawdust and chips. This also was put out, but none too soon, as it was rapidly making headway in the strong wind which was blowing.

Fever, colic, unnatural appetite, fretfulness, weakness and convulsions are some of the effects of worms in children. Destroy the worms with Dr. Low's Worm Syrup.

In St. Thomas on Saturday evening, 5th inst., a young man named Michael Eustice, of Fingal, got such a load of stimulants into his locker as to create in him a burning desire to fight anybody or everybody. In the Penwarden House was seated a young man named John North, and Eustice struck him a blow in the face, breaking his nose. North had his proboscis attended to by Dr. Wilkinson, and then notified Chief Fewings. The chief took steps to effect Eustice's arrest, and he was captured shortly afterwards by P. C. Armstrong, and lodged in the cooler. He was charged at the police court next morning with assault, was found guilty, and fined $5 and $3 costs.—Journal.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

It is a safe rule to give all electric wires as wide a berth as possible, whether they are electric light, telegraph or telephone wires. The seemingly-harmless dangling telephone wire may somewhere in its course be crossed with an electric light wire and to touch it may be death. Last Saturday in New York a young dry goods salesman standing at his door waiting for a street car reached up to an electric light lamp to give it a swing. He happened to be standing on an iron plate let in the sidewalk. Instantly with his touch the electric circuit was closed. His body underwent a series of horrible contortions, his knees were drawn up to his chin, his face was convulsed, and he dropped to the ground dead. On the same day at Halifax an electric lineman was instantly killed by his thoughtlessly grasping an iron support with which a live wire was connected. It was a quarter of an hour before the engines could be stopped and this poor fellow's body got down. In Toronto we have hitherto escaped fatalities of this kind, but as the insulating cover of the wires wears off we cannot expect to preserve our immunity.—Empire.

A SURE RELIEF.

I suffered from a hard cough contracted by damp feet. Having consulted a local doctor without effect I thought I would try Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam as a last resort. Before I had finished the first bottle my cough had entirely disappeared, and to-day I enjoy better health than ever before. I can conscientiously recommend it. Chas. H. Kent, telegraph operator East Selkirk Man.

OLD DR. CHASE'S NEW RECEIPT BOOK.

His Last and Crowning Life Work.

Dr. Chase's Third, last and Complete Recent Book and Household Physician, or the Book for the Million, contains nearly 900 pages and sells for $2.25 in cloth binding and $2.50 in imported oil cloth, marble edge, and is justly by him called

'The crowning work of my life.'

It is the result of over half a century's observation, study and experience. Yet this embodies no compilation of his former books. IT IS WHOLLY A NEW BOOK. If 30 years ago he could produce a book that has had a sale of over 150,000 copies, and has made his name familiar in nearly every English-speaking home in the United States, Canada and thousands of homes in Europe, Australia, and South America, what kind of a book could or would he produce at his CROWNING LIFE WORK, with more than thirty years of additional practice and experience? The book itself answers the question, and is the most valuable production in the history of book publishing.

Caution! Unscrupulous and pirating publishers are attempting to copy this book by taking portions of it out and palming it off on the public as the complete work. We own the manuscript, purchased from Dr. Chase's heirs. See that you get the GENUINE book. See that it has our name on the title page and is copyrighted by us.

HAGYARD'S YELLOW OIL CURES RHEUMATISM

FREEMAN'S WORM POWDERS.

Are pleasant to take. Contain their own Purgative. Is a safe, sure, and effectual destroyer of worms in Children or Adults.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

DR. WASHINGTON,
I think it my duty to let you know how my health is improving. When I commenced treatment with you I was very ill. I had severe catarrh of my head and throat. My lungs were pronounced to be far gone in consumption. I had a very bad cough, raised a good deal of blood and matter, had night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, appetite very poor and could scarcely walk across the floor My family doctor considered my case entirely hopeless. As a last resort I was lead to try your treatment for Catarrh and Consumption My improvement was noticeable from the first and now after nearly six months treatment, under the blessing of a kind Providence, my health is again restored.
Signed, MR. WM. MITCHELL, Otterville.

A WORLD-'ROUND RECORD!

THE UTTERMOST PARTS OF THE EARTH PRAISE
WARNER'S "SAFE" CURE!

Merit wins!
In the past decade H. H. Warner, who was restored to health from an "incurable Kidney disease" by what is now known as Warner's Safe Cure, and made a vow that he would spread its merits before the entire world of sufferers—has seen the most SIGNAL PROOFS OF THE WORLD'S NEED of a Scientific Kidney Specific. All nations recognize and welcome Warner's Medicines as standards of the highest excellence because their curative powers are PERMANENT—a sure proof of power and merit. Read a few of their voluntary testimonials. They speak a varied language but tell a common story:

FRANK STUART, 28 Free School St., CALCUTTA, INDIA. "In 1875 was prostrated with a sudden attack of liver trouble. From '75 to '81 I had twenty of these terrible attacks. On the way to Japan, Capt. Connor of the "Geukai Maru" recommended me to use Warner's Safe Cure. After using 15 bottles, I HAD A SOUND, HEARTY APPETITE, THOROUGH ENJOYMENT OF LIFE, things to which I had been a stranger for six long years."

GEORGE BICKNELL, Editor Daily Telegraph, MELBOURNE, AUS., the great Australian Daily, March 30, 1886, wrote: "Work of a sedentary character for 20 years developed unpleasant symptoms of illness of the liver and kidneys. I used Warner's Safe Cure, which SPEEDILY RELIEVED ME of the unpleasant symptoms, remedied my dyspepsia, bettered my appetite, increased my enjoyment of life and work. It is a most valuable medicine and I have no hesitation in recommending it."

DR. GUSTAV WEBER, of Dessau, Duchy of Anhalt, GERMANY, May 30, 1887, writes: "For several years I have suffered with Inflammation of the Kidneys, Rheumatic Pains, etc., for which I go every summer to Carlsbad, and find a little relief. To this suffering is added a Diabetes Mellitus (sugar diabetes), which appears alternately with Rheumatism. With the using of the 15th bottle of Warner's Safe Cure I have COMPLETED MY CURE, for which I am greatly indebted to you. My general health has apparently been restored. I repeat with this my sincere gratitude."

REV. HENRY PLUME, M.A., Archdeacon, Townsville, NORTH QUEENSLAND, Oct. 15, 1887, writes: During my long bush tours I have come across many wonderful cures effected by Warner's Safe Cure. FOR FEVER, SO PREVALENT IN THE BUSH, IT SEEMS TO BE A CERTAIN CURE. From what I have seen on my late trip, I should never start on a journey without my pack being furnished with a bottle."

GEO. THORNE, ex-Premier, QUEENSLAND, at Ipswich, Sept. 2, 1887, writes: "I have recommended Warner's Safe Cure to many people who have suffered from different complaints, and in every case A CURE HAS BEEN EFFECTED. Personally I have used the medicine and derived the greatest benefit from it."

CAPT. CONNOR, of the Steamer "Geukai, Maru," JAPAN. "Suffered from congestion of the kidneys and liver, losing four stone in weight, determined to give up his steamship, almost CONTEMPLATED SUICIDE. One day an American passenger recommended him to use Warner's Safe Cure. In TWO MONTHS USE HE RECOVERED HIS LOST STRENGTH, and was THE PERSONIFICATION OF HEALTH AND STRENGTH. "God bless the day I took Warner's Safe Cure," he says.

GEN. W. F. NUTHALL, of 10 Edith Terrace, Brompton, S.W., LONDON, Eng., who contracted Liver and Kidney disease in India, March 10, 1837, wrote that he "was at times prostrated with the most agonizing attacks from passage of gravel. I was firmly of the opinion that I should never recover my health, as the long residence in India had caused so much disease of the Liver and Kidneys that I was beyond permanent help. In this desponding condition I began Warner's Safe Cure, and in eight months I fully recovered my health, and to day am in its full enjoyment, never having had a particle of trouble since my remarkable recovery. As this was five years ago I can safely say that the wonderful cure was permanent and is all to be attributed to Warner's Safe Cure.—[Author of "Staff Corps Guide."]

DR. WM. EDWARD ROBSON, late Royal Navy, ENGLAND, writes April 12, 1887, from New Egham, Stains, Eng.: "My attention was first called to Warner's Safe Cure about a year ago, when a patient of mine suffering from Bright's Disease was cured by its use. Since that time I have prescribed it in hundreds of cases, with the most gratifying results, and I am willing to acknowledge and commend thus frankly the value of this great remedy."

WILLIAM BEDE DALLEY, Q. C., Privy Counsellor of the Queen, Sydney, New South Wales, writes Feb. 21, 1888: "I can bear witness to the very great improvement in my health consequent on the persistent use of Warner's Safe Cure."

The Hon. W. B. Dalley, is the most celebrated lawyer in the Colony and the most brilliant orator and greatest statesman in Australia; he is ex-Premier of the Colony of New South Wales.

☞ H. H. Warner & Co. point with pride to the World-'Round Fame of Warner's Safe Cure. They offer the above as genuine in all respects and true, so far as they know, with $5,000 for proof to the contrary. Ask your friends and neighbors about

TWO YOUNG MEN KILLED.

THE GRAHAM ROAD BRIDGE THE SCENE OF A FATAL ACCIDENT.—TWO MEN DEAD AND FIVE INJURED.

At 9 a.m. Thursday, while the men were at work on the iron bridge across the River Thames, two miles north of here, connecting the townships of Mosa and Aldborough, the bridge gave way, hurling the men into the river fifty feet below, killing two and injuring five. The killed are James Lamb, of Acton, head split open; Alex. Watterworth, son of Joseph Watterworth, Mosa, neck broken. The injured are John Maddington, foreman, leg and hand badly bruised and one finger taken off; Ben Campbell, leg bruised and wrist badly sprained, besides a severe shaking up; Hiram Lumley, shoulder and side badly bruised and leg hurt.

The stonework has been successfully built by Messrs. Farquhar & Bro., of Toronto, and the iron work was about to be placed on the stone piers by the Hamilton Bridge Company. It appears that in digging the foundations for the piers a quantity of blue clay had, when the water was low, been thrown out in the bed of the river last fall. In putting down the timber for the trestlework to support the iron girders, the ends of the sticks of timber appear to have been driven into the blue clay referred to, and after the recent rain, the water washing away the earth from the false posts on the south bank of the river, let them slip inwards, allowing the bridge, which was heavy with the weight of iron on it, to go endways towards the south bank. When the accident took place Lamb and Watterworth were sitting down, engaged in welding some of the iron works together, and had no chance to save themselves, as the bridge went down suddenly. The rest of the men jumped, and were more fortunate. The loss to the company will be considerable, as the bridge would soon have been completed.

The Aylmer council have appointed as special police Francis Gras, George Grass, John Mathers and Wm. Purdy; wages, when on duty, $2 per day.

A double funeral took place at the Jubilee Baptist Church, Malahide, on Sunday 6th, when the last respects were paid to the remains of two aged ladies, mother and daughter. Mrs. Abigail Northrup, aged 94 and Mrs. Tameer McConnell, aged 73.

CAST UP BY THE WAVES.

On Wednesday afternoon of last week as Mr. Mitchell, of Delaware west, was walking along by Weekes' Cove in Caradoc his attention was attracted by something sticking out of the mud, left by the recent floods, which on examination proved to be the body of a man. Information was speedily given to the coroner, Dr. McLaren, who telegraphed to the Crown Attorney for instructions as to holding an inquest. The body was brought over to Delaware and placed under the town hall. On examination it appeared to be the body of a young man from eighteen to twenty years of age, no hair on his face, but closely cut black hair on his head, apparently well dressed with two pairs of pants on. He is about five feet nine inches in height, very slight build. Must have come down with the recent floods and partly buried in sand.

Mr. Gilmour, of London, went to Delaware to ascertain if the body was that of his son who disappeared during the winter. The remains were fully identified as those of the missing young man.

Archbishop Lynch, of Toronto, died on Saturday last and was buried on Wednesday of this week.

St. Thomas has entered into a three-year contract with the Electric Light Company at 28 cents per light per night. The city now has 14 lights on Talbot street and 8 on other streets for which they have been paying 22 and 25 cents per light.

A SUCCESSFUL RESULT.

Sirs,—I was troubled for five years with liver complaint. I used a great deal of doctor's medicine, which did me no good. I was getting worse all the while until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters. After taking four bottles I am now well. I can also recommend it for dyspepsia. Miss Hattie L. Swick, St. Williams P.O., Ont.

The Journal Belmont correspondent writes: Messrs. Angus Taylor and Duncan Dewar proceeded to St. Thomas Friday to purchase three colonies of bees to ornament their apiary. On returning and when opposite the cheese factory, Mapleton, the bees being insecurely moored and having obtained their liberty attacked the horses when the latter ran away.

There is no danger to human life more to be dreaded than that which arises from vitiated blood. Dyspepsia, rheumatism, headache and general debility all result from it, and are cured by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Take it this month Six bottles, $5.

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,

New York, August 1, 1886. 122 E. 27th st.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,
Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:
My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.
Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,
A Priceless Blessing
C. EDWARDS LESTER.

THE THREAD OF LIFE;

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER I.—BOHEMIA.

Whoever knows Bohemian London, knows the smoking room of the Cheyne Row Club. No more comfortable or congenial divan exists anywhere between Regent Circus and Hyde Park Corner than that chosen paradise of unrecognized geniuses. The Cheyne Row Club is not large, indeed, but it prides itself upon being extremely select—too select to admit upon its list of members peers, politicians, country gentlemen, or inhabitants of eligible family residences in Mayfair or Belgravia. Two qualifications are understood to be indispensible in candidates for membership: they must be truly great, and they must be unsuccessful. Possession of a commodious suburban villa excludes, ipso facto.

The Cheyne Row Club is emphatically the headquarters of the great Bohemian clan; the gathering-place of unhung artists, unread novelists, unpaid poets, and unhesitated social and political reformers generally. Hither flock all the choicest spirits of the age during that probationary period when society in its slow and lumbering fashion is spending twenty years in discovering for itself the bare fact of their distinguished existence. Here Maudle displays his latest designs to Postlethwaite's critical and admiring eye; here Postlethwaite pours his honeyed sonnets into Maudle's receptive and sympathetic tympanum. Everybody who is anybody has once been a member of the 'dear old Cheyne Row:' Royal Academicians and Cabinet Ministers and Society Journalists and successful poets still speak with lingering pride and affection of the days when they lunched there, as yet undiscovered, on a single chop and a glass of draught claret by no means of the daintiest. Not that the Club can number any of them now on its existing roll-call: the Cheyne Row is for prospective celebrity only; accomplished facts transfer themselves at once to a statelier site in Pall Mall near the Duke of York's Column. Rising merit frequents the Tavern, as scoffers profanely term it: risen greatness basks rather on the lordly stuffed couches of Waterloo Place.

No man, it has been acutely observed, remains a Bohemian when he has daughters to marry. The pure and blameless ratepayer avoids Prague. As soon as Smith becomes Chancellor of the Exchequer, as soon as Brown takes silk, as soon as Robinson is elected an Associate, as soon as Tompkins publishes his popular novel, they all incontinently with one accord desert the lesser institution in the Piccadilly byway, and pass on their names, their honours, their hats, and their subscriptions to the dignified repose of the Athenæum. For them, the favourite haunt of judge and bishop: for the young, the active, the struggling, and the incipent, the chop and claret of the less distinguished but more lively caravansera by the Green Park purlieus.

In the smoking-room of this truly great and unsuccessful Bohemian society, at the tag-end of a London season, one warm evening in a hot July, Hugh Massinger, of the Utter Bar, sat lazily by the big bow window, turning over the pages of the last number of the Charing Cross Review. That he was truly great, nobody could deny. He was in very fact a divine bard, or, to be more strictly accurate, the author of a pleasing and melodious volume of minor poetry. Even away from the Cheyne Row Club, none but the most remote of country-cousins—say from the wilder parts of Cornwall or the crofter-clad recesses of the Isle of Syke—could have doubted for a moment the patent fact that Hugh Massinger was a distinguished (though unknown) poet of the modern school, so admirably did he fit his part in life as to features, dress, and general appearance. Indeed, malicious persons were wont at times unkindly to insinuate that Hugh was a poet, not because he found in himself any special aptitude for stringing verses or building the lofty rhyme, but because his face and bearing imperatively compelled him to adopt the thankless profession of bard in self-defence. This was ill-natured, and it was also untrue; for Hugh Massinger had lisped in numbers—at least in penny ones—ever since he was able to lisp in print at all. He had taken to poetry almost from his very cradle; and had astonished his father at sixteen by a rhymed version of an ode of Horace, worth the inspiration of the great Dr. Watts himself, and not, perhaps, far below the poetic standard of Mr. Martin Farquhar Tupper. At Oxford he had perpetrated a capital Newdigate; and two years after gaining his fellowship at Oriel, he had published anonymously, in parchment covers, Echoes from Callimachus, and other Poems, which had fairly succeeded by careful nursing in attaining the dignity of a second edition under his own name. So that Massinger's claim to the sodality of the craft whose workman are 'born not made' might perhaps be considered as of the genuine order, and not entirely dependent, as cynics averred, upon his long hair, his pensive eyes, his dark-brown cheek, or the careless twist of his necktie and his shirt collar.

Nevertheless, even in these minor details of the poetical character, it must candidly be confessed that Hugh Massinger outstripped by several points many of the more recognised bards whose popular works are published in regulation green-cloth octavos, and whose hats and cloaks, of unique build, adorn with their presence the vestibule pegs of the Athenæum itself. The undistinguished author of Echoes from Callimachus was tall and slight, and a trifle affected-looking. That his face was beautiful, extremely beautiful, even a hostile reviewer in the organ of another clique could hardly venture seriously to deny: those large sad eyes, that long black hair, that exquisitely chiselled and melancholy mouth, would alone have sufficed to attract attention and exhort admiration anywhere in the universe, or at the very least in the solar system. Hugh Massinger, in short, was (like Coleridge) a noticeable man. It would have been impossible to pass him by, even in a crowded street, without a hurried glance of observation and pleasure at his singularly graceful and noble face. He looked and moved every inch a poet; delicate, refined, cultivated, expressive, and sicklied o'er with that pale cast of thought which modern æstheticism so cruelly demands as a proof of attachment from her highest votaries. Yet at the same time, in spite of deceptive appearances to the contrary, he was strong in muscular strength: a wiry man, thin, but well knit: one of those fallacious, uncanny, long-limbed creatures who can scale an Alp or tramp a score or so of miles before breakfast, while looking as if a short stroll through the Park would kill them outright with sheer exhaustion. Altogether, a typical poet of the newest model, that dark and handsome æsthetic-looking man; and as he sat there carelessly with the paper held before him, in an unstudied attitude of natural grace, many a painter might have done worse than choose the author of Echoes from Callimachus for the subject of a pretty Academy pot-boiler.

So Warren Relf, the unknown marine artist, thought to himself, in his armchair opposite, as he raised his eyes by chance from the etchings in the Portfolio, and glanced across casually with a hasty look at the undiscovered poet.

"Has the Charing Cross reviewed your new volume yet?" he asked politely, his glance meeting Massinger's while he flung down the paper on the table beside him.

The poet rose and stood with his hands behind his back in an easy posture before the empty fireplace. "I believe it has deigned to assign me half a column of judicious abuse," he answered, half yawning, with an assumption of profound indifference and contempt for the Charing Cross Review and all its ideas or opinions collectively. "To tell you the truth, the subject's one that dosen't interest me. In the first place, I care very little for my own verses. And in the second place, I don't care at all for reviewers generally, or for the Charing Cross Snarler and its kind in particular. I disbelieve altogether in reviews, in fact. Familiarity breeds contempt. To be quite candid, I've written too many of them."

"If criticism in literature's like criticism in art," the young painter rejoined, smiling, "why, with the one usual polite exception of yourself, Massinger, I can't say I think very much of the critics.—But what do you mean, I should like to know, by saying you don't care for your own verses? Surely no man can do anything great, in literature or art—or in shoe-blacking or pig-sticking, if it comes to that—unless he thoroughly believes in his own vocation."

Massinger laughed a musical laugh. "In shoe-blacking or pig-sticking," he said with a delicate curl of his thin lips, "that's no doubt true; but in verse-making, query? Who on earth at the present day could even pretend to himself to believe in poetry? Time was, I daresay—though I'm by no means sure of it—when the bard, hoary old impostor, was a sort of prophet, and went about the world with a harp in his hand, and a profound conviction in his innocent old heart that when he made 'Sapphic' rhyme to "traffic," or produced a triolet on the theme of "Catullus" "lull us" and "cull us" he was really and truly enriching humanity with a noble gift of divine poesy. But who in London, in the nineteenth century, can for a moment affect to believe in the efficacy of poetry? Look at this last new volume of my own, for example!—You won't look at it, of course, I'm well aware, but that's no matter: nobody ever does look at my immortal works, I'm only too profoundly conscious. I cut them myself in a dusty copy at all the libraries, in order to create a delusive impression on the mind of the public that I've had at least a solitary reader. But let that pass."

Warren Relf looked up at him a little uneasily. "I don't like to hear you run down poetry like that," he said, with an evident tinge of disapprobation. "I'm not a poet myself, of course; but still I'm sure it isn't all a mere matter of rhymes and refrains, of epithets and prettinesses. What touches our hearts lies deeper than mere expression, I'm certain. It lies in the very core and fibre of the man. There are passages even in your own poems—though you're a great deal too cynical to admit it now—that came straight out of the depths of your own heart, I venture to conjecture—those Lines on a Lock of Hair, for example. Aha, cynic! there I touched you on the raw. But if you think so lightly of poetry as a pursuit, as you say, I wonder why you ever came to take to it."

"Take to it, my dear fellow! What an Arcadian idea! As if men nowadays chose their sphere in life deliberately. Why, what on earth makes any of us ever take to anything, I should like to know, in this miserable workaday modern world of ours! Because we're simply pitchforked into it by circumstances. Does the crossing-sweeper sweep crossings, do you suppose, for example, by pure preference for the profession of a sweep? Does the milkman get up at five in the morning because he sees in the purveying of skim-milk to babes and sucklings a useful and important and even necessary industry to the rising generation of this great Metropolis? Does the dustman empty the domestic bin out of disinterested regard for public sanitation? or the engine-driver dash through rain and snow in a drear-nighted December like a Comtist prophet, out of high and noble enthusiasm of humanity?" And he snapped his fingers with an emphatic negative. "We don't choose our places in life at all, my dear boy," he went on after a pause; "we get tumbled into them by pure caprice of circumstances. If I'd chosen mine, instead of strictly meditating the thankless muse, I'd certainly have adopted the exalted profession of a landed proprietor, with the pleasing duty of receiving my rents (by proxy) once every quarter, and spending them royally with becoming magnificence, in noble ways, like the Greek one reads about in Aristotle. I always admired that amiable Greek gentleman; the megaloprepee, I think Aristotle calls him. His berth would suit me down to the ground. He had nothing at all of any sort to do, and he did it most gracefully with princely generosity on a sufficient income."

"But you must write poetry for something or other, Massinger; for if it isn't rude to make the suggestion, you can hardly write it, you know, for a livelihood."

Massinger's dark face flushed visibly. "I write for fame," he answered majestically, with a lordly wave of his long thin hand. "For glory—for honor—for time—for eternity. Or, to be more precisely definite, if you prefer the phrase, for filthy lucre. In the coarse and crude phraseology of political economists, poetry takes rank nowadays, I humbly conceive, as a long investment. I'm a journalist by trade—a mere journeyman journalist; the gushing penny-a-liner of a futile and demoralised London press. But I have a soul within me above penny-a-lining; I aspire ultimately to a pound a word. I don't mean to live and die in Grub Street. My soul looks forward to immorality, and a footman in livery."

Relf smiled dubiously, and knocked the ashes off his cigar into the Japanese tray that stood by his side. "Then you look upon poetry merely as an ultimate means of making money?" he suggested, with a deprecatory look.

"Money! Not money only, my dear fellow, but position, reputation, recognition, honour. Does any man work for anything else? Any man, I mean, but cobblers and enthusiasts?"

"Well, I don't know. I may be an enthusiast myself," Relf answered slowly; "but I certainly do work at art to a great extent for art's sake, because I really love and admire and delight in it. Of course I should like to make money too, within reasonable limits—enough to keep myself and my people in a modest sort of way, without the footman or the eligible family residence. Not that I want to be successful, either; from what I've seen of successful men, I incline to believe that success as a rule has a very degenerating effect upon character. Literature, science, and art thrive best in a breezy, bracing air. I never aim at being a successful man myself; and if I go on as I'm doing now, I shall no doubt succeed in not succeeding. But apart from the money and the livelihood altogether, I love my work as an occupation. I like doing it; and I like to see myself growing stronger and freer at it every day."

"That's all very well for you," Massinger replied with another expansive wave of his graceful hand. "You're doing work you care for, as I play lawn-tennis, for a personal amusement. I can sympathise with you there.—Let's quit the subject. It turns me always into a gloomy pessimist.—What are you going to do with yourself this summer?"

"Me? Oh, just the usual thing, I suppose. Going down in my tub to paint sweet mudbanks off the coast of Suffolk."

"Suffolk to wit! I see the finger of fate in that! Why, that's just where I'm going, too. I mean to take six or eight weeks' holiday, if a poor drudge of a journalist can ever be said to indulge in holidays at all—with books for review, and proofs for correction, and editorial communications for consideration always weighing like a ton of lead upon his unhappy breast; and I propose to bury myself alive up to the chin in some obscure, out-of-the-way Suffolk village they call Whitestrand.—Have you ever heard of it?"

"Oh, I know it well," Relf answered with a smile of delightful reminiscence. "It's grand for mud. I go there painting again and again. You'd call it the funniest little stranded old-world village you ever came across anywhere in England. Nothing could be uglier, quainter, or more perfectly charming. It lies at the mouth of a dear little muddy creek, with a funny old mill for pumping the water off the sunken meadows; and all around, for miles and miles, is one great flat of sedge and seapink, alive with water-birds, and intersected with dikes, where the herons fish all day long, poised on one leg in the middle of the stream as still as mice, exactly as if they were sitting to Marks for their portraits."

"Ah, delightful for a painter, I've no doubt," Hugh Massinger replied, half yawning to himself, "especially for a painter to whom mudand herons are bread and butter, and brackish water is Bass and Allsopp: but scarcely, you'll admit, an attractive picture to the inartistic public, among whom I take the liberty, for this occasion only, humbly to rank myself. I go there, in fact, as a martyr to principle. I live for others. A member of my family—not to put too fine a point upon it, a lady—abides for the present moment at Whitestrand, and believes herself to be siezed or possessed by prescriptive right of a lien or claim to a certain fixed aliquot portion of my time and attention. I've never admitted the claim myself (being a legally-minded soul); but just out of the natural sweetness of my disposition, I go down occasionally (without prejudice) to whatever part of England she may chance to be inhabiting for the sake of not disappointing her foregone expectations, however ill-founded, and be the same more or less.—You observe, I speak with the charming precision of the English statute-book."

"But how do you mean to get to Whitestrand?" Relf asked suddenly after a short pause. "It's a difficult place to reach, you know. There's no station nearer than ten miles off, and that a country one, so that when you arrive there, you can get no conveyance to take you over."

"So my kind cousin gave me to understand. She was kind enough to provide me with minute instructions for her bookless wilds. I believe I'm to hire a costermonger's cart or something of the sort to convey my portmanteau; and I'm to get across my self by the aid of the natural means of locomotion with which a generous providence or survival of the fittest has been good enough to endow me by hereditary transmission. At least, so my cousin Elsie instructs me."

"Why not come round with me in the tub?" Relf suggested good-humoredly.

"What? your yacht? Hatherley was telling me you were the proud possessor of a ship—Are you going round that way any time shortly?"

"Well, she's not exactly what you call a yacht," Relf replied, with an apologetic tinge in his tone of voice. "She's only a tub, you know, an open boat almost, with a covered well and just room for three to sleep and feed in. She's a perfect treasure to a marine painter in the mud-and-buoy business. But I won't for a moment pretend to say she's comfortable for a landsman. If you come with me, in fact, you'll have to rough it."

"I love roughing it.—How long will it take us to cruise round to Whitestrand?"

"Oh, the voyage depends entirely upon the wind and tide. Sailing boats take their own time. The Mud-Turtle—that's what I call her—doesn't hurry. She's lying now off the Pool at the Tower, taking care of herself in the absence of all her regular crew; and Potts, my mate, he's away in the north, intending to meet me next week at Lowestoft, where my mother and sister are stopping in lodgings. We can start on our cruise whenever you like—say, if you choose, to-morrow morning."

Turkey.

"Si requiris monumentum circumspice." We are surrounded by a cloud of witnesses. Every land that has embraced Islam has been smitten with decay. Look at Turkey. The learned Prof. Paparrigopoulos of Athens has concentrated in a sentence the withering effect of Mussulman domination in what is now the Ottoman Empire. In the beginning of the thirteenth century the annual revenue of the Byzantine Empire was £130,000,000. Yet at that time not only was the Eastern Empire greatly impoverished by the ravages of the Crusades, but the chief part of Asia Minor, with its flourishing cities, had been wrested from her by Islam. The revenue of the Turkish Empire to-day is less than £18,000,000, and it is steadily declining. To what are we to attribute this portentous fact? Not to soil or climate or lack of natural resources. Turkey possesses all the conditions favorable to agricultural and commercial prosperity in a degree surpassing that of any other country in the world—climate, geographical position, fertility of soil, convenient channels of exportation. Possessing the climates it yields the fruits and products of all the zones. Astride on Europe and Asia, it owns the richest territories on both continents, and is still sovereign over the fertile valley of the Nile. The country abounds in lakes, is indented by numerous bays and gulfs and washed by six seas, all of which offer it rare advantages for maritime commerce. It is, in addition, intersected by broad and deep rivers ready to bear its produce to the sea. In no country of the world have the gifts of God been lavished in richer profusion. In none have they been so grossly and systematically abused by the folly of man. The silence of desolation now broods over vast regions which were once thickly peopled, well cultivated, abounding in flourishing cities and rejoicing in an advanced civilization. Territories which formerly supported the capitals of ancient kingdoms—Pergamos, Sardis, Cyzica, Prusium, Troy, Nicomedia, and many more—have been reduced by Islam to cheerless solitudes, broken at intervals by the tents of nomad Kurds or man-stealing Turkomans. According to Ubicini, a cultivated Roumanian who spent 20 years in the civil administration of the Porte and wrote after the Crimean war in defense of the Turkish Empire, the annual produce of corn in Asia Minor was then estimated at 25,000,000 Turkish kiles, representing in value about £3,000,000. He thinks that this amount might easily be increased tenfold "if the great productiveness of the soil were turned to account." "Tne same remark," he adds, "applies to all other productions which serve for local consumption or for exportation." But, instead of increase, during the last 40 years there has been an accelerating decrease. The decay of every kind of manufacture has kept pace with the decline of agriculture. Diarbekir and Brousa, once so famous for their velvets, satins, and silk stuffs, have been ruined. So have Aleppo and Bagdad."

NOTES ON CURRENT TOPICS.

It is reported that General Booth of the Salvation Army sold seven thousand tickets of admission to the wedding of his daughter the other day in London at $5 each. Probably the story is a hoax, but it suggests the immense financial possibilities that there may be in the possession of seven or eight daughters when the owner of them happens to be a celebrity.

The Boston Post has made a discovery which has somewhat disconcerted the U. S. fishermen who have so loudly clamoured for protection against Canadian aggression. It publishes a list of over twenty masters of fishing vessels sailing from Gloucester to the Banks, and states that all of them came from Nova Scotia, while in many cases the crews were also Nova Scotians. It will now be in order to protest that the native-born American fishermen are being robbed of their trade, and to call upon the Government to set in motion the law forbidding the employment of alien labour under contract.

One would think that New York should be a healthier city to live in than London, but a report of the health department of the former city for the year 1886 proves the contrary. In 1886 the mortality of London was only 20 per 1,000 of the population, whereas in New York it was 26 per 1,000. It seems that New York is really more overcrowded than London, notwithstanding the five millions of people in the world's metropolis. The report states that the average number of persons to a dwelling in New York is 16 37 as compared with 7.8 in London. The excessive mortality in New York is ascribed to diseases caused or aggravated by overcrowding, such as diphtheria, croup and diarrhœa.

The encroachments of the fair sex upon domains which were once held to belong exclusively to men are gradually increasing. In the United States women are employed as shorthand writers, typewriters, cashiers, bookkeepers, compositors and photographic retouchers, and have been allowed to enter the profession of medicine. In England, their services are utilized as telegraph operators. In a town in Kansas the mayor and the councillors are women. In the city of Philadelphia over five thousand women have obtained employment during the past few years in branches previously filled by men alone. In process of time it may be expected that the ladies will monopolize all the genteel occupations.

A Brooklyn, N. Y., journal is now championing the English sparrow, and protests against the measures being taken for its extirpation. "The much abused sparrow," it says, "has done a great deal for Brooklyn, as he has for other places. When the inch worm or measure worm had possession of the city, dropping from the trees on pedestrians and so torturing the nervous system that life was robbed of every charm, this pugnacious little bird made short work of the nuisance. He was brought from England with this one object in view, and when he had done his work quickly and effectively his praises were sung in every home. The bird-houses which one sees in the trees throughout the city are tributes to the sparrow of grateful appreciation."

Byron and Burns.

The explanation of the carelessness of Byron's centenary is plain. The fact is its own interpreter. It is his personality which accounts for the indifference. We do not mean his loose life. Burns was as loose a liver, but no famous personality in English literature is so beloved as Burns. Nelson was as immoral, but England bore him upon her heart to St. Paul's, and with his name she conjures English valor still. But Byron personally kindles no emotion save one of half contempt. He had every opportunity, every splendid advantage, every gift that men desire, but the personal life that they all helped to achieve was simply pitiful. His genius asserted itself in passionate and powerful poetry. That was in despite of himself. But all that belongs to character, to pure, generous, ennobling and helpful life, all that depended upon himself, was wantonly squandered. Nor did he apparently even care or try to do differently, except at the last, when he went to Greece.

Of Burns' remorse, regret, and earnest stumbling endeavor to stand upright, amid pinching poverty and hostile circumstance of every kind, of that profound and penetrating pathos of consciousness of baffled will and of lost life, which appeals to the heart of the world, like a sick child to the mother, there is no trace in Byron. But it is the personality, large, generous, humane, aspiring, longing, lamenting—the pearl in the mire, but still a pearl—which gives Burns the love of his fellow-men, and makes his name as dear as his song, and amid all the shame and sorrow and hopelessness of his life still whispers,

"Tis sweeter for thee despairing
Than aught in the world beside."

W. D. Howells, in April Harper's.

Stay on the Farm.

In all ages attempts have been made to check the tendency of people to forsake farms and pour into cities. Joaquin Miller, the poet of the Sierras, who has a bit of land under his feet near Oakland, Cal., deprecates the singular action of the daily press toward all who live remote from the great towns. He objects to the flippant sneers about "rustics" and "hayseeds," and he asks: "Who was the father of the poor simpleton who writes all these things of the farmer, the country editor, and all, indeed, who dwell not at the Capital? Why, the bright and brassy young man who writes these things was himself born among the cows. And, indeed, no man yet of any great account was ever either born in a city or reared in a city. The great men of earth have ever been born and reared on the grass, close to the bosom of our mother." The strong men of the city press are not guilty of the offenses charged by Mr. Miller. They know the temptations, the follies and the disappointments of the metropolis, and they would rather build up country life than to sew in its ranks the seeds of discontent. He who has developed broad views never forgets his early impressions, if he was born and reared on a farm, nor is he ashamed of the past. In Canada agriculture is one of the great sources of wealth, and no sensible man would think for a moment of trying to crush it with a sneer. He who has won all the triumphs which can be won in a city is seldom satisfied. His crowning ambition is to buy a farm, stock it with horses, cattle or sheep, and to try his skill in molding type. The glitter of the city is poor recompense for the peace, independence and solid comforts of the country.

Then Tell it

To the victims of pains and aches no tidings can give greater pleasure than the means of relief. Polson's NERVILINE exactly fills the bill. Nerviline cures rheumatism. Nerviline cures cramps. It is not surprising that some members of the Dominion Parliament are impatient and even indignant at the apparently slow progress of British diplomacy in putting a stop to the seizure and confiscation of Canadian fishing vessels in Behring's Sea. The pretence that the nation which has just insisted upon and secured the right of fishing in Canadian Bays exceeding ten miles in width at the mouth may justly exercise territorial rights over a great open sea, and that too in virtue of the ownership of but one of its coasts, seems too preposterous to become a matter of serious international correspondence. To even the coolest heads the seizure of inoffensive fishing vessels, with their cargoes and crews, at the distance of ninety or one hundred miles from the mainland, has more the appearance of privateering than of legitimate protection of rights by a civilized and Christian nation.

How He Expressed His Love.

"James, do you love your sister?"

"Yes, pa."

"Well, show me how you love her."

The boy stood still, not knowing what to do.

"James, how do I express my love for your mother?"

"Oh, you now and then give her some money, but I ain't got any."

Woman as a Martyr.

History records the sufferings of countless martyrs, and we read of them with wonder and sympathy. But there are living to-day in our midst thousands of other martyrs who have far stronger claims upon our consideration—women who are sufferers from those ailments peculiar to their sex, our wives, daughters and sisters, perhaps, whose lives are an unremitting round of suffering. "Is there no relief?" they cry. Yes, there is; Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will remove that "dragging down" feeling, will banish that backache, will restore every function to its normal condition. To all sufferers from female complaints—and their name is Legion—we say: get the "Prescription" at once; it will be worth far more than its weight in gold to you.

Symptoms of Catarrh.

A profuse and many times excessively offensive discharge, with "stopping up" of the nose at times, impairment of the sense of smell and taste, watering or weak eyes, fmpaired hearing, irregular appetite, occasional nausea, pressure and pain over the eyes, and at times in the back of the head, occasional chilly sensations, cold feet, and a feeling of lassitude and debility, are symptoms which are common to catarrh, yet all of them are not present in every case. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures catarrh in its worst forms and stages. It is pleasant to use, and contains no poisonous or caustic drugs. Of druggists, for 50 cents.

A Voluntary Statement.

The writer of this paragraph once had an elder and only brother. Brought up together, we were almost inseparable, hopeful and ambitious. Exposure planted the seeds of consumption in the elder, and in a few weeks, in the month of May, "good store of flowers were stuck round about his winding sheet." Every attention and every remedy that love could give or obtain were unavailing. Since that sad day, I have learned, through the most trustworthy authority and from experience in its use, that a real remedy now exists, that of Dr. Pierce, called the "Golden Medical Discovery." A thousand pities that it was not discovered ages ago, but how thankful the present generation should be that it can now avail itself of so potent a remedy.

An influential deputation, representing the cattle shippers of Ontario, waited upon the market committee of the Montreal city council to protest against the imposition of market dues on export cattle. The committee decided to refer the question whether the impost complained of was legally collectable to the city attorney, and promised to give the deputation an answer at the earliest possible moment.

A curious case has arisen out of the proceedings of the Combines Committee. It appears that a Mr. Lockerby has brought an action for the libel against Mr. Mathewson, of Montreal, arising out of the evidence he had given before the committee. An original letter was put in, and Mr. Lockerby obtained a copy of this letter; but since the copying the original letter has disappeared, and Mr. Mathewson is placed at a serious disadvantage. The committee is now considering the desirability of procuring legislation protecting witnesses.

Two girls belonging to Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, while returning from church at the village of Ohio in that country, were attacked by a savage-looking tramp who struck one of the girls with a club. The other promptly felled the supposed tramp to the ground with her fist. In falling the assailant's cap fell off and about two feet of hair rolled from beneath, proving their assailant to be not a man but a female, an enemy of theirs, dressed in men's clothing, with her face smeared over with pot smut that her features might not be recognised.

Contemporaneous with the repeal of the Scott Act in Renfrew the following story comes from Eganville:—Mrs. Davis, of Eganville, opened a can of peaches, and, discovering that they had "worked," threw them into the back yard. Not long after the chickens began eating the spoiled fruit, and as the "working had generated alcohol, the fowls soon became gloriously drunk, swaggering about in the most ridiculous manner. One staid old rooster, who had never been known to indulge in a fight, became very tight, flew over the fence into a neighbour's yard, attacked a rooster twice his size and got licked. He managed to get home again, however, and dropped over apparently dead. When Mr. Davis came home in the evening he threw the whole flock over the back fence, supposing they had been poisoned. In the course of a short time the rooster came to, crowed lustily, and soon his companions sobered up also, but they acted as if they had bad headaches.

In the United States last year the losses by fire amounted to over $119,000,000, an increase of fourteen millions over 1886. The principal causes of fire are put down as incendiarism and defective flues, lighting the fires with kerosene being included amongst the former.

The temperance party of Massachusetts have gained a great victory in the Legislature, where a bill limiting the number of liquor licenses to one in 1,000 of the population for cities and towns outside of Boston, and one in 500 in Boston, was passed by a vote of 104 yeas to 49 nays.

William Jones and Charles Angels quarreled the other day in Oregon, each claiming to be the better marksman. At Indianapolis as a gentleman was walking along the street, accompanied by two young ladies, one of the girls stepped on a parlor match, and in an instant the dresses of both were ablaze from head to foot. The Massachusetts Assembly-men by a vote of 121 to 50 have refused to grant the suffrage to women. A majority of both parties in the House rejected the measure, so that the Massachusetts women have very little ground for hope in the future. This comes of magnifying the importance of the Pilgrim Fathers so that no one ever heard of the pilgrim mothers.

A very curious point of law of importance to the Roman Catholic Church has just been decided in the State of New York. A testator left in his will fifteen thousand dollars for the purpose of having prayers offered in a Roman Catholic Church, to be by the executors selected, "for the repose of his soul and the souls of his family, and also the souls of all others who may be in purgatory." The Court of appeal held that the bequest was invalid and that the money must go to the heirs, on the ground that no Catholic Church was specified. The language of the will, the court decided, was broad enough to include all the Catholic Churches in the world, and there should have been a definite beneficiary or one capable of determination

It is only a question of a few years for the proposed legislation to be adopted.

Attacked by Squirrels.

Many instances are narrated of weasles attacking, savagely biting and sometimes even killing human beings. But squirrels are regarded as more timid and harmless animals, yet the following anecdote illustrates that they, under certain circumstances, may become formidable antagonists. Col. J. L. Culbertson, of Edwardsport, Ind., tells it as a story of his experience about the year 1854, the time of the great migration of squirrels from the East to the West.

He was a young man then, and one day he took his rifle and went about a mile from town to hunt. He was going through the woods when he met the army of squirrels. They became so thick around him and seemed so fearless that he stood in amazement.

Finally he struck one with a stick. The squirrel uttered a sharp squeak, and instantly myriads of squirrels from all directions rushed to the defence of their associate and attacked Mr. Culbertson, who kicked them off and clubbed at them with his gun. They climbed up his legs, jumped upon his back and on top of his head.

He fought desperately, but the more he succeeded in hurting, the louder the chattering and screaming around him became, which only brought greater numbers of the infuriated little animals to the attack. They bit his legs and arms and gashed his face and neck, and lacerated his hands, fairly scrambling over each other in their fierce assault.

He dropped his gun and retreated as fast as he could, fighting desperately as he went. Blood streamed down his face and neck and hands. They bit him through the ears, and held on until they actually tore their hold loose.

He got out of the woods, and still scores followed him and clung to him until they were pulled off by the clerk and others in a store into which young Culbertson rushed for assistance. Some of the friends who helped to pull off the squirrels, and who saw him come into town literally beset with them, still reside at Edwardsport.

His friends washed his wounds and stayed the flow of blood which trickled down his legs and back and gushed from his face and neck, and, with good care and attention, he slowly recovered.

South American Railways.

MONTREAL, May 7.—A rumor has been going round the town for several days past that an extensive company, composed of leading Canadian and American railway and steam magnates had been, or was about to be, formed to build railways in South America. The name of Hon. J. J. C. Abbott being connected with the enterprise, your correspondent endeavored to ascertain from some members of the firm here if there was any truth in the report. Nothing definite can be learned, but it is certain that such an organization has been talked about, if not really, in fact, accomplished. The capital of the company is estimated at $1,000,000, and the alleged operations of the concern will be confined to the great Empire of Brazil, whose resources, while being inexhaustible, have scarcely entered upon the first stage of development. The steamers of the proposed company are to be placed on the Amazon and other rivers, and a thousand miles of first-class railway will be built, uniting the two great waterways of the Amazon and the Para.

Germany Alarmed—Fears in Berlin that Russia will make a French Alliance.

BERLIN, May 13, 1888.—The resurrection of the Panslavist party in Russia has reawakened alarm in official circles. The Czar's reinstatement of General Bogdanovich in his former position in the Russian service is not an isolated proof that the open adoption of an offensive policy approaches.

The Czar's assent to the revival of the Slav associations—closed ten years ago under an edict of the late Czar—has been obtained. General Schermaieff will become the president and a kindred association, the so called Slav Committee of Charity, with General Ignatieff as president, will affiliate, thus forming a formidable body, embracing both wealth and energy. The avowed aim is to incite insurrections among the Slav peoples and increase agitation until Russia comes into possession of Constantinople.

GERMANY TAKES ALARM.

It is impossible that the sudden reappearance of the three foremost men of the Slavophil party is a mere coincidence. General Bogdanovich's promotion might have been due to the influence of his friend Pobedonotseff with the Czar, but simultaneous with the appearance of Stonnberds, Tchernaieff and Ignatieff there is warning of a coming tempest in the unmistakable revival of the hostility of the German semi-official press, preceded by a distinct change in the attitude of Prince Bismarck toward the Czar. The Cologne Gazette suggests that Panslavism has grown mightier than the Czar himself, and may force his hand and cause him to enter into a fighting alliance with France. The Official Gazette of Berlin interprets the position in a similiar way.

THE WAR PARTY'S ASCENDANCY.

It is believed that the party has convinced the Czar that the next French elections will return a war ministry and that Russia ought to be ready to co-operate with France.

The renewal of the press campaign against Russia is unjustly attributed to the desire to frustrate a new Russian loan. M. Rochereau, the director of the Comptoir d'Escompte, between which concern and the Russian government negotiations for a loan have ceased, returned to Paris a month ago, since which time Russia has made no overtures in any quarter. A general advance has set in since the better promise of the Emperor's health in the foreign stock at present on the Boerse.

A WILL AND A CONFESSION.

Tragic Sequel to a Story told in a Mining Camp.

Not many years ago a group of invalids and gamblers were seated about an evening fire in the office of a Colorado hotel. The institution was in a region where nature had launched her gifts. Healing springs and invigorating mountain breezes attracted invalids from every quarter and the proprietor of the sanitarium was reported a rich man. He had been in that country for thirty years. He was a silent, uncommunicative man, not morose nor sullen, but simply uncommunicative. He never spoke of his family or of "the States," and were it not that he was a man of evident refinement and education, he would have passed as one born in the life giving valley, which he, above all men, had developed, for anything he would ever say of the world outside of its pine fringed confines.

On this particular night an old man in the group told, with the simple pathos of an unlettered mind, the story of the great grief of his life. He had gone to California in '49, leaving a wife and child behind him. He prospered in the land of the Argonauts and kept up a regular communication with his family, sending them sufficient sums from time to time to keep them in comfort, but saying nothing about the "pile" he would have within a year or so. He wanted to surprise the folks at home with his good fortune. At last he had accumulated $10,000 and the longing came over him to go home. His dust was converted into ten crisp bank notes and he started homeward.

"You see, boys, I didn't rig up in new togs, or anything like that. A fellow like to go back home in his old camp togs, and knock around a few days, letting on as though he had come home broke, and then when every one has about made up their minds that you never were any good anyhow, spring your fortune on them, and give them the laugh that had been giving it to you. I made the trip overland all right, and was on the railroad train within 300 miles of my wife and baby, when I dozed off for a few minutes. When I awoke I had been robbed of my pile. I always was a —— fool about telling my business to strangers, and there wasn't a man on the car that didn't know that I was a miner going home with a fortune. When I awoke and found that I had been robbed I gave the alarm. No one had left the train. There was great excitement and one man proposed that everybody in the car be searched. No one objected, and the conductor and myself went through every man on the car and examined every valise and piece of baggage in it. I felt just as though my heart would break, not for myself—I was used to hard luck—but for my wife and little gal. I couldn't go home and face them, so I got off at the next city, and the next day I was off on my way to the coast to begin all over again. I was just getting on my feet once more when I got a letter one day with a black border. My little gal had been taken sick with the typhoid fever and died, and two days later they laid her mother away with her. That settled it. I have been no good since, and I am only waiting the time when I can join them up there if I can get in."

The silent partner of the sanitarium had listened to the sad story with his face buried in his hands—a common attitude for him. When the old man had finished the proprietor left the room abruptly.

The group noticed that he was deadly pale, and one of them remarked that it appeared as though Jim had been taken bad.

Two hours later a pistol shot rang out from the hotel man's private office. When the group ran into the room Jim lay on the floor, with a bullet hole in his head. On the desk lay two documents, freshly written. One was marked "my will," the other "my confession." The will left everything to the old miner who had told the story. The confession was to the effect that he had robbed the returning miner as he slept. Retiring to a closet he had with a knife scooped out the inside of a cake of soap and secreted the roll of bills and replaced the cake, which showed no signs of having been cut in two pieces, in a valise.

Experience.

Some boys like the maiden with saucy blue eyes,
Or fancy the girl with gold hair;
Some chaps like the lass of diminutive size,
Or maid with a scholarly stare;
Some youths are quite partial to tender young dears,
Or beauties who weightily crash;
But men are convinced thro' the knowledge of years,
There's naught like the girl with the cash.

Mr. Gervais, a French authority, says there are men capable of bearing arms—in Germany, 5,000,000; in France, 4,500,000; in Austro-Hungary, 1,800,000; in Italy, 2,000,000: in England, 800,000; in Russia, 6,000,000; and in all the other European States, 4,000,000. That gives a total of 25,000,000. Of that number, 10,000,000 are trained soldiers.—N. Y. Tribune.

The King of Dahomey has embarrassed the King of Portugal by sending six negro girls, the "most beautiful" in his dominions. King Louis doesn't know what to do with them, and has housed them in the Zoological Gardens, pending reflection.

FARM.

EXAMINE YOUR WELLS.

It is very important that a careful examination of all wells used to supply water for the horses or stock should be made, to ascertain whether they contain any impurities, or whether by any means, surface water or underground veins from stables or vaults, enter them. Every well should be cemented near the top, where walled with brick or stone, and this wall should rise several inches above the level of the surrounding land or if curbed with timber, as many in the West are, great care should be taken to have the curbing very tight, and a banking of hard clay packed closely on the outside to prevent rats or mice or other small animals from gnawing through it.

Typhoid fever and many other disease are often caused simply by the use of impure water—water which neither tasted badly, nor had any perceptible odor. I remember an instance now, where a well in a small town in this State was used by quite a number of families, and nearly every person who drank from it was stricken down with typhoid fever, and no others suffered from this disease. If cows drink of such water they are not only injured themselves, but the poison is conveyed to those who use their milk. In these days when the snow is melting and the ground is soaked, no water should be left standing near the wells to filter into them, but small ditches should be dug that the ground may be thoroughly drained all around them. By such carefulness much sickness may be avoided.

TRANSPLANTING EVERGREENS.

C. F. Gardener gave his very sensible method before the Iowa Horticultural Society. He sets a trifle deeper than the tree stood before, reducing the top enough to prevent it swaying in the wind. He digs the hole and half fills it with water. He then throws in fine earth and mixes it well continuing to throw in earth and mixing until a mortar is formed. Into this set the tree, and throw in enough fine soil to cover the mortar. Beat the surface slightly with the spade and let it stand half an hour; then fill with earth. The tree will stand firmly and require no staking. Covering with fine soil will prevent baking. Unless the trees are sufficiently pruned to render the head lighter, the operation will fail. The roots must be kept moist while they are out of the ground. This is very important, though no less so than that they must not be exposed to the sun or wind.

A FARMERS' TRUST.

The Farmers' Club of Meriden, Jefferson county, Kas., Hon. Walter N. Allen, President, has issued a call for a delegate and mass convention of farmers at Topeka, May 1, 1888, for "the purpose of forming a Farmers' Trust, to include stock-raisers and feeders of the North-western States and Territories.' Governors of States are requested to appoint eight delegates for each State. The call is general, and all farmers and stockmen of the Northwest are invited without reference to locality, and with or without special appointment. Mr. Allen will answer all questions of detail.

LEADING A STUBBORN COW.

Put a rope around her horns in the usual fashion, and then pass it back of and around her ear, then forward and under the rope which goes around the horns, pulling the ear tight against the horn. When the rope is properly arranged, the most stubborn cow will trot along nicely.

TANNING SKINS.

In response to the inquiries on this subject, I give the following directions: Take two parts alum and one part saltpetre, pulverize finely, mix and rub in on flesh side of skin or simply sprinkle on it. Then put away for 24 hours, when the mixture may be rubbed off.

CHEAP GARDEN FENCE.

A very cheap way to fence poultry from the garden is to stretch three No. 12 wires very tightly, and then weave in common swamp willow, sharpening the ends and sticking them in the ground a couple of inches. This fence does not cost over 6 cents a rod and is very effective.

NOTES.

The Rural New Yorker after four years experience advises all whose potatoes are usually scabby, to sift sulphur flour over the seed pieces.

Drain around the wells. Allow all surface water to flow away. It is a very easy matter to contaminate the drinking water, especially in spring, when the ground is saturated.

The ground for carrots and parsnips should be free from small stones. The best soil is a light sandy loam. The roots would grow forked and irregular if they should meet with obstructions in the soil.

Professor Fjord, of the Danish agricultural society finds one pound of the sweet skim equal to two pounds of the buttermilk. He also finds that six pounds of sweet skim milk are equal to one pound of rye or barley.

The improved mutton breeds of sheep cannot be kept in the manner usual with common sheep. They demand good pasture, liberal feeding and attention, but they pay well for the care bestowed. There is a great demand for superior mutton.

Cows that are soiled with cut grass and those which are fed in well-fenced pastures from which all noxious and ill-flavored weeds have been extirpated, are more likely to yield a uniformly good and sweet quality of milk than those which are suffered to roam the woods and commons.

The president of a state agricultural society thinks that artificial watering, as ordinarily done, is of very little benefit, and estimates that to water properly an acre of cabbages or strawberries in a dry time it would require at least 30,000 gallons of water.

Many farmers claim that if a large potato with all eyes cut out but one be planted, a larger per cent. of early marketable potatoes will be produced than if the seed were cut or small potatoes planted whole. A study of this subject was made at the Wisconsin Agricultural Experiment Station last season with four varieties the result in each case being in favor of the large prepared seed.

Rome began to die when she gave over her agriculture to slaves or to foreign conquered tribes, and her manufactures to ignorant men, or even to slaves, and sent her best blood into the army or into commerce, politics and the clerical employments. Our country should take warning. We cannot afford to let our native born young men drift away in a body from the productive industries, agriculture, manufactures and the trades.

J. Abbot, Jr., of Philadelphia, Pa., sends to the Country Gentleman the results of the analysis of milk in his laboratory for the year 1887, 12 Jersey herds average 14.75 per cent of solids the highest herd averaged 15.31 per cent. Three Guernsey herds averaged 14.59 per cent. Herds of grade Guernseys and Jerseys averaged 13.75 per cent; seven herds of general breeding, for a part of the year analyzed 13.32 per cent and five herds for the entire year 12.96 per cent. The highest herd analysis was 17.12, the lowest 11.54.

The Southern Farmer says the cheapest and best insurance against dogs killing sheep are bells. The sheep-dog is a great coward when in pursuit of mischief, and he wants to do it quietly—wants no noise, no alarm. Bells bought at wholesale do not cost much. Buy a side of bridle leather at the currier's for collars, and put a bell on every sheep if your flock is small. The price of one sheep will buy a gross of bells and leather enough and buckles to strap them. Put bells on a flock of sheep and they will frighten every dog out of the field.

We must not hope wholly to change their original tempers, nor make the gay pensive and grave, nor the melancholy sportive, without spoiling them.—[Locke.

THE ENGLISH SPARROW.

Something in Behalf of the Much-Abused Bird.

Even the kind-hearted John Burroughs has given a reluctant assent to the popular verdict against the English sparrow. But a popular outcry is not always well-founded. The noisy, pugnacious, often greedy little bird has such hosts of enemies that it is only manly to see it popular prejudice is not going too far, and whether or not the English sparrow is a wholly bad bird.

Some years ago I lived in a town in Western New York, not far from Rochester. In my garden was a fine peach-tree, full of blossoms. As I lived in the outskirts of the town, a sparrow at that time seldom had been seen in the garden.

One day a neighbor not two blocks away said to me: "The English sparrows are destroying all the peach blossoms. Smith and his boys are shooting all that come in his yard. But I won't fight the birds. As I can afford it, I prefer to buy my peaches."

"Smith and his boys" saved the blossoms but got barely fifty peaches from a dozen trees and those were mostly too wormy to be used. My tree, untouched by the "blossom destroyers," had less than a dozen peaches, and they were wormy; while the friend who allowed the English sparrows to work their own sweet will had about a-half bushel of fair-cheeked, full-sized beautiful peaches.

At the time when the blossoms were covering the trees, I had a newspaper controversy (through a Geneva journal) with a Rochester fruit-grower on this same subject, for I had examined hundreds of blossoms and found the germ of some insect in most of them. I insisted then, and still do insist, that the sparrows destroyed only such blossoms as not only would have destroyed the fruit for that year, but for many subsequent years. There are portions of Illinois in which farmers are unable to raise wheat on account of the insect known as weevil. But a great outcry is made that the English sparrow destroys wheat! How many have made any examination of what was being destroyed in order to tell positively whether the wheat was sound or not? Now, sons of farmers, you may help settle the question. It is not an unknightly deed to defend the character of an unpopular bird.

Put down in a clear space one peck of sound wheat; then ten feet away put down one peck of wheat that is full of weevil; then stand back and wait and just notice what the sparrows do.

I believe that you will find that invariably the diseased wheat will be eaten first. If the birds are very hungry they may afterwards take the good wheat. But even boys eat as long as they are hungry.

For centuries the crow, too, has been shot at, destroyed and abused by men; and today how few know—or will believe the good that crows do in agriculture. I refuse to let any one disturb crows when they settle on my newly-planted corn fields, and my neighbors, here in Southern Maryland, have to replant far more than I do. I do not dispute that the crows take some toll for destroying the cut-worms; but I think them entitled to as much as they take.

I took a neighbor through his own corn field and offered him a dollar for every ear of corn (not yet fully ripe) which had been partially eaten by the crows but which did not show traces of the corn-worm. He could not find one from which the crow had not first taken the worm. In no case could a sound ear be found that had been disturbed by the crows. Still the same man continues to shoot the crows.

Entomology and ornithology, in their practical application, are branches of agriculture, and there is need of much post graduate study in the gardens and fields. These sciences can not be fully learned in the schools.

Ireland's Jews.

A plan of campaign is very much needed against the gombeen man who, it is said, still flourishes in Ireland. According to the authority of one of the assistant land commissioners, the sufferings of the tenants in Ireland are often produced, not by rack rent, but by rack interest. The Irish Times describes the system of the gombeen man as follows: "When a tenant required a little money for some temporary necessity, he used to go to the local money-lender, who advanced him a sum of, say, £5, getting as security the borrower and some neighboring farmer, who 'backed a bill' for the amount. The interest for the first quarter was then stopped out of the advance. When the end of the quarter arrived the gombeen man was never anxious to be repaid his money. He only asked for a second quarter's interest. The tenant in this way soon found it much easier to pay each quarter 5s. interest on the original £5 borrowed than to repay the original. If he ever made default in the interest both he and his surety were sued before the County court and put to costs, which added largely to the debt. Rather than incur this risk the security as a rule would pay up on demand the interest due. The result is that a gombeen man in a few years is repaid his entire advance, and a good interest in addition, and still the farmer is liable for the full amount, and has to continue his annual payment of twenty per cent. to the lender." The Times adds: "Now surely when people speak of farmers not being able to pay a judicial rent they should take into account whether in the particular case the farmer has been paying a gombeen interest. If he has, would it not be the simplest equity to reduce the loan monger as well as the landlord? Yet none of the champions of the tenants have thought of making this claim."

KILLED BY A STEAM DRILL.

Horrible Accident to a Young Canadian in a Detroit Factory.

DETROIT, May 15.—Andrew Gaghan, a young machinist, was fatally injured the other afternoon by a boring machine in Galvin Bros. brass and iron works. In some manner the drill struck his head, cutting a large hole through the skull near the temple, and he was found lying on the floor unconscious, his clothing saturated with blood and part of his brain and pieces of the skull scattered over the machine. The unfortunate man was taken to his boarding place, where he died the same night. Gaghan was 24 years old, and had been employed by Galvin Bros. only a short time, but they speak of him as one of their best men. His parents live at Dundas, Ont.

Centipedes and Prairie Runners.

Those who have made a study of the centipede say that he never turns his mind to anything but mischief. He will crawl into a bed in the middle of the day and wait patiently until night, when the rightful owner crawls in, so he, the intruder, can improve his opportunity to get even with the human race, against whom he has a spite. But man has a friend in the prairie runner, which is the name of a bird whose mission in life is to supervise the centipede census. This bird has a fondness for centipedes au naturel. If it were not for these industrious birds centipedes would be as plentiful as men who think they understand all about the tariff question. When a prairie runner discovers a centipede, he takes the insect in his bill, and runs off with him. What the object of the bird is in running I cannot imagine, unless he, the bird, wants the centipede to admire the grace and swiftness of his motions. After giving the centipede a ride, the prairie runner pauses, and passes the insect with a sideway chewing-gum sort of motion through his bill, very much as a linen collar is passed through a patent clothes wringer. Then the centipede is pale and cold in death, and the prairie runner, which must be provided with a digestor lined with sheet-iron, swallows the insect endways.

A minister overtook a Quaker lady and politely assisted her in opening a gate. As she was a comparative stranger in town, he said: "You don't know, perhaps, that I am Mr. ——. Haven't you heard me preach?" "I have heard thee try," was the quick rejoinder.

Notice was published in the Canada Gazette of the 28th ult. of the continuance for this season of the special rate of toll on grain and food products passing through the St. Lawrence and Welland canals, and of the exemption of the same from tolls on the St. Lawrence canals if they have paid full tolls through the Welland canal.

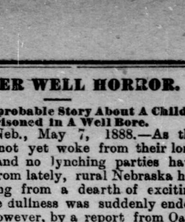
ANOTHER WELL HORROR.

Highly Improbable Story About A Child Imprisoned In A Well Bore.

OMAHA, Neb., May 7, 1888.—As the snakes have not yet woke from their long winter nap and no lynching parties have been heard from lately, rural Nebraska has been suffering from a dearth of exciting stories. The dullness was suddenly ended this week, however, by a report from Oakdale, about a hundred miles northwest of this place, that a child three years of age had fallen into a deep bored well from which about twenty feet of tubing had been removed, leaving a hole about a foot in diameter; the child remained at the bottom of this hole two days and night and was finally extricated after keeping the population of the surrounding country highly excited and miserable through sympathy.

NO GRAPPLING NONSENSE.

The alleged rescuer did not attempt to grapple for the child, as was said to have been done in the case of the mythical Pennsylvania child who recently fell into a well bore too small to admit a kitten. On the contrary they dug a shaft near the well, and from this newer hole tunnelled toward the imprisoned child. The work in the tunnel, in sand so loose and treacherous that they dared not touch it with pick or shovel, is said to have been terribly exciting, the workers, burrowing softly with their hands only, being stimulated by the moaning of the child and not overcheered by the prospect of a cave-in that would bury them alive TOO PREVIOUS.



The first tunnel struck the bore too far above the place where the child was, so a second shaft was dug from the tunnel itself, and the child was rescued alive and apparently uninjured, although it had been all the while so doubled that its head, which fortunately did not go down first, was pressed against the lower joints of the legs. Hundreds of people were about the mouth of the shaft when the rescuers reached the surface with their precious burden and fainting is said to have begun and progressed at a rate never before known except at a colored camp meeting in the green apple season.

It has not yet been decided what shall be done with the narrator of this story, should his statements prove untrue, but the people are ripe for any vengeance if they learn that all their agony has been for nothing.

DR. WASHINGTON,
I think it my duty to let you know how my health is improving. When I commenced treatment with you I was very ill I had severe catarrh of my head and throat. My lungs were pronounced to be far gone in consumption I had a very bad cough, raised a good deal of blood and matter, had night sweats was greatly reduced in flesh, appetite very poor and could scarcely walk across the floor My family doctor considered my case entirely hopeless. As a last resort I was lead to try your treatment for Catarrh and Consumption My improvement was noticeable from the first and now after nearly six months treatment, under the blessing of a kind Providence, my health is again restored.
Signed, MRS. WM. MITCHELL, Otterville.

You Carry
A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."
Here is an instance of
who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:
"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."
John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."
T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

HERBERT DISCHARGED.—Jas. Herbert, of Brighton, was arraigned at the police court Tuesday morning on the charge of stealing an express receipt from Thomas McGrew, of Syracuse, whose headless body was found lying on Kettle Creek bridge a couple of weeks ago. The evidence of Chief Fewings and P. C. Sissons was taken and Herbert was discharged by the magistrate, with a caution to tell the truth thereafter. Mr. T. W. Crothers appeared for Herbert. Herbert's aunt, Mrs. Gorman, of Belleville, was present.

WARNER'S - SAFE - CURE!

ST. CATHARINES, Ont., Jan. 24, 1887.—About six years ago I was a great sufferer from kidney disease, and was in misery all the while. I hardly had strength enough to walk straight and was ashamed to go on the street. The pains across my back were almost unbearable, and I was unable to find relief, even temporarily. I began the use of "Warner's Safe Cure," and inside of one week I found relief, and after taking eight bottles, I was completely cured.

Manager for American Express Co.

TORONTO, (18 Division Street,) Sept. 17, 1887.—Three years ago last August my daughter was taken ill with Bright's disease of the kidneys. The best medical skill of the city was tasked to the utmost, but to no purpose. She was racked with convulsions for 48 hours. Our doctor did his best and went away saying the case was hopeless. After she came out of the convulsions she was very weak and all her hair fell out. The doctor had left us about a month when I concluded to try "Warner's Safe Cure," and after having taken six bottles along with several bottles of "Warner's Safe Pills," I saw a decided change for the better in her condition. After taking twenty-five bottles there was a complete cure. My daughter has now a splendid head of hair and weighs more than she ever did before.

Mrs Jos Emms

THE GREATEST BLOOD PURIFIER,

CHATHAM, Ont., March 6, 1888.—In 1884 I was completely run down. I suffered most severe pains in my back and kidneys, so severe at times that I would be almost prostrated. A loss of ambition, a great desire to urinate, without the ability of so doing, coming from me as it were in drops. The urine was of a peculiar color and contained considerable foreign matter. I became satisfied that my kidneys were in a congested state Finally I concluded to try "Warner's Safe Cure" and in forty-eight hours after I had taken the remedy I voided urine that was black as ink, containing quantities of mucus, pus and gravel. I continued, and it was not many hours before my urine was of a natural straw color, although it contained considerable sediment. The pains in my kidneys subsided as I continued the use of the remedy, and it was a short time before I was completely relieved. My urine was normal and I can truthfully say that I was cured.

296 McNab Street North, HAMILTON, Can., Nov. 2, 1886.—I had been suffering for over twenty years from a pain in the back and one side of the head, and indigestion. I could eat scarcely anything, and everything I ate disagreed with me. I was attended by physicians who examined me and stated that I had enlargement of the liver, and that it was impossible to cure me. They also stated that I was suffering from heart disease, inflammation of the bladder, kidney disease, bronchitis and catarrh, and that it was impossible for me to live. They attended me for three weeks without making any improvement in my condition. I commenced taking "Warner's Safe Cure" and "Warner's Safe Pills," acting strictly up to directions as to diet, and took thirty-six bottles, and have had the best of health ever since. My regular weight used to be 180 pounds. When I commenced "Warner's Safe Cure" I only weighed 140 pounds. I now weigh 210 pounds.

Regulates Every Bodily Function

GALT, Ont., Jan. 27, 1887.—For about five years previous to two years ago last October I was troubled with kidney and liver trouble, and finally I was confined to my bed and suffered the most excruciating pain, and for two weeks' time I did not know whether I was dead or alive. My physicians said I had enlargement of the liver, though they gave me only temporary relief. Hearing of the wonderful cures of "Warner's Safe Cure" I began its use, and after I had taken two bottles I noticed a change for the better. The pains disappeared, and my whole system seemed to feel the benefit of the remedy. I have continued taking "Warner's Safe Cure" and no other medicine since. I consider the remedy a great boon, and if I ever feel out of sorts "Warner's Safe Cure" fixes me all right. I weigh twenty pounds heavier now than ever before.

It is proposed to call a citizens' meeting in London to consider the demand of the Board of Education for something like $60,000, which is considered excessive.

The London assessment summary for 1888, which has just been completed, shows a population of 29,960, an increase of 645 in the past year; total assessment $13,571,132, an increase of $100,245.

The hectic flush, pale, hollow cheeks and precarious appetite, indicate worms. Freeman's Worm Powders will quickly and effectually remove them.

The annual camp to be opened in London on the 10th of June will include the London Field Battery, 21st Essex Fusiliers, 22nd Oxford Rifles, 27th Lambton, 29th Waterloo, 32nd Bruce and 33rd Huron. About 2,600 men will go under canvas.

The new screw steamer, City of Chatham, which will run between Chatham and Detroit, has been successfully launched in Toronto. She was built for Captain Cornette, of Chatham, and her total cost is $25,000. Her extreme length is 125 feet, with breadth of beam 28 feet. There is accommodation for 400 passengers.

HE PLAYED THE LOTTERY.—Do you see that man across the street? Mark him well, my son. Three years ago he drew a prize of $150 in a lottery. He was a happy, industrious man before he won that prize. It ruined him. He has sunk every dollar he could borrow, beg or earn since that same lottery. Look at him now. Note the hungry look in his eyes. He has only one object in life. He wants to draw the capital prize. He is a lottery maniac. If you ever feel any symptoms of his disease coming over you, my boy, get down on your knees and pray for deliverance, and then hunt this man up and take another good look at him.—Chicago Tribune.

THE SCOTT ACT.

A meeting of hotel-keepers, representing all sections of the county was held at the Hutchinson House, St. Thomas, Tuesday, when resolutions were passed deciding to take steps towards securing the repeal of the act in the County of Elgin. Committees were appointed in each township and petitions praying for its appeal will be put in circulation without delay. The meeting adjourned to meet at Aylmer next Tuesday, 29th inst.

Ed. Smith, of Rodney, charged by Inspector Beaton with a second violation of the Scott Act, pleaded guilty last Thursday and was fined $100 and costs by Police Magistrate Leonard. Tom Moore, of the Southern Hotel, charged with a first offence by Inspector McCausland, also pleaded guilty, and was fined $50 and costs. J. C. Pankhurst, of Port Stanley some time ago was fined and $100 and $8 costs, or sixty days in jail, for a second offence. He paid $30 of the amount and was sent to jail in default of payment of the baiance, but on Saturday paid the balance due and was released.

THE VALUE OF UNDERDRAINING.

Ever since underdraining was first introduced, farmers who had not witnessed its effect were accustomed to say: "Oh, yes, we presume draining will make the land drier in the spring, and will enable us to plow the ground and enable us to get in the crops earlier with less work, but in summer the land is so dry that it bakes into bricks. We don't want to drain it and make it drier. It is too dry now" Thousands of farmers in old times made such remarks. But, thanks to the agricultural press, thanks to farmers' clubs, thanks to fairs and farmers' institutes, and to grange meetings and to railroads, that make it easy for farmers to travel to and fro, whereby knowledge is increased—thanks, in short, to the wonderful age in which we live, we have not for several years heard this objection made to underdraining. It is true our old friend the Deacon still says, "Give me a good open ditch so that I can see the water run." But all farmers now admit that draining is a good thing, and would be glad, as our old friend Timothy Bunker, Esq., said, to have the "bottom knocked out" of every wet spot on the farm.

It is strange, however, now that the farmers are thoroughly convinced of the value of underdraining, that some of our agricultural writers, wanting, we may suppose, something to talk about, have started the notion that draining intensifies the bad effects of drouth! Of course there is no truth in it. Land that needs draining was never injured by draining—either in spring, summer, autumn or winter, in seasons cold, hot, wet or dry.—American Agriculturist for June.

A lawsuit is in prospect between Patterson Bros. and the town of Woodstock. The latter granted a big bonus and free water for ten years, but are now kicking because the company use so much fluid in their condensing engines that the supply is not adequate to meet the demands of the town, particularly in case of fire.

A BIGAMIST SENTENCED.

THE MAN OF MANY NAMES SENT TO KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

The following has reference to James Agnew, formerly of Springord, an account of whose perfidy and preliminary trial appeared in the ENTERPRISE a few weeks ago:

At the General Sessions James Agnew, alias Page, alias Ford, alias Grafton, was arraigned before Judge Macdougall on two charges of obtaining money by false pretences from J. W. A. Fenner, to which he pleaded guilty, admitting that he had secured $200 on one occasion from complainant and $210 on another. The prisoner also pleaded guilty to a charge of bigamy, and he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment in the Kingston Penitentiary, the terms to run concurrently.

Agnew is a most consummate scoundrel. Some years ago he made business proposals to Mr. Fenner and by representing himself as the owner of property in several sections of the country, succeeded in defrauding him out of a considerable amount of money. Inspector Newhall was entrusted with the case, and after tracking the swindler through half a dozen States in the Union, finally captured him in Parkdale. A few weeks ago his wife discovered that she was no wife at all, as Agnew, when he married her, was already a married man. She instituted inquiries and it was learned that in 1872 he had in this city married a Miss Eliza Irvine, who is still alive. He married Miss Caroline R. Genvey at Springford, Oxford Co., in 1878, and for that offence as well as for the frauds he was sentenced.—Toronto News.

HENRY TAYLOR IN COURT.

LONDON, May 19.—At the Assize Court yesterday, Chief Justice Galt presiding, Henry Taylor, ex-President of the Ontario Investment Association, was placed on trial for the misappropriation of $5000 belonging to that institution. The prosecution failed to establish criminal intent, and his Lordship charged the jury to that effect, but stated that a civil action might succeed. The jury, after an absence of a few minutes, returned a verdict of not guilty.

Mr. Taylor was again placed on trial on a similar charge, the amount being $10,000. As the evidence was similar to that adduced in the former case the judge ordered the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, which was done.

Mr. Taylor remains in jail on a capias.

To Tunnel the Detroit River.

DETROIT, May 19.—James Ross, of Sherbrooke, P.Q., a railroad contractor and engineer of renown, B. Baker, of London, Eng., known as engineer of the immense Forth Bridge that is now in process of construction in Scotland (the largest bridge in the world), and Nicol Kingsmill, counsel for the Michigan Central Railroad in Canada, are in the city to take the necessary preliminary steps for setting in motion a gigantic and carefully pre-arranged scheme for tunnelling the Detroit River at this point. They are thoroughly satisfied that it can be accomplished with ease, and will so report.

A gigantic syndicate, known as the Michigan and Canada Tunnel Company, and representing more than $100-000,000 of capital, has just been legally formed in Canada, and will be properly qualified for transacting business under the Michigan State laws at once.

Toronto's rate of taxation for this year is 14½ mills on the dollar, the lowest it has been in 15 years.

In chronic diseases medicines should be restoring and not debilitating in their action. The wonderful strengthening and curative effects, realized from the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, sustain the reputation of this remedy as the most popular blood purifier.

An Avon correspondent says, "The outlook for cheese making is good. Our cheese factory sometimes makes as high as twelve or thirteen cheeses per day. The April cheese was sold at 9 cents a pound"

KIND WORDS AND TRUE.

Mr. John H. Carter, of Corbetton, Ont., writes as follows: "Hagyard's Yellow Oil has stood the test often when all others failed. Our house is never without it, and it will always find a welcome spot on the shelf."

The creditors of Mr. Geo. White, butcher, St. Thomas, have agreed to accept 50 cents on the dollar. The liabilities were estimated at $2,000, and the assets at between $1,000 and $1,500. Mr. White will continue the business.

BILIOUSNESS.

"I should not think it right did I not give my testimony of what I know to be the value of Burdock Blood Bitters. Being a sufferer from biliousness I took one bottle of B.B.B. and it gave me immediate relief I recommend it as a cure for biliousness. Annie McLean, Woodville, Ont.

The Norwich Gazette advertises that it has found a lady's bustle containing "three yards of muslin lining, a woolen scarf, a cotton stocking, a piece of print, a handkerchief, and a bit of Turkish towelling." ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world Price twenty-five cents a bottle. EARLY CLOSING.

To the Editor of the ENTERPRISE:

The early closing movement, of which mention was made in your last issue, will take effect on May 31. It was not the intention to petition the council, as you stated. The Act to Regulate the Closing of Shops, recently passed, does not confer any power upon township councils. The words of the Act are: "Any local council may by by law require that during the whole or any part or parts of the year, all or any class or classes of shops within the municipality shall be closed, and remain closed, on each or every day of the week at and continuously after the time and hour fixed or appointed in that behalf by the by-law; but any such time or hour fixed or appointed by a by law, passed under the authority of this sub-section, shall not be earlier than seven of the clock in the afternoon of any day."

"Local Council" means the council of a city, town, or incorporated village, as the case may be, but not a township council.

The movement will be a Magna Charta for the clerks of the village, and being acquiesced in by the merchants, is likely to be strictly observed.

Yours truly,
H. CLAY.

Martyrs to Headache
Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and bilousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. THE THREAD OF LIFE;

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER II.—DOWN STREAM.

Tide served next morning at eleven; and punctual to the minute—for, besides being a poet, he prided himself on his qualities as a man of business—Hugh Massinger surrendered himself in due course by previous appointment on board the Mud Turtle at the Pool by the Tower. But his eyes were heavier and redder than they had seemed last night; and his languid manner showed at once, by a hundred little signs, that he had devoted but small time since Relf left him to what Mr. Herbert Spencer periphrastically describes as "reparative processes."

The painter, attired for the sea like a common sailor in jersey and trousers and knitted woollen cap, rose to from the deck to great him hospitably. His whole appearance betokened serious business. It was evident that Warren Relf did not mean to play at yachting.

"You've been making a night of it, I'm afraid, Massinger," he said as their eyes met. "Bad preparation, you know, for a day down the river. We shall have a loppy sea, if this wind holds, when we pass the Nore. You ought to have gone straight to bed when you left the club with me last evening."

"I know I ought," the poet responded with affected cheerfulness. "The path of duty's as plain as a pikestaff; but the things I ought to do I mostly leave undone; and the things I ought not to do, I find, on the contrary, vastly attractive. I may as well make a clean breast of it. I strolled round to Pallavicini's after you vacated the Row last night, and found them having a turn or two at lansquenet. Now, lansquenet's an amusement I never can resist. The consequence was, in three hours I was pretty well cleaned out of ready cash, and shall have to keep my nose to the grindstone accordingly all through what ought by rights to have been my summer holiday. This conclusively shows the evils of high play, and the moral superiority of the wise man who goes home to bed and is sound asleep when the clock strikes eleven."

Relf's face fell several tones. "I wish, Massinger," he said very gravely, "you'd make up your mind never to touch those hateful cards again. You'll ruin your health, your mind, and your pocket with them. If you spent the time you spend upon play in writing some really great book now, you'd make in the end ten times as much by it."

The poet smiled a calm smile of superior wisdom. "Good boy!" he cried, patting Relf on the back in mock approbation of his moral advice. "You talk for all the world like a Sunday-school prize-book. Honest industry has its reward; while pitch-and-toss and wicked improper games land one at last in prison or the workhouse. My dear Relf, how on earth can you, who are a sensible man, believe all that antiquated nursery rubbish? As a matter of fact, is it always good boys who pull the plums with self-appreciative smile out of the world's pudding? Far from it: quite the other way. I have seen the wicked flourishing in my time like a green bay-tree. Honest industry breaks stones on the road, while successful robbery or successful gambling rolls by at its ease, cigar in mouth, lolling on the cushion of its luxurious carriage. If you stick to honest industry all your life long, you may go on breaking stones contentedly for the whole term of your natural existence. But if you speculate boldly on your week's earnings and land a haul, you may in time set another fellow to break stones for you, and then you become at once a respectable man, a capitalist, and a baronet. All the great fortunes we see in the world have been piled up in the last resort, if you'll only believe it, by successful gambling."

"Every man has a right to his own opinion," Warren Relf answered with a more serious air, as he turned aside to look after the rigging. "I admit there is a good deal of gambling in business; but anyhow, honest industry's a simple necessary on board the Mud-Turtle,—Come aft, here, will you, from your topsy-turvy moral pulosophy, and help me out with this sheet and the mainsail."

Massinger turned to do as he was directed, and to inspect the temporary floating hotel in which he was to make his way contentedly down to the coast of Suffolk. The Mud-Turtle was indeed as odd-looking and original a little craft as her owner and skipper had proclaimed her to be. A centre-board yawl, of seventeen tons registered burden, she ranked as a yacht only by courtesy, on the general principle of what the logicians call excluded middle. If she wasn't that, why, then, pray, what in the world was she? The Mud-Turtle measured almost as broad across the beam as she reckoned feet in length from stem to stern; and her skipper maintained with profound pride that she couldn't capsize—even if she tried—in the worst storm that ever blew out of an English sky. She drew no more than three feet of water at a pinch; she could go anywhere that a man could wade up to his knees without fear of wetting his tucked-up breeches. This made her a capital boat for a marine artist to go about sketching in; for Relf could lay her alongside a wreck on shallow sands, and run her up a narrow creek after picturesque waterfowl, or approach the riskiest shore to the very edge of the cliffs, without any reference to the state of the tide, or the probable depth of the surrounding channel.

"If she grounds," the artist said enthusiastically, expatiating on her merits to his new passenger, "you see it doesn't really matter two pence; for the next high tide 'll set her afloat again within six hours. She's a great opportunist: she knows well that all things come in time to him who can wait. The Mud Turtle positively revels in mud; she lies flat on it as on her native heath, and stays patiently without one word of reproach for the moon's attraction to come in its round to her ultimate rescue."

The yawl's accommodation was opportunist too: though excellent in kind, it was limited in quantity, and by no means unduly luxurious in quality. She was a working-man's yacht, and she meant business. Her deck was calculated on the most utilitarian principles—just big enough for two persons to sketch abreast; her cabin contained three wooden bunks, with their appropriate complement of rugs and blankets: and a small and primitive open stove devoted to the service of the ship's cookery, took up almost all the vacant space in the centre of the well, leaving hardly room for the self-sacrificing volunteer who undertook the functions of purveyor and bottle-washer to turn about in. But the lockers were amply stored with fresh bread, tinned meats, and other simple necessaries for a week's cruise. Thus equipped and accoutred, Warren Relf was accustomed to live an outdoor life for weeks together with his one like-minded chum and companion.

As for Hugh Massinger, a confirmed landsman, the first few hours' sail down the crowded Thames appeared to him at the outset a perfect phantasmagoria of ever varying perils and assorted terrors. He composed his soul to instant death from the very beginning; not, indeed, that he minded one bit for that: the poet dearly loved danger, as he loved all other forms of sensation and excitement: they were food for the Muse; and the Muse, like Blanche Amory, is apt to exclaim, "'Il me faut des emotions!" But the manifold novel forms of enterprise as the lumbering little yawl made her way clumsily among the great East-Indiamen and big ocean-going steamers, darting boldly now athwart the very bows of a huge Monarch-liner, insinuating herself now with delicate precision between the broadsides of two heavy Rochester barges, and just escaping collision now with some laden collier from Cardiff or Newcastle, were too complicated and too ever-pressing at the first blush for Massinger fully to take in their meaning at a single glance. Hugh Massinger was at once amused and bewildered by the careless confidence with which his sea-faring friend dashed boldly in and out among brigs and schooners, smacks and steamships, on port or starboard tack, in endless confusion, backing the little Mud-Turtle to hold her own in the unequal contest against the biggest and swiftest craft that sailed the river. His opinion of Relf rose rapidly many degrees in mental register as he watched him tacking and luffing and scudding and darting with cool unconcern in his toy tub among so many huge and swiftly moving monsters.

"Port your helm!" Relf cried to him hastily once, as they crossed the channel just abreast of Greenwich Hospital. "Here's another sudden death down upon us round the Reach yonder!" And even as he spoke, a big coal-steamer, with a black diamond painted allusively on her bulky funnel, turning the low point of land that closed their view, bore hastily down upon them from the opposite direction with menacing swiftness. Massinger, doing his best to obey orders, grew bewildered after a time by the glib rapidity of his friend's commands. He was perfectly ready to act as he was bid when once he understood his instructions; but the seafaring mind seems unable to comprehend that landsmen do not possess an intuitive knowledge of the strange names bestowed by technical souls upon ropes, booms, gaffs, and mizzen-masts; so that Massinger's attempts to carry out his orders in a prodigious hurry proved productive for the most part rather of blank confusion than of the effect intended by the master skipper. After passing Greenhithe, however, they began to find the channel somewhat clearer, and Relf ceased for a while to skip about the deck like the little hills of the Psalmist, while Massinger felt his life comparatively safe at times for three minutes together, without a single danger menacing him ahead in the immediate future from port to starboard, from bow to stern, from brig or steamer, from grounding or collision.

About two o'clock, after a hot run, they cast anchor awhile out of the main channel, where traders ply their flow of intercourse, and stood by to eat their lunch in peace and quietness under the lee of a projecting point near Gravesend.

"If wind and tide serve like this," Relf observed philosophically, as he poured out a glassful of beer into a tin mug—the Mud Turtle's appointments were all of the homeliest—"We ought to get down to Whitestrand before an easy breeze with two days' sail, sleeping the nights in the quiet creeks at Leigh and Orfordness."

"That would exactly suit me," Massinger answered, draining off the mugful at a gulp after his unusual exertion. "I wrote a hasty line to my cousin in Suffolk this morning telling her I should probably reach Whitestrand the day after to-morrow, wind and weather permitting—I approve of your ship, Relf, and of your tinned lobster too. It's fun coming down to the great deep in this unconventional way. The regulation yacht, with sailors and a cook and a floating drawing room, my soul wouldn't care for. You can get drawing rooms galore any day in Belgravia; but picnicking like this, with a spice of adventure in it, falls in precisely with my own view of the ends of existence."

"It's a cousin you're going down to Suffolk to see, then?"

"Well, yes; a cousin—a sort of a cousin: a Girton girl: the newest thing out in women. I call her a cousin for convenience's sake. Not too nearly related, if it comes to that; a surfeit of family's a thing to be avoided. But we're a decadent tribe, the tribe of Massinger; hardly any others of us left alive; when I put on my hat I cover all that remains of us; and cousinhood's a capital thing in its way to keep up under certain conditions. It enables a man to pay a pretty girl a great deal of respectful attention, without necessarily binding himself down in the end to anything definite in the matrimonial direction"

"That's rather a cruel way of regarding it, isn't it?"

"Well, my dear boy, what's a man to do in these jammed and crushed and overcrowded days of ours? Nature demands the safety-valve of a harmless flirtation. If one can't afford to marry, the natural affections will find an outlet, on a cousin or somebody. But it's quite impossible, as things go nowadays, for a penniless man to dream of taking to wife a penniless woman, and living on the sum of their joint properties. According to Cocker, nought and nought make nothing. When a man has no patrimony, he must obviously make it up in matrimony. Only, the great point to avoid is letting the penniless girl meanwhile get too deep a hold upon your personal feelings. The wisest men—like me, for example—are downright fools when it comes to high play or the domestic instincts. Even Achilles had a vulnerable point, you know. So has every wise man. With Achilles, it was the heel; with us it's the heart. The heart will wreck the profoundest and most deliberate philosopher living. I ackhowledge it myself. I ought to wait, of course, till I catch the eminent alderman's richly endowed daughter. Instead of that, I shall doubtless fling myself away like a born fool upon the pretty cousin or some other equally unprofitable investment."

"Well, I hope you will," Relf answered, cutting himself a huge chunk of bread with his pocket clasp-knife. "I'm awfully glad to hear you say so. For your own sake I hope you'll keep your word. I hope you won't stifle everything you have got that's best within you for the sake of money and position and success.—Have a bit of this corned beef, will you?—A woman who sells herself for money is bad enough, though it's woman's way—they've all been trained to it for generations. But a man who sells himself for money—who takes himself to market for the highest bidder—who makes capital out of his face and his manners and his conversation—is absolutely contemptible, and nothing short of it.—I could never go on knowing you, if I thought you capable of it. But I don't think you so. I'm sure you do yourself a gross injustice. You're a great deal better than you pretend yourself. If the occasion ever actually arose, you'd follow your better and not your worse nature.—I'll trouble you for the mustard."

Considered at a Farmer's Institute.

The black knot on cherry and plum trees was shown to be a fungus disease penetrating the bark. The only safe remedy is to cut it off and then rub the spot affected with turpentine. The tomato rot was also declared to be a fungus, the preventive being sulphur powder.

Col. F. D. Curtiss spoke upon pigs as a dairy and fruit farm necessity, and how to feed them lean. He advocated a radical change, and said it was a mistake to think it impossible to keep pigs without corn. Corn is the farmer's ideal of everything, and it is all wrong. Pigs ought to be fed but twice a day, to give time for rest and an opportunity for digestion. The food should be strongly impregnated with phosphate nitrogen. Feed them with meals, turn them into rye fields, put them in clover fields and apple orchards—that is nitrogenous food. Follow up with sweet cornstalks and sorghum. The best quality of pork is made out of apples alone. He pictured the difference between the effects of carbonaceous and nitrogenous food, and such a pig could be fed so long on corn as to be starved to death.

Dr. J. S. Woodward addressed the farmers upon "Nitrogen, Potash and Phosphoric Acid." He said the air was the great storehouse of nitrogen; another source was the coal fields. He described the ammoniacal liquor of the gas factories, and said it was one of the best forms of nitrogenous manure. Potash is found in plants in the mines of Germany. Phosphoric acid builds up the frames of animals, and is found in the bones of animals. It also exists in the slag of iron furnaces, in natural deposits in the south, along the St. Lawrence and in the Canadas.

THE DOCTOR'S SHADOW.

An Incident of the Cholera Outbreak.

During the outbreak of cholera in Naples, three years ago, the hostility of the lower classes towards the doctors was violent. They insisted that the spread, if not the origin, of the disease was due to them, and called them poisoners and murderers. Physicians who made visits at night to the poor's quarters carried revolvers, or were accompanied by policemen.

A French physician, who had volunteered his aid, used to go about unarmed and without a guard, at all hours of the night, for, as he said to a friend, "Don Salvatore Trapanese was watching over him."

Wherever he went, at night, a man, with a long cloak thrown over his shoulder, carrying a stick in his hand, followed him, as a detective follows the man he is "shadowing." Even in the heart of the thieves' quarter this physician was as safe as in the public square at midday. For the man was one of the chief thieves, and his business was to see that no harm came to the doctor.

It happened in this way. Late one afternoon the doctor happened to be in a church frequented by the poor of the city. The doors were about to be closed, as a man entered and fell upon his knees. His lips moved hastily, and repeatedly he struck the ground with his forehead. As the sexton came up to lock the door, the man threw his cloak over his shoulder and hurriedly left the church.

As the doctor passed the spot where the man had knelt, his foot stumbled against a long Calabrian dagger which lay upon the floor. Catching up with the man outside, the doctor handed him the knife, and noticed his pale face and agitated manner.

"I feel sorry for you," said the doctor.

"Cholera in the house," the man muttered through his clenched teeth.

The doctor announced himself a physician from Paris, and offered his services. The man shook his head, walked away, and then returned.

"Are you a stranger?" said he, curtly.

"Yes."

"You have nothing to do with the municipal authorities?"

"Nothing at all."

"Will you come with me?"

They went down into a narrow street, walked a long way in the darkness, through a vaulted passage, into a narrow alley, and halted before a tumble-down house. A man came out, and all three went down a pitch-dark passage, crossed a yard, and stopped before a miserable hovel. The man who had come from the house, raised a lantern and scrutinized the doctor's face, and then they entered the hovel.

A mother lay upon the floor wringing her hands in despair. Three women were on their knees praying. A old woman, a cripple, sat all in a heap before the fire, muttering to herself.

On the bed was a little girl, half cold and unconscious. No one stood beside the bed, for the lowest class Neapolitans are afraid to touch a dying person.

Surreptitiously, under the blanket, the doctor administered an ether-injection. She rallied, opened her eyes and moaned softly, thereby softening the suspicious eyes around the physician.

The mother rose from the floor and began helping the physician rub the girl with the blanket. The rubbing was useless; the child was sinking fast.

The doctor prepared to give an intravenous injection. As he cut open the vein all the women shrieked. The child collapsed; the mother cried:

"She is dying! she is dying!"

The doctor held the child in his arms. Savage eyes followed his movements, and amid prayers to the Virgin and threats hurled at him, the night wore on.

A reaction set in toward morning, and warmth returned to the body. She moaned, "Mamma! mamma!" The mother's faced glowed with hope. The child was returning to life.

When the doctor left the house he was guided through the labyrinth of lanes and alleys by the father, whose look of gratitude more than compensated the physician for the sleepless night.

Several nights, for they preferred to receive his visits after dark, the doctor visited the hovel. On the night of the last visit, the mother stood on the doorstep, as the doctor departed, praying, "May the peace which you desire be granted unto you!"

As the doctor took leave of the father he asked his name. "Salvatore Trapanese,' the man answered, and added, "If ever you want me, excellency, my life and my knife will be at your disposal."

Pointing to where a ragged old cobbler was seated repairing a boot, he said, "Address yourself to that man if you want me."

For months the physician did not see Salvatore. The papers teemed with accounts of nightly attacks, and the dreadful Camorra —the association of thieves and beggars which once ruled half of Naples—appeared to be renewing its sway. But whenever the doctor went out at night, he saw that he was followed by a suspicious-looking character. Subsequently the doctor found out that the man overshadowing him was Salvatore's brother, who had been ordered by the Camorra to watch over him.

The doctor lost a valuable dog. He informed the old cobbler. That night a man called, whose appearance was not such as to beget a sense of security. He came as a friend of Salvatore.

"You shall have the dog back to-morrow evening, if he be not dead!" said the man.

The next night the dog rushed into the room dragging Salvatore after him.

The doctor thanked him and shook him by the hand.

"I am a bad man," said Salvatore looking confused, "and not worthy of touching your hand."

The doctor handed the reward he had promised for the dog's return, two hundred francs. The man put it back on the table, saying: "You saved the little girl. I found the dog—it is all right now."

Railroad Flyers in England.

"You don't know what fast traveling means in this country."

An Englishman who had recently made a trip throughout the New England states and the west, was discussing our railroad system with a friend at a cafe.

"Now listen and I'll give you some news. In England third class passengers ride from forty to forty-five miles an hour and nobody pays extra fare on account of the speed. From New York to Albany it is 142 miles by a splendid track. There are ten express trains daily between these cities, and their average speed is twenty-nine miles an hour. Between London and Sheffield, 162 miles, the Great Northern runs nine trains daily, with an average speed of forty-five miles an hour. Between New York and Boston the average speed is thirty miles an hour, and the fastest, a train composed exclusively of sleeping cars, makes thirty-nine miles an hour. Between London and Manchester, 203 miles, there are twenty trains daily, with an average speed of forty-one miles an hour, and some trains making fifty. Between London and Glasgow, 440 miles, there are thirteen daily expresses, and their average speed is almost forty miles an hour, one train being much faster than this."

"Yes, but that is only on favored lines."

"Not at all. All over England and Scotland express trains, composed of first, second and third class carriages, make from thirty-five to fifty miles an hour, while in America a thirty-five mile train is called a stroke of lightning. The fastest regular train in America, so I am told, is on the Baltimore and Ohio, which makes the forty miles between Washington and Baltimore in fifty minutes. There are three or four fast trains between New York and Philadelphia covering forty-six miles an hour. Between Liverpool and Manchester there are fifty-two trains daily, none of them slower than forty-five miles an hour and four of them making fifty-one and a third miles an hour."

Starvation in London.

One of the most active charities in London is that which provides food for the unemployed, and also for laborers who are not allowed to leave the docks, where they are busy, during working hours, and who can pay only the smallest possible sum for what they eat. Those who have work are expected to give one penny for an amount of food which the unemployed can obtain for a half-penny, and it is estimated that the first sum covers the actual cost of the bowl of nourishing soup of which a dock-dinner consists. This is supplemented by a slice of pudding when the applicant can afford an extra half-penny.

A visitor at the place where the food is distributed says, that on a cold spring day nine hundred and sixty men were served from the food trucks in less than an hour. This took place after the worst distress of winter was over. Said the attendant in charge, "We are daily implored to give food to men who have had none for twenty-four or forty-eight hours."

"Please, I've no money to-day," said one poor fellow. "I know you don't give the food quite, because there'd be such a lot of us if you did; but will you take my matches, and let me have a little for them?"

In the midst of such bitter want, a great deal of brotherly kindness is shown by men who feel that a starving comrade's need is greater than their own.

A poorly dressed man one day gave a penny to two others, telling them to buy soup and pudding for themselves. One of them came to the truck, and asked for two slices of pudding.

"Why didn't you get some soup, instead of two pieces of pudding?" asked the one to whom he had been indebted.

"Oh," was the answer, as he handed one slice to another man, "Here's a chum of mine who can get along with a piece of this."

And the man who was thus helped was seen, a few minutes after, dividing his share with a neighbour more needy than himself.

Last October an elderly man, looking very white and thin, stood for three days outside the gate, watching the others as they ate their hot stew. On the first day a friend lent him a penny, but on the second no one could afford to repeat the loan, and on the third the man fell to the ground exhausted. He had been reduced by starvation to the lowest point of human endurance, and actually died on the spot where he hoped to be fed.

Punctually at noon two wretched-looking cats appear, and wait until some one takes pity on them. Some of the men leave a little food in their basins for the poor animals, besides breaking off a bit o pudding for anxiously watching children.

One day the attendant was, as usual, collecting two basins of scrapings, one for the black cat, and one for the white, when he saw a lean, starved human creature peering at him through the railings. The two cats finished their meal and retired, and then the watcher, springing toward the basin, ravenously devoured the rest of the food.

The amount of good done by this system of food distribution is almost incalculable.

Royal Intermarriages.

A grave national crisis seemed about to arise recently in Germany as the result of a proposed marriage between a daughter of the reigning Emperor and Prince Alexander of Battenberg. Alexander was formerly Prince of Bulgaria, and while occupying that throne gave such offence to the Russian Czar that he was abducted, and was afterward forced to give up his Bulgarian throne.

Obnoxious, therefore, as Alexander is to the Czar, Prince Bismarck declared that his marriage into the Emperor's family was likely to bring about unpleasant relations—and perhaps worse—between Germany and Russia, and therefore Bismarck strenuously resisted the arrangement which was dear to the heart both of the young princess herself and of her mother, the Empress Victoria.

This occurrence strikingly illustrates the fact that marriages among the European reigning families may still have a large influence upon the course of political events.

It is quite true that such ties do not prevent, and never have prevented, the different nations from quarrelling with and fighting each other. Royal fathers-in-law and brothers-in law have often, all through European history, confronted each other on the battle field, and allied themselves with each other's enemies.

Napolean the First warred upon Francis of Austria, his father-in-law, and a few years ago England and Russia were on the very point of coming to blows, though the second son of Queen Victoria was the husband of the Czar's sister.

Yet the reigning families, or their ministers, have always arranged marriages between their members for "dynastic" and political reasons, and not seldom the fact that marriage ties existed between them has turned the scale in favor of or against wars and other important political events.

In the monarchies, indeed, either absolute law or immemorial custom has established the rule that royalty can only wed royalty, and that if the heir, near or remote to a throne, marries beneath the royal rank, he shall forfeit his right of succession.

Prince Oscar of Sweden, by marrying recently Miss Munck, one of the maids of honor at the Swedish court, was obliged to abandon all right to succeed to the throne, and to give up his rank as a royal prince.

In order to avoid such results, the princes of many European states are permitted to contract what are called "morganatic" marriages, with women not of royal blood. But the children of such marriages are not recognized as their father's heirs, or as being of the blood royal; nor does a morganatic marriage prevent the prince who makes it from also legally wedding a princess of royal blood.

Royal marriages for dynastic or political reasons often have two opposite results. They often unite in wedlock a prince and princess who know little of each other, and who do not love each other. On the other hand, the rule of dynastic marriages sometimes keeps apart a prince and princess who do love each other. The latter is said to be the case with the Prince Alexander and the Princess Victoria.

Sometimes, however, it happens that affection and political exigencies harmonize, and produce happy marriages. Of such a character, undoubtedly, were the marriages of Queen Victoria with Prince Albert; of her son, the Prince of Wales, with the Danish Princess Alexandria; of the present German Emperor with his Empress, and of the present Czar with the Princess Dagmar.

So long-continued has been the custom of intermarriages between royal people, that the present reigning families of Europe are all more or less nearly related to each other; and, in many instances, are related to each other by numerous ties of blood and inheritance.

It cannot be said, however, that this fact materially lessens the probability of war. Indeed, as the case of Prince Alexander and the German Princess shows, adherence to the custom may bring the prospect of dissension and war nearer, rather than more remote.

The Song of a Flirt.

Oh, a dainty toy is the heart of man!
For all toys known since time began
Compare with this one what one can?
What rapture to watch it chill and burn
And burn and chill and tremble in turn—
Then with dainty shod feet to carelessly spurn!
Oh, 'tis rare, indeed, with a victim smitten—
This delicate game a la mouse and kitten—
To cajole, soothe, caress—then "give him the mitten."

Take all other toys, then, but leave me mine;
Take riches and pleasures and palaces fine;
Take all but my plaything—the heart masculine.

RUSSIA'S PETROLEUM GEYSERS.

Wells that Alone Produce More Oil Than an Entire American Field.

Statistics of the oil business in Russia have just reached this country, and American oil men are studying them with a great deal of anxiety. They throw a new light on the business in Russia, and show too plainly that the Baku districts are a most dangerous rival of the American fields. The output of many of the Russian wells is prodigious, and far eclipses anything ever heard of in this country. American oil producers have claimed to have no fears of Russian competition, but with the new information on the industry they are taking another view of it.

There is no better way to bring this fact to them than by a few comparisons. Take a well at Baku called the "Wet Nurse." It has been yielding oil for twelve years, and in that time has averaged 32,000 gallons a day. These figures are amazing to an American oil producer. They mean that the well has produced 140,000,000, gallons of oil, or over 3,000,000 barrels. These figures are startling to the people of this section when they turn to the statistics of their own industry and find that this one well has produced three times as much as Pithole in a year of its wonderful business. It lacks less than 400,000 barrels of producing as much as the famous Oil Creek district produced in 1869, its most prolific year. The Washington district, among the richest ever discovered in America, in 1887, its banner year, produced but 3,500,000 barrels. This is but 500,000 barrels more than the output of this one well in Russia. The wonderful Thorn Creek pool, in Butler county, produced in its best twelve months but 268,000 barrels more than this one Russian gusher.

Such astounding facts as these bring the danger of Russian competition home to the people of the Pennsylvanian fields. This does not stand alone in this enormous production. The yearly output is given of a number of wells, many of them nearly as large as this one. The "Mirzoeff No. 5," also at Baku, has for six years produced 40,000 gallons a day. This is above 2,000 barrels, and the production of Cogley, Tarkill, and Red Valley, three prolific Venango county pools, produced but 1,965,000 barrels in 1886, their best year.

The record is given of a well drilled by the Nobel Brothers, called the "Drooja well." It cost $7 500 to drill. The record of the well is thus stated:

This well spouted for 115 days, the yield being 3,400 tons for thirty, and 600 tons for eleven days. The well was then plugged and the supply kept under ground for further wants. The amount of oil spouted by this well, according to the lowest estimate, was 22,000 tons, or 55,000,000 gallons: according to the highest estimate, 500,000 tons or 125,000,000 gallons."

The spray from one of these geysers was blown through the air for eight miles.

With these figures before them, coming as they do from official sources, American oil men realize that Russian petroleum deposits are too great for computation. Five hundred wells have been sunk in the Baku districts, 200 of which, irrespective of the enormous fountains, are now producing 560,000,000 gallons of oil every year. It is the opinion of American operators now in that field that this flow "could be increased tenfold or a hundredfold." A very significant fact to oil men is the interest which the Rothschilds have taken in the Russian field, controlling, as they do, a large percentage of the producing and refining business.

His Wife Saw the Point.

Jones had married the prettiest woman in town and Brown had married the homeliest and thought she was beautiful. One evening they were talking about their respective better halves, and Brown remarked:

"I say, Jones, I think you and I married the two prettiest women in town."

Jones looked at him in surprise a moment, but he saw he was serious.

"Well," he replied, cautiously, and with pride, "I guess you are about half right, old fellow."

Brown didn't see the point until he told his wife.—[Washington Critic.

Sedentary Habits.

In this age of push and worry, the business man and the professional man are alike unable to devote any adequate time to exercise. In the daily round of toil and pleasure, no suitable provision is made for that important function, and the result is that men of sedentary habits become subject to many forms of ailments arising from a torpid or sluggish liver. Constipation, sick headache, bitiousness and dyspepsia are all due to the improper action of the liver. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets cure these troubles by restoring the liver to its normal condition.

A BOTTLE OF OIL.

Wishing to take the night train at the small station of B ——, and having nothing to employ my attention about the village, I went early to the station, and was ushered into the waiting-room by the watchman, a stout, good-natured looking man in the prime of life, who wore, pinned across his breast, an empty sleeve

As I had an hour or more of leisure before my train would arrive, I passed the time chatting with the watchman, and he told me the story of the adventure in which he lost his arm. I repeat his narrative as nearly as possible in his own words.

Before I was intrusted with the night duties of this station I formed one of a crew of three sectionmen, who had in charge seven miles of track upon our road, some three hundred miles west of here, in the roughest and most lawless part of the Territory.

Our duties were to keep in thorough order the track upon our section, and we were held responsible to the company for any thing that would endanger or delay the trains while upon it.

Our section began at Summit Station, and ran east seven miles. Thence to Brewster's, the next station east of Summit, and fifteen miles distant from it, was another section eight miles long.

The night duty of a section-hand is not pleasant. In rain or shine, snow or sleet, the section must be patrolled by one man—who employs in good weather a light hand-car for the purpose—ahead of our Overland Pullman train. This train passed over our section at midnight, and our departure was timed so as to inspect the track immediately ahead of it.

So, taking turns at that duty, we started from Summit at ten o'clock sharp, and usually arrived at the "half-way house" about ten minutes ahead of the train. Here we met one of the men from the section east of us, who had started about the same time and for the same purpose. You see the precaution taken by all well-managed roads for the safety of its patrons.

How many of the passengers on the Overland to-night know, or knowing, give a thought to the men who, since darkness settled upon them, have been plunging through the snow,—for hand cars are useless in such weather as this,—swinging their lanterns from side to side, examining carefu ly every cut for fear of falling rocks, every bridge for broken rails, thus enabling them to ride in safety.

As I said before, the men from each section having patrolled fifteen miles of track, meet at a little shanty situated beside the track, just large enough to hold a small stove and a few necessary supplies, and allow the men to enter. Here they stay until the train comes in sight, then outside, and display their two whitelights, that the engineer may know all is well. Failure to do this would result in a report to headquarters, and possibly in discharge from the service.

One night it came my turn to run the section. Before starting, it occurred to me that our supply of lantern oil at the half-way house was low, so I procured and filled a quart bottle of lard oil, the kind which is used for the purpose, put it into the inside pocket of my heavy coat, buttoned it snugly about me, and started.

It was a stormy summer's night, as black as ink. My car ran smoothly over the rails, and soon I had travelled about half the distance and arrived at a bridge crossing Snake River. Here I dismounted from the car, and pushing it ahead of me as I passed, I gave the structure a careful examination, found everything all right, and was about mounting my car again, when I received a violent blow upon the head which stretched me senseless upon the rails.

Recovering consciousness after a few moments, I found myself bound, gagged and lying but a few feet from a gang of masked men, whom I saw, as well as the darkness would permit, at work with bars removing one of the rails just at the entrance of the bridge.

Train wreckers! I had heard a great deal about the desperate character of these ruffians, but was now making my first acquaintance with them.

As they worked, they dis used the situation and how they should dispose of me.

"I tell yer, Sam!" one big fellow exclaimed. "Best way is to tie him across the rails, and let 'em finish him."

"Yes, that's so!" echoed the party. "Dead men tell no tales, and he may have seen our faces."

"Ho! ho! ho! I won't listen to such a plan," said one who seemed to exercise some influence over them. "We shall have enough to answer for before this job is finished without killing him. How this nail sticks!" he added with an oath. "The man who drove these spikes must have meant 'em to stay. Come, mates! He is safe enough, and if we mean business, we must be lively. The train will be here in twenty minutes, and we have no time to lose," and at the rail they all sprang with a will.

Twenty minutes! What could I hope to do to save the train in my condition, with so short a time?

The thought of the terrible wreck which must result if the derailed train struck the bridge made me desperate. Straining at the cords which bound my wrists, I fancied they gave way a little. I remembered the trick of the necromancers who free themselves from their bonds by alternately contracting and expanding their muscles, and I lay in silence, working in a perfect frenzy of excitement until I was able to free my hands. In an instant my knife out of my pocket, and my feet free.

Without waiting to free myself from the gag, I sprang to my feet, and, at the top of my speed, started down the track in the direction of the approaching train. With a yell which told me I was discovered, the whole gang started in pursuit; but I had some little start of them, and bounded along the ties, bent upon stopping the train at any cost.

In the inky blackness of the night pursuit was difficult. Soon pop! pop! pop! from the revolvers of the gang. They were firing down the track, in the hope of stopping me with a bullet.

As the gag, which I had not removed, hindered my breathing, I was forced to stop for a moment to cut it away. While so engaged, there came a second volley, this time more successful. I was struck in the left arm midway between wrist and elbow. I should have fainted from the shock, together with the rough usage I had previously undergone, but for my determination to keep up.

"Brace up!" I called, as if addressing a companion. "No time for such foolishness now, Tom. Remember the train!"

This I said aloud to myself, for the solitary work of my nightly rounds had given me the habit of talking to myself, for want of another companion.

Setting my teeth hard, I overcame the faintness, staggered to my feet and ran on. I soon noticed that the pursuit had ceased. Either the train-robbers thought I was done for, or they had returned to their unfinished work, trusting I should be unable to stop the train.

And now it flashed upon my mind for the first time, How could I accomplish it? Light I had none—my lantern was with the wreckers.

While I was thus deliberating, still running on as fast as my condition would permit, instinctively I felt in my pocket for matches. Ah, the oil! Why had I not thought of that before? Of course!

"Of course the oil will stop them, Tom. Spread it on the rails. Their old seventy-ton locomotive can get no grip on that iron. Smear it thick, cover it well, rub it on with your palm, so—both rails, don't neglect an inch of either. For life, Tom! for life. Think of the men, women and little children upon the train!"

I worked with the desperation of a drowning man. Upon my knees, the bottle under my disabled arm, pouring the oil, by an inclination of my body, into my right hand, and spreading it upon the rails.

In ten minutes the quart of oil was exhausted, and as a result I had both rails for quite a distance very well covered with it.

I had started backward from the approaching train, and now rose to my feet at the end of my labor and at the terminus of the greased rails.

The train was coming.

Already the rails were singing with vibration as the heavy train approached. Here they come. How awful the sight of a big locomotive, coming straight toward one upon a dark midnight! The great, round eye of the head light streaming out into the darkness, the roar of the exhaust, the hiss of the steam through the cylinders, together with the rush and roar of the train, make up a terrifying, though magnificent sight.

I stood upon the track, waving my hands, far enough away to spring from it before he train could reach me, but so that the headlight would shine upon me and I could be seen by the engineer. "Now for it," I thought. She strikes the oil—the big, seven-foot driving-wheels spin round as though the engine had been lifted in the air.

Friction, the propelling influence, is gone now. She slackens speed. I could see the engineer plainly.

In my excitement I screamed as loud as possible, in vain protest to the engineer, who was pulling the little lever which sands the rails.

Shouting is of no avail, they could not hear me.

Had there been sufficient upgrade there the oil would have stopped them quite. As it was, the inertia of the cars composing the train was able to push the engine over, sliding the wheels.

But one resource was left, and I thought of it just in time. I stepped as close to the rails as I dared, and with all my strength hurled the empty bottle at the head-light. It struck the glass and shattered it to splinters, and the light instantly went out.

Then came the welcome signal from the whistle for brakes, and I sank down unconscious.

When I recovered, a moment sufficed to tell the story, and, proceeding slowly, we soon came to the scene of the trouble. The rail had been removed and was lying beside the track; but, of course, the would-be wreckers had seen by our careful approach that their plan was spoiled and had decamped.

With the tools always carried upon a train for such purposes, we soon replaced the rail and proceeded.

I was carried to the company's hospital at S——, where skillful surgeons did the best they could for me, but it was found necessary to remove my arm, as you see. And the company thought it best, to avoid my meeting with possible harm from the gang I had foiled, to transfer me to this point.

Now it is time for me to light up the station, for your train will soon be here. A pleasant journey to you, sir, and no mishaps. Good-night.

Burman's Indifference to Death.

Three Burmans were led out to suffer death by being shot. They were perfectly apathetic, not seeming to care a bit, judging by the way they laughed and talked and smoked the never absent cigar. One of them having been tied up, the other two squatted down and watched the sentence being carried out with intense interest. The volley was fired, and so true had gone the bullets that the top of the Burman's head was riddled with five of them. Turning away in disgust, what was my horror and surprise to see the remaining two prisoners rolling on the ground, convulsed with laughter at the effect of the Sepoys' rifles. It was some time before they recovered sufficiently to be taken up for punishment, and when they were, one of them was smoking a cigar and the other burst out laughing just as the order for firing was given.

The Burman, it will be seen from this, is apathetic, apparently indifferent to death. In spite of this quality, he is a coward in action and rarely fights in the open or stands his ground when attacked. They are not a tall race, and in many respects resemble the Chinese; having flat faces and small eyes. They wear their hair long like a woman, and the greatest insult they can receive is to have it cut. In daily life they are lazy, making the women do everything; thieves and liars, and not to be trusted in any business transaction.—Neville Morris, in New York Star.

A Romance of Compressed Air.

A gentleman who, by the way, is quite a celebrated organist himself, was wandering through the organ loft of St. Andrew's Church in New York when he slipped and fell into the diapason pipe of the huge instrument. He went down feet foremost into the cone of the pipe until he was firmly wedged.

The more he struggled the tighter he wedged himself, and being about twelve feet from the top of the pipe, the air soon began to give out, and he became frightened at the idea of dying in the prison where accident had lodged him. His frantic shouts for help did no good.

After spending a night in this dangerous and dismal hole, and having in his struggles stripped off his coat, he wound it about his waist, so that no air could escape from below. Soon he heard the sonorous tones of the organ, and ascended the pipe until he could reach the top with his hands. Then he knew that air had been pumped in below him, and that by gradual compression of the air, he had been forced up as through a pneumatic tube. As he drew himself out of the pipe, he gave one hearty and fervent shout of "Saved!" which rang above the tones of the organ, and nearly frightened the organist to death.

Navigability of Hudson's Straits.

OTTAWA, May 23.—The following extract from the private report to the Government by Captain Martham, who accompanied the expedition sent to Hudson's Bay to inquire into the navigability of the straits, was received here to-day from Ottawa:—"There it certainly navigation every year for at least five months. Very often the straits are likely to be navigable the entire twelve months, and the ice is not heavy, being of the honeycombed character, which can be easily resisted by steamers built for navigating these waters." The report indicates that the testimony of the men who were placed at stations along the shore is quite worthless, as they never could tell from their position how the water was flowing in the open channel. In fact they could not see.

A score of years ago the exploits of the Monitor, an experimental warcraft designed and built in the United States, drew the attention of the maritime world, and did much to inaugurate the revolution which has since been wrought in the construction and equipment of navies. Another experimental vessel, the Vesuvius, was launched the other day from the American Navy Yard, which bids fair to attract no less attention, and, should opportunity occur, to outdo the feats of its short-lived predecessor. The two chief novelties in regard to the Vesuvius are the high rate of speed anticipated, twenty knots an hour, and the unique character of her offensive armament. The latter is to consist of three guns, each fifty-four feet in length, and adapted to throw a dynamite shell of two hundred pounds weight a distance of one mile with precision. If this can be accomplished, and the dynamite cartridge made to explode on striking, it is evident that no ironclad could withstand the shock. Whether, however, the long range guns, now so much in vogue in naval warfare, would leave the little slumbering volcano many chances of coming within striking range of its intended victim is one of the uncertainties of the experiment.

