House of Commons Debates

THIRD SESSION—ELEVENTH PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 21, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—LAND DAMAGES.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the government what is the reason for the delay in granting fiats to a number of petitions of right, I believe over thirty in all, which were asked for in the month of September and October, 1907, in regard to claims for compensation for lands taken by the commissioners for the Transcontinental railway in the county of Madawaska in the province of New Brunswick. It would appear that although these petitions of right were filed, and fiats were asked for more than three years ago, no fiat has been granted up to the present time. The right of expropriation involves a certain sacrifice of private interest for the public good. When it is exercised, it seems to me that the subject, whether his claim be against a corporation or against the Crown, ought to have the right to make that claim good in the courts. These claims have been standing for three years, and I would like an explanation as to the cause of the delay in issuing fiats.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. The cases of lands taken in the county of Madawaska along the line of the Transcontinental railway have been a matter of consideration, and of discussion with the hon. gentleman who represents that county in this House by the Department of Justice for a good many months, and there has been considerable difficulty and delay in regard to them caused by the view which has been taken of the applicability of the provisions of the Expropriation Act to lands taken for the line of the Transcontinental railway. I gave to the question the best consideration that I was able, upon the language of the Transcontinental Railway Act, and the provisions enacted by this parliament with reference to the manner in which the construction of that line was to be carried out, and I was of opinion, from such examination of its provisions. that notwithstanding the constitution of the Board of Transcontinental Railway Commissioners, land taken for the construction of the line was land expropriated by the Crown, and therefore that the provisions of the Expropriation Act would have application, and that an information filed in the name of the Attorney General for the condemnation of any land which was requisite for that purpose would properly bring the question for consideration before the Exchequer Court. Such proceedings were taken, not with reference to lands in Madawaska, although I think that in some instances of lands taken in that section of the province of New Brunswick, fiats were given or expropriation proceedings initiated upon information. Some cases, however, from other parts of the province of New Brunswick came not long ago before the learned judge in the Exchequer Court for disposition, and he reached the conclusion after consideration that the lands so taken could not be considered as expropriated by the Crown, but that they were taken by the Board of Transcontinental Railway Commissioners for the purposes of their work, and, in that view, that the method of proceeding under the Expropriation Act would not have application. Not considering that that disposition of the matter was a satisfactory one, instructions were given to appeal from that decision to the Supreme Court of Canada. Such an appeal has been taken, but has not been heard by the Supreme Court. It will be heard, I have no doubt, at the sittings which begin to-day, and as soon as we have had an authoritative pronouncement on the subject from the Supreme Court, it will be either unnecessary to make any amendment of our present expropriation statute or it will be a matter for consideration whether that course should be taken. With regard to the granting of a petition of right in such circumstances to the land owner, let me say just one word. I have had no reason to change my view that it is more in the interest of the land owner himself that the proceedings for ascertaining the amount of compensation should be initiated by the government upon information of the Attorney General than upon a petition of right. There is perhaps no great practical difference, but there is this important difference in the matter of expense to the land owner that if instead of allowing him to proceed by petition of right, the Crown takes the initiative and lodges the information, exactly the same result is obtained, but the Crown is in the position of the actor or plaintiff, and the burden of the preliminary expense is taken off the shoulders of the land owner and assumed by the Crown. For that reason I have encouraged that course of procedure rather than by giving the land owners fiats for petitions of right and in almost every instance—I know of no exception—that course has met with the approval of the land owners.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If I might be pardoned, I would like to say that I do not think these men should be subjected to the delay and inconvenience of having fine points of construction of statutes decided by the Supreme Court or any other court. Their lands have been taken, in this case they seem to have been taken three or four years ago, and a cheap and inexpensive method of ascertaining the amount of compensation to be given ought to have been provided in the first instance. If there is any doubt about their right to pursue such a course, that doubt should have been removed by statute long ago. I do not think that these men should be obliged to endure this long delay caused by the proposed appeal to the Supreme Court. They have been waiting three or four years now, and I do not think they should be saddled with one day's delay more than is absolutely necessary.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BLAIN. Are the government willing to lay on the table from day to day the very large number of protests sent in with respect to the proposed reciprocity agreement. These are documents which should be in the possession of the House, and we had the promise of the right hon. the Prime Minister that they would be laid on the table from day to day. I have a copy of one with a very large number of signatures from operatives in the Hamilton cotton mills, and another from the pork packing industry, and I think there is also one from business men in Toronto.

Mr. FIELDING. These protests are not brought down from day to day, but at several times we have brought down papers called for. Every day something comes in, and not all on the one side. We have not only protests against the agreement but also the other side, but my hon. friend evidently does not desire to have these.

Mr. BLAIN. I did not draw any particular distinction. I was assuming that the bulk of the protests were against the proposition, but I would be very glad if the Finance Minister would lay all the documents on the table, as they would be all equally valuable. We ought to have a definite answer in this matter, and I would like to know whether or not the government propose to have these on the table from day to day.

Mr. FIELDING. I have not heard the proposition before, and, therefore, am not at liberty to answer it definitely.

Mr. BLAIN. A few days ago a similar request was made, and the right hon. the Prime Minister promised that he would bring these down from day to day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. BLAIN. On February 14, following a request from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) with respect to a delegation from the Vegetable and Fruit Growers' Association I asked would there be any objection to have the views of the pork packing industry delegation which interviewed the government submitted to the House so that we might have full knowledge of their statements, and the Prime Minister replied 'no objection, whatever.' Everything will be brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That does not mean from day to day. I have brought in the proceedings of the pork packers delegation, and am laying it on the table, and intend following this by a report of the delegation of the fruit and vegetable growers. I shall do more, I shall have these printed.

Mr. BLAIN. Any on the other side

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved :

That the report of proceedings between the delegation of Fruit and Vegetable Growers and the Prime Minister and members of the government held in the House of Commons on the 10th February inst., be printed for the use of members, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto. Also that memoranda presented by the Meat Pakers of Ontario and Quebec be printed.

Motion agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER delivered a message from the Governor General, which was read by Mr. Speaker, as follows :

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons the Fourth Joint Report of the Commissioners for the demarcation of the meridian of the 141st degree of west longitude (Alaska boundary) appointed in virtue of the first article of the convention between Great Britain and the United States, signed at Washington on the 21st of April, 1906.

Government House,
20th February, 1911.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.—Mr. LORTIE.

Mr. J. A LORTIE (Soulanges) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I rise to a question of privilege, in connection with an article which appeared in 'Le Canada,' on February 17th. It reads as follows :

LATEST NEWS.

Nationalists are divided on the question of reciprocity.

(From Le Canada's special correspondent).

Ottawa, 16.—I learn on reliable 'castor' authority that Mr. Monk will vote against the reciprocity proposal and that Mr. Nantel will follow suit.

Dr. Paquet, on the other hand, and Mr. Gilbert, who have been brought into line by numerous protests forwarded by their constituents, will give their support to the reciprocity proposals.

However, the former has come to that conclusion on the ground that he considers the proposal of benefit to Canada. As to the idea whether the proposals are of any advantage to his constituents, he does not concern himself with it in even the slightest measure. He went so far as to acknowledge that even should his electors frown on reciprocity, he would support the proposals. The member for L'Islet is certainly entitled to the country's gratitude under the circumstances; however, it remains to be seen whether his constituents will approve of the principle he propounded or on the contrary will show their distrust at the coming elections by throwing him overboard.

As for Messrs Lortie and Blondin, they have not as yet taken a stand, it is said, and for this good reason that they have not been in the House for over two weeks.

The counties of Champlain and Soulanges are in the same plight as the county of St. Hyacinthe in reference to its representation in the local house they have as their representatives in the Dominion parliament men who take no interest whatever in the concerns of their electors. Mr. Héroux, while in a mood of tendering good advice, should call the attention of these gentlemen to the primary importance of their duties as representatives of the people in parliament.

Mr. Speaker, every statement in reference to me in the above extract is shamefully false. Ever since the opening of this session, I have been discharging faithfully my duty as a member of parliament. I followed assiduously the various debates which have been going on, and I appeal to all my fellow members that I am telling the truth while I flatly contradict the statement which appeared in that paper 'Le Canada,' in the very presence of the man who wrote those lines.

If 'Le Canada,' or the writer of that piece of news, is in a position to show that I have been two weeks away from the House, I shall at once resign as a member of parliament.

Of all the newspapers in the country, I do not think there is another as rotten as 'Le Canada' when it comes to misrepresenting and knowingly showing things in a false light.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MONK. I desire to ask the government if they will table any correspondence had with the American government since the last batch of correspondence was laid upon the table. I understand there has been an exchange of letters, and that notably since what is known as the Champ Clark utterance, there has been some correspondence, letters addressed, I believe, to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), or, it may be, to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). I think that all this correspondence up to the present moment should be tabled.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend (Mr Monk) refers to some correspondence which the Minister of Finance has had in relation to the Champ Clark utterance?

Mr. MONK. I said that amongst other things it was said that there had been an exchange of letters in regard to that question between the Secretary of State of the United States and my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. FIELDING. There is not a shadow of foundation for that statement.

Mr. MONK. Has there been any correspondence?

Mr. FIELDING. If there is any correspondence in relation to this matter with the United States authorities, properly the subject of consideration by this House, it will always be brought down.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I desire to make inquiry concerning two returns moved for on the 14th of December last, relating to the travelling expenses of ministers and civil servants and the cab hire of ministers and civil servants.

Mr. MURPHY. I will make inquiry and see that the returns are brought down with all dispatch.

Mr. LENNOX. I desire to call the attention of the government—I presume, of the Minister of Public Works—to the fact that an order made on December 5 last and recorded in revised 'Hansard' page 786, for a return showing all public buildings occupied by post offices in whole or in part, and the revenues derived from them, has not yet been complied with.

Mr. MURPHY. I will make inquiry about that also.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). I desire to ask the Minister of the Interior when I may look for the return asked for on December 7?

Mr. OLIVER. What is the nature of the return?

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). It relates to lands, timber and mineral rights.

Mr. OLIVER. If my memory is right, the return involves a great deal of labour for its preparation. I can assure my hon. friend that it is in course of preparation, but I cannot promise it at an early day.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). It was ordered a long while ago.

Mr. OLIVER. The return is very comprehensive, perhaps more so than my hon. friend realized when he moved for it.

Mr. BRADBURY. When may we expect the return ordered on January 23 last referring to licenses, leases or concessions given to individuals or corporations of water powers and privileges on the Winnipeg river?

Mr. OLIVER. I am sorry that my hon. friend is delayed in that, it should have been down long ago, I assure him that it will be down without any delay.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I wish to call the attention of the House for a few moments to a matter of great importance. Let me first read a telegram recently received:

Mission Junction, Feb. 18.

J. D. Taylor,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Resolution passed here to-day as follows: 'That whereas the Dominion government has seen fit, in the reciprocity agreement, to abolish the duty on fruit, farm products; and whereas, this will be a detriment to the farmers of British Columbia, we wish to go on record as being strongly opposed to the agreement as it now stands.'

Mission City Agricultural Association, per A. M. VERCHERS, Secretary.

Mr. LENNOX.

Also I have this communication:

The Hammond Fruit Association, Limited.
Hammond, B.C., Feb. 4, 1911.

Dear Sir,—At the annual meeting of the Hammond Fruit Association, Limited, the following resolution was passed, and I was requested to send same to you: 'That the Hammond Fruit Association, Limited, views with alarm the movement recently advanced by the grain growers of the Northwest for reciprocity in natural products with the United States. Such an adjustment of the tariff would be of material disadvantage to the fruit industry of this province, and this association is strongly of opinion that not only should no reduction of duty on fruit be permitted by the Dominion government, but that immediate steps should be taken to place our duty on a parity with that of the United States.

Yours truly,
D. W. BAKER, Secretary.

J. D. Taylor, Esq., M.P.

I have another communication, which I will not read in full, from the Western Canada Bag, Envelope and Box Board Company, Limited, which states that this corporation has addressed to the Prime Minister a communication setting forth their position with respect to the proposals now under consideration, the effect of which is given in this:

—regarding the proposed reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States so far as it pertains to the removal of duty on building, roofing and sheathing paper, deadening felt, box board, &c. Such a policy would absolutely destroy all hopes of success for the plant which we are now erecting at New Westminster, B.C., for the manufacture of these products and which we hope to have in operation within six months.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.) The importance of the question now before the chair has been so frequently reiterated by hon. gentlemen who have already taken part in the discussion that I will make no apology for the time I shall occupy this afternoon. Since the debate was commenced, a couple of weeks ago by the leader of the opposition, (Mr. Borden, Halifax) whose views were further emphasized by the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto, I think I may fairly say that, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned who have taken part in the debate, no new ground has been broken. The imperialist drum has been pounded and the stalking horse of annexation has been paraded before us; the dire calamities that will come to the industries of Canada in respect of all her present industrial activities have been emphasized in language which for pessimism and lachrymose sentiment cannot be paralleled, I verily believe, anywhere outside the tomes of the ancient prophets. For my part, I have always endeavoured to view questions of trade as purely business questions. I think it is very rarely that any question can come before this House, or this committee, in which sentiment is to be irrevocably intermingled. The question before the chair at the present moment is neither more nor less than to give effect to a tentative agreement arrived at between certain commissioners representing the government of Canada and certain commissioners representing the government of the United States by which it is proposed to have certain reciprocity of trade between the two countries. Since this question was first mooted in the House and before this committee, the fact that it was an old question has been frequently stated by hon. gentlemen who have taken part in the discussion. My recollection carries me back as far as 1879, when the Conservative party was returned to power upon the question of the National Policy. The very first session of parliament after the new government was called to power they proposed what was known as a standing offer to the United States whereby the government led by Sir John Macdonald offered to the United States reciprocity in animals, fruit, hay, vegetables, wheat, barley, rye, oats and other grains, fish, meats and lumber. Now, I am sure there is no hon. gentleman sitting opposite to me who will say that Sir John Macdonald was actuated by any sentiments of disloyalty towards this country or towards the imperial connection when he placed in the platform of his party that standing offer of reciprocal relations between Canada and the United States in respect of natural products. Again, in 1891, the issue before the people was the trade issue which we have at the present time. The Conservative party of the day went to the country on the issue of reciprocity. And the subject was dealt with in certain state papers which are on record and available to hon. members of this House. I have here a letter written by Lord Stanley of Preston, Governor General of Canada, to Lord Knutsford,

Government House,
Ottawa, December 13, 1890.

My Lord,—I have the honour to send to Your Lordship to-day a telegraphic message in cipher, of which the following is the substance:

With reference to my telegram of the 10th instant this government is desirous to propose a joint commission such as that of 1871, with authority to deal without limitation and to prepare a treaty respecting the following subjects:

1. Renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, with the modifications required by altered circumstances of both countries, and with the extensions deemed by the commission to be in the interests of Canada and the United States.

2. Reconsideration treaty of 1888, with respect to the Atlantic fisheries with the aim of securing the free admission into United States markets of Canadian fishery products in return for facilities to be granted to United States fishermen, to buy bait and supplies and to tranship cargoes in Canada. All such privileges to be mutual.

3. Protection of mackerel and other fisheries on the Atlantic ocean and in inland waters also.

Taking the agreement now before the chair in connection with the agreement which was arrived at by Sir Allen Aylesworth, Minister of Justice, and the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) at Washington some weeks ago, we have a settlement of those very questions which it was proposed by the late Conservative government should be dealt with by this joint high commission. It is a circumstance to be noted that the Conservative government of that day was so anxious to disclose to the people of Canada the fact that they were about to bring about such a boon to the people that they violated certain confidences which existed between them and the commissioners at Washington, for which I venture to say they were severely reprimanded later. I have here a letter written by J. G. Blaine, to Senator Baker. It reads:

Dear Mr. Baker,—I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be assured no such scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion confined to natural products will be entertained by this government.

Yours very truly,
JAMES G. BLAINE.

It would appear from this that the effort of Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues to negotiate a treaty with the United States confined to natural products was not likely to be acceptable to the government of the United States. It was insisted upon by the government of the United States and their representatives of that day that any treaty of trade to be entered into between the two countries must not be confined to natural products, but must also include manufactured articles. That was an addition to the treaty which was not acceptable to the manufacturing interests of Canada in 1891 any more than it is acceptable to the manufacturing interests of Canada at the present time. But, Sir, I have further evidence of the fact that the late government was not dealing frankly with either the people of Canada or the people of the United States with respect to these negotiations. I have here a letter addressed by Mr. Blaine to Sir Julian Pauncefote, then British ambassador at Washington:

Department of State,
Washington, April 1, 1891.

While no notes were exchanged between us I carefully minuted my modification of the paper you left with me containing Lord Salisbury's proposition, and did so immediately after you left the department. You will observe the private character which I wished to impart to the conference is recognized by you a month later in your note of January 27, when you called the correspondence 'confidential.'

In view of the fact that you had come to the state department with the proposals, and that the subject was then for the first time mentioned between us, and in view of the further fact that I agreed to a private conference as explained in my minute. I confess that it was a surprise to me when several weeks later during the Canadian canvass, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, both stated before public assemblages that an informal discussion of a reciprocity treaty would take place at Washington after the 4th of March, by the initiation of the Secretary of State.

I detail these facts because I deem it important, since the matter has been for some weeks open to public remark, to have it settled that the conference was not 'initiated' by me, but on the contrary that the private arrangement of which I spoke was but a modification of your proposal and in no sense an original suggestion from the government of the United States.

I read that, in order to point out to the House the value which the late Conservative government seemed to have set upon the successful termination of a reciprocity treaty between the two countries. So anxious were the late government to get that fact before the country during the election campaign of 1891, that they did not hesitate to violate the confidences that were established between them and the commissioners at Washington for which they were subsequently reprimanded in the letter which I have just read to the committee.

For my part, I have been endeavouring since this debate opened to discover what are the changed circumstances which appear to justify hon. gentlemen opposite in coming to the conclusion that a trade arrangement which was admittedly so advantageous to Canada in 1891 could be so disastrous to Canada in 1911. I am reminded that a year ago the time of this House was occupied in discussing questions in relation to another one of the great nations of the world, Germany. A year ago, it will be remembered, a considerable time of this parliament was taken up in the discussion of what was then supposed to be a war scare existing between Germany and England. Our hon. friends opposite had no kind words to express with respect to the conduct of Germany and her apparent determination to strengthen her armaments for the avowed purpose, as was alleged by them, of making an attack on Great Britain. In fact, Sir, during several weeks, whenever hon. gentlemen moved about the chamber one might always hear the clanking of military accoutrements. The other evening the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) made a complaint that this government had not devoted more attention to improving the trade relations of Canada with Germany. I was rather surprised to hear the loyal member that he is, expressing so much consideration for trade with the Germans, when a year ago he and his colleagues on the other side of the House were prepared to condemn them with every anathema they could command. A complaint was made against the Minister of Finance that he had not abolished the German surtax to enable the products of that unfriendly nation, because it was unfriendly a year ago if we are to take the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, to enter Canada and make Canada a market for the manufactures of Germany. On the other hand, we have a proposal here to establish trade relations with the United States, a country whose peaceful and happy association with Canada for 100 years is about to be celebrated. The hon. member for East Lambton went into somewhat specific details with respect to the industries that would be inevitably injured if not absolutely ruined if this reciprocity arrangement was carried out. He undertook to speak for the dairymen of Canada and more particularly of Ontario. He did assert, and his observations I am sure are still impressed on the minds of hon. gentlemen who were present and heard him, that if this reciprocal arrangement were to be carried out the dairying industry of Canada and more particularly the dairying industry of the province of Ontario, would be ruined. I have before me copies of two resolutions passed, one by the Dairymen's Association of Western Ontario and one by the Dairymen's Association of Eastern Ontario. The first reads:

Moved by J. W. Hyatt, West Lake, Ont., seconded by James R. Anderson of Mountain View, that the Dominion government be respectfully but most strongly urged in the negotiations now pending between Canada and the States to provide for complete reciprocal trade in dairy products.

I have also the resolution passed by the Western Dairyman's Association, which is as follows:

Moved by J. A. Biehn, of Bright, seconded by Geo. Rice, of Tillsonburg, that the Dominion government be respectfully but most strongly urged in the negotiations now pending between Canada and the States to provide for complete reciprocal trade in dairy products.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that having read these resolutions, which were passed by the men who are most interested in that industry, it is scarcely necessary for me to remind this committee that the hon. member for East Lambton, when he made those observations with respect to the effect of the reciprocal arrangement upon the dairying industry, was not speaking by the book.

With regard to the fruit and canning industry, he also devoted some considerable time to that subject, and he came to the same conclusion, that the confirmation of this reciprocity agreement with the United States would inevitably destroy the canning industry of this country.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to place words in my mouth that I never uttered, or to misrepresent me in any way. I do not think you can turn up 'Hansard' and show that I have made the statement that the canning industry would be ruined.

Mr. KYTE. Then that it would be seriously injured and hampered.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Oh, well, be fair.

Mr. KYTE. I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation with respect to that, but I wish to point out to my hon. friend that there is not much evidence of the canning industry being injured, or in any way hampered by this agreement in face of the fact that the common stock of the Dominion Canners, within the last ten days, went up from 48 to 58. There are many sources in this country from which we can obtain evidence with respect to the effect a question of public policy may have upon certain industries without taking all our authority from hon. gentlemen opposite. I think the records of the stock exchanges afford a pretty good index as to what the people generally are thinking with respect to the operation of this reciprocity arrangement upon the industries of the Dominion. With regard to the railways of Canada, it has also been asserted that this agreement will result inevitably in diverting traffic from our transcontinental railways, and that the American roads will get the benefit of the carrying trade, or a great portion of the carrying trade, of our country. I observe that the Canadian Pacific railway stock, within the last ten days, went up from 209½ to 213¾. If we accept that as an index of the view which the Canadian Pacific railway take of this matter, I can scarcely imagine that the argument advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect can be harmonized with the stock operations in the city of Montreal, and in the other stock exchanges throughout this country. I have here, also, from the Montreal 'Daily Witness,' selected from the column called 'Stock Exchange Talks,' a paragraph which says:

Our big railways are preparing for a great year's activity from one end of the Dominion to the other, and in this connection, among the many interests to be served by this expansion will be the different Canadian steel corporations which are to receive liberal orders for rails and other construction requirements from the railway concerns.

I might also point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that in the last week the determination has been arrived at by the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build an additional line from Victoria harbour, on the Georgian bay, to the city of Montreal, in order to carry the additional freight which will be offered as a result of this trade agreement.

Mr. SPROULE. They have been working at that for nearly two years back.

Mr. KYTE. At all events, they are not discouraged by the prospect, or, perhaps, they would hesitate before they would carry on the scheme. I also saw, a few days ago, that it was the intention of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build an additional competing line between Toronto and Montreal. Taking all the leading stocks of Canada, I think you, Mr. Chairman, will be very much impressed with the fact that, taking one with the other, nearly every industrial stock in Canada has gone up during the last two weeks. I might say further, that this morning's paper contained a despatch from Montreal, which reads as follows:

Montreal, Feb. 20.—G. F. Johnston and H. J. Allison, of the firm of Johnston, McConnell and Allison, left Montreal this evening for New York en route for England in connection with the completion of a $20,000,000 British Columbia lumber deal, the capital for which is already largely subscribed. The name of this concern will be the British Canadian Lumber Corporation, the head office of which will be in this city.

I read this for the purpose of pointing out that the lumber interests is not calculated to receive very much injury from this reciprocal trade arrangement should it pass through parliament.

But there is one other feature of this question that I desire to present to the committee, because this is an agreement which involves a larger question than that of any local industry or enterprise. I refer to the large amount of British capital which has heretofore been invested in Canada for the purpose of developing the great industrial and commercial enterprises of the country. The statement was made without reserve by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and repeated by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) that the result of this arrangement would be to withdraw British capital from Canada and make it extremely difficult to get any further advances of British capital for the industrial and agricultural development of the country. I have before me an interview given by a distinguished financier of the city of London, whose name we will all recognize, Mr. Grenfell, son-in-law of the distinguished Governor General of Canada at the present moment. Mr. Grenfell is a member of the banking firm of Chaplin, Milne, Grenfell & Co., and chairman of the Canadian agency of one of the leading Canadian bond issuing houses in London. In a cable message which reached here yesterday, Mr. Grenfell is quoted as giving the following interview with regard to reciprocity:

From my recent trip to Canada, I am convinced that Canadians fully realize the progress and prosperity that have accrued to Canadian manufacturing and agricultural industries from cheap money sent out at a rate of over £30,000,000 per annum by English investors. I am confident that the first thing taken into consideration by the Canadian ministers would be whether the reciprocity arrangement with the United States might affect securities against which these large investments have been made.

I believe it will prove of inestimable advantage to Canada. Great material benefits will be derived by the whole Dominion in both agricultural and manufacturing industries from the opening of American markets. The future prosperity of Canada must be largely based on the soundness of agriculture and the enhanced value of western farm lands that will result from reciprocity will mean greater security of English investors. The free and larger markets which reciprocity will open to the farmers of the west, will cause great demands for the products of the factories of the east. Canadian statesmen have taken advantage of the situation.

It appears to me they have secured splendid terms for Canada in exchange for giving Americans what Americans could have taken for themselves at any time by simply lowering their own tariff wall without asking permission from Canada. Investors in England will speedily realize many trade advantages derived by Canada through the reciprocity agreement and will be more anxious to participate in opportunities offered by sound Canadian enterprises by investing their money at high rates of interest, while assisting in the development of the British Empire.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these statements, coming, as they do, from gentlemen who are experts on the subject, gentlemen who have authority to speak, are far more convincing arguments to lead one to a correct conclusion as to the real effect of this reciprocity arrangement upon the industries of Canada than all the somnolent reveries of the hon. member for East Lambton. My hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong) also stated that the Hudson Bay railway should be abandoned, because it would be practically a waste of money to construct it, as under this arrangement the trade would be diverted from that railway to the railways of the United States.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte), is wide of the mark again. I made no such statement as he now attributes to me.

Mr. KYTE. The hon. gentleman stated that one of the results of reciprocity would be that the Hudson Bay railway would be useless to Canada, and though I may have paraphrased his statement and not given his exact words, I believe 'Hansard' will bear me out that such is in effect what he said.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I ask you, Mr. Chairman to have the hon. gentleman read the 'Hansard' and there he will find that what I said was, that if the statement of the men of the west be true, that they are going to trade with Chicago and New York, then there was no need for the Hudson Bay railway, and that statement was made by me interrogatively.

Mr. KYTE. I accept the correction, and it still leaves the point just where I put it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No.

Mr. KYTE. Now, the hon. the leader of the opposition, speaking on this very Hudson Bay railway some short time ago, said:

The west is very much concerned at the present time about the building of the Hudson Bay railway. There is not absolute unanimity of opinion in this country as to the relief that will be brought to the people of the west by the construction of that road. I hope it may bring to them all the relief they expect, and then beyond question, in justice to this road it ought to be proceeded with without any delay.

That is the statement of the leader of the opposition in respect to the building of the Hudson Bay railway, and we may conclude from it, that he does not regard that this trade arrangement will militate against that great enterprise as my hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong) would have us imagine.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the hon. gentleman not find that the leader of the opposition also said in effect: Why proceed with the building of the Transcontinental railway, the Hudson Bay railway, and the canals, if we are going to divert our trade to the south and alter our policy which has been established for so many years.

Mr. KYTE. I did not feel I was called upon to read all the speeches made by the leader of the opposition, in which he has made reference to this railway; my point was to show that when he was discussing this particular resolution, he was still urging the government to proceed without delay with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, instead of making this bargain with the United States.

Mr. KYTE. There is no such reference as that in the speech I have read.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is what it was; it was an alternative.

Mr. KYTE. My hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong), also spoke of the annexation sentiment that existed in the United States, and he referred to Senator Cummings as an annexationist. True, Senator Cummings is an annexationist, but like his friend, Speaker Cannon, he is opposed to the reciprocity arrangement, and therefore, it may be assumed that if there was any trend towards annexation in this reciprocity arrangement, Senator Cummings, annexationist as he is, instead of opposing it, would have been anxious to have facilitated its passage through the Senate. Let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite that Mr. Bennett, who moved the annexation resolution in Congress, is also opposed to the reciprocal arrangement, and Senator Fordray, of Michigan, speaking on the question a few days ago, in the American Senate said:

> We have been buncoed by the Canadian representatives into a free trade treaty from which we receive no benefit. I do criticise our representatives for having surrendered body, soul and breeches to Canada.

Evidently, the people of the United States, like the people of Canada, are not unanimous as to the real meaning or consequences of this trade arrangement. We have in this House hon. gentlemen opposite censuring this government and its representatives, for yielding everything to the United States, and we have a member of the United States Senate censuring the representatives of that country, because they negotiated an arrangement, which gave everything to Canada. Amidst these conflicting opinions, it is difficult for one to come to a conclusion, as to how much sincerity or earnestness there exists in one party or the other, but, taking the extremists in the United States, who say Canada gets everything, and taking the extremists in Canada, who say the United States gets everything, and drawing an average between them, we may possibly come to the correct conclusion that this treaty is a fair treaty, and one that ought to receive the approval of the people of both countries. I do not know whether our hon. friends opposite are serious, when they say that the interchange of business promoted by reason of this agreement, will lead to annexation. I can scarcely believe that these hon. gentlemen one after another would reiterate so solemn a statement, unless they had some real conviction upon the matter. But, I would call attention to the fact that a reciprocity treaty existed between Canada and the United States from 1855 to 1866, and before that treaty actually terminated, the people of Canada, for the first time in 100 years, were called upon to show their loyalty to the mother land and their disposition towards the people of the United States. In 1866 there was a raid by United States subjects across the Canadian border. True, it did not amount to much, but whether the invasion was great or small the people of Canada did not hesitate to take up arms to repel the invaders from Canadian soil. Had that reciprocal arrangement between the two countries, had the effect which hon. gentlemen opposite say a reciprocal trade arrangement will now have, then the people of Canada might have betrayed their annexation sentiment and rested on their arms, while their country was overrun by invaders. Happily but few opportunities have been given to the people of Canada to defend their country, and I trust it may be many a long year before another opportunity will arise, but I venture to say, tracing the whole history of this country from its earliest beginning to the present there is to be found no time when the people of Canada expressed annexation sentiments, except it be on a historic occasion when certain men of the political stripe of gentlemen opposite, desired for the time being, to make political capital out of a great question in this country.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman does not include the Hon. Edward Blake, does he ?

Mr. KYTE. I do not include the Hon. Edward Blake, but I do include the Hon. J. J. C. Abbott and other distinguished Tories.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why does the hon. gentleman exclude the Hon. Edward Blake, when he did the same thing as the Hon. Mr. Abbott?

Some hon. MEMBERS. He never did.

Mr. KYTE. Another statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite is, that this reciprocal trade arrangement will have the effect of diverting all the grain carrying trade from Canadian ports to United States ports. I have before me a statement of the amount of foreign exports from Canada in 1910, and I find that from the port of Montreal there were shipped in that year, $15,037,958 worth of United States goods. I find also, that at the present time, when no reciprocal trade arrangement is in effect, 27 per cent of the foreign exports of Canada, (other than to the United States), was shipped from United States ports during the same year, 1910.

When I point out that millions of dollars worth of American goods for export are shipped from the ports of Montreal and St. John and that millions of dollars worth of Canadian goods for export are shipped from New York, and other ports of the United States, that is all I need say to show that trade will find its own channels where they are of the greatest advantage. It is inconceivable that there is any hon. gentlemen in this House who would look forward to a consummation when no exports from Canada would go by way of the United States, and no exports from the United States would go by way of Canada. We are living too closely together and our interests are too much interwoven for us ever to expect to see the day when all Canadian goods will be exported from Canadian ports, and all American goods will be exported from American ports.

I have one or two observations to make with respect to the effect of this agreement, as I view it, upon those sections of Canada with which I am most familiar ; and I am going to quote some figures, even at the risk of falling under the solemn and weighty abjurgations of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), who found fault with the figures given by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) a few days ago.

Mr. LENNOX. Can the hon. gentleman say that they were correct?

Mr. KYTE. I am not saying anything about them ; but the figures I give are as likely to be challenged as were the figures of the hon. member for South Wellington. Looking over the trade returns, I find that the value of agricultural products shipped to the United States from Canada in 1910, including horses, cattle, swine, lambs, sheep, poultry, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, beans, peas, Indian corn, hay, straw, potatoes, green apples, berries, butter, cheese, and eggs amounted to $6,277,295, upon which duties were paid of $1,274,337. The value of fish products sent from Canada to the United States was $3,223,398, upon which there were duties paid of $512,514. Gypsum to the value of $396,493 was shipped, upon which duties were paid of $101,493.

When discussing this question, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) pointed out that we had at present two markets in Canada, and that it was needless for us to seek a third market by entering into negotiations with the United States. Speaking more particularly for the maritime provinces, and with reference to the chief item of export from those provinces, namely, fish, I would like to remind hon. gentlemen that at present we have scarcely any free market for our exports of fish. The hon. member for North Toronto said that reciprocity between the various provinces of Canada was the ideal for the people of Canada to strive for. I quite admit that in the last 40 years there has been considerable reciprocity between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario on the one hand, and the maritime provinces on the other, but that reciprocity consisted in the people of the maritime provinces buying manufactured goods from the people of Quebec and Ontario, and the people of Quebec and Ontario taking current cash of the realm from the people of the maritime provinces in payment for those goods.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I think the hon. gentleman should be fair enough to say that the people of Quebec and Ontario have bought large quantities of coal and steel from the maritime provinces.

Mr. KYTE. My hon. friend did not permit me to refer to that fact, as I intended. It is quite true that Nova Scotia coal is sold in large quantities as far west, I understand, as Montreal, but not very much farther, and that considerable steel and iron have been shipped during the last two years from the steel works of Sydney and Sydney Mines into Quebec and Ontario ; but apart from these two items there is no reciprocity of trade in natural products between the maritime provinces and the province of Ontario.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Are there not a great many potatoes shipped from New Brunswick to the western provinces?

Mr. KYTE. There are some, but not many. The great market for the potatoes of the maritime provinces is in the United States. More potatoes from the maritime provinces are bought in the United States, notwithstanding the duty of 25 cents a bushel against them, than are bought in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. BLAIN. May I be permitted to say that three years ago there were 600 carloads of potatoes sent to the city of Toronto alone from the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. KYTE. That is quite true. There are seasons when potatoes are sent from the maritime provinces to the city of Toronto ; but these are exceptional seasons. I am speaking of a market which the people of the maritime provinces may at all times and seasons depend upon.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman has given the exports from Canada into the United States of different kinds of farm products. Would he give the exports of the same from the United States into Canada? He would find that several times the quantity of potatoes come from the United States to Canada as go from Canada to the United States.

Mr. KYTE. I would say to my hon. friend that I prefer to make my own speech; and having listened to one from him of two hours the other evening, I do not think I am under any special obligation to listen to another one now. During the last 40 years I have never seen or heard of a man from Ontario or Quebec coming to Nova Scotia to buy fish.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Is it not a fact that in the maritime provinces potatoes are manufactured very extensively into starch, which is shipped to the western provinces?

Mr. KYTE. I will relieve my hon. friend by saying that there is no great percentage of the potatoes of the maritime provinces made into starch.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is it not a fact that this government has established a special cold storage rate for carrying fish from the maritime provinces to Ontario, and Quebec? Has no fish been carried?

Mr. KYTE. It is quite true, the people of the maritime provinces have been endeavouring to coax the people of Ontario to buy their fish, but they have not succeeded to any great extent. It is absolutely impossible for reciprocity to any large extent to arise between the maritime provinces and the western provinces of Canada in regard to our fish products. The great market for the fresh fish of the maritime provinces is the United States owing to the easy access which we have to that market and owing to the facilities of transportation. The fresh fish of the maritime provinces is, however, but a very small item. Their salt fish needs a market, and we can get no market for it in Ontario or Quebec. I know a gentleman down in Halifax who has a son living in Alberta Last year he sent his son half a barrel of herring, knowing that his son was fond of the real product such as we get in Nova Scotia. He paid $3 for the half barrel but the freight to Alberta cost him $8. Is it not preposterous then to talk of the maritime provinces shipping salt fish to the prairies of the west? I have here the figures showing the exports of fish from Canada in 1910 :

EXPORTS FROM CANADA, 1910.

	United Kingdom.	United States.	Other Countries.
Codfish, haddock, ling and pollock..	$116,468	$432,211

It is not, then, a correct statement to say that we have two markets for the products of the maritime provinces, particularly with reference to our fish. There is only one solid, substantial market which can always be depended on, and that is the United States, and in respect of this market the fishermen of the maritime provinces have been labouring for the last forty years under the handicap of an adverse duty. Let me remind the House that the people of the maritime provinces did not complain of this handicap so long as it was the policy of this government to maintain exclusiveness in our dealings with the United States and prevent, by a high tariff, as much as possible, intercourse between the two countries. But when the opportunity has come to throw down the barriers and enable our people to sell their fish in the best markets free of duty, it is not surprising that they should be strongly in favour of this reciprocal arrangement.

My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) endeavoured to convince us that there is a large market for fish in Canada. Well, I should like to quote an article from the Montreal 'Herald,' dated 15th February, and entitled 'Fish Eating.' It is as follows:

FISH EATING.

Few countries are more generously endowed in the matter of its marine riches than Canada, and it is surprising and surely regrettable to learn from the annual report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries that Canadians are not fish eaters. This is attributed to the lack of proper transport and delivery or of careful attention in the treatment of fish while in transit. Then it is said the condition in which the fish is offered the public, for a sale is not what it ought to be. Professor Cowie, of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, cites Ottawa as a frightful example of the manner in which fresh fish is generally exhibited. 'A dealer,' he says, 'usually a butcher, on a Friday morning, places a large tin tray in his shop window on which are laid out generally in an inch or more of their own blood a few sickly looking fresh haddock, trout, &c., by means of which he expects to entice the custom of those, and there are many, who would eat real sea fish.

I am one of those, who, when they come to Ottawa, would like to eat real fish, but I must confess that up to the present my taste has not been gratified. I was really astonished to find that it was almost impossible to get good fish in this city, and that the only opportunity any man from the maritime provinces can have to taste the real article is when he enjoys the hospitality of some of the private citizens of this city, who have lived in the maritime provinces, and have had an opportunity to appreciate the simon pure article.

There is another important feature in this arrangement, and that is that it opens to us the market of Porto Rico. The United States markets take our fresh mackerel, canned lobster, salt mackerel and certain kinds of salted fish, but the market of Porto Rico is the great market to which we have been exporting dried fish from time immemorial. But ever since Porto Rico came under the control of the United States our Canadian fish have been subject to the American tariff. Under this arrangement, however, not only are the markets of the United States thrown open to our fish, but the market of Porto Rico as well, so that we shall have at all times and in all seasons a steady demand for our products in this line. That is one of the things we are seeking. It is very little avail to tell us that during lent, in Montreal and Ottawa, there is some demand for our fish, because once Lent is over that demand ceases. What we want is a place to which we can always send our fish and have a ready, steady market.

There is another feature which commends itself to my judgment, and that is that in the United States there is a growing demand for salted cod fish other than the dry. Heretofore our fishermen have been obliged to dry their fish, which is a long, tedious and laborious process, and the additional price obtained does not pay for the additional labour and trouble. But a market has sprung up in the United States for salted cod fish not dried, and that is bound to become one of our most profitable industries.

In this connection I should like to quote the opinion of Mr. Howard Smith, of the firm of M. and N. Smith, of Halifax, the largest exporters of fish in the world. That statement may, perhaps, surprise some hon. gentlemen, but it is none the less correct, and I might add that Mr. Howard Smith is a strong supporter of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), and his colleague from Halifax (Mr. Crosby). He is prominent and active in the public life of the city of Halifax, and his word is accepted throughout the whole of the maritime provinces. This is what he says:

I cannot see why nine-tenths of the people of this country should not be overwhelmingly in favour of reciprocity. Under reciprocity and with up-to-date methods there is no reason why the fish catch of Nova Scotia should not run up to one million quintals yearly, says Mr. Howard.

Will revolutionize industry.

Now with free fish into the United States, what will happen? We can build and fit out vessels here at about forty per cent less than the Gloucester owner can do. With the fishermen demanding their rights, they will man their home vessels, and the owners can pay them cash as soon as the trip is over, owing to the fact that middlemen will come into the business who will handle fish in a green or half-made state and supply the family trade in the United States. There is no excuse now for standing off the fisherman, for the bulk of the present catch will be sold in a green state to people who will cater to the package fish trade in the states.

Fleet of 500 Bankers.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Nova Scotia banking fleet of from two hundred to two hundred and twenty-five sail will increase to five hundred within five years. There is also no reason why Nova Scotia should not catch and market as many fish as Norway. At present our catch equals only about one-third of theirs, and this with the fishing grounds at our doors, and the consuming market for salt fish thousands of miles nearer to us than to them.

Salt Fish Export.

For a year or two the fresh and package fish people will be the only ones who will benefit under the new regime, so far as the export trade is concerned, but as soon as the catch is large enough, to supply the excess demand of the United States, and the price of hard dried will be on a parity with what can be got for half made fish, then salt fish exporters will take a hand in the business. They will then be able to get what they have been trying to get for years, that is, a slack salted fish, hard cured suitable for any of the world's markets. At present the old-fashioned way of curing still obtains and our fish are suitable only for Cuba, Porto Rico, Hayti and other West Indian islands. A more immediate result will be looked for by exporters, and that is the possibility of getting business in Porto Rico on an up-to-date basis. The preference in favour of Gloucester on that market of 86 cents a quintal will be done away with, and Gloucester will not be able to supply any fish, to speak of for that market.

The chances are that the old fish consigning business, from Lunenburg will be a thing of the past in a year or two, and the large distributors in Porto Rico, will look to this country to purchase supplies to be delivered to them regularly by steamer each month. It is well known that the consignment business has not been profitable ever since return cargoes of molasses ceased to be available.

I read that to show what Mr. Howard Smith thinks of this reciprocal arrangement with respect to its effect on the fishing industry of the maritime provinces. And I think hon. gentlemen opposite may well pardon me if I have shown a little enthusiasm in favour of this trade arrangement. There is another item which——

Mr. AMES. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) preparing to leave the subject of fish?

Mr. KYTE. I was, unless it is desirable to continue it.

Mr. AMES. We have all been listening with interest, I am sure, to what the hon. gentleman has been saying. There is one portion of the subject we have been expecting to hear the hon. gentleman deal with but which he has not touched. What will be the effect of Newfoundland's fish coming into the Canadian market, and what will be the effect of throwing the preferential West Indian market open to the fish of Newfoundland and the United States?

Mr. KYTE. That is a question that was propounded twenty years ago: What effect will Newfoundland have upon our markets? For years and years fish came into Halifax and were distributed to the ports of the West Indies and the United States, and it did not appreciably affect the price so far as the maritime provinces are concerned. Newfoundland fish largely go to Spain and Portugal. Halifax and the American markets have not been considered a very considerable object for the fish producers of Newfoundland. They have their trade connections with Liverpool and the Mediterranean, and they ship direct to Spain and Portugal, and some times to Brazil. Therefore, the people of the maritime provinces will suffer little from the competition of Newfoundland.

Now, I desire to refer to another item in which Nova Scotia is interested, the item of gypsum. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite proclaiming that the natural resources of this country ought to be kept for the people of this country. That is a proposition with which I entirely agree, provided that those natural resources are to be made a source of revenue to the people of this country who are now in life and their immediate successors. If they say that the natural resources of this country should be locked up for the benefit of some enterprising speculator in the next century, I decline to accept that proposition. I say that the natural resources of Canada are for the people of Canada to-day as well as for the people of generations to come. We have large deposits of gypsum in Nova Scotia, and have been endeavouring to find a market for our gypsum. But, the encouraging encomiums made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) with respect to the home market and the market of Great Britain, have not brought any consolation to the owners of gypsum deposits in Nova Scotia. A few years ago a trade of modest dimensions grew up in the shipping of gypsum, inaugurated by an American company that had vessels engaged in carrying gypsum from Windsor to different parts of the United States. But that business has been limited owing to the duty on gypsum. As this is an article which is not of very great value in its raw state, shippers could not compete successfully under that duty, no matter how small it might be. But let me read a telegram from Washington which appeared last week in the New York 'Post,' which will show the effect that this arrangement will have on the gypsum trade of Nova Scotia:

The ship-building industry of the country is vitally interested in the agreement, as is shown by a telegram received by the President to-day from the Staten Island Ship-building Company of New York. The telegram states that free gypsum provided by the reciprocal arrangement means an order for that firm to build a large fleet of American steel ocean-going vessels of 7,500 tons capacity each, to transport the gypsum from Nova Scotia to the manufacturers of the Atlantic sea-board.

That indicates that there will be great activity in the shipping of gypsum from Nova Scotia within the next few years. In the Island of Cape Breton, the whole coast line of the Bras d'Or lakes is filled with gypsum deposits of enormous-value to those who make use of it for the usual purposes of trade. But, with the exception of the Keystone Plaster Company, which has been doing business in a rather small way in the constituency of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) during the last five or six years, not a pound of gypsum has been sent from Cape Breton to other parts of Canada, to the United States or elsewhere. I am aware that a strong financial concern in the United States has had their representatives in the Island of Cape Breton during the last few years going over gypsum properties, having them bonded, and making arrangements to have gypsum shipped into the United States notwithstanding that the duty was adverse and that the profits would not be what they desired. Under the present arrangement, a tremendous boom will take place with respect to the shipping of gypsum to the United States, and the natural resources of Nova Scotia in that commodity will be made to pay tribute to the people of this generation as well as to the people of generations to come.

There is another large item, the shipping of sheep and lambs from Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces. I do not desire to occupy time by referring particularly to all the subjects which are vitally affected in this arrangement. Other hon. gentlemen who are to follow me, will, no doubt, take up the discussion of these items. But I desire to say that the opposition which this measure is receiving from hon. gentlemen on the Conservative side is quite in keeping with their attitude on every other question of public policy propounded by this government, no matter how beneficially it ultimately resulted to the people of Canada. I have particular reference at the present moment to the Fielding tariff and the British preference which was submitted to this House in the session of 1897. I have here the speech of Sir Charles Tupper, who was then the leader of the opposition in this House, a distinguished imperialist so far as his utterances at all events during a long life are concerned, and a gentleman who, would not be considered by hon. members opposite as for a moment assuming a position of disloyalty to the empire.

When the British preference and the Fielding tariff were under discussion, he delivered himself in this way:

The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence.

There is a familiar ring to that utterance in view of the speeches of hon. members who have been prophesying that this arrangement will affect disastrously the industries of this country.

While hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries, I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal 'Gazette' where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country.

And again:

I feel that far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada, and upon its great industries.

My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), might have saved himself a good deal of energy and this House a good deal of time if, instead of the speech he delivered a few days ago on this question, he had taken the speech of Sir Charles Tupper, put it in your hands and asked that it be taken as read.

That is the reception which this proposal of the Finance Minister is receiving from the opposition to-day, but that is to be expected, as that is the treatment accorded by hon. gentlemen opposite to every proposal made by this government, no matter how beneficial it is calculated to be to the people of Canada. Last year, when the budget speech was being discussed, the hon. member from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), said:

The point is what are you taking out of the individual taxpayer of this country? What are you taking out to-day? $11 to $12 per head, whereas in 1896 we took out a little less than $5.50 per head. This money you took out is money that comes from the man's earnings, it is so much abstracted from his capital. There ought to be no reason in the world for taking it except that it is absolutely necessary that the aggregate of the people of this country should be governed and that they should pay for it.

The whole criticism of the speech of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), on the Budget last year, was that the Minister of Finance was taking too much money out of the taxpayers of Canada, and that cry was taken up and reverberated along the back benches until its last echoes died on the lips of the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Thornton). Here is a proposal of the Minister of Finance to lessen the amount of money taken out of the taxpayers to the extent of $2,500,000. Does it receive the approval of the hon. member from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) or any hon. gentleman opposite? If the Finance Minister was taking too much money from the taxpayers last year, when he took $100,000,000 out of their pockets, if the hon. gentlemen really meant their criticism to be taken seriously, they ought to hail this agreement with pleasure, because it will relieve the taxpayers of Canada to the extent of $2,500,000.

I desire to quote an article from the 'Shareholder' a newspaper of recent date. The article is as follows:

If we are to believe the hysterical outbursts which are appearing in many of our papers at the present time, Canada is on the verge of a great calamity. We have no interest in the political aspect of the present tariff negotiations and are indifferent whether Liberals or Conservatives are in power at Ottawa. We do feel, however, that a great deal of nonsense has been written in regard to the reciprocity negotiations, and that those writings will do more harm to Canada than any reciprocity treaty we might negotiate. It is little less than absurd for writers to say that the pending treaty between Canada and the United States means the breaking up of the empire and the absorption of Canada into the United States. This is so puerile that it is unworthy of refutation. The absurdity of such a contention is self confident. Almost on a par with these contentions are the statements that the completion of the treaty will mean the break-up of our transportation systems. In other words, these 'calamity howlers' state that the Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk railway, and the Canadian Northern railway will become mere branch lines and act as feeders to the United States railroad. The history of Canadian railway enterprise disapproves of any such theory. It is acknowledged to-day that the Canadian Pacific railway is one of the greatest—if not the greatest—railway in the world. At the present time its stock is selling higher than that of any railroad on the continent. It pays a dividend of 10 per cent, and its earnings and general development have been little short of phenominal. It is unbelievable to think that our Canadian railroads will quietly submit to the traffic being taken south instead of east. Even those who oppose the treaty acknowledge that one result of it will be the opening up of large areas of our western lands and a greater influx of emigrants. This will undoubtedly mean that more grain is to be shipped out and more manufactured articles carried in to supply the needs of the new settlers. This will mean more traffic instead of less for the Canadian railroads.

At the same instant that our Canadian 'calamity howlers' are predicting the break-up of the empire and the absorption of Canada into the United States, the business men of New York are proclaiming to their government and to the world that Montreal has captured the export grain business from New York. They point out that 74 per cent of the shipments of the west are now going through Montreal. In 1903 New York exported 14,000,000 bushels of wheat, while Montreal exported 8,000,000. In 1908 New York exported 16,000,000 while Montreal exported 30,000,000. In 1910 New York figures showed 6,000,000 and those from Montreal 20,000,000. They claim that Montreal is bound in time to capture practically all of the export grain trade, not only from the Canadian west, but a large amount of grain from the northwestern states.

All students of economics, or even the man who knows absolutely nothing of economics, knows that business will naturally follow along the cheapest lines. If grain can be carried cheaper to Montreal than to New York it will naturally go by the former port. As a matter of fact, such is the case, and with the developments going on in connection with our canals, our terminal facilities, and the deepened St. Lawrence route, Montreal will continue to receive more and more of the export grain trade. The bogie which the protectionists' interest have raised is not even a real one. Canada is developing at such a rate that no treaty or combination of treaties could retard her development.

I, for one, should be very sorry to see any policy adopted by this parliament that would result injuriously to the manufacturing industries of this country. I recognize the part that the manufacturers and the capitalists of this country have taken in building up this great Canadian nationality. I recognize that by their enterprise and capital, they have made it possible for men to receive remunerative employment, and they have added enormously to the population in our industrial centres; but having regard to the record of the government and to the patriotism of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), it is idle folly to assume for a moment that anything will be done by this government or this Finance Minister that will jeopardize the manufacturing interests of Canada.

This question of loyalty is so beside the question under discussion, that one almost loses patience in discussing it, but it comes up so frequently and with such insistence, that it seems necessary for every one taking part in this debate, to put himself on record as respects his loyalty, ambitions and inspirations, as regards our connection with the mother country. The question of loyalty was not permitted by hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, to in any way interfere with the carrying out of any question of public policy. It is well known that on one occasion, when Sir John Macdonald proposed a policy which was criticised as being likely to be injurious to British connection, he answered: 'So much the worse for British connection.' That sentiment has never been stated or repeated by any hon. gentleman on this side of the House, or so far as I know, by any member of the Liberal party in Canada since 1896, when this government was called on to take office. But their loyalty is of such an ephemeral character that it is difficult to say what hon. gentlemen opposite, regard as loyalty to-day, and what they will call loyalty to-morrow. It was loyalty last year to proclaim that Germany was a nightmare disturbing the dreams of the people of Canada; that the people of Canada should put up money to help to build a navy in England, to assist in repeling a threatened German invasion. We hear nothing now about a German invasion or a German peril, that has passed away into the oblivion of forgotten things. A year ago an election was progressing in Great Britain, in which gentlemen, who were trying hard to get into office, were endeavouring to secure some support by conjuring up to the minds of the people of England, that the responsible ministers did not show a sufficiently anxious disposition to keep up the armaments of Great Britain. But that election passed away. The Liberal party were returned to power. Since then, but a few weeks ago, another election took place, and the same party has been returned again to power. We have had strident and hysterical demands for imperial preferential trade between Canada and the empire. It would be a very good thing, and I can assure you, that if Great Britain declared for imperial preferential trade within the empire, I should hold up both hands for it. But, is it not idle for the hon. member for North Toronto, to tell the people of the maritime provinces, 'you had better keep your fish, keep your lambs, keep your apples and keep everything else you have to sell until we obtain preferential trade with Great Britain, and then we will send our goods over there.' There is not much prospect of our getting imperial preferential trade within the empire while the dominant partner, the people of Great Britain, repudiate it, as they have on three several occasions within the last five years. It is loyalty to-day as far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, to proclaim imperial preferential trade within the empire, but who knows what will be their policy next year? I am reminded of lines written by a poet whose name we all venerate and revere, referring to a distinctly similar situation which existed in England at a time when a party out of power was endeavouring to get back to power. He wrote:

> Loyalty, sooth, we're on dangerous ground;
> Who knows how the fashions may alter,
> The doctrine to-day that is loyally sound,
> To-morrow may bring us the halter.

I have one more observation to make, and I am through. During the course of the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto, he made some references to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in connection with his administration of public affairs in the province of Nova Scotia, and in connection with the issue which was raised there in the election of 1886. That charge was reiterated, in a somewhat subdued and rarified form, I will admit, by the hon. member for East Lambton. The hon. member for North Toronto referred to the fact that in 1886 the Minister of Finance, then premier of Nova Scotia, went to the country upon an issue which was calculated to disrupt the confederation of Canada. I wish to remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the people of Nova Scotia have, as long as I can remember, taken an active and intelligent interest in public matters. I need scarcely do more than remind you, Sir, that the province of Nova Scotia, within twenty years, has given two prime ministers to the Dominion of Canada, and if the hopes and aspirations of hon. gentlemen opposite had been realized in the last election and they had been returned to power the province of Nova Scotia would have contributed a third prime minister to the Dominion of Canada, to show the deep and intelligent interest Nova Scotians must necessarily take in political matters. Having said so much, I desire to add that the issue that was framed by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and that received the approval of the people of Nova Scotia, was an issue that he was absolutely justified in submitting to the people. From the years 1878 to 1896 the province of Nova Scotia was in opposition to the Conservative government at Ottawa, of which the hon. member for North Toronto was a prominent member. Certain questions of right and justice which had arisen between the two governments, and which should have been settled and decided by the Conservative government at Ottawa in favour of the Liberal government in Nova Scotia, were not so settled. The rights of the province were ignored, and the people of Nova Scotia, driven to desperation, as they were on one other occasion, when a great question came up for their judgment, said: If we cannot get justice from the government at Ottawa we ought to get justice from some other source. In 1886 there was an election run in the province of Nova Scotia on the question of whether Nova Scotia ought to accept conditions as they existed and bear the hardships which were being imposed upon her by the government at Ottawa, or endeavour to secede from the union. I need not remind the committee that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was amply sustained, handsomely vindicated, by the people of Nova Scotia upon that issue, and that he came back to the government of the province with a larger majority than he had before. In two subsequent elections my hon. friend the Minister of Finance led the Liberal party in Nova Scotia and led them successfully, as he has been successful upon every issue on which he appealed to the people during the twenty-nine years of his public life in Canada. We down in the province of Nova Scotia learned years ago to appreciate the eminent ability, unselfish character, loyalty and devotion with which the hon. Minister of Finance has always administered public affairs in Nova Scotia, and since he left the province of Nova Scotia to become Minister of Finance the people of that province have turned their eyes lovingly towards Ottawa to learn from day to day of the new things and the good things that my hon. friend was bringing to the people of Canada. He has brought many good things to the people of Canada, and that he may long live to bring many other good things to them is the devout wish of every man in Nova Scotia irrespective of politics, whether he be Conservative or Liberal. I referred a moment ago to the eminent talents of the Minister of Finance. I shall not discant upon his personal qualities, that must be manifest to every hon. member who knows him, but I will say that as respects his character, his ability, the great good which he has conferred upon the province of Nova Scotia and the Dominion of Canada, and as respects his loyalty to his colleagues and his country future generations of Nova Scotians will say of him:

He was a man, take him for all in all,
We ne'er shall look upon his like again.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kyte) happens to come from a section of the country where the people have been for many years inclined to indulge in their own peculiar amusement of aërial navigation, each one vieing with all his predecessors to make for himself a world's record as a kite flyer. But, unfortunately for their own reputation, they usually move around in the air promiscuously for a time and then finally land down in some deserted swamp or obscure lake. I do not think that the hon. member who has just taken his seat has established a record for himself any more important to hand down to posterity in that respect than many of his predecessors. He started out by saying that what was suitable for Canada in 1891 ought to be suitable for it in 1911. That may be true, or it may be false, because a great many changes have taken place in Canada in the last twenty years. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said something about the same. He said that Canada, from 1854 to 1866, during the time we had the reciprocity treaty, enjoyed such advantages that she has desired to get such a treaty ever since, and that if Canada required a reciprocity treaty then she requires one equally as much in 1911. Does it necessarily follow that that is correct? Is it likely to be correct? Are the conditions of Canada the same to-day as they were twenty years ago, or the same as they were in 1866? Not at all. Most of the hon. gentlemen who spoke on this question have given expression to the same principle, and have employed practically the same argument. The hon. member for South Wellington says that what was suitable for Canada in 1866 is just as suitable to-day. I would like to ask him to apply that to himself.

The 'Parliamentary Companion' tells us that he was then a mere babbling infant, and that about all he needed was a bath tub, a little human milk moderately hot and a good deal of spanking to make a boy of him. But he grew up and he developed, and he came to manhood. Does he require nothing more to-day than he did in his infancy? What has happened in the meantime? He has increased in stature, in vigour, in mentality and to-day he is a full grown man. To ask him to be content now with what suited him in his swaddling days is as absurd as to ask Canada in the year 1911 to be content with what she required in the year 1866. Twenty years have brought great changes to Canada: We have grown to nationhood; we have developed strength; our people require different conditions and pursuits now from what they did then. What was suited to Canadians 20 years ago does not suit them to-day. True, as the hon. gentleman told us, the eastern and western dairymen have passed resolutions in favour of this arrangement and no doubt they spoke honestly and with the best intentions, but after all they may not be the best judges, and we will have to leave it to the future to determine. The hon. gentleman told us that the foreign trade of the port of Montreal was $15,000,000 and I can tell him that our fear is that if this arrangement goes into effect, that trade instead of developing as it ought to develop in proportion to the increased wealth and population of the country, will be retarded if not destroyed. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) told us what was going to happen to Nova Scotia fish if they did not get reciprocity with the United States. Might I ask him what has happened to the maritime fish trade up to the present hour? He told us that none of their fish was sold in Ontario and the west, but I would refer him to his political friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) to know if it is not true that that gentleman for years has been doing a very large and remunerative trade in fish with Montreal and Toronto and other cities in these provinces. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) told us that the English market was of little value to the maritime provinces for fish products; he told us that the interprovincial trade in Canada was of no consequence and that if they got a free market in the United States for their fish they would have all they could desire. But, the value of the product of our fisheries last year was $15,000,000, and I find from the statistics that of that the United States took $4,627,000 worth while the English market which the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) has such a contempt for took $5,899,000 worth. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) announced an economic fallacy when he said that the natural resources of our country are for the people of to-day, and not for the people of the future. Is there any wisdom in such a policy. Are we living only for ourselves and for the present; are we to pay no heed to posterity; are we to recklessly waste what nature has given us and leave to future generations a depleted country. Sir, such a policy would be the height of folly. I say that a wise and intelligent people in this or any generation will say: It is ours to use economically the gifts of nature, not to waste or destroy, but to save what we do not really need for those who come after us. That, Sir, is our real duty to ourselves and to our country. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) told us that this reciprocal arrangement would give to the maritime provinces a market for their potatoes. He was asked what quantity of potatoes had been sent from the maritime provinces to the United States last year, and he could not tell, although he ventured the opinion that the interprovincial trade in potatoes was of little or no value. Well, the facts are that large quantities of maritime province potatoes are used in Ontairo and Quebec, and three years ago when in Winnipeg I was told that most of the potatoes they were then using were brought from the province of Prince Edward Island. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that last year the United States sent into Canada $52,597 worth of poultry, while Canada only sent to this great market of 95,000,000 people $3,576 worth. In view of these figures the poultry raisers in Canada will not have much to hope for from this trade arrangement, and with regard to potatoes, as to which the hon. gentleman thought the American market would be so valuable, this 95,000,000 people took last year from all Canada $36,710 worth. What a wonderful benefit it will be to the Nova Scotians to get that market for their potatoes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a wonder they took that much, with the duty of 25 cents a bushel.

Mr. SPROULE. I wonder that they took any at all. They never take any more than they can do without, and they are not likely to take any more in the future out of generosity than they have done in the past. They only take what suits them. From the United States returns I find that they sent into Canada last year $213,554 worth of potatoes, whereas they took from us only $36,000 worth. Where would the poor Nova Scotians be if the duty were taken off potatoes and the Americans had the freedom of our market? I am inclined to think they would be worse off rather than better. Then, the Canadian farmer has eggs to sell, and where is he going to sell them? The ninety-five million of people of the United States took from us last year only $12,500 worth of eggs, whereas we took from them $117,517 worth. What a wonderful benefit it will be to the Canadian farmers and farmers' wives who have eggs to sell, when they find that they will have to compete in their home market with the importation of double or treble the quantity of American eggs when the duty is taken off. The same is true with regard to horses and the same with regard to cheese.

The Minister of Finance stated, as a justification for making this treaty, that both political parties in Canada were committed to such a proposal ever since 1866, when the old reciprocity treaty was abolished. Well, in my judgment he was a little out in his history and was not quite accurate in his facts. Canada, he said, enjoyed good times during the continuance of that treaty from 1854 to 1866, and presumably those good times were due to that treaty. I want to ask those who know anything about the history of that time, is that a fact? I say emphatically that it is not. What gave us the good times that we enjoyed from 1854 to 1856 or 1857? It was the Russian war, which ran up the price of everything we had to sell. We sold wheat in the barn for $2 a bushel, and everything else at correspondingly high prices. After that, for some years, notwithstanding the reciprocity treaty, we had rather bad times. Prices went down lower and lower until 1861, when the American war started, and we had good times again. Why had we those good times? The Minister of Finance says because of the treaty of 1866. Not at all. It was because 5,000,000 people in the United States were withdrawn from peaceful pursuits of agriculture, to fight for their rights, and that country had to depend on other countries for its supplies, and everything went up enormously in price. I happened to be living in the United States in 1866, and I remember the high prices we had to pay for everything—25 cents per pound for pork, from 20 to 24 cents per pound for beef, and correspondingly high prices for butter, cheese and all other articles of food. An ordinary suit of clothes cost $125. Our horses and cattle went to the United States in thousands and were sold at very high figures. We had good times, not because of the reciprocity treaty, but because so many of their people were taken from the peaceful pursuits of agriculture and the country had to get its requirements from other countries, and Canada, being so close to the United States, enjoyed the advantage of that condition of things. In 1865 the war closed. I was in the United States in 1866 and 1867, when they abolished the reciprocity treaty, and what was one of the reasons they gave for doing it? I remember one of the generals speaking in Detroit at the time, and saying : Over five millions of our people were taken from the peaceful pursuits of life for many years, and we stopped production, and were obliged to get our supplies from other countries ; but the war is now over, these people have gone back to their regular pursuits, and they will be able to supply us with all the foodstuffs we require, and we are bound as a nation, in the interests of our own people, to abolish this treaty and to put up the duties on these articles, so that we can keep the market of our own country for our own people. And the Americans abolished the treaty for that purpose, and put very high duties on everything that went into that country. I remember that the duty on a box of matches was 10 cents, and everything else was in proportion ; and from that time on we were shut out of the United States market. Then the Finance Minister said, and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) as well, that both parties in Canada have been committed to such a proposal since 1866 up to the present. That history, I submit, is not correct, and I propose to show that it is not. Since 1897 the Conservative party have never submitted to the people a policy of reciprocity. It is also incorrect as regards the Reform party. In 1891 that party went before the electorate with the policy of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union and not limited reciprocity, and they ran their election on that platform and were sadly defeated.

What has been the history of both political parties in this country with regard to their efforts to secure reciprocity from 1866 to the present? In 1866, after the abolition of the treaty, Sir Alexander Galt and Sir William Howland went to Washington to secure reciprocity, but failed. In 1868, after confederation, there was a clause inserted in our first tariff Act declaring our readiness to enter into a similar limited treaty with the United States if they were prepared to reciprocate. That clause, however, remained ineffective. In 1869 Sir John Rose was despatched to Washington by the government of Sir John Macdonald to secure reciprocity in natural products on the lines of the treaty of 1866, but he also returned without being able to accomplish anything. In 1871 another effort was made by Sir John Macdonald, when the treaty of Washington was negotiated. An effort was then made to have that treaty extended to natural products, but the Americans again refused. In 1874 Sir Alexander Mackenzie sent a deputation to Washington, headed by the Hon. George Brown, to get reciprocity, but they also failed. In 1879, when the National Policy tariff resolutions and the Customs Act were passed, there was a statutory offer made for reciprocal tariff legislation, or reciprocity, in natural products, and that remained a standing offer to the United States for several years, but was never accepted. In 1891, for the last time, Sir John Macdonald appealed to the country and asked the people whether they were desirous of having reciprocity with the United States. If so, he said, we are prepared to make another effort as opposed to the policy of the Reform party in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union. On that issue both parties went to the country, and the Reform party was ignominiously defeated. Sir John was returned, and, true to his promise, he sent another deputation to Washington, but that met with a similar fate as its predecessors, and from that time to the present day the Conservatives have never made any effort to get a reciprocity treaty with the United States. From that day to the present they have never put any such plank in their platform, and I appeal to the Minister of Finance whether he was not absolutely incorrect when he said that from 1866 down to 1911 both parties were committed to such a policy. In 1891 the Reform party ran their election on unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union, and were defeated. In 1893 they put a plank in their platform in favour of reciprocity with the United States and appealed to the people. They carried the country, and in 1899 the right hon. the Prime Minister and Mr. John Charlton went to Washington to try and get reciprocity, but utterly failed, and the right hon. gentlemen then declared that they had made their last pilgrimage to Washington to secure a treaty, and would in future endeavour to develop this country on national lines. In view of these facts, is it right, therefore, to say that both parties were committed to that policy during all those years? I submit that from that time to the present neither party was committed to it.

My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has said, however, that if there was good reason for the demand in 1866 there is equally good reason for it in 1911. Well, I say there is not. Times and conditions have both changed. To-day we have good markets, whereas then we had unprofitable markets. Since then the country has been developing in every line. Its people are amply employed at renumerative wages, its interprovincial trade has been growing and has grown immensely, and owing to this development and the increase in immigration we have a home market adequate for all our necessities. There could, therefore, be no comparison between 1866 and the present in that respect. We are to-day a full grown nation. We have reached that development which comes with maturity. We are now full grown, and can face the world in arms; we have the brain, brawn and muscle necessary to hold our own. We have good markets in Canada and ample employment for our own people. Can it, therefore, be said that we are in the same position as in 1866? I say no. Do we then require a reciprocity treaty to-day, as we did in 1866? Not at all. All we require to do is to continue working out our own national development, as we have been during the last 15 years. It seems to me that the epitaph on a certain tombstone would apply well to Canada if we should get this proposed treaty. The epitaph reads as follows:—

> I was well, wished to be better;
> Took medicine and here I am.

Mr. FIELDING. Rather hard on the doctors.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, on political doctors just as well as on medical men. The Canadian people will say: We were well, our political doctors thought we should do better; they administered medicine, and now here we lie. What has been the ruin brought to Canada by the, I was going to say quack political physician and his empirical prescribing for the country's needs at this time!

I was much amused at the wonderful cheer that went up from the supporters of the Minister of Finance on the other side of the House, and from the colony on the back benches of this side when the Minister of Finance sat down. It was as though some oracle from Heaven had spoken—as though the clouds had opened and the shower came down from Heaven to revive the drooping spirits of the world. The hon. gentlemen acted as though they felt very much better. They reminded me of the sick Irishman, who was called upon by the doctor. Doctors have a habit, when they call upon a patient, of not only looking at the tongue and feeling the pulse, but of using a little instrument, such as I have here, a thermometer. First the thermometer must be shaken down to make sure that it is below 98⅘, the normal human temperature, and then it is placed under the patients tongue. The physician placed the thermometer under the Irishman's tongue and walked up and own, while he waited for the expiry of the three minutes, during which the instrument was to remain in the patient's mouth. The poor Irishman held his mouth shut, and when at last, the doctor removed the thermometer, the patient said: 'Thank you, sorr; I feel a great deal better for that thratement.' The Finance Minister had taken the temperature of his following, and they felt they would soon be well. But I am afraid the improvement was like that of the Irishman, more in imagination, than in reality. Now, what did we do when we found we could not get any treaty with the United States? The matter was taken up seriously by the Conservative party in 1876, 1877 and 1878, when Sir John Macdonald, finding every effort to negotiate a treaty unavailing, laid down a policy designed to protect the home market of Canada and prevent the United States exploiters from dumping their surplus goods in our country. Being shut out of the American markets by high tariffs and the refusal to negotiate a reciprocity treaty from 1866 to 1890, we had periods of hard times in Canada, there is no doubt, and felt the urgent need of better markets for our own people. But, as the United States did not admit us to their markets, the wise statesmen of that day said: We will prepare for ourselves a National Policy, and will develop Canada on lines that will assure to our own people the employment that is denied to them by the Americans making a slaughter market of Canada. This National Policy was introduced in 1879, and had the effect of directing the pursuits of the people of Canada, and educating them so that they might better employ their time and labour by turning out the finished products suitable for Canada, instead of selling our raw products, as we had been doing up to that time. That policy continued to be carried out by the statesmen controlling the destinies of Canada. We sent experts to Great Britain to study the markets and ascertain what was suitable for the consumption of the people there, and how we could produce it and lay it down in their markets in prime condition, and in the most attractive and saleable form. We established experimental farms for the same purpose; we appointed a dairy commissioner, and dairy instructors; we prepared cold storage by land and by ocean, and improved the transportation of the country by land and by ocean as well. We did this for the purpose of transporting to the markets in which we must sell the goods we had to dispose of the only one of value we had left to the Canadian people, so that they might receive the benefit they were entitled to expect from the markets of the mother country. We sent Prof. James W. Robertson to England to study the markets of that country and of other European countries as well; and on his return to Canada, he outlined the policy which, in his judgment, we should follow, to make our products sell in those markets. He said that the education of our farmers was one of the desirable things, so that we might produce an article of superior quality in dairy products, cured meats and other foodstuffs, suitable for the British market. For that purpose we established experimental farms, we commenced experimental work by means of the experimental farms, and by the officers appointed to deal with the dairy associations to carry on the other portions of this business. And so we went on up to 1890. But we found that the Americans were still taking advantage of our markets. The meat products which our Canadian farmers were supplying in unlimited quantities, were driven out of the Canadian markets by the inroads of the United States meats. We had got the government in 1879 to put a duty on meats, but it was not sufficient. Deputation after deputation came to the government, until, in 1890, we laid this problem before them. We said that the Canadian farmers were raising meat enough to supply the demand of Canada, but the big Chicago houses brought into Canada 22,000,000 pounds of fresh meat to feed the Canadian people, depriving the Canadian farmer of his home market. And we urged that, in the interest of the farmer, the duty must be increased. We succeeded in convincing the government that this was the right thing to do. We showed them that every day the refrigerator cars could be seen coming from Armour & Co., from Swift, and other meat packers, of Chicago, dumping out the fresh meat in London, Hamilton, Toronto, Kingston, Montreal and even down to the maritime provinces. And there were stalls retailing this meat alongside the Canadian butcher stalls. These Chicago houses, in fact were feeding the Canadian artisans and labourers in the cities with beef and pork raised in Kansas and Illinois to the detriment of our farmers. Was that wise? Was it proper? We got the government to put the duty, not as high as we asked, but up to 2 cents and 3 cents a pound on fresh meat.

What was the result? In two years we shut up every one of these American butcher stalls in Canada, we stopped these refrigerator cars from dumping the fresh meat in Canada and reduced the consumption of American fresh meat to less than 8,000,000 pounds. Will any man tell me that that did not do the Canadian farmer any good? I think the Canadian farmer is too intelligent to doubt it. What would be the result to-day if you took the duty off? By this arrangement we reduce it to one and a quarter cents a pound. It was 2½ cents a pound when we imported 22,500,000 pounds, and they kept stalls open. Would not the same thing happen again? It would, and to the detriment of the Canadian farmer who is raising meat enough to feed the Canadian people and is entitled to demand from the Canadian government a protection of the home market for the Canadian farmer. But although we are feeding the Canadian people our exports of cured meats, packing house produce, increased from $5,000,000 in 1889 when that duty was put on to $17,196,000 in 1903, and in addition we fed the Canadians as well. Was that no benefit to the Canadian farmer? Would we not do him serious injustice if we took that duty off? In my judgment we would. By these means we secured a profitable market in Great Britain for all we had to sell over home consumption and we had there a splendid market also for our dairy products? What did we do with regard to dairy products? We sent our dairy instructors and instructed the people how to make better butter and better cheese. We prohibited the importation, manufacture or sale of spurious products, process butter and filled cheese which were largely produced in the United States. We compelled the Canadian people to label all Canadian produce going to Great Britain so that it would not be confused with American produce there. Then the Americans commenced shipping butter and cheese across at Brockville, sending it to England by Montreal and calling it Canadian. We stopped that by compelling them when they brought it across to label it United States produce. By these means we developed that industry until in a few years our cheese products increased, the price and quality went up all along the line until three years ago we enjoyed the advantage of being able to supply the British market with 65 per cent of all the cheese imported from all parts of the world. The United States was our greatest competitor in 1879 and shipped double the quantity of cheese to Britain that we did. The exports have been going down from that time until to-day, and last year they sent there only a few million pounds, a negligible quantity, and there is practically no American cheese in the English market to-day. We supplied England last year with 65 per cent of her imports of cheese. Will any one tell me in the face of these facts that the Canadian dairymen would not suffer and lose his reputation for butter and cheese abroad if he allowed the same thing to happen now that happened years ago? History would repeat itself and the Canadian dairyman would live to learn that he made the mistake of his life when he passed that resolution saying that all he desired was to get into the American market with his cheese and butter.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said that he represented an agricultural constituency, that there were farmers there who are raising the best cattle found on the continent, and raising splendid horses for which they desired access to the Buffalo and New York market.

He said :

> The arrangement presented before us will give Canada tremendous advantages over the position which she now occupies.

He added:

> Will any one tell me that the people of my riding do not desire to get their cattle and their sheep and their hogs into the Buffalo market?

I would like to ask would they be equally desirous that the man from Kansas, Illinois, Ohio and New York should come into the Canadian market and share the markets of Guelph, or Toronto, or Montreal with the Canadian farmers to the extent they were doing before? Will the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) be willing to see an American butcher stall opened in Guelph, to sell beef and pork from Chicago in competition with the farmers of South Wellington? I think not. He says the Canadian farmers are anxious to get into the American market to sell horses. Where do they sell them to-day? They have a splendid market in the Canadian west, the best we ever had, a Canadian market, a home market, a market that never fails us so long as we protect it against the American people. Last year over 6,000 horses were imported from the United States and paid over $100,000 duty to get into our market.

Mr. MILLER. Was not a large number of these horses the property of immigrants coming to Canada which as settlers' effects would pay no duty?

Mr. SPROULE. No, these are horses on which duty was paid, the settlers' effects are not included in this list. Remove that duty and will there not be much greater competition with the Canadian farmers? Our Canadians are buying horses all over our country, and are paying enormous prices. I saw $200 paid for one horse the day I was home, $255 is sometimes paid, and I saw $450 paid for a team. Where were they going? Away to the western provinces to supply our people. The hon. member for South Wellington said that we want to get into New York with these horses. These heavy horses never go to New York ; the only market we have there is for fancy hunters or for driving horses of which we get perhaps one out of 500. The great and important market we have is the home market, and we have shut out from that the cayuses and bronchos that were destroying the horses of our western country. Are we to bring back the conditions we had when they were coming in with impunity? It would be a bad day for the western horse and for the western farmer, a bad day for Ontario and Quebec whose farmers have such a splendid market there. We are told that the Canadian market is of little value to our people, but the Minister of Agriculture told us the other day that the home market is increasing at the rate of $2,000,000 a year and it is already by far the most important we have in point of volume as it is in point of value ; four times as much as there is a surplus to export.

Are they willing to let that market be destroyed? I say keep the home market for the Canadian people and unless we do that we will not be doing what is right. Will this agreement help us? In my judgment it will do us very serious injury. It will break up and injure our present lines of transportation and foreign trade which are interprovincial, which are from east to west. To-day the trade is carried by our own lines of railway and steamer through our own ports and through our own great cities. It will break up that trade and will carry it to the south, to the American market. It will seriously injure the earning power of our railway and transportation companies and of those men who own vessels and who are making a good living out of the carrying trade. They will be seriously struck by this treaty. It will injure as well the Canadian ports and cities through which these goods are carried. It will injure Port Arthur, Fort William, Winnipeg and the ports on the Georgian bay, but it will build up St. Paul, Minneapolis, Duluth and Chicago. Is that the national policy that we should desire, is that the national policy that is good for the Canadian people? It is no more suitable for them to-day than it was in 1879 when we introduced the national policy as being suitable for Canada. We have now an interprovincial trade of vast importance, of great value to the people of Canada, from west to east and from east to west. This will be broken up and our trade will be drawn off by the various lines and branches that tap our country every few miles of a length extending from 2,000 to 4,000 miles. The trade which goes through Ontario, which filters through Quebec and the maritime provinces and passes Halifax and St. John on its way to England, will go through the United States by way of Chicago, Boston, Portland, New York, and Canada must inevitably suffer on account of being deprived of the interprovincial trade and the transportation which she now enjoys and which will be taken away from her if this agreement is carried out. It will divert trade from the great cities and towns of Canada to the great cities and towns of the United States. Winnipeg is one of the largest cities in Canada to-day in her population, wealth and enterprise. What will she be in future years? It is true that she will go on developing but not at the same rapid rate as she has been developing of late years. It will be a serious blow to her if that law goes into force, because the wheat that is shipped through Winnipeg and inspected there will be turned from that route, and sent down across the boundary line, not touching Winnipeg at all. It will not reach the terminal elevators and the complaint of the western farmers that the terminal elevators do them an injustice by mixing their grain will be very largely removed because their grain will go to the western states and find a market at Duluth, Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Superior, instead of Toronto, Montreal and the maritime provinces. That will be the result, and therefore it will do them a great deal of harm. It will Americanize our trade and commerce. Two thousand commercial travellers go out every week from Winnipeg away through the western country with their samples to take orders for the products of our country and England that are distributed through the wholesale houses of Winnipeg to that western country. One hundred million dollars worth of goods are distributed every year through the wholesale houses of Winnipeg to the wholesale and retail stores of the west extending from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean. Those goods are distributed on account of the orders taken by the 2,000 commercial travellers. What will happen to them? They will be supplemented by from 2,000 to 4,000 American travellers from Chicago, St. Paul and Minneapolis, selling American meat, American cured beef, fresh beef from Chicago and Kansas City, and other goods from the United States. They will become serious competitors of these commercial men.

But, this agreement will do more than that. I say it will Americanize the commerce of our country. We have many Americans in the west who are accustomed to the products of their own country and they will buy them in preference to ours because they know them better. They will establish a demand for them, and these commercial men will get their orders. These orders will not be sent to the Winnipeg whosale houses but to the wholesale houses of Chicago, Duluth and Minneapolis, to the detriment of our great Canadian cities, especially to the detriment of Winnipeg and to the benefit of the American cities. It will Americanize our trade, it will Americanize our people in social, commercial and industrial life, to the disadvantage of our people, and it will result in injuring the great towns and cities of Canada and building up the great towns and cities of the United States. I said that it would Americanize our commerce, and the social life of our people. The dominating influence of 95,000,000 of people over 8,000,000 of people will soon do more; it will assimilate, absorb, take up and cause us to lose our imperial and British identity, and we will be practically assimilated by the United States. If you have in one school 95 children belonging to one nation and 9 to 12 of another nation, in a few years you will see the greater dominating the lesser and the greater absorbing the lesser. Will not the ideas of the greater overcome the ideas of the lesser? And will that not produce a change in the social, intellectual and commercial habits of the lesser number? Would that not happen in this case? Most assuredly it would, the same as it would in the case of the school children. We will have 95 millions of people overshadowing, overtowering and dominating the seven or eight million people that we have. It will Americanize them, it will wean them away from their British allegiance, it will wean them away from their loyalty to the mother country, and it will pave the way for unrestricted reciprocity and annexation. That is the goal that many of those who are advocating this treaty are aiming at to-day. That is the goal they desire, that is the goal that many of them would have us reach. I fear very much, Mr. Speaker, that is what will come to pass, if in our fatuity, the parliament of Canada should sanction this reciprocal trade arrangement.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

Bill (No. 45) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.—Mr. Ecrément.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Pacific and Peace Railway Company.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill (No. 115) to incorporate the Guardian Accident and Guarantee Company.—Mr. Doherty.

Bill (No. 77) respecting the National Indemnity Company, and to change its name to National Guarantee and Accident Company.—Mr. Wilson (Laval). (Title changed to 'The Merchants and Employer's Guarantee and Accident Company).

THE HUDSON BAY MORTGAGE CORPORATION.

House in committee on Bill (No. 56) to incorporate the Hudson Bay Mortgage Corporation.—Mr. Knowles.

On section 31,

Mr. PUGSLEY. It strikes me that this section is rather extraordinary. It seems to make a special provision for removing doubts that might arise as to certain questions between the company and its shareholders, and it provides that if the doubts which the company had were not unreasonable, even though the decision might be in favour of the shareholders, the cost of the proceedings should be a lien on the stock. I have never seen such a provision in a special charter before. I think that might very well be left to the ordinary provisions of the law with regard to trust matters. I would invite the attention of the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill to this section.

Mr. McCRANEY. The section to which the hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley) refers was discussed in the Banking and Commerce Committee, but not with respect to the particular point that he mentions. The Bill, I understand, is modelled upon that of the Northern Mortgage Company which was passed last session. I understand that a similar section is in the Great West Permanent Company's Act also.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Of course, if there is precedent for it, one must have due respect to that fact. But let me read the section:

34. Whenever the directors shall entertain reasonable doubts as to the legality of any claim to or upon such shares, bonds, debentures, obligations, dividends or coupons, or the proceeds thereof, then and in such case the directors may file in any court of competent jurisdiction in the province in which the head office of the company is situated, a petition stating such doubts, and praying for an order or judgment adjudicating and awarding the said shares, bonds, debentures, obligations, dividends, coupons, or proceeds to the parties legally entitled thereto, and such court shall have authority to restrain any action, suit or proceedings against the company, and the directors and officers thereof for the same subject matter, pending the determination of the petition; and the company and the directors and officers thereof shall be fully protected and indemnified by obedience to such order or judgment against all actions, suits, claims, and demands in respect of the matters which have been in question in such petition, and the proceedings thereupon, provided that if the court adjudges that such doubts were reasonable, the costs, charges and expenses of the company, in and about such petition and proceedings, shall form a lien upon such shares, bonds, debentures, obligations, dividends, coupons or proceeds, and shall be paid to the company before the directors shall be obliged to transfer, or assent to the transfer of, or to pay such shares, bonds, debentures, obligations, dividends, coupons or proceeds to the parties found entitled thereto.

It strikes me that that is a most unusual enactment. It means that if the directors have any doubts as to whether a shareholder is entitled to shares or a depositor to certain moneys, those directors may file a petition, and, if the court holds that their doubts were reasonable, even though the party wins the suit and is awarded the property in question, he may still be made liable for the costs. As I say, it is a very unusual proceeding, but there is precedent for it, and when this Bill passes there will be still another precedent.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House again in Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I had pointed out to the House the probability that if we established closer relations with the United States in commerce, in social, professional and official life, the tendency would be for the larger nation to dominate the smaller, for the 95,000,000 of the United States to influence the 8,000,000 people of Canada, so that we would become more like them and lose our own identity. I had also dwelt on the injury likely to be inflicted on the farmers of Canada by giving access to the Canadian market to the stockraisers of the United States. I had pointed out that it will injure the meat-raising industries of the country as it did in 1885 to 1890. It will also injure them in another way.

By the importation from the western country into Ontario and Quebec of the grain necessary to keep our millers going we have more food supply for our cattle and hogs down here. We have 300 flour mills going in Ontario and the upper portion of Quebec that are supplied with a large portion of the grain they grind from the west every year, and the stock feeders of Ontario and Quebec will use up all the offal, the bran, shorts and coarse flour. They bring thousands of cars of this feed from these western provinces in addition to that produced down here. Will we have the same system that we have now when that grain goes across to the American market? We are not likely to have it. If the grain of the west is ground in the mills of Minneapolis and St. Paul the offal will not be brought to Canada, and the Canadian farmer and feeder who requires it so much for the growing and fattening of his stock will be deprived of it. It is another source of supply that will be taken from him; it is another handicap that will be placed upon him in carrying on this operation out of which he makes money. It will very seriously injure him, as well as injure the millers of the country. These 300 mills are obliged to get grain from the west to keep their mills running for about six months in the year. I know something of the business, because I was in it for a short time some years ago, and I found that we were obliged to import from the west sufficient grain to keep our mills running for nine months in the year. Of late years we have been growing more grain in Ontario, and perhaps it is only necessary to bring down grain enough to keep them running for six months in the year. But the flour that seems the most saleable, the strong bakers' flour, is made from the hard wheat of the west and the soft wheat of Ontario mixed in equal quantities. Therefore, the Ontario and Quebec miller requires that western wheat to make the quality of flour that the Ontario people desire to have, and they require to get it to keep their mills running as well. They have a large amount of wealth invested in these plants, and unless their mills are running fairly up to their capacity they stand to be seriously injured. The harder you make it for them to get that grain from the west and the more grain that goes to Chicago, St. Paul and Minneapolis the more difficult it will be for them to meet the supply down here, and the less there will be of offal from the grinding of that grain to supply the farmers of this country. In that way it will seriously injure our country. I am speaking especially of Ontario, the conditions of which I know something about. If this arrangement is carried out it will strike a very serious blow at the interests of the millers, as well as the stock breeders and farmers.

Then, it will injure the stock raisers generally by a serious reduction in the amount of feed that they will be able to get. But it will injure them in another way. If you make it possible for cattle, sheep and horses to be transported across the line free of duty, what will be the result? With a plentiful supply of corn in the west there is a great demand for our young cattle for the purpose of feeding them there. Why? Because if they have a large supply of feed and they are short in their supply of cattle, our young cattle will be purchased in the northwest and in other provinces at the very time when the farmers should begin to feed them, and when they should become most profitable to them, they will be sold on the farm, because of the higher price which will be offered for them, and it will be as it was a few years ago, when we had the freedom of that market for our young cattle. Our young cattle were bought up by thousands, taken over to the United States and fattened by these western people, because they had a plentiful corn crop with which to feed them. In a few years, I believe we will have a great shortage, and I am afraid that instead of the Canadian farmer finishing his product upon his own farm and returning the required nourishment to the soil the young cattle will be taken away, the farms will be impoverished and our farmers will be going around during a portion of the year doing very little on account of it.

We are told that this is going to be a most valuable thing for the farmers of the northwest. The hon. Minister of Finance said: Look at the large deputation we had down from that country, and what were their wants? One of the great wants was the freedom of the American market in order to enable them to sell their cattle and grain. It may be a very attractive prospect to the western farmer to-day to get a few cents more a bushel for his grain for a short time, or a few dollars a head more for his cattle, but I say that in doing that he is sowing the wind and is bound to reap the whirlwind. The system of farming —if I may say so, and I think I know something about farming—that they carry on in the country to-day is not the best kind of farming for the progress of the country, or for the future. What is their system of farming to-day? Having broken up some virgin soil on the prairie, rich, strong and fruitful, they go upon the land in the spring of the year, put in their crop, allow it to remain for a few months, harvest it, thresh it, put their grain into the elevator, and get their elevator receipts. It is all done in a few months in the year, commencing about March or April and ending about the following September or October. What does the farmer do after that? He does a little ploughing in the fall, but he has got the full return of a year's labour by working only a few months and that suits him very well, because human nature is always ready, in a few months, to take the wage of a year's work if circumstances will permit. You have the full return of a year's work in a few months when you get your warehouse receipts. Having obtained their warehouse receipts, what do they do? Three or four farmers will employ one man to stay on the homesteads and look after the stock of all of them while these farmers come down to Ontario and the east and go around visiting in the country until next spring. This is inculcating, not industrious habits, but indolent and unthrifty habits, because these men are away from their farms. When a farmer leaves the farm generally everything is going to the bad. He should be on his farm in winter as well as in summer. He should be carrying on mixed farming, he should have enough stock to keep the boys employed in the winter time feeding the coarse grains from his own farm that he has in such plentiful supply and return to the soil by that system the nourishment which it needs instead of the system of farming which is carried on now. He is impoverishing that rich virgin soil, with the result that it will yield him less every year. It will bring him to the same condition as that which is found in the States, where they have carried on the same kind of farming until to-day they are receiving a return of only eight or ten bushels to the acre, whereas it ought to be 25, 30, 35, or 40, as we find it in Ontario to-day. Is that healthy farming? It may please the western farmer to get the returns from what ought to be a year's labour in a few months. But that is not the kind of farming that will pay in the future. It reminds me of what an old Scotch woman said to her boys who were rather given to running around all winter and doing nothing. She said in my presence: It is all right for you to have a good time now, and it will be very well if there is no hereafter, but if there is you will have a fearful reckoning.

A day of fearful reckoning will come, but I fear it will be when the land is impoverished and the soil no longer able to continue giving the large crops it yielded when first brought under cultivation. The system of farming now pursued will not ensure to their benefit and it will do incalculable damage to the land. They should remain on the farms during winter, feed and grow the animals on the soil just as the Ontario farmer does, instead of denuding the land of its fertility. The Ontario farmer has learned by experience that it requires a different system of farming from that to bring him a suitable return, and no doubt the time will come when the western farmers will see the errors of their present system. This reciprocity agreement will tend to build up the cities of the United States and to impoverish Canadian cities. Our lake port towns on Lake Superior, at the Sault, on the Georgian bay, instead of being on the great highway of commerce as they are to-day, will be side-tracked, and the trade of the country will go by them instead of through them. This reciprocity arrangement will decrease the business of the railways which is looked to to pay the dividends to the stockholders. Winnipeg, Port Arthur, Fort William, Collingwood, Owen Sound, Meaford, Midland, Sarnia, will, if this reciprocity arrangement is passed be seriously injured—and when you injure these towns you injure the surrounding country—and the United States cities like Detroit, Chicago, Superior, Minneapolis, St. Paul, will improve just in proportion as our Canadian towns deteriorate. This arrangement will give the fruit raisers and garden vegetable producers a bad blow, and in this industry to-day in Canada an immense amount of money is invested and a great number of people employed in its pursuit. The fruit growers of British Columbia and Ontario have with no uncertain voice told the Prime Minister the injury that will be done to their industry if this arrangement is sanctioned, but the government turned a deaf ear to them, and the Prime Minister told them they had come too late. Surely it is never too late to mend ; surely until the die is finally cast it is not too late to retrieve this step which is calculated to do so much injury to our country. Then, the lumbermen have said that it will injure their business and they ought to be the best judges of that. The fine lumber for which the Americans receive a good price will be consumed in the American market and the coarse lumber will be thrown into Canada, to the detriment of the Canadian lumbermen in Ontario, British Columbia, Quebec, and the maritime provinces. This reciprocal trade arrangement will give the American manufacturer access to the natural resources of Canada, and a greater supply of raw material to keep their factories running and employ labour on the American side. The other day we were told by the Finance Minister that the Americans would have no more advantages under this arrangement, in the future than they have had in the past, but listen to what President Taft said in his message to Congress :

We have on the north of us a country contiguous to us for 3,000 miles with its natural resources of the same character as ours which have not been drawn upon as ours have been, and in the development of which the conditions as to wages and character of wage earners and transportation to market, differ but little from those prevailing with us. The difference is not greater than between different states of our own country or between different provinces of the Dominion of Canada. Ought we not then to arrange a commercial agreement with Canada if we can by which we shall have direct access to our great supply of natural products without an obstructing or prohibitory tariff.

And yet in the face of such language from President Taft the Minister of Finance tells us that this reciprocity agreement will give the Americans no better advantages than heretofore in the rich inheritance of our forests and other natural resources. President Taft continues :

Ought we not now, therefore, before their policy has become too crystallized and fixed for a change, meet them in a spirit of real concession, facilitate commerce between the two countries and thus greatly increase the natural resources available to our people?

That is what Taft says, and that is what he hopes to gain, and now will the Minister of Finance pretend that the arrangement will not give the Americans access to our forest wealth? President Taft further says :

The currents of business and the transportation facilities that will be established forward and back across the border cannot but enure to the benefit of the boundary states.

Mark that language well. And just in proportion as this inures to the benefit of the boundary states, to a like extent it will injure Canadian cities, towns and provinces. President Taft goes on:

Some readjustments may be needed, but in a very short period the advantage of the free commercial exchange between communities separated only by short distances will strikingly manifest itself. That the broadening of the sources of food supplies, that the opening of the timber resources of the Dominion to our needs, that the addition to the supply of raw materials, will be limited to no particular section does not require demonstration.

If it does not require any demonstration on his part, it ought to suggest to us the danger that we encounter if we adopt this proposed treaty. What will it do ? It will give the raw materials of our country to keep labour employed in the United States. What will it do more than that ? We are told by one of their most eminent men, that because of the obstructions at the boundary line, $350,000,000 of United States capital have been invested in Canada during the last few years, to establish in this country branches of American factories, because they could not otherwise get access to the markets of Canada. That meant the employment of our mechanics and artisans and an immense increase in the wealth of our country. The same man said: We need to do something to stop that great influx of capital from our country into Canada. Do we, in Canada, want to stop that ? I say we do not. This measure will make ultimately for commercial union with the United States. It will weaken the tie that binds us to the mother country. Some say that it will not affect us one iota. On that point let me quote one or two American writers and speakers. President Taft's speech in Columbus, Ohio, elaborated as follows:

The greatest reason for adopting this agreement is the fact that it is going to unite two countries with kindred people and lying together across a wide continent in a commercial and social union, to the great advantage of both.

How long afterwards will they be kept apart politically? I say that commercial and social union inevitably ripens into something more—ultimately into political union. Then, I take Mr. Wilson, the United States Secretary of Agriculture. He is equally frank as in his addressed letters to the farmers of the republic, he assures them that:

> The removal of the duties on Canadian products will do them no harm, and that the great feature of the compact is that under it our relations with Canada will be more intimate and we will become more and more one people.

One people commercially, one people socially, one people politically, if that is not leading us away from our ties of loyalty to the mother country, I do not know what English language means. The Detroit 'Free Press' says:

> That the principal merit of the agreement is political and social. It will, it is hoped, and confidently expected, be the beginning of the end of the stupid separation of two halves of a continent which is inhabited by substantially one people.

If I know what the English language means, I say that there is but one interpretation to be placed on this, and it is that it means ultimate political union. Then, the 'Free Press' of Milwaukee, says:

> The terms of the agreement will be viewed by some people from the standpoint of the pocket book, but the man of larger vision will regard it not only in the light of its present effect but in the light of its future fruitage. Thus viewed, a reciprocity agreement with Canada assumes a significance far transcending even its great promise of benefaction to the living people of these neighbouring nations.

It means a union of the two countries in the future. I said that it will tend inevitably to weaken the tie that binds us to the mother country. I have here a speech made by Mr. Austen Chamberlain, at Birmingham, a short time ago, and I wish to quote from it briefly, to show how the subject is viewed over there. To my mind, he has voiced the situation very correctly. He says:

> What is going to be the effect upon the trade of our city of such an arrangement as this? I cannot doubt that it will be serious. I cannot doubt that, whilst depriving us of advantages which Canadian imperial patriotism has hitherto afforded us, whilst depriving us of those, it will expose us to a new and an additional and a more eager competition from the United States of America. In the first place, the purchase from Canada of its grain and raw material, creating a new trade route, will bring back the trade route a stream of manufactured articles; and I cannot help saying that, as I think of this agreement, I come more and more to the conclusion that the American policy of conservation of its natural resources is turning into a policy for the exploitation by American capitalists and American manufacturers of the national resources of Canada. It must increase enormously the competitive power of America in the world's trade, and its export power as well as its domestic production. And as its new ties become more firmly established, as new interests grow up under them, I feel that the independent national growth of Canada, within the British Empire, will be seriously menaced by the overwhelming strength and the overwhelming wealth of its great neighbour. As the years roll by, as the north and south trade develops, as the transport interests become greater and ever greater, the hold of the American upon the Canadian market will become closer; his grip upon Canada will be firmer, and the national development in which we all rejoice, the material development to which we have looked forward, will be hampered, if it be not jeopardized, by the growing competition of continental ties.

I take up the speech of Mr. Asquith when answering in the English House of Commons the speech of Mr. Balfour, and in that speech we find illustrated the callous indifference of our government to the great policy of inter-imperial preferential trade to which we ought to look forward knowing what it would do for us. What does Mr. Asquith say:

> I come to the main point in the debate. The charge against the government is that during all these years the Dominion has been knocking at our door, that we have turned a deaf ear to her appeal, and that the first-fruits of our indifference and neglect are to be found in this agreement between Canada and the United States of America, which the leader of the opposition tells us, if ratified, will be a disaster to the empire. Well, but have they been knocking at our door? What do they themselves say? Sir W. Laurier, speaking at Nelson on August 30 last, said: 'It is not the policy of the Canadian government to ask Great Britain to change her fiscal policy one iota. (Ministerial cheers.) We make our arrangements to suit our own interests, and so it is with Great Britain.'

Mr. Asquith gave that statement of our Prime Minister as an answer to the contention of the leader of the opposition in the British House of Commons that Canada had been knocking at its door for imperial preferential trade, that she had been knocking in vain and was now about to make a tie which would alienate her affections from the mother country and seriously cripple every chance of bringing about that inter-imperial trade. Am I not justified therefore, in saying that this proposed reciprocal arrangement with the United States will operate to our disadvantage? It will give American manufacturers command of the timber resources of Canada, it will give them a greater supply of raw material to keep their own establishments going, it will give employment to labour in the United States and deprive Canadians of that labour in their own country, and will make undoubtedly for commercial union. In every way it will operate to our disadvantage. It will weaken the ties that bind us to the mother country. In the face of all these facts, why should this scheme be forced on the Canadian people against their will and desire? What is impelling the government to take this course? They say they do not desire to make this a political issue. Neither do the opposition. We have endeavoured to keep this question as much as possible out of the arena of party politics, and have it discussed solely on its merits. On every side we have protests against it. The boards of trade in Toronto and Montreal, Halifax, Vancouver, Winnipeg and a dozen other towns and cities have pronounced against it in the strongest possible language. The most eminent and influential men in the public life of this country have declared against it in the most unmistakable terms. The great financial magnates of this country, our professional men, our great manufacturers, our railway and transportation interests, our agricultural interests—all these have come out most emphatically in opposition to this policy yet it is being forced on the country all the same. Why force it through this parliament? Why not submit the question to the people before the die is cast, and it is too late to retreat? I challenge the government to do that, and will be willing to abide by the decision of the people and offer no more objection.