Sudden joys are apt to be followed by moments of weakness. In the reaction from the delight occasioned by the freedom from flood this year, a Montreal paper says: "Spring poems are in order in Montreal at present, the season having behaved so well. Ask any devel-headed business man of Montreal, even with a warehouse near the river, and he would welcome a flood to escape the poetry.

In a paper read by a Baltimore physician it was truly said that persons accept medical charity who would not accept it in any other form, and who are able to pay the doctor. The reason for this condition of things lies, in a great measure, in the willingness of physicians, especially young physicians who want practice, to give their services. No other profession is so charitable as the medical.

The Emperor Frederick wears a scarf-pin with a history. Remarking on one occasion that the person with whom he was conversing was observing the pin with some curiosity, he pulled it out of his scarf and said:—"This little silver coin is one of three which were unearthed in an old Roman grave in the presence of my three boys. I had the three coins mounted as pins for them as mementoes of the occasion, and when my little Waldemar died I took possession of his and have worn it ever since." Prince Waldemar, who died in March, 1879, was a singularly lovable and bright boy, 12 years old at the time, and was the favorite child of "Unser Fritz" and his wife, and they bitterly and deeply mourned his premature death.

She Got Him Home.

A woman up at St. Helen's, says the Astoria Pioneer, is the wife of a man who loves to hang around a certain grog bazar, and in so doing he sorely neglects the helpmeet who sits patiently at home. Many a time and oft has she reasoned with him in her quiet, motherly way, and tried to point out to him the disgraceful way in which he was using her, but all to no purpose. She even went so far as to request the teller in the aforesaid booze emporium that he cease selling her husband liquor. But the poison-mixer bade her go hence and exchange New Year's calls with herself; but she turned on her heel and left his hateful presence.

That evening as she sat alone she heard a racket down cellar, and upon investigation found that a skunk had got his tail in the rat-trap. Now it is a well-known fact that a skunk will hold its peace as long as his bushy tail is held, whether in a trap or the hand, and remembering that she had no fear. Suddenly a bright thought entered her head. The clock in the house was striking one and she wanted papa to come home. With a quick movement she threw a bag over the animal's head, and, after grasping its tail, opened the trap, and thus armed headed for the saloon. It was only a short distance away, and finding the door partly open, she tossed the skunk into the midst of the crowd, and swiftly stole away.

It had the desired effect and papa came home. The saloon keeper, who never took a vacation before in his life, has gone into the country to visit relatives, and the saloon is closed for repairs.

Habits of the Ostrich.

The supposition that an ostrich lays but one egg annually, and drops that carelessly in the sand, is nonsense. So also is the familiar story that the bird is in the habit of poking his head in the sand, thinking that it may thus escape the observation of its pursuer. The ostrich is no such fool. The female lays as many eggs annually as any goose or hen, and all the birds in the flock use the same nest, which is a hole dug in the sand in some secluded place where they are safe from disturbance. When there are twenty or thirty eggs the male bird hatches them, sitting upon the nest continually for thirty days, and is fed meantime by the females. During the period of incubation the male bird is in an ugly mood and attacks fiercely with his bill and feet any man or animal that approaches him. As the chicks are hatched their mothers take care of them, the brood being divided among the flock by some instinct, and the cock is free to attend to his own affairs again. Very often eggs are found on the pampas, but such have dropped in the chase or by hens that have been unable to reach the nest.

Talk.

It seems to me that talk should be,
Like water, sprinkled sparingly.
Then ground that late lay dull and dried
Smiles up at you revivified,
And flowers—of speech—touched by the dew
Put forth fresh roots and bud anew.
But I'm not sure that any flower
Would thrive beneath Niagara's shower!
So when a friend turns full on me
His verbal hose, may I not flee?
I know that I am arid ground,
But I'm not watered—Gad! I'm drowned

Thanksgiving is good, thanks living is better.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

A War Scare in England—Emperor Frederick's Health—Bismarck Thinks War Imminent.

LONDON, May 15.—England is becoming excited over the possibillity of war, and there is a great popular uprising in favor of strengthening the army and navy for defensive purposes. The attacks of Gen. Lord Wolseley upon the Government for its niggardly economy and inefficiency have created great uneasiness. One hundred members of Parliament have called on the Secretary of State for War with reference to the matter and numerous public meetings are to take place during the coming week on the subject.

The Emperor has again passed a good day. The baseless reports circulated that there had been a recurrence of the inflammation caused general excitement till the results of inquiries at the palace were published. The official news concerning his condition is not entirely trustworthy, as the doctors join in the concealment of the worst phases of his malady, and in making the best of any change for the better. A favorable symptom is his increasing strength. His efforts to walk about the room are now fairly successful. A week ago he could not move his limbs. Now, with slight assistance, he is able to take an occasional turn up and down the room. His fever in the morning is very slight, but increases towards night. His sleeplessness continues, though frequently broken, but he enjoys intervals of repose deep and refreshing. The Empress visits his bedroom every morning, awaits his waking, and remains until the doctors assemble for consultation, when she withdraws to meet her daughters and to go out riding.

Prince Bismarck's solicitude to prevent the public mind being lulled into a deceptive calm regarding the chances of war was shown in the promptitude with which were made the denials of the peace predictions placed in his mouth in connection with the Schurz interview. Mr. Schurz did not communicate to any person the subject of his conversation with the Chancellor. He is, therefore, not responsible for what an official note in the North German Gazette termed an absolute invention.

A COCKROACH LETTER CARRIER.

Trained to Help Convicts to Escape.

A common cockroach was trained to act as a letter carrier between William Rodifer and "Starlight Jack" Ryan, convicts in the Southern Indiana Penitentiary. It is probably the first instance on record, too, where there was any use found for this little creature.

Rodifer occupied a cell in the tier just above the one where Jack was confined, and for a long time they had no means of communicating with one another. Rodifer was a daring fellow, but he had not sufficient imagination to get up a plan of escape, and he relied on the bright mind of his friend "Starlight Jack" to suggest an idea.

One evening Rodifer noticed an innocent looking cockroach running about on the floor. After watching its gambolings for a time he concluded he could use it. So, writing a short note to his friend, he tied it to the cockroach's wing, and kneeling down on the floor, he put it on the wall under the iron balcony in front of his cell. He calculated that it would run into the cell underneath. And it did.

Jack noticed the paper, caught the insect and read the note. Then he answered it, and poking the little creature out on the wall from the ceiling over the door he released it. The roach went into Rodifer's cell and was caught. Then they fed and cared for it, and used it in this manner for some months. In fact it grew to understand its business.

It must have been a female cockroach, however, for one day it stopped to chat with a friend and was noticed by a warden. The note which was written in some sort of cipher, was taken off and the hospital steward, Dr. Sid C. McCure, read it. Then the beetle was put on the balcony floor, and it ran into Rodifer's cell. Thus the officials were kept posted as to the plans of the two famous gaolbreakers.

After a time Jack began to suspect that something was wrong, and added a postscript to his letter something like this: "If everything is right you will find a hair from my head in this note." The warden read it as he did the others, but dropped the hair and lost it. "Never mind it," said Capt Craig, whose hair was red; "put one of mine in it." The answer came back, "That last whipping must have been an awful one, Jack, for it has changed the color of your hair." The scheming of these two worthies came to naught, however, and they served their terms.

Authors and Sentiments.

Nobody but us literary people knows how closely grows the attachment between the author and his characters. It is related of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe that when from the pages of her manuscript she read the death of little Eva, the entire family sat bathed in tears, nor could one of them speak a word, but all mournfully separated, going to their rooms as though they had just attended the funeral of a dear friend. Some friends met Thackeray on the street one day, and his countenance bore traces of intense grief. "What is the matter?" they asked. "I have just killed Colonel Newcome," he sobbed, bursting into tears as he hurried away. Charles Dickens had the same experience. So did I. Mine was even more harrowing. When I wrote my first funny story about Mr. Bilderback going up on the roof to shovel off the snow, and making an avalanche of himself and sliding down into a water barrel, I was almost heart-broken. I didn't kill Mr. Bilderback myself. Ah, indeed, I hadn't the heart to do that. The managing editor, that dear, considerate soul, saw how I felt about it, and he killed him for me. He also killed all the other dear, loving gentle characters in the sketch. And as I was leaving he remarked that he would kill me if I ever came back with any more such stuff. He meant it, too. People who saw me coming out of the office, scraping dust, and lint, and pine slivers, and gouts of paste off my back, saw at once, by my grief-stricken face, that something had happened. But I could not tell them what. My poor, bursting heart was too full.—[Bob Burdette.

The Loss of Temper.

Temper, too, there is no question, is good to keep; yet we ourselves remember occasions when we would have given all the world to have been able to lose our temper thoroughly, completely, irrevocably. Simulated loss of temper is a great gift; but a real, genuine loss has a power of closing a controversy or putting an end to a situation where stimulated loss can effect nothing. No doubt the losing is expensive; it generally means apology or compensation of some sort; but for the moment it carries a man through a difficulty unconsciously, and, as it were, on wings. The wounds received in the excitement of battle are said at the time not to hurt, and loss of temper means an excitement where wounds given and received become almost a pleasure.—[London Spectator.

Swift Justice.

The New York Herald says:—Yesterday morning Charles Rickerd was a member of the police force in this city. In the evening he was a convict in Sing Sing. He was arrested at four o'clock in the act of stealing and was sent on the 2 30 train to Sing Sing. In the meantime he had been indicted by the grand jury, arraigned before Recorder Smyth and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment on a plea of guilty. That beats the record. It shows what the machinery of the law can do when handled vigorously.

"Look here, doctor, if you could pay this bill, you'd accommodate me greatly." "Can't do it, my dear sir, impossible; but come in next week, and I may be able to do something for you." "Then you expect to be in funds soon?" "Yes, I saw young Slenderlegs going by here on his bicycle to-day."

Torn in Pieces by a Panther.

Hugh Williams had a thrilling adventure the other night while driving from Hot Springs to his country home. When half a mile from his house his horses evinced considerable uneasiness, as though they were afraid to advance further in the direction they were going.

The farmer, becoming uneasy, whistled to his large and trusty bulldog, which was but a short distance in advance of him. Just as the dog started to return, in obedience to the alarm, Mr. Williams heard a noise in the branches of a tree which stood near the roadside, and when the dog got within twenty five yards of the waggon he was pounced upon by a huge panther, which leaped from the tree upon him. A terrible fight ensued.

The farmer's team became frightened and ran home with him. As soon as he reached his home Mr. Williams tethered his team, ran into the house, picked up his Winchester rifle, and returned to the spot to take a hand in the battle. He found his faithful dog torn to pieces, but no signs of the "varmint" was visible.

African Explorers Attacked.

The Weser Zeirung reports that Kund's and Tappenbeck's expedition to the interior of Cameroons was recently attacked by natives, and that two officers were severely wounded.

Kund and Tappenbeck are officers in the German army who made a notable journey in the Congo basin once two years ago, during which they discovered a large new river, the Fkatta, emptying into the foot of Lake Leopold I., which Stanley discovered. After their return home the Government sent them out again with a well-equipped expedition to traverse a great region which has never yet been visited by white men. The country stretching from Cameroons to Adamawa on the north, and far toward the big northern bend of the Congo on the south, is now the largest unexplored part of Africa. It is while engaged in this important enterprise that their expedition has been attacked by the natives, whose unfriendly disposition had already been reported by travellers who had gone a little inland from Cameroons.

THE Home Circle had another special meeting on Friday evening.

A DUTTONITE, while standing on the platform at the station in St. Thomas the other day, was accosted by an acquaintance thusly: "Good day. In the fish business now?" "No; in the mushroom business?" "Is there any money in that?" "Yes. I want three or four good men." "What do you pay?" "Forty dollars per month and board." Other conversation took place and the name and address of the man out of a job was handed over that he might be sent for when wanted. We presume that the man of Shedden, or some other place, is waiting in great expectancy to get word to come and receive that $40 and board per month.

A SURE RELIEF.

I suffered from a hard cough contracted by damp feet. Having consulted a local doctor without effect I thought I would try Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam as a last resort. Before I had finished the first bottle my cough had entirely disappeared, and to-day I enjoy better health than ever before. I can conscientiously recommend it. Chas. H. Kent, telegraph operator, East Selkirk, Man.

A LAST RESORT.

Last summer, says Wm. J. James of Atherly Ont., I felt very miserable with pains over my kidneys, fluttering of the heart and nervousness; after taking different kinds of medicine, hearing of B.B.B. I thought I would try it; one bottle completely cured me. I can highly recommend it to others.

OLD DR. CHASE'S NEW RECEIPT BOOK.

His Last and Crowning Life Work.

Dr. Chase's Third, last and Complete RECEIPT BOOK AND HOUSEHOLD PHYSICIAN, or the Book for the Million, contains nearly 900 pages and sells for $2.25 in cloth binding and $2.50 in imported oil cloth, marble edge, and is justly by him called

'The crowning work of my life.'

It is the result of over half a century's observation, study and experience. Yet this embodies no compilation of his former books. IT IS WHOLLY A NEW BOOK. If 20 years ago he could produce a book that has had a sale of over 150,000 copies, and has made his name familiar in nearly every English-speaking home in the United States, Canada and thousands or homes in Europe, Australia and South America, what kind of a book could or would he produce at his CROWNING LIFE WORK, with more than thirty years of additional practice and experience? The book itself answers the question, and is the most valuable production in the history of book publishing.

Caution! Unscrupulous and pirating publishers are attempting to copy this book by taking portions of it out and palming it off on the public as the complete work. We own the manuscript, purchased from Dr. Chase's heirs. See that you get the GENUINE book. See that it has our name on the title page and is copyrighted by us.

DR. WASHINGTON,
I think it my duty to let you know how my health is improving. When I commenced treatment with you I was very ill. I had severe catarrh of my head and throat. My lungs were pronounced to be far gone in consumption. I had a very bad cough, raised a good deal of blood and matter, had night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, appetite very poor and could scarcely walk across the floor. My family doctor considered my case entirely hopeless. As a last resort I was lead to try your treatment for Catarrh and Consumption. My improvement was noticeable from the first and now after nearly six months treatment, under the blessing of a kind Providence, my health is again restored

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

Mayor Cowan, of London, is lying seriously ill in Toronto.

An action is now pending at Osgoode Hall, Toronto, to quash the early closing by-law of that city.

A young man at Guelph married a young lady there a year ago and received $2,000 in Central Bank shares. He is now $2,000 worse off than he was before.

TO THE DEAF.—A person cured of Deafness and noises in the head of 23 years' standing by a simple remedy, will send a description of it FREE to any person who applies to NICHOLSON, 30 St. John St. Montreal.

Woodstock has four or five lawsuits on its hands. The town is in a fair way to learn that, while there is a great deal of uncertainty about the law, there is none about the costs.

Two men leading stallions met on the road between Merrickville and Burritt's Rapids. While the men conversed the horses fought. Mr. McEwen took a stick and endeavored to part the animals, when one of them reared up and struck him on the head, killing him instantly.

Sunday night, after returning from church, Mrs. William Blain, of Orillia, asked her maid to prepare some gruel. By mistake the maid used meal which contained "Rough on Rats," and which had been placed on a shelf in the pantry. Mrs. Blain died within an hour after partaking of the gruel. She leaves a husband and three children.

Michael Hunsberger, until recently keeper of the Elgin House of Industry, died at his residence in St. Thomas on Sunday, 20th inst., after a long illness of cancer in the stomach, in the 58th year of his age. He was for some years a well known Bayham farmer and at one time served the township as deputy-reeve. When the Elgin House of Industry was built, twelve years ago, he was appointed its keeper, and retained the position up to last January, when ill-health compelled him to resign, and when the county council presented him with a handsome silver service.

The New York World states that the Western Union Telegraph Company have an arrangement with Edison by which the company pay him a certain sum yearly for the right to suppress any of his inventions which the company chooses. It is said that under this arrangement the company has already suppressed two important inventions which would have revolutionized and indefinitely cheapened telegraphy. Apparently there is nothing a monopoly will not do, from dynamiting a possible rival to obstructing human progress.

CROP PROSPECTS.

FALL WHEAT.—The outlook for fall wheat is rather unpromising, though much depends on the character of the weather during the latter part of May and the first half of June. A very dry summer was followed by a dry autumn; the little rain that did fall in time to in any way promote the growth of crops was so quickly absorbed by the parched ground that its good effects were scarcely noticeable. In so far as concerned fall wheat, the cold weather came upon it while the plant was still small and delicate and in every way ill-fitted to contend with the trials of the winter and spring seasons. Had the spring opened at all favorably the crop would likely have been a good one, despite the bad start in the fall. But the season has been very untoward. April, instead of being made up of successive days of warm showers and bright sunshine, was, with the exception of a few days, cold, dry and bright. Chilling winds from the west and north-west made sad havoc with the wheat, which in most localities had come through the winter very promisingly, and though the crop is now in anything but a promising condition three or four weeks of fresh, warm, "growing weather" may greatly change its prospects for the better. It is a noticeable fact that to a great extent the plants escaped winter-killing, while very few correspondents have noticed the ravages of worms or insects. In the Lake Erie counties the reports are decidedly unfavorable. Not only did the cold dry weather of April damage the crop, but much of it was destroyed by ice forming on the fields after the thaws of winter. This seems rather inexcusable, as surface draining is neither troublesome nor expensive. It is all very well to have a field in such a state that the self-binder will pass over it smoothly, but the farmer should remember that if this means letting the water lie long enough on the field to form a heavy and destructive coating of ice he will presently find that there will be comparatively little work in his fields for his favorite implement. In the county of Elgin one correspondent notes the ravages of the wire worm, but as a rule the fall wheat crop seems to be singularly free from damages by worms or insects in this as well as other parts of Ontario.

CLOVER.—Owing to several causes clover will be a very light crop. In most localities the seed sown last year was a failure on account of the drouth, which did far more damage than the winter or spring frosts. Much of the clover spared by the drouth, however, has been destroyed by late frosts heaving out the plants, especialy on heavy and low-lying land, as many fields have been plowed up. In some parts the remaining crop is reported as backward, owing to the lateness of the spring. Old meadows are generally in better condition than those of last year's seeding. In a few places the ravages of a grub are noted as having caused some destruction. There are numerous exceptions to the generally unfavorable outlook, but as a whole the yield will be far below a full one.

FRUIT AND VEGETATION.—Although a careful resume of the reports received prove that vegetation is at least from ten to fifteen days late compared with last year, yet at the time of writing both field and forest have begun to present a decidedly green appearance. Fruit trees generally are looking well. The very backwardness of spring is thought to be favorable to fruit, as late frosts are less liable to occur. The apple crop will be above the average. The peach crop is likely to be a failure except in the Niagara district and in some parts of Essex and Kent, and even in these localities many of the buds have been killed by the severe frosts. The plum promises well where the trees have been spared by the black knot, and pears, quinces, grapes and small fruits bid fair to come up to the average. In regard to the cherry, the reports are very discouraging. From every part of the province correspondents report with unvarying monotony that nearly all trees are destroyed by the black-knot, no adequate or wholly satisfactory method for its prevention or extermination having yet been devised. Moreover much fault is found since the preventive measures ordered by the government are not carried out in a manner at all consistent with the wishes of those who desire the preservation of one of our most luscious fruits.

MILLS BURNED AT IONA STATION

LOSS ESTIMATED AT $14,000

Last Thursday morning, 24th, about two o'clock, a train gang approaching Iona Station from the west discovered the Roseneith Mills to be afire. The engine whistle was blown loudly, arousing the inhabitants, but the fire had got too far to be subdued. When first discovered the fire had not broken out, but the whole inside of the building was a blaze. The fire spread to the storehouse and stable which stood close by. The fence and the stock shute for loading live stock on the cars, and about 100 cords of wood were also burned.

The mills were new, having been in operation only about three years; the machinery was of the most improved kind and there was a large quantity of it. The origin of the fire is supposed to have been from a hot journal, as the mill was running the day before until night.

Mr. Henderson, the proprietor, says that he does not purpose building again, as he is unable to do so. The succession of fires which he has had has reduced him financially, this being the third in about four years. He lost by the first $2,000 over and above the insurance; by the second $1,000, and by this he estimates the loss at $14,000, but covered by insurance to the amount of $6,500—$700 of which is in the Huron & Middlesex, and $1,500 in the Perth Mutual. The stock, of which there was not much, is fully covered by insurance. Mr. Henderson tenders his thanks to those who labored so hard and heroically in saving the balance of his wood and other surroundings.

The loss of the mill will make it rather gloomy for some of the men who are left in business there, as the mill was the life of the place. Mr. Jelly, merchant, thinks he will not remain there.

DISTRICT MEETING.

SECOND DAY.

On Wednesday, at 10 o'clock, the lay delegates were present representing each circuit in the district.

The reports from the various circuits showed a year of progress in all departments of the work. An increase of 152 in the membership for the year was reported. The connexional funds were well sustained.

Rev. J. W. Freeman, B. D., was elected to represent the district on the Stationing Committee and Rev. J. Philp and W. B. Whiting, Esq., on the Sabbath School Committee.

Moved by Rev. J. Philp, seconded by W. B. Whiting, Esq., and resolved, That we hereby express our hearty thanks to the minister and friends of Dutton for the very hospitable manner in which they have entertained the members of this district meeting, and that this resolution be read to the congregation by the pastor next Lord's day.

A resolution was passed thanking the chairman for the able manner in which he presided at the meetings during the year and the prosperity attending his year of office.

Meeting closed with benediction by the chairman.

SHEDDEN.

Mr. Thomas Orchard and family, on returning from church in St. Thomas Sunday evening, the team became unmanageable and ran away, smashing the rig. The occupants escaped with slight injuries.

Mrs. Henry Down is considered out of danger.

A son of David Marr had the misfortune to dislocate his arm at the elbow. Dr. Howell attended to his injuries.

Wm. Singer has started the mason work of John Andrew's house.

One of our citizens who figures on his interest came home from St. Thomas on Saturday and had a few words with some parties. He went to his house, got his revolver and came up to the corner "loaded for bear," but as he could not find his man at the moment he got over his passion.

Galt's population is now 6,150, with a suburban population of about another 1,000.

THE THREAD OF LIFE;

OR

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

The village of Whitestrand, on the Suffolk coast—an oasis in a stretch of treeless desert—was and is one of the remotest and most primitive spots to be found anywhere on the shores of England. The railways, running inland away to the west, have left it for ages far in the lurch; and even the two or three belated roads that converge upon it from surrounding villages lead nowhere. It is, so to speak, an absolute terminus. The World's End is the whimsical title of the last house at Whitestrand. The little river Char that debouches into the sea just below the church, with its broad estuary from the low stretch of reclaimed and sluice drained pasture land of wiry grass that rolls away to the southward. The very name Whitestrand, as old as the days of the Danish invasion of the East Anglian plain, at once describes the one striking and noteworthy feature of the entire district. It has absolutely no salient point of its own of any sort, except the hard and firm floor of pure white sand that extends for miles and miles on either side of the village.

All Whitestrand—what there was left of it—belonged to Mr. Wyville Meysey. His family had bought the manor and estate a hundred years before, when the banking firm of Meysey's in the Strand was in the first heyday of its financial glory. Unhappily for him, his particular ancestor, a collateral member of the great house, had preferred the respectable position of a country clergyman to an active share in the big concern in London. From that day forth, the sea had been steadily eating away the Meysey estate, till very little was left of it now but salt, marsh and sandhills and swampy pasture-lands.

It was Tuesday when Hugh Massinger and Warren Relf set sail from the Tower on their voyage in the Mud-Turtle down the crowded tidal Thames; on Thursday morning, two pretty girls sat together on the roots of an old gnarled poplar that overhung the exact point where the Char empties itself into the German Ocean. The Whitestrand poplar, indeed, had formed for three centuries a famous landmark to seafaring men who coast round the inlets of the Eastern Counties.

The elder of the two girls who sat together picturesquely on this natural rustic seat was dark and handsome, and so like Hugh Massinger himself in face and feature, that no one would have had much difficulty in recognizing her for the second cousin of whom he had spoken, Elsie Challoner. Her expression was more earnest and serious, to be sure, than the London poet's; her type of beauty was more tender and true; but she had the same large melting pathetic eyes, the same melancholy and chiselled mouth, the same long black wiry hair, and the same innate grace of bearing and manner in every movement as her distinguished relative. The younger girl, her pupil, was fairer and shorter, a pretty and delicate blonde of eighteen, with clear blue eyes and wistful mouth, and a slender but dainty girlish figure. They sat hand in hand on the roots of the tree, half overarched by its hollow funnel, looking out together over the low flat sea, whose fresh breeze blew hard in their faces, with the delicious bracing coolness and airiness peculiar to the shore of the German Ocean. There is no other air in all England to equal that strong air of Suffolk; it seems to blow right through and through one, and to brush away the dust and smoke of town from all one's pores with a single whiff of its clear bright purity.

"How do you think your cousin'll come, Elsie?" the younger girl asked, twining her straw hat by its strings carelessly in her hands. "I expect he'll drive over in a carriage from Daw's from the Almundham Station."

"I'm sure I don't know, dear," the elder and darker answered with a smile. "But how awfully interested you seem to be, Winifred, in this celebrated cousin of mine! What a thing it is for a man to be a poet! You've talked of nothing else the whole morning."

Winifred laughed. "Cousins are so very rare in this part of the country, you see," she said apologetically. "We don't get sight of a cousin, you know—or, for the matter of that, of any other male human being, erect upon two legs, and with a beard on his face—twice in a twelve-month. A live young man in a tourist suit is quite a rarity, I declare, nowadays.—And then a poet too! I never in my life set eyes yet upon a genuine, all-wool, unadulterated poet. And you say he's handsome, extremely handsome!"

"Winifred! Winifred! you naughty, bad girl!" Elsie laughed out, half in jest and half in earnest, "moderate your transports. You've got no sense of propriety in you, I do believe—and no respect for your instructress's dignity either. I oughtn't to let you talk on like that.—But as it's only Hugh, Winnie, like my own brother."

"What a jolly name—Hugh!" Winifred cried enthusiastically. "It goes so awfully well together, too, Hugh Massinger. There's a great deal in names going well together. I wouldn't marry a man called Adair, now, Elsie, or O'Dowd, either, not if you were to pay me for it (though why you should pay me, I'm sure I don't know), for Winnifred Adair doesn't sound a bit nice; and yet Elsie Adair goes just beautifully. Winifred Challoner—that's not bad, either. Three syllables, with the accent on the first. Winifred Massinger—that sounds very well too; best of all, perhaps. I shouldn't mind marrying a man named Massinger."

"Other things equal," Elsie put in laughing.

"Oh, of course he must have a moustache," Winifred went on in quite a serious voice. "Even if a man was a poet, and was called Massinger, and had lovely eyes, and could sing like a nightingale, but hadn't a moustache—a beautiful, long, wiry, black moustache, like the curate's at Snade—I wouldn't for the world so much as look at him. No close-shaven young man need apply. I insist upon a moustache as absolutely indispensable. Not red: red is quite inadmissible. If ever I marry—and I suppose I shall have to, some day, to please papa—I shall lay it down as a fixed point in the settlements, or whatever you call them, that my husband must have a black moustache, and must bind himself down by contract beforehand as long as I live never to shave it."

Elsie shaded her eyes with her hand and looked out seaward. "I shan't let you talk so any more, Winnie," said she, with a vigorous effort to be sternly authoritative. "It isn't right; and you know it isn't. The instructress of youth must exert her authority. We ought to be as grave as a couple of church owls.—What a funny small sailing-boat that is on the sea out yonder! A regular little tub! So flat and broad! She's the roundest boat I ever saw in my life. How she dances about like a walnut-shell on top of the water!"

"Oh, that's the Mud-Turtle!" Winifred cried eagerly, anxious to display her nautical knowledge to the full extent before Elsie, the town-bred governess. "She's a painter's yawl, you know. I've seen her often. She belongs to an artist, a marine artist, who comes this way every summer to sketch and paint mud-banks."

"She's coming in here now, I think," Elsie murmured, half aloud.—"O no; she's not; she's gone beyond it, towards the point at Walberswick."

"That's only to tack," Winifred answered, with conscious pride in her superior knowledge. "She's got to tack because of the wind, you know. She'll come up the creek as soon as she catches the breeze. She'll luff soon.—Look there, now; they're luffing her. Then in a minute they'll put her about a bit, and tack again for the creek's mouth.—There you are, you see; she's tacking, as I told you.—That's the artist, the shorter man in the sailor's jersey. He looks like a common A.B. when he's got up so in his seafaring clothes; but when you hear him speak, you can tell at once by his voice he's really a gentleman. I don't know who the second man is, though, the tall man in the tweed suit—he's not the one that generally comes—that's Mr. Potts. But, oh, isn't he handsome? I wonder if they're going to sail close alongside. I do hope they are. The water's awfully deep right in by the poplar here. If they turn up the creek, they'll run under the roots just below us.—They seem to be making signs to us now.—Why, Elsie, the man in the tweed suit's waving his hand to you!"

Elsie's face was crimson to look upon. As the instructress of youth, she felt herself distinctly discomposed. "It's my cousin," she cried, jumping up in a terror of excitement and waving back to him eagerly with her tiny handkerchief. "It's Hugh Massinger! How very delightful! He must have come down by sea with the painter."

"They're going to run in just close by the tree," Winifred exclaimed, quite excited also at the sudden apparition of the real live poet. "O, Elsie doesn't he just look poetical! A man with a face and eyes like that couldn't help writing poetry, even if he didn't want to. He must be a friend of Mr. Relf's I suppose. What a lovely, romantic, poetical way to come down from London—tossing about at sea in a glorious breeze on a wee bit of a tub like that funny little Mud Turtle!"

By this time, the yawl, with the breeze in her sails, had run rapidly before the wind for the mouth of the river, and was close upon them by the roots of the poplar. As it neared the tree, Hugh stood up on the deck, bronzed and ruddy with his three days' yachting, and called out cheerily in a loud voice: "Hillo, Elsie, this is something like a welcome! We arrive at the port, after a stormy passage on the high seas, and are met at its mouth by a deputation of the leading inhabitants. Shall we take you on board with your friend at once, and carry you up the rest of the way to Whitestrand?"

Elsie's heart came up into her mouth. She would have given the world to be able to cry out cordially: "O Hugh, that'd be just lovely;" but propriety and a sense of the duties of her position compelled her instead to answer in a set voice: "Well, thank you; it's ever so kind of you, Hugh; but we're here in our own grounds, you know already.—This is Miss Meysey, Winnifred Meysey; Winnie, this is my cousin Hugh, dear. Now you know one another.—Hugh, I'm so awfully glad to see you!"

Warren Relf turned the bow toward the tree, and ran the yawl close alongside till her tiny taffrail almost touched the roots of the big poplar. "That's better," he said.—"Now, Massinger, introduce me. You do it like a Lord Chamberlain, I know."

"You won't come up with us, then, Miss Challoner?" asked Hugh. Elsie bent her head. "We mustn't," she said candidly, "though I own I should like it. It's so very long since I've seen you, Hugh. Where are you going to stop in the village? You must come up this very afternoon to see me."

Hugh bowed a bow of profound acquiescence. "If you say so," he answered with less languor than his wont, "your will is law. We shall certainly come up.—I suppose I may bring my old friend with me—the owner and skipper of this magnificent and luxurious vessel?—We've had the most delightful passage down, Elsie. I never in my life felt anything like it. The blood of the old Sea-kings comes up in my veins, and I've been rhyming "viking" and "liking," and "striking" and "diking" ever since we got well clear of the London Bridge, till this present moment.—I shall write a volume of Sonnets of the Sea, and dedicate them duly to you—and Miss Meysey."

As for Winifred, with a red rose spreading over all her face, she said nothing; but twirling her hat still in her hand, she gazed and gazed open-eyed, and almost open-mouthed—except that an open mouth is so very unbecoming—upon the wonderful stranger with the big dark eyes, who had thus dropped down from the clouds upon the manor of Whitestrand.

"I'll put her in nearer," Warren Relf said quietly, after a few minutes, glancing with mute admiration at Elsie's beautiful face and slim figure.—We'll lie by here for half an hour, Hugh, and if you prefer it, I'll put you ashore, and you can walk up through the grounds of the Hall, while I navigate the ship to the Fisherman's Rest, up yonder at Whitestrand."

As he spoke, he put over the boom for a moment, to lay her in nearer to the roots of the tree. It was an unlucky movement. Winnifred was sitting close to the water edge with her hat in her hand, dangling over the side. The boom, flapping suddenly in the wind with an unexpected twirl, struck her wrist a smart blow, and made her drop the hat with a cry of pain into the river. Tide was on the ebb; and almost before they had time to see what had happened, the hat had floated on the swift stream far out of reach, and was careering hastily in circling eddies on its way seaward.

Hugh Massinger was too good an actor, and too good a swimmer into the bargain, to let slip such a splendid opportunity for a bit of cheap and effective theatrical display. The eyes of Europe and of Elsie were upon him—not to mention the unknown young lady, who, for aught he knew to the contrary, might perhaps turn out to be a veritable heiress to the manor of Whitestrand. In a second he had taken off his coat and boots—sprung lightly to the further deck of the Mud-Turtle, and taken a header in his knickerbockers and stockings and flannel shirt into the muddy water. In nothing does a handsome man look handsomer than in knickerbockers and flannels. The tide was setting strong in a fierce stream round the corner of the tree, and a few stout strokes, made all the stouter by the consciousness of an admiring trio of spectators, brought the eager swimmer fairly abreast of the truant hat inmid-current. He grasped it hastily in his outstretched hand, waved it with a flourish high above his head, and gave it a twist or two of playful triumph, all wet and dripping, in his graceful fingers, before he turned. An act of daring is nothing if not gracefully or masterfully performed. And then he wheeled round to swim back to the yawl again.

In that, however, he had reckoned clearly without his host. The water proved, in fact, a most inhospitable entertainer. Hand over hand, he battled hard against the rapid current, tying the recovered hat loosely around his neck by its ribbon strings, and striking out vigorously with his cramped and trammelled legs in the vain effort to stem and breast the rushing water. After thirty or forty strokes, he looked in front of him casually, and saw, to his surprise, not to say discomfiture, that he was farther away from the yawl than ever. This was distressing—this was even ignominious; to any other man than Hugh Massinger, it would indeed have been actually alarming. He only thought to himself how ridiculous and futile he must needs look to that pair of womankind in having attempted with so light a heart a feat that was utterly beyond his utmost powers.

Vanity is a mighty ruler of men. If Hugh Massinger had stopped there till he died, he would never have called aloud for help. Better peace with honour, on the damp bed of a muddy stream, than the shame and sin of confessing one's self openly beaten in fair fight by a mere insignificant tidal river. It was Elsie who first recognised the straits he was in—for though love is blind, yet love is sharp-eyed—and cried out to Warren Relf in an agony of fear: "He can't get back! The stream's too much for him!—Quick! quick! You've not a moment to lose! Put about the boat at once and save him!"

With a hasty glance, Relf saw she was right, and that Hugh was unable to battle successfully with the rapid current. He turned the yawl's head with all speed outward, and took a quick tack to get behind the baffled swimmer and intercept him, if possible, on his way toward the sea, whither he was now so quickly and helplessly drifting.

The War Scare in England.

Quite a storm has been raised in England by some criticisms made by Lord Wolseley, and echoed by the Duke of Cambridge, on the state of the army and navy and the defences of the empire. According to certain critics the services have been in a bad way for years, but it was hardly to be expected that authorities so high in office would voice what others have only dared to write. The result of the course taken by the Commander-in-Chief and the assistant General has been that Lord Salisbury from his place in the House of Lords has severely condemned the action of Lord Wolseley in particular, and the latter, while maintaining that his criticisms were just, has declared that he did not mean to attack the administration. Anyway it is a sign of the times where the commanders of the army openly rebel against the policy of the government. To say the least of it, it is a bad example to set the soldiers, who may also be tempted to address public meetings and reveal their grievances, of which they undoubtedly have a stock.

The incident created quite a stir, in fact, almost a panic. Reading the cablegrams one would almost think some powerful nation was standing by and at any moment might gobble the sea-girt isle with the ease that an ordinary individual would devour a penny roll. Things, however, are not quite so bad as that. The most noteworthy feature of the interesting little quarrel is that Lord Charles Beresford, who resigned his position as a lord of the Admiralty because the navy was seemingly no more than a paper creation, now says that in the two years and a half since he retired much has been done towards improvement. Perhaps the same beneficial effect would follow the resignation of Lord Wolseley, but, as a truce has apparently been reached, that is not likely to happen.

In view of the fact that the War Office spends about £20 000,000 annually, there must be, unless enormous misappropriation and waste prevail throughout, some pretty tangible results achieved somewhere. Lord Salisbury's guarded observation that there had been a considerable increase in preparations within recent years, means, no doubt, a good deal. Meanwhile all this excitement is producing its effect at home and abroad. The Duke of Cambridge denies that the country is in imminent danger, though even the modified form of his denial is adapted to intensify rather than allay the public disquiet. When it is announced that modern 30 guns are being mounted at Sheerness, that other measures of defence are being adopted on the Thames, that the first and second army corps are to be placed on a war footing, magazine rifles issued to all the regular troops, etc., it is no wonder that the people begin to ask what it all means. Nor is the news from abroad reassuring. The Prussian military leaders are said to be counting confidently on a summer campaign, and the din of warlike preparations still resounds in Austria and in Russia. It seems incredible, however, that the Government, or any one but a military officer, can suppose England to be in any such danger of invasion, as would seem to be foreshadowed by great activity in strengthening coast and river armaments. Either the Island must be suffering from one of its unaccountable but periodical panics, or the real danger must be threatening some quarter other than that indicated. Gen. Boulanger is yet far from having reached the head, either of the French Government or the French War Office, and, even if he were in either place, the menace to English homes could not be very terrible. It is not easy to conceive of any other Power as likely to carry the war into the Thames.

A Russian Railway Station.

The following description of a railway station in the Ural Mountains is taken from George Kennan's illustrated account of his trip across the Russian frontier, in the May Century. It will be read with surprise and peculiar interest by many in America, the railway country: "We were greatly surprised to find in this wild mining region of the Ural, and on the very remotest frontier of European Russia, a railroad so well built, perfectly equipped, and luxuriously appointed, as the road over which we were traveling from Perm to Ekaterineburg. The stations were the very best we had seen in Russia; the roadbed was solid and well ballasted; the rolling stock would not have suffered in comparison with that of the best lines in the empire; and the whole railroad property seemed to be in the most perfect possible order. Unusual attention evidently had been paid to the ornamentation of the grounds lying adjacent to the stations and the track. Even the verst-posts were set in neatly fitted mosaics three or four feet in diameter of colored Ural stones. The station of Nizhni Tagil, on the Asiatic slope of the mountains, where we stopped half an hour for dinner, would have been in the highest degree creditable to the best railroad in the United States. The substantial station building, which was a hundred feet or more in length, with a covered platform twenty feet wide extending along the whole front, was tastefully painted in shades of brown and had a red sheet-iron roof. It stood in the middle of a large, artistically planned park or garden, whose smooth, velvety greensward was broken by beds of blossoming flowers and shaded by feathery foliage of graceful white-stemmed birches; whose winding walks were bordered by neatly trimmed hedges; and whose air was filled with the perfume of roses and the murmuring plash of falling water from the slender jet of a sparkling fountain. The dining-room of the station had a floor of polished oak inlaid in geometrical patterns, a high dado of dark carved wood, walls covered with oak-grain paper, and a stucco cornice in relief. Down the center of the room ran a long dining table, beautifully set with tasteful china, snowy napkins, high glas epergnes, and crystal candelabra, and ornamented with potted plants, little cedar-trees in green tubs, bouquets of outflowers, artistic pyramids of polished wine-bottles, druggists' jars of colored water, and an aquarium full of fish, plants, and rockwork. The chairs around the table were of a dark hard wood elaborately turned and carved; at one end of the room was a costly clock as large as an American jeweler's "regulator," and at the other end stood a huge bronzed oven by which the apartment was warmed in winter. The waiters were all in evening dress, with low-cut waistcoats, spotless shirt-fronts, and white ties; and the cooks, who filled the waiter's orders as in an English grill-room, were dressed from head to foot in white linen and wore square white caps. It is not an exaggeration to say that this was one of the neatest, most tastefully furnished, and most attractive public dining rooms that I ever entered in any part of the world; and as I sat there eating a well-cooked and well-served dinner of four courses, I found it utterly impossible to realize that I was in the unheard-of mining settlement of Nizhni Tagil, on the Asiatic side of the mountains of the Ural. This, however, was our last glimpse of civilized luxury for many long, weary months, and after that day we did not see a railway station for almost a year."

Col. Ingersoll's Logic Assailed

In the current number of the North American Review Mr. Gladstone replies to the heterodox assertions of the distinguished American infidel, Col. Robert Ingersoll. Mr. Gladstone takes the ground that the Darwinian theory of evolution, so far from invalidating the truth of revelation as given in the Scriptures, is entirely in harmony with it. He, moreover, defends the ethics of the Old Testament and the actions and teaching of the early prophets. He assails the logic of Col. Ingersoll, and claims that it is not a sufficient objection to the truths of spiritual phenomena we cannot put to the test of individual experience to say "I do not know." The whole subject is treated by the ex-Premier of England in a suggestive and most reverential manner.

A BIRD OF GOOD AND EVIL OMEN.

Legends of the Crow in all Lands.

"Thou hast ravens' knowledge—Tha Fios Fithichayad," is said in the Highlands to a child who is wise beyond his years; and all over the world we find the same supernatural wisdom attributed to ravens and crows. Not only so, but the raven is in many mythologies closely connected with the gods. Thus among the Greeks he was the messenger of Apollo, even as in early Christian legend we find him the messenger of St Oswald.

But the god who must ever be most intimately associated with the raven is the Norse Odin, who in the earliest legends is wont to take the form of a raven at will. Afterwards, when his worship became purer, he had still two attendant ravens, "Mind" and "Memory," who told him all things. The old Scandinavians had the raven emblazoned on their standard, and Asser, in his Life of Alfred the Great, tells how in a victory gained by that King over the Danes he took the raven banner; "for they say the three sisters of Hindwai and Hubba wove that flag, and got it ready in one day," and that in "every battle whenever that flag went before them, if they were to gain the victory, a live crow would appear flying in the middle of the flag," but if they were to be defeated it hung motionless.

Mr. Andrew Lang, in his recent work on "Myth, Ritual, and Religion," when giving his theory as to the legends of the gods of savage races and their doings, says that probably many of these tales were told in answer to the questions men began to ask as they emerged from the lowest state of savagery. Amongst these great first questions as to the beginning of things which were asked all the world over is what seems to us the almost childish one—"Why is the crow black?" That this question as to the colour of crows was asked we find proof in the tales of many widely scattered races.

Apollo's raven was white until one day the god sent him to bring water for a sacrifice. On his way he found a fig tree with fruit almost ripe, and waited for its ripening. To excuse his delay he took the water snake from the fountain, put it in his pitcher and told Apollo that it had daily drank the waters dry. The god, not to be imposed upon by this tale, punished the raven by turning him black, and condemned him to be plagued with thirst as often as the season of his fault came round, and to give token of his punishment by his hoarse croaking.

The crow became proverbial for procrastination among the Greeks, on account of this fatal delay. St. Athanasius, however, gives as the reason for this character being attributed to him, his cry of "cras," the Latin for "to-morrow."

Among the Bushmen, the race lowest in the scale of humanity in Africa, there is a legend which accounts for the white patches on the breasts of their crows. Some men having tarried long at their hunting, their wives sent out crows to seek for them. Here again we find the crows playing the part of messengers. Round the neck of each bird they tied a piece of fat to serve as food on its journey, and ever since the crows have borne the marks left by this fat on their breasts.

Among the Hottentots, also, we find the belief that the crows were once white, for they tell how in old days the lion had the power of flight—a power which depended on the bones of his prey remaining unbroken. When he went a-hunting, he gave the charge of his bone heap to two white crows. The legend then goes on to tell how the bones were at last broken, and the lion was deprived of his wings by "the Great Frog."

The Australian blacks have a story in which the crow figures as a sort of supernatural being, though here there is no mention of his colour. The Pleiades, they say, were once a Queen and her six maidens. The crow fell in love with the Queen, but she refused to marry him. He changed himself into a grub, and hid in the bark of a tree. The Queen and her maidens went hunting for edible grubs, as the gins, or black women, do to-day. They found the grub-crow and the maidens first tried to pick him out, but he broke the point of all their wooden hooks. Then came the Queen with her bone hook, and succeeded where her maidens had failed; but no sooner was the crafty crow drawn out than he changed himself into a giant, and rann away with the Queen. Ever since there have been but six Pleiades.

It is not necessary to go to the Antipodes, however, to find man in the guise of the crow. In several of the West Highland tales collected by the late Mr. Campbell of Islay, the enchanted prince is spellbound in the shape of a raven or a hoodie. In one story the heiroine marries the hoodie, woh after many marvellous adventures, eventually regains his human form.

Whenever the crow figures in these Highland tales it is as the friend of man. In the story of "The Battle of the Birds," the hare assists a raven to kill a snake, and it shows its gratitude by helping him afterwards in various encounters with giant and other foes. Similarly, in a Russian folk-tale Ivan Popyaloff and a raven together slay a twelve headed snake.

In Hindoo myth the crow personifies the souls of the dead, and when from the far East to the far West we go, we find the tulinkeets of Mexico reverencing an aged raven as the incarnation of the soul of one of their "shamans" or magicians. Similarly, too, we find in the "Clouds" of Aristophanes the phrase, "to go to the crows," meaning simply to die.

There is a very widespread tradition of a mortal war waged between the crows and the owls. Aristotle, in his "History of Animals," tells that the crow destroys the owl's eggs in the day, the owl those of the crow during the night. In the great Indian poem, the "Mahabharata," the owl kills the crows by night when they are asleep, and this war of the crows and owls is well known in Hindoo popular tradition. In Russian fable the owl accuses the crow to the eagle of stealing the eggs of geese and swans; and the Italians use the expression, "The owl among the crows," much as we say, "A bull in a china shop." John Tzetza has a fable in which the crow plays the part of Æsop's "Jackdaw in borrowed plumes." He is just about to be elected king of the birds, when the owl recognises one of his own feathers and exposes the impostor. The part which the crow plays in Æsop is too well known to require mention here, but there are many less-known tales about him, to which space will not allow us to refer. Those who have studied the raven in his haunts, by mountain or by rocky shore, will not wonder at the attribution to him by primitive people of more than human wisdom.

In Scotland, when they hear his hoarse "c-r-r-k c-r-k" sounding over some misty moorland or lonely valley among the hills, comes not the thought of Odin or of Apollo, of spell-bound prince or hoary wizard, but rather a memory of the grim and ghastly rejoicings of the corbies over the slain knight, deserted and forgotten by hawk and hound and lady fair.

Yet, bird of ill omen as he is, we would not willingly see him no more in his ancient haunts. Hated both by shepherd and gamekeeper, he is slowly but surely disappearing; and we could almost wish a wider credence to the Cornish superstition which sees and reverences in the raven, Arthur, "the blameless king," who will yet some day return to the land he loved and ruled so faithfully and well.

Unimaginable Gulfs of Space.

The great Lick telescope, although not yet in full working order, has demonstrated its superior power by its clear presentation of objects located in the solar system, and its discoveries in the indefinitely more remote stellar universe. Its last performance is said to be the discovery of suns, infinitely remote, in that great gulf of the sky which, because it has proved to be so empty to all other telescopes, has been called, derisively, "the hole in the sky." Mr. Boutwell once wanted to see Andrew Johnson shot out through that "hole in the sky"—never dreaming the alleged hole was occupied by a universe of suns, many of which, very likely, are bigger than ours, and all of which probably have their own systems of attendant planets. Suns so remote that their light, flashing through the star-depths at the rate of 187,000,000 miles per second, takes a thousand years to reach our world, may well have remained hitherto unseen, buried in fathomless space. It takes a fraction over eight minutes for the sun's light to reach the earth, but the sun is only 92,000,000 miles distant. It it is useless for the mind to try to grasp, in a "realizing sense," even such distances as ninety-two millions of miles. As to the shoreless depths of outer space, peopled as it may be to all infinity with circling suns and systems, nothing less than eternity for all mental development would serve to qualify human minds even approximately to grasp the mighty reality.—[Hartford Times.

A Ship That Will Not Sink.

"One condition laid down in the contract by the company was that the new liner should be unsinkable." This is a brave guarantee on the part of the builders of a great ocean steamer, even in this extremely scientific age. The ship thus warranted is the City of New York, a new ocean boat of the huge capacity of 10,500 tons built by Messrs. Thomson, Clydebank, Glasgow, to the order of the Inman company.

A Woman's Charms

soon leave her, when she becomes a victim to any one of the various disorders and peculiar "weaknesses" that are peculiar to the fair sex. The condition of tens of thousands of women to-day is pitiable in the extreme; they are weak, bloodless creatures, a prey to mental anguish and bodily pain; in a word, "broken-down," from any one of numerous causes. To this unhappy multitude we strongly urge the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, an infallible, world famed remedy, for all "female" irregularities and "weaknesses," and which restores the worst sufferer to vigorous health, and reinvests her with all the charms of figure, face and complexion, that receive such willing homage from man.

FARM.

MULTIPLYING POTATOES.

A writer in the London Garden gives an account of the method he adopted to increase a high-priced potato. The variety was a kind known as the Pride of America, of which he gave something like a dollar for two tubers, one of them large and sound, and the other small and diseased. Early in March they were laid in a pan, covered with fine soil, and set on a warm staging in his peach-house. They soon sprouted, and when the sprouts were three inches long, they were carefully pulled off, and the tubers returned to the soil. The sprouts were potted off singly, in good loamy soil, previously warmed, 3½ inch pots being used. They were set on the front staging and watered. They soon became well established, and were transplanted. The tubers gave a second and larger crop of sprouts than before, and these were treated like the first. A third, but smaller, crop of shoots was obtained. All the plants formed a row in the garden 51 feet long, on a deeply dug, thoroughly pulverized ground, 8 inches apart. Inverted flower pots protects them from any threatened frost, and evergreen branches were used for the same purpose later on. Two bushels were obtained from one pound of seed. The above is substantially the process given in the Garden, greatly reduced and condensed; and it may afford useful suggestions to those not familiar with the process adopted by gardeners for rapidly increasing rare and costly sorts.

HOW TO PLANT TREES.

On receipt from the nursery, the trees should be carefully heeled-in. If they are to remain several days, the trees should be shaded. If they are very dry, tops and all should go into the trench, and the covering be made quite damp. The holes should be dug four feet in diameter, and deep enough to admit the planting of the trees a little deeper than it stood in the nursery. The filling of well pulverized soil having a liberal amount of ground bone and ashes well worked into it is placed beside the hole. Carefully examine each tree for borers, cut back one half of last year's growth, remove all broken limbs with a sharp knife, and coat with shellac all cuts and chafted places. All broken roots should be cut smoothly with an upward slant, and after all the roots have been dipped in thin mud, the tree is placed in the hole. Spread the roots carefully, drive a stake beside the tree, and fill in the soil, working it thoroughly under and among the roots with the hand. Give two or three sound treadings during the process of filling, which should reach the height of the nursery setting, and fill the rest of the hole with a mulch of coarse hay and straw. Place a piece of woolen cloth between the tree and stake, to prevent chafing; tie firmly, and the following day give the tree a thorough watering.

ABOUT INCUBATORS.

Few people realize the importance of letting the incubator alone after the eggs begin to pip. Having tried many means of supplying moisture in the egg drawer, we are satisfied that spraying with a florist's bulb, having an exceedingly fine rose, is the best. The eggs should not be turned after the 19th day (never fear of their pipping on the under side).

If the chicken is strong enough to come out, this is of little consequence, he is bound to come. At the last turning of the eggs, they should be sprayed thoroughly with water at least 110° or even 115° would not injure them. The drawer should be closed immediately, and left so for 24 hours at least. In hot water machines 36 hours is even better.

We have recently seen a hatch of 169 chicks from 188 fertile eggs. They were left in the drawer for 35 hours, and the only means of ventilation is 1½ inch pipe in the front of the machine, which goes to prove that bottom ventilation from a series of pipes is a prolific cause of unsatisfactory hatching.

BUCKWHEAT FOR TREE PROTECTION.

Two years ago a central Dakota farmer planted five acres of box elder and cotton wood trees one year old, having previously prepared the lamp. He then sowed buckwheat quite thick, which grew luxuriantly, and being left uncut, served as an excellent mulch, protecting from the hot sun of July and August, the cold winter and alternate freezing and thawing of early spring. The land was well seeded from the first crop, and another heavy crop was allowed to grow last year, and left on the ground as before. The trees have stood both winters well, and the percentage of loss is very small. The buckwheat straw subdued the weeds, and saved the labor of repeated cultivation.—North Dakota Farmer.

DEEP SOWING FOR PEAS.

Many garden crops are retarded or injured by deep sowing, but peas are not among the number. With more space and greater depth they would grow better and give finer crops, especially in seasons of drouth. A successful cultivator says that he gives each plant six inches space in the lines; and instead of covering them only two inches deep, as is the common practice, he finds at least twice this depth much better, and obtains larger crops. As the common practice is to plant peas as one of the earliest crops, and the time in many places is at hand, it is well to remind gardeners that they will obtain an item of valuable knowledge by trying both ways side by side.

FACTS ABOUT SEEDING GRASS.

In an acre there are 8,128 640 square inches. There are in a bushel of clear seed, of

Timothy	40 000,000	seeds
Orchard grass	7,000,000	"
Kentucky Blue	45,000,000	"
Red Top	70 000,000	"
Meadow Fescue	25 000 000	"
Red Clover	16,000,000	"
White Clover	25,000,000	"

DON'T COVER TOO DEEPLY.

Many who plant fine seeds have no conception of their requirements. A lady purchased some pansy seed the other day, and asked me how deep she should sow it—"four or five inches?" I told her if she wanted it to come up not to cover it more than a sixteenth of an inch. Many people fail just this way and then blame the seedsman.

NOTES.

Good plowing is the foundation of good crops.

Things to be avoided: Scrub stock, scrub crops, and scrub families.

Sulphur dusted over the seed pieces after they are deposited into the furrows is said to prevent scab.

The damage done to fruit trees by rabbits, borers and insects, may be prevented by applying pine tar to the bodies of the trees. Warm the tar and apply with a brush.

Frequent and thorough cultivation is generally fully as effective in protecting vegetable plants against injury from drought, as the best mulch most carefully applied.

Toads are the policemen of the garden. They speedily transport insect depredators to a place where they will do no more harm. And this interior jail is quite capacious.

Sprinkling garden vegetables or vegetable plants is of no account. If you want to water them, give the ground a thorough soaking—afterwards mulch or keep well cultivated.

Farming is too complex an art for a man to learn it all in an average lifetime and by his own experience alone. There are both wisdom and profit in utilizing the experience of others.

When we put our plows away last fall every one of them got a coating of grease. Now they are as bright as need be. Not much sympathy for the farmer with the rusty plows.

Plant potatoes deep enough so you can use the harrow at the time that the young plants are just coming up, and then use it thoroughly, pulverizing the soil finely and killing every weed.

If you have a shady spot in the garden, plant it with lettuce, cabbage, cauliflower or any crop used for salads or greens. The warmest and sunniest location is needed for melons, tomatoes, sweet potatoes, peanuts etc.

No farmer can afford to continue raising scrub stock. Between twenty years of farming with scrub stock, and twenty years of farming with improved stock, there will be a difference in profits equal to the price of a fine farm.

The carcass of every animal that dies of disease should be buried. Only by this process can the virus and germs be annihilated and the spread of the disease be prevented. This is especially true of animals dying of diseases known to be contagious.

Set sweet potato plants after the soil has become thoroughly warm. The ground need not be rich, but should be fertilized in the hill or drill, either by well-decomposed barnyard manure, or (what is generally preferable in our soils) by a good special potato fertilizer.

We would rather have one pan of milk with quarter inch cream, than four pans with one sixteenth-inch cream. By the same token, twenty acres of land, with a rich, deep soil, may be more desirable than a thin skinned tract of one hundred and sixty acres.

An oblong form is better than a square one for the home garden. Seeds sown or planted in rows instead of little beds simplifies the whole matter, and admits of the use of the plow and cultivator instead of the spade, the hoe and the rake, and makes its cultivation a pleasure instead of a dreaded task.

To get the cream quickly from milk: As soon as it is drawn from the cow reduce its temperature to about 45° and keep it there, and in 4 or 5 hours all the cream will rise. The cream will be perfectly sweet, and the skim milk will be of a very superior quality. If the cream is to be made into butter, it should be kept at a temperature of about 65°, and churned at a temperature of from 55° to 60°.

Pumpkins planted among corn should not be planted at the same time with the corn, but when the corn is about four inches high. Take an old shovel or fork handle, point the end of it, make a hole with this, drop in your pumpkin seed, and close in the hole with your foot. By this method you can get your pumpkins just where you want them, as thick as you want them, and being later than the corn, the vines are not in the way of the cultivator.

In pruning apple orchards, many farmers insist on cutting out the leading centre branch to let the sun shine into the tree. This is a serious mistake. So is the cutting off of any large branches. It is a stabbing and wounding of the tree that gives it a rotten heart makes it weak to resist the wind, and leads to premature death. Cut out the sap shoots, trim off small branches, and encourage a pyramidal growth, is the one correct plan. And early spring is the right time.

The School of the Soldier.

Though it is impossible to make the young soldier, say of two or three years' service, physically old: though we cannot give him the hardened muscles and the steady nerves which he will have some six or seven years later, we can to a certain extent make him a veteran by giving him perpetual practice in peace of the work which he will have to do in war. No doubt, as I well know by my own unpleasant experiences in the Franco-German war, the actual whistling of bullets, the crashing of shells, and the sight of friends killed and wounded, have an effect which cannot be simulated in peace; but it is certainly possible to give the young soldier such instruction that all the phases of the action will be familiar to him, and that he will instinctively know the right course to pursue under different circumstances. So long as fighting was conducted in stiff lines or heavy columns, the regular drill, which still goes on in the barrack yard, was undoubtedly a very valuable training for war; but the case is altered now, and we are handicapping ourselves if we do not give to the young soldier constant instruction in all those fighting exercises which have taken the place of the starched movements formerly in vogue. If the chief portion of his time is spent in the ordinary drills, whereas on the field of battle those drills will absolutely disappear, we are not training the man for war, but, on the contrary, training him for samething different, so that when he finds himself in the presence of an enemy everything will be comparatively new to him. To the effect on the nerves produced by the bullets and the sight of wounds and death we deliberately add the confusion which arises from his having to perform movements to which he is unaccustomed, or at least little accustomed; and by such training we are deliberately unfitting him to be steady on the field of action. It is said with justice that the best training for the soldier and that which soonest changes him into a veteran is the actual practice of war. We should therefore endeavor to make our peace training as like that of war as possible. By this means we shall soonest ingraft the qualities of old soldiers upon those of young ones, and shall have done all that in us lies to obtain the steadiness of the veteran in combination with the fire of youth. Another quality which may be impressed upon the young soldier with great advantage is that strong esprit de corps which gives much of their tone to soldiers, old or young.

A Hard Diamond.

At a recent meeting of the New York Academy of Sciences a remarkable diamond was exhibited. It is a compound or multiple crystal, containing a large number of twinings, and belongs to the class termed "extreme durate" by the French. It had been cut into the general shape of a brilliant, and then placed on the polishing wheel, where it was kept for 100 days, the wheel revolving at the rate of 2,800 revolutions a minute. The diamond was fixed upon the rotating surface at a distance of about fifteen inches from the centre. Based on these figures, a calculation showed that the surface passed over by the diamond amounted to 75,000 miles. The ordinary weight placed on a diamond while on the wheel is from two and a quarter to two and one-half pounds. This was increased until finally forty pounds were used. The wheel was badly damaged, the diamond ploughing into it and throwing scintillations in all directions. Even under these conditions the diamond could not be given a commercial polish.

The Chicago Tribune recently published a summary of about 200 reports received by prominent grain shippers at representative points thoughout the principal corn and winter wheat States, showing surplus of wheat, corn and oats in store and in farmers' hands as compared with the same time last year, and acreage and condition of the wheat winter crop. The winter wheat reports shown for the entire section covered a surplus in store and in farmers' hands of 70 per cent., acreage 95 per cent. and condition 68 1-2 per cent. as compared with the same last year. The estimated shortage reported in Illinois and Indiana alone would amount to 43,000,000 bushels. The reports on corn for the entire section covered show amount in store and cribs at stations, as compared with last year, 48 per cent. and surplus in farmers' hands 60 per cent. Oats in store at stations 72 1-2 per cent. and surplus in farmers' hands 85 per cent.

A new helmet for firemen has been invented in Bremen. It consists principally of a copper mask, which is very light. The wearer's nose, mouth and eyes receive through an india rubber tube a constant stream of pure air, which leaves the helmet by an opening opposite the eyes and prevents the entrance of smoke. The helmet has been practically tested and is to be used by the Berlin firemen, it is said.

"If you do not give me a penny," said a young hopeful to his mamma, "I know a boy that has got the measles, and I'll go and catch them."

OLD WORLD NEWS.

Russia Still Active—The Kaiser Better.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph keeps hammering away at his story of an impending Russian descent upon Persia and a general Central Asian advance. The English Foreign Office officials persist in assurances that they know nothing of such an intention, and don't credit the report. The German papers, however, not only seem to believe it, but connect it with England's latest flurry over her defenses, pointing out meanwhile that this would be a good time for the English to accept the inevitable and adopt conscription.

Under the influence of bright Summer weather the poor Kaiser is gaining strength more rapidly now, and these about him begin to cherish a hope that he will be able to withstand the next recurring crisis in his throat malady, which will probably come in a week or so.

Senator Voorhees to Senator Ingalls.

The rude simplicity of Republican manners was strikingly illustrated during the scene which occurred in the United States Senate the other day. Senator Ingalls chose the occasion to make an attack on the Democrats and singled out Senator Voorhees for a special tirade of vituperation. The Kansas Senator declared that the President's election had been brought about by fraud, that the solid South was still in arms, and that the Democratic leaders were rebels and traitors. Mr. Cleveland, he said, had been counted into office by a partnership between footpads and sneak-thieves, between Dick Turpin and Uriah Heep. He accused Senator Voorhees of being disloyal and of being a Knight of the Golden Circle. In the middle of Senator Voorhees' reply Mr. Ingalls interrupted by enquiring blandly if the soldiers of Indiana had not threatened to hang him once on a time. An interchange of choice epithets then occurred, "dirty dog," "liar," "infamous scoundrel," being some of the terms applied. Senator Voorhees characterized the charges as "putrid, foul, despicable lies," and said he spurned them, spat upon them and kicked them from him. The situation was red-hot for a time, but the irate belligerents finally subsided and the Senate adjourned to talk over the matter. The Chicago Herald of the following day, in commenting on the occurrence, referred to Senator Ingalls as a "reptilian blatherskite representing the rottenest political society in the United States."

On the Beach.

I stood on the beach when the tide went out,
And the blue waves kissed my feet;
They coaxed and caressed like a babe on the breast
Of its mother, soft and sweet;
Then glided away, like a child at play,
On the smooth and pebbly sands,
And came fawning back o'er their silver track,
And beckoned with shining hands.

I stood on the beach when the tide came in,
And the waves were foaming white;
They lashed the shore with the awful roar
Of the tempest in its might.
They bubbled and boiled, and hissed and coiled,
Like things of venomous breath,
And dashed 'gainst the rocks their threatening shocks,
Defiance unto death.

And I said, as I stood alone on the beach,
Old ocean, I know you well;
Your smile is bright as an angel of light,
But your kiss is false as hell.
Woe shadows your path when you wake in wrath,
Death lurks in your breezes free,—
In your coral caves and sighing waves,
O lovely, treacherous sea!

Chinese as Liquor Drinkers.

There is hardly a single Chinaman among the Chinese denizens of this city who has ever fallen into the liquor habit, and a policeman who patrols the Chinese quarter says he never yet saw a drunken Chinaman. There are more Americans of both sexes who have taken up the Chinese opium habit than Chinamen who have been seized with the alcoholic mania of the Americans.—[New York Sun.

Electric rifles are the latest. Instead of the ordinary percussion firing device a dry chloride of silver battery and a primary coil will, so it was lately stated before the America Institute, fire the rifle 35,000 times without re-charging.

The late Legislature of New York passed a bill to change the method of capital punishment. It provides for executions by electricity. The method is to place a band about the head of the criminal, and, send a current of electricity through it sufficient to send him into eternity in an instant. The act is enlightened in other respects. The death sentence is to leave the exact date of the execution in the hands of the prison authorities. Perhaps the uncertainty as to when death is to come may produce in the mind of the prisoner a constant dread, however, which will be more torturing than a state of certainty, but a good effect will be attained in removing from the minds of the curious that morbid and unhealthy expectancy which makes public executions of today so demoralizing. The attendance on the execution is to be limited, and other precautions are to be taken to prevent, if possible, the tragic event from being described in extended and sensational accounts.

A THRILLING HOUSEHOLD TALE.

THE TAIL OF A TADPOLE.

Mr. John Brown came home one evening lately, and being very thirsty, poured out for himself a tankard of water in a glass which he thought was empty. Imagine his surprise and consternation when his son Tommy, aged eight, came running in, just as his draught was finished and shrieked: "Why, papa! you've swallowed my tadpole!"

"Whaaat!!" shouted the alarmed father. "You young idiot! run for the doctor!"

But the only medical man who could be got hold of at the moment was a Frenchman, visiting in the neighborhood. On the case being rather incoherently explained to him by the now thoroughly frightened family, he said:

"You most make heem svim."

"But my husband can't swim," replied poor Mrs. Brown, in tears."

"No, it is not ze man zat shall svim, it is ze leetle frog who shall svim, you know, qu'il faut que le poisson nage, so you fill him wiz ze water to his teeth, zen ze leetle frog he vill svim up to ze mout of Monsieur, and ven he see za light he vill shomp out, so."

And they gave him bucket after bucket of water till he become horribly sick, but no tadpole "shomped out."

By this time poor Brown was suffering agonies. The tadpole, or the large quantity of water, one or other, was causing him great pain, added to which he himself was in a state of mortal and indefinable terror. Just then the family physician made his appearance and tried to allay their fears, but all to no purpose, something practical must be done. Thinking a little stimulant would do his patient good after the drenching he had, he said:

"Now, I should recommend you, if you want that tadpole to jump, to give him a good dose of brandy, that will make him frisky and perhaps he will then, under the influence of liquor, make his sudden appearance, and relieve you all."

The plan was tried on a most wholesale scale, but instead of making the tadpole frisky, it only made Mr. Brown somewhat tipsy, in which state he became what the Scotch call "getin' fu'." In a maudlin way he bade his weeping wife an affecting farewell and insisted on being put to bed to die.

The doctor however, seeing that the poor man, as well as his family, was suffering agonies of mind about the unfortunate little polliwig, determined to take active measures, and bring matters to a satisfactory crisis by a little scheme of his own. He ordered Mr. Brown, who was now in bed, to be partially undressed, promising to return in an hour with his assistant, when he hoped to be able to relieve him permanently.

In the succeeding half hour the patient suffered all sorts of pains, real and imaginary, and was more than ever convinced of the activity of his unwelcome tenant.

The doctor, however, meanwhile, had offered half a dozen small boys a handsome price for the first tadpole they would bring him, and the fact being noised abroad his house soon resembled Pharoah's palace during one of the plagues of Egypt. It was filled with frogs and froglings of all sizes and ages, causing great consternation to the medical household.

But long ere this the doctor and his assistant had started off to finally cure their patient. The doctor carried a healthy pollywig in a small bottle, in his pocket, the assistant a powerful electric battery, in a valise. Turning every one out of the room, the conspirators quietly hid the battery under the bed, after adjusting it to its utmost power. The new pollywig was then carefully placed on the pillow near the despairing man's head, one battery wire was arranged under his chin and at a signal from the doctor, the other, with the full power of the battery, was suddenly applied to his stomach. With a horrid yell the poor wretch suddenly sprang up in bed, and the doctor and his assistant both shouted: "Hurrah! he is out at last!" The unsuspecting family, hearing the yell, rushed in to see the startled Mr. Brown sitting up in bed, the poor little tadpole lying beside him. He was soon made aware of the change in the state of affairs, and warmly thanked the doctor, as did all the family.

"He gave me an awful spasm as he got out though, but thank Heaven it is now all over."

Just at that moment however, the ever unfortunate Tommy came rushing into the room with a glass in his hand, saying: "Why, papa! here is my tadpole! You never swallowed it after all!"

If a bombshell had burst in the room the consternation could not have been more complete. The father, now cured, suspected some trick, he did not exactly know what, but seeing the doctor and his assistant convulsed with laughter, he angrily requested their immediate withdrawal from his house and they, nothing loath, were only too glad to escape into the open air. The story soon leaked out, and while the doctor was highly praised for his treatment, so much so that he was ever after called Dr. Tadpole, poor Mr. Brown had a hard time of it. He soon got so disgusted with being nick-named "old Polliwig" that he left the country, and returned permanently to town, where no one ever knew of the bad time he had when he swallowed the tadpole.

How Rain is Produced.

Did it ever occur to the reader that there is just as much water in the air above him on a clear, bright day as on a cloudy or rainy one? Rain does not come from somewhere else, or if it is wafted over you by the wind from somewhere, the water that is over you is simply wafted on to some other place. What is said above explains this. Water is absorbed in the air above us, at a certain temperature, and it becomes insensible. Cool that air by a cooler atmosphere, or by an electrical or chemical influence, and the moment the air becomes cooler it gives up some of the watery particles that were insensible or invisible at the higher temperature. These small particles thus given out unite, and, when enough of them coalesce, obstruct the light and show the clouds. When enough of them unite to be too heavy to float in the air, they begin to descend; pair after pair of them come together until a raindrop is formed. One of the minute raindrops is made up of millions of infinitely small watery particles. Air passing over the cold tops of mountains is cooled down so that it gives up a good deal of the concealed watery vapor, and hence little rain falls in the region along the lee side of such mountains. This is why little rain falls in Colorado and in other places north and south of the State. The prevailing winds blow to the west, and the cool tops of the Rocky Mountains lower their temperature and thus take out the moisture that would otherwise fall in rain.

Jealousy the Cause of Hostility.

The London Spectator (April 28) attributes the hostility of the military party in Germany to England to the desire of the German authorities to "square" Russia by allowing her to have her way in Eastern Europe in order that Germany may have a free hand against France. England cannot afford to let Russia have her way at Constantinople, and the Germans are afraid she will combine with Austria and Italy to explode the arrangement.

Celery Growing.

In her prize essay on celery, in Vick's Magazine, Mrs. C. H. Root, of Ripon, Wis., recommends the following method for preparing for and cultivating the crop:

1. Send where you will be sure and get good seed.

2. Prepare a seed-bed out of doors, in a sheltered situation. You will get your plants early enough by so doing, for they grow much faster and are stronger than when grown in a hot bed.

3. Sprinkle the bed often to keep it moist, and when the young plants are about three inches high transplant them into rows putting them about one foot apart.

4. When the plants have become stalky, have a trench about one foot deep, put into it equal parts of wood ashes and good, rich dressing and rich black soil, and work all together with a hoe.

2 Set plants about four or five inchess apart and be sure to straighten out the root and press the soil firmly around them.

6. Sprinkle the roots enough to keep them fresh till they are firm in their places, and then give them all the water you have a mind to; the more the better.

7. When you have grown enough to cause the leaves to lie over, hill up the stalk enough to hold them erect. Continue the hoeing process at intervals of two weeks, all summer; be careful to do it when the weather is dry, and in the afternoon when the dew is off. Be sure when hilling to hold the stalks together to prevent the soil from getting into the heart of the plant.

8. Such portions as you wish for early celery bank to the top by the 1st of September. For winter use bank the top from the first to the middle of October.

The letters are worked in light-coloured foliage planted amid others forming a dark background, and 650,000 trees have been used in the undertaking.

WEEKLY WEAVINGS.

PRESENTS.—Read Brush, the photographer's new ad.

THERE are 67 inmates in the Elgin House of Industry, the oldest being 91 years of age and the youngest 21 days.

THE present membership of the St. Thomas Methodist district is 2,785, an increase of 152 during the year now closing.

I AM lending money at present in large loans on good farm security at 5½ per cent.—A. MCCRIMMON, St. Thomas.

BASE BALL.—The Shedden and Iona base ball clubs will play a friendly match at Iona next Saturday. Humpidge and Knight will form the battery for Iona.

THE Thistles, highly elated with their success of last Thursday, have kindly consented to become pie for the Shamrocks on W. H. Vogt's polo grounds to-morrow evening. Game called at 6 o'clock.

THE Elgin farmers hold their annual picnic at Port Stanley to-morrow. The farmers will be addressed by several members of Parliament. Warden Turner will occupy the chair. Cheap fares.

J. H. LEBLONDE will give lessons on piano or organ, and in harmony and thorough bass; also lessons given in singing—Italian system of voice culture. Will give lessons in the country. Leave orders at Price's bookstore, Dutton.

BUILDING OPERATIONS IN RODNEY —J. Barnes has the frame-work of his block up. It is to be brick veneer, and will be done off for two stores. The upper flat will consist of offices.——Mr. Patterson has his brick block rising to the second storey.

IONA MILLS.—Mr. Britton, of Iona, has leased the mills to his son Wesley and W. D. Robertson, who will run the mills in partnership. They purpose buying wheat on a larger scale than has been done there heretofore. Custom sawing and grinding will receive prompt attention.

AN exchange tells of a subscriber to a paper who died and left fourteen years' subscription unpaid. The editor appeared at the grave when the lid was being screwed down for the last time, and put a linen duster, a thermometer, a palm leaf fan and a receipt for making artificial ice in the coffin.

EVERY editor publishes articles that some don't like. You see there are so many different persons and ideas it is difficult to please everybody. So we don't attempt it. Only a demagogue would. Of course, most readers believe they could do the job. No doubt, the average man can beat the editor at this business. Of course you can. The man doesn't live who can't beat an editor at running a paper. The editor is willing to acknowledge that you can. He only runs it because you have not time.

SCOTT ACT.—Inspector Beaton has one case of infraction of the Scott Act coming on this week.

THE West Lorne cheese factory have ordered an Acme engine through C. W. Allen, similar to the one used in this office.

SCOTT SUTTON was thrown out of his wagon by his horse being frightened at a passing train while on Shackleton street Friday afternoon. He was picked up by a passer by and brought to his home. Dr. McKillop attended to his injuries.

THE spring sittings of the county court open at the court house on June 12th. There are already five criminal cases on the docket: C. H. Whiting, rape; Martin O'Malley, larceny; Wm. Roy, larceny; T. C. Hewitt, et al, false pretences; and John Ninham, assault.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.—Rev. Mr. Learoyd in the Bridge street church, Belleville, after reading some half dozen notices said:—Brethren, I think I have read announcements enough. I shall be glad of the time when they will send announcements like these to the papers instead of the pulpit to waste time. that's what newspapers are for.

A boy threw his hat on the floor,
And was told he must do it no more;
But he did it again,
And his fond mother then
Used her slipper until he was sore.

The boy then looked up askance,
And his mother cast down a mad glance;
"Do you know now said she,
"Where your hat ought to be?"
"Yes," he answered, "inside of my pants."

DID you ever consider that our village is just what you make it? If you have poor officers you are to blame; if you have no factories, it is as much your fault as any one's; if your town doesn't grow it is ten chances to a dozen because some pessimistic dolt has started a growl and an army of chumps follow suit. Speak well of your town always, and if any prevaricating is to be done, do it so some good will be realized therefrom.

ARMY NOTES.—Lieut. Gardiner, of Watford, who is on a visit to his home in Morpeth, stopped over in Dutton Saturday, Sunday and Monday and assisted in Army work.——The Army had the largest parades on Sunday of any day since coming to Dutton. There were 22 soldiers in Sunday evening's march.——A number of horses were frightened by the march of the Army on Saturday evening. No damage was done.——Captain Hazlitt, assisted by the cadet, will hold special meetings every Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock for the children.

HE WENT FISHING.—While visiting at Union Monday, L. J. Willson, of the Dutton Woolen Mills, thought he would like to have a fish. A boat and lines were procured and his nephew kindly consented to row him about the large pond there. While Mr. Willson was standing in the boat and about to throw his line in for the first haul, and secretly thinking what sad havoc he was about to make among the finny and scaley tribe, he requested his nephew to row a little nearer to a certain spot. The boat moved and Mr. Willson involuntarily took a "header," and was for the time being "non est." "No; I didn't touch bottom, but I believe I went down ten feet," was his reply in answer to a question put to him on coming to the surface. Mr. Willson is a good swimmer and was soon in the boat again a wiser and a wetter man. It is hardly necessary to add that he caught no fish. There might not be as much fun but there is less danger in fishing in the Mennie Drain.

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

—County Council meets in St. Thomas next week.

—Rev. Mr. Grant returned with his family on Saturday.

—Mr. R. Manson, of Ayr, is spending a few days with friends in Dutton.

—Mr. and Mrs. Cape have been visiting relatives and friends in Chatham.

—J. E. Crane was home from Detroit over Sunday. He returned on Monday.

—The delivery of milk at the Iona cheese factory reached as high as 3000 pounds last week.

—Mr. H. Hollingshead and mother have been on a trip to Clinton and Seaforth, in Huron county.

—Mr. McCulloch, of the firm of Goldie & McCulloch, Galt, was visititing Mr. Hollingshead last week.

—The Home Circle can now boast of having the largest membership of any society in Dutton, it having 32 members.

—Rev. R. D. Hamilton will preach a special sermon for the children in the Methodist church next Sunday morning.

—Rev. R. D. Hamilton preached to the Tyrconnell Court I. O. F. in the Methodist church, Wallacetown, last Sunday evening.

—Mrs. Sutton fell at her door-step on Saturday morning injuring her hip. Dr. McKillop was called in and found no bones broken.

—We wish our readers to look over our advertisements carefully. There is more profit in them than is sometimes given credit for.

—The early closing movement takes effect to-day. Do your shopping early in the day and thus assist the merchants in this good movement.

—Blake Foster, who has been in this section for about two years, left for New York Tuesday morning where he will take the SS. Pennsylvania for his home in Bristol, Eng.

—James McDougall started on Monday for Kansas and the Western States, where he will likely spend the summer months. The store will be in charge of his nephew, John McDougall.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

The 69th anniversary of the birth of Queen Victoria passed off quietly in Dutton. The festive small boy amused himself with fire-crackers and other infernal contrivances, frightening horses and annoying peaceable citizens. In the morning a game of was played on the polo grounds between the Young Atlantics, of St. Thomas, and the Thistles of this place. The Atlantics were easily defeated—in fact, it looked very much as if they would be blanked, no run having been made until the seventh innings. By a few bad plays on the part of the home club the Atlantics scored seven runs in the last three innings. The Atlantics played at a disadvantage, having much smaller men than their opponents. The following is the score:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Thistles	2	6	2	1	1	0	0	1		—13
Atlantics	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	2	4	— 7

FOOTBALL.

In the afternoon the Wallacetown juniors played a return match with the Dutton juniors which resulted in a tie.

The members of the gun club enjoyed themselves by shooting at glass balls. The club expected to meet their opponents from the south but were disappointed.

AT THE LAKE.

A number of pleasure parties hied themselves to the lake and amused themselves with fishing and other amusements.

IN THE EVENING.

The ladies' aid of the Presbyterian church held a promenade concert and ice cream festival in the evening in Leitch's hall which was well attended. The receipts amounted to $27.

A SURE RELIEF.

I suffered from a hard cough contracted by damp feet. Having consulted a local doctor without effect I thought I would try Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam as a last resort. Before I had finished the first bottle my cough had entirely disappeared, and to-day I enjoy better health than ever before. I can conscientiously recommend it. Chas. H. Kent, telegraph operator, East Selkirk, Man.

OLD DR. CHASE'S NEW RECEIPT BOOK.

His Last and Crowning Life Work.

Dr. Chase's Third, last and Complete RECEIPT BOOK AND HOUSEHOLD PHYSICIAN, or the Book for the Million, contains nearly 900 pages and sells for $2.25 in cloth binding and $2.50 in imported oil cloth, marble edge, and is justly by him called

'The crowning work of my life.'

It is the result of over half a century's observation, study and experience. Yet this embodies no compilation of his former books. IT IS WHOLLY A NEW BOOK. If 30 years ago he could produce a book that has had a sale of over 150,000 copies, and has made his name familiar in nearly every English-speaking home in the United States, Canada and thousands of homes in Europe, Australia and South America, what kind of a book could or would he produce at his CROWNING LIFE WORK, with more than thirty years of additional practice and experience? The book itself answers the question, and is the most valuable production in the history of book publishing.

Caution! Unscrupulous and pirating publishers are attempting to copy this book by taking portions of it out and palming it off on the public as the complete work. We own the manuscript, purchased from Dr. Chase's heirs. See that you get the GENUINE book. See that it has our name on the title page and is copyrighted by us.

DR. WASHINGTON,

I think it my duty to let you know how my health is improving. When I commenced treatment with you I was very ill. I had severe catarrh of my head and throat. My lungs were pronounced to be far gone in consumption. I had a very bad cough, raised a good deal of blood and matter, had night sweats was greatly reduced in flesh, appetite very poor and could scarcely walk across the floor. My family doctor considered my case entirely hopeless. As a last resort I was lead to try your treatment for Catarrh and Consumption My improvement was noticeable from the first and now after nearly six months treatment, under the blessing of a kind Providence, my health is again restored

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

does sell." Prepared by

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Price $1; six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

Blenheim is to have a new English church.

Rev. L. Iler has resigned his charge at Palmyra.

Enrich the blood by the use of Milburn's Beef, Iron and Wine, which supplies the necessary blood building material.

James Thompson, an employee in Coates' mill, Blenheim, had the end of his thumb cut off by the stave knife last Thursday afternoon.

The iron for the new Graham road bridge, near Glencoe, which was damaged in the recent accident, has been returned from Hamilton repaired, and the truss work is again being erected.

THE DEAF HEAR.

After eight years suffering from deafness, so bad that I was unable to attend to my business, I was cured by the use of Hagyard's Yellow Oil. With gratitude I make this known for the benefit of others afflicted. Harry Ricardo, Toronto.

A young man in Thamesville crawled under a house with a rifle to shoot a cat. He succeeded, but the ball went through the floor as well and into the leg of Mrs. Wm. Frogget, who was sitting in the kitchen above.

John Scott, an old resident of Tilsonburg, dropped dead in his house there Wednesday evening. He was very wealthy, and a few years ago gave $3,000 in aid of the new Presbyterian church in that town. Sometime previous to his death he had an elaborate monument constructed and placed in the graveyard to mark his grave.

Occasional doses of a good cathartic like Burdock Pills are necessary to keep the blood pure and the body healthy.

A waterspout fell in the northwestern part of Dawes county, Nebraska, Saturday night of last week, burying five miles of the Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley track and carrying away a large number of cattle. The bridges across the White and Lone Tree rivers were carried away and all telegraph communication cut off.

Mr. R. Miller, solicitor for George Howard, father of John F. Howard, the lad so severely injured by falling brick at the house moving accident on William street, St. Thomas, on April 14, has issued a writ against the city in an action claiming $5,000 damages for injuries received by the lad. It is claimed that his mind has been permanently affected by the injuries sustained.

BE ON YOUR GUARD

Against sudden colds, irritating coughs and soreness of the throat. Keep Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam at hand for these prevalent troubles of winter and spring. It is the best safeguard.

About ten o'clock Friday morning the bedding in a room in the general store of Mr. James Haight, Union, took fire and was extinguished after damage to the extent of about $100 had been occasioned. The bedding, dresses and other contents of the room were destroyed. Mr. Haight was badly burned about the face, head and hands in fighting the fire. The window of the bedroom being open, it is supposed the fire caught from a spark which blew in from the chimney.

A unique agreement beaween an Oxford farmer and his wife has just come to light during a private examination at the London court house. The farmer wanted to execute a mortgage to the Huron and Erie Society. His wife at first refused to be a party to the bargain, but finally compromised on the husband signing an agreement that in case he got drunk or absented himself from home twenty-four hours at a stretch while the mortgage was in force the farm was to become the sole property of the wife.

Eggs at Two Cents a Dozen.

Before I hit on the plan of paying our little boy and girl two cents for every dozen of eggs they bring into the house what a wearing, drumming time I had of it to get our hens properly fed and provided with nest and dust boxes! I always save the table scraps and a kettle of skimmed milk for them, thickening the mess with meal or shorts, and have it hot on the stove each morning, ready for the men folks or children to carry to the hens early in the forenoon; but the men folks would be sure to forget it, and the children would be often off to their play or school before I would remember to have them feed the biddies; and there that kettle would stand and stew and scorch, cluttering my stove half the forenoon, and then grow chill cold when carried away from it, the hens often getting their breakfast just as they were flying upon the roost at the early bedtime. And after school, every day of the week, I must remember to tell the children to hunt the eggs, and not having a bit of interest in the matter, they sometimes forgot, and sometimes half of the nests were not looked after, and it was all up-hill work for me, this having the care of the hens, which were in a building so far from the house I could not tend them myself.

But paying the children for their work has changed all this. Without any telling or reminding, the kettle of scalded milk and meal is promptly lifted on their little wagon as soon as I have it ready after breakfast, and is hauled to the hen-house. I am besieged for boiled potatoes and meat scraps and extra pans of milk, and the hens lay as they have never laid before on these premises. Boxes for grain, lime, ashes, burnt bones, and pounded crockery, they have added to the institution and keep replenished, and one of the cattle troughs they have wheedled of their father for the hens' daily allowance of skimmed milk. I have not seen a frozen egg all winter, but every night I have seen two little round rosy faces, brimful of eager delight and expectancy, looking in through a crack of the sitting-room door, hiding behind them a heaped hatful of eggs, while, with shining eyes, they asked, "Guess, mamma; guess how many eggs to-night?" And sometimes, though I guess away up in the thirties, they gleefully count out still more from the old felt hat that is their egg-basket.—CLARISSA POTTER, in American Agriculturist.

ELGIN BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

The 29th annual meeting of the Elgin Baptist Association was held with the 2nd Dorchester church, assembling in the village of Gladstone, on Friday and Saturday, 1st and 2nd insts. It was preceded by a meeting of the Women's Missionary Circle, held on the afternoon and evening of Thursday, attended by Revs. Alex. Grant, general superintendent of Home Missions, and James Grant, district secretary of Foreign Missions, whose addresses were highly appreciated.

The Association met at 11 a.m., when after Scripture reading by Rev. R. Marshall, of Sparta, and prayer by Rev. A. Grant, an appropriate and suggestive discourse was delivered by Rev. A. H. Munro on "Home Missions." Rev Geo. Mason, of Calton, was chosen president, and Rev. D. W. Rowland, clerk, with R. Marshall, assistant.

The business claiming attention at such gatherings was conducted in perfect harmony throughout. A platform meeting in behalf of education, home and foreign missions was held in the evening. Speakers, Revs Prof. Newman, of McMaster Hall, A. Grant and A. Sowerby, of Aylmer. The subject of Modern Revivals was taken up at the Saturday morning session. Afternoon session was devoted to public worship, with prayer and conference. Statistics showed 152 baptisms for the last year, and present membership in all the churches, including four that sent no reports, to be about two thousand. The next Association will be located by the Committe on Arrangements. The church at Gladstone, though now without a pastor, provided ample hospitality to all that came.

There are many indications of worms, but Dr Low's Worm Syrup meets them in every case successfully.

The edge of a cyclone and hailstorm struck Elgin, Ill., on the evenihg of May 28, breaking thousands of panes of glass, blowing down trees and doing much other damage. West of there it was much worse. Hailstones seven inches in circumference fell.

Rev. D. D. Burtch, of Leamington, preached the introductory sermon at the Association of Baptist churches, which opened in Chatham on Tuesday of last week. Rev. L. Iler was re-appointed clerk. The attendance of delegates was fair. The church reports showed an increase of membership in some cases and a failing off in some others.

DEATH OF MR. NAIRN, M. P. P.

Mr. Thomas M. Nairn, M.P.P. for East Elgin, died at seven o'clock Friday morning at his residence in Aylmer, in the 58th year of his age, after a fortnight's illness. The deceased has been a prominent public man, and was actively associated with municipal, legislative, educational and mercantile affairs for the past thirty years in this county. He was born in Ballochfoot, Loch Lomond, Scotland, in 1830, and had been a resident of Aylmer since 1851, carrying on business as a general merchant till 1854, when he formed a partnership with Mr. Henry Martin in mercantile business, which lasted until 1874, when he took charge of the Air Line railway in Aylmer. He was first elected as a municipal councillor in 1858, and was re-elected every year until 1872. In that year Aylmer was created a town, with Mr. Nairn as its first reeve, and he was re-elected each year until 1878. He served in the county council for nineteen successive years, and was elected warden of Elgin six successive years, from 1866 to 1871

Mr. Nairn was one of the originators of the idea of building a railroad across the lake shore counties, which project finally culminated in the building of the Air Line railway, of which he was the first provisional director, and then a member of the permanent board, which membership lasted until the road was merged into the Great Western. In 1867 he ran in the Reform interest in East Elgin, but was defeated by 23 votes. In 1879 he was elected over Mr. Samuel Day, but in 1883 was defeated by Mr. E. O. Ermatinger. At the last election Mr. Nairn was again successful at the polls.

No higher testimony could be borne to the respect in which Mr. Nairn was held by the people of Elgin, and no greater evidence of the grief felt at his demise could be given, than was furnished by the immense concourse of people that assembled in Aylmer on Sunday to follow his remains to their last resting place. From St. Thomas a train of four cars, all crowded to the doors, was run over the G. T. R. A special train was also run from Tilsonburg, bringing the Masons and Workmen of that place. By two o'clock locomotion was difficult in the principal streets of the town. Service was held in the house, addresses being given by the clergymen of the town. At the conclusion of the service those who had not yet viewed the remains passed through the house to take a last look at the well-known countenance of their departed friend, after which the funeral procession was formed and took up its slow line of march to the cemetery. The procession seemed almost interminable. Half an hour was consumed in passing a given point, and the length of the line must have been fully a mile and a half. The Masons in the procession numbered about 200; the Workmen a few less. Arrived at the grave prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Sowerby, and the solemn service of the Masonic fraternity was read.

UNITED POWER.

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

We are glad to learn that Oliver Silcox is improving slowly in health.

Mr. James McSherry intends manufacturing plows again on a large scale, having purchased an engine and other machinery necessary for carrying on an extensive business.

Our post-office is to be removed a quarter of a mile farther north. Some of our town people are indignant at the change. It is hoped our worthy P. M. will change his mind

Wm. McLandress returned on Thursday from Albany, having sold a load of cattle to one of his old customers. He says the prospect of the crops and fruit look very favorable in the east.

The boys of our village played a game of base ball with the boys of Shedden on Saturday which resulted in a victory for Iona, the score being 43 to 13, and which was easily done without the aid of any of your Dutton boys, as stated in your last issue.

The Free Will Baptist people will hold their yearly meeting in Iona, commencing on Thursday, June 14, and lasting over Sunday. Elders Ball and Taylor will lead the meetings, assisted by local ministers. Both the other denominations have kindly consented to dispense with their appointments on this occasion, and there will, no doubt, be a very large gathering.

MORFORD AND THE OPERATORS.

Superintendent Morford has declared his intention of removing all the operators on the line, members of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, unless they withdraw from the Order. It is stated that only six out of those who joined the Order have since withdrawn, and those who decline to withdraw are being relieved from service and their places filled by others. A batch of twenty or twenty-five operators arrived in St. Thomas Monday and are being sent out as vacancies are made by the dismissal of those refusing to withdraw from the Order. Applications for positions as operators, which have been pigeon-holed, have been gathered together, and if occasion requires these applicants will be summoned to the city, and after passing the examination will be sent out to fill the place of those loyal to the Telegraphers' Order. P. G. Bromley, agent at Tilsonburg, has been dismissed for refusing to withdraw from the Order. Relieving agent Glendon has also been dismissed.

A member of the Order of Railroad Telegraph Operators states that the statement that operators along the M. C. R. were withdrawing from the association, in consequence of the order received from Supt. Morford, was not correct. He maintains that the operators will not allow their personal liberties to be interfered with, and as long as they give the company faithful service, they have a right to join whatever order they see fit. The object of the association is to raise the standard of the operators in regard to the teaching of students. He claims that there are too many boys employed as operators, and the association would have operators men of judgment and intelligence. There are enough telegraph operators not working at the business to supply the M. C. R. for the next twenty years, he said, without importing any from the United States.

LATER.—Division Supt. Morford has been notified by Mr. E. C. Brown, general manager, not to take any further steps to crush the Order of Railroad Conductors. The news was received with general rejoicing by the operators.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

SUICIDE AT INGERSOLL.—A sad case of suicide occurred in Ingersoll on Friday night or Saturday morning. Miss Leigh, who has had a fancy store for several years there, was found dead in bed on Saturday morning at the residence of Mr. John Lee, where she had been a guest over night. Nothing peculiar in her manner was noticed by Mr. or Mrs. Lee, who were conversing with her at a late hour Friday night. When found she was lying with her face buried in her hands, and a bottle of chloroform was standing on the table in the room. No possible reason can be assigned for her rash act, as her business was in a flourishing condition, but for the past few days she has been suffering from melancholy for some cause or other.

THE THREAD OF LIFE;

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER IV.—BURIDAN'S ASS.

For a minute the two girls stood in breathless suspense: then Warren Relf, cutting in behind with the yawl, flung out a coil of rope in a ring towards Hugh with true seafaring dexterity so that it struck the water straight in front of his face flat like a quoit, enabling him to grasp it and haul himself in without the slightest difficulty. The help came in the nick of time, yet most inopportunely. Hugh would have given worlds just then to be able to disregard his proffered aid, and to swim ashore by the tree in lordly independence without extraneous assistance. It is grotesque to throw yourself wildly in, like a hero or a Leander, and then have to be tamely pulled out again by another fellow. But he recognised the fact that the struggle was all in vain, and that the interests of English literature and of a well-known insurance office in which he held a small life policy, imperatively demanded acquiescence on his part in the friendly rescue. He grasped the rope with a very bad grace indeed, and permitted Relf to haul him, hand over hand, to the side of the Mud-Turtle.

Yet, as soon as he stood once more on the yawl's deck, dripping and unpicturesque in his clinging clothes, but with honour safe, and the lost hat now clasped tight in his triumphant right hand, it began to occur to him that, after all, the little adventure had turned out in its way quite as romantic, not to say effective, as could have been reasonably expected. He forgave himself his wet anp unbecoming attire, as he handed the hat, with as graceful a bow as circumstances permitted, from the yawl's side to Winifred Meysey, who stretched out her hands, all blushes and thanks and apologetic regrets, from the roots of the poplar by the edge, to receive it.

"And now, Elsie," Hugh cried, with such virile cheerfulness as a man can assume who stands shivering in wet clothes before a keen east wind, 'perhaps we'd better make our way at once up to Whitestrand without further delay to change our garments.—Miss Meysey, I'm afraid your hat's spoiled.—Put her about now, Relf. Let's run up quick. I don't mind how soon I get to Whitestrand."

Warren Relf heade l the yawl round with the wind, and they ran merrily before the stiff breeze up stream towards the village.

"O Elsie," cried Winifred, "it was so grand! Wasn't it just magnificent of him to jump in like that after my poor old straw? I never saw anything so lovely in my life. Exactly like the sort of things one reads about in novels!"

Elsie smiled a more sober smile of maturer appreciation. "Hugh's always so," she answered, with proprietary pride in her manly and handsome and chivalrous cousin.

The men made their way up stream to Whitestrand, and landed at last, with an easy run, beside the little hithe. At the village inn—the Fisherman's Rest, by W. Stunnaway—Hugh Massinger, in spite of his disreputable dampness, soon obtained comfortable board and lodgings, on Warren Relf's recommendation. Relf was in the habit of coming to Whitestrand frequently, and was "well be-known," as the landlord remarked, to the entire village, children included, so that any of his friends were immediately welcome at the quaint old public-house by the water's edge.

"I'll change my clothes in a jiffy," the poet said to his friend as he leapt ashore, "and be back with you at once, a new creature."

In ten minutes he emerged again, as he had predicted, in the front room, another man—an avatar of glory—resplendent in a light-brown velveteen coat and Rembrandt cap, that served still more obviously than ever to emphasise the full nature and extent of his poetical pretensions. It was a coat that a laureate might have envied and dreamt about. The man who could carry such a coat as that could surely have written the whole of the Divina Comedia before breakfast, and tossed off a book or two of Paradise Lost in a brief interval of morning leisure.

"Awfully pretty girl, that," he said as he entered, and drummed on the table with impatient forefinger for the expected steak: "the little one, I mean, of course—not my cousin. Fair, too. In some ways I prefer them fair. Though dark girls have more go in them, after all, I fancy; for dark and true and tender is the North, according to Tennyson. But fair or dark, North or South, like Horniman's teas, they're "all good alike," if you take them as assorted. And she's charmingly fresh and youthful and naive."

"She's pretty, certainly," Warren Relf replied with a certain amount of unusual stiffness apparent in his manner; "but not anything like so pretty, to my mind, or so graceful either, as your cousin, Miss Challoner."

"Oh, Elsie's well enough in her own way, no doubt," Hugh went on with a smile of expansive admiration. "I like them all in their own way. I'm nothing, indeed, if not catholic and eclectic. On the whole, one girl's much the same as another, if only she gives you the true poetic thrill. But the other—Miss Meysey, now—who's she, I wonder?—Good name, Meysey. It sounds like money, and it suggests daisy. There was a Meysey a banker in the strand, you know—not very daisy-like, that, is it?—and another who did something big in the legal way—a judge, I fancy. He doubtless sat on the royal bench of British Themis with immense applouse (which was instantly suppressed), and left his family a pot of money. Meysey—lazy—crazy—hazy. None of them'll do, you see, for a sonnet but daisy.—How many more Miss Meyseys are there, if any? I wonder. And if not, has she got a brother? So pretty a girl deserves to have tin. If I were a childless, rich old man, I think I'd incontinently establish and endow her, just to improve the beauty and the future of the race, on the strictest evolutionary and Darwinian principles."

"Her father's the Squire here," Warren Relf replied, with a somewhat uneasy glance at Hugh, shot sideways. "He lords the manor and a great deal of the parish. Wyville Meysey's his full name. He's rich, they say, tolerably rich still; though a big slice of the estate south of the river has been swallowed up by the sea, or buried in the the sand, or otherwise disposed of. But north of the river they say he's all right. That's his place, the house in the fields, just up beyond the poplar. I daresay you didn't notice it as we passed, for it's built low—Elizabethan, half-hidden in the trees. All the big houses along the East Coast are always planned rather squat and flat, to escape the wind, which runs riot here in the winter. The old gentleman's connected with the bankers in the Strand—some sort of a cousin or other, more or less distantly removed, I fancy."

"And the sons?" Hugh asked with evident interest, tracking the subject to its solid kernel.

"The sons? There are none. They had one once, I believe—a dragoon or hussar—but he was shot, out soldiering in Zululand or somewhere; and his daughter's now the sole living representative of the entire family."

"So she's an heiress?" Hugh inquired, getting warmer at last, as children say at Hide and seek."

"Ye-es. In her way—no doubt, an heiress—Not a very big one I suppose, but still what one might fairly call an heiress. She'll have whatever's left to inherit.—You seem very anxious to know all about her."

"Oh, one naturally likes to knew where one stands—before committing one's self to anything foolish," Hugh murmured placidly. "And in this wicked world of ours, where heiresses are scarce—and actions for breach of promise painfully common—one never knows beforehand where a single false step may happen to land one. I've made mistakes before now in my life; I don't mean to make another one through insufficient knowledge, if I can help it."

He took up a pen that lay before him upon the table of the little sitting-room and began drawing idly with it some curious characters on the the back of an envelope he pulled from his pocket. Relf sat and watched him in silence.

Presently, Massinger began again. "You're very much shocked at my sentiments, I can see," he said quietly, as he glanced with approval at his careless hieroglyphics.

Relf drew his hand over his beard twice. "Not so much shocked as grieved, I think," he replied after a moment's pause.

"Why grieved?"

"Well, because, Massinger, it was impossible for any one who saw her this morning to doubt that Miss Challoner is really in love with you."

Hugh went on fiddling with the pen and ink and the envelope nervously. "You think so?" he asked, with some eagerness in his voice, after another short pause. "You think she really likes me?"

"I don't merely think so," Relf answered with confidence; "I'm absolutely certain of it—as sure as I ever was of anything. Remember, I'm a painter, and I have a quick eye. She was deeply moved when she saw you come. It meant a great deal to her.—I should be sorry to think you would pay fast and loose with any girl's affections."

"It's not the girl's affections I play fast loose with," Massinger retorted lazily. "I deeply regret to say it's very much more my own I trifle with. I'm not a fool; but my one weak point is a too susceptible disposition. I can't help falling in love—really in love—not merely flirting—with any nice girl I happen to be thrown in with. I write her a great many pretty verses; I send her a great many charming notes; I say a great many foolish things to her; and at the time I really mean them all. My heart is just at that precise moment the theatre of a most agreeable and unaffected flutter. I think to myself, "This time, it's serious." I look at the moon, and feel sentimental. I apostrophise the fountains, meadows, valleys, hills, and groves to forebode not any severing of our loves. And then I go away and reflect calmly, in the solitude of my own chamber, what a precious fool I've been—for, of course, the girl's always a penniless one—I've never had the luck or the art yet to captivate an heiress; and when it comes to breaking it all off, I assure you it costs me a severe wrench, a wrench that I wish I was sensible enough to foresee or adequately to guard against, on the prevention-better-than-cure principle."

"And the girl?" Relf asked, with a growing sense of profound discomfort, for Elsie's face and manner had instantly touched him.

"The girl," Massinger replied, putting a finishing stroke or two to the queer formless sketch he had scrawled upon the envelope, and fixing it up in the frame of a cheap lithograph that hung from a nail upon the wall opposite: "well, the girl probably regrets it also, though not, I sincerely trust, so profoundly as I do. In this case, however, it's a comfort to think Elsie's only a cousin. Between cousins there can be no harm, you will readily admit, in a little innocent flirtation."

"It's more than a flirtation to her, I'm sure," Relf answered, with a dubious shake of his head. "She takes it all au grand serieux.—I hope you don't mean to give her one of these horrid wrenches you talk so lightly about?—Why, Massinger, what on earth is this? I—I didn't know you could do this sort of thing!

He had walked across carelessly, as he paced the room, to the lithograph in whose frame the poet had slipped the back of his envelope, and he was regarding the little addition now with eyes of profound astonishment and wonder. The picture was a coarsely executed portrait of a distinguished statesman, reduced to his shirt-sleeves, and caught in the very act of felling a tree; and on the scrap of envelope, in exact imitation of the right honourable gentleman's own familiar signature, Hugh had written in bold free letters the striking inscription, "W. E. Gladstone."

The poet laughed. "Yes, it's not so bad," he said, regarding it from one side with parental fondness. "I can imitate anybody's hand at sight.—Look here, for example; here's your own." And taking another scrap of paper from a bundle in his pocket, he wrote, with rapid and practised mastery, "Warren H. Relf" on a corner of the sheet in the precise likeness of the printer's own large and flowing handwriting.

Relf gazed over his shoulder in some surprise, not wholly unmingled with a faint touch of alarm. "I'm an artist, Massinger," he said slowly, as he scanned it close; "but I couldn't do that, no, not if you were to pay me for it, in heaven above, or earth beneath, or the waters that are under the earth; but I couldn't make a decent facsimile of another man's autograph.—And, do you know, on the whole I'm awfully glad that I could never possibly learn to do it."

Massinger smiled a languid smile. "In the hands of the foolish," he said, addressing his soul to the beefsteak which had at last arrived, "no doubt such abilities are liable to serious abuse."

On Mormonism.

Of Mormonism as a national danger much that is superficial and idle is spoken and written. The Mormons are sober, industrious and thrifty, and their acceptance of polygamy is our only grievance against them. But polygamy, beyond all question, we need not fear at all. Even among the Mormons it exists in comparatively few instances. It is a barbarous institution, and is found only where women are held in the bondage of ignorance and servitude. No man who has regard for his peace or comfort would think of having two wives in a country in which women have become so intelligent and independent that the only safe way of living happily with even one is to be humble and obedient.—[Bishop Spalding in the March Forum.

Dishorned Cattle.

William Horne, V. S., in Country Gentleman:—We are getting the fruits I said would surely come. One stockman had 60 cows dishorned, and in seven weeks the milk fell from thirteen to nine pounds, and he says that many of them are ruined altogether. I know of quite a number of animals whose heads are nearly rotted off. Five absolutely breathe through the enlarged apertures whence the horns came off. I know of 27 animals which were dishorned; five of them came near dying, two did die, and all the rest degenerated. There is no doubt of the prepotent powers of both cows and bulls being injuriously affected by dishorning. I challenge any educated veterinarian in the country as to whether or not the vital forces are destroyed to a great extent. The whole animal economy suffers by the cruel practice.

Rich People.

Doubtless the Vanderbilts could command within twenty-four hours more money than any other family; and perhaps Mr. Russell Sage could command in two hours more money than any other single person; and perhaps the capital of the Rothschilds is larger than that of any other family, but not so easily to be realized. The Vanderbilts, Jay Gould, Russell Sage, the Astors, the Goelets, D. O. Mills, C. P. Huntington, Sidney Dillon and many others are each worth over $5,000,000.

Undecided.

The Danish Exhibition at South Kensington, London, will, it is expected, be inaugurated on the 14 inst. In order to be in keeping with the verbal atrocities of the "Fisheries," the "Healtheries," the "Coalineries," and the "Inventories," this is to be called the "Daneries," and the Italian exhibition the "Romansies." By the way, what will they call the Irish exhibition, which opens on the 4th of June?—[Mail.

FARM.

HINTSON PLANTING

CABBAGE.—One had better buy the few plants he will require for the early crop than attempt to raise them from seed, unless he has hot beds or chooses to raise the plants for the pleasure of growing them. They should be set in the ground about the 20th of April. Winter cabbages can be raised from seed sown in open ground between the 10th and 20th of June.

THE TOMATO.—Tomato plants should be set out about the first of June; the ground should have been made very rich, and if it is kept free from weeds no further attention will be required. Just before frost the vine may be taken up with all the earth that can be kept adhering to the root, and transferred to the cellar, where all the full grown tomatoes not already picked will ripen.

POLE OR RUNNING BEANS.—These cannot be planted until settled, mild weather, say from the 20th of May until the 1st of June. Four plants in a hill, with hills four feet apart each way, is as close as they should be grown, as they require plenty of light and air. Limas and sievas being very tender should not be planted before June 1st. For shell beans, the best kinds are large white lima, and pole horticultural. Either the black wax pole or Indian chief is an excellent snap or string bean. The dwarf kinds are far superior for the latter use to the pole beans.

THE BEET.—It requires a deep, sandy loam; should be sown as early as the ground is in good working order, and the plants as soon as well up, should be thinned to eight or ten inches apart for the early crop. Sowing for the winter crop should be about July 1st or a little earlier. Less thinning will be proper than for the early crop. Four to five inches will be narrow enough. The early Bastian and Dewing's early turnip are standards for both early and late crops. Beet tops used as greens are by many preferred to dandelion or spinach; the Swiss chard or silver beet is grown entirely for this purpose. It sends out fresh sprouts continuously during the season, no matter how often cut off.

CLASSIFICATION OF GRASSES.

The grasses, for convenience, may be ranged in two general divisions. The first division comprises all the true grasses or plants with long, simple, narrow leaves and a long sheath divided to the base which seems to clasp the stem; or, rather, through which the stem appears to pass.

The artificial grasses are mostly leguminous plants with a few stems which are cultivated and used like the grasses, although they do not properly belong to that family. The clovers of all varieties, the alfalfa, etc., belong to this latter class.

In general, grasses ought to be cut not long after the time of flowering, for although there is a great deal of nourishment in the ripe seed, it is hardly enough to make up for the loss in the stalks and leaves, which are most valuable before the soluble materials, such as starch, gum and sugar, are gradually changed into woody fiber.

The best known remedy for the currant worm, which infests both currant and gooseberry bushes, is said to be white hellebore. Now, white hellebore is an altogether different drug from black hellebore, so remember and use the former. The cheapest and easiest mode of application is to mix the hellebore in water. Place a heaping tablespoonful of the powder in a dish; and gradually a quart of boiling water, stirring all the while to make certain that the hellebore is thoroughly saturated. Turn this mixture into a pailful of cold water, stir well and apply with a garden syringe or ordinary watering pot. The object is to wet every leaf; make two applications, a few days apart. While white hellebore is poisonous, there is little or no danger from its use, as above directed.

The chances are that before the fruit is ripe enough to eat the rains will have washed off all traces of the hellebore, and should any remain on the clusters the fruit will present a soiled appearance and be rejected in consequence.

STRAWBERRY CULTURE.

Strawberries do not anymore seem to bring the large prices of former years, says the Orchard and Garden. We must economise someway. But the attempt to save in the manure account is like trying to make the dairy business pay by withholding the grain rations from the cows. High cultivation and high feeding is the only thing that can make strawberry culture profitable in a dull market.

An English strawberry grower uses oil meal and woodashes spread about the plants and worked into the soil, and recommends it as a clean fertilizer for strawberries. No weeds in that manure.

The composting of coarse manure, even for a period of one or two years, will not destroy the vitality of half the weed seeds in it.

Considerable heat in fermenting manure may kill most of the weed seeds in it, but it also and always impairs the value of the manure.

NOTES.

Prune any time the weather is fit and keep the knife sharp.

For fertilizing purposes there is no more valuable form of potash than wood ashes.

Be sure and plant good seed potatoes even if the seed be costly. But do not plant too many acres.

Good roads are the most obvious marks of advanced civilization, and are essential to general prosperity.

The hen that is active, scratches vigorously, and seems anxious to be always searching for food, is usually the one that is a good layer.

Dwarf pears and cherries often yield a good crop the second year after planting, but for the after good of the trees such early bearing, in large quantities, should be discouraged.

Sow more clover. Sow it with the spring grain where you do not intend to lay the field down for mowing. Clover will smother other weeds that would otherwise mature their seeds with the grain, and will make a good crop to plough in.

Beans like a dry and rather light soil, though they will do well in any garden soil if not planted too early in the spring. Dwarfs are earliest and most hardy, as a general rule. In garden culture beans are generally planted in rows, 18 inches apart, and 3 inches apart in the row; in field culture in drills wider apart, so as to cultivate with horse one way. Running beans are planted in hills two or three feet apart.

The Poultry Record gives this method of liming eggs for long keeping: To one pint of salt and one pint of fresh lime add four gallons of boiling water. When cold put it in stone jars. Then with a dish let your fresh eggs into it, tipping the dish after it fills with the fluid, so they will roll out without cracking the shell, for if the shell be cracked the egg will spoil. Put the eggs in whenever you have them fresh, keep covered in a cool place and they will keep fresh for a year.

Keep your cows comfortably housed Keep salt before them at all times See that they get all the water they want at least twice a day. Water warmed to 55 at 60 deg will save feed and increase the milk supply. Feed regularly both as to time and quantity. Mild regularly and with no undue haste or rudeness. Strain the milk away as soon as possible in a cool place. Skim after about twenty-four hours, and put the cream in a moderately warm place to sour; stir thoroughly three or four times a day. Churn at 60 deg.

The farmers in the Eastern States are applying themselves more and more to dairying. According to the third volume, just issued, of the Massachusetts census, taken in 1885, that State produced in that year agricultural products of the value of $47,750,000. Hay is an important crop. Between 1875 and 1885 the quantity of milk produced rose from 36,698,159 to 72,523,728 gallons, very nearly doubling. The production of butter in the same period increased nearly 2,000,000 pounds. The egg crop was more than doubled between 1675 and 1885. The increased attention given to fruits is a marked feature in the change. The apple crop of 1885 was nearly 1,300,000 bushels greater than that of 1875, while the product of cranberries more than doubled.

The grain farmer, says an agricultural writer, no matter how few his acres, can make money by keeping a few sheep. There is always room for them somewhere, and they consume and turn into money food that otherwise would be wasted. To illustrate: suppose a farmer cultivates only eighty acres, raising grain chiefly. He keeps a few cows, and the necessary teams. One fifth of his farm is in pasture, one fifth meadow, one planted, one spring grain, and one wheat. He thinks he has as much stock as he can profitably keep, but if he puts one sheep to every five acres, he will find their products clear gain. In the spring early they can run on the sod which is to be planted, and will not hurt the land, but will live well. After that they can go into the pasture, and will glean after the cows to advantage. A run on the stubbles after harvest will not be felt, and in the fall there is plenty of feed. And through the winter they can be kept on what the other stock would not consume, with the addition of a little grain.

Make Your Daughters Independent.

From an "Open Letter" in The Century for May:—"Would it not be wiser for to induce young girls in thousands of happy, prosperous homes to make ample provision for any and all emergencies that the future may have in store for them? Could a better use be found for some of the years that intervene between the time a girl leaves school and the time she may reasonably hope to marry? The field for woman's work has been opened up of late years in so many different directions that a vocation can easily be found, outside the profession of teaching, that will be quite as congenial to refined tastes and considerably more lucrative. Bookkeeping, typewriting, telegraphy, stenography, engraving, dentistry, medicine, nursing, and a dozen other occupations might be mentioned. Then, too, industrial schools might be established, where the daughters of wealthy parents could be trained in the practical details of any particular industry for which they displayed a special aptitude. If it is not beneath the sons and daughters of a monarch to learn a trade, it ought not to be beneath the sons and daughters of republican America to emulate their good example, provided they possess the requisite ability to do so.

"Two years will suffice to make any bright, quick girl conversant with all the mysteries of the art of housekeeping, especially if she be wise enough to study the art practically as well as theoretically. The management of servants and the care of the sick and children will be incidentally learned in most homes, and can be supplemented by a more extended study of physiology, hygiene, etc., than was possible at school. Sewing need not be neglected either, while leisure will readily be found for reading or any other recreation that may suit individual tastes. Another year, or longer, may be added to the time devoted to these pursuits, if desired. But, above all, let two or three years be conscientiously set apart for the express purpose of acquiring a thorough experimental knowledge of some art or vocation which would render its possessor self-supporting and, consequently, independent.

"If the tide of public opinion favoring such a course would but set in, many a one would be spared untold suffering and misery in after life. Let the rich set the example in this matter. They can afford to do whatever pleases them, and, therefore, have it in their power to mold public opinion. Be not afraid, girls, that you will find your self-imposed task irksome. Remember that occupation is necessary to happiness, and that there is no reason why you should not dream while you work.

"The cry will be raised that there is danger that such a plan as the one advocated here will tend to give girls a distaste for the quiet retirement of home, but there is little cause for fear. Not, one girl in twenty will voluntarily choose a business life in preference to domestic happiness. Indeed, it is absolutely certain that happy marriages would be promoted by this very independence among women. Not being at leisure to nurse every passing fancy, girls would elect to wait patiently until the light of true love came into their lives."

A Literary Horse Dealer.

Anderson, the famous Piccadilly horse dealer, is dead, and figures, curiously enough, as a patron of letters. This man, who was very wonderful in many ways, honest among other things, although a horse dealer, read every day in the Morning Post the sporting articles of "Pavo." These he much admired, and Pavo receives a large legacy. Anderson was one of the most successful as well as most trustworthy of London horse dealers. In his old age he was assisted by George Rice, about the smartest horseman in England, with a perfect figure, and admirable seat and the best boots and breeches that could be bought. A practice of Anderson's which may be of use to American horse dealers was to put Rice on the hack he wished to sell. Rice would make the animal show off as no one else could, and then Anderson, with a smile like Bret Harte's Chinaman, would say:

"George Rice is a good fellow, but he doesn't know anything about riding a horse. When you are on that little animal it will look very different indeed, sir."

This usually effected a sale.

The Poet Pope in His Old Age.