Canada values her own interests very highly and desires to have that commercial freedom in the future which she enjoys at present. Canada is now enjoying a prosperity she has not had for years. Her products are abundant, her granaries are overflowing, she has profitable markets for all she has to sell at home as well as outside. Canada produces nothing which she cannot now dispose of readily at remunerative prices, her people are happily employed, and are being paid good wages and what more can she want? Our railways and other transportation companies are taxed to the utmost to carry on the commerce of our country and are earning large dividends from year to year; our banks are overflowing; our factories are unable to cope with the orders they receive and are obliged to enlarge their premises from year to year, and we have others being established in order to supply the great demand which exists at remunerative prices in our own market. Why then should the government carry on this flirtation with Miss Jonathan? We are making money in every line, we are rapidly becoming rich, and our people are strong and vigorous in their physical manhood and national life. Why then continue that flirtation with Miss Jonathan? Our Finance Minister seems to have become infatuated with her appearance. Her attractiveness has captured his fancy and he seems disposed to carry on that flirtation and lead us into an alliance from which there will be no escape. He is today in the garden of Eden enjoying all the luxuries which the finances of this Dominion can procure, he is now revelling in the milk and honey of political life, but if he persists in carrying on this flirtation, until it results in the fruition he desires, he will find himself in the position of that Irishman who was advised to go and get married. This man was employed as a gardener by a lady who owned a beautiful place and was much pleased with the manner in which he cared for her garden. Why, said she, you are a fine gardener, and I have kept you many years at good wages, but although you earn good wages and at the entrance to those grounds there is a commodious house to occupy if you only get married, I think it is your duty, under the circumstances, to get married, and I have told you often that my desire is that you should do so. You are here very much as Adam was in the garden of Eden. When the Almighty put Adam in that garden to till the soil, he saw that it was not well for man to live alone and he got him a helpmate. Do you not think that you should also get a helpmate? Did you not go to school when a boy and did you not hear the story of Adam? The Irishman replied: Faix, ma'am I did hear that well. Don't you think Adam was no better gardener than you, and had no better place? Don't you think that you should go and do likewise? Faix, ma'am, I remember it very well, and I remember he didn't hould his job long after he got her, but the Lord turned him out to wander up and down upon the earth. So it will be with the Finance Minister, if this comely face and attractive form and immense wealth win him away from the trust given him by the people of Canada. He may make this matrimonial engagement, but it will be with him as the Irishman said of Adam in the garden—not long after he will lose his job and will be turned out to wander up and down upon the earth.

What does Canada want to-day? Canada enjoys freedom and desires to have that freedom continued. Canada desires to be left alone; she does not wish to be a slave to either man or nation. She desires to have the full benefit of her own country and the bountiful resources with which nature has provided here from the sustenance of man and beast. She desires to be left alone to work out her own problems and her own destiny and to develop her national, commercial and financial life as she has been doing. This is the desire of Canada and her sons of whom Robert Reid, the poet of Canada has said:

Sing me a song of the great Dominion;
Soul felt words for a patriot's ear;
Ring out boldly the well turned measure
Voicing your notes that the world may hear;
Here is no stravelling—Heaven forsaken—
Shrinking aside where the nations throng;
Proud as the proudest she moves among them—
Worthy is she of a noble song.
Sing me the worth of each Canadian—
Roamer in wilderness, toiler in town—
Search earth over you will find none stauncher,
Whether his hands be white or brown;
Come of a right good stock to start with,
Best of the world's blood in each vein;
Lords of ourselves, and slaves to no one,
For us or from us, you'll find we're—men.

And Canada desires, with her men, to be left alone to work out that destiny that she has been working out so bravely for the years of the past. And if the present government do not allow her to go on in her own way with her own development, there will come a fearful day of reckoning for them as soon as the Canadian people have an opportunity to speak their mind upon this question.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). Mr. Chairman, I shall crave the indulgence of the committee for a short time to express to the House and the country the arguments that offer themselves to me in favour of the policy wisely pursued by this government and cheerfully held by the best elements of this country of ours. I hope that in the few remarks I intend to make I shall approach this subject dispassionately. It is one of those issues of national importance which naturally should bar out any party spirit and any dissonant accents; because, Mr. Chairman, speaking of reciprocity of trade between Canada and the United States of America can only mean discussing the development, the progress, the ultimate grandeur of both countries.

I have listened, as I listen always, with great interest and great attention to my old and genial friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). I paid careful attention to his tale of woe. When I refer to my hon. friend as an old friend, I only mean that he is one of the old members of the House of Commons. It is one of the privileges of old age to become at times sentimental, reminiscent and even witty. My hon. friend in his tale of woe, has interspersed that tale with reminiscences of the past, with a little sentiment expressed at times in poetical quotation, and with a few witticisms, from the south of Ireland I suppose. In the closing sentences, and even at the beginning of his speech, he stated in a very manly way—forgetting the immediate past—that this Canada of ours had good markets, had good times, and that we should let this country work out its own destiny. Without discussing all the points raised by my hon. friend in his very interesting, very witty and very sentimental speech, let me tell him that I take issue with him on this point. Granted that we have good times, but our policy is to have better times; granted that we have good markets, which we of the Liberal party have created during the past 14 years; but we want better markets. And so, while accepting what my hon. friend said, I will put it this way: Let Canada, with better times and better markets, work out its own destiny under the aegis of the British Crown. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is full of fears as to the future of this young country, I am full of hope as to the future of this country of ours. And as he has quoted a little poetry let me remind him of the beautiful words of Tennyson, the great poet laureate, in speaking of the grandeur of England, and of the still greater hopes of that country:

We sailed wherever ships can sail,
We founded many a mighty state;
Pray God our greatness may not fail
Thro' craven fear of being great!

And I must say at once, that this can be addressed as much to myself as to my hon. friend. Sentiment, however, is a sorry substitute for sound argument. I am reminded of this old English truism by the fact that my hon. friend in his many reminiscences, in his sentimental moods, whilst unbiassed by party politics, as he stated from the beginning, paid his compliments to the old National Policy. I do not blame my hon. friend, he was a faithful supporter of the old chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald. But has he forgotten that when Sir John A. Macdonald introduced in 1879 the National Policy before this parliament, he inserted a clause in the statute, whereby a reciprocal offer was made to the United States of America? The reciprocity offer did not work, and we remained with the high protective wall raised by the Conservative party in 1879 until 1896. What is the tale of woe of that policy adopted in 1879? I say that sentiment is a sorry substitute for sound facts and sound arguments. It is rather remarkable that I should lecture, if he will allow me, my old friend from East Grey, and tell him, I, a Frenchman, that I have more faith in facts and figures than in poetry, when discussing a financial question. What did the National Policy do during the 18 years of office of the Conservative party? Under the National Policy, from 1879 until 1884, the rate of increase of exports of Canadian produce was 17 per cent; from 1884 to 1889, 7 per cent; from 1889 to 1896, 29 per cent: and from 1896 to 1901 during our tenure of office, 78 per cent. The aggregate foreign trade of Canada increased under the National Policy, from 1878 to 1884, at the rate of 20 per cent, a good start; but from 1884 to 1890, it increased 5 per cent, a decrease of 15 per cent; from 1890 to 1896, 9 per cent, a slight increase; but under the Liberal policy from 1896 to 1902, it increased 77 per cent. You have there the record of both parties in each their fiscal policy.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. minister give the figures from 1902 to 1910?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have not these figures at hand, but they can be given to my hon. friend, I am sure, during the course of this debate. My hon. friend will understand from the position he occupies in the ranks of his party, that we, on this side of the House, I, at all events, do not object to his criticism of the measure, which is now engaging the attention of the House. The opposition is a necessary part of the machinery of constitutional government. The opposition is bound to watch the affairs of the country, the conduct of the government, the conduct of public business. The opposition, under our constitutional government, is bound to criticise, and it is in the interests of the country that it should criticise. It must find fault with the government. That is the chief occupation of my hon. friend, and I do not blame him for that. I was myself born in opposition. I wished, when I was elected for the first time to the House of Commons, that I had sat a few years where my hon. friend now graces the seat he occupies. But let me remind my hon. friends that our fiscal policy, as this reciprocity agreement with the United States, has always been unjustly criticised by the hon. gentlemen opposite. If they had been satisfied with criticism, I would not object, but they fall into that very bad habit of making predictions. There is no worse thing in public life, than adding a prediction to a criticism. Might I remind my hon. friend of the speech, the very remarkable speech, he made in this House some 10 or 12 years ago, when I was still a young man, when the Yukon railway project was brought before parliament? I never heard such a prediction as the one formulated that fateful afternoon by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). Does he not remember describing Mackenzie & Mann reaping every year in the wilds of the Yukon territory, crops after crops of gold as a result of the arrangement they had made with the Canadian government? If I remind my hon. friend of the predictions he made at that time, it is only to emphasize this fact, that on all great issues, whilst it is the duty of the opposition to criticise and find fault with the policy of the government, in order to enlighten the minds of the country and to give a little courage to the Conservative party in the country, yet, Sir, the opposition should not venture to predict and to prophesy, because it becomes a very bad piece of business when facts come a few months afterwards to defeat the arguments propounded by the prophets. Speaking only of our fiscal policy, which, in the words of my hon. friend a moment ago, is a monument to this Liberal government, because as he described the condition of affairs in this country, we have good times, we have good markets, and Canada should proceed to work out its own destiny. Does not my hon. friend remember the words spoken by the honoured leader of the opposition when the British preference was introduced in this House by the present Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)? Does he not remember the words spoken by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the financial critic of the opposition? I shall not refer to the old Cumberland war horse, to that great Canadian statesman, Sir Charles Tupper, when he said in the House:

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while honourable members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal 'Gazette,' where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

These are the words, this was the prediction, made by the leader of the Conservative party in 1897, when the British preferential arrangement was proposed to this House. But, what said the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), then member for either Kings or York? He said:

> Is it right, is it fair, is it statesmanlike to allow this young and growing industrial life and development to be hampered and shackled, if not totally destroyed by invoking a competition on the basis of a reduction of duty to the extent of .25 per cent in favour of these countries that may come if the standard is as I have said and we have not a word to the contrary from the government.

The hon. member for Kings then, now for North Toronto, was prophesying that the industries of this young country would be hampered and shackled if that British preference came into existence. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), then one of the young members of the House—we were elected the same year—in 1896, discussing the same measure, said:

What is this noble contribution of 25 per cent—— to British trade and British industries.

—the noble contribution is this that the hon. gentlemen opposite, without taking the trouble, in an important matter of this kind, to ascertain whether they were right or wrong, have seen fit to take a step which can, to my mind, have only one of two results: either it is bound to bring this country into direct conflict with the mother country on this point, or else it is bound to bring the mother country into direct conflict with Germany. One or the other of these results may follow.

We were declaring war on the industries of Great Britain, we were hampering and shackling Canadian industries, we were creating a scare—yes, 13 or 14 years ago we were anticipating the scare of last year—we were creating a real scare between Great Britain and Germany because forsooth we were giving a British preference of 25 per cent. This emphasizes the fact that it is very dangerous to make predictions.

Now, let us come to the arguments which are invoked in favour of this measure. First of all let us rise to the height of the question, let us rise to the height of Canada, let us not belittle our country, let us trust ourselves in this bargain with the United States. Sir, the wealth of Canada baffles all description. Our resources are enormous, are unbounded, our development during the last fifteen years—I maintain the expression fifteen years, which I used at the manufacturers' banquet, because I want to give just a little slice of these good times to my hon. friends opposite—our development during the last fifteen years has been unprecedented. To make a short inventory of the resources of Canada, let me say that it is a country as big as Europe 111,000 square miles, larger than the United States, it could absorb the United States, the United States materially could not absorb Canada; it is a country thirty times as large as the United Kingdom, eighteen times as large as Germany, extending over 40 parallels of latitude, with resources the like of which are not known in any other country in this wide world; we have the greatest timber resources in the world, 550,000,000 feet of standing timber; wheat fields 600 miles wide, 1,000 miles long, waiting ready for the plough, not less than 190,000,000 acres of wheat land; we have 12,500 miles of coast fisheries, 250 miles of which are in the beautiful county of Gaspé; we have 440,000 miles of fresh water fisheries; in coal alone, according to the statistics of the Department of the Interior, 172,000,000,000 tons; in gold we have produced the worth of $260,000,000; in silver we occupy third place in the world; in nickel we have three-fifths of the world's supply; in 1901, of pig iron we produced 160,000,000 tons, in 1904, 509,000,000 tons; we have estimated water-powers available to the extent of 25,000,000 horse-power. Sir, I think it will not appear ludicrous if I give this short inventory of the resources of our country.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition the other day concluded his speech by saying that his motto was: Let well enough alone. I say that with such collossal natural resources, with such a heritage, and with such a future, we can well afford to say: Not let well enough alone, but let us open wide the gates of our country, let us not be afraid to bargain and to trade with our neighbours.

Thanks to a wise immigration policy, our great west is filling rapidly with the best elements of the white people of this world. Not to speak of the two old races in Canada, the English and the French—and when I mention the English, I wish to include my friends from Ireland, from Scotland, from Wales, and I hope that the flag shall wave on St. David's day—not to speak of the last two races which I claim come from the best stock in the world, I say that we have a good element in the other races that are filling up rapidly our virgin soil in the far west. Therefore, Sir, we should not be afraid with such a population, ever and ever increasing, to trade with the United States of America. Not speaking of my own countrymen, but of the English race in Canada, it is the descendants of that hardy race which, in the last two or three hundred years, has conquered all the best markets in the world. Great Britain is not afraid to trade east and west, north and south, not afraid to trade with the United States, not afraid to trade with the Latin republics, not afraid to compete with Germany, with her high tariff wall, not afraid to compete her colonies with those nations which are slowly conquering the deepest recesses of the wild continents of the earth.

Great Britain, that nation of shop-keepers as it was so aptly described by Napoleon Bonaparte; Great Britain by trading with the whole world, by leaving her doors open to all comers has not lost her autonomy. The British race is still the hardy race it was 300 years ago, and I believe that for centuries to come it will continue to lead the world. Canada is looking for markets for her enormous surplus products. We are subsidizing steamship lines east and west and north and south; we are bonusing the construction of railways; we are establishing commercial agencies in the United States, in France, in Belgium, in Germany, in Italy, in Japan, in Australia, in China, and in Africa. At Durban in Natal I was met by a young Canadian from Ontario who represents there the commercial interests of the Dominion. We have an agent at Cape Town, and I trust the government will soon have an agency in British South Africa—a colony founded only yesterday but which already under the governorship of Sir Percy Girouard a French Canadian is producing enormous quantities of cotton and coffee and tea, and will be able to buy and consume in large quantity the products of Canada. And, if we are subsidizing steamship lines, and bonusing the construction of railways, and appointing commercial agents in the four corners of the earth, why should we refuse an invitation to trade with the United States ; an invitation which by the way came this time from Washington to Ottawa, and did not go from Ottawa to Washington. Why in the name of common sense should we refuse to develop our commerce with the 95,000,000 of neighbours to the south of us, the greatest consuming people in the world?

The policy of reciprocity with the United States is not new. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is an old parliamentarian, and having read the history of our commercial ventures he knows full well that ever since the fight for responsible government in Canada the question of a reciprocity agreement with the United States has always been the first article in the programme of both political parties. Let me recite briefly the circumstances under which the first reciprocity treaty was negotiated. And my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) having given what I think to be a biased recital, may I be permitted to give my version of the history of trade negotiations between the United States and Canada for the last 50 years. We know that when Lord Elgin came as Governor General in 1847, it was just one year after the repeal of the corn laws in England ; laws under which Canada in a degree benefited by a preferential tariff in the mother country. If the corn laws were not completely repealed in 1847 it was because Sir Robert Peel had provided a gradual sliding scale which delayed the result for some years. In 1847 when Lord Elgin assumed the governorship of Canada we were fresh from a revolution; discord and discontent were abroad in the land, and in 1849, the Rebellion Losses Bill was passed, and the parliament buildings burned in Montreal, and Lord Elgin stoned in his carriage on his way to Monklands. A few months afterwards when the sliding scale had run its course, and the corn laws were completely abolished, there was in Canada a deep sentiment of distrust in the mother country because forsooth the Canadians of those days thought they were not supported by the mother country as they ought to be. Then was published the annexation manifesto to which memorable document was attached names famous in Canadian history—Sir John Abbott, Sir David Macpherson, Luther Holton, A. A. Dorion, Sir John Rose ; I need not mention others. At this juncture the leading men in both political parties appeared ready to pass under the stars and stripes because, as I said, there was a deep sentiment of distrust caused by the friction in trade relations between Canada and the mother land. It is a notable thing that the only time there ever seemed to be any annexation sentiment in Canada was a time when we were refused the advantages of a reciprocity treaty with the neighbouring republic. Need I remind the House, however, that our predecessors in political life were labouring under a delusion, and that the statesmen of Britain were not averse to a reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States. They had more faith in the loyalty of the Canadians of that day than has my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in the loyalty of his fellow countrymen of to-day. I hold in my hand an historic document which I have obtained from the archives, it being a letter of instructions from Lord Grey to Lord Elgin, Lord Grey was colonial secretary, and writing to Lord Elgin on his assumption of the Governor Generalship of Canada, and within a week of Lord Elgin's departure, under date Downing Street, 31st December, 1846, he said :

> This is an occasion upon which I cannot with propriety enter into any discussion of the grounds upon which this change of policy has been adopted.
> But without doing so I may express my firm conviction that eventually the welfare of the colonies even more than that of the mother country will be promoted by the abandonment of a system of artificial restrictions upon trade. Looking to the great natural advantages possessed by the British colonies, and especially by the fine provinces of North America, I cannot doubt that adopting a policy of which the object is to render industry productive by leaving it to follow its natural channels of employment, and by affording every possible facility to commerce, must lead to their rapid advancement in wealth and prosperity.

So Lord Grey, in his instructions to Lord Elgin, on the very day after the Canadian rebellion, on the very day when the Corn Laws were repealed in England, was advising the Governor General to give to Canada the benefit of a convention with the United States of America, to do away with the artificial barriers existing between those two countries, so as to develop trade and industry, so as to make the colonies of North America prosperous provinces. As a result of the annexation manifesto, Lord Elgin proceeded to Washington and negotiated the famous Elgin-Marcy Treaty, which lasted from 1854 to 1866. What was the effect of that reciprocity between Canada and the United States? Turning to the reports published in those days, I find that the exports of the various provinces to the United States in 1854 amounted to $10,473,000; in 1855, the year following the treaty, they amounted to $19,368,000, and in 1866, the last year of the treaty, they amounted to $39,950,000, so that in 12 years the exports from Canada to the United States increased 280 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member may have overlooked the fact that on account of the depreciation of American currency, the exports seemed to be very much larger than they really were. Greenbacks were standing then at about 58.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. These are the values of the exports in gold.

Mr. SPROULE. American currency was not on a gold basis.

Mr. LEMIEUX. At all events, the men who lived between 1854 and 1866 duly appreciated the vast importance of that treaty. Listen to what Sir Alexander Galt, who was the Minister of Finance, said when that treaty came to an end on the 17th of March, 1866:

If we require to find an example of the benefits of free commercial intercourse, we need not look beyond the effects that have followed from the working of the reciprocity treaty with the United States. In one short year from the time when that treaty came into operation, our trade in the natural productions of the two countries swelled from less than $2,000,000 to upwards of $10,000,000 per annum, and now, when we are threatened with an interruption of that trade—when we have reason to fear that the action of the United States will prove hostile to the continuance of free commercial relations with this country, when we know that the consideration of this question is not grounded on just views of the material advantages resulting to each country, but that the irritation connected with political events exercises a predominant influence over the minds of American statesmen, it is the duty of the House to provide, if possible, other outlets for our productions.

And Sir John Bourinot, who for many years occupied the position of clerk of this House, but who is probably better known as a great historian of Canada, in his sketch of Lord Elgin, described the results of that treaty in the following terms:

Not only was a large and remunerative trade secured between the United States and the provinces but the social and friendly intercourse of the two countries necessarily increased with the expansion of commercial relations and the creation of common interests between them. Old antipathies and misunderstandings disappeared under the influence of conditions which brought these communities together and made each of them place a higher estimate on the other's good qualities.

Sir, I prefer this appreciation of Sir John Bourinot, who was a descendant of a United Empire Loyalist family, to the appreciation given this evening by my hon. and loyal friend from East Grey. I know that my hon. friend is loyal to his country; I know that he has faith in his fellow-countrymen, but I could not help thinking this evening, when he was describing his fear of the effects of this treaty on the social and political conditions of Canada in the future, that my hon. friend was, perhaps, more loyal at times to his political party than to his country. Sir, what was the opinion of Canada respecting the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty in 1866? My hon. friend is speaking of the evil effects of that treaty 40 or 50 years after its abrogation, but the men who lived in those days, the men who were at the head of affairs in this country, who piloted the ship of state, thought otherwise. I hold in my hand a Minute of Council adopted on the 19th of February, 1864. Canada was then under the Union. The meeting of Council was held in Quebec, and there were present the Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau, Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Dorion, Mr. McDougall, Mr. Fergusson Blair, Mr. Holton, Mr. (afterwards Sir Oliver) Mowat, Mr. Letellier de St. Just, Mr. Huntington and Mr. Laframboise—all names of good old Liberals, loyalists and patriots if ever there were loyalists and patriots in this country. This Minute of Council reads as follows:

Certified copy of a report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 19th February, 1864.

The committee of the Executive Council deem it to be their duty to represent to Your Excellency—— —that the recent proceedings in the Congress of the United States respecting the reciprocity treaty have excited the deepest concern in the minds of the people of this province.

Those proceedings have had for their avowed object the abrogation of the treaty at the earliest moment consistent with the stipulation of the instrument itself.

Although no formal action indicative of the strength of the party hostile to the continuance of the treaty has yet taken place, information of an authentic character as to the opinions and purposes of influential public men in the United States has forced upon the committee the conviction that there is imminent danger of its speedy abrogation unless prompt and vigorous steps be taken by Her Majesty's imperial advisers to avert what would be generally regarded by the people of Canada as a great calamity.

The committee would specially bring under Your Excellency's notice the importance of instituting negotiations for the renewal of the treaty with such modifications as may be mutually assented to before the year's notice required to terminate it shall be given by the American government, for they fear that the notice if once given could not be revoked, and they clearly foresee that owing to the variety and possibly the conflictory nature of the interests involved on our own side, a new treaty could not be concluded and the requisite legislation to give effect to it be obtained before the year would have expired and with it the treaty.

Under such circumstances, even with the certain prospect of an early renewal of the treaty, considerable loss and much inconvenience would inevitably ensue.

It would be impossible to express in figures with any approach to accuracy the extent to which the facilities of commercial intercourse created by the reciprocity treaty have contributed to the wealth and prosperity of this province, and it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance which the people of Canada attach to the continued enjoyment of these facilities.

Nor is the subject entirely devoid of political significance, under the beneficent operation of the system of self-government which the later policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada in common with the other colonies possessing representative institutions combined with the advantages secured by the reciprocity treaty of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbour in the natural productions of the two countries, all agitation for organic changes has ceased, all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the province has wholly disappeared although the committee would grossly misrepresent their countrymen if they were to affirm that their loyalty to their Sovereign would be diminished in the slightest degree by the withdrawal, through the unfriendly action of a foreign government of mere commercial privileges however valuable these might be deemed, they think they cannot err in directing the attention of the enlightened statesmen who wield the destinies of the great empire of which it is the proudest boast of Canadians that their country forms a part, to the connection which is usually found to exist between the material prosperity and the political contentment of a people; for in doing so they feel that they are appealing to the highest motives that can actuate patriotic statesmen, the desire to perpetuate a Dominion founded on the affectionate allegiance of a prosperous and contented people.

This is the statement embalmed in a minute of council by the men who represented public opinion, who represented the best interests of Canada, on the eve of the abrogation of the famous reciprocity treaty which lasted from 1854 to 1866. That treaty was abrogated, but I come again to my first proposition, and I say that since its abrogation there have been repeated efforts made by every government, every Minister of Finance in this country, to obtain a similar commercial agreement between the United States and Canada. Several attempts at renewals were made. The first were made by Sir Alexander T. Galt, Sir John Rose, Sir Francis Hincks, and in 1874 by the Hon. George Brown; and last but not the least was the attempt made by one of the giants of Canadian public life, Sir John Alexander Macdonald.

My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), referring to the campaign of 1891, said that Sir John Macdonald then declared that if Canada would again return him to power, he would be ready to again approach the American authorities on this question, and particularly Mr. Blaine who was then Secretary of State in the United States, in order to obtain a renewal of the treaty of 1854. In this my hon. friend is right, but where he was wrong was when he said that the policy of reciprocity was defeated at the polls in 1891. It was not. The policy which was defeated at the polls in 1891 was quite different from that of the present government. The policy of the present government is a restricted policy of reciprocity.

Mr. SPROULE. Is not that exactly what I said, namely, that the Reform party went to the country on unrestricted reciprocity, and the Conservative party on a policy of limited reciprocity, and the country decided in favour of the latter.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, and now that these hon. gentleman are getting it, they are not satisfied.

Mr. SPROULE. We needed it then, but not now.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What was the attitude of Sir John Macdonald in 1891? My memory of those days is evergreen because I began my political life in 1891, and addressed many meetings in the province of Quebec in favour of the policy of the Liberal party. I quite remember that from 1887 until 1891, the then leader of the opposition, who is now the leader of this government, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), offered to this House resolution after resolution in favour of reciprocity—not of unrestricted reciprocity because that policy culminated only in 1891. But they offered resolution after resolution in favour of a policy of reciprocity of whatever form or kind with the United States. Year after year these resolutions were rejected. I shall not say that they were rejected by the servile majority of the day, but they were rejected by the followers of Sir John Macdonald from 1887 down to 1891. When, however, Sir John Macdonald saw that the tide was rising in the country and that his party would be swept by the wave of public opinion in favour of reciprocity, he suddenly, before the parliamentary term had expired, dissolved parliament and appealed to the country on the reciprocity issue. But the statesmen in the United States, and foremost among them was the late James G. Blaine, took the precaution, for what reason I do not know—of insisting on Canada setting forth what she desired in writing. That same precaution has not been taken this time between Mr. Taft, President of the United States, and Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance of Canada. No written agreement was required before the negotiations began. But in those days Mr. Blaine wanted to know what the gentlemen from Canada would propose to the United States; he wanted it in black and white in order that he might know what they would discuss at Washington. And Lord Stanley, our Governor General of that day, wrote to the Colonial Secretary, Lord Knutsford, a series of questions which would be debated by the Canadian representatives with Mr. Blaine and the members of the American executive. The first question they were to debate, according to Sir John Macdonald—because although the letter is signed by His Excellency the Governor General, yet in this country, where we have responsible government, the Governor General speaks only by his Prime Minister and his cabinet—and this letter—the utterance of Sir John Macdonald—was:

> The renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, with the modifications required by altered circumstances of both countries and with the extensions by the commission deemed to be in the interest of Canada and the United States.

Then follow some other questions respecting the fisheries, the Alaskan boundary, the coasting laws and other matters. And let me say en passant, that this unrestricted reciprocity policy, which, for my part, I would not advocate to-day—because I have grown older and probably wiser—so appealed to the electorate of this Dominion, that they divided almost evenly at the polls. And remember that we, of the Liberal party, had lost the services of our great leader, Hon. Edward Blake. We were defeated, but only by a very slim majority. After the elections of 1891, if I mistake not, the majority of the Conservative party, then sitting at the right of the Chair, numbered only 19 or 20, having dwindled to that number from 50 or 60. And what appeals were made to the province of Ontario, and to the province of Quebec and other parts of the country ! It was during the last phases of Sir John Macdonald's brilliant career, his last appeal to the electors,—a British subject he was born, a British subject he would die ! The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who now leads this House had only been selected as leader of the Liberal party a few years before, in 1888 or 1889. He was not then so well known in the country as he is to-day. And he belonged to the minority. Yet, Sir, in the great province of Ontario, the majority for Sir John Macdonald in the elections of 1891, was not more than half a baker's dozen. And the province of Quebec we carried by a majority of 15. We lost in all the other provinces, except, I believe, Prince Edward Island. All this to show you that, now that we are not asking to commit this country to unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, but have receded to the sounder policy of restricted reciprocity, if parliament were dissolved, and an appeal made to the electorate of the Dominion, I have no hesitation in saying, the Liberal party would again carry the country. At all events, the policy of the Liberal party in 1891, for the many causes I have mentioned, was defeated by the electors. But, Sir, the Liberal party, in 1893, again raised the flag of reciprocity.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before the hon. gentleman leaves the elections of 1891, let me point out several points in which he has not stated the facts with accuracy. He says that in 1891 the Liberals carried the province of Quebec by a majority of 15. Quebec only gave them 5. And he is wrong also with regard to the general result.

Mr. LEMIEUX. All I know is, that the party of my hon. friend (Mr. Wright), came back to office with a largely reduced majority. And we must thank the electorate for having postponed the final victory of the Liberal party. If the Liberal party had come into power in 1891—and we were very near reaching the coveted goal—we should have inherited the effects of the National Policy; we would have been held responsible of the Black Fridays; and, no doubt, in 1896, the electorate would have done for us what they did for our opponents.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Had the Liberals come into power, would they have carried out the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux), has just said he is sorry for having advocated ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro), is a lawyer, I believe. As a lawyer, he knows that the witness cannot answer a hypothetical question, especially when it refers to past events. Let bygones be bygones. But in 1893 at the Liberal convention in Ottawa, the Liberal party once more raised the flag of reciprocity—restricted reciprocity—with the United States. We Liberals generally bow to the wishes of the electors. In the platform laid down at that convention appears the following:

That, having regard to the prosperity of Canada and the United States as adjoining countries, with many mutual interests, it is desirable that there should be the most friendly relations and broad and liberal trade intercourse between them;

That the interests alike of the Dominion and of the empire would be materially advanced by the establishing of such relations;....

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada, would enormously increase the trade and commerce between the two countries, would tend to encourage friendly relations between the two peoples, would remove many causes which have in the past provoked irritation and trouble to the governments of both countries, and would promote those kindly relations between the empire and the republic which afford the best guarantee for peace and prosperity;

Since 1896, when we took office, the Liberal party has striven to open negotiations with the United States on this question of reciprocity. In 1898 or 1899 a high joint commission under the presidency of Lord Herschell proceeded to Washington and there and then discussed the question with the American statesmen. We all know why this commission did not meet again after the sittings held in the summer of 1898. We all know, it is a matter of history that it is on the question of the Alaskan boundary that it came to grief. But strange to say, in the document which I quoted a moment ago, the letter of Governor Stanley of Preston to James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State in the United States, the first question to be debated is that of a renewal of the reciprocity treaty with the United States. The Alaskan boundary question has since been settled, alas ! against the best interests of Canada. The question of the fisheries has been settled in the interests of Canada by the Hague Tribunal. The other questions pending between the United States and Canada concerning our boundaries on the lakes and rivers adjoining the United States have also been settled and now, as the crowning event, it is the first question in the letter of Governor Stanley of Preston which is settled last. We have ceased to make pilgrimages to Washington. Washington has come to Canada, and the result is the policy which is now offered to the consideration of the Canadian parliament. Mr. Chairman, I stated a moment ago that the two policies of 1891 and of 1911 are quite different. As I stated, in 1891 we were advocating unrestricted reciprocity; in 1911, we are presenting to parliament a restricted reciprocity agreement. In 1891 we were opposed by Sir John A. Macdonald and the Hon. Edward Blake, because both were opposed to the free interchange of all commodities including manufactures as well as natural products. But, Sir John Macdonald favoured the free interchange of natural products. That is mentioned in the statute of 1879, and in his last address to the electors of Canada. The Hon. Edward Blake—and by the way, I may say his distinguished brother, in a letter published in this morning's 'Globe' stands by the present policy of the Liberal government—the Hon. Edward Blake in his Durham address of 1891 opposed the policy of the Liberal party, first, because in his mind it was discriminating against British manufactures, second because Canada would become dependent on the United States for the adequacy of the Dominion revenue and third because in his mind commercial union or continental union might mean political absorption or annexation. How different from the present situation ! In the first place, there is not in this agreement a discrimination against Canadian manufacturers. There is in our fiscal policy, however, a discrimination in favour of English manufacturers. Our revenue has never been larger and it will become larger and larger as the years roll by. We are discriminating in favour of Great Britain's manufacturers.

Let me quote from a pamphlet issued by the Tariff Reform Association in England. In this pamphlet, Tariff Reform, by Mr. J. Ellis Parker, the effects of the Canadian preference in favour of British manufactures are pointed out. It says:

Before the Canadian preference, British imports into Canada constantly declined. The effect of the Canadian preferential tariff, which was introduced in 1897, upon the British export trade as a whole, and upon the individual manufacturing industries, may be seen at a glance from the following table which is taken from the report on Conditions and Prospects of British Trade in Canada, published in 1908.

Then he gives the three columns of British imports. These figures are in round numbers:

Proceeding with the advantages that must inure to Canada let me mention in as few words as possible what the farmers will draw from the present agreement. The benefits from the opening of the markets of the United States to the products of Canada are so obvious and have been set forth with so much ability by those especially qualified to deal with the subject that it would be idle to again recite a catalogue of these benefits. Last year Canada exported rather more than $90,000,000 worth of agricultural products. This is nearly one-third of the total exports from this country which totalled $279,000,000. These agricultural products consisted mainly of wheat, oats and flour, and of the $90,000,000,

$71,000,000 were marketed in Great Britain whilst the United States took only $8,200,000. These figures would appear to tell us their own tale so far as the mother country is concerned, and no person listens to the tale more gladly than I do. Great Britain purchases from us as well as from all the rest of the world in great abundance. There is no index more accurate of the value of the services of her great industrial army and the consequent prosperity of a country than the extent of her purchases. But note this, whilst Great Britain sells to the whole world Great Britain buys from the four quarters of the globe. Englishmen sell where prices are highest and buy where they are lowest, and forget to ask whether, as the result of their transactions, they are less English than they were before. Canadians have the freest access to the market of Great Britain, but so have the people of every other country. We must not forget that fact. In 1908, the last year for which we have the British trade returns, Great Britain took over 16,000,000 cwts. of Canadian flour. But she took on precisely the same terms, 17,800,000 cwts. from Russia, and 20,000,000 cwts. from Argentina as well as large quantities from other countries foreign and colonial. The effect of this miscellaneous buying on the part of Britain upon the trade of Canada is well set forth in a tabulated statement prepared every year by the Montreal 'Gazette' on the business done at the port of Montreal. Let me quote on that the report of the export trade at the port of Montreal. It says:

Canada's export grain trade from the port of Montreal for the season of 1910, has been anything but a profitable one to exporters, owing to the unsettled condition of the wheat markets of the world and the keen competition that was met with from exporting countries, which tended to depress values in the English markets, frequently during the season, below prices on the Canadian market.

Mark this, Mr. Chairman. There is no question of the welcome ready for goods in the English market; if only our farmers are willing to take as low prices as the same goods can be had for from any other country. Our farmers are compelled and indeed are quite satisfied to pay their labourers wages high enough to enable them to live according to the standards of a high civilization, but the Canadian farmer will not on that account, receive one iota of advantage over the Indian, Russian or the South American farmer, who can hire labour at wages our farmers would be ashamed to pay their men.

Let us see what is the scale of wages paid in Argentina to farm hands. It is 64 cents per day, in Russia 40 to 45 cents per day, and in India 8 and 12 cents per day.

Mr. AMES. By this reciprocity treaty, do not the natural products of Argentina and Russia come free into Canada?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Well, I am not ready to answer my hon. friend, but I do not see what the wheat from Argentina, or Russia, or India would do in Canada when we export our surplus production. I am only a tyro in business, but surely my hon. friend will not contend for one moment that we must fear the competition of Argentina in our grain markets.

Mr. AMES. I think the hon. gentleman shows that very strongly.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would not the same argument apply to the United States, which exports 114,000,000 bushels?

Mr. LEMIEUX. If I were in Scotland I would be willing to be heckled, but I am not in Scotland, I am in Canada. My hon. friend will find my tables and statements in 'Hansard,' and he will read, mark, learn and inwardly digest them. In Canada, according to this table—

Mr. AMES. Would my hon. friend be kind enough to repeat the wages paid in Argentina and Russia?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. The wages of labour in Argentina, Russia and India are, according to late United States consular reports, as follows, in each case without board or keep: Argentina, 64 cents per day; Russia, 40 to 45 cents per day, and India, 8 and 12 cents per day. Now, in Canada the schedule shows the rates for 1899 and for 1909, the comparison being for ten years:

The information received at the Department of Labour is to the effect that there has been no substantial change in farm wages since 1909.

I will not take all the different sections of the country, but I will take the northwest provinces. On a yearly engagement the rate is $35 per month around Winnipeg.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does that include board?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Per month, with board, during the summer season around Winnipeg; Brandon, $30 and $33; Moosejaw, $50; Calgary, $35 and $40. Now, Mr. Chairman, with these figures giving the scale of wages paid in various countries, it is easy to see that as long as we give our farm hands living wages, as long as we uphold the ideals for which we live in a white country in British North America, we cannot compete against the wages paid to the peasantry of Russia, to Indians, or to the farm hands of Argentina. I mean on the British market, not on the Canadian market.

Mr. AMES. The minister probably knows that Halifax is nearer Buenos Ayres than London.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, but Halifax is also nearer Canada, and I would like my hon. friend, with his knowledge as a member of the Board of Trade—and probably one of the protesting members of the Board of Trade—to give me the name of one firm in Halifax importing wheat from Argentina.

Mr. AMES. Of course, at the present time there is no firm in Halifax importing wheat—

Mr. LEMIEUX. Let well enough alone.

Mr. AMES. On account of the duty.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Let well enough alone! Now, with regard to the export of Canadian flour, I shall quote further from this carefully prepared report issued by the Montreal 'Gazette:'

In this department of the export trade the volume of business done during the past season has not been as large as the previous one, which has no doubt been due to some extent to the unsettled condition of the markets for raw material, and the keener competition on the part of other exporting countries for the business, and the fact that the present milling capacity of Great Britain is equal to their requirements, they having the advantage of cheaper labour, and to the fact that the raw material is carried at from 50 to 100 (sic) per cent less than the manufactured article from Canada. In fact, milling in England has reached a state of efficiency equal to that of any other country. Besides, they have the entire world to draw upon for supplies, consequently the English miller to-day is our strongest competitor in some of the importing markets.

So, Mr. Chairman, when my hon. friend says, as he stated a moment ago, that we are going to injure the milling industry of this country by this reciprocity convention, he forgets two facts. He forgets, first, that already there is a refund of duty on wheat exported from Canada to the milling industries of Minneapolis. Second, he forgets that our strongest competitor is the English miller, because the milling industry in England is better equipped and is favoured with lower wages and cheaper raw material than the same milling industry in Canada. I quote from that report, published in the Montreal 'Gazette:'

For the year ending 31st March, 1910, Canada exported $14,900,000 worth of flour, of which $8,900,000 went to the English market.

It would seem, therefore, from this most reliable journal that the retention of the present body of trade with England in flour is quite problematic, and indeed the writer did not scruple to suggest that with her several advantages, notably the employment of cheaper labour than could be got in Canada, Great Britain may be able to wrest from us some of our present markets. So it will be seen that the old mother country is not yet asleep, and I will be able to show that the centuries tilled soil of Great Britain to-day gives a greater yield per acre of wheat than does the virgin soil of Canada. Our resources vast in extent will compel us for a long time to come to seek markets for them, and we have formidable rivals in Argentina, Russia and India. In 1909 with a population almost the same as that of Canada or probably somewhat less, Argentina had an export trade of $397,000,000 against Canada's export trade of $243,000,000 for the same year. Argentina resembles Canada in having an enormous extent of disposable land fit for cultivation. She, Argentina, already exports more agricultural products to Great Britain than does Canada, and there is no possible limit to the expansion of her trade on these lines. Russia, both in Europe and Asia has great stretches of territory available for agriculture and there are other countries coming to be our rivals in the British market, and which have this great advantage over Canada that they have a class of labour which does not exist in this country, a white country, and which truth to tell we do not want. In North America we have a great white population living up to the same standards of civilization. We pay in Canada about the same wages as are paid in the northern and western states of the union, and therefore, we are on a common ground where as rivals we can meet and compete. This enlarged market in the United States will be only another string to our bow. When the prices in the markets of Great Britain are high enough to attract our natural products there will be no reluctance on our part to ship our goods to Great Britain. There is no fear but that the movement towards the mother country will in the future be as it has been in the past, and that taking into account our rapid expansion there will be a steadily increasing surplus of products which must find their outlet in the British market. If our farmers should profit greatly by the new arrangement, as I believe they will, the influx into our prairies from Europe and the United States, of farmers desiring to share these profits, will produce surplus enough to keep prices reasonably low and provide great stores for export. The fear is expressed that our trade will not follow the same route from east to west, but that it will take to channels north to south. This could only take place if the United States consumed all the cattle and wheat and different products we have to sell, and if we on our part replaced the British and European wares we have been accustomed to purchase by wares of a similar character from the United States. This, of course, is most improbable, and it is only possible when the products of the ill-paid peasants of India, Russia, and South America bring down the price in the British market to a point at which our farmers cannot sell their products at a profit sufficient to enable them and their neighbours to live in the comforts to which they have been accustomed. But, shall we lose the traffic from east to west? The opinion of Sir Donald Mann, one of the great railway builders of Canada is that we will not. The opinion of Sir William Van Horne at one time president of the great Canadian Pacific railway does not sustain that view that we shall. Some years ago a committee was appointed by the Senate to inquire into the feasibility of the Georgian Bay canal, and Sir William Van Horne appeared before that committee and although the Georgian Bay canal when built will take from the railway a vast amount of a certain class of freight, Sir William Van Horne did not oppose the scheme, but on the contrary gave it his strong support. Like this reciprocity agreement, it would add he said to the prosperity of the western farmer and lumberman, and he declared it to be his opinion that the canal would in that way contribute to the business of his railway far more than it took from it. The greater prosperity of the people, whether due to cheaper transportation of grain through the canals or because of higher prices due to reciprocity, means for the railways and the great seaport cities an augmentation of the volume of business in finished products. Neither the Canadian Pacific railway, nor the Grand Trunk Pacific, nor the Canadian Northern railway, are likely to lack any conveyance of natural products for a long time to come. It is the law of nature, that for centuries to come and may be for all time to come the North American continent will be the great purveyor of natural products to the continent of Europe. The trade from Canada to the United States will continue to increase, and it requires no unusual foresight to see that this increase will inure to the benefit of our ocean ports. Montreal will beyond all doubt replace New York as the first ocean port of North America ; indeed, Montreal has already taken the premier position. That is a decree not of mine, not of the Canadian government, it is a decree of nature and of geography. There can be no evasion of the fact that the water route from Montreal to Liverpool is 220 miles shorter than that from New York to Liverpool, and that 1,000 miles of the Canadian route lies within the shelter of adjacent shores. During last season of navigation, and the season before that, Montreal defeated New York in the race, for in the export of butter and cheese the port of Montreal leads the way on the North American continent. And, Sir, fifty years ago Montreal entered in the race with New York and the American ports. Fifty years ago the Post Office Department of Canada carried the mails of the United States by the St. Lawrence river. Fifty years ago the mails from Paris, from Brussels, from London, were sent by Liverpool and Rivière du Loup in the St. Lawrence, not to Canada alone, but to Chicago and all the western states. There were some accidents in the St. Lawrence in those days ; it was not so well lighted and as well buoyed as it is to-day. We have to-day three main lines running from Montreal and Quebec to Liverpool, and I venture to say that 60 per cent of the passengers on those lines are from the United States. Why do they go by Montreal and Quebec? It is because it is the shortest route, and I dare say also because it is the most picturesque route. There need be no fear of our not maintaining the supremacy of the St. Lawrence river for the North American continent. We need not be afraid that the trade of the north will pass to the south by New York or by New Orleans, as has been suggested of late years.

One of the objections urged against this agreement is that so much benefit will inure to Canada from it that we shall waste all our natural resources, devastate our great wheat areas, our lumber and our standing timber, and deplete our fisheries. Well, Sir, there is no fear of our depleting our natural resources, now that the people are becoming impressed, through the policy of this Liberal government, with the supreme importance of the schemes for the conservation of the country's resources. Canada last year produced 21½ bushels of wheat to the acre, which is about 5¾ bushels to the acre higher than the yield of the United States. But in our western provinces we are working a virgin soil of great natural fertility. We have, however, a long way to go yet before we reach our ideal, and indeed the figures which I am about to quote from Professor Robertson, give me the ground for the confident hope that we shall not only obtain for our soil a productiveness 50 per cent greater than it has at present, but will maintain it for all time. England has been taking crops of wheat from her soil for a thousand years, and her soil should have been exhausted centuries ago if constant cropping results necessarily in depletion. But listen to the figures. During the last ten years the average yield of wheat per acre in England has been 31⅛ bushels to the acre, while last year the average was 33⅜ bushels. So that far from a lessened productiveness in England, Professor Robertson assures us that the yield per acre now is higher than ever before.

The farmers of Canada start with an unsurpassed soil, and by the application of intelligent methods, such as are followed in all the leading European countries, they will increase the productiveness of their fields, and maintain them at the highest level they can reach.

In our forests, we are equally assured. An estimate from the Forestry Branch, which is moderate, gives the acreage of our standing timber as 500,000,000 acres. In Germany, where forest conservation is carried to a high point, it is estimated that every year there is produced new timber to the extent of 100 feet of merchantable timber to the acre. Suppose that, by the methods now put in operation to stop the waste, Canada was able to raise no more than 50 feet of new timber per acre yearly fit for cutting, the produce from this would go far to supply not only the Canadian market, but the whole United States market as well.

What benefits shall we derive from this free market for our Canadian fisheries? With the protection afforded by the regulations of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, I have no fear whatever that our fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence will be depleted. This agreement opens up a friendly market fifteen times larger than our own for fish. We have a surplus of fish. All engaged in the fish industry say that the Canadian market is too limited. Our vast waters, the largest fishing areas, fresh-water and marine, in the world, must produce a surplus which the United States market will take. They depend upon Canadian fish now but with the duty removed an immense increase will result. Our fisheries produce not less per annum than 450 or 500 million pounds of fish of every kind. It can be increased by opening up new waters in the Northwest and probably Hudson bay. Not 50 per cent of these fish can be sold in Canada, even with increasing population.

It will result in better prices. Hitherto United States fish combines have dictated prices to our fishermen and fish firms, and we had the advantage of the duty. With open United States markets our fishermen will not sell through the restricted trade channels or be at the mercy of combines. They will sell at current prices to any buyers, on the same terms as United States fishing firms. The United States buyers want our fish.

Fish will have increased value, especially kinds for which our fishermen get low prices or have no sale. I was reading this morning in the New York 'Fishing Gazette' what Mr. Edward Born, president of the Seaboard Trading Company said, as follows:

> In view of the fact that the production of salt fish on the American side has been entirely inadequate for the requirements of the home market, and that Gloucester has been a heavy buyer of stock in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, free fish is a perfectly logical demand.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Our salt fish have other markets than the United States, but a leading New York fish merchant recently said that Gloucester and other cured fish centres must buy heavily from Canada in the future, hence our salt fish trade will receive an impetus. Herring bait, fresh mackerel, live lobsters, &c., will be in greater demand under the new conditions. Even the Pacific fisheries will benefit. Fresh salmon, halibut, &c., will no doubt be sought, with returns higher than the canned fish bring.

Lobsters on the Atlantic coast similarly will bring far greater profits to fishermen and firms in Canada if shipped fresh or alive. Thus four lobsters in a 1-lb. can, bring 15 or 20 cents, but sold whole, four lobsters bring 80 cents or $1. A free market in the eastern states means increased demand for live lobsters, and increased transportation facilities which may make it easy for Prince Edward Island and Bay of Chaleur lobsters to be sold at these high rates.

Mr. JAMESON. Do not lobsters enter the United States now free of duty?

Mr. LEMIEUX. They may, but with this increased trade between the United States and Canada, the demand will be much larger. I have already answered the statement made by my hon. friend that our transportation systems would be affected by this agreement. It is absurd to say that the trade, instead of running east and west, will run north and south. Why, the railway systems of the United States run many of them, east and west. The great transcontinental lines in that country run east and west. A great part of the American grain, in spite of the existing tariff, now finds its way through American railways and canals to Montreal, and Montreal is taking the lead, as a shipping port, over the ports of the United States. Mr. J. J. Hill, who is such a bogey to my hon. friends opposite, will have to compete against our railway barons of the Canadian Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and he will meet his equals when he comes against Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, Sir Donald Mann, Sir William McKenzie and Mr. Hays. If you will look at the stock reports every night, you will find that the Canadian Pacific stock has not been affected prejudicially by this proposed agreement, but rather to the contrary, nor has the credit of the Canadian Northern railway, and the Grand Trunk Pacific been injured. The Grand Trunk Pacific will still go on and be soon completed and prove one of the best traction systems on this continent notwithstanding the pessimistic prophesy of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to reciprocity. The dividends earned by our railways will be as large as ever, and as the result of this proposed agreement, we shall have a large inflow of population into our west. I am told by the officers of the immigration Department that we may expect in the west this year not less than 500,000 people. And with a greater population in the west, more wheat will be grown, and there will be greater hauls for the railways, and lower prices for the consumer. Our hon. friends need, therefore, be under no apprehension that this agreement will in any way prejudice our transportation systems.

We are told, however, by my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) that it is a one-sided agreement, and he quoted to this effect the words of two or three prominent men in the United States—I think even the President of the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. So did my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr Foster), but we also have one of the highest protectionists on this continent, Mr. Joe Cannon, Uncle Joe, prominent in American public life, who objects to this agreement because it is one-sided. It is, indeed, strange to find protectionists on both sides of the line agreeing that it is a one-sided agreement to the prejudice of each. Well, I believe with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). with the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with Mr. Taft, the President of the United States, that it is a compact which involves mutual advantages. That is only natural. Canada could never expect, in dealing with the United States, or even in dealing with the smallest island in the West Indies, to obtain in a trade bargain, a one-sided arrangement.

But my hon. friend says that we have given up our fiscal independence, and he quoted from Mr. Austen Chamberlain, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer in England some years ago, to prove this assertion. But he failed to remind the House that Mr. Chamberlain stated, probably in the same speech, that Canada had just entered into the American vortex. Well, such a statement is a silly one. We are not in any way divesting ourselves of our fiscal independence. We are simply propounding a policy which parliament is free to accept or reject. We have kept clear of all entangling alliances because we know that the conditions of this country are likely to change rapidly within the next 5, 10 or 20 years and at any moment we may alter our course. In a brief period we shall have a much larger population and be much stronger, and the British preference still remains. That preference is still, in the words of my right hon. leader, the Prime Minister, the cardinal feature of our fiscal policy. We gave that preference willingly to the mother country and we asked nothing in return. We have maintained that preference, although it is one-sided, and to the advocates of inter-imperial preference we said: We Liberals, we Canadians, shall never put a price on our loyalty. Why did we give this preference to Great Britain? We gave it in order to show our gratitude for the blessings of responsible government which we owe to her wise policy and the efforts of her statesmen, such as Lord Durham and Lord Elgin? We gave Great Britain a preference because we recognized that her markets were free to the countries of the world and her colonies in particular, and because during more than a century she bore the brunt of Canadian defence on land and sea. We have not altered or impaired in the least our fiscal independence, we have simply made a bargain, and are submitting that bargain to the Canadian people. This parliament is free to accept or reject it, but we still maintain, in either event, the British preference which we gave of our own free consent, and which we still maintain because of our gratitude to the mother country, and also because it suits us.

We are told, however, by my hon. friend, that this is a dreadful blow to tariff reform in England. Well, if such be the case, what then? I am a Liberal, and as a Reformer I accept the verdict of the people—vox populi, vox Dei. On three different occasions, the electorate in Great Britain has been consulted on tariff reform—in 1906, 1909 and a few months ago—and on each John Bull declared that, even for the sake of his colonies, he will not tax the food of the large masses who are working at low wages, and sometimes starving, in London, Manchester, Birmingham and Liverpool. Mr. Balfour himself during the last campaign made a proposal to the British electors. He would not, he said, discuss mutual preference at that election, but if returned to power he would have a referendum. That was the chief plank of his platform in the month of December last. He offered to give John Bull an occasion to show whether he was for or against mutual preference. What did John Bull answer? He answered that he would not even consider the propriety of a referendum of that question. Therefore, it is not this proposed arrangement which is giving a death blow to tariff reform. Long ago in 1906 and 1908, the people of England themselves gave a death blow to mutual preference.

But see what confusion exists among hon. gentlemen opposite. We have my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), who rose in his place the other day, and asked the House to postpone the consideration of this question, because forsooth, he had reached in his own mind the idea that we were playing into the hands of the British government in making this bargain with the United States. He wants to postpone consideration of the question, he will ask the House to defeat this proposal, on the ground that we are playing into the hands of the British authorities. On the other hand, we have my hon. friend from East Grey, we have his leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), we have the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and probably my good friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), clamouring that this agreement made by the Liberal government with Mr. Taft, is most anti-British, anti-Imperial, and tends to weaken the tie that binds us to the mother country. Sir, in this agreement, we received the help of that statesman who represents Great Britain and Canadian interests as well at Washington, Mr. Bryce, the eminent writer, the great reformer, whose name will live as long as beats a British heart in Britain. Mr. Bryce helped the case of Canada, and assisted my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). What a different policy was followed by Mr. Bryce from that followed by the British representatives who, in 1871, accompanied Sir John Macdonald to Washington when the dearest interests of Canada were debated. Sir John Macdonald, in a letter to his friend, Dr. Tupper, who was his colleague in the government, was not afraid to write the following lines:

I must say that I am greatly disappointed at the course taken by the British commissioners. They seem to have only one thing in their minds, that is, to go home to England with the treaty in their pockets, settling everything, no matter at what cost to Canada.

How different is the attitude of the British statesmanship from that of the British statesmanship of 1871. What a difference between the representatives of Great Britain under a Liberal government in England, and the representatives of Great Britain under a Tory government in England. Mr. Bryce helped Canada in this agreement. Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister of England, who voiced the sentiments of Great Britain and of the British Empire —for there is no man, except the King of England, above the Prime Minister—is satisfied with the agreement.

We see it stated that this agreement is a blow at British investments in Canada, and that henceforward British investors will hesitate before they invest their capital in Canada. Mr. Chairman, I am not of British parentage, but I know one thing: British capital will be invested where it pays the British investor. In Great Britain or wherever I have met the Anglo-Saxon in my lifetime, I have always discovered, to my discomfiture at times, that with an Englishman, in matters of business, sentiment is not allowed to intervene. In this connection, nothing is more striking than the view of Great Britain on this very question of British mutual preference. We all know that Sir John Macdonald, as far back as 1885, advocated a policy of mutual preference between the mother country and Canada and the colonies. He was the foremost colonial statesman of the day, and in 1885, when he went to London, he spoke as follows:

Commercially, British federation may be achieved on a basis of give and take. If you will give colonial produce such immunities as you give to no foreign nation I will commit myself to the expression of belief that the colonies will give British goods and only British goods, preferential treatment.

And what did Lord Salisbury answer to that pressing request of Sir John Macdonald ?

I fear that we must for the present put in the distant and shadowy portion of our past, and not in the practical part of it,——

Listen to the business man.

—any hope of establishing a customs union among the various parts of the empire.

And later on, in 1887, the first intercolonial conference was held, and a resolution was adopted favouring a policy of mutual preference. But nothing was done. In 1891 the colonies urged the imperial government to denounce the treaties with Germany and Belgium, which prevented imperial preference. Lord Salisbury declined courteously to take action. In 1891, my hon. friend, sitting on this side of the House, joined with his fellow members, and with the Canadian Senate in passing a resolution in favour of the denunciation of these treaties, because it was stated in England that even if we obtained mutual preference they would have to include Belgium and Germany, because we were bound by old treaties with those countries. The House of Commons passed a resolution asking the mother country to denounce these treaties. But no action was taken. In 1892 the House of Commons made a formal offer of a preferential tariff; in 1893, the Ottawa conference passed a similar resolution. What was the answer of Lord Ripon then colonial secretary ? He said:

A consideration of these practical difficulties and of the more immediate results indicated, of a system of mutual tariff discrimination, has convinced Her Majesty's government that, even if the consequences were confined to the limits of the empire, and even if it were not followed by changes of fiscal policy on the part of foreign powers unfavourable to this country, its general economic results would not be beneficial to the empire. Such theories are really a weapon of commercial war, used as weapons of retaliation, and inflicting more loss on the country employing it than on the country against which it is directed, and which would not be likely to view them with indifference.

In 1897 we passed the British preference to which I referred a moment ago. The Prime Minister of Canada knew it was the time to strike the popular imagination of Great Britain. It was at the time of the Queen Victoria's Jubilee, and the imperial conference had been summoned. The Prime Minister of Canada was there with his colleagues and at this the psychological moment, a resolution was passed unanimously at the request of the Prime Minister of Canada by the delegates of the various colonies urging upon the imperial government the necessity of denouncing the German and Belgian treaties. It was due to the wisdom, the statesmanship, the ability which one must recognize in the Prime Minister of Canada that the German and Belgian treaties were denounced.

However, there were conferences in 1902 and 1907, resolutions after resolutions were passed urging imperial preferences, and now all the self-governing colonies, yes, even distant Rhodesia, on the shores of the Zambesi river, has adopted a preferential tariff between the mother country and herself. Yet, Sir, the electors of Great Britain, loving their fellow-subjects in the overseas dominions, as they do love them, will still get free food, free bread before taxing the masses swarming within the four corners of the United Kingdom. We have heard protests from Toronto and Montreal against this arrangement. I see among the names given in the Toronto and Montreal papers as opposed to this agreement the names of bankers, of insurance men, of men connected with great trust companies. They urge, all of them, that if we carry out this agreement it means ultimately the fusion of Canada into the United States, yes, we are going to be drowned in the American ocean. Well, Sir, I never thought that the question of dollars and cents might weaken the ties between the mother country and Canada; I never expected that trading with the United States would mean the wiping out of the frontier which exists between the two countries. I did not forget, when I saw the names of those bankers and magnates of insurance and trust companies, the good old French dicton: L'argent ne connaît pas les frontières et l'argent n'a pas de sentiment—money knows no frontier, and no sentiment. Many of our banks, the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Commerce, to name two of the most important, have branches established in Chicago, in Detroit, in New York, in Baltimore, in San Francisco, Seattle, and, perhaps, in Washington. I am not aware that the managers of these banks, who are Canadians, have become Americans; I am not aware that they have transferred their fealty and their loyalty to the Stars and Stripes, but if I look at the two last bank returns in the 'Official Gazette' for the month of October and the month of December, I see that those bankers who fear for the future of Canada because we are going to trade with the United States, to sell hay, and horses, and wheat, and potatoes, and fish, and lobsters, have made call loans and current loans outside of Canada in the United States to the amount of $144,548,600. I see that in the month of December they made call loans and current loans to the amount of $131,111,276. Still, in Toronto and Montreal, on the shore of Lake Ontario and on the bank of the St. Lawrence, there has been no necessity to call my hon. friend for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr Hughes) to defend those cities, they are still Canadian, the banks still fly the British flag and the bankers reap a good interest from the investment they have made abroad. It is not only their money they invest; there is a little of their money and very little of ours, but it is the money of our fellow-subjects in the different provinces of the Dominion. Do you believe that the insurance men would refuse a good investment in Mexico, Brazil, or the United States of America? No. Last year and two years ago when a commission sat, what limitations were not urged upon the insurance men so as to prevent them from investing too much of our Canadian money abroad? Yet, Sir, in the House of Commons, when we came to study the Bill we gave our insurance men a free scope; we had confidence in them, in their loyalty and fealty: we believed that they were shrewd business men, that money had no colour and no sentiment, and knew of no boundary. They say that reciprocity is injurious to Great Britain and the empire. What is the answer of the home government to that statement? I see that my friend Mr. Buxton the ex-postmaster general, who is now president of the Board of Trade in England, said in the House of Commons on the 8th of February, in answer to Mr. Austen Chamberlain:

> They had neither changed nor modified their view that the proposals of Mr. Chamberlain——

That is the father who was advocating an imperial preference, > —and his friends would be injurious to this country and injurious to the empire as a whole. This very agreement——

Speaking of our agreement, > —afforded a good object-lesson of the evils and dangers of the fiscal relations which Mr. Chamberlain suggested should exist between the mother country and Canada. Had a system of preferences existed——

This is a hypothetical case,

—at the present moment Canada would have had to consult the mother country before entering into an agreement with the United States. Then the local interests of Canada would have been antagonistic to the interests of Great Britain, and colonial preference, instead of being a link in the chain of empire, might well have brought that chain to the snapping point.

This is what the home government answers to the charge that this agreement is injurious to Great Britain. Now, it is stated that reciprocity would even impair the existing preference. I shall not read to the House the answer made by Mr. Buxton, but I will ask permission to file it on 'Hansard.'

OUR TRADE WITH CANADA.

The government recognized the advantages which we in this country received from the preference which Canada had been good enough to give us, but he would point out that Mr. Fielding and his ministers had always based that preference upon the advantage which it conferred upon Canadian trade. Holding the views which they did, the government could not regret any arrangement or agreement which might weaken the opportunities of putting a tax upon corn coming to this country, nor could they regret any fiscal arrangements which tended to the reduction of high duties in any part of the world and to break down tariff walls. Neither could they regret any arrangement under which the trade of Canada itself would, as Canadians thought, be largely increased. They certainly felt very strongly that at the present moment the allegiance and loyalty of the Canadians were not involved in this agreement (ministerial cheers). He could assure the right hon. gentleman that the very pessimistic view which he took of the effect of the agreement upon Canadian preference to Great Britain was much exaggerated. We sent at the present moment nearly £20,000,000 worth of goods to Canada, and of those two-thirds received a preference under the old agreement, and £969,000 represented the goods dealt with in the agreement between Canada and America.

Of the last figure £176,000 represented goods free to all nations, and about £800,000 only was affected by the agreement so far as British preference was concerned. Out of that £477,000 still retained a preferenec of 10 to 12 per cent, leaving a balance of £316,000, or only 1½ per cent, of British imports to Canada on which the duties in future would be identical with the duties on American goods. Therefore he thought he might say that the alarm which seemed to have been excited in some quarters had really been very much exaggerated. Mr. Chamberlain had declared that as a result of the agreement less Canadian corn would come to England, and that the price of corn in this country would consequently go up. That was the argument which free traders had always advanced against a colonial preference which involved a tax on imported corn. They had been told that under tariff reform the growth of corn in the colonies and at home would be encouraged to such an extent that in the end the price would be cheaper. If that would be the result under the proposals of tariff reformers, was it not still more likely to be the result of the stimulus given to Canadian corn growing by opening the markets of America? (Ministerial cheers).

Now, I will answer, and I will conclude here, the last argument—I will not suggest that this last argument is the last refuge because I might bring in the name of Dr. Johnson, and I do not wish to apply the words of Dr. Johnson to my hon. friend—but I will answer the last argument of my hon. friend that this agreement will weaken the tie between Great Britain and Canada. That is a very poor argument. It is more than that; it is a panicky argument. Why Sir, the loyalty of Canada and Canadians stood the test of adversity during half a century. Will it not stand the test of coming prosperity? There were days of adversity in 1775 and in 1812 and we were just a few isolated provinces defending ourselves against the invading armies of the United States of America. Yet the French who had recently been conquered on the Plains of Abraham united with the descendants of the United Empire Loyalists, resisted the invasion of the American soldiers and saved Canada to the British Empire. In 1866, when the abrogation of the Elgin-Marcy Treaty caused all the evil forebodings contained in the state document which I read a moment ago, we were able to steer our own course, and to maintain our dignity. In 1867, when Sir John A. Macdonald, Mr. George Brown, Mr. Alexander Mackenzie and Sir George Cartier united their forces to make this confederation of ours, the United States of America were not slow in passing a resolution in their Congress offering the several provinces of Canada the opportunity of becoming so many different states in the American union. But the Canadians were not lured by the offer made by the United States. In 1870 we repelled another invasion. How did Canada accept the suggestion that England should hand over our country as a compensation for the Alabama claims? A few days ago I was reading the reminiscences of Goldwin Smith and—I do not know if my hon. friend has read the book—it is stated in so many words that there was a time in the seventies when Mr. Gladstone, being Prime Minister of England, was ready to sacrifice Canada as compensation for the Alabama Claims made by the United States. Canada resisted the suggestions made by British statesmen. The great Disraeli, himself, stated that we were a millstone around the neck of the mother country; yet, in spite of these remarks, in spite of this policy of oblivion followed by the mother country, we remained firm and staunch to our colours and we decided to live under the Union Jack instead of under the Stars and Stripes.

Mr. SPROULE. I think my hon. friend is doing Disraeli a great injustice by that statement; at least, I have no remembrance of his having made it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, I have read it many times. To-morrow I will pass the book in which it is contained over to my hon. friend. It is in Justin McCarthy's History of Our Own Times, and Justin McCarthy, although a well-known home ruler, is an up to date and fair minded historian. He states it in so many words. Goldwin Smith has also quoted it in his book on the Canadian question. Did we ever accept the interpretation of the Monroe doctrine, suggestive as it was, by the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, to the effect that no European power would be tolerated any longer upon the American continent? Did we ever accept with fear the policy embalmed in Mr. Dingley's and Mr. McKinley's Bills? We stood the days of adversity like men, like Canadians, like British subjects and surely with prosperity we can trust ourselves. We gave willingly our help to Great Britain in South Africa. We have offered cheerfully our help to Great Britain for the well-being of the British Empire in the various colonial conferences and we have given, as I stated a moment ago, without expecting anything in return, a fiscal preference. If now, the westerner, in that beautiful country west of Lake Superior, can sell his wheat to the United States to better advantage, if the poor fisherman from Gaspé can sell his catch to better advantage to the eastern states, if the Prince Edward Islander can sell his potatoes in a wider market, if the Quebec habitant can add a dollar to his ton of hay, if the Ontario farmer can raise barley and do a better trade in cattle with the United States, surely his or their loyalty will not be impaired. If, on the contrary these things are done, as my hon. friend suggested this evening, at the cost of the loyalty of Canadians, then indeed the empire possesses no real strength.

I hold no brief to speak for my friends of the English persuasion, but I know that no English-speaking Canadian will ever barter his birthright for the flesh pots of Egypt. I know that no French Canadian at least would ever accept annexation. I can speak for my fellow countrymen. We in the province of Quebec, French Canadians one and all, Conservatives and Liberals are against any idea that smacks of annexation. Why? Because of the privileges we enjoy under the British Crown. By the Quebec Act of 1774, under which Act our language, our faith, our laws, our customs, our usages have been respected in a privileged manner by His Britannic Majesty and by the imperial government. We know what has been the fate of our fellow countrymen in Louisiana and we know that as long as we live under the British flag, as long as we live under the benign laws of Great Britain, our rights and our privileges will be protected and safeguarded, and we are willing to do our duty towards the Crown of England which is not only a bond of unity between the colonies and the mother land, but also between the various races in those colonies. The sentiments expressed by Joseph Howe at the time of the Detroit convention are ours. They are ours to-day as they were ours in 1865:

> I have heard it said since I came to the convention that if the reciprocity treaty is annulled the British provinces will be so cramped that they will be compelled to seek annexation to the United States. I know the feeling in the lower provinces, and I believe I am well enough acquainted with the Canadians to speak for them also when I make the assertion that no considerations of finance, no question of balance for or against them on the interchange of commodities can have any influence upon the loyalty of the inhabitants of the British provinces, or tend in the slightest degree to alienate the affections of the people from their country, their institutions, their government and their Queen. There is not a man who dare, on the abrogation of the treaty, if such be its fate, to take the hustings and appeal to any constituency on annexation principles throughout the entire domain. The man who avowed such a sentiment would be scouted from society by his best friends. What other treatment would a man deserve who had turned traitor to his government and violated for pecuniary advantages all obligations to the country that gave him birth? The very boy to whom I have alluded as having fought manfully for the stars and stripes would rather blow his own father's brains out than haul down the honoured flag under which he was born. If any member of the convention harbours the idea that in refusing reciprocity to British America they would undermine the loyal feelings of the people of those colonies, he is labouring under a delusion. . . . I sincerely hope that all thought of forcing annexation upon the people of Canada will be abandoned.

The sentiments of Joseph Howe expressed in 1865 at the Detroit Convention are the sentiments of Canadians in this year of grace 1911, on the eve of adopting this reciprocity treaty. I say further, that not only are we against any idea of political union with the United States, but that on the contrary, we believe that such agreements as these make for genuine Anglo-Saxon solidarity. The Trent Affair, the Fenian Raid, the Behring sea seizures are things of the past. A firm friendship between the several branches of the Anglo-Saxon race is worth striving for. We are told, Sir, that we are against the empire in propounding such a policy, but do you know that the greatest imperialist of modern times, Cecil Rhodes, devoted his life and his wealth after his death to the advancement of just such a policy of Anglo-Saxon solidarity. In his will he provides a sum of money to enable young men in each state of the Union to take a course at Oxford University, there to study British life and British ideals. His object was to spread throughout the world that love for liberty and justice and right which is begotten of British institutions and British law. At the end of this century of peace (the celebration of which will take place in 1912 on the wise suggestion of my colleague the Minister of Labour), this reciprocity agreement will be the crowning event of that century. We believe it will be a means of serving the empire and Canada; we believe it will prove a link between the mother country and the great republic. In the past our loyalty has borne its trials, even with the mother country. While we were still suffering from the effects of the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, statesmen high in station in England gave us to understand that they would see us part from the old connection without regret, but we did not believe that those were the feelings of the people of England, and so we held on, and so we will still continue to hold on. We have fairly won our way into the British brotherhood, and we will not hear with patience that any trade arrangement, however favourable, will turn us from the course we have freely chosen for ourselves within the greatest empire that has been.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.03 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

DISPOSAL OF SEWAGE.

Mr. LEWIS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 122) respecting sewage. He said: I do not think there is any one who will fail to recognize that the grievance which I propose to remove is one that causes severe injury in this country. The Bill I am about to introduce provides as follows:

1. This Act may be cited as the Sewage Act.
2. No person, corporation or municipality shall deposit or cause to be deposited any sewage or refuse of any kind whatsoever in any river or stream in Canada.
3. Any person who violates the provisions of section 2 of this Act shall be guilty of an indictable offence and may be condemned to a fine not exceeding $100 for each day during which such violation continues; and any corporation or municipality that violates the provisions of the said section shall be guilty of an indictable offence and may be condemned to a fine of not less than $200 and not more than $1,000 for each day during which such violation continues.
4. This Act shall come into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

I do not see that there is any necessity for me to explain the great need which exists for legislation in this line. I introduce this Bill simply for the purpose of bringing the matter to the attention of the government; and I think that the need for legislation of this kind is so great that the right hon. the Prime Minister should have this measure sent to a joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate. I do not pretend for one moment that the Bill I am introducing, and which has been drawn at my request by one of the best legal men in Canada, covers the whole case; but when we reflect that in the great countries of France and England, with their large and congested population, such a disease as typhoid is almost unknown, I think it is time we should take immediate action.

Mr. SPROULE. I should dislike very much to allow the statement to go uncontradicted that typhoid fever is unknown in France and England. Our medical literature tells an entirely different story, so of course it is much less prevalent in these countries than in this. But what I wish particularly to point out is that this Bill is rather an interference with provincial rights, because the provinces have jurisdiction over all matters relating to health except quarantine, and they are now dealing with this very question of typhoid. Of course if we bring this matter under the Criminal Code, that may give us jurisdiction; but as the provinces are charged with the responsibility in matters affecting the public health and we have provincial statutes dealing with that subject, I am afraid that if we were to undertake to legislate in a similar line we would be interfering with their rights.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. JAMESON:

1. Was the defective condition of the public landing at Meteghan brought to the attention of the Minister of Public Works, during the year, 1909? If so, by whom, in what manner, and when?

2. Has any report from the resident engineer been since asked for by the department regarding the condition of such public work? If so, when?

3. Has any report been received from the engineer, what is the date of any such, and in what condition does it state the said public landing to be?

4 Why have the repairs required on such public landing not been provided for and effected?

5. What provision, if any, has been, or will be made, for the repair of such public work?

6. Was a sum of $4,000 placed in the estimates for the current year for repairs to the public work at Meteghan, and subsequently changed to Meteghan river, expended at the latter place?

7 At whose instance did the minister make the change from Meteghan to Meteghan river in said vote?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Yes, by Mr. Jameson, M.P., in Committee of Supply.

2. (A) Yes; (B) April 26, 1910.

3. (A) Yes; (B) May 6, 1910; (C) wharf requires repairs and extension.

4. Provision cannot be made for all requirements at once.

5. Question of making provision in Supplementary Estimates, if any, will have careful consideration.

6. No.

7. The minister assumes responsibility for the change in the reading of the item, which was intended to be for Meteghan river.

MR. GEORGE MERCIER.

Mr. CROCKET:

1. Is the Minister of Customs aware that George Mercier, a customs preventive officer, is said to be a member of the town council of Dalhousie, N.B.?

2 Is this permissible under the regulations of the department.

Mr. PATERSON:

1. No.

2. The customs regulations established by order in council of 14th June, 1875, provide as follows: 'No officer of customs is allowed to hold any corporate office, nor to interfere in political questions, either local or general.' The question of repealing or modifying this regulation is under the consideration of the Department of Customs.

GLACE BAY BAIT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MADDEN:

1 Who were the members of the Glace Bay Bait Association at the time this association applied for moneys on account of construction of freezer at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, and when was the first $1,000 paid?

2. What amount was paid to the Glace Bay Bait Association in 1908, and what was the date or dates of such payment or payments?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. D. H. McKay, Chas. D. McKay, Angus H. Gillis, Jesse G. Dunbar, Alex. McPherson, J. W. Cameron, Chas. Burke, J. R.

McKeen, K. McRitchie, Henry Debeson, Thos. McInnes, Nicholas McDonald, J. A. Carmichael, D. N. Brodie, George Keigan, F. A. Ferguson, J. J. Fraser, R. S. McDougald, Geo. B. Bulmer, Lauchlin McLean, H. S. Tate, W. S. Hay. October 21, 1907.

2. $765.30 by cheque on August 10, 1908, and material was supplied during the building of the freezer worth $234.70.

QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew):

1. Was a caisson being used in the rebuilding of one of the piers of the Quebec bridge damaged?

2. If so, what was the nature and extent of the damage and the actual money loss in repairing and replacing the caisson?

3. What quantity of masonry, or concrete, in cubic yards, had been placed in the caisson the cost thereof, and the cost of removal after mishap?

4 What was the date of the suspension of work on pier, and the date when work was resumed?

5. Is the loss sustained to be borne by the government or the contractor?

6. Has the Department of Railways and Canals received notice, either written or verbal, of any claims made by or on behalf of the contractor on account of said loss?

7 Having as an object lesson the deplorable loss of life and money consequent upon the sudden collapse of the defective superstructure of this bridge, did the department have the plans of the caissons, to be used in the rebuilding of the substructure, properly examined by the chief engineer of the department, and do the authorized plans bear the certificate of the latter?

8 What is the name of the chief engineer of the department who approved of the plans?

Mr GRAHAM:

1. Yes.

2. The pump broke and the caisson was strained through grounding on an uneven bottom, necessitating the removal of the concrete already placed therein, and placing the caisson in dry dock for repairs. The cost to date for labour and material in connection with repairs amounts to approximately $75,000.

3. About 2,300 cubic yards of concrete had been placed in the caisson when the said accident occurred. Approximate value of this masonry in place, $14,000; approximate cost of removing same, $7,000.

4. The work of sinking the caisson stopped on August 31, 1910. No attempt was made to resink the caisson during the same season. All work at the bridge site stopped for the winter, on December 23, 1910.

5. The contractor is responsible for any loss sustained on account of the accident to the caisson.

6. The department is not aware of any claim made by or on behalf of the contractor on account of the alleged loss.

7 and 8. By order in council dated August 17, 1908, a board of engineers, consisting of H. E. Vautelet, chairman, and Chief Engineer Maurice Fitzmaurice, and Ralph Modjeski, was appointed to have charge of the construction of the Quebec bridge. The plans for the caisson to be used in rebuilding the substructure of the Quebec bridge were prepared for the contractor by Alfred Noble, an eminent bridge engineer of New York, and forwarded to the board of engineers at Montreal and were approved by them. The plans for the above work are not entirely completed.

The responsibility for the sinking of the caisson devolved upon the contractor.

STEAM TRAWLERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR :

1. Are the steam trawlers 'Wren' and 'Croquette' registered in Canada?

2. If so, in what port or ports and who are the registered owners thereof?

Mr. BRODEUR :

1 and 2. The 'Wren' is registered at the port of Canso, N. S., and is owned by the Pioneer Steam Trawling Company, Limited, Halifax, N. S. As far as the Department of Marine and Fisheries is advised the 'Croquette' is not registered in Canada.

Mr. JAMESON :

1. Has application been made for the payment of fishing bounty to any steam trawler?

2. If so, by whom was application made, and in respect of what trawler or trawlers?

3. What is the intention of the government with respect of the payment of fishing bounty to steam trawlers?

4. Has any bounty to such been ordered to be paid? If so, when, what amount and to whom?

Mr. BRODEUR :

1. Yes.

2. Application in respect of the steam trawler 'Wren' was made in 1909 by the Pioneer Steam Trawling Company, Limited, Halifax, and in 1910 by the Maritime Fish Corporation, Limited, Canso.

3. It is not the intention in future to pay any fishing bounty to such vessels.

4. Yes, for the season of 1909, $111.50, $44 having been paid to the Pioneer Steam Trawling Company, and $67.50 to the crew.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—NEW BRUNSWICK SECTION.

Mr. CROCKET :

1. What is the general standard of the National Transcontinental railway through New Brunswick, as referred to in the government notice of motion respecting the proposed St. John Valley railway?

2. What is the present estimated total cost per mile of the New Brunswick section of said railway?

Mr. GRAHAM :

1. The general standard of the National Transcontinental railway through the province of New Brunswick comprises a single track railway with necessary sidings of the standard gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches on a roadbed constructed and ballasted in accordance with the general specifications for the construction of the said railway, upon which is the superstructure consisting of steel rails weighing eighty pounds to the lineal yard with steel fastenings and laid on first-class cross-ties. The substructures for bridges are either of concrete or stone, and the superstructure being of steel built in accordance with the provisions of the general specifications for railway bridges issued by the Department of Railways and Canals, 1908 edition. The said railway being constructed with grades not in general exceeding 0·4 per hundred adverse to east bound and 0·6 adverse to the westbound and with curves of a minimum radius of 955 feet. Near Tobique river where same was rendered necessary by the physical features of the country a grade of 1·1 is allowed.

2. The present estimated total cost per mile by construction contract divisions is as follows :

Contract No. 1, extending from the city of Moncton westerly for a distance of about 50 miles is estimated to cost $49,190 per mile.

Contract No. 2, from the west end of contract No. 1 to Chipman, a distance of about 8 miles is estimated to cost $89,710 per mile.

Contract No. 3, from Chipman westerly to crossing of the Intercolonial railway, a distance of about 39·7 miles is estimated to cost $35,333 per mile.

Contract No. 4, from the Intercolonial railway crossing westerly to Tobique river, a distance of about 67 miles is estimated to cost $46,920 per mile.

Contract No. 5 from the Tobique river westerly to about 2½ miles west of Grand Falls, a distance of about 31·5 miles is estimated to cost $133,518 per mile.

Contract No. 6, from 2½ miles west of Grand Falls to boundary between New Brunswick and Quebec, a distance of about 67 miles is estimated to cost $46,484 per mile.

This covers the contract grading items including clearing, excavation, culverts, substructures of bridges, tracklaying, ballasting, ties, signals, interlocking, appliances, telegraph lines, fencing, water supply, track scales, temporary trestles and extra work—also pumps and pump-houses, rails and fastenings, including frogs, switches and diamond crossings, and the steel superstructure and flooring of bridges.

The cost per mile of contract No. 2 is high on account of heavy grading work. At the east end of the contract there is a cut about 2 miles long and 18 feet deep at the highest point. There is also a very heavy fill at the crossing of the Salmon river at mile 57, and a viaduct 1,200 feet long.

The cost per mile on contract No. 5 is high on account of the grading being unusually heavy and there is a steel viaduct nearly 4,000 feet long, and with a maximum height of 250 feet across the Little Salmon river.

MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE.

Mr. FRASER. Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to inquire of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if it is the intention of the government to call a meeting of the Marine and Fisheries Committee of this House. No meeting of that committee has been held since the Christmas holidays, and I have some matters to place before it. I have spoken to the chairman, but cannot get a meeting of the committee. Will the government order a meeting of this committee?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

ATLANTIC, QUEBEC AND WESTERN RAILWAY.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I desire to give an explanation with regard to some figures placed before the House the other day as to the expenditure on the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway. Under the Act governing the granting of subsidies, the usual subsidy given is $3,200 a mile, if the road in question costs $15,000 per mile. After that amount has been reached, subsidies increase by 50 per cent of the additional cost of the road till a maximum subsidy is reached of $6,400 on a total cost of $21,400 a mile. The figures given the other day are those estimated for subsidy purposes and are not necessarily the actual cost of the road. The department always wishes to be sure that the road has cost a sufficient amount to warrant it in paying the subsidy, and, for that purpose, the estimates are made, and the figures given to the House the other day were the figures so obtained. They might be misleading as to the actual money spent on that line or on any other. As the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway has been discussed to a certain extent, I have asked the head of the Audit Branch of the Railway Department to proceed at once to the offices of the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway and make a complete audit of the money spent on the line, so that there may be no misunderstanding on the matter. Also, I have asked the chief engineer to send an engineer over the line to see exactly how much road has been constructed.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I desire to give notice to the government that to-morrow, if they move to go into Committee of Ways and Means, I intend to discuss the question of reciprocity on that occasion, and to prepare the way for the presentation to the House, either to-morrow or at a later date, of an amendment dealing with this question.

DREDGING THE NAPANEE RIVER.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) with reference to the dredging of the Napanee river. This is a matter with which the minister is perfectly familiar. Petitions have been presented to him, and he has had a deputation down here, and has had a great many letters with reference to the state of the navigation of that river. I think last year the minister went so far as to give an order for a dredge to be sent there to do the work. I do not know why they did not go and finish the dredging commenced in 1909. We have certainly established the need for this dredging. The order was given last year to dredge the river ten feet deep with a channel 75 feet wide. But they found that a mistake had been made by the engineer in the previous dredging. Instead of going, just before the dredging was done and making his report on the facts as he found them, he took an old report, made in 1907, and on the basis of that he reported that the water had fallen 18 inches since the time he had made the survey. Consequently, when they came to do the dredging in 1909, it was found that the appropriation was altogether too small. They started to dredge to a depth of 10 feet and a width of 75 feet, but they found their money was giving out, so they ran a narrow channel 25 or 30 feet wide, and that only part of the way. Besides, owing to the narrowness of the channel, the dirt dropping over the edge of the dipper made a bank on either side of the channel. The result is that navigation is reported by some of the captains of vessels using the river, to be worse than it was before the dredging was done. This is a matter of very serious importance to the town of Napanee and vicinity, because we get our coal by water, and the engineer reports that where they have to lighten up vessels so that they may get into the river, they have to pay 15 cents a ton more as freight. I bring this to the attention of the minister so that he may make an announcement of what he intends to do. I was surprised to find that there was no appropriation in the main estimates, as the minister had learned from the reports of his engineers the need for this work. But there are supplementary estimates to come down and I presume there will be an appropriation in these estimates to do this work. Our county is one that gets very little in the way of government money, but we are modest and do not ask for much. But I would like to see a work of such importance as this proceeded with this year. I am sure it was the intention of the minister to proceed with it last year, because he told me, before I left last session, that the order had been given. And I notice in the return brought down that the order is in the papers. I hope the minister will be good enough to make a promise on the subject now.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) called my attention to the necessity for this work of dredging upon the Napanee river, and also that the work was pressed very strongly upon my attention by prominent residents of the town of Napanee and other localities, the people interested in the navigation of the river.

I was also waited upon by a delegation, which urged strongly the importance of the work. I hoped to have been able to continue the work begun under my directions, but I found it was impossible to do it last year, unless urgent work in other localities was neglected. My hon. friend must know that we have only a certain number of dredges, and I thought this was a work which had better be done by a government dredge; but we may find it desirable to engage the services of a private dredge. In case we do that, the work would have to be advertised for, the same as that which has already been done. My hon friend has called my attention to an order made on the 8th of August, 1910. It is quite true that at that time, I expected to be able to continue the work during the past season, and I regretted very much I was not able to do so. As to whether there will be an amount placed in the supplementary estimates for the current year, I am unable to state. I may say, however, that I think it very possible, indeed, I think it very probable, that the work will be undertaken during the coming season, and it is likely that it will be provided for out of the general vote, from an item which is now before parliament for dredging in Ontario and Quebec.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—NEW BRUNSWICK SECTION.

Mr. DANIEL. Referring to an answer just handed over to the member for York, who has had to leave the chamber, he asked me to ask the minister this question in relation to this last part of the answer:

Near the Tobique river where the same was rendered reasonably necessary by the physical features of the country a grading of 1·1 is allowed.

I would ask the minister if that is one of the pusher grades in New Brunswick?

Mr. GRAHAM. 1·1 we call a pusher grade, I think that is one of the pusher grades in New Brunswick.

Mr. DANIEL. Is the minister sure about it?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is my impression.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MONK. Before you leave the Chair I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter of some importance. It seems to me that in the discussion of the question with which the House is now seized, the members require the fullest possible information, and at the stage at which this discussion has arrived, I think that perhaps what will throw most light upon the subject of this trade agreement, and will, perhaps more powerfully sway the members of this House in their decision, is the production of all the correspondence had before and during the negotiations. In this, as in many other matters, the government, I think, shows an unwillingness to deal fairly with this House, and upon this point particularly, to give us without niggardliness, whatever correspondence we require. Let me illustrate this point. Yesterday I asked the government for the production of all the correspondence had since the last letters were laid upon the table, and let me recall the answer of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance:

Mr. MONK. I desire to ask the government if they will table any correspondence had with the American government since the last batch of correspondence was laid upon the table. I understand there has been an exchange of letters, and that notably since what is known as the Champ Clark utterance, there has been some correspondence, letters addressed, I believe, to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), or it may be, to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). I think that all this correspondence up to the present moment should be tabled.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) refers to some correspondence which the Minister of Finance has had in relation to the Champ Clark utterance?

Mr. MONK. I said that amongst other things it was said that there had been an exchange of letters in regard to that question between the Secretary of State of the United States and my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. FIELDING. There is not a shadow of foundation for that statement.

Mr. MONK. Has there been any correspondence?

Mr. FIELDING.

Note this sibylline answer:

If there is any correspondence in relation to this matter with the United States authorities, properly the subject of consideration by this House, it will always be brought down.

Well, does my hon. friend not think—because he knew it—that when he gave that answer, he might have told the House that there had been correspondence? 'If there is any correspondence.' But he adds another qualification. He assumes to himself and to his colleagues, the right of saying whether that correspondence should be brought down; he and his colleagues will be the sole judges as to what should be given of that correspondence, and what should not. 'If there is any.' I submit to you that that is not a tenable attitude. All correspondence of any nature whatever bearing upon this question, we, who are called upon to ratify this treaty, have a right to see. Now, let me add another word, and I speak in the judgment of the members of this House. This question has already passed through quite a range of discussion and deliberation. When my hon. friends returned from the United States, and when we had the first news of their negotiations issued, not only here but in the United States, the discussions and opinions freely given were as to the value of these schedules, what were the concessions made on each side, and nothing else. Then there came a second phase, and we were invited by the public press of both countries, and by those who spoke upon this subject, to give our opinion in regard to the broader question raised by this agreement, that is its effect on trade generally between the two countries, and more particularly on the transportation question. Then it entered upon another phase, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that to-day the discussion has assumed much larger proportions. We are treated in the newspapers of the neighbouring republic, and of our own to a consideration almost exclusively of the ultimate effect of this agreement upon our political relations. Open these newspapers and see what our public men have to say: the utterances which they make turn upon this point. Is this going to lead to annexation, yes or no? I do not insist on that point, but I say that is what it has come to. Look at the trend of discussion in the United States, open their newspapers, and in every part of that country, it is not the schedules, it is not the particular bearing of this treaty upon the interchange of the natural products of both countries, it is annexation, and nothing else. We have seen what Mr. Champ Clark said. I hear a laugh on the other side. Do my hon. friends find that a droll utterance? For my part I do not. We have that utterance coming from a man, who may be an incurable humourist, but who occupies a position very much the same as my right hon. friend does here, or as the leader of the opposition. It is true that the motion made in the House of Representatives by Mr. Bennett did not emanate from a man possessing similar authority : but from what I see in the United States papers, that gentleman holds a certain position in the Congress of the United States. His proposals were not accepted, but although they were condemned on many sides, they were treated seriously. The entire press of the country, the deliberations in the legislatures recently again—perhaps you saw in the reports of this morning the reference to the legislature of Dakota—lead one to believe that they at least, in perfect good faith perhaps, look upon the real question at the back of this agreement as a question of annexation. In our own newspapers it is very much the same thing. Led on by the discussions, by the trend of public opinion here, they are discussing that question in our own country, and when we read the reports which have arrived here, the telegraphic despatches from the other side of the Atlantic, we find that in England they have taken this question quite seriously, interpolations are made in the House there on the subject, and evidently the least one can say is that this phase of the question has created unrest in a country where we would be glad, I may say, to think that there is no doubt as to the attitude of this country.

Are we entirely blameless in this matter? Are the gentlemen who have brought about these negotiations, and the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself able to throw stones right and left? We know what utterances in the past, because we have heard a great deal in and out of the House, have fallen in moments of forgetfulness, probably, from the right hon. gentleman. The difference between a British shilling and an American dollar, ripe fruit falling from the tree, continental free trade—all these matters have been dished up very often, and although I know my hon. friend is not an incurable humorist there was at that time some seriousness in what he said. And my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in that respect, has been a very hardened sinner, I think, because I have not heard him recant, when, time and again in this House, he has been charged with utterances, in the long ago days; of course, in favour of secession and annexation, I think, too.

Mr. FIELDING. I take exception to the statement of the hon. gentleman. When the hon. gentleman says that I was ever an annexationist he is fabricating a statement which no man in this House can substantiate.

Mr. MONK. I assure my hon. friend that I am very glad to hear him make that statement.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman should not be content with that; he should show some warrant for his statement.

Mr. MONK. I could show warrant, if we had the debates of the House in past years, for the statement, that time and again my hon. friend has been charged with holding and expressing in his province views of that kind.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend, I can assure him, is mistaken. I have never been charged in my presence until this moment.

Mr. MONK. If my hon. friend states that he has nothing to retract——

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

An hon. MEMBER. Send and get the book.

Mr. MONK. It will be all right.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. MONK. With pleasure. But my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) himself, when younger, in his green and salad days, spoke in that way sometimes. My hon. friend knows it, but he has recanted, he has abjured and denied and the most rigid of casuists would find nothing that would be regarded as a blot on his reputation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. With the permission of the hon. member from Jacques Cartier, I will ask him to what he is referring?

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend has often seen quoted, has he not, in the newspapers of the French language in our province, speeches of his own in which he spoke in the sense that I have indicated?

Mr. LEMIEUX. In what sense?

Mr. MONK. I have the whole paraphernalia here and I can get it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In what sense.

Mr. MONK. In the sense of annexation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I now rise to a point of order. I wish to state most emphatically that my hon. friend is in error. I have never, directly or indirectly, expressed any sentiment, by word of mouth or by writing, in favour of the annexation of Canada to the United States. My hon. friend, if he will allow me just one minute, may have in his mind a speech which I delivered in 1893 at Parc Sohmer, in Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will explain the incident. In 1893 the St. Jean Baptiste Society of Montreal had organized a public meeting in order to promote the erection of a building called the Monument National, and a public debate was arranged for by the then president of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, the late Mr. J. X. Perrault. This debate was purely academic.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. Four speakers were selected to discuss the following questions: Statu quo, independence, imperial federation and annexation. I was allotted the privilege——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX—of discussing the question of the independence of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My late friend, Mr. Archibald McGoun, King's Counsel, was given charge of the imperial federation question; my late friend, Mr. Cardinal, King's Counsel, of Montreal, was assigned to the discussion of the question of statu quo; the question of annexation was taken up by a good Ontario King's counsel, Mr. Elgin Myers. The public was given——

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. May I ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The public was given a chance to vote on the four questions.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The minister (Mr. Lemieux) is speaking with the permission of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not——

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am making a statement.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, it is customary in this House, when a member rises in his place and interrupts a speaker, to ask a question, and not to make a speech. Therefore, I claim that the hon. Postmaster General is entirely out of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has the floor. He has consented to allow the minister to give an explanation, but the hon. member for Jacques Cartier can resume the debate whenever he wishes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The public was given a chance to vote——

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX—and in connection therewith a certain sum of money was subscribed. I may say that the question of the independence of Canada triumphed that evening. It was a purely academic debate and I would not be afraid, when the occasion arises in this House, to quote my speech from beginning to end. It has been fully reported in the Toronto 'Mail and Empire' and in the press of the country, but as regards annexation, I have always been opposed to it.

Mr. MONK. There is no doubt we are often misjudged in public life, but if I were to pursue this examination of conscience with my hon. friends I am afraid I would take up more of the time of the House than I deem it necessary to. I would have liked had he been present to say something about our friend the Nihilist; the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who at one time earned in our province the cognomen of the Nihilst, because he would concede nothing and claimed everything, and he thought that if we wanted to defend ourselves in this country the home government itself ought to purchase the arms for us, because we could not afford to spend the money.

Mr. TALBOT. How long ago was that?

Mr. MONK. Oh, not so very long ago. Of course I know that to-day his repentance has been complete and we know him now as an admiral. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt upon one point; there is in the United States amongst people best disposed towards us, those whom we meet when we go there, a disposition to think we are not in possession of freedom here. I have noticed it time and again, and other gentlemen of this House must also have noticed that there is a disposition to think that we in Canada require something politically better. Probably their minds are filled with the memory of other days and times when colonial relations were not such as they are to-day. Undoubtedly that feeling exists in the neighbouring republic. Would it not be right for us before we proceed any further in this matter to accentuate precisely our position at this moment. I have not studied in diplomatic schools and I do not claim to know exactly how relations must be conducted between free nations, but I suppose they must be likened to a certain extent to the relations between individuals, and if I had a business proposal to make to a man I would not be very much flattered if, having my proposal before him, he should discuss the question of annexing me and causing my identity to disappear. It seems to me that we will do a great deal in this country to quiet a feeling of legitimate anxiety which exists if we now voice what is exactly the feeling of the country, because I have no hesitation in saying that there is not a public body in Canada that would not, upon this question, declare themselves, as it seems to me we ought to declare ourselves now. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without wishing to delay in any way the interesting discussion which was going on yesterday, I beg to move that the following words be added to the main motion in your hands:

But, before resuming the discussion of the terms of the agreement concluded between the government of Canada and the President of the United States, and with a view to dispel the feeling of unrest created in Canada by comments made in both countries as to the political consequence of the agreement, the House wishes to affirm emphatically its determination to preserve intact the bonds which unite Canada to the British Empire, and the full liberty of Canada to control her fiscal policy and internal automony.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident that the incorrigible jokers or humorists, as my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) styled them, are not all on the other side of the line; we have some of them in Canada. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has spoken of some friend of mine on this side of the House who gave expression to certain utterances in his green and salad days, but we have all been young, and for my own part I am ready to confess that I have had my green and salad days too. However, they are over by this time with me, although it would seem that there are some men who are always in their green and salad days, no matter how mature in years they may be. I need not mention who the man is on that side of the House who is still in his green and salad days. Sir, this discussion in which we are now engaged has given rise to a great deal of comment on both sides of the line. Men there are on the other side of the line who have interpreted this arrangement as meaning ultimately the annexation of Canada to the United States. Men there are on this side of the line who have taken the same position, but I am glad to say there is not one man on this side of the House who has ever thought of such a thing. It appears that men there are on the side of the House on which my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) sits whose views upon this question are disturbed, and who believe that in the discussion of this question of a better trade arrangement between us and our neighbours the Canadian people would be so wanting in self-respect that they might be driven beyond an agreement so wise in itself to a conclusion which the hon. gentleman dreads. If there are such men in this chamber I repeat that they do not sit on this side of the House. But if it is necessary, in order to strengthen the wavering faith of the hon. gentlemen who sit with and around my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), for my part I have no objection whatever to accept the present motion and to say that this discussion will not in any way affect or jeopardize the allegiance of this country to the mother land. Surely, it is not worth while discussing that; surely there was no necessity for this motion. It affirms a principle which everybody is persuaded of and which no one needed to affirm, but in order to make it doubly sure, in order to affirm not only to this country but to the other side also that this discussion in which we are now engaged does not mean what has been stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) it may mean, I shall for my part vote for his motion and I hope all on this side of the House will vote for it also. I have to say to my hon. friend that all the correspondence that has taken place on this question has been brought down. Why should we not bring it down? What object could we have to serve by keeping anything from this House. I do not know as to whether Mr. Fielding or Mr. Paterson, or somebody else has received a private letter or letters, but any correspondence in the hands of the government has been laid before the House. I have only to say, Sir, that we will vote for this resolution.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I did not know that my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) proposed to introduce this motion until after he had come into the House to-day, and therefore, I did not prepare to speak upon it. I would like to say, however, that it would seem to me to have been a wise course for the Prime Minister, if he thinks that conditions at the present time are such as to justify him in accepting this motion, to have brought it in as Prime Minister of this country, and to have asked the parliament of Canada, and the people of Canada to accept it. But my right hon. friend appears to have departed to-day from the line of argument which he took some years ago in accepting this motion. He says that there is no danger, and that the people of Canada realize that there is no danger, and that there is no man in this House who realizes that there is any danger. The loyalty of the Canadian people does not need to be affirmed; but let me tell my right

hon. friend that if these proposals of his mean anything, in my judgment, they mean, in the end that commercial union for which he fought in 1891, and concerning which a man who was his leader for some years, and whom he followed in this House, and in this country, made a memorable declaration over his signature, in a letter published immediately after the election of 1891. Hon. Edward Blake, to whom I refer, had no doubt that commercial union would lead to, would end in the political absorption of Canada into the United States which the right hon. gentleman says is not a danger to-day. My right hon. friend touched with a very light hand some very notable utterances which have been made in the Congress of the United States. I will not deal with the press comment in the United States ; I have seen a great deal of it. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier is perfectly right when he says that press opinion in the United States in very many influential quarters is supporting these proposals, not upon economic considerations, but for the reason that they will undoubtedly lead to the political absorption of this country into the United States ; and in that they are of course simply following the line which Mr. Blake took in 1891 when he said that commercial union meant in the end political union. The Prime Minister was inclined to refer in a somewhat jocular way to the utterances of Mr. Champ Clark in the House of Representatives of the United States. There was a very mysterious silence about those utterances in a certain part of the press of the United States immediately after they had been made. As far as one could judge, it was an inspired silence. I find that on the day following those utterances there were press despatches in nearly all the newspapers of Canada, which were designed to lead the people of this country to suppose that Mr. Champ Clark had made those utterances in a jocular way. I took the very first opportunity of examining the 'Congressional Record' to ascertain if possible from the context whether those utterances were serious or jocular, and I will read them to this House from the 'Congressional Record,' with a portion of the context, and hon. gentlemen can judge for themselves whether they were serious or not. It is perfectly true that this gentleman occupies a very important place in the United States at the present time. He is the leader of the Democratic party in the House of Representatives, and it is believed that he will be the Speaker of that House in the new Congress. The vote upon this reciprocity agreement divided the Republican party. A majority of the Republican party voted against it —if I remember rightly, 87 voted against it, and 78 for it. Mr. Clark made his appeal to the Democratic party, with the result that 142 members of that party besides himself voted for the agreement, and I think only five Democrats voted against it. So that the appeal that carried the Democratic party in the United States House of Representatives to vote for the agreement was the appeal contained in the speech of Mr. Champ Clark. What was that appeal? I will read what Mr. Champ Clark said, as reported at page 2623 of the 'Congressional Record' of the 14th of February, 1911 :

> The chief thing that this country needs in its business is a wider market, and I am in favour of this reciprocity Bill because it gives wider markets to American products. That will be one great point gained. Considered as a whole, our exports are large, but our per capita exports are smaller than those of any other great commercial nation on earth, which is not a healthy condition.

You will observe that there is no humour thus far ; everything is matter of fact and plain and serious. He continues :

> As much as any other living man I desire to see them increased. Therefore I am for this Bill, because it will increase our exports. I am in favour of this Bill because it establishes closer trade relations with one of our nearest neighbours, and the closer trade relations you have with your neighbours the better off you are.

No humour—nothing of a jocular character, thus far.

> When Thomas Jefferson delivered his first inaugural on the 4th day of March, 1801, he enunciated the principles upon which this government should be conducted, and one of the principles was: 'Peace, commerce and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none.'

No humour there, and nothing of a jocular nature thus far ; and, by the way, the last clause of that sentence in particular would be a very good motto for Canada at the present time. He continues :

> That has been the mainspring of our policy ever since, or should have been. We have spent or will spend somewhere in the neighbourhood of $500,000,000 to build the Panama canal. Therefore I am in favour of the reciprocity treaty to promote our trade relations. That is what we spent that money for. We are not spending that vast sum because we are altrinsto but as a business matter.

I do not observe anything of a jocular or humorous character in Mr. Clark's remarks up to this point. Then he continues :

> I am for it, because I hope to see the day the American flag will float over every square foot of the British North America possessions clear to the north pole.

I do not observe anything which would lead me to believe that that remark was made in a humorous or jocular vein. There is not the slightest indication of it. Then he continues :

They are people of our blood. They speak our language. Their institutions are much like ours. They are trained in the difficult art of self-government. My judgment is that if the treaty of 1854 had never been abrogated the chances of a consolidation of these two countries would have been much greater than they are now.

Then he was interrupted with a question :

Mr. MARTIN, of South Dakota. Will the gentleman favour the abrogation of our tariff law entirely so far as Canada is concerned, and making free trade with Canada on all products?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. By taking Canada in to become a part of the United States; yes.

There was nothing apparently humorous or jocular in that statement. Further on he was interrupted in this way:

Mr. NORTON. I wanted to ask the gentleman something along the lines of universal peace. As I understand it, the gentleman favours this Bill for at least one reason, that it will have a tendency in the end to bring Canada into the union.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Yes, I have no doubt about that.

Mr. MORRIS. Will that have a tendency to preserve peace with Great Britain?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Why, certainly it will. I do not have any doubt whatever that the day is not far distant when Great Britain will joyfully see all of her North American possessions become a part of this republic. That is the way things are tending now.

It is thus clear that Mr. Clark's observations were perfectly serious and were part of a serious discussion.

There are a great many other observations in Mr. Clark's speech of a very important character so far as the economic features of this proposed arrangement are concerned. I do not intend to go into these to-day, but shall later on for the purpose of showing that the government could not have chosen a more inopportune time and occasion for entering into these negotiations. Mr. Clark distinctly declared that in addition to his reasons which I have already quoted, for desiring that this treaty should be accepted, he considered it merely an instalment of the tariff changes which the Democratic party were prepared to carry out the moment they had control of Congress. In other words, when the Democratic party gets control of Congress, they would, if we had not been in such haste, have given us every advantage we might possibly gain under this treaty, and it would not have been necessary for this country to make any of the sacrifices entailed by the proposal now before parliament. The whole situation as at present developed, shows in what an unfortunate position the government have placed the country when it brings down a tariff to parliament and says you must accept or reject it as a whole. There is a very radical difference between a secret tariff made by diplomatic methods and a tariff proposed to parliament to be considered and passed under the ordinary parliamentary procedure prevailing in this country and in the United Kingdom. In the one case, as in 1894, 1897 and 1907, the government comes to parliament with proposals that have been worked out by the government themselves, and which they present to parliament for its serious consideration; and in the instances to which I have alluded dozens of amendments, and on at least one occasion, hundreds of amendments, were made to the proposals as brought down. But in the present instance, no discretion of the kind is left us. We are told by the government that they have secretly consented to a certain arrangement, which may work injustice to us in many ways, but which we must either reject or approve as a whole. We are in fact asked to give our approval merely as a matter of form. As the right hon. gentleman himself said in 1895 with regard to a somewhat similar transaction: We must either swallow or reject it, holus bolus. It is unfortunate that the government should have placed parliament in such a situation. A tariff worked out in secret by diplomatic methods and then presented in such a way as to preclude any amendment or alteration by this House is bound to lead to dissatisfaction and trouble. Further than that, I am firmly persuaded that it would have been much wiser for Canada and for the United States each to deal with its own tariff in every instance, as seemed best without any understanding of this kind. I venture to affirm that an arrangement of this kind, adopted under such conditions cannot fail to lead to complications, irritation and discontent, and to a disturbance of the good relations which have up to the present prevailed between the two countries. An experiment of this kind has been tried before. It has been tried between the dominions of the empire under the British flag, and experience has shown that it has led to irritation, friction and dissatisfaction.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (York). I propose to say a few words on this question from the national standpoint which has induced my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) to submit this resolution. As regards the suggestion that the proposed arrangement contains the germ of annexation to the United States, I believe it does, but I believe also that Canadians are strong enough in their devotion to their country to reject any proposal in the direction of annexation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). But what are the circumstances under which this proposal comes before us. A new departure in constitutional government is being introduced. In the old days the King was supreme, and then came the lords and gradually the commons came to have control, and to-day in the old country all the powers are about to be taken by the House of Commons in the interests of the people. But in this country another great development is taking place, and we are asked to give exclusively into the hands of the cabinet the power of making the tariff. That is a crime against the constitution, against the rights of the people, greater than ever attempted heretofore in this House. In the old days, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), has said, this House had the right to control all money Bills whether for the expending of money or the raising of money for revenue purposes. But to-day we have reached such a stage that the cabinet and the Prime Minister, in an irresponsible way and without consulting this House, frame our tariff and tell us that we must either accept it without amendment or reject it. Well, if there be anything which is of national importance, it is that parliament should control all money Bills and the making of our tariff. But here we have had negotiations carried on in Washington culminating with an agreement with regard to the tariff. That tariff was brought down and we are told that we cannot change it, but must take it as presented. Even the screws are put on the government side, and they are given no opportunity of saying what they think about it. In fact a closure is put on the whole House and the whole country, and we are told that we must accept this tariff proposal without any change whatever. As has been said a few moments ago, every other tariff Bill has been submitted to this House as a government measure, open to explanation, discussion and amendment. Deputations were heard with regard to it, their suggestions were considered, some were adopted and changes made. Other delegations came that were affected by the amendment, and they were heard. And so, after a great deal of talk, after many amendments, after everybody was heard, the new tariff Bill was voted and carried—the result of a compromise, as every tariff Bill ought to be. But here, for the first time in the history of this House, a tariff Bill is laid before us, the result of surreptitious negotiation between the Prime Minister, who is the new czar of this country, and the czar of the United States, and the people of the whole of North America are committed to a tariff proposal to which there is to be no amendment, negotiated by the czars of the two countries. There is a feeling in the United States, as there is here, that if our tariffs are to be made for us in this way, and if they are to be made for us in Washington, as in this case, the people of Canada, or the parliament of Canada not being consulted, then, on the face of it, the tendency of such a proposal is toward the destruction of our national autonomy and our gradually absorption into the United States. I have not any doubt that that will be the result of this proposal. And that that will be the effect the people of the United States believe—not only the members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States, but men, business men generally. And I take that fact from a friend who has recently come from New York, and who has been in touch with business men there. He tells me that the biggest men there regard the proposal as one step on the road to annexation. And if this proposal realizes, or tends to realize, the view expressed by Mr. Champ Clark as to the American flag waving over the whole of North America, is it not reasonable that the United States should be prepared to make tariff concessions to that end? On the other hand, we, by adopting this proposal, say in effect that, for a tariff consideration, for a money consideration, we will endanger our nationality. Is not our nationality endangered if, when a tariff Bill is to be made, word is sent to the Canadian government to send delegates to Washington to look after our interests? It means, if this proposal is carried, that never in the future can there be another tariff Bill introduced in this House without the consent of the people of the United States. This country will be indubitably committed to such a principle if this proposition is accepted. Never, hereafter, can any move be made in connection with the tariff without first sending to Washington to enter into secret negotiations with them. And never again—and this is the most significant thing of all if this method is to be continued, which I hope it will not be—never again will the people of Canada have the opportunity they have always had heretofore of discussing a tariff measure as introduced in this House, amending it, compromising on it, or adopting it as we see fit. That is the thing that is ahead of the people of Canada to-day—that they are losing absolutely their tariff independence.

Mr. TALBOT. Even with a change of government?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). No, not with a change of government. But, adopt this proposal and the people of Canada, forever after, if hon. gentlemen opposite have their way, will have their tariff proposals brought into this House for discussion, but beyond amendment. Those questions will not be for settlement in Canada, but for settlement by surreptitious negotiations carried on in Washington—and we have, shall have, to be satisfied with that which goes to the lesser as compared with the greater. And once they start to break us down in that connection, all legislation proposed in this House will be on that basis: Come to Washington and have a secret negotiation, and we will give you something that you must take to the parliament of Canada to be passed holus bolus. That is the danger of our situation, and it is the greatest danger that ever came to us. It is a great change, an enormous change, an organic change—and the proposal is introduced in this House without ever consulting the people with regard to it. Surely, a Liberal party, surely a party headed by one who has made the professions made by the leader of this House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), would say that if there is to be an organic change, a change of autonomy, it should be only after the people have been consulted by a general election. But there is nothing of that kind. If there is a warrant, as was said a few moments ago by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), the only warrant for this change is that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his friends from 1887 to 1892 were advocates of commercial union. But when they proposed commercial union to the people of this country it was repudiated. Years after the government abandoned it. But, like the dog returning to its vomit, in this quiet and surreptitious way the proposal is made to resume these commercial union negotiations and to put Canada into a commercial union with the United States. And what was the folly of the right hon. gentleman—mention has been made here of 'green and salad days'—what was the folly of his political manhood has to-day become the suicidal madness of his later years, a thing that will bring himself and his party to destruction. I have no doubt that the people of this country to-day are determined to maintain their political autonomy, and above all to make their own tariffs. In that view the people of Canada will repudiate the right hon. gentleman's party in the next election, as they did in the election of 1891. For the proposal which is made—I say it again and insist upon it—means the surrender of our tariff autonomy. I got that idea from my late father, who, in discussing these questions in the old days, constantly insisted on the idea that if Canada was ever to pass beyond the tutelage of the old colonial position, as we have done, it must be by absolute control of her own tariff. We fought it out in this country and took away the control of our tariff from the mother country, and it was the greatest assertion of Canadian independence that was ever made. To-day the government of this country proposes to give up that independence and hand that autonomy over to our rivals of the United States. That certainly is not in the line of progress, and yet that is the proposal to-day—that the old commercial union idea should be revived, that our tariff is to be made in the United States, and that the people of Canada are to have no voice in it. Can that be justified on any grounds? Will anybody say that a surreptitious treaty made by two or three representatives of each nation can take in the broad national aspect of the tariff? Why, in this country, it is proposed that we should have a permanent tariff board. In the United States that has become a practical question—to have a board of tariff experts to deal with the tariff in order that the very fullest consideration may be given to every element of every question arising, that witnesses may be called, that interests may be heard, and tariff schedules worked out that will best meet the conditions. Instead of all that, this new and tyrannical view of the constitution is to be asserted in this country, and people are never again—because it is not for this session or this tariff alone—to have a voice in parliament as to making the tariff, or as to the interpretation of any single item in it. Never was there such an abandonment of national rights and national autonomy as is contained in this Bill; never did any man who calls himself a Canadian have more reason to be ashamed when he sees such a proposal made in the House of Commons of Canada, a proposal to abandon our tariff autonomy and to hand it over to the people of the United States. Well may the people of the United States afford to make tariff concessions. They can tell their farmers: Yes, we are going to let in Canadian farm products, even if they do damage you, because we are not looking at the tariff; we are looking at the effect of this arrangement on national questions, at the effect it will have in raising the Stars and Stripes from Mexico to the Arctic ocean. Now, another aspect which has been raised by this discussion—

Mr. TALBOT. I rise to a point of order, as I see the hon. gentleman is proceeding with his speech. A moment ago he referred to the Liberal party, to the party on this side of the House, as a dog returning to his vomit. I want to know, Mr. Speaker, if you consider that expression parliamentary.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Certainly in no offensive sense at all, but in the ordinary sense in which it is used in English literature; and if the hon. gentleman was a little more conversant with English literature, he would see there is nothing offensive in the term in the sense in which I used it.

Mr. SPEAKER. My ruling is that it is a figure of speech.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Even if you had told me I was out of order——

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman does not use the expression in an offensive way.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Certainly not.

Mr. TALBOT. Then it is an after dinner expression.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Now let me come to the continental aspect of this great question. There are two systems of government on this continent to-day; there is the American system and there is the Canadian or British system. What is the difference between them, and where are we likely to land if the Canadian system should disappear? The British system of government as exemplified in the old land, and more or less exemplified in Canada, is an unlimited system of government. Certainly in the old country they can do anything the people desire, they can carry out any view that the people may hold. Let me compare that system with the United States system. In the United States the government is limited in every way and problems that arise there cannot be dealt with. Under the British system they can be dealt with, and are being dealt with, as we see to-day where great social and economical questions are being handled and carried out. In the United States the dominant idea is the exploitation of the resources of the country, the exploitation of its natural resources by the great interests. In England and in Canada more attention is paid to social and economic conditions; but in the United States everybody is devoting his time and energy to the exploitation of the natural resources of the country, and of the public interests by the great corporations. As a consequence of this condition of things, affairs have come to a rather bad mess in the United States, and now we find that the Senate of the United States has gradually absorbed most of the powers of government. Even the integrity of the courts has been questioned, and the control of the legislatures has passed into the hands, to some extent, of the interests. We see now a great magazine movement in the United States, the object of which is to restore the old time conditions and to get them into better shape. They point out that a marvellous change has come about in the last 20 or 25 years, and that the old democracy which existed in that country from the inception of the union down to the period of the great civil war, has disappeared. In former days there was a political equality, one man's vote and influence were as good as another's. Now all that has disappeared. The great interests have control of the legislatures; they have control of the courts, and to such an extent, that the old democratic equality of political power as between individuals no longer obtains, but all power is centred in the great interests, or in what are called the political machines. That is a thing to be deplored. But there is worse than that. There is no longer any democracy of opportunity in the United States, no longer is there any democracy of wealth, all that has disappeared. In the old days one man's wealth was almost equal to another's, but to-day there is an enormous concentration of wealth in the hands of a few. The control of a great many institutions dealing with the savings of the people has absolutely passed to Wall street, the control of the savings of the people vested in insurance companies has passed to Wall street. To-day things are so bad that the people are almost on the verge of revolution. And yet, Sir, at the very time when this great political upheaval is in sight, we propose to enter into closer relations with the people of the United States, and to put the control of our tariff into their hands. When the inevitable disorder and revolution come about, they will have control of our tariff, and where will we be? We will be dealing with a nation whose record shows them to be not over careful or over scrupulous in the way they handle questions of that kind. They would say: The best way to put down a revolution at home is to extend the American flag all over the continent. That is really the proposal that we are dealing with to-day; they wish to divert public attention from domestic troubles, and to turn it upon this question of trade relations with Canada.

In the past we know that they were not friendly to us. The people of the United States drove out the United Empire Loyalists, who made this country. They invaded this country more than once, they allowed the Fenians to invade this country and the dream of every American statesman to-day is the unification of the continent. They have the plan all laid out for taking over Mexico any day, but they say that with Mexico in its present condition the people are too yellow for them and they propose to counterbalance them with the white people of Canada and bring the two countries in together. Will anybody deny that such a feeling is existing over there? I have read it time and again. The republican party of the United States have refused to entertain a proposal to extend their states farther until a Canadian counterbalance of white people is brought about. Look at the construction of the Panama canal. What is the object of that but the continentalization of the whole of America. They have gradually dipped their hands into the affairs of every little republic in Central America. Morgan, the other day, financed Honduras for the purpose of making it easy to secure American control of the Panama canal. They are building that canal and they are going to dominate the whole of Central America. They took over the Panama belt, not by any right, but by an Act of acquisition, and rough-shod acquisition at that. They are ready to take over Mexico, but they want Canada as an offset. Continentalism is the dream of every American. I do not blame them at all for having such dreams, but I do blame my fellow-countrymen who will aid and abet such dreams by setting down to make a tariff with them to the disadvantage of Canada, the result of which will be that we shall have to go to Washington to make the future tariffs of this country.

Mr. DEVLIN. Was that sentiment existing in the States in 1894?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I cannot say what were the sentiments in 1894; I say that the sentiment that exists to-day is continentalism.

Mr. DEVLIN. Will the hon. gentleman explain why, in this House, in 1894, Sir John Thompson, then Prime Minister of Canada, made use of these words:

> The hon. gentleman says we could have a greater trade than that by throwing down the tariff wall. He goes on the old fallacy, which we have had put forward in this country for ten years, that all we have to do is to pass a statute and have reciprocity with the United States. By all means, if the regulation of the trade with a foreign country is in the hands of this parliament, let us pass a statute and have reciprocity right away.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Reciprocity brought about by the independent action of each House, or rather a tariff made by each House that gives us free trade no one can blame because then each party could act absolutely in its own interest. If such a tariff resulted in promoting trade I could not say anything against it, because it might be a benefit to this country, but to sit down surreptitiously, not openly, and make a tariff without consulting the Canadian people, is a crime against this country, and the country will hold every man responsible who attempts to do it. The tendency of this proposition is towards annexation. The hope of the world is the domination and success of the British system of politics, that system of government which we have inherited from the old land. There is more thought of humanity and progress in the British association of free states like the mother country, Canada and Australia, than in anything else. There is no hope for humanity in the domination of the American republic over the whole of this continent. They are not taking up any of the great questions of to-day. They are not fighting the battles of humanity, they are not fighting the battle of the heathen or the oppressed in the distant continents of Africa or Asia. The hope of humanity in the British system, and one of the bulwarks of the British system is the maintenance of Canadian nationality on the northern half of this continent. There is danger of our Canadian nationality being injured by appeals being made to the people based on their pocket rather than on their nationality, appeals where there is no deliberation, where there is no amendment and no compromise. I say as a Canadian, what I said in opening my speech here to-day, that I have little fear of annexation resulting as some people think. But there is one section of this community that I wish to make an appeal to to-day. Perhaps I will not be credited with much earnestness in making the suggestion, but I do make the suggestion to my fellow-countrymen who live in the province of Quebec, who are of the French race and who value above all the autonomy which they have to-day. I say that anything that tends in the direction of annexation, or if annexation should ever come as the result of these proposals, it means good-bye to the people of Quebec with regard to the autonomy that they have to-day. It will be wiped out like a flash in the night.

Mr. TALBOT. We thank you for the advice.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I knew I would meet that statement from some one, but I say to the people of Quebec that they had better pause when an organic proposal of that kind is being made and not allow themselves to be led into the support of such a proposal because it means the end of their autonomy and any other autonomy within the limits of Canada will disappear later on. To-day is the day to put in a protest, and if the people of Quebec love their institutions, their language and their rights, as I believe they do, they will see to it—and this is to be my amendment later on.

Mr. DEVLIN. Why does the hon. gentleman appeal to Quebec?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I have the right, I hope. They are my fellow-countrymen, as much as you are, and if the opportunity is presented to me——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). If the opportunity is presented to me to say a word for the province of Quebec, which is one of the best provinces we have in Canada—

Mr. DEVLIN. And one of the most loyal.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). One of the most loyal to its institutions. But, if the North America Act, which gives autonomy to these people, is to be destroyed in its most significant clause which gives us control of our tariff and we give that away to the people of the United States what next is to come? Thus I say to the people of Quebec that we have this great organic change proposed in this House and we have hardly a single Quebec member who enters a protest.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). If the old Tory party in England had had its way how much autonomy would the province of Quebec have had to-day?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Thank God, I am not responsible for the old Tory party. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen on the other side are. Certainly the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is not; I will give him credit for being a progressive Liberal.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I would like to know why the hon. gentleman appeals to Quebec?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I have given you my reasons. They have, within the British constitution, certain rights and privileges of their own and if our constitution is to be broken down—

Mr. TALBOT. If.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes, and it is proposed here to-day to do that because it will mean that Canada will never again have a word to say in the making of her tariff. This is a great organic change the effect of which will be that we shall never have a word to say in the making of our tariff but that we shall have to go to Washington for instructions. Again, I say to the people of Quebec, pause now before this thing is done, let us take time to deliberate and then it must not be carried until the people of Canada have had a chance to register their voice on the question.

Mr. TALBOT. Why do you not publish a French edition of the 'World?'

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The hon. gentleman is too humorous; if he has no better argument than that, I will not take up my time by answering him. But, if we are to abandon the control of our tariff and give it to the United States, it should not be done without a mandate from the people. There has been no mandate. The right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), may think he has a mandate. He knows what happened in 1891, when commercial union was repudiated, and he has no right to resurrect that at this time of day without consulting the people in a general election. Does he propose to do it? Will he go to the people on this question? I challenge him to-day to face the people of Canada on this question. There are certain things that a government can take in its own hands; it can lead the people into war and it may have to do it, but the government has no right to make a great organic policy change without consulting the people. Twice has the English government recently gone to the people and they say they have the mandate of the people, and Mr. Asquith, the Liberal leader in Great Britain, is pressing a great constitutional amendment this very day, on what he declares to be the mandate of the people. Is the right hon. the Prime Minister pressing this proposal before us to-day on the mandate of the people? I challenge him to stand up and say that he is. I say that he is abandoning the rights of the Canadian people. He is handing over our commercial integrity to our neighbours and in doing that, he is doing an unconstitutional thing. Again, I tell the people of Quebec that if our privilege in this parliament in regard to the tariff is to go, they will see what may happen to them later on. It is for the people of this country, (not to say perhaps that this nation shall be abandoned for ever), but it ought to be the duty of every man in this House to vote for a proposal that the consideration of this issue shall go further, only when the people shall be given an opportunity to speak in regard to it. To prove how deep my idea of Canadian nationality is, I repeat that we Canadians are on this continent to stay. I believe there is room on this great North American continent for at least two free and independent communities, based on English ideas of government, and that Canada is, must, and shall be one of these—by the grace of our neighbours if they choose to accord it; in spite of them if we must. That is the true idea of Canadian nationality. I have no fear that even while these proposals of the government tend in the direction of annexation or in the direction of commercial union, that the people of Canada, especially the young men and young women of this newer and greater Dominion, will ever have any other aim than the domination of the northern half of the continent by Canadians and by the maintenance of Canadian institutions in alliance with the old land. In a single night that great imperial idea of the mother land and the daughter states being associated, disappears, and the whole thing starts to slide down the hill if we move in the direction of commercial union. I have spoken from the constitutional and national point of view and later on I purpose telling how this arrangement affects my own riding, my own city and my own province, and how it destroys the industry of the market gardeners around the city of Toronto, who are constituents of mine; an industry laboriously built up by these industrious people. Already the land they cultivate has fallen in value, for fear of this arrangement. The same thing happens with regard to the fruit growers in the Niagara district. Even to-day the future of Toronto is changed by this proposal, and Canadian manufacturers, with annexation in view, are not going to increase their capital and their industries. But the greatest danger of all is to our transportation industry. The transportation of Canada moves east and west and capital moves east and west, and the great source of our capital to-day, is in the mother land, and if we have the policy and commercial institutions of the United States, we soon will see the last of British capital coming to Canada.

Mr. AMES. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), is now discussing the merits of the proposal.

Mr. FIELDING. He has been doing that for a considerable time past.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). And I have a perfect right to do it, and the great mistake has been that the Bill has not been discussed on the proposal to go into supply. I was quite willing that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames), should go on to-day, and I told him so, but inasmuch as the question came up in this way, I exercise my right to speak on the motion. Again I warn the government that this is an unpatriotic proposal, that it should not go through, that it has a tendency in the direction of annexation, and that no action should be taken until the people of Canada have had an opportunity to pass on this great organic change in our system, which this proposal brings about.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I desire to offer my sympathies to my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), who, according to the programme was scheduled to speak this afternoon and who finds that three gentlemen on his own side have cut in to deprive him of the opportunity which belongs to him.

Mr. MONK. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has stated that I 'cut in' for the purpose of depriving my hon. friend (Mr. Ames), of his right to speak.

An hon. MEMBER. He said 'butt' in.

Mr. MONK. Whether it is 'cut in' or 'butt in' I do not think the expression should be used.

Mr. FIELDING. I would not charge my hon. friend with 'butting in', because it is rather a clumsy way, but I did say that he cut in, which is a more gentlemanly method.

Mr. MONK. I object to the insinuation of my hon. friend that I had a motive.

Mr. FIELDING. I have not ascribed any motive to the hon. gentleman, I merely mentioned the result, namely, that he has kept the hon. gentleman from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), from delivering his address, until at last in sheer desperation, the hon. member (Mr. Ames), had to protest against the hon. member from York (Mr. Maclean), discussing the merits of the question.

Mr. MONK. I have raised my point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not see that any point lies there, unless the hon. gentleman may further explain it.

Mr. FIELDING. There is no point except in what I have stated. We are not favoured in this House with the continuous presence of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The hon. gentleman is now making an unfair statement. I have been sick quite a number of days, and I have had a lot of sickness in my family, and I would be here long before this, if it were possible.

Mr. FIELDING. Then I withdraw what I have said on that point. I would not charge my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) with improper motives, but he is a busy man, and we know that every once in a while, when he turns up here, we may look out for squalls. It does appear to me that to-day the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), finding it convenient to be here, and perhaps being obliged to go away soon, thought it would be a nice thing to cut in on a side issue and thus get in his speech, which he would not have got in for several days, had he waited the usual routine. I do not think I am doing any injustice to my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean), when I say that that seems to be the purpose of his address this afternoon. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) seems to be labouring under the delusion that this agreement does not require the approval of the parliament of Canada. He has talked again and again and again of this parliament having no voice in the matter. Well, this agreement is submitted to this parliament and every member of this parliament is as free to vote for or against this agreement as he is to vote for or against any other matter that may be submitted to the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FIELDING. If any hon. gentleman takes exception to that statement, I do not know on what ground the exception can be taken. We cannot give effect to this agreement by any act of ours. All we can do, is to present to the House that which we believe, as we believe this to be, for the best interests of the great masses of the people of this country, and present it to the House with the best information and the best argument we can bring forward, and then await the judgment which the House may give. Agreements of any kind are not usually made out on the public street. Whether they be agreements of business or diplomacy or agreements of any kind they are necessarily made by conference between the parties interested, and all that the parties concerned in this matter can expect is, that the results of such conference will be presented to the people's representatives and that the people's representatives shall have a full and unqualified right to pass judgment upon the scheme that has been submitted to them. That is the position with regard to this agreement; that is the position with regard to every treaty and every agreement that is made anywhere. There have been reciprocity treaties and other treaties in times past. To hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk about this thing having been made in secret, one would imagine that all the treaties made in bygone years, had been made on the public highways. The thing is ridiculous. Every treaty is made by conference between the authorized representatives of the countries concerned, and this agreement, though not a treaty, though less formal than a treaty, has been made in the same way. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), again and again said: Never again—and he emphasized it in ringing tones—never again will this parliament have a right to deal with a tariff matter. How can the hon. gentleman and those who agree with him, expect the people of Canada to be influenced by such statements as that? and it is only a specimen of hundreds of things that they are saying day after day. What says the document before them? I do not suppose my hon. friend from South York ever took the trouble to read it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I heard it explained by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FIELDING. I am obliged to assume that the hon. gentleman never read it——

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes, I read it.

Mr. FIELDING. Or never listened when I read it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes.

Mr. FIELDING. That is the most charitable view that I can express, because if the hon. gentleman read or heard it read and explained, and if in the face of that he makes the statement which he made to-day, then I am afraid I would have to use language of a harsher nature than I would like to use with reference to my hon. friend, and harsher than you, Mr. Speaker, would permit me to use. On the very first page of this agreement we have the statement that the government of the two countries hope that this arrangement will be found satisfactory, and that it will be continued because it will be found satisfactory; and then we have this further statement—and if anybody can make it in stronger language than is contained in this passage, I would like to hear them:

> Nevertheless it is distinctly understood that we do not attempt to bind for the future the action of the United States Congress or the Parliament of Canada, but that each of these authorities shall be absolutely free to make any change of tariff policy or of any other matter covered by the present arrangement that may be deemed expedient.

And with that on the first page of this agreement, the hon. gentleman and friends of his on that side of the House, and men in the press representing them, go on day after day telling the people of Canada that we are bound hand and foot by this agreement. Now, the suggestion was made by the hon. member for South York that we ought to have an appeal to the people on this subject; but I did not find that that suggestion was received with the wildest enthusiasm on the other side of the House. I do not know how many years or how many months we may be from an election, but it cannot be very long before the people of Canada——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. I hope that it will be noticed that hon. gentlemen, spurred up by my gentle suggestion, have said that they want it now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. Very well, let it go on record; it may be useful by and by. But at some time, before very many months—it is a matter of opinion how many—we shall have an appeal to the people, and we have no reason to doubt that the government which has successfully appealed to the people in bygone years will appeal with greater strength than ever by reason of this agreement. I have had occasion to be associated with many public matters in this House, and I say that there never was a public matter with which I was associated as to which I would be better prepared to go before the people from ocean to ocean, and look for a triumphant victory. But let us admit that at some day not too far distant we shall have an election. If hon. gentlemen opposite have the ghost of a hope of coming into power, why do they say that never again can this arrangement be changed? The agreement says that it can be changed by the parliament of Canada. Yet my hon. friend from South York says never again can it be changed; and when hon. gentlemen behind him slam their desks and applaud that sentiment, it means that never again in the present generation have these hon. gentlemen any hope of being placed in a position to change it.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition is evidently much troubled over this reciprocity matter. He has now given us three speeches on the subject, and he threatens us with one or two more.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not promise to be confined to that.

Mr. FIELDING. I think my hon. friend will find, before this thing gets through, that he will have to make a great many speeches; and when the time comes for him to go before the people of Canada and explain those speeches before the toiling masses of this Dominion, he will have occasion to make a great many. When I first heard the amendment of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, I did not think it was necessary. I thought it was rather useless. It talks about our loyalty and devotion. The man who flaunts his loyalty and the woman who flaunts her virtue are both open to suspicion.

Mr. MONK. Is my hon. friend opposed to the motion?

Mr. FIELDING. No, I am going to show my hon. friend that this motion is needed, and why.

Mr. MONK. If it is needed, my hon. friend had better not attack it.

Mr. FIELDING. It is needed by some persons and not by others—'they that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.' My hon. friend proposes that we shall make a declaration of the loyalty and devotion of this House to British institutions. Sir, we on this side have no need of making any such declaration. If there is need for this motion, it is because hon. gentlemen opposite, by their own acts, have talked annexation in this country for the last month. Who ever heard of it before?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, it was heard away back in 1849, when the Tory leaders signed the annexation manifesto. In these later days, and in this more modern history in which it is our privilege to play a part, who ever heard any talk of annexation except when hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to use the old flag in order to cover up a bad political record in their attempt to obtain power which they could not obtain otherwise? If there are people in the United States to-day who think there is some annexation feeling in this country, what is the evidence to which they can point? They will say that the hon. members on that side of the House, in their public speeches, and that the press of the Conservative party, in its daily articles, are representing that this commercial proposal means annexation; and if there is any possible doubt—there is none on our side, I rejoice to say—in the minds of the people of Canada to-day as to the position of any man on this question of annexation, it is simply and solely because hon. gentlemen opposite have been proclaiming to the world that this fiscal arrangement has something to do with annexation.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Is Champ Clark a Canadian?

Mr. FIELDING. I will come to Champ Clark in a moment. It is because these hon. gentlemen, and they alone, have been talking about annexation, and I call the people to witness that the only people who talk about annexation to-day are the members of the Tory party.

I have now explained why I agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) as to the need for this motion. As doubts and aspersions on the loyalty of our people have been provoked by the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, my hon. friend finds it necessary to come forward with a motion which practically says: Do not make any mistake; after all, though we have said a great many foolish things we do not mean them, and are good loyal subjects all the same. Therefore we on this side propose to vote for this motion, not because we think it necessary in our behalf, but because we think it is only right, after all that has happened, that hon. gentlemen opposite should have an opportunity of proclaiming to the world that they, who are the only party whose loyalty is in doubt, are devoted to British institutions.

Mr. MACDONELL. Might I put my hon. friend a question? He has made reference to the opportunities given for the discussion of this matter, I would like to ask if it be true that either before he and his colleague went to Washington or during the time they were there, certain Liberal members of this House were consulted by letter as to whether this proposed arrangement would be desirable or not, and that no other members of this House and none outside were so consulted?

Mr. FIELDING. There is nothing new or novel about this matter. It is not one which has been sprung upon the House. Many months ago it was announced that negotiations had been entered upon between this government and the President of the United States regarding commercial relations. A certain arrangement was made for the moment which was brought before this House. That arrangement was condemned by a number of hon. gentlemen opposite, but they never had the courage to record their votes against it. That was an arrangement made to serve the purpose for the moment, and then there was an exchange of letters which expressed the desire of the President of the United States and the willingness of the government of Canada to have further negotiations looking to a reciprocal arrangement. All that was known for months, and what we are presenting is merely a consummation of an arrangement which has been under negotiation for a long time.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The hon. minister has not answered the question.

Mr. FIELDING. If I had correspondence with any member of this House with regard to any matter, which correspondence that member and myself saw fit to treat as confidential, I deny the right of the hon. gentleman to put to me any question about it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I rise to a point of order. The hon. minister has not answered the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. No minister or member is required to answer a question.

Mr. MACDONELL. I would like an answer to the question I have put, which is very simple. I understand that when these negotiations were entered upon, the Liberal members of this House were written to for their opinions, but no request of the kind was made to the Conservative members, nor was the public taken into the confidence of the government.

Mr. FIELDING. Again I say that it is my right and privilege to have correspondence with members of this House; and if any member receives a letter from me and sends me a reply and he and I see fit to treat that correspondence as confidential, I deny the right of any member to raise any question about it.

I do not want to enter into the merits of this whole matter because this is not the moment to do so. This motion is only a species of side show.

Mr. HUGHES. It is a side show motion which seems to worry the hon. minister.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not worry over this annexation bogey. I think that the reply given the other day by the Prime Minister very aptly fits the interruption. If the worst should come to the worst, we may send the gallant colonel to Washington, and if he will only bring Turpin with him the country will be safe. I notice that my hon. friends opposite quote everything they can find in the United States papers in favour of reciprocity and annexation. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) had a good deal to say about a resolution by Mr. Bennett, a member of Congress from the state of New York. Mr. Bennett moved a resolution in favour of annexation, and my hon. friend concluded that Mr. Bennett must be in collusion with the Prime Minister of this country and the other members of the Liberal party. He, however, forgot to state one fact, namely, that Mr. Bennett has two fads at Washington, one of which is to talk annexation, and the other, and the most important, is to defeat this reciprocity agreement. The very man who is promoting annexation recognizes the fact that in this commercial agreement there is not a shadow of annexation, and he takes the view no doubt that should we have liberal commercial relations with our brethren to the south, that will make for a happy, contented and prosperous people on both sides, and when our people are in that enviable condition they will not be anxious for any political change.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it possible that Canada might follow the lead of a distinguished Canadian who dealt with that same question some years ago, and not make two bites of a cherry?

Mr. FIELDING. Does my hon. friend refer to Sir John Abbott?

Mr. HUGHES. No, I refer to the Hon. Edward Blake.

Mr. FIELDING. I regret to say that my esteemed and revered friend, Mr. Blake, is in such feeble health that we are not permitted to invite or expect his opinion on this question. In 1891 the hon. gentleman opposite and all his friends, under the leadership of Sir John Macdonald, were endeavouring to get the very kind of reciprocity we are now offering them. There was then nothing disloyal about it; it was all right. The only difference is this, that the distinguished and able gentleman who leads this government has succeeded. It seems to be a very loyal thing to make a failure of the business and a very disloyal thing to bring it to a success. I have said that owing to the regrettable illness of my respected friend, Mr. Edward Blake—and there is no man in this House or out of it who has a higher respect for him than I—we cannot know his views, but we have the views of a member of his family in pretty close touch with him. I find in the Toronto 'Globe' of yesterday, a letter written, not by Hon. Edward Blake, but by his brother, the distinguished ex-vice-chancellor of Ontario, Hon. S. H. Blake. After some general observations favourable to this project, Mr. Blake winds up with these remarks, which I commend to hon. gentlemen opposite:

> It is always very repulsive to me to find that so many men are now beginning to place the integrity of the British Empire upon the low platform of tariff, trade relations, preference, &c., as if some little change in duty or some little rearrangement of tariff considered to be necessary in the interest of either England or Canada should sever the ties of loyalty and degrade us to the low level of persons who desire to continue the union only because of some material advantage that may arise.

In the absence of any testimonial from Hon. Edward Blake, I present to my hon. friends opposite the opinion of his distinguished brother.

Mr. HUGHES. What about Mr. Lash?

Mr. FIELDING. Mr. Lash is a very excellent citizen. I have no doubt that if I wanted an opinion on any legal matter I could go with confidence to Mr. Lash. But I do not know that he is infallible. A good many men have spoken on this matter whose opinion would be highly respected on some things, but who are no better qualified to speak on this subject than the average man.

But let me give one thought in conclusion—and I have already spoken too long. I am going to assume, for the sake of argument, that every human being in the United States favours the annexation of Canada. Why should not they? Canada is like a beautiful woman who expects to be courted and admired. Why, Sir, she feels offended if she is ignored or treated with indifference.

Mr. HUGHES. But she does not want to be tied up to one fellow alone.

Mr. FIELDING. She is not going to be tied up at all. But I may mention to my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) that a decent woman who is to be tied up, is well content to be tied up to one man. But I say, Sir, that Canada has reached a position which has given her a standing in the eyes of the world, of which we should be proud. And if the United States, which has too often treated us with indifference and almost contempt, has come to a different view, if the people of the United States have made up their mind that Canada is worth cultivating, whether in the form of better trade relations or in any other form, why should we complain of that?

But, if one must speak seriously, I do not believe that one responsible man—I should not say that, I suppose, for Mr. Champ Clark, who is to be the next Speaker of the House of Representatives is certainly a responsible man; it is said that his remarks were humorous; all I can say is it is a dangerous kind of humour; —with the possible exception of Mr. Clark, I do not believe there is a man in the United States to-day holding a responsible position in the front rank of either party who would seriously desire the annexation of Canada to the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I do not believe it. The United States have all the territory they can manage to-day They have all the problems of government that it is well for a nation to have. My opinion is that the best and most thoughtful men of the United States have no serious desire to annex Canada, but, if they had, I am not going to quarrel with them for it. Again, I say, it is a tribute they pay, a tribute of honour and admiration to a country which at one time they treated with indifference. But it takes two to make a bargain. And although hon. gentlemen opposite, unwisely, I think, and unjustly too, have tried to convey the impression that there is some portion of the people of Canada who are not loyal to the institutions of our country and to the empire, I am ready to believe that they have done it for party purposes. I believe that every man of them, and every man on this side, and every citizen of this Dominion is bound to maintain the position of Canada as a portion of the British Empire. But, since my hon. friends opposite think that, in view of their record, it is necessary to make a declaration to that effect. I am going to help them to make it.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). I do not rise to debate the question of reciprocity for, upon another occasion, when this House is in Committee of Ways and Means, I expect to have an opportunity to say a few words upon that subject. I simply wish to treat, in a good natured way, some of the remarks of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). If I am using a parliamentary expression, I will say that I presume that when the hon. gentleman made his appeal to the province of Quebec, more particularly in connection with the question of annexation, he was speaking in a Pickwickian sense; otherwise I would consider his appeal as most unjust—I must not say, mean, for that would not be parliamentary—and calculated to attract, presumably for himself, certain cheap notoriety in a section of the press. As to the sentiment of the province of Quebec, I am not here to speak. But I do know this, and I wish to lay stress upon it and to call the attention of the hon. member for South York to it, that long after he and I have disappeared, should the question of maintaining the rights guaranteed to us under the British North America Act arise, should the question arise of upholding the dignity of this country's institutions amongst the foremost provinces to uphold that dignity and those rights will be the province of Quebec. We have heard a great deal about the question of annexation. I would like to quote a page of Canadian history to my hon. friend, and to a few other hon. gentlemen to whom it may do some good I had the curiosity, while listening to what has been said on the subject of annexation by certain hon. gentlemen opposite, to try to find out where the question of annexation really arose, and in whose mind the idea first took root. I find that it originated in the minds of gentlemen allied with members sitting on the opposite side of the House. I find that so eminent an authority in the Conservative party as Sir John Rose spoke very strongly upon the question of annexation, and, though many people in this country may not be aware of it, Sir John Rose was Minister of Finance in a Conservative administration. Speaking at the time of the famous annexationist manifesto, he said this:

To protract is cruelty; and are we unmanly enough to leave as a legacy to our children a task from the performance of which we shrink ourselves?

The hon. member (Mr. Maclean, York) must know that the talk of annexation did not arise with the Liberals of the province of Quebec, but chiefly with the members of the Conservative party. The Liberal party has always been true to this country, the province of Quebec has always been true to this country, and to our institutions. It would be more honourable, in discussing a commercial bargain between the United States and Canada, to appeal to Canada as a whole and not to sections of the country.

Amendment (Mr. Monk) agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. H. B. AMES (St. Antoine, Montreal). I suppose the House is now prepared to settle down to a businesslike discussion, and to deal with the question before us without heat and without partisanship. I hope that we may be able to weigh dispassionately the pros and cons of this proposition. I think the people of this country have been waiting with a little disappointment for a more businesslike discussion of the resolution now before the House. I realize that what I am about to say, is capable of being rejected or accepted by men of good faith on both sides of the House.

The year 1910 has been a record year for Canada. Never has prosperity been greater or more widespread. Our farmers have had good harvests and high prices, our manufacturers have enlarged their output and have increased their plant. There have been great works of public utility and transportation undertaken and carried on to a successful conclusion. Our aggregate trade in 1910 has been greater than in any previous year in the history of Canada. Our banks are increasing their capital, and enlarging their business. During last year credit has been good and payments have been sound, and there has been throughout the country a feeling of optimism, and a feeling of confidence in our selves and in one another. Canada has admittedly been doing well, she has been treading along safe and conservative lines, along lines that should be, and are I believe, satisfactory to the sound judgment of the country as a whole. We can find optimism everywhere, and confidence is general. Now, suddenly, without the slightest warning, and like a bolt out of the clear sky, this government comes into the House and flings upon the table a proposition which alters our fiscal policy that for the last forty years has been profitably pursued on the same lines. This agreement, we are told, must be accepted in its entirety, without any amendment in even a word or a syllable. The whole proposition stands or the whole proposition falls.

Now, we have had tariff revisions before. I can remember them ever since 1893, but I never remember an occasion before when a tariff was taken into consideration with a view of amending it that there has not been ample opportunity afforded to all persons interested to be heard, to state their wishes, and to talk over their needs with the ministers, and only after such consideration, has the tariff been amended. The hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) remembers that in 1907 he brought in a Bill to amend our tariff; and that Bill was altered if I remember rightly in a score of items before it finally passed the House. That is the way to make a tariff. In that way it is possible for interests to be heard, it is possible for injustices to be remedied before it is too late; and Canada, maintaining her own fiscal independence, is able to make a tariff under which all her people may prosper.

Now, we are just beginning to wake up to the consequences of this far-reaching proposition. Every day some new group of people in the country are beginning to realize that this is affecting them, that it is affecting the country; whereas a few weeks ago, or a few days ago, they had no knowledge that this proposition would affect them in the slightest degree. The area of those who are beginning to feel doubt as to the wisdom of this measure is enlarging with every succeeding day.

Now, I want to ask the government why should they take this leap in the dark? Had the government any mandate from the people to do this? We had elections in 1900, in 1904, in 1908, and not one syllable concerning reciprocity with the United States was uttered on the platforms by either Liberals or Conservatives in those elections. We were told by the premier, when he went to the west, that there would be no tariff changes without a commission, or at least without an opportuity for discussion. And yet there are tariff changes in this Bill that wipe out completely some particular industries, and the people whose livelihood is taken away have not had the slightest suspicion that any such thing was in contemplation. And yet, Mr. Speaker, two men in camera, without the knowledge of a single soul outside the government, make, on behalf of eight million people a hard and fast agreement, an agreement that spells difficulty and sacrifice for thousands, an agreement that spells ruin for many ; and then, when people come forward and ask that the sentence be mitigated, they are simply met with the statement : Not one word, it is all or nothing ; this country is pledged, our credit is given, it is too late, there is the door. Talk about despotism ; there was never anything in the history of Russia that for absolute despotism equals the manner in which this arrangement has been made.

But, says the government, this is a bargain which is advantageous to both the contracting parties, a bargain for the good of Canada and for the good of the United States. We must concede something, we are told. That is true, but do the advantages that are to be obtained in return for our concessions greatly outweigh the sacrifices? Let us inquire for a few moments what are some of the things we are called upon to give up in order to have the privileges which the government newspapers tell us are so very great in this reciprocity measure. Let us examine what we get in return for what we give. Let us see whether we could not have got all that is worth getting by waiting a bit, and then we might have spared ourselves sacrifices.

Now, when we come to consider the cost to Canada of the concessions that we are to obtain from the United States, as the first item of cost I would place the unsettling of our trade conditions. Since confederation this country has been steadily progressing, during the greater portion of that time. We have built up a great interprovincial trade, with an enormous amount of business within each province and between the provinces. It is stated that eighty per cent of all we produce is sold in Canada, either in the province in which it is produced, or in the neighbouring provinces. Now, these producers and these consumers have made a large number of business connections one with the other, ramified throughout the Dominion of Canada. There is a constant ebb and flow taking place between the east and the west, and the west and the east, of the commodities they interchange one with the other. The men who entered into these business arrangements have made trade connections with the expectation that there would be in them an element of permanency. They did not anticipate that one stroke of the pen would throw their whole business into disorder. It was reasonable to suppose that if changes were to be made they would be made gradually, after due warning and that they would be made with due regard for the circumstances. Now what do we find? We find all these interests thrown into confusion. The eastern miller, the eastern packer to-day does not know where, if this agreement is ratified, he is going to get his raw material. He does not know how much of his home market he will be able to conserve, he does not know whether he can do any export trade whatever, and he finds himself facing a dislocation of trade conditions that is a most serious thing for him. The eastern shipper who sends his butter, fruit and meats over all that long string of provinces to the Pacific coast and who has been accustomed to place such and such quantities at different central inland points finds that the whole trade is likely to be dislocated and he does not know what he is face to fact with.

The British Columbia fruit grower finds his market in Alberta and Saskatchewan taken from him. The Alberta raiser of cattle and grain finds that his British Columbia market is likely to be lost. So, all along the line these dislocations of trade are likely to be enormous. The lake carriers are likely to lose their water traffic. The railway companies will lose much of their trade and ocean steamship companies are wondering how their cargo will hereafter be obtained. So, all along the line we have uneasiness in the businesses affected and a recognition of the fact that these unsettled conditions may mean a great deal. Such a rash and sudden dislocation will mean a heavy loss to many and failure to not a few It will mean financial stringency, I believe, in many parts of this country. I believe that among bankers it will be found necessary to curtail the credits of some of their customers, and it will mean a withdrawal of capital and a lack of confidence on the part of people with capital to invest in Canada. I make this prophecy in all earnestness that there will be a long account on the debit side, and that the results of many years of prosperity will be wiped out before the debt, the loss, is made up from the unsettlement of our trade.

When we come to count the cost there is another thing that we must take into consideration, and it is that this proposition, if it becomes law, is the inevitable abandonment by Canada of the principle of protection all along the line. There are no two ways about that. Since 1879 we have built up this country under protection; we have diversified development and diversified employment. We are making an all-round nation, and we have been committed to that policy until this time. Now, protection to have any possible excuse, any logical defence, must be claimed by all and granted to all classes of the community. You cannot make fish of one and flesh of another. You cannot say to one class of the community: There is no protection for what you produce, and say to another class of the community: We will maintain the protection on what you produce. If you remove all protection from agriculture and leave no protection whatever for any of the farmers throughout Canada, how long do you suppose the farmers of Canada will be content to allow the manufacturers to have protection if they can have none? How long do you suppose the farmers, whose produce is open to the competition of the whole world, will consent to pay the price of protection for the articles they use? That same feeling actuates the farmers on both sides of the line. Just let me read to the House a few clauses from a resolution that was passed at the National Grange meeting, held on the 4th February in New York. The National Grange represents a million farmers in thirty states. Here is part of the resolution:

> The Bill provides for the admission free of duty of all Canadian farm products. Since Canada is the only country from which any considerable quantity of these products can under any circumstances be imported, this would result in practically free trade in everything the farmer produces.
> While putting farm products on the free list the reciprocity Bill make no material reduction in the high tariff rates on all the manufactured articles the farmer buys, and therefore gives no relief from the heavy burden of taxation imposed by these duties.
> The theory on which our protective policy has always been defended is that all classes and interests are equally entitled to protection.

Then further down it reads:

> We hold that the farmers should receive exactly the same measure of protection as is given the manufacturers, and that there must be no reduction of duties on farm products either by reciprocity or tariff revision, unless the duties on all manufactured articles are at the same time correspondingly lowered.

Mr. AMES.

Just at the same time there appeared in the New York 'Evening Post' this significant editorial. It was addressed to the Democrats in the hope that the Democrats might facilitate the passage of this agreement through Congress:

> Tariff revision is not likely, even on general principles, to lose favour by scoring an initial victory; people are apt, when they have got a part of something they have been trying for, to be all the more eager to get the rest. The fact that they have got the bars down for butter and eggs and wheat will not tend to reconcile them to buying shoddy blankets and clothes at prices that would pay for woollen ones if the tariff were out of the way.

Remember, this is in the United States.

> But in addition to this, there is a special reason for not being afraid that reciprocity will kill tariff revision. How about the farmers in the border states who are squealing now over the threatened competition of Canadian producers? When their share of the tariff has been taken away, is it likely that they will be as well satisfied as they are now to help feed the other beneficiaries? Will they vote to stick to the high tariff for the manufacturers when they must be content with little or none for themselves?

What is said on the other side of the line is said, in this same strain exactly, by the farmers of this country. Just another instance; by a stroke of the pen salt is made free. There is invested $1,500,000 by the Windsor Salt Works in western Ontario, a company which has a pay roll of $60,000 each year. Their salt is now made free, but they still have to pay the full duty on their coal, which is their raw material. Do you tell me that if the people who have been engaged in that protected industry for years, find their protection wholly removed, they are going to continue to advocate protection for others? That will be what the farmer would say, and we will have the butter maker, the fruit grower, the vegetable grower, the salt manufacturer and a great many others saying: If there is no protection for me there shall be none for the rest of you. If the outworks of protection are stormed it will not be long until the citadel will come down as well. The government has been saying to the manufacturers: Do not disturb yourselves; you will not be affected, but the government is opening up a stream, the volume of which it will be unable to check after it has once commenced to flow. You have rendered the position of protection illogical. You have made it class legislation. You cannot have free trade for half the community and protection for the other half. You open floodgates that you cannot close, and you will find that if this reciprocity treaty goes through there will be no stopping the flood until the last vestige of protection in Canada is wiped out. If protection is wiped out in Canada and the United States as against one another if we have free trade across the border and a common tariff against the world, how long will it be before political union will follow?

When we are counting up the cost, Mr. Chairman, we must not lose sight of the fact that we lose our fiscal independence. That has been discussed a good deal this afternoon and denied; nevertheless, the fact remains true. This is not a treaty, says the Finance Minister; it is a pact which may be changed at will. Well, he has read to us this afternoon from this blue-book, and he has told us that we shall be absolutely free to make any change in the tariff of Canada that we see fit; that both countries that are at the present time parties to this arrangement shall be able to make any change they like at any time. Let us see if that really is so. Supposing that this tariff arrangement has been in effect for five years, that we find that it injures us, and we desire to make a change; the moment we do so the Americans resort to reprisals, and every interest in Canada that stands to lose by these reprisals falls upon this government or the government that may replace it and says: You must not sacrifice us, and the government says: Ah, but it is only a little thing. And so they grin and bear it. And step by step there will be that constant encroachment. It is the old story of the camel and the tent—the camel gets one foot in first, then his second foot, then his shoulder, then his head, and soon the camel is entirely in the tent and there is no room for anybody else. Or, if the Americans are the ones who are injured and they desire a change shall we dare to make any reprisals? Did we dare make any reprisals last spring when they threatened us with the big stick? Not at all. Shall we dare to make reprisals? No, there would be too many Canadians who would be seriously injured. And so we will grin and bear it. And I do not see how, Mr. Speaker, if this goes into effect and great avenues of trade are created flowing north and south instead of east and west, I do not see how it will be possible for us to take back anything we have given because the whip hand will be with the larger partner and the stronger partner can threaten us and make us suffer any time. Our fiscal independence henceforth—although on paper I admit we have absolute freedom—our fiscal independence henceforth will be in the hands of the authorities at Washington. They can hurt us and they can hurt us severely; we can hurt them but very little and do our very worst. Is it wise to put all our eggs into one basket and then leave the carrying of that basket to those whose interest it may be to let the basket drop? What would be the worst loss that we could inflict upon them? It would be to take away a market of from eight to ten millions of people; the loss they could inflict on us would be to take away a market of ninety or a hundred millions of people on certain commodities which by that time had begun to flow in that direction. They could injure us infinitely more than we could injure them, and when they see fit to do so they have a leverage upon us—a leverage upon our commercial and political future the strength of which it is hard even now to begin to realize. How can there be any stability or any permanence under such circumstances? There is actually no stopping place until you have reached the place where you have complete commercial union and the larger partner dominates the policy of both.

Now, there is another price we are called upon to pay. We are called on to give up our export identity. We have special advantages in Canada for raising certain articles for export and this paternal government has endeavoured in a very large measure to educate our people to make the most of these special advantages. We have a rich soil, plenty of rainfall, a cool climate, so that there are certain things that we can produce admirably. We have gone in for export business and spent very large sums of money in improving our methods, and in rendering it possible for our commodities to reach the markets of the world. The excellent quality of our products has become recognized. The Canadian name is worth something when stamped on a box of cheese or a barrel of apples. But, hereafter it will have no value in excess of the value that may be given to the mixed commodity of the North American continent. Wheat so carefully graded and guarded hitherto will go down to Duluth or else to Buffalo and there it will be mixed with the inferior American grades and exported from a United States port as grain from North America. The mixture and export of this grain will make such a thing as Manitoba No. 1 hard and No. 1 Northern disappear; in the future there will be no such thing, but there will be substituted for it a mixture that will go abroad as wheat from the North American continent, and the price will fall accordingly. That mixture will enter into competition with the mixture from Argentina and Australia, and Canadian wheat will be only what its value is to tone up the weaker mixture of the other countries. Take our cheese as another example. We have been working with a great deal of energy to secure a reputation for Canadian cheese in the British market. We have given them an honest article; we have replaced the American article by the very honesty of our product. But, now, the cheese factories of both countries can ship indiscriminately through their ports, and it will be perfectly impossible hereafter to get Canadian cheese in any way distinguishable from American cheese. We must come down to their level; there will be North American cheese hereafter and a North American price; such a thing as Canadian cheese will be practically unknown. The same is true about bacon. We have made special arrangements to cater to the British market and we are sending $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 worth of bacon annually, and the hogs are specially grown in Canada and cured in a special manner for the British market. Hereafter there will be no opportunity of distinguishing our bacon products; Canadian bacon on the British market in future will be simply a product of North America. We have been endeavouring for a long time to secure the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle. We have told them that our cattle were sound and well and that our quarantine arrangements prevented diseased cattle coming in from the United States. Is there any chance of our getting that embargo removed now? Certainly we cannot; we must let all the cattle from Hudson bay to Texas into the port of Montreal hereafter.

And, when we are counting the cost, we must also remember that a preference as far as Great Britain is concerned now becomes impossible. We have lost completely the identity of what we export. The government may increase the preference on British goods if they see fit; the government after cajoling the manufactures and bringing them on year after year to imagine they were in fancied security, may, as a counter demonstration of loyalty decide to make that exhibition at the expense of the Canadian manufacturers. They can reduce the duties on the goods coming from England into Canada just as far as they like, but they can never hope to get any preference in the British market hereafter. Our products will be undistinguishable in the future from the products of the United States, and that renders a preference for us absolutely impossible. And so I think Mr. Bourassa was not very far wrong, when, in his newspaper not long ago, resuming at the end of a series of articles his appreciation of the result that this convention would have upon Canada, he wrote:

Constitue-t-elle un obstacle infranchissable à l'union douanière de l'empire? Oui—et c'est le motif qui, a nos yeux, milite le plus en sa faveur.

Does this constitute an insurmountable obstacle to a tariff union within the empire? Yes it does. And that is the very reason which in my eyes militates in its favour.

Is that the reason which militates in its favour with the Prime Minister?

Mr. LEMIEUX. What paper is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. AMES. From 'Le Devoir.'

Mr. AMES.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Signed by Mr. Bourassa?

Mr. AMES. Signed by Mr. Bourassa. Let me read from the New York 'American' under the heading 'America Cuts Loose from the British Empire,' the following:

In ratifying the trade agreement, we should understand, therefore, that we are settling a world problem and settling it right. British imperialism will wane in consequence. But American trade routes will run along the lines that were ordained by nature. And the prosperity of the western continent will receive an immense impetus through a definite a final disentanglement from the intrigues of European politics.

That is how it is viewed by the Americans. Let me read this extract from the New York 'Herald' of February 1, 1911:

The discussion of the last few days shows that the key to the imperial reciprocity situation, so far as Canada may be a party to it, is held by the United States.

Yes, that will be the result; the key of the imperial reciprocity situation so far as Canada is concerned will hereafter be held by the United States, and can be used only with the consent of the United States. When the right hon. the Prime Minister and his associates go over to the Imperial Conference in May next, they will go and confess to their friends from other parts of the British Empire that as far as they are concerned they can do nothing in respect of fiscal matters without consulting Washington. We formerly enjoyed the proud position of being the mistress in our own house and daughter in our mother's house. Hereafter we are no longer the mistress in our own house and we become the stepdaughter in our mother's house, and can not even sign our own name without the consent of the dominant party.

Although the contrary has been frequently asserted, I would like again to bring to the attention of the Finance Minister the fact that this proposition does affect the British preference—at least, in one very important item; that is, the item of rolled plates. I cannot see how he ever allowed that to slip into the agreement. Formerly the duty on rolled plates coming from the United States to Canada was 5 per cent, although we permitted them to come from Great Britain free. They are now made free to both countries, and the result is that the whole of our trade, amounting to $4,500,000 annually, will go to the American steel trust.

Mr. FIELDING. That article is now on our free list? What we did was to secure its free admission to the United States.

Mr. AMES. You will not send one ton to the United States, but you will transfer 50,000 tons that now come to Canada from Great Britain in British bottoms to the American steel trust.

Mr. FIELDING. We have more faith in our manufacturers than my hon. friend.

Mr. AMES. The American steel trust will deal with this as with the other opportunities which the Finance Minister has given them to control the markets of Canada, and I can see no hope of benefit to Canadian interests.

Now, we are sometimes told that there are many benefits from this arrangement. I do not deny that there are some benefits, of course, but I do venture to say that if we had not been so precipitate, we could possibly have got most of these benefits without having made the sacrifices that we have made. The New York 'Journal of Commerce,' an independent paper, commenting on the situation, said the other day:

> The concessions we (the United States) made are in themselves for our benefit, and most if not all of them it would be wise to make if we got nothing in return. The concessions of Canada are also for our benefit as wel as that of the people of Canada.

I think there is little doubt that we would have got the greater portion of these concessions without having to make sacrifices for them. There is a moribund administration at Washington. The new Congress has been elected on a pledge to reduce the tariff all along the line. Would it not have been wiser for us to have waited to see what they would do before we rushed in and gave concessions? Would it not have been wiser also to have waited until after the Imperial Conference? Then we would have been in a position to see how far our neighbours to the south would go of their own initiative, and if it were then necessary to make a limited treaty with them on articles on which they were not prepared themselves to give us freedom of access to their markets, it would have been a right and proper thing to do so. One has only to read the letter of President Taft, which has often been quoted in this House, to see how much the United States realize that they are in need of our raw products. The whole letter teems with expressions to that effect: 'We are exhausting our own, we shall soon need more, we must have those of Canada, let us take this opportunity to secure them.' That is the whole tenor of the letter from beginning to end. And yet our ministers rushed down precipitately and practically gave away our whole hand before the time.

Mr. FIELDING. Will my hon. friend say in what respect we are giving them concessions as respects access to our raw materials?

Mr. AMES. I have shown a good many things that we have sacrificed.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon friend says that we rushed to give away our raw materials to them. Will he show by any concession that we are proposing to give them any more access to our raw materials than they have to-day?

Mr. AMES. Yes, there are many.

Mr. FIELDING. Mention a few.

Mr. AMES. Wheat, for example. It does not go free.

Mr. FIELDING. Is my hon. friend referring to wheat coming into Canada or wheat going out of Canada?

Mr. AMES. I am referring to wheat going to the United States.

Mr. FIELDING. They are absolutely free to do as they like. It is no concession on our part that makes wheat free into the United States.

Mr. AMES. I will deal with that when I come to it. Now, I want to look at some of these alleged benefits and see what they mean—whether they are all wool and a yard wide and without serious drawbacks. We are told that this arrangement is for the benefit of the Canadian farmer—that he stands to gain by it all along the line, I admit that when the farmer first hears that he is to have access to the American market, he was inclined to favour this arrangement. But when the farmers of this country begin to learn what tags are on what is given to them, they will not be so sure that they want the present which the Finance Minister is offering to them if they have to take all the responsibilities that go with it.

I think it is a self-evident proposition that in a reciprocity agreement between countries which produce similar products, where one country is weaker than the other, the smaller of the two stands to endure the maximum of suffering. The United States and Canada raise identical products, and the United States can raise them cheaper than they can be raised in Canada, although the prices are sometimes higher there than in Canada; but they have the oportunities and the climatic conditions which render it possible for them to raise the raw products cheaper than we in Canada can. They raise wheat and cattle and hogs and dairy products, and we the smaller country stand to suffer the greater loss on a falling market. Even at the present time, notwithstanding the duties, there is more of nearly all agricultural products imported into Canada from the United States than go into the United States from Canada. The Minneapolis 'Journal' gives a list of these—horses, apples, grapes, cherries, cranberries, potatoes, melons, corn, barley, dressed poultry, eggs, dried fruits, and a number of other articles; and the same paper adds:

> Some persons in this country do not appreciate how much we have the best of it in a free exchange of agricultural products with Canada.

The Michigan bean growers evidently do not. But, I judge from the equanimity with which the farmers generally receive the agreement, they are on the whole well pleased and that they do understand they have the best of the trade.

There is too much our farmers can grow in abundance which the Canadian cannot grow well or cannot grow at all, yet which the Canadian must have. The few figures I have given you at random from the customs reports on last year's business between the two countries seem to make that clear. Of course, if on so many different products the balance was so heavily in our favour in spite of a high duty, it must be apparent that under a free exchange the American farmer will derive a very great benefit from the natural stimulation of the trade, provided this agreement is ratified.

And the expectation of this paper is that when the barriers are taken down altogether, the American farmer will undoubtedly have the best of it. Now, at times in the United States there are enormous surpluses of agricultural products. Taking them throughout the year, prices vary much more in the United States than in Canada. There are times when they are higher than with us, but there are also times when they are lower and they are more subject to speculation. Our farmers have a safer market on the whole, taking one year with another. At present there is a great glut of many farm products in the United States. I have here a report in the New York 'Produce Review' of the 4th of January, which shows that the stocks of butter held in New York, Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia at present are enormous. These four leading storage centres held on January 4 the following amounts:—

New York..	237,300	134,400	183,400
Chicago..	350,000	166,000	250,000
Boston..	236,010	154,200	172,300
Philadelphia	64,690	35,000	63,600
Totals	888,000	489,500	669,300

That butter was bought last fall at high prices by speculators, who would be glad enough to-day to sell it at cost, but will be forced to take even less. If there were no duty on butter to-day, our Montreal merchants would not only bring butter from New York but from England, which they shipped in the summer, and the English people would be glad to send their butter back at several cents less than they paid for it.

Sometimes hogs are higher in Buffalo than in Toronto, but the market changes. Three years ago live hogs sold in Chicago at $3.90 per 100 pounds, and four years ago at $4.25; and during the same years in Canada they were selling at $5.90 and $6.25 per 100 pounds. Taking the last 20 years, the average price, in 18 years out of these 20, paid in Canada for hogs has been higher than in the United States.

During the last three months lamb has been cheaper in Chicago than in Toronto. To-day it is one cent cheaper, and Hamilton is actually importing lamb from the United States and paying the duty.

In eggs there is to-day a glut in the American market, and refrigerator eggs are being imported into Canada at 14 cents per dozen free on board at Chicago.

Butter is selling in Chicago at 18 to 20 cents per pound, of the same quality as we are paying 24 cents per pound for to-day in Montreal. If there were no tariff our Canadian farmers would be swamped in a large number of articles which they have to sell.

I admit that the Canadian farmer might secure at certain times of the year higher prices by having the American market open to him; but he stands the danger of having his home market made a dumping ground whenever there is a surplus in the United States, Great Britain or anywhere else, and his prices will be knocked down in consequence. What our farmers have hitherto enjoyed is a steady market at reasonable prices, not subject to the fluctuations of the American market; but hereafter whenever there is an overstock in the United States, the surplus will be dumped on the Canadian market. So that after all, even from the farmers' point of view there is very great doubt as to whether a mutual interchange of farm products with the Americans would be, taking everything into consideration, to our ultimate advantage.

There is another serious phase which has not been touched upon very much by those who spoke for the government or by the newspapers which support it. It must not be forgotten that free trade in natural products between the United States and Canada means practically free trade with the whole world. By letting in the United States, under the terms of this agreement, we also let in all British possessions and no less than a dozen foreign countries on exactly the same terms. The agreement states:—

> The advantages hereby granted to the United States shall be extended to the United Kingdom and the several British colonies and possessions with respect to the commerce with Canada.

Whatever advantages we give to the United States we automatically extend to every British possession throughout the whole world, and also to fully a dozen foreign countries. I know what the retort will be. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say: Why! Would you give these advantages to the United States and not give them to British colonies? I reply, certainly, I would not treat colonies of the British Empire worse than the United States; no one should be treated better than our own kith and kin. But what I do object to is that these concessions and the sacrifices consequent upon them are the mere incidents of a bargain with a foreign nation and not the result of a straight contract among principals. Instead of letting all members of the family in at the front door, you are sending them around to the back door and then admitting them on a stranger's ticket. What is more, you are letting in a dozen strangers besides without any ticket at all. What does it mean to have free entry of natural products? Take for example the producing centres of the southern hemisphere. Let us look at Australia, New Zealand and the Argentine republic and see how far our farmers can compete with the farmers of these countries. We have in Canada a severe winter during which prices usually go up and our farmers labour under climatic conditions which are a serious handicap. But the three countries I have mentioned have in the first place, no severe winters, and in the second place, our winter is their summer. Consequently when our farmers have the smallest quantity of produce for their home market and expect their best prices, at that very time there is in each of these three countries the greatest surplus for export and prices are lower than at any other period. Then our wheat fields and our great cattle ranches are 1,500 to 2,000 miles away from our seaports, so that it costs a great deal to bring these products to the Atlantic and Pacific sea-boards. But in Australia, the Argentine republic and New Zealand, their pastures and wheat fields are not more than 300 miles from their seaports, and their railway facilities are excellent, so that transportation costs them but a fraction of what it costs us.

Take for example Australia. Australia exports annually from 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 pounds of frozen beef, and the Australian government gives the producer of frozen beef every facility and assistance. The most of it is brought down on the hoof to the packing establishments on the sea-board and is shipped in cold storage. I went through some of the establishments in that country and know that they are equipped with the latest improvements, and they consequently export their products to the best advantage. Australia sends from 90,000,000 to 100,000,000 pounds of frozen mutton and lamb out each year, all carefully killed, kept in refrigerators, covered in cotton bags, and sent to the English and other markets in cold storage. Australia exports from 50,000,000 to 75,000,000 pounds of butter annually. She has a beautiful strip of country, about 1,500 miles long between the mountain ranges and the sea thoroughly well watered, about 200 miles wide, and consequently produces dairy products in large quantities, always close to the port of shipment. The quantity of dairy products produced in Australia is rapidly increasing. She has also immense wheat fields. Last year her wheat crop was as large as that of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, and it was raised not more than 300 miles from the sea-board. If you can imagine Manitoba having a seaport on Lake Winnipeg, you can understand the advantage which Australia enjoys in the export of wheat.

New Zealand is famed for its wool, wheat and dairy products. In 1909, she exported $18,500,000 worth of frozen lamb and mutton, and $13,500,000 worth of butter and cheese. Little New Zealand sends to the British market twelve times as much butter as Canada sends. She sends out 5,000,000 carcasses of frozen lamb, mutton and sheep in a single season. I think it well to read to the House a few of the quotations showing what farm produce is worth in New Zealand. I have here a statement from the Weekly Report of the Trade and Commerce Department, page 138, which gives the prices of produce, live stock and provisions for the provincial district of Auckland during the past year. Let me make a few quotations:—

Fat cattle, per head, $30.
Fat sheep, per head, $3.50.
Fat lambs, $2.50.
Beef ready for the butcher, 7 cents per lb.
Mutton, 6 cents per pound.
Veal, 9 cents per pound.
Pork, 12 cents per pound.
Lamb, 9 cents per pound.
Fresh butter, 20 cents per pound.
Cheese, 14 cents per pound.
Ducks, $1.25 per pair.
Fowl, 75 cents per pair.
Turkeys, $1.25 apiece.
Bacon, 15 cents per pound.
Ham, 16 cents per pound.
Eggs, 21 cents per dozen.

These are comparatively low prices, when you consider that this farm produce, or nearly all of it, will be brought free into Canada, and with only the freight rate against it.

Then, let us take the Argentine. The Argentine is one of the countries that comes under the most favoured nation clause, and consequently enjoys all the rights that we give to the United States. We were greatly indebted last night to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) for giving us a good deal of very valuable information regarding the Argentine—not knowing, I think, that it is one of the most favoured nations.

However, we can utilize some of the information he gave us. For example, he said that the wages for farm hands in the Argentine were about 64 cents a day, without board, as I understood him. And he said that the rate in Russia was from 40 to 45 cents a day—and Russia is another country whose products will hereafter come free into Canada on this most favoured nation basis. Now, the Argentine Republic has a trade which is larger even than our own. She exports $400,000,000 worth of goods, 90 per cent of which is live stock and agricultural products. Argentina ships to Great Britain six times as much beef as New Zealand and Australia together, and one and a half times as much mutton and lamb. In 1909 Argentina produced wheat to the value of $320,000,000, and exported over 100,000,000 bushels. The flax crop of Argentina is valued at $115,000,000. Cattle, sheep, horses, donkeys and mules as live stock are exported, usually to Great Britain. When you consider that the Argentine is one of the countries that can hereafter ship to Canada, that the Canadian Pacific railway are now arranging a line from Halifax to Buenos Ayres, with cold storage accommodation; that the government are asking us this year to vote a subsidy to a steamship line to the West Indies and South America; that a company is being formed in Montreal for the express purpose of exploiting the business between Canada and Argentina—you will see that the facilities for shipment between Montreal and Argentina in the summer, and between Halifax and St. John and Argentina in the winter in these agricultural products will soon be most excellent, and that we may expect to have our local markets, to a very large degree, supplied by the produce that will come from that country. Be it remembered that the Argentine is peopled mainly by Italians, Spaniards and Germans, who have a scale of living quite inferior to that which our farmers will submit to, and who, as the Postmaster General tells us, are willing to work for 64 cents a day and board themselves. We can see what pressure will be brought to bear on the farmers of Canada to reduce their scale of living and cut their necessities in wages down to the Argentine standard.

How will the products of these three countries coming into Canada in winter especially, affect the home markets on the sea-board? Chilled beef from the Argentine and Australia, frozen lamb and mutton from New Zealand can be laid down in Halifax, St. John or Montreal at ruinous prices. The f.o.b. export price on chilled beef of the entire New Zealand product last year was 5½ cents per pound. With a duty of three cents per pound, we have kept that meat out, for it would cost 8½ cents, plus freight. But with a duty of 1¼ cents that means that it could be laid down in Canada for 7 cents. And this excellent chilled beef from Argentina and Australia, laid down in Halifax, St. John and Montreal, will bring down the price of every beef animal in the eastern provinces. Take, also, the case of New Zealand lamb and mutton. Last year the entire quantity of the New Zealand product exported averaged 6½ cents per pound, and even sold at less. With a protective duty of 3 cents per pound, the price would be 9½ cents, which would be enough to keep it out of our markets. But reduce the duty to 1¼ cents and you bring the price down to 7¾ cents, and you make it possible to lay this lamb and mutton down at 8 cents per pound upon our Atlantic or Pacific coasts, and that is a price which our farmers, who produce for the home market, will be unwilling to accept if they are to compete. Australian butter can to-day be laid down in bond in Montreal at 23 cents. A duty of 4 cents means a price of 27 cents, which is prohibitive. But take the duty off and our farmers will have to get down to 23 cents, the price at which it is possible to bring this Australian butter in. In January, 1909, the Montreal produce men imported 5,000 packages of Australian butter. The market at that time stood at 27½ cents for Canadian creamery. It fell within a month to 19 cents. Eastern township butter makers, who get 25 cents to 26 cents for what is shipped from the eastern townships throughout the west, would have to cut down their prices. To-day a splendid trade is done from the Eastern townships with the west; 100,000 packages go westward every year, and are scattered all along as far west as Vancouver. With reciprocity in force there will be nothing more of that kind. Australian butter coming in from the west and New Zealand butter from the east will each monopolize half our continent, and will meet in competition at Winnipeg.

The same is true at the Pacific coast. There is a large interchange now between Alberta and British Columbia. Meat, grain, dairy products and feed pass west from Alberta to British Columbia, and lumber and fruit pass eastward from British Columbia to Alberta. This trade is profitable to both, and should be continued and encouraged But if this reciprocity measure goes through, chilled beef and mutton from Australia will flow into British Columbia, and there will not be a city or a mining camp in British Columbia that will want a pound of Alberta beef. And the same will be true of butter, cheese, poultry and eggs. New Zealand butter can be laid down in Vancouver at 24½ cents but, with the present duty, 28½ cents, this is prohibited. The millers of British Columbia will grind Antipodean wheat, for they will not pay the freight rates to haul over three ranges of mountains when they have only to pay ocean carriage from Australia or New Zealand to Vancouver.

Taking the question by and large, it seems to me that natural products will become cheaper at the ocean ports and for a certain distance inland. They will be lower in winter. They may possibly be higher in summer, owing to the opportunity afforded our farmers for sending them to the United States. But our farmer, on the whole, will be worse off than before, because he will have to sell his winter product at Antipodean prices, and will have to stand the chance of bad times and of Canada being made a dumping ground for the American surplus.

There was another phrase of this question that I was going to allude to. It had been my intention in this House to move a resolution in favour of reciprocal trade arrangements with Australia. I had made some careful preparation in that direction, and had interviewed some of the Australian ministers, and having brought the correspondence down, it seemed to me that a discussion of this question would be a useful one in the House. But there is no use now in bringing up the question of Canadian-Australian reciprocal trade arrangements. The whole hand of the government is on the table, the game is played. All those items which we want, all those commodities which we could fairly send to them, we cannot now send without the intermixture of American goods. Nearly all the items on which we were prepared to make concessions to Australia, are now free. We are henceforth handicapped both in giving to them and taking from them, because we have no longer a basis or means of negotiation. Let me put on 'Hansard' this schedule, and you will see what I mean. Australia could export to Canada:

	Formerly.	Now.
Meats	3c. lb.	1½c.
Canned meats	27½ p.c.	20 p.c.
Mutton and lamb	3c.	1½c.
Poultry	25 p.c.	free.
Tallow	20 p.c.	5 p.c.
Butter	4c. lb.	free.
Apples	40c. brl.	free.
Grapes	2c. lb.	free.
Oranges	free.	free.
Peaches	$1 per 100 lbs.	free.
Salt and a few others	5c. per 100 lbs.	free.

On the other hand, the articles we can export to Australia from the Pacific coast are limited to lumber, fish and fruit. Our people in British Columbia were expecting to get a great market opened to them. Now, lumber, fish and fruit are all free, and no distinction is possible between Canada and the United States, and it is impossible for us to get any preference in their market. Consequently, the whole game is played.

Then, under these most favoured-nation treaty arrangements, there are many other countries we have to consider, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Spain, Switzerland and many others. Norway and Sweden export bacon, salt pork and butter, condensed milk, salt and pickled fish. Denmark exports butter, bacon and salted meats, eggs and potatoes. In 1909 Denmark exported eggs of the value of $8,250,000. Russia exports eggs, and Siberia exports butter. Spain exports grapes and dried fruits. These countries can now get their goods into Canada without our giving anything in exchange; in other words, we have practically instituted free trade in natural products with all the world, and the cheapest producer of all the competitors will set the pace for the rest. If the Italian, the German or the Spaniard can live on less than the farmer in Canada, the Canadian farmer will have to come down to his level; there is no other alternative.

Now let me come to the last phase of my argument and inquire whether there is not a better way for Canada to progress and develop than the way the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs have chosen on our behalf. Speaking generally, it seems to me that it is bad policy for a nation to send its raw material out of the country. It was by a strict adherence to that policy, that the German Empire has prospered so greatly, that France has prospered, and that England has prospered and is prospering to-day. Our natural resources represent potential employment, wealth and prosperity. They spell towns, and railways, and industrial establishments, when they are worked up in the country. What we cannot utilize ourselves, we are in duty bound, I think, to hold in trust for those who come after us. To export our raw materials, and to enable the stranger to grow rich in working up our materials, is to draw upon our national capital from the bank, and to present it to outsiders. What would you think of a manufacturer, a shoe manufacturer, for example, who, having bought sole leather at 20 cents a pound, and finding it was worth 22 cents a pound, should forthwith, sell his supply, and close his factory? You would speak of him as bereft of his senses, and yet that is exactly what is meant by the proposition we are now contending against. I have always cherished the idea for Canada that she should become a highly developed and self contained country, but this legislation seriously endangers that ideal. It is to my mind, the duty of each one to have regard to the welfare of all, for only thus can a common nationality be upbuilt. Now I contend that there is a better way to build up Canada, than the one that has been proposed by the negotiators, and let me illustrate it by way of analyses. Suppose that

A, B and C discover a mine, and agree to exploit it. A, it is agreed, should mine the ore, B should build a railroad and carry the ore across the country, and C should erect a smelter. A, who mines the ore, is to get 50 cents a ton, and he will employ 100 men. B, who builds and operates the railway, also gets 50 cents a ton, and he employs 100 men. C, who constructs the smelter, gets 50 cents a ton, and he employs 100 men. Together they employ 300 men, and together they get $1.50 a ton from working up this raw material. Now, one morning B and C wake up and find to their astonishment, that while they did not know of it, A has made an arrangement with a party on the other side of the mountain to sell his raw material at 60 cents a ton, instead of 50 cents. A says, I am getting 10 cents a ton more than I got before, and what have you got to say to that? He sells his raw material at 60 cents to the man on the other side of the line; and so B's tramway has nothing to carry, his 100 men are thrown out of employment; C has nothing to smelt, and his 100 men are thrown out of employment. 200 men are thrown out of employment in order that A may get 10 cents more a ton on his ore, and only 60 cents a ton is kept in the country on that raw material, instead of the $1.50 which was previously left in the country.

I think it is perfectly fair to apply that analogy to some of the items in this schedule, and particularly to wheat. We hear a great deal about the great concessions that are to be obtained for our farmers by free wheat in the American market, and what great things it means to Canada. Let us see if Canada will realize any benefit from it. The Canadian northwest was purchased and was developed for, and by, the entire people of Canada. The debt incurred thereby, rests upon the shoulders of all the people of Canada, and I do not think it unjust to say that the benefits of that northwest should accrue to all the people of Canada. Now suppose we take a bushel of wheat, for which the northwest farmer now gets 85 cents. If that bushel of wheat passes eastward, along Canadian lines, the railway companies of Canada get 8 cents out of it, the inland shipping companies gets 4 cents, and the port of Montreal gets 1 cent before it leaves the country; therefore, $1 altogether on that wheat is left in the country. Now supposing it is exported south. For the purpose of argument, I am willing to grant that the farmer gets 88 cents, and 2 cents more goes to the road that hauls it to the border, so there are 90 cents left in the country. All the rest of the money goes out of the country to the profit of the men in a foreign nation who handle that wheat. In the one case, $1 is left in the country as an equivalent of that bushel of wheat; and in the other case, 90 cents is left in the country, which, from a national point of view, is not satisfactory.

I verily believe that there will be times when the prices will be practically the same. Take the closing quotations yesterday for May delivery No. 2 Northern; Fort William 91 cents, Minneapolis 93½ cents. The difference is only 2½ cents. Is it worth while to allow the wheat of Canada to pass out of the country to be utilized in a foreign land for a difference of 2½ cents a bushel? Supposing that it were milled in Canada the advantages would be considerable. The Canadian carriers would profit, the millers would make their flour for export, the Ontario farmer could grow his Ontario wheat, which, mixed with the western wheat, would make exportable flour, and the Ontario farmer will be able to grow no wheat at all unless there is Manitoba wheat to grind with it. Then also the bran and shorts will be distributed among the dairymen and there will be a profit on that for them also. All the good of that is sacrificed by this arrangement. I hold in my hand a very interesting editorial which appears in the Weekly 'Northwestern Miller,' of January 8, 1911. I cannot read the whole of the editorial because it is too lengthy, but I think I have time to read several extracts from it which will illustrate better than I could the thought I have in my mind. Here is one. Remember that this is written in Minneapolis from the American point of view, and you will see why the Americans want free wheat in Canada:

> In course of time, owing largely to the growth of the Canadian wheat crop and its inability to enter the United States, the export flour trade suffered a serious decline. . . . Another change is now impending in the trade, and again the 'Northwestern Miller' goes on record with a prediction: that if the opportunity now at hand to obtain free wheat from Canada is neglected, the American miller will suffer.

Further on:

> Bountiful nature has placed at the very threshold of this country a natural wheat field,——

This, of course, refers to Canada.

> —the like of which has never before been known since the world was made. This magnificent source of supply, a mighty empire in itself, produces glorious wheat of unrivalled quality. Its possibilities are difficult to over estimate. The land was created for wheat-raising. This area can and will produce sufficient wheat to keep American mills supplied to double their present capacity, and to extend their usefulness for good to an almost unlimited extent. This territory lies at our very doors. Our mills are ready and willing to grind its product. Its people would gladly find a market for their grain in the milling centres of the United States. All is favourable to this traffic save one thing, and that places an insuperable barrier before it. Narrow minded protection has built between the mill which needs the wheat and the farmer who needs the market a wall consisting of an absurd tariff of 25 cents on every bushel of wheat that crosses the boundary.

The disposition of Canada's surplus is a question upon the answer to which depends the future, not only of the milling interests of the Northwest, but indeed of the United States. Canadian mills do not have capacity enough to grind this wheat.

Well, why should not their capacity be increased?

If they had the capacity, they would not possess a market for their flour sufficiently large to take it.

Listen to where the Americans expect to find a market.

American mills have both the capacity to grind, and the market to supply.

Should this surplus be shipped abroad, the foreign miller will become possessed of a supply of raw material practically unlimited as to quantity and actually unrivalled as to quality. Therewith he can secure a mixture from which he can produce a flour to rival in strength anything his American competitor can offer. The result must, in the end, inevitably mean the destruction of the American export trade, the shifting of the American milling centre, the gradual decline of the American milling interest to a purely domestic basis, and its ultimate retrogression to a comparatively unimportant place in the list of large American industries.

Well, where will they shift to? They will come to Canada, of course, Canada cannot grind the surplus crop of her northwestern territories. If America may not do so, because of her own shortsightedness, it follows that the work will fall to the more fortunate miller in Great Britain or on the continent, whose laws are not framed to forbid the free importation of the raw material. The miller who is able to grind this enormous crop will be the miller of the future; and, where he is, there will be the great mills of the world.

Are we going to allow the great mills of the world all to be south of the line when we have the raw materials to keep them going?

To obviate the danger which threatens American milling interests from the north, there is but one course. The free admission of the raw material is the sole remedy. Milling in bond under present regulations is impracticable, and almost impossible. Millers who undertake it will find it too cumbersome and expensive to be profitable, the margin in flour at best being but slight.

Going further on:

Should foreign millers——

That is Canadian of course.

—secure this wheat, they would be enabled thereby to cut off the American export trade, both in wheat and flour.

A terrible thing, would it not be if we in Canada supplied the raw material by which the Americans could cut off our export trade in wheat and flour.

One bushel mixed with three bushels of the less virile wheat grown in the United States and ground into flour, is sufficient to raise the whole high value.

Then, going on, there is a significant passage which I would like to read before I lay this down.

Turning from the pessimistic to the opposite point of view, the contemplation of the future of American milling with the protective tariff removed and free Canadian wheat secured, the prospect is a grand one. With this enormous and steadily increasing crop free to pursue its natural geographical and commercial channel, flowing into the mills and elevators of the States, a splendid tide of activity and prosperity would follow in its wake. Assured of their future supply of raw material, the mills of America would go forward on their developing course, continuing the march of progress which has brought them to the front. New mills would be built, and capacities enlarged. New markets abroad would be sought and conquered. The returns from this renewed and extended activity would be felt in increased commercial prosperity. New railways would be extended into the wheat-growing territory. American railroads carrying the flour from the mills would secure additional freight. American banks would obtain increased deposits, and greatly enlarged exchange accounts; American mill operatives would be in demand, and payrolls would be increased; mill machinery, bags, barrels and other mill supplies would be required in larger quantities; more money would be in circulation; and the benefit would be felt in every artery of industrial life touched by milling. There would be an increase in grain firms, in elevators, and in every branch of the grain-handling and flour-making interests. This would be felt in the added value of real estate and in the solid and substantial development of every undertaking and enterprise that makes a community prosperous. Farmers would find a better market for their products; and, in the end, should this crop be assimilated at home rather than abroad, they will secure an average higher price for their wheat because of the ability of the progressive and successful miller to pay more for his raw material.

There is an article which goes all the way through to show that the milling interests of the American northwest are stationary if not declining, but that if they can only grind Canadian wheat they will not only hold their own market, but the export markets of the world. Is it not better that Canadian wheat should be ground by Canada and that we should have the markets of the world instead of the Americans? Were there time I might apply this same argument to a great many other subjects. The same could be applied to cattle, hogs and a large number of other articles which the farmer produces and which are really raw material. If as raw materials these go out to supply employment and wealth to others the farmer may get a trifle more at times, but the packing interest suffers, export business becomes impossible, the western market goes to Chicago and the profits of the transportation companies disappear. Canada is poorer if we allow our raw products to go out. I might apply it to hay and we would have the interesting spectacle of seeing our hay going away, and the cattle and farmers going out on the same train to the United States. The same is true of lumber, pulpwood, iron ore and many other things. The farmer will not be unwilling to live and let live. Will he cripple Canadian enterprise to make Americans rich? There is just one suggestion—I make it quite unauthorized—and it is a suggestion that occurs to me because after all we all realize that from the western point of view the opportunity of exporting Canadian grain to the United States is a very great thing, and we must consider that our western friends will not lightly turn down a proposition of that kind.

But I think it is for Canada to take into consideration the fact that we have certain geographical and climatic conditions which render it somewhat difficult for our farmers to compete with the farmers of Argentina, Australia and New Zealand, and that it would be quite in line for this government, or for any government that may succeed it, to do something towards removing these disabilities. The price of wheat is, I think it is admitted, fixed by Liverpool, and the grain grower practically throughout the whole world gets the Liverpool price less the cost of transportation from his farm to Liverpool. Figure that back and you will come to the Canadian northwest. Now, if our Canadian western farmer, say at Regina, cannot send his grain as cheaply over Canadian lines to Liverpool as the American farmer at Grand Forks, Dakota, or some place immediately south of Regina, does, then there is something wrong. It may be that the transportation rates are too high; it may be that there are other charges that are more than the traffic can bear. Well, we have a Railway Commission, and if, after thorough investigation, it is found that for similar distances it costs more to send Canadian wheat to the British market than it does American wheat, I, for my part, would rather see a bonus (of 2 or 3 cents a bushel) paid to the Canadian farmers than to see that grain going to the United States. Let us keep our own materials in Canada, and then the Americans will come over to us and they will be welcome, and they will build their factories here, and we will make up the raw materials here, and we will supply our own home markets and compete for the export trade of the world. Sir, Canada would present a sorry sight if she were reduced to the position of digging out and hauling to the nearest railway station her raw materials to have them made up in the country to the south, with all the wealth that accrues from that process going into the pockets of the stranger. There are some who say that this is bound to come anyway, and I think the Minister of Finance told me not long ago that if the Americans wished to take off their duties they have a perfect right to do so. That I admit. I admit that when the Americans need our raw materials they can bring them into their country free of duty. Well, let them do so when they get ready to do it. We can then determine whether it is in our interest to put an export duty on or not, but it will be time enough to face that when it comes. In the meantime, what is the difference between the proposition of the minister and my proposition—the minister's proposition is suicide, the other alternative is murder, and one can die with honour, but one cannot commit suicide with honour. As it is near six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour briefly to summarize what I have endeavoured to bring to the attention of the House. I consider that at the present time we are doing well and have been doing well along safe and conservative lines, and to take a leap in the dark which may possibly turn out for the better, but which stands a great chance of turning out for the worse, would be, under the circumstances, highly inadvisable. As far as this particular bargain is concerned, don't let us lose sight of the fact that it means the unsettling of established conditions, that it means the loss of our fiscal independence, that it means the ultimate abandonment of the principle of protection for all classes in Canada, that it means the loss of our export identity, and that it means farewell to any opportunity for a preference in the British market. These are some of the sacrifices which Canada will be called upon to make, and, after all, why should we make any sacrifices, because, probably we can, without sacrifice, get all the benefits which are worth having. And when we come to look on the so-called benefits we find that where there is reciprocity in similar products between two nations, one of whom is great and powerful and the other small and weak in point of wealth and population, that if anything goes wrong it is the smaller one that stands to suffer every time. Let us further remember that in letting in the United States we are admitting all the British possessions—whom I should like to see admitted, but by the front door rather than by the back door—and we are also admitting 12 other countries who are giving us absolutely nothing for the privilege. This, I think, will affect the farmers' home market very greatly at the seaport towns, and for some distance inland. I think, taking it by and large, that while the Canadian farmer may occasionally take advantage of American high prices and get a little more for his products in summer, he stands a chance of having his market in winter glutted, and of having to take whatever overflow prices may prevail. In conclusion, I bring to the attention of the House the fact that it is bad policy to export raw products any more than we can help. If it be that we cannot use these raw materials in our own day and generation we should at least have the courage and the manliness to keep them for those who come after us. Canadians are a highly developed and self-contained people. I should not like to see them reduced to the position of being mere hewers of wood and drawers of water; mere burrowers of the raw material to send it out of the country to make others rich. I feel that if we pass this measure we are approaching the parting of the ways; that we are turning our faces, which have hitherto been looking round the world, to the other members of the galaxy of British nations; we are turning our faces away from that ideal, and we are looking southward to a nation that has never treated us in such a way as to make us particularly desirous to extend special advantages to her. And, Sir, let me say here and now that even if the sacrifice—the temporary financial sacrifice—might be hard on individuals in this country, I think in the long run we will be better off if we continue along the road which we have been following and remain in the rank we at present occupy in the list of nations under the British flag.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1911,

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 123) to incorporate La Banque du Canada.—Mr. Bickerdike.

Bill (No. 119) respecting the Ontario Northern and Timagami Railway Company. —Mr. Carvell.

WATER IN THE RAILWAY BELT AND PEACE RIVER BLOCK.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 124) relating to the water in the Railway Belt and Peace River block of land. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to provide for the administration of rights in regard to water in the Railway Belt of British Columbia and in a certain area of land in the Peace River country within the province of British Columbia, to administer rights to water in these areas by the Dominion government in pursuance of the decisions of the Privy Council delivered recently by which that jurisdiction was fixed.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). May I ask if the Bill covers a policy for the conservation of that water and its equitable distribution? Does it take in that view of the case?

Mr. OLIVER. The whole purpose of the Bill is to provide for the conservation of the public interest in the water in these areas. But, the conditions being what they are, the details are not set out in the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUEBEC AND NEW BRUNSWICK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CARVELL moved the first reading of Bill (No. 120) respecting the Quebec and New Brunswick Railway Company.

Mr. CROCKET. Explain.

Mr. CARVELL. The object of this Bill is to renew a railway charter granted about ten years ago. The charter was renewed about two years ago, but the time allowed for commencement of construction will expire, I believe, in April next. The parties are anxious to have the charter renewed for the purpose of going on and probably constructing the railway. The proposed line is from Quebec to the town of Connors in the province of New Brunswick, and, by an amendment added two years ago, from Connors to the city of St. John. There is also provision, I think, to extend across the northern part of the state of Maine. No doubt, some portion of the railway will be built within the next two years.

Mr. CROCKET. Is the Bill simply for an extension of time?

Mr. CARVELL. That is all.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN—PROPOSED LAND ENDOWMENT.

Mr. LAKE:

1. Referring to a resolution of the legislative assembly of the province of Saskatchewan, of December 18, 1909, endorsing the desirability of the creation of a suitable land endowment for the University of Saskatchewan out of the public domain within the province, what was the nature of the reply made by the government to the Lieutenant Governor in acknowledging the receipt of the resolution?

2. Have any further communications in regard to the subject taken place between the government and the provincial authorities? If so, will the government lay a copy of the papers on the table of the House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. The nature of the reply made to the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Saskatchewan of the 18th December, 1909, is set forth in the order in council of 31st March, 1910, which I lay upon the table of the House.

2. There has been no communication on this subject since.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. REID (Grenville):

If the proposed arrangement of the tariff with the United States is passed, will the following countries be allowed to import goods into Canada on same terms as allowed the United States, viz.: Argentine Republic, Austria, Hungary, Bolivia, Columbia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela?

Mr. FIELDING:

This question was covered by an answer given to the hon. member for North Ontario on the 16th day of February, 1911. (See unrevised edition of 'Hansard,' page 3744.)

FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. HENDERSON:

What action does the government intend to take on the two requests preferred by the deputation on behalf of the shareholders and depositors of the Farmers' bank, viz.:—

That a royal commission be appointed to make a thorough examination into all matters connected with the incorporation and management of the Farmers' bank; and that legislation be enacted to relieve shareholders of their double liability and to enable depositors to be paid at least fifty cents on the dollar?

Mr. FIELDING:

The government have no reason to doubt that the exercise of the powers given to the liquidator by law, and the performance of the duties imposed upon that officer by like authority, and the proceedings now engaging the attention of the courts of justice in Toronto, will lead to a full investigation into and disclosure of all the affairs of the bank, and that, therefore, there is no need of the appointment of a royal commission. Should anything arise later to indicate that the investigation is insufficient, the question can be further considered. Replying to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's question, the government deeply regret that a number of people who are not well able to bear the loss are likely to suffer from the failure of the bank, but in the judgment of the government it would be contrary to public policy to recoup the losses of any class of investors from the public treasury.

LANDS FOR HOMESTEADS.

Mr. LAKE:

What is the total amount of land thrown open for homesteads since 1st August, 1908, in the following townships: 21 to 33 in ranges 18 to 23 inclusive, west of the 2nd meridian?

Mr. OLIVER:

As far as can be ascertained from the records of the department the approximate area is 61,920 acres.

Mr. LAKE:

What different parcels of land have been thrown open for homesteads since the 1st August, 1908, in the following townships, viz.: 21 to 33, ranges 18 to 23, west of the 2nd meridian?

Mr. OLIVER:

As far as can be ascertained from the records of the department the following lands in the townships mentioned were thrown open for homestead entry:

Tp. 21, range 18, west 2nd mer.—All sec. 31.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES—POSITION OF CERTAIN OTHER COUNTRIES.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I desire to refer to my question to which an answer has just been handed in. The question is as follows:

If the proposed arrangement of the tariff with the United States is passed, will the following countries be allowed to import goods into Canada on same terms as allowed the United States, viz.: Argentine Republic, Austria, Hungary, Bolivia, Columbia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela?

The answer handed in by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is that this question was covered by answer given to the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) on the 16th February, 1911; see unrevised edition of 'Hansard.' Now, I did not name in my question all the countries covered by the question of the hon. member for North Ontario. My question is capable of being answered, 'Yes' or 'No.'

Mr. FIELDING. I object that it should be answered 'Yes' or 'No.' A question may be so asked that to answer it 'Yes' or 'No' would be misleading. I think it is right to give the information; and every point of the question my hon. friend (Mr. Reid, Grenville), was covered in the answer as published in 'Hansard' of some days ago.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I have read the answer in 'Hansard,' and to me and other hon. members that answer is not plain enough to be understood. I would like the minister to give an answer to my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is regular to discuss the subject now.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I can discuss it on going into Ways and Means.

Mr. MONK. I might raise a similar question. Mine was the last question on this list, question 13. I do not see how I can get an answer to this question by converting it into a motion. I submit also that it is a question which could be answered without having recourse to a motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is no necessity for moving it; it stands as an order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That from this day to the end of the session government orders on Monday will have precedence immediately after questions to be put by members.

Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary, Montreal). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister to kindly put off the motion till the following Monday.

Under the heading of 'Public Bills and Orders,' in the journal of the House, these are very important proceedings. I think it would be convenient that the motion do not include Monday next.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would suggest to the Prime Minister that the motion do not include Monday next. I would also suggest that for the words 'after questions to be put by members,' the words 'notices of motion for the production of papers' be substituted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no objection.

Motion as amended, agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved :

That when this House adjourns on Tuesday next, the 28th instant, it stand adjourned to Thursday the 2nd March.

Motion agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That from this day to the end of the session the House will meet on Wednesday at 3 o'clock p.m., and that the sitting on such days shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other sitting days.

Motion agreed to.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES—MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS.

Mr. OWEN. Before you proceed with the orders of the day, I have here a telegram which I wish to read, and to ask a question about it. It comes from a very important place just at present, being dated Washington, February 23.