Alexander Pope had not, to use De Quincey's words, drawn that supreme prize in life, "a fine intellect with a healthy stomach," and his whole story testifies to that fact. As years went on his little figure, in its rusty black, was seen more rarely in the Twickenham lanes, and if he took the air upon the river it was in a sedan-chair that was lifted into a boat. When he visited his friends his sleeplessness and his multiplied needs tired out the servants; while in the daytime he would nod in company even though the Prince of Wales was talking of poetry. He was a martyr to sick headaches, and in the intervals of relief from them would be tormented by all sorts of morbid cravings for the very dietary which must inevitably secure their recurrence. This continued strife of the brain with the ignobler organs goes far to explain, if it may not excuse, much of the less admirable side of his character. His irritability, his artifice, his meanness even, are more intelligible in the case of a man habitually racked with pain, and morbidly conscious of his physical shortcomings than they would be in the case of those "whom God has made full-limbed and tall," and in the noble teaching of Arthur's court, his infirmities should entitle him to a larger charity of judgment.—[Austin Dobson, in "Scribner's Magazine" for May.

A Joke on a Liberal Orator.

Charlottetown Herald: One night during the session of the Legislature, while the House was in Committee of Supply, Mr. Bell was repeating his speech for the hundredth time, when he stopped and beckoned the messenger to bring him a glass of water. Thereupon Mr. Shaw rose to a point of order. Being asked by the chairman to state his point, he said he did not think a windmill should be propelled by water. This sally caused great amusement to all present except Mr. Bell.

The claim that it is just as good made by those endeavoring to palm off imitations for the genuine only proves the superiority of "Putman's. Use only Putman's Painless Corn Extractor. Sure, safe, painless.

Catch Questions.

It is always a delight to a school-boy to propound to his teacher "catch questions" in mathematics that the teacher cannot answer. Usually these catch questions or propositions are of little importance, and the object of them is simply to elicit absurd replies from those to whom they are put. Temple Bar gives several such questions, a few of which are new and the others as "old as the hills," but new, probably, to some school-boys and girls.

If a goose weighs ten pounds and half its own weight, what is the weight of the goose? Who has not been tempted to reply on the instant, fifteen pounds?—the correct answer being of course, twenty pounds. Indeed, it is astonishing what a very simple query will sometimes catch a wise man napping; even the following have been known to succeed:

How many days would it take to cut up a peice of cloth fifty yards long, one yard being cut off every day?

A snail olimbing up a post twenty feet high, ascends five feet every day, and slips down four feet every night. How long will the snail take to reach the top of the post?

A wise man having a window one yard high and one yard wide, and requiring more light, enlarged his window to twice its former size; yet the window was still only one yard high and one yard wide. How was this done?

This is a catch question in geometry, as the preceding were catch questions in arithmetic. The window was diamond-shaped at first, and was afterward made square.

As to the two former, perhaps it is scarcely necessary seriously to point out that the answer to the first is not fifty days, but forty-nine; and to the second, not twenty days, but sixteen—since the snail who gains one foot each day for fifteen days, climbs on the sixteenth day to the top of the pole, and there remains.

A man walks round a pole, on the top of which is a monkey. As the man moves the monkey turns on the top of the pole so as still to keep face to face with the man. Query: When the man has gone round the pole, has he, or has he not, gone round the monkey?

The answer which will occur at first sight to most persons is that the man has not gone round the monkey since he has been behind it. The correct answer, however, as decided by Knowledge, in the pages of which this momentous question has been argued, is that the man has gone round the monkey in going round the pole.

Salaries of Judges.

England has thirty-four judges who are each in receipt of a salary ranging from $25,000 to $50,000, and together draw $910,000 a year from the treasury. The eighty judges in the courts of the United States are paid from $3,500 to $10,500 a year, an aggregate of $318,000.

Consumption Curable.

Since the fact that consumption is both preventable, and in its earliest stage curable, it has lost much of its terror. If the first symptoms are at once recognized, and the proper remedy applied, very few, if any one, need die of consumption, which is really lung-scrofula. Like many other diseases this formidable one grows out of impure blood, and this, in turn, from a diseased liver. Hence, we have the hacking cough, the pains in chest, the inflamed lungs and all the symptoms of hastening consumption, all the result of depraved blood and a diseased liver. The use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will arrest all such symptoms, restore the liver to healthy action, and send streams of pure blood into every organ. Of druggists.

LIVE FOR SOMETHING.

Live for something, have a purpose,
And that purpose keep in view;
Drifting like a helmless vessel,
Thou canst ne'er to life be true,
Half the wrecks that strew life's ocean,
If some star had been their guide,
Might have now been riding safely,
But they drifted with the tide.

Minnie—No, you can't have a kiss. I don't believe in kissing. Frank—Do you know how the Aztec word for kissing is pronounced? Minnie—No; pronounce it, please. Frank—I cannot do it alone; it takes two to pronounce the word. Minnie—That is queer. How is it done? Frank—I will pucker my lips as in whistling, and you do the same. That's it. Now we will put our lips close together and try to blow—just so. Minnie—How nice. Let us pronounce it again; but don't you think that is a good deal like kissing.

The present Emperor of China has been very well cared for since he made his appearance in this world. It is said that when he was a baby he had 8 nurses, 25 farmers, the same number of bearers for his palanquin, 10 umbrella-holders, 30 physicians and surgeons, 7 chief and 23 inferior cooks, 50 waiters and messengers, and the same number of dressers and other immediate servants, and other attendants to the number of at least 400. His spiritual welfare was looked after by a corps of 75 astrologers, 16 tutors of high rank, and 60 priests. Notwithstanding all this the child grew, and is now a very well-disposed youth.

A watch dial now being made contains, instead of the usual numerals, twelve small but distinct shilouette figures representing a woman with a very young child in her arms. At 1 o'clock the lady and her little baby are clearly depicted, the infant being in long clothes. At two o'clock the same figures appear, but the child is a little larger. At three o'clock mamma is still there, but the infant is in short clothes. At 4 o'clock and so on up to 8 o'clock, when he goes to school for the first time. At 9 o'clock he may be seen with his college gown and mortar board, and the happy smile of the now elderly but happy mother. At 10 o'clock the deathbed scene, where he parts with his beloved mother. At 11 o'clock he is a middle-aged man, over whom the snows of many winters have passed. At 12 o'clock an old and decrepit specimen of humanity praying for a better land.

Rattlesnake Oil.

Rattlesnakes are among the few things that seem to thrive among the rocky hills of Pike county, Pa., and they are just about as plentiful there now as they were when the country was opened. Recently they have become an article of merchandise, owing to the efforts of Anton Hinderman, a little middle-aged German, who leaves his wife and family in Elizabeth, N. J., every year and goes up to Bike county to live in a hut and hunt rattlesnakes. The rattlesnake industry is monopolized by Anton. Others occasionally kill a rattler and lie about its length, but the little German hunts for them persistently and methodically, and catches or kills five or ten on every fine day in summer. He sells them alive to showmen and guests at the Pike county hotels occasionally, but his chief income is derived from rattlesnake oil, which he tries out and sells for one or two dollars an ounce, according to the fluctuations of the market.

He catches the ratilers basking on the rocky ledges, and after pinning them down with a forked stick ties strings around their necks and binds them securely in the crotches of the sticks and carries them to his hut, where he puts them in a perforated packing case to await death or sale. He has never been bitten, but he professes to have a botanic cure for snake bites, and says he is not afraid of the biggest rattlesnake in the State.

He does not use fire in extracting the oil, because he believes that it will spoil it. He says the snakes must be hung in the sun and allowed to dry out slowly in its fierce rays, while the oil drips from their tails into wide-mouthed bottles which are suspended to them. A large snake yields several ounces of oil, and it is a very small snake that will not fill an ounce vial with the greenish oil which is reputed to be a sovereign cure for rheumatism and kindred complaints.

A Kansas school-teacher offered a prize to the scholar who would come to school with the cleanest face. He was unable to recognize some of his pupils the next day.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

More Trouble with Russia—Kaiser Fredrick's New Quarters.

The inauguration of retaliatory measures against Russia is delayed until Austria is prepared to join in the economic war. Public feeling in Germany and the opinion of business men concur in approving the government's projected reprisals. It is not necessary for Prince Bismarck to await the assent of the Reichstag before decreeing a prohibitory tariff. Under the law of 1879 the government is empowered to raise the tariff fifty per cent. for countries treating Germany unfavorably. The assent of the Reichstag must be asked afterward. Nobody can contest the fact that Russia is placing an exceptional tariff on German products. For instance, coal and coke entering Russian ports on the Baltic pay one-half copeck duty, against one and a half copeck crossing the German frontier. The tax most unfavorable to German industry is the differential duty on pig iron, which amounts to seventeen per cent. if sent across the frontier. The impending fiscal projects of the Czar's government will also raise the duties on cotton fabrics and German wines.

I passed a very pleasant day recently visiting the apartments that the Emperor is to occupy at Friederichskrone, the famous Potsdam palace built by Frederick the Great in 1769 and until lately known as Das Neue Palas. The Emperor's bedroom is on the first floor and is exactly above the very room in which he was born. The windows look westward over a large stone square, and a fine view of the fruit trees and peach orchards is seen in the distance. The bed is of medium size and of white enamelled wood. Soft Turkish carpet covers the floor, and the walls are hung with light gray damask. The only pictures are a few engravings of Frederick the Great, the late Emperor, the Empress Dowager and Prince Henry. There is no portrait of the Crown Prince in the bedroom or in the adjoining cabinet de travail.

The Emperor is delighted to get to his own quarters at Friederichskrone again, which he always considers as his home. The air at Friederichskrone is much purer than at Charlottenburg, which is low, damp and feverish in summer, and where the mosquitoes had begun to become unbearable. In the lower parts of Potsdam there is a little malaria, but Friederichskrone is high and dry and makes a nice resting place for the Emperor before he goes to Homburg.

Horse-Breeding.

The stinting season for horses is now in full swing and our farmers need to pay the greatest attention to their breeding stock. The raising of first class horses is going to be the key note to successful farming in Ontario. Our good horses are eagerly sought after all over, and command the highest price. There is a steady market both in England and the United States for all the saleable horses we have; and if the horse production were expanded 100 per cent. there is plenty of room for them in the world. But horse breeding here requires to be more systematic to produce the best results. There is altogether too much haphazard breeding, or breeding to no definite purpose. It is too often the case that cheap sires are used for the sake of saving a little, and the consequence is the production of an inferior, nondescript horse, which finds no place in the market except as a "plug." These cheap stallions have been the ruin of a goodly number of our Canadian horses. Only to a limited extent are undersized and pony horses required, and this for mere local purposes, such as running a grocery wagon or a light buggy around a city; but for the export trade they have no place at all. We have a number of first-class stallions in nearly every class, but this is not the only requisite to successful horse-breeding. There must be good mares and adaptability in crossing and breeding to a purpose. We may import all the best horses from England and France, but until proper mares are selected horse-raising cannot be a success. And it is too well known that the greater part of the brood mares in this country are animals that are unfit for work, old, blemished and just on their last legs. To produce the best results in horse raising the mares should be strong, vigorous, sound, and roomy.

Another great cause of the poor stock raised in this country is the fact that many farmers pay no attention to the adaptability of the animals in crossing. Small-sized, fine-boned females are put to heavy-boned, large-bodied Clydes and Shire horses with the idea that the production will be a model horse. There never was a greater mistake. There is too sudden a descent, too abrupt a change, and in seven cases out of ten such an amalgamation—small mares, large horses—produces a lack of symmetry and frequently malformation. Nature is uniform in her operations, and horses of about the same build and type should be mated together to produce good animals. Strong, bulky mares are required to create heavy, bony offspring. If the horse-market be studied at the present time, it will be noticed that horseflesh goes by the pound the same as beef; for horses are most in demand that will come up to a certain weight. It is well known that a draft colt—Clyde or Shire—from most of the imported horses now in Ontario can be raised to 1,500 lbs, or more, at 3 years old more cheaply than a three-year-old steer of the same weight, and will sell as readily for cash at three times the price. Then the last year's use of such on the farm will amply pay for any other difference. First-class carriage horses and saddle horses will pay equally as well as the heavy classes if bred for a purpose and mated and bred to produce the desired results of coach and saddle horses. The production of good horses is a business in which any farmer may engage in Ontario with the consciousness that he is doing a work that will add to the wealth and general prosperity of the country, and producing an article which requires no sharp practice to turn into honest money, and one which comes nearer having a fixed value than any other product upon the farm.

Death to Trusts.

The Iowa Legislature has taken the bull by the horns in its anti-trusts legislation. It has passed a bill prohibiting any corporation, co-partnership or individual from entering into any combination or confederation to fix the price of any commodity, or the amount or quality of it to be produced or sold in the State. The bill also provides further that on any trial of an indictment for violation of this law all officers or agents are made competent witnesses, and may be compelled to produce books and papers, and shall not be excused from testifying, even on the plea that their testimony may criminate themselves. A proviso is, however, added that no such testimony shall be used against the person testifying in any suit in which he is a party. This is certainly heroic legislation, and the working of the law will be watched with interest.

Woman in Business.

Women who go into business from either choice or necessity, should acquire business habits, adopt business methods and possess themselves of all knowledge of details and general information. There should be no sentiment about it: they should expect no immunity from disagreeables on the score of being "ladies;" their prospect of marriage should have no more effect on their work than it has with that of men. Their dress should suit the requirements of the occupation. In no dress does a girl look neater, prettier or more graceful than that adopted for gymnastics or lawn-tennis, both of which give fullest play for all movements. How much better would many working girls look and feel and work in such dresses than in the gaudy, tawdry finery so many of them wear! These should have their business suits just as men do.

Is Russia About to Strike?

They who take optimistic views of the European situation, may perhaps find some comfort in the assertion of an anonymous writer that Prince Bismarck recently assured Mr Carl Schurz that the peace of Europe would not be disturbed by Russia. But even if we could assume that the Chancellor has chosen such a medium for a proclamation urbie et orbis, he has never, we could recollect, pretended to be a prophet, but has, on the contrary, acknowledge that the war of 1870 was a surprise to him. To our minds the alleged revelations of confiding statesmen are less trustworthy indications of what this summer has in store than the actual incidents taking place in Russia and southeastern Europe.

In order to gauge the significance of the ascendancy suddenly regained by Slavophils in Moscow, and of the commotions which have simultaneously broken out in the Danubian States, it is well to recall the events curiously analogous which preceded the last war between Russia and Turkey. It is well known that the late Czar, Alexander II., was extremely reluctant, to engage in that contest and that for two years, notwithstanding the pressure of the patriotic party, he could not be prevailed upon to take any decisive step. The Herzegovina insurrection of 1875 and Servia's aggressive movement against the Sultan in the following year were, no doubt instigated by Slavophil committees; but the Russian Governm ent long refused to lift a hand to save its supposed proteges from Ottoman reprisals. As late as February, 1877, the Queen's speech expressed the conviction now imputed to Bismarck that the peace of Europe was assured. Within a fortnight afterward Slavophil Generals and statsmen had become dominant in the counsing of St. Petersburg, and in the beginning of March Gen. Ignatieff was allowed to undertake a private mission to central and western Europe, professedly for the purpose of consulting an oculist. By an odd coincidence, on March 3 the Czar ordered the mobilization of eight army corps. What specialists Ignatieff consulted in Berlin and Vienna can only be conjectured; but what we know is that in a few weeks after he obtained the Emperor's full confidence, Alexander II, ordered his troops to invade Prussia, and on June 21,1877, the Russians crossed the Danube. The Slavophils are superstitious; they may this year be waiting for the same date of departure, in order that the next expedition, like the last, may be pushed forward within sight of the towers of St. Sophia.

The Czar's armies are now in a state of far greater readiness than they were eleven years ago, and a week at the outside would suffice to transport an army from Bessarabia across the Danube. All the information obtainable confims the belief that three-fourths of his active forces have since the beginning of the year been concentrated in the south-eastern corner of his empire. It seems an unreasonable hypothesis that so tremendous a display of strength is intended merely to supersede Prince Ferdinand of Coburg by another ruler on the insignificant throne of Bulgaria. Is it not more probable that Slavophils, who remember how at San Stefano the prize lay at their feet, are convinced that the hour has come to lay aside all subterfuge and make shift and to strike boldly at Constantinople? If they did not suppose the hour ripe for putting off the mask, why should such men as Ignatieff Tchernaieff and Bogdenovich s! at once emerge from their retirement and repeat, point by point, the demonstrations and manœuvres which preceded the last Turkish war? Here is the Slav Association, of which we used to hear so much eleven years ago, all at once resuscitated with Tchernaieff at its head; here is the co operative agency, the Slav Committee of Charity starting into fresh activity under the Presidency of Ignatieff; here is Gen. Bogdanovich, an avowed believer in Boulanger, abruptly reinstated in the service, and at the same time permitted, or privately ordered to visit France. Finally, that nothing might be wanting to perfect the parallel between the present situation and that presented in the spring of 1877, here is an opportune rising in Macedonia and a Ministerial crisis at Belgrade and Bucharest directed against the anti-Russian party.

To insist that the huge outlay made by Russia on mobilization during the last four months has no larger purpose than a change of princelings at Sophia seems to us the acme of absurdity. If Alexander III. were capable of so great a waste of his country's resources for an end so trivial, he would richly merit the execration of his subjects. If he accepts, on the other hand, the programme of the Slavophils, there is no sacrifice that Russians will not cheerfully endure. Nor is it likely to be forgotten by one who has so long been the target of assassination, that no Russian hand would ever be raised against the Czar who should rear the standard of Peter the Great above Constantinople. Even the Russian revolutionist is, first of all, a patriot; and it is probable that Alexander II would be alive to-day had his armies in the last war ventured to pluck the fruits of victory instead of succumbing to the bravado of Lord Beaconsfield.—N. Y. Sun.

The confidential witness is objectionable, for he insists that his evidence shall fall upon the judge's lips instead of his ears. Mike, a tall, slim Irishman, had volunteered to assist his friend, Tom O'Flaherty, in becoming a citizen of the United States.

The judge, when Tom's papers were handed to him, asked, "Who knows Thomas O'Flaherty?"

"I do, your Honor," answered Mike, leaning over the rail so that he ceased to be upright, and trying to bring his lips near the judge's.

"Stand up, sir, and speak out!" said the judge, as Tom began whispering. "Is Thomas O'Flaherty a man of good moral character?"

Mike drew himself up, stepped back from the rail, and in an indignant tone asked, "Do you mane to ax me if me friend Tom is a man of good character?"

"I do," said the judge.

"Well, then," continued Mike, in a voice loud enough to be heard in the street, "Av ye do, and its jokin' I think ye are, I'll tell ye all about it. He plays upon the fiddle, he reads, he doesn't whip the ould woman, an' he takes a dhrop of whiskey now and thin. Will that plaze ye?"

Tom got his papers.

His Will Was a Short One.

They are telling a little story on the street about a well-known real estate man of considerable means who is a little careless in his business habits and has allowed a large number of unpaid bills to accumulate in various parts of the city. The other day he took it into his head that he would have a new will drawn up, and to that end he summoned a legal friend who was acquainted with his little peculiarity. The lawyer put down the imposing clause, "In the name of God, Amen, I ——, being of sound and disposing mind," etc. Then he looked up at the real estate man.

"I desire," said the latter, "first, that all my just debts shall be paid.

The lawyer wrote, laid down his pen and asked him to sign.

"But I haven't finished yet," said the astonished real estate man.

"Oh, yes, you have," replied the lawyer. "That's all that's necessary. By the time that desire is complied with your estate will be taken care of."

"I think," said the minister, who was visiting a parishioner, "that it is easier to coax children than to drive them. Gentle words are more effective than harsh ones.' "I think so, too," said the lady tenderly. Then she raised her window and shouted to her boy: "Johnnie, if you don't come in out of that mud-puddle I'll break your back."

Father (to would-be son-in-law)—"Young man, will you be able to take care of my daughter in the style to which she has always been accustomed?" Young man (earnestly)—"I'll guarantee it, sir, or return the girl.

FLORICULTURAL.

FLOWER CULTURE.

One of the largest industries of Southern France is that of the cultivation of flowers for the manufacture of perfumes. The flower harvest covers three-fourths of the year, but the season of greatest activity comes in May and June, when the roses and orange blossoms are gathered. The violet, jonquil and mignonette appear in February, March and April, although in mild, moist winters, the violet comes as early as December; jasmine and tuberoses belong to July and August; lavender and spikenard to September, and the acacia to October and November.

Thyme, rosemary and lavender are grown chiefly by small farmers of the grape and olive, who manufacture from them an inferior sort of oil, used to dilute and adulterate the superior essences made by large establishments.

The Journal of the Society of Arts, from which these facts are taken, also describes the method of harvesting blossoms. During the busy season, traders go about from farm to farm, collecting flowers, which are then hurried to the nearest manufacturer, and delivered while they are still fresh and crisp.

The making of perfumes includes also the processes of manufacturing pomades and essences. Pomade is used as a vehicle for absorbing and transporting to a distance the perfumes of certain flowers. A square frame of wood is set with a pane of strong plate glass, and on each side of this is spread a thin layer of grease, which has previously been refined and purified by boiling.

Thus prepared, the frames are piled up to await the season of each special flower. When the blossoms arrive, their petals are stripped from the stems, and laid upon the grease of the frames, and thus, as the frames are again packed together, supported upon their wooden edges, a series of close chambers is formed within which the grease is constantly absorbing the perfume.

The supply of flower petals is daily renewed, and the process goes on for four or five months, at the end of which time the pomade is removed from the glass, with wide, thin spatulas, and packed in cans for transportation. The perfumed grease is treated with alcohol, which extracts its sweetness, and forms the floral waters and extracts of commerce.

The process of preparing perfumed oils is somewhat similar, except that superfine olive oil is used, instead of grease. Pieces of coarse cotton fabric are saturated with oil, and stretched upon wire netting held in wooden frames.

Essences and distillations are produced by boiling the flowers in water, and the vapor which carries away the perfume is condensed in copper tanks. Some of the retorts used for this purpose are of sufficient size to receive, at one time, a half-ton of fresh flowers, with the amount of water necessary for their distillation.

The work in perfume manufactories is largely done by women, who earn from ten-pence to a shilling for a day's labor of ten hours, and who make half as much more during the busy season of orange flowers and roses, by working until midnight, or even later.

HARDY BORDER PLANTS

Those not having the time or inclination to fuss with a class of plants that will not take care of themselves, can select such as will stand out of doors all winter. These, with a sprinkling of the common annuals, if properly selected, will furnish flowers continuously from the first Spring day until frosts in the Fall. Commencing in the Spring, all that perenials usually require is a cleaning up of old decayed foliage and a spading and raking of the ground around them. Such plants are benefitted by a division of the roots every three years or so, and his is the general method of propigation; although first to obtain them, most can be raised from seed. If sown at the close of Summer, any of them will flower the next; while with rare exceptions, and among those called biennials, a few will flower the first year, planted early enough in the Spring.

TREATMENT FOR POT FLOWERS.

Take a clean pot and make very rich soil with a little silver sand, or drift-sand found after a heavy shower. Then take bone or some red brick and fill the bottom of the pot. Lay some burnt bone beaten fine over this. Fill the pot with soil and make firm Plant the bulb so that the top of it will be one inch below the surface. Stand the pot in a pan of water; wash the pan often and be sure to use soft water or water that has been boiled. Occasionally use a little washing soda and a little cold tea; keep the pan full of water. Never water on top of the pot and every year your plant will improve.

NOTES.

Dipping the roots of plants in clear water is just as effective as the often recommended method called "puddling;" also generally less inconvenient, and in most cases preferable. This applies with equal force to vegetable and to small fruit plants. Most persons dislike to handle puddled plants.

Several of our native Lilies make capital border plants, easy to grow and conspicuous when in flower. Those curious in the Lily family have an immense variety to choose from, including several grand California species. The old longifolium, such a favorite with floristi for cut flowers, is one of them. The common Lily and the longifolium can be obtained almost for a song, from the florists, after they have flowered them.

The culture of flowors is not, strictly speaking, a part of domestic economy. The writer has cared for flowers a considerable part of her time for the past 15 years, and there is no other occupation that has given her more downright pleasure. Our home without flowers would scarcely seem like home. We fancy that the children would be less contented, and that summer would be deprived of an essential charm. The culture of flowers may not be a part of domestic economy in a technical sense, but it promotes domestic joy and contentment—and is not this economy?

Spring bulbs are among the earliest to flower, and generally go by the name of Dutch bulbs. The Snowdrop is first to open; then comes the Crocus, Narcissus, and ending with the late Tulip. The Crown Imperials are also quite early in flowering and have a strong, quick growth, almost before frost is out of the ground. All of this class of plants are better planted in the Fall, their growth being so early in the Spring, that to transplant them breaks the young tender roots, and checks the flowering. They commence to grow early, have finished by July, the foliage dried up and no more is seen of them till their time of growing the ensuing Spring. The Lily family, provided they are moved early enough, may be transplanted in the Spring. The old white garden lily, L. candidum, is a splendid hardy border plant. The L. auratum is an immense flower and makes a grand show. The several kinds of lancifolium are charming plants. The old Turk's cap, the tiger, and the tennifolium, are well worth growing.

Justice Triumphant.

From time to time the press of the United States unite in lamenting that crime is on the increase in the large cities of the Union. The reason should not be difficult to find; if the following case is a sample of the justice of the courts. Before Justice Haight, of Buffalo, the Everests, father and son, were indicted for conspiring to commit an act injurious to trade and commerce. The precise offence, committed in 1881, for it has taken seven years to bring these wealthy men to justice, was enticing a workman away from the Buffalo Lubricating Oil Company and attempting to blow up the machinery of this important rival of the network of Standard works. The trial was long, and the Everests were able to use all the legal defence wealth could procure. The evidence was overwhelming and the verdict a righteous finding if there ever was one. The penalty fixed by law is a light one at best, $250 fine or imprisonment for a year, or both. The judge fixed the lightest sentence he could, $250 fine, which for a wealthy man was nothing.

Said the mistress of a cigar shop to an editor man. "This is the sixth time you have been here without saying a word about the money you owe me." "Ah, madame," said the clever journalist, "when I see you I forget everything."

Where is Stanley?

The precise whereabouts of Stanley, the explorer, is now a subject of anxious discussion among European newspapers and geographers. Ten months ago he left the last point from which news of him was received, that is, the camp of Yambunga. On the 19th of August, 1887, he wrote to this post, asking that fresh supplies of provisions might be sent him. Since then nothing has been heard of him. Between this point and Wadelai, the first station at which he would strike the territory of Emin Pasha, he had about 600 miles to travel through a swampy, but not impassable country. In Stanley's last letter he fixed August 15 as the date at which he would get into the Lake Nyanza country, where Emin Pasha would have been sure to hear of him, but Emin Pasha wrote November 2 that he had heard nothing of him. Sir Francis Winton, an ex Governor of the Congo Free State, suggests that he has met with obstacles on the road which may have compelled him to go a great way round. The London Globe says that in making his way northward on the west side of the great lakes he may have missed Emin Pasha, who was going to meet him along the eastern shore; but the Paris Temps suggests that it would hardly be possible for an expedition of the size of Stanley's to be on one side of the lakes without news of its getting across to the other. Nor is it likely that Stanley has fallen into an ambuscade and been massacred. He has 484 men, what with carriers and soldiers, who are well armed, and he is himself in this sort of warfare an experienced commander. Still another hypothesis has been propounded, namely, that having fully satisfied himself of Emin Pasha's safety and unwillingness to be "rescued," he has turned southward to do some more exploring on his own account, and will come out in the direction of Zanzibar. Everything that is said about him is thus far mere guesswork.

SUNDAY was childrens' day at the Methodist church. The exercises partook of a song service by the congregation and a paper and chalk talk by the pastor which proved very interesting not only to the little ones but to the older ones as well. The secretary's report showed the school to be in a flourishing condition.

WEDDING BELLS.—On Thursday of last week, at the residence of the bride's mother, Mr. D. McNabb, of Cowal, was united in marriage to Miss Jane McBride. The wedding party drove to Dutton, where the bride and groom took the afternoon express for the west. The ENTERPRISE joins their many friends in tendering congratulations.

HERE is a neat little arithmetical problem upon which our readers may exercise their ingenuity: Put down in figures the year in which you were born; to this add 4; then add your age at your next birthday, provided it comes before Jan. 1, otherwise your age at your last birthday; multiply result by 1,000; from this deduct 677,423; substitute for figures corresponding letters of the alphabet, as A for 1, B for 2, C for 3, D for 4, etc. The result will give you the name by which you are popularly known. Try it, and you will be surprised. It beats Donnelly's cipher.

D. J. THOMPSON is building a picket fence around his property.

THE Fingal club have signified their willingness to play the Shamrocks here the 1st of July. The challenge will be accepted.

I AM lending money at present in large loans on good farm security at 5½ per cent.—A. MCCRIMMON, St. Thomas.

ANOTHER pest has made its appearance in the country which, it is feared, is going to do great damage to the grain crop, and particularly to peas and wheat. The insect is about half an inch long, and notwithstanding that the grain is only coming above ground the destructive worms are at work at the root and the stalk is killed. It is a few days now since they were noticed first.

SHEDDEN DEFEATED.—The Shedden and Iona base ball clubs tested each other's mettle on the diamond at Iona on Saturday. The Shedden club was defeated by 43 to 13. It must have been Shedden's off day. That they are capable of playing better ball no one will dispute. Knight and Lumley formed the battery for Iona, while Frank Howard took the receiving end for the visitors.

J. H. LEBLONDE will give lessons on piano or organ, and in harmony and thorough bass; also lessons given in singing—Italian system of voice culture. Will give lessons in the country. Leave orders at Price's bookstore, Dutton.

EARLY CLOSING.—The success of the early closing movement is assured. For the past week the stores have been closed promptly at the ringing of the bell at 8 o'clock. Although some have been disappointed in not being able to get into the stores after that time, it ought now to be generally known throughout the township that the business places of Dutton close promptly at a specified hour, 8 o'clock.

THE editor of the Transcript thus bewails the result of Glencoe's artesian well:—

AN EPITAPH.

Here lies buried deep in the rock
Two thousand dollars of Glencoe stock.
Beyond the reach of burglar's skill
With dynamite, or sledge or drill—
Well secured in deepest vault
Beneath one hundred feet of salt;
A legacy forever sure
As long as Glencoe doth endure—
Which not but death can from them sever.

THE editor is away on his holidays. The typo and sporting editor have formed a combination and will hold the fort against the sheriff, bailiff and life insurance agents until his return. "The man who knows it all" called on us to tell us how a paper should be run. His remarks wounded the sporting editor's feelings and he was obliged to fill him with double pica slugs. The last words he uttered were, "Sic transit gloria nundi." What's left of him will be used as a paper weight. No orders have as yet been received to "stop my paper," and if we can manage to pacify the paper-maker, the stationer and the drayman for a few days longer all will be well.

GONE TO HIS REWARD.—One by one Dunwich's old settlers are passing away. On Wednesday of last week at Cowal, the widely-known and much-respected pioneer, Stephen Griffin, uncle of James Griffin, Dutton, passed peacefully away at the ripe age of 75 years. The remains were interred in the Iona burying-ground on Thursday, Rev. J. W. Mann, of Iona, conducting the funeral services. Notwithstanding the disagreeable state of the weather, a large number turned out to pay their last respects to their deceased friend. Mr. Griffin, with the exception of a few years, was a resident of Dunwich all his life, and was well known in East Elgin. He took a deep interest in church work, having been an elder of the Free Will Baptist church for a number of years.

IN MEMORIAM.

"Those whom the gods love die young." The words of the poet are very fitting and expressive in the subject of our brief sketch. Mr. D. McPhedrain, a student of our High School, passed away on Tuesday, 5th inst., at the age of 22 years. Deceased had been sick since Christmas with that fell disease, consumption, which baffles all medical skill, and which terminated his life while on the threshhold of what we have every reason to expect would have been a brilliant career. An apt student, a lovable classmate, he was beloved by teachers and scholars. To know him was to love him, and time will not erase the warm place his memory has secured in the hearts of those with whom he came in contact. He threw his whole soul into everything he did, and whether at his studies or sports he worked with a determination which invariably brings victory. The funeral was held on Wednesday from his father's residence, five miles north of Dutton. The High School was closed from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., to allow the scholars to attend the funeral.

HOW IT WORKS.

The mode of operating of Burdock Blood Bitters is that it works at one and the same time upon the stomach, liver, bowels and blood, to cleanse, regulate and strengthen. Hence its almost universal value in chronic complaints.

Over 800 Christians partook of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in the First Methodist church, St. Thomas, last Sunday.

Backache, stitches in the side, inflation and soreness of the bowels, are symptoms of a disordered state of the digestive and assimilative organs, which can be corrected by the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills.

The special train which run over the Brantford & Tilsonburg R. R. to carry the Grange excursionists to Guelph on Tuesday, consisted of ten cars, which were crowded, the platforms being also crowded. There was a large number went from St. Thomas.

PERFECT HEALTH

Can only be attained by carefully attending to the laws of nature as expressed in the wants of the system. To do this successfully requires the use of Burdock Blood Bitters occasionally to secure the regulating and strengthening effect of this splendid medicine.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

OLD DR. CHASE'S NEW RECEIPTB OOK.

His Last and Crowning Life Work.

Dr. Chase's Third, last and Complete RECEIPT BOOK AND HOUSEHOLD PHYSICIAN, or the Book for the Million, contains nearly 900 pages and sells for $2.25 in cloth binding and $2.50 in imported oil cloth, marble edge, and is justly by him called

'The crowning work of my life.'

It is the result of over half a century's observation, study and experience. Yet this embodies no compilation of his former books. IT IS WHOLLY A NEW BOOK. If 30 years ago he could produce a book that has had a sale of over 150,000 copies, and has made his name familiar in nearly every English-speaking home in the United States, Canada and thousands of homes in Europe, Australia and South America, what kind of a book could or would he produce at his CROWNING LIFE WORK, with more than thirty years of additional practice and experience? The book itself answers the question, and is the most valuable production in the history of book publishing.

Caution! Unscrupulous and pirating publishers are attempting to copy this book by taking portions of it out and palming it off on the public as the complete work. We own the manuscript, purchased from Dr. Chase's heirs. See that you get the GENUINE book. See that it has our name on the title page and is copyrighted by us.

DR. WASHINGTON,
I think it my duty to let you know how my health is improving. When I commenced treatment with you I was very ill. I had severe catarrh of my head and throat. My lungs were pronounced to be far gone in consumption. I had a very bad cough, raised a good deal of blood and matter, had night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, appetite very poor and could scarcely walk across the floor. My family doctor considered my case entirely hopeless. As a last resort I was lead to try your treatment for Catarrh and Consumption My improvement was noticeable from the first and now after nearly six months treatment, under the blessing of a kind Providence, my health is again restored.
Signed, MRS. WM. MITCHELL, Otterville.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

A very severe accident to a party of five Spaniards happened at Niagara Falls Friday morning. They visited the whirlpool rapids park, Canada side. They got into the car on the incline railway without the attendant being at his post. The car with the weight of the party descended at a terrific rate of speed. When it reached the bottom of the track it crashed into the wooden structure below, injuring the whole party—one lady so severely that it is said she will not recover.

Wm Etherington, aged eighteen, met with a fatal accident at White's boiler factory on William street, London, on Friday last. The young fellow was attempting to adjust a belt upon a shaft when his hand was caught between the belt and wheel and he was rapidly whirled around by the moving machinery. When cut loose from the belting it was found that he had sustained a fracture of the skull, his arm and leg were broken and he was also injured internally.

Miss Sebastian, aged 22, an employee of the Featherbone works, experienced a narrow escape from death on Saturday. She had entered May Bros.' flour mill with a couple of companions to secure some wheat, and in passing the main shaft she was wound against the shaft. Mr. S. May, who was close by heard the screams of the young woman's companions, and the mill was promptly shut down. Miss Sebastian's clothing was considerably torn, but she escaped injury other than a severe shock and fright.

A barn raising took place at Dan Purcell's, Clachan, on Thursday last. Mr. A. P. Pastell, of Ridley, who had been secured to photograph the framework, had made his last exposure, and the boys were descending from their positions, when a crash was heard, and Mr. P. McVicars, who was captain, fell from mid-rafter to sills, a distance of twenty-three feet, striking an over-layer midway, but strange to say, with the exception of face wounds and a severe shaking up, he escaped almost unhurt, from what might have proved a fatal accident.

BARRED OUT.

When the county council arose Tuesday it adjourned till 10 o'clock Wednesday morning. Shortly before 10 Warden Turner and some of the members arrived at the court house, only to find the court room occupied by the county judge, who was holding division court therein. Indignant at such usurpation, the council determined to wait until 1 o'clock, and then, if the court were adjourned, as is usually done, to take possession of the room. But contrary to custom the judge did not adjourn for lunch, but continued court, and in the afternoon at 1 o'clock there was an indignant crowd of councillors clustered around the doors of the court house, discussing the situation They were barred out of their own house, and if they had been convinced that legally they possessed the power it would not have been unlikely that the judge would have been lifted by main force out of his chair.

The action of the judge is particularly rich in view of the fact stated by Inspector O'Reilly that the judge told him that he would not again hold court in the court house until the sanitary condition of the building was improved, which it has not been.

SURGEON GEN'L W. A. HAMMOND says we can each prolong our life if we learn the secret thereof. WHAT IS THIS SECRET? If you soak a sponge in oil, the sponge will have in it all the peculiarities of the oil. So every organ in the body contains all the peculiarities of the blood. If the kidneys, the ONLY blood purifiers, do not clean the blood of the waste of the system, then the various organs will give out and you will have Rheumatism, Malaria, Headaches, Ague, Chills and Fever, Impotency, Bladder Diseases, Lame Back, Neuralgia, Nervousness, Bad Eyes, Stomach Troubles, Boils, Carbuncles, Abscesses, Apoplexy, Paralysis, and in women Female Troubles. The secret of good health then lies in KEEPING THE KIDNEYS WELL. If you don't, you can't cure any of the above diseases. They may not suspect it, but eight persons out of every ten have some form of kidney derangement. The only scientific blood purifier is the famous WARNER'S SAFE CURE, which not only cures kidney diseases but the majority of ailments which really come from unsuspected kidney disease.

The Patterson & Bro. Company, Woodstock, manufacturers of agricultural implements, are now employing some 340 hands, divided into two gangs, who work day and night, the daily output being about twenty-five binders, besides other work.

COUNTY COUNCIL.

The Elgin County Council met on Tuesday of last week. Warden Turner in the chair.

Several communications were read. From Duncan McKellar and four other ratepayers, S. S. No. 10, Dunwich, appealing against the refusal of the municipal council to alter the boundaries of S. S. No. 10 and other existing sections, so as to form a new section.

From W. Atkins, inspector of Elgin county public schools, enclosing his report for 1887. The total receipts were $69,445.74; the expenditure was $58,635.77. During the year there were 100 rural sections and 3 village sections besides Aylmer. 121 teachers were employed, 58 males and 63 females. The average salary is $401.60. Number of pupils on the registers, 7,765; average attendance, 3,609.

N. T. O'Reilly, inspector of prisons enclosing his report.

The county treasurer stated that the sum of $41,450 would be required for expenses for the coming year.

A deputation from Dunwich, consisting of Messrs. Duncan McKellar, Neil Love Peter McKellar waited on the Educational Committee, seeking its consent to a division of the Campbellton school section.

WEDNESDAY.

Council met at 10 o'clock.

The usual grant of $25 was given to the Farmers' Institute.

The report of the Jail Committee was read, stating that sixteen iron bedsteads had been ordered for the jail cells at a cost of $5.40 each.

Dr. VanBuskirk reported on the sanitary condition of the jail.

The Education Committee reported recommending that W. Backhouse be appointed an arbitrator to act with the county judge, W. Atkin and Warden Turner and Councillor McGregor, to settle appeal of D. McKellar and others against the action of the township council of Dunwich.

THURSDAY.

The sum of $200 was voted for a new lock-up at West Lorne.

The Finance Committee reported, recommending that the accounts of D. J. Donahue, county attorney; D. Brown, sheriff; R. Miller, Master Supreme Court, for office rent and expenses be not entertained, as the council did not authorize them to rent offices, and the committee being by no means satisfied that the offices at the court house are, from a sanitary point of view, unfit for occupation, as the former tenants of the offices, though occupying them for many years, never complained that their health suffered. The report was adopted.

FRIDAY.

It was moved by B. F. Hathaway, seconded by Sheldon Ward, and carried, That this council desire to put on record their condemnation of the action of the county judge in holding division court in the court room during this session of the county council, and that his action in so doing has all the appearance of a studied and malicious insult to the members of this board, and that by interrupting the work of the council an additional expense is put upon the ratepayers of the county, thus showing in the most unmistakeable manner how completely the judge of this county ignores the rights of the county council and the interests of the people; that this council petition the Dominion Government superannuate His Honor Judge Hughes, and appoint some one in his stead, and that our members of parliament be requested to bring the petition properly before the government.

Mr. Kirkpatrick thought the resolution was premature, and that it should be reconsidered.

Mr. Leitch said all who know the judge know that if the council gave way an inch they would have to give a yard, and he objected to any signs of weakness being given. He was sorry the resolution had been necessary, as the judge should be one of the most useful members of the council. It was stated that the judge had expressed his intention of not meeting with the present warden on public business during the year, to the consequent injury of the public's interest.

It was decided not to give a grant to repair lock-ups in the county.

A FATAL FALL.

Chas. Miller, a resident of Detroit, and a paperhanger by trade, had been working for his employers in London for some time past. It appears that Miller had sat down on a three-storey-high window of the City Hotel to smoke his pipe before retiring on Thursday night, and going to sleep had lost his balance and fallen to the yard below. He was found early Friday morning by P. C. Smith, who heard a crashing noise, and supposing a horse had broken loose in the stable, hurried to the spot, and arrived just in time to hear the last gasp of the dying man. Coroner Flock was at once notified, but it was decided that no inquest was necessary, as the cause of death was evidently accidental. The dead man's pipe, tobacco and one armlet were found beneath the window out of which he had fallen.

BY PROXY.

Some time since, one of the brightest and wittiest of Cincinnati's girls went abroad, and when she returned home about the first person to congratulate her upon her safe return was B——, a young blood from the city, whose dollars exceeded his sense in a rotation of about a million to one.

"Aw, Miss Y——," he said, "permit me to greet you. I know you have had a very pleasant trip abroad."

"Yes," she answered, "very pleasant indeed. I was all over the continent, and through England, Scotland and Ireland."

"Ah, in Ireland, and did you see the Blarney Stone?"

"Yes, I was there."

"Oh, I should so delight to see it. It has always been a desire of mine to kiss the celebrated stone, but I have never had the opportunity."

"Indeed, then you should go there."

"I know, but I have not done so, but why shouldn't I kiss it by proxy? You have been there and kissed it, why should I not take the influence of the Blarney from your lips?"—and the smart Aleck stepped forward to proxify the young lady.

But she drew back, and looking him squarely in the face, said: "I beg your pardon, my dear Mr. B——, but I sat upon the blarney stone" Like a man of great sorrow, B——, sank down in a heap, and he hasn't said "Ireland" since, and the very word "Blarney" makes him delirious.

CHAPTER V.

ELECTIVE AFFINITIES.

The Girton governess of these latter days stands on a very different footing indeed in the family from the forty-pound-a-year-and-all-found young person who instructed youth as a final bid for life in the last generation. She ranks, in fact, in the unwritten table of precedence with the tutor who has been a university man; and, as the outward and visible sign of her superior position, she dines with the rest of the household at seven-thirty, instead of taking an early dinner in the school-room with her junior pupils off hashed mutton and rice-pudding at half-past one. Elsie Challoner had been a Girton girl. She was an orphan, left with little in the world but her brains and her good looks to found her fortune upon; and she had wisely invested her whole small capital in getting herself an education which would enable her to earn herself in after-life a moderate livelihood. In the family at Whitestrand, where she had lately come, she lived far more like a friend than a governess; the difference in years between herself and Winifred was not extreme; and the two girls, taking a fancy to one another from the first, became companions at once, so intimate together, that Elsie could hardly with an effort now and again bring herself to exert a little brief authority over the minor details of Winifred's conduct. And, indeed, the modern governess, though still debarred the possession of a heart, is no longer exactly expected to prove herself a moral dragon; she is permitted to recognize the existence of human instincts in the world we inhabit, and not even forbidden to concede at times the abstract possibility that either she or her pupils might conceivably get married to an eligible person, should the eligible person at the right moment chance to present himself with the customary credentials as to position and prospects.

"I wonder, Elsie," Winifred said after lunch, "whether your cousin will really come up this afternoon? Perhaps he won't now, after that dreadful wetting. I daresay, as he only came down in the yawl, he hasn't got another suit of clothes with him. I shouldn't be surprised if he had to go to bed at the inn, as Mr. Relf does, while they dry his things for him by the kitchen fire! Mr. Relf never brings more, they say, than his one blue jersey."

"That's not like Hugh," Elsie answered confidently. "Hugh wouldn't go anywhere, by sea or land, without proper clothes for every possible civilized contingency. He's not a fop, you know—he's a man all over—but he dresses nicely and appropriately always. You should just see him in evening clothes; he's simply beautiful then. They suit him splendidly."

"So I should think, dear," Winifred answered with warmth. "I wonder, Elsie, whether papa and mamma will like your cousin?"

"It's awfully good of you, darling, to think so much of what sort of reception my cousin gets," Elsie replied with a kiss, in perfect innocence. (Winifred blushed faintly.) "But, of course, your papa and mamma are sure to like him. Everybody always does like Hugh. There's something winning about him that insures success. He's a universal favourite, wherever he goes. He's so clever and so nice, and so kind and sympathetic. I never met anybody else so sympathetic as Hugh. He knows exactly beforehand how one feels about everything, and makes allowances so cordially for all one's little private sentiments. I suppose that's the poetic temperament in him. Poetry must mean, at bottom, I should think, keen insight into the emotions of others."

"But not always power of responding sympathetically to those emotions.—Look, for example, at such a case as Goethe's,' a clear voice said from the other side of the hedge. They were walking along, as they often walked, with arms clasped round one another's waists, just inside the grounds, close to the footpath that led across fields; and only a high fence of privet and dogrose separated their confidences from the ear of the fortuitous public on the adjoining footpath. So Hugh had come up, unawares from behind, and overheard their confidential chit-chat! How far back had he overheard? Elsie wondered to herself. If he had caught it all, she would be so ashamed of herself!

"Hugh!" she cried, running on to the little wicket gate to meet him. I'm so glad you've come. It's delightful to see you.—But oh, you must have thought us two dreadful little sillies.—How much of our conversation did you catch, I wonder?"

"Only the last sentence," Hugh answered lightly, taking both her hands in his and kissing her a quiet cousinly kiss on her smooth broad forehead. "Just that about poetry meaning keen insight into the emotions of others; so, if you were saying any ill about me, my child, or bearing false witness against your neighbour, you may rest assured at any rate that I didn't hear it.—Good-morning, Miss Meysey. I'm recovered, you see: dried and clothed and in my right mind—at least, I hope so. I trust the hat is the same also?"

Winifred held out a timid small hand. "It's all right, thank you," she said, with a sudden flush; "but I shall never, never wear it again, for all that. I couldn't bear to. I don't think you ought to have risked your life for so very little."

"A life's nothing where a lady's concerned," Hugh answered airily with a mock bow. "But indeed you give me credit for too much gallantry. My life was not in question at all; I only risked a delightful bath, which was somewhat impeded by an unnecessarily heavy and awkward bathing dress.—What a sweet place this is, Elsie; so flowery and bowery, when you get inside it. The little lane with the roses overhead seems created after designs by Birket Foster. From outside, I confess, to a casual observer the first glimpse of East Anglian scenery is by no means reassuring."

They strolled up slowly together to the Hall door, where the senior branches were seated on the lawn, under the shade of the one big spreading lime-tree, enjoying the delicious coolness of the breeze as it blew in fresh from the open ocean. Elsie wondered how Hugh and the Squire would get on together; but her wonder indeed was little needed; for Hugh, as she had said, always got on admirably with everybody everywhere. He had a way of attacking people instinctively on their strong point; and in ten minutes, he and the Squire were fast friends, united by firm ties of common loves and common animosities. They were both Oxford men—at whatever yawning interval of time that friendly link forms always a solid bond of union between youth and age; and both had been at the same college, Oriel. "I daresay you know my old rooms," the Squire observed with a meditative sigh. "They looked out over Fellows' Quad, and had a rhyming Latin laxameter on a pane of stained glass in one of the bay windows.'

"I know them well," Hugh answered, with a rising smile of genuine pleasure—for he loved Oxford with a love passing the love of her ordinary children. "A friend of mine had them in my time. And I remember the line: 'Oxoniam quare venisti præmeditari.' An excellent leonine as leonines go, though limp in its quantity.—Do you know, I fell in love with that pane so greatly, that I had a wire framework made to put over it, for fear some fellows should smash it some night, flinging about oranges at a noisy wine-party."

From Oxford, they soon got off upon Suffolk, and the encroachment of the sea, and the blown sands; and then the Squire insisted upon taking Hugh for a tour du propriétaire round the whole estate, with running comments upon the wasting of the foreshore and the abominable remissness of the Board of Admiralty in not erecting proper groynes to protect the interests of coast-wise proprietors. Hugh listened to it all with his grave face of profound sympathy and lively interest, putting in from time to time an acquiescent remark confirmatory of the wickedness of government officials in general, and of the delinquent Board of Admiralty in particular.

"Æolian sands!" he said once, with a lingering cadence, rolling the words on his tongue, as the Squire paused by the big poplar of the morning's adventure to point him out the blown dunes on the opposite shore—"Æolian sands! Is that what they call them? How very poetical! What a lovely word to put in a triolet! Æolian—just the very thing of all others to go on all-fours with an adjective like Tmolian!—So it swallowed up forty acres of prime salt-marsh pasture—did it, really? That must have been a very serious loss indeed. Forty acres of prime salt marsh! I suppose it was the sort of land covered with tall, rank, reedy grasses, where you feed those magnificent, rough-coated, long-horned, Highland-looking cattle we saw this morning! Splendid beasts: most picturesque and regal. "Bulls that walk the pastures in kingly-flashing coats," George Meredith would call them. We passed a lot of them as we cruised up stream to-day to Whitestrand.—And the sand has absolutely overwhelmed and wasted it all? Dear me! dear me! What a terrible calamity! It was the Admiralty's fault! Might make a capital article out of that to bully the government in the Morning Telegram.

"If you did, my dear sir," the Squire said warmly with an appreciative nod, "you'd earn the deepest gratitude of every owner of property in the county of Suffolk, and indeed along the whole neglected East Coast.—The way we've been treated and abused, I assure you, has been just scandalous. Governments, buff or blue, have all alike behaved to us with incredible levity. When the present disgraceful administration, for example, came into power"——

Hugh never heard the remainder of that impassioned harangue, long since delivered with profound gusto on a dozen distinct election platforms. He was dimly aware of the Squire's voice, pouring forth denunciation of the powers that be in strident tones and measured sentences; but he didn't listen; his soul was occupied in two other far more congenial pursuits: one of them, watching Elsie and Winifred with Mrs. Meysey; the other, trying to find a practicable use for Æolian sands in connection with his latest projected heroic poem on the Burial of Alaric. Æolian; dashes: Tmolian; abashes, not a bad substratum, that, he flattered himself, for the thundercus lilt of his opening stanza.

It was not till the close of the afternoon, however, that he could snatch a few seconds alone with Elsie. They wandered off by themselves then, near the water's edge, among the thick shrubbery; and Hugh, sitting down in a retired spot under the lee of a sheltering group of guelder-roses, took his pretty cousin's hands for a moment in his own, and looking down into her great dark eyes with a fond look, cried laughingly: "O Elsie, Elsie, this is just what I've been longing for all day long. I thought I should never manage to get away from that amiable old bore, with his encroachments and his mandamuses, and his groynes and his interlocutors. As far as I could understand him, he wants to get the Board of Admiralty, or the Court of Chancery, or somebody else high up in station, to issue instructions to the east wind not to blow Æolian sands in future over his sacred property. It's too grotesque; quite, quite too laughable. He's trying to bring an action for trespass against the German Ocean.

Will ye bridle the deep sea with reins? will ye chas
ten the high sea with rods?
Will ye take her to chain her with chains who is older than all ye gods?

Or will ye get an injunction against her in due form stamped paper from the Lord Chief-justice of England? Canute tried it on, and found it a failure. And all the time, while the good old soul was moaning and droning about his drowned land, there was I, just sighing and groaning to get away to a convenient corner with whom I had urgent private affairs to settle.—My own dear Elsie, Suffolk agrees with you. You're looking this moment simply charming."

"It's your own fault, Hugh," Elsie answered with a blush, never heeding overtly his last strictly personal observation. "You shouldn't make yourself so universally delightful. I'm sure I thought, by the way you talked with him, you were absolutely absorbed in the wasting of the cliff, and personally affronted by the aggressive east wind. I was just beginning to get quite jealous of the encroachments—For you know Hugh, it's such a real pleasure to me always to see you."

She spoke tenderly, with the innocent openness of old acquaintance; and Hugh still holding her hand in his own, leaned forward with admiration in his sad dark eyes, and put out his face close to hers, as he had always done since they were children together. "One kiss, Elsie," he said persuasively.—"Quick, my child; we may have no other chance. Those dreadful old bores will stick to us like leeches. "Gather ye roses while you may: Old Time is still a-flying.'"

Elsie drew back her face half in alarm. "No, no, Hugh," she cried, struggling with him for a second. "We're both growing too old for such nonsense now. Remember, we've ceased long ago to be children."

"But as a cousin, Elsie," Hugh said with a wistful look in his eyes that belied his words.

Elsie preferred in her own heart to be kissed by Hugh on different grounds; but she did not say so. She held up her face, however, with a rather bad grace, and Hugh pressed it to his own tenderly. "That's paradise, my dear," he murmured low, looking deep into her beautiful liquid eyes.

"O son of my uncle, that was paradise indeed; but that was not like a cousin," she answered with a faint attempt to echo his playfulness, as she withdrew, blushing.

Hugh laughed, and glanced idly round him with a merry look at the dancing water. "You may call it what you like," he whispered with a deep gaze into her big dark pupils. "I don't care in what capacity on earth you consider yourself kissed, so long as you still permit me to kiss you."

For ten minutes they sat there talking—saying those thousand-and-one sweet empty things that young people say to one another under such circumstances—have not we all been young, and do not we all well know them?—and then Elsie rose with a sigh of regret. "I think," she said, "we mustn't stop here alone any longer; perhaps Mrs. Meysey wouldn't like it."

"Oh, bother Mrs. Meysey!" Hugh cried, with an angry sideward toss of his head. "These old people are a terrible nuisance in the world. I wish we could get a law passed by a triumphant majority that at forty everybody was to be throttled, or at least transported. There'd be some hope of a little peace and enjoyment in the world then."

"Oh, but, Hugh, Mrs. Meysey's just kindness itself, and I know she'll let you come and see me ever so often. She said at lunch I might go out on the water or anywhere I liked, whenever I chose, any time with my cousin."

"A very sensible, reasonable, intelligent old lady," Hugh answered approvingly, with a mollified nod. "I wish they were all as wise in their generation. The profession of chaperon, like most others, has been overdone, and would be all the better now for a short turn of judicious thinning—But Elsie, you've told them I was a cousin, I see. That's quite right. Have you explained to them in detail the precise remoteness of our actual relationship?"

Elsie's lips quivered visibly. "No, Hugh," she answered. "But why? Does it matter?"

"Not at all—not at all. Very much the contrary. I'm glad you didn't. It's better so. If I were you, my child, I think I'd allow them to believe, in a quiet sort of way—unless, of course, they ask you point-blank, that you and I are first-cousins. It facilitates social intercourse considerably. Cousinhood's such a jolly indefinite thing, one may as well enjoy as long as possible the full benefit of its charming vagueness."

"But Hugh, is it right? Do you think I ought to?—I mean, oughtn't I to let them know at once, just for that very reason, how slight the relationship really is between us?"

"The relationship is not slight," Hugh answered with warmth, darting an eloquent glance deep down into her eyes. "The relationship's a great deal closer, indeed, than if it were a much nearer one.—That may be paradox, but it's none the less true, for all that.—Still, it's no use arguing a point of casuistry with a real live Girton girl. You know as much about ethics as I do, and great deal more into the bargain. Only cousin's a cousin anyhow; and I for my part wouldn't go out of my way to descend gratuitously into minute genealogical particulars of once, twice, thrice, or ten times removed, out of pure puritanism. These questions of pedigree are always tedious. What subsists all through is the individual fact that I'm Hugh and you're Elsie, and that I love you dearly—of course with a purely cousinly degree of devotion."

"Hugh, you needn't always flourish that limitation in my face, like a broomstick."

"Caution, my dear child—mere ingrained caution—the solitary resource of poverty and wisdom. What's the good of loving you dearly on any other grounds, I should like to know, as long as poetry, divine poetry, remains a perfect drug in the publishing market? A man and a girl can't live on bread and cheese and the domestic offections, can they, Elsie? Very well, then, for the present we are both free. If ever circumstances should turn out differently——" The remainder of that sentence assumed a form inexpressible by the resources of printer's ink, even with the aid of a phonetic spelling.

When they turned aside from the guelder-roses at last with crimson faces, they strolled side by side up to the house once more, talking about the weather or some equally commonplace and uninteresting subject, and joined the Meyseys under the big tree. The Squire had disappeared, and Winifred came out to meet them on the path, "Mamma says, Mr. Massinger," she began timidly "we're going to a little picnic all by ourselves on the river to-morrow—up among the sandhills papa was showing you. They're a delicious place to picnic in, the sandhills; and mamma thinks perhaps you wouldn't mind coming to join us, and bringing your friend, the artist, with you. But I daresay you won't care to come: there'll be only ourselves—just a family party."

"My tastes are catholic," Hugh answered jauntily. "I love all innocent amusements—and most wicked ones. There's nothing on earth I should enjoy as much as a picnic in the sandhills.—You'll be coming too, of course, won't you, Elsie?—Very, well, then. I'll bring Relf, and the Mud-Turtle to boot. I know he wants to go mud-painting himself. He may as well take us all up in a body."

"We shall do nothing, you know, Winifred cried apologetically. "We shall only just sit on the sandhills and talk, or pick yellow horned-poppies, and throw stones into the sea, and behave ourselves generally like a pack of idlers."

"That'll exactly suit me," Hugh replied with a smile. "My most marked characteristics are indolence and the practice of the Christian virtues. I hate the idea that when people invite their friends to a feast they're bound to do something or other definite to amuse them. It's an insult to one's intelligence; it's degrading one to the level of innocent childhood, which has to be kept engaged with Blindman's Buff and an unlimited supply of Everton toffee, for fear it should bore itself with its own inanity. On that ground, I consider music and games at suburban parties the resources of incompetence. Sensible people find enough to amuse them in one another's society, without playing dumb crambo or asking riddles. Relf and I will find more than enough, I'm sure, to-morrow in yours and Elsie's."

He shook hands with them all round and raised his hat in farewell with that inimitable grace which was Hugh Massinger's peculiar property. When he left the Hall that afternoon, he left four separate conquests behind him. The Squire thought this London newspaper fellow was a most sensible, right-minded, intelligent young man, with a head on his shoulders, and a complete comprehension of the rights and wrongs of the intricate riparian proprietor's question. Mrs. Meysey thought Elsie's cousin was most polite and attentive, as well as an extremely high-principled and excellent person. (Ladies of a certain age are always strong on the matter of principles, which they discuss as though they were a definitely measurable quantity, like money or weight or degrees Fahrenheit.) Winifred thought Mr. Massinger was a born poet, and oh, so nice and kind and appreciative. Elsie thought dear darling Hugh was just the same, sweet, sympathetic old friend and ally and comforter as ever. And they all four united in thinking he was very handsome, very clever, very brilliant, and very delightful.

As for Hugh, he thought to himself, as he sauntered back by the rose-bordered lane to the village inn, that the Squire was a most portentous and heavy old nuisance; that Mrs. Wyville Meysey was a comic old creature; that Elsie was really a most charming girl; and that Winifred, in spite of her bread-and-butter blushes, wasn't half bad, after all—for an heiress.

The heiress is apt to be plain and forbidding. She is not fair to outward view, as many maidens be. Her beauty has solid, not to say strictly metallic qualities, and resides principally in a safe at her banker's. To have tracked down an heiress who was also pretty was indeed, Hugh felt, a valuable discovery.

When he reached the inn, he found Warren Relf just returned from a sketching expedition up the tidal flats. "Well, Relf," he cried, "you see me triumphant. I've been reconnoitring Miss Meysey's outposts, with an ultimate view to possible siege operations. To judge by the first results of my reconnaissance, she seems a very decent sort of little girl in her own way. If sonnets will carry her by storm I don't mind discharging a few cartloads of them from a hundred-ton-gun point-blank at her outworks. Most of them can be used again, of course, in case of need, in another campaign, if occasion offers."

"And Miss Challoner?" Relf suggested, with some reproof in his tone. "Was she there too? Have you seen her also?"

"Yes, Elsie was there,' the poet answered languidly, as he rang the bell for a glass of sodawater. "Elsie was there, looking as charming and as piquante and as pretty as ever; and, by Jove! she's the cleverest and brightest and most amusing girl I ever met anywhere up and down in England. Though she's my own cousin, and its me that says it, as oughtn't to says it, as oughtn't to say it, she's a credit to the family. I like Elsie. At times, I've almost half a mind, upon my soul, to fling prudence to the winds, and ask her to come and accept a share of my poor crust in my humble garret.—But it won't do, you know—it won't do. Sine Cerere et Baccho, friget Venus. Either I must make a fortune at a stroke, or I must marry a girl with a fortune ready made to my hand already. Love in a cottage is all very well in its way, no doubt, with roses and eglantine—whatever eglantine may be—climbing round the windows; but love in a hovel—which is the plain prose of it in these hard times—can't be considered either pretty or poetical. Unless some Columbus of a critic, cruising through reams of minor verse, discovers my priceless worth some day, and divulges me to the world, there's no chance of my ever being able to afford anything so good and sweet as Elsie.—But the other one's a nice small girl of her sort too. I think for my part I shall alter and amend those quaint little verses of Blackie's a bit—make 'em run:

I can like a hundred women;
I can love a score;
Only with a heart's devotion
Worship three or four."

Relf laughed merrily in spite of himself.

Massinger went on musing in an undertone: "Not that I like the first and third lines as they stand, at all: a careful versifier would have insisted upon rhyming them. I should have made "devotion" chime in with "ocean" or "lotion," or "Goshen," or "emotion," or something of that sort, to polish it up a bit. There's very good business to be got out of "emotion," if you work it properly; but "ocean" comes in handy, too, down here at Whitestrand. I'll dress it up into a bit of verse this evening, I think, for Elsie or the other girl.—Winifred's her Christian name. Hard case, Winifred. "Been afraid" is only worthy of Browning, who'd perpetrate anything in the way of a rhyme to save himself trouble. Has a false Ingoldsby gallop of verse about it that I don't quite like. Winnie's comparatively easy, of course: you've got "skinny" and "finny," and "Minnie" and "spinney." But Winifred's a very hard case indeed. "Winnie" and "guinea" are good enough rhymes; but not quite new: they've been virtually done before by Rossetti, you know. But I doubt if I could even consent to make love to a girl whose name's so utterly and atrociously unmanageable as plain Winifred.—Now, Mary—there's a name for you, if you like; with 'fairy' and 'airy,' and 'chary' and 'vagary,' and all sorts of other jolly old-world rhymes to go with it. Or if you want to be rural, you can bring in 'dairy'—do the pretty milkmaid business to perfection. But 'Winifred'—'bin afraid'—the thing's impossible. It compells you to murder the English language. I wouldn't demean myself—or I think it ought to be by rights be—mean myself—by writing verses to her with such a name as that. I shall send them to Elsie, who, after all, deserves them more, and will be flattered with the attention into the bargain.

At ten o'clock he came out once more from his own room to the little parlor, where Warren Relf was seated "cooking" a sky in one of his hasty seaside sketches. He had an envelope in his hand and a hat on his head. "Where are you off?" Relf asked carelessly.

"On, just to the post," Hugh Massinger answered with a gay nod. "I've finished my new batch of verses on the ocean—emotion—potion—devotion theme, and I'm sending them off, all hot from the oven, to my cousin Elsie.—They're not bad in their way. I like them myself. I shall print them, I think, in next week's Athenæum."

The Czar of Russia.

Stung by the taunts of his cowardice, when he made a visit to Moscow, the Czar insisted upon walking alone through a crowd of twenty or thirty thousand people, without the slightest protection but his own sword. The walls of the city had two nights before been mysteriously decorated with posters announcing that the end of Alexander's reign had come; that he had been tried and found wanting, that the "committee" had declared his death for refusing to give the people a constitutional government.

When the morning of the day on which the Czar's death was to occur arrived, he announced his intention of attending mass at the Church of the Annunciation, within the walls of the Kremlin, and a quarter of a mile or so from the palace. The Czarina and the other members of his family implored him to take no such risk; they begged him to have mass sung in the chapel of the palace, but he declined, and even ordered that the police guard should be withdrawn. He said that if his time to die had come he was ready, that he would not die like a coward in seclusion, but he would die like a soldier with his uniform on and his sword in his hand, in the presence of his people; and so he left the palace alone, clad in the uniform of a field marshall, resplendent with gold and silver lace, and walked across the parade ground to the church.

The news of his rashness spread quickly among the people, who were naturally on the qui vive, owing to the mysterious proclamation of the Nihilists, and before the mass was over the area within the Kremlin walls was crowded with all sorts and conditions of men, twenty or thirty thousand in number. After mass was sung, and he had committed his soul to God, the Czar, with his gloves in his hand, left the church and entered the throng, which opened to make passage for him, but one so narrow that he could touch the bodies of those who stood on either hand. No bomb was required on such an occasion; a pistol, or even a knife, would have done the business, but with his head erect, and bowing to those who had saluted him, the Emperor walked the entire distance. The crowd were silent and almost breathless. Every man present expected something would occur, but the only break in the Czar's walk that morning was when he reached the steps of the palace, stopped, turned his face to the people and spoke to them.

He said that he had been told that he should have trouble if he came to Moscow; that since he had arrived he had been warned by mysterious enemies, whose motive he could not understand, that the present day was to be his last. He had therefore done as all men should do who expected danger—gone to church to ask forgiveness for his sins, and protection from on high. This protection was not denied him. His body, like his soul, was in the hands of God, and man had no power to injure him without the Divine decree. He therefore feared nothing, and believed that as long as he governed the Empire with wisdom he should be allowed to live. Then, thanking the people with hearty words for their loyalty, he bowed and entered the palace.

There had been silence till then, but as the Czar disappeared the crowd broke into a cheer that almost reached the sky.

Blood Letting in Persia.

In Persia blood letting is the same panacea for well-nigh all fleshly ills to-day that it was with our ancestors in the days of bluff King Hal. In the spring every Persian hies him to the barber surgeon to have that professional phlebotomist relieve him of, say, half a pint of blood. One sunny March morning I sat upon the bala Khana of a village chapa house and watched the barber bleed a goodly share of the whole male population. With his arms bared to the elbows, a bunch of raw cotton in lieu of lint beneath his arm, and his keen-edged razor inserted beneath his cap, the travelling tonsorial artist took up his position on the bank of the irrigating ditch that ran through the village of Lasgird. Candidates for his services soon began crowding about him. Each sturdy ryot bared his right arm to the shoulder, and got one of his neighbours to bind a handkerchief tightly just above the elbow. He then presented himself to the barber. The tonsorial artist pressed out with his thumb and forefinger the small vein he wished to slit, and with the air of a man who knows his profession and its importance, deftly inserted the point of his razor. The blood spurted out in a tiny stream; villagers squatted down on their haunches and watched it bleed, occasionally working the elbow joint to stimulate the flow. Half a pint is considered about the correct quantity for an adult to lose at one bleeding; the barber then completes his services by binding on a small wad of cotton. Many prefer being bled in the roof of the mouth, instead of in the arm. I observed that these were old men mostly, and judged them to be knowing customers, who had wise theories of their own as to why the mouth bleeding was preferable to the others. I have seen as many as thirty or forty of the Persian barber's patients squatting in a low row on the bank of a stream or ditch, each one letting the little stream of blood from arm or mouth spurt into the water.

Pain Cannot Stay

Where Polson's Nerviline is used. Composed of the most powerful pain subduing remedies known, Nerviline cannot fail to give prompt relief in rheumatism, neuralgia, cramps, pain in the back and side, and the host of painful affections, internal and external, arising from inflammatory action. A 10 cent sample bottle of Nerviline will give sufficient proof of its superiority over every known remedy. Try Nerviline. Large bottles 25 cents; trial bottles only 10 cents.

A Mere Misconception.

When Lord Wolseley said their was nothing to prevent 100,000 men, well handled, getting possession of England, he evidently overlooked the home forces. According to a recent return Great Britain has 360,000 soldiers, consisting of volunteers, militia and yeomanry. She has also the regular army reserve of 50,000 men. Surely 400,000 men, actuated by patriotism, should be able to hold their own against an invading force of one-fourth of their number.

What Ails You?

Do you have obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges from head and throat, sometimes profuse, acrid and watery, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid and offensive; dull, heavy headache most of the time, with occasional "splitting headaches"; are your eyes weak, watery, or inflamed; is there ringing in the ears, with more or less deafness; do you have to hack, cough and gag, in your efforts to clear your throat in the morning; do you expectorate offensive matter, scabs from ulcers, perhaps tinged with blood; is your voice changed and is there a "nasal twang" to it; is your breath offensive; are your senses of taste and smell impaired? If you have all or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common and dangereus of maladies—chronic nasal catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, which is sold by druggists at only 50 cents, will cure it. The manufacturers of this wonderful remedy offer, in good faith, $500 for a case of this disease which they cannot cure.

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr. Page's business, as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in his specialty, light weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality, he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

ANXIOUS TO BE HANGED.

A Murderer Who Says He Longs to Die and Go to Meet His Victims.

Charles Henry Riedel was convicted of murder in the first degree before the courts of New Castle County, Del., for the brutal killing of his wife and young son in September last. The trial was begun on Monday last and the prosecution was able to fasten the crime upon the prisoner directly and to prove that he had frequently confessed to committing the deed. The defence set up the plea of insanity and established its claim to the evident satisfaction of the Court, as inferred by the charge of Chief Justice Comegys, through the testimony of local physicians and experts in nervous diseases and mental disorders. In view of the Court's instruction the verdict was a great surprise.

The murder was perhaps the most brutal crime ever committed in the state. Riedel and his wife were weavers, and had been employed in the Arlington Mills, of this city. The latter was in a delicate condition, and was laid off by her employers, and the husband, taking umbrage at his wife's discharge, also quit work. He made threats upon several occasions to shoot two or three of the mill bosses, but never took any steps toward carrying them into execution. The day of the murder he spent with some friends in Philadelphia and returned early in the evening with his wife and son. After they had gone to bed he left the house, procured a pistol, and returning while they were sleeping soundly, pressed the weapon against their foreheads and blew out their brains. He then attempted his own life, firing two bullets into his head, but while neither served to produce fatal results, they rendered him unconscious and made him helpless.

After his arrest he freely confessed the crime and gave as his excuse that he had determined to take his own life and did not want to leave his wife and child alone and unprovided for in this world. Riedel heard the verdict of the jury this morning without the slightest sign of emotion or feeling. He sat unmoved when his doom was pronounced, but did not betray the least indication of fear. After he had been returned to his cell he conversed freely with Your correspondent, and expressed himself delighted with the finding of the jury. It was just exactly as he had desired, wished and hoped for, and requested that his counsel be notified to urge the Court to fix the execution for the earliest possible date. The condemned man is anxious to be reunited with his murdered wife and son, and fears there may be some delay through the formalities of the court which may postpone the joyfully anticipated meeting. During the interview he expressed the deepest love for the victims of his crime and regards the State's taking any cognizance of the affair as a piece of unwarranted interference. He holds to the theory that his wife and child were his own exclusive property and that his right to make whatever disposition of them he desired should be unquestioned.

An Ingenious Chinese Toy.

The New Orleans Times Democrat says:—Messrs. E. Claudel & Bro., 142 Canal street, have just received from San Francisco a wonderful piece of workmanship, which is a striking evidence of the patience, skill and ingenuity of the natives of the celestial empire. It is intended as an easter offering—an egg, but little larger than a turkey's and, to outward appearance, nothing but such an egg as might be picked up in any farmyard. But inside the shell there is such a delicate mechanism that an accurate description of it is well nigh impossible, and to get a fair idea of the limits to which human skill may reach it is necessary to see this marvel. The eggshell is divided into two parts, but so closely and skillfully are they joined that the naked eye fails to discover the line of junction. The tiny works by which its different parts are operated are a lot of microscopic springs and diminutive wheels, so small that the largest of the lot hardly rivals in size those small spangles which are used in gold lace embroidery.

The arrangement is such that once in each hour the two shells, which are hinged at the base, fly apart with a spring, displaying to view a gorgeous tulip, so artistically and truthfully coloured that one can hardly believe that it has not been plucked from a flower-bed instead of being a production of art. The petals of the tulip slowly unfold, opening one after the other, until the flower is full blown. Within it stands a wee church, with belfry, on the outside of which is a small dial plate, where the tiniest hands point the hour. The latter are so very small that, placed next to them, the finest needle seems monstrous. The hour strikes with a fairy-like tinkling, the church slowly revolves on its axis, when the rear comes to view, exposing the works to the sight. Then the petals of the tulip fold together again, the shells of the egg rejoin, and for another hour the whole seems to be uninitiated beholder nothing but a common egg.

Outdoor Sports in England.

Sport is the law and the prophet of Englishmen, and to confess to neither pleasure nor concern in the results of the day's racing, shooting, hunting, angling, is to totally emancipate one's self from the amiable regard of a sport loving Briton. American indifference to the circumstance and event of sport is the contempt of the aristocracy and landed gentry. Sport is the autocrat. It controls society and makes an important chapter in literature. There is a universal devotion to the idea, alike from high and low. But it is the privilege of the great, the temptation of the poor. Poaching as an offense forms stereotyped matter for every well regulated English novel. The dress, the manners, the flirtations which make the maximum of life in country houses during autumnal revels are as important a factor in British society as the London season. Wives, mothers and daughters who have none of the tastes which give zest to the hunt are constrained to provide them selves with more gentle amusement during that sanguinary period in the British year.

It is not a fine taste—the love of horseflesh, cricketing, deer stalking and the general desire of killing something. It seems to take a place in the category with pugilism and bull fighting. But it develops brawn and a kind of rude mental strength, and the cultivation of muscular vigor is something more valued than the artistic sensibility in the English man's passion for an excess of animal force.

A number of ladies in Philadelphia get their bonnets very cheaply by having a clever girl milliner out of employment come to the house. They pay her five dollars a day, and in one day she trims up the bonnets and hats for all the women in the family.

Mrs. Robert Milligan of Bridgeport, Ct., gave birth to her twenty-fifth child on May 10. The mother is 48 years old, and was married at 14 years of age. Her children include five sets of twins, and of the twenty-five twenty-one are living, the oldest being 33 years old. There are nine grandchildren.

The provision in the English Local Government Bill giving compensation to liquor dealers whose licenses are refused, is creating a great deal of opposition. And no wonder. Why should men who receive a modified monopoly from year to year in a very lucrative business be compensated for that in which they had no vested right beyond the year of license? If any are to be compensated it should not be the whiskey sellers, but the impoverished and miserable wives and children of the whiskey buyers. The general feeling is that if the Government insist in retaining that clause it will either wreck the measure or wreck itself, perhaps both.

FARM.

In putting out onion sets have the ground very fine and simply place them on the row, slightly pressing them down, leaving the greater portion of the tops above the surface. Where onions are cultivated in large quantities the sets are thinly scattered in the rows without regard to regularity, and thinly covered.

While strawberries are throwing out runnersearth between rows should be kept very loose, and all the grass and weeds removed from around the old plants, even if it become necessary to hand pull them out, as the strawberry needs plenty of moisture, of which it is deprived when the rows are thick with weeds.

The Field and Farm says: "We predict that Colorada will have three million pounds more wool in 1888 than it had in 1887. The flocks have been increasing, and the young sheep coming on are an improvement in breed over the older ones. The two-year-old half-breed Merinos will many of them clip eight and nine pounds."

The Indians had no almanacs, nor any means of knowing the day of the month. But their rule for planting corn was a very simple and good one, and that was when the leaves of the hickory or butternut were of the size of squirrels' ears. At this time the ground has become warm enough to germinate the seed and push it forward. Corn is a semi-tropical plant, and more impatient of cold than the smaller grains.

Mr. Powell, in Mass. Ploughman: "All I ask of farmers is that they try the old Dominique fowls. They are good layers, good sitters and good fowls for the table."——Prof. Johnson, Mich. Ag. College: "After repeated trials with many of the so-called new and improved varieties of oats, I am compelled to say that, in my judgment, not one of them is superior, if equal, to the common white oat for general cultivation. In yield and quality of grain and straw, it has year after year made a most favorable showing in comparison with any of the new and much advertised sorts." Has Prof. Johnson ever tried Schœsen?——New England Farmer: "Dr. Geo. Bowen, of Woodstock, Connecticut some years ago began experiments in a small way in planting the nuts and seeds of our native forest trees. He learned that if a board be placed in the bottom of the trench in which the seeds are planted, the would-be tap-root will be turned from its downward course and will become more branched and fibrous, making a better tree to transplant.——"Ownership of a garden promotes temperance, as idleness supports the saloon."——Farm Journal: "Now, good woman, be sure and take an afternoon nap every day. This will keep the second wife at bay."

A Fight With Pirates.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 2.—The steamer City of Peking, which arrived from Hong Kong and Yokohama yesterday, brings additional information in regard to the wrecking of the steamer San Pablo, near Turnabout Island, in the Channel of Formosa a month ago. The captain's statement is as follows:—On Monday evening the vessel ran into a thick fog. He kept the ship on her course, though precautions were taken to keep continually sounding. On Tuesday morning at 3 30 the San Pablo struck a sunken rock ten miles north of Turnabout. It was impossible to back the ship off, as the two holds and coal bunkers were filled with water and there was danger of the vessel capsising. It was decided that it was hopeless to attempt to save the steamer or cargo, consequently the passengers and crew took to the boats and made for Turnabout Lighthouse, whence they were conveyed to Shanghai. Just before the lifeboats were ready to be lowered a swarm of Chinese piratical junks came from the neighboring mainland. The queer-looking vessels sailed in line of battle, and Capt. Reed, realising the danger his charges were in, made preparation to repel the attack.

THE PIRATES,

however, came in such overwhelming numbers that before any demonstration could be made on board the spiking vessel the pirates were climbing up the ship's sides They were led by a man armed with a cutlass and a large revolver. His shipmates were also very heavily armed. Capt. Reid passed revolvers and guns among the passengers and crew and after a furious fusilade the Coolies were beaten off. They rallied, however, and made a second and to board the San Pablo, which was fast settling in the water. Some of the pirates gained the main deck in spite of the gallant stand of the passengers and crew and were swarming toward the promenade deck, where the detenders were busy firing and reloading, when Capt. Reed brought the ship's hose pipes into requisition. The long coils of hose were manned by the crew and instantly the pirates were again put to flight, the torrents of boiling water from the pipes sweeping many of them off the decks into the sea. The Coolies then beat a retreat, and drawing their vessels up in line cruised half a mile off the sinking vessel with the evident intention of waiting for its abandonment. During the fight Capt. Reid imprisoned all the Chinese among his crew, with the Chinese passengers, in the forehold for fear they would aid their countrymen. As soon as possible the passengers, mail and specie, were put into the San Pablo's boats, and then all bore away for land. When only a short distance from the wreck they saw the pirates set sail and rush upon the Pablo. They clambered over the ship's sides with grappling hooks and were soon masters of one of the finest boats that ever sailed the Pacific. Whether by accident or design, they soon and when last seen smoke was pouring from the wreck in great clouds. In a few days tugs were sent to the relief of the San Pablo, but they found only the hulk, burned to the water edge and stripped of everything valuable. It is estimated that at least a score of pirates lost their lives in the fight with Capt. Reid and his men. During the battle the women and children who were on board the San Pablo sought the staterooms, where they were in constant fear not only of falling into the hands of the pirates but of being drowned in the water which was filling the ship.

MORE DESPERATE ATTEMPT

SET FIRE TO THE SHIP,

Handy Hints.

Lard, if applied at once, will remove the discoloration after a bruise. Earthenware and china, washed in soap-suds and rinsed in cold water are freed from grease and stains with little or no trouble. Soda is good for greasy dishes. To make tough meat tender, soak it in vinegar and water; if a very large piece, for about twelve hours; for ten pounds of beef use three quarts of water to three quarters of a pint of vinegar, and soak it for six or seven hours. If you are troubled with moths in your feather beds, boil the feathers in water for a short time; then put them in sacks and dry them, working them with the hands all the time. Never enter a sick room in a state of perspiration as the moment you become cold your pores absorb. Do not approach contagious diseases with an empty stomach; nor sit between the sick and the fire, because the heat attracts the vapour.

Sir Morell Mackenzie's Arduous Task.

Speaking of Sir Morell Mackenzie, a writer in Life, London, remarks that few people except the initiated can have any idea of the arduousness of the duties which his position at the German Court imposes upon him. To all intents and purposes, the gifted specialist is a prisoner at the palace, for confidence placed in his skill is so great that the Emperor and Empress cannot endure the thought of his absence from their immediate vicinity; and when, in addition to his ceaseless attention, he is daily subjected to the most venomous and unmerited attacks, it can be easily understood how great is the strain, both mental and physical, to which he is exposed.

A PEEP AT HONDURAS.

The Island of Utilla and Its Pirate Caverns.

BY E. W. P.

A few days ago the steamer which had for three days been slipping swiftly and quietly southward through waters sparkling in the warm sunlight, dropped her anchors and lifted her hoarse voice abreast of the Island of Utilla, twenty miles off the coast of Honduras. Less than a mile away the surf broke on the black reef, and on the strip of white beach beyond. Over the foam drooped the feathery fronds of cocoanut trees. Between the slender gray trunks the passengers caught glimpses of the red clay walls and brown thatched roofs of huts. Behind the point lay a quiet little bay, wherein two or three schooners were moored, their topmasts showing faintly against the forest beyond. As the steamer forged slowly ahead in the smooth water the bay opened to view, disclosing the government building, bearing on its top a tower in which a range light is kept for the safe guidance of sailors at night. Then a white church, built for and by the Methodists; a white cottage or two, a few weather-beaten buildings on the beach, and then the village on the hillside, the bananas and the tamarind trees. The first sight of land after a voyage of nearly 900 miles was as novel as it was refreshing to the passengers who so lately felt the chilling breezes of the Northern country.

HALF HIDDEN BY THE PALMS,

Behind the village the hill rose some 300 feet, covered from foot to rounded top by dense growths of rich green. In the heart of that hill are carved out of the solid rock chamber after chamber, connected by passages extending deep down toward the level of the sea.

"How long are the longest of these passages?" I asked Mr. Solomon, a planter who was born on the island.

"Some of them run down 600 fathoms; may be more. I don't believe any one has ever gone to the end. It is a very suspicious looking place. Many men don't care to go there."

"Are the rooms regular in form and size?"

"Some are as square as the rooms in a house, and some as round as—as the binnacle there. They say the pirates made the cave, and men have found silver and gold pitchers and cups there. One man found a big nugget of gold in one room; but he didn't bring it away, and he never would go back to get it. Plenty of men have hunted for money on the island. Chests full of gold have been dug up. And there is a place in the swamp southwest from the hill, a square pile of stone built up, where they say vast stores of treasure are buried. Some men have tried to dig them out, but they were frightened by something and never got the treasure. There was leading down to the pile of masonry. The surface of the road is broken now, but the under part, the bed, is as good as any you ever saw."

Two hours' steaming through showers which hid the land brought us close to the extinct volcano of Congrehoy. Black clouds hid the top, 7,500 feet high. When the clouds were lightened of their weary burden of rain, and the thick veil lifted a little, the blue back sides of the massive cone were brightened here and there by torrents leaping down from the very edge of the crater, from which no fires have gleamed in nearly a quarter of a century. Along the narrow coast between the foot of the mountains and the sea are plantations where grow bananas and plantains, cocoanuts and pineapples, scores of shiploads every year, which find their way to the United States. Occasionally a little town is seen hiding among the trees at the water's edge, the pretty white cottage with green blinds looking delightfully cool and restful.

At noon the next day the Oteri let go her anchor abreast of the ancient City of Truxillo—which, if the people who have lived here all their lives know anything of the matter, should be spelled Trujillo. There was some talk when we landed about the rifles which the party carried, but by skillful diplomacy we managed to leave them and the ammunition in the custody of the collector of customs. He was very polite and attentive, but—business is business, you know, and duty is duty. He explained that while incomers are not exactly prohibited from bringing rifles into the country, the government would be pleased if visitors to the republic would bring shotguns instead. It was possible, however, that in view of the fact that we were hunting for pleasure, had come nearly 2,000 miles to kill deer and and would doubtless be willing to give bonds that we would not sell guns nor ammunition, we might be permitted to take the rifles when we should start for the coast near Caratasca. So we left the guns. It was so much better that way. No bother of guns hanging about the walls or standing in corners.

Up a rather sharp pitch a hundred feet long or so, past a corner of the ruins of the ancient fort, and the plaza was reached. On the south side is the hotel, and a very good one, all things considered. An hour later our traps were scattered about the large, airy room, and we were sitting comfortably in the fresh breeze, in rocking chairs of American make and maple, on the balcony running along two sides of the house.

Across the pretty plaza is the public school building, the barracks, the house of the commandante, and the American consulate. Beyond these, the crumbling old ramparts, the funny little watchtowers of bygone centuries still perched at the angles. East of these, the outer walls and inner rows of pillars of the old prison where Walker, the filibuster of a generation ago, was shot. In and out of these roofless old walls of ecquina, red brick and black rocks cemented together by hands which withered many a long year ago, the lizards dart almost as quick as a flash of lightning, finding ready refuge in the peepholes whence blazed the fires of escopetas in those good old times when brave Spanish soldiers within shouted hatred and defiance to those merciless enemies of man, the good king and of God, the buccaneers who were long the terror of this coast.

Back of the hotel is the town, a typical Spanish-American place, with its low and massive church of stone, bricks and cement, beside which the roses and oleanders are in bloom; its with brick walls, roofs of brown tiles, and green blinds; the streets paved with large cobblestones, sloping to the gutter in the middle of the way; its shops, in which are found for sale varied stores of goods for every ordinary purpose of tropical life, many bearing familiar trademarks of American makers; and the barber shop, where the victim sits in an ordinary chair and submits to ten minutes of rasping torture, yet does not rise and slay the operator, who pleasantly smiles and does not know that he deserves extermination. Down on the flat, west of the old town, is the quarter called Carib Town. There live the working people, the skillful and bold Carib sailors and fishermen, the washerwomen, who whip the buttons off your garments, and the major part of the fabrics away afterwards on the rocks. Back of the city rises the mountain, and it is near, for the bench is narrow on which Truxillo sits with her foot washed by the bright waves of the Carribbean Sea.

In these mountains and the densely wooded valleys is plenty of deer, they tell us, and wild pigs. Gov. Martinez told me a day or two ago that gentlemen who are fond of hunting find no difficulty about killing a deer almost any day. In the beautiful bay which lies before our door a dozen dories are sailing, while their crews pull in barcouta or bluefish, Spanish mackerel, bass and other fish of goodly size and flavor. Surely, than these can be found in which to fish and sail, bathe and idle away the hours in which folk in the North gasp and shiver in the pinching of Manitoba zephyrs. The bay is from five to nine miles wide and not far from the same in depth. It is shut off from the power of the northerly gales which sometimes blow by a low, thickly timbered point, above which shows the swelling top of Bonacca, thirty-seven miles off the coast. In the north-west the peaks of Ruatan, forty five miles distant, rise from the sea to tempt the idler to explorations in search and study of the traces found thereof that ancient civilization of which we have so very little knowledge. Eastward from Truxillo the coast stretches many a league, past the Aguan River, where a company is improving the navigation, planting fruit trees and setting out bananas, past the mouth of Black River, where an attempt was made by the Englishi to establish a colony some fifty years ago; and past the Patook River, the largest stream in the Republic, to Cape Gracias a Dios, where the weary Spanish discoverers were very thankful to land, about FOUR CENTURIES AGO.

NO MORE DELIGHTFUL WATERS

Sandy keys and coral islets are there, and beyond, affording abundant field for turtle fishing, while the mainland gives promise of many a curious sight and, mayhap, exciting experience.

Foreign enterprise seems at last to be awaking to the fact that Honduras has offered exceedingly good opportunities for investments, but there is even yet no indication that the very friendly and more than liberal feeling of President Bogran and his administration towards foreigners is properly appreciated. There is reason to believe, though, that the encouragement offered by the Hondurians to foreign trade and industry is soon to receive a fair return. A company has established in Truxillo the only banking house in the Republic and has begun to issue paper currency. This will greatly facilitate business as soon as people shall have learned to use this currency, instead of shipping specie or goods to balance accounts, as has been the general practice here. The banking company is engaged in other and here, including the development of mines, and the improvement of the navigation of an important river.

While we were at dinner this evening two men passed the door bearing in a hammock one of the sailors who came ashore this afternoon in an open boat which belonged to the Norwegian ship Jan until she was wrecked on a reef nine days ago, as she was trying to make her way to Black River, in Jamaica. Shortly after we arose from the table a cart, drawn by oxen, rumbled by laden with stuff brought in the boat. On top of the load sat the captain, sunburnt and wretched, and following him staggered the other survivors, with haggard faces and swollen feet. Each had received a small ration of extract of beef and a drop of whisky and water. They had suffered from want of water, notwithstanding showers had fallen frequently during the last week. Poor beggars; they must feel that they are in clover now.

Hungary's Great Tunnel.

An engineering work that has taken over a century to construct can hardly fail to offer some points of interest in its history, and illustrate the march of events during the years of its progress. An instance of this kind is to be found in a tunnel not long completed, but which was commenced over one hundred years ago. This tunnel or adit, as it should be more strictly termed, is at Schemnitz, in Hungary. Its construction was agreed upon in 1782, the object being to carry off the water from the Schemnitz mines to the lower part of the Gran valley. The work is now complete, and it forms the longest tunnel in the world, being 10 27 miles long, or about one mile longer than St. Gothard, and two and a half miles longer than Mount Cenis. The height is nine feet ten inches, and the breadth five feet three inches. This tunnel, which has taken so long in making, has cost very near a million sterling, but it appears to have been well spent—at least the present generation has no reason to grumble, for the saving from being able to do away with water-raising appliances amounts to £15,000 a year.

There is one further point, however, worth notice, for if we have the advantage of our great-grandfathers in the matter of mechanical appliances they were certainly better off in the price of labour. The original contract for the tunnel, made in 1782, was that it should be completed in thirty years and should cost £7 per yard run. For eleven years the work was done at this price, but the French revolution enhanced the cost of labour and materials to such an extent that for thirty years little progress was made.

For ten years following much progress was made, and then the work dropped for twenty years more, until the water threatened to drown the mines altogether. Finally the tunnel was completed in 1878 the remaining part costing £21 a yard, or more than three times as much as the original contract rate.

Thibet.

The attack on the British garrison at Gratong by a large force of Thibetans indicates that the latter are seriously bent on hostilities. For a long time armed parties have crossed into Nepaul and created disturbances there, and several skirmishes have occurred. The Bengal Government has been obliged to send troops to the frontier, and now it looks as if open war was to go on. Thibet has been one of the most vigorously exclusive of even Asiatic countries. A few years ago the famous traveller, Prajevalsky, was prevented from reaching its capital, Lassa, but a few months hence, it appears, he is going to make another effort to get there, with an escort of two officers and a few men, he himself being in the Russian military service. The real opposition to opening Thibet to travel and trade is thought to come from Pekin, since Thibet is an integral part of the Chinese Empire, and China watches with suspicion all efforts to gain access through this "back door" of her provinces, whose trade and resources she wishes to completely control. Whether the present turbulence in Nepaul is encouraged either at Pekin or Lassa does not appear, but it is clear enough that the recent amicable overtures of the Viceroy of India have thus far proved of little avail. Yet, out of the hostilities may come important results towards the opening of Thibet.—N. Y. Times.

How Fast Can a Train Move.

Many questions have been asked concerning the highest speed possible to be attained by a railway locomotive. The London Engineer submits the statement that eighty miles an hour is the greatest possible limit, and for the following reasons:—

Because no greater velocity has ever been attained.

Because of the resistance of the air.

Because of the back pressure of the cylinders.

Because of the amount of power which must "no doubt be lost in imparting violent motions to masses of metal which can make no return when coming to rest. The swinging of the engine, the excessive vibration of its parts, and the jar and concussion all operate to the same end, and tend to keep down the speed."

Because of "the extraordinary retarding influence of very moderate rising gradients."

Because of the coupling rod—"it appears to be beyond question that coupling an engine tends to keep down the speed."

Here are three items of interest about women: The Rev. Carrie J. Bartlett, who used to be a Minneapolis newspaper woman, has been for nearly two years the pastor of a Unitarian church at Sioux Falls, Minn., and under her ministration the congregation has steadily increased. Edith Martineau, the niece of Harriet Martineau, has been elected a member of the Royal Society of Water Colorists. England's leading woman doctor is Mrs. Garrett Anderson, who has a practice worth $50,000.

They are having hard work finding hard pan for the foundation of the new bridge across the Thames at East New London, Conn. The have put spiles down 113 feet, and have not got to solid earth yet. It is thought that bottom will be reached at about 130 feet.

Clam Shells Sixty Dollars a Pair.

The Hartford Post says:—Col. Silas Moore, of Southington, sold a pair of clam shells last week for $60. The pair were two feet and ten inches in length and about one foot and ten inches wide and weighed 304 pounds. Col. Moore is the owner of a pair weighing 339 pounds, which he would not sell for $100. These large clam shells come from the Mediterranean Sea, and there are some in Italy which weigh 700 pounds. Most of these shells have a blemish, but in a public museum, where they are not handled, the blemish may not be seen. In a private collection it is desirable to have perfect shells. Col. Moore's one-hundred-dollar shells are perfect, and the finest in the United States. There are parts of these big clams which are good food, Col. Moore has seen a clam steak six inches wide and a foot long. In his collection are clam shells so small that ten pairs would not weigh an ounce. To outweigh the big pair would require more than 10,000 of the small ones.

"Her Ladyship."

A sense of official greatness is ingrained in the nature of people who have been overshadowed by what is known as a paternal government. Such persons form their own conceptions of angelic ministrations. The idea of the guide to Westminster Abbey was original, to say the least.

The man acted as guide to the monuments, and, upon coming to that of Lord and Lady Monteagle, which represents the spirit of Lady M—— ascending to heaven under the guardianship of angels, finished his pompous description of it with these words:

"A hangel is 'anding Her Ladyship to 'eaven."

At the same time he bowed as deferentially as though he himself had been performing the office of master of ceremonies to "Her Ladyship," and was about to "and" her into some ball room.

"Speaking about the weather, General, answer me this. If 32 above zero is the freezing point, what, pray, is the squeezing point?" General Greely, who is one of the most modest men living, replied with some embarrassment that he did not know, and then he added, "Do you?" "Why, certainly," the pretty woman replied. "It's two in the shade, of course."

DUTTON, JUNE 14, 1888.

NOTES.

—Hon. Edward Blake will return to Canada in August.

—The City Council of Toronto have repealed the early closing by-law.

—Winnipeg grain dealers are said to have cleared $700,000 by the recent rise in wheat.

—Governor Hill of New York has signed the bill substituting death by electricity for hanging.

—Three lives were lost and great damage done to property by a cyclone in Ottawa last week.

—Cleveland and Thurman were unanimously nominated for President and Vice-President of the United States at the Democratic Convention held in St Louis last week.

—Hon. Edward Blake will act as counsel to Hon. Oliver Mowat in the case of the Ontario Government against the Federal Government, which comes up before the Privy Council in England this week.

—The Dominion Cabinet has been reconstructed. Hon. G. E. Foster becomes Finance Minister in succession to Sir Charles Tupper; Mr. Chas. H. Tupper is made Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and ex-Lt.-Gov. Dewdney takes the portfolio of Minister of the Interior.

—The Senate, by a recent vote, only allow search to be made for liquor in Scott Act counties in the daytime, but decided it was quite proper to give Customs officials the power to break into the premises of merchants in search of smuggled or undervalued goods at any time in the whole twenty-four hours.

—Canada has a couple more new knights, Chief Justice Galt and Dr. Daniel Wilson being the last to find favor in a certain quarter. This knighthood business is becoming rather monotonous in this country.—Standard. We are glad to see that Dr. Wilson has refused the bauble, being content with his present well-earned honors.

—Nearly the whole of Friday's session of the Niagara Conference of the Methodist church was again taken up with the case of the Rev. Mr. Longley, who made a long and affecting statement, confessing his deep penitence for his error and pleading for mercy. The Toronto district resolution for his expulsion was rejected, there being only twelve votes for it, and by a vote of 56 to 40 a resolution was carried suspending him from the ministry for one year.

—Say, friend, if you owe anything for this paper, remit at once, for these reasons, we dish up all the news and we need the money. You owe it, then pay it. If you don't want the paper, pay up and stop it. If you take it, pay for it. We want you to take it, and if you oblige us in this, then pay up or you are only a clog on the wheel. We cannot afford, and do not want, to furnish you with our journal unless you pay for it. Now, then, let us hear from you with a remittance of what you us. —Ex.

—The Rev. Sam Jones says: "If I want to get good, square judgment on something I had done I would rather go to a newspaper office than to any court of justice. I know that journalists probe into men's characters, and that the pure need not fear all the presses in America. The way to be safe from so-called newspaper attacks is to be a Christian. The reporters are the best detective force in the country. They have brought more criminals to justice and punctured more shams than all agencies combined."

WEEKLY WEAVINGS.

PRIVATE funds to loan at 5½ per cent. on good security.—H. CLAY.

LARGE quantities of wool are being brought to the Dutton Woolen mills.

A. M. MCINTYRE has been to Detroit shipping lumber. He returned last Thursday.

THE woolen mills of S. V. Willson & Co., of Union, were completed last Saturday and are now ready for business.

I AM LENDING MONEY AT PRESENT IN LARGE LOANS ON GOOD FARM SECURITY AT 5½ PER CENT.—A. MCCRIMMON, St. Thomas.

WEST LORNE has adopted the early-closing system. The by-law came in force on Monday. The stores are now closed at 8 o'clock.

A FAREWELL social and bazaar will be held at the Methodist parsonage on Wednesday evening next, 20th. This will also be the first anniversary of the purchasing of the parsonage.

THE Stationing Committee of the London Conference of the Methodist church have placed Rev. E. Middleton in charge of Tyrconnell circuit. Mr. Hamilton goes to Fingal.

THE Minister of Education has issued a notice that "the authorized retail price for the public school drawing books on and after the 1st of January next will be five cents each." The present price is ten cents each.

THANKS.—We have received from the Managing Committee of the Ridgetown Driving Club a complimentary press badge to the sports to be held in that town June 28 and 29. Prizes to the amount of $1,200 are to be competed for.

HIS eyes were wild, his teeth were set, as down the street he ran. The crowd made way as on he went, for this excited man. Was fire, murder and sudden death the tidings that he bore? O, no, he is a base ball crank, who wants to know the score.

THE county judge Monday gave judgment in the division court case of Schulte vs. McMillan, an action brought by John Schulte to recover from Angus McMillan 1½ per cent. commission for sale of farm. The judge allowed plaintiff $75 and costs.

A NUISANCE.—A young man was fined in the Cleveland police court the other day for standing on the street corners and staring at ladies who passed, greatly to their annoyance. A few instances of this kind of justice are needed in Dutton.

SNEAK THIEVES.—Sneak thieves are operating in the vicinity of Iona Station On Thursday night, not satisfied with stripping a clothes line at the residence of Judson Milligan, they visited Mr. Hugh McPhail's, and helped themselves to a quantity of wool and some pork.

NOTHING IN IT.—The heirs of the Teetzel estate, resident in St. Thomas and vicinity, who recently subscribed a fund and sent Mr. James Teetzel to Germany to investigate all the facts in connection with the untold millions which awaited claimants, on Saturday cabled Mr. Teetzel to return home. "There ain't nothing to it."

RAISE MORE ONIONS.—If our farmers would pay attention to growing onions they would find it very remunerative. It has been found almost impossible to obtain enough for culinary purposes during the past spring, and they have been worth at wholesale $5 per hundred pounds. Onions are being imported from Egypt and Malta to supply the demand in Ontario. An acre will easily produce 100 bushels.

THE Thistles played the return match with the Young Atlantics in Atlantic Park, St. Thomas, on Saturday last, and were defeated by 12 to 14. The absence of some of the Thistles' best players and a number of foolish but costly errors gave the Atlantics the victory. B. J. Schultz umpired satisfactorily to both sides. As this is a game for each club, another match will have to be played to decide the victors.

A HEARTLESS "JOKE."—Sunday morning Wm. Doyle was presented with a cigar by a friend. Later on in the day he concluded to have a smoke and accordingly lit the aforesaid cigar. Before proceeding far with the delicious weed it suddenly exploded, it having been filled with powder, severely burning Mr. Doyle's face. The perpetrator of such a cruel and heartless "joke" should be made an example of.

BRUTAL ASSAULT.—Mr. McPherson, brother of D. McPherson, Dutton, watchman at the crossing of the M. C. R. and G. T. R. about three miles east of St. Thomas, was murderously attacked about 9 o'clock on Wednesday morning of last week by three tramps, who beat him until insensible, and, after robbing him of his watch and other articles, threw his body into a pool of water. Mr. McPherson is recovering slowly. Several tramps have been arrested for the crime, but the guilty ones have not been captured as yet.

AN ANCIENT RELIC.—A correspondent of the Rodney Mercury says: A very ancient relic is to be seen partially buried on the farm of Mr. Philip Schleihauf. The stones are thirty inches in diameter and six inches thick. The lower one is concave, and the upper one is fitted to it. They were dressed to run with the sun, and were propelled by a bullock working a wooden lever. The origin of this and similar mills date back to the time of Abraham and Sarah, when dwelling in tents near Padanarum. The stones are well-worn, but they seem to have suited the times, and the simple-minded miller who last used them.

JUBILEE.—The Dutton corps of the Salvation Army purpose holding a grand jubilee on Dominion day.

THERE is talk of a telephone line being put up between St. Thomas and Ridgetown. What is to hinder some of our enterprising men from securing privileges and having some instruments put in along the line and especially in Dutton?

THERE is a good chance for some active and trusty men to secure paying work at once by engaging with Jas. E. Whitney, Nurseryman, Rochester, N.Y., to sell his warranted nursery stock He furnishes outfit free and the work is steady. No experience required.

DURING the summer months the dust flying on our Main street is almost suffocating. Could not our merchants form a "combine" to protect their goods by having Main street sprinkled? "Combines" are fashionable; let's be in the fashion in this respect anyway.

MRS. JAMES GREEN, who has been seriously ill for the past few weeks, departed this life on Wednesday morning. The funeral will take place early Friday morning, as the remains will be interred in the St. Thomas Cemetery, and the procession wishes to leave Dutton at 8 a.m.

DUTTON is well represented at court now in session in St. Thomas. McIntyre vs. Hockin & Pool, an action for wages claimed to be due; Cattanach vs. Bake, action on replevin; Queen vs. C. H. Whiting, indecent assault and a graver charge; Queen vs. T. C. Hewitt, et al., false pretenccs.

WE understand that a subscription is being taken up for doings on Dominion Day. The Shamrocks have arranged for a ball match with Fingal and the Dutton and Ridgetown gun clubs will probably have a shoot on that day. By a little energy on the part of our citizens a number of other sports can easily be added.

WE have received a copy of the prize list just issued for the tenth Industrial Exhibition, which is to be held at Toronto from the 10th to the 22nd of September next. Any of our readers may obtain a copy by dropping a post card to H. J. Hill, Secretary, Toronto. The Provincial Exhibition will be held at Kingston this year, from Sept. 10 to 15th, of which we have also received the prize list.

THE Rodney people want a roller mill. Report says that the one patterned after that used by Abraham and Sarah is about played out. The Aldborough Council will exempt from taxation for ten years a roller grist mill, provided David Patterson erect one in Rodney. If the proposed mill be erected any other roller grist mills now in the township shall also be exempt from taxation. Why not stone mills?

REMEMBER THIS.—The latest postal laws are such that newspaper publishers can arrest any one for fraud who takes a paper and refuses to pay for it. Under the law the man who allows his subscription to run along for some time unpaid, or takes three papers from the post-office, and then orders the postmaster to mark it "refused," and has a notice sent notifying the publisher, makes himself liable to arrest and fine same as for theft.

THE NEWEST SWINDLE.—A new swindle has been developed, and several farmers have already been bitten. To operate requires a shrewd man and a second or third rate horse. The man in this instance is particularly shrewd, and the horse worth $50 or $60. The confidence man informs himself accurately regarding the farmer upon whom he intends to call, talks of his family affairs, has some good jokes that are worked off at the expense of one member or another, is very slick all round and generally succeeds in convincing the honest farmer that he's a genial fellow and all right. Through these traits of character the fellow gets his board and lodging free of charge, and the host that gets off with no heavier loss is in great luck. After he has circulated about in one neighborhood long enough to become popular and solid, he drops in upon the one selected as his victim. He has with him a note purporting to be made by a neighboring farmer. It is for $50 and the fellow wants to dispose of it. He doesn't expect to be in that section soon again and besides has need of ready money. He gets $40 for the paper if he can, but occasionally drops down to $35. This is a very enticing snare, and the sale is usually made in short order. It is invariably the case that a man on horseback is soon making himself scarce in that section galloping away to some other field of enterprise. The note is a forgery and the victim is out the cash invested. The trick has caught several of the farmers and the presumption is that the horse is still going, as all attempts to capture its owner have thus far been unsuccessful.

THE DEAF HEAR.

After eight years suffering from deafness, so bad that I was unable to attend to my business, I was cured by the use of Hagyard's Yellow Oil. With gratitude I make this known for the benefit of others afflicted. Harry Ricardo, Toronto.

There is a post-office for every one thousand women and children in the United States, and if the expense of carrying the mails was paid directly by the people pro rata, each citizen would pay an average of 85 cents a year.

PERFECT HEALTH

Can only be attained by carefully attending to the laws of nature as expressed in the wants of the system. To do this successfully requires the use of Burdock Blood Bitters occasionally to secure the regulating and strengthening effect of this splendid medicine.

The case of Zealand vs. the Grand Trunk, arising out of the accident of July 15th last, whereby Mr. S. G. Zealand, wife and child lost their lives, has been settled, the railway company paying the heirs of the deceased the sum of $12,500, they paying all costs and doctors bills. The doctors bills amount to $400.

A sound body and a contented mind are necessary to perfect happiness. If you wish to possess these, cleanse your blood with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It is perfectly safe to take, and is a thoroughly reliable, highly concentrated and powerful blood purifier.

The Dunkard church, in its conference at Wabash, Ind., has denied the petition of its young men to wear moustaches and have their hair cut. It is evident that the Spanish proverb—"that a moustache is to a kiss what salt is to an egg"—does not find favor with the elder Dunkards.

HOW IT WORKS.

The mode of operating of Burdock Blood Bitters is that it works at one and the same time upon the stomach, liver, bowels and blood, to cleanse, regulate and strengthen. Hence its almost universal value in chronic complaints.

Backache, stitches in the side, inflation and soreness of the bowels, are symptoms of a disordered state of the digestive and assimilative organs, which can be corrected by the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills.

General Ross, the new commander of the forces in Canada, is a rather short, thick-set man, and wears side whiskers and a light moustache. He has a distinguished military record, having served through the Crimean war, the Indian mutiny and Afghanistan wars. He took part in the battles of Alma and Inkerman, the siege of Sebastopol, the action at Cawnpore, the siege and capture of Lucknow, accompanied General Sir Frederick Roberts in his famous march to Candahar, and was second in command when the Afghans were routed and practically annihilated.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

OLD DR. CHASE'S NEW RECEIPT BOOK.

His Last and Crowning Life Work.

Dr. Chase's Third, last and Complete RECEIPT BOOK AND HOUSEHOLD PHYSICIAN, or the Book for the Million, contains nearly 900 pages and sells for $2.25 in cloth binding and $2.50 in imported oil cloth, marble edge, and is justly by him called

'The crowning work of my life.'

It is the result of over half a century's observation, study and experience. Yet this embodies no compilation of his former books. IT IS WHOLLY A NEW BOOK. If 30 years ago he could produce a book that has had a sale of over 150,000 copies, and has made his name familiar in nearly every English-speaking home in the United States, Canada and thousands of homes in Europe, Australia and South America, what kind of a book could or would he produce at his CROWNING LIFE WORK, with more than thirty years of additional practice and experience? The book itself answers the question, and is the most valuable production in the history of book publishing.

Caution! Unscrupulous and pirating publishers are attempting to copy this book by taking portions of it out and palming it off on the public as the complete work. We own the manuscript, purchased from Dr. Chase's heirs. See that you get the GENUINE book. See that it has our name on the title page and is copyrighted by us.

To Assist Nature
In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal.
Ayer's Cherry Pectoral
Soothes and Heals
the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.
L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."
Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with Lung Trouble.
For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

A firm on Wall street, New York, has in operation and on exhibition what is probably the smallest working printing press in the world. It is an interchangeable cylinder, printing from a continuous roll, with a cut-off. It is but twelve and a half inches in length and seven and a half inches high. Its width in the widest part is ten and a half inches. At the office where it is in use it has been necessary to furnish to brokers and others a daily letter of financial news. Until the invention of the press this service was performed by the manifold system. Nine manifolders were required, working very rapidly. By simple hand power, after the type is set, 200 copies per minute of any circular can be printed. With a dynamo machine to furnish the power, over 500 copies can be printed in the same time.

Recently some five hundred brewery workmen in New York city who had been locked out four weeks because the boss brewers refused to recognize their union, marched down town to Mayor Hewitt's office and asked the Mayor, through S. E. Shevitch, the noted anarchist, to do something in their behalf. The Mayor advised the men to give in and go back to work. Shevitch said if the men did that they would be called "scabs." That was too much for the Mayor. He interrupted Shevitch and excitedly denounced labor organizations for their tyranny in compelling men to join them. "It is tyranny that no American will submit to," said he. "You have half a million men in two labor organizations, let us say in the United States, yet you seek to control 58,000,000 people. You have no right to take away my liberty. It is a violation of law. You talk of 'scab' as a term of reproach. I consider the 'scab' a moral hero, who refuses to surrender his individual liberty."

EARLY-CLOSING ACT. The Hon. Commissioner of Public Works certainly deserves the gratitude not only of clerks but the mercantile trade generally throughout the Province for this measure of reform. The general verdict of the press goes to show invariable success wherever the Act has been adopted. It does not seem that in framing the bill the idea of embracing rural municipalities was intended, as was very clearly shown by Mr. Clay in a recent issue of your valuable paper, and the Alboro Council were without doubt acting ultra vires in passing the by-law they recently passed under and by virtue of this Act. In Dutton, be it said to the credit of the merchants, the early closing plan has been fairly and honorably observed for over three weeks, and while I trust it may continue I fear the critical period is yet to come. A most opportune time of the year was chosen for the scheme, but when the busy season of harvest arrives, I imagine farmers, knowing as they do, that it involves no penalty, will demand as the consideration of their trade to be supplied with goods at former hours. Another great danger to early closing is this: Certain penny-grab parasites, under cover of keeping refreshment rooms only, invade the legitimate domain of grocers by selling teas, tobaccos, etc., at any hour. This will certainly work ruin to the plan unless promptly suppressed by the clerks.

COUNTY COUNCIL VS. COUNTY JUDGE. All must regret that matters have reached their present stage between the representatives of the people of Elgin and his Honor the county judge. The bench, which should have our utmost respect, is in many quarters regarded with the most unqualified contempt. This is a grave state of affairs, and I cannot see how the judge should escape bearing the onus of responsibility for this condition of things It is, without doubt, within the prerogative of a judge to criticize matters regarding the State, though removed from judicature, but to impeach the integrity of an honorable body of men chosen by their fellows to conduct public affairs, is an abuse which should not and will not go unchallenged. No one appears to be much exercised over the drubbing the judge is receiving from county councillors, Bohemian and others, the general opinion being that "it serves him right. It would be trifling indeed did this fiasco culminate in the ousting or shelving of Judge Hughes, but I fear that the judgeship of Elgin has so long been trailed through the mire that it will take long years of careful deportment by his much-wished for successor to win the respect and esteem which is properly due that high office.

UNITED POWER.
Burdock Blood Bitters unites in one combination remarkable powers as a tonic, blood purifying, system-regulating and cleansing medicine. It has no equal in its power of curing all diseases of the stomach, liver, kidneys bowels and blood.

A side collision took place about 5 o'clock Tuesday morning at Cornell. An extra east drawn be engine 407, Conductor Gillespie, ran past Cornell and struck an extra west, Conductor Deyell, engine 359, which was backing into the switch. Both engines were badly damaged. One flat car loaded with granite was wrecked, and three other cars derailed or more or less damaged. The wrecker was sent out and the track cleared.

During the year 1887, according to the Government returns, 10 passengers were killed, 84 employees and 84 others a total of 178. The passengers were all killed through their own negligence. During the year the Canada Southern passenger trains made 990,140 miles, freight trains 1,689,187, and mixed 112,662. The engine mileage was 3,762,215; average rate of speed, 35 miles per hour for passenger trains, and 15 for freight trains. The operating expenses were $997,913.10. There were 8 employees killed and 3 others, and 26 employees and 2 others injured.

The poor sparrow will soon have no safe abiding place, no spot where he may feel he is among friends. Farmers in England are now fully convinced that he possesses all the bad qualities with which he has been charged with here, and have set to work systematically to rid themselves of him and his brood. In various counties, but especially in Cheshire, boys are making wages out of prize money that is paid by the authorities—six cents a dozen for heads and eggs. The Farmers' Club, of London, has stated the case against the sparrow, and nobody has ventured to make reply. He is quarrelsome, noisy, dirty and greedy; he plays havoc in the garden, from the crocus bed to the green pea vines. He drives away the really insectivorous birds, and then lives at the expense of the garden and kitchen, leaving the caterpillars and other pests to increase as they never did before. It is seriously stated that the sparrow causes a loss to agricultural England of from forty to fifty million dollars per year.

Luxuriant Hair
Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.
Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."
Ten Years Younger.
Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."
A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.
The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

THE THREAD OF LIFE;

OR

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER VI.—WHICH LADY?

Hugh found the day among the sandhills simply delightful. He had said with truth he loved all innocent pleasures, for his was one of those sunny, many-sided, æsthetic natures, in spite of its underlying tinge of pessimism and sadness, that throw themselves with ardour into every simple country delight, and find deep enjoyment in trees and flowers and waves and scenery, in the scent of new-mown hay and the song of birds, and in social intercourse with beautiful women. Warren Relf had readily enough fallen in with Hugh's plan for their day's outing; for at a first glance he had been greatly taken with Hugh's pretty cousin, the dark-eyed Girton girl. His possession of the Mud-Turtle gave him for the moment a title to respect, for a yacht's a yacht, however tiny. So he took them all up together in the yawl to the foot of the sandhills; and while Mrs. Meysey and the girls were unpacking the hampers and getting lunch ready on the white slopes of the drifted dunes, he sat down by the shore and sketched a little bit of the river foreground that exactly suited his own peculiar style—an islet of mud, rising low from the bed of the sluggish stream, crowned with purple sea-aster and white flowered scurvy-grass, and backed by a slimy bed of tidal ooze, that shone with glancing rays of gold and crimson in the broad flood of the reflected sunlight.

Elsie was very happy, too, in her way; for had she not Hugh all the time by her side, and was she not wearing the ardent verses she had received from him by post that very morning, inside her dress, pressed close against her heart, and rising and falling with every pulse and flutter of her bosom? To him, the handicraftsman, they were a mere matter of ocean and potion, and lotion and devotion, strung together on a slender thread of pretty conceit; but to her, in the innocent ecstasy of a first great love, they meant more than words could possibly utter.

She could not thank him for them; her pride and delight went too deep for that; and even were it otherwise, she had no opportunity. But once, while they stood together by the sounding sea, with Winifred by their side, looking critically at the picture Warren Relf had sketched in hasty outline, and begun to color, she found an occasion to let the poet know, by a graceful allusion, she had received his little tribute of verse in safety. As the painter with a few dainty strokes filled in the floating iridescent tints upon the sunlit ooze, she murmured aloud, as if quoting from some well-known poem:

> Red strands that faintly fleck and spot
> The tawny flood the banks enfold;
> A web of Tyrian purple, shot
> Through cloth of gold.

Hugh looked up at her appreciatively with a smile of recognition. They were his own verses, out of the Ballade of the Char he had written and posted to her the night before. "Mere faint Swinburnian echoes, nothing worth," he murmured low in a deprecating aside; but he was none the less flattered at the delicate attention, for all that. "And how clever of her, too," he thought to himself with a faint thrill, "to have pieced them in so deftly with the subject of the picture! After all, she's a very intelligent girl, Elsie! A man might go farther and fare worse—if it were not for that negative quantity in Girton and Nirvana."

Warren Relf looked up also with a quick glance at the dark-eyed girl. "You're right, Miss Challoner," he said, stealing a lover's side-look at the iridescent peacock hues upon the gleaming mud. "It shines like opal. No precious stone on earth could be lovelier than that. Few people have the eye to see beauty in a flat of tidal mud like the one I'm painting; but cloth of gold and Tyrian purple are the only words one could possibly find to express in fit language the glow and glory of its exquisite coloring. If only I could put it on canvas now, as you've put it in words, even the Hanging Committee of the Academy, I believe—hard-hearted monsters—would scarcely be stony enough to dream of rejecting it."

Elsie smiled. How every man reads things his own way, by the light of his own personal interests! Hugh had seen she was trying to thank him unobtrusively for his copy of verses; Warren Relf had only found in her apt quotation a passing criticism on his own little water-color.

After lunch, the two seniors, the Squire and Mrs. Meysey, manifested the distinct desire of middle age for a quiet digestion in the shade of the sandhills; and the four younger folks, nothing loth to be free, wandered off in pairs at their own sweet will along the bank of the river. Hugh took Elsie for his companion at first, while Warren Relf had to put himself off for the time being with the blue-eyed Winifred. Now, Relf hated blue eyes. "But we must arrange it like a set of Lancers," Hugh cried with a languid wave of his graceful hand; "at the end of the figure, set to corners and change partners." Elsie might have felt half jealous for a moment at this equitable suggestion, if Hugh hadn't added to her in a lower tone and with his sweetest smile: "I mustn't monopolise you all the afternoon, you know, Elsie; Relf must have his innings too; I can see by his face he's just dying to talk to you."

"I'd rather, a great deal, talk with you, Hugh," Elsie murmured gently, looking down at the sands with an apparently sudden geological interest in their minute composition.

"I'm proud to hear it; so would I," Hugh answered gallantly. "But we mustn't be selfish. I hate selfishness. I'll sacrifice myself by-and-by on the altar of fraternity to give Relf a turn in due season. Meanwhile, Elsie, let's be happy together while we can. Moments like these don't come to one often in the course of a lifetime. They're as rare as rubies and as all good things. When they do come, I prize them far too much to think of wasting them in petty altercation."

They strolled about among the undulating dunes for an hour or more, talking in that vague emotional way that young men and maidens naturally fall into when they walk together by the shore of the great deep, and each very much pleased with the other's society, as usually happens under similar circumstances. The dunes were indeed a lovely place for flirting in, as if made for the purpose—high billowy hillocks of blown sand, all white and firm, and rolling like chalk downs, but matted together under foot with a tussocky network of spurges and soldanella convolvulus. In the tiny combes, and valleys in between where tall reed-like grasses made a sort of petty imitation jungle, you could sit down unobserved under the lee of some mimic range of mountains, and take your ease in an enchanted garden, like sultans and sultanas of the Arabian Nights, without risk of intrusion. The sea tumbled in gently on one side upon the long white beach: the river ran on the other just within the belt of blown sandhills; and wedged between the two, in a long line, the barrier ridge of miniature wolds stretched away for miles and miles in long perspective towards the southern horizon. It was a lotus-eating place to lie and dream and make love in for ever. As Hugh sat there idly with Elsie by his side under the lee of the dunes, he wondered the Squire could ever have had the bad taste to object to the generous east wind which had overwhelmed his miserable utilitarian salt-marsh pastures with this quaint little fairyland of tiny knoll's and Lilliputian valleys. For his own part, Hugh was duly grateful to that unconscious atmospheric landscape gardener for his admirable additions to the flat Suffolk scenery; he wanted nothing better or sweeter in life than to lie here for ever stretched at his ease in the sun, and talk of poetry and love with Elsie.

At the end of an hour, however, he roused himself sturdily. Life, says the philosopher, is not all beer and skittles; nor is it all poetry and dalliance either. "Stern duty sways our lives against our will," says the Echoes from Callimachus. It's all very well, at odd moments, to sport with Amaryllis in the shade, or with the tangles of Neæra's hair—for a reasonable period. But if Amaryllis has no money of her own, or if Neæra is a penniless governess in a country-house, the wise man must sacrifice sentiment at last to solid advantages; he must quit Amaryllis in search of Phyllis, or reject Neæra in favour of Vera, that opulent virgin, who has lands and houses, messuages, and tenements, stocks and shares, and is a ward in Chancery. Face to face with such a sad necessity, Hugh now found himself. He was really grieved that the circumstances of the case compelled him to tear himself unwillingly away from Elsie, he was so thoroughly enjoying himself in his own pet way; but duty, duty—duty before everything! The slave of duty jumped up with a start.

"My dear child," he exclaimed, glancing hastily at his watch, "Relf will really never forgive me. I'm sure it's time for us to set to corners and change partners. Not, of course, that I want to do it myself. For two people who are not engaged, I think we've had a very snug little time of it here together, Elsie. But a bargain's a bargain, and Relf must be inwardly grinding his teeth at me.—Let's go and meet them."

Elsie rose more slowly and wistfully. "I'm never so happy anywhere, Hugh," she said, with a lingering cadence, "as when you're with me."

"And yet we are not engaged," Hugh went on in a meditative murmur—"we're not engaged. "We're only cousins! For mere cousins, our cousinly solicitude for one another's welfare is truly touching. If all families were only as united as ours, now! interpreters of prophecy would not have far to seek for the date of the millennium. Well, well, instructress of youth, we must look out for these other young people; and if I were you, experience would suggest to me the desirability of not coming upon them from behind too unexpectedly or abruptly. A fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind. Relf is young, and the pretty pupil is by no means unattractive."

"I'd trust Winifred as implicitly"—Elsie began, and broke off suddenly.

"As you'd trust yourself," Hugh put in, with a little quiet irony, completing her sentence. "No doubt, no doubt; I can readily believe it. But even you and I—who are staider and older, and merely cousins—wouldn't have cared to be disturbed too abruptly just now, you know, when we were pulling soldanellas to pieces in concert in the hollow down yonder. I shall climb to the top of the big sandhill there, and from hatspecular mount—as Satan remarks in Paradise Regained—I shall spy from afar where Relf has wandered off to with the immaculate Winnifred.—Ah, there they are, over yonder by the beach, looking for pebbles or something—I suppose amber. Let's go over to them, Elsie, and change partners. Common politeness compels one, of course, to pay some attention to one's host's daughter."

As they strolled away again, with a change of partners, back towards the spot where Mrs. Meysey was somewhat anxiously awaiting them, Hugh and Winifred turned their talk casually on Elsie's manifold charms and excellences. "She's a sweet, isn't she?" Winifred cried to her new acquaintance in enthusiastic appreciation. "Did you ever in your life meet anybody like her?"

"No, never," Hugh answered with candid praise. Candour was always Hugh's special cue. "She's a dear, good girl, and I like her immensely. I'm proud of her too. The only inheritance I ever received from my family is my cousinship to Elsie; and I duly prize it as my sole heirloom from fifty generations of penniless Massingers."

"Then you're very fond of her, Mr. Massinger?"

"Yes, very fond of her. When a man's only got one relative in the world, he naturally values that unique possession far more than those who have a couple of dozen or so of all sexes and ages, assorted. Some people suffer from too much family; my misfortune is that, being a naturally affectionate man, I suffer from too little. It's the old case of the one ewe lamb; Elsie is to me my brothers and my sisters, and my cousins and my aunts, all rolled into one, like the supers at the theatre."

"And are you and she ——" Winifred began timidly. All girls are naturally inquisitive on that important question.

Hugh broke her off with a quick little laugh. "Oh, dear no, nothing of the sort," he answered hastily, in his jaunty way. "We're not engaged, if that's what you mean, Miss Meysey; nor at all likely to be. Our affection, though profound, is of the brotherly and sisterly order only. It's much nicer so, of course. When people are engaged, they're always looking forward with yearning and longing and other unpleasant internal feelings, much enlarged upon in Miss Virginia Gabriel's songs, to a delusive future. When they're simply friends, or brothers and sisters, they can enjoy their friendship or their fraternity in the present tense, without forever gazing ahead with wistful eyes towards a distant and ever receding horizon."

"But why need it recede?" Winifred asked innocently.

"Why need it recede? Ah, there you pose me. Well, it needn't, of course, among the rich and the mighty. If people are swells, and amply provided for by their godfathers and godmothers at their baptism, or otherwise, they can marry at once; but the poor and the struggling—that's Elsie and me, you know, Miss Meysey—the poor and the struggling get engaged foolishly, and hope and hope for a humble cottage—the poetical cottage, all draped with roses and wild honeysuckle, and the well-attired woodbine—and toil and moil and labor exceedingly, and find the cottage receding, receding, receding still, away off in the distance, while they plough their way through the hopeless years, just as the horizon recedes forever before you when you steer straight out for it in a boat at sea. The moral is—poor folk should not indulge in the luxury of hearts, and should wrap themselves up severely in their own interests, till they're wholly and utterly selfish."

"And are you selfish, I wonder, Mr. Massinger?"

"I try to be, of course, from a sense of duty; though I'm afraid I make a very poor hand at it. I was born with a heart, and do what I will, I can't quite stifle that irrepressible natural organ.—But I take it all out, I believe, in the end, in writing verses."

"You sent Elsie some verses this morning," Winifred broke out in an artless way, as if she were merely stating a common fact of every-day experience.

Hugh had some difficulty in suppressing a start, and in recovering his composure so as to answer unconcernedly: "Oh, she showed them to you, then, did she?" (How thoughtless of him to have posted those poor rhymes to Elsie, when he might have known beforehand she would confide them at once to Miss Meysey's sympathetic ear!)

"No, she didn't show them to me," Winifred replied, in the same careless, easy way as before. "I saw them drop out of the envelope, that's all; and Elsie put them away as soon as she saw they were verses; but I was sure they were yours, because I know your handwriting—Elsie's shown me bits of your letter's sometimes."

"I often send copies of my little pieces to Elsie before I print them," Hugh went on casually, in his most candid manner. "It may be vain of me, but I like her to see them. She's a splendid critic, Elsie; women often are: she sometimes suggests to me most valuable alterations and modifications in some of my verses."

"Tell me these ones," Winifred asked abruptly, with a little blush.

It was a trying moment. What was Hugh to do? The verses he had actually sent to Elsie were all emotion and devotion, and hearts and darts, and fairest and thou wearest, and charms and arms; amorous and clamorous chimed together like old friends in one stanza, and sorrow dispelled itself to-morrow with its usual cheerful punctuality in the next. To recite them to Winifred as they stood would be to retire at once from his half-projected seige of the pretty little heiress's heart and hand. For that decisive step Hugh was not at present entirely prepared. He mustn't allow himself to be beaten by such a scholar's mate as this. He cleared his throat, and began boldly on another piece, ringing out his lines with sonorous lilt—a set of silly, garrulous, childish verses he had written long since, but never published, about some merry sea-elves in an enchanted submarine fairy country:

> A tiny fay
> At the bottom lay
> Of a purple bay
> Unruffled,
> On whose crystal floor
> The distant roar
> From the surf-bound shore
> Was muffled.
> With his fairy wife
> He passed his life
> Undimmed by strife
> Or quarrel;
> And the livelong day
> They would merrily play
> Through a labyrinth gay
> With coral.
> They loved to dwell
> In a pearly shell,
> And to deck their cell
> With amber;
> Or amid the caves
> That the ripplet laves
> And the beryl paves
> To clamber.

He went on so, with his jigging versicles, line after line, as they walked along the firm white sand together, through several foolish sing-song stanzas; till at last, when he was more than half way through the meaningless little piece, a sudden thought pulled him up abruptly. He had chosen, as he thought, the most innocent and non committing bit of utter trash in all his private poetical repertory; but now, as he repeated it over to Winifred with easy intonation, swinging his stick to keep time as he went, he recollected all at once that the last rhymes flew off at a tangent to a very personal conclusion—and what was worse, were addressed, too, not to Elsie, but very obviously to another lady! The end was somewhat after this wise:

> On a darting shrimp
> Our quaint little imp
> With bridle of gimp
> Would gambol;
> Or across the back
> Of a sea-duck black,
> As a gentleman's hack
> He'd amble.
> Of emerald green
> And sapphire's sheen
> He made his queen
> A liar;
> And the merry two
> Their whole life through
> Were as happy as you > And I are.

And then came the seriously compromising bit:

> But if you say
> You think this lay
> Of the tiny fay
> Too silly,
> Let it have the praise
> My eye betrays
> To your own sweet gaze,
> My Lily.
> For a man he tries,
> And he toils and sighs
> To be very wise
> And witty;
> But a dear little dame
> Has enough of fame
> If she wins the name
> Of pretty.

Lily! Lily! Oh, that decomposing, unfortunate, compromising Lily! He had met her down in Warwickshire two seasons since, at a country-house where they were both staying, and had fallen head over ears in love with her—then. Now, he only wished with all his heart and soul she and her fays were at the bottom of the sea in a body together. For of course she was penniless. If not, by this time she would no doubt have been Mrs. Massinger.

Hugh Massinger was a capitol actor; but even he could hardly have ventured to pretend, with a grave face, that those Lily verses had ever been addressed to Elsie Challoner. Everything depended upon his presence of mind and a bold resolve. He hesitated for a moment at the "emerald green and sapphire's sheen," and seemed as though he couldn't call the next line. After a minute or two's pretended searching he recovered it feebly, and then he stumbled again over the end of the stanza.

"It's no use," he cried at last, as if angry with himself. "I should only murder them if I were to go on now. I've forgotten the rest. The words escape me. And they're really not worth your seriously listening to."

"I like them," Winifred said in her simple way. "They're so easy to understand: so melodious and meaningless. I love verse that you don't have to puzzle over. I can't bear Browning for that—he's so impossible to make anything sensible out of. But I adore silly little things like these, that go in at one ear and out of the other, and really sound as if they meant something.—I shall ask Elsie to tell me the end of them."

Here was indeed a dilemma! Suppose she did, and suppose Elsie showed her the real verses! At all hazards, he must extricate himself somehow from this impossible situation.

"I wish you wouldn't," he said gently, in his softest and most persuasive voice. "Elsie mightn't like you to know I sent her my verses—though there's nothing in it—girls are so sensitive sometimes about these matters.—But I'll tell you what I'll do, if you'll kindly allow me; I'll write you out the end of them when I get home to the inn, and bring them written out in full, a nice clear copy, the next time I have the pleasure of seeing you." ("I can alter the end somehow,") he thought to himself with a sudden inspiration, "and dress them up innocently one way or another with fresh rhymes, so as to have no special applicability of any sort to anybody or anything anywhere in particular.")

"Thank you," Winifred replied, with evident pleasure. "I should like that ever so much better. It'll be so nice to have a poet's verses written out for one's self in his own handwriting."

"You do me too much honor," Hugh answered with his mock little bow. "I don't pretend to be a poet at all; I'm only a versifier."

They joined the old folks in time by the yawl. The Squire was anxious to get back to his garden now—he foresaw rain in the sky to westward.

Hugh glanced hastily at his watch with a sigh. "I must be going back too," he cried. "It's nearly five now; we can't be up at the village till six. Post goes out at nine, they say, and I have a book to review before post-time. It must positively reach town not later than to-morrow morning. And what's worse, I haven't yet so much as begun to dip into it."

"But you can never read it and review it too in three hours!" Winifred exclaimed, aghast.

"Precisely so," Hugh answered, in his jaunty way, with a stifled yawn; "and therefore I propose to omit the reading as a very unnecessary and wasteful preliminary. It often prejudices one against a book to know what's in it. You approach a work you have't read with a mind unbiased by preconceived impressions. Besides, this is only a three-volume novel; they're all alike; it doesn't matter. You can say the plot is crude and ill-constructed, the dialogue feeble, the descriptions vile, the situations borrowed, and the characters all mere conventional puppets. The same review will do equally well for the whole stupid lot of them. I usually follow Sydney Smith's method in that matter: I cut a few pages at random, here and there, and then smell the paper-knife."

"But is that just?" Elsie asked quietly, a slight shade coming over her earnest face.

"My dear Miss Challoner," Warren Relf put in hastily, "have you known Massinger so many years without finding out that he's always a great deal better than he himself pretends to be? I know him well enough to feel quite confident he'll read every word of that novel through to-night, if he sits up till four o'clock in the morning to do it; and he'll let the London people have their review in time, if he telegraphs up every blessed word of it by special wire to-morrow morning. His wickedness is always only his brag; his goodness he hides carefully under his own extremely capacious bushel."

Hugh laughed. "As you know me so much better than I know myself, my dear boy," he replied easily, "there's nothing more to be said about it. I'm glad to receive so good a character from a connoisseur in human nature. I really never knew before what an amiable and estimable member of society hid himself under my rugged and unprepossessing exterior." And as he said it, he drew himself up, and darting a laugh from the corner of those sad black eyes, looked at the moment the handsomest and most utterly killing man in the county of Suffolk.

When Elsie and Winifred went up to their own rooms that evening, the younger girl slipping into Elsie's bedroom for a moment, took her friend's hands tenderly in her own, and looking long and eagerly into the other's eyes, said at last in a quick tone of unexpected discovery: "Elsie, he's awfully nice looking and awfully clever, this Oxford cousin of yours. I like him immensely."

Elsie brought back her eyes from infinity with a sudden start. "I'm glad you do, dear," she said, looking down at her kindly. "I wanted you to like him. I should be dreadfully disappointed, in fact, if you didn't. I'm exceedingly fond of Hugh, Winnie."

Winifred paused for a second significantly; then she asked point blank; "Elsie, are you engaged to him?"

"Engaged to him! My darling, what ever made you dream of such a thing?—Engaged to Hugh!—engaged to Hugh Massinger!—Why, Winnie, you know he's my own cousin."

"But you don't answer my question plainly," Winifred persisted with girlish determination. "Are you engaged to him or are you not?"

Elsie, mindful of Hugh's frequent declarations, answered boldly (and not quite untruthfully): "No, I'm not, Winifred."

The heiress of Whitestrand stroked her friend's hair with a sigh of relief. That sigh was blind. Girl though she was, she might clearly have seen with a woman's instinct that Elsie's flushed cheek and down-cast eyes belied to the utmost her spoken word. But she did not see it. All preoccupied as she was with her own thoughts and her own wishes, she never observed at all those mute witnesses to Elsie's love for he handsome cousin. She was satisfied in her heart with Hugh's and Elsie's double verbal denial. She said so herself with a thrill in her own soul, as a girl will do in the first full flush of her earliest passion: "Then I may love him if I like! I may make him love me! It won't be wrong to Elsie for me to love him!"

MISCELLANEOUS.

Small boys in Phillips, Me., make circus money by digging bait for trout fishermen. The latest quotations were 25 cents a quart offered by one of the leading grocers, and eighteen quarts were brought in at those figures.

The workmen on the great Eiffel tower in Paris have struck on the ground that the higher they go, the greater the danger is. There are 200 of them earning on an average 80 cents a day. If their wages are to rise with the tower, it will not go very much further.

The bodies of Edward Whitehouse and Lizzie Webb were found on May 21 in the river Lea, tied together with a handkerchief, and locked in each other's arms. A letter was found in the young woman's pocket addressed to her mother, desiring her not to "fret," and asking that she and her lover might be buried in the same grave.

The largest umbrella in the world has been made in Glasgow for a King of East Africa. It can be opened and shut in the usual way, and when open is 21 feet in diameter; the staff is also 21 feet long. It is lined with cardinal red and white, has a lot of straw tassels, and a border of crimson satin. The canopy itself is made of Italian straw, and the top terminates in a gilded cone.

When the United States Fish Commission steamer Albatross was in the Straits of Magellan, where she spent a month making collections, she ran out of ice. So she steamed into Eyre Sound, where icebergs are often found floating, made fast to a nice berg, cut off big blocks of the ice, which was clear and solid, and took on board six tons, which lasted until she reached Panama.

According to Prof. Sargent, the strongest wood in the United States is that of the nutmeg hickory of the Arkansas region, and the weakest the West Indian birch. The most elastic is the tamarack, the white or shell-bark hickory standing far below it. The least elastic, and the lowest in specific gravity, is the wood of the ficus aurea. The highest specific gravity, upon which in general depends value as fuel, is attained by the bluewood of Texas.

Eugene Hopkins, of Plymouth, has a five-year-old Jersey cow that is peculiar. The other day she shed one of her horns, leaving in its place a smaller, better-shaped, and glossy horn that had apparently grown up within the old one. The horn upon the other side of the head shows signs of coming off in the same way. Down in those parts it's unusual for cows to shed their horns unless assisted by the hired man with a club or a heavy milking stool. Mr. Hopkins says that he would as soon expect to see a man shed his kneepans.

Three-year-old Robbie De Forrest, a Connecticut boy, fell head first into a big post hole the other day. There were several inches of water at the bottom of the hole, but Robbie held himself up by the arms, so that he didn't get his face in the water, and the earth he loosened in his struggles absorbed it soon; so danger from that source was taken away. There the young man remained, upside down, for three-quarters of an hour, when his aunt saw his feet sticking out of the hole and promptly yanked him out. He was nearly exhausted.

"Aunty," he said, "I heard you every time you called, but I could not make you hear me."

$40,000 Lost.

"I lost forty thousand dollars by a periodical attack of nervous sick headache," said a Chicago capitalist to a correspondent, pointing across the street to a handsome corner lot. "That lot was sold for ten thousand dollars at public auction five years ago, and I intended to buy it, but was too sick with headache to attend the sale, and it is now worth fifty thousand dollars." It he had known of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets they would have removed the cause of his headaches—biliousness—and he would have made the money. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets cure sick headache, bilious headache, dizziness, constipation, indigestion, and bilious attacks; 25 cents a vial, by druggists.

Small mantels of embroidered cashmere or sheer white muslin, will be fashionable this summer.

$500 Reward.

The former proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for years made a standing, public offer in all American newspapers of $500 reward for a case of catarrh that he could not cure. The present proprietors have renewed this offer. All the druggists sell this Remedy, together with the "Douche," and all other appliances advised to be used in connection with it. No catarrh patient is longer able to say "I cannot be cured." You get $500 in case of failure.

Safe, Sure, and Painless.

What a world of meaning this statement embodies. Just what you are looking for, is it not? Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor—the great sure-pop corn cure—acts in this way. It makes no sore spots; safe, acts speedily and with certainty; sure and mildly, without inflaming the parts; painlessly. Do not be imposed upon by imitations or substitutes.

Canes are carried by fashionable ladies a la Lady Teazle in the "School for Scandal."

> "I wonder Grimes has any friends—
> His manner grows so surly;
> No matter where we chance to meet,
> Or whether late or early,
> 'Tis just the same: he cannot stay,
> And barely answers a 'good-day.'"

Now this is a sad case of misconception. It is not Grimes' disposition which is at fault, but his liver. He can't appear jolly when he feels miserable. If he would take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, the great liver, stomach and bowel regulator, he would soon be the same happy fellow as of old—agreeable to himself and the world generally.

Last week a plot was discovered in the penitentiary. The document, which is a lengthy one, passed through several hands but only received three signatures, and the result was that one of the convicts to whom it was given "peached," and Saunders was put into a dungeon cell for five days. He is a crank, and has tried to organize a plot on a previous occasion.

A Washington Sensation.

A lady well known in society created a sensation at a reception in Washington a few weeks ago by appearing in an armour of jewel. A two-hundred-and-forty-thousand-dollar necklace encircled her throat. She wore a pair of ear-rings said not to be equalled in America. Her bodice was a perfect mass of jewels. Her gems glittered in the gaslight like raindrops in the sun. The design of many of them was unique. One splendid spray represented a cluster of wild roses, five petals of each rose being five diamonds of similar size and shape. Another was a spray of fuchsias, formed of hundreds of small and large diamonds, about a dozen huge stars, and almost as many crescents. She also wore an open fan covered with diamonds in her hair. Each side of the fan showed fifteen raised plaits, and the whole were studded with diamonds, beautifully matched in colour and size. The gems in the raised plaits were larger than those which enriched the depressed ones, and stones upon the comb ranged in size from one to five carats each.

Horse Breeding in Italy.

One of the most useful of the leaflets which are being circulated by the Agricultural Department is that on horse-breeding in Italy, published this week. From this it appears that a new code of laws regulating horse-breeding was passed last June by the Legislature, by which it is provided that from June 1, 1888, and during the period of eight years from this date, not less than 800 stallions shall be purchased for the Government stallion centres, for which a sum of £19,000 is allotted. After Jan. 1, 1889, private individuals will not be allowed to keep stallions for service unless they have been duly approved by the Minister of Agriculture, an action calculated to prevent the use of unsound and unsuitable sires. The fee charged varies in amount from 10s., the most usual charge, to £1. In the list for the ensuing year there are six stallions, for which the fee is £1 13s. 4d. (forty lire), English thoroughbreds. Of the 362 stallions for service this year, only two, the trotter Amber, son of Clear Grit and bred at Brantford, Ontario, and a thoroughbred, Andred, by Blair Athol, bred in England, are put at comparatively high rates—namely, £6 and £4 respectively. It is seen upon examining this list of stallions whose pedigrees and country of birth are given, that 116 of these were bred in England, and 130 were bred from English horses either in France, Russia, America or Italy. In the last five years 237 stallions have been purchased by the Italian Government, at a cost of £44,200, or an average of about £186 per head. The total number of mares covered in 1887 was 13,006.—London Live Stock Journal.

FLORICULTURAL.

HOUSE PLANTS.

The way house plants thrive on the dregs of coffee left at breakfast is admirable. Bowker itself hardly turns out stronger leafage or such thick bloom. The grounds are a good mulch on the top of the soil, but a little care must be given not to let them sour and get musty in coolish, damp weather.

The great trouble with house plants, greater than errors in watering, is letting the pots be exposed to the sun. The fibrous roots soon grow to the side of the pot, and these are baked in full sunshine, trebly hot coming through glass, which condenses its rays. The root tips are soon killed. The whole ball of earth is baked over and over daily and yet people wonder why they don't succeed with houseplants. Shade the sides of the pots always, either by plunging in a box of sand, moss, cocoa fibre or ashes, or place a thin board on edge across the front of the plant shelf, that will come almost to the top of the pots. Let the plants have the sun, but shade the pots. A good way to screen them is to set each pot in one two sizes or more larger, filling the space with moss or sand.

The best gardeners say that the porous common pots are not so good for house plants as those glazed or painted outside. The reason is that evaporation is constant from the porous pots, and the roots are not only drier but cooler for it.—[Vick's Magazine.

ROSE BRIEFS

I wouldn't use manure water for out-door roses; instead, mulch with manure and let nature wash down the fertilizing substances to the roots.

In pruning rose bushes, the more wood left on, the more roses will come, seems sound sense, but it isn't. In case of dwarf, or what are usually known as bedding roses, cut out all dead wood and weak, scraggy shoots, and cut the large, vigorous shoots back pretty well—say to three or four or six or seven eyes. This induces vigorous young shoots that bear large fine blossoms. But in case of running roses, don't cut them back hard; only cut out the dead or scraggy wood, and thin out the good shoots and cut off a bit of the tips of those left. Mr. Roehrs said he believed that just as good results could be obtained if the plants were lopped off with a sickle or a pair of garden shears without regard to system. There is much truth in what he says. And as a general rule what a commercial man does for profit may with confidence be done by amateurs for pleasure. But I am inclined to think that we may just as well go about the job of pruning with some pretensions to method. The contour of the plant when grown must be borne in mind during the progress of the work. Cut out all shoots which cross each other, especially in the center of the bush, and cut back all shoots to a good bud—one which looks outward. It is better not to prune too soon. Advice on this subject can be good only in a general way. Here, at the North, it should be deferred until all danger from severe frost is over. If done too soon, the shoots are apt to "die back" which will necessitate a second looking over, for it will never do to have dead wood in our rose bushes.

For a tropical effect at a trifling cost, we know of nothing more effective than a few plants each of the several varieties of Ricinus. For a massed bed plant Ricinus Borboniensis arboreus in the centre. Under very favorable conditions this grows to the height of 15 feet. Follow with R. macrophyllus and R. Africanus. R. purpureus, sanguineus and Gibsonii finish the list. Thirty cents cover the cost of seed for a bed of this kind. Plant the seeds in the open ground the middle of May in this latitude.

It is said that gardeners, sometimes, when they would bring a rose to richer flowering, deprive it for a season of light and moisture. Silent and dark it stands, dropping one fading leaf after another, and seeming to go patiently down to death. But when every leaf is dropped, and the plant stands stripped to the uttermost, a new life is then working in the buds, from which shall spring a tenderer foliage and a brighter wealth of flowers. So, often, in celestial gardening, every leaf of earthly joy must drop, before a new and divine bloom visits the soul.

MIGNONETTE.—The early sowings give the best flowers. I often find difficulty in getting summer sowings to come up well.

SWEET PEAS.—The earliest sowings of these are always the best—indeed, while May and June sowings may germinate all right, they often fail to produce a good crop of flowers.

METEOR MARIGOLDS.—Flower well before July, but during the months of July and August their flowers come so small and poor that the plants are not worth keeping after the flowers begin to fail. In June sow again for fall blooming.

CHINA ASTERS.—Sow in May and again in June if you wish to prolong the blooming season till October.

FOR PANSIES—A cool, moist part of the garden, very rich soil and copious waterings are what should be given if we want to keep up good flowers till midsummer.

DO NOT BE IN A HURRY—To set out tender plants. There is nothing gained by planting out tender stuff before the ground begins to warm up. And do not set out plants that have not previously been well hardened off and inured to wind and sunshine.

DOUBLE PETUNIAS—When planted out bloom beautifully, but they have not the long-lived continuous blooming nature of the single-flowered sorts. While singles delight in warm dryish soils, doubles should get moister and richer ground in order to bring out the fulness of their flowers. We get magnificent doubles from seed.

ASHARAGUS TENUISSIMUS.—Now so largely grown by florists in place of smilax, is propagated by cutting. Cut the branches up into little pieces, each with a spray of green leaves attached, and insert in damp sand or earth in a shady place, and in a few weeks, a sort of tuberous excrescence forms at the joints under the ground and from these in a few days roots are emitted.

IVY CUTTINGS.—I pruned my old ivy plants last November and used all of the prunings, old wood and young wood, for cuttings. I kept them just as long as they were cut, some a few inches, others a couple of feet, and inserted them—several together—in 5 and 6 inch pots, which were placed under a greenhouse stage and kept moist. They rooted very well and are now growing nicely. Shall pot them off singly.

AMARYLLIS JOHNSONI GRANDIFLORI.—Which flowered in February, gave me ripe seeds the middle of April. These sown now should give me blooming plants three years hence.

FRAGARANT MYRTLE (Myrtus communis)—Is a favorite evergreen shrub, which we winter in our windows or cellars. We love it for its fresh and fragrant foliage and starry white flowers. Cuttings of the young wood root freely in moist sand, or sandy soil and a shady place. But note especially that it is with myrtles as with many other young wood cuttings—if you let the cuttings wilt before or after they are put in, it may be a difficult matter to get them to live and root.

GLADIOLUS AND HYACINTHUS CANDICANS.—The seeds of these germinate readily. If you have any, sow them in rows as you would those of onions. The hyacinths will bloom next year, the gladioli the following season; at least, many of them should.

PERENNIAL LARKSPURS—Are now in vigorous growth. If you cut down a few plants when they are half-grown, they will come into good bloom just as those that have not been cut back are going past. And if you cut back the early blooming ones as soon as they have done blooming, they will again bear a few good flowers before winter.

POLYANTHUSES.—These raised from seed sown last summer are now in full bloom. What generous plants they are—so thrifty and so copious! They were wintered in a cold-frame, the same as pansies and violets. They bloom well when a year old, but older plants are not so desirable.

DAISIES.—Double-flowered daisies grow well from seed, but in this way we seldom get good varieties; they are usually only half double. But I have a lot of Longfellow now in bloom, which was raised from seed sown last spring, and some of them have large full-double flowers, well worth growing. A large majority of them, however, are not worth growing. In order to have good daisies, we must perpetuate them by division. Winter them in a cold-frame, or cover them up out-doors.

BLOODROOT.—Although we find it wild in moist or wettish places, it thrives well in the garden under ordinary circumstances, and in April and early May is one of the brightest and choicest flowers we cultivate; it lives along year after year, and increases in bulk. In rockeries, or where it may come up and bloom and remain undisturbed all summer long, it ripens a good deal of seed, which scatter about and produce lots of seedlings the following spring.

SIBERIAN SQUILL.—In the way of blue flowers in early spring, we have nothing to equal these. They are hardy, copious and extremely showy. They ripen lots of seed, which are scattered around and germinate. Among handsome-flowering bulbous plant, it reproduces itself from seed as freely as (if not more than) any other of its kind.

Abnormal Sleep.

Familiar as is normal sleep, no one can fully explain it. It is, nevertheless, a pleased fact. Though it seems to take one-third from our life, it really prolongs it by the daily renewing of vigor.

Some of the abnormal forms of sleep exhibit strange phenomena. We need not dwell on sleep induced by opiates; the lethargy of apoplexy and, what is doubtless akin to it, the sleep of the drunkard; the coma of Bright's disease and diabetes, and the almost irresistible sleep caused by freezing cold.

The sleep of somnambulism is a very interesting form. The person will get up and go abroad in the darkness and into the most dangerous situations wholly without fear. The power of sight is often greatly exalted, and seems sometimes wholly independent of ordinary vision.

Another form is that of catalepsy. In this there is an entire loss of sensibility and ordinary consciousness. The limbs may be placed in any position, the most grotesque and uncomfortable, and they remain so, as if they were made of wax.

Still another form is that of hypnotism, or mesmerism, induced on susceptible subjects by skilled manipulators. The person becomes insensible to pain, and his will is entirely subject to that of the experimenter. The barest suggestion through any sense is sufficient to put the person under the dominance of the idea suggested.

Akin to artificial hypnotism is a morbid condition into which persons of a nervous organization sometimes fall. The celebrated "Soho Sleeper" would, for many years, fall asleep for a fortnight or more at a time, meanwhile exhibiting more or less of the peculiar characteristics of hypnotism. Many similiar cases might be cited, for hardly a month passes when the newspapers do not tell the wonderful story of some "sleeping girl," who has been living unconscious for weeks; but some of the cases are not only interesting scientifically, but pathetic.

In 1745 the wife of an English colonel apparently died. The husband persistently refused to have her buried and watched over her cold and motionless body for eight days.

Suddenly, on the bells of a church ringing, she started up, saying, "It is the last prayer-bell; it is time to go,"

A lady patient was requesting to have a hot-water bottle put to her feet, saying. "I feel"—when she passed into a cataleptic state, and remained in it three hours. On opening her eyes, she ended her sentence—"a great cold over my whole body."

The Change in the Frog.

Nowhere in the animal kingdom is there so favorable an opportunity for peeping into nature's workshop as in the metamorphoses of the frog. This animal is a worm when it comes from the egg, and remains such the first four days of its life, having neither eyes, nor ears, nostrils nor respiratory organs. It crawls. It breathes through its skin. After awhile a neck is grooved into the flesh. Its soft lips are hardened into a horny beak. The different organs one after another bud out; then a pair of branching gills, and last a long and limber tail. The worm has become a fish. Three or four days more elapse, and the gills sink back into the body, while in their place others come, much more complex, arranged in vascular tufts one hundred and twelve in each. But they, too, have their day, and are absorbed together with their framework of bone and cartilage, to be succeeded by an entirely different breathing apparatus, the initial of a second cartilated group of radical changes. Lungs are developed, the mouth widened, the horny beak converted into rows of teeth, the stomach, the abdomen, the intestines prepared for the reception of animal food in place of vegetable; four limbs, fully equipped with hip and shoulder bones, with nerves and blood vessels, push out through the skin, while the tail, being now supplanted by them as a means of locomotion, is carried away piecemeal by the absorbents, and the animal passes the balance of its days as an air-breathing and flesh-feeding batrachian.

Articles of Faith.

It is said that the prominent members of the Presbyterian Church in England and Scotland have nearly completed the preparation of new "Articles of Faith" to supersede the Westminster Confession. The new "Articles" are 23 in number and are said to be of a less exclusive character than those of the old "Confession" A New York paper gives the following statement of the substance of the new "Articles:"—While they mention the election or choice by God of "a people unto Himself," they do not say that He has made a portion of the human race on purpose to condemn them to everlasting misery. On the contrary, they say that Jesus Christ was sent to be the Saviour of the world. In the terms of salvation they declare, not that some men are born to be damned, but that "God willeth that all men should be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth, and that the gospel of forgiveness and eternal life is freely offered to all men."

George Potts of Head county, Ga., had reason to think that the revenue officers would be glad to find him, and he determined to circumvent them. One morning several months ago his bed was found empty, and pinned to the wall was this note: "When u rede this this I will be ded. Under the river will be my home." His friends searched for him. They found tracks leading to the river and then disappearing. A mile down the stream they got Potts's coat caught by an everhanging branch. They decided that he was dead, and his family mourned duly. Three months later Potts appeared, and said that he wasn't dead: but his friends won't believe him. They say that the original Potts is indeed dead; and now Potts is trying to find proof to show that he is really alive.

Brunswick, Me., is getting ready to celebrate its 150th anniversary, and already stories of the early days of the town are being set afloat. Here's one: Mr. William Walker, of Falmouth, and Miss Sibyl Staples, of Topsham, were to be married. They were on the Topsham side of the river, and on the Brunswick side was the Rev. John Miller, the minister who was to perform the ceremony, and between them rolled the raging waters swollen by the sudden spring thaw. The minister couldn't get to the anxious couple and they couldn't get to him. But he was equal to the emergency. Standing on the edge of the bank, he sent his powerful voice across the stream, and William and Sibyl joined hands and made the proper responses, and were duly pronounced man and wife.

DONE IN A MINUTE.

What is ecomplished Every Sixty Seconds.

"Well, well, don't fret; I'll be there in a minute."

But, my friend, a minute means a good deal, notwithstanding you affect to hold it of no consequence. Did you ever stop to think what may happen in a minute? No. Well, while you are murdering a minute for yourself and one for me, before you get ready to sit down to the business we have in hand, I will amuse you by telling you some things that will happen meantime.

In a minute we shall be whirled around on the outside of the earth by its diurnal motion a distance of thirteen miles. At the same time we shall have gone along with the earth, in its grand journey around the sun, 1080 miles. Pretty quick traveling, you say? Why, that is slow work compared with the rate of travel of that ray of light which just now reflected from that mirror made you wink. A minute ago that ray was 11,160,000 miles away.

In a minute, over all the world, about eighty newborn infants have each raised a wail of protest at the fates for thrusting existence upon them, while as many more human beings, weary with the struggle of life, have opened their lips to utter their last sigh.

In a minute the lowest sound your ear can catch has been made by 990 vibrations, while the highest tone reached you after making 2,226,000 vibrations.

In each minute in Canada and United States, night and day, all the year round, twenty-four barrels of beer have to go down 12,096 throats, and 4830 bushels of grain have come to bin.

The telephone is used 595 times, the telegraph 136 times. Of tobacco, 925 pounds is raised, and part of it has been used in making 6673 cigars, and some more of it has gone up in the smoke of 2292 cigarettes.

But I am afraid that you will forget that we are talking about a minute, sixty seconds of time. No? Well, then, every minute 600 pounds of wool grow in this country, and we have to dig sixty-one tons of anthracite coal, and 200 tons of bituminous coal, while of pig-iron we turn out twelve tons and of steel rails three tons.

In this minute you have kept me waiting fifteen kegs of nails have been made, twelve bales of cotton should have come from the fields and thirty-six bushels of grain gone into 149 gallons of spirits, while $66 in gold should have been dug out of the earth. In the same time the United States Mint turned out gold and silver coin to the value of $121, and forty. two acres of the public domain have been sold or given away.

The Cow-Bird.

Our readers have probably heard of the European Cuckoo, and its strange habit of dropping its eggs in the nests of other birds. They would perhaps be interested to know that one of our native American birds has the same peculiarity.

I refer to the Cow bird, (Molothrus pecoris) which is found throughout the United States, with the exception of the Pacific coast.

It is sometimes seen in flocks, often in company with the red-winged black bird. At other times it follows cattle, and this is probably the origin of its name.

The cow-bird does not sing, but makes a chuckling sound. It is eight inches long, and, with spread wings, measures twelve inches across. The male is glossy black, except head, neck and breast which are brown. The female is light brown. The eggs are light blue with brown streaks, and they are usually dropped one at a time into the nests of smaller birds, such as sparrows, etc. In New England they frequently choose the nest of the summer yellow bird.

The eggs are about the same size as those laid by the birds that make the nests, and are more quickly hatched. When this occurs, the mother bird leaves the nest to seek food for the young intruder, and the other eggs, which are her own, are left to perish.

If the cow-bird's egg be left in an empty nest, the makers generally abandon it, and build another, but if the nest already contains eggs it is usually allowed to remain.

The yellow bird, however, is not to be so out-witted. She picks a hole in the strange egg, leaves it in the nest, but builds a new floor over it. She sometimes buries her own eggs with that of the cow-bird, and lays others on the floor above.

Sometimes the cow-bird lays another egg, on the upper deck as it were. In that case the yellow bird builds a third story to her nest.

Bravo, little yellow bird.

In the United States in 1886 33 national banks were closed, of which number 24 went into voluntary liquidation, 1 ceased to exist by expiration of charter, and 8 failed. There are 2,868 national banks now existing, the capital stock of which is represented by 7,116,894 shares. Of these only about 10 per cent. are held outside the state in which the bank is located. Since the establishment of the national banking system in 1863, there have been organised 3,580 establishments. Out of these 465 have gone into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of winding up, and 79 for the purpose of reorganisation; 65 are in liquidation by the expiration of their charter, and 112 have been placed in the hands of receivers for the closing up of their affairs.

Adulteration of Milk.

There is a statutory standard of milk in New York and some other states. The New York law provides for the confiscation and destruction of milk, if that fluid contains "more than eighty-eight per cent of water or other fluids, or less than twelve per cent of milk solids which shall contain not less than three per cent of fat." Milk not up to this standard is pronounced "adulterated." This adulteration is produced in two or more ways. First, by removing a portion or all of the cream, which is a direct fraud upon the consumer's pocket by depriving him of nourishment for which he has paid, and upon his health if he is living upon a milk diet of a given strength. A second mode of adulteration is by the addition of water, and wich the water, of some substance to restore the color, and remove the "sky blue" appearance, as anatto or rice flour. Chalk has gone into "innocuous desustude." The water adulteration is also a robbery of the consumer, and may be the means of causing sickness by the introduction of disease germs. The source of water supply is rarely regarded by those who mix this fluid with milk, and whatever contamination is in the pump or well is sure to find a new field of harmful operation among the milk consumers.

The New York law is very rigidly enforced in New York city, as milk venders often find to their great detriment. No skim milk is allowed to be sold, and the inspectors make frequent and unexpected raids upon incoming milk trains, upon the supplies of venders, and upon the carts of distributors, and thousands of gallons of condemned milk are annually turned into the gutters. Examination of the customs in regard to milk production, and the marketing of the same, in the milk region from which New York draws its chief supplies, will show that the farmers are not amenable to the charge of adulteration in either of the methods above mentioned. The milk as yielded by the cow is honestly sent to market, and the adulteration occurs in the thousands of petty shops from which the poorer people draw their petty supplies.—American Agriculturist.

that dread terror, a disease so long baffling science and the most skilled physicians, who knew of nothing to arrest, nothing to alleviate, nothing to cure. Now it is no longer an incurable malady even when given up by physicians, health can yet be found in OUR REMEDY, it heals and soothes the membrane of the Lungs, inflamed and poisoned by the ravages of this fell disease, and prevents the night sweats and tightness across the chest which accompany it.

COUNTERFEIT $5 notes purporting to be the issue of the Bank of British North America, are in circulation. A greenish tinge covers the face of the bogus bill, and it is dated July 5th, 1887, whereas the good ones are dated July 3rd, 1887. MR. ALEX. MCLEAN, a well-known machine agent of Glencoe, died very suddenly on Thursday at the residence of his brother-in-law, Mr. Peter Campbell, Metcalfe. He was conscious until near the last, and bad his friends goodbye a few minutes before he expired. Mr. McLean was well known in Dunwich, and his many friends will be sorry to learn of his sudden death.

COUNTY COURT.

McIntyre vs. Hockin & Pool.—An action for wrongful dismissal of plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict of $166.17.

Bake vs. Cattanach.—An action to replevin a horse, the jury gave a verdict for plaintiff with costs of bond.

McPherson vs. Thomas and Joseph Harris.—An action for $375, the price of a threshing machine, the judge gave a verdict for plaintiff for full amount.

Rolling vs. M. C. R.—An action for damages to fencing and trees by fire. Verdict for plaintiff for $55.

Queen vs. Coombs.—Arson by setting fire to his house on 30th of May. Discharged.

Queen vs. C. H. Whiting.—It is unnecessary for us to go into the particulars of this case, as they were fully published at the time of Whiting's arrest, and which are of such a nature as to be not very desirable for publication. All lovers of justice will be pleased to hear that this villian is about to receive his just desserts, he having been convicted on one charge of indecent assault and pleading guilty to three other charges. Yesterday morning Judge Hughes sentenced Whiting to 23 months imprisonment and 50 lashes, 25 to be administered one month after imprisonment and 25 one month before his release. Sentence was suspended on the charge of having carnal knowledge with the girl. On Whiting's left arm is a tatooed wreath and the letters "J. E. M.," which shows that he is sailing under a false name.

A DENIAL.

MR. EDITOR,—I see by the papers, and I believe it is circulated pretty freely, that I as prosecutor against Hewitt and Ward gave my consent, or was bought over, to liberate those swindlers. I deny the charge, and am willing to make affidavit before any Justice of the Peace that I was not even approached in way of settlement, but I have no doubt but some boodle must have changed hands when such a case could be withdrawn from court.

JOHN L. PEARCE.

Dutton, June 20, 1888.

MARRIED.

SIFTON—BACKUS.—On June 14, at St. Peter's Church, Tyrconnell, by the Rev. James Chance, Bamlet E. Sifton to Catherine E. Backus,

To Assist Nature
In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral
the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.
L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."
Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with Lung Trouble.
For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

THE DEAF HEAR.
After eight years suffering from deafness, so bad that I was unable to attend to my business, I was cured by the use of Hagyard's Yellow Oil. With gratitude I make this known for the benefit of others afflicted. Harry Ricardo, Toronto.

Both meadows and pastures require some looking after in the spring. If there be bare or weedy places, throw on a little seed. If the pastures had been seeded last spring and the "catch" was not good, it would be a good plan to again go over the whole, giving seed as would seem to be needed.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla operates radically upon the blood, thoroughly cleansing and invigorating it. As a safe and absolute cure for the various disorders caused by constitutional taint or infection, this remedy has no equal. Take it this month.

The ashes of very old wood do not contain so much potash as ashes of wood of younger growth. Ashes generally pay well on all ordinary crops, but are specially adapted to the wants of fruit trees, grape vines and all kinds of vines, clover and peas.

"The Church of England in Canada" is the title by which the Episcopal church is to be known in this country hencetorth. It was formerly described as the United Church of England and Ireland. But the Montreal Synod has decided that this title is inapplicable, and that the church should be naturalized.

About 10:30 Friday morning fire was discovered on the roof of Geo. H. Hammond's mammoth new ice house at Waterford. It is supposed that the fire started from a spark from a passing locomotive. Notwithstanding efforts to save the building the fire got beyond control and it was totally destroyed. A number of telegraph poles were burned and wires melted, causing considerable trouble to the M. C. R. The building was 80x140, and was full of ice. It erected last October at a cost of about $8,000. The bill for the lumber was $3,600, and over 12,000 shingles were used in the roof.

A MUCH MARRIED MAN.—Allen Bailey appeared in the dock at the police court on Tuesday, charged with bigamy, says the Chatham Banner. The prisoner is an Englishman, aged 40, and works in the woolen mills. Six years ago he married a Miss Henry, in Chatham, by whom he had two children. Some time ago he left her and went to Missouri where he married another lady. When arraigned he pleaded in extenuation of his conduct that he was a married man before he married Miss Henry, and that his first wife was agreeable to separate and had since married. This leaves him with three living wives. After this statement had been taken down Mr. O'Neil arrived to defend him but could not see what was to be done, the statement being virtually an admission of guilty, and in addition, to the charge of having another wife.

BLACK KNOT.

Black knot is due to a fungus, and the trouble is communicated from one tree to another. If the disease is taken in hand upon its first appearance, when first seen breaking up through the bark, and the branch removed, or, if the branch is large, the affected portion cut entirely away down to sound wood, afterwards washing the wound with a solution of chloride of lime (bleaching powder), it can, if this is persisted in, be subdued. Where the neighborhood is filled with diseased trees it will be of little use to try to cure your own, for your neighbors' trees will continue to infest them or any new ones that may be planted. If all plum growers in the vicinity would agree to cut down and burn every diseased tree, and if the healthy trees remain free from "knot" for a couple of years, it may be safe to plant new trees. The knot often attacks the Morello cherry, and may exist in a locality where there are no plum trees, and when these trees are planted the cherries communicate the disease to them. Thorough cutting, if it takes the whole tree, is the only hope for the present trees; if beyond this, cut down all the diseased trees and do not plant any more plums until the disease appears to be extirpated in the vicinity. It has been stated that yellow plums are less liable to the knot than those with purple fruit, but this is not well established. — American Agriculturist for July.

One of the most serious hindrances in onion growing is the onion maggot, the larva of a small fly resembling the house fly, but smaller. No positive remedy is known, but it is a common belief among gardners that when the maggot becomes troublesome it is a good plan to change the land, which otherwise would not be done, for, unlike cabbage and many other crops, onions thrive year after year on the same land.

It is always bad policy to crop bearing orchards, and one reason for this is that it generally prevents their pasturing by pigs, which are the best scavengers for destroying wormy fruit, with its contents. The apples in our markets would be fairer if pigs had the range of apple orchards, and the pigs themselves would be more healthful food. If not ringed, pigs will give an orchard all the ploughing it needs, with no danger or injury to tree roots.

THE MONTREAL CONVENTION.

The Dominion Prohibition Convention, to be held at Montreal on July 3rd, 4th and 5th, will be a gathering of remarkable interest. It will be the first national Canadian conference of delegated Prohibitionists. The great meeting in Montreal in 1875, out of which came the Dominion Alliance and the Scott Act, was simply a mass convention of active temperance workers. In the coming meeting every delegate will represent a constituency of Prohibitionists anxiously waiting the decision of their leaders and the call to arms for further conflict.

The convention has been called by the Dominion Alliance, but it will be thoroughly independent when it meets, and will organize and control itself. Every local temperance organization, every lodge, division, council, union, club, church, society, or any such institution is invited to send a delegate for each fifty of its membership, any number not being a complete fifty to count as fifty for the purpose of representation. Every Provincial Temperance organization is invited to send its executive committee or an equal number of representatives. Every Provincial Branch of the Alliance is to send ten, and every County Alliance or Scott Act Association is entitled to five.

The principal railway and steamboat lines are acting very liberally towards the Convention. The Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railways and Richelieu Steamboat Company will issue return tickets to Montreal, for single fare, to all persons applying. Tickets will be issued on this plan from Saturday, June 30th, up to Tuesday, July 3rd, and will be good for return passage up to Saturday, July 7th. It will be seen that all who attend the Convention (which will be open to the public), whether delegates or not, may avail themselves of these reduced fares.

The meetings of the Convention proper will be held in the Victoria Rifles Armory on Cathcart street. On Sunday evening, July 1st, there will be held a great Gospel temperance meeting at some central point; on Monday, 2nd, there will be an excursion to Mystic and a Prohibition picnic there; on Tuesday evening, 3rd, a monster Prohibition mass meeting will be held. All these gatherings will be addressed by the foremost moral reform workers of Canada.

Already there is being manifested everywhere a deep interest in this Convention. Its doings and sayings will be carefully studied by the temperance party, the liquor party and the politicians. It will make history. The Prohibitionists are in earnest. The policy they are advocating must speedily receive the careful attention of statesmen and voters. It is being pressed into active politics with a persistence that will not be daunted. It has behind it some of the best brain-power in the land, it has been warmly endorsed by different branches of the Christian church, and it influences the vote of an important and growing section of the electorate. The Montreal meeting will be a gathering of men conscientiously and determinedly in earnest. We trust that in its deliberations wise counsels will prevail, and that its results will be for the welfare of our country and the advancement of temperance, which every friend of humanity desires to promote.

The chief objections to cornmeal as food for pigs, says the Cultivator, are its richness, and secondly its liability to compact in the stomach, so that the saliva and other solvents cannot readily work on it. The food after mastication lies in a heavy mass that only the strongest stomachs can resolve. The cow and sheep remasticate this food, mix more saliva with it, and thus escape much injury. But an over-feeding of corn will put either sheep or cows "off their feet" quicker than almost anything else. The pig has no such recourse. Having his stomach filled with corn, he founders, just as a horse would do under like circumstances.

Luxuriant Hair
Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.
Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."
Ten Years Younger.
Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."
A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.
The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

CHAPTER VII.

FRIENDS IN COUNCIL.

That same night, as the Squire and Mrs. Meysey sat by themselves towards the small hours—after the girls had unanimously evacuated the drawing-room—discussing the affairs of the universe generally, as then and there envisaged, over a glass of claret-cup, the mother looked up at last with a sudden glance into the father's face and said, in a tone half-anxious, half-timid: "Tom, did it happen to strike you this afternoon that that handsome cousin of Elsie Challoner's seemed to take a great fancy to our Winifred?"

The Squire stirred his claret-cup idly with his spoon. "I suppose the fellow has eyes in his head," he answered bluntly. "No man in his senses could ever look at our little Winnie, I should think, Emily, and not fall over his ears in love with her."

Mrs. Meysey waited a minute or two more in silent suspense before she spoke again; then she said once more, very nettatively: "He seems a tolerably nice young man, I think, Tom."

"Oh, he's well enough, I daresay," the Squire admitted grudgingly.

"A barrister, he says. That's a very good profession," Mrs. Meysey went on, still feeling her way by gradual stages.

"Never heard so in my life before," the Squire grunted out. "There are barristers and barristers. He gets no briefs. Lives on literature, by what he tells me: next door to living upon your wits, I call it."

"But I mean, it's a gentleman's profession, anyhow, Tom, the bar."

"Oh, the man's a gentleman, of course, if it comes to that—a perfect gentleman; and an Oxford man, and a person of culture, and all that sort of thing—I don't deny it. He's a very presentable fellow, too, in his own way; and most intelligent: understands the riparian proprietors' question as easy as anything.—You can ask him to dinner whenever you choose, if that's what you're driving at."

Mrs. Meysey called another halt for a few second's before she reopened fire, still more timidly than ever. "Tom, do you know I rather fancy he really likes our Winifred?' she murmured, gasping.

"Of course he likes our Winifred," the Squire repeated, with profound conviction in every tone of his voice. "I should like to know who on earth there is that doesn't like our Winifred! Nothing new in that. I could have told you that myself. Go ahead with it, then.—What next, now, Emily?"

"Well, I think, Tom, if I'm not mistaken, Winifred seemed rather inclined to take a fancy to him too, somehow."

Thomas Wyville Meysey laid down his glass incredulously on the small side-table. He didn't explode, but he hung fire for a moment. "You women are always fancying things," he said at last, with a slight frown. "You think you're so precious quick, you do, at reading other people's faces. I don't deny you often succeed in reading them right. You read mine precious often, I know, when I don't want you to—that I can swear to. But sometimes, Emily, you know you read what isn't in them. That's the way with all decipherers of hieroglyphics. They see a great deal more in things than ever was put there. You remember that time when I met old Hillier down yonder——"

"Yes, yes, I remember," Mrs. Meysey admitted, checking him at the outset with an astute concession. She had cause to remember the facts, indeed, for the Squire reminded her of that one obvious and palpable mistake about the young fox-cubs at least three times a week, the year round, on an average. "I was wrong that time; I know I was, of course. You weren't in the least annoyed with Mr. Hillier. But I think—I don't say I'm sure, observe, dear—but I think Winifred's likely to take a fancy to him—a serious fancy—and he to her—what are you and I to do about it?"

As she spoke, Mrs. Meysey looked hard at the lamp and then at her husband, wondering with what sort of grace he would receive this very revolutionary and upsetting suggestion. For herself—though mothers are hard to please—it may as well be admitted off-hand, she has fallen a ready victim at once to Hugh Massinger's charms and brilliancy and blandishments. Such a nice young man, so handsome and gentlemanly, so adroit in his talk, so admirable in his principles, and though far from rich yet, in his way, distinguished! A better young man, darling Winifred was hardly likely to meet with. But what would dear Tom think about him? she wondered. Dear Tom had such very expansive not to say utopian ideas for Winifred—thought nobody but a Duke or a Prince of the blood half good enough for her: though to be sure, experience would seem to suggest that Dukes and Princes, after all, are only human, and not originally very much better than other people. Whatever superior moral excellence we usually detect in the finished product may no doubt be safely set down in ultimate analysis to the exceptional pains bestowed by society upon their ethical education.

The Squire looked into his claret-cup profoundly for a few seconds before answering as if he expected to find it a perfect Dr. Dee's divining crystal, big with hints as to his daughter's future; and then he burst out abruptly with a grunt; "I suppose we must leave the answering of that question entirely to Winnie."

Mrs. Meysey did not dare to let her internal sigh of relief escape her throat; that would have been too compromising, and would have alarmed dear Tom. So she stifled it quietly. Then dear Tom was not wholly averse, after all, to this young Mr. Massinger. He, too, had fallen a victim to the poet's wiles. That was well; for Mrs. Meysey, with a mother's eye, had read Winifred's heart through and through. But we must not seem to give in too soon. A show of resistance runs in the grain with women. He's got no money," she murmured suggestively.

The Squire flared up. "Money!" he cried, with intinite contempt, "money! money! Who the dickens says anything to me about money? I believe that's all on earth you women think about—Money indeed! Much I care about money, Emily. I daresay the young fellow hasn't got money. What then? Who cares for that? He's got money's worth. He's got brains; he's got principles; he's got the will to work and to get on. He'll be a Judge in time, I don't doubt. If a man like that were to marry our Winifred, with the aid we could give him and the friends we could find him, he ought to rise by quick stages to be—anything you like—Lord Chancellor, or Postmaster-General, or Archbishop of Canterbury, for the matter of that, if your tastes happen to run in that direction."

"He hasn't done much at the bar yet," Mrs. Meysey continued, playing her fish dexterously before landing it.

"Hasn't done much! Of course he hasn't done much! How the dickens could he? Can a man make briefs for himfelf, do you suppose? He's given himself up, he tells me, to earning a livelihood by writing for the papers. He had to do it. It's a pity, upon my word, a clever young fellow like that—he understands the riparian proprietors' question down to the very ground—should be compelled to turn aside from his proper work at the bar to serve tables, so to speak—to gain his daily bread by penny-a-lining. If Winifred were to take a fancy to a young man like that, now"——The Squire paused, and eyed the light through his glass reflectively.

"He's very presentable," Mrs. Meysey went on, re-arranging her work-box, and still angling cleverly for dear Tom's indignation.

"He's a man any woman might be perfectly proud of," the Squire retorted in a thunderous voice, with firm conviction.

Mrs. Meysey followed up her advantage persistently for twenty minutes, insinuating every possible hint against Hugh, and leading the Squire deeper and deeper into a hopeless slough of unqualified commendation. At the end of that time she said quietly: "Then I understand, Tom, that if Winifred and this young Massinger take a fancy to one another, you don't put an absolute veto on the idea of their getting engaged, do you?"

"I only want Winnie to choose for herself," the Squire answered with prompt decision. "Not that I suppose for a moment there's anything in this young fellow's talking a bit to her. Men will flirt, and girls will let 'em. Getting engaged indeed! You count your chickens before the eggs are laid. A man can't look at a girl nowadays, but you women must take it into your precious heads at once he wants to go straight off to church and marry her. However, for my part, I'm not going to interfere in the matter one way or the other. I'd rather she'd marry the man she loves, and the man who loves her, whenever he turns up, than marry fifty thousand pounds and the best estate of all Suffolk."

Mrs. Meysey had carried her point with honours. "Perhaps you're right, dear," she said diplomatically, as who should yield to superior wisdom. It was her policy not to appear too eager.

"Perhaps I'm right!" the Squire echoed, half in complacency and half in anger. "Of course I'm right. I know I'm right, Emily. Why, I was reading in a book the other day a most splendid appeal from some philosophic writer or other about making fewer marriages in future to please Mamma, and more to suit the tastes of the parties concerned, and subserve the good of coming generations. I think it was an article in one of the magazines. It's the right way, I'm sure of that; and in Winifred's case I mean to stick to it."

So, from that day forth, if it was Hugh Massinger's intention or desire to prosecute his projected military operations against Winnifred Meysey's hand and heart, he found at least a benevolent neutral in the old Squire, and a secret, silent, but none the less domestic ally in Mrs. Meysey. It is not often that a penniless suitor thus enlists the sympathies of the parental authorities, who ought by precedent to form the central portion of the defensive forces, on his own side in such an aggressive enterprise. But with Hugh Massinger, nobody ever even noticed it as a singular exception. He was so clever, so handsome, so full of promise, so courteous and courtly in his demeanour to young and old, so rich in future hopes and ambitions, that not the Squire alone, but everybody else who came in contact with his easy smile, accepted him beforehand as almost already a Lord Chancellor, or a Poet Laureate, or an Archbishop of Canterbury, according as he might choose to direct his talents into this channel or that; and failed to be surprised that the Meyseys or anybody else on earth should accept him with effusion as a favoured postulant for the hand of their only daughter and heiress. There are a few such universal favorites here and there in the world: whenever you meet one, smile with the rest, but remember that his recipe is a simple one—Humbug.

Hugh stopped for two months or more at Whitestrand, and during all that time he saw much both of Elsie and of Winifred. The Meyseys introduced him with cordial pleasure to all the melancholy gaieties of the sleepy little peninsula. He duly attended with them the somnolent garden-parties on the smooth lawns of neighboring Squires: the monotonous picnics up the tidal stream of the meandering Char: the heavy dinners at every local rector's and Vicar's and resident baronet's; with all the other deadalive entertainments of the dullest and most stick-in-the-mud corner of all England. The London poet enlivened them all, however, with his never-failing flow of languid humor, and his slow, drawled-out readiness of Pall Mall repartee. It was a comfort to him, indeed, to get among these unspoiled and unsophisticated children of nature; he could palm off upon them as original the last good thing of that fellow Hatherley's from the smoking-room of the Cheyne Row Club, or fire back upon them, undetected, dim reminiscences of pungent chaff overneard in brilliant West-end drawing-rooms. And then, there were Elsie and Winifred to amuse him; and Hugh, luxurious, easy-going epicurean philosopher that he was, took no trouble to decide in his own mind even what might be his ultimate intentions towards either fair lady, satisfied only, as he phrased it to his inner self, to take the goods the gods provided him for the passing moment, and to keep them both well in hand together. "How happy could I be with either," sings Captain Macheath in the oft-quoted couplet, "were t'other dear charmer away." Hugh took a still more lenient view of his personal responsibilities than the happy-go-lucky knight of the highway; he was quite content to be blest, while he could, with both at once, asking no questions, for conscience' sake, of his own final disposition, marital or otherwise, towards one or the other, but leaving the problem of his matrimonial arrangements for fate, or chance, to settle in its own good fashion.

It was just a week after his arrival at Whitestrand that he went up one morning early to the Hall. Elsie and Winifred were seated together on a rug under the big tree, engaged in reading one novel between them.

"You must wish Winifred many happy returns of the day," Elsie called out gaily, looking up from her book as Hugh approached them. "It's her birthday, Hugh; and just see what a lovely, delightful present Mr. Meysey's given her!"

Winifred held out the present at arm's length for his admiration. It was a pretty little watch, in gold and enamel, with her initials engraved on the back on a broad shield. "It's just a beauty! I should love one like it myself!" Elsie cried enthusiastically. "Did you ever see such a dear little thing? It's keyless too, and so exquisitely finished. It really makes me feel quite ashamed of my own poor old battered silver one."

Hugh took the watch and examined it carefully. He noted the maker's name upon the dial, and opening the back, made a mental memorandum of the number. A sudden thought had flashed across him at the moment. He waited only a few minutes at the Hall, and then asked the two girls if they could walk down into the village with him. He had a telegram to send off, he said, which he had only just that moment remembered. Would they mind stepping over with him as far as the post-office?

They strolled together into the sleepy High Street. At the office, Huge wrote and sent off his telegram. It was addressed to a well-known firm of watchmakers in Ludgate Hill. "Could you send me by to-morrow evening's post, to address as below, a lady's gold and enamal watch, with initials "E. C., from H. M." engraved on shield on back, but in every other respect precisely similar to No. 2479 just supplied to Mr. Meysey, of Whitestrand Hall? If so, telegraph back cash-price at once, and cheque for amount shall be sent immediately. Reply paid. Hugh Massinger, Fisherman's Rest, Whitestrand, Suffolk."

Before lunch-time, the reply had duly arrived: "Watch shall be sent on receipt of cheque. Price twenty-five guineas." So far, good. It was a fair amount for a journeyman journalist to pay for a present; but, as Hugh shrewdly reflected, it would kill two birds with one stone. Day after to-morrow was Elsie's birthday. The watch would give Elsie pleasure; and Hugh, to do him justice, thoroughly loved giving pleasure to anybody, especially a pretty girl, and above all Elsie. But it could also do him no harm in the Meyseys' eyes to see that, journeyman journalist as he was, he was earning enough to afford to throw away twenty-five guineas on a mere present to a governess-cousin. There is a time for economy, and there is a time for lavishness. The present moment clearly came under the latter category.

SHERIDAN'S FIRST VICTORY

"The Boy is Father to the Man"—An "Unconditional Surrender" for the Time Being.

The Sheridan story runs thus: The Irish schoolmaster, Patrick McManly, was one of the sort who believed that the intelligence, morality, and future happiness of the scholars depended upon a liberal use of the birch. —On a very cold morning of 1842 or 43 two scholars reaching the school house a little ahead of the time, crawled in through a window and got warm. Being full of fun and seeing a bucket of ice water, they fastened it over the door so that on its opening the water would come down. They then retreated to a neighboring hay-mow to watch the result.

Teacher Patrick soon came along rubbing his hands vigorously to keep them warm, hurriedly turned the key and entered, and received the full dose, which heated instead of cooling his blood. He looked all around, inside and out, but there was never a boy anywhere to be seen to vent his wrath upon. So arming himself with a six-foot hickory twig, and stirring up the fire, he sat down to dry, fully determined to flog the first boy that entered. Unfortunately a little fellow soon came, and his hand was was scarcely on the latch when Patrick seized him by the collar, and shook him fiercely, "to shake the truth out of ye," he said. The astonished looks, and more astonishing yells, convinced Patrick that the boy was innocent. The next and the next and the next boy went through the same operation. Finally when all the school had been throttled and shaken into their seats, the two real culprits left the hay mow, entered the school, got their shaking and went to work.

It so happened that Phil Sheridan was very late that morning, and as each previous comer had proved his innocence, the presumption against the last one was very strong. When Phil opened the door Patrick made a dive for him, but Phil dodged and commenced his first "strategic retreat." Patrick, believing this a proof of guilt, pursued. Away went Phil up the street, and away went the teacher after him, bareheaded, stick in hand, with the whole school bringing up the rear, all on a run. Phil lost a little on the home stretch, and his pursuer was too close for him to shut the gate, as he broke into the back yard. But here he got a "reinforcement" in his pet Newfoundland dog, who instantly attacked Patrick on "flank and rear," as his master did in after years when driving Early from the Shenandoah valley. Patrick mounted the fence, the dog snapped at his heels, and he found it necessary to climb an apple tree, where he found himself out of breath, out of patience and very completely "outflanked."

"Take away yer divilish dog, Phil," says he, "or I'll bate the life out of ye." "Like to see you," says Phil; "watch him, Rover." And then he threw an old piece of carpet under the tree and bid the dog "watch" it. The dog laid down on it, and Phil mounted the fence, where he sat contemplative, with his chin in his hands and his elbows on his knees.—"What do you want to kik me for?" asked Pat.—"What did ye throw water on me for?" said Pat.—"I didn't throw any water on you."—"You did, though, bekase none of the ither boys did, and I'll punish ye to death entirely, if ye don't let me down."—He started down, but Rover went for him. Retreating up the tree, he called loudly for Phil's father.

The noise soon brought out Mr. Sheridan. The teacher up the tree, the dog growling at him, Phil on the fence, and the whole school standing around, was too funny a scene not to require an explanation.—"What are you doing up the apple tree, Mr. McManly?" he asked.

"Ah, that divilish boy of yours, Misther Sheridan, will be the death of me yet. It's all his doin's, sir. He poured a whole buckетful of water on me this mornin,' and when I wanted to give him a dacent reprimand he ran away, and for the sake of the discipline of the school, I went to catch him, and he got that big baste of a dog after me, so I had to climb this tree to defind meself."

"I didn't throw any water at all," said Phil. "All I know about it is, that he went to whipping me this morning before I got in." The old gentleman, rather enjoying the fun, and not certain whether his boy ought to be whipped without reason, suggested to let the case await further inquiry. —"Let 'im go without a floggin', Misther Sheridan? Shure, it'll ruin the school to do that now; just look at 'em, will ye, how they're all laughing at me." The old gentleman called the dog, but he looked at Phil and wouldn't stir. "Take away the divilish dog, or I'll bate the life out of both of ye intirely," said Patrick.

"Better come down nrst," Phil suggested; "watch him, Rover." Finally relenting, he said after a pause, "If you won't whip me I'll call him off. He won't go for father's calling all day, because he sees you're imposing on me.—Patrick argued and protested, but it wouldn't do. Phil's terms then were, as in after years, unconditional surrender." The longer Patrick talked, after the hot race, the douse of cold water, and the frosty January morning, the more hopeless his case became, especially when Phil intimated intention to demand on the spot exemption from all future flogging.—Finally Patrick said: "I'll tell you what, Phil. If you'll jest call off that baste, I'll not bate you this time, indade I won't."—"Why didn't you say so at first?" said Phil, and then he called Rover away.

This is believed to be the first surrender to Sheridan, though not the last by any means.—Phil said, however, that the teacher kept his word in that affair, bnt that he put two floggings into every one that he afterward administered for new offenses.

Won by a Neck—and a Box on the Ear.

About twenty-five years ago a Yorkshire gentleman owned a very promising two-year-old colt. On the day he was to make his debut the jockey engaged was unable to ride. The old trainer picked out a promising stable lad who could ride the weight and promised him five sovereigns if he won. The saddle, bridle, whip and boy barely turned the scales; in fact there was not half an ounce to spare. It being the boy's first race in public he felt anxious and nervous. The result, however, confirmed the trainer's good judgment. The boy rode a brilliant finish and beat the favorite by a neck, On returning to the paddock he was congratulated by the trainer and the owner promised him that he should do his riding for the future. The boy was elated and overjoyed at this. Catching up his saddle, bridle and whip, he went smiling and laughing into the weighing room along with the trainer. And to their dismay he was unable to pull down the the scales. The old trainer took in the situation at a glance and said to the weighmaster: "Excuse me a second." He caught hold of the boy, kicked him round the weighing-room and boxed his ears soundly, saying: "You young scoundrel, you have sold the race; never come round the stables again." He dumped him again into the scales, the boy crying as though his heart would break. The saddle, bridle and whip was pitched on his lap, and strange to say he pulled down the scales, with a trifle to spare. The incident was related to the officials, and the race was saved by the old trainer's presence of mind.

The boy became a celebrated jockey and enjoyed the confidence of his trainer and master for many years. There was a good deal of discussion at the time amongst medical men and others as to how the boy's state of mind affected his bodily weight. The colt won by a neck. The boy nearly lost by an ounce—and the trainer snatched it by a box on the ear.

NOTES ON CURRENT TOPICS.

Travellers who feel disposed to treat railway officials must in future treat only with courtesy. The penalty for giving them liquor while on duty is a fine of $50 with imprisonment for a month at hard labour.

The State of Mississippi is rejoicing because some residents of Dakota, driven away by the blizzards, have gone south to try farming. It is said that the fleeing farmers all tell the same story—the blizzard has been too much for them.

New York Tribune: The English Government never abandons its colonists when their commercial interests are at stake. It protects them, makes their interests its own, and devotes all the energies and the finesse of its diplomacy to their service.

Christian World: "Toronto is a city containing a population of 140,000, and yet they have neither Sunday horse-cars nor a single Sunday newspaper, and it is reported that in spite of the prophecies of ill, the city is prospering as never it prospered before. We hope some of that kind of leaven will be imported into the States.

Buffalo, being a much more populous city than Toronto, has suffered to a greater degree from the evils of grade railway crossings. It is stated that at least a life a day is lost on these crossings, and it is no wonder that the people of Buffalo have, during the past twelve months, persistently and vigorously agitated for the removal of so great an evil.

London is not to have a free library, the electors having voted by a large majority against it. It is satisfactory to learn that the oppositian to the enterprise was based solely upon the conditions attaching to it. The Library Board wished the city to buy a lot of old books and to take possession of an unsuitable building, and to this the people were advised not to consent.

A new thing in the way of subsidies is proposed in Quebec. On the plea that in a cold country like this some kind of stimulant is necessary, and on the assumption that if people drink good Canadian wine drunkenness will be decreased, a wine-making firm is asking for a bonus from the provinces. Of course if we bonus railway companies and manufacturers, why not wine producers?

Southern prejudices against the Negro race are evidently being softened by time. The latest evidence of this fact is found in the appointment of fifteen Negroes to positions on the police force of New Orleans. The city council for three weeks refused to confirm the nominations of the colored men, but finally they gave way to the pressure of public opinion.

Disasters are not always without redeeming features. The Baptist church in Charlottetown, P. E. I., was burned down and it is related that "the Roman Catholics were among the first to offer their afflicted fellow-citizens the use of their hall in which to bold their services, and are not at all backward about tendering donations of money to the building fund." Here is a case in which trouble has produced sympathy, toleration and friendship.

Spontaneous combustion having brought to ruin several buildings in the neighbourhood of Fredericton, N. B., the populace has arrived at the conclusion that the spirits of departed enemies are at the bottom of the disasters. Unfortunately punishment for arson does not lie in these cases, nor were such punishment possible would the insurance companies prosecute, for it happens in every instance that an uninsured building has been burned. The series of calamities certainly forms an argument in favour of insurance.

Though thoroughbred cattle may be imported free of duty into the United States the American Customs authorities have levied duties upon animals sent there by Canadians for sale at auction. Through the intervention of Sir Charles Tupper cattle of this kind, whether already sold or consigned to be sold at auction, may now pass the frontier without paying toll. Sir Charles deserves credit for the part he took in securing the removal of the tax.

It has always been a source of wonder to Canadians that mob law is so constantly resorted to in the United States. It appears in comprehensible to us that in a country where there are regularly organized courts of justice so many lynching outrages should occur, and that no serious attempt should ever be made to punish the perpetrators. It does not require any great capacity for moral reasoning to come to the conclusion that a number of men who, taking for granted the guilt of a person suspected of crime, proceed to constitute themselves jury, judges and executioners are themselves guilty of murder.

The boating season has been opened in earnest, and with it have come the dangers which beset pleasure-seekers on the water. Last year several calamities occurred, bringing sorrow into formerly happy family circles, and it is only truth to say that some of these resulted from inexperience in the apparently easily acquired arts of sailing and rowing. The trouble in past years, and it may be repeated this year, has been that people who do not know how to manage a boat are too ready to trust their lives to one.

The United States fishery experts have made one attempt to transplant the lobster from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, but they have failed owing to the circumstance that the crustacean has not been able to stand the long overland journey. A second attempt is to be made, and the Canadian Government is about to make an experiment in the same direction with a view to giving the British Columbians fresh instead of canned lobsters. It is rather strange that the lobster, so popular in the East, is not to be found in the Pacific; but probably the explanation is to be found in the circumstance that lobsters had contracted the absurd habit of walking backwards.

The War Scare.

LONDON, June 18.—The fading hopes of the warmongers now centre in Turkey as a last resort. Russia has, like a polite tailor, sent a note stating that she has been very patient, that she is pressed for money herself, and that Turkey has not kept her promise. She is earnestly requested, therefore, to send forthwith £700,000 Turkish, representing two delinquent annual instalments of the thirty-two million war idemnity agreed upon by the treaty of 1879. The Sultan not only has no money, but has a Finance Minister who just now is accused by the Vienna correspondents of amassing £300,000 by methods which would affront the sensitive feelings of a pawn broker. If Russia is ruthless in her demand she will proceed to scissor off a slice of Turkey's territory. England agreed at the Cyprus convention to protect Turkey's Asian frontier, and she must do it.

Moreover, English diplomatic circles are not a little ill at ease over Russian railway building, and if there is to be trouble they would prefer to have it come this year. With a Unionist majority in Parliament and the railway through the Caucasus yet in complete, making the Black Sea still a commercial and strategic necessity, is perhaps one reason why Lord Knutsford is laboring so hard to fix up the trouble concerning a Chinese invasion of Australia and a British invasion of Thibet.

"She's Much Older Than Her Husband."

We heard a young girl make the above remark the other day about a lady with whom we are slightly acquainted. It was not true, yet the lady in question actually does look five years older than her husband, although she is really several years his junior. She is prematurely aged, and functional derangement is the cause. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription would cure her, and should be recommended to her, and to all others who are in the same condition. If the reader of this chances to be a similar sufferer, let her get the "Prescription." It will bring back her lost beauty, and, better still, it will remove all those distressing symptoms which have made life a burden to her so long. Money refunded if it don't give satisfaction. See guarantee printed on bottle wrapper.

It seems strange that it is necessary to persuade men that you can cure their diseases by offering a premium to the man who fails to receive benefit. And yet Dr. Sage undoubtedly cured thousands of cases of obstinate catarrh with his "Catarrh Remedy," who would never have applied to him, if it had not been for his offer of the above sum for an incurable case. "We believe that in certain lines of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

Death of Actors on the Stage in Dying Scenes.

The death of the actor Frederick Baker on the stage at Melbourne has made a great sensation in that city. The fact that he was playing the part of Mephistopheles in "Faust" no doubt heightened the melodramatic effect of it on the beholders, and it was also probably the first time a similar catastrophe has taken place in Australia. Death on the stage, however, is not a very uncommon occurrence and when we consider the highly-wrought condition of an actor's nerves, and the exciting nature of his occupation, it seems strange that it should not be more frequent. How many of us, who pursue other callings, are told by the doctors that "all violent emotion and exercise should be avoided," and that getting into a passion, or running "to catch a train," are equally deleterious! and what are these excitements compared with the feelings of an actor who identifies himself with his part? The curious coincidences, as they are called, in the fitness of the words of the drama spoken by the dying man, are merely instances of cause and affect—their peculiar appropriateness to his situation no doubt brings to a head, as it were, the catastrophe that was impending, and which would have happened in any case. Otherwise it is difficult to explain why, in so many instances, the fatal seizure should take place at so apt a moment. The best known case is that of John Palmer, who died in 1798 at Liverpool while performing as "The Stranger," and in the very act of saying.

"There is another and a better world."

In this instance there were predisposing causes, for on that day the actor had received the news of the death of his favourite son.

Mr. Bond, an amateur, met the same sudden fate as Lusignan in Voltaire's "Zara. His emotion at the discovery of his daughter is described as "excesive" and "prodigious," and the house "rang with applause," we are told, at the fainting fit from which he never rescovered. Mr Paterson, at Norwich, as the Duke in "Measure for Measure," expired in the act of saying—

Reason thus with life—
If I do lose thee, I do lose a thing
That none but fools would keep.

And at Leeds in 1817 Mr. Cumming, in "Jane Shore," fell dead upon the stage just after he had pronounced the benediction—

Be witness for me, ye celestial hosts,
Such mercy and such pardon as my soul
Accords to thee, and begs of Heaven to show thee,
May such befall me at my latest hour.

What seems curious in this last case, and sheds some light upon a recent controversy, the actor had played Dumont for half a century, and yet, as it would appear, still experienced the emotions proper to the part in only too great intensity.

The Druggist's Coloured Jars.

While a reporter was talking with a druggist the other evening a little fellow, clad in a blue suit, entered and bought a postage stamp. After getting the stamp he said—"Say, mister, what do you put in them big jars in the window?" "Colored water," replied the druggist, smiling, and when the little fellow had gone he added—"Every now and then some little child asks us about those globes." "Well, I am curious myself. What is the full receipt?" said the reporter. "Those used by the better class of druggists," replied the druggist," "are, in reality, composed of mixtures of chemicals. Some use bottles of coloured glass filled with water, but these do not reflect the light from the gas jets as the chemicals do. For red, the most common of all, we mix iodine and iodide of potassium with water. Some add alcohol to prevent freezing. Blue is formed by a mixture of sulphate of copper, commonly called blue vitriol, and water of ammonia. Plain bi-chromate of potash in water forms the yellow colouring, and green is made by a mixture of the blue and yellow, or else from nickel dissolved in nitric acid. A pretty crimson colour may be made by combining alkanet root and oil of turpentine, and lilac is the result of a mixture of crude oxide of cobalt and nitric acid. Royal purple, one of the window colours, is made by dissolving logwood or cochineal in ammonia or sulphate of indigo. Pink is nitrate of cobalt and sesquicarbonate of ammonia, and amber is formed of one part of dragon's blood and four oil of vitriol, filtered and mixed with water. Of course, all sorts of combinations of these colors may be made, and other shades produced, but those which I have named are the principal ones in use. The first thing a druggist does on starting in business is to buy the chemicals needed for his bottles. They are an important item in the equipment of his store."

Atmospheric Strata.

The tendency of the air to form strata of different density and of different temperature is often indicated by a column of smoke rising through the still morning air to a certain height, and then spreading out as a cloud. Naturally the warmer air, being the lighter, will be above the heavier cold air; but as the atmosphere gets all its heat from the surface of the earth, the warmed air is at first beneath.

It takes more force to break up these layers of air and start currents of circulation than is popularly supposed. This will be discovered by those who have occasion to be abroad on country roads in the early morning. Driving into a thick wood, or even under the lee of woodland, they will, on a chilly August morning, suddenly come into a warm streak clearly left over from the heat of the day before. It does not rise and give place to the colder air, though it is sensibly lighter.

Some observations made on the east coast of Greenland by the German Arctic Expedition, in February of 1870, yielded most interesting results. The first report is from an elevation of nine hundred and eighteen feet. At that height the temperature was a fraction more than twenty-five degrees below zero, while, at the level of the sea close by, the thermometer indicated at the same time a temperature of about twenty-eight and one-half degrees above zero.

Here was a difference of almost fifty-four degrees within less than a thousand feet elevation, and the warmer air was beneath. In this instance there was a strong north wind blowing at the top of the mountain, no sign of which was had below.

Getting Ready for War—Apprehensions with Which the New Kaiser's Policy is Regarded.

Most of what is printed concerning the German royal family is mere reproduction of what was published following Kaiser Wilhelm's death. But from this mass of biography and personal gossip the public turns anxiously to estimates of the future policy of the new Emperor. It is believed that the policy will have nothing uncertain about it, but will be promptly and clearly defined. Bismarck has shown such aggressive tendencies, even when checked by the Empress Victoria, that his future course, now that he is practically without check, is anxiously awaited. He was so persistent in his political opposition to Emperor Frederick that nothing but his actual dying condition had the effect of softening the bitter asperities which every one in Berlin knew to exist. The stories of a reconciliation between Prince Bismarck and the retiring Empress, brought about by the dying monarch, are received with much caution. It is known that both are unrelenting in their dislike, and that no real reconciliation is possible. It is now expected that there will be at once developed a more rigid policy than ever upon the German frontier. Austria is arming with as much energy as if she were certain of future trouble. Russia is constantly sending secretly to London for financial aid for the purpose of extending her military preparations. All of the leading English newspapers are making ready for war, hoping it may not come, but believing that it will not be safe to go ahead from now without being fully prepared.

ALIVE IN HER COFFIN.

Strange Restoration of a Young Woman Who Was Supposed to be Dead.

Mrs. Dicie Webb keeps a grocery in Cincinnati, O., and is known to hundreds of people. Two years ago John Webb, a son of Mrs. Webb, married Sarah Kelly, a remarkably pretty girl, to whom the mother-in-law became greatly attached. Before the first year of their married life had passed Mrs. Webb, jr., became stricken with consumption. About a month ago the young lady became anxious to visit her parents in Henderson County. Two weeks ago last Tuesday a telegram announced her death, and the husband started for the remains. Three days later he returned with the corpse. The mother-in-law pleaded so hard for a sight of the dead woman it was decided to open the coffin.

While looking at the placid face Mrs Webb became almost paralyzed with fright at beholding the eyelids of the dead woman slowly open. Mrs. Webb was unable to utter a sound. Finally she fell upon a chair near by, but her horror was only increased when the supposed corpse slowly sat upright and in an almost inaudible voice said: "Oh, where am I?" At this the weeping woman screamed.

Friends who rushed into the room were almost paralyzed at the sight. One, bolder than the others, returned and spoke to the woman, who asked to be laid on the bed. Hastily she was taken from the coffin and tenderly cared for. The day following she related, as her strength permitted, a wonderful story. She was conscious of all that occurred, and did not lose consciousness until she was put aboard the train for Memphis.

Soon after being placed in her mother-in-law's home she regained consciousness. A supreme effort was made to speak while her mother-in law was looking at her, and in that instant, while returning to life, she again lost track of her surroundings, which caused her to ask where she was. Mrs. Webb lived a number of days, when she again apparently died. The doctor pronounced her dead, and she was once more placed in the coffin from which she had been taken, and next day was buried.

Sculling Across the British Channel.

Mr. Samuel Osborne, whose disappearance in a small pleasure boat on Monday caused considerable anxiety, returned to Dover Thursday with the boat in which he sculled across the Channel to the French coast. He belongs to Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, where it is stated he is well known. He is a well-built, athletic-looking young fellow of about 30, and resembles in a remarkable degree the late Capt. Matthew Webb, who some years ago swam across the Channel.

He came to Dover on Saturday night, and states that his only object was to prove that the voyage of the Oxford crew in crossing the Channel in an eight-oared galley was no great feat of endurance when it could be done by one person. Altogether Mr. Osborne must have rowed between forty and fifty miles, and, as a feat of strength and endurance, it is certainly a notable one. The time occupied from start to finish was only thirteen hours. This is the most remarkable part of the performance, as the voyage was made against a strong easterly wind.

Osborne states that he launched from Dover beach at 11 A. M., there being a fresh wind at the time. The only refreshments he took with him were a few biscuits and a bottle of stout. His intention was to row straight to Calais, but he found the tide drifted him down channel toward Folkestone. In crossing he was drifted backward and forward, according to the set of the tide. About 3 P. M. he passed the East Varne buoy, where he sighted a yacht, which signal led to him. Toward dusk he had reached the Ridge Bank, or fishing ground, where he came up with a Folkestone fishing boat. The wind had then increased, and his little twenty-foot punt was pitching about a great deal, although, with careful handling, only a little water was shipped. The fishermen told him it was going to be a rough night, and advised him to come on board, as he was then fifteen miles from Calais and twenty from Boulogne. Osborne, however, thanked them for their offer, and said he intended to finish his voyage. As there was considerably more wind—which is always felt more in this side of the Channel—the boat required very careful handling for the rest of the distance. Night soon after set in, and the remainder of the voyage was made by moonlight. Nothing further was fallen in with, and Osborne ran his boat aground on the French coast near Wimereux at midnight, about two miles and a half west of Boulogne. Osborne states that he kept up a steady pull right across the Channel, and did not feel any the worse for his trip. There being no one about, Osborne pulled his boat up, and lay in it till morning, when he obtained assistance, and had his boat conveyed into Boulogne, where it was subsequently placed on board the packet and brought over to Folkestone.

When the matter became known at Boulogne it created a great deal of interest in the town. The boat belonged to a boatman named Newman, who had very little hope of ever seeing his boat back again. Mr. Osborne three years ago performed the feat of rowing fifty miles in twelve hours, from Tewkesbury to Gloucester, and Sharpness Point and back to Gloucester.—[London Telegraph.

Deep-Sea Soundings.

According to Mr Stalibrass, the history of deep-sea sounding might almost be said to date from the time of the first Almanac cable scheme in 1858, but proper attention has not been given to the subject until quite recently. The work of surveying with a view to ascertaining the configuration of the ocean-bed previous to laying a submarine cable is of vital importance. Between Cadiz and Teneriffe alone, a distance of about seven hundred miles, seventy-three soundings were taken on one expedition, resulting in the discovery of two banks, two coral patches, and four other shoal spots. Some of the inches near these banks were remarkable for their steepness.

FARM.

TREES ON MY NEIGHBOR'S LAND.

If my neighbor's trees, planted near my line, and hanging over on to my land, even if their roots draw subsetenance and spread over the border and go foraging among my own, he is entitled to all the fruit, not me.—But, if the fruit falls and lays on my land, a question may arise as to my neighbor's right to go on my land to recover the fruit. This point is supposed not to be clearly settled, though an implied right to enter and recover his fruit would seem to follow. In a New York case the law books report a case of a lady (whose father owned some fruit trees) stood upon the division fence, and undertook to pick cherries from a limb of a tree that overhung a neighbor's land. The neighbor forbade her, and on her persisting, attemped to prevent her by force, and did her personal injury, for which he was obliged to pay, through the courts, one thousand dollars. The rights are not all one way, however. I may lop off branches or roots of trees just even to my line of land to my neighbor's trees, but if I use them after lopping, I am liable to pay the owner for their value, or if I exceed my exact line. If a tree stands on a boundary line, part on my, and part on my neighbor's land, then we own it, or its fruit, in common. Neither I nor my neighbor can cut down this tree without obtaining the consent of the other. Nor can I cut off that part extending over my domain, if by so doing I injure the common property. I am not responsible to my neighbor for a thick plantation of trees I may have, that makes my neighbor's house damp and unhealthy, hat is called in law d mnuma bsque injuria a loss without injury.) But I am responsible for any damage caused by poisonous trees overhanging my neighbor's property—if his cattle "did eat" and suffer.

If, however, they broke through my fence and coveted my tree to their injury, I am not liable, his cattle then being trespassers. This is in substance the law as laid down in Austin's American Farm Law.

OBJECTS TO DEHORNING.

D. M. Langley, Bourbon, Ind., in a recent issue of the Chicago Tribune, says of dehorning: Why in humanity's name is this criminal cruelty allowed to be practiced by the money-making sharks who prey on the ignorance and credulity of the public? Some Bergh should rise up and bring these offenders to condign punishment for practicing such cruel and unnecessary horrors on the dumb animal, when a far better and easier method of dehorning cattle can be made by anyone without cost, pain or danger. If the calf is taken when but a few weeks old and the little horns just begin to bud and show themselves, and a white-hot iron held over the little horn germ for an instant, no horn will ever appear, and there will be no possible danger of injury to the little dumb animal. No doubt the dehorning man will attempt to laugh the idea to scorn, as it will abolish his profitable vocation, but none the less is it a fact worth remembering in the practice of dehorning cattle.

A LARGE PLANTATION.

The Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Agriculture offered in 1876 a prize of one thousand dollars for the best five-acre plantation of the European Larch, 2,700 trees to be planted to the acre. The "Forest and Garden" gives the report of the committee awarding the premium to J. D. W. French of North Andover. The trees were set when a foot high, on poor worn out land, unfit for agricultural purposes, producing nothing but a scant growth of grass, sedge and stunted pitch pines—15,000 on the five acres, four feet apart each way. The trees and setting cost $240. They grew slowly at first, but better afterwards. At the end of the prescribed ten years the largest tree was 25 feet high and 8 inches in diameter, several others about as large, and most of them are 12 feet or more. The experiment appears to have proved that very poor and unproductive soil may be cheaply covered with trees. The awarding committee think that white pine would be quite as successful and much more valuable.

NOTES.

Increase the ventilation of your stables as the weather grows milder.

Straw alone is a poor food, but mixed with cotton or linseed cake, wheat bran and oats and clover hay it makes excellent food.

Buttermilk may be safely fed to sows with pigs, but it is best to begin feeding a small quantity and gradually increase the amount.

Weeds will spring up as early as vegetables, and a watch must be kept for them. The best time to destroy them is when they first appear.

An experienced breeder of swine says that often when hogs are sluggish and indifferent about eating, nothing in the world ails them but toothache.

Soot water is a good and easily made fertilizer for hot plants. It benefits all kinds of plants and clears the soil of worms. Begin using it moderately.

In laying out your work for the season give the garden a liberal share of attention. It may not be labor which will bring great returns in money, but it is certain to do so in family health and comfort.

Professor Whitcher says that a ton of ordinary manure contains only about twenty per cent. of fertilizing material, the remaining eighty per cent. being water. If that is correct, dry manure would be all fertilizing material, which would place it ahead of superphosphate.

Two dollars a ton is about the price paid by the sugar mills in Kansas for sorghum cane delivered. The price seems to us very low. The farmer saves the seed, however, which adds to the profits. Sorghum seed is a very rich stock food, but ought to be ground before being fed.

The bright spring days will cause the young pigs to grow rapidly. Turn them on grass as soon as they are ten weeks old, but gradually at first, or they may have the scours. It will cost but very little to raise a few pigs if they be given the privileges of a small grass plot and fed twice a day.

We import some 16,000,000 dozen eggs a year, for which we pay $2,500,000, and Mr. A. F. Hunter wants to know why we do not produce these eggs ourselves. He answers his own question in the New England Farmer, by saying that we have hens enough, but they do not lay as they ought to.

The hens should always be provided with something within which to scratch. Any thing will answer, such as cut-straw, chaff, sawdust, earth, wood ashes, or even sweepings from buildings. Above all things, keep the hens at work during confinement, as they will remain in better health, and prove themselves more productive.

A farmer in the neighborhood of Corinth, Me., having been annoyed by a number of hawks and crows which made their headquarter in ore of his trees, set a trap on the end of a long pole, which he fastened to the tree in such a manner that the trap was a little higher than the topmost branch. The result, at last report, was the capture of nine hawks, three owls and one crow.

Several cases of poisoning by strawberries are reported by physicians. There is something antagonistic in the acid of the fruit to some stomachs which results in indigestion. The disturbance makes itself felt by an eruption upon the skin, and sometimes by extreme swelling of the face. This lack of harmony between certain articles of food and the stomach is a curious matter, but instances of it are afforded in nearly every family. One member cannot eat fish, another chicken, etc. Experience alone is able to tell us what to avoid, and in this matter, at least, the unstudied individual is wiser than his physician.

At Saturday's session of the London Conference Rev. John Stonehouse, of Adelaide, whose name figured so prominently recently as being accused of blackmailing hotel-keepers, was deposed from the ministry and expelled from the Church.

A CHAPTER OF TRAGEDIES.

Some Examples of the Wickedness in United States Centres.

On a Sabbath noon, about the middle of last October, the worshippers who were leaving one of the most fashionable churches in Chicago were startled by the sounds of pistol shots and at the sight of one of their number falling to the pavement, apparently dead. The wounded man was a rich banker and his assailant was his step-son. The first has recovered from the five bullet wounds he received, while the second is serving out a brief term of eighteen months for attempting the life of his step-father. On a recent Friday another chapter was added to this tragedy when the wife of the banker and the mother of the prisoner walked into a courtroom in Chicago and of her husband, wounding him twice. The wounded lawyer will probably recover, and the would-be murderess has gone to join her son in prison.

The occurrence illustrates on a conspicuous scale one feature of social life which is becoming so marked in the large American cities. Another phase of it was exhibited a few weeks ago in New York, when a broker was found dead in the yard of the house from which he was seeking to escape in order to avoid disgrace. In the Chicago case the actors were a rich banker of easy social habits, a woman whose only dowry was her beauty and a young man reckless and daring enough to take upon himself to revenge the supposed wrongs of his mother. The reputation of the woman was known to the banker before he made her his wife. He was told that she had had two other husbands from neither of whom had she obtained a legal divorce, but when to him he averred his readiness to marry her even if the whole world was against her. When, however, he repented of his choice and sought to be rid of his burden he found that the woman whom he had supposed to be only a weak, emotional creature could fight as well as he.

Then followed charges and counter-charges a suit for divorce and ejectment from home, the raking up of old scandals, the hounding of lawyers, the tragedy at the church door and finally the shooting scene of Friday.

And now the public which has been compelled unwillingly to take the part of an audience while this play in real life was being acted before its eyes, must apportion the blame and award the censure. With a full knowledge of all the facts the sympathy of the city in which the tragedy was enacted has gone out to the woman until the last when she attempted to take vengeance in her own hands. The larger share of public censure in such a case is always meted out to the man, and generally this judgment is just.

It is one of the penalties exacted for the greater liberties accorded the male and it is one of the safeguards public opinion throws about

THE DEFENCELESS FEMALE.

And who shall say that the decision is not just? The male actors in these tragedies find that their business and even their social privileges are but little restricted by such escapades, while publicity always brings social ostracism and financial ruin to the female.

Chicago is said to have doubled its population and quadrupled its wealth during the past sixteen years. Those who look only at the surface of things will be dazzled by these figures and the visions of future prosperity they call to the mind's eye. But those who look deeper and estimate the welfare of a nation by the honor and domestic virtue of its people will see in the Hatch and Rawson tragedies the seeds of a social rottenness that must be eradicated, or it will bring ruin to the country, in spite of its marvelous achievements in material wealth.

The Democratic Nominees.

Grover Cleveland, who is to be the eighth American re chosen by his fellow-citizens to the chief honor in their gift, began life under fairly good conditions, but without adventitious help to advancement. His mother was the daughter of an Irish bookseller. His father was a Presbyterian minister. Of this parentage he was born in Cardwell, N. J., March 18, 1837. He received only a country school education, and at 14 years old it was necessary that he should add his mite to the family income. He was a clerk in a country store for $50 a year, but his father's death, leaving a widow and nine children, broke up the family and set the 17-year-old boy afloat in the world. In 1853 he assisted his brother to teach the blind at the institution on Thirty-third street in this city. A friend then offered to send him to college, but he preferred begin the study of law directly. His uncle, L. F. Allen, of Buffalo, helped him to enter the office of Rogers & Bowen, of Buffalo, where he remained until 1863. That his prosperity had already begun, and that, without wealth, he lacked for nothing, sufficiently appears from the fact that he always had something to spare for his mother and sisters and steadily contributed to their support.

Grover Cleveland's first office was that of Assistant District Attorney for Erie County for three years from 1853. He was nominated for District Attorney, but was defeated by Lyman K. Bass. He declined the offer of an Assistant United States District Attorneyship, and in 1870 was elected sheriff. He wanted the income of an office to increase his means, and its leisure for study. He realized his expectations in these respects, and, instead of becoming a commonplace sheriff, he developed into a thriving counsellor at-law. Thus in 1881 he was equal to accepting his party's nomination for mayor, and he was elected by the largest majority ever known in the history of Buffalo. He at once put in practice a principle phrased at a later period, viz.:—"That public office is a trust," and that public affairs should be administered on the principle of private business. His mayoralty attracted attention and approval beyond the bounds of Buffalo, and thus he ran for Governor in 1882, and was elected by a plurality of 192,854. In this conspicuous office he maintained his repute for modest efficiency, honesty and independence, conducting himself with a sole regard for the public good, careless of the effect upon his personal fortunes. His phenomenal majority and his evident capacity for high office commanded for him the nomination for President in 1884. Since then his life has been before the eye of the nation, and needs no rehearsal, now that his nomination repeats the verdict of approval which has followed him in every relation of life.—[N. Y. Col. King Harman, under secretary for Ireland, over whose salary war has been waged in the Imperial parliament for the greater part of the session, is dead, but as a successor is to be appointed it is not likely that the battle will cease. It is somewhat interesting to note that the Dublin Free man claims that the agitation over the salary bill was largely the cause of Col. Harman's death, when it was the Freeman's own party that made the stir and that the deceased had been absent on a voyage to South Africa and back nearly all the time the discussion had been going on.

The net profits of the Canadian Pacific railway for the month of April, inclusive of the South-Eastern railway, were $249,679, as compared with $232,456 for April, 1887. For the four months ending April 30th the net profits were $487,879, against $236,453 for the corresponding period last year.

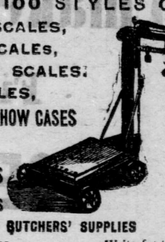
Mobbing an Executioner.

The office of public executioner at Vienna is not a very desirable position. A few days since this official, accompanied by two assistants, went to Trieste to polish off some poor wretch who was under sentence of death. While sipping beer in a brasserie they were recognized, and the place was immediately turned into a battlefield. They were mobbed and narrowly escaped with their lives to the nearest police station. The proprietor of the brasserie then broke the glasses out of which they had been drinking, and after chopping up the chairs upon which they had been sitting he made a bonfire of them in the street. The principal barber in Trieste was obliged to publish a card in all the local newspapers denying a rumor that the executioner had been shaved in his shop, as in consequence of the story getting abroad every one of his customers refused to continue their patronage.

A Lady Who Saw Napoleon.

Lady Buchan, whose death is recorded at the age of 90 years, was one of the last surviving persons who had a distinct recollection of Napoleon the Great. Her father, Colonel Wilks, was Governor of St Helena in 1815, at the time of Bonaparte's banishment, and on the term of his Governorship expiring, Miss Wilks was desirous of being introduced to the ex-emperor. "I have long heard from various quarters of the superior eloquence and beauty of Miss Wilks, but now I am convinced from my own eyes that report has scarcely done her sufficient justice," said Napoleon to her. "You must be very glad to leave this island," he said. "Oh, no, sire," was the answer, "I am very sorry to go away." "Oh! mademoiselle, I wish I could change places with you." Napoleon presented her with a gold bracelet in memory of this visit. Miss Wilks subsequently married the late General Sir John Buchan, whom she long survived.



It is stated that words hurt nobody; nevertheless, Samson jawed a thousand Philistines to death.

A little girl seeing her mother petting and caressing another child began to show unmistakable signs of jealousy. Her mother remarked; "Why Sadie, I believe you are jealous." "No mamma," she replied, indignantly, "I'm not jealous, but I don't feel comf'able."

SOME of our readers may be anxious to know how James McRae, the young man who accidentally shot himself at the Wallacetown fair a year ago last fall, is getting along. In reference to his condition we would say that his wounds and sores are healed up and he is pretty rugged and hearty, but his lowor parts are still paralyzed. He has no feeling in feet or legs and is unable to move them except with his hands. There is a military doctor in the West who says the bullet can be removed and the patient cured. We believe it is the intention to move him for a trial this fall.

DOMINION DAY at Leamington is to be celebrated in a manner in keeping with the successful demonstration which usually takes place at that town. The programme of amusements is a lengthy and a varied one, consisting of athletic sports, procession, base ball match, bicycle races, horse races and a grand display of fireworks in the evening. The amusements of the day will be sufficient to draw a very large crowd of pleasure seekers, but the main attraction will be the grand display of fireworks in the evening, which will be under the management of Prof. Hand himself, and which will without doubt be the finest display ever made in Ontario west of London. The committee are sparing no pains to make the day a grand success in every respect, and all who make July 2nd a holiday should undoubtedly go to Leamington. There will be excursion rates by rail and boat on that day.

A MOST enjoyable time was spent by those who were fortunate enough to be present at the annual picnic of School Section No. 12, Aldborough, which was celebrated last Friday. After ample justice had been done to the good things usually furnished on such occasions Mr. Stalker was called to the chair, which he filled in his usual happy style. Short and instructive addresses were delivered by Mr. McKillop, B.A., Mr. Montague and others of West Lorne. Messrs. Crane, Campbell and Jackson, of Dutton, furnished the instrumental music which called forth storms of applause, indicating how much they were appreciated by the audience. Messrs. Crane and Jackson gave a few of their comic songs which completely captivated the lovers of music and brought forth roars of laughter. The songs rendered by Mr. A. McMillan, of Dunwich, were a treat to all those who love the songs of Scotia. Too much praise cannot be given to Miss Moir, teacher, and the Misses Coll and others for the management, as no doubt they have the credit of having one of the best picnics ever held in the vicinity An amusing feature of the affair was the eagerness with which some of the bachelors acted upon a suggestion of the chairman, that it would be a good opportunity for them to improve their time by swinging the ladies and making themselves agreeably useful.

HYMENEAL.

A happy party gathered at the residence of Mr. Neil Blue, Duart, on the 20th inst. to witness the marriage of his only daughter, Miss Mary M. Blue, to Mr. Alexander Love, of Eagle. The nuptial knot was tied by the Rev. Mr. Pollard, the groomsman being Mr. Duncan McColl, of Wallacetown, and the bridesmaid, Miss Minnie Blue, cousin of the bride. After the elegant dejeuner provided by the hostess had been partaken of the happy couple departed amid showers of rice. They were accompanied to Ridgetown by the wedding party where they took the 3:30 express for Detroit and other western points to spend the honeymoon.

UNITED POWER.

Burdock Blood Bitters unites in one combination remarkable powers as a tonic, blood purifying, system-regulating and cleansing medicine. It has no equal in its power of curing all diseases of the stomach, liver, kidneys bowels and blood.

Ex Senator Harrison, of Indiana, received the nomination for President of the United States at the Republican Convention held in Chicago last week.

Enrich the blood by the use of Milburn's Beef, Iron and Wine, which supplies the necessary blood building material.

The flea beetles which attack cucumber, squash and other similar plants may be kept of by dusting the vines with slackened lime or London purple mixed (one part to twenty) with flour.

PERFECT HEALTH

Can only be attained by carefully attending to the laws of nature as expressed in the wants of the system. To do this successfully requires the use of Burdock Blood Bitters occasiona ly to secure the regulating and strengthening effect of this splendid medicine.

Why You Feel
So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,
"The Life of the Body."
Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?
Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:
G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."
Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."
Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best
Spring and Family Medicine
in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how does sell." Prepared by

A fire occurred at Thomas Tait's sawmill at Germania, about six miles from Gravenhurst, on Thursday last, burning the mill, contents, 1,500,000 feet of lumber and 100,000 shingles. A spark from the burner is supposed to have been the cause of the fire.

A G. T. R. ENGINEER AND FIREMAN IN TROUBLE.—The coroner's jury empanelled to enquire into the circumstances of the death of Patrick Doyle, of Hamilton Township, who was killed by a west bound freight train at the railway crossing west of Hon. Sidney Smith's residence, Cobourg, found that Doyle came to his death through the culpable negligence and carelessness of William D. Coombe, Grand Trunk Railway engineer and Fireman A. Gates, who did not give the necessary and precautionary signals by whistle or by ringing the bell of the engine as required by law. Coombes and Gates will both be arrested.

Very little Sunday work is done at Chicago, St. Louis or Kansas City now. Says the Railroad Gazette: "The men are pleased with the change and so are the companies. The men are more ambitious than formerly and all unite in an effort to handle the business with despatch, and there is actually a great contrast noticeable between the new and old practice. Officers are well pleased, too. When much business is being done on Sundays it necessitates the attendance of officials at their posts of duty Under the present arrangement—except in cases of emergency—superintendents and managers will have no excuse for shirking church or domestic duty."

It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

TO BRIDGE THE ENGLISH CHANNEL.—Beside the long mooted project of a submarine tunnel between France and England, which has been postponed to an indefinite future, there has been for several years a scheme agitated for bridging the channel between France and England by a structure of fabulous extent. This proposed railway bridge will begin at Cape Gris-nez, near Calais and end at Folkestone. It will be nearly twenty-five miles long, and rest on seventy piers with lighthouse towers. Four railway tracks will be laid on this bridge at a height of 1,500 feet above the sea level, which will thus give direct railway communication between England and the continent, and the dreaded channel passage, which is the bugbear of sensitive travelers, will be a thing of the past. The cost of this gigantic piece of engineering, which, when completed, will be without precedent or parallel will exbeed a millard of francs.—Demorest's Monthly.

A FACT WORTH REMEMBERING.

BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of the Midland Counties Baptist Association was held in this town on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. Sixteen churches were represented and substantial progress was reported. During the year the membership in the district has increased 200. A number of very important questions were discussed and the greatest unanimity prevailed. Dr. Newman in his educational address referred to the settlement of the McMaster University difficulty, stating that a ladies' college would be instituted in connection with the University at Toronto, Mrs. McMaster having donated her residence valued at $70,000 for the purpose. The school in Woodstock will be continued as a boy's college. An annuity of $10,000 is to be set aside for the payment of teachers for the same and $36,000 will be spent in improving the building.—St. Marys Journal.

SUICIDE.—John Coates, a retired blacksmith of Canfield, about six miles below Cayuga, worth between $25,000 and $30,000, committed suicide by hanging at 9 o'clock Tuesday morning. The family consisted of deceased, his wife and adopted daughter. His wife left Monday on a visit to the lake shore, and Tuesday morning, after taking breakfast, the deceased walked quietly out of the house towards his blacksmith shop. Here, it is supposed from the place, he must have taken a box and stood upon it, and tied a rope to a beam, and after having made a running noose about his neck, he threw himself off. The body was found hanging to the beam about half an hour after he left the house. No cause as yet can be ascertained that would likely have led the deceased to commit the rash act. The deceased was 65 years of age.

NO MECHANICS WANTED.—In a letter received by the Stratford Beacon, from Mr. Robert Russell, son of Mr. George Russell, of Downie, from Spokane Falls, Washington Territory, he says: This is a lively town of 9,000 people on the Northern Pacific railway in Eastern Washington. There is considerable going on here, also in Tocoma and Seattle, but this territory is overcrowded with mechanics of all kinds and laborers. They can do much better in the east at the present time. As I am in the building line I have a chance to know. Mechanics and others seeking employment in the east, hear of the high wages here, and desire to come, but they had better stay where they are. Expensive living takes away all the profit of extra wages if a person should get work here.

"KISS THE BOOK."

In the courts of many States a witness is sworn to "tell the truth, and nothing but the truth," with his hand upon a copy of the Bible, and after this the book is presented to him to kiss. In other States the Bible is not made use of, at least not unless one of the lawyers thinks that on account of the religion of the witness it will add to the sanctity of his oath. At a trial in Newark, N.J., not long ago, Dr. Drescher, "State Analyist" of New Jersey, was a witness, and, on being sworn, made only a pretext of touching his lips to the soiled volume. After the lawyers had made their arguments, the counsel for the opposite side raised the point that the doctor's oath was invalid, as he had intentionally avoided "kissing the book." The doctor admitted that he was afraid to touch his lips to a book that had been kissed by so many others, for fear disease might be communicated, saying that "he did not think it safe to touch his lips to it." The judge ordered the case to be reopened; the doctor gave the soiled cover of the Sacred Book a sounding smack and then vigorously scrubbed his lips with his handkerchief. On the few occasions when the writer has been a witness in court, he has asked of the judge that he might "affirm" instead of "swearing," as he preferred to not take any bacteria or microbes with his oath. It is a violation not only of personal rights but of proper sanitary regulations to compel one to place his lips in contact with so foul a thing as the binding of a court Bible.—American Agriculturist for July.

About six or seven weeks ago two discharged employees of the Plaindealer took a notion to start a Reform newspaper here. A prospectus was drawn up; the town canvassed and more or less support was promised the new journal. Notice of the scheme was sent to outside papers, and Messrs. Harrison and Clark found themselves almost, if not quite, famous. Time went on but the new paper did not "materialize." About four weeks ago Mr. Harrison went to Toronto to buy the plant, but the latter had not reached maturity and could not with safety be removed here. Mr. Harrison failed to return. Mr. Clark hung on, however, and talked big. A type dealer came up from Toronta, remained here two days, and announced the bargain completed. One evening last week Clark took a check on the Traders Bank for $5, purporting to be signed by John Moody & Son, into Ed. Mitton's store and had it cashed. On going to the bank in the morning Mr. Mitton was informed that Mr. Moody had no account there. Being interviewed the Messrs. Moody pronounced the check a forgery. Clark in the meantime had skipped and the dream of a third paper was at an end. We learn that Clark's relatives, some at Woodstock and some in Ridgetown, very respectable people, have made good Mr. Mitton's loss, and the chances are the affair is ended.—Ridgetown Standard.

OUR POST-OFFICE.

The Dutton post-office has now been running nearly 14 years under the able management of Mr. A. J. Leitch. During that time there has been no trouble in the way of letters going astray or by bad management. Until about six years ago it was nothing more than a common post-office where mail was received, delivered and letters registered, but through the direct means of an article in the ENTERPRISE, which we wrote and published, setting forth the population, necessity and benefit to the place, it was made a money order office. Again, about two years ago, through another article written and published by ourselves, (unsolicited), it was raised to a savings bank post-office, which privilege many have taken advantage of.
The salary paid during most of the time since its establishment, we believe, has been nearly the smallest—or, perhaps, the smallest in comparison with the work done—of any post-office in West Elgin; but now, if not the largest salary, we believe it has the largest mail of any post-office in the west part of the riding. The following is a record of some of the work done during the past three months: Ragistered letters, 746; money orders issued, 124, amounting in aggregate to $2,336.12; the sum deposited in the savings bank department since its establishment amounts to $7,832, thus showing how the people of this community appreciate this department.
Although Mr. Leitch has not expressed in words, we believe he as well as many of the villagers are very grateful for the interest we take in the enterprise of the place, and this is only one instance in many.

HERE is a new idea for those whose churches are ornamented with a mortgage: At the Methodist church in Johnsbury, Vt., a few Sundays ago, a blackboard was displayed, upon which appeared a mountain divided off into geological strata, the upper one bearing the figures $50. Other sections were marked in smaller sums down to $1, the total representing the $708 of the church debt. This, the pastor said, he wanted to see wiped out, and as subscriptions were announced from the audience the corresponding figures and sections were erased from the board. In 25 minutes the whole mountain of debt had disappeared, and there was $50 to spare.

You Carry
A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."
Here is an instance of
who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:
"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."
John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."
T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ROADS DIVIDE.

On the second morning, true to promise, the watch arrived by the early post; and Hugh took it up with pride to the Hall, to bestow it in a casual way upon poor breathless and affectionate Elsie. He took it up for a set purpose. He would show those purse-proud landed aristocrats that his cousin could sport as good a watch any day as their own daughter. The Massingers themselves had been landed aristocrats not presumably purse-proud in their own day in dear old Devonshire; but the estates had disappeared in houses and port and riotous living two generations since; and Hugh was now proving in his own person the truth of the naif old English adage—"When land s gone and money spent, then learning is most excellent." Journalism is a poor sort of trade in its way, but at any rate an able man can earn his bread and salt at it somehow. Hugh didn't grudge those twenty-five guineas: he regarded them, as he regarded his poems, in the light of a valuable long investment. They were a sort of indirect double bid for the senior Meysey's respect and for Winifred's fervent admiration. When a man is paying attentions to a pretty girl, there's nothing on earth he desires so much as to appear in her eyes lavishly generous. A less abstruse philosopher, however, might perhaps have bestowed his generosity direct upon Winifred in propria persona: Hugh, with his subtler calculation of long odds and remote chances, deemed it wiser to display it in the first instance obliquely upon Elsie. This was an acute little piece of psychological byplay. A man who can make a present like that to a poor cousin, with whom he stands upon a purely cousinly footing, must be, after all, not only generous, but a ripping good fellow into the bargain. How would he not comport himself under similar circumstances to the maiden of his choice, and to the wife of his bosom?

Elsie took the watch, when Hugh produced it, with a little cry of delight and surprise; then, looking at the initials so hastily engraved in neat Lombardic letters on the back, the tears rose to her eyes irrepressibly as she said with a gentle pressure of his hand in hers: "I know now, Hugh, what the telegram was about the other morning. How very, very kind and good of you to think of it.—But I almost wish you hadn't given it to me. I shall never forgive myself for having said before you I should like one the same sort as Winifred's. I'm quite ashamed of your having thought I meant to hint at it."

"Not at all," Hugh answered, with just the faintest possible return of her gentle pressure. "I was twisting it over in my own mind what on earth I could ever find to give you. I thought first of a copy of my last little volume; but then that's nothing—I'm only too sensible myself of it's small worth. A book from an author is like spoiled peaches from the market gardener: he gives them away only when he has a glut of them. So, when you said you'd like a watch of the same sort as Miss Meysey's, it seemed to me a perfect interposition of chance on my behalf. I knew what to get, and I got it at once. I'm only glad those London watchmaker fellows, whose respected name I've quite forgotten, had time to engrave your initials on it."