Senator Cummins has served notice that he will propose amendments to the Canadian Reciprocity Bill to admit free from Canada manufactured product not mentioned in the treaty.

The question I wish to ask is this : Should the American government change their reciprocity treaty soon, I suppose about to be entered into between Canada and the United States, so as to allow the manufactured products of Canada to enter the United States free, will our government also allow the manufactured products of the United States to come into Canada free?

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid my hon. friend is not correctly interpreting the telegram. If I understand it, the motion of Senator Cummins is that manufactured products of Canada can be admitted into the United States free of duty. There is nothing in this agreement which will prevent the United States doing that if they want to.

Mr. OWEN. But should the American government change the treaty so as to allow—

Mr. MARTIN (Montreal).

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend is mistaken, that would not be a change in the treaty.

Mr. OWEN. If they do that, will our government allow the products of American manufacturers to enter Canada free?

Mr. FIELDING. I would wait until I received the proposal before I considered it.

HOURS OF LABOUR ON PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. KING. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to make a correction. In a communication I received this morning my attention was drawn to the fact that when I was asked during the course of the debate on January 16, if I had received any representations respecting amendments to the Eight Hour Bill introduced by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), from the workingmen employed on the Intercolonial, I replied, no. I find that I was in error in making this reply, that in fact communications were received during my absence, and acknowledged by the Deputy Minister of Labour, and subsequently further acknowledged by myself. The question was asked me in the due course of debate, and I answered on the spur of the moment without having recollected the communications I now refer to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to two returns ordered by the House, one on the 23rd of January, the other on the 16th of February. The one on the 23rd of January was for the by-laws, &c., of the Bankers' Association as approved by the Treasury Board ; the other was for the reports of the curators of the different banks to whom curators had been appointed. I would like these down just as soon as the minister can get them.

Mr. FIELDING. I will call the attention of the officials to them. I was not aware the order of the House had not been complied with.

Mr. FOSTER. I might also ask the minister to hurry up the other editions from day to day of reciprocity resolutions and amendments pro and con. These are becoming very interesting now, and we would like not to be behind date.

FISHERIES PROTECTION SERVICE.

Mr. JAMESON. I call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) to this despatch which I find in the Ottawa 'Free Press' of February 22 :

'RAINBOW' MAêES FIRST SEIZURE.'

The Department of Naval Affairs has received a message to the effect that the new Canadian Cruiser 'Rainbow', while rounding Cape Scott, had caught the steamer 'Edric' of Seattle fishing within the three-mile limit, and was proceeding to Esquimalt with the 'Edric' in tow.

I would like to ask the minister if this report is correct, and if so, to what nationality the vessel seized belongs.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have seen the report in the newspapers, and I asked the department to send me the particulars. I expect to receive them in a few minutes, and will inform my hon. friend. I suppose that the information is correct. All the vessels of the Canadian navy are utilized in the protection of the fisheries.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What business will be taken up to-morrow)?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. To-morrow we intend to proceed with Supply.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What particular department?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I shall state that later in the day.

Mr. FIELDING. There is a special Supply Bill for the current year with which some progress has been made. That will be the first item.

WAYS AND MEANS — RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to bring to the attention of the House a communication I have received from the Trent River Paper Company, it is as follows:

E. Gus Porter, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I learned from the papers, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has promised to carefully consider any objections filed against the proposed changes in the tariff.

Relying upon this promise, I appeal to you as our representative in parliament, to bring to the attention of the Premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the truth concerning the position the strawboard manufacturers of Canada would be placed in, should the proposed change in the tariff regarding paper, pasteboard and similar products selling for 4c. or less than 4c. per pound, be put into effect.

The Hon. Mr. Fielding when introducing the reciprocity agreement, stated that he has consented to admit all manufactures of paper selling for 4 cents or less, into Canada, free of duty, because he is of the opinion that the Canadian manufacturers should be able to compete, with manufacturers of similar products in the United States.

Unfortunately for the manufacturers of strawboard in Canada, the Hon. Mr. Fielding has failed to realize the true position of affairs, and I submit, through you, for the consideration of the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. Mr. Fielding, the following facts:

1st. The freight rates on strawboard, from strawboard mills situated in Ohio, are lower to Windsor and London than our rates are, and as low as ours to Paris, Hamilton, Niagara Falls, Berlin, Guelph, Galt, Brampton, and Brantford, and only 40 cents per ton higher to Toronto. Our Winnipeg business would be lost to Michigan or Indiana mills, owing to the great difference in freight rates in their favour.

2nd. Our product is to be admitted free, and we are called upon to pay the following rates of duty:—

	Per ton.
On slack coal (a large item in our cost of manufacture)..	$0 14
Freight from International bridge ..	1 30
Or, in all..	$1 44

Beyond a doubt we have got to pay $1.44 more per ton for our fuel than the United States manufacturers have. Further however, on this subject of coal, the freight on a ton of coal from the mines to the international bridge is $1.25 per 2,000 lbs. On the other hand, all the board mills in Ohio can bring their coal supply to their mills for less than $1 per ton or thereabouts.

Therefore, Canadian manufacturers are under a handicap of from $1.25 to $1.50 per ton on the manufactured product, in so far as coal consumption alone is concerned.

Again, it must be remembered, that we have to endure rigorous winter season, and the amount expended in fuel for the mere heating of the mill buildings is considerable.

The duty on felts, another large item in the cost of manufacture, is 35 per cent, the duty on wire cloth, 30 per cent, the duty on machinery and parts thereof is from 27½ to 30 per cent, on valves and steam pipe, and steam pipe fittings, pumps, belting and all other supplies, we pay a high rate of duty.

We consider that the duties on outward and inward freights we pay, place us under a disadvantage of from $2.50 to $4.50 per ton, according to distance or point of delivery from our mill. The business west of Boston we will lose—no hope in that direction.

This question of the paper and pulp section of the reciprocity agreement seems to me to be in a very complex condition. As I read it, only paper or woodboard, the major part of which consists of mechanical or chemical pulp, is to be admitted free into the United States, and even then, only when the pulp is produced from timber cut upon land, upon which there are no provincial government regulations, hindering the free export of pulp wood to the States. Such paper or board to be of the value of 4 cents per pound or less than 4 cents per pound. On the other hand, as far as I understand the wording of this same paragraph as it reads in the reciprocity resolution introduced in the House of Commons, all paper, pasteboard and similar products valued at 4 cents or less than 4 cents per pound are to be admitted free into Canada from the United States, as soon as the United States government consents to admit pulp and paper free from all parts of Canada.

What I wish to make plain is this, that I gather from the two wordings that strawboard will be admitted free from the United States although the United States will not admit strawboard free. I can hardly believe that the Hon. Mr. Fielding will allow the agreement to go through in that way. Free admission to the United States for our strawboard will not be of any use to us, but that is only added proof that we are placed in a helpless position. I would like very much to have the opportunity of having a short interview with the Minister of Finance, just for the purpose of explaining our position.

Yours truly,
The Trent River Paper Co., Ltd.,
W. S. MILLER,
Managing Director.

I would ask the Minister of Finance whether an interview such as it is desired here would be accorded?

Mr. FIELDING. We are here from day to day, and we are only too happy to receive any gentlemen who come to us on public business.

Mr. KNOWLES. I am requested to communicate to the government and the House this important and I believe wise and patriotic resolution passed unanimously by the Swift Current Board of Trade. The resolution reads:

This board of trade views with satisfaction the reciprocal tariff arrangement recently negotiated between Canada and the United States, and on behalf of the agricultural interests of Swift Current strongly urges upon the government of Canada that the promotion of better commercial relations between this country and the great republic to the south of us will not affect our national loyalty but will greatly stimulate the agricultural interests of this country and assist the development of these resources.

Respectfully,
A. WEBER,
Secretary.

Mr. GOODEVE. I desire to bring to the attention of the House the two following resolutions which have been communicated to me:

RESOLUTION OF THE CRESTON FRUIT AND PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.

Whereas the proposed agreement introduced by the Hon. Mr. Fielding will inflict a severe blow to the fruit and lumbering industries of British Columbia without giving any equivalent; and whereas the fruit industry is in its infancy and needs fostering; and whereas the fostering of home industries is of vital importance to the welfare of this province; and whereas the proposed agreement would impair the capital investment of those interested in those industries; now be it resolved, that the Creston Fruit and Produce Association in regular meeting here assembled, strongly condemns the proposed agreement so far as it applies to these two industries.

And whereas the principle of reciprocity with the United States involves fundamental changes in the policy adopted during the past ten years and with such success by Canada, and may involve Canada as a whole, in a policy which will result in our commerce being diverted, and flowing north to south, instead of east to west as at present, to the great disadvantage of Canadian railways, manufacturers and producers; therefore the Creston Fruit and Produce Association, in regular meeting here assembled, requests the earnest attention of the government to these facts, before any change whatsoever is made, in the present successful Canadian tariff policy.

And that copies of these resolutions be sent to Premier McBride, A. S. Goodeve, Senator Howitt Bostock and Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Resolution passed unanimously by the South Kootenay Farmers' Institute:

Whereas, the fruit and vegetable growers of South Kootenay have invested heavily in the fruit industry, relying upon the government of Canada to maintain existing tariff conditions as affecting their products; or in case of any modification of the tariff affecting fruit, vegetable, and poultry products, to benefit, at least, to an equal extent by the modification of the tariff on other articles affecting the cost of production of these commodities; and

Whereas, the cost of production in this district is increased by the fact that labour and all supplies are higher by reason of a generally protective tariff, and by the distance from eastern Canadian manufacturing centres; and

Whereas, the proposed reciprocity arrangement with the United States would remove the protection which we now enjoy, while there is nothing in the proposed reciprocal arrangement to reduce the cost of production; the result, therefore, will be both injurious and unjust to us, and will doubtless mean the ruin of many who have invested their all in these industries.

Therefore, be it resolved, that we, the members of the South Kootenay Farmers' Institute, do unanimously protest against the abrogation of the present duties on fruit, vegetables and poultry products, and respectfully urge that the government of Canada may find some other means of securing such concessions as they may desire from the United States than the partial extinction of these most important industries.

Signed on behalf of the Institute.

GEO. A. PAULL,
Secretary.

Dated at Columbia Gardens, B.C.,
Feb. 13, 1911.

Mr. SEXSMITH. I wish to call the attention of the government to the following item from the Toronto 'News,' which is published in the Montreal 'Gazette':

Toronto, February 22.—The 'News' says that President Stuart, of the Quaker Oats Company, a large American concern, with a Canadian branch at Peterborough, while in the city a few days ago, stated to Z. A. Lash, K.C., that if the proposed agreement is adopted at least 80 per cent, of the business now done at Peterborough will be transferred to the United States, which will practically mean the closing of the Peterborough mills.

I wish to ask if the government has had any representation in regard to this matter ?

Mr. FIELDING. I have read the article in the press to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I desire to call the attention of the government to a resolution passed by the Associated Boards of Trade, of the province of Ontario at their meeting in Toronto yesterday, the resolution was introduced by a prominent Liberal and seconded by the Hon. E. J. Davis, ex-commissioner of Crown lands in the Ross government, and it reads:

In the opinion of the Ontario Associated Boards of Trade the proposed reciprocity agreement threatens Canadian nationality and autonomy and is opposed to the true interests of Canada and should not be ratified.

This resolution was carried by a vote of 97 to 18. I also desire to call the attention of the government to a statement made yesterday by Sir William Van Horne, who, speaking on the reciprocity agreement said:

It has made me sick and ashamed; too sick and too ashamed to say anything on the subject.

In view of the representations of men of the standing of Sir William Van Horne; in view of the representations of an association representing all the boards of trade in the province of Ontario, and in view of all the representations that have been made by all the associations and boards of trade throughout the country, I desire to ask if these will have any effect whatever upon the determination of the government to force through this reciprocity compact.

Mr. FIELDING. The only new point in my hon. friend's remarks is the high admiration he has now for the Hon. E. J. Davis. We are glad to know that hon. gentlemen opposite think so well of him.

Mr. LALOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the government to a resolution of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, which, by a vote of 69 to 13, condemned the proposed trade arrangement between the United States and Canada. This resolution was moved by Mr. W. H. Cross and seconded by Mr. D. C. Cameron, who was Liberal candidate in the last election in the city of Winnipeg. I wish to know if resolutions of this kind will have the effect of causing the government to withdraw the agreement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read the resolution.

Mr. LALOR. That resolution reads:

That the Winnipeg Board of Trade, after careful consideration of the proposed reciprocity agreement between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, is firmly of the opinion that the same is not in the best interest of the Dominion, particularly that portion of the country west of the Great Lakes, and desires to impress upon the government its urgent wish that the proposal be not ratified.

Mr. LAW. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a resolution passed by the Yarmouth County Farmers' Association, which is composed of both Liberals and Tories alike. I may say that this resolution was passed unanimously and without division. It reads:

Whereas the reciprocal trade arrangement recently drafted by representatives of the United States and representatives of Canada is now before the parliament of Canada for ratification.

And whereas, in the opinion of this Yarmouth County Farmers' Association the ratification of said arrangement and the amendment of the customs tariffs of both countries in accordance with the schedules to said proposed arrangement, will establish between Canada and the United States, not only a more liberal trade policy than heretofore, which must have many advantages, but will promote and encourage the commercial interests of both countries and strengthen the friendly relations now happily prevailing between them, and thus add another safe-guard to the peace of the empire by further promoting the union of Anglo-Saxon nations for their common interests.

Therefore resolved, that this Yarmouth County Farmers' Association place on record its approval of said trade arrangement, and of its hope and desire that it may be ratified both by the Canadian Parliament and the American Congress, believing that its ratification will effect a marked increase in the prosperity of the people of Canada.

Further resolved, that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Honourable W. S. Fielding, Minister of Finance and to B. B. Law, M.P., at Ottawa.

Yarmouth, N.S., February 17, 1911.

I wish also to say that the Yarmouth County Farmers' Association is one of the largest, if not the largest farmers' associations in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg to present a petition from the Fruit Growers' Association of the village of Burlington, in the county of Halton, which I will read:

Burlington, Ont., Feb. 2, 1911.

Whereas it is proposed to establish free trade in fruits and vegetables between Canada and the United States.

And whereas, millions of dollars are invested in Canada in these industries.

And whereas, under free trade, competition would be unequal and the Canadian power heavily handicapped by reason of having to sell in a wide open market and to buy in a protected one, and also on account of ten or twelve times the amount of capital invested in the fruit industry in the United States as compared with Canada, and the larger investment always tends and strives to crush the smaller.

And whereas, the value of fruit and vegetable lands would be materially diminished.

And whereas the fruit and vegetable growers have from time to time in the past emphasized to the government of the day the desirability of a moderately protective tariff; therefore, be it resolved that:

The Canadian government be respectfully requested to maintain the present Canadian tariff on fruits and vegetables entering Canada, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Mr. David Henderson, M.P., for Halton.

Moved by A. W. Peart, seconded by Robert Fowler.

H. T. FOSTER,
Pres. Burlington Fruit Growers' Association.
W. E. A. PEER,
Sec. Burlington Fruit Growers' Association.

I present this petition Mr. Speaker, hoping that it will assist the right hon. gentleman to find a reasonable excuse for withdrawing from the compact which he has announced to the House.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I do not know that these extracts are all in perfect order, but as we have been having some of them, and as I have here a newspaper that has been sent to me without any communication, asking me to read it to the House, perhaps it would be as well if I should do so. The article is from the Summerland 'Review,' which I suppose is the organ of the fruit industry in British Columbia. There is an article from Mr. Burrell, with reference to the question, and this article in the 'Review,' is headed 'Sober Second Thoughts.'

Mr. BURRELL. Do I understand the hon. minister to say that this extraordinary article is from my pen?

Mr. PATERSON. No. It may, perhaps, come from the hon. gentleman's pen after he has the sober second thought which the editor recommends. The editorial in this fruit organ is as follows:

SOBER SECOND THOUGHTS.

When the people of Canada have overcome the scare many have apparently been driven into in connection with the reciprocity agreement between the United States and Canada, we believe that the general opinion will be that the agreement is one of the greatest achievements of statesmanship to be recorded in the Laurier regime, in fact, something too good to come to pass, for the American Senate will hardly pass it. This may sound strange coming from a newspaper essentially Conservative in its politics, particularly in view of the fact that many of our politicians see in the agreement much out of which to make political capital.

Mr. HENDERSON.

In matters so great as this, where the interests of the whole Dominion are at stake, and Canada is getting that for which the Dominion has worked hard since 1865, we believe the matter of politics should be laid aside and the question studied soberly so as to be fully understood.

Going back to 1854, a treaty of reciprocity in natural products was entered into between the United States and Canada. This was the result, largely, of the personal work and influence of Lord Elgin, then Governor General of Canada. This treaty proved of great value to both countries and under it Canada revived in a marked degree. That treaty covered the navigation of the St. Lawrence, the fisheries question, and provided for mutual free trade between Canada and the United States in the products of the two countries. For six years the Elgin treaty worked particularly advantageously to Canada. Then the strained relations between England and the United States over the Alabama claims, brought on the question on the part of the United States of the abrogation of that treaty. For five years more it was continued, then in 1865 the American Senate cancelled the agreement.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not think it is quite proper for a minister of the Crown to obstruct his own motion for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means by reading a long article in defence of the government's policy, and thereby setting a bad example to the House. I want to ask your ruling on the question whether this conduct is strictly in accordance with parliamentary usage.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Minister of Customs has seconded the motion before the Chair, and I presume that he has a right to speak.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not object to the point of order. I am glad that it has been taken. It just emphasizes the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite cannot hear the truth and remain quiet under it—that they are afraid of free discussion—afraid of anything being said which will conflict with their pet theory.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The motion is for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means. I ask whether the hon. gentleman can discuss the matter contained in the motion, as he is doing, by reading an extract.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have been consulting Bourinot in the last day or two on that point, and I find that it would be irregular to discuss the resolution now before the committee. But the doctrine laid down by Bourinot is that on a motion for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, or into Committee of Supply, almost any question which is not on the Order Paper, or in committee, may be discussed; but a specific reference to the resolution before the committee I would consider out of order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then this is strictly in order, because it has nothing whatever to do with the resolution before the committee.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Is it your ruling, then, that an amendment dealing with the resolution before the committee would be out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not called upon to rule on that point. If the point is raised, after hearing the old parliamentarians, I will decide it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The hon. gentleman is out of order, then?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is in order; he is speaking to his motion.

Mr. PATERSON. It is strange that the hon. gentleman could not see that. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been reading to the House extracts from newspapers, and have been asking time and again for any expressions of views that have reached the government with reference to this question. Here is an expression of view with reference to it, and why it should be thought that I am contravening any rule of the House by reading it I cannot understand. The article continues:

Since that time numerous efforts have been made to renew the reciprocity trade relations between the two countries. In 1866 a Canadian delegation went to Washington to negotiate a treaty; in 1869, Sir John Rose made the effort; in 1873 George Brown and Sir Edward Thornton repeated the effort, and in 1890-92 Hon. Robert Bond did likewise, with no result.

While these prominent Canadians were making the effort on the part of Canada, various Bills and resolutions for reciprocity with Canada were tabled or voted down in Congress from time to time. After this came the 'Joint High Commission,' which was to settle all points of difference between the two countries including reciprocity.

From this brief history of reciprocity and reciprocity negotiations covering half a century or more, it will be seen that Canada is now getting something our statesmen, at least, have believed all along the Dominion was in need of, and, whether we can all agree as to what should and should not be placed on the free list, we must recognize this, that reciprocity is something our greatest statesmen have fought hard to bring about.

There is another article in the same paper dealing with the same question, which is as follows:

OUR FRUIT HAS NOTHING TO FEAR.

Without wishing to disparage the argument sincerely made by many against the removal of the duty on fresh fruit and vegetables to and from the United States, as provided in the proposed reciprocity agreement, we object to the underlying thought which bottoms all such argument, that Canadian fruit growers are not able to compete with the American fruit growers in the matter of picking, packing and selling their fruit.

British Columbia fruit, such as peaches, pears and apples,—particularly apples,—could be sold at the highest price in the best markets in America alongside of the best fruit from California, Colorado Washington and Oregon. We have seen Colorado Jonathans push the California Belleflower off the market at Los Angeles, the greatest fruit centre in the world. And, under reciprocity British Columbia fruit growers could ship apples to such centres as this and find a market already built up. For our fruit growers have nothing to fear in competition with the fruit from any of the American districts.

Speaker Cannon, of the American House, spoke significantly at a banquet of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers a few evenings ago.

We have lately had sent to Congress a commercial agreement in name, but a treaty in reality, but one that goes primarily to the House. In a month's time we shall be called upon to enact it as law. I do not know what we are going to do with it. Ask the fruit growers of California what they are going to do when Canadian fruits are free. What answer are we going to give one-third of the population of the country—the farmers?

And are we to fear the American apple on our markets when our fruit is so much superior? If our fruit growers could produce the quantity, the product from the other side would not stand any chance here, for our fruit would command the market. Until we do produce the quantity the present tariff or any other tariff is but a superficial remedy.

As I said, the other side of the question is set out in the letter published in this same paper and signed by Mr. Burrell.

Mr. LALOR. Is that a resolution or an editorial article?

Mr. PATERSON. They are both editorials.

Mr. BURRELL. As the hon. minister has seen fit to introduce my name in this discussion and has also quoted an editorial from the Summerland 'Review,' British Columbia, it is only fair that I should ask the House to bear with me a minute or two along that same line. I have in the Vernon 'News' of February 9 an article which gives the report of the Associated Boards of Trade of the Okanagan valley, which met at Summerland, and which expressed very clearly and explicitly the overwhelming convictions of the fruit growers in that district. That resolution is as follows:

That the Associated Boards of Trade for the Okanagan Valley at their annual meeting now assembled urged in the strongest manner upon the Dominion government the absolute necessity of maintaining the present import duty on fruit as from the United States.

The fruit industry in British Columbia is in the infant stage with great possibilities which has been stated by responsible men will equal the lumber industry of the province, and at present stage requires careful handling and fostering. There are millions of dollars invested in the fruit industry in the province more than in the farm implement business of Ontario which has been nursed and protected, by so doing these factories of Canada are classed in this line as the leading industries of the world. Without this protection through their growing years, these magnificent plants now employing thousands, would never have existed. The same applies to the British Columbia fruit industry in which the growers have invested many millions of dollars, besides the very large investments of capital in irrigation systems running into millions of dollars.

The necessity of a protection duty outside the fostering of a young and promising industry, is the undeniable fact that the natural market for British Columbia. 'The Northwest Territories' is made the dumping ground for surplus fruit from the northwestern states which already possess a large and fully developed fruit industry and the pernicious action of consignment is resorted to on a large scale. It is well taken that the fruit growers are entitled to have their rights guarded the same as has been the case for other enterprises.

It winds up with the strongest representation that this fruit industry absolutely needs protection. The minister has seen fit to quote the views of one editor of a newspaper. I do not know the gentleman who wrote the article or what weight it carried, but the overwhelming majority of the whole of that district entertained diametrically opposite views. I have a copy of the Vernon 'News' of February 16, to show you how strongly they feel on this question. I may say that at a very large meeting on February 15, they quoted various statements made by the government and others with reference to this industry, and among these statements I find the following:

The Shoreham Hotel,
Washington, D.C.,
21st January, 1911.

G. C. Johnston, Esq.,
Secretary, Board of Trade,
Vernon, B.C., Canada.

Dear Sir,—I am just in receipt of your telegram of the 20th and have carefully noted all that is stated therein.

I shall bring the matter before my colleague, Hon. Mr. Fielding, and you may rest assured that it will have our most serious consideration.

Yours truly,
WM. PATERSON.

So that these gentlemen who were representing the fruit growing industry in the Okanagan valley wired to the minister at Washington the disastrous effects which would follow if the duties were taken off, and the hon. Minister of Customs wired in reply, before the negotiations were concluded, that he would seriously consider their representations. The hon. minister has intimated that the gentleman who wrote the article he quoted is a Conservative. I have here a copy of the Kelowna 'Courier' and Okanagan 'Orchardist,' which is edited by one of the strongest, most consistent and vigorous supporters of this government that I know of in western Canada.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not say that this editor was a Conservative.

Mr. BURRELL. My hon. friend was endeavouring to say apparently.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. BURRELL. He said that paper was Conservative, which would lead to the inference that this was a Conservative authority, but the gentleman who edits Kelowna 'Courier' is one of the most indefatigable Liberals in British Columbia, and is rarely to be found opposing or criticising harshly anything this government does. I want to read a leading article from this gentleman on February 16:—

Free trade is theoretically the best policy, failing which fair trade, which would consist in a reasonable tariff to use as a weapon in making countries with high protective tariffs come to time; but there should be no picking and choosing, and a lopsided reciprocity agreement which leaves untouched the majority of the high protective duties on manufactured articles, but strips the farmer and fruit grower of their share of protection, is grossly unfair.

And he goes on:

As a Liberal, albeit always an independent one, it pains us to find ourselves in opposition to the policy of the leaders of our party, especially when Liberal rule in Canada has been signalized by such abundant prosperity, but we cannot endorse a departure from the established policy of the past fifteen years so discriminatory in its character that it throws the burden of loss and disaster on the infant industry of horticulture, only beginning to direct its wavering steps along the path of progress, while the manufacturing trusts of Eastern Canada, gorged with the accumulated profits of years, sit sleek and smiling behind an impregnable tariff wall.

Now, before I close this short reply to the Minister of Customs, I would like the minister to understand the emphatic opinion of a gentleman whom he ought to respect. And I would call the attention of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), to this, and that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) also, for, if I understood the latter gentleman rightly, he implied that they were Conservatives largely, who were indulging in the fiercest criticism of the tendency of this policy from the national point of view. The gentleman whom I am going to quote, is one who had the honour and pleasure of entertaining my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in the city of Vernon. I refer to Mr. Husband, mayor of Vernon, a lifelong Liberal, and highly respected in the district, and who, so far as I know, has always been a consistent Liberal. At the board of trade meeting, at which they protested strongly against the proposals, Mayor Husband spoke strongly on the point to which I have referred. I quote from the Vernon 'News' report of the meeting:

Mayor Husband then said that he would like to offer a few remarks regarding the reciprocity agreement, and proceeded to set forth in very lucid and convincing terms his reasons for opposing it. He thought that every one in the district, who had any knowledge of the circumstances, would agree with the resolution passed by this board—— —and the associated boards, protesting against the removal of the duty, and he went on to review very thoroughly the various conditions which gave the old established fruit growers of the states to the south a great advantage over us on the prairie markets. . .

That is the resolution protesting against the removal of the duty.

Still more important, however, was the effect that such an arrangement would have on our national and political life. The great and patriotic statesmen who had made it their object to build up a strong nation in Canada under British institutions had commenced by uniting the east and west by a line of railway. We have pledged our national credit for many millions to build other roads, with the view of uniting our provinces and maintaining our trade in our own channels. He believed that the trade policy inaugurated by Sir John A. Macdonald was the best possible for Canada at the time, and it was fortunate that another such great statesman as Sir Wilfrid Laurier had continued the development of this policy. Have we reached a stage, he asked, when we can afford to let down our tariff walls? . . .

He felt that any step towards reciprocity was premature and dangerous. It was the beginning of the parting of the ways which might eventually lead to Americanizing the country. While he had every confidence in Mr. Fielding, who he regarded as one of the best finance ministers Canada ever had——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BURRELL. The hon. gentlemen who cheer that sentiment, should let me finish the sentence.

—he feared that in his anxiety to increase trade he had overlooked the grave political danger of such an agreement.

He disliked and mistrusted the attitude of the United States in this agreement. He felt that there was an ulterior motive behind their actions, and concluded by comparing them to the Greeks at Troy, reiterating the classic warning to beware of the Greeks especially when they bear gifts.

That is all I have to say. I want to make it absolutely clear that the little matter of editorial opinion quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), is abundantly repudiated, and he has his answer at the hands of the Liberal gentlemen whom I have quoted.

Mr. BRADBURY. I hold in my hand a letter from the market gardeners of Manitoba. Last year, I presented to this House a petition in the interests of the market gardeners, and I received a promise from the Finance Minister that nothing would be done in the way of changing the tariff until an investigation had been made. This letter goes on to say:

As secretary of our society, I make a strong protest on behalf of our gardeners, because the government have taken this step without consulting our producers and without any consideration for the petitions already sent to them, and further without any regard for the capital invested in this industry in our country by those now in the business and many others coming in renting land at a big figure and putting their last dollar into their outfits. Free vegetables will simply put these men out of business. The government should consider our local conditions—expensive labour and working and keeping clean these gardens which is a very costly item compared with cheap southern labour, and also our climatic conditions, our severe winter necessarily entailing an enormous expense in heating greenhouses which must be used in order to compete. Our market now is not as it should be, being controlled by a few middlemen. We are just now taking steps to have the city of Winnipeg establish a central market place. The number of gardeners around Winnipeg for five or six miles would be fully 100, with others growing potatoes and other vegetables who do not make a regular business of it. The amount of capital invested would average from $1,000 to $3,000. I estimate roughly the amount tied up in these outfits, including horses, machinery, wagons, greenhouses, &c., and not considering the land value, about $400,000, or perhaps $500,000. If you included the land value, of course it would be very much more. On learning from the newspapers that this arrangement had been made, I communicated with the President of the Market Gardeners' Association and asked him for a special meeting on Monday next to protest against the action of the government. I see by the papers that it will be up in the House on Tuesday next.

A copy of the resolution sent forward to the government has been sent to me, and I beg to put it on record. It is in the form of a memorial:

To the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada, and to the members of the House of Commons.

Gentlemen,—We, the undersigned market gardeners in the vicinity of Winnipeg now assembled humbly desire to impress upon your honourable body the importance of the duty now being imposed upon green vegetables coming into Winnipeg from the United States.

We therefore petition that this duty be left as at present and sincerely hope your government will not remove the same as asked for by the wholesalers and jobbers in the session of 1909, which would benefit only themselves and neither the producers nor the consumers of Manitoba.

And it would only be the means of depriving our gardeners of a very large portion of their earnings and in fact many of them would have to go out of business.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), promised across the floor of the House last year, to give these men an opportunity of presenting their views, and at least to make an investigation, I think it is absolutely unfair, by the proposition brought down, to deprive these men of the protection they enjoyed under the old tariff. I beg to call the attention of the government to another resolution passed in the city of Winnipeg. This was passed by the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, two-thirds of the members of which are Liberals:

The Winnipeg Grain Exchange, by a vote of 54 to 15, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is the opinion of the members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange that the proposed measure of reciprocity trade between Canada and the United States of America now under consideration at Ottawa and Washington, if ratified, will not be in the best interests of Canada.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES—POSITION OF SOME OTHER COUNTRIES.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I brought a question up here a short time ago, and asked the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), if he would give me a definite answer. The hon. gentleman replied that the information asked for by my question, had been covered by the answer to a question asked by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe), on February 16. The question was with regard to this reciprocity treaty. The hon. member for North Ontario asked a question on February 16, as recorded at 3744 of the Unrevised 'Hansard':

1. What is the number and the names of the countries, if any, that will be entitled to have their natural products and manufactured articles come into Canada under the same terms as the United States under the proposed reciprocity agreement?

Now, I am not finding fault with the answer that the Minister of Finance gave to the hon. member for North Ontario. That answer, perhaps, was satisfactory to that hon. gentleman. That answer reads as follows:

Mr. BRADBURY.

1. France is a favoured nation country to a limited extent, that is to say, as respects the lists of articles specified in schedules B and C to the French treaty. Twelve countries: Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela—are accorded most favoured nation treatment generally.

That does not answer the question definitely. It also states:

These are consequently enjoying the benefits of the French treaty As respects the dutiable schedules in the agreement with the United States, the concessions to be granted to the United States are largely the same as already have been granted to France and the favoured nation countries.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the whole tendency of this answer is to mix the question up so that people will not understand it.

As respects a large part of the list, therefore, no additional advantage will be enjoyed by such countries.

That is not a fair, straight-out answer to this question.

There are, however, a few articles in the French schedules which in the agreement with the United States are made free or dutiable at lower rates.

There are, however, a few articles in the French schedules which in the agreement with the United States are made free or dutiable at lower rates. In these cases the advantages granted to the United States will extend also to France and the favoured nation countries. In the case of the few articles which are not to be found in the French treaty, the favoured nation countries will be entitled to receive concessions on the same terms as the United States, but France will not be so entitled.

In every sentence of this answer there is a tendency to mix up the whole question, so that the public may not understand it.

Although not arising from any agreement, in no case has any advantage been granted to any foreign country that did not at the same time extend to all parts of the British Empire. In the few cases in which the rates to be established are lower than those already enjoyed by British countries, the reductions will apply to such countries.

Now, I can understand why it was possible for the Finance Minister to mix up this question, because there is no doubt that in answering it he would have to bring in France, with whom we had a special treaty. But in order to get an answer as to the names of the countries that would enjoy the same conditions as the United States in bringing into Canada every article produced by the farmer outside the French treaty, in asking my question I mentioned the Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, and Venezuela. I left out the name of France, because we have a treaty with her. As I understand it, these are the favoured-nation countries, and as I understand it, every one of these countries will be entitled to ship their farm products in here, and to compete with our own farmers, if this treaty goes through. Butter from Denmark can come in to Montreal in competition with our Canadian butter, and come in free, butter from Australia can come free into British Columbia and flood the market there, and the same remark applies to every other country I have named. Now, when this deputation of western farmers was down here last fall, and they were asking for a lower tariff with the United States, we did not hear either the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister, who received that deputation, telling them : Gentlemen, if we carry out your wishes, there will be twelve other countries allowed to send in their stuff and compete with yours. If the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Customs had stood up then and told that deputation from the west : If we do this for you, you are going to have the Argentine Republic, you are going to have Russia, shipping their wheat in here free to compete with ours, you are going to have butter, and poultry, and cheese from all these countries coming in here free ; I venture to say that if the government had told the western farmers this, they would have turned round and said : Don't make any such arrangement with the United States. Now, my object in asking that question was that the farmers of this country, from one end to the other, would understand what the effect of this arrangement would be, and whether it allows twelve other countries besides the United States, and the British colonies to send their goods in here free. There are members of this House who, until a few days ago, did not really understand the whole situation ; and why should not the Minister of Finance, when this question is asked him, jump up and tell the people the exact truth. I venture to say that the Minister of Finance dare not go out into the Northwest to-day and tell the farmers that all these countries are going to import their stuff free into Canada. Every farmer with whom I have talked yet, when he is told that there are twelve other countries going to have the same advantage as the United States, is opposed to this proposition. The whole course of the Minister of Finance shows that he is trying to deceive the people of this Dominion as to the true position of the matter.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. REID (Grenville). I want the Minister of Finance to answer that question, yes or no.

Mr. FIELDING. I have no right to speak. My hon. friend has asked a question, and I could not answer it in any plainer English than I used in answering the same question more comprehensively put by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). I think the hon. member understands it well enough, but it suits his purpose to pretend that he does not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not regard the answer as entirely definite. The reference in it is to dutiable goods, it says nothing at all about the free list. I suppose there was an obvious intention in making that omission. Why should not the hon. gentleman be able to inform this House, in the first place—

Mr. FIELDING. On what point?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Whether the Argentine Republic will have the right to send its goods into our territory on the same terms as the United States?

Mr. FIELDING. That is answered, my answer says so.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, we have the answer now ; that is correct. Then will the hon. gentleman tell us if Austria-Hungary will have the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. The same answer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will Bolivia have the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will Colombia have the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Denmark the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Japan the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Norway the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Russia the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Spain the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Sweden the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Switzerland the same right?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Venezuela the same right.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, if the hon. gentleman had said this before, it would have saved the House a good deal of time.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I am not taking up the time of the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, but the hon. gentleman has done so, and he complains if any one else does it.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I do not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He reproached me yesterday for having made three speeches, and I was obliged to tell him that I would have to make many more. I ask him now if we will have the right to send our goods into those countries on the same terms on which we can send them into the United States.

Mr. FIELDING. Surely the hon. gentleman is not serious. He knows the meaning of the favoured-nation treaty. It means that you get in those countries the best terms that are granted by those countries to any people on earth.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Surely this is a very plain question : Will we have the same right to enter the markets of those countries, both in respect to free and dutiable goods, that we have to enter the markets of the United States under this reciprocity proposal?

Mr. FIELDING. Every one of these countries makes its own tariff laws, as we make ours. Every country may send its products into the Dominion of Canada subject to our tariff laws, and our products must enter every country subject to the tariff laws of that country ; and every country having a favoured-nation treaty guarantees to us that no other country will ever get any advantage over us in its markets. That is favoured-nation treatment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I did not ask the hon. gentleman to make a disquisition on the favoured-nation treaty, I was asking a very simple question. We did extract certain information from him by going over these countries one by one, but with difficulty, and much reluctance on his part. Now, I ask him this: As under these reciprocity proposals, the goods of Canada can enter the United States, some of them on the free list, and some upon the reduced list—will we have that same right in respect to the countries I have mentioned? That is a plain question, is it not? And it is a question which the government ought not to be afraid to answer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. FIELDING. There is no fear in answering it. These favoured-nation countries are to-day, as I said in the answer I gave to the member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe), they are to-day enjoying to a large extent the concessions which this arrangement gives to the United States. These concessions to a large extent are the same as were granted to France, and when they were granted to France, they were granted to the favoured-nation countries. The favoured-nation countries are getting them to-day, and they are not getting them by virtue of the reciprocity arrangements at all. Second, the reciprocity arrangement does not deal with favoured nations. Whatever obligation we have in the matter of trade relations has been on the statute-book for ages; it arises out of treaties made by our mother country years ago. We have been subject to these treaties for years. There is nothing new in them to-day, there is nothing in this reciprocity arrangement which in any way creates any new favoured nation condition.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman has not given a conspicuous example of courage, because he has still been afraid to answer the very simple question put to him.

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend will be good enough to repeat the question, I will be as brave as he is known to be.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman did not understand the question he is the only hon. gentleman in this House who did not.

Mr. FIELDING. Pity my ignorance.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If his intellect is not keyed up to the pitch of understanding such a question as I have addressed to him, he had better give over the control of this treaty to some one else.

Mr. FIELDING. Oh, no he hadn't.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I make that suggestion.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend has not been invited to do that. If he will repeat the question I will try to answer it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will repeat it once more, and try to make it so plain that even the Minister of Finance will understand it. I asked whether or not the terms which are extended to this country by the United States, under these tariff proposals, will be extended to the products of this country entering the countries that I named only a moment ago. If that is not plain, I cannot make it plain.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman's question is, whether the terms we obtain in the United States will be obtained in these various favoured nation countries ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes.

Mr. FIELDING. I answer—and if the hon. gentleman did not know it, it is a marvellous thing that one in his position did not know it, and I must be permitted to doubt whether he did not know it,—that this arrangement does not in any way touch the rights which we have in any countries in the world. I repeat that every country makes its own tariff arrangements, that the United States has no power to determine on what terms and conditions Canadian products will enter Austria-Hungary. Every nation makes its own tariff.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Except Canada.

Mr. FIELDING. Canada makes its own tariff. I would have thought that after our little interview of yesterday, never again would we have heard that very foolish statement. I have a better opinion of hon. gentlemen than to suppose they do not know the principles of favoured-nation treatment. Favoured nation, simply means that in every one of these countries, we have a guarantee that no other country will ever be allowed to get any advantage over us. That is what favoured-nation treatment means, and I rather suspect that the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course I do.

Mr. PATERSON. I beg pardon, I only spoke once, and I was called to order, when I was entirely within my rights, and here is an hon. gentleman making four speeches.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I yielded on every occasion in order that the Minister of Finance might ask a question.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know that you have an absolute right to ask a question, and demand three or four answers to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have allowed a great many questions to be put, because I have felt it was the sense of the House that they should be put. Of course the minister having been called on more than once, cannot be called on to make a speech on each occasion, and therefore, it is irregular to put these questions, because they cannot be put without there being a right to answer them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was not calling in question the right of a minister to answer my question, that would be an utter lack of courtesy. I asked the minister a question, and I yielded the floor in order he might have an opportunity to answer. I could not compel him to answer, but I yielded the floor to him to answer if he saw fit.

Mr. PATERSON. No, because you spoke three or four times.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have never understood that a gentleman who sits down in this House in order that some one else may answer a question thereby yields his right to the floor. The Minister of Customs does not seem to know any more about the rules of the House, than he does about this reciprocity treaty.

Mr. PATERSON. I take the point of order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I knew perfectly well what the answer of the Minister of Finance ought to be, but I sought to let him give a plain statement to the House of what the facts were, and with a good deal of skill he has in some sort of half-hearted way, endeavoured to make a plausible answer, and at the same time to avoid giving a direct answer.

Mr. PATERSON. Do you understand it now ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. PATERSON. I raise the point of order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the point of order?

Mr. PATERSON. The point is that the hon. gentleman has spoken half a dozen times and he has not the right to do that. I was called to order when I was speaking perfectly within my rights, I had not spoken before or anything, and the hon. gentleman has taken the floor four or five times, occupying all the afternoon, after having all his questions answered.

Mr. SPEAKER. I consider that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), is within his right.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think I am entirely right in the conjecture which I ventured a moment ago, that the hon. Minister of Customs knows just about as much about the rules of the House as he does about the reciprocity arrangement. That has been made absolutely manifest by the result of the point of order which he raised just now. I understood perfectly what the situation was, but we desired to have the understanding of the government upon the same point. The question was really not open to argument. We in Canada, under these reciprocity proposals, will be obliged to open our markets to all the countries that have been named upon the same terms as are contained in these proposals with reference to importations from the United States of America. There is no doubt at all about that, but on the other hand, when our products go from Canada to these countries, they do not go on the same terms as those on which products of Canada enter the United States. In other words, to sum it all up, by these reciprocity proposals, our markets are opened upon these terms to the products of some 13 or 14 countries, while the market of only one country is opened to us, under the same terms and conditions. If the Minister of Finance had answered directly on the point, he would have said that which I have just now stated to the House, as to the correctness of which I absolutely defy contradiction by any hon. gentleman in this House.

Mr. SPROULE. Following the good example of the Minister of Customs, I have a burning desire to entertain this House for a length of time by reading important editorials. They are very long and argumentative, and I have no doubt, will afford a great deal of valuable information to members of this House, and since it has been ruled that it is in order to do so, especially by a minister of the Crown, who, in the judgment of some is obstructing the motion which the government has made, to allow the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, I hope to entertain the House probably for the next 24 hours, if I am able to stand up that long. I believe in following a good precedent and a good example.

I have one editorial here extending over two columns and a half; it is ornamented with a photograph of one of the ministers at its head, and I am sure it would be very interesting to the House. But I have been debating in my own mind whether it would be the part of wisdom to do as the Minister of Customs has done and obstruct the business of the House by reading this article. Of course, the Minister of Customs said that no time was wasted by his reading an editorial, and so I might entertain the House by reading an article from the Montreal 'Star,' covering 14 columns, which is filled with valuable advice and courteous advice and kindly advice to the First Minister and the Minister of Finance, and which speaks out on behalf of the interests of our great Dominion and the menace to our connection with the mother land. I would be strongly tempted to read that article if I could do so before the House rose at six o'clock. Of course, we are not in a hurry, because the Minister of Customs has told us that time is no great object, and I could interlard this editorial with a few of my own remarks, which might be jocose in imitation of the Minister of Customs. When my hon. friend from Kootenay was quoting some references to the Minister of Finance this afternoon, hon. gentlemen opposite all cheered the first part of the article, but when the latter part was read they all remained silent. It reminded me of the story of the man who saw a little vicious animal called a bull in a field pawing up the ground and exhibiting his desire to get over the fence and at the man. And the man said: You little brute, I feel like going over that fence myself, taking you by the horns, slinging you down the hill and breaking every bone in your body. Well, the man thought this was a good idea and he had a hearty laugh at it. However, no sooner was he over the fence than the bull charged him, threw him up in the air, and when he came down to earth with nearly every bone in his body broken he said: It was a mighty good thing that I had my laugh beforehand. And so, if these hon. gentlemen opposite had waited until the end of that article they would never have had that opportunity to cheer. But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding my desire to enlighten and entertain the House and my inclination to follow the good example of the Minister of Customs, I am inclined to be merciful and to spare my fellow-members. I, of course, have a strong desire to economize the time of parliament and let the government get on with their very interesting measure, which is doing so much to bring down on them the odium of every intelligent man in Canada, and, therefore, I will not at the present moment read these important editorials, although later on it may be necessary to do so, especially in view of the fact that every time a minister of the Crown rises to tell us something about this beautiful trade arrangement he plainly shows that he knows nothing about it. For the present, Sir, I shall content myself with the observations I have made, and I shall defer until some future occasion, following the example of the Minister of Customs in reading these newspaper editorials.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I see in the newspapers this afternoon a cable despatch from England, which, I ask the Minister of Finance, to reconcile with the statement he made in the House a few days ago. This cable reads:

MR. BRYCE NOT INSTRUCTED.
(Canadian Press Cable).

London, Feb. 23.—In the house of commons to-day Sir Edward Grey in answer to Mr. James Hope said that no instructions had been given to the ambassador at Washington in connection with the Canadian-United States agreement.

Mr. Hope: Do I understand that no instructions were given at all?

Sir Ed. Grey: No instructions were sent beforehand. We have not yet received the full report of the speech of the Canadian minister who said Ambassador Bryce helped all through the negotiations.

Mr. DANIEL. It was the Postmaster General who said that.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). No; it was the Minister of Finance when he made his speech congratulating Ambassador Bryce for the valuable assistance he had rendered in Washington.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Minister of Finance has already spoken on this question, and he cannot be permitted to make another speech.

Mr. FIELDING. I should be glad to answer.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like it to be understood by the House that I cannot allow a minister or a member to speak more than once on the same motion.

Mr. DANIEL. Perhaps the Postmaster General will explain his statement that Mr. Bryce, the British ambassador, had assisted the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs to help along this reciprocity arrangement at Washington.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). The meaning of what I said was that Mr. Bryce had given his assistance and help to the ministers who were at Washington negotiating with the American government, but that did not imply that he had received any instructions. He is our ambassador and naturally he would assist and help Canada whenever Canada needs him. That is the duty of the British ambassador and that is what I said.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yesterday one of the ministers of the Crown tried to make the House and the country believe that the members on this side of the House and the Conservative press throughout the country were largely responsible for promoting the annexation idea. In answer to this, may I be privileged to read a resolution signed by 18 prominent Liberals in the city of Toronto, worded as follows:

PROMINENT LIBERALS OPPOSE RATIFICATION OF RECIPROCITY.

We oppose ratification of the proposed reciprocity agreement with the United States of America:

1. Because in the years 1897 the parliament of Canada repealed the legislation then existing relating to reciprocity and since such repeal neither the people of Canada nor their parliament have entrusted the government with any duty or authority to negotiate with respect to any agreement on the subject.

2. Because the present unexampled prosperity of Canada is the result of the policy which has been pursued in the development of her trade and of her natural resources. Because this has involved the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars upon railways, canals, steamship and other means of transportation between east and west and west and east, and the obligation to incur further great expenditures for the same purpose; and because further development along the same lines would be seriously checked by the proposed reciprocity agreement and the benefits of the expenditures referred to would be to a great extent lost.

3. Because it is essential to the continued national unity and development of Canada that no trade relations with any country should be agreed to by Canada on any basis which would check the growth and development of trade between the various parts of Canada with each other, or between Canada and the various parts of the empire; and because the proposed reciprocity agreement betwen Canada and the United States of America would seriously check the growth and development of this trade.

4. Because any present benefit to any section of Canada or to any interests or individuals therein which might accrue from the proposed agreement would be more than offset by the loss and injury which would accrue to other sections and interests and individuals and because the result to Canada as a whole would be greatly injurious.

5. Because as a result of the proposed agreement the freedom of action possessed by Canada with reference to her tariffs and channels of trade would be greatly curtailed, and she would be hampered in developing her own resources in her own way and by her own people.

6. Because after some years of reciprocity under the proposed agreement the channels of Canada's trade would have become so changed that a termination of the agreement and a return by the United States to a protective tariff as against Canada would become a disturbance of trade to an unparalleled extent, and because the risk of this should not be voluntarily undertaken by Canada.

7. Because to avoid such a disruption Canada would be forced to extend the scope of the agreement so as to include manufactures and other things.

8. Because the agreement as proposed would weaken the ties which bind Canada to the empire, and because the unrestricted reciprocity which would naturally follow would still further weaken those ties and make it more difficult to avert political union with the United States.

9. Because the disruption in the channels of Canada's trade which was caused by the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 and the subsequent establishment of a protective tariff by the United States gave rise to a decided leaning in many minds towards annexation with the United States, and this at a time when Canada was mainly peopled by native-born Canadians and other British subjects to whom the prospect of annexation was most unwelcome, and because Canada in a comparatively few years will have millions of newcomers, a large percentage of whom will have come from foreign countries, and because if Canada should then have to chose between disruption of her channels of trade with the United States or political union with them the preservation of Canadian autonomy and Canadian nationality would be enormously more difficult.

10. Believing as we do that Canadian nationality is now threatened with a more serious blow than any it has heretofore met with, and that all Canadians who place the interests of Canada before those of any party or section or individuals therein should at this crisis state their views openly and fearlessly, we, who have hitherto supported the Liberal party in Canada, subscribe to this statement.

February, 1911.

My object, Mr. Speaker, in placing this resolution on 'Hansard,' is to convince the Finance Minister of the inaccuracy of the statement he made yesterday to the effect that the Conservative members of this House, supported by the Conservative press, were largely responsible for the annexation agitation throughout the country.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer). Mr. Chairman, I need scarcely say to the House that it is somewhat of a relief to a nervous man to have come through the usual daily amount of guerilla warfare, which naturally will take the place of regular opposition methods, when you have an opposition without a tabulated policy, and demoralized largely by the strength and popularity of the policy of the government of the day. I am sure that I carry with me the consensus of opinion of the whole House when I express my personal gratification that the member for the St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames), has been able, after his serious illness, to take his position once more amongst us, and make his painstaking contributions to the study and exposition of public affairs. I should like to reciprocate the wish which that hon. gentleman gave expression to, when he said that we ought to approach this question of reciprocity in a spirit calm and non-partisan. If he were to ask us to be non-partisan in a resolution, I should be disposed to say reasonably non-partisan so far as the hon. member for St. Antoine is concerned. Now, I do not intend to devote very much attention to the details of the speech of my hon. friend, who very courteously informed me that he had to leave for New York at four o'clock this afternoon; and he, I am sure, will not think me guilty of a bad return for that courtesy in not referring to his speech in detail. There are, however, one or two points to which I would like to draw attention. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), some little time ago, depicted myself as occupying a somewhat lone position in this House—as being a kind of Canadian Rosebery, ploughing my lonely furrow. Well, I am bound to say that there was an admission at the beginning of the speech of the hon. member for St. Antoine, that takes away a great deal of my feeling of loneliness to-day; because he said that protection to be of any use, must be protection all round, otherwise it became class legislation, and was doomed to be destroyed. He saw, in what is going on now, the fall of the outworks, and he said the citadel would soon come down. Well, that is very consoling to a lone free-trader in a foreign land; for I should like to point out that we never have had protection all round in this country, and there never has been protection all round in any country upon earth. That is not the nature of the thing; that is not the object of it. The only object of protection is to give a minority the chance of protecting themselves at the expense of the majority. My hon. friend from St. Antoine, and I think, my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid), have indicated the opinion that the western farmers, when they understand this question, will not be so keenly in favour of reciprocity as they are supposed to be at the present time. These hon. gentlemen need not be alarmed. The western farmers have been studying this question for some time, and to a great deal of the speech of the hon. member for St. Antoine, I think I can furnish an answer which was placed in my hand to-day by Mr. Bower, the president of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, who allows me to use his name in saying that the United Farmers of Alberta, the Grain Growers of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and the Grange of Ontario are all unanimously in favour of reciprocity. The grain growers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the Grangers of Ontario are unanimously in favour of reciprocity.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is the political machine.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Am I to understand that my hon. friend is opposed to reciprocity?

Mr. BRADBURY. Most undoubtedly, as you propose it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Then I can only say that there will be more lonely men than myself, if I understand anything of the opinion of the western farmers and the meaning of legislation such as this.

I have been frequently called a theorist on this question, and I suppose that my hon. friend from St. Antoine division of Montreal (Mr. Ames) is put forth as a man of affairs, who understands business, and who approaches the consideration of politics from the business standpoint. Well, in that connection I was surprised to hear him suggest, apparently seriously, the giving of a three cent per bushel bounty on the raising of wheat. In the west last year we raised in the neighbourhood of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. Three cents per bushel bounty on that would amount to a trifle of $3,000,000 bonus to begin with, and we have only begun cultivating wheat in the west. Does my hon. friend want this House seriously to believe that he and his friends would put that as a serious proposition before the people, and then pose in this House as a man of business who wants to be considered a practical politician. I dismiss a suggestion of that kind without further comment. You cannot goldbrick the farmers of this country with a proposition of that kind.

My hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) further said that the cattle raisers of Alberta were convinced they would lose their market. How did my hon. friend come to know the opinion of the Alberta raisers of cattle? I am in a small way an Alberta raiser of cattle myself, and I do not think the market for that cattle is likely to be lost; but there is no answer to what Mr. Asquith has aptly termed the sloppiness of the protectionist argument. Actually the logical protectionist speaking in the person of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), says that the multiplication of markets means the loss of markets. Well, with gentlemen who argue in that fashion, it is impossible to continue a serious or relevant discussion.

If the House will extend me its patience a little while, I should like to make a few remarks on the general aspect of this question, and also reply to some of the objections we have heard, and I trust that my remarks will be strictly pertinent to the debate as far as it has gone. Personally I should be quite content to leave the defence of the position of the government as it was left by the speech of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) the first night of the debate. The hon. minister (Mr. Paterson) in that speech was logical, forcible, cogent and commendedly brief. I do not know however, whether I ought not to modify that compliment about brevity, because since then my hon. friend seems disposed with some other members, to eke out his original contribution by supplementary remarks. There is another quality in that speech which we should all endeavour to imitate, and that is that he looked at the thing from the broad national standpoint. My hon. friend reminded me of some one who had been living for some time in a very inhospitable climate and had suddenly found his youth and vigour restored by returning once more to breathe his native air. But the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition reminds me of the man who is still living in an inhospitable clime and likely to remain there much longer.

I find myself, however, in agreement with the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), and my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) when they said that Canada was big enough to look after her own tariffs, and to make her own tariffs independently of other countries. But if I agree in that, it is as a free trader. I learned the doctrine in the form of an aphorism from a great Conservative—possibly the greatest Conservative leader—who was at the head of the Conservative party in England in the 19th century, a great financier, the teacher of Mr. Gladstone in matters of finance, and the man to whom Mr. Gladstone, to the very end of his career, referred always in terms of veneration and respect. Sir Robert Peel, after eight years of instruction at the hands of Cobden, came to repeal the corn laws, and laid down what I conceive to be sound philosophy today, as it was then, with regard to tariffs, and that is that the best way to combat hostile tariffs is by a system of free imports. As a free trader, therefore, I am bound to endorse the position that Canada is big and strong enough to attend to her own tariffs. That was the theory laid down by Sir Robert Peel, and which has been put in practice by the greatest commercial nation in the world during 70 years, and how has it worked out? It has worked out, as good theories always do. It has been proved by practice up to the hilt. Take for instance what has happened as regards trade between the United States and Great Britain. Britain takes the imports all right, she gets wire nails from the United States at $6.50 per ton for which the people of the United States pay $10 per ton. As a man who uses wire nails, I prefer to buy them at $6.50 per ton rather than at $10 per ton. A well educated American told me lately that, to his own knowledge, fencing wire manufactured in Rochester is taken across the Atlantic to Britain and then reshipped to Brazil and sold in Brazil cheaper than in Rochester where it is made. That is dumping, and Britain gets the cheap goods. Sir Robert Peel said that free imports are the best method of overcoming hostile tariffs. How does Britain get on after 70 years experience of hostile tariffs? At this juncture it is sufficient for me to say that British ships plough through the hostile tariff of the United States to such an extent that she exports more manufactured goods to the United States than to any other country in the world. Britain, with her free imports, commands the trade all around. She gets the cheap goods and compels the other countries to take her manufactures in exchange. Sir Robert Peel was a great Conservative statesman and financier, and when he made an aphorism in political economy he made it for all time.

I have ventured to trespass on the patience of the House in order to illustrate why I am an adherent of the position taken by the opposition in this regard. But, how does the position accord with their theory. How does it lie in their mouths to state that they believe Canada is big enough to make her own tariff? Another example of the sloppiness of the protectionist argument. Why, in the mother country the friends of my hon. friends opposite have for seven years been telling the people that one of the main uses of a tariff is to bargain with other countries. That is the main item in the protectionist programme of Great Britain. It is the main contention of every man advocating a protectionist fiscal policy. And, yet, when it suits their purpose, my hon. friends come forward and says that this is the main use of a tariff, but how dare these two ordinary gentlemen put a tariff to that particular use?

I am in agreement with another position of these hon. gentlemen. I concede that history will probably record that the reciprocity arrangement, which I trust will soon go into effect, took its origin in the economic necessities of the United States people and the political necessities of the Republican party. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in taking up that position, makes a lone free trader still more comfortable, because he says that it arose from these conditions and we need only have waited for it. What is that but a contention that protection is breaking down in the United States? Does he want Canada to embark upon a foolish policy which the United States people now feel they have to run away from? My hon. friend from North Toronto is coming to see what Mr. Lloyd-George sees very clearly in England, for he stated the other day—truthfully, as I think—that the ice of protection is cracking all over the world.

Well, now, what is it that the government have done against which such complaints are formulated? As my hon. friend from Richmond, N.S. (Mr. Kyte) pointed out in his very able speech, they have remitted over $2,000,000 of taxation. And hon. gentlemen opposite would like to contend that this was in answer to their criticism or at any rate in accordance with their expressed wishes. Well, it is not a very horrible thing to remit two millions of taxation. Every government that I have ever lived under sought, and received, gratitude from a reasonable population for giving any remission whatsoever in taxation. But I do not know that I have any right to include the hon. member from North Toronto in any reasonable population. This argument of my hon. friend from Richmond is capable of extension. These hon. gentlemen opposite have not only been telling the government, ever since I came to this House, that the government have broken their pledges to reduce taxation, but they have also said: 'You promised to find us new markets, and you have not done it.' Now the government find new markets, and these hon. gentlemen say: 'How dare you do it?'

Well, what can you do with a front bench of an opposition like that? The hon. gentleman also says: 'The government have taken steps to increase the trade of the country.' How horrible! I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would recall what John Bright said and apply it to economics, to trade. He said that he failed to find any different code of morality for a nation than that which would apply to a man. Well, I cannot find a different code of economic laws, or trade laws, for a nation than I do for a man. When did my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) fail to develop any opportunity that presented itself of expanding his business? Well, Canada is only an aggregation of human beings something like my hon. friend from St. Antoine, and the government of Canada has as plain a duty in regard to extending the trade of Canada as it has in looking after the taxation of Canada and in finding new markets. They have remitted taxation; they have found new markets; they have extended our trade. And hon. gentlemen opposite say: 'How dare you do it?—you are breaking up the constitution!'

It is extremely refreshing to me to find my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) taking up these well-worn free trade positions; but I must say that their discussion of them does not impress me very strongly with their logic or with the consistency of their political opinions. But, perhaps, they are unconscious free traders.

Now, I want to say a few words on the economic outcome of this policy as it appeals to me. I notice that the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Toronto were very non-committal on this point, in fact the leader of the opposition accomplished the extraordinary feat in his speech in the first night of the debate of taking up an hour and twenty minutes on a reciprocity agreement and discussing everything but reciprocity. This non-committal attitude, so far as the hon. member for North Toronto is concerned, is chronic with him in such circumstances, for I find that in 1897, he spoke of the scope of the tariff which was being introduced at that time by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and its effect on the interests of the country, and he had to confess candidly that he had not been able to make up his mind yet on these particulars. That is just why the proper place for him was opposition; and that is just why the proper people were in control of the government. Those in control of the government were able to frame a fiscal policy for the good of the country, and they could see well what was to come out of that policy, as all hon. gentlemen opposite now know what actually has come out of it. They are wise after the event; therefore, opposition is the proper place for them. But some of their number at that time were not so reticent, as was pointed out by the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) the other evening. 'Industry paralysed!' 'Industry destroyed!' The 'wail of industry.' In 1897, this was what some of these hon. gentlemen talked about. Why, it was necessary to add an adjective to describe it, so it was called the sorrowful wail' of industry. Sir Charles Tupper used that language (he might have been anticipating the speech my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) made the other night) the sorrowful wail of the manufacturers of Canada in the Montreal 'Gazette.' The sorrowful wail has been patented now, and is being sold by the yard, accompanied by a life-like photograph of the Prime Minister to give some credit to the thing.

There are some prophecies concerning what is going to come out of this arrangement that will not be fulfilled. I venture upon that prophecy very firmly. I think it is a safe position because the prophets are driven to contradict one another and themselves, and their prophecies cannot all work out. It is clear that this arrangement cannot at the same time ruin the Canadian consumer and the Canadian producer of the products that are being consumed (or not being consumed; I do not know what hon. gentlemen opposite really think is going to happen then)—but that is what we are being told, on one hand there is a reason for the greatest alarm on account of the consumer, and on the other hand that the producers of the goods to be consumed are ruined. I think we may confidently look to the nonfulfilment of one of these prophecies. There is some part of the 'sorrowful wail' that will not work out. Now, my hon. friend from North Toronto gave a very good example of his capabilities in the way of prophecy by being a double prophet in his long speech. One of the difficulties of a speech of four hours' duration is that a man is almost sure to forget at the end what he said at the beginning. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) spent three hours in trying to prove that this arrangement would be the disruption of the empire, the ruin of Canadian nationality, and the end of all things. And then, at the end of his speech he turned round quite coolly and said: This is not a reciprocity arrangement at all, it is simply a matter of exchange of jack-knives. We on this side of the House do not regard the British Empire and Canada as quite such flimsy things that they are going to be destroyed by an exchange of jack-knives.

Now, with regard to the effects of this arrangement upon the people of Canada, I think it is a good, sound position to take that trade makes prosperity, that prosperity makes for increased wealth, that prosperity and increase wealth must mean more employment to labour, and benefit all round. Why, Sir, that is capable of very simple proof. Last year this government—which has never reduced any tariffs, which has continued the National Policy, though, by the way, a year after they came into power they were going to ruin the industries of the nation by departing from the National Policy—but that is a small inconsistency—a year ago this government made an arrangement with regard to the German surtax. I was in Prince Edward county ten days ago, and I met a gentleman there who is engaged largely in the evaporation fruit industry, and he told me that at the time that arrangement with Germany was come to, he had 600 cases of evaporated fruit which he could not place. The moment the arrangement was made he got $300 more for those 600 cases by selling them to Germany than he could have got before the arrangement was made. I think that is very practical proof that the lowering of tariffs promotes trade, that trade promotes prosperity and wealth, because that $300, or what it represents, would come into Canada, be circulated in Canada, and to that modest extent would increase the material prosperity of the Canadian people.

Now, I think that Mr. Scallion, who came down with the grain growers, put the case for reciprocity in a brief and convincing shape. I was surprised to see that so prominent a man as Premier Roblin, of Manitoba, yesterday said that no one had asked for reciprocity. Well, that is an extraordinary statement for the premier of the province to make, where the grain growers have their headquarters, and it is very scant courtesy to Mr. Scallion to say that no one asked for reciprocity. Mr. Scallion pointed out in so many words what he thought would be the benefit to the farmers of extending their markets; he pointed out that there would be opposition along certain lines, and I must say that he portrayed very accurately the lines of opposition which we have had elaborated in this House. Then he asked the very practical question with regard to this breaking up of the empire. He said: We do $350,000,000 of trade with the United States now, and I would like to know the exact amount of trade which would be dangerous, because there is no question that, while we have been doing that trade, it has not been leading to the destruction of the empire.

Now, Sir, I do not know that I would dare to make some of the prophecies that are being made about the effects this arrangement will have upon the price of special commodities. I do not think that a lowering of the tariff is likely to raise prices to the consumers of the country; yet I am sure that so far as the west is concerned it will benefit the producers. The farmer in the west stands very largely to benefit by the increased price of his land holdings. It is the magnificent prerogative of Canada to-day to offer to immigrants a splendid heritage of free land and independence in the possession of their land. I think if we get this prosperity I am talking of, the farmers will benefit by the increase of their wealth, such is the fortunate position of this great country, without damaging consumers at all. As a free trader, I should regret if any lowering of the tariffs led to the punishment for one moment of the consumers. There may be temporary inconveniences, there may be temporary upsets of things in certain localities, but we believe benefit will be the broad outcome of the policy.

Now, I want to look for a few moments at some of the main positions which were taken up in a very serious argument by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), some of the main positions which were not dealt with at all by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I certainly think that with those parts he did deal with, he proved to be a successful controversialist. But I think there was an argument presented which deserves the consideration of some one in this House; because, when the hon. member for North Toronto favours us with his views at such length he naturally commands our attention, our respectful attention, and his arguments in favour of protection, and, therefore, against the reciprocity arrangement, have to be examined. Now, the member for North Toronto said: There is a labour question involved in this. I may say that I listened to every word of his speech, and I took notes of it; that was all I needed to do to give due respect to my hon. friend. After all, if one listens to a speech of four hours and then has to read it, one would be forgetting what was due to the consideration of the brevity of human life. I will endeavour not to misrepresent my hon. friend's position in any way. There was a suggestion of hurt to labour. There is great solicitude on the part of protectionists for labour. The labouring men, of course, in a democratic country, like this, have votes, and unless the labourers can be deluded into supporting protection the thing is doomed past all redemption. It is pathetic in the extreme to find the interests interested in labour. It is one of the hoary-headed fallacies with which error has bolstered itself, and reappears generation after generation. When Mr. Cobden was fighting in Great Britain sixty or seventy years ago for the repeal of the corn laws, he made great fun of the contention that British labour would be hurt by cheap labour somewhere up the Baltic. He said: I do not know where it is, but it is somewhere up the Baltic, and British labour is going to be ruined by it. I wish that hon. gentlemen who talk upon this labour question would reflect that the very things they are saying in regard to this reciprocity question hurting Canadian labour are being said on the American side about the cheap Canadian labour hurting American labour. That would surely, even to the most partisan intellect, bring conviction that there is nothing in this outcry. What are the facts about labour? There was this peculiarity in the portion of the speech of my hon. friend with which I am dealing, which deposes me from the position of the champion theorist in this House, for, as regards some of the figures, they were knocked into the proverbial cocked hat by the hon. member for South Wellington. In defending his theory of protection he gave the facts of the history of commerce the widest berth it was possible to do. I am in the memory and judgment of the House when I say that his speech along these lines was pure theory, woven out of his own brain. He might never have known there was a history of commerce, he might never have known there was trade going on all over the world among the nations of the earth. I want very briefly to follow an exactly opposite method and to cede to my hon. friend willingly any honour there is in being a pure theorist. What are the facts that bear upon this argument of how far labour is going to be hurt? It is beyond possibility of contradiction that the best paid labour in Europe to-day is the labour of the British islands, whether skilled or unskilled, and I take it that that nearly ends the argument, because there is no fair comparison between the labour of Great Britain and the labour of this continent; labour on this continent is so scarce that it is bound to be highly paid, and protection, in my mind, has nothing whatever to do with it. I take it that that fact is an argument which cannot be contradicted, and nearly ends all discussion upon the subject.

Mr. Hobson, a well-known British economist, wrote a pamphlet a short time ago in which he showed as clearly as statistics can prove anything that in the United States under the McKinley tariff the proportion of the total wealth of the country going to labour was smaller than under the lower Wilson tariff, and that the proportion of wealth going to labour under the lower Wilson tariff raised and then under the Dingley tariff it sank once more.

The fact is that there is nothing in this world so striking as the exploitation of labour by protection. Will the House allow me to give an example, for this is a strange statement to make. I read recently a book by a member of the Philadelphia bar on the tariff. The evidence is by a cultured and educated American. He tells us, and I can almost repeat it in his own language, how the article borax was sold in the United States of America for $50 a ton until there was discovered in the United States the richest mine of borax in the world. That mine is situated in California and the neighbouring states. Having discovered this rich mine, the author says a great misfortune fell upon the American people. The discovery of a rich mine should not be a misfortune to a people, but the writer goes on to prove his case. He said that the moment the mine was discovered it needed to be protected, and through the proper influences at Washington, it got protection under the McKinley tariff, 5 cents a pound was put on borax; under the Wilson tariff it fell to 2 cents a pound, and under the Dingley tariff it was put back to 5 cents a pound. A very simple calculation will reveal to the House that that is $100 a ton, and the price of borax to the American consumer immediately rose to $150 a ton, while the borax was taken to the coast of the Atlantic and sold to Germany and Britain in competition with the world at $50 a ton. Oh, but say the protectionists, it is necessary to protect American capital. Unfortunately for that argument, the author says, every cent of the capital working that mine is the capital of a British syndicate. Yes, but the protectionist is not so easily bowled out. What about labour, look at the protection of labour—and this is the point that pertains to the argument which I am contending against, that there is going to be any injury to labour in this reciprocity arrangement. It is a very unfortunate position to be driven to for the protectionist, because my author informs us that the borax is dug out of the mine by Chinese coolies living in shacks. That is a fair example of how labour is protected by this system, and goes far to justify my statement that protection is the greatest exploiter of labour in the world.

My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) had something to say about interprovincial trade. If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery he should feel flattered, because Premier Roblin yesterday repeated most of what he said, in the Manitoba House, and the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) dealt liberally with him in the same fashion. I wish to cite a few figures in this connection. In my opinion the hon. member for North Toronto was on very, very weak ground when he spoke lightly of the importance of foreign trade. I do not think I misrepresent him, I am sure I do not desire to, when I say he spoke lightly of foreign trade. I think it is capable of exact proof that there is no surer test of the greatness of a nation than its foreign trade. If I were to ask any hon. member on either side what are the four greatest nations in the world I should get the same answer from every one of them, the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany and France, perhaps in a different order of preference; if I did not happen to be a modest man, I might have put Great Britain first. That would be the universal consensus of thinking men anywhere. Yes, Sir, but these four nations are also at the head of the foreign trade of the world. I take it that this is almost a proof that you can have no better test of the greatness of a people than by its foreign trade, and no better test of the rapidity with which it is marching to greatness than by the way it is expanding its foreign commerce, and it is a matter of congratulation to us on both sides of the House that Canada is the country that is making the most rapid advances in this direction.

The next proposition I should like to lay down in regard to what fell from my hon. friend on interprovincial trade is that there is no real quarrel between interprovincial trade and foreign trade; on the contrary they advance, in my judgment, pari passu. Does the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) think there is no interprovincial trade in Germany or in Great Britain or in France? Does he not know that there is interstate trade, but that these nations also have the greatest foreign trade in the world? There is no quarrel between interprovincial trade and foreign trade.

I wish to offer an illustration upon that point. In 1893, an interesting year, three years before the change of government, the foreign trade of Canada was $247,000,000 all told, export and import. That was when my hon. friends were building a nation under the National Policy, and when the finances of this country were under the guidance of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). In the year 1894, the year after that, the foreign trade and commerce had dropped from $247,000,000 to $240,000,000, and in the year 1895, the figures had dropped still further to $224,000,000. I should like to ask any candid hon. gentleman on the other side of the House whether Canada at that time, when her foreign trade was not only insignificant but diminishing, had an interprovincial trade that was anything to boast about? There was no west for the east to trade with. Talk of the prosperity of Canada having a growth of 40 years. I have not been in Canada 40 years, I have not been here since 1896—

I am very glad I came after 1896—but I can read the story of simple and plain figures and the simple and plain figures teach me what I wish to present with all respect to my hon. friend that when the foreign trade was insignificant and diminishing the interprovincial trade was small too.

But, this is not a matter of figures and of theories only, is it not a matter of common sense? What is the object of Canada in all of her policies at the present time? What is the object of her immigration policy; what is the object of her transportation policy—the one object is to get a huge surplus of wealth from out of the land, the great heritage which the Almighty has given us. And surely when we get that surplus it is common sense to know that we must and can only dispose of it by foreign trade. Allied to this argument is what my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) said about the frightening of capital; he told us Britain's capital is going to be frightened from Canadian investment. Well, I cannot think so. I received a letter yesterday telling me that two acquaintances of mine in the north of England, and their wives are coming here in May, and they have considerable capital; they are not frightened; I talked with a young Northumbrian the other night who told me he had a letter from a young man who was sailing in the month of March to Canada, and as they are somewhat politicians in Northumberland, this young man who is coming out wrote congratulating my friend (who is one of the free-traders so scarce in this country according to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) on the fact that he was living in Canada, where the fiscal policy was approximating to the fiscal policy of Great Britain. I would like to ask my hon. friend whether he thinks the financiers of Great Britain will be really frightened to embark their capital in an atmosphere of freer trade when they know very well they made all of that capital in an atmosphere of absolute free trade. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) also said that this policy was inimical to our industries, and as the hon. gentleman has been courteous enough to come into the chamber I ought perhaps to tell him that I heard every word of his speech but I excuse myself from the double task of both hearing it and reading it on the ground that life is somewhat brief. I shall endeavour, from the notes I took as I heard it, to state fairly his position. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) said that this trade arrangement was inimical to the building up of the industries of Canada. We hear that outcry from various quarters and I must say it is rather a curious outcry considering the source it comes from, for were I a manufacturer I should have lain as low as 'brer rabbit' at this particular moment. What does the outcry from that particular quarter mean; what is making them cry out? Personally, I would have made them cry a good deal harder if that were possible. They cried hard enough in 1897—industries were paralyzed and destroyed then according to them, and I do not know that we can do much more to a thing than first to paralyze and then destroy it. But no disaster happened to them then, and somehow or other I do not feel it is going to happen to them now. To be serious upon this point, I do think that the great moneyed interests do not live up to their responsibilities when they oppose thus lightly what I believe to be a policy that is supported by the great masses of the people of this country. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition seemed to lend himself to this argument: That the policy of reciprocity and of freer trade is inimical to the building up of industries, and I must say that in this respect he did not follow his usual custom of carefully buttressing his position by facts. The hon. gentleman said twice over in a somewhat demonstrative way, that the United States was the greatest manufacturing country in the world. Well, I should not make superlative statements about anything unless I were prepared to offer some evidence. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) did for once stoop to figures at this point, and he seemed to think it was a wonderful thing to turn to his followers and say: Why the United States of America exported $440,000,000 worth of manufactured goods last year. Well, they live on a continent and they have 90,000,000 of inhabitants, and they have protection thrown in to help them. I was reared in a small country, the country of Britain, and I am sure my hon. friends opposite who are the British party will be glad to hear what Britain has done. You could put the United Kingdom twice over into the province of Alberta so that her area is somewhat restricted for carrying on her operations, and she only has 45,000,000 people as against 95,000,000 in the United States, and my hon. friend thinks that $440,000,000 worth of manufactured goods is a wonderful record under protection. Well, I think it is, but free trade is a different matter. What does he think the exports of manufactured goods from Great Britain were last year, exclusive of ships—£334,000,000 sterling worth. If you multiply that by five you will get somewhere around $1,670,000,000 worth of manufactured goods from a little country which is having imports dumped on it from all the world, and which according to all protectionist theories ought to have had its manufacturing industries destroyed off the face of the earth. There has been some talk of an expert tariff commission upon how industries are built up, and if I may trespass on the time of the House, I should like to give a little expert testimony. Mr. W. H. Lever is the biggest soap man in the world. By the way I might remark that we manufacture in free trade England, as little things as soap and as big as Mauretanias, although my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) tells me, without proof, that the United States is the greatest manufacturing nation in the world.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I meant by that, that I was under the impression, and I am still under the impression, that the manufactured product of the United States is greater than that of any other country in the world.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I have no desire to misrepresent my hon. friend, but I am sure I quoted his exact language.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is what I intended by it, and I stand by that still.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Very well, I do not want to labour the point. Mr. Lever is at the head of a well known company, which manufactures soap, and allied products. They have factories in the United States, in Germany, in France, in Switzerland, in Belgium, in Australia, in Canada, and in South Africa, all grown up from little free trade Britain. I take it that Mr. Lever is somewhat of an expert in this particular line of manufacture, and the story he tells is very interesting. It was published in a magazine article, and it has been reprinted and scattered broadcast in pamphlet form.—It is because of the wide information the British people get on these points that they vote so remarkably well. Mr. Lever says that Gladstone took the duties off soap and soap maker's materials in the middle of the last century, and at that time the exports of soap from Britain were scanty; protection had not built up the manufacture of soap to any great extent, and not only was the manufacture of soap scanty, but the soap was poor in quality, dear in price, and the soap imports large. That was the state of affairs in the middle of the last century, and to-day Mr. Lever makes himself responsible for the statement that Britain's exports of soap are equal to the exports of soap of the whole of the rest of the world put together, that the imports of soap into Britain are a negligible quantity and that soap is to-day to be had in Great Britain of the best quality in the world, and at the cheapest possible price. That is not a bad way to build up manufactures surely—to build up an industry which extends all over the world and produces these magnificent results. Contrast that with a telegram from Washington, which appeared in the London 'Daily Telegraph' at the time of the Payne-Aldrich tariff was before the United States Congress, stating that a member of a firm of manufactures in the States, was in Washington—you know for what purpose—and that he had sent an urgent appeal to his partner to come to Washington at once, even if he had to leave the affairs of the firm in the hands of the office boy. He went there, and of course, began log-rolling at once. Mr. Lever's statement is, that he has been able to make the great advances that he has made in his manufacturing, by means of cheap raw materials added to attention to business, and he asks the very pertinent question: is it not in accordance with the common sense of any one of us that manufactures or anything else will be built up better by cheap raw materials, and attention to business, than by dear raw materials and attention to log-rolling.

My hon. friend had something to say in this connection about the kind and variety of manufactures, and he implied, though he did not state, that it was only under protection that you can secure variety in manufacturing. My reading on this question goes to prove the exact opposite. It is being proved by the best-informed minds in Germany to-day, that the effect of protection there, is to build up cartels—known on this continent as trusts, which pay lower wages than are paid in Great Britain, and whose whole object is to turn out huge amounts of goods, and make big profits for those at the head of the concerns. It had been proved that the half-finished articles produced in Germany are being sent to Britain, and that British workmen are getting the higher wages for doing the finishing work upon them under free trade—the exact opposite of the argument used by my hon. friend. In this connection, my hon. friend must know what was stated in the tariff debates in the old country. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain thought he had discovered a magnificent illustration in support of his views when he found that a number of steel billets had been shipped from Germany to Barrow-in-Furness. But the fact was explained by Sir Hugh Bell, one of the greatest manufacturers in England, thus: 'It is true that the steel billets went there, but Mr. Chamberlain did not find out what happened to them there. It is the business of a manufacturer to find that out. A firm of Barrow shipbuilders had a contract for ship-building which they secured in competition with the whole world, and the contractors put those billets into the ships and sent the ships back to Germany where the steel billets came from.'

Intensive farming was a subject which I had hardly expected to hear my hon. friend from North Toronto growing eloquent upon. He did, however, seem to hint that intensive farming would be hurt by this reciprocity arrangement. He did not give any facts to support that idea. What are the facts? Mr. Cobden, in a speech which he delivered after the repeal of the corn laws, drew attention to the fact that the most notable thing after the repeal of those laws was the improvement of agriculture in Great Britain. We know what is sure to happen if a man is held up on his feet: he will never develop the muscles of his lower limbs. The same is true when a state undertakes to support farming industry. There are numbers of men in this House, who have attained their present position by their own character and efforts, and who know that men grow stronger by reliance on themselves, and that manufacturing and farming grow strong in the same way. There is not a fact in the history of commerce to show that intensive farming was ever helped by protection. In free trade Britain to-day—if I am wrong, the Minister of Agriculture will correct me—33 bushels of wheat to the acre are grown on the average; in protected America the average is 14 bushels to the acre, and in Canada, with our virgin soil, it is only 17 bushels. What is the matter, I ask my protectionist friends, with little Britain as a country where intensive farming is carried on under free trade?

My hon. friend went on next to say that the policy of mutual preference had been destroyed by this reciprocity arrangement. That was a somewhat sad confession on his part. I think he said that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister had dished preference. Well, that was extraordinary adulation. We on this side of the House are sometimes deemed servile for serving up adulation to my right hon. friend, but he never had such a dish of adulation served up to him on this side of the House. We never charged him with running both Canada and Great Britain at the same time. It was the more extraordinary phrase coming from the hon. member for North Toronto, because in another part of the same speech he had referred to my right hon. friend as a very ordinary man, while he was furnishing evidence that he was a very extraordinary man. However, I am quite sure that my hon. friend would not claim that for himself. The great thing for me is his admission that British preference is dished. I think there is no doubt about that fact, but I do not agree with his charge that it has been dished by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. We on this side of the House, as I believe all the people of Canada, are reasonably proud that we have for Prime Minister of this country a man whose opinion goes for a great deal in Great Britain, but neither he nor we would claim that he is the author of what my hon. friend from North Toronto must consider such a terrible misfortune. This mutual preference is a preference which meant a movement on the part of Great Britain towards restricted trade, whereas the Fielding preference was a movement towards freer trade on the part of Canada —two very different things economically considered. It must have been with a very sad heart that my hon. friend discovered that this infant of mutual preference, into which he had tried to breathe the breath of life for years, was not an infant at all, but only a wax doll. The hon. member for North Toronto said in this House in 1892, as recorded in 'Hansard':

> If I read public opinion in the old country aright, I believe that the free trade sentiment pure and simple, founded on what were thought to be irrefutable principles almost divine in origin, is largely changing in Great Britain.

Well, some men need a long time for the fulfilment of their prophecies. I am not sure that my hon. friend feels that there is so much change in that direction in Great Britain at the present time. It could reasonably be argued that if the principles are true, they are of divine origin. That may be the reason they are not recognized by my hon. friend. I have often been afraid that he looked in another direction for his economic inspiration. Even if I did not admit that the policy of protection is bad enough to come from a direction opposite to the divine, I would certainly admit that it is an intensely human thing to say the least of it.

At six o'clock committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Mr. Chairman, I quoted some figures, in illustration of an argument which I ventured to present to the committee at the very beginning of my remarks, from a speech which I had read in the Winnipeg 'Tribune,' as made by a governor of an American state. I quoted these figures from memory. But, on examining critically, it is clear I must have been in error as to the quantity of nails procured at a certain price. It is perfectly immaterial to the argument which I was presenting. It does not need figures to prove that goods are sold cheaper in Great Britain and other protected countries. It certainly does not need figures to prove that to protectionists, because they are continually taunting Great Britain with being the dumping ground of cheap goods. I mention the matter only because it is desirable to be accurate even in small things, and not because it affects the argument I was presenting in that connection.

When the committee adjourned at six o'clock, Sir, I was trying to answer the question: What dished preference? And I set out to show that preference in the sense of the Chamberlain preference was never likely to live if it depended in any degree upon the phophecies of those who advocate it in this country. I had shown that in my researches I came across the speech of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in 'Hansard' of 1892, which is the first reference I have found of his in relation to this subject. We find the hon. member next figuring on this topic in the Imperial Conference which was held in Ottawa in 1894—seventeen years ago. I think it quite important to look at these things, I think it quite important to go into the history of my hon. friend in this connection and look at the Chamberlain preference for a little while. For it will be clear to the whole House that one of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite is that we ought to postpone trade arrangements with other parts of the world in case we may interfere with some possible trade arrangement in the future with Great Britain. At page 234 of the report of that conference, the hon. gentleman from North Toronto ventured a prediction—as he so often does—and said that in twenty years time the larger part of Britain will be outside of Great Britain. At page 184 he places the time at twenty-five years. Well, that puts these prophecies within a few days of one another. A discrepancy of five years in the prophecies of a man who takes eternity to fulfil his prophecies is not a very long time. That was seventeen years ago. Senator Pulsford, of the Australian Commonwealth, has shown that these prophecies so far from giving promise of fulfilment, not only have the outlying portions of the British Empire not grown in a way to surpass Great Britain, but it happens that they have not grown even proportionately as fast in population as the United Kingdom has grown. And this prophecy was due to be fulfilled in twenty-five years. The hon. member for North Toronto spoke again upon the subject, as reported at page 205 of the report.

Since our meeting yesterday, I have read the comments in the British papers, and, you may depend upon it, that in the British Empire to-day the seed has more than sprouted; it is germinating.

He got a little mixed in his botany, I think, unless I am misinformed, germination comes before sprouting.

The idea is growing, and it is going——

Mark the courage, the confidence in himself.

—it is going, ultimately, to bring the different parts of the empire together, in spite of all the doctrinaires that live and breathe upon the face of the earth.

The House recognizes the style. Well, now, I do not know the exact condition of this botanical specimen to-day, but I think it is withered pretty badly; I do not think the growth is taking place very rapidly. What a magnificent contempt for doctrinaires my hon. friend has—almost as much contempt as he has for the members of the present cabinet. I wonder that he did not reflect, in 1894, that his record as a trade producer—for that was the middle year of the three years I quoted this afternoon when the trade of Canada was disappearing under his fostering hand—I wonder that he did not reflect that he was scarcely the man to talk to either doctrinaires or anybody else about how to promote trade either in Canada or in the British Empire. Just imagine the hon. member, with such performances and such prophecies, coming into this House and telling the hon. ministers who, after all, having found that trade as he had it diminishing have been able to show a marvellous expansion of the trade of Canada in the last fifteen years—just imagine him standing upon a pedestal raised there by his performances, and by his sense, no doubt, of his own greatness, and saying: 'They are two very ordinary men; and the other members of the cabinet are thirteen very ordinary men.' The time has come when some one has got to say in this House and this country that the hon. member for North Toronto has no record as a statesman, and no record as a prophet which for one moment justifies him in using language like that to any hon. member on this side of the House. And then he had contempt for the doctrinaires who did not quite see this thing as he saw it, mere tyros in politics, men like Gladstone, and Peel, and Lord Salisbury, and Cobden—men of absolutely opposite sides of politics in Great Britain, but all of whom knew more about this preference thing, and the difficulty of making it live than the hon. member for North Toronto had even dreamed. And I should like to advise the hon. gentleman, if he pays any attention to what I say, not to be too much impressed by what he reads in the Tory papers of London. During the whole of my life, it has been a safe thing to prophesy that, in elections, the United Kingdom will go just in the opposite direction from the prophecies of the Tory press of London. That is an almost invariable rule; and if the hon. gentleman had known that, he would not have been so elated at what he read in the London Tory press the day after he made his comments. And if he reads the Unionist press at the present time, he will observe the extraordinary spectacle that, while all agree that preference of the Chamberlain order is a corpse, they are divided in opinion as to what to do with it. Half of them are in favour of burying it, while the other half—and the more stupid lot, I think—are in favour of hanging on to it.

I have not quite finished with the hon. gentleman's prophecies. They are interesting and are not altogether ancient history. At page 206 of this report which I have been quoting the hon. gentleman said:

I think that, as far as Canada is concerned, the day is considerably distant when we will propose, if it is not to our advantage somewhat, to give very great commercial advantages to the British Empire without receiving something in return.

After all, the imperialism of my hon. friend is of a somewhat windy variety; it is rather of the huckstering and bargaining variety; but I am dealing with him as a prophet for a moment. In three years, after he said the day was distant, there was a change of government—and the thing was done; and done with vast profit to the country and vast advantage to the imperial connection. I think it is rather shabby of him, with a record like that, when he had banned the birth of this child, when he had declared that the Fielding preference must not be born—'the day is far distant,' when we will do such a thing—to come to the House now and say, as he did to the Minister of Finance the other day: It is not your child. Why, he actually wants to confuse our minds, surely, as to the difference between the Fielding preference and the Chamberlain preference. Not having been able to get this wax doll of his to live, he wants to claim the Fielding child. The hon. gentleman has appeared in a great many roles in his time, but this is the first occasion, so far as I know, on which he has assumed the role of the political kidnapper.

The Chamberlain preference has died, and I think largely because of the unfulfilled prophecies which have been uttered in regard to it. But it died because, in its intrinsic nature, there was nothing in it. It is important to Canada to know what there is in this thing, and why we should expect something to live which has not in it the germ of life. The moment you examine the possibility of the old country giving preferences in a fair way as between the different portions of the empire, you would see the thing is impossible. In Australia more wool is produced than is necessary to supply the wants of the whole empire, and it is an element of political economy that you cannot give protection to an article if more is produced in it than the country requires. So the idea of giving a preference on wool in Australia is an economic impossibility. But my hon. friends say: We will get it on wheat. Well, how would that bind Australia to the British Crown? If I were an Australian, and my hon. friends opposite were Canadians, and Great Britain gave a preference in wheat and not give it on wool, would not I say that the old country was showing favouritism to Canada, while doing nothing for Australia? Would that help build up the British Empire?

What would be the effect of giving a preference on wheat? Clearly the moment you gave that preference you would concentrate the supplies of wheat in the outlying portions of the empire upon the British market, because you would raise the price of wheat in Britain. If it did not do that, it would be no good to Canada. You would raise the price in Britain, and you would raise the price of bread to the British workingman. Well, if I were a British workingman, how much do you think that would increase my love for Canadian preference? Flag waving won't fill a man's stomach. But that would only be the first effect of it. If a better price was given for wheat in Britain and the price was raised to the British workingman, it is clear that a secondary result would be a concentration of supplies there, because they always go where the highest price prevails. You would also raise the price of food to the workingman in Canada. It is an everyday truism that the price of wheat is made in Liverpool. Raise the price there and you inevitably raise it to the Canadian consumer. South Africa imports wheat. You would raise the price of wheat to the workingman in South Africa, who buys it in the world's market. And do hon. gentlemen think they would build a permanent empire by a system of preference which would raise the price of the commonest article of food in Britain, Canada and South Africa? Now, these are some of the considerations which were discussed again and again in the old country, and it was largely considerations of this kind that led Mr. Asquith, at the beginning of these discussions, to declare to a crowded audience: The thing is an economic impossibility. The idea has died, because there was no life in it, and it has been killed, so to speak, in successive general elections. A friend of mine was in conversation the other day with a nobleman having intimate associations with British politics, and he said to my friend: If Canada had offered free trade within the empire it would have been fruitless, because it would be impossible to shift the free trade sentiment of Britain in fifty years. This empire has grown up on the basis of absolute freedom of its component parts. Would you have us repeat the experiment that Great Britain tried with her American colonies, and which lost them to the empire? Was it not this very mistake of mixing up trade relations with politics? Was it not that which led George Washington to advise his countrymen so earnestly not to become entangled with the politics of foreign nations? Now, the rule in Britain is to make her own tariffs, and what is good for Britain is good enough for Canada. It is the only rule which works to the permanency of the empire.

The hon. member for North Toronto had a good deal to say about conservation. The conservation question is a peculiar one. I am raising steers in the west, and my experience has been that I have had to keep my steers from spring to fall because I could put them into market, though not of recent years. I am bound to say I imagine the leader of the opposition, on learning of my difficulties, saying to me: What we have we hold. My reply would naturally be that if that refers to the farm I agree with you, but if it refers to the steers I don't agree with you. Annexation, Mr. Chairman, means revolution. Let us understand what this blessed word annexation means. There was an old lady in England who never got any good from a sermon unless several times the blessed word Mesopotamia was mentioned, and without that blessed word annexation what would our friends opposite have left to say?

Annexation means the dismantling of these buildings, it means the hauling down of our flag, it means going to Washington to hold our parliamentary sittings. Is there a man or a woman who believes in his heart of hearts that that is possible to come to pass in this country? Annexation means revolution and my little reading of history tells me that revolution has never taken place in this world except amongst a discontented people. When Charles the First drove things to a certain point there was a considerable revolution in Britain, ending in the cutting off of the King's head. A few years afterwards his son had a discontented people and was driven from the throne in the revolution of 1688. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) can tell the House far better than I can what was the condition of France before the great revolution in that country. In 1838-39 in this country of Canada the people were discontented and there was danger of revolution. In America itself, it was the discontent of the people with taxes and with the restriction of their rights to trade with other nations that led to revolution. But the argument of my hon. friend is that Canadians are of such a type that they will say: We have such freedom and prosperity under the red, white and blue that we will haul it down.

My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) asked the government how they dared do certain things. I should like to ask him how he dared use in the Canadian parliament and with the knowledge that his words would be read by the Canadian people, the words: Conquest by gifts. He said we could not be beaten but the conquest of Canada—he mentioned these words in the parliament of Canada—the conquest of Canada is to be brought about by gifts. If I had dared to use such words, the kindest friends I have on this side of the House would have taken me to the Atlantic at once and have deported me. We at least on this side of the House have not met the type of Canadians with whom he has been consorting. We on this side who represent and will represent for many a day, I think, a large majority of Canadian people, have been consorting with such Canadians that we know we have a people here who cannot be beaten and cannot be bought.

There is an interesting historic parallel between what happened in the House of representatives in a vote there a few days ago and the vote that took place on the repeal of the corn laws in Great Britain. A Conservative leader in Great Britain carried the repeal of the corn laws by a minority of his own followers but supported by the entire force almost of the Liberals of the House, and in the United States a great republican leader in the person of Mr. Taft was appointed I think also by a minority of his own followers but by almost the entire strength of the democratic party. I wonder if, when this reciprocity arrangement goes through in this House, there will be any break in the ranks I see opposite to me? I fear not, I fear that the darkness will be impenetrable and that the suitable wailing will be provided by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) and the gnashing of teeth in abundance by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster).

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) says there is an element of instability in this arrangement. We have been told on every hand there will be disturbance of trade. Well it is very likely that some one may be temporarily incommoded or hurt; that is always the case in the history of human progress in scientific invention as well as in politics. One remembers how the hand loom weavers of Lancashire tore down the first machinery put up to replace the work of the hand loom workers. They did not see that for each hand loom worker thrown out of occupation, twenty others would get work making the machine that was to displace their work. The great scientist Humboldt says that when travelling in the Andes in South America he found a place where men had a profitable business carrying passengers over certain passes in the mountains in baskets. A better government came into power and made good roads, and the basket carriers petitioned the government not to make the roads because it would hurt the business of the basket carriers. Of course the government went on with the mending of the roads. I suppose that when gas was first invented there were some dealers in candles who had a very large stock on hand and who might not be able to dispose of them so well with gas, but nobody proposed on that ground to go back to the use of farthing dips. Farthing dips might indeed be a fitting illuminant for guiding the footsteps of some of the economic reasoners opposite in the primeval paths of protection, but we on this side believe in progress, and that progress can only be made in the broad sunlight and with the best possible illuminant.

Something has been said about doing as well as we can and letting well enough alone. That was all right under the National Policy but they did not even manage to do that because the trade of Canada was shrinking. That is what happens a people who let well enough alone. We all know that for a young organism, whether it be an individual or a nation, growth and progress are the absolute necessities of continued existence, and all progress implies change and change may bring, does bring temporary, discomfort and inconvenience to sections, but it ever works out for the benefit and the prosperity and the wealth of the masses of the people. We heard this afternoon something about some one being sick and ashamed. I am perfectly certain that in a few years' time my hon. friends opposite will be sick and ashamed of their attitude and their arguments in this discussion.

There can only be one result to this arrangement. The government would have been guilty of one of those blunders which are almost as bad as crimes if they had not received the advances of the United States and made this arrangement on the high ground of showing to the people of the world how two nations can live in friendship together, on the more material ground of promoting the prosperity of the country and on the ground of Canada being in the forefront of movements that are making for the real progress of the world. On all these grounds this is a splendid arrangement, and I have not the remotest doubt that, just as the extension of freedom of trade helped Canada in 1897, this will help us still more. It is a policy in keeping with the record of the right hon. gentleman who is at the head of the government of this country (Sir Wilfrid Laurier); it is a policy which makes for the prosperity of the country, it is a policy in accordance with the best traditions of that Liberalism which has built and maintained the British Empire, that Liberalism which spells freedom, freedom to buy and sell, and in a few years' time, those who have opposed it will be ashamed of the thoughts they have entertained.

Yet I doubt not thro' the ages, one increasing purpose runs.
And the thoughts of men are widen'd with the process of the suns.

Mr. R. BLAIN (Peel). The House, I am sure, has been entertained by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) for the last half hour since eight o'clock, and for one hour prior to the recess for dinner.

The hon. gentleman has stated among various things that he does not know what the opposition would have done in this discussion had it not been for the word annexation, and if I wanted to be jocular with my hon. friend I might safely say that he had not the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Toronto as a text there would have been very little left in his remarks. I am not unkind when I say that the hon. gentleman did not touch upon the question before the House at all, or did he make any suggestion of value from a Canadian standpoint. Of course, he told us all about free trade as they have it in England, and in that respect his remarks must have been directed more to the government than to the opposition. We have heard that same speech several times in this House. True, the hon. gentleman revamps it occasionally, but it is one and the same old story : I am a free trader, and as such I am alone in this House. But, if he is so eloquent in the House and so powerful in the country one would have thought he would have had a few converts by this time. However, he is still alone, and if I mistake not he will be alone in his free trade professions for a long time to come. We once had a free trader in this House supporting the government but he sought and found a place in the Senate, and may be my hon. friend from Red Deer is aiming that way. For several years the hon. gentleman has directed our attention to what he regards as a better fiscal policy for the Canadian people than that which they now have. For my part I would rather take the votes of the people of Canada on both sides of politics than the trade expressions of the member for Red Deer, when I seek a true index of the feeling of the people. What has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clark) done since he came here to perpetuate that policy which he says is dear to his heart, and which he advocates in the House and out of the House? Did he ever vote against this government upon a single item of the tariff?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Does the hon. gentleman ask a question?

Mr. BLAIN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). In voting on the tariff in this House I only have a choice between—

Mr. BLAIN. I would like to be courteous, but I would prefer an answer and not a speech.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I can only vote two ways in this House, and having only that alternative I vote for freer trade in preference to protection.

Mr. BLAIN. The old story. It is well that the hon. gentleman has told the House that he only came to Canada in 1896, for everybody knows that the question of our fiscal policy was settled by the Canadian people long before the hon. gentleman favoured us with his presence. I have asked the hon. gentleman whether he ever voted against the administration since he came here, although it is a protectionist government in the main, and you heard his answer. In all these years did he ever take advantage of his right to move or make an attempt to move to reduce any single item of the tariff? That after all is a test of a man's free trade principles in Canada ; I do not know what the test is in England whence he comes. And, I dare say that the hon. gentleman will continue to support the present administration. Of course he will, everybody knows that. And, I venture to say that the hon. gentleman is not only a lonely free trader but, as he has told us himself, he is the greatest theorist in the House.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I said I had been called a theorist. There is surely a great difference between a man being called a theorist by others and calling himself a theorist.

Mr. BLAIN. Well, the appellation fitted him so well that he made the House believe he was the greatest theorist here. When a man comes into parliament to preach a new doctrine as it may be called ; when he comes here to preach free trade ; when the people of Canada give him a responsible position in parliament for several years, and he makes no attempt to reduce the tariff but gives a continued and enthusiastic support to a government which talked free trade out of power, and which adopted protection in power, what are we to think? But there are in Canada those whose opinions I would take in preference to that of my hon. friend as to what is best for Canada. I will not encumber 'Hansard' with too many extracts but I must read a resolution passed by the Montreal Board of Trade which is one of the largest commercial institutions in Canada.

Resolved, that we, the members of the Montreal Board of Trade, in annual meeting assembled, believe that the sober sense of the country as a whole is against any change in the trade policy under which Canada has grown to her present admitted state of prosperity;

That we consider it to be the bounden duty of every Canadian to resist to the last anything that might endanger our status as a component part of the British Empire, and that we fear such a treaty as proposed might easily prove to be the entering of a wedge that would eventually result in a separation of our interests from those of the mother land;

That we hereby record the unalterable opposition of this board to the proposed reciprocity treaty with the United States, which treaty would involve the country in dangers not yet fully realized, and we consider that the government should first ascertain the opinion of the whole country on this question, and receive a definite mandate thereon, before committing it to a change so revolutionary as this reversal of its entire policy, threatening not only the trade, but also the more vital interests of Canada as a nation;

That the Council of the Board, with the following other members, are hereby appointed a special committee, with power to add to its number, for the purpose of proceeding to Ottawa and presenting to the government the views of this board, as expressed in this resolution: Messrs. C. C. Ballantyne, Geo. Caverhill, E. B. Greenshields, A. J. Hodgson, Robert Meighen, Farquar Robertson.

These are gentlemen who have been in this country longer than since 1896. These gentlemen do not all belong to the Conservative party. Some of them are supporters of my right hon. friend and supporters of the policy which my hon. friend from Red Deer votes for, but not the policy he talks about in this House. These gentlemen ought to know something about what policy would be best suited to the people of Canada. These gentlemen have grown up with Canada's prosperity. They have witnessed one government in power and now another. They can trace the history of Canada for many years. They can go back to 1873 and find a Liberal government in power headed by a distinguished man, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. From 1873 to 1878 this trade question took shape in Canada. During those years, in this very chamber, the government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and the opposition headed by that distinguished statesman, Sir John Macdonald, discussed this trade question, not from a British standpoint particularly, though that was kept in view, but from a Canadian standpoint, and that is what the people of this country want on the present question. During those years the Liberal-Conservative party placed their policy as a party before the people of Canada by a resolution and a vote in this House. The right hon. leader of the government followed his leader at that time in a policy of low tariff for Canada. During the years that the Mackenzie administration was in power—I am not going to charge it to anybody—there were dull times in Canada, in the mercantile interests, in the agricultural interests, in the manufacturing interests. They all came to this parliament seeking for some redress from the condition of things that prevailed, and the Liberal-Conservative party laid down its policy as a protective tariff for this country. The government in power opposed that, and in 1878 appealed to the people. They gave the people an opportunity to consider the question, unlike my right hon. friend, who makes a bargain with the government of the United States without giving the people of this country an opportunity to say whether they want it or not. The Mackenzie government were beaten at the polls in 1878, the people of Canada expressing themselves in favour of a National Policy for this country, with protection for the agriculturist, for the mechanic, and for every man. The Liberal-Conservative party came into power. They had in opposition given pledges to the people of Canada, and thank God they were strong enough when they came into power to fulfil those pledges by putting on the statute-book the grand old National Policy that still lives to-day. From that moment the Liberal party in this House and out of this House made declarations; by resolutions, by speeches and by votes, against the National Policy, although it had been endorsed by a large majority of the people of Canada. I need not review the history of that policy. At once the people of Canada took on new life; at once they found employment; at once the manufacturing establishments began to grow up in every centre of population; at once the goods that were coming into Canada from the United States, that were manufactured by the United States people, were stopped, and the Canadian people commenced to manufacture those articles for themselves and to pay the wages to their own working people. My right hon. friend in those years had become leader of the opposition, and he went from platform to platform throughout this country denouncing the National Policy and calling upon the people of Canada to adopt the same old policy which the hon. member for Red Deer has been talking about to-night. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) took the platform, and, in the province of Ontario in particular, and the Toronto 'Globe,' with all its power, laid down a policy which I regard as one of the most dangerous ever advocated in Canada; that was the policy that the National Policy was against the interests of the farmers and was for the benefit of the manufacturers alone. I say that was a bad policy for any public man in Canada to advocate. It left its mark on the agriculturists of Canada. The mark is still there; but there is a new generation to-day, and when my right hon. friend appeals to the farming community, he will find a class of people who have lived under this National Policy, who have enjoyed under it a better price for their products, and he will find that no class in Canada will condemn this brand-new policy as the farmers will when they have an opportunity to vote upon it. That is the history very briefly of the trade policy as we have it in Canada, and have had it for the last few years. I may assume that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will be more interested in that than in being told about borax in the United States, and a large soap concern in England with branches all over the world as spoke by the hon. member for Red Deer.

I shall stop here to say a word or two to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who has left the chamber. Let me read his words. He said:

> The leader of the opposition spoke for upwards of one hour on the resolution and did not touch the reciprocity question at all.

That requires no answer, because we know how able is the leader of the opposition to discuss this question, and how well his remarks were directed a few days ago to the resolution before the Chair.

What is the question which the right hon. gentleman has thrown into the arena of politics now. Our National Policy gave to the Canadian people of every class, the manufacturer and the farmer, protection to assist them in building up our manufacturing and agricultural industries. The right hon. gentleman has now made a division between the farmer and other classes in the proposition before the House. Let us see what that division is. With one stroke of the pen he and his Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), have taken away altogether almost every vestige of the protection given by the National Policy to our agriculturists. That is the charge which the farmers of this country have against the right hon. gentleman and his government. In schedule A of this agreement, which gives the free goods, we find the following: Live animals, cattle, horses and mules, swine, sheep, lambs, and all other live animals. There is to be no duty upon these. Poultry, dead and alive, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, dried peas and beans, edible corn, sweet corn or maize, (except into Canada for distillation), hay, straw, extract of hemlock bark, fresh vegetables, potatoes, sweet potatoes, yams, turnips, onions, cabbage and all other vegetables in their natural state. Fresh fruit, apples, pears, peaches, grapes, cherries and all other edible fruits in their natural state. Dried fruits, apples, peaches, pears, apricots, dried or evaporated.

Dairy products: butter, cheese, fresh milk and cream, eggs, honey, flaxseed or linseed, cotton seed and other seeds. I shall not go through the whole list, but this list gives the products on which the Liberal-Conservative party had placed a duty in the interests of the Canadian farmers. But the present government now proposes to take away every vestige of protection on these articles, and make them free between the United States and Canada and a good many other countries as well. That is the charge which the farmers of this country have against the right hon. gentleman and his government.

A very large deputation waited on the government a few days ago—a deputation representing hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in the fruit and vegetable growing industries of Canada. They came here with their policy, and they said that they had already placed that policy before the right hon. gentleman in a resolution many months before. They told him in a long telegram from their association which was meeting in Toronto, some months before, what they required from this government, should there be any changes in the tariff. But they pointed out that they did not want the tariff as it stands to-day, to be interfered with. When the delegation came down here, it filled this chamber, both the floor of the House and the gallery, and the right hon. gentleman, after hearing all their statements, said: Oh, it is a pity you did not come earlier, but you are too late now. I should like to know if that was a fair answer. Might I call attention to the question which I put the right hon. gentleman in this House before this large delegation came:

Mr. BLAIN. I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether or not serious consideration will be given to any special interest in Canada that may be affected by the proposed reciprocity arrangement should it become law? In the county I have the honour to represent there is a very strong feeling in respect to these matters. Throughout the western part of Ontario, at the present moment, large sums of money are being subscribed to send delegations to the government to explain the position of specific interests that will be affected if these tariff changes become law. Will the government give serious consideration to the representations of these interests if they are made? I may anticipate by saying that a general answer that the government will listen to all complaints of everybody will not be quite sufficient. I want to know if the government will give serious consideration to these matters, or whether it will be better for these gentlemen to stay at home on the ground that this proposal will not be changed?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will give most serious consideration to all the interests represented reserving our judgment.

Mr. BLAIN. I anticipated that.

I would ask the right hon. gentleman now, whether, if these men came before the government and presented their views, the government would have any consideration for them. My right hon. friend said in his genial way: Oh, yes, they can come down and present their case, and we will reserve judgment. Why did not the right hon. gentleman say in answer to my question: There is no use for any reconsideration, we have signed this agreement and it cannot be broken without the consent of President Taft, and the Congress at Washington. These gentlemen came to Ottawa and presented their views to the government and in reply the government said: Oh, no, this pact is made, and it cannot be altered. And the farmers of this country, the fruit men and vegetable growers of this country, will all feel that the right hon. gentleman did not deal fairly with them. He was not willing to listen to their statement at a time when these changes could be made, but he was willing to allow them to spend large sums of money to come to Ottawa to present their request to him at a time when he knew full well that, no matter what they stated, no changes would be made in this arrangement.

I wish to say a word to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) whom I do not see in his place. One would have thought that, with all this going on against the farmers of Canada, the Minister of Agriculture would have taken a hand in. We were told, when this government was formed, that we had a real farmer as Minister of Agriculture, an educated farmer. And our farmers were expecting that, when the government proposed to strike off every vestige of protection that the farmers had, at least the Minister of Agriculture would raise some protest and would have said to the government that if others are to have protection the farmers must get their share. The Minister of Agriculture, I presume did not do that. If he did, his voice was not heard, and the pact went on and will become law, I suppose, in the course of a few weeks or a few months

I wish now to show what the policy of the Liberal party has been with respect to the protection for the farmers. That is an important matter in this discussion. I have already given a partial list of the articles that have been robbed of their protection by this government, all of which are of interest to the farmers of Canada. Perhaps I may be permitted to read first a letter sent to me from the county I have the honour to represent :

Clarkson, Feb. 10, 1911

Richard Blain, Esq.,
Brampton.

Dear Sir,—The fruit and vegetable growers of the Clarkson and Lorne Park district, earnestly request of you as our representative to use all the influence you possibly can with the government, in reference to the carrying out of the reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States, which is now under consideration.

If this agreement is carried out, it will mean a serious question to us as fruit and vegetable growers, more especially to the smaller growers; it will simply take from us our natural rights as citizens of Canada. Normally speaking, we have amply shown that we can supply our home market with both lines of domestic fruit and vegetables both in season and out of season.

It is a well known fact, that, very often in business, a particular part is the most remunerative, and consequently the backbone of that particular business, the loss of which would be serious. It is this particular part, that reciprocity with the United States would take from us, simply because we are geographically handicapped.

The Fruit and Vegetable Growers, Clarkson, Peel Co., Ontario.

Going back a little in the history of this parliament, I notice that in 1902, Mr. Leonard, who then represented Laval in this House, and who sat on this side, moved the following resolution :

That it is greatly in the interests of the market gardeners and the farmers that the duties on our Canadian garden products be so adjusted as to guarantee the Canadian farmer an effective protection against foreign competition.

And in the following year, the same gentleman moved exactly the same resolution. These two resolutions were voted down by the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his supporters. But the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), and every member on this side recorded their votes for better protection for the farming interests of Canada. I follow that a little further : in 1904 I had the honour of moving this resolution :

That a large and increasing quantity of farm and market garden products is being imported into Canada.

That our own country is fully capable of furnishing an ample supply of such products for our own market.

That under an adequately protective tariff such sufficient supply would always be produced and marketed in Canada.

And that such readjustment should include as far as practicable the imposition of specific instead of ad valorem duties.

That in the opinion of this House the duties upon the said products should be so readjusted during the present session as to secure the Canadian market to the Canadian producer.

Among the requests that the farmers and gardeners make to the government are the following: That duties be imposed as follows:

Asparagus	per pound	3 cents.
Cabbages	each	3 "
Cauliflowers	"	3 "
Celery	per doz.	25 "
Beans	bush.	45 "
Green cucumbers	per doz.	20 "
Onions	bush. of 56 lbs.	40 "
Tomatoes	per lb.	5 "
Watermelons	each	5 "
Musk melons, cantaloup	"	3 "
Spinach	per bush.	25 "

These were some of the requests that the market gardeners of the province of Ontario had made to the government for increase of duty. That resolution was voted down by the right hon. the Prime Minister and his supporters, but the leader of the opposition and hon. members on this side recorded their votes in favour of it. A little later, I find somebody on the other side of the House moving a similar resolution. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, so long as the Canadian tariff affords, incidentally or otherwise, a considerable degree of protection to manufacturers, some protection may fairly and properly be afforded by our tariff to Canadian agriculturists and stock raisers upon hogs, hog products, garden vegetables and such other items as it may appear possible to so protect with advantage to the agriculturist, and without undue injury to the Canadian consumer.

That resolution was supported by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Schell), whom I see in his place. In a speech of some length made in the interests of the farmer, he stated his opinion that the government should increase the duty on pork. I do not suppose my hon. friend has changed his mind now, but perhaps he has. I must not press that question too closely. The hon. gentleman gave us a very interesting speech in favour of that resolution. The resolution was not voted upon, because the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) requested that it should not be pressed to a vote, explaining that he was going to revise the tariff that year, suggesting to the people of Canada that the farmers' interest would be taken care of in the new revision of the tariff. We have that new revision now, and not only has the request been refused of an increased protection to the farmer, but almost every vestige of protection on articles except pork, on which there is a reduction of duty, has been swept away altogether by the Minister of Finance in the pact he has made with Mr. Taft. I would like to know what the hon. member for South Oxford thinks of that policy—whether he proposes to support it or not. I am saying this to show that after all there has always been in this House a special distinction between the two parties in respect to protection for the agriculturist. That fact was never so manifest as it is in this proposed arrangement. The government are now proposing to take away protection the farmers have had, and the opposition in this House say, no, that as long as there is protection in our tariff, the agriculturist should get a fair share of it. I will follow that up a little further by a quotation from a speech of the leader of the opposition. In the session of 1902-3 the leader of the opposition moved a resolution in the interest of more adequate protection to the farmers, and supported it by a very strong speech. Speaking on April 17 to the resolution for better protection to the farming interests and all other classes, he said :

I believe that upon many agricultural products the duty ought to be increased. I want to say that a country like Canada, possessing agricultural possibilities second to none in the world, should not be handicapped in competition with the United States, and should not be obliged to import from that country nearly $28,000,000 worth of agricultural and animal products. The farmer is protected in this country to a certain extent, he should be protected to a greater extent, and the Conservative party will be prepared, upon attaining power, to give him a further measure of protection which in its opinion the interests of the country demand.

I think that quotation is sufficient to prove to the country that there is a vast distinction between the policy of the government and the policy of the opposition with respect to the farming classes of Canada. I repeat that the farmers will be disappointed in the right hon. gentleman and in the Minister of Finance, when they consider the proposition which the government are asking us to accept, a proposition which involves the removal of almost every vestige of protection the farmer has on the products he raises upon his farm.

Now I want to look at the other side of the tariff. I want to point out that there are a large number of articles that the farmers require that are not touched by this new proposition. I want to point out that while this government have taken away protection on the products of the farmer, and reduced protection on some of the products they raise upon their farms, they have left a pretty strong tariff protection on the articles they require in their houses and the implements they use on their farms. When a farmer wants to buy a wagon, he finds there is a tariff of 22½ per cent upon it; a buggy, 35 per cent; a piano, 30 per cent; boots and shoes, 25 per cent and 30 per cent; furniture in his house, 30 per cent; harness for his horses, 30 per cent; whips, 30 per cent; gloves and mitts which the farmer wears, 30 per cent; braces and suspenders for his clothing, 35 per cent; collars and cuffs, 37½ per cent; scythes, forks, hoes, rakes, axes, all of which the farmer requires, 22½ per cent; self binders, 15 per cent; mowing machines, 15 per cent; sewing machines that his wife requires in the house, 30 per cent; field rollers, 25 per cent. I am only mentioning a few of the articles the farmer requires to use on his farm. The farmers of this country will, therefore, see that the government, while taking the duty off wheat, barley, oats, peas, vegetables and fruit, taking away the protection the farmers have, has at the same time, allowed protection to remain upon all these articles that he requires to use, and upon a few luxuries in which he may wish to indulge. That shows the difference between the two parties in respect to the tariff as it affects the farmer.

Now I want to say a word about trade conditions. For the fiscal year ending 30th March, 1910, our total purchases from the United States amounted to $223,501,809; their purchases from Canada amounted to $113,150,778, showing a difference of $110,351,031. For the past decade the returns, in round numbers, shows imports from the United States of $1,000,000,000 and exports to the United States of $500,000,000. In other words, 7,000,000 Canadians purchased twice as much from the United States as 90,000,000 people in the United States purchased from Canada. That is the position of the tariff at the present moment. Now let me consider the question of the tariff as it affects manufacturers. I am one of those who believe that there can be no tariff in Canada for the manufacturer, that does not help the farmer, and the mechanic, and every other man; and there can be no tariff upon farm products or upon animals of the farm, that is not in the interest of every other man in this country. Therefore, I say that a protective tariff which is a uniform tariff, and gives every class a fair field and an equal chance, must be the best policy for the people of this country. There is invested in the manufacturing establishments in Canada at this moment $1,200,000,000. They have an annual output of the value of $1,000,000,000; employing 435,000 working men, and paying in wages annually, $250,000,000. I declare here, as representing the people, that an interest so valuable should be taken care of by any government. The 'Monetary Times,' of Toronto, is responsible for these figures: There are at least 200 manufacturing establishments, branches of United States industries, now located and operating in Canada, with an investment of United States capital of $24,000,000. That is something worthy the consideration of the government and of the people of Canada. There is no doubt in the world, that had it not been for the protective policy inaugurated by the Conservatives, and generally speaking, continued by this government, not one of these establishments would be to-day in Canada, and the wages they pay, would be expended in the United States. Let me read what President Taft expects for the United States from this agreement. At page 8 of his message to Congress, he says:

The benefit to our widespread agricultural implement industry from the reduction of Canadian duties in the agreement is clear. Similarly, the new widely distributed and expanding motor vehicle industry of the United States is given access to the Dominion market on advantageous terms.

At page 9 of his message he says:

As an illustration, it has been found possible to obtain free entry into Canada for fresh fruit and vegetables, a matter of special value to the south and to the Pacific coast in disposing of their products in their season.

I commend to the fruit growers of Canada the opinion of President Taft on how the United States fruit industry will be benefited by finding a new market in Canada. If it could be said that this government had opened up a new market of 92,000,000 people who required what we produce, not having enough of these articles themselves, then they might expect to get the approval of the people. But, the fact is that Canada produces more farm products than Canada herself requires, and the United States is in exactly the same position. The United States is an exporter of these articles mentioned in the trade agreement just as Canada is, and I cannot understand what advantage it is to the Canadian people to have access to the markets of a country which manufactures more than it can consume, and which produces more farm products than is required for their own consumption. Surely it is manifest that such an arrangement can be of no value to the farmers of Canada. Some say that protection increases the cost of the manufactured article to the consumer, and as that question has been often discussed I shall not dwell upon it further than to point out that in 1879, when the National Policy was passed there was an establishment in this country which that year manufactured about 30 buggies, for which the farmers paid them from $100 to $170 each, but last year, in various kinds of wheeled vehicles the same company had an output of 15,000, and they sold to the farmer for $85 a better buggy than formerly he had to pay $100 to $170 for. In 1878 the price of sugar was 9 and 10 cents per pound retail, but to-day, under a protective policy, it is under 5 cents per pound. The best self-binder was sold, in 1878, at from $275 to $300, but to-day the farmer gets a lighter and more compact binder that will last longer for $125. In 1878 single reapers retailed in Ontario at from $100 to $105, but to-day the best reapers retail at from $60 to $65. And so I could go all down the list and give instances to show that after all where a protective tariff is placed on the statute-books in the interest of all the people, instead of increasing the price, it decreases the price to the consumer, and in addition our own people get the benefit of the wages at home and the farmers of Canada supply the wage-earners with their products. And now, as to the fruit and vegetable industry, I point out that we have at the present time large quantities of fruit coming into Canada free of duty, and it comes into competition with our native grown fruit. For the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1910, there were entered for home consumption in Canada the following:

Oranges and grape fruit.. ..	$2,135,943
Pineapples..	252,719
Lemons..	528,149
Bananas..	1,499,095
	$4,415,906

These fruits go into competition with fruits we raise upon our own farms, and for my part I think that the present protection should be left where it is, and that so long as these fruits that we cannot grow in our own country come in free of duty the consumer will not suffer by the protection that is given to the fruit and vegetable interests. Now, some remarks have been made in respect to the price of wheat under this new arrangement, and some of the farmers in the west think they will procure a higher price for their wheat, but let me refer them to this authority, which I quote from the Toronto 'Globe' of February 9 last:

The Right Hon. Sidney Charles Buxton, President of the Board of Trade, London, England, speaking:

Stated that the more Canadian wheat goes to the United States, the more will the United States send to Great Britain, with the result that the prices will decline.

That means, of course, and it seems quite logical, that the more Canadian wheat that is sent to the United States the more United States wheat there will be to ship to England, and the lower the price will be in the English market. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has told us that the price of wheat is fixed in England, and therefore, it cannot be expected that under this new tariff arrangement the natural course of trade will be changed and the price of wheat fixed by the United States market. Then as to the pork industry let me quote from a statement submitted to the government the other day by a large delegation representing that industry. Here is what they said:

The meat packers of Ontario and Quebec have in good faith invested large sums of money in fixed assets reported by their buildings and plant. They have had the courage to build and equip their houses in advance of the production of hogs necessary to their operation. They have to-day, as they have had for years past an aggregate capacity greatly exceeding the aggregate supply of hogs. They are, therefore, deeply concerned and have great anxiety as to the effect upon these investments if the proposed reciprocal trade relations are established between Canada and the United States.

These business men of Canada are deeply concerned and in great anxiety as to the effect upon their investment by the proposed reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the United States. Further on, with respect to the price paid to the farmers, these gentlemen say:

Dnring the last 20 years the average price of hogs in Ontario and Quebec each year has exceeded the average price of hogs in the United States. We have not had the extreme range in values incident to United States' markets, hence we have not been as high in price during a period of extraordinary high levels, nor have we been as low in price during a period of extraordinary low levels, but the average price throughout any years with the exception of two years when the price was in favour of Buffalo has been higher to the farmers in Canada for their pork products.

I submit that statement for the mature consideration of Canadian farmers who are engaged in hog raising. I think I should put on 'Hansard' a statement made within the last few hours by Sir William Van Horne. This is it:

SICK AND ASHAMED.
SIR WILLIAM VAN HORNE ON THE RECIPROCITY AGREEMENT.

(Canadian Press Despatch).

Montreal, Feb. 22, 1910.—Sir William Van Horne has just returned from Cuba, highly disgusted at the proposal just put forward to carry through the Fielding-Paterson reciprocity measure. I am too much disgusted to talk about it, he said to-day. Just think of it. Our government returns show that the commerce per capita of the people of Canada is $97 per head, while the commerce per capita of the people of the United States is $33, and some odd cents per head. Naturally they look upon us with a covetous eye, and this proposal for reciprocity is the result. Now we are actually proposing to remove the mill dam, and you know what happens when the mill dam is removed the waters find a common level. It is humiliating and disgusting to find such a deal as this one proposed by Messrs. Fielding and Paterson being seriously entertained. I won't trust myself to say another word about it.

'Here just say that my opinions on the subject are summed up in the following,' and Sir William sat down at his desk and wrote:

'Re reciprocity agreement—

'I am sick and ashamed—too sick and too much ashamed to say anything about the subject.'

I quote that opinion from a business man of the standing of Sir William Van Horne against the opinion of my hon. friend from Red Deer as to what is the best for Canada, and I leave the people to draw their own conclusions. As to the linseed oil industry, a gentleman who had a seat in this House a few years ago, and who is engaged in the business writes me:

As soon as the new scheme becomes effective it will kill the linseed oil industry as dead as a mackerel.

That statement from a gentleman who has a good deal of money invested in the industry I commend to the government, and to the people of Canada. Now, the Finance Minister told us the other day that there has been no annexation feeling in Canada for the last 45 years, but the Toronto 'Globe' holds a different opinion, and I quote from its issue of February 9, last:

Twenty years ago there was quite a strong undercurrent of annexation sentiment in the country.

That was in 1891 when the Liberal party were advocating unrestricted reciprocity in Canada. Was that annexation feeling to be found in the ranks of the Conservative party? If so how does it come that in that year the Hon. Edward Blake stated over his own signature in a published letter, that the policy advocated by the Liberal party in 1891, of unrestricted reciprocity, would lead to annexation if it were carried into law. If there is any annexation talk in Canada it certainly is not traceable to the Conservative party. True, it is said, that many years ago certain Conservatives signed an annexation manifesto, but that document also bore the signatures of prominent Liberals of that day, and be that as it may, in after years when these men had a better understanding of our position and more faith in their country they repudiated the sentiments they earlier expressed. Whatever annexation talk there is in Canada is traceable to the policy advocated by the Liberals before they came into office and which at the time was repudiated by some of their best friends. And, Sir, to-day, there are prominent Liberals throughout Canada who declare that if this trade arrangement becomes law there are dangers surrounding it in respect to our nationhood. These gentlemen believe that possibly there may be some talk and some action in this House and in the United States with regard to annexation. I have in my hand a letter dated a few days ago from Aurora, Illinois, from a Canadian who lives in the United States, written to myself, and I will read one paragraph from it:

The view point over here can be summed up briefly. These Americans think they have slipped one over the Canadians. They openly admit and brag over the fact that they have secured a great deal for very little given in return. The Americans think that Canada is beginning to break away from England, and they think that this is the first step on the road to annexation later.

Evidently there is some talk on the other side of the line with respect to annexation. For my part I believe that the best policy for this country is the policy laid down many years ago by the Liberal-Conservative party, of protection for every interest in Canada—a policy kept on the statute-book by this government until every class of people in Canada are satisfied with present conditions. Our trade is expanding, our natural resources are being developed by our own energy, and with the assistance that we get from the United States and from England in particular in the shape of large investments of money. The policy that has made Canada the admiration of the world is the policy that in my opinion ought to be continued, and that policy is Canada for the Canadians, not Canada for the United States people.

Mr. JOHN P. MOLLOY (Provencher). Mr. Chairman, I have listened with pleasure to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. They were in line with what we would naturally expect from him as a strong protectionist. I am not a strong protectionist—quite the opposite. On this question I propose to speak from the point of view of a Manitoba man as well as a Canadian, and I believe I shall have the support of every man from the province of Manitoba. The great majority of course are Conservatives; but before I came to this House, every once in a while the Conservative newspaper in Winnipeg, the 'Telegram,' told us of the many things that the three Conservative members were anxious and willing to do for the farmers of Manitoba. My good friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) never forgets to remind this House that he moved for a reduction of the duty on agricultural implements to 10 per cent. At the same time, he cannot forget that he voted for the motion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that this reciprocity agreement be delayed—that in 40 years the Canadian people have not had time to give it that consideration which it deserves. Every member of this House from the province of Manitoba with the exception of myself voted for that motion. But this question is a question of vital importance to the farmers of Manitoba, and every one of us, including the hon. member for Winnipeg, who in reality represents a rural county. If it were not for the rural counties in the province of Manitoba there would be no Winnipeg; and, as I believe that this agreement is in the interest of the producer in the province of Manitoba, it should receive the support of all the hon. members from that province. They must do one of two things: they must either support it—and that I am sure will be the wish of their constituents—or they must oppose it. They cannot stand for one thing and vote for another, if they do not support it they class themselves with the black princes of protection who when it suits them wear the spurs of free traders. For my part, I am going to vote for the agreement, the whole agreement, and nothing but the agreement, and I hope for the early ratification of the same. So far as I am concerned, and I believe the people I represent, we are not too well pleased with the amount of reduction in the duty on agricultural implements. It might have been greater, but still there is a reduction of from 2½ to 5 per cent. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) in a very able speech, to which he must have given a great deal of thought and time, moved that the reduction of the duty on agricultural implements be substantial. From that day to this we have not heard from the hon. member regarding this reduction. We have not heard from either that hon. gentleman or any other member from the province of Manitoba about the various articles which have been put on the free list. We have not heard whether they favour free wheat, free oats or free barley. I will vote for this agreement for this reason, if for no other, that it has lowered the duties on many articles and that it has not increased the duty on a single article and made many things free. I say that it is in the interest not only of the producer, but of the consumer, and, therefore, I will support it. I profess to speak only for the part of western Canada which I represent. On the day that this agreement was placed before the House, the 26th of January, I took care to put myself in touch with the people I represent. I wrote to a number of the ablest and most level-headed men of the county of Provencher, and the first reply I received was to this effect: The reciprocity agreement known as the Taft-Fielding agreement, has many friends in the district, the people believing it to be the greatest and most popular thing this government has done for the people of Canada. The next letter I received was worded something like this: In that portion of the county in which I live, I have made it my business to inquire, and the only man I have found opposed to this agreement is a gentleman who is the president of the Conservative Association of the county. Therefore, I believe that I shall be justified in voting for this agreement in toto. I am convinced that it will develop, not alone the province of Manitoba, but every province in the Dominion. I was informed not later than the night before last by one of the most prosperous farmers in Manitoba, known very well to my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples)——

Mr. STAPLES. Who is he?

Mr. MOLLOY. Mr. James Riddell, my hon. friend's opponent in 1904. I made the statement some time ago that I believed this agreement would increase in value at least $5 per acre land in Manitoba, and the other western provinces and he thought it would increase a great deal more.

Mr. STAPLES. Did Mr. Riddell tell you his opinion which he gathered abroad? Did he tell you what feeling existed in the old country regarding this reciprocity measure? Did he tell you that in his opinion conditions were quite satisfactory in this country, and this government would be very foolish to disturb them?

Mr. MOLLOY. I would like to inform my hon. friend that he told me just exactly the opposite. He told me that it would benefit, not only the people of Manitoba, but of all western Canada, and that the people were only getting what the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Staples) has told us he had fought for ever since he has been a member of this House.

It is well known that this year was an unfavourable year for Manitoba, and yet we raised in that province 96,000,000 bushels of grain, of which 40,000,000 bushels were wheat. That was raised from an acreage of 3,110,000 acres, with the small average of 13½ bushels per acre. Now, there are at least 25,000,000 acres of land arable in the province of Manitoba alone. Last year the United Kingdom imported 163,000,000 bushels of wheat, and that 25,000,000 acres of land, which is deemed to be arable in Manitoba alone would yield 325,000,000 bushels of wheat at 13 bushels per acre. The question with which I am concerned is this: We know that in western Canada there will be some day from 175,000,000 to 200,000,000 acres of land under development, and I would ask where will the people of western Canada go to sell their surplus wheat, oats and barley when that day comes?

Mr. STAPLES. Does the hon. gentleman think they will find it in the United States, which is an exporting country to-day?

Mr. MOLLOY. Yes, it is an exporting country to-day, and will be, perhaps, for a short time, but only for a very short time, and the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite that if we had waited the United States would have taken down their tariff barriers, is not really an argument against this agreement, because by this agreement these barriers are being taken down. I do not pretend that it will increase the price of wheat to the Canadian producer, but I say it will maintain the present prices. There are those who say it will increase the price 2 cents or 3 cents per bushel, but I shall be well satisfied if the present prices are maintained, because at the prices of to-day the raising of wheat is one of the best paying businesses in the Dominion. Instead of having only a home market and the British market, we shall have the United States market as well, and can any one doubt that with three markets at his command instead of two the producer will benefit? Say, for instance, that the price of No. 1 Northern is 76 cents, and of No. 2 Northern 70 cents. It is well known that there may be but a very slight degree of difference between the two, and that if that grain is sampled what may be refused as No. 1 Northern may bring 75 cents.

So far as the western farmer is concerned we know that this agreement must be a good thing for him if we judge it from the American point of view, because we know that the ablest men connected with the farming industry in the United States are opposing it on the ground that the United States government have maintained protection for the manufacturers and have made the tillers of the soil free traders. In proof of this, let me read an extract from a letter to Secretary of Agriculture Wilson from former Governor Nahum J. Bachelder, of Concord, N.H.:

> In reply to our statement that the pending Bill was one-sided and unfair to the farmers, in that it makes no material reduction in duties on manufactured articles used by them, you attempt to defend the continuance of a high tariff for manufacturers along with free trade for the farmers, by claiming that it is the protected workers who furnish the farmers with their chief market.
> We would respectfully submit that you are simply repeating the pet argument of the domestic manufacturer and that in asserting that the prosperity of the farmer depends on the workers in protected industries, you are claiming what is exactly the reverse of actual conditions. It is on the prosperity of the farmers that the welfare of all other classes—manufacturers, merchants, transportation interests and factory workers, depends, and we cannot understand how at this late day you should be found repeating the stale and exploded theory that the farmers exist by the grace of protected manufacturers, or any one else on earth.

I say, therefore, that when men in the position to make such a statement as whose letter I have just read, who is at the head of the National Grange and chairman of the Patrons of Industry, are in a position to make such a statement as that, this reciprocity must be a good thing for our western farmer, and if it be good for them it will benefit the whole Dominion.

Some time ago we were all struck with an article which appeared on the front page of the Montreal 'Star,' in which that paper appealed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the only man who could save Canada. Well, we on this side believe that he has been the only man for a generation, who has done that which is best for Canada, and who will continue to do so as long as God spares him, regardless of the fact that it was a paid advertisement, regardless of the fact that it was paid for by the manufacturers, and vested interests as against the masses of this country. But an article appeared in the Montreal 'Star,' which was copied by the Winnipeg 'Tribune,' in which they took up the side of the farmer. That was like some gentlemen on the other side, who before the reciprocity agreement had been entered into, and while they believed it was impossible to secure reciprocity in natural products, advocated such reciprocity, but when such an arrangement was actually made, they found an excuse to get out. The Montreal 'Star' found a way to get out. But what they now say, will not go down with the masses of this country, because the farmers represent 63 per cent of the population of Canada, and they must, and will be heard. And nobody will hear them more plainly than the men who represent rural counties in western Canada, when the tocsin is sounded for the next election. For my part, I believe it to be my duty to stand for that for which the people elected me. If I could not support this agreement conscientiously and fairly and honestly, it would be my duty, as a man, to get out and let some one else take my place who is more closely in touch with the people I represent. However, I will read this article in which the Montreal 'Star' stood up for the farmers. My western friends will notice that it is pretty pointed. Whether correct or incorrect, there are facts in it that it will be pretty hard for them to get over:

Where the tariff burdens the farmer, that item is immediately put on trial for its life. This country can stand a burden anywhere else more easily. Agriculture is our hope. It is the splendid agricultural opportunities of the west which are drawing to that section such excellent settlers. A mere chance to make a living will attract all the less desirable sort of immigrants we can stand—and probably far more. But after all, it is not so much population we want as fellow citizens up to the Canadian standard; and we can only secure this high grade of immigrant by making farming conditions superlatively attractive. New York can boast of its brokers and London can boast of its Lords; but Canada must be in a position to boast of its farmers. That is our prize product—our compelling lure to the best of the best nations.

And again they say:

Where they find railway or other corporations inclined to side-track their interests or ignore their just demands, they must tell any government that sits or ever shall sit at Ottawa that its only title to continued existence is its instant readiness to compel the possessors of public franchises to recognize that the public is the controlling partner in their business. The farmers are the masters of the situation; and, if they fail, the blame is theirs.

Mr. MOLLOY.

As I said a moment ago, the farmers represent 63 per cent of our population, and I do not believe that, organized, as they are, any corporate interest or any wildcat talk of annexation—which is the only defence offered by hon. gentlemen opposite—will sway the farmers from protecting and helping their own families, or cause them to vote for men who are diametrically opposed to their interests. Now, speaking of the grain of western Canada—

Mr. BLAIN. Would the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Did I understand him to make the statement that the article of the Montreal 'Star,' as it is found in other newspapers in Canada, was paid for, as an advertisement by the Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. MOLLOY. By members, by interests, opposed to a reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Molloy), be good enough to name——

Mr. MOLLOY. No, I will not

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh

Mr. MOLLOY. I do not wish any hon. member to feel that I am discourteous, and if I have hurt the hon. member's feelings, I apologize. But so far, I have never risen in this House to make a statement, except once, when I rose to a question of personal explanation, without being baited by hon. gentlemen on the other side. And I have never yet interrupted any speaker on that side of the House. I took a vow the first day I came here that, as long as I had a seat in this House, I would not interrupt any hon. member who was speaking.

Mr. STAPLES. I rise to a question of order. The hon. member (Mr. Molloy), said that he never rose to give offence or insult to hon. gentlemen on this side Now, with his permission, I will ask him a question——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is not a point of order, and unless the hon. gentleman (Mr. Staples) has a point of order, I cannot hear him.

Mr. STAPLES. I can only say that, if the hon. gentleman takes offence, I am very sorry. I did not mean it in that way.

Mr. MOLLOY. I have endeavoured to point out from the farmers' point of view the desirability of an enlarged market for the western farmers' wheat. But there are other grains raised in western Canada besides wheat,—for example, oats. Last year, 42,000,000 bushels of oats were raised. But owing to the drought in western Canada, the crop was less on the average than for some years. The western oats are better, stronger and heavier oats than the American, and will command on the American market higher prices, owing to their milling properties. In spite of the fact that the staple crop of Canada, up to the present time, has been wheat, there is nothing in this agreement so beneficial to the western farmer, as making barley free. We all knows that under the old reciprocity agreement, of from 1854 to 1866, the staple crop of eastern Canada was barley, and we also know that, at the present time, the price of barley, on the American side, with the duty of 30 cents equals, and in some cases, even exceeds, the price of wheat on the Canadian side. I made it my business, the other day, to inquire into the value of barley on the American side and on the Canadian side. And I say that if barley alone, had been put on the free list by this agreement, it would be my duty, in the interests of the western farmer, to vote for the agreement.

On February 18, the highest price paid for barley in Winnipeg was 56 cents, and the lowest price 38 cents. In Chicago on February 19, the highest price paid for barley was 94 cents, and the lowest price 75 cents one day between. In other words, the difference between the highest price paid in Winnipeg and the highest price paid in Chicago was 38 cents, and the difference between the lowest prices was 37 cents. That was for feed barley. But that is not all. It must be admitted, it is admitted, there is no use trying to deny it, that in decreased in the province of Manitoba toba, which is the oldest agricultural province in the west, many sections of the country have been overrun by weeds. We know that the crop of barley has decreased in the province of Manitoba for the simple reason that it does not pay. For instance, in 1908 there were 18,000,000 bushels raised; in 1909, 16,000,000 bushels; in 1910; 12,000,000 bushels, showing a decrease for the simple reason that it does not pay. There will be this advantage, that the farmer of western Canada, and the Manitoba farmer particularly, as the oldest agricultural district west of the lakes, will be able to grow barley at a paying price, getting in the neighbourhood of what they are getting for wheat at the present time, with the additional benefit that they will have an opportunity of cleaning their land. They will have the use of the land which would otherwise be less useful. Therefore, so far as the western farmer is concerned, putting barley on the free list is the best thing that has been done for him. It will give him a paying crop, as the yield per acre will be about double. This year the yield per acre is 20·75 bushels for barley, and for wheat only 13·47, on account of the drought. If he can receive two-thirds the price that he receives for his wheat, he will make more money raising barley, and cleaning up his farm, which has become overrun with weeds in some districts.

Another reason for which I shall vote for this agreement is that it will furnish a better market. Where are the people of western Canada to get a good market for the future? The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in his speech the other night, and it certainly was an able speech, asked: What will happen when there are a million farmers in western Canada? I say, What will happen when there are twenty-five million farmers in western Canada, and what will happen when there are 200 million acres of land cultivated in western Canada? We know the time will come when there will be 80 millions of people living between the Great Lakes and the Pacific ocean. They must have a market somewhere. The western farmer asks for a fair, square deal. He says he is prepared to meet anybody, or any interest on a fair, equal footing, and the more markets he gets the better it will be for him and the better for the whole Canadian people.

There is another question I wish to touch upon, that is the question of transportation. It has been argued that if this agreement goes into effect trade will go south, and that the millions and millions that have been spent by the people of Canada on railways will be, in a sense, wasted. My argument is this, the time is near when all the existing lines we have at the present time, and when the other two now in course of construction, are completed within five years, they cannot handle the output of western Canada. I have the statement of a railway man who was in close touch with the Canadian Northern railway, and he said to me frankly, the Canadian Northern railway have the lowest fixed charges of any railway in the world of its size. It owns its own lake steamers, it owns its own ocean steamers, and if they cannot compete with their American competitors let them go out of business.

An hon. MEMBER. May I ask the name of the hon. gentleman's informant?

Mr. MOLLOY. I cannot give the names publicly, but I will give it to the hon. gentleman privately. There is one thing in regard to transportation which this government must be very careful about, and that is that the handling of grain by the elevator companies and railway companies particularly, must be such as to guard the interest of the producer. First and foremost the interest of the producer must be considered. If competition by American roads tends to lower the freight rate in this country, I am sure and I know, that nothing will be more popular in Canada. The people of Canada will then know that for once they are in a position to control the railway rates, to some extent. If you can by this agreement induce American competition and lower the freight rates to the grain growers of Canada, to the stock raisers of Canada, to the miners of Canada, and to the fishermen of Canada, it will be welcomed by them, because it will be in the interest of the whole people. If this agreement tends to lower freight rates, which I hope it will do, that alone will be an enormous benefit. We all remember, those of us who live in Manitoba, years ago when the Canadian Pacific railway held the people by the throat, when that great company dictated their terms, dictated their rates, dictated when you should ship your grain.

Mr. BELAND. Was Sir William Van Horne then connected with that road?

Mr. MOLLOY. He was president. It is now possible for the people to get relief; they believe that this agreement will tend to a reduction of freight rates, and, therefore, it will be welcome to the people of this great and growing country. It is no wonder that Sir William Van Horne is opposed to this agreement, for in a short time the Canadian Pacific railway will not be able to dictate to our free people as they have done in the past. Now the statement is made that all the grain will go south. We must remember that part of it has already been going south. It may surprise you, and it did surprise me, to learn that half of our wheat crop for the last three years in western Canada has gone out by southern routes. I have a statement to that effect from the Department of Trade and Commerce, showing the quantity of wheat exported from the Dominion of Canada in three crop years ending August 31. In 1908 there were 39,000,000 bushels, in round figures; in 1909, 45,000,000 bushels; in 1910, 52,000,000 bushels. How much of that wheat was exported through the United States? In 1908, 19,000,000 bushels, in round figures, went through by American routes; in 1909, 23,000,000 bushels; in 1910, 27,000,000 bushels. The Minister of Customs pointed out in his speech that from Port Arthur and Fort William alone there were 19,000,000 bushels exported by American routes. Now if you compare the figures you will find that in 1908, 1909 and 1910, half of our exports of wheat went by American routes. You may think it went in bond but the fact remains that freight rates were paid on it over American roads.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. In 1910, 100,000,000 bushels of wheat went through Port Arthur and Fort William, and only 1,000,000 bushels did not go that far on Canadian roads.

Mr. MOLLOY. My statement was that half the grain went by American routes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. But it came east to be exported.

Mr. MOLLOY. Partly, but not entirely.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. All except 1,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MOLLOY. I was struck by an article written by Dr. Andrew McPhail in the Montreal 'Witness' under date February 21. We have heard a great deal of the howl sent up by vested interests in this country, and I notice that the strongest opponents of this agreement are the moneyed men of Canada. The common people, apparently, are not to be considered or consulted if some people are to have their way, but there are those who are prepared to take up their cause and fight it out for them, and I am one of them. The blue ruin predicted by hon. gentlemen opposite and some of their press, with its accompaniment of falling stocks, financial stringency, tying up of corporations and unwillingness of the banks to lend money, is hardly borne out by the facts as here set forth. This article is as follows:

TEST OF PUBLIC OPINION.

There is only one method of testing public opinion upon the effect which any proposal will have in industrial values, and that is by appealing to the record of prices which the public is willing to pay. The Montreal Stock Exchange will yield those quotations. The schedules were brought down on January 27——

Bear in mind that was the day after the Finance Minister made his statement.

—or 'thrown on the table,' as the saying is. Let us now compare the prices which prevailed at the close of the market on the day previous to the event with those which are recorded for February 14. There are 49 stocks listed, for which quotations are given for both days, and the average values increased by 2·22 per cent. Let us compare the values of stocks in those industries, about which the greatest clamour has been raised. The Canadian Pacific railway, on January 26, closed at 207½ bid; on February 14 it had advanced to 212⅝ bid. Grand Trunks in London on January 26, closed at 106¾ for firsts, 95¾ for seconds, and 54 to 54⅞ on actual sales of thirds. On February 14, the closing figures were: firsts 108, thirds 54⅞, there being no quotations for seconds. Ogilvie Milling Company closed at 129⅛ and 129 respectively; Lake of the Woods at 142 and 141½; Steel Company at 57⅞ and 58⅛. Even 'farmers' may be trusted to see the significance of those figures, and to test by them the sincerity of the 'business men' who are crying out that they have been betrayed.

The railways have come in for especial commiseration. The railways may be trusted to take care of themselves if we adhere to the sound principle of minding our own business, and let the American railways mind theirs.

Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, Mr. Hays, and the proprietors of the Canadian Northern, are quite competent to protect their east and west haul, if only their hands are not tied by an International Railway Commission. That is the trap we have to fear. But all railways on the American continent run east and west, and always will. With the exception of the Illinois Central, there is not a road in America which ever made any profit by north and south traffic alone.

Therefore, I say that so far as the railway interests are concerned, no statement has been made by any railway man who is in active railway business to-day against this agreement, although we have, on the other side, the statements of Sir Donald Mann and Sir William Mackenzie in its favour. If it lowers the freight rates of the Canadian railways, I shall welcome the agreement more and more in the interests of the people, knowing and believing that they have paid more than their just share in the past, and I am sure the people of the country will take the same view.

The only argument left to the opposition is the flag, the old, the dear old, the good old flag. I wonder how it has stood the racket so long; it must be great stuff. Whenever the poor old, dear old, good old Tory party gets in a hole they appeal to the dear old, good old flag to help them out. It has stood the test not only in this country, in which we are proud to live, in which we will always live and will always defend, but in other parts of the world. In this country the only thing the flag is up against is the political attacks made upon it to suit the purposes of the Conservative party. When they fail everywhere else, then they appeal to the flag. I will tell hon. gentlemen that they must have something else than that racket for the future. It has worked, I admit, pretty well in the past, but the people are getting next; they are getting wise. You have got to have something else. Just in the same way you can go on talking graft until the crack of doom, but you have to give the people a policy, and do not raise the flag and give us the flag in the place of a policy. The people want something and are bound to have it, and we, the Liberal party, are bound to give it to them. The people of this country are loyal, they always have been, and they always will be. If there is any difference in loyalty, if you can measure it in that way, the people in Canada to-day are more loyal than they ever were before, because they are better satisfied with conditions than they ever were before. Therefore, they have every reason to be satisfied. You create conditions whereby the people suffer an injury, starve the people and they will soon forget the flag, they will think of their stomachs only; men on the other side of the House would do that just as those on this side. Some of them on the other side seem to have no consciences, but I suppose they all have stomachs.

As for the railway companies in this country, as I said, they have taken care of themselves. They do not hesitate to cross the international boundary to extend their systems in the United States, not one of them, and the bankers in this country who are raising such a row do not forget to send their money to New York if they can get a good percentage. They are out for their pockets, we all are, legitimately. Therefore, I say that the annexation cry and the disloyalty cry will not work out for the simple reason that the Canadian people are intelligent, and, therefore, they know better than to be deceived by such cries. You will have to give them something else that will appeal to them, to their sense of honesty and intelligence in addition to any ribald cry that you wore out yourselves many, many years ago. As to the statement that Americans are flocking into Canada, I say it is a good thing, and that they are welcome to Canada. There is no man who comes into Canada to-day who is a more up-to-date, a more loyal, or a more progressive citizen than the naturalized American. You meet them at every turn in western Canada.

There are many of them in my own constituency that I know personally, and if you talk to these men they will admit that they have a protection and justice in this country that they did not get in the land of their birth. Some of these men are born Americans and in other cases they are Canadians who have come back. One word in conclusion. We heard to-day of a resolution passed by the Winnipeg Board of Trade, and they did not forget to tell us that Mr. D. C. Cameron seconded that motion. Mr. Cameron has a perfect right to do as he sees fit. He is an intelligent, honourable, upright man, and a good citizen. I have no fault to find with him, but I have a certain amount of fault to find with a bunch of men who palm themselves off as Toronto Grits. We are told there are 18 Grits in Toronto ; I was not aware there were that many. If you look over the list of these 18 you will find it starts with Sir Edmund Walker, banker, and the next man is a financier, and the next man is a financier, and the next man is a financier, and so on and so forth, and the next man is the manager of a bank, and they come together and they say that this arrangement is a bad thing. I would not be afraid to wager, and I am going to tell the farmers of my constituency, that these 18 Grits of Toronto who went to that meeting went in automobiles costing from $5,000 to $10,000 each, to lay down a policy for the farmers of Canada. They either went in their own automobiles or their own carriages, or in the automobiles and carriages of their friends, and they met there, and they said the country is going to the bowwows. Their position is simply this, and they know it, that they have had the best time they ever had since the Laurier government came into power, and since then the country has experienced unexampled prosperity. But, as a western man I want to tell you that so far as annexation is concerned, there could have been created a movement for annexation in western Canada in the days when the Conservative government entered into a contract with the Canadian Pacific railway which perpetrated a gross injustice to the people of the west. The producers of this country who number 63 per cent of the people including the farmers of the west, will not submit for one moment to being dictated to by any 18 Liberals in Toronto, or, for that matter any 18 Conservatives in Winnipeg. It is all right for these men when they have reaped their riches at the expense of the sweat of the brow of the farmer in western Canada, these gentlemen with their palaces in the city, and their seaside homes who travel in their automobiles, and spend their wealth most extravagantly throughout the length and breadth of the land ; it is all right for such men to talk, but I tell them that the people of western Canada who have made them what they are, will not be dictated to by any such bunch. As a rule the farmer of Manitoba does not travel in an automobile.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). May I ask the hon. gentleman if he does not canvass his own electors in his own automobile?

Mr. MOLLOY. I did not hear the question.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). Does the hon. member (Mr. Molloy) not canvass the electors of Provencher in his own automobile or that of his brother?

Mr. MOLLOY. I have been asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart) if I did not canvass the electors of Provencher in my own automobile or my brothers, and I want to make the statement here, and now, and by the time this House meets to-morrow I am prepared to prove it, that I was never in any automobile during my canvass in Provencher in 1908, my brother's or anybody else's and if that is not true I will leave this House. I will admit that my brother, of whom I am very proud, and who is a member of the Manitoba legislature, canvassed in his automobile, and he was elected by only 9 majority, and the last party he brought to the poll just numbered 9. However, that has no reference to my case. I may tell the hon. member (Mr. Haggart) that I do not need an automobile at all ; the people come up and vote for me without being driven in an automobile; they would ride in Red River carts if they had to. I can tell the hon. member further that I won't need an automoblie next election. And, without wishing to hurt the feelings of anybody I will just mention that the Conservative party in the constituency I represent are scarce of candidates, and if there is any hon. member in this House from the province of Manitoba who wishes to try his luck in Provencher I will welcome him as my opponent ; and I think I will be able to defeat him on this or any other question of the policy of the Laurier government. I am going to vote for this agreement, believing it is in the interests of the people, believing it is in the interest of the land in which I was born, and believing that the gentlemen who oppose it to-day, and whose opinions I respect, will in time come round to my way of thinking, that it is an agreement which is in the interests of the whole people of Canada.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the committee rises, I would like to make myself clear to my hon. friend from Red Deer, who thought I was wrong on some question of fact. I stated the other day that according to my information the United States was the greatest manufacturing country in the world and the greatest agricultural country in the world. I still think I am correct so far as the statistics show. If my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) would name any other country that is a greater manufacturing country or a greater agricultural country than the United States, I would be very glad to be corrected. My hon. friend (Mr. Clark) said I had not, as usual, buttressed my statements by facts. I suppose he regarded them as unsupported facts and, therefore, no facts at all. I have looked into the point, and I would tell my hon. friend from Red Deer that according to the best information I can get—which is to be found in the Statesman's Year-book for the year 1908, being the last edition in the library, a publication well recognized in all English-speaking countries—the manufactures of the United States amounted to $16,866,706,985. I do not think that record of value is equalled by any other country in the world. If I am wrong I should be glad to have my hon. friend correct me. As to agricultural products, the information I have is not quite so late; it only comes down to 1900. According to the same authority, the agricultural products of the United States in that year amounted to $4,717,069,973. In another publication, an American one, the Standard Dictionary of Facts, which professes to give the latest statistics, I find that the United States leads the whole world in agricultural products of the following kinds: in wheat, in oats, in corn—four or five times as much as all the rest of the world—and in cotton---nearly twice as much as all the rest of the world. Therefore, subject to correction, I still think that the statement I made on that point in the House a few days ago was quite correct.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I think my hon. friend will agree with me that the question of agricultural products does not come into dispute between us, because I did not refer to that part of his statement at all. It would be too much to expect that a country about the size of Alberta would equal one-half of this continent in agricultural products. The hon. member has not given any comparative figures. He has stated the gross figures of the United States for 1905. I think he will agree with me that it is an extremely difficult line of comparison. There is the difficulty as to what really are manufactures. For instance, in the statement of manufactures in the old country, ships are for some reason excluded, although it could be reasonably argued that ship-building is a line of manufacture, a ship being a highly-finished product. I certainly think that the comparative figures which I gave with regard to the export of manufactures rather bore out my side of the case. But in matters of trade I am cosmopolitan. I look for the time when the United States and Canada must of necessity overtake and pass Great Britain, just as a son outgrows his father. It is not a very important point, but I think it is as well to state it before it actually comes to pass.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would be inclined to think that it has come to pass already. I do not think the manufactured product of Great Britain at the present time approaches anything like the figures which I have given. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that it is a little difficult to get the statistics for Great Britain in the same way as they are given for the United States. But I find that the cotton, linen and woollen industries of every kind form a very large part of the production of Great Britain, and their product does not begin to approach in value the figures to which I have just called attention. According to this year-book, it amounts to about £200,000,000, which would be about one-sixteenth or one-seventeenth of the total manufactured products of the United States. Of course, that does not include the iron production. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the manufactured product of Great Britain at the present time does not begin to approach the product of the United States; but, as we have not the figures for the purpose of exact comparison, as my hon. friend says, there may be some room for difference of opinion. I may possibly be able to get more satisfactory statistics; but in the limited time at my disposal since my hon. friend called my attention to them, I have been able to get only these. Yet I am quite satisfied that they substantially and essentially bear out the statement I made a few evenings ago.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BAGGAGE SMASHING.

Mr. LEWIS moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 129) respecting Baggage Smashing. He said: This Bill deals with a grievance affecting a great number of people in Canada. I find by statistics in the library, that the number of passengers carried in the year 1910 by the railways, was 35,894,575; and that the freight carried during that time was 74,000,000 tons. According to the computation I have made, there would be about 5,000,000 tons of baggage carried. I wish to state, and I believe it is a fact, that there is more damage done by the railways in carrying that 5,000,000 tons of baggage, than is done in carrying that 74,000,000 tons of freight. A number of cases have happened in my own experience and others have been related to me, where people prefer to pay freight on their valuable trunks and baggage, and to send them as freight, instead of risking the damage that would happen to them in transit as baggage. The cause of the trouble is either the carelessness of the employees in handling the baggage or want of sufficient men. Since the Canadian people have attained to such a degree of comfort and affluence, they delight in their personal belongings, and they carry many valuable articles in their baggage; but very few will allow a small piece of baggage, a valise or suit case, to be taken into the baggage car. Consequently, people who travel, are under the discomfort of tumbling over trunks and valises in the car. If a person has a valuable trunk worth $50, the chances are that in travelling from Ottawa to Toronto, he may suffer damages to that trunk to the extent of $25. The object of my Bill is not to impose penalties, it is more as a detriment. I will read the Bill:

1 This Act may be cited as The Baggage Smashing Act.

2. Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before a magistrate, stipendiary magistrate or any one justice of the peace having the power to do alone such acts as are usually required to be done by two or more justices, to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars over and above the value of the baggage destroyed or damaged or to one month's imprisonment with or without hard labour, or to both, who wilfully or through negligence destroys or damages any trunk, valise, satchel, box or other baggage when handling such baggage for transportation by railway, vessel, vehicle or any other means of conveyance used by common carriers.

3. When the person found guilty of a violation of the provisions of section 2 of this Act is an employee of any corporation or company, the magistrate, stipendiary magistrate or justice, may convict such corporation or company of the offence and find it liable for the actual damages caused; the employee, in such case, being held liable only for the penalty.

4. This Act shall come into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

Now it is a well known fact that those who have travelled in the old land are aware that no such trouble occurs, the baggage is handled properly. This baggage smashing, which is the term now used in this country, may be of some benefit to the large manufacturing concerns, who make the trunks, and may help to make more millionaires in Canada. But I stand here on behalf of the plain people who travel, and who want this thing to be put a stop to. I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), to look into this matter, and if this Bill does not cover the point, I hope he will himself, take hold of the difficulty, and see that baggage smashing is put an end to, at present the only remedy is by civil action, ordinary citizens cannot afford law suits with corporations.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I would ask the Minister of Railways, if there is not a law on the Railway Act that covers this very thing.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Railway Act makes the railway company liable for damage to baggage to any amount they carry. My hon. friend speaks of handling baggage in the old land. As a matter of fact, most of that is carried in the railway compartment, because when they send it as baggage, they have to pay for it, while in Canada, a certain amount is carried free. Some of us have noticed that when Englishmen are travelling in Canada, they have a habit of carrying nearly all their baggage in the trains with them. I am afraid if we were to follow their example, instead of having fewer valises in the aisles of the cars, we would have more. However, I have no objection to the first reading of the Bill. As the members of the House are now not allowed any more trunks, those of us who travel hereafter, will probably carry handbags.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. LEWIS.

LEASE OF RAILWAY IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. GRAHAM. I move that on Tuesday next the House do go into Committee of the Whole, for consideration of the following resolution, which stands in my name. I may add that His Excellency has been apprised of the subject matter of this resolution, and has given his assent thereto:

Resolved, that, whereas by legislation enacted at the session thereof held in the year A.D. 1910, the legislature of the province of New Brunswick authorized and empowered the Lieutenant Governor in Council for the said province to guarantee the principal and interest of the bonds of any railway company which would build a line of railway from a point on the line of the National Transcontinental railway at Grand Falls in the county of Victoria, to the city of St. John, in the said province of New Brunswick, a distance of about two hundred and twenty miles, to the extent of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) per mile, upon certain conditions therein set forth, one of such conditions being that no such agreement should be entered into with any company or corporation for the construction of the said line of railway or for the guaranteeing of the said bonds unless and until the parliament of Canada should enact legislation authorizing the entering by the government of Canada into an agreement with such company or with the government of the province of New Brunswick, for the leasing of the said line of railway when completed, with its appurtenances and rolling stock, and for the operation, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the said government of Canada, as a part of the government railway system of Canada for a period of ninety-nine years and for the payment by the government of Canada to the said province of New Brunswick, or the government thereof, each year during the said term of ninety-nine years of forty per centum per annum of the gross earnings of the said railway, as or in the nature of rental therefor; the amount of such rental to be applied in payment of the interest of the bonds so to be guaranteed and the surplus, if any, to be paid to the said company;

Now, therefore, it is expedient that His Excellency the Governor in Council be authorized to enter into a contract with any such railroad company and the government of the province of New Brunswick as aforesaid, for the leasing of the said line of railway with its appurtenances and rolling stock, when completed and equipped with rolling stock, and for the operation, maintenance, upkeep and repair by the said government of Canada, as a part of the government railway system of Canada, for a period of ninety-nine years, and for the payment by the government of Canada to the said province of New Brunswick, or the said company, each year during the said term of ninety-nine years, of the forty per centum per annum of the gross earnings of the said railway, as or in the nature of rental therefor;

Provided, however, that the said contract shall be entered into only upon the condition that the said railway be constructed upon plans and specifications to be approved of by the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and shall be up to the general standard of the said National Transcontinental railway through the said province;

Provided, further, that His Excellency the Governor in Council shall be authorized to enter into a contract as aforesaid, for the operation of the said road in sections, when completed, and equipped as follows:

1 From Fredericton to Woodstock.

2. From Fredericton south a distance of fifty miles.

3 Each twenty-five miles thereafter, until the line be completed and equipped from Grand Falls to St. John.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATION OF FISHERIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BRODEUR. I move that on Tuesday next the House do go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution. His Excellency has been apprised of the subject matter of this resolution, and has given his assent to it.

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Fisheries Act, chapter 45 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, be amended by enacting that in the province of British Columbia no one shall engage in the manufacture of oil or other commercial products from sea lions, hair seals, sharks or dogfish, nor operate a salmon cannery or salmon curing establishment, except under license from the minister; that the site of reduction works must be approved by the minister; that operations must proceed within one year from issue of the license for which annual fees shall be required; that the annual fee for a lobster fishing license be increased and based on the total number of pounds of canned lobsters; that the annual returns to the minister by the owner or manager of a lobster factory, through the inspector of fisheries of the district, shall furnish more details and be submitted not later than the 31st day of May, each year, and penalties for failure to make such returns shall be imposed; and that licenses must be obtained for maintaining lobster pounds, with an annual fee for the same.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I rise to a question of privilege which is of concern to myself as a member of this House, but which is also, I believe, of concern to the House as a whole.

For over eight years I have had the honour of being chairman of the Committee on Private Bills. On the 23rd February instant, my action as chairman of that committee was made the occasion of some unfair, misleading and uncalled for criticisms. Reference was made to the stand taken by me at a meeting of the said committee, on April 22, 1909, and remarks purporting to have been made by me were quoted and put in print. I wish to contradict these statements, and am anxious to apprise the House of their utter lack of foundation.

The statements to which I take exception were made in a manner which I might term incongruous and unworthy of the position occupied by the person who uttered them. I refer to Senator Kirchhoffer, chairman of the Divorce Committee of the Senate, who has thought fit to make the following public statement:

> The Divorce Committee of the Senate has been often accused by a member of the House of Commons, named Ethier, who is, or used to be the chairman of the Private Bills Committee in that House, of granting divorces on evidence——

If I wished to give him a Roland for his Oliver, I might refer to the honourable senator as 'the man named Kirchhoffer,' but I prefer acting in a more courteous and proper way. Then he continues:

> —on evidence you would not hang a cat upon. I think that is the favourite expression used . . . Of course, the reporter is anxious to announce that Mr. Ethier, in the Commons, and the Hon. Mr. Cloran, in the Senate, make the above remarks—I mean those original remarks about the hanging of a cat on the evidence; but you are entirely mistaken, because you will find thousands of people believe anything they see in the paper, no matter how thick the head or slimy the tongue that gives utterance to it.

There can be no mistake as to whom he is aiming at, for a little further on, he says:

> I shall allude to him as the member for Two Mountains.

And again:

> Mr. Ethier made use of the very remark which he quoted. I have no doubt he originated it. I think he is deserving of a great deal of censure.

I humbly submit, Mr. Speaker, that this statement, as I have already stated, is false, uncalled for and without foundation. I never uttered such words neither in 1909 or any other time, and I may quote, for the information of the honourable senator, who may judge for himself, the report which the organ of his own party, the Ottawa 'Citizen,' published of what I said in reference to those relief Bills which are sent down to the Committee on Private Bills after going through the Senate. That paper published the following on April 23rd, 1909:

> The matter in which the Senate has been granting divorces this session caused some very pointed remarks by Chairman Ethier in the Private Bills Committee of Commons yesterday morning. The Bill called was that divorcing Mildred G. Wendolyn Patterson, now of Toronto, from Charles Colebrooke Patterson, of Ottawa. 'We have 21 of these relief Bills from the Senate this session, said Mr. Ethier ; 'I think the situation is most serious, most unusual. For six years I have presided over this committee and for thirteen years been a member of it, and while we are accustomed to have half a dozen each session, the limit is reached this time. I think it amounts to an abuse. I do not want to criticise the action of the Senate, but I cannot escape from the idea that this is going too far. In the different provinces we have laws regarding separation and even in them the judges are very careful. In these cases we have asked to authorize absolute divorce. Those of us who are fathers of families, should think of the great social evil that is involved and not do in this country as they do in the States. The committee should assert its right to see if the proof given in the Senate is proper. I have looked over the evidence in several cases and do not hesitate to say that it does not justify the report save as to separation. The Senate is granting divorces in cases where a court would not give separation. If you prove a man is a drunkard or a gambler, it is not sufficient to justify divorce. I am not speaking as a Catholic, but on the general principles involved in these cases.'

As will be observed, that was far from asserting that the Senate granted relief on evidence insufficient to hang a cat upon.

Let the hon. senator read the article and he will be satisfied, through the testimony of his own organ, that the charge he made against me with the object of inducing the Senate to censure me, is false and that his statements regarding me on that occasion were without foundation; that he showed undue haste and spoke before securing the requisite information. The 'Citizen's' report, which I have just quoted, is a truthful account of what I said on April 22nd, 1909.

In yesterday's number of that same paper, I notice an account of what that hon. gentleman stated in his report to the House; it is as follows:

On moving the adoption of the committee report in the Robertson divorce case, Senator Kirchhoffer sketched the history of divorce in Canada. He said the committee has been criticised by Senator Cloran and Mr. Ethier, M.P., and it has been declared that divorces were granted on evidence insufficient to 'hang a cat.'

That is another erroneous statement emanating from the hon. senator. Instead of attempting to induce the Senate to censure a member of the House of Commons, who is unable to vindicate himself on the floor of the Senate, why does he not, if he thinks I should be censured, read the words uttered by the hon. leader of the opposition when a Bill was introduced for the relief of John Denison Smith, on May 10th, 1909, page 6070, volume 4, of 'Hansard?'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Chairman of the Committee on Private Bills, I believe, called attention in connection with one of these Bills, to a tendency towards acting on evidence of a more or less loose character in considering these Bills for divorce. I have already taken occasion of informing him privately that I entirely concur with the view he expressed.

So the hon. senator should in all fairness censure the leader of the opposition who held views similar to those given expression by me before the Committee on Private Bills. The hon. leader of the opposition goes on:

Every one who is familiar with the proceedings in courts with regard to such matters is aware that there are some precautions observed in court which do not seem to have received very much attention in the proceedings of the Senate.

At the same sitting of the House, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) stated in answer to the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean):

I have had some experience in connection with divorce courts in the province of New Brunswick and have read the reports of the Divorce Committee in the Senate. In the latter it seems to me divorces have been granted on evidence which would be laughed at in any ordinary court.

* * * * * * *

I have read the reports and have seen cases in which the question was never even asked as to whether there was any collusion between the parties, and divorces have been granted in cases which were the absolute result of collusion. That would be impossible in proceedings before an ordinary court such as we have in our province.

Here is another hon. member which that hon. senator should get the Senate to censure. I may mention another one.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member when rising to a question of privilege may refer only to what concerns himself and not to any matter in connection with other hon. members.

Mr. ETHIER (Translation). I was about to close, Mr. Speaker, but before resuming my seat I was anxious to quote the opinion of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller). However, I shall abide by your decision.

In conclusion, I submit to the House that no senator should be allowed to cast aspersions, in the way Senator Kirchhoffer has done, on a member of the House of Commons whose work is carried on in conjunction with that of the Senate, and I think the language he used should be condemned. I repudiate all he said. I repudiate the uncalled for statements which he made to the effect that I had censured the Senate; never have I done so, as he stated at the sitting of February 23rd instant.

QUEBEC BRIDGE.

On the orders of the day being called :

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) whether or not the contract for the construction of the Quebec bridge has been let and, if not, how soon is it expected that will be accomplished. I would like to ask whether there is any truth in the rumour that the chairman of the Quebec Bridge Commission has resigned, and, if so, what is the cause of his resignation?

Mr. GRAHAM. The contract for the Quebec bridge has not yet been let. The chief engineer has resigned. For a year or more he has intimated to me that he intended to resign not later than when the contract was let. He gave several reasons. He has been for the past three months, or for several weeks, at least, quite ill, and he has been pressing upon me more strongly than ever that he must resign. Finally, he, a few days ago, formally handed in his resignation. I regretted very much to accept his resignation. I had been endeavouring for months at different times to prevail upon him to remain on the board and take charge of the work until it was completed. I expect in a very short time to have the contract for the Quebec bridge superstructure signed. When that is done I will be pleased to bring down all the correspondence with reference to it as well as the correspondence concerning the resignation of the chief engineer.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY ARBITRATION.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to trouble the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) a little. On the 16th February, last, the minister answered a question which I had put with reference to the commission appointed to settle the differences between the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk railway, but I am sorry to say I did not get much information from that. I asked amongst other things, what were the matters in dispute. And then :

2. What were the points to be determined?
3. What have so far been settled and how?

Answer No. 2 reads in this way :

2. Questions arising under agreement of the 1st February, 1898, confirmed by statutes of 1899, chapter 5, and brought into force on September 26, 1899, in the matter of issue of bills of lading, routeing of freight, diversion of traffic, disputed accounts. The several matters were submitted for arbitration under the provisions of the said agreement, either at the initiation of the Crown or of the company and disposed of by the arbitrators, some in favour of the Crown and others adversely and were practically questions of interpretation of the provisions of said agreement as applying to matters from time to time arising in connection with the operation of the respective railways, subject to the agreement. Other questions submitted were not disposed of by the board of arbitrators, owing to the death of the then chairman, the late Judge Killam, and are now for the consideration of the board of arbitrators as at present constituted.

My question asking how they were settled, the minister states, is answered by No. 2. In answer to the fourth question he says that :

Amount paid by Intercolonial railway to date is $49,737.97.

That is not what I wanted to get at. I would like to get, if it is possible without too much trouble, just a statement of what were the questions in dispute, and as to how each one of these has been settled. I think there was some money question, or some question involving payments to one side or the other, according to the disposition made by the commissioners, and I would like to know how these have been settled, what amounts have been paid to us or what we have had to pay to them? We seem to have incurred a cost of $49,737.97. That is a pretty good sized item—what did we get for all that? Is it possible for the minister to have a full statement prepared which will show what I want to know without giving him too much trouble?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is a harder thing to do than the question would seem to indicate.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be.

Mr. GRAHAM. The agreement made, I think, in 1897, in the first place if I remember rightly—

Mr. FOSTER. 1898.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think there were supplementals afterwards. The main agreement was made—

Mr. FOSTER. 1st February, 1898.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think the main agreement was before that, and then there were two supplementary agreements. These dealt mostly with such questions as this : How much traffic should be handed over? There is a money consideration but it is difficult to tell just what it is because traffic is given under a certain decision that without the decision we would not have got. It is not a question altogether of dollars and cents as it is a question as to whether the Grand Trunk should hand to us certain traffic at certain places—St. Rosalie, Chaudière Junction and Montreal. There was some dispute as to the traffic to be handed over at one or the other of these points. According as the judgment was in favour of the government road or against it, it would mean traffic for us or not. I had my traffic manager here, and I asked him to get something more in detail for the hon. member for North Toronto. He seems unable to get it down to detail, and he says that it is just a general decision giving us the right to have traffic handed to us at certain points. It is very hard to bring it down to dollars and cents. I will make further inquiry and see whether I can possibly get it into more concrete shape because it is something more general in its nature than concrete.

Mr. FOSTER. I judge from that that the minister does not see any way by which he can satisfy my thirst for information.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will take 'Hansard' of what my hon. friend has said to-day, wire it to my traffic manager, and see whether I can get something more definite. Some of these things are open yet, and we cannot tell just what they will amount to.

CONFERENCE AT WASHINGTON—FISHERIES REGULATIONS.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) a question with reference to the conference at Washington about the fisheries, the old regulations, and the new regulations, the information in regard to which he will remember he laid on the table of the House at my request, and which was to have been printed. The House passed an order, and I would like to know if it has yet been printed. I thought that the papers would have been printed, and distributed to the members of the House, but all I have seen is this paper which I hold in my hand, and that is not much.

Mr. BRODEUR. The return should have been printed before to-day. We passed an order some weeks ago to the effect that all these papers should be printed. I took occasion to give a list to the clerk of the House including all the papers which we wanted to have printed, and I shall make inquiries and let my hon. friend know.

MANITOBA FISHERIES COMMISSION.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) when we may expect the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the question of the Manitoba fisheries?

Mr. BRODEUR. Professor Prince showed me the report a few days ago. It was to be sent west to be signed by the members of the commission, I suppose he has sent it, and we must expect it in a few days.

Mr. BRADBURY. Will it be laid on the table?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, as soon as it is printed.

FISHERIES PROTECTION SERVICE.

Mr. JAMESON. Mr. Speaker, I drew the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fsheries (Mr. Brodeur) yesterday to a report which stated that the cruiser 'Rainbow' had seized a vessel fishing within the three-mile limit, and I asked if he would be able to give us some information with regard to it. He was not able to do so then, and I would like to ask if he is able to state now whether this reported seizure has actually taken place, what is the nationality of the vessel and what action the department has taken?

Mr. BRODEUR. I intended to give my hon. friend the information, but yesterday when the question was put to me I was not in possession of the official information which I could convey to the House. The 'Rainbow' proceeding along Cape Scott found the 'Edric,' which I presume is an American vessel, because it comes from Seattle, within the three-mile limit.

Mr. HUGHES. Did she catch it?

Mr. BRODEUR. She caught it, yes.

Mr. HUGHES. Good.

Mr. BRODEUR. The commander was instructed to hand over the seized vessel to the inspector of fisheries in the New Westminster district. This has been done as is shown by the following telegram which reached the department yesterday afternoon:

> Have delivered fishing boat to proper authorities. Instructions are requested as to future programme of movements.

The 'Rainbow' has been ordered to continue her cruise and proceedings will immediately be taken under the law to deal with the ship which has been seized.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did the 'Rainbow' overtake the other vessel while the latter was at anchor?

Mr. BRODEUR. She was engaged in fishing operation.

MARKEY FISHING LEASE.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has what is called the Markey lease on the Nelson river, which runs out of Lake Winnipeg, been cancelled?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is in the hands of the Department of Justice.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How long has it been in charge of that department?

Mr. BRODEUR. I think proceedings are being taken before the courts to have the lease cancelled, and I suppose the case is contested.

Mr. CAMPBELL. At whose instance are proceedings being taken with regard to the cancellation of the lease?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. No proceedings have as yet been instituted in any court. The matter has been one of careful consideration, because it presents features of a very unusual character, and I have not only consulted with Mr. Shepley of Toronto as an advising counsel in the matter, but have put the whole case into his hands for consideration and advice as to the course which ought to be taken. About three months ago Mr. Shepley was suddenly seized with very serious illness, from which he has not yet recovered altogether, and which has made it entirely impossible for him to give any attention to business matters during that time and in consequence no further steps have been taken in regard to this matter. I have thought that if there was any prospect that within any reasonable time Mr. Shepley would be able to give his personal attention to the case it would be more in the public interest that it should remain in its present situation than that anything should be undertaken with regard to it without the advantage of his counsel in the matter.

NORTH ATLANTIC COLLIERIES BOARD.

Mr. MADDIN. Has the Minister of Labour received a protest on behalf of the employees of the North Atlantic Collieries Company in Cape Breton county in regard to the nominee of the company to a proposed board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Act. I gather from a newspaper report that such a protest was entered on the ground that Mr. C. O. McDonald, who was nominated by the company, is one of the directors of the company. I would like to know if such a protest has been received by the minister and what course he intends to pursue?

Mr. KING. Such a protest was received. I took immediate steps to ascertain whether the facts as represented were correct. I found they were and we asked the company under the circumstances to kindly nominate another man as I could not accept the recommendation they had made. They did not care to do so, so I named another man, the present Mayor of Sydney Mines.

VENTILATION OF THE CHAMBER.

Mr. HUGHES. I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the ventilation of this chamber. I notice that on some days the members on both sides are alert and bright, while on other days nearly everybody is yawning. To-day happens to be one of the yawning days. I think there must be something wrong with the atmosphere of this chamber. Does the minister keep the exhaust fans as well as the supply fans going at full speed all the time?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It might enlighten the House if the hon. gentleman stated where he spent last evening.

Mr. HUGHES. That is a very serious reflection on the minister himself, and in fact on almost every one on the front benches, because four out of the six of them were asleep before I spoke a short time ago. I happen to be one of those who were all right last night.

Mr. PUGSLEY. With these preliminary remarks, I will say to my hon. friend that the rule is, and I think it is strictly observed, to have all the fans going continuously for two and a half hours before the daily sittings of the House and during the sittings.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

House went into Committee of Ways and Means and adopted a resolution granting $180,000 out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1911.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 128) for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1911.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—DAMMING OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. HUGHES. Some time ago I noticed by press reports that the proposition now before the United States Congress to dam the St. Lawrence river had been defeated in the House of Representatives. I noticed subsequently that it had been reintroduced into the Senate and there are rumours to the effect that it is about to be forced through in the hurried work at the close of this session when everything is going through Congress very rapidly. Has the First Minister any information bearing on the matter and have any steps been taken by this government to induce the American Congress not to pass that legislation?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have received no information at all upon the subject. We have taken certain action with respect to this matter which will be brought down to the House as soon as the correspondence is completed.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not wish to have any state secrets from the First Minister, but there has been a feeling throughout the Dominion that this is a very important matter. The Prime Minister has never yet intimated whether there has been a protest by the Canadian government on behalf of the Canadian people concerning this matter. The public undoubtedly believe that this is violating the Ashburton Treaty. I am surprised that the Prime Minister will not give the public information as to whether a formal protest has ever been made. It is all well enough to let the matter drift through Congress, but if the First Minister will inform the public that he has entered a formal protest to Washington that this Bill is violating the Ashburton Treaty, then if Congress pass it they are doing it in direct opposition to the protest made by the Prime Minister of Canada on behalf of Canada. In every reply made by the Prime Minister there has been hesitation as to expressing that fact. I cannot see for the life of me why there should be any hesitation. It is quite plain in the Ashburton treaty——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot discuss the question on the orders of the day.

Mr. REID. I simply wish to ask whether the Prime Minister has definitely protested to the President of the United States through Ambassador Bryce, against that Bill going through in violation of the Ashburton Treaty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have nothing to add to the information which I have given already. We have made representations to Mr. Bryce to convey to the American government. We have no intention of withdrawing what we have done, the report has been prepared and will be laid on the table of the House at a very early date, perhaps on Monday.

Mr. HUGHES. There is an understanding in some minds that article 7 of the Ashburton Treaty has been overridden by the legislation in connection with the Waterways Commission. Is the government in a position to give us any information in that regard?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I want to draw the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that Congress will sit only for a few days longer, and one day next week is a holiday. The Prime Minister tells us that he will bring the papers down on Monday, perhaps. That does not mean that we are going to have them on Monday, and we have only a couple of days next week to consider the matter before Congress adjourns. There is no doubt that there never was a more important Bill brought before Congress in so far as the relations between Canada and the United States are concerned, and I cannot understand why the right hon. the Prime Minister should not tell us what instructions he really gave the British ambassador, Mr. Bryce. No doubt these instructions are in the report, and it is only a question of bringing down the report and laying it on the table. If we had the information that the right hon. gentleman had instructed Mr. Bryce to notify the President that the passage of such a measure would be a violation of the Ashburton Treaty, that would be quite satisfactory, but we certainly should have information on that point. This is not the first time that the United States have not lived up to their treaty obligations towards Canada, and we therefore have reason to doubt that they might possibly fail to carry out the reciprocity arrangements now before this House, according to its spirit, if that arrangement should be adopted. If instances were wanting to prove my assertion that the United States government have not always kept faith with Canada, I could easily supply them.

Let me give one or two to show that the United States government have not kept faith with this country, although we have always kept faith with them. Some years ago a treaty was made providing for a reciprocal use of the canals by the two countries. Canada has lived up to that treaty. For instance, a vessel can load at New York, go through the Erie canal and down through the Welland and thence to Ottawa, going through all our canals, and no one questions its right. But I have yet to learn that a Canadian vessel, laden in a Canadian port, has ever been allowed to go through to New York through the Erie canal. I challenge the right hon. the Prime Minister to point to one instance of a Canadian vessel laden in Canada being allowed to go through an American canal. I am informed by marine men that when a Canadian vessel gets to the dividing line, she must unload and transfer her cargo to an American bottom. The reason given by the American government for this breach of faith is that the American canals are owned by separate states. A Canadian vessel is not allowed to go from St. John's to New York through the Erie canal because that canal belongs to the state of New York. Thus by simply transferring their canals to the several states, the United States evade the provisions of a treaty made with Canada. Let me give another instance. According to treaty, no war vessels of either country are to be allowed on the Great Lakes. But what do we find? When the United States government applied for permission for war vessels to go through our canals, they told us that if we did not give that permission they would abrogate the treaty; and rather than have the treaty abrogated, our government allowed these vessels the use of our canals, although of course without guns. Let me cite still another instance. When the Canadian government said to the United States: You are violating treaty obligations by putting your war vessels on the lakes and thus giving you an advantage over us in case of war, the reply sent by Washington was this. They said: It is not we who are doing this, it is being done by the state of New York; these are training ships which we have given to the states of New York and Minnesota simply to be used for training purposes, and if you do not allow these vessels through your canals, each state will build its own training ships. Thus they fall back on state rights, which are equivalent to our provincial rights. In this way our American cousins evade their treaty obligations, and I could cite other instances. I might refer to the fisheries, but I am not going into any more detail. All I wish to point out is that while Canada has kept faith, the United States have not.

As respects the particular case which I have brought to the attention of the House, it is as plain as possible that a similar evasion is sought to be practised. The Ashburton Treaty shows exactly what was agreed to between the two countries. In that connection a question has been raised about the dam built at Sheik island. Well, I have seen the maps and plans, and that part where Sheik island dam was built is not in the international arrangement at all. In fact the Ashburton Treaty was made after that dam was built, and, therefore, does not apply to it. The very fact that the President of the United States would allow Congress to pass a Bill which is in direct violation of the treaty, would show bad faith on the part of the United States. We are now about to make an arrangement on this reciprocity question. I remember years ago when the United States put up barriers to prevent the carrying out of the arrangement then in force for letting our farm products go in free. By establishing United States consuls at the different points, to whom our people had to pay heavy consul fees, they managed to evade the agreement.

I cannot for one moment believe that when the Bill for the construction of this dam came before Congress, the right hon. the Prime Minister did not immediately wire Ambassador Bryce to notify the President of the United States that such a measure was a violation of the Ashburton Treaty. If the right hon. gentleman did that, he was doing his duty and his people would be satisfied. But if he did it, what objection has he to letting us know? He hesitates, however, and will not give a direct answer, and that causes me to suspect that there is something concealed, something behind, which he does not wish to divulge. We know that some of the strongest friends of the Prime Minister, some of his strongest supporters, are shoving this Bill through at Washington and here.

Mr. HUGHES. Any doubt about that?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Not the slightest, the Prime Minister knows it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Well, he knows that the chief solicitor of this company is Mr. Leighton McCarthy, who sat in parliament here at one time, who is one of the right hon. gentleman's supporters, and helped to keep him in office.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As a lawyer, he does it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). He is doing it as a lawyer, and he has got thousands and thousands out of it already. He is here doing his best to shove this through the House, and as he is doing it as a lawyer, no one can blame him for doing it in that way. I am not finding fault with him for performing that duty, because that is a part of his profession as a lawyer. I do not wish to reflect upon him. At the same time, there is no doubt that he is putting pressure upon the minister and his supporters to try to get this Bill through. So, I would like the Prime Minister to give us this information without hesitation. There is no reason why he should hesitate. Should this matter turn out in the way I hope it will not turn out, and should it be found that the Prime Minister has hesitated to defend Canada's rights, even to the extent of asking the President of the United States to see to it that that treaty is carried out, we on this side, and I believe many hon. members on the other side as well, will feel very sorry that that should be the position.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have only to repeat what I said. The government have made representations to Mr. Bryce to be conveyed to the American authorities. I have no hesitation in bringing down the papers. I said they would be brought down. In fact, I may inform the hon. gentleman that I hope to bring them down on Monday. The clerk of the Privy Council handed them to me, and I have them in my desk, but on looking through them I find that some later despatches are not among them. I hope to have these papers added, and to bring the whole down on Monday. And I hope that I shall not lose the goodly opinion of my hon. friend (Mr. Reid, Grenville) when he has had an opportunity to read the papers.

Mr. HUGHES. I have a word to say to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). He is one of the ministers who blushed—

Mr. FOSTER. What, what?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, I reaffirm it—blushed—when the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) was stating that certain gentlemen on this side of the boundary and supporters of the Prime Minister were interested in pushing this thing through. Some strange things develop sometimes—

Mr. GRAHAM. So we see.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know whether the evidence brought out before the committees at Washington might tend to throw light on this subject or not, but I think the First Minister might properly interest himself in studying some of the evidence which has been brought out before those committees on this very matter. It would prove very interesting reading to the public of Canada. There is a powerful organization behind this concern. Money has been spent, not in thousands or tens of thousands, but in hundreds of thousands—

Mr. REID (Grenville). Millions.

Mr. GRAHAM. Make it billions.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not say that all this has come to this side of the line, but a good deal of it has.

Mr. CARVELL. Who got it?

Mr. HUGHES. Read the evidence as far as it has gone. It will all be produced.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did you say 'Read' the evidence?

Mr. HUGHES. The point I wish to impress on the First Minister is that there is no use locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Before that Bill passes the American Congress is the time for this parliament to take action. The government has been notified that legislation has been going on there, promoted by a private company, to interfere with waterways of Canada, in which we have a vital interest. The excuse is made, as I understand it, that the Ashburton Treaty gives them the right to do this. And the instance is cited of the little dam between Sheik island and the Canadian shore. But who will pretend that this is on a par with a dam between Long Sault island or Barnhart island and the American shore? The Ashburton Treaty distinctly states that the channels on each side of Long Sault island and on each side of Barnhart island are inviolable, but it never mentions, directly or indirectly, the little channel between Sheik island and the Canadian shore. These important channels mentioned in the treaty are being interfered with by this proposition at Ottawa. The proposition is to dam the channel between Long Sault island and the American shore, to dam the channel between Barnhart island and Long Sault island, and then to dam the channel between Barnhart island and the Canadian shore. (Yes, as a friend near me suggests, it is a doubly damned institution.) Under this proposition 95 per cent—yes, 97 per cent, I am told—of the electric power will be on the American side. It is mere child's play for any minister of the Crown to tell us that if this legislation is passed at Washington and if these dams are made they will see to it that half the power is reserved for the Canadian side. If power is wanted there is any amount of power available where it will not interfere with navigation. Let them go down to the Coteau, the Cedars, or the Cascades. If they want power, and if you want to make a deal with them let them take the power where there is no navigation, but let them not interfere with the Long Sault channel. I saw by the press the other day that it was reported that already the ice at Cornwall has raised the waters to the extent of 14 feet. If this proposed dam were built the ice floating down from the rapids above would accumulate, and there is no saying what harm might be done. We know what these ice jams and bursts have caused in other parts of the world, and there is no reason to doubt that the disaster caused at this point might be tremendous. But aside from that, there is the interference with the navigation of the river. This is an international channel, and should be preserved as it is. I am surprised that any minister of the Crown of the Dominion of Canada, any responsible person under the British flag, can be found dickering, or even for an instant considering, the question of closing that waterway. This is an important matter, and I would suggest to the Prime Minister—I suppose it would come within his department—to take the matter up, and not only protest against this action going further, but also get copies of the evidence before the committee in Washington and look into the matter. My faith in him is such that I believe that if he had that evidence before him now he would put his foot down and settle the question. Now is the time to stop it. In the United States such Bills as this are slipped through sometimes, just as they are here, without much attention being paid to them. However, so far as we are concerned, we are on our guard. We have had the warning of a certain Bill which was passed through this House. But we are on our guard, and I think that, for the next few years at all events, until suspicion is lulled, there will be pretty close watch kept on the legislation affecting matters along the border. Knowing the danger, it is certainly the duty of this government to protest and to protest in most emphatic language, against the reintroduction of this Bill before the Congress at Washington.

Mr. GRAHAM. I presume that when the correspondence is brought down my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) will see that even his visit to Washington was not necessary to protect the rights of Canada. He let slip one word very significant to me, that there were other water-powers available in that vicinity. I know there are, and we in eastern Ontario hope to get power from some source even if the Sault is never developed. So far as his reference to me is concerned, I am not alarmed about that. But I rose mainly to say a word in answer to my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid). I think that he is in error as to the United States not giving us reciprocal treatment in the use of their canals. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley), I think it was, brought this matter up, discussing correspondence he had had with the State Department, if I remember correctly. At his suggestion, I wrote to the head of the canal department of the state of New York. Speaking from memory, that authority assured me that the canals were free and open to the vessels of Canada, if they desired to use them, as much as to their own vessels, and that the authorities never charged any canal dues on Canadian vessels. I want to make that statement, because I believe it is fair to the United States and to the state of New York.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Do I understand now, that a Canadian vessel can load at a Canadian port and go directly to New York with a cargo of freight? I suppose these little fishing yachts are allowed to go through, I do not refer to them. Am I right in understanding now that there is no doubt that a vessel can load at Ottawa, for instance, go through the Welland canal, on down through the Erie canal to New York, without breaking cargo, so long as the cargo is consigned from Ottawa direct to New York? I ask that question, because one of the largest marine men told me that their vessels were compelled to unload. If that is not the case, then I will inform this marine man, who told me, that he is entirely in error, and I will give the reply of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. GRAHAM. The information, as I remember it, which I received last year from the head of the canal department of the state of New York, is that Canadian vessels have the same free access to their canals as their own vessels.

Mr. HUGHES. They have under federal law, but not under state law.

ICE ON LAKE WINNIPEG.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), to a matter of very serious importance to the navigation of Lake Winnipeg. Last year, owing to an early frost, all the vessels, except one, were frozen in on Lake Winnipeg. This was a very serious matter, and has entailed great loss to owners of steamboats, and endangered the lives of a great many men employed on these boats. The remedy would be for the government to have a boat sufficiently strong at Selkirk, or at the mouth of the river, to keep the river open. I have a resolution here from the Board of Trade at Selkirk, which I wish to place on record. I understand it has already been placed in the hands of the Minister of Public Works:

Whereas all vessels of draught operating upon the waters of Lake Winnipeg require to and do frequently enter the mouth and travel upon the waters of the Red river in order to reach the town of Selkirk, which is the chief harbour and port of entry for Lake Winnipeg, and where all the vessels of the lake have their winter berth and repair station; and

Whereas, owing to the geographical configuration of this portion of the American continent, the Red river of the north will always continue to be the navigable highway and avenue of approach to and exit from Lake Winnipeg for vessels of draught; and

Whereas the navigation of Lake Winnipeg, and the shipping industry of the lake are vast enterprises, having invested therein great sums of money and giving employment to many hundreds of people; and that this industry, and its relative importance to Canada is undoubtedly to greatly increase in the future; and

Whereas the government of the Dominion of Canada has in its wisdom recognized the importance of the navigation of trade and commerce on this lake and its connecting river, and through its Department of Public Works has appropriated and expended great sums of money, and has employed pronounced engineering skill upon the task of maintaining, improving and extending and rendering less hazardous the navigation of this body of water, and does now maintain at Selkirk an important depot of the Department of Public Works for such purpose; and

Whereas all vessels engaged in the fishing industry or in providing for the wants and necessities of those engaged in that industry are compelled, by the very nature of their calling, to ply the lake as late as possible in the fall; this necessity applying especially to the men and vessel or vessels engaged in the collection of spawn for the charging of the fish hatcheries maintained by the government for the perpetuity of the species; and

Whereas the Red river freezes and bocomes closed to navigation some time before the waters of the lake freezes and becomes closed, and that by this circumstance the vessels plying upon the lake are, some years, and especially this year, prevented by ice from entering the Red river, and are compelled to make shift as best they can for the winter upon the open lake, thereby causing great delay, inconvenience and hazard and direct loss; and

Whereas the situation at present upon the lake is that vessels of steam draught, including the government tug, 'Lady of the Lake,' and including all the steam vessels engaged in the regular traffic of Lake Winnipeg are in the lake and will be compelled to so remain until summer, and that the leading vessel of the lake fleet, the ss. 'Wolverine,' and others, are, and their officers, men, passengers and cargo, at large and its whereabouts unknown at the present moment.

This resolution, I may state, was drawn up before they found out where the 'Wolverine' was:

And whereas this situation is bound to result in great pecuniary loss, and delay, and injury, and possible tragedy to life; and

Whereas a greater portion of this uncertainty and loss and delay and inconvenience and hazard could have been entirely obviated by the presence and action of a vessel suitable for breaking a limited coat of ice and of keeping the Red river and its harbour open for navigation for only a few days; then

Be it hereby resolved that this board extend their thanks and acknowledgment of obligation to the government for the service it has and is rendering to the improvement of navigation in Lake Winnipeg and on the Red river; and that they humbly and earnestly petition the government, in view of the circumstances recited, and other circumstances that may not be recited, but may come, through investigation and inquiry, to its ears; to provide at Selkirk a vessel properly constructed to break the accumulation of early ice that is apt to impede navigation of the Red river, and to keep same plying in said river so long as possible and practicable in the fall and as early as practicable in the spring.

That this board point to and reiterate the prayer in the same matter made November 13, 1905, a copy of which resolution at that time being duly forwarded to the honourable the Minister of Public Works.

And thus your petitioners shall ever pray.

Passed November 15, 1910.

This is signed by the secretary of the Board of Trade. I have also in my hands a letter written to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, by the secretary of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg. It is inclosed in a letter written to myself, which I will just read:

I inclose to you herewith a copy of a letter addressed to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (a copy of which has been sent to the hon. the Minister of Public Works) relating to the necessity of having some provision made for a vessel, preferably one belonging to the Dominion government, that is fitted up with steel sheeting or otherwise, to break ordinary ice forming in the late fall on the lower Red river.

This board will be pleased to have you take an interest in this matter and discuss the same with the two ministers.

I am also sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Alexander Haggart, M.P., with whom you might kindly confer.

Here is the letter I referred to addressed to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

Mr. BRADBURY.

Winnipeg, January 20, 1911.

The Honourable
The Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—I am instructed by this board to urge that the application of the Selkirk Board of Trade in re provision for the breaking of ice on the lower Red river in the fall season be approved and carried out by your department.

This board strongly urges that some vessel, preferably one owned and operated by a Dominion government department, be suitably reinforced and steel sheeted where necessary, for breaking a reasonable thickness of ice in order to protect the shipping interests of the Red river and Lake Winnipeg when occasion may require; last autumn serious loss was caused to the shipping interests by the early and unexpected freezing up of the river, which prevented vessels out on the lake from reaching their winter quarters at Selkirk.

This board is fully aware of the valuable service rendered to shipping at Fort William and Port Arthur by the tug 'Whelan,' which while used in the ordinary course of business throughout the summer, by its construction and bow protection is enabled to break in ordinary ice in the spring and fall; and there can be no doubt but that the services of this tug, which it is understood is secured by your department, has rendered invaluable aid to shipping, indeed with consequences very far reaching not only to shipping but to grain dealers and the farming community, as well as the general trade of the western country.

Last fall when the Red river froze a number of vessels were still on the lake, and when they came to the mouth of the river they found the channel closed. Anybody who knows anything about the mouth of the Red river will realize the importance of having the channel open. The mouth of the Red river is about 25 miles across, there are different channels and when the mouths of these channels are frozen it is a very hazardous position for vessels to be placed in when they reach the river. It is not impossible, but it is a very great risk, for a vessel to attempt to retrace its course and get back into the open water after it has once entered the channel. There is a channel which has been dredged by the government for many years running for a distance of two miles, and once a vessel enters that channel it is almost impossible to turn and get back again into the open water. The consequence is that last year nearly all of the craft that attempted to navigate that channel had very great difficulty in getting back to deep water. The steamer 'Mikado,' a large boat, the property of one of the big fishing firms on the lake and having something like sixty or seventy men on board, was met by a fierce storm at Swamp island, after failing to get into the river, and in attempting to make the harbour was blown on the rocks. The vessel sank in water not sufficiently deep to cover it, but sufficiently deep to entail a serious loss of supplies and to the boat itself. The same fate befel the 'Wolverine' in attempting to make harbour. That vessel was also sunk. She was one of the biggest boats on the lake, the boat that His Excellency used when crossing the lake to make that famous trip of his to Hudson bay. I want to impress upon the minister the importance of taking the matter up and providing what the board of trade asks, which is a very reasonable request—a boat so equipped that she can break this ice. I do not think there is any doubt that the tug which is operating in connection with the dredging at the mouth of the Red river —if it is a proper tug, although I do not know what condition it is in—could be sheeted with steel and strengthened in the bow this winter so as to fit her to do that work. This would entail a very small expense. I understand that the government have in contemplation the building of a new boat. If that is so I would strongly urge upon the minister to arrange that this boat shall be constructed so as to be capable of keeping the Red river open at a reasonable expense. I do not ask the government to provide a regular ice-breaker to break ice eight or ten inches thick; all I ask is a boat to break four or five inches of ice. Our present boats cannot go through three or four inches of ice without having their planking torn and the boat likely sunk.

In connection with this matter I would like to urge upon the minister also to provide better harbours nearer the mouth of the river than we have at the present time. I drew the attention of the minister last year to the question of extending Gimli dock about 100 feet. This would entail the expenditure of $8,000 or $10,000 at the outside, a sum sufficient to provide for the extension of the harbour and do all the dredging that would be necessary to make a first-class harbour at that point should be provided this session. This is a very important harbour and occupies a very important position on Lake Winnipeg.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The question of building wharfs on Lake Winnipeg has been referred to the Committee of Supply. I should think that my hon. friend would be out of order in discussing this matter now.

Mr. BRADBURY. Well, I was just referring to this in connection with the other matter. Of course, if I am out of order——

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend will have ample opportunity when we come to those items.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to urge the minister——

Mr. PUGSLEY. I presume he will have an opportunity again in Supply.

Mr. BRADBURY. I presume I will if I am in the House, but I would like to urge upon the minister the necessity of making provision for these urgent improvements, and if he is not in a position to make a definite statement to the House to-day I trust he will do so when the time comes to discuss the estimates. I thought I had his pledge last year, but it was not carried out.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some time ago the petition of which my hon. friend has read a copy, was sent to me from the Board of Trade of Selkirk, and I also received a request from the secretary of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg urging that an ice-breaker should be provided for the purpose of breaking the ice at the mouth of the Red river and also at Lake Winnipeg. As the matter of employing tugs for ice-breaking purposes in other sections of Canada had been attended to by the Department of Marine and Fisheries and not by the Department of Public Works I referred the petition to my colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) and advised the Selkirk Board of Trade and also the secretary of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg that the matter was one which did not appertain, in my opinion, to my department but appertained to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The tug 'Whelan,' which is employed for breaking the ice in the harbour of Port Arthur and Fort William and perhaps at other points on Lake Superior, is employed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries and not by the Department of Public Works, and so it is with regard to ice-breaking upon the St Lawrence. The matter rests entirely with the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I have referred the matter to my colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; he is not in his place at the present moment, but I have no doubt the question will receive his very careful consideration. I shall take occasion to call his attention to the remarks which my hon. friend has made and which will appear in 'Hansard' where he will have an opportunity of seeing them. I think that on his behalf I can say to my hon. friend that the matter will receive very careful consideration. We all recognize the great importance of the Red river between the city of Winnipeg and its mouth and also the great importance of Lake Winnipeg and also the importance of doing what we reasonably can to assist the navigation of the lake and the Red river and of making navigation as safe as possible. Therefore, I am sure my hon. friend can rely upon the request of the Selkirk people receiving very careful consideration.

Mr. BRADBURY. I notice the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) in his place now. I was just drawing the attention of the House to the matter of providing a boat for keeping the Red river open. I understand that the chief engineer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries was sent up to investigate and the word that I got from Selkirk was that he stated that it was a matter for the Public Works Department. That is why I referred my remarks to the Minister of Public Works to-day. There is a very urgent request and resolution and I would like to know if the minister can give me any encouragement that that boat will be provided for that important work.

Mr. BRODEUR. No report has yet been made to me with regard to this ice breaker When the question was brought to my attention some time ago I gave immediate instructions to have a report made. That report has not yet reached me. As soon as I get it I shall communicate it to my hon. friend.