"But Hugh, it must have cost you such a mint of money."

Hugh waved a deprecatory hand with airy magnificence over the shrubbery. "A mere trifle," he said, as one who could command thousands. "It came just to the exact sum the Contemporary paid me for that last article of mine on "The Future of Marriage." (Which was quite true, the article in question having run to precisely twenty-five pages, at the usual honorarium of a guinea a page.) "It took me a few hours, only, to dash it off." (Which was scarcely so accurate, it not being usual for even the most abandoned or practised of journalists to 'dash off' articles for a leading review; and the mere physical task of writing twenty-five pages of solid letterpress being considerably greater than most men, however rapid their pens, could venture to undertake in a few hours.)

Winifred looked up at him with a tender glance. "It's a lovely watch," she said, taking it over with an admiring look from Elsie: "and the inscription makes it ever so much nicer. One would prize it, of course, for that alone. But if I'd been Elsie, I'd a thousand times rather have had a volume of poems, with the author's autograph dedication, than all the watches in all England."

"Would you?" Hugh answered with an amused smile. "You rate the autographs at a living versifier immensely above their market value. Even Tennyson's may be bought at a shop in the Strand, you know, for a few shillings. I feel this is indeed fame. I shall begin to grow conceited soon at this rate. And by the way, Elsie, I've brought you a little bit of verse, too. Your Laureate has not forgotten or neglected his customary duty. I shall expect a butt of sack in return for these; or may I venture to take it out instead in nectar?" They stood all three behind a group of syringa bushes. He touched her lips with his own lightly as he spoke. "Many happy returns of the day—as a cousin," he added, laughing.—"And now, what's your programme for the day, Elsie?"

"We want you to row up the river to Snade, if it's not too hot, Hugh," his pretty cousin responded, all blushes.

"Tuus, O Regina, quid optes, Explorare labor; mihi jussa capessere fas est," Hugh quoted merrily. "That's the best of talking to a Girton girl, you see. You can fire off your most epigrammatic Latin quotation at her, as it rises to your lips, and she understands it. How delightful that is, now. As a rule, my Latin quotations, which are frequent and free, as Truthful James says, besides being neat and appropriate, like after-dinner speeches, fall quite flat upon the stony ground of the feminine intelligence—which last remark, I flatter myself, in the matter of mixed metaphor, would do credit to Sir Boyle Roche in his wildest flights of Hibernian eloquence. I made a lovely Latin pun at a picnic once. We had some chicken and ham sausage—a great red German sausage of the polony order, in a sort of huge boiled-lobster coloured skin; and towards the end of lunch, somebody asked me for another slice of it. "There isn't any," said I, "It's all gone. Finis Polonie!" Nobody laughed. They didn't know that "Finnis Polonie" were the last words uttered by a distinguished patriot and soldier, "when Freedom shrieked as Kosciusko fell." That comes of firing off your remarks, you see, quite above the head of your respected audience."

"But what does that mean that you have just said this minute to Elsie?" Winifred asked doubtfully.

"What! A lady in these latter days who doesn't talk Latin!" Hugh cried, with pretended rapture. "This is too delicious! I hardly expected such good fortune. I shall have the well-known joy, then, of explaining my little joke, after all, and grimly translating my own poor quotation. It means: "Thy task it is, O Queen, to state thy will: Mine, thy behests to serve, for good or ill." Rough translation, not necessarily intended for publication, but given merely as a guarantee of good faith, as the newspapers put it. Aolus makes the original remark to Juno in the first Æneid, when he's just about to raise the wind—literally, not figuratively—on her behalf, against the unfortunate Trojans. He was then occupying the same post, as clerk of the weather, that is now filled jointly by the correspondent of the New York Herald and Mr Robert Scott of the Meteorological Office. I hope they'll send us no squalls to-day, if you and Mrs. Meysey are going to come with us up the river."

On their way to the boat, Hugh stopped a moment at the inn to write hastily another telegram. It was to his London publisher: "Please, kindly send a copy of Echoes from Callimachus by first post to my address as under." And in five minutes more, the telegram despatched, they were all rowing up stream in a merry party toward Snade meadows. Hugh's plan of campaign was now finally decided. He had nothing to do but to carry out in detail his siege operations.

In the meadows, he had ten minutes or so alone with Winnifred. "Why, Mr. Massinger," she said with a surprised look, "was it you, then, you wrote that lovely article, in the Contemporary, on "The Future of Marriage," we've all been reading?"

"I'm glad you liked it," Hugh answered with evident pleasure; "and I suppose it's no use now trying any longer to conceal the fact that I was indeed the culprit."

"But there's another name to it," Winifred murmured in reply. "And Mamma thought it must be Mr. Stone, the novelist."

"Habitual criminals are often wrongly suspected," Hugh answered with a languid laugh. "I didn't put my own name to it, however, because I was afraid it was a trifle sentimental, and I hate sentiment. Indeed, to say the truth—it was a cruel trick, perhaps, but I imitated many of Stone's little manneriams, because I wanted people to think it was really Stone himself who wrote it. But for all that, I believe it all—every word of it, I assure you, Miss Meysey."

"It was a lovely article," Winifred cried, enthusiastically. "Papa read it, and was quite enchanted with it. He said it was so sensible—just what he's always thought about marriage himself, though he never could get anybody else to agree with him. And I liked it too if you wont think it dreadfully presumptuous of a girl to say so. I thought it took such a grand, beautiful, ethereal point of view, all up in the clouds, you know, with no horrid earthly materialism or nonsense of any sort to clog and spoil it. I think it was splendid, all that you said about its being treason to the race to take account of wealth or position, or prospects or connections, or any other worldly consideration, in choosing a husband or wife for one's self—and that one ought rather to be guided by instinct alone, because instinct—or love, as we call it—was the voice of nature speaking within us.—Papa said that was beautifully put. And I thought it was really true as well. I thought it was just what a great prophet would have said if he were alive to say it; and that the man who wrote it"—— She paused, breathless, partly because she was quite abashed by this time at her own temerity, and partly because Hugh Massinger, wicked man! was actually smiling a covert smile through the corners of his mouth at youthful enthusiasm.

The pause sobered him. "Miss Meysey," he broke in, with unwonted earnestness, and with a certain strange tinge of subdued melancholy in his tremulous voice," "I didn't mean to laugh at you. I really believe it. I believe in my heart every single word of what I said there. I believe a man—or a woman either—ought to choose in marriage just the other special person towards whom their own hearts inevitably lead them. I believe it all—I believe it without reserve. Money or rank, or connection or position, should be counted as nothing. We should go simply where nature leads us; and nature will never lead us astray. For nature is merely another name for the will of Heaven made clear within us."

Ingenuous youth blushed itself crimson. "I believe so too," the timid girl answered in a very low voice and with a heaving bosom.

He looked her through and through with his large dark eyes. She shrank and fluttered before his searching glance. Should he put out a velvet paw for his mouse now, or should he play with it artistically a little longer? Too much precipitancy spoils the fun. Better wait till the Echoes from Callimachus had arrived. They were very fetching. And then, besides—besides, he was not entirely without a conscience. A man should think neither of wealth nor position, nor prospects nor connections in choosing himself a partner for life. His own heart led him straight towards Elsie, not towards Winifred. Could he turn his back upon it, with those words on his lips, and trample poor Elsie's tender heart under foot ruthlessly? Principle demanded it; but he had not the strength of mind to follow principle at that precise moment. He looked long and deep into Winifred's eyes. They were pretty blue eyes, though pale and mawkish by the side of Elsie's. Then he said with a sudden dowcast, half-awkward glance—that consummate actor—"I think we ought to go back to your mother now, Miss Meysey."

Winnifred sighed. Not yet? Not yet! But he had looked at her hard! he had fluttered and trembled! He was summoning up courage. She felt sure of that. He didn't venture as yet to lay seige to her openly. Still, she was sure he did really like her; just a little bit, if only a little.

Next morning, as she strolled alone on the lawn, a village boy in a corduroy suit came lounging up from the inn, in rustic insouciance, with a small parcel dangling by a sting from his little finger. She knew the boy, and called him quickly towards her. "Dick," she cried, "what's that you've got there?"

The boy handed it to her with a mysterious nod. "It's for you, miss," he said, screwing up his face sideways into a most excruciating pantomimic expression of the profoundest secrecy. "The gentleman at our 'ouse—'im with the black moustarche, you know—'e told me to give it to you into your own 'ands, if so be as I could manage to catch you alone anyways. 'E was very pertickler about your own 'ands. An' I needn't wait; there ain't no answer."

Winifred tore the packet open with trembling hands. It was a neat little volume, in a delicate sage-green cover—Echoes from Callimachus, and other Poems; by Hugh Massinger, sometime Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. She turned at once with a flutter from the title-page to the fly-leaf: A Mdle Winifred Meysey; Hommage de l'auteur.' She only waited a moment to slip a shilling into Dick's hand, and then rushed up, all crimson with delight, into her own bedroom. Twice she pressed the flimsy little sage-green volume in an ecstasy to her lips; then she laid it hastily in the bottom of a drawer, under a careless pile of handkerchiefs and lace bodices. She wouldn't tell even Elsie of that tardy muchprized birthday gift. No one but herself must ever know Hugh Massinger had sent her his volume of poems.

When Dick returned to the inn ten minutes later, environed in a pervading odour of pepperment, the indirect result of Winifred Meysey's shilling, Hugh called him in lazily with his quiet authoritative air to the prim little parlour, and asked him in an undertone to whom he had given the precious parcel.

"To the young lady 'erself," Dick answered confidentially, thrusting the bull's eye with his tongue into his pouched cheek. "An' I give it to 'er be'ind the laylacs, too, where nobody in the world never seen us."

'Dick," Hugh Massinger said, in a profoundly persuaded and sententious voice, laying his hand magisterially on the boy's shoulder, "you're a sharp lad; and if you develop your talents steadily in this direction, you may rise in time from the distinguished post of gentleman's gentleman to be a private detective or confidential agent, with an office of your own at the top of Regnet Street. Dick, say nothing about this on any account to anybody; and there, my boy—there's half-a-crown for you."

"The young lady give me a shillin" already," Dick replied with alacrity, pocketing the coin with a broad grin. Business was brisk indeed this morning.

"The young lady was well advised, "Hugh answered grimly. "They're cheap at the price—dirt cheap, I call it, those immortal poems—with an autograph inscription by the hand in person. And I've done a good stroke of business myself too. The Echoes from Callimachus are a capital landing net; they don't succeed in bringing her out, flapping, on the turf, gaffed and done for pretty speckled prey, why, no angler on earth that ever fished for women will get so much as a tiny rise out of her.—It's a very fair estate still, is Whitestrand. "Paris vaut bien une messe," said Henri. I must make some little sacrifices myself if I want to conquer Whitestrand fair and even."

Paris vaut bien une messe, indeed. Was Whitestrand worth sacrificing Elsie Challuner's heart for?

THE NEW EMPEROR.

Incidents in the Life of Germany's new Ruler.

Prince William, the eldest son of the Crown Prince, and the future heir to the German crown, received the title of major-general as a birthday present from the Emperor on January 27th. The advanced age of the monarch and the frail condition of the Crown Prince's health have certainly had much to do with the grandson's rapid promotion. Two years ago—he is now 29—Prince William ranked only as a major, and people in general spoke with surprise at the slowness with which he advanced, yet all praised the thoroughness of his military education. Innumerable princlings were then above him, as well as untitled men of not much longer service, for a Prussian prince receives his straps at the age of ten. He was compelled to work like the rest of his comrades, equally subject to military discipline. Early and late he was with his regiment, ordered about as an ordinary major, saluting his superiors, with little or no attention—in a military way—paid to his royal rank. But all this is changed, and he wears now the brilliant insignia of a Prussian major-general. The Emperor appointed him by telegraph—he being stationed in Potsdam—and a few hours late he presented himself to his grandsire in his new regimentals, beamingly happy at his increased importance. Any hour may make him Crown Prince—yea, may make him King and Emperor—and the proud old ruler has at last thought it best to recognize this possibility, and prepare the young man for its realization.

Yet Prince Willian is a young looking major-general. He lacks the prominent rugged features of his father and the handsome lines of his grandsire. The Hohenzollerns have no hereditary physical characteristics. Even Prof. Richow failed to find any cranial ones in his scientific examination of the ancestral skulls. They have never intermarried, having the purest blood of all royal families—a custom which tends to preserve and intensify peculiarities. Prince William has the appearance of a young man of twenty-five. His upper lip shows a sparse blonde moustache, his nose is slightly Roman, with a medium forehead and hair stands back like Beethoven's. But despite the comparatively weak chin, his cold blue eye has a brave, daring expression, which reminds one a little of the great Frederick, whom he is fondly said to resemble in character. He is slender in build, and shorter in stature than his brother, the "naval Hohenzollern." His right hand is badly crippled, and his right arm at least two inches shorter than his left, a defect which has caused as much annoyance and mental pain as ever Byron's deformity did. He tries upon every occasion to conceal it, but tries, of course, in vain. Yet the skill he possesses is remarkable. He carries his sword upon parade as well as any officer, and has become a most excellent fencer, rides like a Cossack, and shoots with unerring aim.

No officer in the army is more popular than this royal scion and none more clever. No wonder that his men are attached to him. He has a pleasant word for all, and cracks his joke with the common man as though he were of his number. His training has been very democratic. He attended school at Cassel, boarding with one of the teachers, and treated exactly as one of the other boys. Taking his lunch one day, he noticed one of his comrades eating the black bread which the poorer classes use in Germany. Wishing to taste it, he offered to "trade" with the boy—the son, I believe, of a poor mechanic—who, of course, was only too glad to do so. It pleased the Prince's palate so much that he made an agreement to exchange lunches with the boy every day—and thenceforward he always feasted upon the black bread, baked in the house of the mechanic. He was graduated after several years at Cassel among the first in his class, to the great satisfaction of his parents, who attended the commencement. He afterwards—as is the Hohenzollern custom—attended the university at Bonn and joined the famous Saxo-Borussen corps, over whose annual meetings he still presides, and is as eager as any in relating the pranks of his student days. And to-day one meets him in the streets of Berlin in civilians clothes, mingling with the people like the "citizen king." The malady and suffering of the Crown Prince have roused the sympathies of the whole population, but despite his popularity, despite the way they love him, it is safe to say that the majority of the nation spend more enthusiasm upon his son, look upon Prince William as the wearer of the mantle of Frederick the Great, and believe him destined to fulfill the cherished hopes of Germany, further the plans of Bismarck and Moltke and cement the union of the Fatherland.

Mutton Suet as a Household Remedy.

It is very vexing and annoying indeed to have one's lips break out with cold sores, but, like the measles, it is far better to strike out than to strike in. A drop of warm mutton suet applied to the sores at night, just before retiring, will soon cause them to disappear. This is also an excellent remedy for parched lips and chapped hands. It should be applied at night in the liquid state, and be well rubbed and heated in before a brisk fire, which often causes a smarting sensation, but the roughest of hands, by his treatment, will often be restored to their natural condition by one application.

The total out-put of coal from all mines in the United States in 1887 was 129 925,557 short tons, valued at $182,491,837, an increase of 14,129,403 tons over the previous year. It will be seen that the value is set down at $1 50 per ton, but it is almost certain that some consumers have paid more than that.

Scandalous scenes occurred lately in the parish church at Ivry., near Paris, during the burial of the old rector, the Abbe Collas. The priest not being on good terms with the local Mayor, the latter declined to allow the police to keep order during the funeral, and some of the riotous characters in the neighborhood remained outside and insulted and hustled the bystander to such an extent that friends and mourners were compelled to resort to vigorous measures to protect the coffin when born out.

Animals of quite different features in respect to primitive selection of food, possess the power of changing their modes of feeding, and of passing over, as it were, from one class to the other. This change is distinct but limited, and we must accept it with all its extension on the one side, and with all its limitation on the other. The fruit-eating ape can be taught to subsist on animal diet, a dog can be taught to subsist on vegetable diet. But it would be as impossible to teach a sheep to eat flesh as it would be to make a lion feed on grass.

NOTES ON CURRENT TOPICS.

The attempt of an English company to establish a bonanza farm in the neighbourhood of Regina has failed, and the corporation retires from agriculture minus its investment and $22,000 in debt. How anyone could expect to manage a Canadian farm from London baffles investigation.

The present year has so far been singularly free from strikes in New York city. The tendency to refer disputes between employers and employed to arbitration, or to hold conferences with the opposite side when difficulties arise, is becoming more general, and in consequence many threatened dangers to labour and capital have been averted.

A Woodstock gentleman is responsible for the statement that in Hamilton a returned missionary who was wanted to fill a pulpit left vacant by illness was found in bed, being weak and ill through sheer hunger, and that when restored by food he went out and preached two excellent sermons. His home presented a most dismal appearance.

It has been recently discovered that cigarettes are a source of disease. An analysis of a package recently made showed that the tobacco was adulterated with opium, and the wrapping or rice paper saturated with arsenic. The first result of the combination, it is said, is to create a desire for opium or some powerful narcotic, and to break down the health.

The Legislature of Manitoba is responsible for a novelty in the way of insurance. At its last session it passed a bill allowing municipalities to raise, by means of a special rate not to exceed a cent on the dollar, a fund to be know as the "Hail Insurance Fund." When in consequence of a hail storm crops are damaged, the owner of the crops may be paid out of this fund a sum equal to one third of his loss.

The Latter Day Saints of Lee's Creek, Alberta, use neither liquor nor tobacco, and they never indulge in tea or coffee. Dancing, except the harmless quadrille, is strictly prohibited. No one is allowed to remain poor, the relief society taking up and dealing with every case of poverty as it arises. Having no particular vices, the community has not many cases of poverty to worry about. The relief committee have therefore a sinecure.

A great and long-needed improvement is now being made in the manufacture of envelopes. The mucilage is placed on the lower part of the envelope instead of on the flap, so that the latter can be moistened without bringing the tongue into contact with an adhesive mixture often of a very doubtful character. The manufacture is carried on in England, but the improvement was suggested by a Yankee. If the plan had not been so simple it would have been found out long ago.

The higher education of women, judging by results, is evidently making progress in the United States. Last week thirty-six graduates of Vassar College for women, eleven graduates of the Elmira Female College, and one lady graduate of Columbia College received the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The lady from Columbia College, Miss Pond, was the first of her sex to receive the baccalaureate from that institution in the whole of its long history, and she won the distinction in competition with men.

The New Zoological Gardens.

Ever since Scroggins went to London to visit his relations and saw the monkeys in the great Zoo, he has become a monomaniac on the subject of natural history, and nothing will satisfy him but the adoption by the citizens of Toronto of the by-law voting $8,000 to make the Toronto Zoo free.

Scroggins has sent us the following scheme, which, if adopted, he is sure will make the Toronto Zoo the first in the known world.

1. The President of the Zoo to be elected for life at a nominal salary of $5,000.
2. That Oliphant Scroggins be elected first President T. Z.
3. That the President, and a house be forthwith built,—not to be occupied by any other animal or animals.
4. That the T. Z. shall include all sorts and conditions of animals, except oyster shells, dead cats and live skunks.
5. That all persons owning wild animals be desired to present them to the T. Z. or they may be left on deposit at the owner's risk.
6. Animals on deposit must be fed daily by the owners.
7. The President shall have the power to eject any animal for unruly or stubborn behavior.
8. Parrots will be examined once a week at least to find out if their language is quite respectable.
9. Animals that live to a great age will be sold periodically to prevent them from becoming chestnuts.
10. No animal will be allowed more than three square meals a day.
11. Trick animals will not be allowed to perform except on their own premises.
12. For the education of our youth a series of living proverbs will be prepared, such as "Bear and Forbear," "A Swarm of Bees in July is not worth a Dead Fly."
13. The aviary will be a specialty—every bird must hatch her own eggs, and birds that can sing and won't sing will be made to sing. Concerts will be held at which trained songsters will compete for prizes; admission ten cents, proceeds to go to the resident President.
14. Among the special curiosities will be the crab that walks forward, the ass that brays loudest and eats least, the crow that gets whiter with washing, and the fox that couldn't say boo to a goose, etc.
15. The President to have the right of parading the T. Z. once a month in the principal streets.
16. No children in arms will be allowed in the lion's cage.
17. Elephants will not be allowed more than they carry either inside or out.
18. All sick animals shall be sent to the General Hospital, and birds are to have a separate wing.
19. Visitors desirous of music will always find Mr. Piper around.

The habit of cautiousness is not, as a general thing, inborn, but it is the result of a naturally generous and confiding nature repeatedly victimized by the cunning and crafty. So the many disappointments, and often injurious effects, arising from the use of various vaunted remedies, have induced an undue cautiousness, and, in many cases, entire abandonment of the use of any. The War of 1812.

Seventy-six years ago — on the 19th of June, 1812—the Congress of the United States declared war against England. At first sight it might seem a plucky, almost a chivalrous thing for a people numbering eight million souls to beard the British lion, to dare to attack the only power that was able to hold its own against the military genius and all-mastering ambition of the great Napoleon. But a closer scrutiny dispels all the illusions of the chivalric character of the deed, removes the glamour of romance and heroism from all concerned in carrying the measure, and reveals the transactions as the declaration of one of the most wicked, wanton wars of aggression that have ever been forced on an infant community by a powerful neighboring nation in its mad lust of conquest and of unrighteous territorial aggrandisement.

From the days of the War of Independence there has existed in the United States a turbulent party, composed of the meaner and less reputable class of American citizens, and augmented from time by considerable accessions of immigrants of the baser sort—Socialistic propagandists from the slums of German cities, red republicans who had become discredited in France, the sans culottses and in short, the riff-raff, scum and offscourirg of the European continent in general—and this party, steadily increasing in numerical strength from these more than questionable sources, had constantly held to one idea in its political creed, namely, that Canada should have been cajoled or wrested from the British Crown, so that no foothold should be left for British loyalty on the continent of North America. The party was forever on the look-out for opportunities of attacking England; it had adopted a motto by an unconscious plagiarism from Demosthenes, "and England's difficulty is the United "States' opportunity," became the unwritten law by which their policy was guided. The leaders of the party thought that the opportunity had now come. England was engaged in a Titanic struggle in behalf of the liberties of Europe, and these professors of the doctrines of liberty were not ashamed to countenance and aid to the utmost of their power the efforts of the great despot of the Old World to crush the only Champions of liberty who were now able to oppose him. The infamous Berlin and Milan decrees of the Corsican usurper were replied to by the "Orders-in Council" of the British Government; the French and English marine policy alike told with disastrous effect on the commerce of neutral States, but the blame was fairly chargeable on the Imperial decrees in which the commercial troubles began. Napoleon was the prime cause, and on him alone should have been laid the blame of all the disasters that befell the mercantile marine of the United States in consequence of the restrictions imposed upon the shipping trade of neutrals by the English as well as the French. But this view did not suit the anti-British party of the States. Mr. Jefferson hoped to fan the mean spite of a small faction into a blaze of national hostility; he refused to ratify the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation that had been agreed upon by the American Minister to the Court of St. James and the British Government; and in an angry message to Congress he furiously inveighed against the "Orders in-Council," while he had not a word to say against the Berlin and Milan decrees of the would-be despot of Europe and the world. This was followed by the suicidal policy of the "embargo," whereby Mr. Jefferson's friends did an immense injury, as it was probably intended should be done, to the commerce of the New England States, then and ever the most ardent advocates of liberty, and for that reason the most strenuously opposed to a war with England, from which the only conceivable advantage would accrue to Napoleon, the greatest enemy of liberty then alive. The "embargo" was withdrawn; but in the meantime, and all the time, trouble was arising from the complicated nature of the claims on which England steadfastly insisted, namely, that she, as mistress of the seas, had the "right of search" in all vessels in which she had reason to believe that deserters from her service were being concealed. The affair between the Leopard and the Chesapeake neither reflected credit on the English captain for good sense, nor on the American for personal courage, honor or veracity; but it served to increase the tension of the already strained relations between the peoples of both countries, and the war party in the States made all the capital that could possibly be made out of the incident. From month to month and from year to year this party was steadily gaining the ascendancy, till at length in January, 1812, Congress by a vote of one hundred and nine to twenty-two, resolved to increase the regular troops to 25,000 men and to raise an immediate loan of ten millions of dollars. What this portended required no political Zadkiel to predict; and accordingly no person nor party was very much surprised when the same Congress declared war against England on the 19th of June, and decided that the brunt of the war must be borne by the mere handful of settlers, only 300,000 all told, who had then made Canada their home. The obnoxious Order-in-Council were removed about the same time, so that no decent pretext for the war existed; all the best and most honorable politicians in the United States denounced it as unjust, ungenerous and impolitic; Randolph, of Virginia, opposed it Congress in one of the best speeches ever delivered in that hall of oratory, and a special convention of delegates met in the fall of the year at Albany on purpose to denounce it. But it was all of no avail; the war party thought they would make an easy conquest of Canada, and that was all they wanted; they, perhaps not unnaturally, supposed that a population of 300,000 would fall an easy prey to a population of 8,000,000, and that the 25,000 regulars of the United States would very speedily demolish the 5,800 men of all arms on whom the young colony had to depend for the protection of more than a thousand miles of frontier. The inexorable logic of stern facts has demonstrated how completely the war party was astray in its calculations; the War of 1812 was one of the most scathing rebukes ever administered to a party of avarice end aggression.

In political circles in St. Petersburg the friendliest feeling is shown towards the new German Emperor, and the belief is expressed that he will continue the peaceful policy o his father.

Major E. C. Browne, an Engishman, writing about the acquisition of Burmah by the British, describes the effect upon the natives of the first exhibition of the electric light. "A great ray of soft light," he says, "shoots across the heavens from horizon to horizon. A flood of light is cast on a spot in the village, but it is off with more than lightning rapidity to illumine another. It heaps and bobs and bounces about the earth in most uncanny fashion. The village is illumined. It visits every portion of it and seems to enter at the doors and windows. At first the people rush away, but finding that in many cases the light follows they throw themselves down with their faces to the earth. In a few minutes the village and river banks are cleared, and the terrified people take refuge in the bush or at the backs of the houses. But this only lasts a very short time. Curiosity is stronger than prudence. So far the light has struck no one dead. Perhaps it may be harmless; so the children, clinging to each other, venture into the glare, then run to their mothers' arms screaming half with fear and half with delight. Some of the big boys then rush out, have a good stare, and having dared so much once more disappear. The ladies seem to gain confidence next to the children. Their curiosity cannot be restrained any longer, so they get together in groups and hide their faces and scream and giggle. Some of the more cheeky ones actually put out their tongues at us and begin dancing and gyrating about. The men, last of all, moodily emerge from their cover, and still not half liking it walk cautiously about, and gradually the village is gay."

The Biggest Ship Afloat.

The Palgrave is the largest sailing ship afloat. She is 3,078 tons register, which is only twenty tons smaller than the new North-German Lloyd steamship Lahn, and there are only about twenty steamships that exceed this size. Allowing for the great amount of room occupied by the engines and machinery of the monster steamship, together with the space devoted to their passenger accommodations, the Palgrave can carry a larger cargo than any other vessel, except the Great Eastern, that has ever made a voyage. There are only three other sailing ships in the world registering more than 2,500 tons. These are the Reliance, of 2,568 tons, built in Liverpool in 1884; the Fingal, of 2,510 tons, built at Dublin in 1883; the New York, of 2,699 tons, built at Greenock in 1858: the New York, however, has an auxiliary screw propeller, though relying chiefly upon her sails. The Fingal is built of steel and the other two are iron.

The largest wooden ships in the world are the Komandor Svend Foyne, the latter of 2 459 tons, having been built at Maitland, N. S., in 1874, and called the William D. Lawrence (the name of her builder), and the A. G. Ropes of 2,342 tons, which was built at Bath, Me., in 1884. There are comparatively few other vessels of above 2,000 tons even.

To put these vessels on short voyages would not, of course, pay. The profit in them lies in the immense cargoes which they can carry on long voyages in trades which the power of steam has not yet been made to compete with advantage. The Komandor Svend Foyne is the only one mentioned that is in the Atlantic trade, and she has previously been around the world several times; she is now at Antwerp from this port. The Reliance is on the voyage from San Francisco to Liverpool, the New York from San Francisco to Nanaimo and thence to Liverpool, the Fingal from San Francisco for Iquique and Liverpool, and the A. G. Ropes from Liverpool for New York and San Francisco. In the great quantities of heavy machinery and vast amount of other cargo they can carry, these vessels make their earnings. None of them were built as swift sailers and none have accomplished remarkably quick passages, though perhaps this may be due to some extent to the difficulty of keeping them in accurate sailing trim and handling them at sea with as proportionately large a press of canvas as a handier vessel of half the size can carry. The Palgrave was 107 days coming here from Calcutta. This is not a long passage, by any means, but she had exceptionally fine weather all the way, being able to carry skysails nearly all the way. Yet with a good wind on the quarter and all sail set, the best day's sail she ever made was 280 miles, and the run from Calcutta to this port has been made often inless than ninety a .—[New York Paper.

STATISTICS.

The Hebrews are returning to Jerusalem. The recent Russian persecutions have led thousands to take up their residence in the ancient city, the Hebrew population of which has increased from 5,000 to 30,000 since 1888.

The greatest feat of baptism in the history of the Baptist Church in modern times was that performed in July, 1878, by J. C. Clough, a missionary, who, with the assistance of five native preachers, immersed 2,222 persons within six hours.

The largest ocean steamer is the City of Rome, which consumes about 270 tons of coal a day. The Umbria and Etruria of the Cunard line, although each about 100 tons smaller than the City of Rome in actual tonage, nevertheless consume from 325 to 350 tons of coal daily.

Not content with the Transcaspian railway, the Czar's Government has determined to build a transcontinental road across Siberia, with a terminus on the Pacific ocean. The whole length of the road will be about 5,000 miles, and it is estimated that it will cost 400,000,000 roubles. The first section will be about 2,800 miles long, and will soon be begun.

A few figures:—During the Democratic Convention 2,151,791 words were sent from St. Louis over the Western Union wire.

Lunacy in England is still an increasing factor. There were no fewer than 82,643 lunatics registered at the beginning of the year. Of these only 37,601 were men and 45,042 were women. 74,171 are supported in pauper asylums. Though there are more female than male lunatics, there are fewer supported out of private fund s, the figures being 3,974 to 3,821.

The important roles which cavalry and artillery play in the art of modern warfare make it interesting to know the total number of animals which the leading countries of the world can throw into the field of battle. Here, according to the latest statistics, is the list: Russia, 21,570,000 horses; America, 9,500,000; the Argentine Republic, 4,000,000; Austria, 3,500,000; Germany, 3,350,000; France, 2,800,000 horses and 300,000 mules; England 2,790,000 horses; Canada, 2,624,000; Spain, 680,000 horses and 2,300,000 mules; Italy, 2,000,000 horses; Belgium, 383,000; Denmark, 316,000; Australia, 301,000; Holland, 125,000, and Portugal, 88,000 horses and 50,000 mules. It will be remarked that Russia heads the list by an enormous majority.

A Camel's Revenge.

An English traveller in the East gives the camel a very poor character. According to his account the creature is from first to last undomesticated and savage, rendered serviceable not by tameness but by stupidity.

One passion alone he possesses, namely revenge, in the carrying out of which he shows in unexpected degree of far-thoughted malice, united with all the cold stupidity of his usual character. One instance of this I well remember.

A lad of about fourteen had conducted a large camel, laden with wood, to another village at about half an hour's distance. As the animal loitered or turned out of his way, its driver struck it repeatedly, and harder than it seems to have thought he had a right to do. But not finding the occasion favorable for taking immediate quits, it bode its time; nor was that time long in coming.

A few days later the same lad had to reconduct the beast, unladen, to his own village. When they were about half way on the road, and at some distance from any habitation, the camel suddenly stopped, looked deliberately round in every direction to assure itself that no one was within sight, and finding the road clear of passengers, made a step forward, seized the unlucky boy's head in its monstrous mouth, and lifting him into the air flung him down again with the upper part of his skull completely torn off.

Having thus satisfied its revenge, the brute quietly resumed its pace towards the village, as though nothing were the matter, till some men who had observed the whole proceeding, though unfortunately at too great a distance to be able to afford timely help, came up and killed it.

Rev. Mr. Rainsford, now rector of St. George's Church, New York, but formerly of St. James' Church, Toronto, recently made the somewhat startling proposition to his congregation that those of them who were leaving town for the summer should allow poor families of the parish who were well recommended to occupy the basements of their houses during their absence, and that he would be personally responsible for the conduct of the inmates. By this means valuable property would be safely guarded, and poor families would live rent free in comfortable and healthy houses during the most trying season of the year. To the credit of the congregation it may be said that a great many of the wealthy members profited by the suggestion; and now between twenty-five and fifty poor families are living in handsome brown-stone houses. This plan has about it a practical side which ought to commend it to the benevolent minded. Schemes for the amelioration of suffering and poverty are now attempted which fifty years ago would have been pronounced visionary and Quixotic.

FARM.

Sweet Potato Cultivation.

The sweet potato is almost an unknown luxury among Northern farmers, yet it can easily be raised anywhere that a good crop of corn can be grown. Not as a field crop, but as a garden vegetable. In its native country it is one of the hardiest of vegetables, where it is often found growing luxuriantly in its wild state. In Georgia, Alabama, and the Carolinas, it forms quite a staple article of food for the negro laborers, but is raised to very little extent for exporting. This causes the cultivation to become very much neglected, as they only aim to supply their own wants.

They very seldom manure the land for this crop, giving their best lands and care to the cotton and corn crops. The tubers are planted there, the same as the Irish potato is planted North, and they are given nearly the same care in the way of cultivation, excepting that the vines of the sweet potato must be loosened up occasionally, to keep them from taking root, where the joints of the vines rest in the mellow earth.

Of course our cultivation of this plant must vary somewhat from its native treatment. Our seasons are not long enough to admit of planting the tubers when the crop is to be raised, even supposing that they did not rot in the ground, which would generally be the case if planted at all early.

One hundred plants, well attended to, will produce several bushels of tubers. This number of plants can be started from the seed tubers in a box two and one-half feet square: the box should be about a food deep and nearly filled with rich loam. The tubers should be planted about three inches below the surface, and the box kept in a moderately warm room, where the sun can shine upon the earth and plants a portion of the time. They need not be planted in the box before the 15th of April, for it will not be safe to put the plants out before the 1st of June. This number of plants may be obtained at a small cost from a green-house if there should be one in the vicinity. If it is desired to grow them on a larger scale, a hot-bed may be constructed for the purpose of starting the plants. A warm, sandy soil is the most desirable location for the plants, if it is made sufficiently rich. They will do very well on black loam if it is dry and mellow. The plants are hardy, and will bear transplanting as well as cabbage plants. In hoeing, draw the earth up around the plants until there is a hill twelve or fourteen inches high. This will give the vines the benefit of the sun and air. They are luxuriant growers and sometimes cover the ground completely.

Loosening up the vines occasionally should not be neglected, as they will, if undisturbed, strike root at the joints, and thus draw nourishment away from the main root of the plant.

They will continue to grow until the frost touches them, when they should be gathered at once, as a little freezing destroys the flavor. They should be housed and kept in a cool, dry place until consumed. There are many ways of packing them, but in fine chaff is good.

Every prominent naturalist in the United States was born on the farm.

Hard work and keeping at it insures success on the farm, as it does in all life's duties.

Don't save all the unpleasant jobs for your boy and expect him to "stick to the farm."

Report for the public your failures in crops instead of your occasional booms. You learn more by your mistakes in farming, than you do in success.

As a rule, those crops pay best that require the most care and attention. The brains and the labor are what sell in the markets in the shape of the crop.

It is predicted that the wheat area throughout the West will be greatly reduced the coming year. In Missouri alone the decrease will be 1,048,111 acres less than last year. This is due partly to the protracted drouth which interfered with the fall sowing, and partly to the low prices of wheat.

The strength of a chain is measured by the weakest link; so the weight of the load that may be hauled over a country road is determined by the worst spot on the road. Thus a single negligent roadmaster can fix the size of a load of country produce that is to be hauled out of a township.

Complaint is made from one or two states that farmers' institutes are losing in popularity. Whispers also come from these same states that whenever the farmers get together, a band of lawyers, politicians and tariff orators are sure to appear upon the scene. Any connection between these two facts?

To make hay so as to retain all the good qualities and nutriment of the grass or clover or any other fodder crop, it must be cut when it is in its stage of blossoming. It then contains the most of the valuable nutritious elements and the least of the indigestible matter. And to preserve these nutritious elements from loss, the grass must be cured as quickly as possible.

Said a farmer to his sons: "Boys, you hear me now! Don't one of you ever speckerlate, or go to wait, as Micawber did, for 'something to turn up.' You might jest as well go and sit down on a stone in the middle of the medder, with a pail 'tween your legs and wait for the old brindle cow to come and back up to you and hist already for you to milk her." And the old farmer was just right in his conclusions.

The gopher problem will soon be a live question again, unless there are unusually heavy rains this spring; and the county commissioners ought to take some measures looking to their extermination. We hardly think the offering of a bounty desirable, as it is very expensive and often ineffectual. The counties that have tried it seem best satisfied with poison. The Stuteman Commissioners have just contracted for $345 worth of strychnine for the purpose.

The Bath.

Farmers and others who work hard in this weather ought to sweat freely. This is healthful, for it carries off dead matter from the body, and thus it is that hard work is better than physic. But the benefit from perspiring becomes more than neutralized unless the effete and poisonous matter which it brings to the surface is promptly removed. Every night at least a sponge wet with water should be passed over the entire body, followed by brisk rubbing until dry. The water may be cold or warm, but for cleaning the skin it should be as warm as the body. A little liquid ammonia added to soft water wonderfully increases its detergent qualities and beside it leaves the skin fresh and cool, admirably preparing the body for healthful sleep. The ammoniated water after being used for bathing is all the better for watering garden or house plants.

The body should not be over heated when you take a bath; neither should it be cold. More harm probably results from sitting on a bank of a stream waiting to "cool off" than could come from plunging into the water at once. Never take a cold bath when the body is cold.

Since the last Presidential election there has been an increase of 7,000,000 in the population of the United States. This will give at least an additional million of voters, making 11,000,000 votes to be cast. Over 40,000 of these new votes are in New York State, where the Democratic majority last election was only 1,200. It will be seen that there is a good deal of margin to play upon, but there is no reason to suppose that the united Democracy has not made as many friends among the young voters as have been made by the distracted Republicans.

CHATTING WITH A PRINCE.

A Lady's Adventure with the late Kaiser Frederick.

In the spring of 1874 I was travelling in northern Italy with some friends, all of them enthusiastic pedestrians, who had climbed to their hearts' content the usual Swiss and Italian Alps, and were now on their way to begin a tour in the Tyrol. I was not a climber myself, nor, indeed, much of a walker even in a moderate way, and in consequence passed many hours alone while my friends explored the country.

We left Venice one lovely morning the latter part of April, passing Verona and taking the steamboat at Peschiera, at the foot of Lake Garda. We sailed up the entire length of the lake at Riva, the little town situated at its northern extremity, and thereby passing into the confines of Austria.

The next day the only excitement we had before our diligence started for Botzen was the news that the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia were expected to arrive.

I had lived a great deal in northern Germany, but had never seen either Prince Frederick or his wife, so we all looked forward to the mild excitement of gazing on the then future Emperor of Germany.

The afternoon was lovely, the lake sparkled and danced in the sunlight, and the beautiful road leading directly from behind the house up through the rocks, looked so tempting that I was persuaded to join the others. The fine road was mostly cut in and through the rock forming small caves, and from semi-darkness coming out to find one's self at a great height of ledge going down in a straight line to the lake below. Fearing to tire myself I sat down under the shade of a large boulder, telling the rest of the party I would await their return.

Lost in admiration of the lovely picture before me I sat musing for some time hearing and seeing no signs of life but the myriads of butterflies that had come with the warm sunlike days. Suddenly, to my amazement, I heard a low, suppressed growl, and turning my head, I saw close to me a huge mastiff, standing like a statue, with tail and ears erect, and his large eye fixed menacingly on me. I am not a timid woman, fortunately, and am a great lover of dogs, but as I turned and spoke softly to him he gave another most unpleasant growl. I was beginning to rise and face my antagonist when I heard a sharp whistle and a "Where are you, my boy?' from the other side of my boulder and the next instant a tall, fine-looking man, with a full brown beard, wearing a light soft felt hat, which he had pushed back from his brow and dressed in a loose suit of brown corduroy, stood before me. He carried a light walking stick, and as soon as he saw me raised his hat and holding up the cane at the dog, said: "How dare you, sir!" Then turning to me and still standing bareheaded.

"I trust he has not alarmed you, madam," he said. "He thinks it is his duty to growl, although he would not, I believe, touch any one unmolested."

"He is a magnificent animal," I replied, "and as I am fond of dogs I seldom feel any fear of them, but he appeared so unexpectedly and notified me of his presence before I remembered where I was."

He then called the dog who looked much ashamed by this time, and, seating himself on a rock opposite to me, said to him: "Go ask the lady's pardon or I shall send you home."

Much amused, I held out my hand for the large, tawny paw that was put into it, and, patting the large, fine creature gently on the head, I asked his master his name and age. Where had I seen this man before, and why did he appear so familiar to me? was what I kept asking myself, as we went on talking about the dog. I felt I knew him but where or how I had met him I could not tell. At any rate he appeared not to recognize me. Certainly he was the finest-looking man I had ever seen, of superb build and imposing presence, and his manner and elegant bearing showed him to be one of Nature's noblemen, whatever other rank he possessed. We talked for some time on a subject of interest to both of us—the canine tribe—and when I was telling him of a fine Irish setter that I owned, he suddenly said in excellent English:

"You are I think, an English woman?" We had been conversing in German, a language I had always spoken, and I prided myself on my accent, so that my surprise was great as I laughingly answered in the same language:

"No not, English, but Canadian. But how did you know?"

"Oh, just as you can now hear, I am sure, that I am a German, although I have always spoken English. My wife is English, and she tells me I speak well, but the 'th' of your language betrays me."

Then we both laughed, and I thought to myself, it is a good thing he spoke of that English wife of his, for my poor heart was beginning to be much interested in this exceptionally handsome stranger. Who in the world could he be? An officer, I felt sure. Probably an Austrian—but no; his accent was that of a northerner.

"Are you alone?" he then asked.

I told him I was awaiting my friends, who had gone further up, and just then we heard their voices above us.

"Well, then, I will wish you good afteg, noon, and I hope you will forgive my dor-Anfweider Schen. I hope we may meet again," and with a deep bow he walked away. The next moment I was surrounded by the others, all looking amewith big eyes as I watched the tall man and his dog descend among the rocks.

"Well, Miss M——, will you please tell us where you became so intimate with his Imperial Highness the Crown Prince of Germany?"

"The Crown Prince of Germany?" I repeated slowly; "do you mean to say——" Why of course. It was all clear to me now, the feeling that I had seen him before. I was so familiar with his photographs, which are excellent likenesses, that I thought I knew him. The next morning we left Riva at daylight, and none of us saw the Prince again. Years afterward I was in Berlin, and in walking through the Thiergarten one day I met the Crown Prince Frederick riding with some officers. I knew him instantly, and although he had grown older he was still a splendid-looking man, and looked every inch the Prince. We all bowed, the gentlemen of our party standing bareheaded, according to etiquette, as he passed; but her vanity had a fall when I saw that my moy had quite forgotten me.

Count von Munster, the German Ambassador to France, in reply to an interviewer, said that he did not think the friendly relations between France and Germany were likely to be disturbed by the death of Emperor Frederick.

The New World is likely to get ahead of the Old World in the matter of railway speed. A New York civil engineer has applied for a patent for a locomotive and tender designed for making faster time than has ever been made in any country. It is claimed that the new locomotive will easily make sixty miles an hour with ten coaches, and ninety-five miles an hour with the same load when driven at full speed.

Mr. Edison's latest invention, the phonograph, is his most marvelous, for he not only records speech but repeats it. It is now perfected for ordinary use and a test exhibition was recently given before a company of electricians and others in New York, which was thoroughly successful. It is said of Edison that he can invent and dictate letters at the same time; that his brain works as easily in one direction as the other.

A traveller in Norway says that the horses in that country have a very sensible way of taking their food, which perhaps might be beneficially followed here. They have a bucket of water put down beside their allowance of hay. It is interesting to see with what relish they take a sip of the one and a mouthful of the other alternately, sometimes only moistening their mouths, as a rational being would do while eating a dinner of such dry food. A broken-winded horse is scarcely ever seen in Norway, and the question is if the mode of feeding has not something to do with the preservation of the animals respiratory organs.

Britain After Waterloo.

As soon as the battle of Waterloo was fairly fought and Napoleon put away at St. Helena, the Continental Professors, historians, political students, and journalists all began with one accord to prophesy the approaching downfall of Great Britian, which some affected to deplore, and others regarded with complaceney. Everything conspired, it was evident, not only to bring about this decline, but also to accelerate it. The parallel of Carthage—England has always been set up as the second Carthage—was freely exhibited, especially in those countries which felt themselves called upon and qualified to play the part of Rome. It was pointed out that there was the dreadful deadweight of Ireland, with its incurable poverty and discontent; the approaching decay of trade, which could be only, in the opinion of these keen-sighted philosphers, a matter of a few years; the enormous weight of the National Debt; the ruined manufacturers; the wasteful expenditure of the Government in every branch; the corrupting influence of the Poor Laws; the stain of slavery; the restrictions of commerce; the intolerance of the Church; the narrowness and prejudice of the Universities; the ingorance of the people; their drinking habits; the vastness of the Empire. These causes, together with discontent, chartism, republicanism, theism—in fact, all the disagreeableisms—left no donbt whatever that England was doomed. Foreigners, in fact, not yet recovered from the extraordinary spectacle of Great Britain's long duel with France and its successful termination, prophesied what they partly hoped out of envy and jealousy, and feared from self-interest. Therefore the politicians and professors were always looking at this country, writing about it, watching it, visiting it. No, there could be no doubt—none of these changes and dangers could be denied; the factories were choked with excessive production; poverty stalked through the country; the towns were filled with ruined women; the streets were cumbered with drunken men; the children were growing up in ignorance and neglect inconceivable; what could come of all this but ruin? Even—and this was the most wonderful and incredible thing to those who do not understand how long a Briton will go on enduring wrongs and suffering anomalies—the very House of Commons in this boasted land of freedom did not represent half the people, seats were openly bought and sold, others were filled with nominees of the great men who owned them. What could possibly follow but ruin—swift and hopeless ruin? What indeed? Prophets of disaster always omit one or two important elements in their calculations, and it is through these gaps that the people basely wriggle, instead of fulfilling prophecy as they ought to do.

Even now the outlook of the whole world is truly dark, and the clouds are lowering. Yet surely the outlook was darker, the clouds were blacker fiftyy ears ago. Read Carlyle's "Past and Present," and compare. There may be other dangers before us of which we then suspected nothing. But if we still preserve the qualities which enabled us to stand up, almost alone, against the colossal force of Napoleon, with Europe at his back, and which carried us through the terrible troubles which followed the war, we surely need not despair.—"Fifty Years Ago," by Walter Besant.

Modern Armies.

At a meeting of the members of the Royal United Service Institution held recently in London a paper was read by Col. H. M. Hozier on the equipment and transport of modern armies.

Col. Hozier called attention to the present attitude of foreign nations, with large bodies of cavalry watching each other on each side of frontier lines. In any future war he believed that there would be an increased number of engagements between cavalry, and that by their means much damage would be done at an early period of any war to roads and railways. But these cavalry engagements would never be decisive of the war, and victory would depend upon which side would be able to bring up infantry with the greatest rapidity. This involved railway transportation. There were now everywhere in foreign lands fortresses commanding the lines of railways, and at the first opening of war upon the Continent no doubt a dash would be made at these fortresses to prevent them being victualled for any lengthened period. They must be prepared to strike quick blows, and within a short time of the outbreak of hostilities. They must reduce the weight to be carried by every soldier and by every horse; they ought not to handicap the soldiers by makeing them carry enormous weights. Next, they must have efficient railway corps, able to repair railways in advancing, and to break them down when they were not wanted. Thirdly, they must do without camp equipment and tents, because they would not be able to carry them in the future.

The whole face of the country everywhere in Europe had changed in the seventy-five years which had elapsed since the last great war; and there was no longer the necessity for such measures to encamp the fighting men as formerly were absolutely necessary. He advocated the soldiers wearing a gray dress in time of war. The kit must be reduced in weight to about 38 pounds, instead of 52 pounds, which it was at present. Men should carry not more than 30 rounds of ammunition at a time. Favor had been shown to taking infantry into action on horseback, but then one man out of every four would be required to hold the horses, and he recommended the substitution of Irish cars—each car drawn by four horses, and carrying fifteen armed men. With regard to the arms carried by a cavalry soldier, he recommended that a triangular sword should be substituted for the present form, because in fighting a man always did more damage by thrusting than by cutting, and that a pistol should be substituted for a carbine. The revolver, he thought, was not a useful weapon for a soldier to carry. The weight which the horse ought to carry should be lightened as far as possible.

Col. Sir O. Burn said in the Indian mutiny they used to put ten men on an elephant, and in that way go long distances. He thought the alteration in the form of the sword was very desirable, as sometimes men would ride through the enemy without doing any damage, whereas thrusts were very dangerous. He hoped that the authorities would not give up their heavy transport yet, because he did not think they would be able, under all circumstances, to depend upon railways.

Col. Hozier, in reply, said he preferred a brown to a gray uniform.

The Earth to Roll on Forever

An Indianapolis despatch to the Chicago Globe, June 4, says:—Rev. T. A. Goodwin, D. D., created a sensation at the meetings of the Evangelical Association of Ministers this morning, reading a paper on "Eschatology." The gist of the paper was that the popular idea that the world will come to an end and will be really burned up and annihilated is a mistaken one. It will go right on forever, he said, and never be destroyed. The inhabitants will die off and each person come to his own individual judgment, but the world itself will have no end. The world cannot afford to go out of business now, when it has just discovered railroads and the telegraph and telephone, and is apparently on the eve of other equally important relevations of the forces of nature, and if it cannot afford to end now how much less can it do so in a thousand years from now? The other ministers present, Methodsists and Presbyterians generally, took issue with Dr. Goodwin, and all thought the subject was one that should not be discussed.

Farming cannot be learned alone from books and newspapers. It is necessary to take hold of the farm implements with both hands, that a practical knowledge be attained, and then it will require years to learn it thoroughly, with a good assurance of success. This we say to a young man who wants to know how to become a farmer.

A Tap at the Door.

BY LILLIE E. BARR,

A hand tapped at my door low down, low down.
I opened it, and saw two eyes of brown,
Two lips of cherry red,
A little curly head,
A bonny, fairy sprite in dress of white,
Who said, with lifted face, "Papa, good-night!"

She climbed upon my knee, and kneeling there,
Lisped softly, solemnly her little prayer;
Her meeting finger tips,
Her pure, sweet baby lips,
Carried my soul with hers, half unaware,
Into some clearer and diviner air,

I tried to lift again, but all in vain,
Of scientific thought the subtle chain;
So small, so small,
My learning all;
Though I could call each star and tell its place,
My child's "Our Father" bridged the gulf of space.

I sat with folded hands at rest, at rest,
Turning this solemn thought within my breast;
How faith would fade
If God had made
No children in this world—no baby age—
Only the prudent man or thoughtful sage;

Only the woman wise, no little arms
To clasp around our neck; no baby charms,
No loving care,
No sinless prayer,
No thrill of lisping song, no pattering feet,
No infant heart against our heart to beat.

Then it a tiny hand, low down,
Tap at thy heart or door, oh! do not frown;
Bend low to meet
The little feet,
To clasp the clinging hand; the child will be Nearer heaven than thee—nearer than thes.

Handsome women without religion are the flowers without perfume.—[Heine.

A correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says that thousands of Russian peasants have died of hunger during the past six weeks. In the district of Zvenigorodka the peasants seized the cattle of the rich landowners.

"The Pipe of Peace," published at the Genoa Indian school in Nebraska, says that Indians are becoming bald-headed as a result of the change in head-gear from feathers to hats and caps. Perhaps there is a sort of retributive justice in this. The Indians have deprived a great many white men of their hair. The white man doesn't retaliate by scalping, but he gets there almost as effectually by forcing the Indian to wear the deadly hat and cap.

THE Schooner Blake ran ashore near New Glasgow during the storm on Wednesday night of last week. It was loaded with wood, but the cargo was not lost. THE latest postal laws are such that newspaper publishers can arrest any one for fraud who takes a paper and refuses to pay for it. Under the law the man who allows his subscription to run along for some time unpaid, or takes three papers from the post-office, and then orders the postmaster to mark it "Refused," and has a notice sent notifying the publishers, makes himself liable to arrest and fine, same as theft

McIntyre, J.P., Wallacetown, on a charge of stealing a cow from Dugald Blue, a farmer residing near Wallacetown. The accused were committed for trial. The prisoners were taken to St. Thomas on Wednesday and have elected to be tried summarily, so they will be brought before his Honor Judge Hughes on Friday.

An information was afterwards laid against the parties by Andrew Liddell, charging them with disorderly conduct and malicious damage to property in throwing eggs at his house. The case will be tried next Wednesday.—Friday's Journal.

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,
Late U. S. Consul to Italy, author of "The Glory and Shame of England," "America's Advancement," etc., etc., etc., writes as follows:—
New York, August 1, 1886. 122 E. 27th st.
DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,
Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:
My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.
Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,
C. EDWARDS LESTER.

"Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

No injurious effects can follow the use of Ayer's Ague Cure. It contains an unfailing antidote and specific for miasmatic poisons, together with remedial agents which purify and reinvigorate the system.

TEMPERANCE NOTES.

(Supplied by W. C. T. U.)

1. Is it right to derive a revenue from a traffic which no decent man defends.

2. Is it right to license a man to make paupers and criminals and then tax sober men to take care of them?

3. Is it right to build churches to save men and at the same time license bar rooms that destroy them?

4. Is it right to license bar-rooms to promote ignorance, vice and crime, and then tax people for schools to teach education and virtue?

5. Is it right to take care of your own boy and vote to license a place which will ruin your neighbor's boy?

6. Is it right to license that which is universally acknowledged to be destroying the bodies and souls of multitudes of men? Is it right to frame mischief by a law? See Psalm 94:20.

Here is another set of questions worth considesing. Answer them candidly.

How does high license alter the moral character of the liquor traffic.

2. Has license ever regulated the traffic? If it has, state the locality and give proofs.

3. Have drinking and drunkenness under license, high or low, added to the material or moral worth of any people?

4. What redeeming feature is there in the liquor traffic of to day, or what benefit does it confer on society that should commend it to the approval of a Christian people, or justify them before God for licensing it?

EDUCATION OF COLOURED RACES

The Christian (London, Eng)., says: Increasing effort is being made to provide for the higher education of the colored people of Canada. The Wilberforce Educational Institute was commenced as long ago as 1841, in a log cabin six miles from Chatham, Ont., was subsequently established in that town. It is now to be considerably enlarged to meet the pressing needs of the day, being the only such institute free from race-prejudice. Rev. Josiah Henson, of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" fame, co-operated with the original founders, and took a lively interest in the development of the work. It is proposed to endow several scholarships for promising pupils, but before carrying out their resolve, the trustees have sent the principal of the Institue, Rev. Henry M. Joseph, to England, a coloured clergyman and a successful educationist, to lay the case before the friends of education and religion, with a view to securing financial help. He holds recommendations from Lord Lansdowne and Sir John Macdonald, and is very highly spoken of by the Bishop of Antigua.

THE CANADA-AUSTRALIAN CABLE.—The Japan Gazette says that H. M. S. Egeria is to survey a track 200 miles wide for a telegraph cable from Australia to British Columbia, a task which is expected to last three years. The route is to be from a point on the Australian coast to the north end of New Zealand and Fiji and thence to the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

BROKEN DOWN.
"After suffering from dyspepsia, kidney disease, loss of appetite and pain in the head until discouraged, I heard of Burdock Blood Bitters, took two bottles and am happy to say feel as well as ever." Mrs. Rufus E. Merry, New Albany, N.S.

WELL TESTED.
"I was nearly dead with cholera morbus, one bottle of extract of Wild Strawberry cured me, and at another time I was so bad with summer complaint that I thought I would never get over it, when two bottles cured me." Mrs. E. Askett, Peel, Ont.

One That Will Bear Telling Again.

A certain fort in the far west, so the story goes, was in command of a major of artillery who was constantly lamenting that his favorite arm could not be more frequently used against the Indians. Finally one day he took one of the small howitzers, which defended the fort, and had it securely strapped to the back of an army mule with the muzzle projecting over the animal's tail. With this novel gun carriage he proceeded in high feather with the captain and a sergeant to a bluff on the bank of the Missouri, near which was encamped a band of friendly Indians. The gun was duly loaded and primed, the fuse inserted, and the mule backed to the edge of the bluff. The major remarked something about the moral effect the exhibition was likely to produce upon the Indian allies, and stepped gayly forward and applied the match.

The curiosity of the mule was aroused. He jerked his head around to see what was fizzing away there on his neck, and the next second his feet were all bunched together and making forty revolutions a minute, while the gun was threatening everything under the canopy within a radius of ten miles with instant destruction. The captain shinned up the only available tree. The sergeant threw himself flat on the ground and tried to dig a hole with his bayonet to crawl into, while the fat major rolled over and over in agony, alternately invoking the protection of Providence and cursing the mule. Finally the explosion came, the ball going through the roof of the fort. The recoil of the gun and the wild leap of the terrified mule carried both over the bluff to a safe anchorage at the bottom of the river. The discomfited party returned sadly to the fort.

Shortly after the chief of the Indians appeared and announced briefly, "Injun go home."

Questioned as to why, he thus explained, "Injun ver' brave, help white man. Injun use gun, use bow arrow, use knife, but when white man fire off whole jackass Injun no understand, no think right. Injun no help um fight that way."—Toronto World.

AFRICAN INTEMPERANCE.

Rev. Horace Waller says that "the degradation of the wretched tribes of West Africa has reached a depth that is appalling" and testifies to having seen hundreds of native girls lying in a state of intoxication round the wagons of liquor sellers. Dr. Clarke, speaking of South Africa, corroborates the statement, but uses the words "thousands" instead of hundreds. Mr. Moir, of the African Lakes Trading Company, writes:—"I have seen boys and girls of fourteen and fifteen getting their wages in rum." In fact, there are parts of the country in which there is practically no other currency. It is enough to arouse the most placid spirit to read that the merchants of Mauritius send their refuse rum, worthless in any other market, to the recently converted island of Madagascar, and despite the entreaties of rulers and people, force upon them a trade which has done much to nullify the work of the Christian missionaries.

The Story of the Strange Men Who Came to Dutton.

Now it happened on a time that there were two men, when John A. Macdonald was king in the land, and these men, having nought to, do were weary, and sighed and cried out, "Give us something to do, something to work at ere we die of lazy fever!" And they were heard, for the prince of the High Schools hearkened to them afar off, and took pity on them and said, "Go ye unto a place named Dutton, where are blooming boys and graceful girls, and stay ye there for a time, and try them, for it is time for them to be tried." And he smiled sideways as he said with covert meeting, "Yea, forsooth, it will be a trying time." But what he meant they knew not. Yet they thanked him withal, and packed their grips and went.

And when they had come unto the place whither he had sent them, behold they were angry and wrath and tore their hair, and would have put on sackcloth (but they had none.) And one said unto the other, "How have we offended the mighty prince of the schools that in this way he should wish them to die; for assuredly he has mocked us, and has laughed in our beards for there is no one that liveth here."

And so indeed it seemed to them at that time, and they wept exceedingly throughout that night.

But when the morning came, behold they heard noises exceeding strange, but when they hadgone out behold it was a woman marching on the highway, and those that dwell around call her the captain, and they report that she maketh that noise continually—if not more frequently. And the men marvelled that she did not die with exceeding haste, for seemed indeed that she were ready, as were all the rest.

And when the men had eaten and were filled, they wandered west and came at last to the trying place, where were gathered together many young men and maidens, some pretty and some not; and the former were more than the latter. And it seemed indeed that they had names, even funny ones—yea, very funny were there. For one of the maidens was called Claymore, and another was of the name of a bird, and to another was a name of exceeding length, so that a man standing at one end thereof could not be heard at the other. But of all these things mention will be made elsewhere—but all were nice.

And the men "tried" throughout those seven days, and much trying was done, until the end of the seventh day. And when the seventh day was finished, behold the men packed their grips and went away. And in their hearts they bore a pleasant memory of the kindness of those they had met, and were indeed, after all, glad that they had come. And the names of those men were Dromio and Antiphilus. Now Dromio was a seeker after knowledge, and, seeking thereafter, found the following verses:—

The day was bright, the sky was blue,
All nature of a roseate hue,
They took a parting smile or two
And then set out for Dutton.

The girls are wondrous pretty there,
Their blooming cheeks are soft and fair;
And yet, d'ye know, they didn't care
To linger long in Dutton.

A pleasant time they had, 'tis true;
They ever met with pleasures new,
And yet they felt it sometimes blue,
Sitting alone in Dutton.

The girls they've met will always be
A source of pleasant memory.
They hope that all again they'll see
When they come back to Dutton.

Martyrs to Headache
Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and bilousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN.

A HOG OF A HUSBAND.

Not a day passes but some amusing incident occurs on the street-cars that relieves the general monotony of a ride in one of these modern conveniences. Yesterday afternoon as a Ridge road car was coming up Lake avenue, the driver stopped on being signaled by a young man on a crossing not far from Driving Park avenue. The young man was accompanied by a rather pretty young woman who was dressed in a light, airy summer attire and carried a fancy colored sun parasol. The young man jumped aboard the car first and rushed inside, securing the only seat vacant, leaving the young woman to follow as best she could. Of course every one expected that he would give up his seat to his lady, but he did not do so, and she, after standing awhile, holding on to a strap, concluded to have a seat anyway, and, without a word of warning, plumped down on the lap of her escort, saying as she did so, "I'm as tired as you are, darling, and you will have to hold me until I can get a seat." He gave a grunt of the hog kind, and told her in plain English that she could stand or sit on the floor for all he cared, but he wouldn't hold her.

At this several male occupants of the car offered their seats to the young woman, but she declined their offer and said:—"He's as able to hold me now as he was before we were married, and I will sit where I am." The passengers were up to this time silently smothering their laughter, but the last was too much for them, and one of them remarked, "the car will be thrown from the track unless we stop laughing so hard." Realising the fact that he was making a target of himself the young man rose hastily, nearly throwing his darling wife on the floor, and made a rush for the door, saying as he did so, "You take my seat; I'll walk home," and left the car. The wife was not dismayed in the least, but sat there quietly enjoying the fun as well as did the other passengers.—[Rochester Democrat.

SWISS GIRLS AS BEASTS OF BURDEN.

No sooner are the girls large enough to possess the requisite physical strength than they are set to the most servile work the land affords. The child has a panier basket fitted to her shoulders at the earliest possible moment, and she drops it only when old age, premature but merciful, robs her of power to carry it longer. I have seen sweet little girls of twelve to fourteen staggering down a mountain side or along a rough pathway under the weight of bundles of fagots as large as their bodies, which they no sooner dropped than they hurried back for others. I have seen girls of fifteen or sixteen years barefooted and bareheaded, in the blistering rays of an August sun, breaking up the ground by swinging mattocks heavy enough to tax the strength of an able-bodied man. And I have known a young miss no older than these to be employed as a porter for carrying the baggage of travellers up and down the steepest mountain path in all the region round about. She admitted that it was sometimes very hard to take another step, but yet she must. And she carried such an amount of baggage! A stout-limbed guide is protected by the law, so that he cannot be compelled to carry above twenty-five pounds, but the limit to the burdens often put upon girls is their inability to stand up under anything more. But the burden increases with the age and strength of the burden-bearers, till by the time the girls have come to womanhood there is no sort of menial toil in which they do not bear a hand—and quite commonly the chief hand.

A SENSIBLE BRIDE.

Guests invited to one of the prettiest weddings of the week, writes a New York correspondent, were surprised to read on one corner of the dainty wedding cards, "No gifts," engraved in a quaint arabesque scroll, which perforce attracted attention. It required some independence of character and some self-denial to go counter to established custom in such a matter, but the dimpled little bride, who looks more like a sweet, plump, pink and white grown up baby than a person of strong-minded proclivities, announced to her friends when they questioned her decision, "I won't make my marriage to Archie a Methodist donation party where all the parish bring in this, that and the other to patch up the salary. We have a circle of three or four hundred friends, and everybody knows that a great many of them would buy presents for us not at all because they love us, but because it is the proper thing, and even if they can't afford the tax, they mustn't be outdone by rich Mrs. A. or Mr. B." Society people have indeed pushed the gift business hard within a few seasons, until there are dozens and scores of young married couples who pinch themselves during Lent and dread the coming June because of the draft the Easter and early summer weddings make on their incomes. If matters go on as they are doing now there may sometime be a spring exodus from New York into the country and to Europe, comparable to the flight of the May tax-dodgers from Boston, to escape paying the debts of honor accumulated in the shape of 200 or 300 wedding gifts, to be returned at the marriage of the givers.

NO PLACE FOR OLD WOMEN.

There are no old women in Terra del Fuego. Lest this should cause an exodus from the civilized world it would perhaps be best to explain why. When a women gets to the right age, about forty-five, she is considered to have done her duty. With appropriate ceremonies, therefore, she is either lanced or strangled, and the family larder is replenished with her roasted remains. The women, when they see the time of sacrifice approaching, never attempt to escape it. They regard it as about as settled a fact as that the wind should blow, and never trouble themselves about it. The Fuegans are not cannibals farther than this. They never eat children, young women or men.—[San Francisco Examiner.

TEACHING A WIFE SENSE.

Wife (counting over her change after making a purchase)—"I guess he's given me the wrong change." Husband (savagely)—"I thought so; that's the way my hard-earned money goes. Trust a woman to get fooled. Go back to the counter and get it made right at once." Wife retruns to the counter and hands the clerk a $2 bill. Husband—"Why, what have you been doing?" Wife—"Making the change right. He gave me $2 too much." Husband (more savagely than ever)—"Well by jings, you are an idiot."

Discouraging.

Country Minister—"I am sorry, Mr Wrangle, but as I was driving from the parsonage before service I saw your little boy on Gorsecreek bridge snaring for suckers." Mr. Wrangle—"Is that so, parson? Did ye notice what luck he was havin'?"

We do not deny that many meritorious remedies are properly to be classed under this heading. Now we know for a fact that Polson's Nerviline is without exception the most powerful, pleasant and certain remedy in the world for pain. It cannot fail, for it goes right to the bottom of pain, penetrates to the nerves, soothes them into quietness, and affords prompt and permanent relief. Nerviline is sold by all druggists. Her mother tried to amuse her by telling her stories about her own childhood, and succeeded so well that the little girl said: "Oh, mamma, I wish I had been born sooner, so that I might have played with you when you were little."

CARACAS AND ITS CLIMATE.

A Genial Land Which Every Prospect Pleases.

BY WILLIAM AGNEW PATTON.

The traveller is most agreeably surprised on his arrival at Caracas to find a large and well-appointed hostelry, much superior in its arrangements and appointments to the average hotel ordinarily to be found in Spanish America. It is well ordered in all its purlieus and purprises, agreeably neat and clean, and is pervaded, moreover, by an atmosphere of ease and homelike repose, in all its aspects and belongings holding forth promises of good living and comfortable entertainment. Like all the larger houses in the city of Caracas the hotel is of two stories only. Living as they do in constant fear of earthquakes, although there have been few of these calamitous visitations of late years, the inhabitants of the Venezuelan capital do not rear lofty dwellings or public buildings that by the slightest disturbance of the earth would certainly be thrown down, burying in a mass of ruins hundreds of citizens, involving the loss of many lives. I have said that tremblings of the earth have not been of frequent occurrence, although in 1813, as will be remembered, untold misery and the loss of 10,000 lives were caused by the great earthquake of that year of hideous memory; nevertheless the people, mindful of this horrible visitation, live in constant expectation if not in momentary dread of the horror of a like disaster.

Certain it is that the woeful forebodings indulged in by the victim of apprehensions and vague unrest interfered not one jot or tittle with my enjoyment during my delightful sojourn in the beautiful valley, which has, alas, so often been the scene of geological disturbances and, more disastrous still, political revolutions and social upheavals. I can, however, in all truth and verity affirm—not in a sprit of bravado or reckless boasting—that I would as soon think of being deterred from visiting Caracas or of being warned away from it by the fear of earthquakes as I would by rumors of wars and "short-winded accounts of new broils." During our first night's stay in Caracas, in the valley of endless midsummer, we were somewhat troubled by the mosquitoes. The attacks of these pestilential visitors served to abate somewhat our enthusiasm at finding ourselves (in the middle of Winter) sojourning in a region where we could enjoy the luxury of sleeping with all the windows of our apartments wide open without finding it necessary to oppress ourselves with the weight of extra blankets and coverlets. Having learned by maddening and sleepless experience the necessity for closely looking to the nice and secure arrangement of our mosquito nets, on following nights we tucked and pinned ourselves impregnable within our canopies, and thereafter slept in peace and comfort.

The city of Caracas, seated on the easter end of the valley of the same name, or, as it is sometimes called the Vale of Chacao, is built four square, being laid out with great regularity. Its streets and avenues cross one another at right angles, forming blocks of houses into almost exact squares. So perfect and well designed is this arrangement that it requires but a glance at the excellent plan of the town, published by La Opinion Nacional, to enable the stranger with only the most rudimentary "bump of locality" to find his way about readily through all the precints and parishes of the town. This may even the newly-arrived traveler do with certainty and without confusion, especially if he be a man given to town trotting and possessed of an eye quick to mark and a mind sure to remember of houses, the color and wording of signboards, and the characteristics of shops and the display in their windows. So, taking heed to know again the street corners and crossings he passes in his perigrinations, he may "dander about" the city in search of sights and wonders, in quest of amusement or opportunity to study, enjoying the process of absorbing from his novel surroundings the knowledge that is to be gained by travel in foreign lands.

For my part, I enjoy nothing so much as turning myself loose in a strange town, provided always it be worth study in the matter of picturesqueness and color of the scenery, as well as the quaintness or even oddity of its people. It pleases me to try to find my way about without guide book or courier, unaccompanied even by a friend familiar with the nooks and turnings, or without appeal to passer-by or casual policeman. I carefully go my way and by my own sweet will, reckless of losing myself, feeling assured that all in good time I shall "come out somewhere." Indeed, there is a pleasure in being for the time entirely "turned round" and apparently—one never is actually—lost; for, like the Irish sailor's marlinespike, which, by reason of being safe at the bottom of the sea, was not, according to its owner's way of thinking, lost or mislaid, so one is never hopelessly out of reckoning, but is always sure of turning up all right at the right time at the right place. Besides, the light-hearted gadabout can always comfort his heart with the "self-thought" that although he may not be sure in what direction lies his hotel, there can be no doubt that he is in Peking or Penang, for instance, or, as in my present South American experience, Caracas—"Big Indian not lost; wigwam lost!"

But let me go on with my too long-delayed description of the city, which I hope may be graphic enough to enable the reader to form some picture of it in his mind. The streets and avenues (calle y avenida) of the town are, as a rule fairly well paved, and although not frequently watered or swept at any time, are neither very muddy when it rains nor dusty when the sun is shining. Lying on a plain that slopes gently from wonderful mountains towering in the north, between the valley and the sea coast, toward the bed of the Rio Guaire, Caracas is well drained and abundantly supplied with sweet water which is drawn from the surrounding hills and conducted to the heart of the city through well-constructed aqueducts, some of them many miles in length. It is comparatively easy for the people to keep their houses clean and wholesome, and this they succeed to a certain extent in doing, being aided in no inconsiderable degree by the vultures that are to be seen hovering in the air over the town. From time to time these soaring scavengers swoop down to feast upon gruesome masses of garbage or filthy refuse that otherwise would be left to infect the air and breed a pestilence or become an offense to the eyes and noses of passers-by. This foul and disgusting feathered tribe are to be seen in thousands infesting the neighborhood of the "abattoir," where are daily slaughtered droves of cattle that furnish meat for the better class of well-to-do inhabitants.

The climate of Caracas is, no doubt, exceedingly healthy, as witness the well-favored appearance of all classes of people. At no time of the year, if the sanitary conditions of the city are strictly cared for, is there any likelihood of the outbreak of an epidemic or even of sporadic cases of yellow fever, cholera, or any of the other filth diseases common in countries lying near the equator, where the ignorance, indolence, or negligence on the part of the people to their physical welfare subjects them to attacks of terrible plagues and wasting sicknesses. The temperature of the valley is at all seasons moderate and only slightly variable. Even in January, the coolest, as well as in July, the hottest, of the months, when less favored cities—Hamilton and Winnipeg for instance—lie baking and grilling in a fervent heat, with the thermometer ranging from 15° to 20° higher than is ever has been known to register in the vale of Chacao, the climate of Caracas is delicious and wholesome. Prof. Ernst, the learned curator of the museum of the University of Caracas, is my authority for the statement that never in the course of many years has the degree of heat exceeded 84° Fahrenheit.

To this testimony is to be added that of the

whose memory goeth not back to the contrary. Likewise at La Guayra, at the foot of the mountains, on the seashore, where the heat is not all times tempered by the genial influence of the trade winds, the mercury seldom amounts above 90°, and this too at a place lying almost on the isothermal line of greatest subequatorial heat. It is within bounds to say that at Marcuto, a watering place three miles to the east of La Guayra, where the quality and gentility of Venezuela resort during the fashionable seaside season, (December, January, and February,) the heat is never so oppressive as it is during many days in some parts of Canada. For nine months of twelve the blessed trades blow with unvarying consistency across the Caribbean, and although at sea level the climate is much warmer than it is among the hills, it is nevertheless salubrious and by no means so enervating as at places further to the east—Trinidad, for example, or Barcelona; or to the westward, at Puerto Cabello and Coro, on the Venezuelan coast. Situated, as had been already stated, 3,000 feet above tide water, surrounded by grand and lofty mountains, Caracas is remarkable for the geniality of its climate. As a Winter resort, a city of refuge from the torture and trials of our Northern Winter it has—for so my experience of it teaches me—no equal on the American Continent. Even Florida and Southern California are not to be mentioned with it in any comparison that can possibly be made by those whose judgment in such matters is to be relied on as trustworthy or unbiased by prejudice born of ignorance or the hope of dividends from railroad stocks or profits derivable from the ownership of so-called Winter hotels in the regions named. When desirability of climate is taken into consideration, and to it is added the fact that in Caracas and at Macuto one may be comfortably, yes, luxuriously, housed and provided for in the matter of food, it is passing strange that travellers from the States and Canada are not to be met with at all the street corners of the Venezuelan capital. Especially during the days of blizzards, chilblains, pneumonia, snow, slush, chill winds, and bitter weather; that is to say, from Christmas till May day, when living in Montreal is no more nor less than unadulterated heart-breaking woe and misery to poor humanity endowed with abnormal sciatic nerves, big toes, meteorological shoulders, delicate lungs, inflammable ducts, tubes, nares, weak, overtaxed or malformed membranes. Victims of dysphonia, clericorum, diphtheria, quinsy, aphthæ, bronchitis, and other nosological phenomena, with supersensitive organs, would do well to flee from these torments and seek refuge in the mollifying air of the vale of Chacao.

Caracas is moreover a city possessed of more attractions than are merely climatic, and no one who has visited it will deny that it is a good place for man to dwell there, not only because of and glowing skies, but because everywhere in, about and around it there are beautiful orchards, groves, and plantations, quaint villages, flower and vine covered farmhouses, fields of living green and quiet pastures by the sweet waters of the Rio Guaire and other winding streams. There is beauty enough in all one sees in this charming place to fill the heart with gladness and content. In the midst of the city is the Plaza Bolivar (not Bol-i-var as I was taught in my early school days to pronounce the name of the liberator—but Bo-lee-var—throwing the accent strongly and sharply on the second syllable, breathing the final "var" gently diminuendo.) This square is what may be termed the heart of the town, and from it extends the four grand avenues that divide Caracas into quarters and regulate the system of naming the streets after the four cardinal points of the compass. The four avenidas are, respectively, called Avenida Norte, Oesta, Sur, and Este; that is to say in our English speech, North, West, South and East avenues, and each has its beginning on that side of the plaza indicated and suggested by the name given to it. The four boulevards extend in a straight line from the square out into the country in a northerly, westerly, easterly or southerly direction, as the case may be. The streets running parallel to Avenida Norte and Sur to the west of those thoroughfares are designated by even numbers; those to the east of the avenues by odd numbers, Norte 1, 3, 5, &c., up to Norte 15, and the streets (calles) crossing these at right angles are similarly numbered by odd numbers, if they be to the north of Avenidas Oeste and Este, and by even numbers if to the south of them.

Avenida Norte (Northern avenue) extends toward the foothills of the grand mountains of Caracas on the north of the city, towering between it and the sea. It ascends gently from the plaza for nearly three quarters of a mile to where the Panteon Nacional occupies a prominent site

ON THE BORDERS OF THE CITY.

Avenida Este stretches down a moderate descent past the Templo Candelaria, the great church of the parish of the same name, out to the pleasant and fruitful estates of San Bernardino, La Gula and the Curdia Guzman, three beautiful plantations of sugar and groves of cocoa. Passing these it reaches the terminus of the Ferrocarril Central, the railway to Petare, a romantic and quaint town nine miles away at the eastern end of the vale of Caracas. From the south side of the Plaza Bolivar Avenida Sur descends into the Valley of the softly-flowing Rio Guaire passing in the rear of the Templo Santa Teresa, which stands on the northern confines of Plaza Washington, where is a statue of the "Father of his Country." Avenida Oeste is but one-third the length of either of the other avenues, owing to the nearer approach of the hills to the central plaza; it conducts one to a flight of stone steps that rise to the summit of Mount Calvario, in the midst of Paseo Guzman Blanco, and on the top of which is a colossal statue of El Ilustre Americo. Beyond this is the station of Ferrocarril. La Guayta-Caracas, up whose tortuous track our train had climbed the afternoon of the day we left the sea behind us to seek the Mecca of our pilgrimage, Caracas, in its wonderful valley of delight.

Thanks to the activity and progressive spirit of Gen. Guzman Blanco, Caracas has in these late years become a really beautiful and picturesque city; it is embellished with numerous plazas, alamedas, public buildings, and statues. The streets are well paved, and nowhere can one find a more pleasant or than the well-laid-out and carefully-kept Paseo Guzman Blanco, whence from the top of Mount Calvario, amid the shade of beautiful trees, surrounded by flowers and blossoming shrubbery, one can obtain views of the valleys of Caracas and Antemano that would baffle the power to paint word pictures of them of even the great master who wrote of the Delectable Mountains, or of him who sings of the glories of the rose strewn vale of Cashmere.

Just before sunrise on the morning after our arrival at the hotel, I stepped out upon a balcony that hung in front of my window, which gave toward the north, and from it enjoyed a wide ranging view of the mountains of Caracas. It was a grand and never-to-be-forgotten sight. The day was dawning—"the jocund morn stood tiptoe—" There the quotation fails of accurate application, for the mountain tops were not misty nor obscured by drifting clouds, but distinctly lined against a gray sky that faded rapidly to warm and dazzling azure as night fled precipitately away before the face of day. The grand peaks towered 6,000 feet above the valley still sleeping in shadow, and as the sun rushed up the east, crag and pinnacle became suffused with a wonderful light that transformed rock and precipice into glistening ramparts and battlements built, in all poetical probability, of gold and precious stones. The light crept down the mountain sides illuminating the ribs and ridges, still leaving the valleys in darkness, the sun peeped over the low hills at the eastern end of the valley

To Look at Pictures Properly

The collector who has seen his choicest prints turned over by unintelligent hands while he has been forced by courtesy to conceal his chagrin and to resist the impulse to seize the precious plates and conceal them from unworthy use, will appreciate fully the force of what we say. Most people might almost as well be given the simple views with which comic almanacs are adorned as set down to examine a portfolio of priceless etchings. Indeed, generally they would be bored by the latter and entertained by the former.

The great mistake made by the majority of persons is to suppose that no special training is needed to see pictures properly. The reception of any work of art presupposes previous and special training. It is necessary to learn the artist's language; to train one's perceptions to acute and instant sensitiveness to the means by which it is sought to produce an impression. If one is to examine photographs with no other end save to decide whether the resemblance to the original object is exact, perhaps no great amount of special preparation is needed; but with a picture which is anything more than a graphic diagram, special education is a necessity. How few persons ever take an engraving and sit down deliberately to study it; to endeavor to discover why the artist disposed his figures and accessories in a given manner; why the light and shade are disposed thus; why the engraver has used certain lines in reproducing certain parts of the plate, and so on for the rest; and yet everybody, as we said at the start, supposes he knows how to look at a picture.

"Logic is Logic."

Now there was the case of our friend McKay:
He said to himself in his resolute way,
That a cough which was growing from bad to worse
Must be cured, in spite of a slender purse.
An ocean voyage was out of the question;
A Florida trip a useless suggestion;
Yet die he wouldn't! His money he paid
For the "Golden Medical Discovery," by Dr. Pierce made;
And as sound as a nut in his health to-day—
"Logic is logic, that's all I say."

ORGIN OF SURNAMES.

Many of Them Taken from Places—Others from Occupations and Personal Traits.

Not only countries but counties and towns were a fruitful source of surnames, writes Prof. N. H. Egleston. John from Cornwall become John Cornwall or Cornish. Richard who lived near a piece of woodland was spoken of as Richard at or near the wood, originating the surname Atwood, or John living near a hill became John Hill. So with Underhill, Atwell, etc. John living near a clump of oaks was John atten oaks, abbreviated into Noakes; or William who had pitched his tent or cabin near a notable ash tree was known as William at the ash or William atten ash, which easily drifted into Nash. So, too, Thomas who lived near a small stream (or in Anglo Saxon a becket) was Thomas at the becket, and thus was named the martyr Thomas a Becket. The most common terminations of English surnames taken from places are ford, ham, lea, and ton. Ford is from the Saxon faran, to go, signifying the place where a stream could be crossed.

In the name of Shakespeare's birthplace we have a memento of three different eras of English history, viz., the periods of the occupancy by the old Britons, the Romans, and the Saxons. Strat is an abbreviation of strata (street), the name by which the great Roman roads were known. Ford tells us that one of these roads crossed a stream, and Avon is the name which the old Britons or Celts gave to the stream.

The word lea, legh, or leigh, signifying a partially wooded field, served as the ending for many surnames, such as Horsley, Cowley, Ashley, Oakley, Lindley, and Berkley, or Birchley. Hay or haw means a hedge, and this has given us Hayes, Haynes, Haley, Haywood, Hawes, Haworth, Hawthorn, Haughton, or Houghton.

Occupations, too, have afforded an endless army of surnames. This method was used by the Romans in such names as Fabricus (smith), Pictor (painter), Agricola (farmer). In England a skilful hunter would adopt that as his surname, and equally so with the carpenter, joiner, sawyer, baker, or butcher.

Personal traits and complexions, too, gave rise to surnames. From the former we have the names Stout, Strong, Long, Longman, Longfellow; and from the latter Brown, Black, etc. Some mental and moral traits were also used to denote surnames. Richard I. of England was better known as Richard of the Lion Heart. The next step would be to derive from this quality the surname Lyon.

PASSING NOTES.

It is announced that the Ontario Government has removed the toll charged for admission to the new Niagara Falls park. A public park, entrance to which was purchaseable at fifty cents per head, was certainly an anomaly.

"The Church of England in Canada" is the title by which the Episcopal Church is to be known in this country henceforth. It was formerly described as the United Church of England and Ireland. But the Montreal Synod has decided that this title is inapplicable, and that the Church should be naturalized.

Letters have been received at Vancouver, B.C., from London, England, having travelled 6,500 miles in twelve days, and this is said to be the shortest time on record over that route. The Victoria Times believes that the enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway is but beginning to shorten up the running time between the two coasts so that the journey between Vancouver and Montreal may be made in four days.

For adding water to milk supplied by him to a cheese factory, a Hastings farmer had to pay, under the Ontario Act, a fine of $20 and costs. Even when milk is supplied to inoffensive residents of cities and towns it is a misdemeanor to water it. Under the Dominion Adulteration Act the fine for this offence is $60 or $100, in the discretion of the magistrate. It is to be feared that all milk vendors do not properly appreciate the risks they are running.

An English newspaper publishes an estimate of what it would cost Great Britain to accede to the demands of the war alarmists. Among the items are five new ironclads and 120 fast cruisers. A first-class modern ironclad costs about three-quarters of a million sterling, and the five would therefore absorb £3,750,000. A fast cruiser cannot be supplied at less than £150,000, and the 120 would cost £18,000,000. It would be necessary to raise the income tax from 6d. in the pound to 1s. 6d. to pay for these two items, a penny extra on the income tax producing less than £2,000,000. It is estimated that the trebling of the income tax for three years might supply all the items enumerated, but the mere idea of such an imposition would frighten John Bull out of his senses.

Some Facts About the Poles.

Much less is known about the region surrounding the South Pole than about that in the neighbourhood of the North Pole, for this reason, among others, that Polar exploration has chiefly been directed towards the latter. The most successful Antarctic expeditions were the American one under Lieutenant Wilkes in 1838-42 and the English one under Sir James Ross in 1838-43 but even these accomplished very little in the way of discovery. The results of Antarctic exploration so far are thus summarized by the New York Tribune:—"Nobody has got within seven or eight hundred miles of the South Pole; that icy barriers have been encountered which eclipse anything known in the North frigid zone; that mountains have been seen, one shooting forth volcanic flames, and loftier than any discovered by Northern explorers; that all the land there is covered with snow at all seasons; that no human being has been met with beyond 55 degrees; that no vegetable growth, except lichens, has been seen beyond 58 degrees, and that no land quadruped is known to exist beyond 66 degrees." It is with a view to the extension of this meagre knowledge that some German scientists, with whom Mr. Henry Villard, of Northern Pacific fame, is co operating, are about to send out another expedition to the South Pole. Their prospects of success are not encouraging, although it is expected that the use of steam vessels will enable the explorers to achieve more than their predecessors.

A Sad Truth.

A physician in a small Western town said, the other day, that during the past year he had treated thirteen boys for what is called "the tobacco heart," a disease of the circulating organs resulting from the use of tobacco. Think of it! Thirteen lives endangered out of a physician's practice of a few hundred, and all the victims young fellows under twenty-one. Does it not show the terrible effects of the habit?

In many countries the evil effects of tobacco-using by boys has been recognized sufficiently to induce the civil authorities to enact laws prohibiting its sale to, and use by, young boys. It is made a misdemeanor for boys under the age of fifteen to smoke or use tobacco in any form. If a lad under this age is found upon the street smoking, he is as promptly arrested and sent to the police station, as though he had been caught stealing.

A Boston servant, like many of her class, does not know her age. She had lived with one family eleven years, and has always been twenty-eight. But not long ago she read in a newspaper of an old women who had died at the age of one hundred and six. "Maybe I'm as old as that meself," said she. "Indade, I can't remember the time when I wasn't alive."

CHAPTER IX.

HIGH-WATER.

Meanwhile, Warren Relf, navigating the pervasive and ubiquitous little Mud-Turtle, had spent his summer congenially in cruising in and out of Essex mud flats and Norfolk broads accompanied by his friend and chum Potts, the marine painter—now lying high and dry with the ebbing tide on some broad bare bank of ribbed sand, just relieved by a battle-royal of gulls and rooks from the last reproach of utter monotony; now working hard at the counterfeit presentment of a green-grown wreck, all picturesque with waving tresses of weed and sea-wrack, in some stranded estuary of the Thames backwaters; and now again tossing and lopping on the uneasy bosom of the German Ocean, whose rise and fall would seem to suggest to a casual observer's mind the physiological notion that its own included crabs and lobsters had given it a prolonged and serious fit of marine indigestion.

For a couple of months at a stretch the two young artists had toiled away ceaselessly at their labour of love, painting the sea itself and all that therein is, with the eyots, creeks, rivers, sands, cliffs, banks, and inlets adjacent, in every variety of mood or feature, from its glassiest calm to its angriest tempest, with endless patience, delight, and satisfaction. They enjoyed their work and it repaid them. It was almost al the payment they ever got, indeed, for, like loyal sons of the Cheyne Row Club, the crew of the Mud Turtle were not successful. And now, as September was more than half through, Warren Relf began to bethink himself at last of Hugh Massinger, whom he had left in rural ease on dry land at Whitestrand under a general promise to return for him 'in the month of the decline of roses, some time between the 15th and the 20th. So, on a windy morning, about that precise period of the year, with a north easterly breeze setting strong across the North sea, and a falling barometer threatening squalls, according to the printed weather report, he made his way out of the mouth of the Yare, and turned southward before the flowing tide in the direction of Whitestrand.

The sea was running high and splendid, and the two young painters, inured to toil and accustomed to danger, thoroughly enjoyed its wild magnificence. A storm to them was a study in action. They could take notes calmly of its fiercest moments. Almost every wave broke over the deck; and the patient little Mud-Turtle, with her flat bottom and centre board keel, tossed about like a walnut shell on the surface of the water, or drove her nose madly from time to time into the crest of a billow, to emerge triumphant one moment later, all shining and dripping with sticky brine, in the deep trough on the other side. Painting in such a sea was of course simply impossible; but Warren Relf, who loved his art with supreme devotion, and never missed an opportunity of catching a hint from his ever-changing model under the most unpromising circumstances, took out pencil and paper a dozen times in the course of the day to preserve at least in black and white some passing aspect of her mutable features. Potts for the most part managed sheet and helm; while Relf, in the intervals of luffing or tacking holding hard to the main-mast with his left arm, and with his left hand just grasping his drawing-pad on the other side of the mast, jotted hastily down with his right whatever peculiar form of spray or billow happened for the moment to catch and impress his artistic fancy. It was a glorious day for those who liked it; though a land lubber would no doubt have roundly called it a frightful voyage.

They had meant to make Whitestrand before evening; but half-way down, an incident of a sort that Warren Relf could never bear to miss intervened to delay them. They fell in casually with a North Sea trawler, disabled and distressed by last night's gale, now scudding under bare poles before the free breeze that churned and whitened the entire surface of the German Ocean. The men on board were in sore straits, though not as yet in immediate danger; and the yawl gallantly stood in close by her, to pick up the swimmers in case of serious accident. The shrill wind tore at her mainmast; the waves charged her in vague ranks; the gaff quivered and moaned at the shocks; and ever and anon, with a bellowing rush, the resistless sea swept over her triumphantly from stern to stern. Meanwhile, Warren Relf, eager to fix this stray episode on good white paper while it was still before his eyes, made wild and rapid dashes on his pad with a sprawling hand, which conveyed to his mind, in strange shorthand hieroglyphics some faint idea of the scene as it passed before him.

"She's a terrible bad sitter, this smack," he observed in a loud voice to Potts, with good-humored enthusiasm, as they held on together with struggling hands on the deck of the Mud-Turtle. "The moment you think you've just caught her against the skyline on the crest of a wave, she lurches again, and over she goes, plump down into the trough, before you've had a chance to make a single mark upon your sheet of paper. Ships are always precious bad sitters at the best of times; but when you and your model are both plunging and tossing together in dirty weather on a loppy channel, I don't believe even Turner himself could make much out of it in the way of a sketch from nature.—Hold hard, there, Frank! Look out for your head! She's going to ship a thundering big sea across her bows this very minute.—By Jove! I wonder how the smack stood that last high wave!—Is she gone? Did it break over her. Can you see her ahead there?"

"She's all right still," Potts shouted from the flow, where he stood now in his oilskin suit, drenched from head to foot with the dashing spray, but cheery as ever, in true sailor fashion. "I can see her mast just showing above the crest. But it must have given her a jolly good wetting. Shall we signal the men to know if they'd like to come aboard here?"

"Signal away," Warren Relf answered good-humouredly above the noise of the wind. "No more sketching for me to-day, I take it. That last lot she shipped wet my pad through and through with the nasty damp brine. I'd better put my sketch, as far as it goes, down below in the locker. Wind's freshening. We'll have enough to do to keep her nose straight in half a gale We're going within four or five points of the wind now, as it is. I wish we could run clear ahead at once for the poplar at Whitestrand. I would too, if it weren't for the smack. This is getting every bit as hot as I like it. But we must keep an eye upon her, if we don't want her crew to be all dead men. She can't live six hours longer in a gale like to-day's I'll bet you any money."

They signalled the men, but found them unwilling still, with true seafaring devotion, to abandon their ship, which had yet some hours of life left in her. They'd stick to the smack, the skipper signalled back in mute pantomime, as long as her timbers held out the water. There was nothing for it, therefore, but to lie hard by her, for humanity's sake, as close as possible, and to make as slowly as the strength of the wind would allow, by successive tacks, for the river-mouth at Whitestrand.

All day long, they held up bravely, lurching and plunging on the angry waves; and only towards evening did they part company with the toiling smack, as it was growing dusk along the low flat stretch of shore by Dunwich. There, a fish-carrier from the North Sea, one of these fast long steamers that plough the German ocean on the look-out for the fishing fleet—whose catches they take up with all speed to the London market, fell in with them in the very nick of time, and transferring the crew on board with some little difficulty, made fast the smack—or rather her wreck—with a tow-line behind, and started under all steam, to save her life, for the port of Harwich. Warren Relf and his companion, dispising such aid, and preferring to live it out by themselves at all hazards, were left behind alone with the wild evening, and proceeded in the growing shades of twilight to find their way up the river at Whitestrand.

"Can you make out the poplar, Frank?" Warren Relf shouted out, as he peered ahead into the deep gloom that enveloped the coast with its murky covering. We've left it rather late, I'm afraid, for pushing up the creek with a sea like this! Unless we can spot the poplar distinctly, I should hardly like to risk entering it by the red light on the sandhills alone. Those must be the lamps at Whitestrand Hall, the three windows to starboard yonder. The poplar ought to show by rights a point or so west of them, with the striped buoy just a little this side of it."

"I can make out the striped buoy by the white paint on it," his companion answered, gazing eagerly in front of him; "but I fancy it's a shade too dark now to be sure of the poplar. The lights of the Hall don't seem quite regular. Still, I should think we could make the creek by the red lantern and the beacon at the thithe, without minding the tree, if you care to risk it. You know your way up and down the river as well as any man living by this time; and we've got a fair breeze at our backs, you see, for going up the mouth to the bend at Whitestrand."

The wind moaned like a woman in agony. The timbers creaked and groaned and crackled. The black waves lashed savagely over the deck. The Mud Turtle was almost on the shore before they knew it.

"Luff, luff!" Relf called out hastily, as he peered once more into the deepening gloom with all his eyes. "By George! we're wrong. I can see the poplar—over yonder; do you catch it? We're out of our bearings a quarter of a mile. We've gone too far now to make it this tack. We must try again, and get our points better by the high light. That was a narrow squeak of it, by Jove! Frank. I can twig where we've got to now, distinctly. It's the lights in the house that led us astray. That's not the Hall: it's the windows of the vicarage."

They ran out to eastward again, for more sea-room, a couple of hundred yards, or farther, and tacked afresh for the entrance of the creek, this time adjusting their course better for the open mouth by the green lamp of the beacon on the sandhill. The light fixed on their own masthead threw a glimmering ray ahead from time to time upon the angry water. It was a hard fight for mastery with the wind. The waves were setting in fierce and strong towards the creek now; but the tide and stream on the other hand were ebbing rapidly and steadily outward. They always ebbed fast at the turn of the tide, as Relf knew well; a rushing current set in then round the corner by the poplar tree, the same current that had carried out Hugh Massinger so resistlessly seaward in that little adventure of his on the morning of their first arrival at Whitestrand. Only an experienced mariner dare face that bar. But Warren Relf was accustomed to the coast, and made light of danger that other men trembled at.

As they neared the poplar a second time, making straight for the mouth with nautical dexterity, a pale object on the port bow, rising and falling with each rise and fall of the waves on the bar, attracted Warren Relf's casual attention for a single moment by its strange weird likeness to a human figure. At first, he hardly regarded the thing seriously as anything more than a stray bit of floating wreckage; but presently the light from the masthead fell full upon it and with a sudden flash he felt convinced a, once it was something stranger than a mere plank or fragment of rigging.

"Look yonder, Frank," he called out in echoing tones to his mate; that can't be a buoy upon the port bow there!"

The other man looked at it long and steadily. As he looked, the Mud-Turtle lurched once more, and cast a reflected pencil ray of light from the masthead lamp over the surface of the sea, away in the direction of the suspicious object. Both men caught sight at once of some floating white drapery, swayed by the waves, and a pale face upturned in ghastly silence to the uncertain starlight.

"Port your helm hard!" Relf cried in haste. "It's a man overboard. Washed off the smack perhaps. He's drowned by this time I expect, poor fellow."

His companion ported the helm at the word with all his might. The yawl answered well in spite of the breakers. With great difficulty, between wind and tide, they lay up towards the myster ous thing slowly in the very trough of the billows that roared and danced with hoarse joy over the shallow bar; and Relf, holding tight to the sheet with one hand, and balancing himself as well as he was able on the deck, reached out with the other a stout boathook to draw the tossing body alongside within hauling distance of the Mud-Turtle. As he did so, the body, eluding his grasp, rose once more on the crest of the wave, and displayed to their view an open bosom and a long white dress, with a floating scarf or shawl of some thin material still hanging loose around the neck and shoulders. The face itself they couldn't as yet distinguish; it fell back languid beneath the spray at the top, so that only the throat and chin were visible; but by the dress and the open bosom alone, it was clear at once that the object they saw was not the corpse of a sailor. Warren Relf almost let drop the boathook in horror and surprise.

"Great heavens!" he exclaimed, turning round excitedly, "it's a woman—a lady—dead—in the water!"

The billows broke, and curled over majestically with resistless force into the trough below them. Its undertow sucked the Mud-Turtle after it fiercely towards the shore away from the body. With a violent effort, Warren Relf, lunging forward eagerly at the lurch, seized hold of the corpse by the floating scarf. It turned of itself as the hook caught it, and displayed its face in the pale starlight. A great awe fell suddenly upon the astonished young painter's mind. It was indeed a woman that he held now by the dripping hair—a beautiful young girl, in a white dress; and the wan face was one he had seen before. Even in that dim half-light he recognized her instantly.

Frank!" he cried out in a voice of hushed and reverent surprise—"never mind the ship. Come forward and help me. We must take her on board. I know her! I know her! She's a friend of Massinger's."

The corpse was one of the two young girls he had seen that day two months before sitting with their arms round one another's waists, close to the very spot where they now lay up, on the gnarled and naked roots of the famous old poplar.

Sea Fisheries of the United Kingdom.

A return issued yesterday by the Board of Trade shows that the total quantity of fish returned as landed on all coasts, exclusive of shell fish, amounted in 1887 to 6,029,000 cwts., or say 301,000 tons, of the value of £3,779,000, which, with the addition of the shell fish, having a value of £324,000 makes a total value of fish landed on the English and Welsh coasts in 1887 of £4,103,000. The corresponding figures for 1886 were—quantity of fish landed, exclusive of shell fish, 6,412 000 cwts., or 320,600 tons of the value of £3,688,000; the value of the shell fish landed being £269,000—making a total value of fish landed in that year of £3,957,000; consequently, although there was a decrease of 383,000 cwts., or 19,000 tons, in the quantity of fish returned as landed, exclusive of shell fish, it appears that there was an increase in the value of the same of £91,000; the value of the shell fish returned as landed having also increased by £55,000.

FLOODS IN MEXICO.

Fifteen Hundred Lives Reported to Have Been Lost.

St. Louis, June 26.—A City of Mexico special says:—During the past ten days the table lands between here and Zacatecas have been visited by unprecedented rains. Every mountain rivulet along the Central railway for more than two hundred miles has been converted into a destructive torrent, and the valleys present the appearance of lakes. Many cities and towns have been inundated, and Leon and Silao have been partially destroyed. "On the 18th inst. the following telegram was received from Silao:—"It commenced raining heavily yesterday afternoon, and continued all night, raising the Silao River out of its banks, breaking at the north end of the town and passing through the streets with irresistible force and volume. Most of the houses here being adobe, they soon became saturated with water and began to fall. About 325 houses have been destroyed.

HOMELESS AND STARVING PEOPLE.

The station buildings are occupied by homeless people, who are unable to obtain anything to eat, except watermelons and fruit found floating in the water. The rain has been general, and the whole country around Silao is flooded. Several dykes have given way. It still continues raining." On the 20th it was learned that the flood had been more destructive in Leon than Silao. On Monday, the 18th, the river broke over its dykes, and notwithstanding all efforts to check its course it made rapid headway and finally flooded the city. As the rain fell the river rose rapidly, its volume of water flowing into the town, gradually wearing away the foundation of the buildings, which commenced to fall as night came on. On Monday night the people, believing themselves secure from the flood, went to bed in those parts of the town where the water had not found its way. The steady downfall of rain into the extensive water bed of the outlying country increased the flow of the river, and rapidly extended its channel until over half of Leon was under water, and a loss of life commenced unparelleled in the history of any of the great inundations of modern times.

APPALLING LOSS OF LIFE.

As the buildings fell the unfortunate sleepers were either crushed to death or drowned. One whole night of terror followed. Men, women, and children fled to the streets in their nightclothes, some to find shelter on high ground, and others to be swept away by the flood. On Tuesday morning the rain was still falling. All night it poured, until Wednesday morning saw the lake surrounding the city undiminished in size, with steady rain disturbing its surface. In the afternoon, however, it ceased raining, and the waters commenced to recede. It is estimated that 700 persons perished. There is a strong stench from the heaps of rubbish that once formed houses, and one is led to believe that there must be bodies buried under them. There are also bodies still floating in the water. One hundred and eleven bodies have been recovered without moving any of the ruins of the houses, and hundreds of bodies must be buried under them. The destoryed houses are estimated at 2,000, and the loss at $2,000,000. Many other towns have been badly damaged, but the loss of life is only reported from Silao and Leon. The Mexican Central railway was washed out in a number of places. The State of Guanajuato and the Federal Government are doing much to succour the victims of the flood.

Important Military Invention.

Apropos of war, the control by England of Major Watkins' invention of a position finder is a matter whose importance it is not easy to exaggerate. The Government has given him £25,000, and £1,000 a year for ten years. They bought the invention cheaply at that. The inability of the human eye accurately to measure distances covered by rifled guns has long been recognized by artillerists. Inventions to meet the difficulty have not been few, but never have they more than half filled the gap in artillery science. The Watkins' invention, however, which was first announced in 1872, has been steadily perfected until it now enables twenty guns to do the work of 320 under the old system. It triples or quadruples the power and rapidity of fire of heavy guns in forts and earthworks. It makes a good artillerist of the rawest gunner, since it reduces him largely to a machine and increases the proportion of hits on a moving target a mile or more from shore from 20 to 80. The invention is operated in a directing station removed from a battery, and the simple laying of a telescope in this marks on the dial in front of the gunner the exact training and elevation. Consequently an artillerist need not look out of the port, does not need to see the object, and can shoot as accurately over a hill as in any other direction. One important result of the adoption of the invention is the increased service ability of the old muzzle-loading cannon. It is proposed to fit them with the position finder and load with melinite shells, making them highly valuable up to 4,500 yards.

The New Emperor.

Emperor William's proclamation issued yesterday to his people is at least a little less martial in tone than the pair of proclamations to the army and the navy that preceded it. There is in it, nevertheless, neither aspiration for peace nor expectation of it, unless in the indefinite phrase "to guard the peace," which is itself followed by a reminder that both Prince and people must be "equally ready to make sacrifices for the Fatherland." That militarism is "in the saddle" now in Germany and is about to run a free course seems to be the opinion of the most competent observers. Had there been any doubt on the subject, the almost startling promptness and exultation with which the young Emperor hurried out proclamations to his army and his navy, letting the one to the people follow later, would have removed it. The whole tone of his essay-like order to his army, with its expression of a desire to occupy first the attitude of "war lord," is ominous. Being thus forewarned, signs of willingness on the part of the new Emperor to refrain from pursuing projects of glory on the battle-field will be hailed with the more pleasure. But it would be folly not to see that no such military note as this young monarch's has been struck on the accession of any European sovereign for many years.—[N. Y. Times.

A Novel Railway.

Mr. E. Moody Boynton, of Newburyport, Mass., has invented what is known as the bicycle railway, and expects to revolutionize the entire railway system of the world. A locomotive which is unlike any heretofore constructed is being built. It is designed specially and solely for service on the new railroad. The cardinal principle of the railroad is that the tracks are not both laid on the ground as we commonly see them. One is laid on the ground and the other is laid on the underside of the framework, which is above and directly over the lower track. The engine and cars have wheels on the bottom and double trucks above. In this way the whole is steadier on the rail, and cannot fall over nor off the track. It is expected that great speed will be attained on account of the comparative lightness of the train, and also because of the loss of friction. The idea is patented in every country in Europe, as well as in the United States and other nations of the Western Hemisphere.

Grace Greenwood says that all Parisian women are not frivolous, and more than all Beston women are profound. She does not believe that Anglo Saxons enjoy a monopoly of home virtues and practical piety, and she does believe that the great majority of French wives are loyal, French mothers tender, French grandmothers and elderly maiden ladies devout.

AGRICULTURE.

DUCKS.

While they may enjoy it, at the same time it is not strictly necessary that ducks should have a pond of water to play in. Any of the good breeds of ducks will thrive if they can have all the good fresh water they can drink without having a supply to swim and play in. They can, by supplying plenty of feed, be kept growing and if desired can be ready for market when not over three months old. With plenty of feed and water, ducks grow very rapidly and can be sold early. If kept after they are matured the feathers should be picked regularly as the feathers that can be secured are well worth the trouble of feeding and caring for them. While they eat more than chickens yet they are great foragers and will manage to pick up a good part of their living if given an opportunity. They are much hardier than chickens or turkeys and less liable to disease, and after they get well started to grow they are less trouble than almost any other kind of poultry. While for the table they can not be excelled.

REMEDY FOR APPLE TREE BORERS.

The entomologist of the Ohio experiment station advises one and the same remedy for both the round headed and flat headed borers and bark lice that so injuriously affect the trunks of apple trees. The remedy is a wash made by mixing one quart of soft soap or one pound of hard soap with two gallons of boiling hot water and then adding a pint of crude carbolic. This mixture should be applied late in May and again three weeks later with a scrub brush to the trunk and larger branches of the tree. If the bark is rough it ought to be scraped before the wash is applied. No cracks in the bark at the base of the trunk where the insects can enter should be missed in the application, as the sole object is to prevent the laying of the eggs from which the grubs are hatched.

REMARKABLE SHOWING FOR MORMONDOM.

The great bulk of the people of Utah are agriculturists. Their possessions are in lands and herds. The statistics show that 90 per cent. of Mormon families own their own homes. There is no other community on earth which will make a like showing. There is not an almshouse, or the necessity for one, in any of the exclusively Mormon settlements. With the exception of the mines, every other industry in Utah is kept alive by Mormon labor and Mormon patronage. The Mormons supply the most reliable non-striking class of laborers in the whole intermountain region.

NOTES.

The State of Sonora, Mex., levies a tax of $2 on every baby born within its limits, and charges the farmer 5 cents for every chicken he raises and 50 cents for every sheep.

The total exports of apples from the United States and Canada for 1887 were 608,588 barrels, as against 811,410 barrels for 1886-7. About one-half the shipments were made to Liverpool.

A farmer in South Carolina is said to have followed the plow for sixty-eight years. There is something to admire in the humble but useful life of such a man. He never waited for anything to turn up, but went faithfully and uncomplainingly to work and turned it up himself, and continued to turn it up.

In England the silo, in ensilage making, is being dispensed with, and the fodder properly stacked, roofed and weighted or screwed down—after heating—comes out in excellent condition. A common practice, also, is that of alternating the layers of fodder with those of cut straw, the latter absorbing during fermentation a portion of the fodder aroma, and thus becoming softened and more digestible.

One of the most serious hindrances in onion growing is the onion maggot, the larva of a small fly resembling the house fly, but smaller. No positive remedy is known, but it is a common belief among gardeners that when the maggot becomes troublesome it is a good plan to change the land, which otherwise would not be done, for, unlike cabbage and many other crops, onions thrive well year after year on the same land.

It is always bad policy to crop bearing orchards, and one reason for this is that it generally prevents their pasturing by pigs, which are the best scavengers for destroying wormy-fruit, with its contents. The apples in our markets would be fairer if pigs had the range of apple orchards, and the pigs themselves would be more healthful food. If not ringed, pigs will give an orchard all the ploughing it needs, with no danger or injury to tree roots.

A careful examination of the corn field at various times has convinced Superintendent Graham, of the Kansas Agricultural College, that the burning of corn stalks and weeds to kill chinch bugs is a waste of time. The bugs do not hide in the fodder, the cornstubs or the weeds, but do hide very close to the roots of the grass. Burning the grass does not destroy many of them, because the grass is damp near the surface of the ground and the fire does not reach them. The question of the proper disposal of our surplus chinch-bugs seems yet to remain an open one.

Each owner of a garden may have abundant raspberries. Cuthbert for red, and Gregg for black, will, in most sections, give entire satisfaction. The descriptions of new varieties read well, and the illustrations are captivating, but the largest yield after all is from such as the above. Dig the soil thoroughly, manure freely, and do not crowd the plants. Set the reds very shallow, and the blacks deep. Partial shade is no detriment, and a slight mulch in hot weather beneficial. Cut away the old canes as soon as the crop is gathered. A horizontal cheap trellis is better than tying closely to single stakes.

Military Efficiency of France.

The military ability of France, and her system of fortification, are splendidly developed, especially when one considers the shifting policies of the war department under her peculiar administration of republicanism. It may be said, however, that each new minister, urged on by the national feeling, has accelerated rather than abated or suspended improvement. For five years following the re-establishment of the republic, the national assembly spent much of its time in supplementing the organic laws of '72, which were copied in the main from those of Prussia. Universal liability to arms, non-substitution, and the abolishment of paid enlistment, are the first features of the modern military statutes. Liability to service in the actives or reserves, extends from 20 to 40 years. The annual contingent is divided into two categories, the first serving three in active army. Since Boulanger's time in the reserve, and the second only one year in the years with the colors, and two years in the war office—and the subtle inspiration of his policy is now becoming manifest—the enlistments have been localized. In consequence of this concession, thousands of trained soldiers, armed for revolution as well as war are caserned at their own firesides, which enables them to balance their interest between subjects of home politics, and trainings for national defense. Including the Gendarmerie and Garde Republicaine, France has at present a peace footing of 525,711 men. Deducting vacancies, absentees, and sick, the total would be about 566,000, The territorial force, officers and men, is about 590, making the total active 1,155,000. The German authorities narrow the total war force of France to something less than 5,000,000, both Hennebert and Froment, who are perhaps the best authorities on the subject, approximate it at over 4,100,000.

Dr. Dennis Campbell, of Hamilton, died on Saturday afternoon from the effects of a dose of arsenate of cooper, taken by mistake.

It is reported that Dr. Mackenzie was snubbed by Emperor William on Tuesday and thereafter left Berlin quickly and quietly.

The steam lighter Louise, fifty-five feet long, undecked, and with but a foot of free board, left Liverpool two weeks ago bound for Benguela, in southwest Africa, 5,000 miles away. She draws three feet of water only, steams four knots an hour, and carries four Portuguese sailors and an English captain.

SEVEN MEN HELD UP THE TRAIN.

The Express Messenger Surprised—One Man Killed and Others Wounded.

The south-bound Missouri, Kansas and Texas express was robbed about 9 o'clock the other night at Verdigris Bridge, I. T. The train had stopped at the bridge to put off some baggage and had just started to pull out when the engineer was covered by a revolver and the express car was entered. The express messenger was taken by surprise, as, it being a very warm night, the side door was open. Before he could close it two men entered the car and robbed him of $8 and one valuable package.

One shot was fired into the mail car, the bullet passing through the left arm of Charles Colton, the mail agent. Two shots were fired at the front of the smoking car, one going through the right fore-arm of Harry Ryan, the train "butcher." The other struck a passenger named Ben. C. Tarver in the left cheek and, passing backward, broke his neck, causing instant death.

The wounded and dead were brought to this place, but the mail agent went south. His was a flesh wound.

Deputy Marshal Tyson and posse are preparing to give pursuit as soon as they can cross the Arkansas River. There were seven men engaged in the robbery. No effort was made to rob the passengers. The dead man's home was Rosebud, Tex. He was a single man, and was going home from a trip to Chicago. The leader of the robbers gave his name as Capt. Jack. Some of them were masked.

The German Reichstag was opened with pomp and brilliancy. The Emperor, in his opening speech, dwelt upon Germany's pacific intentions. He said his policy was simply to ward off attack, and not to acquire military glory.

At a recent meeting of the Bundesrath Prince Bismarck laid special stress on the peaceful character of the political situation, and intimated that the Government would adhere to the principles which had hitherto guided their policy.

JOHN C. MCINTYRE, who has been in bad health for a year or more, died Thursday afternoon, and was buried at Black's cemetery on Saturday, a very large concourse of sorrowing friends following his remains to the grave. He was very highly respected, a man of sterling worth, a warm friend and an estimable citizen. Few men in this township were so highly respected. He leaves two daughters, aged six and eight years; his wife died six years ago.

LOST TWO FINGERS.—The Wallacetown correspondent of the Journal writes: A serious and painful accident happened to Mr. Jacob Moss, of this village, yesterday. He was working in the mills of Schleihauf Bros., running the edging saw, when a board slipped throwing his left hand on the saw, cutting it badly. He was taken to the office of Dr. Ling, who found it necessary to amputate his middle and little fingers, binding the others up with the hope of saving them. The accident is the more painful from the fact that he has scarcely recovered from the severe accident which befel him in the latter part of last winter, by having his foot broken to pieces by a saw log falling on it. He had so far recovered from the first accident as to get married on July 4th to Miss Gaydon, of Port Talbot. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Chance, of St. Peter's church, Tyrconnell.

FIRE AT WEST LORNE.—On Saturday afternoon the grain warehouse at West Lorne, owned by J. C. Schleihauf, took fire and was completely destroyed, together with the M. C. R. cattle pen and 400 feet of lumber. A family were living in the warehouse, and it is supposed the fire started from a defective stovepipe.

KILLED IN MONTANA.—Mrs. B. F. Honsinger Saturday evening received a telegram from Missoula, Montana, conveying intelligence of a sad and fatal accident which happened to her brother, Alfred Urlin. The unfortunate young man who is well known in this city, and is a brother to Messrs. A. D. Urlin, of Wallacetown, and Will Urlin, of Dutton, was a passenger on a train on the Northern Pacific, which was derailed near Missoula, and he and another passenger, a lady member of a theatrical company, were buried beneath the overturned coach and received severe internal injuries. They were taken to the hospital at Missoula, and when the telegram was sent by Mr. Urlin's wife the doctors had no hopes of the recovery of either of the injured. —Monday's Times.

THE Salvation Army had a big time on Monday at their banquet and jubilee. Two or three arrived on Saturday and a large number from various quarters on Monday. They marched through Main street at six, and then repaired to the barracks for tea which was served between six and 8 o'clock, and partaken of by a large number. After tea the audience repaired to the skating rink were speaking and singing were indulged in. The rules and regulations of the army were read, and a number who have lately made a profession joined their ranks. They again returned to the barracks and had another feast and then a few hours of prayer which lasted until the early hours of the morning. Since the Army came to Dutton much good has apparently been done which, it is to be hoped, will be lasting.

THE Dutton correspondent of the Journal must have very bad ailments. His article, dated the 7th, appeared in Tuesday's paper stating that "Owing to a foolish paragraph in a local newspaper, stating, without any authority for doing so, that a fee would be charged all presenting themselves for entrance examination, the number writing here was very much less than at former examinations." In stating that we did so without any authority, we say that he manufactures the falsehood, not us, and we will not gratify him enough to state from what source we got our information; although when informed that there was no fee attached we made the correction promptly and we believe the examination was not affected in the least. The scribe takes up our correction to fight a battle agains the wind. We suppose he thinks he is firing from behind the screens. If the scribe of misery will call upon one of our local doctors he can get a dose of physic. We suppose this will call forth the scribe again, but we do not purpose going into any debate, considering it only our duty to state the case in its true light.

SURPRISE AND PRESENTATION.