WESTERN ONTARIO DAIRYMEN AND RECIPROCITY.

Mr. LALOR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a letter which I received yesterday, and which reads:

Cambro, Ont., Feb. 21, 1911.

Mr. F. R. Lalor, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Lalor,—When I wrote you yesterday I had not read the report of the debate—

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman can refer to that now because we are going into Supply, while the subject to which the letter refers has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I think it would be irregular now to read the letter.

Mr. LALOR. It is a correction about a statement made in the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. As a correction of a statement I presume it would be admissible.

Mr. LALOR. The letter reads:

When I wrote you yesterday I had not read the report of the debate in the House regarding reciprocity, and I notice on page 3826 that the hon. Mr. Paterson replying to Mr. Armstrong states 'that the Dairy Association of Eastern and Western Ontario unanimously desired that this treaty should go into affect.'

This statement is absolutely incorrect in so far as the Dairymens' Association of Western Ontario is concerned. I am a director of that association and have been for over twenty years. I was present in Stratford when this question was introduced. The facts are as follows: After the convention was opened a couple of farmers came to myself and one or two others, asking that we put this question on our programme to be discussed during the convention, before deciding in regard to the advisability of doing so. We consulted every director and officer of the association and we unanimously agreed not to permit the question to go on the programme of the convention for discussion. As there was not one man on the board who believed the measure would be in the best interest of the dairy industry of this province, we told these men that if they wished to discuss this question they would have to do so altogether independent of the association. They then asked permission to bring this question up at the close of the afternoon session of the first day of the convention, this was granted and after the session of the convention was closed, a gentleman on the floor of the convention hall moved and another seconded his resolution, that Mr. Scott our president act as chairman while those present would discuss the question of reciprocity. Mr. Scott was accordingly elected chairman of the meeting, when these two men, Mr. Behn of Oxford county and Mr. Rice of Norfolk county, introduced a resolution that they believed it would be in the best interests of the dairy industry of this country, to have reciprocity between the United States and Canada. In the discussion of this question there was not one word spoken by any officer of the Dairymens' Association of Western Ontario in favour of it, and there was not one who voted for the resolution, in fact there was less than twenty in the entire audience who voted for the resolution.

I thought I would give you these facts, so that if the opportunity presented itself you could put the Minister of Customs right in regard to the attitude of the Dairymens' Association of Western Ontario.

Sincerely yours,
J. N. PAGET.

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE AT HAWKESBURY.

Mr. PERLEY. On the 7th of December last, I asked a question with regard to the proposed highway bridge between Hawkesbury, Ontario, and Grenville, Quebec. In reply the minister said:

With reference to the bridge across the Ottawa river at Hawkesbury, Ont., the delay in this matter has been on account of the approach to the bridge on the Ontario side.

He went on to say that this was the natural place for the crossing to be made and afterwards said:

Although I do not think there is anything in writing, it has been understood all along, or at least expected, that the town of Hawkesbury would arrange with the Hawkesbury Lumber Company for a right of way through their property giving an approcah to the bridge and, I may say, it is the custom for municipalities to do this.

The minister explained there was some trouble between the town of Hawkesbury and the Hawkesbury Lumber Company in regard to their assessment, and that was probably the reason why nothing had been done. There is a special and peculiar need for a bridge across the Ottawa at this particular point. There is no highway bridge across the Ottawa river below the city of Ottawa and the consequence is that the people up and down the Ottawa river on both sides would use this bridge if it were built. In the summer they get along very well with ferries, and in the middle of winter by using the ice, but between seasons, in the fall and spring, there is always a longer or shorter period when it is impossible for any one to cross the Ottawa with safety. The consequence is that there have been a great many accidents in the fall and spring and people have lost their lives in attempting to cross the river. This matter was all laid before the minister I think twice and all these reasons given, and the minister stated he believed it was in the public iinterest that this bridge should be built. I submit that the reason given by the minister in this answer for not going on with the building of the bridge is a poor one. He states that it is the custom for the municipalities to arrange for the right of way for such bridges.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, for the highway to the bridge, the approach to the bridge.

Mr. PERLEY. For the right of way to the bridge.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is to connect with the main highway.

Mr. PERLEY. For the right of way to the bridge. I doubt very much whether there is any such custom, and I do not think the minister can show that there is in cases of this kind. If it is in the public interest that the bridge should be built the authorities who are to build the bridge must surely provide the approaches to the bridge as well as the bridge itself. I am surprised at the minister giving a reason of that kind, when I remember what he has stated in this House several times with reference to the public buildings which he is putting up in this country. Not long ago when a public building was being discussed the minister stated with great emphasis that he would never think of asking a municipality to provide a site for the building, and surely there is more reason why the government should provide the approaches to a bridge which is evidently in the public interest.

Mr. SPROULE. Why not build one like the Disraeli bridge?

Mr. PERLEY. I leave that to the minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is hardly courageous to do that. Why does not the hon. gentleman reply to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule)?

Mr. PERLEY. The minister is well able to take care of himself, and the kind of bridge provided at Disraeli did not throw any credit on the minister's department.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for East Grey is trying to throw ridicule on this bridge and the member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) should resent that.

Mr. PERLEY. Not at all, the hon. member for East Grey is bringing to the attention of the minister the fact that he built a bridge for a municipality and called it a wharf, he showed himself willing to do that in Disraeli even although it did not come within his proper scope.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The minister did not happen to do that.

Mr. PERLEY. If the land belonging to the Hawkesbury Lumber Company should be expropriated for this bridge, it seems to me the minister should go on and take the necessary proceedings to expropriate. If, on the contrary, it is considered best that the bridge should be put somewhere else under the circumstances, to serve the people of these two counties, I have a map of that section of the river and there are other places where a bridge could be built. I think something should be done about that. The bridge is a great necessity, it is not a matter of politics at all, it has been taken up by all sections of the people, and has been agreed to by the minister. I want to urge on the minister to take steps to get this bridge built as soon as possible and I will ask him if he will not do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is quite true that this bridge has been decided upon. It is to be built at the joint expense of the governments of Quebec, Ontario and the Dominion, the Dominion contributing the lion's share. When this matter was urged upon me, as it was very strongly, by the hon. gentleman who represents the constituency on the Quebec side with the hon. member for the county of Prescott, I was led to understand that the municipality would be likely to provide the highway, giving the approach to the bridge. I rather inferred also that the Hawkesbury Lumber company were likely to give a right of way through their property, either free or at a low cost, Since that time, some difficulty has arisen between the Hawkesbury Lumber company and the town of Hawkesbury. I believe the assessment of the company's property has been considerably raised, and they have not towards the town council, the same good feeling which they had when this bridge was originally proposed. My own view is, that it is not at all unreasonable, when the three governments are undertaking, at a large expense, to build a bridge for the accommodation of the people of the locality that the municipality should provide a highway that would give the approach to the bridge from the main highway. That has been done in other cases. However, I am not without hope that the previously friendly relations between the company and the town may be restored, and that the arrangement, as originally proposed, may be carried out. If in the coming spring that appears unlikely to take place, then it will be my duty to consider the question of obtaining another location for the bridge. I hesitate about expropriating a right of way through the company's property without its consent. This might involve the Crown in an expense away beyond what we had anticipated the bridge would cost us. I intend to take the matter up in the spring or early summer, in the hope that a satisfactory arrangement may be arrived at.

Mr. PERLEY. I may say that I was at two meetings, and I never noticed that there was any arrangement, express or implied, by which the Hawkesbury Lumber company would give a free right of way or a right of way at a low cost. Is the minister quite sure that there was such an understanding ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perhaps the hon. member for Prescott, who is familiar with the details of the matter, can give some information with regard to it.

Mr. PROULX. I understand that the Hawkesbury Lumber company have never promised a right of way, but we had hoped that the town council would arrange with the company to get a right of way. Last year the town had a lawsuit with the company about the assessment, and the company were not disposed to grant the right of way. They told the Hawkesbury Bridge Committee that if they wanted the right of way, they would have to expropriate. I think it is still their intention that the government or the town will have to expropriate the right of way.

Mr. PERLEY. Then the Hawkesbury Lumber company's refusal to grant the right of way had nothing to do with the dispute between them and the town regarding taxes ?

Mr. PROULX. No. The assessment of the company was increased before there was a request made to it by the town.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BRADBURY. I notice in the Ottawa 'Free Press,' of this date, the following reference to myself:

> In the House of Commons yesterday, Dr. Clark secured from Mr. Bradbury, the Conservative member for Selkirk, an admission that he was opposed to reciprocity and a declaration that the men who had organized the grain growers' deputation in December last were members of a 'political machine.'

I want to say that this is a misconstruction of what I said. What I did say was, that the Grain Growers' organization was the political end of the grain growers' of Manitoba. The article goes on to say:

> Now, human memory is often erratic, but it comes to our mind that when the great grain growers' delegation was nearing Ottawa to demand reciprocity, a deputation of western Conservative M.P.'s went 'up the line' to meet them, and to extend the hand of co-operation against 'the tariff tyranny of the Liberal government's tariff. There were eight of them and they may have included George Bradbury. They certainly included the other leaders of Conservative opinion west of the lakes, and as there are only a dozen of them all told, it is a fair presumption that George Bradbury was one of the contingent. He was certainly active enough when the delegates were down here in endeavouring to impress upon them the opinion that he was heart and soul in sympathy with their demands.

Now, I just want to say that when the delegation were here, their demand was not for reciprocity, but for a reduction of duties, and I was in hearty sympathy with that demand.

> What has happened since to change his views? Has the word come from the twin bosses of Manitoba, Rogers and Roblin, that the grain growers are to be thrown to the wolves and are to be represented as a body of disloyal annexationists?

I want to say just a word regarding my attitude when the delegation was here. I was in hearty sympathy with the demand of the Grain Growers' Association when they were asking this government for a reduction of the duty on farm implements, which is something that every man from Manitoba on this side of the House supports. The question of reciprocity is another question. I did not say that I was opposed to reciprocity. I stated that I was opposed to reciprocity, as proposed by the present government. I am absolutely opposed to it, and I want my constituents to know it. I want my constituents to know it, for I am not going behind doors. My opposition is open and above board.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What kind of reciprocity?

Mr. BRADBURY. I will tell you when the time comes. What I want to do is to set the 'Free Press' right, which I am sure has no intention of misrepresenting me or putting a false construction on my attitude. There is no man from the west, Manitoba or the territories, who has stood out more firmly for the rights of the farmers than I have. When a resolution was before the Chair asking for what the farmers require more than reciprocity, namely, government-owned and operated terminal elevators, the Conservative members were found standing by my hon friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) and endeavouring to induce the government to adopt the resolution moved by him. They have also been found standing by the farmers in other matters, which are more important to the agriculturists of Manitoba and the west than this question of reciprocity as proposed by this government. I have no hesitation in saying that this proposition of the government is simply a gold brick offered the farmers of the northwest, and it will not be my fault if they do not find it out before it is too late.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Conciliation and labour, including publication, printing, binding and distribution of the 'Labour Gazette,' and allowance to correspondents, $27,300.

Mr. GOODEVE. I would ask the Minister of Labour if he has had any communication asking for certain amendments to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act of 1907?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (Minister of Labour). I received yesterday from one of the hon. members of this House a communication transmitting some proposed amendment. That is the only one I have received this session to that effect.

Mr. GOODEVE. I have received a communication from the Moyie Miners' Union No. 71 with regard to clause 56 of the Act. They suggest that this clause should be amended to read as follows:

Provided, that it shall be unlawful for any employer, incorporated company or corporation to close down their industries and then resume operations under changed conditions of employment, without first giving prominent notice in the local newspaper at least thirty days prior to the resumption of operations.

The object of this is to prevent an evasion of the Act. Under clause 56 it is unlawful to have a lockout, but the same thing has been brought about in another way. An employer may, for instance, close down his works, without giving any particular reason or possibly for some reason entirely outside the matter in dispute, and then, when it suits him, reopen it under changed conditions. Has the attention of the minister been called to that particular weakness in the Act?

Mr. KING. The same proposition came in the communication I received from the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell). I shall certainly consider it very carefully. My impression at the moment is that if action of that kind were taken the company would be liable, under the Act as it stands. If my contention be right there is no need to amend the Act, but that is a matter on which I should like to have the opinion of the Justice Department.

Mr. GOODEVE. I agree that the object of the Act is to prevent any such violation, but evidently the labour organizations have not found it altogether effective. Possibly the minister, after considering the wording of the Act, may deem it necessary to amend it in the way suggested. I am very glad that he is taking the question up with the Justice Department, and trust that if he finds what is pointed out is really the case he will make the necessary amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. How many copies of the 'Labour Gazette' are printed, and to whom are they sent? How many correspondents are there, and how are they paid? Where is the 'Labour Gazette' printed and bound and what does the printing and binding cost?

Mr. KING. In the vicinity of 16,000 copies are published every month. There is a paid subscription list of nearly 10,000. A distribution is made to members of both Houses, copies are sent out occasionally for the purpose of getting other subscriptions, free copies are also sent to departments of government in other countries and to newspapers in exchange for their publications; also to the public libraries educational institutions, labour organizations and Boards of Trade.

Mr. DANIEL. Are they sent to every newspaper in the country?

Mr. KING. Yes. The number of correspondents is 52, and they are paid $100 each per year. They are occasionally called upon to make special reports. For example, the department may be collecting information as to prices and the cost of living. This is in the nature of additional work to their regular duties, and, in such cases, an extra allowance is made to these correspondents of $25 for the work done in that connection through the year. I do not recollect if there were any other questions—

Mr. DANIEL. What revenue does the government receive from those who subscribe to the 'Labour Gazette?'

Mr. KING. Last year, the revenue from this source was $1,547.

Mr. DANIEL. Is the subscription price $1 a year?

Mr. KING. No, 20 cents a year.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I understood there were 16,000 copies issued. The figures would indicate that about 10,000 copies were paid for, leaving 6,000 free.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I hardly think the explanation the minister has given would account for these 6,000 copies.

Mr. KING. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Schaffner) understands that there are copies kept in the department for purposes of binding and to meet future demands. There are also some 1,800 labour organizations in the country, and many newspapers. There is also a large exchange, list. I might say the 'Labour Gazette' is sent to the different statistical bureaus of European countries, and other countries throughout the world.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I suppose the minister could state the numbers used in these ways?

Mr. KING. I have the figures here. Last year the exchange list of departments of government, including federal, provincial and British and foreign governments numbered 509; trade papers and labour journals 167; public libraries and libraries of educational institutions 125; members of the House of Commons, 221; members of the Senate, 87; boards of trade, 276; newspapers, 1,075; labour organizations—Nova Scotia, 160; Prince Edward Island, 11; New Brunswick, 83, Quebec (copies sent both in English and in French) 610; Ontario, 770; Manitoba, 106; Saskatchewan, 14; Alberta, 131; British Columbia, 222; a total of labour organizations, 2,174. This is a larger number than I thought.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would like the minister to give the House some information as to the object of this 'Labour Gazette.' What is its purpose?

Mr. DANIEL. Before the minister goes on with that, I would like him to finish answering the questions I asked. I asked where the 'Labour Gazette' was printed, and whether the work was done by tender or not, how many copies were printed, and the cost of printing?

Mr. KING. That question, I am afraid I would have to refer to the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy). The department of labour makes its contract with the government Printing Bureau for the printing of the 'Labour Gazette.' Accounts are sent by the Printing Bureau to the Labour Department, and paid by the department. I understand that the 'Labour Gazette' is printed at the 'Free Press' printing office in this city, but that is by arrangement which the King's Printer has made in accordane with rules made at the Bureau.

The sitting of the committee was suspended.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the secretary of His Excellency the Governor General the following communication:

Ottawa, February 24, 1911.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the right hon. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber this afternoon at five o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and the House of Commons during the present session.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

C. J. JONES,

Assistant Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable,

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

A message was received from His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General by the gentleman usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of your honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate chamber.

The House having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that when this House did attend His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, His Honour was pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the Royal assent to the following Bill:

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1911.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Mr. KING. I have here the figures of the cost of printing the 'Labour Gazette' for the last fiscal year. The 'Labour Gazette' is printed in both English and French. The printing of the English edition cost $11,544.80, of the French edition $5,704.16. In addition to printing the 'Gazette,' at the end of each year the 'Gazette' is bound, and an index is prepared for the use of subscribers, and this costs $190.07. That cost includes the paper.

Mr. DANIEL. So the cost per volume of these twelve copies for the year is $1.20 for printing, and as the minister gives it to subscribers for 20 cents a year, subscribers get off pretty cheap under those circumstances. Perhaps it is the intention that the 'Labour Gazette' should not be self-supporting?

Mr. KING. I may say that in some countries similar publications are distributed free of charge. The purpose in fixing any amount is not to bring in a revenue at all; it is simply to insure the fact that whoever asks for the 'Gazette' is likely to have some real desire for it.

Mr. DANIEL. Who makes terms with the 'Free Press,' or whatever concern prints it?

Mr. KING. I understand the King's Printer fixes the terms in accordance with a rule he adopts at the Government Printing Bureau. There is a rule governing all printing which is done outside, and the King's Printer follows this rule with regard to the 'Labour Gazette.'

Mr. HENDERSON. I must congratulate the Minister of Labour on his extreme liberality. I wish some other departments would take this leaf out of his book. I had occasion a few days ago to ask the Minister of Agriculture for a copy of the bulletin with respect to seeds in Canada, and I received from him a very courteous reply —I do not complain of it at all—telling me that I had had three copies before, and if I would send a dollar down to the King's Printer I could get another copy. I asked it for a friend, perhaps that was the reason why he suggested that I should pay a dollar for it. If I had not mentioned that probably he might have given it. But I wanted it for a student at the Guelph Agricultural College, who desired to make use of it in preparing for his examination. I put it that way to the Minister of Agriculture, thinking, perhaps, I would appeal to his generosity. But he appears to have no respect for students at agricultural colleges, at any rate he does not treat them in the same way that the Minister of Labour treats his friends. I merely make mention of this in the House to give it all the publicity I can, because I think it was a very small matter on the part of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Would the Minister of Labour please tell us some of the purposes that this 'Labour Gazette' is intended to subserve?

Mr. KING. The main purpose is to gather information in regard to the industrial and labour conditions of the Dominion, and in respect to all matters likely to be of concern to employers and employees. This information is gathered by means of correspondents, who send in monthly reports. These correspondents are located in different cities of the Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The trade journals and the press are carefully reviewed, and any items that appear to have a bearing upon labour conditions are carefully classified and compiled in the department. Statistics are also collected by special investigation, these are made up in the form of tabular statements. For example, each month the 'Labour Gazette' contains a review of the industrial and labour conditions of the particular industries, agriculture, mining, lumbering and the like. Then it takes up the conditions in different trades, and this information is prepared in accordance with general form, beginning at the Atlantic and running across the continent. Then there is information of a special nature; for example, industrial accidents, statistics gathered and classified, and at the end of the year a statement is made up showing the total number of these accidents and the causes in each case. A similar method is followed in regard to strikes and lockouts. Also, changes in rates of wages and changes in hours of labour, formation of employers labour organizations, so far as is possible to get them, are mentioned and classified and compiled, also, legal decisions affecting labour, &c. All data of this kind is so shaped at the outset that at the end of the year it may be possible to make statistical tables that will show the trend of industrial development for that year. Then, over a period of years the intention is to classify still further, in some cases in the form of charts, and these charts are printed in the annual report, or in special publications. I have in my hand the bound volume of the 'Labour Gazette' from July, 1909, to 1910. It is a volume of 1,500 pages with a carefully prepared index. To show the scope of the work, I might read some of the subjects in the index: Industrial accidents, adulteration of foods, arbitration, annuities, meetings of labour associations, building trades, accidents, changes in wages, hours of labour, &c. That is the nature of the information. The department has in mind, in gathering and compiling this information, to furnish the country with what would serve as a basis of an industrial history of the Dominion. There is no attempt to express opinions in the 'Gazette'; it is simply a compilation of data, which can be used by persons who desire it for reference.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I understand that the reports are sent in by agents all over the country, and these are edited in the department, and the department sends out what they see fit, and suppresses what they see fit. I think any one who reads the 'Labour Gazette' must come to the conclusion that one of the chief objects of its existence is to advertise the department.

Mr. KING. I would not like to take issue with my hon. friend except as regards one of his expressions, when he suggests that the department is 'suppressing' information. I may say that the practice has been followed in the department carefully to edit the reports sent in by correspondents, and to see that they do not contain grammatical errors, or items that it would not be proper to print. But in the department the original reports sent in are kept, and any members of the House who desire to see any of the reports sent in during the previous year can do so; they are all available to members for investigation. There is no intention to suppress any information.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Or to advertise the department?

Mr. KING. There is no intention to advertise the department. There is a desire to have the department's work known to the country. It would be of very little service to the community if the community knew nothing about it. To that extent, I suppose, the department follows the practice of any other organization.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to ask the minister what principle is followed in the selection of the places to be served by correspondents ?

Mr. KING. The department has tried to follow a general rule and confine the appointment of correspondents to localities that are either incorporated cities, or that have a population of 10,000 or more, and in some cases, where it has appeared that there are large industrial interests that could not be covered in that way, a district has been mapped out and a correspondent has been appointed for that particular district.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Would the minister say whether he has a correspondent at Prince Rupert, and if not, whether he thinks a correspondent there would give useful service.

Mr. KING. The department has no correspondent at the present time at Prince Rupert, but I think the suggestion that my hon. friend makes, if he intends it as a suggestion, is one worthy of careful consideration. Prince Rupert promises to be an important centre, and I think I might say to my hon. friend that if he cares to recommend the appointment of a correspondent there, I would be prepared to appoint one.

Mr. TAYLOR. (New Westminster). As Prince Rupert is in the district represented by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman), it might come with rather bad grace on my part to make any recommendation——

Mr. KING. I would be prepared to accept it.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster)—— but certainly it is a point where, I think, there should be a correspondent of the 'Labour Gazette,' because there are a great many problems connected with labour constantly demanding attention and, although an officer of the labour department went to Prince Rupert during last year and made a very interesting report on conditions there, I think it would be well to supplement that report with regular monthly reports from a correspondent, because at Prince Rupert conditions are in a formative state, and they are not so well regulated as they are in older communities. It seems to me that this is one point where the services of a correspondent ought to be more valuable than at general points.

Mr. CROSBY. I notice that the 'Labour Gazette' bears the union label.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. Is it printed in a union shop ?

Mr. KING. I cannot say offhand whether the shop that prints it is a union shop or not, as I have not inquired into the question.

Mr. CROSBY. What authority would you have to put the union label on, if it were not printed in a union shop ?

Mr. KING. I understand that the conditions that prevail at the bureau are conditions that the union regard as satisfactory, or as coming up the standard.

Mr. CROSBY. The Minister of Labour certainly understands what I mean by asking if this is a union shop. I want to know if every man who works in this shop, is a union man and whether this label is rightly put on the 'Gazette' or whether it is put on in some irregular way, to indicate that it comes from a union shop when, as a matter of fact, it may not.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the union label is controlled by the Allied Printing Trades, and they allow its use by shops that comply with the conditions. I presume the shop that prints the 'Labour Gazette' must comply with those conditions, or those who control the label would not have permitted it to be used by that shop.

Mr. CROSBY. Then they would have the consent of the Allied Printing Trades ?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. This item also refers to the conciliation of labour, and I would like to ask a few questions with reference to that. I think it has already been stated in connection with some of the strikes in Nova Scotia that the only difficulty about their settlement is, that the companys have decided that they will not hire men who happen to be members of a certain organization and that they will not employ them unless they belong to some other organization that they may designate. To make my meaning plain, I understand that the United Mine Workers' Association is the association which prevails in Springhill, Nova Scotia, and that a large number of men in the county of Cape Breton also belong to that organization. I understand that the management of the Springhill company have decided that they will not employ men who are members of the United Mine Workers' Association.

Mr. KING. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Crosby) is mistaken in that view of it. At least I have been informed by Mr. Butler, who is the present manager of the Springhill mines, that he has no objection to the men belonging to whatever organization they please. They may belong to the United Mine Workers' Association if they wish to do so, but he is not prepared to deal with them as union men. He allows them the privilege of belonging to the union if they wish to do so, but he refuses to enter into an agreement with the union as a union. That is the position as Mr. Butler stated it to me only a few weeks ago.

Mr. CROSBY. That being the case, has Mr. Butler, or Mr. Anybody Else, any right to dictate to the workingmen as to what organization they may belong to so long as the organization does not conflict with the interests of, or become a nuisance to, the employers of labour? Would they be acceptable to him if they belonged to the Provincial Workingmen's Association?

Mr. KING. As I understand it, Mr. Butler does not raise the question, in taking a man into his employ, whether he belongs to the Provincial Workingmen's Association or the United Mine Workers' Association. He stated that it was a matter of indifference to him whether the men were members of a Provincial Workingman's Association or of the United Mine Workers' Association; the contract he would make with them would be a contract irrespective of the organization to which they belonged. He would allow every workingman to join whatever organization he pleased, but he did not propose to confine his own liberty in the matter of taking men into employment to taking men belonging to any particular organization, and refusing to take men who might belong to another organization.

Mr. CROSBY. It is evident from the information I have received from the minister that the whole thing hinges on this small, miserable question of whether a man belongs to this organization or to another organization, and that Mr. Butler, at the head of the Springhill mines will not treat with some men because they belong to a workingman's association headed by some letters instead of an organization headed by some other letters. I appeal to the Minister of Labour to exercise some influence with these men. It must be remembered that the coal mined by the Springhill company is owned by the people of the province of Nova Scotia, and is worked by that company under lease for a certain time under certain conditions. It is true that these conditions are made by our local legislature, but it must be remembered that we have in the Dominion government a Department of Labour whose duty it is to deal with matters affecting the interests of labour. I was very pleased when that department was established and a special minister with full cabinet rank, placed at its head. The more you can do to improve the conditions of labour and of labouring men, the better it is for the country in which those men reside. It seems to me very petty for a company receiving a charter and a lease under which it mines this coal, to declare what is practically a lockout on the question of what labour union or organization the men shall belong to. Since the amalgamation of the Dominion Coal Company with the Springhill Company it is necessary for the men to combine together in such a way that they may be able to off set that great combination of capital. It has been said by Mr. Butler, the new manager, for whom I have a great respect, that he considers this question of whether the men do or do not belong to the United Mine Workers, a childish one. If it is childish why should this great financial combination say so and say to the men: Go to work. Then we will have the men at work instead of being locked out with a constant continuation of strife existing in one of the most prosperous districts of Nova Scotia. The late manager, Mr. Cowan, stated when the strike was brought on that the company was quite pleased to have it as they were not making money and were glad to have the mines closed, but that apparently was not altogether correct because the company concluded they must get the mine going and they commenced to get labour and carry on the work. I appeal to the minister to get this thing settled. I have personal knowledge that the only question in the way is this one of the men belonging to the United Mine Workers' Association, and it is a mere quibble to say that that is sufficient to justify the continuation of the strike. We have really had more trouble since the inauguration of the Labour Department than before. I am sorry to have to say that, but it is true and I do hope that the minister of Labour will make very strenuous efforts to bring about a settlement. There have been a number of boards of conciliation on this strike, but apparently it has not been possible to act on or enforce the report of any one of these boards. If that is the case, then the boards were simply a means of spending money. The men would have as much right to object to the amalgamation of the two coal companies as the coal companies have to say to what labour organization the men should belong.

Mr. McCRANEY. Would it not be perfectly proper for the employee to say that because these two companies have amalgamated he would not work for either of them.

Mr. CROSBY. The workingmen are not saying that. My statement is that the coal being mined by these companies belongs to the province of Nova Scotia, that under the terms of their lease they are to carry on mining under certain conditions; therefore it is more or less like a public franchise, and I say that the miner or workingman would have as much right to say that there should be no combination of companies, as the companies have a right to say to these men, because you have formed yourselves into an organization for the protection of yourselves, your homes and your families, we will not treat with you as an organization, and you must disband and separate yourselves from it before we will treat with you at all. To my mind that is a miserable quibble which no self-respecting company should use; but if the companies say that, it is up to the government of the province of Nova Scotia and the government of the Dominion of Canada to see to it that the people who are assisting these companies to make the money which pays the dividends on many millions of watered stock, shall get their rights; and the only way they can get their rights as workingmen is to be returned to their work in the mines. It is only a quibble to object to their organization being headed by the letters United Mine Workers or Provincial Workingmen's Association or any other letters, so long as the organization is open to the public. I have every hope that before many days are over the Minister of Labour will be able to tell us that the men have returned to work, or give us some reason why they have not, because after all the boards that have sat on this question there should be some decision by this time. If the Minister of Labour finds that it is essential for him to communicate with the government of the province of Nova Scotia on this matter, I hope that within a very short time the influence of the two governments will result in our people being put back to work. If it does, it will be an advantage not only to the province of Nova Scotia, but to the Dominion of Canada at large.

ALL RED STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 105) to incorporate the All Red Steamship Company.—Mr. McKenzie.

On section 9, as amended, expropriation powers.

Mr. REID (Grenville). In cases of expropriation under this Act, how will values be arrived at? I suppose that the company can expropriate only private property and not government property?

Mr. GRAHAM. The Railway Act provides the machinery. They file expropriation plans, and values are fixed by arbitration. This is a pretty wide power of expropriation given to this company.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is the first time I have seen the Bill. This seems to be merely a shipping company, and I think the expropriation powers here proposed are unusually wide—the company may expropriate docks, wharfs, piers, elevators.

Mr. GRAHAM. Only in case they are 'required in connection with the construction of its docks, piers, wharfs and other works.'

Mr. BRODEUR. I am not aware of any other similar company having been given such powers. I do not see the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) who has charge of the Bill in his place. For my part, I would rather have the consideration of the Bill deferred.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur). I do not wish to do anything to prevent the Bill going through. But my reason for calling attention to the matter was that it seemed to me these powers were very wide. I do not see any objection to the company taking necessary land by expropriation, but these powers to expropriate wharfs, piers, elevators and so on may involve hardships to others. The company might cause great trouble in Montreal, for instance. I do not know whether, even under this clause, they could expropriate the government elevator, or even the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Pacific Railway elevators. But, apparently, in the case of a private individual or company operating an elevator or other work of that kind, this company could step in and take it over under expropriation powers with the value fixed under arbitration. As the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill is not present, I would move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. GRAHAM. We might put through the other clauses, and then let the Bill stand. That would save time.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Then, the minister (Mr. Graham), I suppose, will take up this expropriation question with the promoter of the Bill and try to get that clause in better shape.

Mr. GRAHAM. This Bill came before the Private Bills Committee, not the Railway Committee. And in committee they have inserted these words relating to elevators and so on, these not being in the original Bill. Perhaps the promoter of the Bill could give the reasons for these changes if he were here. I hardly think the Bill means what has been suggested by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid). It refers to property in connection with the construction of its docks, piers and other works. Better let that clause stand and go on with the others.

On section 11,

Mr. REID (Grenville). This section provides that the company may issue debentures on their land not exceeding the cost of the properties mortgaged. No money at all, therefore, might be put in by the company in so far as the stock is concerned. It seems to me that the company itself should put some money into the concern, as otherwise it might give a fictitious value to its property in order to get the full amount of capital in the issue of bonds.

Mr. NESBITT. That is a provision often put in other Bills. No doubt the purchasers of debentures will inquire into their value before buying them.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). When the committee rose we had under consideration the matter of the action or inaction of the Board of Conciliation in connection with the Springhill strike. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Crosby) was laying down a principle as to which, I think we ought to hear from the Minister of Labour.

Mr. KING. The subject of the Springhill strike was brought up the other day, when we were in committee, and has already been discussed three times.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). At Springhill, as I understand it, the matter at issue was the recognition of a union and the question raised by the hon. member for Halifax was whether or not this department had made any endeavour to secure recognition of the union by the proprietors of the mine where the trouble occurred or whether the department took the opposite view and stood behind the mine owners in declining to treat with the men ; on that basis I think we ought to hear from the minister with regard to that point.

Mr. KING. I have no hesitation in stating that the recognition or non-recognition of a union is something to be entirely left to the parties themselves. The department would not be justified in asking the employers to recognize the union any more than in asking the employees to take any particular stand against the employers who failed to recognize the union. That is a matter to be left to the parties themselves. I said once before that I did not know anything short of a law which would make it illegal for men to strike because of the non-recognition of a union, or for employers to lock out because of men joining a union that could meet such a situation. I do not think the House would enact such a law.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I did not suggest the enactment of the law. What I asked was merely the principle upon which the department proceeds, because if the department is really wedded to the idea that employers should not recognize unions, then its services would be of no value at all to the men in disputes such as have been referred to. If, on the other hand the department were of the opinion that a recognition of the unions is in the interest of the workingmen, and would give friendly advice in a general way to the corporations brought before the Board of Conciliation, it might be of great service indeed to the mass of the people, and I take it that this department has been organized for the special protection of the mass of the people against more powerful influences that do not need the services of any department to protect them. I would ask the minister whether he accepts it as part of his duty to endeavour to influence corporations generally to recognize the unions, or whether he stands for the non-recognition of unions on the part of corporations.

Mr. KING. Every case depends on the circumstances surrounding it. In some cases it might be advisable to try to persuade a corporation to recognize the union as a means of helping to settle industrial disputes ; in other cases it might not be expedient. It is not a matter upon which one can generalize.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Then it is safe to say that as a general rule the minister does not lend his influence to secure the recognition of unions by employers. Am I correct?

Mr. KING. I do not know that the hon. gentleman can draw that inference ; my remarks I think do not necessarily imply that.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think when we are voting large sums of money for the purpose of conciliation, we should know from the minister upon what principle we proceed.

Mr. KING. Everything depends on the circumstances of each case.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). There is nothing to be ashamed of. There are many very worthy citizens adverse to the recognition of the unions, and on the other hand there is a large body of people who think that it is the proper principle to follow. But I think we are entitled to some expression of opinion from the Department of Labour. The hon. gentleman ought to be an expert on this subject.

Mr. KING. Possibly I might make my views still clearer if I were to say that when I have actively intervened in the settlement of strikes, in some cases I have tried to get the employers to see the wisdom of recognizing the union. But everything depends on the circumstances of the case; it is not possible to lay down a general rule.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I have in mind a case in which the minister might set an excellent example to employers generally, that is, to use his influence on the government of which he is a member to recognize the union whenever circumstances of employment offered by that government makes it possible. This afternoon, for instance, an hon. member asked about the union label, and why it appeared upon the 'Labour Gazette.' The answer, as I understand it, was that the minister did not know how it came to appear, but he thought it appeared there because conditions in the government Printing Bureau were satisfactory to the labour unions. It seems to me, under the circumstances, that there is another reason, and that is that the 'Gazette' is not printed at the government Bureau at all, but is, as the minister stated before recess, sent outside to an office which is a union office, which does recognize the union, and is, therefore, entitled to use the union label which appears there.

Mr. KING. The 'Labour Gazette,' I understand, was at the outset printed in the Printing Bureau, then the Bureau became too crowded with work, and decided to have it printed outside. But the 'Gazette' used the union label from the outset.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Now that we learn from the minister that this union label was attached to the 'Labour Gazette' when it was printed at the Printing Bureau, I might ask if it is not permissible to put the union label on all government work? If it is not permissible for instance, to put it on this volume of estimates, and upon all government work? Now, it occurs to me that if the minister would follow out his idea already stated in this House, that the government should be a model employer of labour, here is an excellent chance to set a good example, and to show to employers generally that this model employer of labour, the government, recognizes the work of the labour unions, far as I can see, in acknowledging the in the interest of workingmen generally, and that in token of that recognition, the department desires the union label to be placed upon all printing emanating from the government printing office. We have already been told that conditions there are entirely satisfactory to the union, so there can be no great difficulty involved, as far as I can see, in acknowledging the union, since the conditions have been made entirely satisfactory to them. I would ask the minister whether it would not have a great effect upon other employers, and be an encouragement to them to concede this point to their men, and if the minister will use his influence with the government of which he is a member to have the printers' union acknowledged in connection with the government printing, and put the union label on all works issued from the government Bureau. I would like to ask the minister whether he has ever taken that up with his colleagues, and whether or not he thinks the government should have the union label represented on all government printing?

Mr. KING. I recognize that there are a good many views in the country as to the propriety of using the union label. It might be that to use the union label on the 'Labour Gazette' would be about as far as we can go at present, in view of the differences of opinion prevailing on that subject.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That is not answering the question.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think it is answering the question so far as the minister cares to go on record. But it is unsatisfactory to those who believe in the recognition of the unions. I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that he takes a great responsibility in the course he is pursuing, because he stands directly behind the employer who refuses to recognize the union, and therefore makes it impossible to have the conciliation which the department is organized to secure.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It looks to me as though the Minister of Labour is working for the employer instead of the men. That has been instanced in cases before this. In those strikes down east, as far as I can judge from the newspapers, the minister stood by the employer to the injury of the man. The men always seemed to come out second best. The same thing applies to the Grand Trunk strike. In that case the minister wanted to show the employees of the Grand Trunk what a great thing he was doing for them, and the impression that went all through the country was that the interest of the men had been served by the minister, that they were all to be reinstated, that everything was to be lovely, and that the Grand Trunk had been brought to time. But you see from the reports afterwards that it turns out the very opposite; the men are the ones that are turned down. As I understood, the Department of Labour was formed for the protection of the men. It was always understood that the employers could look after themselves, but it was the men that this Department of Labour was being organized for. In all these great strikes that have occurred for some years the whole difficulty, as I understood it from hon. gentlemen in this House, and from ministers when they wanted to organize this great Labour Department, was that the men had not any protection, and that if we had a Minister of Labour there would be no trouble at all because he could always force the employer to come to terms. I was certainly led to believe that, and if I had not been so led to believe it I would not have agreed to this large expenditure each year. It was only going to be $7,000 or $8,000 when it started, but I venture to say that in a year or two it will be rolled up, like that of the Department of Militia, while the Department of Agriculture will be allowed to remain as it is. The Minister of Labour cannot prove to this House one instance where he has helped the men out, the very thing that he was expected to do when he was put in that position. In every case he has gone to the employer, made a deal with him, and the men have always come out second best. I would like to ask the Minister of Labour what he considers to be the duty of the department in cases of this kind. Is the department there for the purpose of assisting the men, working particularly in the interests of the men to prevent strikes, and get them reinstated in case of a strike, or is the department there for the sole purpose of taking the side of the employer to the detriment of the men?

Mr. KING. I do not think it the duty of the Department of Labour to champion the case of either side. The position of the Department of Labour is the same as that of any other department of the government, the duty being to consider the general good of the community, and to see that justice is done in every way possible as between employers and employees. I think that is all the working classes expect of any one acting on their behalf expect. They do not want coddling or protecting. All they are asking is that the government shall see that there is fair play and that is what the Department of Labour has endeavoured to secure.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That is what I think the Department of Labour should be for. At the same time the weak side is that of the men because the employers have capital and can stop the fight. The men have no capital and the minute a strike takes place they have no protection. They must have something to keep their families and they are the weak side. If any help is to be given, the men should get help from the department. Why I mention this is that in so far as I can see in any strikes that I have read about as being settled, the whole trouble is that the employer has got the better of the men. For instance, take the Grand Trunk strike; if you travel by the Grand Trunk to-day you will find that the men are not all put back, and the minister certainly will not deny this statement. He assured the public that every man was to be taken back, and that within three months. If there is any doubt about that I would like the minister to say so now. Was not that the understanding? He was trying to let the men understand that he had done them a great service, but the result is that the men were not taken back as he led them to believe they would be, and they are not back to-day. Whenever the Department of Labour, over which he presides, do take any part, they certainly should see to it that whatever arrangement they make is carried out. They did not in that case and they did not in the case of the strikes down in Nova Scotia. In those cases they did not act properly in so far as the men were concerned. I would like the minister now to give me one case where the men were all taken back, put in their positions just as they were before, perfectly satisfied, and that the minister has done what was right in so far as they were concerned.

Mr. KING. I should like, in answering my hon. friend, to let the statements of the workingmen speak for themselves rather than that I should speak on behalf of the department. I read to the House the other evening the expressions of opinion given by the leaders of the Grand Trunk strike as to the service that had been rendered by the Department of Labour, and if my hon. friend would like to hear these opinions again I should be very glad to repeat them.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I would like to hear who the leaders are.

Mr. KING. There was a communication from Mr. A. B. Garretson, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, one of the organizations involved in the strike. On the 10th August I received the following letter.

Mr. REID (Grenville). August when?

Mr. KING. 1910. The strike was settled on the 2nd of August.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Yes, that is right.

Mr. KING. (Reading):

Cedar Rapids, Iowa,
August 10,1910.

Hon. William L. Mackenzie King,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,—I take this opportunity of expressing to you on behalf of not only myself and my associate officers, but of the organization at large and the more especially the Canadian membership thereof, the profound obligation under which we lie for the services of yourself and your associate minister in connection with the settlement of the strike upon the Grand Trunk and the Central Vermont railways. The ready recognition by you of the justification for the claims of the men on those properties and the exercise of personal and governmental influence toward securing a termination of the strike on those properties will not be forgotten by our membership and I sincerely trust that those most directly affected, namely, our Canadian citizens, will, in the future, make that appreciation thoroughly apparent.

In conclusion, kindly accept my expressions of highest personal regard, and believe me,

Sincerely and gratefully yours,
(Signed) A. B. GARRETSON,
President.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Did you ever hear from him again?

Mr. KING. Yes, I have had other communications from him. Then, there have been other communications in magazines published by these organizations much of the same nature. I have here a pamphlet issued by Mr. W. G. Lee, president of the Railroad Trainmen, the other organization involved in this strike. At page 10 of this pamphlet, which is issued to the members of the organization, Mr. Lee states:

The ministers of the Crown and particularly the hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Minister of Labour, and Sir Frederick Borden, Minister of Militia, were largely instrumental in bringing about a settlement of the strike. They kept in close touch with the strike, throughout its duration and made the most of every opportunity to bring the two parties together. They are due high praise for their interest in the welfare of the striking employees and of those affected by the interruption of the company's traffic. Their efforts on behalf of the men are appreciated by both organizations and by officers and individual members of the brotherhood.

There have been several other communications of a like kind, received from members of both organizations, and the men themselves, I may say, have taken strong exception to the endeavour on the part of some, to hold the government responsible for any delinquency on the part of the Grand Trunk company in carrying out in all particulars, as they understand, the terms of the agreement. The position of the parties in regard to that strike was this. The government intervened with a view of helping to terminate the strike, the strike was terminated through government intervention, by an agreement signed by each of the two parties. That agreement was brought about through the good offices of the government. The carrying out of the terms of that agreement is a matter of contract between the parties, and if the agreement has not been carried out in the manner which some would like to have seen it, it is in no way the fault of the government, but rather a delinquency on the part of one of the parties in carrying out the obligation which they have signed. That is the view taken by the men themselves.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I shall not speak at length as this matter will come before the House in another form, but I desire to make two or three further statements to complement what the minister has stated. Without in the slightest, contradicting the minister's statement that he received some communication of a eulogistic nature about the 10th of August. He was not so good however, as to read some later communication from the same gentlemen or from equally high leaders of the workmen, that if something was not done and done speedily, they would put the men back in the same position as before the 10th of August, and the men claim they were betrayed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. King).

Mr. KING. I challenge the hon. gentleman to point out where any workingman has charged that he was betrayed by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I am talking of leaders of the strike.

Mr. KING. I challenge him to produce any communication to that effect.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I shall be very happy at the stage to which I have referred to bring down the letters. If the minister looks through his correspondence, he will find a letter from one of these leaders, written months after the 10th of August, in which that leader finding fault with the way in which the agreement was carried out, says they would put the men back where they were before the 10th of August. I will undertake to produce such a letter. The minister spoke of the desire of the government to see justice done. That is what the men complain, that the government were so anxious to sit by and see justice done, that they did nothing to compel it to be done. The minister says that there was an agreement between the men and the Grand Trunk by which the strike was settled. Is that statement the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth? Does he not know that when the agreement was made, the men objected to having such indefinite words in it, as that they would be taken back 'as soon as possible'; they refused to accept the agreement with these indefinite terms, because the expression might mean the day of judgment. The men left the conference, and subsequently the minister of labour notified the men that the Grand Trunk company had given as an interpretation of the words 'as soon as possible,' at the outside, 90 days. On the strength of that notification that agreement read that they would be put back within 90 days and the strike was called off. I would ask the minister if, from the day he notified the men that they would be put back in 90 days, he did a single thing to see that that agreement was carried out? He read a letter to the House in which Mr. Hays repudiated the agreement, and said there was no undertaking to put the men back in 90 days, that the Grand Trunk must be the sole judges of who were proper men to be in their employ. The Grand Trunk wilfully violated the agreement. These men appealed to the Minister of Labour and if ever there was a time when a powerful minister, with a desire to do justice to labour, had the opportunity to do so, that was the time. Surely all the minister had to do with the Grand Trunk, which is so intertwined with the affairs of this country, was to say: I was a party to that agreement, Sir Frederick Borden and I were present when the agreement was made, the men were not there at all, but you made a promise, and I, acting in good faith on your promise, had the strike called off; now we insist on the Grand Trunk standing by the agreement. If the minister for once had ventured to address the corporation, which many people consider the master of the government, in those terms, there is not the slightest doubt in the world that the unfortunate men, who, evidently wrongfully, since many of them have since been reinstated, were deprived of their positions, would have been put back within 90 days. Therefore, the minister can hardly claim that he was acting impartially between the two parties to that agreement. The agreement was wilfully violated by the president of the Grand Trunk, it was not a case of conflict of evidence; the minister has the agreement and the letter, both signed by Charles M. Hays, as diametrically contradictory as any two statements could be. It would not have been hard for the minister to say to Mr. Hays: You may say one thing at one time, and another at another time to some people, but so far as this government is concerned, when you make a bargain with us, you have to keep it. Instead of that, the minister did not say a single word for the men, but he wrote to them, saying that he was no party to the agreement, only a witness thereto, and the best advice he could give them was, that Mr. Hays had the power in his hand, and perhaps the best thing they could do, was to accept the situation as it was. Surely in the fact of that, the minister can hardly claim that he did all he could to do justice to the labouring men.

Mr. KING. I do not desire to go into a discussion of the Grand Trunk strike. The contract was signed between the parties. It is quite true, as my hon. friend has said, the Grand Trunk Company stated that by 'as soon as possible' would be meant not more than 90 days. That was not put in writing at the time, as one of the parties to the contract did not wish to have anything stated on that point one way or the other, and the other party, by way of compromise, gave it as their view that they would be satisfied if an assurance were given in a form which could be vouched for, and on that consideration they would not insist on it going into the contract. The assurance was given that by 'as soon as possible' was meant 90 days. That part has never been disputed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, as I understand. If it had been I would have stated here that that was the assurance and I have always stood prepared to say that it was. The difficulty that has arisen, as I understand, is over the interpretation which the company has put upon the words 'found guilty of acts of violence or disorderly conduct.' The company claim that the men who have not been taken back have been guilty of disorderly conduct. If some men have not been reinstated who should have been, the responsibility is on the company for the manner in which they have interpreted that part of the contract. Personally, I think the company has taken a very narrow view of its obligations under this contract, and I have not hesitated to say so very frankly to the company. As the hon. gentleman knows, Judge Barron is at the present time inquiring into the cases of the men who were not taken back. He is doing that at the instance of the Grand Trunk as a result of the pressure brought to bear on the company by the government for that purpose, and if any of these men have been reinstated since who were not taken back at the end of the ninety days, it is the result of that pressure. The government has all along insisted that the company should interpret this clause in as generous a way as it is possible to do.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The minister has just stated in as many words that in as much as Judge Barron is adjudicating on these cases under the pay of the Grand Trunk company, so far as that is concerned, he sits, not as a judge of any Canadian court, but as a Grand Trunk employee.

Mr. KING. I think Judge Barron's own letter in reply to the request of the Grand Trunk Company to investigate these cases is, perhaps, the best answer that can be given to my hon. friend. Judge Barron said that he would not accept the position unless he were allowed an absolutely free hand to decide the cases on their merits, and I am told by the leaders of some of the men who appeared before Judge Barron that they feel perfectly satisfied with the manner in which he is conducting the investigation, and will have full confidence in the justice of his findings. If I understand my hon. friend rightly, he is endeavouring to hold the government responsible for the non-reinstatement of some of these employees.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Certainly. The government acted for them, and did not get them back.

Mr KING. I would point out to my hon. friend that these men do not take the position of my hon. friend with regard to the carrying out of this obligation, but take the only position which any one looking at the matter with absolute impartiality will take, namely, that if there has been any failure in carrying out the terms of the contract, the party who is responsible for that failure is the delinquent. I have a letter from Mr. Murdock, vice-president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, addressed to myself, and inclosing a copy of an answer which was sent to my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). I am sorry he is not in his seat at the moment, because I rather hesitate to read a communication which introduces his name in his absence. But the letter sent to me is a formal letter, and after receiving it I took care to inquire whether it was a public communication, and was informed that it was, and, as it answers my hon. friend, I will venture to read it to the committee. The hon. member for South Simcoe asked me in the House the other day some questions which I answered categorically. It appears that my hon. friend had communicated with both the representative of the trainmen and the representative of the conductors, submitting the same questions to them, and asking for their views in reply. When he did so these gentlemen communicated with me, as they have done all through, informing me of their action and of the communications which they have received. The letter to me is as follows:

Mr. NORTHRUP.

Grand Union Hotel,
Montreal, February 20, 1911.

Hon. Mackenzie King,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I inclose herewith copy of letter this day written to Mr. Houghton Lennox, M.P., in answer to a letter that he sent me under date of February 7, requesting certain information, in the form of the following questions:

Questions re settlement of Grand Trunk strike.

Was the settlement of 31st July last, between the Grand Trunk railway and its employees in train and yard service:

(a) Intended and understood to put an end to all then existing disputes and difficulties?

(b) Was it understood that the men would be put back in the positions they held previous to the strike?

(c) Was it understood that the men would be reinstated or were they only to be taken back as new men?

It occurs to me that you might be interested in reading these questions which, I presume, you have heard heretofore, and that you might also like to see the answer that I have made to the questions as asked.

I remain, with high personal regards,
Yours very truly,
JAMES MURDOCK,
Vice-president B. of R. T.

The following is the communication inclosed:

Grand Union Hotel,
Montreal, February 20, 1911.

Mr. Houghton Lennox, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Your letter of February 7, with which was inclosed three questions relative to the settlement of the Grand Trunk strike, has only just reached me, hence the delay in my replying.

I will answer your questions in the order given.

(a) Yes, most positively hoped for and understood.

(b) Yes, without reservation it was expected that the understanding that Mr. Hays gave to ministers of the Crown on August 2 as to his intended application of paragraph 1 of the agreement made on July 31, contemplated that all men who had gone on strike and who had not been guilty of the commission of overt acts would be returned to their former positions, runs, seniority, standing, &c.

(c) Is answered in the reply given to (b).

I am indeed glad to know that yourself and other eminent and representative members of the Dominion parliament are taking such a commendable interest in the welfare of Grand Trunk employees who have not yet been returned to service, or who having been returned to service, have not been conceded their positions or runs

The question of pensions or of conserving the pension rights of the employees who had been on strike and who were by the settlement to be returned to service was not even considered as a factor in determining the basis of settlement. Representatives of labour and labouring men, generally, recognize the fact that pension schemes, provident fund arrangements and relief associations, inaugurated, fostered and maintained by railroad companies or large employers of labour, without the employee's co-operative sanction to the formation of such concerns, are usually found to be nothing more or less than a prearranged and contemplated outlay or investment on the part of the employer to test the loyalty of the men to themselves, as individuals, and to each other, in the event of just such trying negotiations as preceded the strike of July 18 last.

Organizations of labour in train and yard service have not considered it as a part of their legitimate sphere of effort to make representations to railroad companies or railroad officials as to the basis upon which pension allowances should be inaugurated or maintained, and in the case of the Grand Trunk strike and settlement the question was not given serious consideration by the employees. Any action that the Grand Trunk Railway Company saw fit to take in reference to pension rights of employees, prior to the Grand Trunk strike, they had an absolute right to take and maintain, and they are apparently disposed to exercise the same rights and privileges that they formerly enjoyed in this respect.

From every consistent and logical standpoint upon which the question of pension might be considered, it should surely be recognized that the mere fact of an employee leaving the service for a period of two weeks and thereby breaking a continued service of many years, should not be sufficient to debar him from all rights to a pension fund, if that pension fund had been inaugurated and was maintained for the purpose of conserving in old age the rights of an employee who had given to the company many years of faithful service.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company's present attitude demonstrates conclusively that the estimate placed on the average railroad company's pension fund has been well-founded.

In conclusion I would suggest that the present attitude of Grand Trunk officials, who have violated indiscriminately the first two articles of the terms of settlement, is deplorable. But if I might be permitted to do so I would suggest that some of the honourable gentlemen at Ottawa who are taking such an apparently deep interest in this situation, are to use the expression attributed to you on page 3480 of 'Hansard' under date of February 10, 'barking up the wrong tree.'

The agreement made when strike was called off was under the circumstances equitable, and amply sufficient to conserve the rights and interests of all concerned, public, employer and employee. The deplorable conditions that have existed and that exist at the present time, are wholly and solely chargeable to Grand Trunk officials' disregard for contract obligations except as expediency suggests.

I trust that the information given above will be looked upon as satisfactorily answering the questions asked in your letter of February 7, at least to some extent.

In conclusion it might not be amiss for me to advise you in case I should be looked upon as politically biased, that I was raised in a family Liberal in politics, always, but that I have personally voted for the past 18 years as opportunity offered with the Conservative party. I believe, however, in giving credit where credit is due, and have been deeply disappointed to find that many eminent gentlemen, like yourself, are apparently disposed to place the responsibility for the failure of Grand Trunk officials to carry out their agreements, on the shoulders of some one else.

I remain,

Yours very truly,

JAMES MURDOCK,
Vice-president,
Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen,
49 Melbourne Av., Toronto, Ont.

I think that letter should be a sufficient answer to those who criticise the attitude taken by the government. It shows what course the men involvd in the strike felt should be taken by the department, and it shows that they realize that everything possible was done to bring about a settlement of the strike. The terms of the settlement are as fair as could be desired and calculated to secure the rights of all concerned. If these rights have not all been secured, the fault is with one of the parties principally interested and not with any party who intervened to assist one way or the other. As stated in this letter, these attacks by hon. gentlemen opposite are regarded by the men simply as party politics and an attempt to put the obligation on shoulders where it ought not to be and take it from shoulders where it ought to rest.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not think the minister has proved that he has succeeded yet in making any settlement which has been in the interests of the men. Of course, Mr. Murdock knows well that it would never do to quarrel with the Minister of Labour, because he is the only one who could help the men out, and for that reason the men called him in. The Minister went down and made that settlement on behalf of the men, and the minister knows that if he had not given his word, and if the men had not felt that they had the government at their back, they never would have had agreed to that settlement.

Mr. KING. What then would have happened?

Mr. REID (Grenville). The men would have stayed out a week or two longer and the Grand Trunk railway would have had to come to time. There can be no question about that. The people along the line would not stand it. My hon. friend knows that if he had not got a settlement made, there were important men on his own side of the House who could have brought such a pressure on him that he would have been forced to make a settlement. The whole country was in an uproar over this strike, and the Grand Trunk railway would have been forced to settle it within a week or two, in any event, and so they got the Minister of Labour to come to their rescue.

Mr. KING. The hon. gentleman cannot show that from the correspondence.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I have read what was in the newspapers at the time.

Mr. KING. I am afraid my hon. friend has been reading the wrong papers. If he will take the facts as they are, he will see that a telegram was sent to me at Ottawa by Mr. Murdock asking me to go to Montreal to intervene. In that telegram it was distinctly stated that Mr. Garretson and Mr. Lee had been endeavouring to get an interview with Mr. Hays but found it impossible, and they asked me to come down and do my best to obtain a settlement. In this connection I would like to correct what I said the other evening. I then said that Mr. Murdock and Mr. Berry had tried to get a conference with Mr. Hays before Mr. Garretson and Mr. Lee had a conference with him. In that I was wrong. Mr. Murdock and Mr. Berry had not had any conference with Mr. Hays. The parties were apart, the difficulty was to get them together, and Messrs. Garretson and Lee came to this country to obtain an interview with Mr. Hays and see if they could not terminate the difficulty. It was when they found they could not succeed in doing this that the Canadian leaders sent a telegram to Ottawa asking me to intervene. It was, therefore, only at the request of the men that I went to Montreal, because I had no communication with the company whatever. In fact my chief difficulty was to get the company to allow me to intervene; and were it not for the assistance of my hon. colleague the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) it might have been impossible for me to get even that opportunity.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That was probably at the first, but not later, because later on the Grand Trunk railway wanted the strike settled.

Mr. KING. The company never wanted it settled. So far as the Grand Trunk railway were concerned, it was impossible for me to understand their position. I believe they were prepared to keep up the strike for a month, even if thereby they should ruin the whole concern. That was the difficulty in bringing about a settlement. The Grand Trunk railway wished to effectively defeat the men and their organization if it were at all possible to do it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). No doubt that was the case until the president of the Grand Trunk railway started for Canada.

Mr. KING. The president of the Grand Trunk railway?

Mr. REID (Grenville). I mean the chairman of the Grand Trunk railway in England. The strike was settled about two days before he landed in New York.

Mr. KING. Throughout the whole trouble the difficulty was to get the Grand Trunk railway to settle at all, and it was only after the greatest possible pressure that the company was brought to consent to a settlement in the end. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Hays, had he not been forced to feel that he owed some obligation to the country, would have kept up that strike until he had succeeded in worsting both organizations, even if he destroyed the property of the company in so doing.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I admit that such was the case until within a week or so before the strike was settled. But the position of the company then compelled it to settle. With its securities going down in England, it could not have allowed that strike to continue much longer. Supposing we take it for granted that the minister went down on behalf of the men, the men trusted him, they placed their case absolutely in his hands, and they felt they had the government at their back when the minister made that settlement.

Mr. KING. And they were perfectly satisfied.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Yes, because they expected that the settlement which the minister had made would be carried out, but they were afterwards sadly disappointed. The minister knows that the company is not carrying it out. At the end of the 90 days, very few men were taken back, and those who were taken back were not reinstated in their former positions, and are not in those positions to-day. They are on the road but not in such good positions. What I cannot understand is this. The Minister of Labour knows that the labouring men look to him in his official position to see to their interests. It was in their interests mainly that the labour department was established. Great corporations, of course, have occasionally difficulties with their men and the men look to the Department of Labour to help them in these difficulties. The minister settled this strike, and the men relied on the company living up to the terms of the settlement. In this they have been disappointed and there is now no possible way of their grievances being removed and their difficulties straightened out because once they have gone back you can hardly expect them to strike again. The result is a great deal of suffering to-day among a number of the Grand Trunk railway employees due to the fact that the Minister of Labour did not see that the agreement was carried out to the letter.

Mr. KING. And how much suffering does the hon. gentleman think there would have been if the strike had not been settled ?

Mr. REID (Grenville). There would not have been another week's trouble, and the men would all have been taken back.

Mr. NESBITT. Who says so ?

Mr. REID (Grenville). I say so. And the hon. member (Mr. Nesbitt) himself knows that it would have been settled in another week.

Mr. NESBITT. I do not believe it would ever have been settled, if it had not been for the Minister of Labour. I have as good a right to prophesy as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid, Grenville), and I believe that I know just as much about the matter as he does. I am free to say that I think that the Grand Trunk would have won out, if it had been gone on with.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. member has a right to his opinion. But from the information that I got along the line, I believe the Grand Trunk would have settled the strike in a very short time But the question I asked the minister at the start, was whether he could name an instance of a strike being settled by him in a way satisfactory to the men and the employers. He mentioned this Grand Trunk case, and I think that the discussion shows that that settlement was not satisfactory. If this is the only case he can name, I cannot see much use for the department.

Mr. KING. I have here the issue of September 10, last of the official monthly publication of the Brotherhod of Railroad Trainmen. It gives a statement of this case from the point of view of the men themselves. At page 797, the following appears:

> The company, however, was able to secure enough strike breakers to enable it to run 148 freight trains within the twenty-four hours ending at 6 p.m., August 2, handling an average of twenty-two cars per train. While this average of trains run was far below normal conditions, a start had been made in the freight service, and it was only a question of time when the entire service would be resumed.

There is the statement as to the freight situation. This publication goes on:

> Passenger service on the main line was but slightly impaired at any time during the strike, while the branch passenger line service was demoralized for about a week.

I think that statement is absolutely correct—that it was only a question of time. But, in my opinion, it would have been a long time. Meantime, the country would have suffered irreparable loss and injury, to say nothing of the possible loss of life and the loss of property to individuals, and certainly whatever the outcome the men would have fared pretty badly.

Mr REID (Grenville). Who wrote that article ?

Mr. KING. This is called 'The Railroad Trainman,' and it is published monthly at Cleveland, Ohio, by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. T. L. Cease is given as editor and manager. This is the official publication of the Brotherhood interested in this strike. The men who were most concerned and who had first-hand knowledge of the facts, recognized the service rendered in terminating that strike, and getting a contract which secured the reinstatement of the men, with the exception of the few who are still out. I think the number involved was about 4,500, while the number still out, are in the vicinity, I understand, of 200. What was secured was an agreement that they should go back into the company's employment, and it may be that even those who are still out will be returned to the service. I hope they will. Their representative states, under date February 20:

> The agreement made when the strike was called off was, under the circumstances, equitable and amply sufficient to conserve the rights and interests of all concerned, public, employer and employee.

If there has been any difficulty since, the parties who are responsible, and who are being held responsible by the men, are the Grand Trunk officials, who have not played, perhaps, as generous a part as I think the country would, on the whole, have expected them to play. I am free to say that if I had been manager of the Grand Trunk I would have acted in a very different manner from the way in which the Grand Trunk has acted. But one must concede that, every man has a right to manage his own business as he thinks best, and must be responsible for the outcome.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The difference between my hon. friend (Mr. Reid, Grenville) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. King), seems to narrow down to a small point. This letter from Mr. Murdock proves, what everybody knew, that the settlement made between the men and the Grand Trunk, as a settlement, was satisfactory. The representatives of the men had done their duty, and we assume that Mr. Hays had done his duty, acting for the Grand Trunk,

Mr. KING. And has the government done its duty ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I was just coming to that. The government intervened at that time to give a definition of three or four words, and the strike was called off solely by virtue of the definition of the words given by the government. The whole difficulty since has arisen over the interpretation——

Mr. KING. No, my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) is mistaken. The government's part in the work was really getting these parties to meet. That was the great difficulty. Mr. Hays took the position—that there should be no dealing between them, and the men had tried to get an interview and could not. It took a good deal of persuasion to bring about an interview in the first instance. And when the interview did take place, it took a good deal more persuasion to prevent the parties flying off at a tangent and making matters practically worse than before. For three or four days, it took as strenuous work, I believe, as any two men could perform, and as much patience as a man could possess, to keep these two parties together and hold them together, despite the feeling between them, until a contract was drawn up which each was prepared to sign. That was the service of the government, and it was rendered, according to statements of the company and the men alike, in such a way as to bring about a contract which was absolutely equitable and fair.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman (Mr. King) does not wish the House to understand that the government dictated the terms of the settlement. The settlement, I take it, was come to between the men and the Grand Trunk, however they were brought together.

Mr. KING. Quite so. The parties were the ones who agreed upon the terms, after having debated the matter back and forth. It may interest my hon. friend to know how the proceedings were conducted. The representatives of the men sat on one side of the table and the representatives of the company on the other. Sir Frederick Borden and myself were present as witnesses. They started negotiating and got along a certain distance. Then there would be a difference that would appear to be irreconcilable. After the first conference the parties quit and went away to get dinner. We got them back. Then we got them at work at night. There was another difference, each side declaring that it would have nothing to do with the other. That process was kept up for days, before we got an agreement, which the parties were prepared to sign. The terms of the agreement, as to conditions of employment and so on, were all a matter of arrangement, between the parties themselves; but the service rendered by the government was in holding the two of them together until they got to the point where they could sign a document setting forth a common understanding.

Mr. NORTHRUP. That agreement was made between the men and the Grand Trunk, however they were brought together, and that agreement has caused no difficulty since, with the exception of the unfortunate words which were entrusted to the care of the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Militia and Defence. Over those words the whole difficulty has arisen.

Mr. KING. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. There has been absolutely no difficulty over those words—the words he refers to, I suppose, are 'as soon as possible.' The words 'as soon as possible' have in themselves no definite meaning whatever. The men wished to have 'immediately' put in; the company wished to have the words 'as soon as possible' left, leaving the meaning indefinite. The Minister of Militia and myself said to the company: Put some meaning on these words; you have no right to say you mean 'as soon as possible' unless you are prepared to give some definite time. Do you mean to take those men back within a stated time, or not to put them back at all? If you mean a stated time, name the time. We had great difficulty in getting them to name a time, and finally ninety days was agreed upon. Then the question came up. Should the ninety days go into the contract? The company did not wish ninety days to be put in writing, because at the time they did not wish it to appear to the public that they had settled this strike and agreed to take every man back at the end of ninety days. Now if they had taken every man back, this agreement about the ninety days would never have been formally disclosed. It was understood by all parties that nothing should be said about that, provided they lived up to it. The company does not deny that, they admit they promised to take these men back within ninety days, they say now they have taken them back, and the point of difference is, not the ninety days, but it is one of the terms of the contract which says 'Except those who have been guilty of acts of violence or disorderly conduct.' These words were not the words of the Minister of Militia and myself, they were the words agreed upon between the parties themselves, and it is over these words that they are differing to-day. The company says these 200 men have been guilty of disorderly conduct, the men say they have not, and it is over these words that the difficulty has taken place. So my hon. friend is wrong when he says it is over the words 'as soon as possible' that all the trouble has arisen.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I would just ask the minister to take the trouble to read the correspondence, and he will find there, over Mr. Hayes' signature, the statement that the reason they have not taken the men back was because the Grand Trunk Company must be the judge of the competency and fitness of the men, and they have a right to discharge their men on the Grand Trunk system regardless of whether they had already been there before. It shows a new factor introduced by Mr. Hayes, which was not in the agreement, and which new factor is the cause of all the trouble and dissatisfaction which have since arisen.

Mr. KING. If it is a new factor introduced by Mr. Hayes which all the trouble is about, then it could not be anything which the Minister of Militia and myself are responsible for.

Mr. CROSBY. I understand by what was said by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) that Judge Barron was in the pay of the Grand Trunk Company. I would like to know if that is a fact?

Mr. KING. Judge Barron has been appointed by the Grand Trunk Company to investigate the cases of all the men who have not been reinstated, or not been taken back.

Mr. CROSBY. Is he in the pay of the Grand Trunk Company?

Mr. KING. I do not presume he is acting for nothing, I presume the Grand Trunk are paying for his services.

Mr. CROSBY. Does not the minister know whether he is being paid or not by the Grand Trunk?

Mr. KING. I cannot say what the consideration is. All I know is that Judge Barron sent me a communication himself stating that he had been asked by the Grand Trunk Railway Company to investigate the cases of these men. In the first instance, I suggested, when this difficulty arose as to the non re-instatement of certain men on the ground that they had been guilty of acts of violence, that the matter should be referred to some third party, and I suggested Judge Barron's name, as he had been engaged on similar difficulties before. He had acted as chairman of the board which prevented a strike of the street railway men in Toronto, and I knew him to be acceptable to the employees, and being a judge, I thought he was the right kind of a man to act. I suggested that he would be a good person. The company would not accept him from the outset, and as I have indicated to my hon. friend, the government intimated to the company pretty firmly that the cases of these men ought to be looked into, that they ought to take a generous view, or what the public would regard as a fair view. Then the company asked Judge Barron to investigate. I have here a letter which was written on December 23, by J. G. O'Donogahue to Judge Barron, which has reference to the view the men take of his appointment:

> I had a talk with Messrs. Murdock and Berry this morning and as a result I take the responsibility of saying to you to go ahead with the suggestions of yesterday.

That had reference to the judge investigating without solicitors for either side; he preferred to investigate the matter himself.

> Their view is that as they were ready to accept you as a government nominee they will have just as much confidence in you in the other capacity.

I am told that the men have absolute confidence in Judge Barron's ability and integrity and in the justice of his decision, whatever it may be.

Mr. MADDIN. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Crosby), before the committee rose at six o'clock, was discussing with the Minister of Labour the question of the recognition of the unions in the province of Nova Scotia growing out of the difficulties in the coal mining districts for the last year or two. I would ask him if it is a fact that out of the nineteen hundred odd unions that were in existence in Canada in 1909, over ninety per cent of these were international unions?

Mr. KING. I can hardly say offhand whether there are ninety per cent, but I would say that certainly a preponderating majority were international unions?

Mr. MADDIN. I think I remember the minister saying that out of 1,900 odd there were 1,900 international unions, which would be really over ninety per cent.

Mr. KING. I might point out that the membership in these unions varies considerably. One union might have a hundred members, and ten other unions together would have no more than a hundred members. Therefore, the mere number of the unions would not signify much.

Mr. MADDIN. I am informed it is a fact that about 1,900 of the nearly 2,000 unions in the Dominion of Canada are international unions. Now, I would ask the minister if it is not a fact that the question of the recognition of the United Mine Workers' of America was involved on three different occasions when boards of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Act were constituted in the province of Nova Scotia, and that each of these boards was constituted by an appointee of the men who are compelled to appoint a representative when they make their application, and that the other two appointees on each of these three occasions, were appointees of the governments. The first one of these investigations which took place was after the application was received by the Department of Labour on the 4th March, 1909, and the constitution of the board was made up of his Honour W. B. Wallace, county court judge of Halifax county, chairman, appointed by the minister in the absence of any joint recommendation of the other members of the board, and Mr. G. S. Campbell, Halifax, Nova Scotia, appointed by the minister in the absence of a recommendation by the employing company. In that case two members of the board were appointed by the minister. The question of the recognition of a union is largely an economic question, and it seems to me that the minister in selecting two representatives to form the personnel of this board might very well have selected some one familiar with economics, some professor of economics in one of our universities. Professor Shortt, who served on 28 or 29 boards of conciliation, would have made an ideal chairman of one of these boards. I discovered in 1907 that Professor Shortt is a strong advocate of international unions, a firm believer in trade combines and that he believes that a healthy restriction on trade combines is international union. It might be that other economists in this country share the views of that distinguished gentleman. However, on the occasion of which I speak, the chairman of the board was the Hon. Mr. Justice Wallace, county court judge of Halifax. I do not know anything about his capacity to sit in judgment on a question of economics, but, as a member of his profession, and in his capacity as a judge, I am sure that he has the confidence of all people who come in contact with him. But, to sit in judgment in an inquiry as to whether or not a trade union should be recognized I do not recognize his Honour Mr. Justice Wallace as a competent authority. A great deal of prejudice was exercised against international unionism in the province of Nova Scotia at that time. Evidently members of these boards forgot or took no cognizance of the fact that the principal industries of that province are developed by international capital. We have one coal mine in the province of Nova Scotia controlled by a company whose whole directorate, almost to a man, are American citizens, whose head office is in Boston and whose annual meetings are held there. I have reference to the Acadia Coal Company. The investment of American capital in the coal mining industries of our country means American boards of directors and means, as in this particular case to which I have reference, American mine managers, American overmen, American underground managers, American superintendents, or in other words, American bosses. The other appointee of the government on the first board of conciliation which was held on these matters between the Dominion Coal Company and their employees was Mr. G. S. Campbell, of Halifax. Mr. Campbell is an employer of labour, a square, upright citizen in every respect as I know him to be, but still an employer of labour and you would naturally have expected that the Industrial Disputes Act, which says that any one having an interest in the case shall not sit on the board, would have guided the minister in judging whether or not an employer of labour would be an unbiased member of a board of conciliation, and would have led him to the conclusion that, being an employer of labour, he was unfitted to discharge his duties impartially. That is one case where the government appointed two members of the board. That was the first case that came up. The next one was the dispute between the employees of the Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Company and the United Mine Workers' of America. In both those instances the United Mine Workers' had named as their nominee the president of their organization. Now, I quite admit that Mr. Campbell as an employer of labour was in as good a position to render a fair and equitable judgment as the president of the organization was on the board, and I condemn his appointment to sit on the board in the same manner that I would condemn the appointment of Mr. Campbell. But I am dealing now with the appointees of the government. Mr. Campbell was appointed in the Dominion Coal Company's matter, and at Sydney Mines the personnel of the board was made up of these gentlemen: His Honour Judge Chipman, Kentville, N.S., chairman, appointed by the minister; His Honour Judge A. McGillivray, Antigonish, N.S., appointed by the Minister and Mr. McDougall again representing the employees. His Honour Mr. Justice Chipman is, in so far as I know, just such a gentleman as the chairman of the board that sat in the dispute on the 4th March in which the Dominion Coal Company and its employers were concerned. As to his previous record with regard to organized labour I have no information, but the minister could have found the record of His Honour Mr. Justice McGillivray with regard to organized labour, and I think if he had made himself acquainted with that gentleman's past record in connection with labour unions, if he had known the active part that Mr. Justice McGillivray had taken in the legislature of Nova Scotia against organized labour in any shape or form, he might well have hesitated before he would have asked him to sit in judgment as a representative of the employer to determine a question between the employer and the employee with regard to the recognition of the labour union. In 1878 the Provincial Workmen's Association in Nova Scotia sought incorporation under the laws of the province. His Honour Mr. Justice McGillivray was a member of the government of Nova Scotia at that day, and he it was who led the attack against the organization. The government refused to pass an Act incorporating the Provincial Workmen's Association. In 1882 the Grand Council of the Provincial Workmen's Association sought incorporation in Nova Scotia again and when the Attorney General Mr. C. J. Townshend introduced the measure Mr. McGillivray said that :

Mr. McGillivray thought it was a very peculiar Bill and one that required some consideration before being passed, and that it would be imprudent to deal with it until first its real object had been ascertained. There was nothing to show what the purpose of the association sought to be incorporated was, except that it was to promote the moral, material, social, and physical well-being of its members and to manage their pecuniary affairs. Now under so indefinite a purpose much harm might be concealed. The House had nothing to do with associations of the kind proposed, and it would not be wise to make a precedent. He, therefore, would move that the Bill be read this day three months.

On the second occasion on which the Provincial Workmen's Association made an effort to get their association incorporated in Nova Scotia, Mr. Justice McGillivray, then a member of the opposition, moved the three months' hoist of the Bill and he urged that further particulars should be brought to the attention of the House, and that the constitution of this organization and its by-laws should be submitted to the House.

On a later day the Attorney General brought the Bill up again.

Hon. Mr. Townshend said in reference to the Bill to incorporate the Provincial Workmen's Association which had excited considerable discussion in committee on Friday last, in accordance with the wish expressed by the House at that time he had communicated with the secretary of that association and obtained from him several copies of the constitution and by-laws and also a statement of the object of the association.

The secretary of the association at that time was the Hon. Robert Drummond, now editor and publisher of the 'Maritime Mining Record' in Nova Scotia, and one of the leading authorities on coal mining in that province.

In his reply the secretary said: I send you a number of constitutions of our society. I think you will find them as good a code of laws as in any society. The objects of the society are therein defined as being to strive by every legitimate means to improve the condition material, social and moral—of our members. Our association has done much good and is stimulating the workingmen who come under its influence to better their conditon; to first of all respect themselves, as the surest way of gaining the respect of others. We seek to get the best remuneration possible for our labour, but we inculcate that high wages are nothing without an exercise of prudence and economy. We are, if you will, a trades union on an improved principle and allowed by law. See chap. 165, Rev. Stat. sec. 2, (appendix).

This was read by the Attorney General, and then the Bill finally came up for discussion before the House, and Mr. McGillivray, from his place in the House, said:

Mr. McGillivray suggested that as there were several hon. gentlemen absent when this bill was discussed on a previous day it would be better to let it lie over and take up some other Bills.

It is to be observed that Mr. McGillivray did everything he could to delay the passage of the Bill, or even its discussion. However, the matter came up for discussion, and then he said:

Mr. McGillivray did not oppose the Bill for any other purpose than that of getting the fullest understanding of what it contemplated.

The purpose for which this society sought to be incorporated were not very clearly set forth. The first object stated was that of managing the pecuniary affairs of the society. These were words of very extensive meaning, and very dangerous powers might be given by the use of these general and indefinite terms. The Bill proposed to incorporate the grand council and all the subordinate lodges. Some of those lodges were not in this province but in New Brunswick and the House was asked to pass upon by-laws of an institution not only belonging to this province but New Brunswick as well. One of the objects of the association, as explained in the constitution, was to shorten the hours of labour and to strive to obtain legislation by which the more efficient management of the mines might be effected, and to enforce the legislation already existing. Now it was well known that the labourers in this country were not overworked. Their hours particularly in the coal mines were not long and they were well paid except when the times were hard and all concerned were obliged to suffer and the wages were reduced in proportion. Then with respect to the management of the mines there was already an Act on the statute-book during the passing of which representatives of this association were heard and every amendment that they asked for had been substantially incorporated in the Act. Why then incorporate this society and give it a legal status when the constitution of the society was so vague and would perhaps give them power to pass by-laws by which the trade of the country would be hampered. Trades' unions were dangerous things. In other countries where the miners were subjected to oppression there might be some call for them, but there was no such oppression exercised in this country and the miners were fully protected by the law. These unions had promoted strikes which were very injurious not only to the employers but in a greater measure still to the men themselves. In 1870 there was a strike in the United States of a serious character.

Mr. NESBITT. Mr. Chairman, under the new rules hon. gentlemen must talk to the question. I am sure that the strike the hon. gentleman is reading about in the United States has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If a point of order is raised, the item before the chair is Conciliation and labour, including publication, printing, binding and distribution of the 'Labour Gazette,' and allowances to correspondents.

The first three words, 'conciliation and labour,' are so very broad in themselves that I hardly feel I can rule out any article that refers to such subjects.

Mr. NESBITT. So long as he confines himself to this country it is all right, but he is reading about a strike in the United States that has nothing to do with this country.

Mr. MADDIN. I think the hon. member must have been asleep and just woke up in the middle of my extract.

Mr. NESBITT. I was not asleep.

Mr. MADDIN (reading):

These unions had promoted strikes which were very injurious not only to the employees but in a greater measure still to the men themselves. In 1870 there was a strike in United States of a serious character, but the most remarkable case occurred in 1873 among the labourers in the Burton mine where the company lost $250,000, while the men suffered a loss of $750,000, in all, a million dollars of loss in consequence of that strike. What he feared was that in passing this Bill the House was merely legalizing trades unions. One of the articles provided that one of the purposes of the association should be to ascertain the true weight of the mines output. This was already provided for by law. Another purpose was to abolish all illegal stoppage of pay-lists. There was no necessity for these, as the law of the land provided for the case. These associations were managed by officers, sent as grand masters, secretaries, &c. Who was to pay these officers? No doubt those who joined the association. He thought it very undesirable to pass laws to take the money out of the pockets of these miners when there was no necessity or useful purpose to be served by it. Legislation had already been passed to put down strikes, and here the House was asked to incorporate an association the legitimate object of which was, he believed, something of this nature. The subordinate lodges that were to be incorporated might change their by-laws and might pass others that would be illegal and unjust, and when prosecuted for illegal conduct they might appeal to this legislation as a justification of their proceedings. He was not opposed to any of these associations so far as their object was to promote the intellectual, moral and physical well-being of their members, but they could accomplish all these objects without being incorporated.

These were the views expressed by a gentleman in 1882, who, in 1909, 27 years afterwards without any expressed opinion that would indicate a change of heart or of mind with regard to labour unions, is asked to sit in judgment, to represent the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, one of the most powerful corporations in the Dominion of Canada, the most powerful corporation in the maritime provinces, and say whether or not these trade unions should be recognized. I submit that when it is borne in mind that all the unions of any importance in this country, all the unions with the largest membership and the unions which embrace the greatest number of trades and branches of employment are international, there should be some very substantial reason offered why the miners of Nova Scotia should not have the union of their choice recognized.

Another board that sat at Springhill somewhat later, comprised the Hon. Justice J. W. Longley, Halifax, N.S., appointed by the minister in the absence of any joint recommendation from the members of the board; Mr. Charles Archibald, Halifax, appointed by the minister in the absence of any nominee by the company, and Mr. E. B. Paul, M.P.P., Springhill, appointed on the recommendation of the employees. Here again, the Department of Labour appointed two members to the board. In this case Mr. Paul, member of the local legislature, was not a member of the United Mine Workers' of America as in the case of Mr. McGillivray, who sat as the men's representative on the other two boards. Mr. Paul, it might be presumed, was not in the position to be biased that Mr. Macdougall was on the two boards that preceded. Mr. Archibald, who sat on the board, was general manager at the Gowrie mines in Cape Breton for a number of years, and had practically all his life been a large employer of labour. He had employed members of the Provincial Workmen's Association, and had met the labour unions time and again. I submit that any man who has been a general manager of coal mines and an employer of labour, is not a man who should be appointed by the Department of Labour to act on a board which is to determine the question whether or not a labour union should be recognized by an employer. I submit that such a man, no matter how upright he may be, or how high a sense of honour he may have, will be warped and clouded in his judgment, unconsciously it may be, but nevertheless warped and clouded, as a result of his study and his past experiences and associations, as well as his present associations, being on the side of capital. Here are three instances, the only three in which the question of the recognition of this union has come before a tribunal formed under the provisions of this Act, and in each of the three cases this government has appointed two members of the board, in each of the three cases the company simply stood aside and said we will have none of it, and threw upon this government the burden of appointing a representative for them, and in each of the three cases, after that appointee was appointed by this government, he would not agree to a chairman, throwing the burden upon the Department of Labour of appointing the third man. In the three tribunals so constituted six appointees were appointed by this government, and in the six there was not one man who found in favour of recognition of the United Mine Workers' of America, notwithstanding the fact that 90 per cent of the unions in Canada are international unions. I ask the minister why, on an important economic question of this kind, one of the broadest economic questions which can confront an expert in economics, he did not appoint Professor Shortt as chairman of one of these boards. True, he was on the eve of accepting, or had already accepted, the chairmanship of the Civil Service Commission; but his past experience on, I think, 29 boards up to that time, and his training as an economist would have put him in a position to have dealt fairly and equitably with the situation, and I have no doubt the result would have been entirely different from what it was under the boards constituted by this government. How can men approach the subject open mindedly and fair mindedly if their training and their interests ally them with one side or the other? I submit that it is a mental and physical impossibility. Yet on each occasion an employer of labour was appointed by this government on a board of conciliation to determine the question whether or not the employers of the men down in Nova Scotia should recognize the union to which those men belonged. Now, I appreciate the difficulties which confront the minister in a matter of this kind; but when the Eight Hours Bill was before this House at the last session of parliament, he was quite ready to accept the recommendation of the committee which had charge of that Bill that a professor of Queen's University should act as a commissioner to gather some statistics with regard to the eight-hour day. In such a case as that, affecting labour all over the Dominion, he would not think of selecting an employer of labour, for the labourers of the country would at once view such an appointment with suspicion, and would regard the data gathered by such a man as unfair and one-sided. The same thing applies to the constitution of these tribunals. I know the difficulties of selecting the right men; but the universities contain men who are students on these questions. We are confronted year after year with the fact that the development of our resources is carried on largely with capital from abroad, and international capital means international boards of directors. The manufacturers who combine with each other do so for the purpose of bringing about cheap production. They can, when they have a monopoly, squeeze the employees and force them to accept lower wages, especially if they are isolated, or if they are banded in small unions of three or four thousands. In the evidence given before the committee on the Eight Hour Bill last session, it appeared that the Manufacturers' Association of Canada is composed of about 2,500 men, who have an investment of over $400,000,000, who turn out productions worth over, $500,000,000 and who employ over there 300,000 men. I am told this is a conservative estimate. What opportunity have little seven-by nine labour organizations to cope with such a union as this? The economists point out that the remedy is not to tear the Manufacturers' Association or the combines or monopolies to pieces, but for the producers, the employees, to unite together in just such proportion, so that these two bodies, equally balanced, will be able to treat fairly one with the other. That is the view taken by the leading political economists of this country, and I venture to say that there is not a gentleman occupying a chair of economics in any university of the United States or Canada who would vote on a board of conciliation, where he had taken his oath to do his duty, against the recognition of a union because it was international or had affiliations in a foreign country. In view of the fact that the government has assumed the responsibility of appointing the chairman and the company's representative on each of the boards of conciliation which have tried out this question of the recognition of the union—and I am sure the hon. minister is himself a firm believer in trades unions, having repeatedly said so in this House—I submit that the government should seriously take into consideration some step in the direction of legislation to compel employers to recognize their unions regardless of where their affiliations or connections may be. If it is the duty of the Department of Labour to act as an intermediary between the employer and the employee, if it is one of the functions of that department to bring labour and capital together, the minister must surely realize that where the open shop exists, where there are no labour unions, it is a physical impossibility to have the men brought up one by one to meet their employer, when as a union they could send their officers to deal with their employer on their behalf.

Modern trades unionism is making advances within the ranks of labour just as are the organizations of capital within the ranks of capitalists, and this is a good thing for employers as well as employees. Many of the best trades unions of this country discipline their men and thereby relieve their employers from a distasteful responsibility and harsh measures. Our labour unions to-day recognize that the man who shirks his work, the man who watches the clock, the man who arrives late at his machine or his work, is a drag on the union, and they either compel him to mend his ways or send him about his business. If a man trespasses on the rights of his employer and it comes to the knowledge of the union, the union takes that matter up and deals with him and thereby removes from the employer a disagreeable task. That is the condition which exists in the largest and strongest international unions, and I submit it would be better for capital in the province of Nova Scotia if some good substantial union, be it international between Nova Scotia and the United States or national in the sense that it would be affiliated with a union in Great Britain, existed in that province, because then capitalists would be able to deal with some good, strong substantial union which appreciated its responsibility, as a member of a powerful association, and would undertake to discipline its own men and thus bring about greater harmony than has heretofore existed in that turbulent industry—the coal industry of Nova Scotia. I am not making these observations, nor did I make those which I did two weeks ago in discussing this matter, for the purpose of harassing or delaying the passage of the minister's estimates. I have every sympathy with him in his administration of this new department which has embarked on legislation which is really of an experimental character; but he must realize that there are many imperfections in the Industrial Disputes Act, and in the Alien Labour Act that ought to be removed. I have no doubt that had my hon. friend read that article from the 'Trainman's Magazine' a little further, he might have found that the main reason for the ability of the Grand Trunk railway to man their trains lay in the fact that they were able to hustle men across the line in spite of the Alien Labour Act. No doubt the hon. minister has had complaints of the flagrant manner in which the Alien Labour Law has been violated even in the city of Ottawa; and so long as an employer can look upon this law simply as a joke, and bring in men from across the line whenever he likes, he need be under no apprehension on account of any labour union be it weak or strong. I have every sympathy with the minister in his undertaking this new portfolio, and instead of harassing him or annoying him in any way I would rather assist him in bringing to perfection some of these measures which are in the experimental stage. I ask him in all seriousness whether he does not think that some legislation should be enacted which would relieve the situation we have in Nova Scotia—a situation which enables an employer to say to his men: I will speak to you as individuals, as John Smith or Tom Brown, but not as members of this or the other union. If that condition be allowed to continue, there is no excuse for the existence of our Department of Labour. What I urge on the minister is that he should make it clear to employers of labour that they will be obliged to recognize a union regardless of where its affiliations or ties may be; and if he would do this, the difficulties under which the department labours would be substantially removed. For in that case he would have to deal with but two factors—the union and the company. But where there is no union he has to deal with individuals whose numbers may run up into the thousands as well as with the company. It is a physical impossibility to carry out the objects of the department unless there be a union. A couple of weeks ago I asked the hon. minister if he believed in trades unions and he said he did. Then he must concede that the working man has the right to choose his own union and that the employer should not be permitted to say to him: You may join union A, but you must not join union B, for if you do I will either dismiss you or not hire you. If the hon. minister would seriously consider the framing of such legislation and also devise some means of enforcing the Alien Labour Law, and of constituting tribunals under the Industrial Disputes Act, I think he would make a very long step in advance, and would remove the cause of quite a number of breaches in the relations between labour and capital in this country.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). I do not propose to follow my hon. friend throughout his meanderings or to discuss the labour question or trades unions or anything of that kind, but I rise simply to take objection to certain observations he made regarding Mr. Justice McGillivray. I happen to know Judge McGillivray, who was on the conciliation board referred to by my hon. friend, and I want to say that the remarks of the hon. gentleman with regard to him are altogether uncalled for, and absolutely unjustified. To those who know Mr. Justice McGillivray these remarks would certainly sound very strange. The hon. gentleman has eulogized the United Mine Workers, but one must not forget that he has been the paid solicitor of that organization. He has had a brief from it within very recent time and for aught I know may still hold a retainer in its behalf. But great as may be the admiration of my hon. friend for the United Mine Workers, it is not regarded in Nova Scotia with at all that amount of respect. What I rose particularly for, however, was not to discuss this union, but to take objection to the remarks which my hon. friend made regarding Judge McGillivray. He intimated that Judge McGillivray was biased and partisan. Well, the hon. gentleman himself, if I remember rightly, served on a conciliation board; and I am sure no one will say, notwithstanding his advocacy of the United Mine Workers that when he sat on that board he did not exercise strict impartiality and discharge his duties without any prejudice. And I am quite sure that any one who knows Judge McGillivray and my hon. friend will have no hesitation whatever in saying that as great impartiality, justice and fairness should be expected from Judge McGillivray as from the hon. gentleman, and in saying this I am sure that I am casting no reflection on the latter but rather paying him a compliment.

So far as the ability, integrity, impartiality and honesty of Judge McGillivray are concerned, words of mine are not needed. My hon. friend (Mr. Maddin) has quoted some remarks made by Mr. McGillivray twenty-seven years ago, as he said, in opposition to a Bill intended for the amelioration of the condition of workingmen. The words as quoted must have struck hon. members as being such words as one would expect from a careful, impartial, truthful, judicial man like Judge McGillivray. He advised to go slow; he wanted to hear all sides. If I were disposed to offer advice, I would say that it would be well for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maddin) to follow the lines pursued by Mr. McGillivray when he was in the legislature of Nova Scotia. But, admitting that Judge McGillivray was hostile to labour unions twenty-seven years ago, great changes may have since come over his mind. I can remember when the political views of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) were entirely different from what they are to-day. That does not detract from his merits or involve any reflection upon them. Surely, even if Judge McGillivray did entertain views against labour organizations or unions—and there is no evidence that he did, mark you—the hon. gentleman might have been generous enough to believe that, in the course of twenty-seven years, his mind might have been changed and be disposed to see labour organizations in their proper light. But, when you consider the fact that Judge McGillivray was on the bench when he was on this arbitration, removed altogether from the turmoil of party warfare and freed from predjuice, and considering the fact also that he was sworn to discharge his duty impartially, to do what was right between man and man, I am sure the hon. member will agree with me, on reflection, that he spoke a little hastily when he insinuated that Judge McGillivray could not be depended upon to do justice between employer and employee. If I were interested, whether as employer or employee I would not have any hesitation in appealing to Judge McGillivray as an arbitrator who would give fair play and justice, in preference even to the hon. member for South Cape Breton, for whom I have the highest regard.

Mr. MADDIN. It seems to me that the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) was unduly exercised about His Honour Mr. Justice McGillivray. I would utter a fervent 'amen' to all the eulogies the hon. member cast upon the distinguished jurist. I merely pointed out that Mr. Justice McGillivray was an appointee of this government, one of six, but, notwithstanding that ninety per cent of the unions of this country were international unions, he and the other five recommended against the recognition of international unions. I pointed out that his past record in connection with unions was such as might cloud and warp his judgment. Those were the terms I used. And I added that, doubtless, if such were the case, he was unconsciously biased. As a member of the legal profession, surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Chisholm) can understand a man possessing all the virtues that he attaches to Justice McGillivray could be unconsciously biased. The law takes cognizance of unconscious bias, and for that reason, forbids a father to try his son, a son to sit in judgment on his father, and others within certain grades of relationship to try their own kin. So far as Mr. Campbell and Mr. Archibald are concerned, I think they are, to say the least, the equal of Mr. Justice McGillivray in all the virtues assigned to him by the hon. member, and my observations with regard to these gentlemen were to show that their association, their training, the views they had expressed from time to time—views that there was no evidence to show had ever been changed—were such as to, perhaps, cloud and warp their judgment and thus render them unable to deal equitably with a case of this kind. I imputed absolutely nothing dishonourable to any of the gentlemen whose names I have mentioned; I simply pointed out that, in preference to these men, there might have been selected some student of economics, some professor from one of our numerous universities, a man trained in economic questions of this kind.

The hon. member for Antigonish suggests that I eulogized the United Mine Worker's of America. He is absolutely mistaken there. I have not uttered a syllable in this House at any time since I became a member, eulogistic or derogatory of the United Mine Workers' of America, or any other labour organization of this Dominion. I have said, and I say it again, that when it is conceded to men that they have the right to belong to a labour organization, they should be permitted to belong to the organization of their choice, whether it be in affiliation with organizations of another nation, or wholly contained within our own province and country. In order to relieve the hon. member's mind of the idea that perhaps I might be receiving a retainer—I do not know what the custom is on the other side—I can assure the hon. member that I have received no retainer to promote the interests of any labour organization in this House. During the summer of 1909, or, to be accurate, from 19th of July to the 19th of November, I was solicitor under contract to the United Mine Workers' of America and acted as their solicitor, afterwards being specially retained in some cases in my own county. That is my whole connection with them, and I have had nothing to do with them, or any other labour organization, either in a professional or any other manner, from that time up to the present. I have not even had correspondence with them, except that their officers have sent me petitions to be presented asking for the repeal of the Industrial Investigations Act. I am surprised that the hon. member for Antigonish should have suspected that the character of his distinguished friend in Antigonish was so easily susceptible to attack. I am sure that he will read 'Hansard' in vain for language of mine that will bear any construction reflecting upon the honour, dignity, or character of the Hon. Justice McGillivray, for whom I entertain as high a regard in his judicial capacity as the hon. member for Antigonish.

Mr. KING. I do not wish to take up time more than is necessary, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maddin) has mentioned as the employees have, but the government, and if I understood the force of his remarks, he would have the country believe that, in some way, due discretion had not been exercised by the government in the choice. I would like to point out to my hon. friend the circumstances under which the choice was made in each instance. In the first place, the companies have the opportunity to name a member of the board, as the employees have, but the government's opportunity to make the appointment does not come until the company has either refused to name a man or has nominated some one whom it is impossible to appoint. This afternoon, in the House, the hon. gentleman asked me if I had observed the petition from the miners of Port Morien with regard to the member of the board named by the company. I mentioned to him that I had refused to appoint the nominee of the company because I had understood he had direct interest or was a shareholder in the concern affected. I then named a member because they refused to name any other member of the board. I named the mayor of Sydney Mines, believing him to be a person who would act fairly on behalf of the company. My hon. friend will say he is a government appointee. But it was not due to any desire on the part of the government that the appointment was made, but because one of the parties failed to name a representative that could be accepted. In selecting a man where either of the parties refuse to name one, my hon. friend will see that our only desire can be to select an impartial man who would be as far as possible acceptable to the interest concerned. If it is the men who have refused to nominate, then some one acceptable to the men should be appointed. I think in some cases the men did refuse to nominate, and in those cases I nominated a man who, I thought would be acceptable to them, and at the same time would give confidence to the community in general. As to the appointment of the chairman, the remaining member of the board, the two parties selected have in the first instance an opportunity to agree upon the chairman; the government has nothing to say in the matter unless they fail to agree, and then we have to appoint the chairman. The idea always is to get some person who, there is reason to believe, will act with strict regard to the justice of the situation. In the province of Nova Scotia I was aware of the fact that the struggle was largely a union struggle, that there was hardly an employer in the mining district of the province who had not taken sides one way or the other, and there was hardly a representative of labour whose views on the question involved were not already known. Therefore, in choosing a chairman, I sought to find some impartial person, and made selections from members of the judiciary, believing they would have no personal ends to serve. I share my hon. friend's admiration for Professor Shortt, and would have appointed him on one or two of these boards if he had been available. But he had already been appointed as chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and for that reason he was not selected. As to the question of legislation compelling recognition of the unions, if the hon. gentleman has any legislation which he would like the government to consider and will submit it, it will be considered. But I would point out that in the province of Nova Scotia at the present time one of the features to be considered is the fact that you have two unions that are seeking recognition, and that is the main difficulty in Nova Scotia at the present time. There are the United Mine Workers' Association asking the employers to recognize them, and the Provincial Worker's Association asking the employers to recognize them. There you have two labour organizations, each seeking to be recognized by one employer.

Mr. MADDIN. That is not so in Springhill.

Mr. KING. No, but it is in the other two cases. Any law enacted would have to be applicable to all cases, and I cannot think of any law that I could recommend to this House which would meet a situation of that kind, and compel an employer to recognize one union as against another union which is also asking for recognition.

Mr. MADDIN. What objection could there be to legislation which would compel an employer to recognize any union to which his men belonged? Supposing there were ten unions.

Mr. KING. It depends upon what the hon. gentleman means by recognition. There are different degrees of recognition, one might involve a contract with the union, and one might not involve a contract. If what my hon. friend means is allowing an employee the right to belong to any organization which he chooses, I think that is a liberty which every man should have. On the same ground I hold the view that an employer should be free to say whom he shall employ, that is a matter of individual liberty. If you concede to the one the right to belong to any organization he chooses, you cannot take away from the other the right to employ whoever he pleases.

Mr. CROSBY. What would the minister say where there are two organizations? In the county of Cape Breton a large majority of the men, four-fifths of the men, I believe, belong to the United Mine Workers' Association. Why should they not be recognized as well as the other fifth? Is it not reasonable that the great majority of the working men who belong to the United Mine Workers' Association should be recognized by the employer?

Mr. KING. The membership may be divided, as my hon. friend has indicated. But a couple of years ago I think the large majority belonged to the Provincial Workingmen's Association. The position may have changed since then, and it may change again. I don't see that it is going to be possible on the ground of mere numbers to lay down a general rule that is going to be applicable to all cases. I take the same view with regard to membership in labour organizations that I take with regard to membership in any other organizaation. A man has a right to belong to the Conservative party, a man has a right to belong to the Presbyterian church, and he has the same right to belong to a trades union. But I do not think we can force an employer to employ only Presbyterians, or Conservatives, or trade unionists.

Mr. CROSBY. But does not the minister think that minorities have a right to be recognized as well as majorities? The Conservatives are a minority in this House, but does he not think they should be recognized?

Mr. KING. I have regard for minorities as well as for majorities. The other evening, in the course of the debate, my hon. friend mentioned that when Mr. Acland, the deputy minister, visited Sydney in September, 1909, to inquire into the conditions of the coal-fields there, Mr. Acland did not go to call upon him, and in fact that he only saw him as he was about to leave South Sydney for North Sydney. Mr. Acland was not here at the time and, of course, I could not reply. But, I may say, in justice to any officer of the government who is not in a position to put his own case before the House when a statement has been made against him, that it is only proper that I should state the circumstance myself. I know that my hon. friend would be the first who would wish that this should be done. Mr. Acland has given me a memorandum on the point and I will just read his own statement as I asked him to make it:

I spent from Wednesday, September 1, to Monday, September 6, in Sydney and vicinity. This period included one Sunday and one holiday (Labour Day). I called at Mr. Maddin's law office in Sydney on two occasions and left an official card. The dates of these calls were Friday, September 3, and Saturday, September 4. On each occasion I was told that Mr. Maddin was at court. My investigations compelled me to be principally out of Sydney or I should doubtless have called more often. I did not learn until later that the court that Mr. Maddin had been attending was at Glace Bay. On Monday, September 6, the courts and offices being closed (it being Labour Day), I hoped to find Mr. Maddin at his house, and called there at 9.30 a.m., but Mr. Maddin having no telephone at his house I was unable to make an engagement. I was again unsuccessful, Mr. Maddin having left for a picnic at Port Morien; I again left my card with the message that if Mr. Maddin would telephone me at the Sydney hotel I would come out to see him at such time as he named. Mr. Maddin kindly came in the evening to the Sydney hotel, instead of making an engagement, and spent an hour in my room discussing the situation. Mr. Maddin falls into a slight error in stating that I was anxious to leave to go to North Sydney to see the representative of the north riding. I had, when I met

Mr. Maddin, only just returned from North Sydney and I had reserved the evening in the hope of meeting Mr. Maddin. My memory and my notes on the subject are clear. I think I understand how Mr. Maddin's error occurred. Nine months later, in June, 1910, I was again in Sydney and vicinity for the purpose of making some inquiries into matters relating particularly to North Sydney. On this occasion I met Mr. Maddin by accident just as I was about to catch the boat to North Sydney and I was pleased again to have the opportunity of discussing matters with him. I do not remember mentioning the name of the member for north riding or stating that it was my intention to see him, but it was naturally my intention to speak with him on the subject of my investigation, should I chance to find him.

I think my hon. friend will desire that this statement should go on record because it is an explanation which I feel sure that he will be the first to accept.

Mr. MADDIN. I have not the slightest objection to its going on record. I could not prevent it from going on record when it is read in the House even if I wished to. The deputy minister says that when he called at my office on Friday and Saturday and left his official card there he got the reply that I was at court but did not know until Monday that I had been attending the court at Glace Bay. He knew I was solicitor for the men and he would naturally infer that I was at Glace Bay. As a matter of fact, I live fully a mile by the car-track from my office in the direction of Glace Bay, and I had my mail brought to my house every morning. A note would have found me, and a card left at my office would not. I was not going to my office during that time. On the Monday evening, after coming in from the picnic, I went down to see the deputy minister and my recollection is, as I expressed it here two weeks ago to-night, that he said he was going over to see Mr. McKenzie. I have my diary on the matter, not in Ottawa but at home, and I have a memo of the date upon which I met him, and of what took place between us. I had no desire to place Mr. Acland in a false light or misrepresent him. But, it was a very simple matter to have found out from the officers of the United Mine Workers', whom I presume he would see on the Friday or Saturday if he went down there to inquire as between the contending parties, exactly where I was because I left every morning at eight o'clock, sometimes at seven, went out to Glace Bay and returned in the evening, sometimes at six o'clock and sometimes not till later. I submit that the mere leaving of a card at my office, even although it bore the name and designation of the deputy minister, was not what I would call a very sincere effort to come in contact with me. My stenographer could have told him what court I was engaged in, and at what point. He should have been able to infer that my duties were in Glace Bay and not Sydney, knowing that I was the solicitor of the men. However, it may be that he did not know that. If he did not know that I was the solicitor of the men then I submit that his conduct in that regard is not open to the same criticism. However, I am very glad that he has this explanation to make, and I only regret that he has not some further explanation to make with regard to where he got his information that the strike was a political one, and had its origin in my running against John Moffatt for grand secretary, which took place seven years before the strike.

Combines Investigation Act, $10,000.

Mr. BEST. Would the minister tell us if he has had any investigation of combines, and if so, what has been the result?

Mr. KING. Up to the present time there have been no investigations of combines under this Act. One application is pending before Judge Cannon of the Superior Court of Quebec on behalf of certain parties who have asked for an investigation into an alleged combine known as the United Shoe Machinery Company. I understand that Judge Cannon will give his finding to-morrow as to whether or not he shall order an investigation in that case. There have been a good many inquiries received by the department for copies of this Act and for the forms which have been drafted under it. I think that the purpose of the Act has been served in part owing to the simple fact of its being on the statute-book because parties know it is there, and they have been more guarded in their actions.

Post Office Department, salaries, $561,080.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is an increase of $12,320, composed of statutory increases, as follows: 16 of $100 each, 224 of $50 each, 3 of $30 each, and one of $2.

Mr. LAKE. When does the annual postal guide come out?

Mr. LEMIEUX. If the hon. gentleman will send me his requisition I will be glad to send him any number that he requires.

Contingencies, $64,800.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Could the minister give any information with respect to the newspaper item about a new issue of stamps?

Mr. LEMIEUX. We intend to issue a new issue of stamps before the coronation, with the head of His Majesty King George V. We are in correspondence with the High Commissioner, Lord Strathcona, and I expect within a few weeks to have a copy of that stamp to lay before the House.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to ask a few questions with regard to the salaries of inspectors and railway mail clerks.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I suppose my hon. friend has in mind the proposed increase in salary to the mail clerks. That will come later on. I received a delegation of railway mail clerks the other day, and am to give the railway mail clerks the increase to which they are entitled.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. About what would the increase be?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not think I would be justified in saying in advance what the increase will be. The deputy minister and I have made up our minds, but the matter has to go before Council. The House will not be disappointed in the measure. I personally intend to give them a substantial increase.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does it cover all the railway mail clerks?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. BEATTIE. I hope the minister will be liberal in this. I find some first-class railway mail clerks drawing no higher salaries than some messengers in Ottawa.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There are two classes of railway mail clerks. We have some who have not passed the examinations required by the Post Office Act, and, of course, they must pass that examination before being entitled to the railway mileage. It is difficult with the increase of mail matter and of the railway mail service to ask from any applicant that he should pass his examination. Generally they are employed for a probationary period, and then after they have passed their examination they are entitled to their mileage. The mileage differs according to the service to which they are attached. For instance, a railway mail clerk having a service between Ottawa and Montreal would receive less than one who runs between Ottawa and Toronto, or London. We generally give the longest runs to the older mail clerks as they get the larger mileage. Of course, there is a grade to which they are entitled according to the length of service they have had in the department.

Mr. BEST. I wish to ask about the salaries of rural postmasters.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I had the pleasure of increasing their salaries two or three years ago. My hon. friend knows that some years ago the rural postmasters received only a pittance, $12 a year was the minimum. Of course, there is always a minimum and a salary, according to the revenue of each office. Sir William Mulock increased that salary from $12 to $25, and I increased it to $35. I have had representations for a further increase, and it is under consideration. I cannot say at present if their request will be favourably received, but it is under consideration.

Mr. BEST. While I have no fault to find with the salaries of any servants here in the House, and I think some of them are not receiving enough, there is no employee in any department of the government as badly paid as rural postmasters. You have a daily mail for 300 days in the year, and they get $35. The government of a country like Canada should not ask any one to keep open house for 300 days in the year for $35, or possibly with a larger revenue, $60. They should get fair play with the rest of the employers of the Dominion of Canada. I think they have been imposed on in the past, and if they do not take the amount offered in many cases the post office is taken away. In my county our post office was closed up for a day, and it was almost impossible to get any one to take it. We offered $35 and $145 for carrying a daily mail 9 miles, or 50 cents a trip.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of course, my hon. friend is aware that the mail contracts are all made under contract and by tender, and I am bound by the Post Office Act to give them to the lowest tenderer. Under $200 I am, of course, at liberty to increase the amount, according to the increase of mail matter and to the cost of living. In the last two or three years I have taken it on myself, after investigation by the inspectors, to sometimes increase the mail contracts. But when it is beyond $200 I must call for tenders. As regards the pay of rural postmasters, when I say that the matter is under serious consideration by the department at present, it is no vain word, for it is being seriously considered.

Mr. BEST. The case I mention was not really a contract. We asked for a daily mail service, and we were refused unless we got the mail carried for $145. We succeeded in getting a man to keep the post office for $35, and carry the mail for $145. But we think it is hardly fair to ask any man to carry the mail nine miles and make 300 trips a year for $145. I hope the minister can see his way clear to give the postmasters in the rural parts of the Dominion a substantial increase in their allowances.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would ask my hon. friend to give me in writing the facts he has stated, and I will certainly take a favourable view of the matter.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I understand that in regard to all the items passed to-night, the Postmaster General will allow them to be discussed at a future time, when his estimates come up again.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I told my hon. friend this afternoon that when postal matters come before the House, it is understood that any question may be brought up concerning post office matters, and I shall be only too pleased to answer them.

Mr. RUSSELL. There is an item here of $50 for inspecting letter carriers' boots. How are the contracts let for the manufacture of these boots? Are they all made at one place for the whole Dominion, or at different places ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are made at different places. We have contractors in all the large cities.

Mr. RUSSELL. What is the name of the contractor in Toronto ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not remember at present.

Mr. RUSSELL. The reason I have brought this matter up is, that I know a very good man in Toronto, who has a well-equipped establishment for making these boots and who would be very pleased to have the contract, and would give good satisfaction.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Tell him to send his application to the department.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What has the minister to say with regard to doing something for the family of R. C. Curren, a railway mail clerk in the Owen Sound district, I believe, who was killed while on service ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The case is under the consideration of the department. Of course, the family of a railway mail clerk has always a recourse against the railway company. The department is not necessarily responsible in the case of an accident. Each case is considered by the department, and if it is thought that a compassionate allowance should be given, it is provided for in the estimates and voted by parliament. But we cannot lay it down as a general policy that in every case there will be a compassionate allowance. In any case, there is no recourse in law against the department. It is only a matter of equity, and in such a case, the House may be satisfied that I will do my duty.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. When Sir William Mulock was Postmaster General, in 1903, on the 29th of June, he made this statement in the House:

> I have been for a long time contemplating some provision by which the government should decree by statute the payment of a bonus, or a compassionate allowance to the family of a railway mail clerk losing his life in the service, or to himself in case of accident. I am not aware that parliament has ever paid a compassionate allowance to the family of a railway mail clerk who has lost his life in the service, until the present government invited parliament to do so, when parliament unanimously agreed to the proposition. It has been our policy ever since coming into power to give a compassionate allowance of $2,000, a fixed sum, to the dependents of a railway mail clerk who has lost his life in the service. But we have not deemed it wise to put that policy into the Act of parliament.

He continued to emphasize that position found a case such as I understand that of the late Mr. Curran, he would grant that amount of money without hesitation. I would also call to the attention of the hon. minister another case. Of course he is well aware of the death of the late Mr. Todd, of London district, who lost his life between Goderich and Buffalo. I hope the minister will deal with that case within reasonable time, and in the same spirit as that in which Sir William Mulock said he dealt with similar cases.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have no objection to following the policy laid down by Sir William Mulock, but of course my hon. friend will understand that when, as in the case of Mr. Curran, his widow, as I am informed, received from the railway company or the insurance company some $3,000 or $4,000 or $5,000, the urgency is not so great. Each case is examined and dealt with on its own merits.

Mr. BEATTIE. In the case of Mr. Tye who lost his life between Goderich and Buffalo, I do not see how you could make the railway responsible unless it was held liable for the accident. If not held liable by the coroner's jury, damages could not be recovered from it. There should be some provision to meet a case of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The department will presently take that matter up. We always take a humane view of these cases.

Mr. BEATTIE. I hope the hon. minister will also take into consideration the mail clerks in the post office. In the city of London, their work has been doubled. There the mails are transferred north and south and east and west, and the work of the clerks is very heavy. These clerks have not had the increases to which they are entitled, and have been given those in Ottawa. I might remind the minister that if prices have advanced in Ottawa they have also advanced in London. These men have to dress their families and live respectably, and some of them have very low salaries, not larger than those of messengers in the departments at Ottawa.

Mr. MADDIN. I would like to ask if it is the intention of the government to bring in this session a superannuation Act for the benefit of the civil service, such as mail clerks, letter carriers, railway mail clerks and the outside service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is a question of policy for the government to determine, and on which I could not pronounce at this moment. Superannuation was abolished some years ago, and I have not heard of its being revived, although, I may say, that had I been in the government at that time I might not have supported any such policy. But we are seriously considering the advisability of giving the railway mail clerks and all such employees, a relief, and before the session is through, I hope I shall be able to satisfy my hon. friend. My hon. friend has been very insistent on this point. He has frequently asked that the department should do a little better for the railway mail clerks, and I must congratulate him on the pertinacity on their behalf.

Mr. MADDIN. Is there any provision in the estimates for an increase?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It would be later on. On account of the Post Office Act I would have to introduce it by resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). As the hon. minister is contemplating some amendments to the Post Office Act, I would like to call his attention to the situation of men who entered the railway mail service before they were 30 years of age. Under the law, unless they pass an examination before reaching that age, they cannot be permanently employed. I have a couple of cases in my mind of considerable hardship. It is rather unfortunate that men perfectly eligible to enter the service and who did enter it at an age somewhat less than thirty, and who for some reason were prevented from passing the examination until they had passed that age, are now not allowed to pass it and cannot be put on the permanent list. It seems to me that there ought to be an amendment to the law which would enable employees who have passed that age, but who are able to pass the examination, to be allowed to do so and be made permanent. I would ask the hon. minister if he intends submitting any amendment to that effect.

Mr. CROSBY. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, but I would add that there are some men in the service, perfectly competent, who, perhaps, will never be able to pass the examination. A man may pass the examination and yet not be competent for the position of railway mail clerk, because that position demands certain qualities of nerve and physique which every one does not possess. A man might not be able to pass a technical examination and yet be a very competent mail clerk and a very competent man on the train. I know of one case where a most excellent mail clerk tried on two or three different occasions to pass. I do not know whether he succeeded in passing in his last attempt, but I do know that he is a very competent man, and I think there should be some provision for keeping such men in the service, but when taking on new men it might be well to have them undergo an examination.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This question of examination for the railway mail clerks has many difficulties, not only in the east, but especially in the west. It is difficult to get proper men to act as railway mail clerks who can pass this examination. This is so much the case that nearly 25 per cent of our railway mail employees are engaged as labourers. Until recently I could not pay these more than $1.50 per day, and yet they are, as a rule, very excellent railway mail clerks. They could not, however, pass an examination, and consequently they had to be employed as labourers. Lately, however, I brought the matter up before the Council, and Council decided that after six months, if these men gave satisfaction I might pay them $2 per day. My view is that we should make those examinations more pertinent to the work rather than covering the field of knowledge that is at present required.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not the minister think that the examination that has to be passed by the clerks in post offices, is a proper one for the railway mail clerks to pass? Does not he think that a railway mail clerk should be as well qualified as a postal clerk ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The clerk in a city post office has to do a certain class of work and that alone. But the railway mail clerk is, as has been said, ' a postmaster on wheels.' He has to command all the different branches of knowledge required of the postmaster of a large post office. Therefore, he must be better equipped mentally than the man who is merely given a certain piece of work to do during the day. Besides, more regard should be had for the railway mail clerk, who, as stated by my hon. friend a moment ago, has to travel, with all that that implies of nervous strain and danger to health and absence from home, than to one who serves in the city post office from about eight in the morning to about four or five in the afternoon. I take all that into consideration, and I intend to see that justice is rendered to whomsoever justice is due.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to hear the minister say that, for I think he is on the right track to do something for the railway mail clerks. I have heard it said that the railway mail clerk was only a stamper and sorter, but have always believed with regard to them, what the minister has just stated.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is it the intention of the minister to place the railway mail service under the Civil Service Commission ?

Mr. MACDONALD. I hope it is not the intention of the minister to do anything of the kind.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister is surely capable of answering the question.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong) may think I am purporting to answer the question, but that is not the case. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wishes to place these officers under the Civil Service Commission or not, but I do not think it should be done. The hon. member for East Toronto, has told us why. The case of the railway mail clerks is a special one, and ought to be dealt with specially. I do not think the law, as it stands to-day, permits of due recognition of the special conditions under which the railway mail clerks serve. If they were put under the hard and fast rules of the Civil Service Commission, it would be still more difficult to recognize their special conditions. I venture to interrupt my hon. friend to say that I hope that the minister entertains no such view.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It is quite out of the ordinary to see a member butt in and answer for the minister.

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not pretend to answer; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong), knows that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Postmaster General is capable of answering without assistance. I think the question is a fair one, and one that I am justified in asking.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There was a time—to use the language quoted by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), the other day, in my green and salad days—when I did hope that we could put all the outside service under the Civil Service Act. That was my view two years ago, and even last year. But the more I go into the post office work, and the more I come in contact with the outside service, and the more I see of the working of the new Civil Service Act, the more I am convinced that the railway mail clerks especially, could not be brought under the Civil Service Act. It is too exacting a law. I may tell the House very candidly that it is difficult for the department at Ottawa, even with the university men, who pass very brilliant examinations, before Messrs. Shortt and Larochelle, to get the practical men we want. Of course, after a while, the university men, the young students, become quite able to perform the work. But in the case of a service like the railway mail service, it would be impossible to get the work done if we had to apply to the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa, and employ men only as they could send them to us. As to the railway mail service, you have no idea, Mr. Chairman, of the difficulty we have, especially in the west, to get the proper men. The young men will not take the office of railway mail clerk. They object to it, and ask for pay which we cannot afford to give and to which they are not entitled. The railway development of the country is so great, and the service is increasing so rapidly and its extension is so large that it would be impossible for us to depend upon a supply of railway mail clerks through the Civil Service Commission. I had the idea a year or two ago that it could be done, but I must recant and say that the railway mail service, in my judgment, must always remain an outside service. As regards the large city post offices like Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, Toronto, Winnipeg, the supply of officers needed during the rush seasons, is also a difficult matter. I am studying that point. My views are shared by the highest officers of my department. But, in my judgment, we should try to bring these officers under the Civil Service Commission. I hope to be able to do it some day, but it is a question to be carefully studied, before deciding the point.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The minister said something a short time ago about the labourers in the city post offices. Does not he think it beneath his dignity to employ a lot of clerks and call them labourers for the sole purpose of evading the provisions of the Act ? Does he not think it would be better to amend the Act in such a way as to allow him to employ these people under their proper title as clerks ? The matter is referred to in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Unfortunately, the law will not allow me to give them any other name than that of labourers. But there is nothing infra dignitatem in that name. We are all labourers—my hon. friend is a labourer; I am a labourer. The law is such that it provides that a special examination should be passed. That is for the protection of the government, of the minister and the department.

Mr. RUSSELL. Would they not come under the head of porters ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Some do; for instance, those who carry on the exchange of mails at Toronto, Montreal and other large places. There are porters—regularly empoyees. But others who have some qualifications, but are not ready to take the examination, are needed in the rush seasons in the large post offices. They are appointed as labourers. I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor, New Westminster) that those who want to come in are not ashamed to come in under the title of 'labourers' provided they get a suitable salary.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think it was beneath the dignity of a minister of the Crown to employ a lot of persons in an occupation where he was not authorized by law to appoint them, and to beat the devil around the bush by calling them labourers. That was the dignity I referred to.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If the hon. gentleman reads the correspondence exchanged between the Auditor General and my department, he will find that we had not recourse to that class of men in order to carry out the work of the department, otherwise it could not be carried out. At the Christmas season and at Easter, in all the large cities, we had to take a certain number of men on temporarily and pay them as labourers. I explained that to the Auditor General. It has been the custom for many years.

Mr. BURRELL. The minister suggested that there was a good deal of difficulty in getting the right class of labour for the various branches of his department. I did not understand whether it was owing to the defective education supplied by our universities that he was getting an inferior class of men, or whether it was that the men were not sufficiently paid. I believe throughout my hon. friend's department the men are not paid in proportion to their responsibility. It is my opinion that of all the departments in the government the last one that can be justified in showing a surplus is the Post Office Department. It is a matter of such tremendous utility and importance to the whole people of the country, that too much attention cannot be paid to the officers who administer it. He said he had difficulty in getting adequate and capable men in the west for railway clerks and other branches of his department. The further west he goes the higher wages he will have to pay all round, and unless you pay adequate remuneration you are not likely to get the class of men that you need. The Postmaster General cannot afford to be niggardly in that respect. I have in my hand a request that meets with a good deal of sympathy from me, it is a memorial signed, I believe, by some 6,000 postmasters. Here are the requests they make:

1. An increase in salary to meet the sharp advance in the cost of living.
2. An increase in the rent allowance, and the placing of it on the straight percentage basis.
3. Necessary supplies, such as twine, ink, pens, pencils, &c., to be furnished by the department.

Now, these are all reasonable requests, especially the last one.

4. The postmasters to be given greater protection in the purchase of good equipment for offices.
5. That offices be classified, and a system of promotion (optional for a time) be established, with a view to promoting greater efficiency and permanency.

I think the postmasters deserve our sympathy in that request. There is no doubt that greater efficiency and permanency would be promoted by placing the postmasters on a civil service basis. The day has come for the government to take a step forward in that direction.

6. Better newspaper labelling, with a view to greater despatch and accuracy.
7. Full recognition of the association by the government, that postmasters may establish a system of post relief and make suggestions from time to time.
8. That a copy of the Postmaster General's report be sent to each accounting office.

I am sure the Postmaster General will see the reasonableness of a request like that. I am getting requests continually from postmasters for a copy of the Postmaster General's Report, and I have no doubt the postmasters would read it with more interest than the members of this House read it.

9. That where safes are advisable, they be furnished by the department.
10. Throwing the civil service insurance open to postmasters.
11. A more adequate night service.

At this hour of the night I do not propose to discuss the merits of each one of these claims, but I feel sure they will all appeal to the Postmaster General's sense of justice. They all seem entirely reasonable. He must remember that upon this class of men great responsibilities are thrown, they are men from whom every one of us requires the very full performance of small duties as well as great. I think a generous recognition should be given to this class of the public service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This petition has already been forwarded to me by the Postmaster's Association, and by several members of the House. It is under consideration by the department.

Mr. BURRELL. Favourable?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would not say favourable consideration for each particular item, but it is being considered very seriously by the department. We have always taken their part in the past, at least I take credit for doing so. If they have had an increase in their salary they owe it to me. I am glad my hon. friend has made these remarks as an adjunct to the petition presented by the Postmasters' Association.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to endorse what my hon. friend has said in favour of that petition. I would also take this occasion of asking the minister whether there is anything in this item for a post office at Central Park, as to which we had some conversation last year. It is near New Westminster.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have not got the papers before me. Is the condition the same as it was last year?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I heard that the minister's deputy had visited the locality this year and had given the people some encouragement.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If my deputy has given the Central Park people some encouragement, my hon. friend may rest assured that the post office will be established, because he generally goes one better than the Postmaster General. He has been there to see what the requirements are. I think he found great improvement in that particular section of British Columbia ; he found a new Vancouver, a new New Westminster and a new Victoria. He was much surprised to see the increased population and business in those cities. He spent a month there at the request of the Prime Minister, who took my place during my absence.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). If the minister will refer to his deputy he will find that the representations I made last year as to Central park were fully borne out. The minister will remember that the office was closed, and another office bearing the same name was established about a mile away. We had a long conversation about it last year, and the minister promised to give it attention.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will have a report upon it.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like to point out to the minister that while the boundaries of Vancouver city have very recently been extended so as to come very close to where the post office at Central park was, that would not be an adequate reason for not reopening that office because, following on the extension of the Vancouver boundaries that far, there has been opened up another district which will add as much on the east of that old Central Park post office as will be taken off in the west for inclusion in the Vancouver service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is there a street railway service there?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). There is the Interurban tram which passes through Central park from Vancouver to New Westminster. But the district is settling very fast, and although half of the persons who petitioned the department have now been included in Vancouver and will get the city service there will, in a few months, be some other places contiguous to Central Park who will require post office facilities. I would be glad if the minister would inquire into the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will have to take the case up with my deputy.

Mr. HERRON. I have had some correspondence along the same line as that read by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) and I would heartily agree in the recommendation made by the hon. member that the postmasters in the outside service should be more adequately paid. I think that some more liberal allowance should be made for rent for post offices in smaller towns. I do not know whether an allowance is made or whether the department pays the rent, but I know that in many towns very inferior buildings are used for post office purposes, and that they are not adequate to the proportions and importance of the towns in which they are situated. In many cases very much better post offices could be provided for a very small additional sum.

Mr. DANIEL. I would like to ask the minister if in all cases every clerk in the outside service is treated equally and equitably with regard to statutory allowances and things of that kind. I have in mind now, although I have no list with me that we have in the post office in St. John men who have been there a great many years, and I think, are entitled to larger salaries than they are getting. These men are not getting as much as others who have come in and who occupy what may be called inferior positions, certainly junior positions. It is not encouraging to young men to enter the service if they can see inequalities in the treatment of clerks ahead of them which may possibly be due to changes in government but which ought not to occur under any circumstances. The minister was complaining just now of the difficulty of getting suitable men to occupy positions in the postal service. I think that probably is one of the reasons why he is not as successful as he ought to be. The men, when they go into the government service, go in with the expectation of being treated equitably. Every one expects to be put on the same footing, and to be treated with the same amount of consideration. If the minister expects, as I have no doubt he wishes, to have a contented and satisfactory service, all the officials in his department ought to be able to feel that they would be treated with the same consideration no matter by whom appointed according to their length of service, and things of that kind. Governments change and even the government of which my hon. friend is such an ornament may some day cross to the other side of the House. He would not like to feel that all those gentlemen whom he appointed might suffer on that account, and I think that every official ought to be equitably treated no matter by whom appointed. I think the minister will agree that what I am saying is reasonable, and I hope that he will see to it that no injustice may continue to be done as I think injustice is now being done in St. John.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If my hon. friend (Mr. Daniel) will draw my attention to any such injustice I will certainly do my best to remedy it, but I may inform my hon. friend that as far as I and the head officers of my department are concerned there is no prejudice whatever concerning matters of this kind. Men come into the department after passing the examination required by the Post Office Act, they enter in a certain class and then they go up automatically every year provided that the inspector, the postmaster and the general superintendent agree that the officer has been a faithful employee. It is not to my knowledge that in the many post offices we have in the country any injustice has been done for really it is a shame to deprive a man of his increase merely for political considerations. My hon. friend knows that I am myself a son of a civil servant and I know how in days gone by we were sometimes sad on account of the poor salary that my father received he being the head of a very large family. He never complained himself, he was treated fairly by the ministers of his department although he was known to be a good Grit himself. I want to see the same fairness shown towards all the employees to-day as the ministers of old extended to my own father. It is not to my knowledge that any man has been deprived of his increase on account of his political proclivities. I can assure my hon. friend that if any case arises where in his judgment, or in the judgment of an employee, an injustice has been done he has only to report the case to me, and I will see that it is dealt with in fairness and equity.

Mr. DANIEL. The first time I am down home I will look up this matter and bring it to the notice of the minister.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the minister know of a Bill considered in the Senate last year dealing with superannuation, and is there any likelihood it will reach the House this session?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think it was considered by the Senate as an academic proposition. Of course that question would have to be decided by the government. Many wise people think we should return to the superannuation system.

Mr. CROSBY. I was glad to hear the minister is increasing the salaries of postal clerks and railway mail clerks. So many new post offices are being erected by the Public Works Department that the Postmaster General will be relieved of many rental charges and I anticipated that this increase would be made. I would suggest that no clerk in the postal service living in the city should get less than $1,000 a year. The salary of $400 which used to be the minimum was quite insufficient. I believe there is no man in the country who ought to be protected by parliament to the same extent as the civil servant if he faithfully discharges his duty. I wish to mention the case of a lady in Halifax who was in the service some years ago and then left the service and owing to circumstances over which she had no control returned to it. In the meantime she was deprived of the advantage that would come to her of superannuation. Representations have been made and I hope the case will be favourably considered.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will take up the case.

Mr. CROSBY. We have some cases in Halifax, such as have been referred to by the hon. member for St. John, of men who complain of being in the department many years but who have been caught up to by younger men.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The deputy informs me he has instructed Mr. Ross to prepare a list of the men who have been long in the service in order to review their salaries.

Mr. CROSBY. We have also many cases of poorly paid rural postmasters in my district, one Mr. Wesley Crooks, who has been in the postal service for 46 years, who has a daily mail which must have increased greatly in that time, and is now getting what he commenced with, $30 a year and nothing for rent. I trust the Postmaster General will be particularly kind to that gentleman. It is so long since he entered the service that I forget the politics of the government in power at that time. I know this man very well, and I think he has been postmaster for some 46 years, which would indicate that he is pretty well up in years. His name is Crooks, and the name of the place is Peggy's Cove. He is a very active and capable man, and I think is entitled to some reasonable increase.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will look into the matter.

Mr. LAKE. I wish to ask that a small post office in the province of Saskatchewan called Lajord should be made an accounting post office. It has considerable revenue and it would be a great convenience to the town and district.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will make a note of it, and if it is possible it will be done.

Mr. FRASER. Does the same schedule of salaries for postmasters prevail in the east as in the west?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is a special allowance to the west.

Mr. FRASER. Some post offices in the east have been closed, while in the west new post offices are being opened. Some have been closed in my own riding, though they have been open for over 40 years. One has been closed at New Harmony, the reason given being that the revenue was very small. But there are as many people in the settlement as there were when the office was opened. The reason the revenue is so small is that it has only a tri-weekly service, while the next post office, 3 or 4½ miles distant, has a daily service, and the people go there for their mail, leaving the other office almost forsaken.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will take a note of it.

Mr. FRASER. Another matter. There is a string of nine post offices near Souris, in almost a continuous chain. One carrier carries the mail to all of them, but three or four have a daily mail service, while the others have only a tri-weekly service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am having a report on that very matter at present from the deputy, and as soon as I get it I will send a copy of it to my hon. friend.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the Postmaster General done anything with regard to a free mail delivery in North Toronto?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am going to Toronto on Monday, and that is one of the matters which I am to discuss with Mr. Ross.

Mr. WALLACE. What about the post office at Mimico Beach, which I asked for last year?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will get the papers.

Mr. JAMESON. I observe by the Postmaster General's Report this year that he is claiming a surplus of $743,210.25 on the year's business. I do not suppose that any person except the Postmaster General entertains the idea that the Post Office Department should be a money-making department, and therefore, in view of the very substantial surplus which the Postmaster General has, I do not think I need be at all diffident in pressing this matter upon his attention. There is a request from the residents of Meteghan Centre, in Digby, This village is situated midway between Meteghan and Meteghan River. The mail carrier in travelling from Meteghan station passes through Meteghan River and so on to Meteghan and on the way, necessarily passes through the village of Meteghan Centre. There is no post office at Meteghan Centre, at present, but there are some 50 families resident there, besides a store and milling concern, and the business is increasing. The people therefore feel greatly the need of a post office. When I presented their petition for one, the answer which the department gave me was that inasmuch as there was a post office at Meteghan and one at Meteghan River, and as these were not very far from Meteghan Centre, there did not appear to be any great necessity of a post office at Meteghan Centre. The cost, however, of opening an office would not be very great. I think that the minimum salary which the Postmaster General pays for small offices is $35, and that would be what he would have to pay there. The transportation of the mails would probably not cost anything, because the mail passes through there now on its way to Meteghan, so that the total cost would be only $35 per year for providing the necessary postal facilities for a very prosperous and thriving village and one which has a bright future. Under the circumstances and considering the substantial surplus which the post office department enjoys, I think that the request I make is a very reasonable one.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the distance between Meteghan Centre and the others.

Mr. JAMESON. About two miles each way.

Mr. LEMIEUX. As there is no mail carrier to pay, I think my hon. friend has made out a very good case, and if he would send me over the papers, I think I can meet his views.

Mr. JAMESON. Do I understand the minister to say that he is convinced because if not, I have more facts which I would present and which will make the case still stronger.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend says it is two miles from each office.

Mr. JAMESON. Approximately. I have travelled the road many times, and that is the distance to the best of my judgment.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is all right.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I hope the minister will allow us to take up matters pertaining to this item at any future time. I intend to emphasize the necessity of rural free mail delivery and there are others not here, who are prepared to take up the same question.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That question must necessarily come up, because I shall have an announcement to make with regard to it.

Mail service, $1,137,700.

Mr. PERLEY. There are some other members who would like to ask questions with regard to this matter and I think the hon. minister should not proceed any further as it is now past midnight and there are very few in the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have other estimates to bring up and every opportunity will be given to ask questions on anything connected with the mails when they are submitted.

Mr. PERLEY. Having passed the first item, I think we have done very well.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I want the whole item of 309 to pass as I require the money, but I give my hon. friend the assurance that if he or any of his friends want to discuss the general item of post offices, there will be no objection whatever, and they will have every opportunity of doing so on other items.

Mr. PERLEY. I think the minister is asking something very unreasonable when he asks us to pass the whole of his estimates at this hour of the night.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have other estimates to bring before the House.

Mr. PERLEY. We have had a long day, and the minister brought on his estimates very late. He can hardly expect us to pass this whole item covering an expenditure of over $8,000,000 with so few members here. I myself have a good many questions to ask, and I do not think that I should be forced to enter into a discussion at this late hour. We have had a very long day as it is.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am in the hands of the House, but I understood that I had made an arrangement with the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), and until my friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) made an objection, there was no disposition to prevent this item going through.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I did not understand that all these estimates were to go through in an hour's time. We have passed some $4,000,000 already, and I think we ought to stop there and give opportunity for further discussion.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Suppose we leave 'miscellaneous' and carry the mail service.

Mr. LAKE. These different estimates are all part of the one item, and you cannot hold over an item in part and pass it in part.

Mr. LEMIEUX. You can leave the last item.

Mr. DANIEL. The Postmaster General will understand that all these estimates are part of the one item 309, and either the whole of item 309 stands or it passes. I appeal to the chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I, of course, am only too willing to respect any arrangement that both sides may come to; but if objection be raised, there are certain rules of procedure which I may be compelled to enforce.

Mr. LAKE. All the four services are under the one item, and it can be of no use to the Postmaster general to pass three-quarters of them and not the other quarter.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not wish to insist more that I should. But I thought we had discussed very fully every item. However, at the special request of my hon. friend (Mr. Perley) I waive any objection I might have.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Lemieux, House adjourned at 12.20 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 130) for the relief of Matilda Emo—Mr. Hodgins.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. LENNOX. I desire to call the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to an item appearing in the English 'Morning Post,' of the 18th February, in which they refer to the approaching Imperial Conference, and point out that many of the overseas Dominions have sent in an outline of important proposals which they propose to submit to the conference—from New Zealand 15 or 16 various resolutions looking to better communication and better carrying facilities; from Australia about the same number from South Africa, and so on. This item is headed:

NO SUGGESTIONS FROM CANADA.

And it says:

A White Paper was issued last night containing the suggestions made by the governments of the British dominions oversea as to resolutions for discussion at the forthcoming Imperial Conferences.

The main outstanding feature of the correspondence is the passive attitude adopted by Canada. She will take part in the discussion of any subject put forward by the other participants in the conference. She makes no suggestions herself. She gives a guarded welcome to suggestions looking to uniformity as far as practicable in the naturalization laws throughout the empire.

I desire to ask the Prime Minister if it is a fact that with all the important questions looming up concerning this great Dominion and its commercial and other relations with Great Britain and the empire, and with these resolutions now on file and completed, there is no suggestion nothing in the way of initiative from the Dominion of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the Dominion government has no new suggestions to make to the Imperial Conference, which meets this year.

RECIPROCITY NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like to read a paragraph from a letter written by Mr. J. A. Macdonald, the present editor of the Toronto 'Globe, and published in the Stratford 'Herald,' of the 21st inst. I propose to read one paragraph of the letter, and then to ask only one question:

(1) Reciprocity had absolutely nothing to do with my going to Washington a year ago. After the close of a certain libel suit in which I was defendant I sought change and rest. On my way to Atlantic city I dropped off at Washington for a day or two. My presence there would have been unrecognized had not the newspaper men dragged me into the discussion of the American-Canadian tariff situation, then at an acute stage. Once in I made the most of it, and got good newspaper copy for the 'Globe.' I saw Aldrich, Cannon, Lodge, Dolliver, Champ Clark and Secretary Knox. On the third day President Taft sent for me. We discussed tariff matters with a great frankness. He expressed an earnest wish to meet Sir Wilfrid Laurier or some member of the Canadian government at Albany, and asked me to prepare the way. That evening I left for Ottawa. The only man who knew of these things was Ambassador Bryce, with whom I was in daily conferense. Not until I reached Ottawa did Sir Wilfrid know. So far as I am aware he knew nothing of my movements. Therefore, when Col. Hughes charged in parliament that I was the 'unofficial agent' of the government he spoke a falsehood.

(Sgd.) J. A. MACDONALD.

La Jolia, Cal., Feb. 18, 1911.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)) whether or not that was the first communication with respect to the tariff negotiations between this government and the government at Washington.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The brief communication that the government had, was from the President of the United States, inviting Mr. Fielding to meet him at Albany. Mr. Macdonald is right in saying that up to the time of the interview, there had been no communication with him whatever or anybody else.

Mr. FOSTER. Had the communication from Mr. Taft been received before Mr. Macdonald's conference on his return from Washington with Sir Wilfrid Laurier here?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not remember it at all; it may or it may not.

COMBINES ACT—UNITED SHOE MACHINERY COMPANY.

Mr. ETHIER. I wish to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) whether his department has taken any action with a view to an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act, in connection with the complaints made against the United Shoe Machinery Company?

Mr. KING. I have received notification from Mr. Justice Cannon of Quebec that he has granted an order directing an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act into an alleged combine on the part of the United Shoe Machinery Company, and that the documents in connection with the matter are being forwarded to the Department of Labour as soon as received, proceedings will be instituted in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

HOLLAND PEAT BOG.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Has the government been investigating conditions along the shores of the Holland river for the purpose of ascertaining whether peat or other fuel can be obtained there on a commercially profitable basis?

2. If so, what is the result, and what further does the government intend to do?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN:

1. The Holland bog, which covers an area of several thousand acres in the counties of Simcoe and York, was surveyed and examined during the months of November and part of December, 1910.

2. The results of the survey of the entire bog have not as yet been worked out since the map which is in course of preparation is not complete, and the analyses of the different samples of peat which have been taken at various depths are not finished. The results, however, have been worked out for a portion of the southern part of the bog. The peat contained in this portion of the bog is suitable for fuel purposes.

When the map is completed and the results of the survey thoroughly worked out, the commercial value of the Holland bog and the various purposes to which the peat contained is best adapted will be known, and published in a report.

Mr. FISHER.

BEAUSOLEIL INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Have permits been issued to the Indians of Beausoleil reserve, Christian island? If so, upon whose application?

2. To what person, in what locations and for how many acres have the permits been issued in each case?

3. Have the boundaries of the territory included in the permits been blazed by the Indian agent, what instructions have been issued to him as to supervision to prevent waste, fraud and the like, and to what extent have these instructions been carried out?

4. Are any white men engaged in cutting timber on this reserve or island? If so, is this in harmony with the regulations?

5. Have Indians applied for permission to cut timber on Beckwith island, has permission been granted or will permission be granted to them to do this?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Yes, on application of Indians.

2. Permits issued by local agent under instructions, and the department is not aware as to what permits have been issued.

3. The local agent was instructed that each member of the band might be given a permit to cut over an area of one or two acres adjoining existing clearances; that the permits should describe the area to be cut over, after being blazed by the Indian the permits should describe the area to be cleared, fenced and put under cultivation within two seasons, or sown with sufficient grass and clover seed next summer to prevent the growth of noxious weeds. The department has no reason to believe that these instructions are not being carried out.

4. The department has no knowledge of white men being engaged in cutting timber on Christian island. The Indians are required to cut and take out timber themselves under permits.

5. Yes; but the same was not granted.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Who is the Indian agent of Beausoleil reserve, Christian island?

2. When was he appointed, on whose recommendation, is he a practical farmer, what evidence had the department of this at the time of his appointment; was it made a condition of his appointment that he should reside upon the reserve and instruct the Indians in agriculture, cattle feeding and the like, and has he resided on the reserve at any time? If so, during what periods, and is he residing upon the reserve or the island now?

3. In order to attain his object, did the government erect a residence for the agent upon the reserve, and at what cost; has the Indian agent ever resided in this house, and by whom is it occupied?

4. Where does the Indian agent reside, and when did he last visit the reserve?

5. Who was the immediate predecessor of the present Indian agent, and for what alleged cause was he retired?

6. Does the government propose to insist that the agent shall reside upon the reserve?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Mr. H. G. Todd.

2, 3 and 4. He was appointed on the 6th of July, 1910. His name was suggested by the Indians of the band, who stated that he was a good farmer. It was a condition of his appointment that he should reside upon the reserve and give the Indians practical advice in farming. He has moved to the reserve, and from information received he was there a few days ago. A residence was erected for the agent on the reserve at a cost of $3,470.

5. Mr. Charles McGibbon. He was retired because he had no qualifications to give the Indians practical advice on farming.

6. The government proposes to insist that the agent shall reside upon the reserve.

FALSE MINERAL NOTICES.

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Referring to the following circular, which it is alleged is being sent out from Ottawa to the land owners in the township of King, county of York, viz.:—' By order of Professor J. H. Wilson, government analyst, we have entered upon a lot (describing the property) and surveyed, bored, analysed and assayed the soil on said lots, and found it contained deposits of mineral carbon autricht. Operations for development will commence May 1. All transfers, encumbrances and drainage schemes in connection with said lots after the date hereof will be null and void, as the government claims all rights over said lots.

F. H. FORCHET,
Analysis and Search Department.'

Is there in all the patents a reservation of the minerals for the Crown?

2. Has the government authorized these notices?

2. Do the minerals belong to the Dominion or to the province?

4. Does the government intend to carry on mining or any other operations upon these lands? If so, of what character, with what object, when, and to what extent?

5. In any case are the notices not too broad?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The Mr. J. A. Wilson referred to therein is not attached to the Analyst's Branch of the Inland Revenue Department, nor connected in any way with the Mines Department, or Geological Survey, and none of these departments have any knowledge whatever relative to the circular issued by Mr. F. H. Forchet, who is likewise unknown to, and unconnected with any of the departments above mentioned.

THE DOMINION SENATE.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN (Huron) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Dominion Senate as at present constituted is not in accordance with the representative institutions of this country, and the government should take the necessary proceedings to have the Senate made representatives of and directly responsible to the people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution I wish it to be distinctly understood at the outset that I have no particular objection to the personnel of the Senate of Canada. There are able and eminent men in that body; men who have devoted their ability and energy to the welfare of their country and who deserve well from her; men whom any constituency might justly feel proud to have as its representative. I think I may be excused if I mention as representative of this class, Sir Richard Cartwright on the one side, and Sir Mackenzie Bowell on the other. So that, Sir, it is not the thing constituted that I object to so much as the manner in which it is constituted. I believe that the people of this country should and must rule, and I further believe that a life appointed and irresponsible body, a legislating body that is above, and beyond, and out of the reach of the people, is entirely at variance with the representative institutions of this country, and is an anomaly that should not be permitted to exist in any free country.

I am safe in saying that a Senate constituted as ours now is must of necessity be either dangerous or useless. If it runs counter to the will of the people as expressed through this House, then I think it is dangerous, and if it does not do so, in most instances it is useless. I may be pardoned for saying that in so far as our Senate is concerned it belongs to the latter class. I had not the opportunity of listening to the discussion of the resolution introduced this session by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) calling for the abolition of the Senate, but I listened very attentively to the discussion last session and while I can agree with a good deal which fell from my hon. friend in his advocacy of this resolution, I do not agree with the conclusions at which he arrived. I do not think it would be wise or judicious to entirely abolish the Senate and for this reason: As we know, the Senate as at present constituted, is a legacy left by the fathers of confederation, in fact it is a part of the confederation compact. It was instituted and designed for the purpose of protecting the smaller provinces from oppression or aggression by the then larger provinces, and if there was at that time even a suspicion for the necessity of a body of this kind, I think that that necessity is even much greater now, and that it will grow as time goes on, and as the newer western provinces grow in population, power, wealth and aggressiveness. So I do not think it would be wise or judicious to remove from the smaller provinces the protection which was guaranteed to them unless it is shown fairly and conclusively that they are willing to be relieved from this protection. I am not aware that the provinces have given any reason to suppose that they would desire to be relieved from this protection which was given to them as a part of the confederation compact. But there is no reason why an elective Senate, a Senate made responsible to the people, should not be more effective as a protection to these provinces than a Senate appointed by the government of the day, entirely irresponsible to the people and appointed for life, because a Senate elected by the people would represent the will of the people and would of necessity be a greater check upon oppression to the smaller provinces than a body such as we now have, owing its appointment to the government of the day and its members more or less obligated to that government. The Senate may properly be divided into three divisions:

First, those who value their seats as a respectable refuge where they can spend their declining years with ease at the expense of the country. ,

Second, those who value their seats for the social position they gain, and for the facilities afforded for the advancement of their own personal and business schemes.

Third, those who give of their ripe experience and rich, matured judgment for the benefit of the country.

The elective system, I claim, would wipe out the two first classes and relegate them to private life where they properly belong, and would retain for the benefit of the country those who belong to the third class.

Mr. BLAIN. There is no such division now over there?

Mr. McLEAN (Huron). Yes, and they must always exist in such a body appointed as the Senate is.

Let us see for a moment how the situation stands in other countries. An elective Senate is not by any means a new thing. In the commonwealth of Australia six senators are elected for each state for a term of six years, half the number retiring every three years and the entire vote of each state is for each candidate.

In New Zealand, the upper chamber were formerly appointed for life. The term is now limited to seven years.

In South Africa, the last constitution that has been evolved, the first House of Assembly will consist of 121 representatives and the Senate of 64, 16 for each of the four provinces. Eight will be elected in each province, eight will be nominated by the Governor General in Council, four in each province.

In other countries, Mexico, Brazil, and the Argentine Republic, the upper chambers are elective. The same condition exists in the other countries of South and Central America. Canada is the only country in North or South America having life appointees. So it will be seen that this is the only country on the American continent that still continues this antediluvian system. I noticed during the recent discussion that my honoured leader stated that there are many difficulties in making a change in the Senate under present conditions. He has also expressed the opinion that an elective Senate would not be advantageous and that no person in the present day advocates an elective Senate. I agree with my right hon. friend in nearly everything but on this question I must certainly disagree. If I can diagnose public sentiment at all I am convinced that a very large proportion of the people of this country would very much prefer an elective Senate to the system we now have and I have paid very considerable attention to public sentiment on this matter. The objection has been raised to an elective Senate that it would be simply a reflex of this House. I think an elective Senate could be constituted which would not be a reflex of this House, but would represent quite a different constituency from that represented in this House, and I shall endeavour to outline a system which I think will accomplish this object.

In the first place, I would have the country divided into senatorial divisons.

For example, the county to which I belong now sends three representatives to this House. The adjoining county, represented by my hon. friend the Deputy Speaker, sends two representatives. If these two counties were united and sent one representative to the Senate, and the rest of the Dominion were divided in like manner, I think we would have a representation in the Senate considerably different from that in this House. My own county is at present represented by two Conservatives and one Liberal. The adjoining county of Perth is represented by two Liberals. What would be the political colour of the senatorial representative elected by these two counties it would be impossible to say, though I think it possible that he would have strong Conservative leanings. In the second place, I would have the senators elected for seven or ten years, as the case might be. In the third place, I would have a small property qualification for the electorate. At present, in the province of Ontario at any rate, we have practically a manhood franchise. I would have a property qualification for the senatorial electors somewhat similar to what we have now for our municipal elections in this province. I would also have an educational qualification to the extent that I would require that every elector should be able to read and write in his own language. I would also require each elector whose name is on the voters' list to go to the polls and deposit his ballot. This is sometimes termed compulsory voting, and is objected to on that score. I fancy, however, that there is no such thing as compulsory voting. It would be impossible to compel a man to vote for either one candidate or another, and it would certainly be very unjust to do so. But I do not think any injustice would be inflicted on any individual by requiring him at least to attend a polling place and deposit his ballot. If he could not conscientiously vote for any one of the candidates, he could at least deposit his ballot, and in this way show that he was prepared to do his duty. I do not think that it would be an undue hardship to any one. The franchise is a privilege granted by the state to the individual; and if the individual does not think sufficiently of this privilege to exercise it, it certainly would be no hardship or no wrong to deprive him of it for at least a season. Consequently, I would say that every voter whose name is on the list and who fails to attend at the polling booth and at least deposit his ballot unless he can give some reasonable excuse satisfactory to some judicial authority, should have his name erased from the voters' list for the subsequent election, and be disfranchised at any rate to that extent. Now, let us see what the result of this would be. At the last Dominion elections in this country there were on the voters' list 1,461,793 votes. The total vote cast at that election was 1,176,104, leaving 285,689 who did not vote at all. But there were certain elections by acclamation. At these elections there were 22,000 voters, leaving 263,689, or about one-fifth of the voters in Canada who did not record their votes at the last election. In Belgium, where compulsory voting exists, and the only country I know of at the present time where it does exist, at the last election practically the full vote was recorded. So that under this system we would have a large vote brought out which does not appear in the elections to this House, and in that respect, at least, as well as in other respects, we would have a considerably different constituency represented by those who would be elected to the Senate. I would also require the practice of personal canvassing to be prohibited by law. We have been endeavouring long and faithfully in this House to make laws which would ensure electoral purity. I do not know that we have succeeded very well. I do know that we have built up the pains and penalties so high that we are now barely able to see over them, although I must say this for Canada, that I think our elections are as pure if not purer than those of most other countries, and certainly they are as pure as those of the mother country, if we are to judge by the reports concerning the last two general elections there. If we are to judge by these reports, I think our friends in the mother country can give us pointers in the ways that are dark and the tricks that are vain. But notwithstanding that fact, there is a good deal more electoral impurity in connection with our elections in this country than most of us would like to see; and in order to eradicate this evil I think it is necessary to strike at its very root, and strike good and hard. In my humble opinion, this abominable practice of personal canvassing, travelling from concession to concession, from street to street, and from door to door, begging people to come out and vote for you, is demoralizing to the candidate as well as to the elector, and has a very strong tendency to lessen the dignity which should naturally attach to the representative position. It is at this every foundation of much of this electoral impurity in this country. To do away with this evil as much as possible in connection with the senatorial elections, I would make personal canvassing on the part of a candidate an offence that would invalidate the election. I would make personal canvassing on the part of a friend or a supporter of a candidate a ground for disfranchising him at the succeeding election. But in order that the public might be made thoroughly conversant with the public affairs of the country,

I would also require that each candidate should hold a certain number of meetings within the constituency, which should be well advertised and be open to the public, and at which the affairs of the country should be thoroughly discussed.

Another provision which I think would be advisable in connection with an elective Senate would be in reference to the veto power. I do not like the idea of any body having the veto power over this House. But I think that the function of the Senate, constituted as it is now, or as it might be if elected by the people, is that of a revising body. The Senate would have greater leisure to consider the measures passed by this House, and they might secure from this House additional consideration of any measure they might think required such consideration. Consequently, I think it would be advisable to adopt a system such as has been spoken of in the mother country. That is, a measure objected to by the Senate should be sent back to the Commons, and if it should be adopted by the Commons at three successive sessions, it should become law, even though the Senate objected to it. In that respect, the will of the people would receive full expression, the measure would receive proper consideration, and everybody would have an opportunity of consulting with those whom he represented.

I had not intended to speak on this subject to-day, and am not going to take up much time; nor is it necessary to do so. My principal object in bringing this matter before the House was to have it discussed here and in the country. I think the scheme I have outlined is desirable and feasible. Every legislative body in a free country should be directly responsible to the people, and I think I have outlined a scheme, which, although it may be faultily outlined, although it could be, in some respects, improved, it at least lays down a basis on which an elective Senate could be constructed, which would be acceptable and beneficial to the people of this country. In conclusion, I have only to say that I would like to see this government take this matter up earnestly, and give it very careful consideration. I sincerely trust that in their wisdom they will be able to evolve a scheme which will remove from this free country the reproach of having as one of its legislative bodies a body that is entirely irresponsible and over and above the people, and that in this way the government will redeem the only pledge made by the Liberal party when in opposition that has not been already fully redeemed.

Mr. THOMAS BEATTIE (London). I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean). I do not wish to see the Senate either done away with or made elective. The Prime Minister expressed an idea when this subject was previously under discussion that seemed to me a wise one, and that was to make the term of a senator ten or twelve years, and make retirement compulsory at the age of eighty years. To make the Senate elective at this time would be a very serious matter. I agree with those who think it would be well to have the Senate non-partisan. This could be accomplished by having the leaders of the two parties nominate senators turn about. If you have senators elected they must be elected for large districts, each of them covering at least three or four constituencies of this House. You could not expect to get the best men who have reached advanced years to engage in canvassing so large a district. For instance, take the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), or the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson)—I think it would be advisable to have them in the Senate. But you could not expect either of these gentlemen to undertake the work of canvassing a large district with a view to election. I never expect to go to the Senate myself, but I certainly would not wish to go if it were necessary to canvass so large a division in order to obtain the position. But if the Prime Minister's idea were carried out and the senator's term made ten or twelve years, with compulsory retirement at eighty years, I think that the change would be a most desirable one. It is true that there are men who, even after eighty years of age, would be good men for the Senate—there are some of them there now. Still, at an advanced age, as a rule, it is well that men should retire. I hope the head of the present government will carry out the idea that he has expressed.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). I have listened to a great deal of debate in reference to the Senate, and I confess I have never heard any suggestions made that appeared to me advisable to adopt. It is very fashionable to talk against the Senate. I believe that, while they are subject to criticism—or, rather, those who appoint them are subject to criticism—we do not appreciate the Senate to the extent we ought to. For my part, I have no hesitation in saying that, long ago, I formed the opinion that we required a Senate in Canada, and I see no reason to change my mind. But I think we could have a better condition of things in the Senate—just as we might have a very much better condition of things in the House of Commons. There is no use beating about the bush—there is no difficulty in reforming the Senate if we wish to reform it. There are a lot of excellent men in the Senate. But there are some not so excellent, and the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who leads the House knew that before he appointed them. He could have avoided such appointments if he had wanted to; but, if appointments to the Senate are made as reward for stepping down from some other positions, or something of that kind, it must follow—not speaking of any particular gentlemen who got the appointments in these cases—it must follow as a principle that we have bad appointments in the Senate, appointments that never should be made.

When my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) spoke the other day, the First Minister, if I understood him rightly, was in very low spirits. He regretted exceedingly the condition of the Senate, but he regretted it all the more because he was helpless to avoid it—at least, so he wanted us to understand. But I do not understand it in that way. The main difficulty about the Senate is that the gentleman who, for the time being, has in his control the appointments to the Senate will not deal honestly and squarely by the people of Canada in making these appointments. And I want to tell the Prime Minister squarely to his face that, if the Senate is not in the condition to-day it ought to be in—and it certainly is not—he, above all men in Canada, is responsible. And when he wants the House to understand that he is anxious to reform the Senate, I wish to tell him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that he has had for years the opportunity to reform the Senate, that it was his duty to reform the Senate, and that he has not done it. He could have redeemed his promise without any radical action, and, redeeming his promise, he might have had a Senate which would be the pride of Canada to-day.

Now, I do not believe in the scheme of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLean, Huron), I believe we have in our constitution at present, the means of forming an able, trustworthy and efficient body of men, who would be a great safeguard to the people of Canada, if the head of the government would only be reasonably honest, and make fair and honest appointments in the interests of the people. I do not know that I have very much hope that the right hon. gentleman will do that. But even at this late day, I do feel that the First Minister ought to take into his serious consideration whether, in view of the promises he made long ago, perhaps in 1893, in view of his duty in any case, if he never made a promise, in view of the solemn pledges he made upon the hustings that he would introduce a reasonable measure of Senate reform, should be not now, even now, in making appointments to the Senate, be guided, not by political expediency, but solely by the public interest, and I say if he did that, we would very soon have a body of which neither side could complain. I said a moment ago that I did not have much sympathy with those who were always making cheap capital, by decrying the Senate. I like to speak of that body as a representative body of Canadians, a great body under the constitution of Canada. I have much respect for them, and in past times, they have rendered efficient service to Canada; they have stood between the government and great wrongs sought to be done to the people of Canada. I look to the time, even as the Senate is at present constituted, I look with great hope to a day not far distant, when the Senate will assert itself again, when the Senate will show that those members of parliament who have decried them, have not estimated them according to their real worth. I look to the time at no distant day, before we have done with this reciprocity tariff, when probably the Senate of Canada, will, as it was designed to do, stand between a government which has not considered the best interests of the people, and the final perpetration of that government's design; will show by their actions, that above all other bodies in Canada, they can be relied upon in the final resort, to stand fairly and squarely in the interest of Canada, uninfluenced by any body of politicians whatever.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am glad to see that my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) is so sanguine that it is possible to reform the Senate, even without reforming the constitution at all. He looks to the time when the Senate will be up to the high standards which he sets for it, and I suppose there is an alternative of standards. One would meet his views especially if the Senate was composed of angels alone, if the Prime Minister, who is more responsible, I admit, than anybody else, were to select angels, the angel Gabriel and others. I suppose that would meet the views of my hon. friend. If that could not be done, I suppose that a Senate composed of Tories would meet the views of my hon. friend, and I have no doubt that then the Senate would be reformed according to his notions. The difficulty, however, is, that whoever occupies the post which at present, unworthy as I am, I occupy, has to appoint men, and whoever occupies this position will be guided by the motives which generally actuate men. I can assure the House, though perhaps my hon. friend will not believe me—but there are others who will believe me—that in recommendations to His Excellency for appointments to the Senate, I have always thought that I was acting in the best interests of the country. In everything I have done, I have always been actuated by the same motives, I honestly believed that I was serving the best interests of the country. If it were not going out of the scope of this resolution, I might mention the reciprocity question, which my hon. friend first mentioned; I certainly thought that in this matter, we were acting in the best interests of the country, and I may say that, after having heard my hon. friend to the contrary, I have not changed my opinion either.

Mr. LENNOX. I think my hon. friend did not hear much of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. On the contrary, I heard all of it, except the last ten minutes, and I read that part of it; and my hon. friend cannot find fault if I tell him that it was the best part of his speech, because it was composed almost entirely of quotations from myself. So I am perfectly familiar with everything that was said by my hon. friend on that occasion.

This is not the first time that we have heard proposals for the reform of the Senate, discussed in this House; we have had a discussion upon it even during the present session. But the present motion which has been made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McLean) has this advantage over others, that it makes at least some suggestion. All the former motions we have had, have been indefinite in that respect. All pointed to the composition of the Senate as being unsatisfactory, that it did not represent the opinions of the country. But no one who ever made such a motion heretofore offered any practical suggestion. The hon. member for Huron, however, has today made a new departure, he has made a suggestion, a suggestion that we should abandon the present method of appointing the Senate, and adopt a new method, that is to say, that we should substitute an elective for a nominative Senate. My hon. friend, I think, has realized already, that the remedy which he suggests, would hardly be accepted by this House, nor do I believe by the country, at the present moment. The mode of constituting the Senate by appointment, was adopted, I think in 1865, when the present constitution was formed under the old parliament of Canada; that constitution substituted a nominative for an elective Senate. My hon. friend who knows the history of this country is aware, he cannot have forgotten, that in the old regime, under the constitution of United Canada, which was adopted in 1841, we had as a second chamber a nominative legislative council. There was a long and anxious struggle to reform this system, and at last it succeeded, and the second chamber, which was called the legislative council, at that time, was made elective—I forget the exact date, but it was between 1855 and 1860. It must be admitted, however, that the elective system which was then adopted and which came into force about 1860, met with serious objections up till about 1864 or 1865, although a number of very able men were in the council at that day.

Mr. FOSTER. Under the elective system ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes. In Upper Canada, Mr. Macpherson, Mr. Vankoughnet, afterwards Chancellor Vankoughnet, and several other men of great eminence, were brought into the council. In Lower Canada, Mr. Dessaulles, and several others were brought into the Senate, all men of great eminence. But in face of that condition which existed in 1865, the fathers of confederation deliberately abandoned the elective system in favour of the nominative system. My hon. friend, who is an old reformer, will remember that even George Brown, who had been one of the most prominent advocates of the elective system, accepted the nominative system.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman probably knows more about this question than I do, but is it not true that although in 1865 the elective system was left and the nomination system taken for the new confederation, it was done not because the fathers of confederation were convinced that the nominative system was superior to the elective one but because of certain practical considerations; to wit, the fact that there were different provinces coming in, and that they had already nominative executive councils or upper bodies, and it was on that account that the conviction of the fathers of confederation was laid aside for the sake of smoothing temporary difficulties.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As a matter of compromise?

Mr. FOSTER. As a matter of compromise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Well, I would not admit that historically. The two men who had more to do than any others with the framing of the constitution were George Brown and Sir John Macdonald. Sir George Cartier had a great deal to do with it also but it was George Brown and Sir John Macdonald who had most to do with the making of the present constitution. My hon. friend is aware that while George Brown was in favour of the elective system Sir John Macdonald was equally strong in favour of the nominative system. Sir George Cartier was also equally strong in favour of the nominative system, and I believe that the opinion of these two men more than any other factor influenced the decision in favour of the nominative system. I believe that on that occasion George Brown gave in to the views of others at the conference while, if his views had prevailed we might have had an elective instead of a nominative system. But George Brown, very properly I think, yielded his views on that occasion and allowed the views of Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier to prevail, and they were embodied in confederation.

I can agree with my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) that the Senate has not been given all the justice to which it is entitled. It is a very eminent and efficient body. If my hon. friend will accept the statement which I make in perfect sincerity, the only objection I have had in the past, and which I would have at the present time is to be found in the fact that the Senate is too predominatingly under one party. The Liberal party at the present time is the predominating party in the Senate. But, in the olden time, before the accession to power of the present government, the Conservative party was the predominating one ; in fact, when we came into office in 1896 the Liberal party was represented by a mere corporal's guard in that great body. I am asked : Why should you have only one party represented in the Senate? It is easy to make that reproach, it is easy to point to the fact but any man who has been somewhat familiar with politics knows how difficult it is to have any other system than the present one to be acted upon so long as the situation remains as it is. There must be necessarily, in the nature of the case, party appointment. While the appointments that we have made may not all have been perfect I believe that on the whole that they have been as creditable to the government as the appointments of our predecessors. If all of the men who have been appointed by this government have not been perfectly free of fault they have on the whole been as free as those appointed by the previous regime. If you analyze the criticisms or recall the objections which are offered from time to time in connection with motions which have been made for the reform of the Senate, I think you will find that they largely originate from the fact that one party has predominated there to the prejudice of the other party, and if it were possible to have a proper balance of the different opinions which prevail in this House and in this country perhaps we would find a solution of the question. I will go farther and I will give this as my very deliberate opinion that if there is to be a reform of the Senate it should be in line with the purpose for which the Senate was instituted in this country, that is to say, to protect minorities, and to make it representative of the provinces rather than any other body of men. At one time I was very much in favour of the American system of election. The Senate of the United States is elected by the local legislatures, and for the first sixty or eighty years of the existence of the Republic the Senate of the United States compared favourably with any other assembly that ever was in existence in the world. It was a body remarkable for its powers, its efficiency and the great service which it rendered to the nation. It has been alleged of late, and I believe the allegation is substantially correct, that the character, the standard of the American Senate has not been kept up to the high degree of excellence which it reached for the first sixty or eighty years of the existence of the Republic. It is alleged, and I know that the allegation is currently made by the American magazines and press that the present mode of election has become dangerous, and there is serious talk at the present time of reforming it because the Senate has become the prey of plutocrats, and that election by the legislatures is susceptible to the influence of money which has contributed, as it is alleged, to degrade the character of that body. I must say that this has modified my views and that it would not be perhaps acceptable to us to have a Senate appointed by the local legislatures. But, I am prepared to consider whether we should not have some proportion of the appointments made by local authority. That is a suggestion which I made, and it is one which is worthy of consideration. For my part I would like exceedingly that this matter should be approached by both sides absolutely unbiassed and with the view of getting the best system of appointment possible. The present government will not always remain in office. Governments, like men, are born to die, but some men, while they are born to die, will live pretty long, and I do not think this government will die prematurely. But, in the course of time everything must come to an end. My hon. friends on the other side of the House will come into the position which we are in at the present time. I am not prepared to say that it will be as soon as my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) hopes. But, whenever there is a change of government my hon. friends sitting on the other side of the House will have precisely the same difficulty to meet that we have at the present time. I am prepared to approach this question without any bias, and I am prepared to have the question examined whether or not, while we should keep the nominative appointment in the government, we should give a share of the responsibility to the different provinces. That is a suggestion which is well worthy of consideration. I agree with my hon. friend that something should be done. This is the last of the reforms which we promised the country, and which we have not yet carried out. It is a reform which we are anxious to carry out, but we wish to carry it out on lines which, I think, would be more in consonance with the spirit of our constitution.

Motion (Mr. McLean, South Huron) withdrawn.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND WORKS.

On the motion of Mr. Lalor:

That, in the opinion of this House, the practice of the government in determining when and where public buildings and other public works shall be erected or constructed should be replaced by definite rules fixing conditions upon which such buildings should be erected as money is available for such purpose.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the absence of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lalor) who has given notice of this motion, I beg to move that the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, before committing the country to any of the alternative propositions, now under consideration for construction of the Quebec bridge, or incurring any substantial additional outlay, it is the duty of the Minister of Railways to inform this House, by a general comprehensive statement, of all the important steps taken and information secured by the government in connection with the undertaking, and the present situation in reference to alternative plans, cost and the like, but not including information liable to prejudice the public interest in connection with tenders; and to afford the peoples' representatives in parliament an opportunity of considering and advising upon what is best in the public interest.

He said: This is a question which is of course surrounded by a good deal of difficulty, and I recognize the embarrassing position the Minister of Railways finds himself in in connection with this Quebec bridge. So far it has been an unsatisfactory and expensive undertaking, without any good results. We are now committed to an additional large expenditure and what I aim at in this motion is not for the present to criticise the government, but to ascertain what the situation is. A good deal of effort has been made during the present session to discover how far the undertaking has advanced, what the probable cost may be, what kind of structure is contemplated, and other matters of interest to the public, but we have not been successful in getting that information. In January, 1909, the minister said that plans were being then prepared, and that before a year's end he expected he would be able to tell the House the probable cost of the new structure. But the year has elapsed, and another year since, and still we are in the dark. In 1909 the minister seemed to think that as soon as the three experts had prepared their plans and were ready to call for tenders he would announce to the House the probable cost. I understand that he is less hopeful now of being able to tell us that. I trust the minister will take the House into his confidence and tell us within a few hundred thousand dollars or perhaps a million dollars what this bridge will be likely to cost the people of Canada. I took the liberty of sending the minister a memorandum the other day which intimates my personal attitude in reference to the matter and some of the information I desire. My attitude is not at present a position of hostile criticism; it is simply a request that the minister should make a comprehensive statement of all the important steps that have been taken and of the present condition of affairs. The country is anxious about this matter and it is not surprising that it should be. Without saying whose fault it was, or whether it was the fault of anybody, there is already in connection with this project, an awful lot of money at the bottom of the St. Lawrence. Under the most favourable conditions it is hard to tell which is the wisest and best course to take in such a matter, but the government might, without militating in any way against their dignity, bring down the plans and let us have a look at them. I admit that many of us would not know a great deal about them, I certainly would not pretend to, but we may form opinions and the expression of these opinions might by some possibility be helpful. It is not often that I agree with the 'Globe', but sometime when I was perhaps in a better mood than usual I appear to have decided to take the 'Globe' for a guide for once, and I read from a clipping from that newspaper the following:

SAFETY, THE FIRST ESSENTIAL.

The Minister of Railways is having more than his share of trouble over the Quebec bridge. Mr. Graham has been of necessity pretty much in the hands of the expert engineers, who have been advising him as to the tenders for the new bridge and the conditions under which it shall be built. He inherited rather a bad mess and has found it far from easy to clean it up.

There is one thing that Mr. Graham should, and no doubt will, put first in considering the question—the element of safety. The matters of cost, elegance of design, and even convenience of navigation must all be subordinated to safety. One Quebec bridge disaster was enough. It may be that some old-fashioned bridge engineer who puts safety first is holding out against a spidery bridge and in favour of some massive structure like that across the Forth, the unnecessary strength of which provokes the mirth of the modern bridge builder. The 'Globe' does not know what the points of difference are, but it is certain that the people of Canada are for the old fogey ideas that mean unnecessary strength rather than for the sacrifice of assured safety to cheapness. No matter what the cost, the Quebec bridge must be built to last.

No fair minded person, whatever his politics, can cavil at that view: safety is the first consideration, and we have had enough experience in connection with this bridge to indicate that the question of safety is not yet finally settled. I may, without accepting responsibility for any condemnation that appears in these articles, but merely to call the attention of the minister to the matter, read two or three passages from articles published in the 'Scientific American' of last year. I do not understand that the bridge here referred to is the bridge which the government now contemplates building, but some of the suggestions in these articles may be useful. In its issue of February 12, 1910, the 'Scientific American' refers to the proposition that a country may be judged as to its capacity by the kinds of structures it erects, and it says:

When the Canadian government took hold of the matter and lent all its powerful prestige and financial assistance to the scheme it was accepted as an augury that the new bridge would be worthy of the great Dominion across the border line. We have to confess, however, that the bridge which it is now proposed to build is decidedly disappointing. The type selected and the method of treatment are not up to the latest standards of bridge engineering. In other words, the design is distinctly commonplace; æsthetically it has not a single redeeming feature. In re-designing the bridge the Canadian government could have made more sure of securing the best possible designs if they had thrown the bridge open to world wide competition.

That is an important statement, and although it is pretty late in the day to suggest it now, it might be even at this date worth while to consider whether that is not the position that should be taken by the government. I understand that the engineers are, in a sense, at loggerheads, that they did not agree upon the design when it was prepared, that the expensive design prepared was practically abandoned, and the government now adopts the very doubtful expedient of advertising for tenders, telling those who tender that they are to prepare their own plans and state the amount for which they will undertake to erect the bridge. That seems to me a job lot way of doing it, and I have my doubts as to the wisdom or safety of this plan. This paper says:

We should then have learned whether the strongest, most economical, and most beautiful bridge could have been secured under the cantilever or under the suspension system of design. Personally, we believe that on all three counts it would be possible to produce a suspension bridge that would be greatly superior to the structure which it is now proposed to build. The suspension bridge, especially when built of these great proportions, is a far easier bridge to erect, not being subjected to those heavy erection stresses which are the peril of large cantilever erection. Moreover, the essential elements, namely, the anchorages, the towers, and the main cables, are at all times entirely free from suspicion, and may be erected with the absolute certainty that they are well within the limits of safe construction. With these main elements assured, it is possible for failures to occur in subordinate elements, such as the suspenders and stiffening trusses, without in the least endangering the integrity of the bridge as a whole.

Not so, however, the cantilever bridge, the greater part of whose intricate framework is in compression. Let but one among the multitudinous members of the main trusses fall, and the whole structure will be thrown into immediate and absolute ruin—as witness the mass of tangled steel now lying in the St. Lawrence river.

For the credit of the profession of bridge engineering in the new world; for the prestige of the great and growing people of Canada; and above all for the greater safety of the public at large, we trust that, before the final plans of this great bridge are adopted, the Canadian government will take steps to make it certain that the final bridge will, from every point of view—engineering, architectural and artistic—be the noblest work of its kind yet erected in any country.

Then if I might read a line or two a few pages further on, where they give a view of the Forth bridge in Scotland, the Quebec bridge which collapsed, and of what was at the time of the writing of this article, the proposed bridge, in other words the government design, the design prepared by the government experts. They say:

The commission was appointed about eighteen months ago. In the interim the preparation of the plans has cost about $150,000, and as the result of its eighteen months' work the commission has produced the very commonplace design, herewith illustrated, regarding which there is a general professional opinion that both structurally and æsthetically it is distinctly inferior to the Forth bridge, which was completed nearly twenty years ago.

If the bridge is built according to the proposed plans, it will not only be of inferior merit, considered from the bridge engineer's standpoint, but will also be the ugliest bridge of monumental proportions among those hitherto proposed or built. It presents the appearance of a monotonous mesh of triangles and straight lines. From abutment to abutment there is not one graceful line in the whole structure; not the slightest attempt to combine the beautiful with the useful. The faulty structure which collapsed had at least the redeeming feature that the oulines were structurally and æsthetically correct; and although the Forth bridge has been made the subject of much criticism by the artist and the architect, it must be regarded as having distinct claims to beauty when compared, as on the accompanying page, with the new plans for the Quebec bridge.

It would seem, however, that the board has some doubts as to the merits of its own work; for it now invites competitive plans from contractors, which are to be filed by May 1, 1910; the plans to be drawn at the contractor's own expense. But if the board has taken eighteen months' time and spent $150,000 to produce the present plans, the public will naturally ask: How can the board expect responsible firms to furnish them with new plans in one-sixth the time and for nothing?

As I understand, it is still intended to construct a cantilever bridge, and without reading I would call the attention of the minister to the fact that in this article they discuss the important question of the width of the bridge. I am not vain enough to imagine that what I shall say is going to change the minister's plans at this stage of the proceedings. I am very strongly impressed with the idea that if any great mistakes have been made in this matter, one of them is that probably this bridge is not wide enough. I am not saying that as a scientific conclusion of my own; I am saying it from having read something as to the width of bridges in relation to their span. These engineers in the 'Scientific American' point out that the fallen bridge was 67 feet wide. I assume that is correct. They say that the new bridge is 88 feet wide, and they figure out that that is one foot in width to every 20 feet in length of span, the span in this case being about 1,800 feet. The Forth bridge is 120 feet wide, and its span is 1,700 feet odd, pretty nearly as great a span as this, and the width of the Forth bridge is as one foot in width to 14 feet of span This writer points out that there have been bridges which have been built on a narrower basis, and which are still standing, but he says they were fortunate, perhaps, at the time of construction in not having to encounter heavy winds. He points out that both during construction, by reason of winds, which have to be taken into account, and also by reason of winds after construction and the vibration of trains on this bridge, anything less than say 120 feet in width would be altogether too narrow.

The result, he also points out, will be that trains will not be able to pass over the bridge at probably more than 25 miles an hour, whereas they pass over the Forth bridge at the rate of 50 or 60 miles an hour. I assume that all these questions have been considered by the minister. They are not new or discoveries of my own; but they are elements which enter into the consideration of this problem in which we are all interested, and to which I thought it right to call the minister's attention before asking him to reply. I would be glad, and I think the House and the country would appreciate it if the minister would tell us, as nearly as he can, about how much the proposed new bridge will cost, when it is expected that it will be completed and ready for the reception of trains, what are the various schemes that have been submitted for construction, and how matters stand as regards the engineering staff at the present time. The minister was good enough to tell us the other day that the chairman of the enginering board has resigned. It is rumoured that that gentleman was not himself an engineer. I do not know that it has ever been alleged in this House that he is. Whether that is material or not, I am not at present proposing to argue; but that we would like to know. Perhaps the minister would also tell us why the cantilever plan is considered the better plan under the circumstances. Although I know that the minister has a great contempt for the suggestion of a tunnel, he might also tell us how far the question of a tunnel was considered. He said the other day that owing to the high banks at the point where the bridge is being constructed, a tunnel would not be feasible. I recognize that, but I am told that other schemes were suggested, for instance, a tunnel from somewhere near the mouth of the St. Charles river. The minister might also explain to the House whether he considered the question of building a bridge across to the island of Orleans, and then to the other shore, which is advocated by some as being a scheme more suitable than the present one. The government has a great responsibility thrown upon it in connection with this bridge. The people are anxious to know what the situation is at the present time, and the minister would be relieving himself of a certain amount of responsibility and would perhaps be satisfying the public if he gives us a pretty full statement of the present condition of the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, for nearly a quarter of a century I was engaged in newspaper work, and it has always been contended in that profession that everybody knows better how to run a newspaper than the man who is running it. That is the way I would like to apply criticisms by the press of various engineers in regard to the Quebec bridge. Every man who has ever dealt in horses has had this experience, that as soon as he has sold a horse for a hundred dollars, somebody came along and told him that if he had known that he was going to sell the horse, he would have given him a hundred and ten dollars for it; and if he bought a horse, somebody came along immediately afterwards and told him that he had a better one to sell at the same price. This Quebec bridge, as my hon. friend intimates, has been a most troublesome thing to deal with, and for this reason. If it were something of ordinary importance or magnitude, the head of a department, even with ordinary ability, would get the various interests together and then decide what ought to be done. But this bridge is the greatest thing of the kind ever undertaken in the world. The Forth bridge has a span of practically the same length; but the trains to be accommodated on it are so light that you can hardly make a comparison between the two. To begin at the reverse end of what my hon. friend said, I think it but fair to Mr. H. E. Vautelet to make it clear that he is not only an engineer, but a magnificent, able man, and resigned in spite of my urgent protest. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, in whose employ he was for years as chief bridge engineer of the Canadian Pacific railway, bears testimony to his ability, and how any person could have ever intimated that he was not an engineer is beyond my comprehension, because his name has always 'C. E.' affixed to it wherever it appears. I wish to state most emphatically that Mr. Vautelet is a very able man, and Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, recommended him to me even before he was placed on this commission. He designed the structure at St. Andrew's Rapids, Manitoba, which is an evidence of his great engineering skill, and he was for years in other positions. As to the speed required of certain companies to prepare plans, my hon. friend read an article from the 'Scientific American,' which I beg to remind him is not looked upon as the leading scientific authority on this continent at the present time. Years ago it was; but while attending a meeting of the engineers of America not long ago, I discovered that there were one or two other journals which at the present time they regarded as being, greater authority. It is an able journal, but it has devoted its columns of late years, so I am told by the best engineers, rather to criticisms—what journalists call knocker's column; though I do not wish to make that point in what I am going to say. My hon friend, reading from the 'Scientific American,' said that it would be better if these plans were thrown open to world wide competition. Well, they were, practically. Practically all the large bridge companies of the world sent representatives to Montreal to look into the plans and specifications. They were notified by advertisement and personally that, in addition to tendering on the board's design, they were invited to put in tenders on designs of their own.

Mr. LENNOX. Perhaps my reading was not first-class, and the minister (Mr. Graham) did not quite catch the idea. As I understand it, the 'Scientific American,' is saying that, instead of engaging three distinguished engineers to prepare plans, it would have been better to throw open the preparation of plans to the world, so that engineers the world over could compete in the drawing of designs and furnishing of plans. I suppose they would have to be paid something. But it would be on the same basis as the competitive plans for the public buildings supposed to be built here.

Mr. GRAHAM. Which are quite often not accepted.

Mr. LENNOX. I know.

Mr. GRAHAM. But, in another way that is practically what was done, the bridge companies of the world have the best of the bridge engineers, with a few exceptions, in their employ. All these bridge companies were invited to put in their own designs. But, it is fair to my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) to add, that they were to adhere to the specifications of the board. As a result, four large bridge companies, including some of the best in the world, did tender. My hon. friend, reading from the 'Scientific American,' complains that they did not have sufficient time to make out their plans and designs, and, as proof, says that it took the board some eighteen months. As a matter of fact, every one of these companies had had access to every investigation the board's staff was making during all these months. As soon as the board started working out their designs, putting on a paper the result of their studies and investigations, representatives from all these companies were given free access to everything they had done. So, as a matter of fact, everything that could be got together in the way of information by the board's staff these men had at their disposal. So, they were in the same position as the board which had to make the investigation from the beginning. I had a talk with a prominent engineer the other night, and he said that whatever might be the result, or whoever might build this bridge, one thing certain was that the investigations made and information obtained by the board had contributed very materially to the scientific knowledge of the world, and that information, of course, laid the foundation upon which the other tenders were submitted.

Then, my hon. friend asks why a cantilever design was chosen instead of a suspension, and quoted from the 'Scientific American' again in favour of a suspension bridge. One gentleman was strongly in favour of a suspension bridge, but he has had a hobby of that for some years, and possibly it is right. A certain school of engineers, very small in number, were very anxious that this design of a suspension bridge should be tried on the Canadian people at Quebec. But, I say to my hon. friend candidly that not one engineer I have met or have had the opportunity of consulting on this continent or in Europe but disagrees with the proposal to put a suspension bridge there—they were unanimously in favour of a cantilever. One of the bridge firms, the Philadelphia concern, did, for another party, present a plan for a suspension bridge, but it was immediately rejected by the board as insufficient.

Now, I cannot tell why a cantilever is considered better than a suspension. That is a scientific matter. It has been explained to me a good many times, but if I were to endeavour to set forth the technical reasons on the subject, I should only display what I do not know about it. My safe plan is to adhere to the opinion and advice of the men who, I think, are as capable of forming opinions on these matters as any that can be found on the continent.

Now, as to the principle of the bridge: It is fair to say, on behalf of the chief engineer who has resigned, that he always contended for what is known as a single intersection design. The Forth bridge is a double intersection design. The chairman disagreed with some other members of the board on this question of single and double intersection. He contended, and adhered to it to the end, that the single intersection was the proper principle to adopt. They discussed it thoroughly. As a result, the board's design, prepared by Mr. Vautelet, was on the single intersection. And I may add that every design tendered on by any bridge company, either here or elsewhere, was on the single intersection principle, which shows fairly clearly, to my mind, that that was the proper one, because whoever builds this bridge has to take full responsibility for the design as well as the construction on that design.

Mr. LENNOX. Can the minister (Mr. Graham) explain what is meant by the single or double intersection?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a technical matter which the engineers have threshed out thoroughly. It is something that I do not know anything about; and I say with candour that I think there are few gentlemen in this room who know anything about it. But I do not mind giving what seems to me an illustration of it. My hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) has seen a lattice fence. If it were built on the double intersection principle, the lattices would be double. Engineers take the position that it is much easier to calculate the direct stress on the members of a single intersection than to divide up the strains amongst the members of the double intersection. At all events, as I say, all those companies that put in their own designs must have favoured the single intersection, as they based their tenders upon that principle.

Now, as to safety. As I have stated to the House on previous occasions, the instruction always given to the members of the board was that safety was the first consideration. We have had one disaster. As my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) says, we are not now discussing who was at fault; but we have had one disaster, the most lamentable part of which was the great loss of life. We must provide against anything of that kind in the future. The question of safety might be divided into two periods. There is the question of safety after the bridge is erected—that is one thing that is most essential. But there is another which is second in importance only to the first, and that is safety during erection. One of the chief points under discussion by the board at various times has been, if possible, to secure a design that will afford the greatest safety to both life and property during the time of erection; in fact, at one time that was the chief subject of disagreement among the members, each contending for his own theory, the one part of the board pointing out that it was——

Mr. LENNOX. Safety in construction is a necessary preliminary condition, because if you cannot get the bridge erected, you certainly cannot use it afterward.

Mr. GRAHAM. The bridge might fall down once and a hundred lives be lost and five or six million dollars' worth of property might be destroyed; then the company responsible, might erect the bridge, profiting by their sad experience. But that would not restore lost lives. We must have safety in the erection, so that there will be no other calamity. I impressed that on the board, and they have made that one of the chief features of their discussions, and one of the chief requirements. I do not know what else I can say to my hon. friend. Every precaution has been taken. When this project was brought before the House by myself, shortly after coming into the government, I made a statement to the House, when I asked them to pass an Act to take over this work, on what lines I would try to have the bridge reconstructed. I admit now that I little knew the difficulties I was facing in attempting the reconstruction of the bridge, it is such an enormous undertaking. It may be, that I had the enthusiasm of youth, in thinking I would accomplish everything in a short space of time. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am going to accomplish the reconstruction of this Quebec bridge in a safe and sure way, but it is taking a great deal longer time than I expected. Scientific men tell me that I should not be discouraged, that the country should not be discouraged, at the slowness with which we are progressing. For some months we have been feeling our way, and testing it at every step. I believe that is the proper thing to do, and I rather encourage them to take their time and not to hurry, because we must make a success of the bridge, no matter if it does take a few years longer.

Now I said to the House at that time, that I would appoint prominent engineers, men of reputation, and place in their hands the entire responsibility for the plans, and in addition, the responsibility for the construction of the bridge on the plans. An order in council was passed, embodying those ideas. Under that order in council, Mr. Vautelet, of Montreal, a very prominent and able man, was appointed chairman and chief engineer; Mr. Fitzmaurice, of London, England, who was associated with Sir Edmund Baker, on the Forth bridge, was appointed as another; and Mr. Modjeska, of Chicago, a very eminent bridge engineer, and a member of the American Society of Engineers, was appointed the third man. They proceeded to prepare the plans, and as I have pointed out, they have differed at various times. Mr. Fitzmaurice, some months ago, I think about the close of last session, intimated to me that he would like to resign his position. He gave two reasons, one was his health, and the other was, that he did not approve of the plans being prepared by the chairman, and thought they could be improved on. After returning from the west I accepted Mr. Fitzmaurice's resignation, one of my chief reasons being, that we were coming to the point where some practical work had to be done in connection with accepting the contracts, and we ought to have a man who could pay more attention to the work and be at the meetings more regularly. His resignation was accepted; and I looked around to find a man to replace him, and I believe I have found a first class men. I went to New York, and discussed the matter with several men, and I heard about Mr. Charles Macdonald, an ex-president of the American Society of Engineers, a man who was born, I think, in Leeds county—which is certainly nothing to his detriment—who had been a bridge engineer for many years, engaged in construction, who was afterwards, I think, associated with the American Bridge company, a very successful bridge builder, and engineer, so successful that he had acquired a competence, and is now living in Gananoque, practically retired. When I went to New York, I was aware that Mr. Macdonald had returned, and was living in Gananoque. But it seemed to be the universal opinion among the engineers with whom I spoke, and of Mr. Vautelet as well, that if I could secure the services of Mr. Charles Macdonald, I would be getting one of the foremost authorities in bridge construction on this continent. Mr. Macdonald, for reasons that are obvious, was not anxious to join the board. He is in a position where he does not have to work any longer, and it took a good deal of persuasion on my part, before he would consent. Finally he took this position: If I can assist this great project, I have such a pride in my old home, and have such a strong Canadianism in my nature, that I will sacrifice myself for a little while, and give up some of my time, in order to work out this problem. Mr. Macdonald did not know what the remuneration was to be,—I believe he would have consented to act without remuneration—and I consider Mr. Macdonald's motive in coming practically out of retirement, to assist in this work. is a patriotic one exclusively, and that there is no mercenary motive in his act. Now he has been giving attention to this work. As I said, he is a great authority on bridge work. I think nearly a year ago, Mr. Vautelet, in conversation with me, suggested that he believed when the time came for the construction of the bridge—he did not put it just in that way, but that was the essence of what he said—he would feel like retiring. It has been a most trying work for him, and trying on others as well. I thought I had induced him to remain at a recent meeting I had with the board in New York, and I was congratulating myself that Mr. Vautelet would remain as chief engineer. The design prepared by the chairman of the board was his design, he is strongly in favour of it, and believes it is the better design. There was some disagreement as to the design, and he took the position later—that under the conditions existing, he would resign and his formal resignation was handed in. It is possible he would have continued in his desire to resign any way—even if his design had been selected. Among the engineers, I believe it is held that the man who makes a design is the best man you can get to erect the design, because he has faith in his structure, and knows all about it, knows what he is doing, and is more competent perhaps, than any other engineer to successfully complete what he started out to do. I might say that Mr. Macdonald accepted appointment only until the contract is let.

Mr. LENNOX. While the minister is dealing with Mr. Vautelet's resignation, will he pardon me for interrupting him? It is rumoured—and I am only taking it as a rumour, so that it can be cleared up—it is rumoured that Mr. Vautelet refused to consider the other designs, that when the question of selecting a design came to be considered, I think probably at the time the question of awarding the contracts came to be considered, Mr. Vautelet, for some reason, refused to take any part in the question whatever. It is also said that he was so determined about this matter, that he would not put a certain question to the vote at a meeting of the board, and that in consequence, the minister was called in, and had to act himself as chairman. Now I am not, for the present, criticising Mr. Vautelet. What the minister says about his adhering to his own design, and not desiring to continue his services if it was not accepted, may be a proper position for him to take. But I would like the minister to explain, if he understands what I am driving at, how much foundation there is for that story.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be absolutely courteous to my hon. friend, but I am afraid it would not be in the public interest just now, at the point we are at, for me to go into these details. He will see on a moment's reflection, that I am trying to bring order out of all these difficulties, and we must not do anything that might tend to create chaos.

Mr. LENNOX. If the minister does not think it is desirable at the present time, I do not press the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will give this much along that point: It is incorrect to say that Mr. Vautelet did not consider these original tenders that were put in. They sat as a board, considered them all and made a report to me, which they all signed on the various tenders, but I thought that was not sufficiently definite, and I asked for a more definite report. The original tenders were discussed by all the members of the board, and the report was signed by Messrs. Vautelet, Macdonald and Modjeska. The other point was merely a matter of detail. At a meeting of the board certain motions were placed before the board, which I will be happy to give the House at a later stage. The chairman thought—and he gave his reasons for it—that these motions were out of order, and he did not put them. I never acted as chairman at any meeting of the board.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister stated that some little time ago, it was determined that the responsibility for the plans and for the construction should be absolutely placed upon the three engineers. The minister mentioned the other day in the House—I think he was entirely right—that when there was an effort to shift the responsibility he said: You gentlemen must take that responsibility yourselves. When the minister formed the plan of leaving the responsibility for the plans and construction upon these three engineers, did they accept that position?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend is taking me along, step by step, I am afraid.

Mr. LENNOX. At the time that they engaged to act as engineers of this great work, did they take upon themselves the full responsibility for all the proceedings?

Mr. GRAHAM. They were appointed under order in council; they knew the order in council providing absolutely for what I have stated.

Mr. LENNOX. They accepted that position?

Mr. GRAHAM. Certainly; there was no doubt in my mind that they accepted full responsibility.

Mr. LENNOX. Then two of these engineers at least have resigned—Mr. Fitzmaurice and Mr. Vautelet. How does the matter stand as regards the responsibility for construction now that they have resigned?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, their successors accept the responsibility they had.

Mr. LENNOX. Did the responsibility mean anything? Was there anything binding upon them at all? There was no obligation taken from them that they would be responsible from beginning to end?

Mr. GRAHAM. I cannot exactly get at what my hon. friend means. If the minister accepts the full responsibility of his once, and the people put him out, or if he resigns, he is relieved of responsibility.

Mr. LENNOX. But there is some difference in a case of this kind.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not get at what my hon. friend means.

Mr. LENNOX. There is an order in council placing the responsibility, and the minister says that the engineers appointed were to take the responsibility for the design and construction. I do not understand that there was any obligation entered into by these engineers that they would assume that responsibility.

Mr. GRAHAM. They gave no bond, of course, that they would do so, but they accepted the position as members of that board, and so long as they remained members of the board they fulfilled the duties devolving upon them. When they resigned we had to get some others to fill their places.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Have their places been filled?

Mr. GRAHAM. The place of the chairman and chief engineer has not been filled. Mr. Fitzmaurice resigned and Mr. Charles Macdonald, as I explained, has accepted the position, and a happy choice, I think, it was. Now, as to the cost: My hon. friend must see that we must look at this question from a business standpoint. We are within hailing distance of having the matter closed up, and the contract signed, the details of which, I think, will fully satisfy my hon. friend, judging from his speech this afternoon, when he sees the documents laid on the table of the House. This will be the result if we are successful, but my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) will understand that you are never sure of having a contract closed until the signatures are placed upon it, and it would not be in the public interest for me to enter into fuller details as to this contract than I have done. I have given the House all the information that, from a business standpoint, I ought to give. Suppose I were to go into details and state some of the differences, and it would take a very long time to discuss in detail all that has taken place at the board—

Mr. LENNOX. What about putting the plans on the table?

Mr. GRAHAM. If we knew exactly the design upon which the bridge was to be constructed to-day, I might put them on the table, but inasmuch as the design under consideration and the contract are unalterably united, if the contractors or the bridge builders declined at the last moment under the conditions imposed to sign the contract, I might be in the position of having to accept some other design, and as the matter is not yet decided, I think it would be altogether unwise from a business point for me to give any further details to the House. I assure my hon. friend that the point that he has raised has been guarded in so far as we can guard it. We have taken the advice of the very best men, I believe, to be found on this continent. No step has been taken without full consideration. There has been no difference without calling in some other expert engineers in order to get the benefit of their advice. Step by step this work has been progressing, and I hope that in a few weeks at the utmost I will be able to give the House the result of months and months of great anxiety on my part and very hard work on the part of the several members of the board. Safety is the first thing—absolute safety—and the criticisms of the 'Scientific American,' I believe, will be found to be totally unwarranted when the papers and designs are put on the table of the House. I assure my hon. friend that this is one of the most difficult problems that any government has ever had to deal with. I have devoted hours, day and night, to try and work it out, but I have depended absolutely at every step on the advice of the scientific men engaged for that purpose, I assure my hon. friend and the House that I have not taken any step of importance in the matter in which I have not had the majority of the board behind me. I have acted on their advice, and if we cannot be successful with the advice we have had, then I believe no success can attend such an enterprise. But I have full confidence in the plan adopted. I have every confidence in the men on the board, and I believe that when this contract is signed, as I hope to have it very shortly, the country will be satisfied, my hon. friend will be satisfied. The construction of material at least for this great undertaking will proceed in a few months, and the people and the government will have reason to be proud of the Quebec bridge in the years to come. As to the cost, my hon. friend will see that it would not be wise for me to mention that at the present moment.

Mr. LENNOX. I would like to ask the minister what is the width and what time it is now estimated it will take, in a general way, to complete the bridge. I do not think he can give the time within a few months. There is one question that I want to ask the minister that I do not understand myself. It has been handed to me by a gentleman who does understand it, and I am requested to ask it. It is this: How many safety factors, after completion, does the design provide for. That is some technical point that I do not profess to understand.

Mr. GRAHAM. Neither do I.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The minister has not told us what is likely to be the cost of this bridge. He says it would be injudicious to do so, but I have never yet heard a minister ask for a vote unless he was able to at least give the estimated cost. Again, is the minister satisfied that the present location of the bridge is the best one possible? I have been informed that there are other locations on which the bridge could be built for less than half the cost, say for instance, a little above Three Rivers, or across the Island of Orleans. It may only be common talk, and it may have no foundation, but it is certainly stated that the reason the bridge cost so much is because it is built there so as to be near the city of Quebec.

Mr. GRAHAM. The width of the bridge as in the official design is 88 feet, and I think the same width is maintained in the other designs, but as to that I am not absolutely sure. The time runs from three to five years and judging from the progress we have made so far my own opinion is that it will be nearer five than three. Last year my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) suggested that the superstructure would cost $11,000,000 and I will not quarrel with that approximation of the estimate; I am hoping that it may be something less. I think the contract for the substructure was in the vicinity of two and a quarter millions. One of the duties of the new board was to examine the location, and they reported that the present location was the best; it is eight miles west of the city of Quebec. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) withdraw his motion?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is one point which should be explained. A board of three able engineers, as I understand, was constituted and we are told that the best men in that particular department were secured. These three engineers consulted, investigated, and eventually prepared plans, having taken a reasonably long time in which to do that work. It appears that when tenders were asked it was suggested that any tenderer might tender upon his own plans, and it is said that the plan likely to be accepted was prepared by a certain corporation which tendered. It is singular that after a board of very able engineers had been at work for a long time on this problem, that the government should have cast their plans aside and adopted a different one. I do not inquire as to this for the purpose of getting information that the country and parliament should not have at present, but I mention it as being rather singular.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is a very proper question and without explanation it would bear the interpretation suggested by my hon. friend. One of the difficulties of the department was this: The chairman of the board had very decided views along certain lines, and the other members of the board had very decided views along other lines. When I considered the time had arrived when we ought to advertise for tenders I found they were not a unit on the chairman's design which was called the board's design, and to proceed with the advertisement—and Mr. Fitzmaurice puts it fairly plainly in his letter to me—I thought it well to make it as a compromise that they would agree to the government advertising for tenders on this design, but that tenderers should be invited to put in a design of their own. The other two members of the board took the position that they were not satisfied that, for such a great undertaking the board's was the very best possible design, and in the resolution of the board they set out that if any better design were presented by any of the tenderers they would accept it over the board's design. On that understanding we advertised for tenders on the board's design and permitted the tenderers to send in competing designs. Two members of the board think there is a better design than the official design, and that is the explanation.

Mr. LENNOX. I have no complaint to make of the reply made by the minister; I treated him very well and he responded. There is a good deal of information no doubt that we would like to have at this stage which it might possibly be urged that it is not wise to give just now but, on the other hand there is a lot of information which I believe might be given to the country now or soon. I trust it will turn out as the minister says, that within a few weeks at furthest we will have the information that the country is waiting for. I hope the minister will make the announcement to the House, without being asked, at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

The minister said that a condition was attached to the tenders that the plans should adhere to the specifications of the board. That may be a good controlling feature in the matter. Ordinarily I would not think it wise or safe to take the somewhat haphazard plans that are prepared by contractors. Another feature not fully developed by the minister is that the minister realized when he was about to let this contract that it was necessary not only that he should have competent men to design the bridge but that these men should be in charge of the carrying out of the work. That, I think, was wise. The chief engineer refused to go on with the work when his plan was disregarded. It may be that from his very desire to obtain the services of gentlemen especially eminent, the minister has run into that other dangerous extreme that as men do not become eminent until they become somewhat advanced in years, and as they become advanced in years they sometimes become independent, the government have probably employed engineers in this case who are to a large extent independent of the compensation they were to receive. The minister might have done better if he had obtained the services of some men who by reason of their position might be expected to remain in the employment of the government throughout not only in the making of the design but the execution of the work. I am inclined to think there is a weakness at this point, that we are now virtually away altogether from the position at which we started, and which was covered by the order in council referred to by the minister. Mr. Vautelet is out of it, his responsibility is gone, Mr. Fitzmaurice is out of it, and his responsibility is gone. The original official plan is out of it, and all the benefit of that plan or at least a great deal of it is lost. The chairman of the board is taking no part in this matter, his plan has been disregarded, he is eliminated from the proposition altogether.

A word as to the cost of the bridge. I am not going to quarrel with the minister's statement but to call attention to it. He says that as to the superstructure of the bridge he does not quarrel with, the figures cited in the House, namely $11,000,000, and as regards the substructure about two and a quarter or two and a half millions. In addition to that there is the cost of the previous structure without counting subsequent interest, &c., about $7,000,000. Thus the total cost exclusive of interest during construction, incidentals, engineering and approaches, of that bridge will come to upwards of $20,000,000. That is as far as we have got, no one can tell what the expense will be hereafter, but anywhere between $20,000,000 and $30,000,000 is within range. I would be inclined to say, at the risk of making a mistake, that it would be a good deal closer to $25,000,000 than to $20,000,000.

In withdrawing the motion I would say that I am gratified that the minister has endeavoured to give us some information this afternoon.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the proposal of the minister with reference to security from the contractors?

Mr. GRAHAM. The clause in the contract reads:

Each tenderer must send with his tender or tenders a cheque accepted by a Canadian chartered Bank of Five Hundred Thousand Dollars ($500,000.00) made payable to the order of the 'Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada.' As soon as a tender is accepted, the successful contractor shall deposit with the minister another similarly accepted cheque made payable to the order of the minister for such amount as will make the united amount of the two cheques equal to fifteen per cent (15%) of the cost of the works as estimated by the chief engineer.

Motion withdrawn.

HAGUE ARBITRATION PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) (for Mr. Jameson) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, papers, minutes and documents between the imperial authorities and the government of Canada, and the government of the United States of America, relating to the settlement of the case in the matter of the North Atlantic Fisheries arbitration at the Hague.

He said: I may say to the Minister of Justice that I do not think any copy of the various proceedings upon that arbitration has been placed for reference in the library. It might be very convenient for many members if a copy could be placed in the library. We have copies there of the previous arbitrations such as the Behring Sea, and the papers relating to the Alaska arbitration.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. Copies will be sent to the library, I have several extra copies on hand.