J. Short, who has so efficiently taught in our High School for the past year, was waited on at his boarding-house on Friday evening by the other teachers and scholars who presented him with a writing case and the following address:—

JAMES SHORT, ESQ., B.A.:

DEAR TEACHER,—We, the pupils of Dutton High School, desire on this the occasion of your departure to offer an expression of our gratitude to you for the innumerable acts of kindness you have shown us during the time you have acted as our teacher and friend. We also desire to convey our sincere thanks for the constant zeal and interest you have ever manifested in our intellectual advancement, and we further wish to express our unqualified regret at your separation from us; yet, while we feel that not only ourselves but this school sustains a very great loss in your departure, we rejoice in the knowledge that your future success is assured in whatever sphere of action you choose to engage. In conclusion we respectfully ask you to accept of this writing case and album as a slight memento of our esteem and regard, yet think not that our feelings can find expression in gifts. We trust, however, that in future years this slight token may assure you that you are still held dear in our memory.

Signed on behalf of the scholars.

Mr. Short was completely taken by surprise, and it was some time before he could respond. He thanked the pupils for the handsome presents and for the kindness they had shown to him since coming among them. Speeches were made by Messrs. Rothwell, Suffel, and Logan. Mr. Short leaves this week much to the regret of the school, for fields unknown at present.

B. SEARLE, Teacher.

S. S. No. 10, Dunwich, is to be congratulated on the great success which attended its picnic held on the 29th ult., in the beautiful woods of Mr. Peter McPherson, near Campbellton. Although the day before was so unfavorable the people came from all directions until the woods were full and the mosquitoes had to beat a hasty retreat. Two large tables were set, and fairly groaned under the delicacies that came from the north, south, east and west. They were a credit to the ladies of the section. Mr. A. McRae, of Glencoe, had a booth on the grounds, and furnished ice cream, candies and thin drinks of all descriptions. After all had done ample justice to the inner man, Mr. D. K. McPherson ascended the platform as chairman, and dispensed with an interesting as well as entertaining programme. The 26th Battalion Band, of Glencoe, were engaged for the day, and Mr. McMillan, of Dutton, enlivened the proceedings with several selections on the bagpipes. Speeches were delivered by our worthy chairman, Dr. Dobie, late of Toronto; Dr. Ruthven, of Wallacetown; Mr. A. McLean, of Glencoe; Mr. Forbes and Mr. James Beatty. Recitations by Masters Buchanan, McEachren, Crawford, McCallum, Hood and Kerr. Music was furnished by Mr. Gordon, Mr. A. McMillan, Misses Hood, Misses Searle, Mr. McGeachy and the school. After the programme was ended the young people finished the day by swinging and other amusements. All then returned to their respective homes fully satisfied with the day's enjoyment, but feeling that one of the happiest afternoons of their lives was numbered with the past.

No Universal Remedy
has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,
which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.
Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.
That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.
All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.
Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

A FACT WORTH REMEMBERING.

Bodily health and vigor may be maintained in the heat of summer, as in the winter months, if the blood is purified and vitalized with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Every person who has used this remedy has been greatly benefited. Take it this month.
It is reported that J. M. Kennedy, late of the Essex Centre Liberal, will shortly take up his abode in Wallaceburg as editor of the Herald or a brand new paper.
The unsurpassed facilities possessed by the Michigan Central for handling large crowds was well illustrated Friday. The excursion from points on Canadian Division, which arrived, Friday, numbered very nearly 5,000 people. The seventy-three coaches required to bring this vast crowd to Detroit were divided into five trains, and all were handled without accident and without perceptibly interfering with the regular running of the road.—Detroit Free Press.
Mr. Rock Bailey, of Union, who advertised in the Journal a short time ago as to the whereabonts of a girl he had taken from Miss Rye's home, and who had run away from his place, has succeeded in finding the runaway. He found the girl living with a poor family of the name of Welsh, living in a shanty in the woods, three-and-a-half miles beyond Rodney. Mr. Bailey has been put to considerable trouble and expense through the girl leaving home on several occasions, and, as he has found out that the people who had her before were served in a like manner he will return her to Miss Rye.
ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.
The community of the northwestern portion of London were thrown into a ferment of excitement and indignation Friday by the announcement that a wretch, James Belben, had outraged public decency by an attempted criminal assault on the 11-year old daughter, of Milo Jaynes, residing on Maitland street, between Princess and Central avenues. Beldon, it appears, had frequently attempted to entice little girls away in the vicinity and became an object of terror to the children in neighborhood. About noon yesterday Mr. Jaynes' liitle girl, in company with several others, ran into the house and told her father of the attempted assault. Mr. Jaynes, who is suffering from a lame back, at once ran out into the lane adjoining his property and beheld the wretch in question exposed in a most revolting manner. This so enraged the father that in spite of his disability he sprang at Beldon, who, however evaded his clutch, and made off, followed in hot pursuit by Mr. Jaynes, several other men in the neighborhood joining in the chase, but at last reports, Beldon was still at large.
The reigning sensation at Stratford is the sudden flight of Chief of Police Herrington on Friday afternoon. For a month past reports have been circulated connecting the chief's name with a number of married women and others. He was warned by his friends to beware lest he get himself into a trap, but replied that he had arrived at the age of discretion and was capable of taking care of himself. Charges have been formulated against Herrington for neglect of duty, and he obtained leave of absence to go to London, where, he said, he could procure evidence that would exonerate him. The same afternoon a Mrs. Henry, wife of a city rag merchant, left her home saying that she would be back in a short time, but boarded the same train as the chief. Mrs. Henry is a fine-looking woman, and a mother of two little girls, aged 2 and 6. The chief has been twice married, has a grown up family by his first wife and a child of three summers by his present wife. No trace has yet been received by the runaway couple.

WELL TESTED.
"I was nearly dead with cholera morbus, one bottle of extract of Wild Strawberry cured me, and at another time I was so bad with summer complaint that I thought I would never get over it, when two bottles cured me." Mrs. E. Askett, Peel, Ont.

HORSE MAXIMS.
Use the curry-comb lightly. When used roughly it is a source of great pain.
Let the horse have some exercise every day, otherwise he is liable to fever and bad feet.
Let the heels be well brushed out every night. Dirt if allowed to cake in causes grease and sore heels.
Whenever a horse is washed, never leave him till he is rubbed quite dry. He will probably get a chill if neglected.
Change the litter partially in some parts and entirely in others every morning; brush out and clean the stall thoroughly.
When a horse comes off a journey, the first thing is to walk him about till cool, if he is brought in hot. This prevents him from taking cold.
Let the horse's litter be dry and clean underneath as well as the top. Standing on hot fermented manure makes the hoof soft and brings on lameness Never allow any one to tickle your horse in the stable. The animal only feels the torment, and does not understand the joke. Vicious habits are are easily brought on.
Let his legs be well rubbed by hand. Nothing so soon removes strain. It also detects thorns and splinters, soothes the animal, and enables him to feel comfortable.
Let your horse stand loose, if possible, without being tied up to the manger. Pain and weariness from a continued position induce bad habits, and causes swollen feet.
To produce a good coat on your horse, use plenty of rubbiug and brushing. Plenty of "elbow gease" opens the pores, softens the skin, and promotes the general health.—Rural Canadian Notes.
Carrots are capital things to give horses suffering from worms, mixed with their ordinary food, says the English Live Stock Journal. In the way of medicine for round or needle worms, santonine, turpentine, calomel, and tartar emetic, followed by a physic ball containing aloes or sulphate of iron in their food, continued for a considerable time in from one to two drachm doses daily, have been found effectual in many cases. For tape worms, areca nut, turpentine, male fern, kousso, and sulpate of iron are some of the best medicines.

MURDERED BY MORMONS.
AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S STORY OF LIFE IN UTAH.—FOUR DAYS WITHOUT FOOD.
CHICAGO, July 16.—A woman giving her name as Elizabeth Turnbull Rutler formerly from England, was picked up in the street aparently fainting from hunger. She claimed to have had nothing to eat during a four days trip from Ogden on her way to England. She told a terrible story of her experience among the Mormons. Her son, she stated, had been induced against the wish of his parents to join a party of emigrants organized by Mormon missionaries in England. Not hearing from him it was learned he had been prevented from writing by the elders. The father frantic with anxiety, followed to Utah. He found employment with a Mormon farmer named Joseph Holbert, but was unable to save enough to continue the search until he pretended to join the church. Then Rutler got money and sent some to his wife, but all letters telling of the condition of affairs in Utah, were intercepted and others substituted urging to come to Utah with the missionaries. She obeyed, and claimed the women in the party were subjected to fearful indignities en rout by the elders.
Rutler was murdered shortly after she joined him. He had inadvertantly given a young Mormon an inkling of his plans to find his boy and escape. The Mormons asserted that Rutler's death was accidental. The womon was defrauded out of her husband's savings, but fleeing to Ogden she earned enough money by working in a hotel to pay her passage home. The amount of railroad fares was larger than she expected, but sooner than delay longer she deprived herself food on the journey to Chicago.

Married without License.
It is becoming well-settled that the marriage license law of Michigan is a weak institution. When a person who desires to be married calls at the county clerk's office, the first question asked is: "Where do you live?"
If the party or parties live in Michigan, then a marriage license must be procured to be entered on record. But if neither party lives in Michigan, a marriage license is unecessary, and parties are entirely at liberty to marry without one. This is the authority of Attorney-General Taggart, and under his printed instuctions has been followed by all Michigan county clerks.
A couple of Canadian excursionests, named Adam Long and Jennie Pettit, were on Friday married in the county clerk's office by Justice Gibson. No marriage license was found necessary in their case, because both live in St. Thomas, Ont.—Detroit Free Press.

A small boy who had happened to bruise his leg said to his mother: "Oh, mamma, how awfully it must hurt to be a colored man." Hurt my dear? What do you mean?" "Why don't you know, I tumbled down this morning and made the black spot on my leg, and it's just as sore as it can be all the time."
A writer says he once had a very valuable heifer was an exceeding vicious kicker. To cure her of the habit, he put a common garden hoe end in front of her off hind leg, and behind and above the gambrel joint of the nigh hind leg. Then sitting down on the right to milk, he put the handle of the hoe well up under the arm and began milking. The heifer could not stir either hind leg, and after one week could be milked safely without fettering, and proved to be a valuable and gentle animal.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.
Since January 1 over 40,000 intending settlers have arrived in Canada.
A. J. Streetor, of Illinois, has accepted the nomination for President of the United States by the Union Labor party.
Another crank named Flack lost his life on Wednesday last while trying to go through the rapids at Niagara in a lifeboat.
The harvest has been fairly commenced in Ontario county, a good deal of barley having been cut in East Whitby and Darlington last Friday and Saturday. The yield is fair, the heads being heavy.
FIVE HUNDRED LIVES LOST.—A dispatch from Cape Town, Africa, says the Debeers coal mine at Kimberly caught fire. Eight hundred men were entombed, and it is believed that out of that number 300 will perish. Many of the victims imprisoned in the mines are white people.
SKEENE RIVER INDIANS IN REVOLT.—The Indians at Skeene River are in revolt. Constables were sent a few days ago to capture an Indian murderer. He resisted, shots were fired and two Indians killed. The Indians are greatly excited and threaten to exterminate the whites. The constables have fortified the Hudson Bay post at Harleton, where they hope to hold out until reinforcements are sent.
At the elections in Manitoba on Wednesday last the Liberals swept everything before them. The Conservatives carried only five constituencies, while the Reformers rejoiced in the election of 33 of their number. This rapid change is due to the decided stand the people of the Northwest took in regard to their right to build new railways in opposition to the C.P.R., and which the Federal Givernment disallowed for some time.

A burn or cut will heal quickly and leave less scar if Victoria Carbolic Salve is applied at once.

THOSE who are indebted to this office either on subscription or otherwise would oblige by calling and settling.

A contemporary very pointedly asks why the farmer who keeps sheep should not take the children into partnership and give them charge of the flock. The proceeds may be divided equally, or the children might have the whole. It is a small thing to do, but a great thing to be done, for it interests the young folks, gives them some business to occupy and train their minds, teaches the value of industry, care and thoughtfulness, and the use of money.

CHINESE JELLY.
SIXTEEN CELESTIALS BOILED DOWN, CANNED AND SENT TO CHINA.
NEW YORK, July 13.—The remains of sixteen dead Chinamen, packed in tin boxes, were shipped by the National Express today for Cathay, China. A firm of celestial philanthropists assembled together some time ago and made a tour of the States to collect the bones of their deceased compatriots and ship them back to China. They started from San Francisco some months ago in search of the heathen dead. They went to Los Angeles, to Denver, Kansas City Wheeling, Pittsburg, Beaver Falls, Philadelphia and New York, and collected in all 215 remains. In each city they first located the graves of their friends, and carefully exhumed. Buried as the bodies were in ordinary Caucasian coffins the difficulty of transporting them seemed great, and the expense appalling. Some proposed to ship all the boiled flesh in one barrel, and the bones in a big packing case, but the idea was scouted on account of the difficulty that would attend the division of the material among mourning relatives at home. So it was agreed to stew every man separately, and to boil him down to the smallest possible space imaginable so as to set in jelly when cold. Square tins suitable for holding one boiled body each were obtained, and the remains were corked so as to fit exactly. It was found that a Chinaman's corpse could be boiled down so as to average about 35 pounds, and that is what was done with all of them, big and little alike.

Whether from swampy land or stagnant pool, or from the deadly gases of the city sewers, malarial poisons are the same. Ayer's Ague Cure, taken according to directions, is a warrented specific for malarial disorders.

HAGYARD'S YELLOW OIL CURES RHEUMATISM
FREEMAN'S WORM POWDERS
Are pleasant to take. Contain their own Purgative. Is a safe, sure and effectual destroyer of worms in Children or Adults.

The Reason Why
Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.
In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:
"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."
Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.
Dyspepsia
and Constipation are almost universal Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:
"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."
The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

ON A COWCATCHER.

A Fifty Miles' Run on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

By the Rev. Alexander A. Boddy, F. R. G. S., Vicar of All Saints', Monkwearmouth, author of "Kairwan, the Holy," "Scenes in Mohamedan Africa.

Ding-dong, ding-dong, ding-dong,
We hurry along.

So sang the English yeoman in his well-known wedding song, but he little thought how aptly he described the locomotive of this great continent. It was remarked on board the steamship Adriatic as we were coming across the "pond," "You will hear that sound (alluding to the ship's bell) all over the American continent wherever there is a track." To an Englishman it seems as if daily services or funerals were constantly being held, for the tolling of brazen bells of trains approach the stations or crossings has an English church-like sound. I take my seat in the cabin of Engine 205, the "engineer" sends the locomotive forward, panting out black balloons of thick sooty smoke from the "smoke stack;" the fireman pulls the long line which swings the great brass bell hanging near the whistle; we pass the level crossing, where buckboards and slatcarts are kept in hand, as the horses nervously gaze on the fiery monster, and then we are off on our journey.

Where are we going to? Permit me to tell you. We are in Eastern Canada, in the province of Quebec. We have just left Lennoxville station, and are passing through the "city" (300 inhabitants). The reason, however, for Lennoxville being well known, even in Europe, is because of its University, and because of its containing perhaps the best public school in Canada. That fine pile of buildings on the left of the line, and rising from the banks of two rivers—the Saint Francis and Massawippi—contains lecture rooms, hall, chapel, houses for professors and rooms for students, and dormitories for the boys. The Principal is our old friend Dr. Adams, whom we miss so much from the Gateshead High School for boys.

But where are we going to? To the "end of the iron." The Canadian Pacific Railway which engirds so large a section of this earth is now completing a short cut to the Atlantic from Montreal, which will save perhaps 300 miles in the trans-continental journey to the Pacific shore. Unfortunately the State of Maine (U. S. A.) runs up into Canada on the east in an objectionably aggressive manner, and we have to cross American territory in order to get a short cut to Halifax. Wonder of wonders the Government of Canada which has aided the Canadian Pacific Railway on its own soil goes still further and heavily subsidizes it even when built in an alien country!

I am journeying, then, from the Province of Quebec over the mountains and down into the wilds of Maine, the home of the caribou, the land of the moose. Pant-pant, whiff-whoff, ding-dong, creak, wheeze, and we roar through the covered bridge over Massawippi's brown flood and through the cutting. Friendly handkerchiefs are shaken over a gate, and then we are in the forest charging along a winding avenue of Canadian firs. Birds fly out of the way as we make 144 revolutions per minute of our driving wheel (5 feet 8 in. in diameter). We are going about 30 miles an hour. For the sake of those who are not familiar with Canada, I will continue to describe the journey until I take my seat above the "cowcatcher."

Panting as we climb up grades, and smoothly dashing on down grades, we soon see the houses of a village in the open country before us, and the gilt spire of its church, and then pass a yoke of patient oxen ploughing or stone-drawing. I set the bell a-swinging as we roll along so slow, for I love to hear it ringing as over the track we go, "Johnville, Johnville," "All aboard, all aboard." We rattle along, and at Bulwer we have the excitement of getting a freight car on to the track. It had run of at the switch. Here the ends of the two lines are moved instead of pointed tongues of metal as at home. "Three cars," sings the fireman—"two cars," "half a car," "just a little mite." These are instructions to the engineer as to the distance he is to send on his engineer. "Draw pin." Then the engine is detached from the train, and with a good pull reinstates the long goods waggon on the track. These freight cars are from 50 to 60 feet long. Away we hurry in the brilliant sunshine. Leaving Cookshire, we dash through the long wooden bridge over the river. I say through the bridge, because the bridges over the river in this neighborhood have roofs and sides to keep out the snow in the winter time. They are like long barns, but with no planks on the floor joists, so that you look from the engine through the ties to the rushing river beneath. Where the line is exposed in the open country, high boardings are erected to catch the drifting snow; they look like advertising boardings without placards upon them.

For three hours we journey along, stopping at country stations, where fresh-looking Canadians crowd the low platform, and curious vehicles drive through the surrounding clearing. The sun gets lower, and as we travel east the long shadow of the engine travels before us on the track, or ripples through the fir trees as we circle round a curve.

Nearly seven o'clock it is when Lake Megantic bursts upon us from the valley behind the woods on our right. Fir-clad hills fold this exquisite mirror in their embrace, and the sunset hues blaze on its sheet from orange to silver steel.

Ice floes and floating timber fill some of the bays. Violet cloudlets float high above the snow-streaked mountains. Fir trees on the crest of the western hills stand out in dark relief silhouetted against the sunset sky. The river, rushing swiftly from the lake, has burst its bonds, and tears round the railway bridge. Red hot water seems to flow amidst the ice and logs, for the sky reflected gleams through them as through a network. To-night, in a wooden French Canadian hostelry, on a creaking bedstead; to-morrow on a cowcatcher to the "end of the iron." What is a cowcatcher? Well, as you never see one in the old country, I must explain. It is a sort of a gird-like plough fastened to the front of the engine, or nearly scraping the rails, so that if the train meets with any movable obstruction, it shall be pushed on one side. A fallen tree, a flock of sheep, an exploring pig, a cariboo, or even a "grizzly" would be probably sent to the right about by this contrivance. It does not strictly catch cows, It rather "does" for them, and flings them suddenly into the ditch.

Next morning the train was well under way for the mountain when I opened the front window of the engine cabin and let the crisp morning air dash in as we rolled up the side of the lovely Lake Megantic.

"I am going along to the cowcatcher," said I to the engine driver, and the answer only was a grim smile. Squeezing through the narrow opening I was outside now, holding on to the long brass rod fastened to the boiler. The engine rolled and jumped as we banged along, but, holding on tightly, I passed forward and stepped down on to the iron shelf above the cow-grid. Here was a huge, thick rope with iron hooks coiled like a great boa-constrictor and ready to be used in parallel shunting. On these coils I sat me down, holding on tightly to one of the lamp holders, and resting my right heel on the link of a stout iron rod.

To enable the engines to shunt trucks and carriages there is an enormous strong bar fastened in front, as thick as a muscular man's arm. It is fastened to the centre of the buffer plank by a correspondingly stout link, and when not in action this stout rod lies down the front of the catcher.

I was told the day previously the train had run into a span of oxen crossing the line, and that this rod had speared and transfixed one ox and carried it for half a mile and it was so firmly fastened to the locomotive that they had to stop the train and cut it away.

You will see that incidents of this nature might be distressingly inconvenient for the occupant of the particular seat that I had taken, and I allow that it was unwise of me to fall asleep there as I did that afternoon for a short time. Now, I must exert any descriptive powers I can conjure up to enable you to take a seat with me on the front of this Canadian railway engine. The unclouded sun beats down but we cannot feel it; for, as we fly along through space, we cut our way through the still air at so great a speed that it becomes a gale. Cold and icy is this wind, for the forest glades on either side of the line are still deep with the winter's snow. Though we see the heat glimmer dancing above the track before us, when we come to the spot we only feel a passing luke-warm breath, and all is cold again until we pull up, and then the fierce sun blazes and scorches, and frizzles with all his might. But now we are rattling along at full speed. I feel that the whole train is behind me, and that I am leading the way.

The long line of rails stretches ahead through the forest, but every moment the scene is changing, and new beauties ahead are evolving themselves out of the mountains. Like a huge monster devouring miles of iron tape, so it is with us, the long rails come flying towards one and then disappear beneath the engine. Great birds fly screaming athwart our track as we charge along, thundering out in agony our gasping blasts of spark and soot.

My steed seems to have life and to be filled with a yearning to outstrip anything which nature can produce; sometimes we fly in comparative silence as we shoot along down grades, but then we puff and toil as we pant and struggle along steep up grades; we creak and jar as we whizz round sharp curves; with a bound we lead over chasms as we are held up by skeletons of wood. Oh! those trestle bridges? Well for the occupants of the comfortable cars reading their papers, that they see not the view from the cowcatcher.

Here is a trestle bridge coming! Lean forward, my friend, while you hold tightly to the iron frame. Look down there through the sleepers; see the rushing brown river tearing at the rocks, and hear the roar of the rapids. What is to save us if any one of those wooden beams, creaking under our weight, snaps or is crushed out of position? Ah! you breathe freely, for we are over now, and dash again into the forest; but we do not forget trestle bridges.

We shall be able to picture the scene next time we read in our papers of the plunging cars toppling one after another, and the drowning, and the burning, and the crushing of fair human lives. Nothing else will I raise my pen against, but it must shower out in splutterings of indignation against trestle bridges, even it its holder is ignorant and partially unjust. Just one question to those in power on the American continent: How is it that, with all their defects, the European lines rarely have bridge accidents? The answer must undoubtedly be because we spend more money over our bridges, and you of the western continent could do the same, even if it was inconvenient.

We slacken speed, the whistle gives a great echoing cry. White new wooden sheds are seen in an opening of the fir forest. Backwoodsmen and women and children come down and smile as they see a man with a notebook writing on the cowcatcher. As the train stops I slide off and watch the passengers alight and their baggage set down on the edge of the forest. As some hunting is to be done, I walk along to examine the boundary between the British Dominions and the United States of America. It is a square cast-iron post about a yard above the ground. Upon two sides appear in relief, "Boundary, August 9, 1842." On the States side are the words: "Albert Smith, United States Commissioner," and on the other side: "Lieut.-Col. B. B. Estcourt, H. B. Commissioner." A tattered "Star and Stripes" hung sadly from a rude pole which some one had lashed to the boundary post.

In 1842, the commissioner cut a track through the forest forty feet wide all along the boundary, from peak to peak, and across the intervening valleys. Every quarter of a mile one of these posts was placed halfway between a square granite stone.

The bell rings, and as the engine gives its first pant I step on to the catcher and swing into my place again. Now and while train dashes down into the United States of America. Two minutes ago we were amenable to British law; now we must do as President Cleveland tells us. It is all down grade now to the end of the line, and about midday we come to the engineer's camp, and are soon enjoying a homely meal in a log hut. Thousands of men are spending their days in the forest battling with mosquitoes and other troubles, but pushing on bravely the work of completing the last link in the chain which holds together the British Dominions in North America. The men all come from Canada. The new law which forbids anyone who is in a foreign land to be hired in order to come into the States to work prevents the railway company from bringing their men in Canada to work here. Instead, they discharge them at the other side of the boundary and give them a ride into the States, and then engage them afresh. Next time I cross the Atlantic I shall probably land at Halifax and travel in a sleeping car over the country I have seen to-day from the cow-catcher.

I finish now. Late in the evening we once more approach my Canadian home, viz., Lennoxville. We trumpet out hoarsely from the booming whistle the news of our return. We swing the brazen bell, and our huge lamp blazes and glares as we fight up the interior of the covered bridge and roll again over Massawippi's swollen flood. I, with memories of Africa, Asia, and Europe still fresh, we shall sing for many a month:—

Way down the Massawippi ribber,
Far far from home,
Dere's where my thoughts are turning ebber,
Dere's where I like to roam.

A Perpetual Railway Pass.

A most singular case came before Judge Allen of the Supreme Court, Boston, for decision. It appears that in 1836, when the Boston and Providence Railroad Company was chartered, Mr. John C. Dodge, of Attleborough, conveyed a portion of his land in consideration that he and his family should ride free over the railroad as long as the land was used for railroad purposes. A granddaughter of Mr. Dodge claims that she is entitled to the privileges named in the deed, and that the word family meant "descendants" of the grantor. The railroad company demurred on the ground that the remedy of the plaintiff, if any, is at law, and not in equity. Judge Allen overruled the demurrer, and expressed an opinion that under the deed the Boston and Providence Railroad Company would be required to carry free the descendants of Mr. Dodge for all time.

The Value of Turpentine.

After a housekeeper fully realizes the worth of Turpentine in the household she is never willing to be without a supply of it. It gives quick relief to burns; it is an excellent application for corns; it is good for rheumatism and sore throats, and it is the quickest remedy for convulsions or fits. Then it is a sure preventative against moths; by just dropping a trifle in the bottom of drawers, chests and cupboards it will render the garments secure from injury during the summer. It will keep ants and bugs from closets and store-rooms by putting a few drops in the corners and upon the shelves; it is sure destruction to bed-bugs, and will effectually drive them away from their haunts, if thoroughly applied to the joints of the bedstead in the spring cleaning time, and injures neither furniture nor clothing. A spoonful of it added to a pail of warm water is excellent for cleaning paint. A little in the suds on washing day lightens laundry labor.

TO EXCAVATE IN BABYLONIA.

A Party of Explorers Going to Study the Mounds in Central Asia.

Dr. John P. Peters, Professor of Hebrew in the University of Pennsylvania; Dr. Harper, instructor in Assyrian at Yale College, and, Mr. J. D. Prince of the class of 1888, Columbia College, have left New York with the purpose of eventually conducting explorations and excavations in Babylonia, middle Asia. They are accompanied by Mr. J. H. Haynes, photographer, and Mr. H. P. Field of Brooklyn, architect.

The only previous expedition of archæological character to Babylonia was the Wolfe expedition of 1884, though French and German savants have long prosecuted their researches in the region. The expenses of Dr. Peters's party will be defrayed by the Babylonian Exploration Fund, which has been subscribed by citizens of Philadelphia. Among the members of the Executive Committee of this fund are Prof. Allen Marquand of Princeton and Mr. Dingley, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. While describing the nature of the expedition to a reporter before leaving Dr. Peters said:

"Babylonia is the general name for the whole region around the city of Babylon. It is a vast plain dotted with mounds, which indicate the burial place of ancient cities. The mound over the city of Babylon is about ten miles square; that over Erach ten square miles. Other mounds are very small, and cover probably only single palaces. Just where we shall excavate, how long we shall stay, and what we shall do with the inscriptions or relics discovered, all depends on the result of negotiations now pending with the Turkish Government. We shall all meet at Aleppo, a four-day ride on horseback six weeks through the mountains with a caravan to Bagdad. We go armed, not so much on account of the brigands, which are not so numerous as formerly, as to protect ourselves from wild beasts. Nights we shall go into camp. I have ordered 1,000 cans of fruits and meats for the journey, so as to break the native fare upon the party gradually. If we work in the sheep-raising section we can get plenty of mutton; otherwise we must live on goat flesh and goat milk. Wheat, I am glad to say, grows wild there, so that we need not want for something like bread. The Arabs, who will do the excavating proper, will be paid ten or twenty cents a day. Their work is correspondingly bad. If we make large excavations we shall employ two, three, or four, hundred. The picks and shovels we take with us. As an experiment I have also ordered six wheelbarrows, though the natives always work with baskets. I may have the experience of the man who first tried to use wheelbarrows in Brazil, where the natives put them on their heads and then piled the things on top of them. We have made all arrangements for one year's work though everything depends on our success and the disposition of the Turkish Government."

Pictue of a Tropical Villa.

The town (Port of Spain, Trinidad,) has between thirty and forty thousand people living in it, and the rain and Johnny crows between them keep off pestilence. Outside is a large savannah or park, where the villas are of the successful men of business. One of these belonged to my host, a cool airy habitation with open doors and windows, over-hanging portico, and rooms into which all the winds might enter, but not the sun. A garden in front was shut off from the savannah by a fence of bananas. At the gate stood as sentinel a cabbage palm a hundred feet high; on the lawn mangoes, oranges, papaws, and bread-fruit trees, strange to look at, but luxuriantly shady. Before the door was a tree of good dimensions, whose name I have forgotten, the stem and branches of which were hung with orchids which G—— had collected in the woods. The borders were blazing with varieties of the single hibiscus, crimson, pink, and fawn colour, the largest that I ever saw. The average diameter of each single flower was rom seven to eight inches. Wind streamed freely through the long sitting-room, loaded with the perfume of orange-trees; on table and in book-case, the hand and mind visible of a gifted and cultivated man.

The particular room assigned to myself would have been equally delightful, but that my possession of it was disputed even in daylight by mosquitoes, who for bloodthirsty ferocity had a bad pre-eminence over the worst that I had ever met with elsewhere. I killed one who was at work upon me, and examined him through a glass. Bewick, with the inspiration of genius, had drawn his exact likeness as the devil—a long black stroke for a body, a nick for a neck, horns on the head, and a beak for a mouth, spindle arms, and longer spindle legs, two pointed wings and a tail. Line for line there the figure was before me which in the unforgetable tailpiece is driving the thief under the gallows, and I had a melancholy satisfaction in identifying him. I had been warned to be on the lookout for scorpions, centipedes, jiggers and land crabs, who would bite me if I walked slipperless over the floor in the dark. Of these I met with none, either there or anywhere; but the mosquito of Trinidad is enough by himself. For malice, mockery and venom of tooth and trumpet, he is without a match in the world.

Feeding the Layers.

The hen as an egg-manu actory must be supplied with the needed raw material. The material should be abundant if the manufactured product is large. It should be of the right character and fed in the right quantity. Anything that will clog up the machinery should be avoided, and anything that will not give the necessary power should be displaced by what will. In plain language, a laying hen should be in good condition—not fat, for then she will lay little; not poor, for then she will lay less.

In grains we believe that oats, wheat, barley and buckwheat are good, while corn is largely to be avoided. Green food in some form is a necessity and young clover is the best of green food. Lean meat every other day is admirable. Meat is one of the best egg foods in existence. Milk, sweet or sour, is exceedingly useful. Oats, fried in fat, will set the hens a cackling. Lime for shells—oyster shells, bones, old mortar, all are good. Occasional and sparing use of condiments may be resorted to—not too much, not too little, but just enough, so as to tone up the system and not in flame it. By the use of all these foods, varied according to need, and fed in the right quantities, fresh eggs in abundance may be had. If they are not forthcoming, buy some new hens. A hen that will not lay with such treatment is making a strong bid for the hatchet, and prefers to fill the market basket with her body to filling it with her eggs. No self-respecting hen will be guilty of such a breach of etiquette, but having partaken of your entertainment and satisfied herself, she will entertain and satisfy you with that most touching thing—to all poultry men—the lay of the hen. She will sing at her work and work as she sings, and eggs will be produced until you begin to believe her a lineal descendant of that famous hen which laid one egg each day and two on Sunday.—[Poultry Yard.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

THE DISCOVERY OF SPECTRUM ANALYSIS.

Shortly before his death the late Dr. Kirchoff, of Berlin, related the true story of the discovery of spectrum analysis. He and Bunsen were then professors at Heidelberg, and kept bachelors' quarters in the well-known "Riesenstein." Upon one of their daily promenades Bunsen remarked: "Kirchoff, we must discover something which will be too simple to be true." They returned and went to work. But years passed by before the discovery was effected. Experimenting one day in his laboratory, Kirchoff happened to place a burning lamp in the rays of the sun. A dark place appeared at once. Thinking it an "optical illusion," he repeated the action, only to find the dark ray reappear and give place to the ordinary ray when the lamp was removed. He called Bunsen. The experiment was repeated many times and always with the same result. They could not explain it. Finally, Bunsen proposed that they go home and "think of other things" for a while; possibly some explanation might be reached. They lolled in their cosy chairs, smoking their long student pipes and talking of the days of their youth and the gossip of the hour. The afternoon had almost passed when Bunsen sprang to his feet with the remark: "Eureka! The flame of the lamp is fed by the same stuff which is burning in the sun!" They hurried back to the laboratory, tried a number of experiments, and the great discovery was made.

THE HUMAN BREATH A POISON.

At a recent meeting of the Academie des Sciences, Professor Brown-Sequard referred to some experiments he had conducted with a view to determine what, if any, were the toxic effects of the human breath. In condensing the watery vapor coming from the human lungs he obtained a poisonous liquid capable of producing immediate death. This is an alkaloid (organic), and not a microbe or series of microbes as might have been imagined. He injected this liquid under the skin of a rabbit, and the effect was speedily mortal. The animal died without convulsions; the heart and large vessels were engorged with reddish blood, contrary to what is observed after ordinary death, when the quantity of blood is moderate and of a dark color. In conclusion, this eminent physiologist said that it was fully proved that respired air contained a volatile toxic principle far more dangerous than the carbonic acid, which was also one of its constituents, and that the human breath, as well as that of animals, contained a highly poisonous agent.—[The Medical Press.

"What's In a Name"?

Shakespeare said there was nothing, but there is. Would Cæsar have had such notoriety if his name had been Caleb W. Pickeragill? Think of Patti drawing $7,000 a night if the bill boards announced her as Jane Brown! The idea is absurd. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets is a name that has made a record. These tiny, sugar-coated pills cure sick and bilious headache, bowel complaints, internal fever and costiveness.

is often the first indication of incipient disease. In such cases the famous "ounce of prevention" is the highest wisdom, and may be found in its most potent form in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which, by its wonderful blood-purifying and invigorating tonic properties, will quickly restore the ebbing vitality, repair and strengthen the system, and thus ward off threatening sickness. Its saving influence reaches every organ of the body.

They "Mean Business."

If any one has ever given Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy a fair trial and has not been cured thereby, the manufacturers of that unfailing Remedy would like to hear from that individual, for when they offer, as they do, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of nasal catarrh which they cannot cure, they mean just exactly what they say. They are financially responsible, and abundantly able, to make good their guarantee if they fail, as any one can learn by making proper enquiry. Remedy sold by all druggists, at 50 cents.

Self-Threading Needles.

One of the latest inventions of interest to ladies is the new patent sewing needle, which is to all appearances like any ordinary needle, but which can be instantly threaded without passing the thread through the eye, and is so simple in operation that even persons who are blind have no difficulty in using them. They are made in England by a well known firm of needle manufacturers, are nicely finished and finely tempered, and do not cut the thread as many do; they are just being introduced here, and sample packets are sent by mail to any address for fifteen cents by the Whiton Manufacturing Company, Toronto, Ontario, and as we know this firm to be thoroughly reliable and the needles not a catch-penny, but a useful and genuine novelty, we would advise our readers to send for them.

THE PHONOGRAPH.

Edison's Latest Invention Tells its Own Story in England.

A London cablegram say: Colonel G. E Gourand, writing from Little Menlo, Upper Norwood, S. E., says: "At two o'clock this afternoon at the above address, I had the honor to receive from Edison his first perfected phonograph, which on the authority of Edison's own statement, in his own familiar voice communicated to me by the phonograph itself, is the first instrument of his latest model that has been seen outside his laboratory or that has left his hands, and is consequently the first to reach this country.

"At 2 65 o'clock, precisely, my family and I were enjoying at once the unprecedented and astounding experience of listening to Edison's own familiar and unmistakable tones here in England—more than 3,000 miles from the place where he had spoken and exactly ten days after, the voice having meanwhile voyaged across the Atlantic ocean. His first phonogram, as Edison puts it, tells me, among other things of interest, that this instrument contains many modifications of that which was shown at the Electrical Club in New York a few weeks ago and so widely reported by the press in several long phonogramic communications to me, no single word of which has it to be repeated in order to be clearly and easily understood by every person present, including my child, seven years old. Edison mentions that he will send me phonograms by every mail leaving New York, and requests me to correspond exclusively through the medium of the phonograph, humorously remarking in this connection upon the advantage he will himself derive from the substitution of phonograms for the style of writing not always too legible.

"Edison has sent, for our amusement, numerous musical records of great interest and beauty, pianoforte, cornet and other instruments, solos, duets, etc., many of which, he tells me, have been frequently repeated several hundred times. Altogether our experiences of to-day have been so delightful and unusual, not to say supernatural, that it would be difficult to realize that we have not been dreaming, and so interesting withal as to make it seem our duty, as it has a pleasure, to communicate the above to your widely read paper, which I have frequently observed to chronicle the works of the author of this unparalleled triumph of mind over matter. All honor to Edison."

Col. Gourand adds the following postscript, which may be interesting: "Add that the above communication was spoken by me into the phonograph and written from phonograph dictation by a member of my family, who had, of course, no previous experience with the instrument."

Take Care of the Apple Trees.

The apple crop in this part of New England is large and small in spots. In a ride of 30 or 40 miles into New Hampshire last fall, we found some orchards laden with a bounteous harvest, while others were almost without fruit. Here and there in the pastures or by the roadside were trees loaded with "natural" fruit, or the ground was covered with the apples, which were allowed to rot.

This is all wrong. To begin with those trees should be grafted with good fruit. They have come up by themselves, and their vigorous bearing and thrift, even in total neglect, show that they have taken root in a good location. Good fall or winter fruit might soon be had from these trees, and at very slight expense.

Then the dropping fruit ought to be picked up every few days. If good for nothing else, it could be fed to the hogs. The object, however, is not so much to save the fruit, as to destroy the worms and fungi, which are bred in the decaying apples.

Scattered about the country, in secluded places, can be found many an apple tree which always bears a large crop of worthless apples—not even fit to make poor cider. The trees would sustain a crop of Baldwins or russets or Hubbardstons equally well, and the farmer or his boys could perform the operation of grafting. Suppose there were danger of somebody's stealing the apples, or that the cows or squirrels should get many of them, the loss in comparison with the present crop would not be increased. There would be a chance to save some good fruit, and there would be an inducement to care for the tree, and make it a sightly object, instead of a blemish.

The Panama Canal.

The Engineering News publishes an article on the "Actual Status of the Panama Canal," giving the results of a recent expert examination of the entire length of the canal, and accompanied by a progress profile, showing the amount of work done and undone to January 1 of the present year, both for the sea level and lock canal.

The profile shows that the work which is anywhere near completion is about eleven miles of dredging on the Atlantic end and about a mile at the Pacific end. On the remainder of the work the proportion done is very small in comparison with that undone.

The estimate given in connection with this profile shows a total of 34,081,000 cubic meters remaining, without allowing for changes of river channels, etc., which raises the aggregate to 51,000,000 cubic meters. The company had admitted 32,000,000 to 40,000,000 meters.

At the highest rate yet reached, of 1,000,000 cubic meters per month, it is estimated that at least four years will be necessary to finish the canal, if there is no lack of money.

The total amount of cash actually expended up to the present date is $177,910,000, represented by $351,150,000 of securities. The amount necessary to be raised to complete the canal is estimated by the Engineering News as a minimum of $230,000,000, which would be represented by at least $500,000,000 of new securities.

The Story of "Annie Laurie."

A correspondent writes:—"The famous song that is sung by all singers of the present day, I am informed, is a mystery as to the author. I was raised on the next farm to James Laurie, Annie Laurie's father. I was personally acquainted with both her and her father, and also with the author of the song. Knowing these facts, I have been requested by my friends to give the public the benefit of my knowledge, which I have consented to do. Annie Laurie was born in 1827, and was about seventeen years old when the incident occurred which gave rise to the song bearing her name. James Laurie, Annie's father, was a farmer, who lived and owned a very large farm called Twaglestown, in Dumfriesshire, Scotland. He hired a great deal of help, and among those he employed was a man by the name of Wallace to act as foreman, and while in his employ Mr. Wallace fell in love with Annie Laurie, which fact her father soon learned, and forthwith discharged him. He went to his home in Maxwelton, and was taken sick the very night he reached there, and the next morning, when Annie Laurie heard of it, she came to his bedside and waited on him until he died, and on his deathbed he composed the song entitled "Annie Laurie."

Instructor—"By the way, Mr. Straddle, which is the more general term, poet or poetess?" Mr. Straddle—"Poet." "Can you give me a reason for it?" "I think so, sir. It is probably because a 'poet is born, not maid.'"

Philadelphia's musical prodigy is a boy of 13, Master J. Miller, the son of the late E. Spencer Miller, once a celebrated lawyer. The Record states that at Easter "the regular organist of St. Clement's Episcopal church was called away, and young Miller was asked to take his place. His playing on the magnificent organ in this the largest Episcopal church in the city has elicited great admiration and surprise. The handsome golden-haired boy of 13 years renders the most difficult and intricate church music without the slightest wavering."

THE THREAD OF LIFE;

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER X.—Shuffling it Off.

The day had been an eventful one for Hugh Massinger: the most eventful and pregnant of his whole history. As long as he lived, he could never possibly forget it. It was indeed a critical turning-point for three separate lives—his own, and Elsie's and Winifred Meysey's. For, as Hugh had walked that morning, stick in hand and orchid in buttonhole, down the rose-embowered lane in the Squire's grounds with Winifred, he had asked the frightened, blushing girl, in simple and straightforward language, without any preliminary, to become his wife. His shy fish was fairly hooked at last, he thought now: no need for daintily playing his catch any longer; it was but a question, as things stood, of reel and of landing-net. The father and mother, those important accessories, were pretty safe in their way too. He had sounded them both by unobtrusive methods, with dexterous plummets of oblique inquiry, and had gauged their profoundest depths of opinion with tolerable accuracy, as to settlements and other ante-nuptial precontracts of marriage. For what is the use of catching an heiress on your own rod, if your heiress's parents, upon whose testamentary disposition in the last resort her entire market value really depends, look askance with eyes of obvious disfavour upon your personal pretensions as their future son-in-law? Hugh Massinger was keen enough sportsman in his own line to make quite sure of his expected game before irrevocably committing himself to duck-shot cartridge. He was confident he knew his ground now; so, with a bold face and a modest assurance, he ventured, in a few plain and well-chosen words, to command his suit, his hand, and his heart to Winifred Meysey's favourable attention.

It was a great sacrifice, and he felt it as such. He was positively throwing himself away upon Winifred. If he had followed his own crude inclinations alone, like a romantic schoolboy, he would have waited for ever and ever for his cousin Elsie. Elsie was indeed the one true love of his youth. He had always loved her and he would always love her. 'Twas foolish, perhaps, to indulge overmuch in these personal preferences, but after all it was very human; and Hugh acknowledged regretfully in his own heart that he was not entirely raised in that respect above the average level of human weakness. Still, a man, however humanesque, must not be governed by impulse alone. He must judge calmly, deliberately, impersonally, disinterestedly of his own future, and must act for the best in the long run by the light of his own final and judicial opinion. Now Winifred was without doubt a very exceptional and eligible chance for an briefless barrister; your sucking poet doesn't get such chances of an undisputed heiress every day of the week, you may take your affidavit. If he let her slip by on sentimental grounds, and waited for Elsie—poor dear old Elsie—heaven only knew how long they might both have to wait for one another—and perhaps even then be finally disappointed. It was a foolish dream on Elsie's part; for, to say the truth, he himself had never entertained it. The most merciful thing to Elsie herself would be to snap it short now, once for all, before things went further, and let her stand face to face with naked facts: ah, how hideously naked!—let her know she must either look out another husband somewhere for herself, or go on earning her own livelihood, in maiden meditation fancy free, for the remaining term of her natural existence. Hugh could never help ending up a subject, however unpleasant, even in his own mind, with a poetical tag; it was a trick of manner his soul had caught from the wonted peroration of his political leaders in the first editorial column of that exalted print, the Morning Telephone. So he made up his mind; and he proposed to Winifred.

The girl's heart gave a sudden bound, and the red blood flushed her somewhat pallid cheek with hasty roses as she listened to Hugh's graceful and easy avowal of the profound and unfeigned love that he proffered her. She thought of the poem Hugh had read her aloud in his sonorous tones the evening before—much virtue in a judiciously selected passage of poetry, well marked in delivery;

> "He does not love me for my birth,
> Nor for my lands so broad and fair:
> He loves me for my own true worth,
> And that is well," said Lady Clare.

That was how Hugh Massinger loved her, she was quite sure. Had he not trembled and hesitated to ask her? Her bosom fluttered with a delicious fluttering; but she cast her eyes down, and answered nothing for a brief space. Then her heart gave her courage to look up once more, and to murmur back, in answer to his pleading look: "Hugh, I love you." And Hugh, carried away not ungracefully by the impulse of the moment, felt his own heart thrill responsive to hers in real earnest, and in utter temporary forgetfulness of poor betrayed and abandoned Elsie. They walked back to the Hall together next minute, whispering low, in the fool's paradise, indeed, for those two poor lovers, whose wooing set out under such evil auspices.

But when Hugh had left his landed prey at the front door of the square-built manor house, and strolled off by himself towards the village inn, the difficulty about Elsie for the first time began to stare him openly in the face in all its real and horrid magnitude. He would have to confess and to explain to Elsie. Worse still, for a man of his mettle and his sensitiveness, he would have to apologize for and excuse his own conduct. That was unendurable—that was ignominious—that was even absurd. His virility kicked at it. There is something essentially insulting and degrading to one's manhood in having to tell a girl you've pretended to love her—that you only care for her in a sisterly fashion. It is practically to unsex one's self. A pretty girl appeals quite otherwise to the man that is in us. Hugh felt it bitterly and deeply—for himself, not for Elsie. He pitied his own sad plight most sincerely. But then, there was poor Elsie to think of too. No use in the world in blinking that. Elsie loved him very, very dearly. True, they had never been engaged to one another—so great is the love of consistency in man, that even alone in his own mind Hugh continued to hug that translucent fiction; but she had been very fond of him, undeniably fond of him, and he had perhaps from time to time, by overt acts, unduly encouraged the display of her fondness. It gratified his vanity and his sense of his own power over women to do so: he could make them love him—few man more easily—and he liked to exercise that dangerous faculty on every suitable object that flitted across his changeful horizon. The man with a mere passion for making conquests affords no serious menace to the world's happiness; but the man with an innate gift for calling forth wherever he goes all the deepest and truest instincts of a woman's nature, is—when he abuses his power—the most deadly, terrible, and cruel creature known in our age to civilised humanity. And yet he is not always deliberately cruel; sometimes, as in Hugh Massinger's case, he almost believes himself to be good and innocent.

He had warned Winifred to whisper nothing for the present to Elsie about this engagement of theirs. Elsie was his cousin, he said—his only relation—and he would dearly like to tell her the secret of his heart himself in private. He would see her that evening and break the news to her. "Why break it?" Winifred had asked in doubt, all unconscious. And Hugh, a strange suppressed smile playing uneasily about the corners of his thin lips, had answered with guileless alacrity of speech: "Because Elsie's like a sister to me, you know, Winifred; and sisters always to some extent resent the bare idea of their brothers marrying."

For as yet Elsie herself suspected nothing. That was best, Hugh thought, she should suspect nothing. That was a cardinal point in his easy going practical philosophy of life. He never went half-way to meet trouble. Till Winifred had accepted him, why worry poor dear Elsie's gentle little soul with what was, after all, a mere remote chance, a contingent possibility? He would first make quite sure, by actual trial where he stood with Winifred; and then—and then, like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, he might let the whole truth burst in full force at once upon poor lonely Elsie's devoted head. Meanwhile, with extraordinary cleverness and care, he continued to dissemble. He never made open love to Winifred before Elsie's face; on the contrary, he kept the whole small comedy of his relations with Winifred so skilfully concealed from her feminine eyes, that to the very last moment Elsie never even dreamt of her pretty pupil as a possible rival, or regarded her in any other conceivable light than as the nearest of friends and the dearest of sisters. Whenever Hugh spoke of Winifred Elsie at all, he spoke of her lightly, almost slightingly, as a nice little girl, in her childish way—though much too blued—with a sort of distant bread and-butterish schoolroom approbation, which wholly misled and hoodwinked Elsie as to his real intentions. And whenever he spoke of Elsie to Winifred, he spoke of her jestingly, with a good-humored, unmeaning, brotherly affection that made the very notion of his ever contemplating marriage with her seem simply ridiculous. She was to him indeed as the deceased wife's sister is in the eye of the law to the British widower. With his easy, off-hand London cleverness, he had befilled and deceived both those innocent, simple-minded, trustful women; and he stood face to face now with a general eclaircissement which could no longer be delayed, but whose ultimate consequences might perhaps prove fatal to all his little domestic arrangements.

Would Elsie in her anger set Winifred against him? Would Winifred, justly indignant at his conduct to Elsie, when she learned the whole truth, refuse to marry him?

Nonsense—nonsense. No cause for alarm. He had never really been engaged to Elsie—he had said so to her face a thousand times. If Elsie chose to misinterpret his kind attentions, bestowed upon her solely as his one remaining cousin and kinswoman, the only other channel for the blood of the Massingers, surely Winifred would never be so foolish as to fall blindly into Elsie's self imposed error, and to hold him to a bargain he had over and over again expressly repudiated. He was a barrister, and he knew his ground in these matters. Chitty on Contract lays it down as an established principle of English law that free consent of both parties forms a condition precedent and essential part of the very existence of a compact of marriage.

With such transparent internal sophisms did Hugh Massinger strive all day to stifle and smother his own conscience; for every man always at least pretends to keep up appearances in his private relations with that domestic censor. But as evening came on, cigarette in mouth, he strolled round after dinner, by special appointment, to meet Elsie at the big poplar. They often met there, these warm summer nights; and on this particular occasion, anticipating trouble, Hugh had definitely arranged with Elsie beforehand to come to him by eight at the accustomed trysting place. The Meyseys and Winifred had gone out to dinner at a neighboring vicarage; but Elsie had stopped at home on purpose, on the hasty plea of some slight passing headache. Hugh had specially asked her to wait and meet him. Better get it all over at once, he thought to himself, in his short-sighted wisdom—like the measles or the chicken-pox—and know straight off exactly where he stood in his new position with these two women.

Women were the greatest nuisance in life. For his own part, now he came to look the thing squarely in the face, he really wished he was well quit of them all for good and ever.

He was early for his appointment; but by the tree he found Elsie, in her pretty white dress, already waiting for him. His heart gave a jump, a pleased jump, as he saw her sitting there before her time. Dear, dear Elsie; she was very, very fond of him! He would have given worlds to fling his arms tight around her then, and strain her to his bosom and kiss her tenderly. He would have given worlds, but not his reversionary chances in the Whitestrand property. Worlds don't count; the entire fee-simple of Mars and Jupiter would fetch nothing in the real estate market. He was bound by contract to Winnifred now, and he must do his best to break it gently to Elsie.

He stepped up and kissed her quietly on the forehead, and took her hand in his like a brother. Elsie let it lie in her own without a remonstrance. They rose and walked in lovers guise along the bank together. His heart sank within him at the hideous task he had next to perform—nothing less than to break poor Elsie's heart for her. If only he could have shuffled out of it sideways anyhow! But shuffling was impossible. He hated himself; and he loved Elsie. Never still that moment did he know how he loved her.

This would never do! He was feeling like a fool. He crushed down the love sternly in his heart, and began to talk about indifferent subjects—the wind, the river, the rose-show at the vicarage. But his voice trembled, betraying him still against his will; and he could not refrain from stealing sidelong looks at Elsie's dark eyes now and again, observing how beautiful she was, after all, in a rare and exquisite type of beauty. Winifred's blue eyes and light brown hair, Winifred's small mouth and moulded nose, Winifred's insipid smile and bashful blush, cheap as dirt in the matrimonial lottery. She had but a doll-like, Lowther Arcade style of prettiness. Maidenly as she looked, one twist more of her nose, one shade lighter in her hair, and she would become simply bar-maidenly. But Elsie's strong and powerful, earnest face, with its serious lips and its long black eyelashes, its profound pathos and its womanly dignity, its very irregularity and faultiness of outline, pleased him ten thousand times more than all your baby-faced beauties of the conventional, stereotyped, ballroom pattern. He looked at her long and sighed often. Must he really break her heart for her? At last he could restrain that unruly member, his tongue, no longer. "Elsie," he cried, eyeing her full in a genuine outburst of spontaneous admiration, "I never in my life saw any one anywhere one-half so beautiful and graceful as you are!"

Elsie smiled a pleased smile. "And yet," she murmured, with a half-malicious, teasing tone of irony, "we're not engaged, Hugh, after all, you remember."

Her words came at the very wrong moment; they brought the hot blood at a rush into Hugh's cheek. "No," he answered coldly, with a sudden revulsion and a spasmodic effort; "we're not engaged—nor ever will be, Elsie!"

Elsie turned round upon him with sudden abruptness in blank bewilderment. She was not angry; she was not astonished; she simply failed altogether to take in his meaning. It had always seemed to her so perfectly natural, so simply obvious that she and Hugh were sooner or later to marry one another; she had always regarded Hugh's frequent reminder that they were not engaged as such a mere playful warning against too much precipitancy; she had always taken it for granted so fully and unreservedly that whenever Hugh was rich enough to provide for a wife he would tell her so plainly, and carry out the implied engagement between them—that this sudden announcement of the exact opposite meant to her ears less than nothing. And now, when Hugh uttered those cruel, crushing, annihilating words, "Nor ever will be, Elsie," she couldn't possibly take in their reality at the first blush, or believe in her own heart that he really intended anything so wicked, so merciless, so unnatural.

"Nor ever will be!" she cried, incredulous. "Why, Hugh, Hugh,—I don't understand you."

Hugh steeled his heart with a violent strain to answer back in one curt, killing sentence: "I mean it, Elsie; I'm going to marry Winifred."

Elsie gazed back at him in speechless surprise. "Going to marry Winifred?" she echoed at last vaguely, after a long pause, as if the words conveyed no meaning to her mind. "Going to marry Winifred? To marry Winifred!—Hugh, did you really and truly say you were "going to marry Winifred?"

"I proposed to her this morning," Hugh answered outright, with a choking throat and glassy eye; "and she accepted me, Elsie; so I mean to marry her."

"Hugh!"

She uttered only that one short word in a tone of awful and unspeakable agony. But her bent brows, her pallid face, her husky voice, her startled attitude, said more than a thousand words, however wild, could possibly have said for her. She took it in dimly and imperfectly now; she began to grasp what Hugh was talking about; but as yet she could not understand to the full all the man's profound and unfathomed infamy. She looked at him feebly for some word of explanation. Surely he must have some deep and subtle reason of his own for this astonishing act and fact of furtive treachery. Some horrible combination of adverse circumstances, about which she knew and could know nothing, must have driven him against his will to this incredible solution of an insoluble problem. He could not of his own mere motion have proposed to Winifred. She looked at him hard: he quailed before her scrutiny.

"I love you, Elsie," he burst out with an irresistible impulse at last, as she gazed through and through him from long black lashes.

Elsie laid her hand on his shoulder blindly. "You love me," she murmured. "Hugh, Hugh, you still love me?"

"I always loved you, Elsie," Hugh answered bitterly with a sudden pang of abject remorse; "and as long as I live I shall always love you."

"And yet—you are going to marry Winifred!"

"Elsie! You and I were never engaged."

She turned round upon him fiercely with a burst of horror. He, to take refuge in that hollow excuse! "Never engaged!" she cried, aghast. "You mean it, Hugh—you mean that mockery?—And I, who would have given up my life for love of you!"

He tried to assume a calm judicial tone. "Let us be reasonable, Elsie," he said, with an attempt at ease, "and talk this matter over without sentiment or hysterics. You knew very well I was too poor to marry; you knew I always said we were only cousins; you know I had my way in life to make. You could never have that thought I seriously dreamt of marrying you."

Elsie looked up at him with a scared white face. That Hugh should descend to such transparent futilities; "This is all new to me," she moaned out in a dazed voice. "All, all—quite, quite new to me."

"But, Elsie, I've said it over and over a thousand times before."

She gazed back at him like a stone. "Ah, yes; but till to-day," she murmured slowly, "you never, never, never meant it."

He sat down, unmanned, on the grass by the bank. She seated herself by his side, mechanically as it were, with her hand on his arm, and looked straight in front of her with a vacant stare at the angry water. It was growing dark. The shore was dark, and the sea, and the river. Everything was dark and black and gloomy around her. She laid his hand one moment in her own. "Hugh!" she cried, turning towards him with appealing pathos, "you don't mean it now: you will never mean it. You're only saying it to try and prove me. Tell me it's that! You're yourself still. O Hugh, my darling, you can never mean it!" Her words burnt into his brain like liquid fire: the better self within him groaned and faltered; but he crushed it down with an iron heel. The demon of avarice held his sordid soul. "My child," he said, with a tender inflection in his voice as he said it, "we must understand one another. I do seriously intend to marry Winifred Meysey."

"Why?"

There was a terrible depth of suppressed earnestness in that sharp short why, wrung out of her by anguish, as of a woman who asks the reason of her death-warrant. Hugh Massinger answered it slowly and awkwardly with cumbrous roundabout, self-exculpating verbosity. As for Elsie, she sat like a statue and listened; rigid and immovable, she sat there still; while Hugh, for the very first time in her whole experience, revealed the actual man he really was before her appalled and horrified and speechless presence. He talked of his position, his prospects, his abilities. He talked of journalism, of the bar, of promotion. He talked of literature, of poetry, of fame. He talked of money, and its absolute need to man and woman in these latter days of ours. He talked of Winnifred, of Whitestrand, and of the Meysey manor-house. "It'll be best in the end for us both, you know, Elsie," he said argumentatively, in his foolish rigmarole, mistaking her silence for something like unwilling acquiescence. "Of course I shall still be very fond of you, as I've always been fond of you—like a cousin only—and I'll be a brother to you now as long as I live; and when Winifred and I are really married, and I live here at Whitestrand, I shall be able to do a great deal more for you, and help you by every means in my power, and introduce you freely into our own circle, on different terms, you know, where you'll have chances of meeting—well, suitable persons. You must see yourself it's the best thing for us both. The idea of two penniless people like you and me marrying one another in the present state of society is simply ridiculous."

She heard him out to the bitter end, revealing the naked deformity of his inmost nature, though her brain reeled at it, without one passing word of reproach or dissent. Then she said in an icy tone of utter horror:

"Hugh!"

"Yes, Elsie."

"Is that all?"

"That is all."

"And you mean it?"

"I mean it."

"Oh, for Heaven's sake, before you kill me outright, Hugh, Hugh! is it really true? Are you really like that? Do you really mean it?"

"I really mean to marry Winifred."

Elsie clasped her two hands on either side of her head, as if to hold it together from bursting with her agony. "Hugh," she cried, "it's foolish, I know, but I ask you once more, before it's too late, in sight of Heaven, I ask you solemnly, are you seriously in earnest? Is that what you're made of? Are you going to desert me? To desert and betray me?"

"I don't know what you mean," Hugh answered stonily, rising as if to go—for he could stand it no longer. "I've never been engaged to you. I always told you so. I owe you nothing. And now I mean to marry Winifred."

With a cry of agony, she burst wildly away from him. She saw it all now; she understood to the full the cruelty and baseness of the man's innermost underlying nature. Fair outside; but false, false, false to the core! Yet even so, she could scarcely believe it. The faith of a lifetime fought hard for life in her. He, that Hugh she had loved and trusted—he, the one Hugh in all the universe—he to cast her off with such callous selfishness! He to turn upon her now with his empty phrases! He to sell and betray her for a Winifred and a manor house! Oh, the guilt and the sin of it! Her head reeled and swam round deliriously. She hardly knew what she felt or did. Mad with agony, love, and terror, she rushed away headlong from his polluted presence—not from Hugh, but from this fallen idol. He saw her white dress disappearing fast through the deep gloom in the direction of the poplar tree, and he groped his way after her, almost as mad as herself, struck dumb with remorse and awe and shame at the ruin he had visibly and instantly wrought in the fabric of that trustful girl's whole being.

One moment she fled and stumbled in the dark along the grassy path toward the roots of the poplar. Then he caught a glimpse of her for a second, dimly silhouetted in the faint starlight, a wan white figure with outstretched arms against the black horizon. She was posing, irresolute, on the gnarled roots. It was but for the twinkling of an eye that he saw her; next instant, a splash, a gurgle, a shriek of terror, and he beheld her borne wildly away, a helpless burden, by that fierce current towards the breakers that glistened white and roared hoarsely in their savage joy on the bar of the river.

In her agony of disgrace, she had fallen, rather than thrown herself in. As she stood there, undecided, on the slippery roots, with all her soul burning within her, her head swimming and her eyes dim, a bruised, humiliated, hopeless creature, she had missed her foothold on the smooth worn stump, slimy with lichens, and raising her hands as if to balance herself, had thrown herself forward, half wittingly, half unconsciously, on the tender mercies of the rushing stream. When she returned for a moment, a little later, to life and thought, it was with a swirling sense of many waters, eddying and seething in mad conflict round her faint numb form. Strange roaring noises thundered in her ear. A choking sensation made her gasp for breath. What she drank in with her gasp was not air, but water—salt brackish water, an overwhelming flood of it. Then she sank again, and was dimly aware of the cold chill ocean floating around her on every side. She took a deep gulp, and with it sighed out her sense of life and action. Hugh was lost to her, and it was all over. She could die now. She had nothing to live for. There was no Hugh; and she had not killed herself.

Those two dim thoughts were the last she knew as her eyes closed in the rushing current: there had never been a Hugh; and she had fallen in by accident.

Thrifty.

The strawberry season never comes in a certain village in the West without the citizens thereof indulging in some sly jokes at the expense of one of their townsmen, a well-to do but extremely penurious man, who sometimes does things that some veritable misers would scorn to do. A good part of his income is derived from the successful cultivation of an acre or more of strawberries, and he was never known to give a berry away, or to take less than the highest market price for a single box.

Although he lives in a large and handsome house, he was never known to entertain company, and his friends and neighbors, were, therefore, greatly surprised when they one day received a neatly printed card, saying that Mr. and Mrs.—well, say Smith, would be at home on a certain evening from eight until ten o'clock.

Many of the prominent residents of the town accepted these invitations, and the house was full.

Mr. and Mrs. Smith received their guests in the most cordial manner, and a little before ten o'clock the dining-room doors were opened, and the guests invited out to partake of strawberries and cream, the strawberry season having just opened.

This unparalleled generosity on the part of their host amazed his guests, and they sat down feeling some compunctions of conscience for the unkind things they had often said about his stinginess. Before they rose, however, they were ready to reiterate all they had ever said, for the attendants who had served the berries and cream quietly passed around among the tables and placed at the plate of each guest a little check, on which was printed:

"Twenty five cents. Please pay at the door."

The host himself stood at the door to take the money, and blandly wished his guests good-night.

Thrift in State of Maine.

Albert Pease of Lewiston, Maine, in a letter to the Maine Farmer says:

I propose to tell a few things that I know in regard to farms in this section. * * * Adjoining the farm on which I live, there is a farm of 56 acres, with some fruit, barn good, house poor but habitable, land good for a small business, that has been urged upon me for $250. On another side of me a farm of 200 acres, buildings good, land good, with an unusually promising fruit prospect. The owner will sell for a sum that I forbear to name, as his is an exceptional case of discontent. These within three miles of Phillips village, on a good road. Running parallel to the road on which I live, about a mile distant, there is a road leading along a high ridge of excellent land on which there are six farms, with bread fields that are mowed with a machine, good orchards, with good buildings, ample, neat and well kept. I was lately told that all these farms were for sale. Since then one of them has been sold, a farm that ought to carry twelve head of cattle and a hundred sheep, for $700. The former owner is one of our smartest men, but he was bound to get out, and sold as he did because he could not get more. On the river road, two and a half miles below Phillips' village, there is a farm with 100 acres intervale with upland, the buildings ample, requiring slight repairs, that a few years ago was bought for $2,500. A few days ago it was sold for $1,500. The farm below this, the best intervale farm in the region, a few years ago was rated at $3,500. I am informed that it can now be bought for $2,500. Another, an upland farm, five miles from the depot, some 100 acres very good land, not excessively stony, 50 acres that can be plowed in one field, the barn the best and most costly of any in the region, the house as good as the average on the best farms in the State, and an aqueduct bringing water to house and barn, and this can be had for two-thirds the cost of the buildings alone. And these, I think, are a fair average of the quality and prices of farms that are offered for sale, after throwing out a few that are not worked as farms, but are turned out to pasture or forest.

Commenting on this account the Moncton, N.B., Times declares that in no section of the Maritime Provinces is there such a condition of things as is here shown to exist in Maine, the condition of Canadian farmers being favorable by comparison.

Spurgeon and the Baptists.

It is not true, as has been stated, that Mr. Spurgeon has returned to the Baptist Union. His brother, Mr James Spurgeon, has, but he himself stands sternly out against any such idea. In his June "Sword and Trowel" Mr. S. says:—"I am not careful to criticise the action of a body from which I am now finally divided. My course has been made clear by what has been done. I was afraid from the beginning that the reform of the Baptist Union was hopeless, and therefore I resigned. I am far more sure of it now, and should never under any probable circumstances dream of returning. Those who think it right to remain in such a fellowship will do so, but there are a few others who will judge differently and will act upon their convictions. At any rate, whether any others do so or not, I have felt the power of the text, 'Come out from among them and be ye separate,' and have quitted both union and association once for all."

He Thought He Could.

Her Parent—"Do you think, Mr. Filkins, that you can support my daughter in style to which she is accustomed?"

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

Germany and Russia Very Affectionate—An Unfounded Rumor From Britain—The New Emperor's Health.

Looking over the Continent, it is amusing to observe the sudden friendship which has sprung up between Germany and Russia. In a few months they may be fighting, but just now they love each other very much indeed and Austria of course, which wants Germany to hate Russia and protect Austria in the Balkans, is as much worried as a school boy who sees his chum forming a new friendship, and tries to persuade himself that the impending friendly demonstrations will not amount to anything. We are informed that the new Emperor, in the midst of all his cares, has learned since his marriage to speak Russian fluently. With a nation to support him, Bismarck to look after his family interests, and nothing to do but wear uniforms and square his soldiers, it is difficult to understand why he should not learn any number of languages; but a great fuss is made over it, and we are told that he will win the hearts of the Russian Emperor and his officers and men by speaking to them in their own beloved tongue.

There is a lot of talk by Berlin correspondents as to the meaning of certain meetings between the Emperor, Bismarck, and the Crown Council. The question seems still unsettled as to whether it is really true that Crown Prince Frederick had no right to ascend the throne when he was suffering from an incurable disease. It is hinted that the intention is to invalidate the decrees of the deceased Emperor, and to lower Victoria, the daughter of the English Queen, from her proud rank of Dowager Empress to that of widowed Crown Princess, and so deprive her of an enormous fortune. This report sounds simply preposterous. Emperor William is very far from being a dutiful son, and the Dowager Empress Victoria is thoroughly disliked in Germany. Nevertheless, the German people revere the late Emperor, and to suppose that the present Emperor could be so stupid as to court unpopularity by such a display of disrespect for his dead as well as his living parent is absurd. By the way, I am informed on most excellent authority from Berlin that the new Emperor is far from sure of a long reign. Despite his square shoulders, great vigor, and powerful military step, the trouble which causes continual discharges from his ear, it is declared, grows worse and worse, and it is making its way toward the brain. Dr. Bergman is the Emperor's chief physician, and has a fondness for operations which may prove dangerous.

Eternal vigilance enables a man to carry the same umbrella for years.

He who complains that the world is hollow and heartless unconsciously confesses his own lack of sympathy, while he who believes that people as a whole are kindly and humane is certain to have the milk of human kindness in his own nature.

MANY are beginning to be seriously alarmed at the threatened spread of Canada thistles, which in many parts of the country are already causing serious loss. The law providing for the cutting of the thistles seems to be a dead letter, the officials appointed in many cases never pretend to enforce its provisions, and the consequence is the thistles are allowed to flourish and spread wherever the wind carries them.

ROBERT NELSON and Fred Gourley, butchers of Wallacetown, were arraigned before the county judge yesterday afternoon, charged with stealing a heifer from Mr. Dougald Blue, of Dunwich. County Crown Attorney Donahue prosecuted, and Mr. C. Macdougall, Q. C., appeared for the defence. It was alleged that the accused stole the heifer from the premises of Mr. Blue, slaughtered and cut it up, and sold it in their shop. Four hoofs, said to be those of the stolen animal, were found, but not the hide. The only evidence against accused was alleged contradictory statements made by them. The judge acquitted the accused.

SABBATH SCHOOL PIC-NIC.

The union pic-nic of the Dutton Sabbath schools, which was held on Tuesday of this week, was a grand success, and those who attended enjoyed themselves immensely. The members of the different schools met at their respective churchs in the morning where carriages were provided for those desirous of going in loads; many others used their own conveyances. They started for Port Talbot about 9:30 and safely reached the pleasant spot and beautiful grounds of Major McBeth between 11 and 12. The cloths were soon spread and the bountiful supply of delicasies which was provided by the ladies were taken hold of by old and young with great energy. After the provisions were cleared away, each individual proceeded to injoy himself or herself as he or she desired. Most went down to the beach, threw stones, waded in the water, fished, swam the dog and did many things. One other was that Sam. Marshman was in swiming and nearly got drowned. He was rescued by D. McKee. The girls who waded too far out in the lake hung thein skirts on the bushes to dry. The only accident to carriages that we heard of was that Mr. Urlin's mare, in charge of R. Shores damaged two buggies; no one hurt. The party returned home about 6,30 much pleased with their days' enjoyment.

ENTRANCE EXAMINATION.

LIST OF SUCCESSFUL CANDIDATES.

The examination for entrance to High Schools and Collegiate Institutes recently held was, in many respects, a very fair one. By comparing the answers sent in by the candidates with those sent in 15 years ago, one can not but notice the great advance made by the Public schools. Yet there is room for improvement. Orthography is but poorly taught; reading and writing also were, with many candidates, something unknown. The more difficult subjects seem to have engrossed the energies of the teacher. A more minute analysis shows that the best candidates came from schools where there is no Fifth Class. We think this matter should be carefully looked into. Is it wise to allow one or two pupils to engross a large proportion of the teacher's time and allow 30 or 40 of younger years spend the time practically unimproved? Parents, trustees and teachers will soon see the folly of this.

The following are the names of successful candidates in order of merit. Marks required to pass, 367.

Greer, with a beautifully upholstered student's chair, accompanied with an address, on Monday evening last as a slight token of the respect in which he is held by them, and for the able manner in which he has filled his position in the lodge ever since its organization. Mr. Greer made a feeling reply.

If it please your neighbor to break the sacred calm of night with the snorting of an unholy instrument it is your duty to put up with this wretched music and your privilege to pity him for the unhappy instinct that moves him to delight in such discordant sounds. Our quiet and peaceful village has long enjoyed immunity from that dreadful insanity that moves men to become musicians in defiance of the will of God that they should confine themselves to sawing wood. Three small boys of this peaceful hamlet have taken possession of a blacksmith shop and go on with their harrowing work every night, cursed by some and pitied by others. The vanity of these boys lends them to the fiddle, bugle and tin pan. It is to be hoped before anyone becomes deranged through their unearthly and melancholy wails they will see the error of their ways and seek more quiet and pleasing pastime. ALPHA.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and bilousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.
Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.
Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."
A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.
The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,
Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by Druggists and Perfumers.

AN UNGRATEFUL SON.—The St. Thomas police have been notified that $200 reward is offered for the arrest of a son of D. Engler, merchant tailor, of Niagara Falls, who was robbed of $1,780 on Saturday afternoon. The money was in a bureau drawer at the family residence, where Mr. Engler put it but a few hours before, with the intention of purchasing the stock of E. Viger, to start his son, the thief, in business next week.

This paper is being distributed secretly among the Anarchist groups in Chicago. The Competition of Indian Wheat.

Prof. Robert Wallace, professor of agriculture and rural economy in Edinburgh University, Scotland, after four months' investigation of India the past summer, tells us that the fear of competition from this source has been largely exaggerated. He says it is a mistake to think that the Indian area in wheat will increase in the next ten years in the same ratio that it has the past five years. It will increase gradually, but the difficulties in the way will prevent any such development of exports as has caused so much alarm of late. The late rapid growth of the wheat crop has been due to the fact that much of it was produced on land previously occupied for some other crop. This substitution cannot go on much longer, for the teeming millions of that empire must have food to live on, and only in the newer parts of the country can the wheat area be much further extended. There are great difficulties of developing new sections in that country: First, because it is hard to get workmen to settle in new districts, and secondly, there is want of money and a want of the necessary extra supply of power. Again, since wheat requires reasonably dry land, failures must occur every few years in the moist climate of that country. A continuous growth of wheat on lands heretofore cropped with leguminous plants, such as clover, etc., is also tending to exhaust the soil, and the yield of wheat per acre is bound to diminish. Prof. Wallace concludes by warning people to beware of Indian wheat statistics, which are not compiled from returns made by practical wheat growers, and are based to a considerable degree on guess-work. This report from so eminent and disinterested authority will be of interest to every wheat-grower in America, as showing that Indian wheat is not to usurp the place of American wheat in the foreign market. —American Agriculturist for August.

As for Mrs. Henry he knows nothing of her whereabouts. He knows she left Stratford on the same train as he did, but says their ways parted at London. Being interrogated as to his reasons for leaving as he did, he says they were purely of a financial nature.

A QUEER SCOTT ACT CASE.—A peculiar Scott Act case was tried in Woodstock lately. A few days ago a woman, named Mrs. Hamill, was arrested for being drunk and disorderly. She told at the police court that she had obtained her whiskey from Joseph Davidson, and that she had paid him for it. Davidson, who is a tanner by trade, and not in any way connected with the liquor trade, except as a consumer, was summoned for violating the Scott Act. From the evidence it appears that Mrs. Hamill had given him a bottle and fourteen cents to get some whiskey for her, she claiming that she was ill. Davidson supplied her from some stock he had on hand for private consumption. After a lengthy and amusing cross-examination, he admitted having taken the fourteen cents, and his worship construed this to be a violation of the Scott Act, and fined him $50 and costs.

EXTENSION TO DETROIT RIVER.

VALUABLE WATER FRONT SECURED BY THE C. P. R.

The Canadian Pacific railroad sent Purchasing Agent Wilds and Engineer Jennings to Windsor very secretly to buy a water front for a railway yard and ship dock for ferries. They passed through the city on Sunday destination unkown but suspected. The men walked into the British American and registered their own names. Immediately it leaked out that they were after railroad property, and in two hours they had bought a frontage of 300 feet on the river, directly east of Crawford avenue and backing up 276 feet on Sandwich street. They paid, it is said, $13,000 for the property. It is also believed that the Great Western, which also owns a large water frontage, has been sold out to the Canadian Pacific. The purchasing agents have made offers for 525 feet frontage on the Crawford estate, 500 feet of the Janesse estate and 115 feet of the Porter property. They were offered from $47 to $120 per front foot. The result of this purchase will be disastrous to people living on Sandwich street, and the residents there are furious over the prospect. Land all about the vicinity has gone up 200 per cent. The recent sale of the C. P. R. guarantee bonds give the company plenty of ready money, and it is certain that the road will be built to Windsor this year.

FLOGGING A "DOCTOR."

WHITING GETS 25 LASHES.

One of those just accompaniments of a criminal sentence in punishment of the horrible crime of assaulting a child was inflicted at the Central Prison Saturday, when an elderly man of short, bulky build, had 25 lashes across the bare back. The culprit was "Dr." Charles H. Whiting, of London, convicted of indecently assaulting his 11-year-old niece in the vicinity of St. Thomas a few months ago. He was sentenced to 23 months in the Central, with fifty lashes—twenty-five one month after he had entered and twenty-five one month before he is discharged.

The hour fixed for the first twenty-five was 10 o'clock this morning, one month from the 20th of June, the day after he entered the prison. At that hour there were gathered in Warden Massie's office a small group comprising Lieut. L. H. Irving and a half-a-dozen reporters. They, with the Warden and Deputy Warden Logan, awaited the arrival of Dr. W. T. Aikins, the prison surgeon, who arrived at 10:10. He was greeted at the door by the Warden, who escorted him to Whiting's cell, where he examined the convict. Five minutes later the Warden, looking the picture of a stern official in his fine blue uniform, reappeared and conducted the reporters and others to the place where such punishments are usually administered. The place is at the north end of the north wing where the iron-bound triangle of oak is fastened securely to the brick wall of the cell enclosure and to the cemented floor. The wing looked as neat as could be, but Warden Massie explained that it was not as neat as usual, because a gang of convicts were at work laying new floors of oak on the galleries facing the four tier of cells. A passing glimpse into the cells on the ground tier showed them to be scrupulously clean, with newly-washed floors and bedding arranged most neatly.

When the small party reached the triangle they found it already occupied by the person of Whiting, who was being tied to it by Deputy-Warden Logan and a guard. The convict, who is a short, stout man of 42 years has a criminal face, which bore not the slightest indication of his possessing the intelligence and manhood of the average doctor. He had a bad, receding forehead, a bad eye and ugly turned-up nose, his close cropped hair adding no favor to the general appearance of toughness. He wore the orthodox prison trousers, wide and fashionably striped in yellow and blue. His back was covered with a woolen undershirt while his coat and cap lay upon the floor.

A look of fear was upon his face as the bands were tightened so that he could not budge. Each foot was securely thonged to the bases of the triangle, while the hands were as tightly fastened above the head to the upper angle, but not before he had drawn the shirt from his back and over his head till it rested on his arms. A canvas band a foot wide held his waist to the triangle, while another of canvas, but only about six inches, was fastened around his neck and held his head and shoulders securely.

Then appeared a tall, thin guard, with a cat-o'-nine-tails folded under his arm. He took his position on the convict's left. Behind him stood the reporters, and on the other side were the Warden, Deputy Warden, Dr. Aikins and one guard. A few convicts watched the scene from one corner, while a groupe of half a dozen engaged in work on the gallery flooring peered over the fourth tier railing upon the scene beneath. Dr. Aikins said: Mr. Warden, I have examined the prisoner and find him in such condition that he may receive punishment. Then the Warden drew forth a blue paper and proceeded to read:

"Charles H. Whiting, you were convicted at the General Sessions of the County of Elgin holden at St. Thomas on June 12, 1888, of indecent assault, and on June 20 you were sentenced to 23 months' confinement in this prison with 50 lashes, to be administered as according to the rule in this prison, 25 at the end of one month after the commencement of your sentence and twenty-five lashes one month before the expiration thereof. The order of court will now be carried into effect."

"One!" rang out the voice of the Warden. The guard calmly took the flail from under his arm, and with a neat turn through the air and brought it down diagonally across the stout white back of the criminal. For an instant no mark could be seen, but in a second's time the Warden said "Two!" the tails again decended, and purple marks were to be seen across the back. At each descent Whiting cried 'Oh!' and at the third he emitted a howl and squirmed, but he was held tight.

"Four!" echoed though the corridors, and the man cried out, "Oh God, have mercy on me!" and repeated it at the fifth. At the sixth it was thought that the guard was laying it on too heavy and Deputy Warden Logan, touching him on the shoulder, whispered to him to be a little easier.

The 7th stroke was a mere slight clip, but two or three other sound ones followed, and the criminal repeated his cries each time calling "Oh God, have mercy on me!" At the 15th stroke his back was of a purplish color, and again the guard gave him a light blow. Then heavier ones, accompanied every time by a cry, followed till the 21st and 23rd, which were very light compared with the others.

The 24th was struck and the Warden called out "Twenty-five!" The guard thought this referred to the preceding blow, but meant that the 25th was yet to come, and he stopped for a few seconds. "Once more!" he was told, and the cat-o'-nine-tails descended for the 25th and final time.

It was a great relief to the prisoner. The bonds were undone, he pulled his shirt over his back, picked up his coat and cap and was told to go to his cell on the corner, only a few feet away. With a weary look he did so and entering the cell, leaned his face on the bed and moaned.

Whiting is no real doctor and it would be a sorry disgrace for the medical fraternity if he were. Although really a quack, he describes himself on the prison records as manufacturer- probably of the patent medicines he used to sell. Since his incarceration in the Central he has confessed that he is a bigamist, and for this he will be tried when he is discharged.—News.

A Panther's Embrace.

Short savage roars broke upon my ear, mingled with the wild shouts of the natives, who were evidently being chased by the now furious beast. At this crisis I felt that my hat would probably do more for me than my gun, so I crushed the former on to my head, and, without waiting to adjust the chin-strap, I seized the latter in my hands and faced the enemy. The panther had meanwhile floored a beater and got him by the arm, but, dropping him, she at once came for me with lightning bounds. I could see nothing owing to the beast's tremendous speed, but a shadowy-looking form with two large bright round eyes fixed upon me with an unmeaning stare as it literally flew toward me. Such was the vision of a moment! My presence of mind did not desert me. I raised my gun and fired with all the care I could at such short notice. But I missed, and the panther landed light as a feather with its arms around my shoulders. Thus we stood for a few seconds, and I distinctly felt the animal sniffing for my throat.

Mechanically, I always turned my head so as to keep the thick, wadded curtain of my helmet cover in front of the creature's muzzle; but still I could hear and feel plainly the rapid, yet cautious, efforts it was making to find an opening, so as to tear open the jugular vein. I had no other weapon but my gun, which was useless with the animal closely embracing me, so I stood perfectly still, well knowing that Sanford would liberate me if it were possible to do so. At the first onslaught we were so placed that he could only have hit the panther by firing through me, which would have been very injudicious, to say the least of it. As may naturally be supposed, the animal did not spend much time in investigating the nature of a wadded hat cover, and before my friend could get around and take aim without jeopardizing my own life the beast pounced on my left elbow, taking a piece out, and then buried its long, sharp fangs into the joint until they met. At the same time I was hurled to the earth with such force that I knew not how I got there or what became of my gun.

Still, throughout, I maintained a clear impression of what was going on. I knew that I was lying on the ground with the panther on top of me, and I could feel my elbow joint wabbling in and out as the brute ground its jaws with a movement imperceptible to the bystanders, but which felt to me as though I were being violently shaken all over. Now I listened anxiously for the report of Sandford's shot, which I knew would be heard immediately, and carefully refrained from making the slightest sound or movement, lest his aim should be disturbed thereby. In a few seconds the loud and welcome detonation, which from its proximity almost deafened me, struck upon my ear. I sat up, I was free, the panther gone.

Feed has much to do with the quantity of milk, but the breed of the cow has much more to do with it. A poor cow will give poor milk, even with the richest feed, while a good cow will continue to give rich milk on poor feed.

When the udder of the cow becomes hard, a prolonged bathing of the udder with warm water is the best remedy. Use the water freely, and rub the udder during the application; then wipe dry. It should be repeated daily until relief be given.

When held up to a strong light a fresh egg is very clear, and the air-cell at the large end is very small. The smaller the air-cell the fresher the egg, as the cell expands as the egg becomes stale. A fresh egg has a somewhat rough shell, while that of a stale one is very smooth.

An advocate of corn-fed pork admits that the hog fed miscellaneously has the sweetest and tenderest meat, and if taste be a criterion in pork, as it is reckoned to be everything else that is eatable, the fruit-fed and milk-fed pork is certainly best. But he adds that if greater firmness be desired it may be had by finishing off the last few weeks of fattening by feeding corn meal, not corn in the ear.

It is said that the cheapest and best mode of keeping lice out of the poultry-house is to add a quart of kerosene oil to each bucket of strong soapsuds on washing-days and thoroughly saturate the floor, walls, roosts, and every portion of the poultry-house, forcing the liquid into the cracks and crevices. It will kill the vermin as soon as it shall touch them, being one of the best insecticides known.

The operation of dishorning is easy and comparatively painless if performed on young calves. Watch the signs of the coming horn, which will generally show itself when the calf is five or six weeks old. Remove it then, and it will never start again. There is no doubt that hornless cattle will, in a few years, sell better than others. In many places they do now, and dishorning is the easiest way to add to their value.

ARSENICAL POISONS ON ELM TREES.

The first brood of larvæ of the elm leaf beetle appears in June. Timely applications of Paris green or London purple in water sprayed over and among the foliage of the trees will destroy this pest. But the spray will leave some poison on the grass The poisoned trees need not be in a pasture lot nor around the dwelling house to be a source of danger. If there is the least possible chance of horses, cows, sheep or other animal grazing about them or of children playing there, the greatest caution should be observed in using arsenites.

A FAMOUS TREE DEAD.

The world-famous Endicott pear tree, planted by Governor John Endicott on the ancient orchard farm at Danvers New Mills (Mass.) in 1630 or 1633, is dead. Tradition has it that 1630 was the date when the venerable tree was planted, but there is also evidence that Governor Endicott did not break up the ground for his orchard until 1633. There is no doubt, however, of the great antiquity of the pear tree, and that it was from 250 to 260 years old when its last vital spark went out. The tree stood on the north bank of the river, about half-way between the mills and the railroad track. It had but one rival—an ancient pear tree at Truro, on the sands of Cape Cod, planted prior to 1644.

An ex-member of the Maine Board of Agriculture who always cut grass early, admits that last year he was "too fast;" the crop was not sufficiently matured, consequently the hay lacks nutrition and "it takes too much to keep the stock." A Farmers' Review correspondent says of the same subject: "Timothy may possess the most nutrition when cut in bloom, but the enormous amount of dust in it when put in the mow as soon as cured renders it most objectionable for horses. If the dust can be practically avoided, I should sanction bloom cutting, otherwise I prefer cutting when the bloom is all gone. Much handling of hay before it is put in the mow may to some extent lessen the dust, but when the weather is threatening there is no time to be wasted by cocking hay that is to go to the barn. Green cut hay, if stocked and hauled to the barn after it is thoroughly dry, will lose much of the dust. Horses must have clean, sweet hay."

BEST APPLES FOR THE EXTREME NORTH.

The ordinary well known commercial apples are all too tender under the severity of winter along our northern borders and in Canada, to be profitably planted, except along the shores of the great lakes.

But recently, for spots where orcharding was before regarded as hopeless, what may well be called a distinct family of apples has been introduced or originated. Many of these are of Russian origin, but not a few of them are native. The following is a list of the best attainable sorts of the different seasons. Many newer sorts are yet under trial but have not been propagated to any extent by nurserymen.

For summer.—Yellow Transparent, Tetofsky.

For autumn.—Duchess of Oldenburgh, Alexander, McMahon's White, St. Lawrence, Switzer.

For winter.—Wealthy, Scott's Winter, McIntosh Red, Fameuse, Bethel of Vermont.

HOW A DANDELION GOES TO SLEEP.

If our Agricultural College does not always give us new things it sometimes calls our attention to things that are old. The following is from the report of the botanist:

The following are some of the conclusions arrived at by a study of a common dandelion: The flower heads open in early morning on bright days and close by ten o'clock, unless in the shade or the day is cloudy. The same head may open on three successive days at the most. After flowering the upright stalk bends down and outward until it lies upon the turf. In about four days the scape becomes thick and with a double curve like a long German pipe. At this time the stem begins to rise, and in two days it has become upright again with the head globular and each fruit with a feathery balloon ready for the wind to carry it away. Some of the stalks elongate eight inches in five days. The greater part of this takes place in the upper half and three fourths of the elongation is made in the night time. The stem lengthens sometimes four to six inches after the seeds have all gone and the heads are "bald."

We hope that by next year the professor can tell us how to stop dandelions from going to seed, or what is better yet, how to get them out of the pastures.

Husband—"No meat for dinner to-day?" "Why? Didn't you telephone to the butcher to send up that roast we agreed upon this morning?" Wife—"No, dear; I'm sorry. But the fact is I was studying my memory lesson and forgot all about it.

"I hear you have changed your boarding place?" "Yes; had to do it. My old place was too luxurious. A dinner of three courses every day was ruining my digestive apparatus." "Three courses? What were they?" "Napkins, ice water and toothpicks.

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN.

A BIRTHDAY WISH.

On this, thy birthday, my dear friend,
What is the wish to thee I'd send?
That earth may be a garden fair,
Wherein bloom only flowers rare?
Nay, that were vain, for here below
We always find weeds, too, will grow,
And e'en the rose, esteemed by all,
Has thorn that's sharp, although 'tis small,
But who would e'er reject, with scorn,
The rose because it has a thorn?
Not one! We prize it for its worth—
Naught perfect is of earthly birth.

Wilt though, my friend, accept from me
This earnest wish I crave for thee?
Oh, make thy heart a garden bright,
Wherein grow virtues fair to sight,
And may to thee be giv'n the strength
To root out every fault at length;
For faults, like weeds, do show that we Must watch ourselves continually.

The choicest flower of every heart
Is love—of life the sweetest part.
Oh, may it for thee ever bloom,
And shed on all its rich perfume;
For love grows most when most it gives,
And bliss bestows if it but lives;
And should'st thou find that, like the rose,
Sorrow (love's thorn) time may disclose,
Be not cast down, thorns will decay,
For all things earthly pass away.

But love to man alone was given
To be a foretaste here of Heaven;
And when we reach our Home above,
And see at last the God of Love
(Who knows how weak we are, and frail,
And sees how frequently we fail
To keep our hearts at all times white,
As they should be in His pure sight),
Oh, may His touch on weed and thorn
Cause flowers immortal to be born,
And since in Heaven no sin shall dwell,
Their beauty aye His praise will tell.

ABOUT QUEENS.

Queen Elizabeth of Roumania is intensely musical, fond of dancing, and has written a ballet.

Elizabeth of Austria has developed an unfortunate skin desease, and wears a veil continually.

Isabella, ex-Queen of the Spaniards, when she appears abroad wears a costume much the same as that of a nun.

The Queen of Denmark is intensely deaf, but fond of music, and has a big and powerful organ that she can hear.

Olga of Greece is the most beautiful Queen of Europe, and is sister-in-law of the Empress of Russia and the Princess of Wales.

Queen Olga of Greece is practical, dresses plainly, and goes in for domestic economy, etc., even making her own bonnets, it is said.

Marie, the daughter of the Empress of Austria, is about to marry Prince Ruprecht of Bavaria, who is, according to loyal Jacobites, the heir apparent to the English throne.

The Queen of Spain recently, after the performance, called Sarah Bernhardt into the box and gave her a bouquet tied in ribbon and secured by a splendid sapphire mounted with diamonds.

The Queen of Sweden, since she learned and began cooking by the advice of her physician for her health, takes long walks, and often goes into the peasants' houses and shows them how to make good dishes.

The latest Paris fashion in dogs commands two pockets in the canine ulster or dolman when travelling, one to hold lumps of sugar and the other for a small fine pocket-handkerchief to wipe the little brute's nose with.

Dagmar of Russia, the Princess of Wales sister, is said to be politically smart, though not intellectual otherwise. Like all her sisters, she is clever with her needle, as they had to make their own clothes before their father got to be King.

The Queen Regent of Spain chooses a word daily for the countersign, without which no one is admitted to the palace by the many guards. This is communicated to the highest military official, who happens to be Marshal Campo, who proclaimed Alfonso King.

Mrs. Oscar Wilde is said to wear the same "best" dress through the season. If not the same dress, it is made on the same plan, being a white clinging silk, embroidered down the front in gold and adorned around the neck with a high standing ruff a la Queen Bess.

Eugenie, ex-Empress, is said to have developed strange idiosyncracies, besides being a recluse. One is a tendency to Spiritualism and a belief that she can communicate with her dead Prince Imperial. It is well understood that she intends to make Princess Beatrice of England her heiress.

Queen Victoria has now reigned over England longer than any monarch but two—Henry III., and George III. She overtook Queen Elizabeth six years ago, and has outdone Edward III., who only reigned 148 days over half a century. If she lives a few years longer Victoria will have reigned longer than any royal personage of history.

The ceilings of most rooms will not need whitening every year, but they will always need sweeping, as well as the walls. No one who has not swept a wall down with a clean duster, firmly pinned on to a broom, would imagine the amount of dust that will have collected in spite of the most tidy housemaid.

That dainty lady tripping by,
How light her step, how bright her eye,
How fresh her cheek with healthful glow,
Like roses that in May time blow!
And yet few weeks have passed away
Since she was fading, day by day,
The doctor's skill could naught avail;
Weaker she grew, and thin and pale.
At last, while in a hopeless frame,
One day she said, "There is a name
I've often seen—a remedy—
Perhaps 't will help; I can but try."
And so, according to direction,
She took Dr Pierce's Favorite Prescription,
And every baleful symptom fled,
And she was raised as from the dead.

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr. Page's business, as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in his specialty, light weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality, he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

AS YOU LIKE IT.

A CRY OF UNBELIEF.

As mothers sometimes draw their children near,
And gaze into their eyes and kiss their mouths,
And say, "You do not love me," knowing the while
How full the child-heart beats with love for them,
Yet say it for the keen, ecstatic joy
Of hearing that which is so sweet to hear;
So do we say in this sad day of ours,
"There is no God; there is no good, no hope,"
And believe it not, but wait with wistful hearts
And eager ears to hear our words denied.
Men call us faithless—we, who yearn for faith,
Who long to hail the one that shall arise,
And fling our cheap words back at us with scorn,
And with impellent, passionate, grand faith
Proclaim the precious thing we long to hear.

Life in the Bahamas.

Sponging has all the attractions of a gambling adventure. Should the cruise be successful, the profits are large; enough money may be made in a short time to insure the enjoyment of months of idleness. And idleness is a real luxury when a man can recline under the shade of his own guava or orange tree, and have the latest news from the passing neighbours as they saunter along, their fanners (round flat baskets of palm leaves) piled with glowing tomatoes, large, green avocado pears, or red and yellow peppers, for sale in town—or else chew sugar cane or smoke a pipe, as the spirit moves him, taking no thought for the morrow, which is pretty sure to be sunny and balmy as to-day. Dwellers in the dark and sombre north can hardly realize the charm and joyousness that seem to radiate from earth and air in the lotus-eating southern climes. The mere sense of existence becomes in itself a happiness; one can understand what animals probably feel in pleasant pastures on brilliant days. Then, as the sun sinks downward, the golden heaven glows over a rejoicing earth, flushing every moment into richer beauty beneath the departing rays, while rosy beams of light streaming upward like so many auroras, is a singular and very beautiful effect often to be seen in a Bahama sunset. When the sun has set new beauties appear, every bush and tussock becoming alive with thousands of fireflies; and when a silvery-green moon rises in the calm, deep, sapphire sky, it is difficult to decide whether night or day be the more full of loveliness. Besides the fireflies, a fire beetle—one of the elytra—is a singular insect with a brilliant green phosphorescent light proceeding from two round spots on the thorax, added to which, when excited, the insect has the power to emit a regular blaze of light from the segments of the abdomen, of such brilliancy that one can read by its light. In Cuba ladies fasten these elytra, as ornaments, in their hair, or let them flash beneath the folds of tulle dresses.

Dipping Sheep.

Why do sheep men dip sheep? What is dipping sheep? What do they dip them in? How do they dip them? are questions asked by many amateur sheep growers. It is considered necessary by our best sheep men to dip sheep annually whether diseased or not. It may prevent disorder if not cure. Sheep men dip sheep to kill ticks, lice, and to cure scab. It is also thought by some to cause a healthy growth of wool. Sheep are seen to be scratching against fences, sheds, etc., when warm weather begins, and is led to examine the cause of such uneasines. He will probably find myriads of sheep ticks, and in some instances where sheep are kept on ranges he may find traces of scab. This, at this season of the year is not probable, as the sheep would have shown symptoms early in the spring, and the fleece parts come off in spots long before warm weather.

Dipping sheep is immersing them in a box containing a decoction of tobacco and sulphur arsenous sheep dip, or carbolic acid diluted. Where large flocks are to be dipped a tank is provided so that sheep have to swim through it, coming out upon an incline on the other side where they are detained to drain, and the drainings run back into the tank. To dip lambs all this is necessary is to hold them back down and immerse them, care being taken to keep nose out to prevent strangling.

If a flock of sheep are properly cared for each year by dipping the lambs at the right time, the adults may not need it so far as the extermination of parasites are concerned. When the warm weather comes, the heat, the biting, and scratching of the adults, cause the ticks to get upon the lambs. If the lambs are dipped about ten days after the sheep are shorn, then the ticks are all destroyed.

Tobacco dip is preferable to arsenous dips for the reason of its safety. Sometimes when a sheep has been dipped in arsenous dip and allowed to go to pasture it will lie down upon the grass. This grass when eaten by sheep will poison them. Tobacco dip is cheaply made by obtaining at the cigar factory tobacco stems. The stems can be bought cheaply, and answer as well as tobacco that costs 60 cents per pound and will kill ticks just as well, as a tick can not stand as much poison as a man. Have had tobacco chewers helping me dip that get very sick breathing the fumes arising from the tobacco. The dip should be warm.

We are not to judge of the feelings of others by what we might feel if in their place. However dark the habitation of the mole to our eyes, yet the animal itself finds the apartment sufficiently lighted.

A New York house which ten years ago employed 100 travelling salesmen now does its business entirely by illustrated catalogues and correspondence, and its trade is ahead of what it used to be. Others are moving in the same way, and in a few years hence the drummer will drum less numerously.

A little five-year-old went to the Sunday-school for the first time. He was very much elated over what he had learned. "Tell me what you heard to-day," said his mother. "It was about Lot's wife," he said, becoming dramatic; "And the angel of the Lord said to Lot's wife, skate for your life, and don't you look back; but she did look back, and turned a somersault.

CHAPTER XI.—SINK OR SWIM?

Hugh was selfish, heartless, and unscrupulous; but he was not physically a coward, a cur, or a palterer. Without one second's thought, he rushed wildly down to the water's edge, and balancing himself for a plunge, with his hands above his head, on the roots of the big tree, he dived boldly into that wild current, against whose terrific force he had once already struggled so vainly on the morning of his first arrival at Whitestrand.

Elsie had had but a few seconds' start of him; with his powerful arms to aid him in the quest, he must surely overtake and save her before she could drown, even in that mad and swirling tidal torrent. He flung himself on the water with all his force, and goaded by remorse, pity, and love—for, after all, he loved her, he loved her—he drew unwonted strength from the internal fires, as he pushed back the fierce flood on either side with arms and thews of feverish energy. At each strong push, he moved forward apace with the gliding current, and in the course of a few stout strokes he was already many yards on his way seaward from the point at which he had originally started. But his boots and clothes clogged his movements terribly, and his sleeves in particular so impeded his arms that he could hardly use them to any sensible advantage. He felt conscious at once that, under such hampering conditions, it would be impossible to swim for many minutes at a stretch. He must find Elsie and save her almost immediately, or both must go down and drown together.

He wanted nothing more than to drown with her now. "Elsie, Elsie, my darling Elsie!" he cried aloud on the top of the wave. To lose Elsie was to lose everything. The sea was running high as he neared the bay, and Elsie had disappeared as if by magic. Even in that dark black water on that moonless night he wondered he couldn't catch a single glimpse of her white dress by the reflected starlight. But the truth was the current had sucked her under—sucked her under wildly with its irresistible force only to fling her up again, a senseless burden, where sea and river met at last in fierce conflict among the roaring breakers that danced and shivered upon the shallow bar.

He swam about blindly looking round him on every side through the thick darkness with eager eyes for some glimpse of Elsie's white dress in a stray gleam of starlight; but he saw not a trace of her presence anywhere. Groping and feeling his way still with numbed limbs, that grew weary and stiff with the frantic effort, he battled on through the gurgling eddy till he reached the breakers on the bar itself. There, his strength proved of no avail—he might as well have tried to stem Niagara. The great waves, rolling their serried line against the stream from the land, caught him and twisted him about resistlessly, raising him now aloft on their foamnig crest, dashing him now down deep in their hollow trough, and then flinging him back again over some great curling mountain of water far on to the current from which he had just emerged with his stout endeavor. For ten minutes or more he struggled madly against those titanic enemies: then his courage and his muscle failed together, and he gave up the unequal contest out of sheer fatigue and physical inability to continue it longer. It was indeed an awful and appaling situation. Alone there in the dark, whirled about by a current that no man could stem, and confronted with a rearing wall of water that no man could face, he threw himself wearily back for a moment at full length looked up in his anguish from his floating couch to the cold stars overhead, whose faint light the spray every instant hid from his sight as it showered over him from the curling crests of the great billows beyond him. And it was to this that he had driven poor innocent, trustful, wronged Elsie! the one woman who, with all the force of a profound nature—profounder ten thousand times than his own—had truly loved him!

Elsie was tossing up and down there just as hopelessly now, no doubt. But Elsie had no pangs of conscience added to torment her. She had only a broken heart to reckon with.

He let himself float idly where wind and waves might happen to bear him. There was no help for it: he could swim no farther. It was all over, all over now. Elsie was lost, and for all the rest he cared that moment less than nothing. Winifred! He scorned and hated her very name. He might drown at his ease, for anything he would ever do himself to prevent it. The waves broke over him again and again. He let them burst across his face or limbs, and floated on, without endeavoring to swim or guide himself at all. Would he never sink? Was he to float and float and float like this to all eternity?

Roar—roar—roar on the bar, each roar growing fainter and fainter in his ears. Clearly receding, receding still. The current was carrying him along in a back eddy, that set strongly south-westward towards the dike of the salt marshes.

He let himself drift wherever it might take him. It took him back, back, back, steadily, till he saw the white crest of the breakers on the ridge extend like a long gray line in the dim distance upon the sea beyond him. He was well into safer water by this time: the estuary was only very rough here. He might swim if he chose. But he did not choose. He cared nothing for life, since Elsie was gone. In a sudden revulsion of wild despair, a frantic burst of hopeless yearning, he knew, for the first time in his whole life, now it was too late, how truly and deeply and intensely he had loved her. As truly and deeply as he was capable of loving anything on earth except himself; and that, after all, was nothing much to boast of.

Still, it was enough to overwhelm him for the moment with agonies of remorse, regret, and pity to make him long just then and there for instant death, as the easiest escape from his own angry and accusing conscience. He wanted to die; he yearned and prayed for it. But death obstinately refused to come to his aid. He turned himself around on his face now, and striking out just once with his wearied thighs, gazed away blankly towards the foam on the bar, where Elsie's body must still be tossing in a horrible ghastly dance of death among the careering breakers.

As he looked, a gleam of ruddy light showed for a second from a masthead just beyond the bar. A smack—a smack! coming in to the river! The sight refilled him with a faint fresh hope. That hope was too like despair; but still it was something. He swam out once more with the spasmodic energy of utter despondency. The smack might still be in time to save Elsie! He would make his way out to it, though it ran him down; if it ran him down, so much the better! he would shout aloud at the top of his voice, to outroar the breakers: "A lady is drowning! Save her!—save her!"

He struck out again with mad haste through the back current. This time he had to fight against it with his wearied limbs, and to plough his way with prodigious efforts. The current was stronger, now he came to face it, than he had at all imagined when he merely let himself drift on its surface. Battling with all his might against the fierce swirls, he hardly seemed to make any headway at all through the angry water. His strength was almost all used up now; he could scarcely last till he reached the smack.—Great heavens, what was this? She was turning!—she was turning! The surf was too much for her timbers to endure. She couldn't make the mouth of the creek. She was luffing seaward again, and it was all up, all up with Elsie.

It was Warren Relf's yawl, bearing down from Lowestoft, and trying for the first time to enter the river through the wall of breakers.

Oh, if only he had lain right in her path just then, as she rode over the waves, that she might run him down and sink him for ever, with his weight of infamy, beneath the curling billows! He could never endure to go ashore again—and to feel that he had virtually murdered Elsie.

Elsie, Elsie, poor murdered Elsie! He should hate to live, now he had murdered Elsie!

And then, as he battled still fiercely with the tide, in a flash of his nerves, he felt suddenly a wild spasm of pain seize on both his thighs, and an utter disablement affect his entire faculty of bodily motion. It was a paroxysm of cramp—overwhelming—inexpressible—and it left him in one second powerless to move or think or act or plan, a mere dead log, incapable of anything but a cry of pain, and helpless as a baby in the midst of that cruel and unheeding eddy.

He flung himself back for dead on the water once more. A choking sensation seized hold of his senses. The sea was pouring in at his nostrils and his ears. He knew he was going, and he was glad to know it. He would rather die than live with that burden of guilt upon his black soul. The waves washed over his face in serried ranks. He din't mind: he didn't struggle; he didn't try for one instant to save himself. He floated on, unconscious at last, back, slowly back, towards the bank of the salt marsh.

When Hugh Massinger next knew anything, he was dimly conscious of lying at full length on a very cold bed, and fumbling with his fingers to pull the bed clothes closer around him. But there were no bed-clothes, and everything about was soaking wet. He must be stretched in a pool of water, he thought—so damp it was all round to the touch—with a soft mattress or couch spread beneath him. He put out his hands to feel the mattress. He came upon mud, mud, deep layers of mud; all cold and slimy in the dusk of night. And then with a flash he remembered all—Elsie dead! Elsie drowned!—and knew he was stranded by the ebbing tide on the edge of the embankment. No hope of helping Elsie now. With a violent effort, he roused himself to consciousness, and crawled feebly on his knees to the firm ground. It was difficult work, floundering through the mud, with his numb limbs; but he floundered on, upon hands and feet, till he reached the shore, and stood at last, dripping with brine and crusted with soft slimy tidal ooze, on the broad bank of the moated dike that hemmed in the salt marshes from the mud-bank of the estuary. It was still dark night, but the moon had risen. He could hardly say what the time might be, for his watch had stopped, of course, by immersion in the water; but he roughly guessed, by the look of the stars, it was somewhere about half-past ten. We have a vague sense of the lapse of time even during sleep or other unconscious states; and Hugh was certain he couldn't have been floating for much more than an hour or thereabouts.

He gazed around him vaguely at the misty meadows. He was a mile or more from the village inn. The estuary, with its acrid flats of mud, lay between him and the hard at Whitestrand. Sheets of white surf still shimmered dimly on the bar far out to sea. And Elsie was lost—lost to him irrevocably.

He sat down and pondered on the bank for a while. Those five minutes were the turning-point of his life. What should he do and how comport himself under these sudden and awful and unexpected circumstances? Dazed as he was, he saw even then the full horror of the dilemma that hedged him in. Awe and shame brought him back with a rush to reason. If he went home and told the whole horrid truth, everybody would say he was Elsie's murderer. Perhaps they would even suggest that he pushed her in—to get rid of her. He dared not tell it; he dared not face it. Should he fly the village—the country—the country? That would be foolish and precipitate indeed, not to say wicked: a criminal surrender. All was not lost, though Elsie was lost to him. In his calmer mood, no longer heroic with the throes of despondency, sitting shivering there with cold in the keen breeze, between his dripping clothes, upon the bear swept bank, he said to himself many times over that all was not lost; he might still go back—and marry Winifred.

Hideous—horrible—inhuman: he reckoned even so his chance with Winifred.

The shrewd wind blew chill upon his wet clothes. It bellowed and roared with hoarse groans round the stakes on the dike sluices. His head was whirling still with asphyxia and numbness. He felt hardly in a condition to think or reason. But this was a crisis, a life and death crisis. He must pull himself together like a man, and work it all out, his doubtful course for the next three hours, or else sink for ever in a sea of obloquy, remembered only as Elsie's murderer. Everything was at stake for him—live or die. Should he jump once more into the cold wild stream—or go home quietly like a sensible man, and play his hand out to marry Winifred?

If he meant to go, he must go at once. It was no use to think of delaying or shilly-shallying. By eleven o'clock, the inn would be closed. He must steal in, unperceived, by the open French windows before eleven, if he intended still to keep the game going. But he must have his plan of action definitely mapped out none the less beforehand; and to map it out, he must wait a moment still; he must sum up chances in this desperate emergency.

Life is a calculus of varying probabilities. Was it likely he had been perceived at the Hall that evening? Did anybody know he had been walking with Elsie?

He fancied not—he believed no;—He was certain not, now he came to think of it. Thank Heaven, he had made the appointment verbally. If he'd written a note, that damning evidence might have been produced against him at the coroner's inquest. Inquest! Unless they found the body—Elsie's body—pah! how horrible to think of—but still, a man must steel himself to face facts, however ghastly and however horrible. Unless they found the body, then, there would be no inquest; and if only things were managed well and cleverly, there needn't even be any inquiry. Unless they found the body—Elsie's body!—poor Elsie's body, whirled about by the waves!—But they would never find it—they would never find it. The current had sucked it under at once, and carried it away careering madly to the sea. It would toss and whirl on the breakers for a while, and then sink unseen to the fathomless abysses of the German Ocean.

He hated himself for thinking all this—with Elsie drowned—or not yet drowned even—and yet he thought it, because he was not man enough to face the alternative.

Had Elsie told any one she was going to meet him? No; she wouldn't even tell Winifred of that, he was sure. She met him there often by appointment, it was true, but always quietly: they kept their meetings a profound secret between them.

Had any one seen them that evening together? He couldn't remember noticing anybody.—How shrill the wind blew through his dripping clothes. It cut him in two; and his head reeled still.—No; nobody, nobody. He was quite safe upon that score at least. Nobody knew he was out with Elsie.

Could he go back, then, and keep it all quiet, saying nothing himself, but leaving the world to form its own conclusions? A sudden thought flashed in: an intuitive moment across his brain. A Plan!—a Plan! How happy! A Policy. He saw his way out of it all at once. He could set everything right by a simple method. Yes, that would do! It was bold, but not risky. He might go now; the scheme for the future was all matured. Nobody need ever suspect anything. A capital idea! Honour was saved; and he might still go back and marry Winifred.

Elsie dead! Elsie drowned! The world lost, and his life a blank! But he might still go back and marry Winifred.

He rose and shook himself in the wind like a dog. The Plan was growing more definite and rounded in his mind each moment. He turned his face slowly towards the lights at Whitestrand. The estuary spread between him and them with its wide mud-flats. Cold and tired as he was, he must make all speed for the point where it narrowed into the running stream near Snade meadows. He must swim the river there, with what legs he had left, and cross to the village. There was no time to be lost: it was neck or nothing. At all hazards, he must do his best to reach the inn before the doors were shut and locked at eleven.

When he left the spot where he had been tossed ashore, his idea for the future was fully worked out. He ran along the bank with eager haste in the direction of Whitestrand. Once only did he turn and look behind him. A ship's light gleamed feebly in the offing across the angry sea. She was beating up against a headwind to catch the breeze outside towards Lowestoft or Yarmouth.

A School of Alligators.

We had reached the San Juan river, and following its course for a rapid ride of a dozen or more miles, came to a series of wide, low bayous, or lagoons, which set back from the river in some places for miles.

These were filled with all manner of luxuriant tropic vegetation and reeds similar to those from which the Guines valley takes its name, interparsed at intervals with stretches of wild cane. Here and there drifts of moss clung from limbs of gigantic trees to the very surface of the still lagoons.

The silence of the locality was something wonderful, says Edgar L. Wakeman in the St. Louis Republican. Strange birds, with long, gaunt bodies and trailing legs, circled dolorously above. Not a ripple broke upon the surface of the slimy bayous. The reeds were straight and still. The grass moss was motionless in the shadows.

The dogs kept close to our horses' heels, and when we halted and tied, the latter crouched close and silent beside them. I had noticed Jose at work upon some old pieces of blackened canvas. When we dismounted he removed his sombrero and put one of these upon his head, placing others in the waist of his blouse.

"Come," said Don Manuel, "we will show you how harmless alligators are when you know them, and what a simple thing it is for Cubans to kill them!"

Moving stealthily along the edge of the lagoon, we suddenly heard here, there, beyond, and again as if all about us, heavy splashes into the water, and the quick parting and subsequent trembling of countless swaths of reeds showed where unwieldy objects had made startled passages. We were among a school of alligators.

How many? "Well, maybe several thousand within a square mile," answered the Don, complacently.

Jose had a tremendous quebrahacha clumped stick as large, almost as heavy and quite as strong as a crowbar, in his hand. At a word from Don Manuel he glided forward and flung himself in a reclining posture on a firm bit of ground, perhaps fifty feet from the edge of the lagoon, while the Don and myself hid in the edge of the jungle.

An almost unendurable silence of perhaps half an hour ensued. Then gentle splashings among the reeds were heard. These were shortly followed by many soft, half-whistled gruntings.

Directly the heads of two alligators parted the reeds near where Jose lay motionless. For a time these were also motionless as an Oriental study in bronze. Then the bodies followed, slowly and cautiously at first, but soon with incredible rapidity they moved upon Jose. I believe I was never so apprehensive and excited in my life.

"Silence!" hissed Don Manuel.

Instantly one flopped about, scampered to the land-edge and whisked himself into the bayou. But the other, with snapping eyes and quivering jaws, was bent on having Cuban meat for breakfast.

In another instant he was at Jose's side. The latter bounded into the air like a rubber ball. Flinging his canvas hat into the alligator's jaws, which snapped and crunched it hideously, the quebrahacha stick whistled through a wide air-circle and descended with a crash into the reptile's skull. Before its first quiver and sprawl Joe's machete was through its shoulder a foot into the solid soil beneath, and the bull alligator, seventeen feet in length, was dead. Three alligators were despatched in this remarkable way.

PASSING NOTES.

Ontario bank bills are subject to a discount of one-half per cent. when used in the purchase of money orders in the Maritime Provinces. The business men complain of the discount; but in all probability the Government cannot avoid it. If the Eastern banks demand the discount, the Post office Department must demand it also or lose on the transaction. Mr. Geo. Hague thinks all Canadian bill should be accepted at par throughout the Dominion, and certainly the intrests of trade make this reform desirable.

In the vicinity of Clayton, N. Y., lie the remains of three of the old British war vessels used in the war of 1812. Two were sold at the conclusion of the war to American timber dealers, and one was a prize captured by the United States war ships. These vessels, so long as they lasted, must have been curiosities in the way of inland marine architecture. The British admiralty supposed Lake Ontario was a salt water sea, and thoughtfully had the ships equipped with colossal tanks for fresh water.

The Prohibition Convention voted in favour of female suffrage. If women are given the franchise they will, no doubt, accept the other duties of citizenship. They will, for example, enrol themselves in the militia and sit on juries. When this happy time comes the incident quoted by Rev. Dr. Griffin in a speech before the Convention will be enacted in real life:

Baby's in the cradle and
Crying like fury,
Father's baking pancakes,
And mother's on a jury.

Under the new Quebec corporation tax bill the Bank of Montreal will be called upon to pay an additional $2,300 a year, the Quebec Bank $350 more, the Bank of Commerce $1,200 more, and the Merchants' and Molson's a proportional increase, while the Jacques Cartier and Ville Marie Banks and the Banque du Peuple will pay reduced taxes. The tax of $5 imposed on telegraph companies for each country office will, according to a high authority, result in the closing of the rural agencies which are not actually profitable. The increase in the taxes is doubly distasteful to the corporations. They expected to be relieved of the former imposts.

The officers of the French army are jubilant over the unbounded matrimonial prospects which open up before them. In the past every officer has been forbidden to marry without the consent of his colonel and the production of a certificate stating that the intended bride had at least a fortune of 20,000 francs. This regulation has always been felt to be a grievance by the French officers, although if the truth be told few would care to marry a bride having a dot less than the sum named. Nevertheless, their manhood demanded that they should have the liberty to take a smaller sum. The French Minister of War, it is said, proposes to abolish the restriction and to allow the officers the right of choosing whom they will as their helpmates.

The defaulting Brooklyn cashier, Albert E. Krahe, who was arrested in Montreal and consented to go back to the States without the necessary extradition order, on being arraigned at the Court of Sessions, Brooklyn, on his return, pleaded that his salary was only $12 a week, and that, occupying the position he did, it was difficult to avoid stealing. Of course such an excuse cannot be admitted for a moment; but, nevertheless many people will think that a corporation or bank which pays its cashier a miserable pittance of $12 a week, deserves to get robbed for its folly in exposing an underpaid official to the temptation of so responsible a position.

DUGOUT AND MAN-OF-WAR.

Queer Craft That Lie Together Victoria Harbor.

A correspondent of the New York Sun, who has been visiting British Columbia, writes as follwes from Victoria:—I doubt if there can be found in all the world a more interesting naval or marine display than fell under my notice here the other day. Early in the morning I was rowed across a narrow area of the harbor to the Indian reservation opposite the city. The Indians, who are called Siwashes, though that is merely their own name for a man, live in decrepit, unpainted houses, amid shabby surroundings, by means of fishing and intermittent miscellaneous work for the white men. A smooth, flat bit of shore they use as a general boat landing, and here were drawn up half a dozen of their canoes. These are so peculiar that I desired a close view of one, and was delighted when I reached the place to find three of the bucks building an immense and superb one. The peculiarity of these boats is that they have tall, erect, prows, shaped like the necks and heads of animals, or, rather always of one shape, which suggests a dog's head on a very long neck. Like as the Siwash, Tlinkets, and all the other Indians on the Pacific coast are to the Chinese, they are not more like them then these boats are like the boats still in use all along the coast of China at a distance from the large cities.

These Siwash canoes are really dugouts, made by scooping out the inside of great tree trunks. Some are no longer than is needed for two persons, but they are all sizes, even up to gigantic lengths, possible of attainment only by searching the giant growths in of that coast. These Indians shape the exteriors of these dugouts very scientifically and gracefully, and then add the peculiar prows I speak of, and also the stern pieces that are akin to the prows in design, though the suggestion of an animal's head is not carried out in the stern pieces.

The Indian shipbuilders I found at work were using the primitive tools. Who can say how primitive they were? The knife or axe, with which the main work was done, was something like our adze, but the blade was strapped to the handle with a leather thong, and was so fixed that the blade and handle came together at an acute angle, the edge of the blade being quite close to the knuckles of whoever was using it. The blade was of steel, but it was evident that in the day when these Indians used sharp-edged flint to cut with, the flint might have been, and presumably was fastened to the handle in the same way. The blade had a cutting edge no wider than that of a large chisel, and when one saw the size of the cavity in the huge, hard log, and considered that it had been dug with this little implement in the hands of one man, it was impossible to avoid admiring the patience of the savage, however one might decry his lack of progress and enterprise. These boats ride through extraordinary seas, and are so swift that few white canoeists or oatboat sailors care to enter against the Indians in their races.

Before I left the reservation I wandered across the lovely neck of land, a far better site for this city than that across the river where it has been built, and presently came to an estuary, or indentation, possessing the characteristics of a river. The grass and the jungle of the woodland met the water's edge, and the entire scene was placid, luxurious, and beautiful. As I walked along I saw the white bulky body of a steamboat heeled over on its side on the opposite bank of the water. It was nothing like the steamers I had seen on the coast. It was like a New York boat. Fancy my surprise when on nearer approach I read upon her pilot house a New York name, the Wilson G. Hunt. That produced a wonderful sensation. Amid what scenes had nearly all my friends seen this very boat time and time again in the days when she was one of the proudest vessels in the great city's fleet! So here was the Wilson G. Hunt that had disappeared and been forgotten. Worse yet, she has lived so long that even her last owners have also forgotten her. They have left her beached in an unused waterway to rot away. Like an old horse she has been turned out to die.

This once proud old boat was practically born again when she reached the Pacific coast, and out here is connected with another set of memories even more entrancing than those her name provokes in New York. She was taken to California during the gold fever, and the speculation was such a fortunate one that she actually made a million dollars a year plying between the coast and the diggings on the Sacramento River. Her owners charged as high as $40 and $50 for a passage on her, and never, unless it may have been in Australia, has a boat carried such motley crouds or been the scene of such hilarity, prodigal waste, and disorder as she. How strange it is that the man she is named for is still alive, and likely to outlive all trace even of her memory.

Not 200 yards from this Siwash boat landing floats the first steamship that sailed the Pacific Ocean. She is the Beaver, and came out under the ownership of the Hudson's Bay Company fifty-three years ago. Her route was around Cape Horn, and she made the passage from London in 163 days. She is not nearly as considerable a boat as many of our coasting schooners on the Atlantic, and is low and broad and short in her outlines. But she was as great a wonder in her day as she is now a curiosity. A local writer who calls her "the Metbuselah of steamships," says of her that a duchess broke the traditional bottle of champagne over her bow and christened her by the name she still bears. It was not considered safe to trust to her engines, so little confidence was then displayed in steam navigation, and she made the trip under sail. Before she was warfed, however, she got up steam and astonished the people by paddling her way proudly before the multitude assembled to see her. After that she was constantly under steam.

FLYING HITHER AND THITHER,

carrying stores and collecting furs. In time she passed into the hands of the Imperial Hydrographers, and now she is doing efficient service as a towboat, still using the original 75 horse power engines built by Bolton & Watt in England before Victoria ascended the throne. A part of her deck housing has been torn away, but otherwise she is as she was in her glory except that while she was a trading boat in the fur service she was considerable of a man-of war for these waters then, for she carried an armament of six nine-pounders.

Later on this same eventful day I drove out between the rose bushes that line the road to Esquimalt. That is the most important suburb of Victoria, and is barbarously pronounced "Squmalt" by the Victorians. Here is the only naval station of Great Britain on the Pacific coast. As though to complete the remarkable experience of the day in the most fitting manner, I soon found myself seated at the table in the ward of her Majesty's iron man-of-war the Triumph. The immense cost of maintaining this station is spent in Victoria and is her chief and most reliable source of income. In the minds of those who would embroil us with England this station is a constant and close menace to our Pacific coast cities, any one of which the great guns carried on these vessels could batter down in a few hours without the possibility of our preventing the damage as we are now situated. Once the British fleet sailed from this lovely little harbor on exactly such an errand. It was when during the heat of the so-called "54 40 or fight" movement in settlement of our Northwest boundary an Americain on San Juan Island called upon our troops for protection against a British order of arrest that was served upon him and that he resisted. The English Admiral vowed he would blow the Yankee troops off the face of the island. But not a gun was fired on any of his vessels, and, on the contrary during the five years that our soldiers and the British marines occupied the island many balls and parties were given and attended by the men on both sides.

Her Majesty's ship, the Triumph, illustrated the progress that has been made since the primitive dugout was the best war ship man employed, and since the day when the Beaver, with her battery of nine-pounders, commanded awe wherever she sailed. The Triumph can be likened to nothing so closely as to a gigantic watch shaped like a ship and set afloat so completely filled is she with

MACHINERY AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR.

From keelson to upper deck and from stem to stern she is closely packed with engines, shafting, turn tables, steam pulleys, pumps, reels, pipes, wires, and gear of every sort that contributes toward the loading, sighting, and turning of her guns, the transportation of shot, shell, and cartridges, the launching of her torpedoes of polished steel that shine like jewellery, the feeding of her electric lights, the working of her rudder, and the employment of all her other manifold appointments. One cannot help feeling when aboard one of these modern ships that the progress in implements of warfare is hastening warfare to some point not easy to ascertain, though the appearance is that it will soon be made too expensive to be indulged in for any but the very gravest reasons. This ship, for instance, is so filled with delicate machinery that the effect of a shot or shell striking her anywhere would be certain great loss in money and in the working value of the ship. So overloaded with fragile and delicate appurtenances is every first class ship nowadays that they cannot even be run up alongside a wharf or touch abroadside against any other vessel without a certainty of serious damage to important appliance.

While I was at Esquimalt I discovered a work under charge of the British Government, of which no American paper has had any account, though it concerns the United States indirectly in a manner that may be of grave interest. It is the work upon the new naval graving or dry dock, now almost finished. This huge dock is 450 feet long on the coping level, and 430 feet long on the floor. It is ninety feet wide on top and 41 feet wide at the bottom. It is excellently constructed of hard sandstone, quarried near by, with a trauling caisson of wrought iron. Fortunately for any enemies of Great Britain on the Pacific coast of North and South America, the dock has been finished on the basis of naval requirements of twenty years ago, and is not now large enough for the first-class vessels in the English navy. Still more fortunately for this country, it is not so large or so good a dock as the one under way in California. The contract for this Canadian dock was awarded in November, 1884, and work was begun early in the following year. It cost about $900,000, which is considered a low price. One of the terms upon which British Columbia and Vancouver Island entered the Canadian confederation was that the Dominion Government should guarantee interest on £100,000 at 5 per cent. for ten years to aid this work. This was changed to the granting of a subsidy of £50,000 for the dock, and then the wily politicians got £30,000 from Great Britian. Later still, in 1874, this was increased to £50,000, and still later, in 1883, the Dominion Government took the entire work in hand and paid back to British Columbia about $300,000.

Steel's horse was then recovered while the Jackson animal was left at Dutton. On Tuesday the magistrate will give his decision.

THE summery frontispiece of the American Agriculturist for August is a pretty fishing scene; a woodland nook, quiet and cool, where the lights and shadows of the trees play over the still surface of the stream and lily-pads float on the water. A young fisherman sits among the grasses on the bank with fishing line cast out and one finger lifted in suspense at the instant of "A Sure Catch." The girl behind him looks over his head with breathless interest, and even the dog guarding the lunch-basket is spell-bound with the importance of the crisis. The picture is the introduction to a number full of bright ideas and practical interest.

It appears that the company have filed in the registry office plans of its western extension through the city, west from Richmond street crossing diagonally both Richmond and Ann streets, crossing George street just north of Mount Pleasant, and striking Oxford street at a point north of Carling's brewery, and crossing the river just north of the present Oxford street bridge.

Revs. Crossley and Hunter will visit Windsor in August.

SEAFORTH, July 17th, 1888.

Editor of the ENTERPRISE:—

With your permission, I would like to address a few remarks to the teachers and pupils of West Elgin on the Entrance Examination. This year's examination, though it has not been by any means an easy one, has, I think, been in many respects an excellent one. If we except the Arithmetic, which was, without doubt, too severe for entrance pupils, there has not been a single "bad" paper. Not only was there an entire absence of catch questions, but some of the papers were a liberal education in themselves. The eighth question of Section I. in English Literature, for example, contains more culture than whole books on "Deportment"

Now, as to the answers these papers called forth, a word may not be out of place.

The general style of answers was certainly worthy of commendation; literature and composition in particular being much above the standard of a year or two ago.

While this is so, and the teachers of West Elgin are to be congratulated that it is so, still I think they will not take it amiss, if I point out one or two particulars where there is still room for improvement.

Firstly, then, as to spelling. In many cases it was simply deplorable This is the more to be regretted, as spelling, if not mastered before the Entrance Examination, will more than likely never be mastered, and prove an ever recurring source of misery.

As you are aware, the department requires the examiner in every case to deduct a mark for each misspelled word, wherever found. Twelve marks was a common deduction on one paper; sometimes an ambitious candidate reached twenty. This applies equally to those who failed and to those who were successful. In all papers, moreover, mistakes of omission of a letter such as spelling "same" "sam," and errors in the more difficult proper names were not counted. Such attempts as "Pit" and "Duton" were common.

Quite as serious as these mistakes was the utter lack of punctuation. Many had not the remotest suspicion of the use of periods or capital letters; others again divided words such as "white" if they occurred at the end of a line, thus "w-hite."

Then, too, the symbol "&" occurred again and again in literature and composition, subjects above all others which should be models of style and free from everything not in good literary form.

Another serious defect, and one that deducted seriously from neatness, was the lack of all distinguishing marks between two questions. Not only was there no space left after one question was finished before commencing the next, but in many cases question nine would end and question seven begin on the same line.

Of course it is always understood that there were many papers quite free from reproach in the respects referred to above. A little attention to these points, however, and some previous drilling on the part of the teacher would remedy these defects where they exist and make the papers of the pupils of West Elgin compare favorably with the best tn the Province.

Thanking you for your space, I remain,

Yours truly,
JAMES SHORT.

THE WALKING DELEGATE.

MONTREAL, July 20.—Judge Dandurand to-day rendered judgment in the case against Walking Delegate Dalton of the Knights of Labor, accused of besetting ship laborers at the present strike on the wharf. In rendering judgment the judge said:

"The law for the protection of both is as perfect as any law can be. The defence did not deny that the accused was watching and besetting and here came in a most extraordinary privilege that has been extended to labor—that is, the right in case of a strike to obtain or give information. Our law on this point is exactly the same as the English law.

"The whole question rested on the motive of the accused. The men the prisoner represented wished for higher wages. He asked that a raise be granted. This was refused and his men then left the ship. None of the union men stayed. He had obtained all the information he had a right to have. Did he leave then? No, he stayed and asked the non union men not to go to work in the name of God.

"His presence there under the circumstances threatened the liberty of the non-union men and the liberty of the subject will always be maintained in this court."

As this was a test case he would impose a nominal penalty of $2 or eight days.

An appeal will be taken.

A burn or cut will heal quickly and leave less scar if Victoria Carbolic Salve is applied at once.

UNDENIABLY TRUE.

"I have used Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry and found it a sure cure for summer complaint. I was very sick and it cured me entirely." Alexander W. Grant, Moose Creek, Ont.

CROP PROSPECTS IN THE NORTH-WEST.—Senator Ogilvie, of Montreal, who has just returned from a trip to the Pacific coast, says: "The crops from the boundaries of Manitoba to the west, where they have usually been short, are simply splendid, and better I never saw. I saw wheat in the ear standing four feet high, and as thick as it can stand for hundreds of acres. The farmers have usually complained of drought, but this year there has been plenty of rain, if not too much, but the appearance of the crops is totally beyond anything I ever dreamed of, and I was always a hopeful man of Manitoba."

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

We are taught that everything is made to fill some purpose. The reason that Burdock Blood Bitters has succeeded in being placed in the front rank of modern medicines is that it fills so well the purpose for which it was intended—that of curing diseases of the stomach, liver and blood.

You Carry
A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."
Here is an instance of
who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:
"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."
John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."
T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

A RICH GOLD FIND.—The richest discovery of gold ever made outside the Comstock lode was made at the Lake Superior Iron Company's shaft, seven miles from Ishpeming, Mich., on July 20. Three hundred pounds of quartz carrying free gold at the rate of over $60,000 to the ton was uncovered by one blast and brought into the city where it created the wildest excitement.

POULTRY IN SUMMER.

It seems very hard to keep poultry shut up during hot weather, and so it often is. But by taking the needed care their lot may be made very comfortable, and the trouble be amply repaid in eggs. The heavy fowls, the Asiatics, need only a low enclosure, but the constant layers, such as the Leghorns, need a high fence. The present styles of wire netting allow one to build an effective enclosure at a moderate outlay. If the fowls find their wants provided for within the yard, they will have less tendency to roam than if comfort was lacking. When fowls roam abroad, green vegetable food and fresh insects are found in abundance. If there is, as there should be on every farm, a garden of good size, the waste from the vegetables as well as the weeds should be thrown to the fowls.

Another method to supply them with vegetable food and insects also is to measure off two ample beds within the yard, and break them up with the spade or plow. Make a frame of the size of the bed, cover it with wire netting, and provide sides about six inches high. These sides may be boards of the proper width, and held up by strong stakes to which the boards may be nailed, or by using two stakes, one on each side of the board. Spade up one of the beds, allowing the birds to pick up the worms and insects (for you can't well prevent this.) Sow it thickly to rye, pack down or roll the surface, and put on the frame. If after the rye starts the birds manage to get at the plants, make the sides of the frame higher. When the rye reaches the net work, spade up and sow the other bed in the same manner, allowing the fowls to eat off the grain shoots as they come up through the wire. When the rye of the second bed comes up through the netting, take the wire from the first frame and let the fowls have free access to it, to eat what they will, and scratch for what they may find. In two or three days spade up bed number one, turning under the roots and whatever of the stalks the fowls have left on it, and they also should have left a liberal manuring. Sow anew and treat as before, alternating the beds until it becomes too late to sow. The last sowing should leave a good crop upon the ground, from which the birds shall be kept during the winter by the use of the frames. The green rye will start very early and be very welcome to the fowls, which should be allowed to to forage upon one of the beds, while the other crop is growing to be fed through the frame, and the same rotation continued. The rye may sometimes alternated with oats, mustard or what other crops may be preferred, but a winter grain should be sown at the last sowing.

Ground bone may be applied to the beds as a fertilizer, and when the hens have their way with the beds they will pick up a lot of egg-making material, but this should not be the only food of the kind furnished. Ground oyster or clam shells, and ground bones, which can usually be bought in cities, should be given freely. At a distance from such markets look to home resources. Bones from the kitchen should be saved and brought into available shape by grinding or pounding Look to the restautants and saloons, which in far inland villages have "shell oyster" in cold weather, and engage their shells beforehand. In some lakes and shallow rivers, fresh water clams or muscles, as they are called, are very abundant, often so plenty that they may be raked out; the shells of these are mostly so thin that they do not need to be ground. If placed in a strong box they may be crushed with a pounder sufficiently to allow the fowls to get at the animals within, while they break the shells smaller.

Fowls that are shut up in hot weather need extra attention as to cleanliness—both in the houses and without. Whitwash, use kerosene for lice, remove the maure frequently or cover it with dry earth; do not forget the dust bath, which must be under cover where it may not be a mud bath.

If fowls can roam about at will, many think if they are give their evening feed of grain they have done their whole duty by them, and the creatures are bound to take care of themselves. Some do not even give the nightly food, thinking that they will come home to visit the nest boxes in return for past favors. Water is one of the necessities to fowls, always, and when they are at large the supply often runs short. Runs from the drains that seem abundant, go dry in June, and the poor birds have to travel far to find water, and if found, it is often unfit. See that the birds when at large can always find good water without tresspassing upon the domestic supply or that of a neighbor. If they must get this water from a river or a lake, see that they have an easy and a safe approach. Water may often be abundant and near at hand, and yet on account of steep banks they cannot get at it, and must go without until they go home at night.—American Agriculturist for August.

EASILY UNDERSTOOD.
The causes of summer complaint, diarrhœa, dysentery, etc., are the excessive heat, eating green fruit, impure water, over exertion and sudden chill. Dr. Fowler's Wild Strawberry is an Infallible and prompt remedy for all bowel complaints from whatever cause.

Money must be plentiful in the market as will be seen by the following: Commencing August 1st the banks reduce the rate of interest on deposit receipts from 4 to 3 per cent.

COUNTERFEITERS COMMITTED.

SARNIA, July 25.—At the examination of Chas. Johnston, W. O. Parsons and Benjamin Mackenzie on the charge of counterfeiting was taken up here today. Knight, the party who has been committed for trial for passing counterfeit money at Kingston, testified that he got $500 in counterfeits of the Bank of British North America from a man named Coultis at Point Edward last April and that Johnston was in the company of Coultis. Knight went to Kingston a couple of days afterwards and in a couple of hours passed $300 of it.

Alexander Brownley, of Ailsa Craig, also gave evidence to the effect that he has obtained money from both Parsons and Mackenzie and that Johnston told him he was dealing in the money and would get it for him.

Chief Sherwood and Inspector O'Leary of the secret service, who had been engaged on the case and who made the arrest, also testified. The three prisoners were committed.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

Regulate the Liver and Bowels by the judicious use of National Pills, they are purely vegetable.

The remedy which most successfully combats malarial disorders, is Ayer's Ague Cure. It is a purely vegetable compound, and contains neither quinine nor any other dangerous ingredient. Warranted to cure chills and fever.

Notice is given of application to Parliament for the incorporation of a company to build a railway from Victoria, B.C., to Shoal Harbor, Vancouver Island, to establish ferries to points on the mainland at or near Point Garry and Canoe Pass, and to build one or more lines of railway to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the United States system of railways.

CERTAIN CURE.
A cure for Cholera Morbus. A positive cure for this dangerous complaint, and for all acute or chronic forms of bowel complaint incident to summer and fall is found Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, to be procured from any druggist or medicine dealer.

A revivalist requested all in the congregation who paid their debts to rise. The rising was general. After they had taken their seats, a call was made for those who did not pay their debts, and one solitary individual arose and explained that he was an editor and could not pay, because all the rest of the congregation were owing him the subscription to his paper.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

A person who happened to be in Waterford recently, states that he saw one of the most barefaced swindles ever attempted. It was getting dusk when a couple driving along one of the principal streets suddenly stopped, and lighting some lights the man announced that he had thirty packages to dispose of in one of which was a valuable prize, said packages to be sold at 50 cents each. He also said as soon as the packages were disposed of and before they were opened his wife would show them a feat of mesmerism. The packages were soon disposed of, when the man took a spool of thread and unwinding some of it told those who had bought packages to take hold of the thread while his wife held the spool in her hand. He then asked his wife what she had, when she replied it was "the greatest string of suckers she ever had."

Sudden Death at Galt.

GALT, July 29.—Edward Edwards, aged 43, an employe at Goldie & McCulloch's safe works, died very suddenly at his residence last night. Mr. Edwards was secretary for the Forester's Society and remained up late writing. Mrs. Edwards retired at the usual hour and awoke between 3 and 4 o'clock this morning. Finding her husband had not come to bed she went to see what was keeping him. She was horrified to find him cold in death, sitting in the chair with his hands folded apparently sleeping. A doctor was sent for, who said that death had occured four hours previous, and was caused by the bursting of a blood vessel in the brain. Mrs. Edwards is in delicate health, and is left with five children, the eldest 14 years of age.

DUBLIN, July 30.—The libel action of Wm. O'Brien v. The Cork Constitution has resulted in favor of Mr. O'Brien for £100 damages. He claimed £5000.

TORONTO TO QUEBEC.

Editor of the ENTERPRISE:—

A few stray remarks on a trip from Ontario's capital to that of fairer Quebec, though they add nothing to the information of your intelligent readers, may serve to beguile a few moments of their leisure.

Promptly at 2 o'clock p.m. the "Corinthian" leaves the slimy waters of Queen's Wharf, at the foot of Yonge street, Toronto. Around the island, shaggy with boats and fittingly named after the great Canadian oarsman, we go. Soon the summer cottages with which it is dotted is in our rear, and the Heights of Scarboro' are before us. The steep bank, with its gables of sand' not unlike those of native Tyrconnell, is everywhere crowned with scrubby pine, balsam and evergreens of various kinds, and as it is within seven miles of the city forms a very pleasant pic-nic ground for the crowded metropolitians.

For four hours the boat ripples past the dark green shore with its bright yellow bordor of barley, till suddenly a beautiful ravine opens up, and the pretty village of Bowmanville comes in view.

A few passengers come on board and after as delightful a sail of an hour and a half as one could wish, the shore loses for the first time its steepness and on the gentle slope rises the fairest town of the lake—Port Hope. The long pier is crowded with evening strollers. There is evidently no Salvation Army there, for the youth and beauty of the town all bent their evening stroll down the long pier to greet the approach of the steamer. The little boats were darting in and out everywhere and completed the animated scene.

At Cobourg there were similar swarms of smaller craft and the similar handkerchief adieus.

The passengers now began to bring forth their overcoats and range themselves around the upper deck to catch the cooling breeze of evening and the last glimpse of the fading land. And with the aid of the rising moon a beautiful glimpse it was.

One by one, however, as sleep overcame them—or, to speak it more classically, as they were about to resign themselves to the arms of "Murphy," they retired to the narrow berths of the crowded stateroom. Some few unfortunates pillowed themselves on the cushions of the open cabin, and about twelve o'clock only the hoarse breathing of the engine could be heard.

At four next morning sweet Morpheus forsook my eyelids and hastily descending from my perch and dressing I reached the outer deck just as we were shoving alongside the Kingston wharf. The old, stone-built fortress city loomed up gray in front, while on every side were forts and battlements that bespoke the martial nature of the place. I dare say the old guns could still speak volumes were there another menacing Wilkinson. A brilliantly uniformed supporter of her Majesty's flag was among the newcomers.

And now for the Thousand Islands! Down the blue St. Lawrence we sweep past islands dotting the river like great warts, themselves dotted with cedars and firs or occasionally quite bare. For miles and miles along both banks are solid rock. The islands partake of the same nature, and in some places they are literally huge stones standing out of the water, without even sunburnt grass to cover their nakedness. They vary in size from a mile to a few yards in circumference. Wherever fancy or means dictated a beautiful summer cottage or castle is erected, and tourists are seen waving their handkerchiefs at the passing vessel or loosening their flag-decked boats for a sail on the clear St. Lawrence. Even the most callous could not but be impressed with the beauty of the scene. I felt a little flutter myself.

At 6 a.m. we touched at Clayton, a pretty little landing on the American side, and received a host of aggressive brothers and sisters of Johnathan. The eye of one (of the brethren) fell on the bright uniform of the Kingston cadet. "What's that?" said he to a Canadian acquaintance; when informed that he was a sergeant of the artillery, "Humph, you dress them up well! Those fellows must get good pay now to dress like that."

An antiquated looking town is Brockville. Many of the old frame buildings are already hoary, and the stone looks as though it had stood a century. Albeit it seems quite ready to stand another.

Before reaching Prescott a fine old windmill is seen, and just below it another, the scene of several bloody conflicts. Now its only occupation seems to be to look down in haughty silence on the voyageur.

Between Prescott and Cornwall occur the first of the rapids that enliven and vary the very variety of the panorama through which we have all morning been steadily moving.

As we near the Long Sault all is bustle and excitement. The bow of the majestic "Corinthian" is crowded entering the surging mass of waters. Dancing through the waves several passengers are thrown from their feet, and everybody laughs and pronounces it perfect. On the left bank runs the canal, for the Sault is too rapid for vessels to climb unaided.

At Coteau Landing we stop to take on the Indian pilot, and from this on the excitement is on tip-toe.

The Cedar Rapids are soon passed and at last comes the Lachine. The islands that stud the river wind and spread about its waters and while they render navigation difficult and dangerous for traffic they certainly add to the pleasure of the traveller. Some three hours after shooting the Uper Lachine the black waters of the Ottawa join us from the left and run on beside the clear waves of the mighty St. Lawrence till Lake St. Francis finally succeeds in mingling them. Passing under the new railway bridge at Caughnawaga we enter the Lower Lachine. One might go to a worse place than China if the gallant Indian at the wheel did not turn us almost at right angles off that defiant rock ahead. But our boat seems to lead a charmed life among the rocks, and in half an hour we have passed under the Victoria Tubular Bridge and are in Montreal (7 p.m.)

Here I might weary you with a description of the "myriad" boats; the huge buildings; the narrow streets—barely wide enough for two teams to pass in; la league Francais spoken on all sides; the magnificent churches, especially Notre Dame, from the top of which Vermont can be seen; and lastly, the mountain which the adventurous Jacques Cartier well named "Mount Royal," but I must forbear and say

An Revoir,

AS YOU LIKE IT.

WHILE IT IS DAY.

If I could live without the thought of death.
Forgetful of time's waste, the soul's decay,
I would not ask for other joy than breath:
With light and sound of birds and the sun's ray,
I could sit on untroubled day by day,
Watching the grass grow and the wild flowers range
From blue to yellow and from red to grey,
In natural sequence as the seasons change.
I could afford to wait but for the hurt
Of this dull tick of time which chides my ear;
But now I dare not sit with loins ungirt
And staff unlifted, for death stands too near.
I must be up and doing, aye, each minute:
The grave gives time for rest when we are in it.

—Wilfred Blunt.

CAWS AND EFFECT.

Like to a cloud down came the crows;
The field was soon upturn;
Where'er 'twas sown, in hills or rows,
They ate the farmer's corn.

Voraciously they tore them out—
The seed and greening blade,
And while the work they went about
A deafening noise they made.

A mad, mad man the farmer was,
A mad, mad man was he:
"I dreaded when I heard the caws,
That the effect I'd see."

For the convenience of housekeepers a sad or flatiron has been invented which makes use of the principle of expansion of metals by heat to ring a small bell when the iron is hot enough to iron clothes with. A pot that well sound a gong when about to boil over may be expected next.

The Russian law forbids jokes on "religion, politics, officials, the law, your neighbor, the Czar's highways and the weather, which is made for all." We always supposed that the reason there were no funny men in Russian journalism was because the "j" box couldn't stand the racket, but we see our mistake now.

There is no event in life which does not carry its own lesson; and that lesson ought to be recognized by us as the best that we can learn at that particular moment. Failure in any enterprise is just as much a fact as success in that same enterprise would have been. But it rests with each person to make every fact in his experiences a factor in his progress.

An ancient canoe has been found in the Tunhovd Fjord, in Valdres, in south Central Norway. It has been hollowed out by means of red hot stones, and is four and a half metres long and eighty centimetres broad. It is in fair condition. The find is of interest, as records say no other primitive vessel of the kind has been found inland in Norway. The boat will be sent to the museum at Christiana.

A curious society was formed in London some two years ago, whose aim was to abolish the custom of ringing church bells before religious services on Sunday. The other day Parliament knocked the society out of existence, for the church people of all denominations produced such a pressure on the House of Commons that they passed an act giving the bells full swing. In the course of the controversy the historical fact seems to have been established that the use of bells in churches for the purpose of calling worshippers together was first introduced over fourteen hundred years ago.

Empress Eugenie, early in her reign, wrote of the late Emperor Frederick:—"The prince is tall and handsome, almost a head taller than the Emperor; he is slight and fair, with a straw-colored moustache, a German, as Tacitus might describe him, of chivalrous courtesy, with something of the Hamlet about him. . . . His companion, a Gen Moltke, (or some such name), is a taciturn gentleman, but by no means a dreamer, and, being perpetually on the lookout, takes one by surprise with his pointed remarks. They are an imposing race, these Germans. Louis calls them the race of the future.

Here's a true story, says The Pittsburgh Dispatch, from the colored society. An old auntie of a complexion rivaling the night for blackness came to do the weekly wash at the house of a friend of mine not long ago. The lady of the house asked how her health was, and Susie, the ebony mistress of the laundry, replied:—"I'se pretty well, t'ank de Lawd; I'se got a lil misery in de lef' knee, but t'aint of no 'count. De ole man miss, am pow'ful bad. There are ills besetting us which it is impossible to avoid, but many of us—all of us, perhaps—suffer most from those we bring upon ourselves. And yet we rarely confess our share in producing them; we excuse ourselves by pious reflections upon the "mysterious dispensation of Providence."

AGRICULTURAL.

FARM NOTES.

Feed the plant and the plant will feed you.

Moss in meadows means wet, poor soil underneath.

Breed, weed and feed are the three needs of stock raising.

When too large flower pots are used there will be more foliage than flowers.

Keep all grass and rubbish at least two feet away from the base of the tree.

Some farmers are all brains and others all elbow-grease, and neither succeed.

Though the season be late nothing is gained by planting in poorly prepared ground.

No animal kept on the farm will produce more fertility or be better for the feed than swine.

A State law in Illinois requires hedges to be trimmed annually on or before the 15th of May.

Sulphur is the remedy used for the mildew in California vineyards with great success.

Fruit should be served in some inviting manner on the farmer's table every day in the year.

The potato crop for Dakota will cut a larger figure than usual in the acreage statistics this year.

One day additional in harrowing will give big wages in harvest time. Yes, and in husking time, too.

There is an apparent deficiency of over 50,000 bags of foreign medium beans before the new crop is ready for market.

A man who feeds correctly and intelligently will save from 10 to 20 per cent over a man who follows only a haphazard method.

Ten thousand dollars' worth of bumble bees have been ordered from Kentucky by an Australian to help in the growing of red clover.

Green corn has appeared in limited quantities on sale in the markets. It was grown in Louisiana, and shipped from New Orleans by rail.

The farm gives the finest opportunity for reading the great book of Nature as the season turns its leaves and exposes each day a new page.

The crops in Southern Kansas have rarely looked so well. The corn is half waist high, wheat is ready to cut and fruit except peaches is plenty.

Cut your salt barrel in half, and put in pasture with salt in it. This will save time and enable your cows to help themselves whenever they like.

Do not wait till cold weather before you provide protection for your dairy cows and young stock. Give them good warm quarters and you will reap the benefit.

A cool, half-darkened dining room makes meals more agreeable and therefore more digestible in hot weather. That is, if it can be darkened without excluding too much air.

The Poland (Maine) Creamery, making 1,000 pounds of butter a week, reports three and one-fourth cents as the cost per pound for labor, including the collection of cream from patrons.

An exchange says Swede turnips if fed whole and separately will flavor milk, but if sliced and mixed with an equal quantity of mangolds, or pulped and mixed with hay will not impart a bad taste.

The California grain crop will be rather below than above the average, although some localities report that land which was believed a month ago to be not worth harvesting will yield a fair crop.

The question of the hour in France is the extreme depression which has fallen upon agricultural interests, and the steadily increasing embarassments which now weigh upon proprietors and cultivators of the soil.

The crop of lambs in Colorado this present season will reach near onto a quarter of a million. Eighty-five per cent. of all of the ewe flocks will raise lambs. It has been the most favorable season for this crop the country has ever had.

The farmer who works energetically all day long, unavoidably gathers on the entire surface of his body a complete wall of dust and a gummy perspiration, and when his day's work is done, he needs, more than anything else, not only a wash but a good, luscious, full bath to fit him for a clean bed and a refreshing sleep.

It has at last been understood that it is difficult to furnish a high-ceiled room so that it shall look cozy and inviting. So the fashion has devised that rooms with very high ceilings shall have a false ceiling of canvas, put about nine feet from the floor. The canvas is then tinted, or painted or paneled, or finished with light gold work as the owner desires.

A Dakota farmer says, the egg product from 35 chicks from Nov. 15, 1887, to Feb. 1, 1888, has been on an average of 15 eggs per day, and since Feb. 1, 20 eggs per day. The chicks are always healthy, and have red combs and look well. I dispose of all my old and young hatched males every two years, and get new blood. With a large number of hens I have not done as well, as during the winter of '84 and '85, I got an average of only 22 eggs per day from 100 hens, kept in the same quarters, and also the same number in the winter of '85 and '86. Since I reduced my flock I have done better.

Clover contains more of the necessary elements for egg production than the grains. All the lime for the shells can be procured by a liberal supply of clover, as there is a large amount of lime in its composition, and it is also rich in nitrogen, so important for the use of the hen in providing the albumen of the egg. True, it is not as concentrated as wheat or corn, but the hens can eat a larger quantity of it, as it quickly digests. It will also serve to keep the hens in good laying condition, as it does not fatten them so readily as will grain. We think clover chopped fine one of the best and cheapest foods that can be used in the poultry yard.

If only 100 cabbages are grown and stowed away for winter, it will provide one head a day for over three months, and will be amply sufficient for a flock of thirty hens. Where grass is not plentiful, turnips, kale or radish may be sown, and the tops used for green food. It is not necessary for such crops to mature; they may be used when the tops are only a few inches high, and are given by chopping them into short lengths. In this manner quite a large amount of green food may be grown. An excellent crop, one that may be cut when young and tender, and which will grow out again as fast as cut, is Hungarian grass, and a small plot will answer for quite a large flock.

TYING UP EARLY CABBAGES.

The tying up of the leaves of early Cabbages, says Gardening Illustrated is much practiced by the London market-growers, and is to be commended. The operation is a simple one, similar, in fact, to that adopted in the case of Cos lettuce. The soft outer-leaves are folded carefully around the heart or center of the plant, and the whole is bound firmly with a withe or piece of baste. There are several good reasons given by market-growers for this practice. The center being protected from the weather, the cabbages heart sooner by two or three weeks than they otherwise would do, and they are more easily handled in gathering and packing for market. The plan is one that is seldom adopted in private gardens, but there can be no doubt that it is one to be recommended, inasmuch as there is a gain of a week or two as regards cutting, and compact little cabbages are always preferable to loose ones, which, moreover, are apt to get broken, or otherwise injured in gathering.

WHY PEACHES AND PLUMS ROT.

A "Veteran fruit-grower" writes that peaches with delicate or thin skins are more easily affected than the downy thick-skinned and solid varieties, although there are some exceptions. Wet weather tends to produce rotting. When the specimens grow in contact with each other the water from rains lodges between them and produces the same result. The fruit is more apt to decay when the trees stand in sheltered places, where the breezes cannot carry off the moisture readily from the fruit and trees. Usually the most common cause of rotting is the puncture of the curculio, and it will often be found that the trouble first begins around these punctures. The same causes, more or less, operate with plums. The practical remedies are: Planting where there will be some breezes; thinning the young fruit when partly grown; killing the curculio; and selecting such varieties as have proved least affected. The Washington plum and the Amsden and other early peaches are more liable to rot than the other sorts. The character of the soil has little or no influence.

An Expensive Luxury.

The cost of running the White House is a small affair compared with the cost of the institution at the other end of the avenue known as the Congress of the United States. That is where the big items of expense make their appearance. Listen to these two little paragraphs as the clerk of the House reads the bill: "For compensation of senators, $380,000;" "For compensation of members of the House, $1,605,000," or a total of over $2,000,000 a year, just for salaries of members of Congress. Then there are an unusual number of other expenses attending the running of Congress. For instance there is about $150,000 mileage of members of Congress.

Then there is the snug little item of $684,000 for the pay of officers and clerks and messengers and aids to the law-makers. There are 400 members of the House of Senate, and to wait upon them and run errands and hold open the doors as they pass in and out and carry the cards of their callers and take care of the thousands of bills they put in, they have employed about 400 people, who are paid the snug little sum of $684,000 for doing so. Every member has an average of about one employee, and for the service of the same there is paid an average of about $1,800 to each. To run Congress and the capitol costs in salaries alone, about $3,000,000 a year.

When you go into the details of this thing they are positively appalling. Think of an approbation of $47,000 for the stationary for members and officers of the House alone during one session of Congress. Think of $52,000 for reporting the debates of Congress, whether the sessions be long or short. Think of over $150,000 a year for committee clerks, who put in probably one day's time a week in their legitimate duties as clerks to committees, and the remainder of their time as clerks to the men who appointed them. Think of nearly $3,000,000 a year to pay for the collection of internal revenue, and as much more for collecting the customs. It is, however, when you glance at the figures at the end of the bill that you get the most impressive view of the size of the government. For this bill alone, the legislative, judicial and executive expenses, the total expenditures are over $20,000,000. Then the bill for the "sundry" civil expenses will be as much more, for it has not fallen below $20,000,000 in this decade; army and navy, $40,000,000; rivers and harbors, $20,000,000 and so on, until the grand total of appropriation bills, for running the daily expenses of the government, including the post-office department, amount to $250,000,000 for the year.

The Sleepers.

A CONTRAST.

Behold them slumbering side by side,
Fair smilling youth and hoary age;
One dreams of worldly pomp and pride,
Where men a godless warfare wage;
The other dreams of summer bowers,
Bright sunshine, warbling birds, and flowers.

One brow is marked with lines of care,
Which shows the world-worn spirit grieves;
The other gleams 'neath clustering hair;
Like a fair star through quivering leaves.
One heart is grasping, proud, and cold;
The other, generous, warm, and bold,

One breathes a long, a weary sigh,
And dreams of earthly gain or loss,
As with a keen, suspicious eye,
He counts once more his glittering dross;
The other bounds with joyous tread
O'er fields of clover white and red.

A groan escapes the old man's lips,
A groan of mingled rage and pain,
For lo! his schemes, like phantom ships,
Have vanished 'neath the treacherous main.
He stretches forth one wrinkled hand,
To find his treasured board but sand.

From parted lips of tender bloom
A trill of merry laughter steals,
Whose fairy music fills the room—
The happy boy is dreamland kneels
Above a little crystal stream,
Where rushes wave and pebbles gleam;

And he beholds with sparkling eyes
His ship—a water-lily—glide
Beneath the rosy-tinted skies,
Right bravely down the dimpling tide.
His bark no sordid hopes doth bear,
But dances on, he cares not where.

Hark! how the dreaming worldling speaks;
"The path to wealth, how drear, how long!"
"Ah!" cries the boy, with glowing cheeks,
"How lovely is the skylark's song,
High soaring 'mid the blue above,
For ever singing, God is love!"

And when the morning sun shall rise
To charm away the mists of night,
The boy will greet with gladdened eyes
A world of beauty bathed in light,
For a fond mother's morning kiss
Will ope its golden gates of bliss.

But the poor worldling, what of him?
Will he not seek the busy mart,
Like some gaunt spectre, stern and grim,
No joy within his withered heart
For life is empty, vain, and cold
To him who only seeketh gold!

Declared Off.

BY A. W. BELLAW.

We've plighted troth; the day is set
There is no fairer bride than she,
Than I no fonder lover, yet
That match is destined not to be.
An awful bar is in the way,
For though I've wealth in goodly store
And cannot fear a rainy day,
Her name is Rich, and my name's Poor

Why did I never think of this
To save her from so dire a fate
And from a lifelong wretchedness
For she was reared in high estate.
How very dreadful would it be
For one so gentle to endure
The taunts of those who'd say that she,
Who once was Rich, had wedded Poo

Then "A Poor-Rich Affair" we'd see
In every paper, and the wits
Would set to punning busily.
The public laughing at their hits.
I'll call the invitations in,
However much I must deplore,
I'd rather, just to save the din,
She'd still be Rich and I'd be Poor.

The fate of Flack in the Niagara rapids is bringing out a host of adventurers who want to experiment in the raging waters of the falls with newly-invented devices. Toronto Conservatory of Music,

Many no doubt will recollect the first announcement that in September, 1887, a Conservatory of Music was to be opened at Toronto, with a Board of Management, comprising men whose names were eminent throughout the entire country, and with Mr. Edward Fisher, the well-known Toronto musician, as Musical Director. The proposal met with marked encouragement, and the Conservatory opened under successful and most brilliant auspices.

The first season has found over 600 pupils in attendance, drawn from all quarters of Canada, as well as Toronto itself. During the season a large number of Concerts, Recitals, Lectures, etc., have been given. These collateral and free advantages all aid in the formation of a broader musical education than can be obtained through the pursuit of the ordinary practical studies, and are to be valued accordingly.

The prospects for next season are said to be so very encouraging that negotiations are even now pending for the purchase of a site on which a large Conservatory Building, Concert Hall, and Art Gallery may be erected.

CARE OF FARM MACHINERY.—Neglect of care of their machinery keeps many farmers poor. They leave their reapers, &c., exposed to all kinds of weather and knock them around as though they were indestructible, and worse still, when running allow the bearings to go dry and wear out through use of inferior oil. Only the very best lubricating oil should be used, one which is clear of grit, will not gum and adheres long to the bearing. It is on this account that careful farmers prefer ROGERS' PEERLESS machine oil. It is sodl in every town by best dealers. See adv.

AN ARCTIC WAVE.

Snow on Both Sides of the North Atlantic —A Likely Explanation.

The New York Herald, July 13, says :—Nothing in the way of meteorological mystery can be more startling than the movement of a great Arctic air wave reported yesterday from both sides of the North Atlantic. In the British Islands snow fell on Wednesday as far south as London, the first, it is said, ever recorded there in July ; while the peak of Skiddaw and other mountains were white with snow. A special telegram from Bethlehem, N. H., states that the summit of Mount Washington was covered yesterday with nearly five inches of snow, and the mercury fell eight degrees below freezing (the lowest record it has ever made in July), during a hurricane blowing about ninety miles an hour. The Herald's special weather telegram from St. John's, N. F., shows that the thermometer fell there Wednesday night to 45 degrees Fahrenheit. The almost simultaneous surge of the "cold wave" on the Western coasts of Europe and the Eastern coasts of America seems to indicate a general southerly outflow of air from the Arctic Ocean sufficient to make itself felt in the temperate zone of both continents.

How to explain so vast a movement of cold air from the Arctic area in midsummer, and what the phenomenon foreshadows, are among the profound problems which modern science has not yet attacked. The most probable solution is that cold air over the icy waters around Labrador, Greenland, and Spitzbergen is set in motion to the southeastward by an indraught from the heated interior of the continents, especially Europe and Asia, in which the barometric pressure is now lower than it is near the Arctic circle. The barometer in July has a very low average (about 29 60 inches or less) over the heart of the Old World, while from Nova Zembla to Iceland and South eastern Greenland the pressure averages about .20 of an inch higher. Consequently a cold Arctic current not infrequently sets in from Iceland toward the Baltic at this period. In 1867, from July 18 to August 1, this was the case, and for five days in Scotland the temperature stood 10 degrees below the average and in some places did not once rise above 54, thus almost ruining the wheat and barley crop. So on July 16, 1883, in Great Britain the mercury fell at some points to 43 degrees. The greater the sun's intensity in the interior of the continent, the greater will be the reduction of the atmospheric pressure and also the indraught of frosty air from the frozen ocean.

It is not likely, therefore, that the present cold movement portends an early and sudden collapse of summer. On the contrary, it is a sign that the hottest part of the season is yet to come in both Europe and America. Now that the Polar Basin has discharged so much of its cold air into our latitudes, we may expect that the season will be less disturbed by sudden thermal changes, and that the prospects of good harvests will brighten. While the Western "hot wave," which threatened us on Thursday, has been partly dissipated and its advance checked by the "cold wave," we may look for an early renewal of the summer's fervour.

Sawdust Turning into Soil.

Did any of the Timberman readers make a study of sawdust turning into soil? Doubtless many have, in some measure, given the idea a passing thought, but have not watched the action of Nature in resolving back again into its original elements the capital she had lent out over a thousand years ago, to build up the stock-in-trade of a pine tree. The study is one of engrossing interest, and its results are well worthy of a brief notice in these columns. Twenty five years ago East Saginaw, Mich., was a scattering hamlet built here and there among and along the edges of swamps and bayous, bordering the Saginaw river. The sawdust and debris of the mills were used fill to up the inequalities, more for the purpose of getting rid of the annoying accumulations, than for any well defined knowledge of the value of such material, or its possible use as a future soil. From year to year the work went on. The swamps and bayous were filled up, and soil was spread on top of the sawdust of variable thickness, from sixteen inches to two feet. Strange as it may seem, there was no settling of the ground, and heavy buildings were erected on the soil thus made. These buildings are the best in the city, and show no cracked walls. Sewers are dug through what was formerly a bed of sawdust, and while traces of the original material can yet be found, still there is a clear evidence of the transformation process going on, beheld in each shovel of matter thrown out. It would be difficult to fully and clearly explain this process. It looks as though the exudations rising from beneath the over-lying debris are continually acting as listilling elements, by which the granules of sawdust gather to themselves earth incrustations, and finally become a homogeneous conglomeration of original soil without undergoing the action of decomposition. This hypothesis may not be any clearer than mud, but it is certain that one of the finest and most substantial cities in Michigan rests secured to day on a bed of sawdust, which latter has resolved itself back into its orignal elements within a quarter of a century. Can any one account for this?

PASSING NOTES.

The interinfection of diphtheria between man and various lower animals, from pigeons and fowls to cats, horses, and sheep, has been pretty well established by Dr. George Turner, who reports the results of his investigations to the British Local Government Board. He found that the "gapes" in chickens was frequently complicated with diphtheretic membraneous growth.

Mr. Beecher's death has occasioned the revival of many pleasant things said and done by him. Among them is his witty answer to a question asked him in connection with his Yale lectures on preaching. "Mr. Beecher, how is it, in your opinion, that there are so many short pastorates in these days?" "Largely of the divine mercy," was the instant reply. This is one of the mots which every one enjoys because of the delightful uncertainty of its application. It leaves each to find out for himself whether the divine mercy favors the church or the departing pastor.

The great curse of India, and one of the greatest sources of danger to English influence and English power, is the insolent, arrogant air which the English, as a rule, assume to Indians of all classes. They look upon them as an inferior race, and even when they are not intolerably insolent they are in danger of being pityingly patronising and calmly and arrogantly condemnatory at once of the native religious beliefs and of the natives' daily conduct. As a class the missionaries do not fall into this grievous mistake, though sometimes they may not conceal their conviction that they are speaking to and treating with an inferior and somewhat degraded people.

Pasteur has just recommended that all dogs not held by a string on the streets of Paris be killed by the police.

Under the provisions of the United States alien labour law, 60 Canadian labourers who were employed by the Grand Trunk railway on the American side of the St. Clair river are no longer allowed to continue work.

Reports from Victoria, B. C., say that there is serious trouble among the Skeena river Indians. It is stated that they murdered Mr. Clifford, in charge of the Hudson Bay station at Hazleton, and a special constable. "C" Battery has been sent to Skeena from Victoria.

It has been discovered that the pretty colored imitation India muslins contain a great deal of arsenic and that many kinds of cretonne are equally guilty. Several bad cases of poisoning were reported in London, and an analysis was made, the result being what Mr. Joshua Fullalove would call a "pooty considerable kind of a scare." It seems that the blues and greens are comparatively innocent this time ; it is the blacks, browns and scarlets that make mischief.

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XII.—THE PLAN IN EXECUTION.

Hugh hurried along the dike that bounded the salt-marsh meadows seaward, till he reached the point in his march up where the river narrowed abruptly into a mere third-class upland stream. There he jumped in, and swam across, as well as he was able in the cold dark water, to the opposite bank. Once over, he had still to struggle as best he might through two or three swampy fields, and to climb a thickset hedge or so—regular bullfinches—before he fairly gained the belated little high-road. His head swam. Wet and cold and miserable without, he was torn within by conflicting passions ; but he walked firm and erect now along the winding road in the deep gloom, fortunately never meeting a soul in the half-mile or so of lonely way that lay between the point where he had crossed the stream and the Fisherman's Rest by the bank at Whitestrand. He was glad of that, for it was his cue now to escape observation. In his own mind, he felt himself a murderer ; and every flicker of the wind among the honeysuckle in the hedge, every rustle of the leaves on the trees overhead, every splash of the waves upon the distant shore, made his heart flutter, and his breath stop short in response, though he gave no outer sign of fear or compunction in his even tread and erect bearing—the even tread and erect bearing of a proud, self confident, English gentleman.

How lucky that his rooms at the inn happened to be placed on the ground-floor, and that they opened by French windows down to the ground on to the little garden! How lucky, too, that they lay on the hither side of the door and the taproom, where men were sitting late over their mugs of beer, singing and rollicking in vulgar mirth with their loud half Danish, East-Anglian merriment! He stole through the garden on tiptoe, unperceived, and glided like a ghost into the tiny sitting-room. The lamp burned brightly on the parlour table, as it had burnt all evening, in readiness for his arrival. He slipped quietly, on tiptoe still, into the bedroom behind, tossed off a stiff glassful of brandy-and-water cold, and changed his clothes from head to foot with as much speed and noiselessness as circumstances permitted. Then, treading more easily, he went out once more with a bold front into the other room, flung himself down at his ease in the big armchair, took up a book, pretending to read, and rang the bell with ostentatious clamour for the good landlady. His Plan was matured ; he would proceed to put it into execution.

The landlady, a plentiful body of about fifty, came in with evident surprise and hesitation. "Lord, sir," she cried aloud in a slight flurry, "to think of that now! I took it you was out ; an them men a-singing an' ballyin' like that over there in the bar-room! Stannaway he'll be downright angry when he finds you've come in an' all that noise goin' on in the 'ouse, as is 'ardly respectable. We never heerd you, nor knowed you was in. I 'ope you'll excuse them, sir, bein' the fishermen from Snade, enjoyin' theirselves their own way in the cool o' the evenin'."

Hugh made a manful effort to appear unconcerned. "I came in an hour ago or more," he replied, smiling—a sugar-of-lead smile.—"But pray, don't interfere with those good people's merriment for worlds, I beg of you. I should be sorry, indeed, if I thought I put a stopper upon anybody's innocent amusement anywhere. I don't want to be considered a regular kill-joy.—I rang the bell, Mrs. Stannaway, for a bottle of seltzer."

It was a simple way of letting them know he was really there ; and though the lie about the length of time he had been home was a fairly audacious one—for somebody might have come in meanwhile to trim the lamp, or look if he was about, and so detect the falsehood—he saw at once, by Mrs. Stannaway's face, that it passed muster without rousing the slightest suspicion.

"Why, William," he heard her say when she went out, in a hushed voice to her husband in the taproom, "Mr. Massinger, he's bin in his own room all this time, an' them men a-shoutin' an' swearin' out 'ere like a pack of savages."

Then, they hadn't noticed his absence, at any rate! That was well. He was so far safe. If the rest of his plan held water equally, all might yet come right—and he might yet succeed in marrying Winifred.

To save appearances—and marry Winifred! With Elsie still tossing on the breakers of the bar, he had it in his mind to marry Winifred!

When Mrs. Stannaway brought in the seltzer, Hugh Massinger merely looked up from the book he was reading with a pleasant nod and a murmured "Thank you." 'Twas the most he dared. His teeth chattered so he could hardly speak any further ; but he tried with an agonized effort within to look as comfortable under the circumstances as possible. As soon as she was gone, however, he opened the seltzer, and pouring himself out a second strong dose of brandy, tossed it off at a gulp, almost neat, to steady his nerves for serious business. Then he opened his blotting-book, with a furtive glance to right and left, and took out a few stray sheets of paper—to write a letter. The first sheet had some stanzas of verse scribbled loosely upon it, with many corrections. Hugh's eyes unconsciously fell upon one of them. It read to him just then like an act of accusation. They were some simple lines describing some ideal utopian world—a dream of the future—and the stanza on which his glance lighted so carelessly ran thus :—

> But fairer and purer still,
> True love is there to behold ;
> And none may fetter his will
> With law or with gold :
> And none may sully his wings
> With the deadly tint of the dust ;
> But freest of all free things
> He soars from the dust

"With law or with gold," indeed! Fool! Idiot! Jackanapes! He crumpled the verses angrily in his hand as he looked, and flung them with clenched teeth into the empty fireplace. His own words rose up in solemn judgment against him and condemned him remorselessly by anticipation. He had sold Elsie for Winifred's gold, and the Nemesis of his crime was already pursuing him like a deadly phantom through all his waking moments.

With a set cold look on his handsome dark face, he selected another sheet of clean white notepaper from the morocco-covered blotting-book, and then pulled a bundle of old, worn-edged letters from his breast-pocket—a bundle of letters in a girl's handwriting, secured by an elastic india-rubber band, and carefully numbered with red ink from one to seventy, in the order they were received in. Hugh was nothing, indeed, if not methodical. In his own way, he had loved Elsie, as well as he was capable of loving anybody ; he had kept every word she ever wrote to him ; and now that she was gone—dead and gone for ever—her letters were all he had left that belonged to her. He laid one down on the table before him, and yielding to a momentary impulse of ecstasy, he kissed it first with reverent tenderness. It was Elsie's letter—poor dead Elsie's—Elsie dead! He could hardly realize it.—His brain whirled and swam with the manifold emotions of that eventful evening. But he must brace himself up for his part like a man. He must not be weak. There was work to do ; he must make haste to do it.

He took a broad-nibbed pen carefully from his desk—the broadest he could find—and fitted it with pains to his ivory holder. Elsie always used a broad nib—poor drowned Elsie—dear martyred Elsie! Then, glancing sideways at her last letter, he wrote on the sheet, in a large flowing angular hand, deep and black, most unlike his own, which was neat and small and cramped and rounded, the two solitary words, "My darling." He gazed at them when done with evident complacency. They would do very well : an excellent imitation!

Was he going, then, to copy Elsie's letter! No ; for its first words read plainly, "My own darling Hugh," he had allowed her to address him in such terms as that ; but still, he muttered to himself even now, he was never engaged to her—never engaged to her. In copying, he omitted the word "own." That, he thought, would probably be considered quite too affectionate for any reasonable probability. Even in emergencies he was cool and collected. But "My darling" was just about the proper mean. Girls are always stupidly gushing in their expression of feeling to one another. No doubt Elsie herself would have begun, "My darling."

After that, he turned over the letters with careful scrutiny, as if looking down the pages one by one for some particular phrase or word he wanted. At last he came upon the exact thing : "Mrs. Meysey and Winifred are going out to-morrow."—"That'll do," he said in his soul to himself : "a curl to the w"—and laying the blank sheet once more before him, he wrote down boldly, in the same free hand, with thick black downstrokes, "My darling Winifred."

The Plan was shaping itself clearly in his mind now. Word by word he fitted in so, copying each direct from Elsie's letters, and dovetailing the whole with skilled literary craftsmanship into a curious cento of her pet phrases, till at last, after an hour's hard and anxious work, round drops of sweat standing meanwhile cold and clammy upon his hot forehead, he read it over with unmixed approbation to himself—an excellent letter both in design and execution.

WHITESTRAND HALL, Sept. 17.

MY DARLING WINIFRED—I can hardly make up my mind to write you this letter ; and yet I must ; I can no longer avoid it. I know you will think me so wicked, so ungrateful ; I know Mrs. Meysey will never forgive me ; but I can't help it. Circumstances are too strong for me. By the time this reaches you, I shall have left Whitestrand, I fear for ever. Why I am leaving, I can never, never, never tell you. If you try to find out, you won't succeed in discovering it. I know what you'll think ; but you're quite mistaken. It's something about which you have never heard ; something that I've told to nobody anywhere ; something I can never, never tell, even to you, darling. I've written a lie to explain to Hugh ; but it's no use either of you trying to trace me. I shall write to you some day again to let you know how I'm getting on—but never my whereabouts.—Darling, for Heaven's sake, do try to hush this up as much as you can. To have myself discussed by half the county would drive me mad with despair and shame. Get Mrs. Meysey to say I've been called away suddenly by private business, and will not return. If only you knew all, you would forgive me everything.—Good-bye, darling. Don't think too harshly of me. Ever your affectionate, but heart-broken

ELSIE.

His soul approved the style and the matter. Would it answer his purpose? he wondered, half tremulously. Would they really believe Elsie had written it, and Elsie was gone? How account for her never having been seen to quit the grounds of the Hall? For her not having been observed at Almundham Station? For no trace being left of her by rail or road, by sea or river? It was a desperate card to play, he knew, but he held no other ; and fortune often favours the brave. How often as boy had he stood against all precedent upon a hopeless hand, and swept the board in the end by some audacious stroke of inspired good play, or some strange turn of the favouring chances! He would stand to win now in the same spirit on the forged letter. It was his one good card. Nobody could ever prove he wrote it. And perhaps, with the unthinking readiness of the world at large, they would all accept it without further question.

If ever Elsie's body were recovered! Ah, yes : true : that would indeed be fatal. But then, the chances were enormously against it. The deep sea holds its own : it yields up its dead only to patient and careful search ; and who would ever dream of searching for Elsie? Except himself, she had no one to search for her. The letter was vague and uncertain, to be sure ; but its very vagueness was infinitely better than the most definite lie ; it left open the door to so much width of conjecture. Every man could invent his own solution. If he had tried to tell a plausible story, it might have broken down when confronted with the inconvenient detail of stern reality ; but he had trusted everything to imagination. And imagination is such a charmingly elastic faculty! The Meyseys might put their own construction upon it. Each, no doubt, would put a different one ; and each would be convinced that his own was the truest.

He folded it up and thrust it into an envelope. Then he addressed the face boldly, in the same free black hand as the letter itself, to "Miss Meysey, The Hall, Whitestrand." In the corner he stuck the identical little monogram, E. C., written with strokes crossing each other, that Elsie put on all her letters. His power of imitating the minutest details of any autograph stood him here in good stead. It was a perfect fac-simile, letter and address ; and tortured as he was in his own mind by remorse and fear, he smiled to himself an approving smile as he gazed at the absolutely undetectable forgery. No expert on earth could ever detect it. "That'll clinch all," he thought serenely. "They'll never for a moment doubt that it comes from Elsie."

He knew the Meyseys had gone out to dinner at the vicarage that evening, and would not return until after the hour at which Elsie usually retired. As soon as they got back, they would take it for granted she had gone to bed, as she always did, and would in all probability never inquire for her. If so, nothing would be known till to-morrow at breakfast. He must drop the letter into the box unperceived to-night, and then it would be delivered at Whitestrand in due course by the first post to-morrow.

He shut the front window, put out the lamp, and stole quietly into the bedroom behind. That done, he opened the little lattice into the back garden, and slipped out, closing the window loosely after him, and blowing out the candle. The post-office lay just beyond the church. He walked there fast, dropped his letter in safety into the box, and turned, unseen, into the highroad once more in the dusky moonlight.

Wearied and faint and half delirious as he was after his long immersion, he couldn't even now go back to the inn to rest quietly. Elsie's image haunted him still. A strange fascination led him across the fields and through the lane to the Hall—to Elsie's last dwelling place. He walked in by the little side-gate, the way he usually came to visit Elsie, and prowled guiltily to the back of the house. The family had evidently returned, and suspected nothing ; no sign of bustle or commotion or disturbance betrayed itself anywhere ; not a light showed from a single window all was dark and still from end to end, as if poor dead Elsie were sleeping calmly in her own little bedroom in the main building. It was close on one in the morning now. Hugh skulked and prowled around the east wing on cautious tiptoe, like a convicted burglar.

As he passed Elsie's room, all dark and empty, a mad desire seized upon him all at once to look in at the window and see how everything lay within there. At first, he had no more reason for the act in his head than that : the Plan only developed itself further as he thought of it. It wouldn't be difficult to climb to the sill by the aid of the porch and the clambering wistaria. He hesitated a moment ; then remorse and curiosity finally conquered. The romantic suggestion came to him, like a dream, in his fevered and almost delirious condition ; like a dream, he carried it at once into effect. Groping and feeling his way with dumb fingers, dim eyes, and head that still reeled and swam in terrible giddiness from his long spell of continued asphyxia, he raised himself cautiously to the level of the sill, and prised the window open with his dead white hand. The lamp on the table, though turned down so low that he hadn't observed its glimmer from the outside, was still alight and burning faintly. He turned it up just far enough to see through the gloom his way about the bedroom. The door was closed, but not locked. He twisted the key noiselessly with dexterous pressure, so as to leave it fastened from the inside.—That was a clever touch!—They would think Elsie had climbed out of the window.

A few letters and things lay loose about the room. The devil within him was revelling now in hideous suggestions Why not make everything clear behind him? He gathered them up and stuck them in his pocket. Elsie's small black leather bag stood on a wooden frame in the far corner. He pushed into it hastily the nightdress on the bed, the brush and comb, and a few selected articles of underclothing from the chest of drawers by the tiled fireplace. The drawers themselves he lift sedulously open. It argued haste. If you choose to play for a high stake, you must play boldly, but you must play well. Hugh never for a moment concealed from himself the fact that the adversary against whom he was playing now was the public hangman, and that his own neck was the stake at issue.

If ever it was discovered that Elsie was drowned, all the world, including the enlightened British jury—twelve butchers and bakers and candlestick makers, selected at random from the Whitestrand rabble, he said to himself angrily—would draw the inevitable inference for themselves that Hugh had murdered her. His own neck was the stake at issue—his own neck, and honour and honesty.

He glanced around the room with an approving eye once more. It was capital! Splendid! Every thing was indeed in most admired disorder. The very spot it looked, in truth, from which a girl had escaped in a breathless hurry. He left the lamp still burning at half-height : that fitted well ; lowered the bag by a piece of tape to the garden below ; littered a few stray handkerchiefs and lace bodices loosely on the floor ; and crawling out of the window with anxious care, tried to let himself down hand over hand by a branch of the wistaria. The branch snapped short with an ugly crack ; and Hugh found himself one second later on the shrubbery below, bruised and shaken.

CHAPTER XIII.—WHAT SUCCESS?

At the Meyseys' next morning, all was turmoil and surprise. The servants' hall fluttered with unwonted excitement. No less an event than an elopement was suspected. Miss Elsie had not come down to breakfast; and when Miss Winifred went up, on the lady's-maid's report, to ask what was the matter, she had found the door securely locked on the inside, and received no answer to her repeated questions. The butler, hastily summoned to the rescue, broke open the lock ; and Winifred entered, to find the lamp still feebly burning at half-height, and a huddled confusion everywhere pervading the disordered room. Clearly, some strange thing had occurred. Elsie's drawers had been opened and searched ; the black bag was gone from the stand in the corner ; and the little jewel-case with the silver shield on the top was missing from its accustomed place on the dressing-table. With a sudden cry, Winifred rushed forward, terrified. Her first idea was the usual feminine one of robbery and murder. Elsie was killed—killed by a burglar. But one glance at the bed dispelled that allusion ; it had never been slept in. The nightdress and the little embroidered nightdress bag in red silk were neither of them there in their familiar fashion. The brush and comb had disappeared from the base of the looking-glass. The hairpins even had been removed from the glass hairpin box. These indications seemed frankly inconsistent with the theory of mere intrusive burglary. The enterprising burglar doesn't make up the bed of the robbed and murdered, after pocketing their watches ; nor does he walk off, as a rule, with ordinary hairbrushes and embroidered nightdress bags. Surprised and alarmed, Winifred rushed to the window ; it was open still ; a branch of the wistaria lay broken on the ground, and the mark of a falling body might be easily observed among the plants and soil in the shrubbery border.

By this time, the Squire had appeared upon the scene, bringing in his hand a letter for Winifred. With the cool commonsense of advancing years, he surveyed the room in its littery condition, and gazed over his daughter's shoulder as she read the shadowy and incoherent jumble of phrases Hugh Massinger had strung together so carefully in Elsie's name last night at the Fisherman's Rest. "Whew!" he whistled to himself in sharp surprise as the state of the case dawned slowly upon him. "Depend upon it, there's a young man at the bottom of this. "Cherchez la femme," says the French proverb. When a young women's in the question, "Cherchez l'homme" comes very much nearer it. The girl's run off with somebody, you may be sure. I only hope she's run off all straight and above-board, and not gone away with a groom or a gamekeeper or married a clergyman."

"Papa!" Winifred cried, laying down the letter in haste and bursting into tears, "do you think Mr. Massinger can have anything to do with it?"

The Squire had been duly apprised last night by Mrs. Meysey—in successive instalments—as to the state of relations between Hugh and Winifred ; but his blunt English nature cavalierly rejected the suggested explanation of Elsie's departure, and he brushed it aside at once after the fashion of his kind with an easy "Bless my soul! no, child. The girl's run off with some fool somewhere. It's always fools who run off with women. Do you think a man would be idiot enough to"—he was just going to say "propose to one woman in the morning, and elope with another the evening after?" but he checked himself in time, before the faces of the servants, and finished his sentence lamely by saying instead, "commit himself so with a girl of that sort?"

"That wasn't what I meant, papa," Winifred whispered low. "I meant, could she have fancied?—— You understand me."

The squire gave a snort in place of No. Impossible, impossible ; the young man was so well connected. She could never have thought he meant to make up to her. Much more likely, if it came to that, the girl would run away with him than from him. Young women don't really run away from a man because their hearts are broken. They go up to their own bedrooms instead, and muse and mope over it, and cry their eyes red.

And indeed, the Squire remarked to himself inwardly on the other hand, that if Hugh were minded to elope with any one, he would be far more likely to elope with the heiress of Whitestrand than with a penniless governess like Elsie Challoner. Elopement implies parental opposition. Why the deuce should a man take the trouble to run away with an undowered orphan, whom nobody on earth desires to prevent him from marrying any day, in the strictly correctest manner, by banns or license at the parish church of her own domicile? The suggestion was clearly quite quixotic. If Elsie had run away with any one, it was neither from nor with this young man of Winifred's, the Squire felt sure, but with the gardener's son or with the under-gamekeeper.

Still, he felt distinctly relieved in his own mind when, at half-past ten, Hugh Massinger strolled idly in, a rose in his button hole and a smile on his face—though a little lame of the left leg—all unconscious, apparently, that anything out of the common had happened since last night at the great house.

Hugh was one of the very finest and most finished actors then performing on the stage of social England ; but even he had a difficult part to play that stormy morning, and he went through his role, taking it altogether, with but indifferent success, though with sufficient candour to float him through unsuspected somehow. The circumstances, indeed, were terribly against him. When he fell the night before from Elsie's window, he had bruised and shaken himself, already fatigued as he was by his desperate swim and his long unconsciousness ; and it was with a violent effort, goaded on by the sense of absolute necessity alone, that he picked himself up, black bag and all, and staggered home, with one ankle strained, to his rooms at Stannaway's. Once arrived there, he locked away Elsie's belongings cautiously in a back cupboard—incriminating evidence, indeed, if anything should ever happen to come out—and flung himself half undressed at last in a fever of fatigue upon the bed in the corner.

Strange to say, he slept—slept soundly. Worn out with overwork and exertion and faintness, he slept on peacefully like a tired child, till at nine o'clock Mrs. Stannaway rapped hard at the door to rouse him. Then he woke with a start from a heavy sleep, his head aching, but drowsy still, and with feverish pains in all his limbs from his desperate swim and his long immersion. He was quite unfit to get up and dress ; but he rose for all that, as if all was well, and even pretended to eat some breakfast, though a cup of tea was the only thing he could really gulp down his parched throat in his horror and excitement. Last night's events came clearly home to him now in their naked ghastliness, and with sinking heart and throbbing head he realized the full extent of his guilt and his danger, the depth of his remorse and the profundity of his folly.

Elsie was gone—that was his first thought. There was no more an Elsie to reckon with in all this world. Her place was blank—how blank he could never before have truly realised. The whole world itself was blank too. What he loved best in it all was gone clean out of it.

Elsie, Elsie, poor drowned, lost Elsie! His heart ached as he thought to himself of Elsie, gasping and struggling in that cold, cold sea, among those fierce wild breakers, for one last breath—and knew it was he who had driven her, by his baseness and wickedness and cruelty, to that terrible end of a sweet young existence. He had darkened the sun in heaven for himself henceforth and for ever. He had sown the wind, and he should reap the whirlwind. He hated himself ; he hated Winifred ; he hated everybody and everything but Elsie. Poor martyred Elsie! Beautiful Elsie! His own sweet, exquisite, noble Elsie! He would have given the whole world at that moment to bring her back again. But the past was irrevocable, quite irrevocable. There was nothing for a strong man now to do but to brace himself up and face the present.

"If not, what resolution from despair?"—That was all the comfort his philosophy could give him.

Elsie's things were locked up in the cupboard. If suspicion lighted upon him in any way now, it was all up with him. Elsie's bag and jewelcase and clothing in the cupboard would alone be more than enough to hang him. Hang him! What did he care any longer for hanging? They might hang him and welcome, if they chose to try. For sixpence he would save them the trouble and drown himself. He wanted to die. It was fate prevented him. Why hadn't he drowned when he might, last night? An ugly proverb that, about the man who is born to be hanged, &c., &c. Some of these proverbs are downright rude—positively vulgar in the coarse simplicity and directness of their language.

He gulped down the tea with a terrible effort : it was scalding hot, and it burnt his mouth, but he scarcely noticed it. Then he pulled about the sole on his fork for a moment, to dirty the plate, and boning it roughly, gave the flesh to the cat, who sat it purring on the rug by the fireplace. He waited for a reasonable interval next before ringing the bell—it takes a long man ten minutes to breakfast—but as soon as that necessary time had passed, he put on his hat, crushing it down on his head, and with fiery soul and bursting temples, strolled up, with the jauntiest air he could assume, to the Meyseys' after breakfast.

Winifred met him at the front door. His new sweetheart was pale and terrified, but not now crying. Hugh felt himself afraid to presume upon their novel relations and insist upon a kiss—she would expect it of him. It was the very first time he had ever kissed her, and, oh, evil omen, it revolted him at last that he had now to do it—with Elsie's body tossed about that very moment by the cruel waves upon that angry bar or on the cold sea-bottom. It was treason to Elsie—to poor dead Elsie—that he should ever kiss any other woman. His kisses were hers, his heart was hers, for ever and ever. But what would you have? He looked on, as he had said, as if from above as circumstances wafting his own actions hither and thither wherever they willed—and this was the pass to which they had now brought him. He must play out the game—play it out to the end, whatever it might cost him.

Winifred took the kiss mechanically and coldly, and handed him Elsie's letter—his own forged letter—without one word of preface or explanation. Hugh was glad she did so at the very first moment—it allowed him to relieve himself at once from the terrible strain of the affected gayety he was keeping up just to save appearances. He couldn't have kept it up much longer. His countenance fell visibly as he read the note—or pretended to read it, for he had no need really to glance at its words—every word of them all now burnt into the very fibres and fabric of his being.

Chinese Intolerance.

We regret to see that the industrious Chinese residents of this city have begun to introduce distinctions among themselves on religious grounds. In fact, it looks as if they already had a system of religious persecution in their social life. For example, they are about to hold a big Chinese picnic and excursion, and notice has been given of the exclusion from the festivities of all "Sunday school Chinamen," which is the phrase that is used to describe Christianized Chinamen. Now, in thus putting a social ban, a pagan boycott, a brand of outlawry, upon such of their countrymen living here as favor Christianity, the Pagans are blundering. The Pagans have, of course, the right to exclude them on account of their religion, or because they have renounced the customs of their ancestors, but yet it would be proper for the Pagans who enjoy freedom here to exercise a large liberality in the toleration of religious difference.—[New York Sun.

An officer attended by twenty policemen entered Queen Natalie's villa at Wiesbaden yesterday and seized the young Crown Prince, who was at once sent by train to Belgrave. The Queen has been advised to leave German territory within twently-four hours, and is terribly prostrated.

When the late Emperor of Germany was in London last year he made frequent calls on Sir Morell Mackenzie, and often drove to the Harley street office in a hansom cab. One day his hansom cab was stopped in the Park by a policeman in pursuance of the rule which forbids any hired vehicle entering the precincts devoted to the equipages of fashion. The Crown Prince, as he then was, gave his name to the officer, but was laughed at for his pains. The London bobby could not believe that a son-in-law of Queen Victoria would ride in a hansom, so the future Emperor was obliged to turn back. He was fond of relating this anecdote afterwards.

Facts About the Moon.

A few weeks ago an important address was given in London by Sir Robert Ball, the Astronomer Royal of Ireland, about the moon. In its course he made known the most recent conclusions of astronomers as to the moon's composition, its climatic conditions, and the probability of its being inhabited.

As our nearest neighbor in the solar system, the moon must always be an object of peculiar interest and of ardent investigation to the dwellers upon the earth. So much nearer is it than either of the planets that we can learn more about it, and observe its physical features more minutely.

We know that the moon's diameter is only one-fourth of that of our globe ; that it is only two hundred and forty thousand miles distant from us ; that if the moon should disappear from its orbit as our satellite, a most important physical change on the earth, the cessation of tides, would take place ; and that in bulk the moon is eighty times less heavy than the earth.

We can discern, through powerful telescopes, the general formation of that half of the moon's surface which is turned toward us. We are told that there are visible two craters of volcanoes sixty miles wide ; another, ten thousand feet deep ; that one mighty peak rises to a height of of twenty four thousand feet ; and that a vast basin is visible seventeen thousand feet deep and over fifty miles wide.

It has long been a warmly debated quest on among astronomers whether it is possible that the moon could support vegetation and animal and human life. But a general agreement has now been reached by them that the moon is much older than the earth ; that it is "as dead as a door-nail ;" that it has neither atmosphere, air or water ; that, in short, it is "nothing else but a ball of extinct volcanic matter, lighted only by the rays of the distant sun."

No fires ever issue from the great volcanoes which are apparent on its surface ; the huge, hollowed-out craters emit no smoke. A vast and eternal silence reigns through all the dreary, treeless, lifeless expanse.

The moon, indeed, "is apparently abandoned to death, nourishing no inhabitants, producing nothing resembling trees, flowers, or beautiful things of any kind—useless, in short, except as a mass of extinct volcanic rubbish, which drags the sea into tides, and reflects the sunbeams in moonlight ; but whirls, like a corpse in cerements of silver cloth and black velvet, round and round the earth."

The astronomers have carefully constructed a geography of the moon, and have mapped out its regions, and given names to its various features. For instance, they have called some of the mountains of the moon "Copernicus," "Posidonius," "Clavius," after earthly philosophers ; others they have christened by the names of the famous peaks of the earth ; and the dreary valleys and waterless bays and lakes have received fanciful but inapposite names, such as the "Bay of Clouds," the "Lake of Nectar," and the "Gulf of Rainbows."

It is doubtful, according to Sir Robert Ball, if any increase of the magnifying power of telescopes will add any further definite knowledge to that which has already been acquired about the moon. He believes that when the moon is brought by great lenses to within fifty (instead of, as now, two hundred and fifty) miles of the earth, as it probably will be in the near future, the result of this improved observation will be mainly valuable as confirming the conclusions already arrived at.—Youth's Companion.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 382 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A. st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

The High School board of trustees of the Glencoe High School asked the council for a grant of $9,000 to enable them to purchase a site on which to build and equip a High School. The petition was granted with only one dissenting voice. The clerk was authorized to draft a by-law that the sum may be raised by way of a loan payable in 20 years.

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,

Late U. S. Consul to Italy, author of "The Glory and Shame of England," "America's Advancement," etc., etc., etc., writes as follows:—

New York, August 1, 1886. 122 E. 27th st.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

Luxuriant Hair
Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.
Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.
Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."
A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.
The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

THE KEY TO HEALTH.
BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS

☞ T. MILBURN & CO., Proprietors, Toronto.

For removing dandruff, Ayer's Hair Vigor has no equal. It restores faded and gray hair to its original color, stimulates the growth of the hair, and gives it a beautiful and glossy appearance.

An exchange gives the following which we think is a little fishy:—"The crusade against the bustle has had a set-back. A woman recently fell into Moosehead Lake, Me., and when she was landed a five pound trout was found entangled in her tournure. There is no reason to doubt, therefore that at certain crisis a bustle may become eminently useful. Its thorough abandonment by women should not take place until all the arguments pro and con have been carefully weighed."

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

The oatmeal combine has collapsed, as it should. A combination to keep up the price of human food is cruel and should be criminal.

St. Thomas has a debt of $260,000 with 43 vacant stores on one street and 300 vacant houses, with a rate of 25 mills on a high assessment.—St. Marys Journal.

Hon. Edward Blake will be banqueted on his arrival in Toronto. It is said that his health is in no way improved by his long European tour.

On Tuesday an aged lady named Gronden was killed by a runaway on the turnpike near Amherstburg. Four women were driving in a light wagon, drawn by one horse. The horse became unmanageable, and the old lady got so frightened that she jumped out of the rig and broke her neck.

TO THE DEAF.—A person cured of Deafness and noises in the head of 23 years' standing by a simple remedy, will send a description of it FREE to any person who applies to NICHOLSON, 30 St. John St. Montreal.

A SIMPLE REMEDY.—A Toronto reporter has been interviewing the medical men of that city for a cure for drunkenness. The object is a laudable one, when we reflect on the habits of the average Torontonian. However, none of the doctors, although they all spoke learnedly, gave the only true cure. It is very simple—Stop drinking.—Montreal Post.

Gen. Sheridan died at Nonquit, Mass., on Saturday last of heart failure. His illness commenced on the 12th of May last. The General had made his will and all preparations for death, and was ready to face it, though resolutely determined that life should not be given up without a severe struggle on his part. He leaves a wife and four small children—three girls and one boy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla is designed for those who need a medicine to purify their blood. No other preparation so well meets this want. It increases the appetite and rejuvenates the whole system. Its record, for forty years, is one constant triumph over disease.

Ten years ago there were 25,535 depositors in the Postoffice Savings Banks in Canada, representing a total deposit of $2,754,484.03. To-day there are 101,693 depositors and a total deposit of $20,689,032.62. This position of affairs is truly encouraging.

Bedclothing is now made of paper. There are doubled sheets of manilla paper, strengthened with twine, and valuable because and by reason of the peculiar properties of paper as a non-conductor of heat. They have a warmth-perserving power far out of proportion to the thickness.

EASILY UNDERSTOOD.
The causes of summer complaint, diarrhœa, dysentery, etc., are the excessive heat, eating green fruit, impure water, over exertion and sudden chill. Dr. Fowler's Wild Strawberry is an Infallible and prompt remedy for all bowel complaints from whatever cause.

This is what an exchange prints:—"How women can sit bolt upright and not changing a position, looking neither to the right nor left, during a sermon in church passes the understanding. A man will sit on a picket fence all the afternoon to see a ball match, but put him in a church pew for three quarters of an hour and he will wobble all over the seat." Probably it is the gooseeggs, flys, fouls and razzle-dazzle that makes it so interesting he forgets to wobble.

CERTAIN CURE.
A cure for Cholera Morbus. A positive cure for this dangerous complaint, and for all acute or chronic forms of bowel complaint incident to summer and fall is found Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, to be procured from any druggist or medicine dealer.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are having immense rotary steam shovels built at their works in Montreal, for use during the coming winter. The machine, which is the invention of Mr. J. H. Leslie, a Canadian, was in operation on the Western roads during last winter, and it is claimed they will completely revolutionize the old system, and effect a saving of over fifty per cent. The Canadian Pacific railway has bought the exclusive right to build the machines in Canada.

Tilbury Centre Times: A party of engineers, under Engineer McLeod, started out from Windsor two weeks ago to-day, 20th ult., on another survey of the C. P. R., striking a line south of any former route. The line curves east from Windsor, just south of the driving park grounds and due west, reaching the northern boundary of lot 6, Rochester, and thence striking Tilbury West and following closely the third concession, and coming into the village limits. Last week the party reached Belle river, crossing the Ruscomb river on Monday, the next day crossing into Tilbury West. They reached Tilbury Centre on Wednesday and had just got nicely settled when a telegram was received from Chief Engineer Jennings ordering them to leave at once for Glencoe. It is reported that the line will cross the Great Western at Glencoe, and that Chatham may get the go-by. There is no doubt but that the line east of Chatham is pretty well located, and that the line is very near the line of the old Great Western survey.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of cutting teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

THE STILLWELL MURDER.

The Stillwell murder, which created the greatest excitement in this county and province about three years ago, is recalled by the fact that an action has been entered against the A.O.U.W. to recover the sum of $2,000 insurance on the murdered man's life in that society. It will be remembered that on New Year's day, 1885, Louis Napoleon Stillwell, who lived in the vicinity of Eden, went shooting in the woods with Ransom Forbes and Albert Thomas. Stillwell's dead body, with a bullet hole through his head, was found lying in the woods next day. It was charged that Ransom Forbes and Mrs. Stillwell were unduly intimate, and they, with Albert Thomas, were arrested, charged with the murder of Stillwell. It will be remembered that Thomas turned Queen's evidence, stating that Forbes fired the fatal shot, but his evidence being unsatisfactory to the jury all three persons were acquitted. Mr. A. F. Clark, of Tilsonburg, solicitor for Mrs. Sarah Jane Stillwell, widow of the murdered man, who was appointed legal guardian of their two children, brings action against Mr. M. D. Carder, Grand Recorder of the A.O.U.W., to recover the sum of $2,000 insurance on the life of Louis N. Stillwell, it being claimed that he was a member of that Order at the time of the murder, and insured for that sum. The writ also claims interest due on the amount. The case will come up for trial at the Oxford assizes at Woodstock on Sept. 18th. Messrs. Crothers & Crothers, of this city, are associated with Mr. Clark for the plaintiff.

The defence is that Stillwell was not a member of the order in good standing at time of his death. By the laws of the Order every assessment must be paid by the 28th of the month in which it is made. Mr. Stillwell had not paid the assessment that fell due on Dec. 28th, 1884, and therefore immediately afterwards stood suspended on the books of the Order. After his death, the amount of an assessment was paid in, but was returned. The writ that has been issued claims $1,000 for Mrs. Stillwell, and $1,000 for the children.

A Strange Scott Act Case.

The case of Duncan McBride of Metcalfe, recently tried for an offence against the Scott Act, has had a singular termination. When McBride was tried some time ago in Strathroy before Police Magistrate Noble one of the witnesses was a man named Barnes. When Barnes was called, however, he swore that he did not get any liquor from McBride. The case was enlarged, and Barnes and McBride drove home together. They had a keg of beer in the wagon, and on the way the vehicle upset. Barnes was thrown out and the keg fell on him with fatal results. McBride was so effected by Barnes' death that he came in and pleaded guilty. He was given time to pay his fine, but neglected to do so, and on Saturday was lodged in jail in London to serve a two months' term for his offence. In the case of Edward Simpson, of Strathroy, and Frank McNulty, of Melbourne each was fined $50 for Scott Act violation.

The Deadly Lobster.

A week ago Sunday night a young man employed as clerk in a grocery store after church took lunch with the sister of the proprietor of the establishment. A can of lobsters was brought upstairs, and formed the principal dish of the lunch. After eating the lobsters the lady and gent were taken deathly sick with all the symptoms of poisoning. Drs. McLarty and Fulton were hastily summoned, emetics administered, and the victims were soon out of danger. An effort was made to keep the matter quiet, which proved successful for several days.—Journal.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

Miss Maggie Johnston narrowly escaped loosing her life outright last Friday evening by a runaway which happened, as follows: While sitting in Dr. Pomeroy's buggy, the horse, which was attached and securely tied to a post opposite Mr. Van Sickle's residence, North Dresden, took fright and pulled his head from the bridle, left the head gear at the post and tore down the street at break-neck speed. When turning the corner the buggy glided around against Mr. J. J. French's fence on the opposite side of the street. The force of the collision knocked off a couple of boards and threw Miss Johnston, so to speak, between the boards into the yard, who was picked up more dead than alive. The maddened beast tore around another corner after the buggy righted itself, when the collision was repeated but with more force. The horse and buggy landed in Mr. J. Lawrence's yard after breaking down a gate and ten feet of new tence. The The animal received a cut a foot and a half long across the chest, and a part of a shoe detached was found in the yard some distance from the horse. Mr. Lawerence was standing at the gate when the horse made for it, and had he not been a supple man he would in all probability, have been injured. Miss Johnston lies in a critical state at her mother's residence, having received a severe cut on the head besides other injuries. After the horse stood perfectly still in the yard some minutes with every muscle quivering. But when taken to the road it took a strong man to hold the brute as it reared and pitched like a show horse.—Dresden Times.

TORONTO TO QUEBEC.

Editor of the ENTERPRISE:—

In my last letter I attempted to give an outline of a trip from Toronto to Quebec, but got lost in the crooked streets of Montreal, and there no doubt would have stayed, had I not climbed up to the top of Notre Dame, and taken my bearings anew.

The first half of the climbing is easily accomplished by the combined aid of the fee and the elevator, for the second half of the 280 feet however you are left to your own resources. But the sight which greets you at the top of this immense cathedral, is worth the trouble.

Looking northward, at your feet lies the toiling city with its pigmy inhabitants. Across the square the workmen are busy at the seventh story of a handsome building; they look like a swarm of bees beneath you.

Lifting up your eyes you see Mount Royal, studded half-way up with beautiful residences of the Stephens and the Redpaths, with here and there the ever present church or seminary. Conspicuous amid the host, stand the Grey Nunnery and McGill College with its clustering brethren. To the west as far as eye can reach smokestacks are puffing out wares of every description.

Turning southward, your eye falls on the Victoria tubular span, and involuntarily follows down the broad breast of the St. Lawerence till is lost in the blue mountains in the distance.

Then you decend "the highest tower in America," pausing as you go, to examine the "largest bell on the continent." This bell, by the way, requires twelve men to ring it, so it does not toll the weary plowman homeward every day. The corresponding tower on the other side has a chime of ten bells demanding sixteen rope pullers.

Mark Twain is credited with saying that Toronto could hold only one more church, that on top of all the rest. Verily Montreal is subject to the same scandal. Forty-seven Catholic churches, besides enumerable chaples, and half as many Protestant, is a modest estimate.

The public buildings of Montreal, are as a whole superior to those of Toronto. They are more varied in their style of architecture, the white marble, the white, red and black granite together with the native grey, hewn from the "Mountain," mingled with the different colors of brick give a pleasing variety, not to be found in the brick built city of the west.

To a stranger, Montreal must appear essentially French. Little else but the Gallic tongue is heard on the streets; signs and public notices are in French, probably with a copy of it in English underneath. Certainly the type of face and the presence of the brunette all bespeak the French origin. And what a noisy race! You hear a shout every minute and turn around expecting to see a house falling but, it is only a "habitant" whispering to his horse. The French carter never has two horses, and the Frenchmen of Quebec seems to have an equal abhorance for four wheels. Over the axle of their two wheels is stretched a long, stout ladder with peg holes at convenient places. One end of his truck-ladder is lowered to the ground, and barrels and boxes are easily rolled up. Then again, in unloading the hind end is raised and stuck through a window and in goes cargo. "Oh, it is what it is of convenient," as the Frenchman says.

On the way to the wharf, I pause at the lofty monument of the "greatest sailor since the world began." Nelson's pillar occupies the centre of the whole square in busy part of the town.

At 7 p.m. the "Montreal" steams out for Quebec.

The descent from Montreal to Quebec in one of the "Ontario and Richelieu Co's." great steamers, is a rapid and enjoyable ride. The boat is fully a block long with three tiers of staterooms, the cabin luxuriously carpeted, beautifully painted, and furnished with finest velvet plush covered the walnut furniture, together with five or six hundred passengers. Among the latter, the travelling American predominated, but their was a pretty fair mixture or the wealthier French-Canadians, on a pilgrimage to the church of Saint Anne, of Beaupre, some 20 miles below Quebec.

When I say fair mixture, I mean in respect to numbers it certainly would not apply to their complexions.

Down the river we glide past innumerable barges, boats, tugs, rafts and steamers, past peaceful hamlets on shore, in the midst of which invariably towers the white spires of the parish church. Sorel is reached by 10 o'clock, and we seemed to take on board more barrels and boxes than even the sidewalk of Main st., Dutton contains, and passengers ad nauseam or as Virgil would say "ad stringam." Three Rivers was our next halt. There the whole town came down to see us, but the young men I fancy, to see the young ladies—home.

After that it didn't matter much where we stopped, for your correspondent was in his sardine box.

I unpacked myself at 5 a.m. to view the rugged rocks that presaged the presence of their crowning brother at Quebec.

The steep banks are composed of a hard slaty kind of stone which the diminutive pines and cedars has much ado to cover.

Fully twenty miles above Quebec the rock can be seen. So intent was I gazing at it there quite ignorant of what it was, that we were past Wolfe's Cove before I had time to enquire its name.

The Cove lies some two and a half miles above the city, and is approached by a flat of an acre or so, on which the hero landed his troops for victory. The spot is now occupied by busy lumbermen with their cottages curving round the bretling crags.

The Cove I afterwards climed just to see how it would "go." I was glad I had no musket to carry, and did not wonder at the grenadiers helping themselves by the roots and twigs, which still grow there.

After landing passengers at Levis for the Intercolonial Railway we tied up at the foot of the ramparts, and going on shore waited an hour for breakfast.

I have been doing the same just now for tea, so,

Au Revoir,

ATTICUS.

Bank Circulation in the Old Country.

At a meeting some weeks ago of the Institute of Accountants it came out in course of a discussion that the idea generally prevails, even amongst those who profess to have considerable knowledge of financial matters, that the only notes in circulation in England are those issued by the Bank of England. Another very extraordinary statement of the same kind was made in a paper on banking, that the banking interests of England are all comprised or centered in the banks established in London. Permit me to state the facts on these two questions. I give my authorities, so that those who at meeting received my statement with a direct denial of their accuracy, and with an oracular assertion that no country bank circulation now existed, may see how far they are astray. The Bankers' Magazine for June, 1888, gives this table:—

England, Bank of England fixed issue	£16,200,000
England, private banks' fixed issue	3,166,393
England, joint stock (or country) banks' fixed issue	2,114,513
Scotland, " "	2,676,350
Ireland, " "	6,354,494
	£30,511,750

The country banks of England are thus seen to have a fixed or authorized issue of £5,280,906; of this the amount in actual circulation in May was £2,595,248, or over 48 per cent. The banks of Ireland and Scotland had fixed £9,030,844, and in actual circulation they had £11,351,504, being no less than £3,320,660 over their fixed issue. Putting then the circulation together of the country banks of the Old Country, we find that these banks had a total fixed issue of £14,311,750, of which no less than £13,946,752 was in actual circulation, being close upon 98 per cent.

But, taking only the English banks, as we have stated, they had in May over 48 per cent. of their notes in the hands of the public. In Canada in that month the banks had also 48 per cent. of their authorized circulation in actual use. The circulation of notes in Great Britain, with a population of say 40 millions (it was 38½ millions in 1886), amounts to $3 70 per head. In Ireland the amount is $6.40 per head of their own bank notes. In Scotland it is $3.30 per head of their own notes. In Canada, taking our population at five millions, there are in circulation $5.80 of bank notes to each head of our people. In England there is a very large metallic currency of which we practically know nothing in Canada.

In the paper I allude to on banking there is a statement and an argument based upon the notion that the London joint stock banks comprise the whole of the English banking interests. I have before me a letter from Mr. George Hague, General Manager of the Merchants' Bank, on this question. He writes:—"The astounding ignorance of men who fancy that the London joint stock banks comprise the whole English banking interests shows the folly of such people dealing at all with the question. The last Economist shows that including the Bank of England, which the paper on banking omits, there are £570,000,000 on deposit in England and Wales alone, and of this not more than £150,000,000 is with the banks that the writer of the paper fancies comprise the total! The Scotch banks have also £80,000,000 and the Irish £35,000,000." I believe that many of your readers will be glad to have these figures presented, especially when authenticated by such references as are given above, and when such utterly erroneous figures and statements have been recently published. STATISTICS.

There are 44,000 deaf mutes in the United States.

London spends more than $15,000,000 every year in caring for the poor.

The Florida orange crop is expected to reach 3,000,000 boxes this season.

Sheboygan county, Wisconsin, produces 9,000,000 pounds of cheese annually.

There are said to be 8,000 Italians in New York and the neighboring cities in actual want of food.

It is estimated that the total number of books in all the American public libraries is 21,000,000.

The receipts of the Chicago Stock Yards for June foot up 179,400 cattle, 407,500 hogs, and 103,000 sheep.

The annual copper production of the world is 273,000 tons, and the French syndicate is said to control 215,000 tons of it.

The Silver King mine, of Arizona, after paying $1,950,000 in dividends, has turned about and levied an assessment of $50,000 on its shareholders.

The statement is made that no less than six species of North American birds have become extinct during the last ten years, and it is claimed that English sparrows were the main cause.

There are in America over 4,000,000 farms, large and small. Their total value is something like $10,000,000,000. The estimated value of the yearly products of these farms is between $2,000,000,000 and $3,000,000,000.

In 1880 there were only 5,000 Jews in Jerusalem; now there are said to be 30,000. The recent persecutions in Russia are said to have caused the greater part of this increase, and many are said to have come from Germany.

Between Valdosta and Albany, Georgia, it is estimated that there are 8,000 acres in melons, and that 3,000 car-loads will be shipped and each car taken 1,000 melons. These melons bring from $90 to $125 per car; so you see it is a great money crop. About two months' time is expended on the crop.

The condition of the slave trade may be estimated when it is learned that Cardinal Lavigirie, Archbishop of Algiers and Carthage, has felt it to be his duty to go to Europe to denounce its continuation. He has lately delivered most impassioned harangues from the pulpit of St. Sulpice, Paris. He says that the evidence is that 400,000 slaves are annually sold on the African shores, and that, taking into account those killed in capturing them and the deaths from barbarous treatment, the slave trade counts 2,000,000 victims every year.

John Wanamaker, of Philadelphia, now has his life insured for a million dollars, paying about $65,000 a year in premiums. John B. Stetson and Hamilton Disston, also of Philadelphia, carry respectively $750,000 and $500,000 life insurance. Dr. Hostetter, of Pittsburg, Penn., carries $800,000. Among others who carry heavy life insurance may be mentioned the following:—George K. Anderson, of Chicago, $350,000; Pierre Lorillard, $310,000; Senator Cameron, $200,000; George Harding, of Philadelphia, $200,000; Andrew Carnegie, $250,000, and George W. Childs and Wharton Baker, $100,000 each.

Sir Robert Peel's Honor.

A private letter, it is said, should never be produced, and as proof of this the conduct of Sir Robert Peel toward Mr. Disraeli is cited. Mr. Disraeli had commenced a series of venomous personal attacks against Sir Robert in the House of Commons. Sir Robert hinted that their cause was to be found in his having refused to give him office. Mr. Disraeli indignantly replied that he had never asked for office, and challenged Sir Robert to produce one single proof that he had. Sir Robert had at the time a letter from Mr. Disraeli asking him for office, but neither produced it nor alluded to it, because his high sense of honor would not allow him to make use of a private letter, the production of which would have crushed his opponent. Had he not taken this view there would, in all probability, have been no Lord Beaconsfield, no Primrose League, no "Peace with honor."

If there is any person to whom you feel a dislike, that is the person of whom you should never speak.

A parrot owned in a suburb of Chicago hangs out in front of its owner's house. Whenever a young lady and her beau are passing it shouts, "Papa! papa!"

Renovating Horses.

A month to grass will work a wondrous change with a horse which is feverish and getting stocked. We used to turn our horses out, at night, and keep them in the stable, if not at work, during the daytime. They would renew themselves in this way. And the run to the grass was just enough laxative to purify the blood and take all the fever out of them.

When a horse is kept on dry food and fed grain for more than a year, without change, the grain does not seem to have the effect in sustaining the system that it does after eating grass. The change is in the lack of complete digestion and assimilation. The stomach becomes more or less inflamed and congested and the food passes through it and is not absorbed and made into new blood. There is no sort of economy in this sort of management, as food is wasted, and the horse is not benefited. Increasing the amount of grain will not remedy the trouble, as the horse has too much already. Any horse should have a rest of a few days when first turned to grass, but after it has become used to the new diet it may be worked carefully. It should be driven slowly, for it will heat up rapidly, and, as it cannot get rid of the water in its system by evaporation fast enough, it will sweat profusely. If it did not, it would die. The horse, fed grain, and full of fever and congestion, has no water in its body, comparatively, and of course it can stand harder usage. The truth is, cows and all animals would freeze in winter if they were in the same physical condition they are in summer—when fed on grass. While this is true, it is nevertheless a necessity that all animals should have this renewal which the succulent foods of summer bring about so well. The city man, who cannot spare his team, wisely buys bunches of clover or green rye for his horses and this acts as an antidote to remove fever, and helps a little. In this way the city horses are made to do service longer than if entirely deprived of green food.

Another Zulu War Imminent.

Telegrams from Durban, bring news of yet another Zulu war. Intelligence has been received of the return to N'Konjeni of the police and soldiers, and the native levies forming a support to the former, from Hlopekulu Hill. The Usutus were found in a strong position among dense, bushy kloofs. After six hours' resistance they were dispersed with heavy loss, 1,000 of their cattle being captured. The casualties on the British side include—killed, Lieutenant Briscoe, of the Inniskilling Fusiliers; Mr. Trent, leader of a native levy, and three natives; wounded, one Basuto (dangerously), and seven others. The extent of the losses among the native levies is as yet unknown. Ishinguna's fate is uncertain, but it is said that he escaped on horseback. A later telegram says a force comprising a detachment of British troops and police and native levies attacked the rebel chief Ishinguna, and utterly routed him after six hours' severe fighting. Intelligence received from Zululand states that four chiefs of the Inkandhla District attacked the loyal chief Sokotyata and looted his cattle. They afterwards attacked the residence of the district magistrate, who, with the help of a few native police and Sokotyata's men, repulsed the enemy with heavy loss after several hours' fighting. The loss on the British side was trifling. More encounters will have to follow it, as some suspect, Dinizulu and his following are acting with the connivance of the Boers. Dinizulu represents the power of Cetewayo, or what is left of it, and he is at deadly feud with a chief under British protection, whom he has just overthrown. Usibepu, his enemy, was only saved by timely flight to a British police station. The engagements have probably been brought about by a punitive expedition against Dinizulu. If he has the Boers at his back it will be easy to err by trying to punish him too much.

Breaches of Etiquitte.

It is a breach of etiquette to stare round the room when you are making a call.

To remove the gloves when making a formal call.

To open the piano or to touch it if found open when waiting for your hostess to enter.

To go to the room of an invalid without an invitation.

To walk about the room examining its appointments when waiting for your hostess.

To open or shut a door, raise or lower a curtain, or in any way alter the arrangement of a room in the house at which you are a caller.

To turn your chair so as to bring your back to some one seated near you.

To remain after you have discovered that your host or hostess is dressed to go out.

To fidget with hat, cane or parasol during a call.

To preface your departure by remarking "Now I must go," or to insinuate that your hostess may be weary of you.

To resume your seat after having once risen to say adieu.

For a lady recieving several callers to engage in a tete-a-tete conversation with one.

To call upon a friend in reduced circumstances with any parade of wealth in equipage or dress.

Because I Love You.

BY SARAH K. BOLTON.

I cannot bring you wealth, she said,
I cannot bring you fame or place
Among the noted race;
But I can love you.

When trials come to test you, sweet,
I can be sunlight to your feet,
My kiss your precious lips shall greet,
Because I love you.

When daylight dies along the west,
You will come home to me for rest,
And I shall sleep upon your breast,
Because I love you.

As dew clings to the violet,
Making the fragrant chalice wet,
So my life into yours is set,
Because I love you.

Only myself, my all, I bring;
But count it, sweet, a precious thing
To give my life an offering,
Because I love you.

I bow before no other shrine!
If I go first across death's line
I will return to claim you mine,
Because I love you.

They Made Him Tired.

Its getting hard for a plain man of ordinary, everyday practical tastes to get on in the world now. When he comes to the city and expects to see the sights he is taken to picture galleries and theatres with strong French plays in progress, and to bric-a-brac exhibitions. A simple, honest countryman was taken to a picture gallery, and a violent and persistent effort made to entertain him with a subject he did not care about. They showed him around the gallery, they expatiated on the great pictures, the superb art, and all that sort of thing. He said nothing until he reached a window which looked out on the street. Then, as a horse-car went rattling by, he turned wearily to his artistic friend and said:—"What kind of axle-grease do they use in this town?"

The fire losses of the United States and Canada for the month of June, 1888, was $9,594,400—more than $500,000 less than the loss in June, 1887.

"The left foot, please," said a shoe dealer, as a customer was about to test the size of a pair of shoes by trying one upon his right foot. "You see," explained the dealer, "the left foot is larger than the right. Everybody to whom I make that statement is surprised, for people believe that in case of the feet as well as the hands the right is the larger. Observation has convinced me, however, that while the right hand is larger than the left, the left foot is larger than the right."

Summer-Made Butter.

Summer dairying calls for all the skill which a dairyman can bring to his aid in neutralizing the inevitable effects of a high temperature. Heat is the most powerful chemical agent, and decomposes everything that exists. If the solid metals, rocks and the most refractory substances are melted, reduced to vapor, and their elements forced apart by heat, how much more readily may such a complex and unstable fluid as milk, or so changeable a mixture of fats and volatile acids as butter, resist the effects of this extraordinary chemical agent? Moreover these effects are produced in very narrow differences. At 32° solid ice changes to fluid water; at 212° the fluid, which has the same properties of a solid, being incompressible by any force that we can exert, becomes one of the most expansive and elastic vapors, and by a little higher temperature this vapor becomes a gas, which explodes with tremendous force. And the points at which these wonderful results occur are exceedingly narrow, and confined within the very small limits of 2° or 3° only each way. Considering then the nature of this wonderful force, is it any matter of surprise that it should make mischief in the dairy at this season, when not uncommonly the temperature varies 25° to 30° in twenty-four hours, and the atmosphere and everything exposed to it, are subjected to a temperature of 80° or 90° and even 100°; a heat which is sufficient to cause any saccharine liquid to become acid in a few hours or to melt into a fluid, the soft fat of which butter consists, and change the condition of the organic acids which are shut up in it and are waiting for the sufficient temperature at which their elements fly asunder and form entirely different combinations? And the dairyman has to struggle with this heat—and not this alone, but the condition of the atmosphere, which is equally affected by it, being charged with electricity at times, or is, through its influence, charged with an enormous increase of its oxygen in the form of that most active chemical agent ozone, by which in a few minutes a whole dairyfull of milk may be turned sour.

Consequently at this season the dairyman needs to exert all his patience, foresight, skill and experience in evading the effects of the high temperature, and in preserving his milk and butter from them. Where ice is available, the greater part of the trouble is avoided; but where it is not to be procured, the way of the dairyman or woman is indeed hard, and calls for all the care and attention that can possibly be given. Even with the use of ice the whole difficulty is not removed, and indeed, without much care, an equally dangerous enemy is invoked. This is moisture, which when in excess causes the growth of various kinds of molds and mildews, and these in their growth produce some of the very results which are thought to be evaded by the use of ice. Dry cold is antiseptic, but moist cold is not; and every person who has used ice in a refrigerator which is neglected, and left always damp, will recall the disagreeable odor, sometimes called "frowy," but which really deserves the term stinking, and which accompanies that sticky, greasy feeling given to everything that is attacked by one of the lowest orders of plant growth that flourishes in damp air, and is commonly known as slime—a species of algæ. Hence the dairyman who has plenty of ice is not free from trouble, and must take care that the atmosphere which he cools by the ice must also be dried in some way, and that without heating. Quicklime is as indispensable in the summer dairy as ice. It is exceedingly absorptive of moisture, taking up one-third of its weight of it without having any appearance of moistness, and only falling slowly to a fine, dry powder. A peck of freshly burned lime will thus absorb nine pounds of water, or the enormous quantity of four quarts and when one realizes what it is to take so much water from the air, floor and walls of a dairy-room 10 by 12 feet square and 9 feet high, as has been done in a week, he will have some idea of the value of lime in this respect. In such a dairy-room, I have made the air so dry by the use of lime that the cream became leathery, and ventilation to admit some moisture became requisite. This applies to the shallow-pan setting, which is indispensable when there is no ice; and in a dairy of this kind, operated in the summer, the air cannot help but be moist, because the air admitted by necessary ventilation must necessarily contain considerable moisture. The following table shows the amount of water that may be held in suspension in the air of a room of the size mentioned, or 1,000 cubic feet, at the temperatures given, viz.:

32 deg.	213 gr.	nearly ½ oz.)
45	310
50	409	(nearly 1 oz.
55	540
65	720	(1½ oz.)
77	1000	(over 2 oz.)
85	1250	(2½ oz.)
95	1716	(3½ oz.)

Now this table has a most important application to the ventilation of a dairy; something, in fact, which bothers dairymen more than anything else in their business, all of which is surrounded by mysteries arising from occult operations of the physical or chemical laws of matter. Supposing a careful dairyman goes into his milk-room on a warm day, and finds a close and disagreeable smell, which really arises from the evaporation from the milk in the pans. The milk is perhaps put in the pans at 80° of temperature in a dairy at 65°. The warm milk throws off vapor in which there is a peculiar odor, sometimes called "animal odor," and which is really much like (if not precisely the same) that of the perspiration from the skin of a cow, and this fills the dairy. The good careful dairyman throws open the window, saying, "It wants some fresh air;" but he does not think that the air outside is 90 or 95° of temperature, and holds 3 or 3½ oz. of water in suspension per 1,000 cubic feet of it. And so he opens the window, and as the fresh air pours in and feels cool, although it is so warm, because it is cooler than his heated face and is in motion, he thinks, but wrongly, that he is doing something useful. The air pours in and pours out, and every time it is changed in the room it leaves 2 oz. of water (the difference shown in the table between the moisture of the air at 95° and 65°) on the walls and everything else in the dairy. The next day the walls are saturated, and if of stone or brick and plaster are trickling with water like a heavy dew. Then the mold appears; the red fungus which grows in round spots upon the cream in moist air, and the blue mildew (pencillivim glaucum) throws up its miniature forest. The dairyman wonders and is in despair. All he wants, however, is a little lime. If the dairy-room is 10 by 12 by 9, and thus holds 1,000 cubic feet of air, a pound of lime—fresh from the kiln or dried in a hot oven—will take all the excess of moisture out of it, and keep it dry enough for two or three weeks, when it should be changed for fresh lime.

To avoid ventilating in the day is another safeguard; ventilation should be given only at night, when the air is cooler and drier than it is in the day time, and during the day it is advisable to screen the windows from the sunshine, the heat of which passes through glass most readily, while fire heat will not. Moreover, the windows provided for ventilation should be made near the floor for the ingress of the air, and at the ceiling or in the ceiling for the escape of it; the warm air will always rise and make a way for the cool air to flow in at the bottom.

Nerviline. What is it?

Nerviline is a combination of the most powerful pain relieving substances known. Nerviline is not a nostrum, but a preparation which has received from members of the medical profession, clergymen, the press, and others most enthusiastic endorsation. If suffering from pain of any kind, external or local, give Nerviline a trial. Nerviline cures toothache, cramps, neuralgia, and almost instantly. Trial bottles 10 cents, large bottles 25 cents, at druggists and dealers everywhere.

A Wonderful Offer.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy have offered, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists at only 50 cents. It has fairly attained a world-wide reputation. If you have dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; if the eyes are weak, watery and inflamed; if there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers, the voice being changed and has a nasal twang; the breath offensive; smell and taste impaired; sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility, you are suffering from what is usual catarrh. The more complicated your disease, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

"Never morning wore to evening but some heart did break," says Tennyson: and the part that ill health often plays in heartwreck is too great for computation. Uterine disorders especially becloud the spirits and sap the springs of vitality and nervous force. For those distressing diseases, functional irregularities, unnatural discharges, constant pains, weak back, lassitude, dullness, sinking sensations, ill temper, and all weaknesses and derangements peculiar to females, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a perfect specific. Sold by druggists.

EDWARD FISHER,

TEMPERANCE.

Jacob Truax, of Eau Claire, Wisconsin, recently became a member of the Prohibition Club on his 100th birthday.

The sale of liquor on feast days, Memorial day, Thanksgiving day, and Christmas day is now prohibited in in Massachusetts.

There are now eight mission vessels cruising in the North Sea, each a combination of church, chapel, Temperance hall and dispensary.

Three-fourths of the saloons of Philadelphia have been refused licenses, and still we hear of no bloodshed and no furious insurrection. Prohibition, even in our large cities, would cause a good deal of howling, but nothing much worse.—[The Voice.

After a most exciting local-option fight the prohibitionists of Independence, Kansas, carried the election, June 28 by over 200 majority and ending the sale of liquor for foury ears. Women and girls worked all day at the polls and bringing in voters.

A Russian physician named Portugaloff declares that strychnine is an infallible cure for drunkenness, administered in subcutaneous injections. The effect of the strychnine solution is to change the craving for drink into positive aversion, and the change is effected in a day. After a treatment of eight or ten days the patient may be discharged. The strychnine is administered by dissolving one grain in 200 drops of water, and injecting five drops of the solution every 24 hours.

Mrs. Ada H. Kepley, the editor of an aggressive little Temperance paper in Effingham, Illinois, has struck on a new method of reforming drunkards. In her saunterings about the town she keeps a sharp lookout for men who wobble in their gait or give forth other signs of bigness in the head. Then, once a month she publishes the names in her paper in bold-faced type. Whether any converts to sober ways have been obtained by this plan is not stated, but Mrs. Kepley has been fined five dollars and costs for putting in the black list the name of a man who claimed that he was not drunk. Theoretically Mrs. Kepley's scheme may be sound and good, but the practical working thereof seems a trifle risky.

Following is the deliverance of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada on prohibition, at its meeting just closed at Halifax:—"That the Assembly declares that the general traffic in intoxicating liquors is contrary to the word of God and to the spirit of the Christian religion; that total prohibition would be the most effective form of temperance legislation; that it is in the highest degree expedient that the State should pass an efficient prohibitory law, and therefore the assembly urge upon all the members to use all legitimate means to secure such legislation." This is a wise and timely deliverance. It gives a full and distinct endorsement of prohibitory legislation, without any attempt to dictate to the people how they shall act. If all the Christian churches firmly and clearly take a similar position in regard to the abolition of the liquor traffic, the day of deliverance will soon come.

The following is the deliverance of the English Presbyterian Synod on the temperance question: Your committee deeply regret that the Acts of Parliament pleaded for by us and by so many representatives of public opinion have not yet been obtained. While thus recognizing the need for Parliamentary action, we do not forget that there is even greater need for improvement in the habits of the people, only to be effected by the force of loving persuasion. Herein lies a demand on the zeal and energy of the Church—(1) to make it very clear that the conscience of the Church is properly tender in relation to the sin of intemperance, and all culpable association with anything that fosters evil in our midst; (2) to familiarize the people with unknown or neglected truths concerning the dangers attendant on the use of alcholic stimulants, and thus to safeguard the young and the unwary; (3) to use toward the victims of the vice Christlike consideration, sympathy and self-sacrifice, so as "to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves"

PASSING NOTES.

Four convicts escaped from the prison pen at Graysville, Georgia, a few days ago. The bloodhounds were put on their track and they were run down, and each one of them received fifty lashes on the bare back. Only fifty lashes? Georgia is moving toward civilisation.

It is said that there are no fewer than 54 sets of counterfeit and altered Dominion notes and Canadian bank bills in circulation. The denominations range from $1 to $50. Business people are beginning to think that it is time something was done to protect them against these fraudulent notes by making public the distinction between the genuine and spurious articles.

In drilling glass stick a piece of stiff clay or putty on the part where you wish to make the hole. Make a hole in the putty the size you want the hole, reaching to the glass of course. Into this hole pour a little molten lead, when, unless it is very thick glass, the piece will immediately drop out.

The tide of pauper immigration to America has swollen to such proportions that it threatens to become a colossal calamity. In the United States the question has been recognized to be so momentous that Congress has appointed a special committee to investigate the subject in all its bearings. The committee will commence its sessions in the city of New York, and it is expected will make its first investigation next Tuesday or Wednesday.

The cranks of Niagara's rapids and whirlpool are no longer to have their own way on the United States side, and in future will be protected against their own folly. The police officers at Niagara have received instructions to arrest all persons who may hereafter go there for the purpose of performing daring feats at the Falls. The question suggests itself whether Blondin will be prevented from crossing the river in the way he achieved the feat done some years ago.

Sufficient attention has not been paid in cities and towns to the valuable part the fire department can be made to play in suppressing riots, dispersing disorderly mobs, and in bringing dangerous characters murderously inclined to an orderly frame of mind. The most angry mob will quail before a couple of well-directed streams of water from the hydrants, and the most desperate criminal will find his courage oozing out of his fingers under the repugnant influence of a good drenching. A couple of days ago, in the village of New Rochelle, N. Y., a disorderly character broke gaol, gained his house, armed himself with a rifle, and threatened to shoot anyone who came near him. The fire engine was brought out and the hose turned on the escaped prisoner. The water had not been going more than half a minute when the fellow begged for quarter and surrendered to the village constables. In this humerous and harmless manner was bloodshed averted.

Which Was the More to be Envied?

When Lafayette was last in America, receiving ovations wherever he went, he was entertained nowhere with more ardent devotion than in New Orleans. He was formally received in the old Spanish building situated on the Place d' Armes, now Jackson Square, north of the cathedral. He was very affable, and particularly agreeable to young men. Illustrative of his happy faculty of making himself popular by being, in a social way, "all things to all men," the following may be pertinent. Two young Creole gentlemen were successively introduced to him. "Are you married?" asked the marquis of the first. "I am, General, "was the reply. "Happy man—happy man!" said Lafayette, warmly pressing the youthful Benedict's hand. The second made a negative answer to the same question, "Lucky dog—lucky dog!" said Lafayette, patting the bachelor on the back.

THE THREAD OF LIFE

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XIII.—(CONTINUED.)

"Why, what does this mean, Miss Meysey—that is to say, Winifred?" He corrected himself hurriedly. "Elsie isn't gone? She's here this morning as usual, surely?"

As he said it he almost hoped it might be true. He could hardly believe the horrible reality. His face was pale enough in all conscience now—a little too pale, perhaps, for the letter alone to justify. Winifred, eyeing him close, saw at a glance that he was deeply moved.

"She's gone," she said, not too tenderly either. "She went away last night, taking her things with her—at least some of them.—Do you know where she's gone, Mr. Massinger? Has she written to you, as she promised?"

"Not Mr. Massinger," Hugh corrected gravely, with a livid white face yet affecting jauntiness. "It was agreed yesterday it should be 'Hugh' in future.—No; I don't at all know where she is, Winifred; I wish I did." He said it seriously. "She hasn't written a single line to me."

Hugh's answer had the very ring of truth in it—for indeed it was true; and Winifred, watching him with a woman's closeness, felt certain in her own mind that in this at least he was not deceiving her. But he certainly grew unnecessarily pale. Cousinly affection would hardly account for so much disturbance of the vaso-motor system. She questioned him closely as to all that had passed or might have passed between them these weeks or earlier. Did he know anything of Elsie's movements or feelings? Hugh, holding the letter firmly in one hand, and playing with the key of that incriminating cupboard, in his waistcoat pocket, loosely with the other, passed with credit his examination. He had never, he said, with gay flippancy almost, been really intimate with Elsie, talked confidences with Elsie, or received any from Elsie in return. She did not know of his engagement to Winifred. Yet he feared, whatever her course might be, some man or other must be its leading motive. Perhaps—but this with the utmost hesitation—Warren Relf and she might have struck up a love affair.

He felt, of course, it was a serious ordeal. Apart from the profounder background of possible consequences—the obvious charge of having got rid of Elsie—two other unpleasant notions stared him full in the face. The first was, that the Meyseys might suspect him of having driven Elsie to run away by his proposal to Winifred. But supposing even they never thought of that—which was highly unlikely, considering the close sequence of the two events and the evident drift of Winifred's questions—there still remained the second unpleasantness—that his cousin, through whom he had been introduced to the family, should have disappeared under such mysterious circumstances. Was it likely they would wish their daughter to marry a man among whose relations such odd and unaccountable things were likely to happen?

For, strangely enough, Hugh still wished to marry Winifred. Though he loathed her in his heart just then for not being Elsie, and even, by some illogical twist of thought, for having been the unconscious cause of Elsie's misfortunes; though he would have died himself far rather than lived without Elsie; yet, if he lived, he wished for all that to marry Winifred. For one thing, it was the programme; and because it was the programme, he wanted, with his strict business habits, to carry it out to the bitter end. For another thing, his future all depended upon it; and though he didn't care a straw at present for his future, he went on acting, by the pure force of habit in a prudent man, as deliberately and cautiously as if he had still the same stake in existence as ever. He wasn't going to chuck up everything all at once, just because life was now an utter blank to him. He would go on as usual in the regular groove, and pretend to the world he was still every bit as interested and engaged in life as formerly.

So he brazened things out with the Meyseys somehow, and to his immense astonishment, he soon discovered they were ready dupes, in no way set against him by this untoward accident. On the contrary, instead of finding, as he had expected, that they considered this delinquency on the part of his cousin told against himself as a remote partner to her original sin, by right of heredity, he found the Squire and Mrs. Meysey nervously anxious for their part least he, her nearest male relative, should suspect them of having inefficiently guarded his cousin's youth, inexperience, and innocence. They were all apology, where he had looked for coldness; they were all on the defensive, where he had expected to see them vigorously carrying the war into Africa. One thing, above all others, he noted with profound satisfaction—nobody seemed to doubt for one second the genuineness and authenticity of the forged letter. Whatever else they doubted, the letter was safe. They all took it fully for granted that Elsie had gone, of her own free-will, gone to the four winds, with no trace left of her; and that Hugh, in the perfect innocence of his heart, knew no more than they themselves about it.

Nothing else, of course, was talked of at Whitestrand that livelong day; and before night, the gossips and quidnuncs of the village inn and the servants' hall had a complete theory of their own to account for the episode. Their theory was simple, romantic, and improbable. It had the dearly-loved spice of mystery about it. The coast-guard had noticed that a ship, name unknown, with a red light at the masthead and a green on the port bow, had put in hastily about nine o'clock the night before, near the big poplar. The Whitestrand cronies had magnified this fact before nightfall, through various additions of more or less fanciful observers or non-observers—for fiction, too, counts for something—into a consistent story of a most orthodox elopement. Miss Elsie had let herself down by a twisted sheet out of her own window, to escape observation—some said a rope, but the majority voted for the twisted sheet, as more strictly in accordance with established precedent—she had slipped away to the big tree, where a gentleman's yacht, from parts unknown, had put in cautiously before a terrible gale, by previous arrangement, and had carried her over through a roaring sea across to the opposite coast of Flanders. Detail after detail grew apace; and before long there were some who even admitted to having actually seen a foreign-looking gentleman in a dark cloak—the cloak is a valuable romantic property upon such occasions—catch a white-robed lady in his stout arms as she leaped a wild leap into an open boat from the spray-covered platform of the gnarled poplar roots. Hugh smiled a grim and hideous smile of polite incredulity as he listened to these final imaginative embellishments of the popular fancy; but he accepted inoutline the romantic tale as the best possible version of Elsie's disappearance for public acceptance. It kept the police at least from poking their noses too deep into this family affair, and it freed him from any possible tinge of blame in the eyes of the Meyseys. Nobody can be found fault with for somebody else's elopement. Two points at least seemed fairly certain to the Whitestrand intelligence: first, that Miss Elsie had run away of her own accord in the absence of the family; and second, that she neither went by road nor rail, so that only the sea or river appeared to be left by way of a possible explanation.

The Meyseys, of course, were less credulous as to detail; but even the Meyseys suspected nothing serious in the matter. That Elsie had gone was all they knew; why she went was a profound mystery to them.

CHAPTER XIV.—LIVE OR DIE?

And all this time, what had become of Elsie and the men in the Mud-Turtle?

Hugh Massinger, for his part, took it for granted, from the moment he came to himself again on the bank of the salt marshes, that Elsie's body was lying unseen full five fathoms beneath the German Ocean, and that no tangible evidence of his crime and his deceit would ever be forthcoming to prove the naked truth in all his native ugliness against him. From time to time to be sure, one disquieting thought for a moment occurred to his uneasy mind: a back current might perhaps cast up the corpse upon the long dike where he had himself been stranded, or the breakers on the bar might fling it ashore upon the great sands that stretched for miles on either side of the river-mouth at Whitestrand. But to these terrible imaginings of the night-watches, the more judicial functions of his waking brain refused their assent on closer consideration. He himself had floated through that seething turmoil simply because he knew how to float. A woman, caught wildly by the careering current in its headlong course, would naturally give a few mad struggles for life, gasping and gulping and flinging up her hands, as those untaught to swim invariably do; but when once the stream had carried her under, she would never rise again from so profound and measureless a depth of water. He did not in any way doubt that the body had been swept away seaward with irresistible might by the first force of the outward flow, and that it now lay huddled at the bottom of the German Ocean in some deep pool, whence dredge or diver could never by human means recover it.

How differently would he have thought and acted all along had he only known that Warren Relf and his companion on the Mud-Turtle, had found Elsie's body floating on the surface, a limp burden, not half an hour after its first immersion.

That damning fact rendered all his bold precautions and daring plans for the future worse than useless. As things really stood, he was plotting and scheming for his own condemnation. Through the mere accident that Elsie's body had been recovered, he was heaping up suspicious circumstantial evidence against himself by the forged letter, by the night escapade, by the wild design of entering Elsie's bedroom at the Hall, by the mad idea of concealing at his own lodgings her purloined clothes and jewelry and be longings. If ever an inquiry should come to be raised into the way that Elsie met her death, the very cunning with which Hugh had fabricated a false scent would recoil in the end most sternly against himself. The spoor that he scattered would come home to track him. Could any one believe that an innocent man would so carefully surround himself with an enveloping atmosphere of suspicious circumstances out of pure wantonness?

And yet, technically speaking, Hugh was in reality quite innocent. Murderer as he felt himself, he had done no murder. Morally guilty though he might be of the causes which led to Elsie's death, there was nothing of legal or formal crime to object against him in any court of so-called justice. Every man has a right to marry whom he will; and if a young woman with whom he has cautiously and scrupulously avoided contracting any definite engagement, chooses to consider herself aggrieved by his conduct, and to go incontinently, whether by accident or design, and drown herself in chagrin and despair and misery, why, that is clearly no fault of his, however much she may regard herself as injured by him. The law has nothing to do with sentiment. Judges quote no precedent from Shelley or Tennyson. If Hugh had told the whole truth, he would at least have been free from legal blame. By his extraordinary precautions against possible doubts, he had only succeeded in making himself seem guilty in the eyes even of the unromantic lawyers.

When Warren Relt drew Elsie Challoner, a huddled mass, on board the Mud Turtle, the surf was rolling so high on the bar, that with one accord he and Potts decided together it would be impossible for them, against such a sea, to run up the tidal mouth to Whitestrand. Their piteous little dot of a craft could never face it. Wind had veered to the south-east. The only way possible now was to head her round again, and make before the shifting breeze for Lowestoft, the nearest northward harbour of refuge.

It was an awful moment. The sea roared onward through the black night; the cross-drift whirled and wreathed and eddied; the blinding foam lashed itself in volleys through the dusk and gloom against their quivering broadside. And those two men, nothing daunted, drove the Mud-Turtle once more across the flank of the wind, and fronted her bows in a direct line for the port of Lowestoft, in spite of wind and sea and tempest.

But how were they to manage meanwhile, in that tossing cockleshell of a boat, about the lady they had scarcely rescued? That Elsie was drowned, Warren Relf didn't for a moment doubt; still, in every case of apparent drowning, it is a duty to make sure life is really extinct before one gives up all hope; and that duty was a difficult one indeed to perform on board a tiny yawl, pitching and rolling before a violent gale, and manned against the manifold dangers of the sea by exactly two amateur sailors. But there was no help for it. The ship must drift with one mariner only. Potts did his best for the moment to navigate the dancing little yawl alone, now that they let her scud before the full force of the favouring wind under little canvas; while Warren Relf, staggering and steadying himself in the cabin below, rolled the body round in rugs and blankets, and tried his utmost to pour a few drops of brandy down the pale lips of the beautiful girl who lay listless and apparently lifeless before him.

It was to him indeed a terrible task; for from the first moment when the painter set eyes on Elsie Challoner, he had felt some nameless charm about her face and manner, some tender cadence in her musical voice, that affected him as no other face and no other voice had ever affected him or could ever affect him. He was not exactly in love with Elsie—love with him was a plant of slower growth—but he was fascinated, impressed, interested, charmed by her. And to sit there alone in that tossing cabin, with Elsie cold and stiff on the berth before him, was to him more utterly painful and unmanning than he could ever have imagined a week or two earlier.

He did not doubt one instant the true story of the case. He felt instinctively in his heart that Hugh Massinger had shown her his inmost nature, and that this was the final and horrible result of Hugh's airy, easy protestations.

As he sat there, watching by the light of the one oil lamp, and rubbing her hands and arms gently with his rough hard palms, he saw a sudden tumultuous movement of Elsie's bosom, a sort of gasp that convulsed her lungs—a deep inspiration, with a gurgling noise; and then, like a flash, it was borne in upon him suddenly that all was not over—that Elsie might yet be saved—that she was still living.

It was a terrible hour, a terrible position. If only they had had one more hand on board, one more person to help him with the task of recovering her! But how could he ever hope to revive that fainting girl, alone and unaided, while the ship drifted on, single-handed, tossing and plunging before that stiffening breeze? He almost despaired of being able to effect anything. Yet life is life, and he would nerve himself up for it. He would try his best, and thank Heaven this boisterous wind that roared through the rigging would carry them quick and safe to Lowestoft.

His mother and sister were still there. If once he could get Miss Challoner safe to land, they might even now hope to recover her. Where there's life, there's hope. But what hope in the dimly lighted cabin of a toy yawl, just fit for two hardy weather-beaten men to rough it hardily in, and pitching with wild plunges before as fierce a gale as ever ploughed the yeasty surface of the German Ocean.

He rushed to the companion-ladder as well as he was able, steadying himself on his sea-legs by the rail as he went, and shouted aloud in breathless excitement: "Potts, she's alive! she's not drowned! Can you manage the ship anyhow still, while I try my best to bring her round again?"

Potts answered back with a cheery, "All right. There's nothing much to do but to let her run. She's out of our hands, for good or evil. The admiral of the fleet could do no more for her. If we're swamped, we're swamped; and if we're not, we're running clear for Lowestoft harbour." Give her sea-room enough, and she'll go anywhere. The storm don't live that ill founder the Mud Turtle. I'll land you or drown you, but anyhow I'll manage her.

With that manful assurance satisfying his soul, Warren Relf turned back, his heart on fire, to the narrow cabin and flung himself once more on his knees before Elsie.

A more terrible night was seldom remembered by the oldest sailors on the North Sea. Smacks were wrecked and colliers foundered, and a British gunboat, manned by the usual complement of scientific officers, dashed herself full tilt in mad fury against the very base of a first-class lighthouse; but the taut little Mud Turtle true to her reputation as the stauncheat craft that sailed the British channels, rode it bravely out, and battled her way triumphantly, about one in the morning, through the big waves that rolled up the mouth of Lowestoft harbour. Potts had navigated her single-handed amid storm and breakers, and Warren Relf, in the cabin below, had almost succeeded in making Elsie Challoner open her eyes again.

But as soon as the excitement of that wild race for life was fairly over, and the Mud-Turtle lay in calm water once more, with perfect safety, the embarrassing nature of the situation, from the conventional point of view, burst suddenly for the first time upon Warren Relf's astonished vision; and he began to reflect that for two young men to arrive in port about the small-hours of the morning, with a young lady very imperfectly known to either of them, lying in a dead faint on their cabin bunk, was, to say the least of it, a fact often open to social and even to judicial misconstruction. It's all very well to say offhand, you picked the lady up in the German Ocean; but Society is apt to move the previous question, how did she get there? Still something must be done with the uncovenanted passenger. There was nothing for it, Warren Relf felt, even at that late season of the night, but to carry the half-inanimate patient up to his mother's lodgings, and to send for a doctor to bring her round at the earliest possible opportunity.

When Elsie was aware of herself once more, it was broad daylight; and she lay on a bed in a strange room, dimly conscious that two women whom she did not know were bending tenderly and lovingly over her. The elder, seen through a haze of half-closed eyelashes, was a sweet old lady with snow-white hair, and a gentle motherly expression in her soft grey eyes: one of the few women who know how to age gracefully.

Whose fair old faces grow more fair
As Point and Flanders yellow.

The younger was a girl about Elsie's own time of life, who looked as sisterly as the other looked motherly; a pleasant-faced girl, not exactly pretty, but with a clear brown skin, a cheek like the sunny side of peaches, and a smile that showed a faultless row of teeth within, besides lighting up and irradiating the whole countenance with a charming sense of kindliness and girlish innocence. In a single word it was a winning face. Elsie lay with her eyes half open, looking up at the face through her crossed eyelashes, for many minutes, not realising in any way her present position, but conscious only, in a dimly pleased and dreamy fashion, that the face seemed to soothe and comfort and console her.

Soothe and comfort and console her for what? She hardly knew. Some deep seated pain in her inner nature—some hurt she had had in her tenderest feelings—a horrible aching blank and void.—She remembered now that something unspeakable and incredible had happened.—The sun had grown suddenly dark in heaven.—She had been sitting by the waterside with dear Hugh.

As she thought of the name, that idolised name, a smile played for a moment faintly round the corners of her mouth; and the older lady, still seen half unconsciously through the chink in the eyelids, whispered in an audible tone to the younger and nearer one: "She's coming round, Edie. She's waking now. I hope, poor dear, she won't be dreadfully frightened, when she sees only two strangers by the bed beside her."

"Frightened at you, mother," the other voice answered, soft and low, as in a pleasant dream. "Why, nobody on earth could ever be anything but delighted to wake up anywhere and find you, with your dear sweet old face, sitting by their bedside."

Elsie, still peering with half her pupils only through the closed lids, smiled to herself once more at the gentle murmur of those pleasant voices, both of them tender and womanly and musical and went on to herself placidly with her own imaginings.

——Sitting by the waterside with her dear Hugh—dear, dear Hugh—that prince of men. How handsome he was; and how clever, and how generous! And Hugh had begun to tell her something. Eh! but something! What was it? What was it? She couldn't remember; she only knew it was something terrible, something disastrous, something unutterable, something killing. And then she rushed away from him, mad with terror, towards the big tree, and——

Ah!

It was an awful, heart-broken, heart-rending cry. Coming to herself suddenly, as the whole truth flashed like lightning once more across her bewildered brain, the poor girl flung up her arms, raised herself wildly erect in the bed, and stared around her with a horrible vacant, maddened look, as if all her life were cut at once from under her. Both of the strangers recognized instinctively what that look meant. It was the look and the cry of a crushed life. If ever they had harboured a single thought of blame against that poor wounded, bleeding, torn heart for what seemed like a hasty attempt at self-murder, it was dissipated in a moment by that terrible voice—the voice of a goaded, distracted, irresponsible creature, from whom all consciousness or thought of right and wrong, of life and death, of sense and movement, of motive and consequence, has been stunned at one blow by some deadly act of undeserved cruelty and unexpected wickedness.

The tears ran unchecked in silent sympathy down the women's flushed cheeks.

Mrs. Relf leant over and caught her in her arms. "My poor child," she whispered laying Elsie's head with motherly tenderness on her own soft shoulder, and soothing the girl's pallid white face with her gentle old hand, "cry, cry, cry if you can! Don't hold back your tears; let them run, darling. It'll do you good.—Cry, cry, my child—we're all friends here. Don't be afraid of us."

Elsie never knew, in the agony of the moment, where she was or how she came there; but nestling her head on Mrs. Relf's shoulder, and fain of the sympathy that gentle soul extended her so easily, she gave free vent to her pent-up passion, and let her bosom sob itself out in great bursts and throbs of choking grief; while the two women, who had never till that very morning seen her fair face, cried and sobbed silently in mute concert by her side for many, many minutes together.

"Have you no mother, dear" Mrs. Relf whispered through her tears at last; and Elsie, finding her voice with difficulty, murmured back in a choked and blinded tone; "I never knew my mother."

"Then Edie and I will be mother and sister to you," the beautiful old lady answered with a soft caress. "You mustn't talk any more now. The doctor would be very, very angry with me for letting you talk and cry even this little bit. But crying's good for one when one's heart's sore. I know, my child, yours is sore now. When you're a great deal better, you'll tell us all about it.—Edie, some more beef-tea and brandy.—We've been feeding you with it all night, dear, with a wet feather.—You can drink a little, I hope, now. You must take a good drink and lie back quietly."

Elsie smiled a faint sad smile. The world was all lost and gone for her now; but still she liked the dear souls' sweet, quiet sympathy. As Edie glided across the room noiselessly to fetch the cup, and brought it over and held it to her lips and made her drink, Elsie's eyes followed every motion gratefully.

"Who are you" she cried, clutching her new friend's plump, soft hand eagerly. "Tell me where I am. Who brought me here? How did I get here?"

"I'm Edie Relf," the girl answered in the same low, silvery voice as before, stooping down and kissing her. "You know my brother, Warren Relf, the artist whom you met at Whitestrand. You've had an accident—you fell into the water—from the shore at Whitestrand. And Warren, who was cruising about in his yawl, picked you up and brought you ashore here. You're at Lowestoft now. Mamma and I are here in lodgings. Nobody at Whitestrand knows anything about it yet, we believe.—But darling," and she held poor Elsie's hand tight at this, and whispered very low and close in her ear, "we think we guess all the rest too. We think we know how it all happened.—Don't be afraid of us. You may tell it all to us by-and-by, when you're quite strong enough. Mother and I will do all we can to make you better. We know we can never make you forget it."

Elsie's head sank back on the pillow. It was all terrible—terrible—terrible. But one thought possessed her whole nature now. Hugh must think she was really drowned: that would grieve Hugh—dear affectionate Hugh.—He might be cruel enough to cast her off as he had done—though she couldn't believe it—it must surely be hideous, a hideous dream, from which sooner or later she would be certain to have a happy awakening—but at anyrate it must have driven him wild with grief and remorse and horror to think he had killed her—to think she was lost to him.—Oughtn't she to telegraph at once to Hugh—to dear, dear Hugh—and tell him at least she was saved, she was still living.

Angel Josie! Snowy Spirit,

BY LEIGH STURGEON.

Angel Josie! snowy spirit,
Far above the milky way:
Brightest star that bless'd our heavens,
Sweetest song that cheer'd our day.

Come back, darling,—mortal hearts say—
But a higher voice replies—
"Rather wait and join her anthems;
Where thy songster never dies."

Angel Josie! snowy spirit,
Eyes must weep and tombs must fill,
Ere life's gloomy tempest enters
Heaven's radiant "Peace be still."

There amid unfading blossoms,
Where dark sorrow never blights;
Hand in hand, we'll love and loiter.
Basking in the Light of Lights.

Not Strangers There.

BY LINDA LOUISA LEHMAN.

To whom would Heaven's door so freely open
As to a little child,
Who stands with timid feet upon its threshold,
Lovely and undefiled?

And such a one, of late, was lowly lying,
With fast receding breath;
Over her face the first, last shadow falling—
She was afraid of death!

Her loved one said, "Oh, do not fear to enter
That land, so wide and fair."
To all their words of cheer she could but answer,
"I do not know them there!"

But, even as she spoke, her hands were lifted
In sudden, sweet surprise,
And the reflection of some dawning splendour
Illumined her wondering eyes.

No longer clinging to her tender watchers,
And darkened by their woe,
She looked as if she saw some loved one beckon,
And was in haste to go.

What she beheld we saw not, and her rapture
Our hearts not yet might share,
But with a last bright smile she whispered gladly,
"They are not strangers there!"

Wild Flowers.

BY E. H. SHANNON.

Along the pleasant country road,
Beneath a cloudless sky
We strolled, that golden summer time
My pet and I;
The deep, deep eyes were drinking in
The beauty, where it spread,
And busy thoughts were busier still
Within her head.

She'd never known the country thus,
Dressed in its colors rare,
When nature strews her wild flowers, bright
Beyond compare.
The houses, as we passed, revealed
Their lawns and flowery beds,
But here, unkept, the wild flowers shook
Their saucy heads.

"Mamma, who owns these pretty flowers,
Does this house or that one?"
I stopped a minute where my girl
Stood in the sun;
"Neither, my dear. God planted them
For little girls like you,
He'll let you take all you can pick,
If you choose to."

Her hands were full—my heart was too,
As with a mother's pleasure,
I watched her gather in her arms
Her treasure;
Then, on her knees the darling dropped,—
Without a minute's warning—
"I thank you, God, for sending these,— Good morning!"

At Aix-la-Chapelle there is a newspaper museum, founded by Oscar Von Forckenbeck, which contains files of specimens of more than 17,000 different newspapers in the world, and it is daily receiving copies of the remainder from all quarters of the globe. The great curiosity of the collection is No. 46 of The Texas Democrat, published at Houston on March 11, 1864, when the exigencies of war time made it necessary to print it on wall paper.

LAWYERS AND THEIR WAYS.

Peter the Great was opposed to litigation. He issued an edict that no trial should last to exceed eleven days.

A lawyer making his will bequeathed his estate to fools and madmen, "for," said he, "from such I had it and to such I give it."

Solon compared the people to the sea and the lawyers to the wind. "The sea," he said, "will be calm and quiet if the wind does not trouble it."

In the reign of Henry VI. courts were held at Dorking every three weeks, and there are instances of suits lasting six months, and resulting in damages of four pence and costs of twelve pence.

European civilization may have wrought changes, but up to a few years ago the Chinese code was so simple that the services of attorneys were not necessary, and there was not a lawyer in the whole empire.

Dr. Garth, alluding to the practice of lawyers, wrote:

"For fees, to any form they mould a cause.
The worst has merits and the best has flaws;
Five guineas make a criminal to-day,
And ten to-morrow wipes the stain away."

In the rolls of the British Parliament, 1445, is a petition from two counties setting forth that the number of attorneys had lately increased from six to twenty-four, whereby the peace of those counties had been greatly interrupted by law suits. They asked that the number be reduced to fourteen.

Addison tells a story about the Neapolitans, who were much given to litigation. One of the Popes made a requisition upon the Viceroy of Naples for 30,000 head of swine. The Viceroy replied that the swine could not be spared, but if his Holiness had any use for 30,000 lawyers they were much at his service.

Love Your Horse.

Do you love your horse? You ought to, for the horse is man's best friend among all his dumb beasts. And the hot weather—how are you tempering it to your horses on the farm? Do you spare them all you can? Teams may be seen plowing in the hot days of July and August in the same harness they wore during the winter. This is needless and cruel. Use a husk collar. Remove every superfluous strap and band, and let the air circulate around the body. At night, wash away the sweat and dust from the legs and thighs. Let his stable be clean and airy, and give him a liberal bed of straw to lie upon. He will be grateful.

He that would enjoy the fruit must not gather the flower.

With all his gallantry it took a Frenchman to say this: "To be beautiful a woman must not talk much or she will contract her mouth in an unbecoming manner."

A new swindle is being worked on the guileless granger. He is induced to buy something or other on long time, his note being all the payment required. But he objects to giving his note and having it discounted for cash. "Oh, we'll keep the note," says the sharper; and thereupon writes across the face "Not transferable." It soon turns up again in the hands of another party who wants the farmer to pay. An "e" added to the "Not," makes "Note transferable."

DISEASES OF MEN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC No. 6

CURES The terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED, AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

Symptoms for which No. 8 should be used:—

Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse, or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short the spring or vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and mentally, from early indiscretions, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address for Lubon's Treatise, entitled "CHRONIQUE SCANDALEUSE," an account of follies and vices. This book will be sent sealed and secure from observation upon receipt of two 3c. stamps.

BINDING twine cheap at Urlin Bros.

CONSTABLE MCRAE has lodged complaint against James Vogan, George House, Thomas Trigger and George Walker charging them with being drunk and disorderly and using profane and blasphemous language on the streets in Dutton last Sabbath. The reason they gave for their bad conduct was that they had procured bad whiskey which made them wild. The law does not justify them in procuring any kind of whiskey, and unless they settled on Tuesday as they proposed doing, we hear they will waltz before A. J. [illegible] P., on Friday, when they will learn the days for rowdyism in Dutton are past.

A CONTINUATION of the pleasing pen and ink sketch, "Toronto to Quebec," is given in another column. After reading these delightful letters one feels like throwing "dull care" to the winds and becoming along with our correspondent "Atramp."

As a healing, soothing application for cuts, wounds, bruises and sores, there is nothing better than Victoria Carbolic Salve.

THE country is fairly swarming with tramps at the present time. They infest all the lines of railways, and notwithstanding that the greatest precautions are taken to prevent them stealing rides, they succeed in hiding in box cars or between the cars. They are all thieves, and many of them professional burglars, and too much precaution cannot be taken by those living along the lines of railways.

BURGLARS BOLD.—Early Wednesday morning the inmates of Mr. S. Wilton's house were aroused by a noise in the lower part of the house. On investigation it was found that a bedroom window had been raised thus admitting a burglar Finding nothing downstairs to suit his fancy he was about to proceed upstairs (where the inmates were sleeping) when he was forced to make a hasty exit without securing any plunder.

LAST Sabbath morning about 7 o'clock two tramps entered James Wilkie's cellar and helped themselves to a quantity of eggs and a sealer of fruit. They were seen coming out by Miss Wilkie who ran to the barn to tell her parents. Mrs. Wilkie got the eggs from one, but the other retained the jar of fruit, and they departed after using some very profane language. It was stated that they were afterwards seen in a rendezvous out towards Wallace town.

Our new lock-up is now ready and has been occupied.

It is said that several boys from here went to Dutton on Sabbath last and serenaded the town to a lively rate. Such things ought not to be and they should be learned a lesson not to be forgotten,

It is said that a base ball match between the Highgate and Iona clubs will be played in the near future at West Lorne.

The Commercial Hotel is being rapidly pushed forward and will soon be one of the first in Elgin county.

We are glad to see Mr. John Paris able to be around again.

Dutton High School at University and Departmental Examinations.

A. W. Cameron at Junior Matriculation took the following stand: First class honors in Mathematics, sixth place; first class honors in French, tenth place; second class honors in English, tenth place; second class honors in Chemistry and second general proficiency scholarship.

Miss Jessie G. Rothwell, also, in the subjects of English, French and German, took the following stand: First class honors in English, second class honors in French and third class in German. This, together with her stand last year of first class honors in Mathematics and first class honors in History and Geography, entitles her to a first class certificate, Grade C.

This, I think, for so young a school, is a very excellent showing at one of the most difficult and at the same time one of the most important examinations in the Province.

At the departmental examinations our record is not so good, still, judging from the report of these examinations given in the Toronto daily papers, it is about in proportion to other schools. In all, then, we are entitled to the following teachers' certificates: First class, Grade C, Jessie G. Rothwell; second class, A. W. Cameron, John R. Patton and W. Docker—one by University examination and two by departmental; third class, Albert Patterson.

Various reasons combined to lessen our results, chiefly, I think, the rapid advance in the standard for teachers' certificates.

Hoping, Mr. Editor, you will find space in your valuable paper for this,

I have the honor to be, etc.,

WILLIAM ROTHWELL.

WALLACETOWN AWAKENED.

When the storm passed over Wallacetown last Friday it does not appear to have spent any of its fury and residents say that it was the worst seen in that section for many years. Many were afraid to go to bed and others awakened by the storm got out of bed and stayed up until it was over. Amongst the latter was Mr. Arch. Galbraith and family. They were sitting in the kitchen when the deafening peal of thunder came. Mr. Galbraith's sister remarking that she the house was struck, although no one felt the shock. Mr. Galbraith went into the parlor and found the carpet on fire. The electric fluid had struck the chimney, down which it ran, and down the stovepipe, setting fire to the carpet. One end of the building had been knocked out by the shock. After extinguishing the blaze, Mr. Galbraith went upstairs with a lamp in his hand, and neighbors seeing him and the light through the hole in the side of the house, thought the house was on fire, and the church and school bells were rung, and the villagers hurried to Mr. Galbraith's to find that all the fire there was, had been extinguished.

A couple of Mr. Galbraith's nieces, daughters of Dr. Galbraith, of Dresden were visiting their uncle and aunt, but that night determined to go and visit some cousins with whom they stayed during the night, and no doubt by so doing saved their lives, for it was on the rooms they occupied that the lightning made such great havoc

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

The Reason Why
Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.
In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:
"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."
Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia
and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:
"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."
The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

It cures dysentery and diarrhœa, regulates the stomach and bowels, cures wind colic, softens the gums, reduces inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. THE ANCIENT CAPITAL.

CLIMBING THE ROCK.—A STROLL ON THE TERRACE.— HISTORICAL PLACES.—MONTCALM'S HEADQUARTERS.—PLAINS OF ABRAHAM.—LIVE SNOW-BANKS IN AUGUST.—AN INTERESTING LETTER BY "ATTRAMP."

Editor of the ENTERPRISE:

'Twould be too bad to "slight off" the old city without a word, and certainly a chirp or two will not utterly destroy it.

Quebec, as you are well aware, is a huge, slaty rock, jutting out into the St. Lawrence river. On the north side winds the St. Charles river, so its water facilities, you see, are abundant. But that doesn't help you in the ascent, and up the rock you must go. Round and round winds the street, studded with tall, antique looking buildings, till finally you come to a little square, turned into an elegant park, and there you pause to take breath a while as well as the horses.

On looking about you find you are only half-way up. There's citadel rock hundreds of feet above you, and twenty feet more of a wall after that. Unless you have the courage of an American (Montgomery e.g.), you will conclude to call a halt till after refreshments have been served. While they are coming let us take a stroll on the famous "Terrace." The Terrace called "Durham" and "Dufferin" at the north and south ends respectively, is a broad walk a quarter of a mile long midway up the citadel rock, and overlooking the St. Lawrence as it rolls hundreds of feet below. The sight from the Terrace defies the world to surpass it. A few geographical spots may be mentioned. Deep down below lies a confused heap of buildings, many of which, were it not for history, would be mistaken by geologists as deposits of the flood. This is the Lower Town. Just across the river another rock stretches its "huge length along." Right in front lies the Island of Orleans. Mountains are scattered on every side. A spur of the Laurentian chain runs out here. Cape Rouge looms up to the west, and 40 miles down towards the Gulf Cape Torment "lifts its awful form" and literally "midway leaves the storm." The cannon frowning above you and the sky overhead are sufficient to complete the tableau, for the daytime. At night the varied lights from the opposing rock of Lewis, from Orleans, and from the chain of villages which actually extends from Quebec down the north bank to St. Anne—a distance of 20 miles—all gleaming out from their dark background, add somewhat of the awful and sublime to the same. But the music of the artillery bands and the gay, laughing crowd beside you break the spell.

Quebec is nothing if not historic. In Canada's leading journal it is always described by the term "Ancient Capital." It well deserves the name. Any morning you may step into a church 200 years old. Houses or parts of houses are to be seen once frequented by Nelson—then simply captain—Montgomery, Montcalm, Brock, Bigot, Frontenac or Laval. There is a house on St. Louis street, now an Indian curiosity shop, still pointed out to visitors as Montcalm's headquarters. From there, no doubt, issued his orders to "scalp Mr. Wolfe and his few Englishmen" on Abraham's Plains. Near by is the monument jointly commemorating the two heroes of the battle which ensued.

Leaving the citadel and turning our steps up the north bank of the St. Lawrence, after a walk of a mile and a quarter we are in the Plains of Abraham. The Plains are full of little hollows and hillocks, and are still "plains," with the exception of the buildings flanking the Grand Allie road running through them. One can, without difficulty, imagine the armies drawn up on that memorable morning in September, 1759. A toll-gate marks the centre of the position of the right wing of the British army and close by a handsome monument is reared, bearing the inscription,

Here Died Wolfe Victorious.

On walking round it one cannot suppress a thrill, "For," as Byron would say,

"Standing on that hero's grave,
I could not deem myself a slave."

A mile and a quarter farther west is the "Cove" rendered famous for all time by the perilous ascent of the British army in the gray dawn of that September morning.

Among the ancient buildings in the town may be mentioned Laval University, founded by the zealous bishop of that name in 1663; and hard by the Basilica Cathedral, founded three years later by the same hand. Besides these there are the English cathedral and St. Andrew's church, founded in 1759.

For architectural beauty St. John's Cathedral, among churches, deserves mention; but towering above all in site, bulk and beauty is the Parliament House of the Province. Its massive white granite front, on the brow of the Quebec rock, can be distinguished from the host miles and miles away. But perhaps more interesting than these ponderous structures are the houses built after French fashion. Their low stories are crowned with steep, slanting roofs, often so steep and tall that they have two tiers of windows in them. There was method in this mad descent however, for the winter snows or Quebec would crush in an ordinary flat roof.

The snow, by the way, that falls here in winter is something enormous. Ten feet is a common depth in the streets, which are so narrow that only one way is made on top and passing-stations prepared at intervals. Furthermore, as I am at this subject, I may say I had the pleasure last week of throwing a snowball of Quebec snow. You may have a throw yourself, Mr. ENTERPRISE, if you will come down any time before September! We have two snow-banks left yet. Two real, live snow-banks—no hot-house affairs! They lie in two vacant lots in the city, open to the sun and rain (and rain falls in torrents here.) Not content with that, the owners of the lots have been selling the "crystal" to butchers by the cart-load. The larger bank, which is not so white and clear as the other, will not all be removed before August is out.

But to return to our sheep. So great is the force of the sleet and frost here, that though most of the buildings are of solid masonry, they have to have a covering of wood or tin to keep the frozen sleet from tearing off the plaster.

The summer season is very short too; the fall wheat is yet green, and haying not quite finished. Still every native thinks the climate can not be improved on. But then they praise even their streets!

Their streets; what a puzzle they are! I am becoming somewhat reconciled to them now. If I wish to go north I invariably go southward. You feel somewhat insulted if, after following a street faithfully for some minutes, you do not come out near where you started. One of the straightest streets in town ends at right angles to the way it commenced.

If you should get lost you are always among curiosities. Among others you may run across the Governor-General. That has been my pleasure two or three times.

Perhaps, Mr. ENTERPRISE, you didn't know that he and I were relatives? His grandfather and mine traded shovels! But then I don't presume too much on the relationship. However, waiving that for the moment, the new Governor, Lord Stanley, is a very pleasant gentleman, polite in his address and easy in his manners. I happened to be crossing in a Levis ferry-boat the other day. His Excellency's carriage, containing himself and wife, drove on board. Barrels and bales were rolled in beside the vice regal carriage, and His Excellency, who had alighted and was watching the proceedings, was nearly jammed two or three times by the rude French wharfmen. A couple of old dray teams, loaded with building stone, crowded in beside the carriage of the Governor, who had all the while seemed intensely amused and pleased with the scene. At the cricket match which followed both he and his wife took a lively interest, talking freely to the players and applauding the deserving. In fact, Lord Stanley of Preston bids fair to become as popular as Lord Dufferin.

But I was talking of getting lost. That reminds me once more of the streets. If the name of the street does not begin with "Saint" then you are lost indeed! "Saint Ursule" and "Saint Angele" are all very well, but I draw the line at Saint Chevrotiere!

French is pre-eminently the language of the town, though more English is to be heard than in Montreal. Of 70,000 inhabitants some 7,000 speak English. These are composed of the upper class English and the working class Irish It does one good to occasionally hear the "rale ould brogue" on the street.

But I nearly forgot to tell you about the women of Quebec. "Comme, elles sont belles!" An admirer of brunettes could surely revel here. He could, like Byron, "see their glorious black eyes shine." Or rather he could see any shade from lightest hazel to deepest brown for, pardon me, ye fair, a genuine black I have never seen, except always after the "glorious twelfth." What strikes one about French women is their neat figure, but in their faces there is something wanting; at least they do not satisfy the æsthetic faculty of the English man.

But I see I have already rambled too wide, starting out as I did with the sublime here I am ending with the—ladies—and as the inevitable bell will ring me up at 5 a.m. for matins, and as it is approaching the "wee sma' hours" I must gather me in.

Au revoir,
ATTRAMP.

RECENT EXAMINATIONS.

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I will trespass on your valuable space to address a few remarks to the candidates at the late examinations who were not successful.

The papers set, I think it will be conceded, though difficult enough, were not much more difficult than those of preceding years. That the ability of the pupils or the character of the teaching was at fault is, I think, sufficiently disapproved by the fact that Mr. Aldis Cameron, with only one year's special training, and a minimum time at that, took the 2nd proficiency scholarship at Toronto, competing with candidates with three years' special training, and unlimited teaching time, in such large schools as Upper Canada College and Toronto Collegiate Institute, and that Miss Jessie Rothwell was one among only six in the Province who attained 1st class honors in English.

What then was the cause of so many failures? It was simply and solely the cold-blooded determination of the Educational Department to repress the number of teachers.

Of this I have further proof. Now whether the course the Department has adopted of indiscriminately plucking all who presented themselves without inquiring if they intended to teach afterwards or not, was the wisest and most beneficial to the cause of education or not, I shall not take upon me to decide. But, sir, if you have watched the reports of the Teachers' Associations, you will have seen that from end to end of the Province the cry has come up, "There are too many teachers! How shall we lessen the number of teachers?"

This, then, Mr. Editor, is the solution the Department has given to the question, and from Dan to Beersheba Rachel is weeping over her children.

Compared with other schools of good standing Dutton has fared well. One school, immediately under my notice, sent up 20 candidates for 2nd class, seven of whom had tried last year, and 40 for 3rd class, and out of the host obtained three certificates, one 2nd and two 3rds. Many schools have been left out altogether. So I am free to affirm, that if the Central Committee had examined no more stringently than last year, Dutton High School would have had twenty certificates instead of four. Yours sincerely,
JAMES SHORT.

MURDER AT ESSEX CENTRE

Dan Brault, a brakeman on the Amherstburg branch of the Michigan Central Railroad, died Thursday morning from the effects of a blow received Wednesday of last week at 5 o'clock, in a hotel in Essex Centre. Brault at one time resided in St. Thomas, and is well known to the local railroaders, who will learn with regret of his untimely end. The circumstances under which he met his death were as follows:

The Roman Catholics of Essex Centre held their annual picnic in a grove in the vicinity of the town. As Brault's train did not leave until about one o'clock he visited the picnic grounds in the morning, but returning too late to catch his train was compelled to lie around Essex Centre the remainder of the day. In company with some companions he visited an hotel on the outskirts of the town. This hotel possesses a license to sell liquor, which the hotels in the town do not, and it appeart that Brault and his friends indulged in the flowing bowl to some extent. As the afternoon wore away an altercation ensued between Brault and some one in the hotel, in the course of which James Drummond, a livery stable keeper at Harrow, came up and interfered, Brault thereupon gave him a piece of his mind, and Drummond, evidently with malicious intent, ran behind the bar, seized an iron wrench which was lying there, and approached Brault in a threatening manner. The latter attempted to evade his assailant, but Drummond caught him and lifting his wrench struck Brault with it just above the forehead. The unfortunate man fell like a log to the floor and never spoke again. Drummond was arrested and is now lying in jail. The wrench with which he dealt the fatal blow is a heavy iron instrument, eighteen to twenty inches long, weighing four or five pounds, used for turning the taps of beer barrels. Drummond's family connections are said to be most respectable, but he has been a somewhat wild youth.

Brault was 24 years of age, was married and had two children. His wife was at his bedside when he died.

STRAY DOGS ARE BAKED.

[From the Chicago Mail.]

"I had to call in my catchers yesterday," said Mr. Barber, master of the dog-pound. "I let them out again this morning and they nabbed seventy-five dogs in a few hours. They can't go out to-morrow. We are too cramped for space. In an average we do not exceed 150 dogs a day. One hundred and seventy-five went to the happy hunting-grounds yesterday. It takes but two minutes to do the work. It is a painless death. The moment I turn the damper in the stove connecting the pipe to the air-tight box, and they get a whiff of the charcoal fumes, they forget they ever had a bark. There is no man on earth who loves a good dog better than I do. I detest a cur, however. By the way, did you ever observe that it is only the mongrels that go mad? Fact! A thoroughbred rarely has rabies. The two dogs that bit Mrs. Martin the other day were mongrels of the lowest type. I had a time in finding them, too. I discovered them secreted in the basement of the house, and upon taking them out shot them right there. That woman's life was worth more than the lives of all the dogs in Chicago. The dog days are approaching, and, in view of it, we are compelled to enlarge our quarters."

South of the pound the sills are being laid for a building 125x50 feet. It will contain fourteen additional pens. The hold-over pen will be 50x25 feet. There will be a separate pen for fine dogs.

"We never mix the thoroughbreds with the mongrels," said the gentleman. "The fine female dogs are also kept by themselves. The new establishment will be thoroughly ventilated and will be an excellent kennel. It will be constructed in hopper fashion, with facilities for perfect cleanliness. We flush the pens every day and turn the hose on the dogs at the same time. The curs and blooded dogs fare alike. They are fed three times a day and there is a constant stream of water running through each compartment. They neither suffer in life nor in death with us."

At this juncture a richly attired lady stepped from a carriage at the entrance.

"I wouldn't have lost my Fido for four dollars," she said.

"It will cost you just $5.75 to obtain her," said Superintendent Barber.

"So much as that?"

"So much as that. Fido is now donning her burial robes and preparing for the smokatory," replied the urbane gentleman.

Fido was saved and the city fund enriched by the transaction.

A little boy in knickerbockers was the next applicant. With tears streaming down his cheeks he asked if they had "burned" his bull-dog.

"What does he look like?" asked Mr. Barber.

"I'll show him to you," and the little fellow chinned up to the aperture.

"Dere he is. Hey, Prince!"

With that a beastly looking, bench-legged brindled bulldog made a bound from the farthest corner of the pen clearing a dozen mangy curs at one bound. He jumped almost into the boy's face. One of the attendants entered and picked him out, and one of the most unique scenes conceivable transpired. The dog was about as big as his young master. He leaped upon him and both went down on the floor together. "Prince" hopped across the little fellow's body, licked his hands and face, and cut some of the maddest capers, running halfway down the long hall and then back again, helter skelter, in the wildest glee, never forgetting to jump over and lie down and roll with his owner. The bill was paid and they started off together, the neatly dressed, nobby-looking little fellow accompanied by about the most ungainly looking canine that ever had the mange.

As they departed a man drew up in a spring-wagon. He was hot. His little English pug was carefully held in his arms that morning, he said. The catchers spotted him. One of them made a grab for the dog's head, but the owner smashed the fellow with the red shirt and brass lasso over the head with his whip. Just then the other snarer crept up in the rear and nailed the pug by the hind legs and pumped him into the cage. He picked his pet out of the crowd of canines and he was tagged and muzzled, and both departed very well pleased with each other and with the world in general.

In the hold-over pen are some as fine dogs as any fancier would wish to look at. There are half a dozen magnificent Newfoundlands, black-and-tans with regular rat tails, pointers, blooded bulls, an assortment of genuine Scotch terriers, and a beautiful Irish setter. It is a notable fact that the majority of these are always on their feet and look chipper, while in the adjoining pen lie the curs of high and low degree in a torpid and listless way.

"Our men also take in horses and cows found roaming at large," said Mr. Barber. "We are clearing on an average about $40 a day for the city. Fifteen hundred and seventy-five dogs have been taken in by us since July 1. Of these there were 1,175 curs. Some of the blooded dogs are still on hand, and the remainder have been purchased, redeemed or asphyxiated. We rarely kill a good dog. The other day we nailed Baron Yerkes' greyhound and English bull. His two coachmen came up after them. They had on the license tag (the dogs, I mean), and got off with $3.75 each. We are no respecters of persons. A dog without a baseball catcher's mask on is a dog to us, no matter who his owner may be."

As the reporter was about to leave a dashing young lady drove up in an elegant turnout. She alighted and in quite a flutter ran up to the superintendent.

"I want my poodle," she said, her eyes snapping very meaningly. "He'll know my voice. Show me where you heartless men keep the animals."

She was shown.

"Dudie!" rang into every compartment and resounded through the corridor. But "Dudie" didn't respond.

"I'm afraid he was baked in the last batch, ma'am," said the unperturbable Barber.

"What! Baked! Oh, you horrid, wicked thing!" and the tears ran down the lady's face. She advanced toward the superintendent in a rather aggressive way, but the veteran of the Haymarket riot never flinched and she departed in dudgeon.

"You have no idea the variety of people that come here, and the way some of them act is a study. I was fifteen years in the fire department and seven years on the police force, but I have learned more of human nature since I became a dog fancier than I ever knew in my life before."

Queer Deaths of Horses.

Singular accidents have befallen eastern Connecticut horses recently. A few days ago F. X. River's fine pair, at Woodstock, ran away with the mowing machine in a field, and the keen saw-toothed blade, worked at a terrific speed by the furious pace, slashed off both the hind legs of one of the animals. The wounded horse was shot. The other horse was not scratched. Not long ago Henry Burk of Brookville while out driving, trotted his fast stepper, valued at $600, over a stable fork that had dropped in the road from a cart which had just passed; the horse's hoof tilted the handle, and the animal was spitted upon the tines. So fiercely was the weapon driven that it penetrated the inguinal region, backward through the pelvic cavity to the vertibræ, thence forward into the diaphragm, passing through the left lung, and nearly perforating the skin at the left shoulder, a distance of four feet. The horse lived several hours and was then shot. At New London, Tyler B. Earl's livery horse not long ago nearly ended its life in scratching its ear with its left hind foot. The calk of the shoe was caught in the horse's teeth, and wedged in so tightly that it could not be removed. In its struggle the horse fell, and the force of the fall ripped the shoe off the hoof. The shoe was dangling from the horse's mouth when its owner, alarmed by the tumult in the stable, arrived.

In a Jungle at Night.

Sombre and awe-inspiring as a forest may be by day it is doubly so during the mystery and darkness of night. Reynell Taylor, an English soldier in India, thus describes his watch in a jungle, where, although he did not kill the tiger he came to seek, he found an abundance of interesting sights and sounds. He had stationed himself, at eight o'clock, near the body of a dead cow, which tigers were likely to visit.

I cannot describe to you the excitement of sitting in the midst of a jungle full of all sorts of animals, listening to the unearthly sounds of midnight birds and beasts. For two hours I was amused by the purring of the goat-sucker, the wailing of the peewit plover, the cry of an awakened peacock, or the distant "hurrah" of a whole pack of jolly jackals.

In the midst of these familiar sounds would come some strange noise, the solitary cry of a large beast of prey on the prowl. Occasionally I was made aware, by an animal galloping away from within a few yards of me, that my position had been minutely reconnoitred; at other times I could hear the rush of heavy feet, and then a scuffle and a suppressed whining.

At last when I had nearly forgotten what I had come out about, a foraging party of jackals came over the hill, and some of them, seeing the carcass of the cow, set to, without further ado, pulling, tearing and crunching the flesh and bones in high glee.

Then some large animal approached, and the jackals scampered off to a little distance. This frightened the big creature, and he retreated, after which the jackals returned. While straining my eyes to see them, the man at my side caught my arm, and pointed through the thorn fence on the right. Just then then the jackals retreated again, and I could see the outline of a large animal standing over the cow.

"You had better try him with a bullet!" whispered my assistant.

I accordingly raised my rifle, and then felt as if I were going to take an awful responsibility upon myself by breaking the wild, mysterious dream about me with the report of a gun, and I could almost have fancied that every available wild beast within hearing of it would hasten to the spot to make short work of so unwonted an intruder.

At length, having covered my object a well as I could, I pulled the trigger. I am sure no rifle ever made such a clamor in the world as that one! The first hill that received the report was so taken by surprise that it did not hand it on to its neighbor for several seconds. The second hill wouldn't believe it, and shied it back at once at the head of the first, and so they went on, tossing it about for nearly half a minute.

In the meantime I inspected the result of my shot. The animal, after some struggles, fell dead, and proved to be a large hyena.

Large Life Insurance Claim.

FIFTEEN THOUSAND DOLLARS PAID BY THE MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION —LETTER OF THANKS AND ENDORSEMENT OF THE ASSOCIATION BY WILMOT D. MATTHEWS, ESQ., PRESIDENT OF THE TORONTO BOARD OF TRADE, ETC., ETC.

The large number of members of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association resident in Canada will read with satisfaction the following letter from Wilmot D. Matthews, Esq., in referring to the prompt payment of the large amount of life insurance held by his late father, W. D. Matthews Esq.:—

There is probably no name in Canada more widely known than that of Mr Matthews—and occupying as he does so many important positions of trust, such as President of the Toronto Board of trade, Director of the Dominion Bank, and also of the Canadian Pacific Railway—his letter to the Canadian Managers of the Mutual Reserve carries with it more than ordinary weight.

The Mutual Reserve a few years since started out with the determination of demonstrating to the world that Life Insurance could be afforded with perfect security for less than half the cost charged by old-line or high-rate companies. While meeting with the most unscrupulous opposition it has pluckily pushed forward overcoming all obstacles placed in its way, and to-day is pronounced a marvel of success, its system and financial position being endorsed by the best actuaries on this continent. It has paid for death claims over five millions of dollars, and at the same time accumulated nearly two millions of dollars in its Reserve Fund.

Mr. Matthews' insurance is an illustration of the small cost under the Mutual Reserve's System as compared with other companies. The sum total of payment by him on $15,000 insurance has only been $1,665. The same amount under the old-time system would have cost him $4,657. It will be seen, therefore, that the actual saving in cost amounts to nearly ($3,000) three thousand dollars.

W. D. MATTHEWS & Co.,
Commission Merchants,
Pacific Buildings, 26 Front st. east,
Toronto, June 16, 1888.

Messrs. Wells & McMurtry, General Managers Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, Toronto:

DEAR SIRS,—In behalf of my mother I beg to express her thanks to the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association for receipt of cheque ($15,000) fifteen thousand dollars in full settlement of my claim under policies of life insurance held by my late father, W. D. Matthews. Although the claim does not mature for several weeks, the same has been promptly paid without the slightest trouble.

My father always held the Mutual Reserve in the highest estimation, and from his intimate acquaintance with President Harper and the chief executive officers of the Association, never hesitated to recommend it to all who applied to him for information. I, as well as other members of our family, hold large policies in the Association and believe it to be one of the best managed institutions represented in the country. The small cost of insurance, together with the precaution taken to protect the trust funds of the Association, in the appointment of a separate corporation as trustee for the policy-holders, and the simplicity and success of the system, cannot fail to make the Association deservedly popular with the insuring public.

Yours truly,
WILMOT D. MATTHEWS.

The Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, to which the above letter of Mr. Matthews refers, is the largest and strongest open Assessment Association in the world. It has issued over seventy-five thousand policies of Life Insurance. It has a Cash Reserve Fund of nearly Two Millions of Dollars, and full Government Deposit at Ottawa.

Active agents wanted in every unrepresented district. Correspondence solicited. Address, Well & McMurtry, Gen'l. Managers, Toronto.

AGRICULTURAL.

Brains and horse sense are the farmer's best capital.

Texas has 3,000,000 acres in cotton, yielding 1,500,000 bales.

Flax-retting needs extreme care if good results are to be obtained.

The heifer born to be a cow, may be turned into a beeve—spoiled by over-feeding.

Everybody who has tried Jerseys or Guernseys for butter-making, sticks to them.

Omaha expects to build a corn palace next fall, to be "one of the wonders of the world."

A first-class farmer will provide some sort of succulent food for his stock in winter.

The increase in fleece, by late shearing, is doubly lost in decrease in the sheep and lamb.

Poor butter may be often laid to the dogs. Do not have too much dog or boy in the dairy.

What is wanted in a fowl-house is comfort, convenience and sufficient room combined with economy.

Because a man may have poor milk some day it does not necessarily follow that the milk has been watered.

Cows will change from day to day in the amount of solids in their milk and especially in the amount of butter fats.

Under a recent arrangement, bees when properly packed can be transmitted by mail between the States and Canada.

Do not buy a cow to make beef. If you do, by the time you have feed that beef a number of years, it will be costly.

Turnips are the cheapest crop to grow and at the same time one of the most valuable. If you are an unbeliever, try it.

There should be no fooling at milking time. A steady hand, a quiet mouth and a gentle milk stool, will help to fill the pail.

Give the cows some extra food at night in the stable. This extra food is the best investment which can be made in the dairy.

Salting stock in the fields should be done only when the stock have free access to water. If no water be given other than when the animals are in the barn-yard the salt is best given in the trough.

The harvesting of the honey crop in California is now in progress, and will be continued through July. Sellers want 6 cents, but dealers think the yield so large that 5½ cents should be the price.

Oats, when lodged or blown down, are most profitably used by being made into hay, and the same is true of wheat. Wheat hay is extremely nutritious, and some of the best dairymen sow wheat especially to make from it a choice hay to be fed to cows in milk

This is an excellent time to use land plaster on grass. The plaster has an affinity for moisture, and attracts it from the atmosphere. It also supplies lime in a soluable form (sulphate of lime.) It is also claimed for it that it attracts and retains ammonia from the atmosphere.

Two many monopolists gull millions out of the American people to spend upon European lordlings in adorning the persons of their daughters or their widows. No wonder the farmers of the country can not raise export wheat enough to keep the balance of trade in our favor.

All goods sell better if put upon the market in neat shape. This is true of honey; crates or surplus cases for holding the section boxes, should be made neat in form. Sections of honey well completed and nicely arranged in such crates, will bear very rough handling, and will remain well preserved, if the sections have not been removed after taken off.

EGGS AND ODORS.—A poultryman advises that egg should never be placed near lard, fruit, cheese, fish or other articles from which any odor arises. The eggs are extremely active in absorbing power, and in a very short time they are contaminated by the particles of objects in their neighborhood, by which the peculiar and exquisite taste of a new laid egg is destroyed.

You cannot get two crops from the land without doing injury unless the land be highly manured. The custom of securing a crop of hay from the orchard robs the trees. The more hay the less fruit. The fruit crop needs as careful attention as any other. All crops grown in the orchard other than the one deserved from the trees simply retard the growth of the trees and lessen their bearing capacity.

The farming of the future must be gradually contracted in the number of acres. Higher cultivation, more remunerative crops, less hard work over broad fields and closer attention to special paying crops on the fields that surround the house. More pasture, more stock and plenty of ensilage—this insures the purchase of less commercial fertilizer and the very best results from the contents of the barnyard.

The hoofs of stock do as much damage to grass as the grazing of it. No pasture should be given up to stock. It is better to divide the pasture into sections, permiting the stock to have access to only one section at a time, in order to allow the other portions to recuperate and renew the crop. The shorter the grass is grazed the more injury will be done by the hoofs. On wet land the injury from tramping is greater, hence stock should be kept out of the pasture for a day or two after a rain.

Who says the farmers are not manufacturers? The idea is not new, but every barn in the land where animals are kept is a kind of manufactory. The animals are the machines; hay, oats, grain, roots and other food crops are the raw materials; and milk, wool, meat, etc., the products. And the conversion of these raw material into salable products requires a vast amount of labor, capital, skill, and good business management. Should not the farmer, then, be as fully protected as other manufacturers?

In Mr. Woodward's description of an English fair last week, he mentioned two features that Americans ought to copy—the horse-shoeing contest and the dairy contest. Both of these features would be sure to take well here. Farmers would enjoy the blacksmith contest, and the man who wouldn't run to see a dozen bright American dairymaids compete for a prize at butter-making doesn't deserve to be called an American. In these two matters John Bull is ahead of Uncle Sam and Miss Bull is beating Miss Sam. Here is a chance for Secretary Woodward. Let him come home and arrange for these contests at the coming State fair and at the institutes this winter.

THE RUSSIAN MULBERRY.

Here is a fruit tree from the far north, which possesses a power of resisting cold much greater than any of the better known forms of Morus. But the same trouble exists with it as with the Siberian Apricot. It has been propagated solely from seed, and consequently has almost infinite variations. I have a tree which has resisted our hardest test winters with but slight injury, while a neighbor has one that kills to the snow line frequently. As to the fruit, not one in ten produces a good kind; and there is also great choice in regard to vigor, form, productiveness and beauty of foliage. Here, too, is a profitable field for careful selection.

For Sweet Home Sake,

Mothers, wives, sisters! why that patient, hopeless suffering, those pinched, melancholy faces that sadden home and cause anxiety to loved ones, while so potent and harmless a remedy as Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription can be obtained of your druggist? It is a panacea for all "female complaints," of marvellous efficacy and health-giving qualities. The debilitated, and sufferers from those excruciating periodical pains, "dragging down" feelings, back-ache and kindred female disorders, should use this certain remedy at once, and be restored to the blessing of health, for home's sake. and Ingersoll, are common topics of conversation, but the mistake we wish to comment on here, is the great one so many people labor under that consumption (which is really only Scrofula of the Lungs) is an incurable disease, and that there is no hope for one suffering from it. This terrible malady, that yearly fills so many graves, can be surely cured, if not too long neglected. Be wise in time, if you are afflicted with it, and arrest the undermining influence that is sapping your life blood, and hurrying you to an untimely grave, by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, a remedy that never fails in its life-giving mission, if taken in time. $500 Reward.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy have offered, in good faith, a standing reward of $500 for a case of chronic nasal catarrh which they cannot cure. No matter how bad the disease has become, or of how many years standing, it yields, in due time, to their skill. This famous remedy is sold by druggists at 50 cents.

SOME EXPENSIVE LUXURIES.

Costliest Articles in America—Furniture, Jewelry, Books and Pictures.

I have come across a curious paper compiled by some of those cranks with a passion for figures and statistics and meant to show how tremendous is the luxury of this city. He begins by saying that Mr. H. G. Marquand has the costliest piano in the world. Steinway made the works and the case—painted by Alma Tadema—was done in London, the whole costing $16 000. This stands in Mr. Marquand's famous music room, one of the most luxurious and beautiful chambers in this country. He also has the costliest billiard table in this country, having paid for it in round numbers $26 000, and everything in the house is on a scale to harmonize with these expensive bits of furniture.

The costliest dinner service ever made was done in this city by Tiffany. Mr. Mackey brought with him from his mines $75 000 worth of bullion, and this the jewelers made up into a service, asking $120,000 for the work, making the cost of it in all $195,000, and no sovereign in Europe eats from such a gorgeous plate. Yet, strange to say, Mackey is as simple as possible in his manner. The costliest string of pearls in this country belongs to Mrs. Louis Hamersley, and was the one she wore on her neck one night last winter when a thief put his hand in the carriage window and tried to snatch them, succeeding only in breaking the string and scattering the pearls, which were all recovered with the exception of one. He had heard of their price, doubtless—$51,000—and made a sudden grasp at fortune. Mrs. Willie Vanderbilt wears a solitaire diamond ring which cost $48,000, while Mrs. Cornelius has just purchased for $125,000 the fittings of one room. The late Mrs. Mary Morgan paid $250,000 for a diamond necklace, and Mrs. Hicks-Lord has one equally valuable.

The most expensive picture in this country is Meissonier's "1807," which hangs in the Metropolitan museum, presented by Henry Hilton, who paid $66,500 for it. It has been estimated that this sum would more than cover the entire canvas with $20 gold pieces. The most expensive book of its size in New York is the 16-9 edition of "Shakspeare's Sonnets," of which but two copies exist, one in the British museum, and the other owned by the publishers Dodd & Mead. They paid $5,000 for it, which in weight is about $480 an ounce. In the Lenox library is a perfect copy of the Mazarine or Gutteuberg Bible, the first book printed with movable types. It is worth $25,000, and nothing better has been done since. Crayton Ives has an imperfect copy for which he paid $15,000. J. W. Bouton, the book dealer, sold a Bible the other day for $10,000. It was originally in three volumes, but by "Grayerism"—the insertion of wood cuts, manuscript, engravings and etchings—it has expanded to sixty imperial folio volumes.—[Brooklyn Eagle.

The present deplorable condition of Cuba has revived the agitation for the annexation of the island to the United States. It is thought that Spain would cede the country for the sum of $100,000,000. Cuba would, no doubt, be a valuable acquisition, as in proper hands she would become a great tobacco and sugar-growing country. Although Cuba has 46,000 square miles of territory, only 9,000 square miles are under cultivation.

A statistical genius has elaborated the following figures regarding the Mills Tariff bill:—The general tariff debate began on April 17th and continued until May 19th, when the five-minute debate began, and continued, with few interruptions, up to Thursday last. In the general debate the Democrats made 71 set speeches and the Republicans 83. About 4,000,000 tariff documents have been sent from the Public Printer's since Congress assembled. Nearly 2,000,000 of these were of the President's Message. Of the speeches delivered in the House there have been distributed:—Of Mr. Mills' 400,000, of Speaker Carlisle's 600,000, of Mr. Reed's 200,000, of Mr. McKinley's 300,000, of Knute Nelson's 300,000, of Mr. Scott's 400,000, of Mr. McMillin's 200,000, of Mr. Burrows' 100 000, of Mr. Wilson's, of West Virginia, 75,000, of Mr. Russell's, of Massachusetts, 50,000, of Mr. Butterworth's 50,000, of Mr. Cox's 50,000.

A Burglar Who Captured Himself.

AUGUSTA, Ga., Aug. 6.—One year ago the house of L. S. Sessions, a few miles from this city, was robbed of some money and silver plate. The thief was discovered and almost captured, when he mysteriously disappeared in the darkness, and the most diligent search failed to trace him. Yesterday Mr. Sessions ordered a tree to be cut, as it gave evidence of rapid decay, and its proximity to his dwelling made it dangerous. It was an immense oak, and for years a hollow had extended up through it. When the tree fell, the skeleton of a man was found wedged in it, and near him the silverware and money that had been stolen from Sessions. The supposition is that the burglar in escaping climbed the tree and stepped in the hollow so as to elude discovery, but found it impossible to get out.

THE THREAD OF LIFE;

OR,

SUNSHINE AND SHADE.

CHAPTER XV.—THE PLAN EXTENDS ITSELF.

For three or four days, Elsie lay at the Relfs' lodgings at Lowestoft, seriously ill, but slowly improving; and all the time, Mrs Relf and Edie watched over her tenderly with unceasing solicitude, as though she had been their own daughter and sister. Elsie's heart was torn every moment by a devouring desire to know what Hugh had done, what Hugh was doing, what they had said and thought about her at Whitestrand. She never said so directly to the Relfs, of course; she couldn't bring herself yet to speak of it to anybody; but Edie perceived it intuitively from her silence and her words; and after a time, she mentioned the matter in sisterly confidence to her brother Warren. They had both looked in the local papers for some account—if accident it were—and saw, to their surprise, that no note was taken anywhere of Elsie's sudden disappearance. This was curious, not to say ominous; for in most English country villages a young lady cannot vanish into space on a summer evening, especially flinging herself bodily into the sea—as Warren Relf did not doubt for a second Elsie had done in the momentary desperation of a terrible awakening—without exciting some sort of local curiosity as to where she has gone or what has become of the body. We cannot emulate the calm social atmosphere of the Bagdad of the Califs where a mysterious disappearance on an enchanted carpet aroused but the faintest and most languid passing interest in the breasts of the bystanders. With us the enchanted carpet explanation has fallen out of date, and mysterious disappearances, how ever remarkable, form a subject rather of prosaic and prying inquiry on the part of those commonplace and unromantic myrmidons, the county constabulary. This strange absence of any allusion in the Whitestrand news to what must needs have formed a nine days' wonder in the quiet little village, quickened all Warren Relf's profoundest suspicions as to Hugh's procedure. At Whitestrand, all they could possibly know was that Miss Challoner was missing—perhaps even that Miss Challoner had drowned herself. Why should it all be so unaccountably burked, so strangely hushed up in the local newspapers? Why should no report be divulged anywhere? Why should nobody even hint in the Lowestoft Times or the Ipswich Chronicle that a young lady of considerable personal attractions, was unaccountably missing from a family of a well-known Suffolk landowner?

Already on the very day after his return to Lowestoft, Warren Relf had hastily telegraphed to Hugh Massinger at Whitestrand that he was detained in the Broads, and would be unable to carry out his long-standing engagement to take him round in the Mud-Turtle to London. But as time went on, and no news came from Massinger, Warren Relf's suspicions deepened daily. It was clear that Elsie, too, was lingering in her convalescence from suspense and uncertainty. She couldn't make up her mind to write either to Hugh or Winifred, and yet she couldn't bear the long state of doubt which silence entailed upon her. So at last, to set to rest their joint fears, and to make sure what was really being said and done and thought at Whitestrand, Warren Relf determined to run over quietly for an afternoon's inquiry, and to hear with his own ears how people were talking about the topic of the hour in the little village.

He never got there, however. At Almundham Station, to his great surprise, he ran suddenly against Mr. Wyville Meysey. The Squire recognised him at a glance as the young man who had taken them in his yawl to the sandhills, and began to talk to him freely at once about all that had since happened in the family. But Relf was even more astonished when he found that the subject which lay uppermost in Mr. Meysey's mind just then was not Elsie Challoner's mysterious disappearance at all, but his daughter Winifred's recent engagement to Hugh Massinger. The painter was still some years too young to have mastered the profound anthropological truth that even with the best of us, man is always a self-centred being.

"Well, yes," the Squire said, after a few commonplaces of conversation had been interchanged between them. "You haven't heard, then, from your friend Massinger lately, haven't you? I'm surprised at that. He had something out of the common to communicate. I should have thought he'd have been anxious to let you know at once that he and my girl Winifred had hit things off amicably together.—O, yes, it's announced, definitely announced: Society is aware of it. Mrs. Meysey made it known to the county, so to speak, at Sir Theodore Sheepshanks's on Wednesday evening. Your friend Massinger is not perhaps quite the precise man we might have selected ourselves for Winifred, if we'd taken the choice into our own hands: but what I say is, let the young people settle these things themselves—let the young people settle them between them. It's they who've got to live with one another, after all, not we; and they're a great deal more interested in it at bottom, when one comes to think of it, than the whole of the rest of us put together.

"And Miss Challoner?" Warren asked, as soon as he could edge in a word conveniently, after the Squire had dealt from many points of view—all equally prosy—with Hugh Massinger's position, character, and prospects—"is she still with you? I'm greatly interested in her. She made an immense impression on me that day in the sandhills."

The Squire's face fell somewhat. "Miss Challoner?" he echoed. "Ah, yes: our governess. Well, to tell you the truth—if you ask me point-blank—Miss Challoner's gone off a little suddenly.—We've been disappointed in that girl, if you will have it. We don't want it talked over in the neighbourhood more than we can help, on Hugh Massinger's account, more than anything else, because, after all, she was a sort of cousin of his—a sort of cousin, though a very remote one; as we learn now, an extremely remote one. We've asked the servants to hush it all up as much as they can, to prevent gossip; for my daughter's sake we'd like to avoid gossip; but I don't mind telling you, in strict confidence, as you're a friend of Massinger's, that Miss Challoner left us, we all think, in a most ungrateful manner. It fell upon us like a thunderbolt from a clear sky. She left a letter for Winifred, saying she was leaving for parts unknown, without grounds stated. She slipped away, like a thief in the night, as the proverb says, taking just a small handbag with her, one dark evening; and the only other communication we've since received is a telegram from London—sent to Hugh Massinger—asking us, in the most mysterious, romantic school-girlish style, to forward her luggage and belongings to an address given."

"A telegram from London?" Warren Relf cried in blank surprise. "Do you think Miss Challoner's in London, then? That's very remarkable.—A telegram to Massinger! asking you to send her luggage on to London!—You're quite sure it came from London, are you?"

"Quite sure!—Why, I've got it in my pocket this very moment, my dear sir," the Squire replied somewhat testily. When an elder man says "My dear sir" to a very much younger one, you may take it for granted he always means to mark his strong disapprobation of the particular turn the talk has taken.) "Here it is—look: 'To Hugh Massinger, Fisherman's Rest, Whitestrand, Suffolk.—Ask Winnifred to send the rest of my luggage and property to 27 Holmbury Place, Dake Street, St. James's. Explanations by post hereafter.—ELSIE CHALLONER.'—And here's the letter she wrote to Winifred: a very disappointing, disheartening letter. I'd like you to read it, as you seem interested in the girl. It's an immense mistake ever to be interested in anybody anywhere! A very bad lot, after all, I'm afraid; though she's clever of course, undeniably clever.—We had her with the best credentials, too, from Girton. We're only too thankful now to think she should have associated for so very short a time with my daughter Winifred."

Warren Relf took the letter and telegram from the Squire's hand in speechless astonishment. This was evidently a plot—a dark and extraordinary plot of Massinger's. Just at first he could hardly unravel its curious intricacies. He knew the address in Holmbury Place well; it was where the club porter of the Cheyne Row lived. But he read the letter with utter bewilderment. Then the whole truth dawned piecemeal upon his astonished mind as he read it over and over slowly. It was all a lie—a hideous, hateful lie. Hugh Massinger believed that Elsie was drowned. He had forged the letter to Winifred to cover the truth, and, incredible as it seemed to a straight-forward, honest nature like Warren Relf's, he had managed to get the telegram sent from London by some other person, in Elsie's name, and to have Elsie's belongings forwarded direct to the club porter's, as if at her own request, by Miss Meysey. Warren Relf stood aghast with horror at this unexpected revelation of Massinger's utter baseness and extraordinary cunning. He had suspected the man of heartlessness and levity; he had never suspected him of anything like so profound a capacity for serious crime—for forgery and theft and concealment of evidence.

His fingers trembled as he held and examined the two documents. At all hazards, he must show them to Miss Challoner. It was right she should herself know for exactly what manner of man she had thrown herself away. He hesitated a moment, then he said boldly: "These papers are very important to me, as casting light on the whole matter. I'm an acquaintance of Massinger's, and I'm deeply interested in the young lady. It's highly desirable she should be traced and looked after. I have some reason to suspect where she is at present, I want to ask a favour of you now. Will you lend me these documents, for three days only, and will you kindly mention to nobody at present the fact of your having seen me or spoken to me here this morning?" To gain time at least was always something.

The Squire was somewhat taken aback at first by this unexpected request; but Warren Relf looked so honest and true as he asked it, that, after a few words of hesitation and explanation, the Squire, convinced of his friendly intentions, acceded to both his propositions at once. It flashed across his mind as a possible solution that the painter had been pestering Elsie with too pressing attentions, and that Elsie, with hysterical girlish haste, had run away from him to escape them—or perhaps only to make him follow her. Anyhow, there would be no great harm in his tracking her down. "If the girl's in trouble, and you think you can help her," he said good naturedly, "I don't mind giving you what assistance I can in this matter. You can have the papers. Send them back next week or the week after. I'm going to Scotland for a fortnight's shooting now—at Farquharson's of Invertanar—and I shan't be back till the 10th or 11th. But I'm glad somebody has some idea where the girl is. As it seems to be confidential, I'll ask no questions at present about her; but I do hope she hasn't got into any serious mischief."

"She has got into no mischief at all of any sort," Warren Relf answered slowly and seriously. "You are evidently labouring under a complete misapprehension, Mr. Meysey, as to her reasons for leaving you. I have no doubt that misapprehension will be cleared up in time. Miss Challoner's motives, I can assure you, were perfectly right and proper; only the action of another person has led you to mistake her conduct in the matter."

This was mysterious, and the squire hated mystery; but after all, it favoured his theory—and besides, the matter was to him a relatively unimportant one. It didn't concern his own private interest. He merely suspected Warren Relf of having got himself mixed up in some foolish love-affair with Elsie Challoner, his daughter's governess, and he vaguely conceived that one or other of them had taken a very remarkable and romantic way of wriggling out of it. Moreover, at that precise moment his train came in; and since time and train wait for no man, the Squire, with a hasty farewell to the young painter, installed himself forthwith on the comfortable cushions of a first-class carriage, and steamed unconcernedly out of Almundham Station.

It was useless for Warren Relf now to go on to Whitestrand. To show himself there would be merely to display his hand openly before Hugh Massinger. The caprice of circumstances had settled everything for him exactly as he would have wished it. It was lucky indeed that the Squire would be away for a whole fortnight; his absence would give them time to concert a connected plan of action, and to devise means for protecting Elsie. For to Warren Relf that was now the one great problem in the case—how to hush the whole matter up, without exposing Elsie's wounded heart to daws and jays without making her the matter of unnecessary suspicion, or the subject of common gossip and censorious chatter. At all costs, it must never be said that Miss Challoner had tried to drown herself in spite and jealousy at Whitestrand poplar, because Hugh Massinger had ventured to propose to Winifred Meysey.

That was how the daws and jays would put it, after their odious kind, over five o'clock tea, in their demure drawing-rooms.

What Elsie herself would say to it all, or think of doing in these difficult circumstances, Warren Relf did not in the least know. As yet, he was only very imperfectly informed as to the real state of the case in all its minor details. But he knew this much—that he must screen Elsie at all hazards from the slanderous tongues of five o'clock tea-tables, and that the story must be kept as quiet as possible, safeguarded by himself, his mother, and his sister.

So he took the next train back to Lowestoft, to consult at leisure on these new proofs of Hugh Massinger's guilt with his domestic counsellors.

CHAPTER XVI.—FROM INFORMATION RECEIVED.

At Whitestrand itself, that same afternoon, Hugh Massinger sat in his own little parlor at the village inn, feverish and eager, as he had always been since that terrible night when "Elsie was drowned," as he firmly believed without doubt or question; and in the bar across the passage, a couple of new-comers, rough waterside characters, were talking loudly in the seafaring tongue about some matter of their own over a pint of beer and a pipe of tobacco. Hugh tried in vain for many minutes to interest himself in the concluding verses of his Death of Alaric—anything for an escape from this gnawing remorse—but his Hippocrene was dry, his Pegasus refused to budge a feather: he could find no rhymes and grind out no sentiments; stillangry with himself, at last for his own unproductiveness, he leant back in his chair with profound annoyance and listened listlessly to the strange disjointed echoes of gossip that came to him in fragments through the half-open door from the adjoining taproom. To his immense surprise, the talk was not now of topsails or of spinnakers: conversation seemed to have taken a literary turn; he caught more than once through a haze of words the unexpected name of Charles Dickens.

The oddity of its occurrence in such company made him prick up his ears. He strained his hearing to catch the context.

"Yes," the voice drawled out in a low London accent, tinged with the peculiar Wapping dialect; "I read that there book, Our Mutual Friend, I think 'e calls it. A pal o' mine, 'e said to me right out at the time, "Bill," says 'e "that there Dickens 'ave took a leaf out o' your book," says 'e; "'e've been a-takin' of you off: 'e've showed you up in print, 'e 'ave, under the halias of Rogue Rider'ood," says 'e; "an' you'd oughter read it, if it was for nothin' on earth but for the sake o' the likeness."—"Is that so?" says I, never thinkin' 'e meant it, as the sayin' is. "It is," says 'e; "an' you've got to look into it."—Well I got a 'old o' the book, an' I read it right through on 'is recommendation: leastways, my missus she read it out loud to me: she've had a eddication, my missus 'av: an' it's a pack o' rot, that's wot I calls it. There ain't no kind o' sense in it, to my thinkin'."

"That cap don't fit you, then, says you," the other voice retorted with a gurgle of tobacco. "'E ain't drawn you so as a man could recognise you."

"Recognize me! Well, recognisin' ain't in it, d'ye see. Wot 't say is just a lot o' rubbish. This 'ere Rogue Rider'ood, acordin' to the story, 'e'd used to row about Limehouse Reach, a searchin' for bodies."

"A-searchin' for bodies!" the second man repeated with an incredulous whiff. "Wy, wot the dooce did 'e want to go an' do that for?"

"Well, that's just where it is, don't you see? 'E done it for a livelihood. A livelihood, says I, wen my missus reads that part out to me; wot livelihood could a beggar make out o' bodies? says I. 'Tain't as though a body was worth anything nowadays, viewed as a body, says I, argumentative like. A man as knowed anything about the riverside wouldn't never 'a gone writin' such rubbish as that, an' in a printed book too, as 'ad ought to be wrote careful an' ackerate. It's my opinion, says I, as this 'ere Dickens is an over-rated man. A body nowadays, wether its a drownded body or a nat'ral body, ain't worth nothing not the clothes it stands up in, viewed as a body. Times was wen a body was always acshally a body, an' worth savin' for itself, afore the 'Natomy Ack. But wot's it worth now? Wy, 'arf a crown for landin' it, paid by the parish, if it's landed in Essex, or five bob if you tow it over Surrey side o' the river. Not but wot I grant you there's bodies an' bodies. If a nob drowns hisself, wy, then, o course there's sometimes as much as fifty pounds, or might be a 'undred, set upon the body. 'Is friends is glad to get the corpse back, an' ave it buried reg'lar in the family churchyard. A reward's offered free enough for a nob, I don't deny it. But 'ow many nobs goes an' drowns themselves in a season, d' you suppose; an' 'oo as knowed anything about the river would go a lookin' for nobs in Lime'ouse Reach or v a r down Bermondsey way?"

"Stands to reason they wouldn't, Bill," the other voice answered with a quiet chuckle.

"O' course it stands to reason," Bill replied with an emphatic expletive. "Wen a nob drowns hisself, 'e don't go an' throw himself off London Bridge; no, nor off Blackfriars neither, you warrant you. 'E don't go an' put hisself out aforehand for nothin' like that takin' a 'bus into the City, as you may say, out o' pure foolishness. 'E just claps 'is 'at on 'is 'ead an' strolls down to Wes'minster Bridge, as it maybe 'ere, or to Charin' Cross or Waterloo—a lot of 'em goes over Waterloo, perlice or no perlice; an' 'e jumps in close an' 'andy by 'is own door, in the manner o' speakin', an' is done with it immejately.—But wot's the use o' lookin' for 'im after that, below bridge, away down at Lime'ouse? Anybody as knows the river knows well as a body startin' from Waterloo, or may be from Westminster, don't go down to Lime'ouse, ebb or flow, nor nothin' like it. It gets into the whirlpool off Saunders's Wharf, an' ketches the back current, an' turns round an' round till it's throwed up by the tide, as you may say, upward, on the mud at Millbank, or by Lambeth Stangate. So there ain't no liveli'ood to be made anyow by picking up bodies down about Lime'ouse; an' it's always been my opinion ever since then that that there Dickens is a very much overrated person."

"There ain't no douot about it," the other answered. "If 'e said that, there can't be no doubt at all about it."

To Hugh Massinger, sitting apart in his own room, these strange scraps of an alien conversation had just then a ghastly and horrible fascination. These men were accustomed, then, to drowned corpses! They were connoisseurs in drowning. They knew the ways of bodies like regular experts. He listened, spellbound, to catch their next sentences. There was a short pause, during which—as he judged by the way they breathed—each took a long pull at the pewter mug, and then the last speaker began again. "You'd oughter know," he murmured musingly, "for I s'pose there ain't any man on the river anywheres as 'as 'ad to do with as many bodies as you 'ave."

"That's so!" the first person assented emphatically. "Thirty year I've served the Trinity 'ouse, rain or shine, an' you don't provision light-ships that long without learnin' a thing or two on the way about bodies. The current carries 'em all one way round. A body as starts on its journey at Wes'minster, as it may be 'ere, goes ashore at Millbank. A body as begins at London Bridge, comes out, as reglar as clockwork, on the furrer end o' the Isle o' Dogs.—It's just the same along this 'ere east coast 'ere. I picked up that gal I've come about to-day on the north side o' the Ordfordness Light, by the back o' the Trinity groyne or thereabouts. A body as comes up on the north side of Orfordness 'as always drifted down from the nor'-west'ard. So it stands to reason this 'ere gal I've got lying up there must a' come with the ebb from Walberswick or Aldeburgh, or maybe Whitestrand: there ain't no other way out of it any'ow. Well, they told me at Walberswick there was a young lady a-missin' over 'ere at Whitestrand—a young lady from the 'All—a lady o' property seeming—and as there might be money on it, or again there mightn't wy I come up 'ere o' course to make all proper inquiries."

Hugh Massinger's heart gave a terrible bound. O heavens! that things should have come to this pass. That wretch had found Elsie's body!

In what a tangled maze of impossibilities had he enmeshed himself for ever by that one false step of the forged letter. This wretch had found Elsie's body—the body that he loved with all his soul—and he could neither claim it himself nor look upon it, bury it nor show the faintest interest in it, without involving his case still further in endless complications, and rousing suspicions of fatal import against his own character.

He waited breathless for the next sentence. The second speaker went on once more. "And it don't fit?" he suggested, inquiringly.

"No; it don't fit, drat it," the man called Bill answered in an impatient tone. "She ain't drowned at all, the young lady as is missing at the 'All. They've 'ad letters an' telegrams from 'er, dated later nor the day I found 'er. I've 'anded over the body to the county perlice; it's in the mortuary at the Low Light; an' I shan't 'ave no more nor arf a crown from the parish after all for all my trouble. Suffolk and Essex is half-a-crown counties; Surrey's more liberal; it goes to five bob on 'em. Wy, I'm more'n eight shillin's out o' pocket by that there gal already, wot with loss of time an' travellin' expenses an' that. Next time I catches a body unbeknown knockin' about promiscuous on a lee-shore, with the tide runnin', an' the breakers poundin' it on its face on the shingle, they may whistle for it theirselves, that's wot they may do; I ain't agoin' to trouble my 'ead about it. Make a liveli'ood out of it, indeed! Wy, it's all rubbish, that's wot it is. It's my opinion that that there Dickens was a very much overrated person."

Hugh Massinger rose slowly, like one stunned, walked across the room, as in a dream, to the door, closed it noiselessly, for he could contain himself no longer, and then, burying his face silently in his arms, cried to himself a long and bitter cry, the tears following one another hot and fast down his burning cheeks, while his throat was choked by a rising ball that seemed to check his breath and impede the utterance of his stifled sobs. Elsie was dead, dead for him as if he had actually seen her drowned body cast up, unknown, as the man so hideously and graphically described it in his callous brutality, upon the long spit of the Orfordness lighthouse. He didn't for one moment doubt that it was she indeed whom the fellow had found and placed in the mortuary. His own lie reacted fatally against himself. He had put others on a false track, and now the false track misled his own spirit. From that day forth, Elsie was indeed dead, dead, dead for him. Alive in reality and for all else save him, she was dead for him as though he had seen her buried. And yet, most terrible irony of all, he must still pretend before all the world strenuously and ceaselessly to believe her living. He must never in a single forgetful moment display his grief and remorse for the past; his sorrow for the loss of the one woman he had really loved—and basely betrayed; his profound affection for her now she was gone and lost to him for ever. He dare not even enquire—for the present at least—where she would be laid, or what would be done with her poor dishonored and neglected corpse. It must be buried, unheeded, in a pauper's nameless grave, by creatures as base and cruel as the one who had discovered it tossing on the shore, and regarded it only as a lucky find to make half-a-crown out of. Hugh's inmost soul revolted at the thought. And yet——And yet, even so, he was not man enough to go boldly down to Orfordness and claim and rescue that sacred corpse, as he truly and firmly believed it to be, of Elsie Challoner's. He meant still in his craven soul to stand well with the world, and to crown his perfidy by marrying Winifred.

COURT ROOM AMENITIES.

Some Elegant Examples of Legal Repartee in Missouri.

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 26.—When Judge White, of the Criminal Court, entered his quarters yesterday morning he first scored Lawyer Lowe, Prohibition candidate for Governor, because that gentleman had said he was off on a vacation and could not be found. Then when ex-Mayor Gibson, acting for Lowe, recited, in a plea for more time for the condemned murderer Myers, the fact of judge's absence, the latter exclaimed:

"Nobody but a dirty dog or a cowardly cur would thus insult the court as you and your colleague have done." Counsellor Gibson grew red in the face. "I expected to be treated as a gentleman in this court and I must insist upon my prerogative. Mr. Myers and I have already settled this matter, and a question on your part would have settled the matter at once. I won't permit myself to be insulted by every one who comes along, and I must insist on being treated as a gentleman.

"You have not acted the part of a gentleman and don't deserve any consideration at my hands."

Counsellor Gibson here become justly indignant.

"I can't imagine how I can refrain from striking you," said he.

"I can," said his Honor, excitedly. "You don't dare to. I can't imagine how I can refrain from kicking you from the court room.

Counsellor Gibson explained this phase of the trouble by intimating that the judge wasn't built that way, and gracefully retired.

RULES FOR COMPOSITION.

A friend who is taking a course at a summer Normal School says the following rules for letter writing were given by a lecturer:

I. Know definitely what you are going to say.

II. Say it.

III. Don't think of a grammatical rule while you say it.

IV. Polish up afterwards.

V. Put your pen through every other word, or in other words, boil it down, or condense it.

I think these rules are very sensible. It will pay to study them. Our letters betray our characters pretty well. It is very important that we know what we are going to say before we begin. The only way to make sure of this is to think the matter all out before we write a word. Then with the points all in mind we can go ahead and write to the point. I get letters sometimes that ramble about, touching first one thing and then another, so that when I have read them through I cannot tell what it is all about. The last rule suits me very well. People generally use too many words to express an idea. It pays to talk straight at the mark. Most people have little time to listen to unimportant things. If we can get into the habit of writing and talking in a business way, we shall find ourselves growing into business men and women.

Chinese Customs.

The Chinese, topographically our antipodes, are as opposite to us in manners and customs.

Our night is their day. Our mourning color is black, theirs is white. Their boats are drawn by men; their carriages are moved by means of sails.

Old men fly kites, while little boys look on; with them the seat of honor is at the left hand, and to keep one's hat on is a sign of respect. We drink tea hot and wine cold; they drink wine hot and tea cold.

The family name comes first instead of last; thus, John Smith would be Smith John. The needle of their compass points to the south, ours to the north. They say "westnorth" instead of "northwest," "eastsouth" instead of southeast. Their soldiers wear quilted petticoats, satin boots and bead necklaces, carry umbrellas and fans, and go to a night attack with lanterns, being more afraid of the dark than the enemy.

They mount their horses on the right side. The children in school sit with their backs to the teacher and study their lessons aloud.

A married woman when she is young and pretty is a slave; when she is old and withered she is the most respected and beloved member of the family.

Their most valued piece of furniture is a handsome camphor-wood coffin, which they keep in the best room. They are very fond of fireworks, but always display them in the daytime. If you offend a Chinaman, instead of killing you he will kill himself on your doorstep.

Canada's Great Fair.

Since its inception in 1879, the Toronto Industrial Exhibition has proved a continued series of successes, and the one for the present year, to be held from the 10th to the 22nd of September, promises to again surpass in every respect those that have passed. Already applications for space in all departments are more numerous than ever before. A liberal Prize List and a long programme of first-class and novel special attractions is what the Toronto Fair offers, and success is always the result. Special exhibits will be sent from Manitoba, British Columbia and many other sections of the Dominion. The special attractions already contracted for are the best that money can secure, and there will be plenty to see, both to instruct and amuse, every day of the Fair. Programmes containing full details will be issued early in August, and will be sent free to any one desiring them. Prize Lists can also be secured by intending exhibitors on their dropping a post card to Mr. Hill, the Secretary, at Toronto. All entries have to be made before the 18th of August. The people of Ontario seem to have set down the time of the Toronto Fair as the occasion of their annual holiday outing, and the railway companies recognizing this fact have decided on giving cheaper fares than ever before for this great exhibition, which is so popular with all. It will be opened on the 11th Sept. by Lord Stanley, the new Governor-General.

Ninety deaths from cholera occurred in Hong Kong during the week ending July 22.

Sir Richard Burton's Opinion.

Sir Richard Burton, the veteran African traveller, who is at present staying in Paris, has written the following letter;—

"I do not despair of Stanley even if the mysterious white Pasha of the Bahr-el Ghazel should turn out to be Emin, which is probable. Stanley is an artist in the surprises, catastrophes, and properties of a drama, as well as in its denouement. He is, in fact, a sort of geographical Sardou and when the world pulls out its cambric handkerchief he will probably come up smiling and ask, 'what the deuce is the matter?' I am a great admirer of Stanley. He is simply the prince of African explorers of this day or of any day. But as an administrator I rank him below par, and the best proof of this is that of all the new stations he has founded on the Congo, at a cruel expense and waste of life and labour, as well as of gold, there is hardly one that has not been abandoned and left to fall in ruins.

MR. STANLEY'S AVOWED OBJECT.

"On the present occasion his avowed object was the rescue of Emin Pasha, who has distinctly and determinedly declined to be rescued, but Stanley's real object was to divert the ivory trade from the long and expensive Zanzibar line to the cheap and safe waterway of the Congo. The idea is excellent. By this means Belgium recoups the millions wasted upon expeditions and stations. Zanzibar also, under the unprejudiced annexationist, our cousins German, can have the profit of the slave exportation; nor would a Teuton of them all raise a hand against what brings grit to their mills. Stanley has thus, by one touch of his magic wand, converted the Congo Free State, the happy hunting ground of Tippoo Tip and his merry Sawahili men—absurdly named Arabs—into a Congo Slave State par excellence. The great slave mines are now transferred from the Unyamwezi country, the old Mountains of the Moon, to the Upper Congo. These fresh diggings remain to be exploited, Tippoo Tib is made governor. (God save the mark!) of those new slave reserves, at a salary of £300 a year, where he can easily make £30,000 a year, and where his followers are pretty sure to shoot him if he talks any nonsense about the abolition of slavery. You must not expect to to hear any truths of this kind in England, where the imperious and tyrannical opinion of society subdues even the boldest spirit.

What is meant by an inch of rainfall is that 14 5 0,000 gallons of water has fallen upon a square mile of ground.

A Minnesota farmer near Clearwater, while digging a cellar, came upon seven skeletons in good condition. They were found in a sort of mound, and the bodies had been buried head downward. The skeletons were from seven to eight feet in height, and the shape of the skulls indicated a low order of intelligence. It is thought that the bodies were buried 200 years ago.

There is a man in Palatka, Fla., who imagines that he is a teapot. He is perfectly sane on every other subject, but nothing can convince him that he is not a teapot, and an earthern one at that. He sticks out one arm to represent the spout, bends the other to represent the handle, makes a hissing noise to represent the escaping steam, and then, if any one comes near him, is very uneasy lest they hit him and break off either his handle or his spout.

Consumption

that dread terror, a disease so long baffling science and the most skilled physicians, who knew of nothing to arrest, nothing to alleviate, nothing to cure. Now it is no longer an incurable malady even when given up by physicians, health can yet be found in OUR REMEDY, it heals and soothes the membrane of the Lungs, inflamed and poisoned by the ravages of this fell disease, and prevents the night sweats and tightness across the chest which accompany it.

DUTTON, AUGUST 16, 1888.

AN ENTERPRISING TOWN.

Dutton and its Principal Business Places.

In the present article the aim is to present in brief form a description of the advanced business facilities of Dutton and sketches of some of its leading business interests. That the village possesses many real and permanent advantages, which, being developed and utilizee by business men of experience and ability, is a fact so well established as to need no comment.

The village is very conveniently situated on the M. C. R. about 90 miles east of Windsor and 20 miles west of St. Thomas.

The educational advantages of Dutton are not exceeded by any other place of its size in Ontario. Two handsome new school buildings—High and public—have been recently built and are managed by a capable staff of teachers. Dutton is growing steadily and surely—not that kind of a growth which generally brings ruin and disaster in the end—but of a firm and progressive character which promises to last. The Main street is adorned with handsome brick blocks, and the number of fine private residences give the village a pleasing appearance. To those who contemplate making a change of residence we would say, "Come thou over with us and we will do thee good."

The mercantile interests are in a flourishing condition and are represented by pushing business men. Manufacturing is quite largely developed, there being in successful operation several important industries.

Following is a brief sketch of some of the leading business interests:

HOCKIN & POOL.

In presenting to the public an edition of the ENTERPRISE descriptive of Dutton's business interests, a business that will come in for a prominent mention is that of the above named popular and enterprising firm. Messrs. Hockin & Pool have been established about six years with the result of a trade being developed which extends over the surrounding country. We may say that the business has exerted a marked influence in building up our mercantile interests and in drawing trade to the town. The members of the firm are each thoroughly practical merchants and clever business men, and are in the very best position to meet the wants of the public in their lines. We have no hesitation in saying that this is one of the best equipped and most ably managed general stores in this section of the country. Their large brick establishment is literally packed with goods, consisting of everything in the line of general dry goods, dress goods, millinery, tweeds, worsteds, etc., hats and caps, gents' furnishings, ready-made clothing, carpets and house-furnishings, also boots and shoes, groceries, including crockery, glass, chinawares, etc. Special attention is given to the tailoring department which is kept to a high standard. The store has become deservedly popular for the excellence of the goods kept, and the ability of the firm to offer to the public all the advantages of the trade.

F. W. DRAKE.

Next in our review we will refer to Dutton's popular general store conducted by Mr. F W. Drake. This business deservedly occupies a prominent place in our mercantile interests, and we may say that it has exerted a marked influence in stimulating the volume of business and in building up the mercantile interests of the village. Mr. Drake is a merchant of experience and ability and is in the very best position to keep his business to the front. The business has been before the public about three years, it being established by McKenzie & Co., by whom it was conducted one and a half years, when Mr. Drake became, by purchase, the sole proprietor. The large trade that has been built up is owing to the fact that every effort has been made to afford to customers every advantage possible. The stock is selected for its superior quality and consists of everything in the line of general dry goods, dress goods, tweeds, worsteds, etc., hats and caps, gents' furnishings, staples, carpets and house-furnishings, etc. A tailoring department is also carried on in connection under experienced and competent management. The boot and shoe department contains an excellent line of boots and shoes of the best makes and of all grades from the ladies' finest French kid to the men's' and boys' heavier wear. In the grocery department is found a full line of pure family groceries of all kinds, pure teas, coffees, sugars, spices, canned goods, flavoring extracts and all the table delicacies, also flour, provisions, etc. The business well deserves its large trade. Location in Leitch block, Main street.

URLIN BROS.

Our business review would be very incomplete without reference to the old established, well known and popular business of Messrs. Urlin Bros. This business is too well and favorably known over the surrounding country to require any extended mention here. It has been before the public about eight years, and has done a large and increasing trade which extends over the adjacent country. The business has been a progressive one. Step by step it has widened its trade and increased its facilities until it has reached its present large proportions. The public find here advantages in making their purchases. The aim has always been to handle a superior line of goods and to keep the stock full and complete. We have no hesitation in saying that the store is one of the best equipped and most ably managed in this section of the country. In reference to the stock kept, no adequate description can be given here. It consists of everything in the line of pure family groceries, crockery, glass, chinawares, etc., flour, salt, provisions, etc., also hardware of all kinds and boots and shoes. The premises are quite extensive, three buildings being utilized, viz.: the store, with the china hall adjoining, and the wareroom, a large building separate. Each department is thoroughly equipped, and any of our readers will find Messrs. Urlin Bros. in the very best position to meet their wants.

J. C. HERTEL.

Dutton enjoys the advantages of one of the best merchant tailoring businesses in the county. There is no line of our mercantile trade that is more ably conducted or kept in a more advanced condition than this one. To the able efforts of Mr. Hertel is this largely due. He has been established about seven years, and has raised his business to a high standard. Mr. Hertel possesses the advantages of large and practical experience, and is a cutter of more than ordinary ability. Any of our readers will find him in the very best position to meet their wants. The stock carried is selected for its superior quality and consists of foreign and domestic tweeds, fine French worsteds to suit the taste and means of all. The business well deserves its large trade.

DUNCAN M'MILLAN.

An important line of business in our town is that in which the above named gentleman is engaged, viz., the manufacture of harness, etc. Mr. McMillan has been established five years and his business is well and favorably known over the surrounding country. He has been successful in building up a large trade and has acquired for his business an enviable reputation for the excellence of the work turned out. Mr. McMillan is a workman of experience and ability and is well able to keep his harness to the front. All kinds of harness, light and heavy, double and single, is manufactured by him, collars, etc., and besides keeping on hand a full line of harness he has everything usually found in a first-class harness shop, such as trunks, valises, whips, combs, horse coverings, etc. The business well deserves its large trade.

THE ANCIENT CAPITAL.—This is the subject of "Attramp's" weekly letter in this issue, and a truly interesting letter it is. It is too bad that a person with such abilities as are undoubtedly possessed by our correspondent should be so persistent in becoming "A-tramp!" We think his blue-blood relative, Lord Stanley, would be displeased were he to know this.

MR. A. MCLACHLIN, for a number of years registrar of Elgin, died on Friday evening, after a long and painful illness. Probably no man was better known in Elgin than the late registrar, he being the founder of the Home Journal, and was for a number of years school inspector, previous to his being appointed registrar of the county. Mr. McLachlin was a self-made man, and, although possessing many peculiarities, was held in high esteem by all who knew him.

EXCURSION.—A Harvest Home excursion will be run to Leamington and Pelee Island on Tuesday, August 21. Train leaves Dutton at 7:30 a.m., fare $1.75; Bismarck, 7:41 a.m., fare $1.45. Leamington is admirably suited for such occasions, with its enormous peach orchards and beautiful groves, not mentioning Sea Cliff Park. Pelee Island contains hundreds of acres of vineyards and many curiosities worthy of notice. The excursion is in charge of A. E. Griffith, the veteran excursion manager, and its success is assured.

IN Mr. Short's letter regarding the result of the recent examinations a very satisfactory explanation is given We agree with Mr. Short in saying that the prime cause of so many failures was the "cold-blooded determination of the Department to repress the number of teachers." Let the pupils who attend our High School (knowing, as they must, that the examinations are getting more severe each year), work with a determination of being successful, and we have no fear but that in the future, as in the past, Dutton High School will maintain the reputation it has already achieved.

THE people appreciate advertising and without it no firm can be well known. New people are coming into the place continually, and it is necessary that the town should receive their custom, and there is no better means of reaching them than through the columns of the local paper. When a man gives as his reason for not advertising that he has an old-established business he must imagine that every one was born in the same year as himself; that they live just as long; that they never move away from around him, and that there are attractions nowhere else.

PURELY PERSONAL.—Mr. H. T. Smith, of the Shelburne Economist, paid his brother a flying visit this week. ——Messrs Albert Hertel, of London, and Henry Hertel, of Guelph, are spendidg their holidays in Dutton.——Mrs. A. M. McIntyre and daughters returned Tuesday from Port Arthur and Duluth where they have been visiting for the past three weeks.——Miss Black, of Strathroy, has been visiting at her brother's.——Geo. F. Robbins, proprietor of the St. Mary's Journal, and wife spent a few days in Dutton last week the guests of Mr. C. H. Glance.——Mr. N. Phelps, of the ENTERPRISE, and Mrs. E. Holcombe and family, of London, left Dutton on Monday for Algoma by way of the great lakes. Mrs. Holcombe joins her husband at Thessalon, Algoma. Mr. Phelps will return in a week or ten days.——Mrs. B. Smith has returned to Dutton after an extended visit to relatives and friends.——Mrs. W. G. Urlin is visiting friends in Ingersoll.

CIVIC HOLIDAY.—The merchants and business men of Dutton have decided on taking Tuesday next as a civic holiday. By refering to another column a list will be seen of those business places which will be closed on that day. Farmers and townspeople should make their purchases accordingly. Glencoe may expect a large quota of our citizens at their annual races on that day, and no doubt the excursion to Leamington will be well patronized.

IONA vs. HIGHGATE.—A game of base-ball was played on the Dutton grounds between the aforesaid teams on Saturday last. Owing to the late arrival of the Iona club six innings could only be played and allow the Highgate club time to catch the train. Owing to the absence of Iona's catcher the "Sluggers" did not put up as good a game as they have been doing of late. The Pastimes played a good game throughout. With their regular nine Iona can play the Pastimes a hard game. Knight pitched a good game for Iona but received poor support from an unknown behind the bat. Score 12 to 7 in favor of Highgate. A retrun match will probably be played in about three weeks.

A REPRESENTATIVE of the Shelburne Economist was in Dutton this week taking notes of the town and country surrounding. Dutton is, in his opinion, beautifully laid out, and the appearance which the stores and other large buildings present would lead a visitor to the conclusion that the citizens are a live go-ahead people. The country adjoining forms a striking contrast to the land in the county of Dufferin, in which Shelburne is situated. The early spring with which this country is blessed enables the farmers to gather in the harvest weeks earlier than the people up north, and also gives opportunity for growing an abundant fruit crop. The only thing around here that makes the Shelburnite tired is riding on the "local" train.

Martyrs to Headache
Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.
The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.
Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.
"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."
"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."
Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."
When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

TYRCONNELL.

ST. PETER'S S. S. PICNIC.—The annual Sabbath School picnic, in connection with St. Peter's church, Tyrconnell, was held on Wednesday last in the beautiful grove belonging to Mr. Storey Backus, along the shore of Lake Erie. The grove forms a most pleasant arcade, perfectly shaded from the sun during every part of the day. On that occasion, however, the sun was overclouded and rain threatened, but a kind Providence favored us by restraining it, and the brightness of many of Eve's fair daughters who were present beautified the shade and made it most enjoyable. The grounds were cleared and good firm tables and seats were constructed by the skill and energy of Mr. Stephen Backus and his workmen, and every needful preparation was made for the comfort and enjoyment of young and old. The provisions for the feast were, as usual, of great variety and abundance, to which ample justice was done by all without exhausting the immense supplies. The amusements consisted in swinging, leaping, racing —straight race, apple race and frog race and leaping in the course through hoops covered with paper, for which races prizes in money were given by the rector. Then there was archery, in which one young lady exhibited great skill, though, of course, not equal to that of the celebrated William Tell. Others did not "Tell" much on the target, but possibly their gracefulness and beauty "told" much elsewhere. It is impossible, if desirable, to exclude Cupid with his bow and arrows from picnics, but what execution he does there your correspondent knoweth not. Another amusement was the tug-of-war, the introduction of which may seem incongruous at a peaceful Sabbath school picnic, but although it was by no means an "armless" amusement, but, on the contrary, very "armful," yet it was perfectly innocent and the young people enjoyed it immensely—yes, and the older folks too, especially the contest between the married and unmarried ladies, in which the former came off victoriously, and the moral, as expressed by the rector, was, that single ladies must get married if they would achieve success in the great tug-of-life. At the last the Sabbath school children were called together and formed a circle, in the centre of which were the rector and his wife, and after the singing of a hymn, the latter, Mrs. Chance, distributed candies to the children which concluded the programme of one of the most enjoyable picnics we ever atttended.

A CORRECT STATEMENT. is made by Miss Jane Rutherford, of Nelles Corners, Ont., who writes—"I have used your Burdock Blood Bitters for Dyspepsia and find it to be the best remedy I ever tried." B B B. is sold by all dealers at one dollar per bottle.

EASILY UNDERSTOOD.

NOTES BY A TOURIST.

TRIP FROM DUTTON TO ALGOMA DISTRICT.

We left Dutton by mail train westward on Monday, Aug. 13, and arrived in Detroit on time, about 8 p.m. When crossing the river from Windsor that formidable visitor, the inspector and revenue collector, was present, who looked through our luggage as if we were loaded with dynamite or something for an invasion; and after considerable work and worry untieing and tieing up our luggage we arrived at the depot where all was bustle. We made directly for the Detroit and Cleveland Steam Navigation Company's wharf at the foot of Wayne street, where we boarded the "City of Alpena," one of the beautiful steamers of that company, for Mackinac Island. We loosed at 10 p.m. and started up the river. The weather was beautiful and the trip delightful. Touching at the ports of Marine City and St. Clair we arrived at Port Huron about 6 a.m., where we remained for about two hours, when we again started up Lake Huron. At the last named port we took on two of our Dunwich neighbors, who were bound for Oscoda, having received a message the day before that a brother was seriously ill.

On the way up the lake we touched at the ports of Sand Beach, Oscoda, Harrisville, Alpena, Cheboygan, Mackinac Island, and arrived at St. Ignace about 9 a.m. on Wednesday. In reference to the country along the route, which is all in Michigan, it appears to be mostly sand, and the burnt district extends from Port Huron to Harrisville. Alpena and Cheboygan appear to be places of some importance and to have been built and kept up by the lumbering which is carried on so extensively in that section of the state.

The island of Mackinac in beauty and scenery is certainly all that is claimed for it, being the most beautiful place in all the route. St. Ignace is a small town doing considerable business as the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic Railway comes in here, which causes a great deal of shipping of lumber and iron ore from this port. This railway company have built an extensive high dock from which they run the iron ore from the cars into the vessels.

After remaining here about an hour we boarded the train for Sault Ste. Marie, as we were told by so doing that we could make close connections at the "Soo" for our destination in Algoma. But we soon discovered that we would have to remain at the "Soo" for two days. That did not matter much, as it was one of the places we desired to take in. The run occupied about two hours, most of the distance being through swamp, timbered with hemlock, small tamarack, spruce, cedar, poplar, white birch and scrub pine. There are not perhaps more than two miles of clearing in the whole distance. The road-bed was very rough, and the ride would not have been very pleasant had we not met at the junction an old friend, the conductor, Frank Anderson, formerly of the M C. R., with whom we accompanied to the "Soo." Arrived at the "Soo" we engaged board and lodging and then proceeded to take in the sights. The "Soo," on the American side, is called a city, and we were informed that it is incorporated as such, but we failed to find where it is. We would call it a good-sized town. The people are making great efforts to boom the place. A large sewer is being put along the principal streets, an electric street railway is just being completed, and a canal is going to be constructed for milling purposes, the work of construction having just been begun. But we think the place the dirtiest and filthiest of any place we ever visited. The scenery is very interesting, especially the canal and locks, the locking through of vessels, etc., the works being magnificent. The Ste. Marie river here, which is the outlet of Lake Superior to Lake Huron, is composed of rapids, and only navigated by Indians and half-breeds, a few of whom get their living from pleasure seekers, who give them a fee for tording them up and down the rapids. They tackled the writer to take a trip, but on being asked "how much they would give" they soon departed for other adventurers.

The C. P. R has a large iron bridge of about six or eight span, which spans the rapids. This is on the branch which leaves the main line at Sudbury and connects with the D. S. S. & A. at the "Soo," which line they have recently purchased, thus securing a through route east and west This line will eventually become the main line.

Now for Algoma. We started at 7 a.m. on Friday morning via C. P. R., passing over the rapids on the bridge of which we have given a description. We soon arrived at the "Soo" on the Canadian side, where our luggage was again subjected to the excise and reviewing officer; but as we did not wear the expression of speculators we were soon cleared at this point. The Canadian "Soo" is a small flourishing town of about 3,000 population. It is apparently mostly new. The buildings are neatly and tastily finished. This is the county town and headquarters for the district. The jail, a stone building, and other public buildings are located here. The town is booming and will likely be boomed for the next two or three years, as the Canadian government is getting a little independent. It purposes constructing a ship canal on this side, which, if built, will take two or three years to construct it. The Canadian vessels have always had to go through the American canal to get into Lake Superior, and vice versa.

Next we pass down the C. P. R. for about 65 miles. Let me say that this piece of road is new yet and consequently very rough. There is nothing of note along here except that one's attention is kept continually on the alert; first swamp, then rock, then lake, swale or marsh, then more rock or bluff, rock cuts, etc. There was not much clearing to be seen until nearing Bruce Mines, except an occasional small patch. We presume some patches had a quarter of an acre and some a a whole acre. On two or three occasions we saw fields that would contain five acres, but on the whole the clearings were very small. As we continued our journey about ten miles east of Bruce mines, we discovered some very good farms, and we are told that wheat has been grown here which yielded 40 bushels to the acre. Some settlers appear to be prospering well.

As to the present harvest. It is now the 20th of August and an occasional piece of oats is seen beginning to turn. We have seen a few pieces of barley which are as green as they ever were. Fall wheat has just been harvested; most people are through their haying, while some are just finishing.

Berries, such as red raspberries, are in abundance and just ripe; cranberries are plentiful about the small lakes; plums also grow in this part of the world, but apples, pears, peaches and quinces are only to be had when shipped in.

The large wild game of this section is principally bear. Two were killed to-day and one yesterday (Sunday.) There are some cariboo, or species of elk deer.

My curiosity was aroused by the peculiar appearance of the ballast on the railroad, so I got off and got a handful for examination. On remarking to a bystander that it looked like ground stone I was informed that it was. It is called "skimpings" and was brought from Bruce Mines. The railway company have laid a track to the mines and are using the refuse for ballast.

Living in this section is as expensive as in Elgin. Provisions, lumber and rent are about as high; stove wood and labor are higher.

Thessalon is a thriving village of about 600, situated on the lake shore at the mouth of Thessalon river. It is the headquarters for this section, as vessels deliver goods at this port for the large tract of country to the north. One, and the most to be appreciated, enterprise of the place is the newspaper, published by R. Sparling and C. A. Dickson, who well deserve the patronage of the community.

Little Rapids is a small place about three miles to the north of Thessalon, but well known, as there is a grist mill there to which people come for sixty miles. There are not many mill privileges in Canada to equal this, as the stream never fails and about twenty-five feet of a fall can be had without a dam.

THE ENVIRONS OF QUEBEC.

To the Editor of ENTERPRISE:

Next to the city itself, the county immediately surrounding Quebec is the most interesting part of the province. To the westward, the Plains of Abraham, with Wolfe's column, already mentioned in a previous letter, in the midst. On the north side of the Plains rises another monument. This marks the scene of the second battle of Abraham, and commemorates the gallant though futile attempt of the French to regain their lost fortress. Descending the Plains to the northward, we cross the St. Charles river, about the spot where Jacques Cartier wintered his three daring little boats in 1534. Remains of a mound erected by him for his defence may yet be seen there. Turning eastward some six miles distant is the Montmorency river, with its famous falls 250 feet high. It was here that Montcalm had his main camp in 1759, and it was here too that he so signally repulsed Wolfe in his first attempt to land. Now, as then, the shore is all along lined with villages, whose predecessors when finally taken by the British, were revengefully reduced to ashes.

St. Anne, the last of these, 21 miles from Quebec, is once more becoming famous, but is more pacific than formerly. It is here that are performed those miracles that have made the name a household word in Quebec. Indeed, the fame of "good St. Anne," as the villagers love to call her, is fast spreading over Canada, the United States, and has even reached Europe. It is now a recognized station for tourists; but it is by Roman Catholics that it is specially sought It bids fair to become a second Jerusalem. Every parish in Quebec takes its turn in making the pilgrimage, while separate individuals are unceasingly plodding thither. Many walk great distances as a penance. I met several ladies of the city of Quebec who recently walked the whole distance (21 miles). Usually they set out at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning in order to reach the shrine before forenoon mass is over. The faith of the "habitant" in St. Anne's healing power is enormous. The lame, blind and disabled fondly beleive that a visit to the altar of this saint will perfectly restore them. Hundreds of cases are reported in which her miraculous power has been displayed, some regaining sight after total blindness for years, others having crooked limbs made straight, or chronic sores healed. But the other day a young man was going down to have his sight restored. It seems that in firing off a cannon, some small stones were blown into his eyes, ruining one and completely knocking out the other. Another believer had his leg cut off by the cars and was going thither to have it renewed. I saw myself, as I was doing my penance, several stone blind, others incurably lame and others palsied, who had joureyed to St. Anne full of hope. As far as I know they returned as they came. The church has recently been rebuilt, as the old one was found too small. In it are two pyramids fully twenty feet high, of canes, crutches and sticks, besides two or three cases of spectacles, left behind by the grateful healed. In very special emergencies a sacred relic, a bone of St. Anne's finger, has to be brought into requisition.

The Frenchman's pride is in his church. Ordinarily frugal even to parsimony, he will stint himself even of necessaries for his beloved church. This begets quite a rivalry between parish and parish. One parish, where the people have much ado to pay their taxes, four years ago had their almost new church burnt down. They received some $20,000 insurance. With this they started to work and now have built and paid for a $66,000 church. They would have spent $15,000 more this year for interior decorations but they are putting up a $10,000 manse for the priest. And to do this they are quite content to remain poor.

Crosses, and diminutive chapels looking not unlike a pigeon-cot, containing diminutive statues of the Savior, or the Holy Virgin are frequently erected along the roadside.

But with all his piety the Lower Canadian has not much respect for the Sabbath. Stages run all day to various points of interest; stores in many parts are open; the bands are playing and even the ice-cream vendor jingles his car down street, selling his compressed sweetness (Hokey-Pokey brand) at five cents a package, and no one says them nay. Lacrosse teams hold their matches Sunday afternoon.

Yes, the Frenchman is frugal. His meals consist chiefly of spices and point. For breakfast he points at the loaf and spreads some mustard over his plate; at noon he has the same point sprinkled with salt; at night he spices his point with pepper. Yet every third store in Quebec is a restaurant. In all restaurants as well as in the hotels liquors are sold. The windows are full of it. Notwithstanding that, I saw only one drunken man in Quebec, and he could zig-zag it. As to house, the Frenchman is easily suited; but no matter how poor, he, or rather she, puts on a fine dress when out on the street, and hires the showiest "Caleche" for a drive.

One of the most striking curiosities here is the farm. All farms front on a river or some great road. Twenty-five yards of a frontage is a big thing. Here, then, on the bank of the river or on the roadside he builds his house. It is two stories high the second story windows looking out of the steep roof like two great eyes. Close beside it, or a little to the rear, is the barn. Then the long, lanky farm stretches back a mile or two as chance or nature may dictate. The neighbor's house almost touches his or at most is within a stone throw. A net picket fence runs along the front, the boards of which are "nailed" on with withes. Beside the house is a quarter acre of onions, and a garden of tobacco. His team consists of one horse, and "Gabriel" has the honor of presiding over the two-wheeled cart for haying and harvest, and drawing the mower alone. The mower as yet is a luxury. Another curious team may be seen in Quebec. Many of the laborers of the city live from five to ten miles out in the country. In order to get into the city fresh for work, he has devised a little bycycle of his own. It consists of a little cart with two wheels, much like those used by boys to play with, only a little stronger and with a comfortable seat. In front is a fair-sized dog. The rider steps in, dinner-pail in hand, and shouts "git up, there" or, as he says it, "marche donc," and away his dogship goes at a good round trot.

The habitant is generally affable and courteous. He is not bold and self-asserting like the American and does not stare you out of countenance like many of his brethren of the more westerly provinces, but he is exclusive. To gain access to him you must give the pass-word; that's French. Its no use for anyone to try to get work with him or to do business with him who does not speak French. He is somewhat lacking in enterprise, but still he thrives. He is possessed of a store of stubborness and conservatism that will be appalling to overcome. In general he is a citizen and patriotic enough. 'Twould be hard to dislodge him from his adopted land, and his house, though it is of the 16th century style; but next after Quebec, France is his land, and all his leanings are French. If it is a question of the Dominion or Quebec, the latter invariably gets it. Unlike many Canadians of the more advanced provinces though, he is not ashamed of the name Canadian when he meets a stranger, and at the same time as he declares his nationality with a pardonable air of pride he prefixes the word "French." And what is more commendable than patriotism? Who does not echo the words of the great lyrist who says:

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart has ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned
From wandering on a foreign strand?

"If such there breathes, go mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High through his title proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim,
Despite those titles, power and pelf,
The wretch—concentred all in self—
Living shall forfeit fair renown,
And doubly dying shall go down
To the vile dust from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonored and unsung."?

But, sir, my rambling letters have already dragged out too long. I must therefore draw them to a close, and with best wishes to you and your readers, bid you
Adieu,
ATTRAMP.

SNEAK THIEF.—While Mr. Dawes was at church on Sunday of last week some person gained entrance into his house by raising a window, and taking a screw-driver opened a bureau drawer, taking $20 therefrom. There is no clue to the thief.

Our teacher found occasion to punish one of Mr. DeLacey's children for misbehavior. The father got angry thereat and intended prosecuting, but has not done so as yet.

THE CHINESE OUR ANTIPODES.

(Third Page ENTERPRISE, Aug. 16.)

To the Editor:—

SIR,—Generally speaking China lies between the parallels of 20 and 50 degrees north longitude; Canada between 42 and 49. China has east longitude, Canada west; hence, as both lie north of the equator, they have the same latitude and seasons. But Antipodes, lying south or north, as the case may be, have opposite seasons, latitude, day and night. The Chinese are our Perieci. When it is day with us it is night with them. They then see the north pole and the circumpolar stars, etc., as we see them when it is day with them. But, although we cannot see them in sunlight, we know they are continually travelling around the pole. (See Canadian Almanac, pp. 6-7.) These phenomena lead many to reject the fond theory of the sphericity of the earth; for as our Perieci inhabit the same meridians as our so-called Antipodes, their longitude is the same, consequently their day and night. Were the earth a sphere they would be under us and could not see the pole star and other circumpolar stars. After you descend a certain depth into a mine in which there is water you can see stars—the very same which our Perieci see. We see them at the same time, they from an eastern longitude, we from a western.
Yours, etc.,
WM. MONSON.