Motion agreed to.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax) moved:

For a copy of all enactments, regulations, documents, papers and information of every kind setting forth or showing the systems or method by which the census is taken in the United Kingdom, the British Dominions and foreign countries, respectively; and showing in what respect, if any, the principle, system or method adopted in the United Kingdom, the British Dominions, and foreign countries differs from that proposed for the approaching census in Canada.

He said: I have put this motion on the Order Paper for the purpose of getting some information which I have found it difficult to collect in the time at my command. I do not know how far the method which we use for taking the census of this country is in use by other countries which take a census of their population at regular intervals, as I found it somewhat difficult to get much information upon that point within a reasonably limited time in the library. For that reason I would like to have a return brought down giving this information to the House, and the country, and I would be glad if the occasion would be utilized by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, who, of course, has had great experience upon this question, to give us a brief statement covering in a general way the information which I hope will be brought down in more detail in the return. I have an impression, I do know whether it is correct or not, that in many other countries a different system is followed from that which we have pursued hitherto. I understand that there was at one time a debate in this House upon the expediency of adopting some other method. I trust that there will be no objection to having the return brought down at as early a day as possible. It would be very interesting to us at the present time, when we are approaching the taking of another census.

Mr. FISHER. I would not like to attempt to give in detail a description of the way in which we take our census, and the way in which the census is taken in other countries. I shall be glad to have a memorandum brought down giving the information which my hon. friend asks for. I may say in a general way that we take in Canada what is called the de jure census and not the de facto. The United States follow the de jure system as we do. The system in England is the de facto. The de jure census is taken for a particular date, all the questions asked having reference to that date. For the coming census the date will be the first day of June. The enumerators are given a reasonable time in which to take the information, going from house to house and filling the schedules. That information covers a great deal besides a simple counting of the people. One schedule has a list of personal questions, another deals with mortuary statistics, another with industrial affairs, another with fisheries, another with agriculture, and so on. The information thus collected is sent in, and is compiled in the census office here in a series of tables, which appear in the census report. The same thing is done in the United States. In England very little is taken beyond the actual counting of the people, and that is all done on one day. The forms are left in every house, the inmates are expected to fill them up, and then they are collected. Very little information is taken beyond personal information, such as the age and sex of the individual, and things of that kind. Anything with regard to business is taken separately, and almost wholly by correspondence. Forms are sent to business houses, filled up and returned.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Are these embodied in the census returns?

Mr. FISHER. No, the information is issued in special bulletins. For the last ten years or so I have been doing, in the Department of Census and Statistics, a good deal of that work between the decennial censuses, getting information in the same way by correspondence. In this country, besides the decennial census of the whole country, we have to take a quinquennial census of the western provinces for population. In the last one I took advantage of the opportunity to get a great deal of agricultural information. The year before that we got by correspondence a good deal of information about manufacturing. At another time we made a dairy census, at another time we got the general crop returns of the whole country. This year all that information will be given in the census schedules. Each individual will give a statement of his own business, and the information will be more accurate than it can possibly be when obtained by correspondence.

Mr. FOSTER. Are those sworn to?

Mr. FISHER. The enumerators of the regular census are sworn; the correspondence is not sworn to; but in the Census Act there is a penalty provided for any one who supplies false information.

Mr. FOSTER. As to the population, what we have recorded in the census of Canada is not the number of people actually in Canada on a certain day, but those who have the right to be? Is that it?

Mr. FISHER. We count the people whose homes are in Canada. If they happen to be absent at the moment, we still count them, but, on the other hand, if a person from another country happens to be travelling in Canada, he is not counted

Mr. FOSTER. The question of who has the right to be counted must depend upon the truthfulness of the person who gives the information. Is there any check in any way by the enumerators?

Mr. FISHER. None, except by question. Instructions are given as to who shall be considered a resident. This is described to the householder or person who gives the information. For instance, a father of a family whose son happens to be away for a month—his statement in regard to that is accepted. I may say that a discussion has arisen on various occasions as to the advisability of changing our method and adopting the de facto instead of the de jure census. I have been rather impressed with the advantage of the de facto system. But I have to recognize the fact that the census of Canada has been taken some five times now, and always upon the de jure system. If we were to make a change and adopt the de facto census, comparisons would not be quite fair. So, I have not thought it well to attempt to make any change.

Mr. DANIEL. From whom does the enumerator take his information, as to those whose homes are in Canada at the time the census is taken? Is that information taken from other members of the family alone, or is any one allowed to go to the enumerator and state that so and so is in the United States and expects to come back sooner or later, and hand in his name and have it recorded?

Mr. FISHER. The questions are put to the householders. The enumerators go to the dwellings in their district. In each dwelling they seek to find a responsible person, the head of the family as a rule, or, if it is a boarding house, the keeper of the house, and ask who are residing there at the time. Should there be no resident in the dwelling house at the time, he will try to find out who are the absent people. It would be only people in charge of the dwelling house who would have the right to say who those are who usually dwell in that House but are absent. As to one going to the enumerator and saying that a certain person is absent from Canada but will return, and getting his name recorded in that way, it would be impossible.

Mr. DANIEL. That information, I take it, is accepted only from the householder, and from no one else—for instance, not from the clergyman of the parish or any one of that kind?

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. PERLEY. What would happen in this case? Suppose that the minister (Mr. Fisher) himself happened to be in Victoria at the time the census was taken, would he be counted in Ottawa and likewise in Victoria?

Mr. FISHER. No, I should be counted at my home. If I happened to be away, the person in charge would be asked who was in my house. The answer would be that I was the householder but happened to be away, and would give whatever information they could. The hotelkeeper in Victoria, when questioned, would say: Mr. Fisher is here, but he does not live here and that enumerator would not enter my name.

Mr. PERLEY. So far as a hotel is concerned, the proprietor would be supposed to give the names of those who actually live there all the time? And they would be counted?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. PERLEY. I was surprised at one thing the minister said—that there would be difficulty in changing from our old system to the de facto system; that, as Canada has always used the de jure system, the new system would be inaccurate. Does he mean by that that our present system of taking the census does, as a matter of fact, give as accurate an enumeration of the people as the de facto system? Or does our present system, in his opinion, give a larger number of people as being in the country than would be obtained by the de facto system?

Mr. FISHER. I would not like to say positively one way or the other. I think that, so far as the whole country is concerned, the probability is there would be very little difference. But there might be great differences in relation to individual places. For instance, if a big convention were going on, in a given town, the de facto system would show that town as having several hundred people more than it ordinarily has. Things of that kind would occur, and the results, as to localities, would be quite unknowable beforehand. That is why the change from one system to the other might make very considerable differences, but I do not think that in relation to the aggregate population of the country, it would make any great difference.

Mr. BLAIN. Could the minister explain briefly the different schedules compared with the schedules placed in the hands of the enumerators of 1901?

Mr. FISHER. I would not undertake to do that from memory.

Mr. BLAIN. For example, when this matter was discussed a year or two ago, it appeared that in the census of 1901, there was no census of fallow land in Canada.

Mr. FISHER. That is included in the schedules this year.

Mr. BLAIN. There was no schedule showing the value of the poultry industry.

Mr. FISHER. I think that is included.

Mr. FOSTER. Will these schedules be laid on the table before they are distributed?

Mr. FISHER. I will do so.

Mr. A. M. BEAUPARLANT (St. Hyacinthe). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, with the kind permission of the House, as regards this resolution, I will ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture whether he could not be induced to amend in some particulars the proposition he has kindly submitted to the members of this House and in which is indicated the number of enumerators it is his intention to appoint for each electoral division.

According to the notice already given, the minister's intention would be to appoint only one enumerator for each municipality or parish. I think it would be preferable to appoint one enumerator for each polling district, so that there would be two, three, four or five enumerators for each municipality or parish.

Although there is nothing final in the proposition submitted by the hon. minister, it seems to be his intention to diminish the number of enumerators, while for my part I think it would be better to appoint the same number of enumerators as in the preceding census.

I submit the suggestion to the hon. minister and I hope he will give it due consideration.

My idea would be to take the number of polling divisions as a basis for appointing the enumerators. It would afford employment to a greater number and give an additional guarantee of correctness to the census to be taken next summer.

Mr. FISHER. (Translation). I shall be pleased to take into consideration the suggestions just made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe. For the present, all I can say is that without having exactly decided to reduce the number of census enumerators, our intention is, as much as possible, to take as a basis the population of each locality. For instance, we suppose that one enumerator can take about fifteen hundred names in a town or city, and between 1,000 and 1,200 in a rural municipality. Consequently, the number will have to be reduced in order to comply with this condition.

INFORMATION CONCERNING TRUSTS AND COMBINES IN UNITED STATES.

Mr. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie) moved:

For a return showing all statutes, regulations, reports and proceedings in the courts of the United States or in the courts of any of the respective states, and all other documents, papers and information of every kind touching or concerning the methods and operations of the meat trust and other trusts and combines in the United States, and touching the results both to the producer and to the consumer of such methods and operations, including all departmental proceedings and reports and other proceedings and reports of the government of the United States or of any department thereof with respect to the matters aforesaid, and in general all available information in respect to the operations of such trusts and combines in the United States.

He said: The subject touched on in this order, was more fully dealt with in the House on the 2nd of the present month, on a motion by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). It has to do with the experience of the United States of America, both in the investigation and control of the various mergers and trusts that operate in that country. The order has particular reference to the methods and operations of the meat trust in the United States. In moving for the information, which, I hope, will be full and complete bearing on this subject, so far as can be gathered from the United States courts, and authorities, I do not propose to make any extended remarks on the general subject of combines and mergers, such as would be more appropriate on a definite resolution dealing with policy. However, I may say in passing, that this resolution, looking, as it does, only to the securing of data, is necessarily of an introductory character; and I hope that at a later date, a discussion may be had on a more definite and specific resolution. I am unfortunate in this regard, that when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier moved his resolution on the 2nd of February, there being no notice given I was not in my seat when the discussion took place. However, from a perusal of the 'Hansard,' of that date, I find that the government, through the mouth of the Minister of Labour (Mr. King), has taken the position, that no further efforts need be made on their part, towards rescuing the general public of this country from the claws of the mergers and combines into which they have fallen to a lamentable extent, in the country to the south of us, and towards preserving us against a more or less similar fate. The Minister of Labour appeared to believe that so long as our banks were loaning more money than they did in previous years, so long as they could show a statement that large increases had been made in their loaning power, and so long as various securities floated by the merged companies and other corporations operating under Dominion or provincial statutes in this country found a ready market in the old land, so long as these conditions obtained, he did not believe that anything further was necessary, or that there were any danger signals on the horizon, but that the government would be well advised simply to stand pat on the situation.

Mr. MEIGHEN.

The Minister of Labour took the further ground that his own Act, passed, I believe, in the last session of this House, dealing with combines, was amply sufficient to meet all present contingencies, and that it had been especially effective, in that it had never had occasion to go into operation at all. He further remarked that in view of the negotiations then under way, with the government to the south, it would be very inopportune for parliament then to take any steps dealing with large corporations, whose products were to be seriously affected by those negotiations.

With the last of his objections, there is no need to deal now, even were this motion a controversial one. There is only this to say, that the commodities largely dealt in by these corporations, have come through the ordeal of the reciprocity negotiations, without serious modification. As to the second reason, namely, the efficiency of the Companies Act, I can say nothing more clearly than did the member for Jacques Cartier, that the Combines Act entirely leaves out of contemplation the very object set out so well in the hon. member's resolution of that date, and indirectly referred to in this. The very fact that a merger has taken place, the very fact that many companies now are one, places it out of the power of any one to say that there is a combination of companies, for there cannot be a combination of companies to enhance prices when all the companies are one. Consequently, the purpose of this resolution cannot be served in any degree by the Combines Act, nor can the purpose which I hope to work out of the data to be furnished under this resolution, be assisted in any way by that Act.

I do not think I need say anything further at present, than merely to promise this, that never in the history of any country, I think, has the evolution of capital proceeded at so rapid a pace, as it has in our country in the last ten, and more especially, in the last three or five years. Never has the development of huge mergers, the great spirit of the age operating in industry, gone faster than it has in our own land. At present our great industries are coming together, and more and more we are being brought industrially under the power of mergers and combines. There is no need of going further than to note this, that while we are exercising our functions they are exercising theirs in a much more fruitful field of operation, and if matters go on as they are, absolutely unhindered, absolutely uncontrolled, particularly so far as capitalization goes, if matters proceed as they are proceeding, the powers of these corporations will be more absolute, more despotic than will be the power of parliament itself. It seems to me that if I could I would use on this subject much the same language as the hon. the Prime Minister, used when, in 1903, he urged with such beautiful eloquence, the immediate construction of the Transcontinental railway. 'Time will not wait,' in this regard, and I do not think the officers of the government could be better employed than in securing from whatever source, however remote or however difficult, the information asked for by this order. May I express the hope that too much time will not be lost. We are now pretty well on in the session; and though it might have been well if the information had been asked for sooner, it is my desire that the government should use every endeavour to secure this data at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. MACKENZIE KING (Minister of Labour). I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen), that a good deal of this information which he asks for on the subject of mergers and trusts, is not contained in reports. It has been the experience of those who have to do with these matters, that the workings of these organizations are so obscure, that it is difficult to get first hand information as to their methods of proceeding. This government being aware of that circumstance, introduced at the last session of the House, an Act that, it was hoped, would enable parties interested in the operation of trusts and mergers to get the facts, and to ascertain whether these large organizations of capital were operating in a manner detrimental to producers or to consumers. The method of procedure under that measure, as I think my hon. friend knows, is a very simple one. When there is reason to believe that a trust or merger is operating in a manner detrimental to Canadians, any six persons are at liberty to make application to any judge of any high court for an order of investigation into that particular merger; and if they are able to make out a prima facie case, they are entitled to have all the workings of the merger thoroughly investigated.

I am glad to be able to inform my hon. friend that in the first application that has been made to any judge an order has been granted for an investigation which will be carried out under this law.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Is that in the case of the United Shoe Machine Company?

Mr. KING. Yes. Some manufacturers in the province of Quebec, who believed that, by reason of this American trust, or rather this company operating in Canada under a parent company in the United States, they were unable to sell some of their commodities which they would have been able to sell if it had not been for the methods adopted by this trust, and who also found it difficult to obtain machinery under the conditions which this trust exacts, made application before the court of Mr. Justice Cannon of Quebec for an order directing an investigation to be held under the Combines Act. This application has been heard, and this afternoon the government received from Mr. Justice Cannon a communication in which he orders an investigation into that trust. He states at considerable length that these gentlemen, having presented their statement to him, had made out a prima facie case as to the existence of a combination detrimental to consumers and producers. The investigation will be proceeded with forthwith. The parties affected will have an opportunity of each naming a member of the board of investigation. The two, so named, if they are able to do so, will agree upon a chairman; otherwise, the government will appoint a chairman, and these three persons will be clothed with all the powers of a court of record. It is also the intention of the government to appoint a solicitor to assist the parties in getting full information in regard to the working of this combination. In this way it would be possible to bring to light a mass of evidence which it would be impossible to obtain from any records or reports which may be in existence at the present time. This is a combination which, as my hon. friend knows, has occasioned a good deal of interest in the United States and in Great Britain. While there has been reason to believe that it is a combination operating in restraint of trade, up to the present time no effective means have been discovered of really getting at its inner workings. What has happened in the case of this particular organization or trust which is operating in this country, although it is an American organization, if there is reason to believe in its existence, may be carried out under the circumstances with regard to any other trust, and I submit that in the legislation which this government have on the statute-book to-day we have one of the most effective means to be found of getting at precisely the information which my hon. friend hopes to be able to secure by the reports for which he is asking.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have to observe to my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) with regard to the urgency which he has pressed upon us with reference to this motion that it lays a very large contract upon the government. The information which he wants us to collect is of a very weighty nature, and as he knows we have no power to compel it. We can only proceed by way of request. I have no objection at all to the motion of my hon. friend; on the contrary, we will be very happy to supply him with the information, but I cannot hope that my hon. friend will receive it in as short a time as he would like.

Motion agreed to.

FLYING OF FLAGS IN CANADA.

Mr. THOMAS BEATTIE (London) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, proper regulations should be issued by the government of the Dominion of Canada insisting that where a foreign flag or ensign is displayed or used either upon a flag pole, private residence, vehicle or in any other manner or place whatsoever within this Dominion by any person or persons except the accredited representative of a foreign government, a Union Jack of equal size and make shall also be hoisted or displayed therewith at the same time and place, and that the Union Jack shall always be placed in the most prominent position on every such occasion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is made with the intention of preventing in future the displaying of foreign flags or ensigns indiscriminately throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. Subjects of other countries are in the habit of flying foreign flags on every possible occasion when within our borders. They seem to forget that whilst they are upon Canadian soil, so long as they do not break the laws of this country, they are entitled to the same protection as our citizens and that the Union Jack is the emblem of authority here in Canada. They also seem to forget that in some of the places they come from the hoisting of our flag would be considered an insult. That cannot be done in foreign countries; yet, foreign flags and ensigns are allowed to be displayed in Canada by those who, through ignorance or otherwise, daily outrage the rules of common decency and international law. This House should insist that those who live within our borders shall not display foreign ensigns to the exclusion of our own flag. More than that, if we desire to keep this Dominion a part of the British Empire we must instill into the minds of the children of the country a love for the flag which represents our empire.

I bring this matter up now although I intended to have brought it up a year ago. I live on the line between Buffalo and Detroit and I suppose that forty or fifty automobiles pass that way every day. They never display the Union Jack but generally have three or four United States flags. It has come to be that the children of that part of the country do not know whether they are in the Dominion of Canada or in a foreign land. Last year I was up in Muskoka and in the vicinity of the Georgian bay and I had with me two young lads. They asked me: Is this not Canada? I said, I thought it was, but they said: We see nothing but the stars and stripes. I think it is nothing but common decency that when a person hoists the stars and stripes he should put the Union Jack alongside of the American flag. Our people are too easy-going with respect to that matter. It was thought to be necessary to display the stars and stripes at a military banquet held in the city of Toronto. If I were in the United States I would not think of hoisting the Union Jack without putting the Stars and Stripes alongside of it. A case in point occurred last year up in the north country. A minister came over to this country and hoisted the stars and stripes on his flagpole. A gentleman went to him and told him that he thought he should put up the Union Jack as well. He said he would not do it. The gentleman said that common decency, to say nothing of his position, should induce him to put the two flags together. The minister was rather impertinent and the gentleman said: I will give you twenty-four hours to hoist the Union Jack or take that other flag down. The minister refused and another gentleman got a ladder, went up and pulled the flag down. I hope that no one will think that in bringing this matter up my action has any reference to the talk which we have recently heard about annexation. I have nothing of that kind in my mind at all. If we have a flag we should respect it and teach our children that it is the flag of our country.

Mr. GERALD V. WHITE (North Renfrew). Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in this resolution and in the sentiments which have been expressed by my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie) in moving it. It would seem to me, Sir, that we Canadians, loyal and patriotic as we are—I believe as loyal and patriotic a people as ever existed—are not as demonstrative as we ought to be of the patriotic feelings which actuate us. Contrast our action in this respect with that of our neighbours across the line, who, in every town, village, and hamlet of their vast country, are proud to display the stars and stripes. Some thirteen years ago I had occasion to travel through the Lake of the Woods district, along the international border, and across the river in United States territory everywhere the eye rested the flag of the United States was visible, but strange to say, in the town of Fort Frances, on the Canadian side, not a Union Jack was to be seen. I believe that every true Canadian should take to himself the words of St. Paul: I am a citizen of no mean state, for Sir, we Canadians are citizens of no mean country. Canada comprises in territory thirty per cent of the great empire to which we belong and has an area of one-fifteenth of the total area of the globe; Canada possesses unlimited resources in the wealth of the forest, the mine, the fishery; vast stretches of the most fertile land, great lakes, noble rivers, and mountains, the scenery which is unrivalled. We, the possessors of this grand heritage, should be proud to display on every possible occasion that emblem which is ours, of the greatest empire of history. And, Sir, while we are the fortunate possessors of these great natural resources, we have, I believe, a population as intelligent, as industrious, as sober, as law-abiding and as God-fearing as ever existed on the face of the earth. The Union Jack, which for a thousand years has braved the battle and the breeze in every corner of the known world, the emblem of all this moral and material wealth, is a flag to be proud of. Let me quote from an address delivered before the Empire Club in Toronto in 1906 by Mr. F. Barlow Cumberland, M.A., on the subject of 'The Union Jack of the Empire':

> The flag tells us whence we came; the flag tells us from whom we obtained it; it tells us that we are to keep it not only for those who are living here, but for those who are loyal to it around the world. Well, then, may it fly upon the school-houses of Manitoba; well has that government taken the foremost step in saying that all those varied nationalities which are coming within their lands shall be taught by the visible emblem which they have placed above their school-houses, that they are coming under the influences and under the charge of the Union Jack. So, too, may we have them all over our school-houses in Ontario. 'Well done' to those men and to those people who would spread the use of these flags among our Canadian school-houses, for they are the signals not only of our own union; they are the signs of a nationality wider than the country in which we live; they are a sign of brotherhood with our fellow peoples around the world.

I am happy to say, Sir, that since this address was delivered the government of Ontario has seen fit to order that the Union Jack shall be displayed from every schoolhouse in the province, on every public holiday throughout the year. Mr. Cumberland continued:

> This Union Jack, then, is the flag which is the birthright of each British man; this is the flag which should always fly and be held and be esteemed as our own. It heralds loyalty to our forefathers, to King, to country, and to empire. It speaks to us from the past; it tells us of the great heroes; it inspires us to greater deeds.

Before concluding I shall cite a stanza of verse which I deem appropriate to this occasion:

> It's only a small bit of bunting,
> It's only an old coloured rag,
> Yet thousands have died for its honour,
> And shed their best blood for the flag.
> It floats over Cyprus and Malta,
> Over Canada, the Indies, Hong Kong,
> And Britons where'er their flag's flying,
> Claim the rights which to Britons belong.
> We hoist it to show our devotion
> To our King, to our country, our laws,
> It's the outward and visible emblem
> Of advancement and liberty's cause.
> You may say it's an old bit of bunting,
> You may call it an old coloured rag,
> But freedom has made it majestic,
> And time has enobled our flag.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I am very glad indeed that my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) has moved this resolution, if for no other reason than that it has given us the pleasure of hearing a very eloquent speech from the mover and an equally eloquent speech from the seconder of the resolution. It is certainly well that we should have our attention called to the importance of keeping the flag flying as often as possible—I was going to say as long as possible, but it is unnecessary to say that, because I believe with every member of this House that the Union Jack will fly over Canada as an integral part of the British Empire until the end of time. However, my hon. friend will see that his resolution can hardly be passed with propriety because it calls upon the government to make a regulation which will require the Union Jack always to be displayed above any foreign flag which may be flown anywhere in Canada, except on the office or residence of a foreign consul.

We have no statute upon the subject, and therefore the government are powerless to pass a regulation which could be enforced. In order to make it effective there would have to be a statute and in order that it might be within the purview of the Dominion parliament, it would have to be a part of the Criminal law. It would have to be provided that the Union Jack was always to be placed above any foreign flag and penalties would have to be provided for any infraction of the law. Therefore, I am sure my hon. friend will see that the resolution could not be properly passed in its present form. Perhaps all my hon. friend desires, will have been obtained by calling attention to the subject which I admit is one of great importance. I do not know whether or not in other countries there are laws upon the subject, or whether it rests entirely with the people to have this view enforced and upon the respect which other people would have for the views of the citizens of these other countries. I know that in many parts of Canada, residents of the United States, who come to this country, are always in the habit of honouring the Union Jack, by placing it above the flag of their own country. There have been cases where that has not been done, and I know that our people upon a number of occasions have been incensed at the conduct of persons who have declined to honour the flag of our country. It is worthy of consideration whether or not a law should be passed, which, of course could be enforced by provisions with regard to a penalty.

My hon. friend has called attention to the fact that the Union Jack is flown upon the schoolhouses of Ontario. My impression is that it is flown every day in the year on the school-houses of Manitoba. In that respect, Manitoba has gone away ahead of the loyal province of Ontario, and all honour to the province of Manitoba that it has gone as far as it has, because there is no better means of teaching the youth of our country the principles of loyalty, than to teach them to know what the flag stands for, and to honour it as they would do, if it was flown from the school-house every day in the year. If it is flown only on public holidays, the school children are not apt to see it, because they do not attend school on public holidays. Therefore, I think it would be desirable that my hon. friend should endeavour to get the government of Ontario to follow the example which has been set by the government of Manitoba. When I was a member of the government of New Brunswick, the question was seriously discussed, and the government adopted a resolution favourable to having the school trustees fly the flag from the schcol-houses upon every day in the year, providing that some assistance should be given by the Board of Education to enable the various school districts to do so. I do not know whether that regulation has been generally observed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is that by virtue of a statute or a regulation ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is done by regulation, the Board of Education undertaking to contribute a certain amount for the purchase of flags.

It will be gratifying to my hon. friend to know that the order which I have had passed in my department, requiring the flag to be flown every day in the year upon every public building in all the border towns, and all the principal seaports of Canada, has met with, I think, the universal approval of the people of the country.

Mr. EDWARDS. Under what statute is that flag flown over public buildings and what penalty is attached if it is not flown?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is flown by an official of the department of Public Works, and the penalty is, that if he does not obey the order of the department, he will be dismissed from office. The order has been given and the flag is now being flown upon the public buildings in all the border towns and cities of Canada, and also at the principal seaports.

Mr. BRADBURY. Could I induce the minister to include the city of Winnipeg and other cities of that kind, where there are so many public buildings ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have started in the way I have described, of ordering the flag to be flown in the border cities and towns and also at the principal seaports. That is so that people crossing the border will see the Union Jack flying and as they come into our country at the various seaports, they will also see the flag of our country flying upon whatever day they happen to arrive. To extend it to every public building in Canada would, no doubt, be somewhat expensive, but I may say to my hon. friend, that this question is under consideration. I myself, think it is worthy of very careful consideration. I believe that if an order were passed to have the flag flown from every public building in every city and town of Canada upon every day in the year—and here, I am expressing my own personal opinion—it would not be unpopular, and I am rather inclined to think the country would justify the additional expense to which the government would be put in having these regulations carried out. However, that is a matter for consideration. I have had applications from other cities than border cities and towns, one from Peterborough; one from Calgary, urging that the flag should be flown on every day of the year in those cities. There have also been applications from other cities and towns throughout Canada. I trust my hon. friend will see that under the present law it would be impossible for the government to pass an effective regulation, and I hope my hon. friend will feel that he has discharged his duty, by thus bringing the matter forcibly to the attention of the House, and will leave it to the government to consider whether or not some modification should be made in the statutes which would enable his views to be carried out.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there actually a flag supplied to every Dominion public building in the country ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the understanding, and if my attention is called to any building where the caretaker is not in possession of a flag, I will see that he is supplied with one.

Mr. BORDEN Halifax). As I understand a regulation has been made that in certain towns and cities near the border the flag is to be flown every day in the year. What is the regulation as to public buildings where that does not apply ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My recollection is, that it is flown upon the 1st of July, Dominion Day, also upon Victoria Day, St. George's Day, St. Andrew's Day, St. Patrick's Day, and hereafter on St. David's Day. Then upon other days, in regard to which directions are given by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BLAIN. What about the 12th of July?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is no order that it should be flown on that day.

Mr. MEIGHEN. There were some remarks that fell from the hon. Minister of Public Works that will be gladly welcomed on this side of the House. He finds fault with the resolution on the ground that it calls for the government to enact regulations looking to the protection of the supremacy of the British flag on Canadian soil. It may be that under the statutes now obtaining in Canada regulations would have no legal effect. Of that I do not presume to speak. The objection applies only to the wording of the resolution. It affects in no way the principle, and it would be quite out of the power of the mover and quite within the power of the government through the Minister of Public Works to effect the amendment and make it a statutory provision instead. There is a principle in the resolution. That principle we hope the government will not antagonize. The hon. minister was good enough to express the hope that the Union Jack would for all time fly over the capital of this country. In that, I presume, he also expresses the hope of the government, including the first minister. I do not think it is quite consistent, though, to expect the Union Jack, which is the flag of the British Empire, to fly on Canadian soil after the ripe fruit has fallen from the tree. I leave that, however, for the Minister of Public Works to work out with his own chieftain. He was good enough to render some applause—and his applause is always appreciated— to the government of Manitoba for doing a little pioneer work in the way of installing into the minds of Canadian youth the importance of reverence for the Union Jack. I want to remind the Minister of Public Works that when this movement was placed in the form of legislation on the statute-books of Manitoba, it was opposed with the bitterest ridicule by the party in Manitoba with which the hon. minister is identified. That party, through its press and speakers, pointed out that this was simply an attempt at flag waving by the Conservative party then in power. I am glad indeed to see the Minister of Public Works come over to our side on this question, and I hope on other and greater occasion, when this side of the House endeavours to protect the Union Jack on Canadian soil against the attacks of its open foes, and against what is worse, the invidious carelessness of the indifferent, we shall find the hon. minister again coming over to our side and assisting us in that great work. Now, Sir, it is my earnest hope—I speak only as one member of the House—that the hon. member for London will not think that his work is done by simply uttering a few remarks on this occasion, but that this House will take occasion to do something effective in at least laying down a principle that will do somewhat to secure the supremacy of the British flag on this side of the 49th parallel, even though we must, when securing that supremacy, tolerate the prevalence of other flags. There is no objection, so far as I can see, to citizens of other lands, or to any one, if he sees fit, displaying the stars and stripes, or whatever flag they may be identified with; but there is objection, as has been well pointed out by the hon. member for London to the far too frequent display of that flag to the utter subserviency, the utter neglect of our own flag of empire. It is to prevent that, that the resolution is moved, but I do not think anything whatever will be done to prevent it if it simply stops at that point.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, it has always seemed somewhat strange to me that the regulations or laws or statutes with regard to the flying of the flag at sea should always be so intensely stringent, while with regard to the flying of flags on shore there seems to be no regulation whatever. Personally I do not know whether the regulations with regard to the flying of the flag at sea are statutory or merely admiralty regulations; but there the law, under whatever form it may be, is well known and well recognized. I listened with interest to the remarks of the Minister of Public Works. He and I both come from the same city, and what he has noticed in St. John, I have noticed also. There are a number of American citizens living there. Now, it appears to be characteristic of American citizens, no matter where they may be, to have an uncontrollable desire to fly their flag—to pin it on themselves —to put it on their autos, on their little yachts, or over the houses where they are staying. That is all very well in their own country; no one objects to that; but they do not appear to recognize that when they fly their flag in what is to them a foreign country, they are only doing it by the courtesy of the country in which for the time being they reside. The American citizens living in St. John appear to fly their flag almost every day in the year. The Minister of Public Works stated that they fly the Union Jack over the stars and stripes. I think that on consideration he will withdraw that. Occasionally some of them fly the Union Jack on the same pole, but on different halyards, at the same level as the stars and stripes. But the majority of them do not do so at all. They are generally content with flying the stars and stripes alone. If it is important that this matter of flags should be attended to in the east, which is a much older settled country as far as Britishers are concerned, certainly,

I think we can all readily agree it is far more important that this flag business should be properly attended to in our great Northwest, which is filling up so rapidly with people of so many different nationalities who perhaps hardly know our flag when they see it. I think this resolution contains a most important principle, one that I hope the Prime Minister and the government of this country will take to heart, so that some regulation will be put into force that will have the effect which the resolution anticipates. It has been said that the resolution would not give the government power to issue regulations that might be of use; but the government has the power to obtain a statute so that they may be empowered to make such regulations as they could legally and practically put into force. In the United States as we all know, it is almost as much as a man's life is worth, in some of the cities, to hoist the British flag. Apparently, it does not require any statute there to provide for the pulling down of that flag very quickly. If officials of the state or of the United States do not attend to the matter, the people soon take it into their own hands, and means are quickly taken by which that flag disappears from its flag-pole. I certainly support this resolution very heartily, and I hope that the government will bring in a Bill to authorize them to make necessary regulations, or that any other means required to carry out the idea of the resolution may be taken. I am quite certain it is high time that we took this matter up. It seems to be a simple thing on the face of it, but our young people are growing up, and strangers of all nationalities are coming into the country who have not been educated in regard to this matter and are content to see the foreign flag flying where their own flag should fly.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto). Like the rest of my colleagues, I was gratified at the encouragement this resolution met at the hands of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), but I think the House would have been better pleased if the minister had gone at least one step further. I think he should have stated that the government would take this matter into its own hands, and would introduce legislation to carry the resolution into effect. This is not the first occasion on which the flag matter has been brought up in this House. I do not desire to disparage the loyalty of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but I think it not unfair to point out, that on every occasion, the initiative with regard to the flag flying in Canada has come from the opposition side. It is not so many years since the flag did not float from this building in which we sit during the sittings of this House. I myself brought up the matter here, and complained of the omission; and ever since that day the flag has been flying at least on this building every day on which the House sits. And so it has been, from time to time, on each occasion the matter has emanated from the opposition side of this House. But it may be that the proposal of legislation to carry this resolution into effect may not properly come from this side. I apprehend that it would be a matter requiring the expenditure of money, and if so, the legislation would have to originate with the Treasury Benches. But, regardless of that, such legislation should be introduced at the earliest moment by those who control the majority in this House. This is not a mere matter of sentiment, but, even if it were, the introduction of such legislation would be quite justified. Many visitors come here, notably from the United States. They are good people, they make excellent friends and neighbours, and we are glad to have them amongst us. But it does violence to the feelings of Canadians when these people arrive enveloped in their stars and stripes? If they come to make their home here for the summer, before they enter their summer houses, they surround themselves, their grounds, their houses and their boats with a great galaxy of American flags. One would think, going through certain parts of this country, that he was in the United States of America. This is all very well, but side by side with these flags, there should be some proper display of the national emblem to mark this country as British. Unfortunately, this display of foreign flags has led to a number of what are known as 'flag incidents'. On certain occasions, the wanton flaunting of American flags in the faces of British subjects has caused men to make the law for themselves, and flags have been taken down in a way that is unpleasant for all concerned. These incidents sometimes become international affairs, but serious trouble has heretofore been averted. Not only the people of our own country, but visitors also are ignorant as to the status of our flag. A visitor will hoist a foreign flag in a more or less insulting way, then a British citizen will threaten to take it down, but does not know his rights in the matter any more than does the man who raises the flag. So, I think the time has come when the government should consider this whole question, and embody our proper rights in a simple statute which should be accessible to everybody and easily understood. For breaches of this law there should be some proper penalty, some fine or some other not too severe sanction. Not only do I concur in the language of the resolution, but I think this whole matter of flag flying in this country should be surrounded by proper regulations, so that the people of this country and visitors to this country may know the rights of our flag, and also of any other flag floated here for the time being. The Minister of Public Works has been good enough to extend the flag flying to border towns and seaports. Personally, I would like to see the regulation extended throughout the whole country. The expense would be comparatively small. As we are having so many foreigners coming to Canada, we want to let them know of what nationality this country is; we want to let them know that Canada is British, and let them know what the British emblem is. It would be a proper thing, and public opinion would back the government up in flying the flag on every public building. Especially this regulation should be extended, not only to seaports, but to the ports on our Great Lakes, some of which have a much larger quantity of shipping than many seaport towns.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The ports to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonell) refers, I class as border cities—those that stand on the shores of boundary waters. The flag is flying on the public buildings of all such cities on Lake Ontario, Lake Erie, Lake St. Clair and other boundary waters.

Mr. MACDONELL. I congratulate the minister upon the extension of his ruling. And, now that he has gone so far and extended it to seaports, ports on boundary waters and border towns, the minister might as well throw in the tail with the hide and have the flag flying on all public buildings in Canada. Then the government might take up this resolution and bring down a Bill containing provision not only for flying the flag, but for the regulation of this whole flag matter.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I am so much in sympathy with the general purpose of my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie), and with the sentiments expressed by him, that I regret to have to join the Minister of Public Works in advising him not to press his motion. I am thoroughly persuaded that the discussion to-night is a timely one, and will have a good effect, yet I feel that to press his motion in the terms in which the hon. gentleman has presented it to the House would not be wise. I am bound to say that I admire our American neighbours for the prominence they give to their flag in their own country, and I do not think any the less of them because, when they go abroad, they still exhibit their flag. Sometimes they may do it in a way that is not always pleasant to us, but after all, their main purpose is to declare themselves as citizens of the great republic, and we should not think any the less of them on that account. I regret that we in Canada do not make more use of our national flag. It is one of those things which we take for granted, that everybody is loyal in this country, and therefore there is no need for us to assert our loyalty. In a country situated as ours is, lying alongside another great nation, I think it is very desirable that there should be, not only upon public buildings, but upon the private homes of our people, a very prominent display of the Union Jack. While I am most heartily in sympathy with my hon. friend in his motive in bringing this matter before us, still I must point out to him that when he asks us to make regulations such as he proposes, I think he will be advised by any hon. gentleman of the legal profession that we practically have no power to make any such regulations. We could, by an Act of this parliament, take the power. But before doing that, it would be well that we should have some regard to the practice of other countries. Flag incidents are always troublesome. Every man who has any pride of country is justly offended when an insult is offered to his flag, and he properly resents it. We feel that way ourselves, and on that account we should be all the more careful to see that we give no cause of offence to the citizens of a foreign country who want to make use of their flag in a proper way. If we had a regulation exactly in the terms of the hon. gentleman's motion it might lead us into trouble. These are international questions. An insult offered to the flag is something of which the recognized authorities of every great nation must take notice. But I think in a matter of so much delicacy, warmly as we must sympathize with the good purpose the hon. gentleman has in view, we would do well to pause and make inquiry as to what is the practice of other nations in this matter. I do not think we are called upon to rush into this matter and do something, even with a good purpose, which might lead us into difficulties with citizens of a foreign country. We have much to learn in regard to these matters from the mother country and from other nations, and while sympathizing strongly with my hon. friend's purpose, and with the sentiments he has expressed in supporting his motion, I think he should let the matter stand over in order that inquiry may be made as to the effect—not of this resolution, because it would have no effect—but if a measure were to be brought forward in the shape of an amendment to the criminal law, declaring what should be done in these cases when a citizen of a foreign nation shows his flag abroad, we might get ourselves into grave difficulties. Regarding flags on public buildings, the government may, as a right, determine whether a flag shall be shown, and on what day. But when you come to deal with the house of a private citizen, or with the motor car or boat of a private citizen, you may be treading on delicate and possibly dangerous ground. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he has accomplished a good purpose already in having this discussion, and that it would be wise for him to withdraw his motion and leave the matter for the consideration of the government, with a view of inquiring as to what is done by other nations under similar circumstances. I would like my hon. friend to concur in that suggestion, because it is a matter on which it would be undesirable to have any division.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). It is so seldom that I have an opportunity of agreeing with anything the Minister of Public Works says that it is a sufficient excuse for me, on this occasion, to rise and say that I do agree with him in the sentiments he has expressed here to-night in regard to the Union Jack being maintained in a prominent position as the flag of this country. I almost expected, before the Finance Minister took his seat, that, judging from the fears that were in his heart with regard to the trouble that might arise if we undertook to deal with this matter, he was going to suggest that a deputation be sent to Washington to talk the matter over with them before we came to a conclusion. Now, I believe there is an evil in this country pointed out by my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie), and that something ought to be done along the lines of his motion to impress upon the minds of American citizens that when they come over to this country they must not give undue prominence to the stars and stripes on their automobiles or on their residences in this country. If it be necessary to take those steps. even though they be offended, I say by all means let those steps be taken, and let them be offended thereat. In this country and in the country across the line the majority of people are able to read. The people of Canada are sufficiently well posted to know that if they go into the United States and flaunt their flag in the way that American citizens flaunt their flag in Canada, they would be showing disrespect to the people of that country. We respect them in their loyalty and their devotion to their flag, and we show our respect for them by respecting their flag. If they cannot show similar respect for us by respecting our flag, then it is high time that the government gave them to understand that they must respect it. Only last summer, in my county, a very unpleasant flag incident took place. We have in different parts of the county of Frontenac many American citizens, who come in to engage in fishing and to reside part of the summer, and in one part of the county you would think it was a portion of the United States, so many stars and stripes do you see floating, while the Union Jack is scarcely ever visible. When one of our citizens protested because the stars and stripes were flying from the top of a flag pole without a Union Jack, he was insulted, and given to understand that he must mind his own business. I certainly think that a rule which applies to an individual should apply to a nation. A man must respect himself if he expects others to respect him. That is true of the individual, and that is also true of the nation. If we do not as a nation respect ourselves we cannot expect to enjoy the respect of other nations. I believe that our American cousins across the line, and the people of other foreign nations that come into Canada from all parts of the world, would have a much higher regard for Canada if we showed them that the British flag must be placed in the most prominent position, and that whatever other flag is shown, the Union Jack must have a position of superiority. That is no more than we should insist upon. Now, I do not see why the resolution of my hon. friend from London should not pass. He asks that regulations should be made by the government to secure respect for our national flag, and if it be necessary to enact a statute, then he asks the government to enact that statute. I think if the government were to propose a law on the lines of the motion of my hon. friend from London there would be no delay at all in passing it; if they brought in a Bill to-morrow or the next day, I think it would go through its first, second and third readings with the unanimous consent of this side of the House.

Reference has been made to the flying of the flag on the school-houses of Manitoba. Some twenty years ago I was the principal of one of the public schools in that province. I started a movement in the school over which I presided, had a flag pole erected and the flag flown, and I think I am right in saying that that school was the first school in Manitoba to have the Union Jack flying over it. It was at Souris, Manitoba. I hope something will be done along the line of the resolution moved by my hon. friend from London. I think it is high time that something should be done. Our beautiful summer resorts are every season attracting not only Americans, but people from England, Scotland, France, Germany and other lands. What must they think, in going through the beautiful lakes of Muskoka and the Thousand Islands to find a hundred American flags for one Union Jack? I feel very strongly that something should be done to regulate this and to show to the people of this country as well as to the people of the world that this is British territory, and that we intend to keep it such.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words upon this subject. I entirely agree with the proposed resolution of my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie), and I see no reason whatever why the government should not accept it. There must be a law in this country, or we can make a law, to stop Americans, or the people of any other nation from coming into Canada and flying foreign flags. It is no insult to any person who comes into Canada from the outside to say to him that he must give prominence to the flag of the country in which he happens to be. I would advise my hon. friend from London very strongly not to withdraw this resolution. I think it is right and I see no reason whatever why the government should not adopt it. The Union Jack is good enough to fly in Canada, or any other place, and it is only proper that we should give due prominence to the flag of our country. I wish to emphasize my view upon this question, and to ask my hon. friend not to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. FIELDING. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) wish to withdraw the motion, or does he wish to speak? He would shut out debate.

Mr. BEATTIE. I would like to make a few remarks.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend would shut out others; that is all.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie) asserts the proposition that some regulation should be issued by the federal government providing for some penalty, I suppose, where a foreign flag is exhibited in Canada above the Union Jack. I am sure that the proposition that due regard and pre-eminence should always be given to the flag of our country, whether in the presence of the flag of another country or not, is one that every member of this House and every good thinking person in Canada agrees with. It will be noticed that my hon. friend does not propose, in his resolution, any extension of the regulation which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) issued with regard to the use of the British flag on public buildings. I apprehend that my hon. friend, therefore, and the other hon. gentlemen who spoke with him on this subject, agree that the government have acted wisely in that matter. Let me say that for myself I have always regarded it as one of the most singular things in Canada that we have never had very much of an open exhibition of patriotic feeling by the display of flags, or by patriotic national music such as is seen in other countries. I think it is one of the great regrets in Canada that this custom has not obtained. Apparently our forefathers, and even the people of the present generation, have accepted all the privileges and rights which have come to them under British rule and under the British flag in a quiescent mood. They have been content to go along and accept the blessings of constitutional government and the advantages of British protection without making any fuss about it. It is only after forty years of our national history that we are seriously beginning to discuss the question of flying our flag. For at least forty years of our national life it was never thought necessary to fly the flag of our country every day on the parliament buildings. It was in the last parliament for the first time that any hon. gentleman in this House thought it necessary that the flag of Great Britain, should be flown above the parliament buildings when parliament is sitting. This indicates a peculiarly quiescent mood on the part of the public in Canada generally with regard to the exhibition of patriotism in that way. No other country with its population, extent or resources has ever got along so far in its national existence as Canada has without having more patriotic songs. True, I think in no part of the British Empire is 'God Save the King' sung so loyally or so frequently on public occasions as in Canada, but outside of that there are very few songs that Canadians sing which are emblematic of their devotion to this country of ours. There is 'The Maple Leaf For Ever,' a song that appeals to the patriotism of every Canadian, and our friends in the province of Quebec sing their patriotic song 'O Canada,' which is, I believe, the best Canadian national anthem. Why is it that we have not more of our national songs, and why is it that we do not fly our national flag more? I felt that sense of humiliation that hon. gentlemen have spoken of when, about ten years ago, on crossing the River St. Lawrence, I found on the other side an adequate display of the American flag on the public buildings and in their public squares such as is not to be found in Canada. The desire that Canadians should make a public exhibition of their devotion to their country either in song or by the use of their flag is one that is growing, and one which I think deservedly ought to grow. Various provinces have adopted the provision that the flag should be flown from the school buildings, a most admirable provision, one that should obtain in every province, so that the young people may learn to realize the history of their country, its traditions, and the great wealth of privilege and right which have been conferred upon us as a result of British rule. Too often our fathers and ourselves and children accept all these advantages and have nothing to say about them, failing to recognize the source from which they came.

With regard to dealing with the proposition contained in the resolution of my hon. friend I think it is a question which is worthy of consideration. I think that any foreigner who comes into Canada, no matter from where he comes, should feel that in this country he is not able to do any more than he can in any other country by the exhibition of the flag of the country to which he belongs. I think there is to be found legislation in the other countries of the world which deals with the exhibition of flags of alien nations, and that we should have something of the same kind on the statute-book of Canada. I think that would be in accordance with the sentiment which obtains in Canada to-day; which for the last ten or fifteen years has been increasing, and which was practically non-existent before. But, this is something which must be formulated in a statute, and the greatest care must be exercised because when you come to deal with the flags of foreign countries it is a very delicate matter. The idea of my hon. friend is a good one, but a cursory examination of the wording of his resolution will show that it is altogether too crude to crystallize into a statute. I submit that in order to deal with the matter in a sensible, sane and practical way, there should be delay so that inquiry may be made as to what is the best form for legislation to take. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Beattie) proposes that regulations should be issued by the government insisting that :

> Where a foreign flag or ensign is displayed or used either upon a flag pole, private residence, vehicle, or in any other manner or place whatsoever within this Dominion——

I suppose that language would be sufficiently broad to cover the display of flags on pleasure boats, although were one to apply the maxim ejusdem generis it is doubtful whether these words would apply to anything but something akin to a flag pole, private house, or vehicle. The hon. gentleman then goes on in his resolution to except only, the accredited representative of a foreign government from this regulation, but vessels of a foreign country within the harbours of Canada have by international law the right to fly the flag of their nation.

Mr. BEATTIE. That is acknowledged. This resolution would not apply to such a vessel at all.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am merely citing that to show that if we are to pass legislation on the subject a great deal more care would be necessary than to merely adopt the wording of this resolution and make it law. With the object of giving the matter that greater care I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Beattie) should accept the assurance of the Minister of Finance that inquiry will be made, and withdraw his resolution. Then, the resolution says :

> That a Union Jack of equal size and make shall also be hoisted and displayed therewith at the same time and place, and that the Union Jack shall always be placed in the most prominent position on every occasion.

Perhaps I am looking at it with the critical eyes of a lawyer, but it does seem to me that it would not be dignified for the parliament of Canada to dispose of such a question by adopting the language of the resolution which is very crude indeed. The use of the word 'occasion' in the resolution seems to be ungrammatical because instead of referring to time or place it would seem to apply to a vehicle, flagpole, or private residence. We are all anxious with my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) that this question should be properly dealt with, and that every Canadian should be encouraged to show on all occasions his devotion to Canada and the empire, but when we are legislating about the use of foreign flags we have to proceed very carefully. It was the Manitoba government I believe, that first blazed the way with regard to the flying of the flag on public schools and I remember that a strong imperialist and a man of high position in the mother country who visited Canada shortly after that action of the Manitoba government, spoke to me in reference to what could be done in Canada for strengthening the ties which bind her to the mother country. I, of course, told him that the Canadian people with firm determination of purpose and sincere devotion of heart were proud of their British allegiance, and were so content under it that nobody ever thought of questioning it, but if anything were to be done we ought to encourage the display of the British flag on all occasions and cultivate among the people a knowledge of national songs which in all countries, and all ages have best given the inspiration of patriotism to the people. Gradually, since the order of the Manitoba government, the different provinces have been taking the question up, and as a result I believe that in recent years our people are expressing more generally than ever before their pride in being Canadians, and citizens of the British Empire. I am sincerely anxious that some legislation should be passed as a result of the proposition now put forward by my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie), and in order that the legislation to be enacted may be appropriate and well considered I would move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey). The hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is perfectly aware that the passage of this resolution would not crystallize its wording into law, but would merely be an expression of opinion from this House that any foreigner who comes to Canada and who is so loyal to his own country that he must hoist his flag, must go to the expense of purchasing a Union Jack and hoisting it in the most prominent position. That is all the resolution amounts to. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) should taunt us with waving the flag.

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not say so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am a little surprised at my hon. friend saying he is surprised that we have not seen more of the flag and that the flag has not been hoisted on more public buildings and made more conspicuous in Canada than it has been. I believe that is in part due to the policies which his party has advocated in the past. We know that in years gone by if there was one thing more than another with which the Conservative party were taunted it was waving the old flag for party purposes, and we know that the party opposite were taunted with advocating a policy of unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union and continental freedom of trade. We know that his own leader at that time, Hon. Edward Blake, said if that policy had been insisted on, and if they had been successful at the polls the ultimate result would have been annexation to the country to the south. We admired Hon. Edward Blake for taking that course. We know that on this same occasion Sir John Macdonald uttered the famous words: 'A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die'. So it ill becomes the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to say he was surprised that the flag has not been used in the past more than it has been.

Mr. MACDONALD. In the days of Sir John A. Macdonald did he find it necessary to fly the flag over the parliament buildings of this country?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Not only did the party of the hon. gentleman not propose that, but they proposed to put into force a policy that would ultimately have led to our annexation to the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD. Let me inform my hon. friend that it was under this government that the flag first flew over this building.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. When the reciprocity treaty was brought into this House, his own Finance Minister said that the first action of the Conservative party would be to beat the drum.

Mr. FIELDING. They are doing that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That means no more than waving the old flag. I am surprised that the member for Pictou has moved the adjournment which means shelving this question. I cannot see why they cannot adopt the resolution which does not become law, but simply affirms the opinion of this House. A Canadian visiting another country and not showing proper respect for the flag of that country would be open to the same blame as a foreigner acting in that way in Canada.

Mr. A. S. GOODEVE (Kootenay). I agree with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that there should be no division of opinion in the House upon this question. I see no reason why the government should not accept this resolution in the spirit in which it has been moved. The hon. member criticises it because it is not couched in such language as would be used in a statute and he seems to me to be begging the question. The resolution says that in the opinion of this House proper regulations should be issued by the government of the Dominion of Canada. The resolution leaves it open to the House or any member to decide what would be proper regulations to carry out the spirit of the resolution. The hon. member has himself made the argument for adopting this resolution, he has said that the spirit of loyalty in this country has been rather quiescent. It seems to me that this is but the fitting outcome of the gradual growth of the national spirit in this Canada of ours. It is quite true that we Canadians can look back to the time when our young men were leaving for the United States and were ready to give allegiance to that flag. I am glad to say that that is changed to-day, but our young men are realizing that we have a national spirit of our own, that the day has come when it is the proud boast of the manufacturers of Canada to place on their goods the trade mark: Made in Canada. A Canadian citizen is proud to purchase goods with that particular trade mark upon them, and now to-night the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) proposes to go one step further and to say that the flag, the emblem of our nationhood, shall be displayed on all occasions so that those who come as guests to our country shall realize that as our guests they must give due honour and respect to that flag. There is nothing more in the resolution, and for that reason I cannot see why the Minister of Finance should object and ask that it be withdrawn. He and other speakers on that side have all said that they agree with the spirit of the resolution. The member for Pictou says he agrees with the kernel of the resolution, the only difference is with the phraseology, but as I have pointed out this resolution will not become legislation. I trust that the Minister of Finance will withdraw his objection, and that this resolution may go forth from this House unanimously to the people of Canada affirming that we shall take one step further in our nationhood, and that we as members of parliament say that the flag of Canada, and the flag of the empire shall always be pre-eminent in our own country.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). I heartily support the resolution which is only an expression of the opinion of this House, and I think the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) is deserving of the thanks of every member for bringing it forward. It ill becomes the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to find fault with the language in which it is couched, I would hope rather that he would fall in line and say it was in the best interests of our people. The resolution reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, proper regulations should be issued by the government of the Dominion of Canada insisting that where a foreign flag or ensign is displayed or used either upon a flag pole, private residence, vehicle or in any other manner or place whatsoever within this Dominion by any person or persons except the accredited representative of a foreign government, a Union Jack of equal size and make shall also be hoisted or displayed therewith at the same time and place, and that the Union Jack shall always be placed in the most prominent position on every such occasion.

The kernel of the resolution, to use the words of the hon. member for Pictou, is sound and he agrees heartily with it ; and yet in the very same breath he moves the adjournment of the debate practically to kill it. I have only to say that I have hearty sympathy with the resolution, and the hon. member for London is deserving of great credit for bringing it forward.

Mr. GLEN CAMPBELL (Dauphin). I dare say there is still in the mind of the hon. Minister of Public Works a gleam of his old political allegiance when he congratulates the province of Manitoba upon the fact that the flag flies over every school-house in that province. The member for Pictou is to be congratulated on the fact that he sees that the little province of Manitoba, under a Liberal-Conservative government, was the first to blaze the trail in educating the foreign children who have come into our country. But if the hon. member for Pictou, and perhaps also the hon. Minister of Public Works, had been in the legislature of Manitoba at the time Mr. Roblin introduced that flag policy, I am sure they would have done just what as good men as themselves did on the Liberal side—worked against it in every manner possible. Let me quote to you something from a man whose name is familiar to all the Liberals in this House, Mr. Edward Brown, the leader of the Liberal party in Manitoba. He felt that he and his party were much hurt by the flag policy inaugurated by Mr. Roblin. He went to the extent of making the same professions of loyalty that we hear so frequently from that side of the House, accompanied by the same actions of disloyalty. In a private circular letter under his own name, sent out on the 17th of September, to the Grit newspapers throughout the province, that was previous to the election of 1907, he wrote :

With regard to the flag incident, can you get any interviews from school trustees in your district as to what they think of the teachers being compelled to hoist the flag and take it down with the thermometer at 35° or 40° below zero. Comment yourselves editorially on the subject. If you do this, will you also send a specially marked copy to the 'Free Press' at once, so that they may quote your views?

Mr. Brown spoke on every occasion against this educative flag policy of Mr. Roblin. Every other Liberal who stood on a platform in any election compaign in Manitoba since that policy was inaugurated took the same stand as Mr. Brown. I may say that Mr. Roblin got more telegrams and communications of all kinds from prominent men all over the empire for the inauguration of that policy than perhaps any other public man got on any other occasion. My hon. friend from Pictou said that to-night was not an opportune time for bringing forward this resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not say that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will not say that the hon. member put it exactly in that way, but that was the sentiment that his words expressed. That may be his point of view, and the point of view of the ministerial side of this House ; but hundreds of thousands of people in Canada, many of them the staunchest Grits, think this is the most opportune time to show by a unanimous vote of this House that a certain measure now before this House called reciprocity is dangerous to the flag of Great Britain. For that reason I think this is a most opportune time for this House to vote unanimously in favour of this resolution. Parliament is omnipotent so far as law-making is concerned. If this resolution is passed to-night, there is nothing to hinder parliament from putting it in proper form to-morrow so that it can be enforced. For that reason I trust that the House will vote down the amendment of the hon. member for Pictou, which is evidently an evasion and quibble, getting away from the point and trying to becloud the matter before the House.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) has nothing but the sincerest motive in bringing this question before the House in the terms of the resolution now under consideration. I cannot say as much for some hon. gentlemen on the other side who have spoken to the resolution, because it would appear to me, judging from their remarks—take my hon. friend who has just sat down as an example—that it is just as much or more to impress on this House and the country their loyalty that they so vigorously support this resolution as it is the national benefit that they are considering. My hon. friend from Pictou has moved the adjournment of the debate, and to my mind he has given a very substantial reason for doing so. It is quite true that in the terms of the resolution, if it were to carry, the government are called upon to make proper regulations, and necessarily they have power to make those regulations in whatever form would seem to them best, if they have power to deal with this matter in that way. But the purpose of the resolution is stated very clearly, and plainly, and whatever regulations the government might attempt to bring into effect as a result of this House passing the resolution, would help to bring about the result that is asked for by the resolution. The purpose of the resolution would have to be crystallized into legislation in some way. Now, I am sure that my hon. friend from London does not want regulations or laws passed that would bring into effect the purpose of this resolution in the way in which it is stated. This language, Sir, is very broad. These regulations must provide—

That where a foreign flag or ensign is displayed or used, either upon a flag pole, private residence, vehicle or in any other manner or place whatsoever within this Dominion——

I take it that that means even inside a private house.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. NEELY. The wording certainly gives that impression. Now, I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) does not want to make it a criminal offence for some American citizen, we will say, who comes here to spend a month or two, or who comes to Canada with the intention of becoming a permanent citizen, to tack the stars and stripes on the walls inside his residence.

Mr. BEATTIE. Would you call the inside of a house a 'public place'?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It does not say 'public place.'

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It says 'display,' and the only way to display it is to put it in a public place.

Mr. NEELY. The hon. gentleman takes a different meaning out of the word 'displayed or used' from that which other people would take.

Mr. BRADBURY. It says 'upon.'

Mr. NEELY. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) had better read the resolution again, for it says:

—displayed or used either upon a flag pole private residence, vehicle or in any other manner or place whatsoever.

Now, if these hon. gentlemen accuse the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) of quibbling, surely they themselves are quibbling when they undertake to say that the words——

Mr. BEATTIE. The words are plain English, and all the hon. gentleman has to do is to read them as they are.

Mr. NEELY. I have read them exactly as they are. Now, as my hon. friend from Pictou says this is a serious question we are considering, I can only again state my position that, by passing this resolution, the House would be declaring that the terms of the resolution would have to be put upon the statute-book. If my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) wished to effect anything, and not merely to promote this discussion, why should he not have introduced a Bill stating the objection he desired to bring about, and thus giving us something tangible instead of a crude resolution of this kind, which, if passed in its present form, might be very embarrassing, no matter how sincere the intention of the government in dealing with the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. NEELY. Hon. members need not laugh. I say frankly it might be embarrassing to deal with the matter in the form in which it is put. There is one thing on which I congratulate my hon. friends on the other side. If they have no policy on any other subject, we may always be sure that they will have a policy on the flag.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. NEELY. Sir, this is one of many cases in which these hon. gentlemen have tried to hide their defects of policy or their lack of policy under a vigorous waving of the flag. I presume it is the sincere and honest desire of every man in this House to have the flag of his country shown due respect. I have many American citizens in my own part of the country and a great many in my own constituency. I do not know that any serious harm has ever come from the fact that a few of them bring a small sample of the stars and stripes across with them——

Mr. BEATTIE. I was not referring to the stars and stripes alone. The resolution says 'a foreign flag.'

Mr. NEELY. I am using this merely as illustration; my hon. friend admits, I suppose, that the stars and stripes is a 'foreign flag.' I say I do not know that any great harm has come to this country because a few of these people from the United States bring across the stars and stripes. Perhaps, for a year or so, they decorate the walls of their houses with this flag. But they spend but a short time in this country in the enjoyment of the benefits derived from living under the Union Jack before they very gladly lay away the stars and stripes and adopt the Union Jack for display on all public and private occasions.

But I submit that this resolution in this form is much further-reaching and wider-spreading in its effects than my hon. friend (Mr. Beattie) probably intended. As I object to the terms of the resolution, I will support the resolution of the hon. member for Pictou that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. W. R. SMYTH (East Algoma). Representing, as I do, a constituency that borders on the United States, I would like to say a few words in regard to this matter. I am astonished to find our good friends on the opposite side quibbling over a matter of this kind. I was wondering, while the hon. member from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) was talking, how long it would take the House of Representatives of the United States to deal with this matter if it were a question of our flag flying over their flags in the United States. I well remember on one occasion passing up the Sault Ste. Marie river and seeing the American flag flying on the flagpoles of the different houses along that stream. A friend of mine remarked as to one of the men occupying one of these houses that it ill-became them to display the stars and stripes without the Union Jack either in an equal position or on top. The man said he was impressed with the propriety of doing so. When, two or three days after, I had occasion to pass the same way, I found that he had complied with the request of my friend by putting up a Union Jack about the size of a postage stamp on the top of the flag pole, which I considered adding insult to injury. I really cannot understand the attitude of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has described the resolution of my hon. friend from London as crude. Of course, that is the usual treatment that a layman on this side of the House, gets from members of the legal profession who sit on the other side of the House. Everything that emanates from a layman of this side of the House, is crude, according to the lawyers opposite. I desire to say that whether it is crude or not, I would rather stand by the resolution of the member for London than to stand in the position of the hon. member for Pictou; and crude though it may be, I shall support the resolution, and I hope the member for London will not withdraw it.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk). I cannot understand the attitude of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, taking objection to a resolution of this kind. I can understand an objection on the ground that it is not properly framed, but I cannot understand any objection against its spirit. There is no question that the very first sentence in that resolution, makes it possible for the government to accept it, and to frame regulations to govern this matter. Now with regard to the flying of flags on public buildings, I was glad to hear the Minister of Public Works intimate the other night, that our flags would be flown on some of those buildings along the border towns. My opinion is that the flag should be shown on every public building, owned by the government of Canada, including the post offices. Regarding the Northwest, and my own province of Manitoba, this is an important matter. We have had an experience in the Northwest that perhaps the people of Ontario have not had. In the city of Winnipeg, on a holiday, as every man knows, who has been there, on such occasions, a stranger walking down the street would hardly know that he was in a Canadian city, he would suppose he was in an American city from the number of American flags that he would see flying. I remember an instance that occurred two or three years ago in Winnipeg, when an American citizen went into the city hall, took down the Union Jack and placed the stars and stripes on the masthead. That is only an example of what is happening every day in parts of Canada. On that occasion trouble was only averted by the coolness and wisdom of the authorities, who took charge of the man who had committed the outrage, and protected him from the men who were waiting at the bottom of the stairs to mob him. He was allowed to go free, there was no punishment meted out to him, because there seemed to be no law against it. I cannot understand the attitude of the government in trying to shelve a motion of this kind. If bloodshed has been averted time after time in Canada, it has been owing to the forbearance and common sense of our people, who have been deeply offended by the use which is made of American flags. Now we have a large number of Americans coming into our western country. We have no objections to their flag, I have no objections to the American flag flying in Manitoba, but I have serious objections to seeing it fly without the Union Jack alongside of it, or in the near vicinity. The resolution before us does not deny to any one the privilege of flying his flag, it only asks that where a foreign flag is flown, a Canadian or British flag should be flown alongside of it, in an equally prominent position. That is a reasonable proposition, and I do not see how the government can object to it. American citizens coming to the western country, who are reasonable and self respecting men, cannot object to it. They admire their flag, and by the great honour they pay their flag, they have obtained the respect of the world. A man who respects himself, will be respected by others; a nation that respects its flag will see its flag respected by other nations. If we fail to respect our own flag, American citizens and other foreigners who come into this country, will also fail to respect it. I am satisfied that they would respect our flag more than they do, if we showed more respect for it ourselves. I would ask the Minister of Public Works to pursue the policy he has outlined, and that he cause the Canadian flag, the Union Jack, to be shown on every post office as well as other public buildings, so that foreigners coming to this country may learn to respect our flag.

Mr. MOLLOY. I must take objection to the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell), regarding the attitude he says the Liberal party took in the election of 1907. I was a candidate in that election, the flag incident was one of those discussed by the people, and I won the election. I won the election against the Attorney General of the province, who went into a certain district of the constituency, inhabited largely by Germans, and told them that they would not be compelled to fly the British flag on their schools. These men swore to that fact, and I used that fact against the Attorney General of the province, on the ground, not that I was opposed to the flying of the flag, but I was opposed to any man or any party trying to make a political football of the British flag.

Mr. A. B. CROSBY (Halifax). I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his change of sentiment, regarding the flag, and likewise the hon. member for Pictou, (Mr. Macdonald). To-night we have seen a rather peculiar condition of things. First, we had the Minister of Public Works undertaking to lead the House in this matter, and finding that things were not going right, the Minister of Finance took hold. He failed to set them right, and then the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), undertook to lead the House, and he simply told the House that if they did not do what he wanted them to do, he would move the adjournment of the debate. The First Minister, who has been accustomed to lead the House, has not seen fit to say anything yet. I congratulate the Finance Minister, because, when he was Premier of Nova Scotia, we never saw the Union Jack flying over the provincial building, the only flag we saw was the flag of Nova Scotia. Well, the flag of Nova Scotia is very good in its place, but since the province has become part and parcel of the Dominion of Canada, the proper flag to fly over the provincial building is the Union Jack. On many occasions during the time the hon. Minister of Finance was premier of Nova Scotia, resolutions were brought into that House calling upon the government to pass an Act to compel the schools to fly the British flag on the 1st of July, but these resolutions were never carried. I think I am quite safe in saying that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), was a member of the House at that time.

Mr. MACDONALD. No such suggestion or resolution was moved in the local legislature at the time when I was there, and I was there for six years, by any member of the Conservative party.

Mr. CROSBY. If the Minister of Finance would say that that is the case I would say that I am in error, but I think I am quite safe in saying what I have said.

Mr. FIELDING. I am quite willing that the hon. member shall keep on saying what he likes.

Mr. CROSBY. The Minister of Finance knows I am saying what is right. I do not propose to say anything but what I can back up, and if the Finance Minister will say that I am not right I will try to get the documents to prove that I am right. If I fail to do that I will be satisfied that I am wrong and I will apologize to him. But he knows I am right and therefore he will let me say what I like. It is not often he allows me to do it if he can help it.

The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) had a good deal to say about flag flying and he made a mournful cry about the people not being able to put up the stars and strips in their houses. In this country we are manufacturing wall paper and there is no necessity for people to use the stars and stripes with which to decorate their walls. Let them put up the paper that is made in this country. He also said that we on this side of the House could not do anything without bringing in the flag. The Conservative party had been noted for that. They never arrange any policy without including the British flag. We have had intimations on many occasions from men on that side of the House, men who, perhaps, do not sit on that side of the House now, men who have been superseded by others of the same opinion, that it was a cry. They have said that the flag did not make any difference to them, that it was a question more or less of business and trade. It is strongly intimated by shrewd and careful calculators—whether they are right or wrong, I am not going to argue the question because it is not up for argument at the present time—that the only thing that the agreement that is before us now has to recommend it is closer relations, so close that the flag will be coming across and staying across and not going back at all. Our friend Mr. Ham says: What is the use of going anywhere because you only have to come back again?—but this will be a case of coming where it does not go back. Therefore, I am not surprised at the Minister of Finance trying to prevent this issue from being voted on squarely. The hon. member for Pictou says that this resolution does not mean anything. This resolution has been on the Order Paper for four or five days and if the hon. member for Pictou had been particularly interested in framing a resolution the grammar of which would meet with his approval, because he is a man of very great ability in his profession, he has had sufficient opportunity to do so. I feel satisfied that if he makes up his mind now to do it he and my hon. friend from London could get together and frame this resolution in such a way as would meet the situation and there would be no necessity for adjourning this debate. Adjourning the debate simply means that we vote down the resolution because there will be no other opportunity of bringing it before the House. This is the last private members day and even if it were not there would be no opportunity. Therefore, the adjourning of the debate means nothing more nor less than voting down the resolution and blocking the whole matter. The hon. member for Pictou went further and said that this would give the government an intimation as to what should be done. This government have been in power since 1896, we are now in the year 1911, and they do not yet know what they should do with the flag. That is a splendid condition indeed! The hon. member for Pictou has had to get up and tell the people on that side of the House that during all this time they did not know they had a flag. The hon. gentleman tells them something that they did not know before, that they have a flag, and he adds that they will take the matter into consideration and fix the flag. I will not be very well pleased with the way that they will fix it up, but I am quite willing to leave it to the members of this House to regulate it for them. Let us regulate it to-night. We have not very much to do, the government has nothing to bring down, it is private members night, let us fix the flag. In the morning we will be able to wake up and say that we have done something—we have regulated the flag. If they are able to steal our trade they cannot steal our flag. Let us fix the flag. I do not desire to take up more of the time of the House. I do think that the hon. member for Pictou should not vote against the resolution. If the grammar does not suit the hon. gentleman let us get the grammar into it. Let us get half a dozen grammars into it if necessary, but let us have the resolution voted upon. Let us show, every one of us, that we are true Britishers. I am not trifling with a matter of this kind to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CROSBY. There are a great many 'hear, hears' over there that have not much behind them. Still, I am willing to accept them on this occasion. There are many occasions on which I do not think much of their 'hear hears,' but, to-night, if they say 'hear, hear,' I say: Let them vote 'hear, hear.' The hon. member from Humboldt has come to the conclusion that it would not be fair to compel people, instead of putting the stars and stripes on the wall, to buy the paper manufactured in Canada with which to decorate their walls and thus stimulate the trade of the country. I trust that the hon. member who introduced this resolution will hold to his resolution as we hold to him. We have no desire to force the resolution upon the hon. member for Pictou or any other member. He can put more grammar or dictionary or any other additional conditions into it that he likes if it will make it any smoother for him, because sometimes it is very hard for him to swallow things and I hope that we may vote on the resolution to-night if he can fix it up.

Mr. M. CLARK (Red Deer). Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House, that I detain it for one moment with the greatest possible reluctance, but this is to me an entirely new class of political discussion and I do not care to give a vote in which the flag is implicated without explaining my position. I am affected by this resolution exactly as I should be if any hon. member on the other side arose and proposed that we should record that it is right for all Canadians to show respect and love to their parents. If any hon. member proposed such a resolution I should feel that it was insulting. I am affected exactly so towards this resolution. I think it is a most undesirable thing in the interests of all that we hold dearest in this country to have a vote upon the flag at all. I must say that those who force such a vote incur what to my mind is a very great responsibility. There are no doubts on this side—who infuses the doubts on the other side, and why infuse them? I must say in regard to our American citizens who come into the west in large numbers that my experience is that of my friend from Humboldt: that they are extremely easily assimilated; not because that in an assertive and what might be to them an offensive way we wave the flag in their eyes, but because we try to show them we have a country over which the flag waves in which they can have as great privileges and as great happiness and as great prosperity as are to be found anywhere in the world. They learn to love the country, they learn to love its institutions, they learn to love, if you like its lower tariffs, and then they love the flag. My hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Smyth) derives his inspiration in support of this resolution from the United States. I wonder he goes there for an example for anything. He told us the United States people would not wait an instant in a matter of this kind, and in that respect at least the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smyth) is a good States man. I have not found that the people of the United States are offensive in this manner. If I might venture to be egotistical I might tell the House that a few weeks ago I had the honour of delivering an address before the Canadian Club at Boston, and, in honour of your very humble servant the Union Jack floated from the Parker House to the other side of the street all the time I stayed at that hotel. But I differ from my hon. friend from East Algoma; I do not go to the United States for my thinking or inspiration on a subject of this kind; I would rather go to the other side of the water and I must say that I have never found any of what I would call this fussy self-assertiveness amongst the men who hold the historic position of being the greatest defenders of the flag. I recall the story of a fussy subordinate who in the days of the Indian mutiny went up to Sir Henry Havelock and said to him: Sir, I always carry out your orders to the letter, and Sir Henry replied: My good man, I never give orders, I only carry out those of the little lady (referring to Queen Victoria). A like fussy person met the Duke of Wellington outside of a church, long years after the day of Waterloo, and he said to him: May I have the great honour of shaking hands with the hero of Waterloo, and the duke turned to him and said: Don't make a damn fool of yourself. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether that advice would be unparliamentary if I repeated it to gentlemen on the other side of the House, but, I submit it as being well worth their consideration. It is because (and I say these words in all sincerity) it is because I have always found in my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie)—for whom I have as great a personal regard as for any member of this House—those very qualities of solid substantial manhood and the absence in his general deportment of what I have termed fussy self-assertiveness, that I regret extremely he did not accede to the very simple request, based upon good grounds as I think, that no great haste should be shown in pressing such a motion as this to a division.

Mr. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Text.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a word of explanation. I approve the principle of the resolution introduced by my friend from London (Mr. Beattie).

I do not come here to scream about the loyalty of my race towards British institutions; it is known!

We, French Canadians, respect, we love the British flag, and are happy, in our province, to see it flying side by side with the tricoloured flag. Moreover, we like to see these two flags mix together on our social and national holidays, we are proud of both our splendid flags. And we would not have waited for that motion to put it into practice in the province of Quebec.

I am paired with my friend from Kamouraska, otherwise I would vote for that resolution as its principle is written in the heart of every French Canadian.

Mr. BRUNO NANTEL (Terrebonne). (Text.) I shall say but one word, Mr. Speaker. I very cordially approve the sentiments which the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) has just expressed. I sincerely believe this resolution should not have given rise to so much discussion, and that it should have been carried unanimously as was the one which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) introduced the other day.

Last year, during a very important debate, the hon. the Prime Minister reminded the member for Jacques Cartier that he should not forget he was not only a Canadian subject, but also a British subject. Well, as a British subject, there should not be the least objection to the British flag flying together with the tricoloured flag which is dear to us.

As I am not paired, I shall with all my heart vote for the resolution of the hon. member for London.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). We have heard with some interest the remarks of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) and of the nationalist members for Quebec, but it seems to me that the flag is in great danger when it comes to be placed in the care of these gentlemen. I might tell my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), whose remarks were very appropriate to this discussion, that he need not worry in the slightest over the remarks of these hon. gentlemen. The junior member for Halifax finds fault with the Liberal party in Nova Scotia because the flag did not fly over the citadel in Halifax on certain occasions, but I have yet to learn that he or his party have ever shown any endearing affection towards that flag, and when he commented upon the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou and of the Minister of Finance, I was rather astonished that he should venture on such ground. He spoke of the 'dictionary' and the language of the hon. member for Pictou, but possibly he was not able to understand the dictionary that the hon. member for Pictou used. So far as the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) is concerned, nature has not endowed him with any very high intelligence, and he has not been favoured with an education which would enable him to stand up here to criticise the language used by members on this side of the House, and more particularly by the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. CROSBY. I did not criticise the grammar of the hon. member for Pictou; I asked him if he would assist us in putting it in grammatical form.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). I should say he could have put it in proper form without any suggestion, hint or opinion from the junior member for Halifax. I am sure he would not thank that hon. member for any suggestion from a grammatical point of view. As to his remarks about the member for Pictou and the dictionary, I think they are entirely gratuitous, and I would suggest that when he comes to waving the flag he confine himself entirely to the flag and do not give way to any criticism of any one else's diction.

Mr. BEATTIE. I am somewhat surprised, in fact, I am astonished, at the course this discussion has taken. I wish to tell the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that I was not waving any flag; I simply put a quiet resolution on the Order Paper, wishing for an expression of opinion which would discourage foreigners coming into this country and waving not only one flag, but hundreds of flags. You cannot go to a theatre but on the stage, if the company have to wave a flag they wave the stars and stripes, or a foreign flag. I think it would be only common decency and politeness when these companies come here to take the money of our people that they should wave only the flag of our country. I have the greatest respect for foreign flags, but I think they might, in common politeness and decency, wave the flag of Great Britain. It seems to me ignorance on their part not to do so.

Reference has been made to flying the Union Jack on all our public buildings. I have no such intention; I do not wish it. There are certain buildings over which the flag should fly, such as customs houses. It flies on the customs house in London, but I had no intention of having it placed on all public buildings. I was not waving the flag; I simply wanted to discourage hundreds and hundreds of foreigners coming in here and bringing in not one, but dozens of flags, covering all their vehicles. The moment they go to a watering place they erect a flagstaff and on it place a foreign flag. Hundreds of children go to Muskoka and other places and find not a Union Jack, nothing but foreign flags. It is a great mistake, our own children get the idea that it is our flag and unfortunately many of our people do not understand the flag. The red ensign we fly on our buildings is a ship's flag and we have no right to fly it in that way. The Union Jack should fly on all private buildings. On our ships we use a Canadian flag, that is, a British flag, with a coat of arms in the corner to let the customs officers know that the ship is from Canada, and in Australia they do the same thing, but they are not national flags, and it is a pity that when our people want to use a flag they do not use the Union Jack, that the flag of the empire. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has been very polite, saying the resolution was crude and ungrammatical. I would like to see some of his documents. If we read them through, I believe we would find many of them much worse than that. Some of these professional men have got the idea that no one is fit to draw a resolution but themselves. I have no fault to find with that. I am surprised that the member for Red Deer should think I was waving the flag.

If I had been asked to withdraw the resolution at the proper time I would have done so, but after it has gone to the country now I would be ashamed to go back to my constituents and say I had withdrawn it. I would like to oblige the Finance Minister and the Minister of Public Works by withdrawing, but if I did so now I would become a laughing-stock. It is a resolution for which every man should vote. I simply want an expression of opinion from the House to discourage this promiscuous flying of foreign flags instead of our own.

House divided on amendment, Mr. Macdonald (Pictou).

Motion for adjournment of the debate agreed to.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I can now give to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition the information as to all the days on which it is ordered that the flag shall be flown. They are as follows : March 17, St. Patrick's Day ; April 23, St. George's Day ; May 24, Victoria Day ; May 26, Queen's birthday ; June 3, King's Birthday ; June 23, Prince of Wales' Birthday ; June 24, St. Jean Baptiste Day ; July 1, Dominion Day ; November 30, St. Andrew's Day ; and now March 1, St. David's Day. These are in addition to the flying of the flag daily at all border towns and principal seaports.

THE MARKEY FISHING LEASE.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved :

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence and other papers relating to the fishing lease granted to one Markey in the waters of the Nelson river and other northern waters; and of all correspondence with regard to the proposed cancellation of same, and a copy of the said lease.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, I do not want to bring in any contentious matter. All I want is to have the information brought down, and I feel sure that the minister will bring it down. My impression was that he had assured me that these fishing leases had all been cancelled. It is a matter of grave import to this country that they should be cancelled, particularly this one. In the event of the Hudson Bay railway being built, this lease, which cost $10 a year, will be of immense value. For that reason I hope that the fullest information that can be given to this House will be given by the minister. Later on, when I have the information, I will bring the matter up.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a return showing all applications for aid to the construction of dry docks under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, 1910, the location or situation of each proposed dock, the dimensions thereof as well as the extent of property and plant proposed, the amount of subsidy in each case, and full particulars of all applications which have been granted, and all those now under consideration.—Mr. Taylor (Leeds).

For a copy of all letters, papers, telegrams, and documents, vouchers and pay sheets, showing the names of all persons who supplied materials or worked, and the prices and rates of wages, and sums paid to each, in connection with the construction of a wharf at Deep Brook, N.S.—Mr. Jameson.

For a return showing respectively, the total trade, the imports, the exports for each year from 1846 to 1876, both inclusive, between the British North American possessions, except Newfoundland, and the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and other countries respectively.—Mr. Borden (Halifax).

Bill (No. 4) to amend the Railway Act—Mr. Martin (St. Mary's, Montreal).

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FIELDING. I desire to lay on the table a supplementary return in relation to the reciprocity agreement, containing additional letters received on the subject, for and against.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister to an important measure on the Order Paper for the protection of children in the cities, known as the Juvenile Delinquents Bill, which stands for its second reading. I am sure that it will only take about ten minutes to dispose of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the Bill of my hon. friend were the next in order there would be no objection ; but there are several just as important on the paper before that of my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Before the House adjourns I beg to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that we are very close to order No. 8, the further consideration of the resolution in favour of a substantial reduction in the duties on agricultural implements which I had the honour to urge upon the House one month ago. At a later date, when we approached the order for resuming the discussion, the Prime Minister moved the adjournment of the House, so that the discussion was avoided at his instance. He assured me then that on the following Monday it would come up, but that again did not turn out to be correct. To-night the resolution is again shifted ahead by the motion of the Prime Minister, and I very much fear that the result will be that it will not be reached again this session, as I understand that this is the last private members' day.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 126) respecting the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Fortier.

BILL MINER.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Before the orders of the day are called I wish to put a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Bureau) based upon the following despatch in to-day's Montreal 'Gazette':

BILL MINER ARRESTED.

Canadian Government may have him, if they want him.

Chicago, February 27.—That 'Old Bill' Miner, second only to Jesse James in notoriety as a train robber, was one of the White Sulphur, Ga., bandits arrested at Gainesville, Ga., last Thursday, was asserted at the bureau of identification of the Pinkerton National Detective Agency to-day.

The train robbery at White Sulphur occurred February 18 and several thousand dollars were secured by the bandits. Five days later three alleged robbers were arrested, among them, it is stated 'Old Bill.'

Unless the Dominion authorities seek Miner's return he will be tried on the White Sulphur charge.

I wish to ask whether it is the intention of the Solicitor General to take steps to have this gentleman returned to Canada.

Mr. BUREAU. The first information I have had as to this matter was from to-day's newspapers. I will see the Minister of Justice and ask him what course he intends to take, and I will communicate further with my hon. friend from New Westminster.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Brandon). Mr. Chairman, I agree with what has been said by members of the House who have preceded me respecting the very great importance of the question we are now discussing. I have found it the most important question which has come before this House since I have had the honour of being a member of it, and when I say frankly to the committee that the result of my investigation has been to lead me to the conclusion that I cannot follow the leader of the party with which I have been identified practically all my lifetime it will be very evident that to me at least it is an extremely important question. A difference with the political party with which I have been associated all my lifetime must necessarily be of an extremely painful character. With the members of the government I am and always have been upon the best and closest possible terms politically and socially. Some of the members of the government I regard as my closest personal friends. And, away back in the county of Brandon there are a great many men who for 23 years have been my supporters, who, I am quite satisfied, will find great difficulty in understanding why I find it necessary to vote against the party with which they and I have been identified so long. It will be readily understood, Sir, under those circumstances, that my convictions upon the subject are extremely strong. Twenty years ago the Liberal party had as its policy a policy of unrestricted reciprocity. As a young man, young in public life at that time, I followed the leaders of my party; I took an active part in that election. There are I think some gentlemen in the House here against whom I spoke in that campaign, and to the best of my ability I endeavoured to convince the electors whom I addressed that the policy of my party was a wise and a prudent policy. I am free to say, Mr. Chairman, that almost before the campaign was over I had succeeded in convincing myself that we were wrong. From that time on my views have undergone, perhaps a gradual, but a steady and a certain change. When the tariff was revised in 1897 I was satisfied that the tariff as we adopted it at that time represented a good policy for the Dominion of Canada and possibly the best policy we could adopt. And, ever since 1898, when under the Joint High Commission efforts were made to secure some kind of reciprocity with the United States, my conviction has been strengthening in that direction. A couple of years ago I had the honour of delivering an address in New York in the Chamber of Commerce of that great city, and I indicated pretty clearly at that time, though to a somewhat hostile audience, what my views are.

Now, I am well aware, Mr. Chairman that it is a matter of possibly small concern as to when and how my opinion has been arrived at, but I will ask the House to pardon me for mentioning the facts which show that my opinion on this subject is not a spasmodic or suddenly formed opinion, but is the mature conviction which comes to me as the result of something over twenty years of pretty close contact with the affairs of Canada. Some of my newspaper friends have intimated that there was some mystery about my opinions upon this subject. I have not sought to make any mystery of them. I have perhaps avoided discussing the subject with my political friends because I did not desire that any of them should feel that I was endeavouring to induce them to adopt my opinions, and I did not desire to say anything to any of my Liberal friends except what I was prepared to say in the presence of the members of the government and in the presence of the House. But what I have to say about that is this. We have in the Dominion of Canada pretty strong party ties. We do not leave our party for small reasons. We do not leave our party because it happens to do something that we do not at the moment approve of—because it builds a bridge or a court house or a public building or even a railroad that we do not think necessary at the time. We have a pretty strong idea with regard to party allegiance, and my conviction is that it is a good thing and contributes to the stability of government that we have that idea. But it must be remembered nevertheless that, the reason why we adhere to a political party is that party in general represents the principles that we think ought to be applied to the government of the country; and when one's party is led to apply principles which are of fundamental and far-reaching importance, affecting the whole national structure, and one feels that he cannot conscientiously adopt or follow those principles, then, Mr. Chairman, his party allegiance is necessarily dissolved, and if he desires to retain his own self-respect, it becomes absolutely necessary for him to decline to follow that of which he does not approve. That is the position in which I find myself to-day; and, however, painful the process may be, I take the only course which I can take and retain my self-respect.

Getting away from that subject let me say a word or two in regard to the conduct of the debate by the government. I think the House has a little fault to find, justifiably, with my hon. friends who have charge of the debate for the government. There has never been, since 1879, so important an alteration in the tariff as proposed in these resolutions; and when alterations of an extensive character are made, it has always been customary to make very thorough and complete inquiries of the most expert and detailed character. Otherwise it is impossible that those who are acting should really know what they are doing. When other countries undertake work of this kind, such inquiries are made. I wonder if the House is aware of the fact that when the last German revision of their tariff was made, 20,000 experts were employed for the purpose of collecting and collating information for the benefit of the government and for the benefit of the parliamentary body which subsequently had to act upon their report. In England the Board of Trade experts act. Here we have generally had a collection of detailed information which was available when the debate came on in the House, and which the ministers in charge gave for the benefit of the members of the House. Now, I think we should have had the information which is necessary for the discussion of this question given us by the government. I think we should have had a full and clear statement as to the effects of this treaty upon our relations with the favoured nations. Members of the opposition have, by questioning, elicited from our hon. friends a good deal of information; but I venture the opinion that there is not a single member of this House outside of the government who now knows whether he is in possession of the whole information or not. Then, we should have had, I think, some comparative statements of prices. This whole question relates to markets and to prices. It would have been a comparatively small matter for a body of experts employed by the government to have got for us a comparative list of the prices of the principal commodities, in the United States, in Canada, and in the other countries concerned. But we have not received it. Neither have we the information, unless we dig it out of the blue-books for ourselves, with great labour, and sometimes with the liability to make mistakes, as we have had evidence of once or twice in the debate already, with regard to the production of the various commodities by the countries concerned. Generally this has been done by the government and generally some member of the government has made it his business properly to place before the House the case for the government for the proposals that are made. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance never speaks except with that ability and cleverness which we all admire, and it was quite as much in evidence in the address that he gave us in introducing these resolutions as it ever was in this House. But I do not think my hon. friend would claim that in that address he undertook to argue the merits of these proposals in detail. Neither did my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. If the committee desires to know just what I mean by this criticism, let them look at the speech which the Finance Minister delivered on the Grand Trunk Pacific resolutions, or at one of the speeches which my hon. friend the Minister of Customs has often delivered in this House in the budget debates, and they will see the kind of a case which our hon. friends can make when they desire to do it and have the material. I would conclude that either our hon. friends in the government have not made the investigation and do not possess the facts, or else that the facts do not bear out the contention which they put forward.

Before going into this question of prices, I desire to say that I dissent altogether from the proposition that everybody in Canada has been in favour of reciprocity with the United States for the last forty years. I do not know of any warrant at all for the statement that both the parties, or that one of the parties, for the last forty years has been in favour of reciprocity. There can be no doubt that the Liberal party was in favour of reciprocity twenty years ago; there can be no doubt that in the platform of 1893 there was what might be called a look at reciprocity; and there can be no doubt that later on, I think it was in 1898, under the Joint High Commission, the right hon. leader of the government attempted to get some measure of reciprocity from the United States. But there is equally no doubt that when the Joint High Commission ceased to act, the right hon. gentleman expressly made his position clear, and that in the general election of 1900, in the election of 1904, and in the election of 1908, there was no mention whatever of reciprocity by either of the parties. As a member of the government in the first two of those elections I should be credited at least with having a general idea of the policy of the government of which I was a member, and I do not think there would be any individual in Canada more surprised than I if I had been told in either of those elections that it was a part of the policy of the government to seek reciprocity. If there was anything that was clearer than another in connection with the policy of the two political parties in those three successive general elections, it was that neither of them made any claim to advocate the policy of reciprocal trade relations with the United States.

I agree with what has been said that the government has no mandate to make these proposals. I do not mention that point because of a desire to fill up the cup or to aggravate the argument against my hon. friends, and I furthermore say that I think oppositions very often say what can hardly be supported on grounds of reason or law in opposition to what is done by governments on the ground that they have no mandate. But I do not think the principles which often apply, apply in this case. We have not, it is true, a system of government by delegation. Our governments are not elected to do specific things; that is not the nature of our constitution. We are elected under a very wide system of parliamentary responsibility, and a great discretion is vested in the House of Commons, and in the government which is the executive committee of the House of Commons in connection with the transaction and new business, business which was not discussed when they were before the electors. They may do a great many things that were not discussed when they were before the electors, but they may not constitutionally or properly do everything, and I venture to say that when the fiscal policy of a country has been thoroughly canvassed and settled, discussed, debated and approved in the year 1900, discussed, debated and approved in the year 1904, discussed, debated and approved in the year 1908, that there is no constitutional warrant for the members of the government reversing that policy radically without any consultation and practically without the knowledge of the people. There is a discretion vested in the government, there is a discretion vested in the House of Commons, but Mr. Chairman, it must be remembered that the discretion that is exerciseable by those who occupy important positions under our form of government is not an arbitrary personal discretion, it is a constitutional discretion which must be exercised in accordance with the principles of the constitution, and the constitutional rights of the people we represent, and I want to say and to say it not as I said simply for the purpose of making another point against my hon. friend, but I want to say that I do not believe, speaking from my own experience and from the experience of many men whom I have met in various walks of life and largely members of the Liberal party, I do not believe that in the recent history of Canada anything has happened which has given to the thinking people of Canada so painful and so sudden a shock as the sudden realization that four or five gentlemen who, by reason of their ability, their years of service and their high position in their party, are in control of the affairs of the dominant political party, can suddenly, of their own motion, without discussion, without debate, without the knowledge of the country, commit the country to a radical change of fiscal policy. That is not, I am bound to say, the doctrine of constitutional government as I was taught it in the Liberal party, and I do not think that there could be possibly a more dangerous innovation.

Sir, what we are asked to do in these resolutions is to reverse the fiscal policy of the Dominion of Canada. It is interesting to note, although there has been very little discussion of that point, what is the policy which we are asked to reverse and why we are asked to reverse it. The policy was adopted in 1897 after the election which resulted in the right hon. the present leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) taking office. That tariff was described by its own friends, of whom I was and am one, as having first for its most outstanding feature the British preference, second, a readjustment of duties which largely reduce the duties upon articles commonly used by the farming community and, third, a substantial reduction in the duties on the raw materials of manufacturers. Now, it may frankly be said that the system of protection was continued by that tariff. Of that there can be no possible doubt. And it must further be said quite frankly and we can say it without disturbing ourselves particularly at this distance of time—that the tariff of 1897 did not fully implement all the promises or the suggestions which we, the members of the Liberal party, had made in regard to our future policy when we were in opposition. But, Mr. Speaker, the policy which we set forth in the tariff of 1897 was deliberately adopted. All these matters were canvassed and considered before we adopted it. We found, as people generally find when they take office, that there were some things that they thought they could do that they could not do, some things that they intended to do that would do harm to some people, and would not do any good to anybody, and so there were many things that perhaps might have been expected that were not done ; but the tariff of 1897 was deliberately adopted after full and careful consideration, we went to the country in 1900 upon that tariff and submitted it to the judgment of the people who had put us in office. We were open to attack then on the ground that we had not fully carried out our pledges, both by our opponents and by our political friends, and, speaking for myself as having conducted largely the discussion on behalf of the government in a very large section of the country which was committed to my charge, I say that no phase of that subject was left untouched. It was discussed and rediscussed at every campaign meeting that was held. We placed the matter before the people, we explained the reasons for the action we had taken, we submitted those reasons to the people, we submitted ourselves to their judgment, and the result was that their judgment upheld us, and that the tariff was approved. It was my opinion then, whatever that opinion might have been worth, little or much, that it was the best tariff that we could adopt. It was only an opinion but as time has gone on, and that tariff policy has been practically unchanged in any very important particular since 1897, I have become thoroughly and completely convinced that the tariff policy which we adopted at that time, which embraced the principle of moderate protection applicable to all classes of the community, is the best policy that the Dominion of Canada can adopt, a policy that it will be most unsafe and most unwise to radically change. One feature, an especially important feature, of that policy, was the British preference. The British preference has been discussed a great deal. Some of our friends from the opposition side of the House have sought to minimize its effects because we were buying largely from the United States, but I do not think that that argument is a good or a sound argument. The imports from Great Britain under the British preference have grown from twenty-nine millions odd in 1897 to ninety-five millions in 1910 ; the increase has been 320 per cent, and it is no answer to the argument that that preference is an effective preference to say that for other and very special reasons we are importing large quantities of goods from the United States for the benefit largely of our own manufacturers. The British preference is a substantial preference. It is suggested that it is likely to be substantially increased, and on that point, while I am dealing with the general question of policy, I desire to express myself clearly and fully. Nobody was a more enthusiastic supporter of the British preference when it was adopted than I was, but I think that there are limits to the extent to which we can go even in cutting the tariff of Canada in favour of the manufacturers of Great Britain as against the manufacturers of Canada. And I am not disposed to say that I would support a substantial increase in the British preference, made, as I understand it, at the expense of deserving Canadian industries for the purpose of putting back into the hands of Great Britain trade which, by this reciprocity arrangement we are taking away and giving to the United States. I cannot see that there is any sound business wisdom in that operation. I cannot see that there is any possible ground for taking such steps as will result in the closing up of Canadian factories doing business at a small margin of profit, so long as they are furnishing their goods to the people of this country at reasonable rates.

What have been the results of the policy which we are following ? The figures which indicate the great progress and prosperity of Canada have been quoted in this House ad nauseam. I should not repeat them here. We know how the population has grown; we know how our public revenue, our foreign trade and the deposits in our banks have grown; we know that in the last twelve or fifteen years the Dominion of Canada has prospered more abundantly than any other country on the face of the earth. We know this, further, that, man for man, the people of Canada are better off than any other population of similar numbers that we can point to. Our farmers are prosperous; our labourers are well paid; there is no unemployment in Canada—almost an unknown thing in any country of the extent and population of ours—there is practically no poverty, except what is due to drink, vice, sickness or other cause which does not depend at all upon the prosperity or want of prosperity of the country; we are receiving an enormous immigration; there is a demand for every man who comes in the shape of a labourer, and still an insistent demand for more labour; and there is a rapid development of our resources. And there is one other thing which is of the utmost importance in the condition of our business position, and that is the enormous growth of the home market, which has been built up in Canada during the last ten or twelve years, and which, in my judgment, accounts more than anything else for the steadiness of prices which our farmers are receiving for their products.

Now, is this prosperity that we are enjoying, a sound prosperity? Very often the charge is made, when a country is prosperous, that its prosperity is unsound, that it is a hothouse growth; and that charge is almost always made if the country is working under a protective system. And that charge is generally true if the protection is excessive or not properly adapted to the wants of the community. Now, it is possible—by reason of the fact that an exhaustive inquiry has been made of an economic character under the direction of one of the members of the government—to collate a few facts which show conclusively what our position in that respect is. A volume has been issued under the direction of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. King), dealing with the subject of wholesale prices, which work I regard as perhaps the most valuable contribution to the economic literature of Canada that I know of. That volume, setting forth the statistics of wholesale prices, enables us to follow accurately the movement of prices which affect the well-being of the various classes of the community. In the consideration of this question, the Minister of Labour and his expert assistants, took as the basis for comparison, the decade which runs from 1890 to 1899. I find by this report, that, in the year 1909, the prices of the commodities to which I shall refer, have risen by the amount which I shall give as compared with the average of the decade, from 1890-1899:

Grain and fodder, including thirteen selected standard commodities, have risen in value 49·9 per cent; cattle and cattle products, hogs and hog products, sheep and sheep products, fowl and turkeys, have risen 48·6 per cent; dairy products have risen 33 per cent. Now, for the purposes of comparison, let us make a different division: Crude farm products have risen 37·3 per cent; manufactured farm products have risen 34·1 per cent; average for crude and manufactured farm products, of 35·7 per cent.

This is what the farmer sells. Now, consider what he buys. He buys imported foods, woollen goods, cotton goods, boots and shoes, metals and implements. The average increases of these commodities are as follows: imported goods, decreased 4 per cent; woollen goods increased 23·3 per cent; cotton goods increased 25 per cent; boots and shoes increased 25 per cent; metals and implements increased 2·4 per cent; an average of all these of 14·3 per cent.

Thus, we see that the staple lines of goods which account for at least nineteen-twentieths of the average farmer's expenditure, have increased 14·3 per cent, while the goods which he sells, have increased 35·7 per cent. There you have an absolutely conclusive demonstration of the position of the two classes of the community. There you have proof of the fact that the urban community is not living at the expense of the farmer, but the farmer himself is getting more than his share of the general prosperity of the community. So, then, we have prosperity, soundness, and—what else? Independence; an independent market for everything we raise and everything we sell. The local market of Canada takes from 80 to 90 per cent of everything raised in Canada by our farming population. Where do we send the rest? We send it to the great, free, open market of Great Britain, from which market nothing but our own foolishness can possibly exclude us. So, we have prosperity, soundness and absolute independence in our markets.

Now, the proposition is made that we revolutionize the fiscal policy under which these results have been attained. And what will be the effect of this proposed revolution in our fiscal policy? I do not intend to overstate it or to say anything which can possibly be regarded as overstating it. But I am surely within the mark, when I say that there will be a very great dislocation and disturbance of business, that there will be individuals who will suffer very great loss, and that even if these individuals succeed in rectifying their position, still, the disturbance for considerable portions of the community will be of a very serious character. As to the general progress of Canada, the production of Canada is so enormous, the immigration is so great, the impetus we have received so strong, the development of our resources so rapid, that no possible mistake of fiscal policy can prevent this country making enormous progress in the future. Nevertheless, the effects will be serious. Let me enumerate what I think will be a few of those effects.

Some industries will be destroyed,—there can be no doubt about that. What reason can be given for drawing your pen through an item of the tariff and thereby shutting up an industry which is not accused of combining as against consumers, of charging illicit prices, or of any other evils?—what reason there can be for selecting that industry and wiping it out of existence, I do not see. I am bound to say that it does not appeal to my common sense. I think that the meat packing industry of this country will be destroyed. I have given that subject a good deal of consideration. I thought when I saw and read carefully the memorial of the packers, that the meat packing industry would be injured, and I am prepared to say now that if this treaty goes into effect, and continues in effect for any length of time, the big packing industry of the Dominion of Canada will be wiped out. There is no more chance of the meat packing industry standing against the beef trust of the United States than there would be of my standing up against this building if it fell upon me. That is precisely the position in which the meat packers will be put.

I shall not say anything about the fruit and vegetable growers. They will be injured. Their case has been stated by men who know vastly more about it than I do. But I call the attention of my friends in the government to the fact that my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) made before this House a full and careful presentation of the case of the fruit growers and vegetable growers; no fairer, no better, no fuller case was ever presented to this House while I have been a member of it, and no answer of any kind has been attempted in connection with that subject. You ask me why I do not support this proposition. Surely, Mr. Chairman, if I had the intelligence to hear a case of that kind presented and no answer made, I must come to the conclusion that no answer can be made.

There will be other large industries affected. There is an enormous industry in existence in the town of Peterborough, the Quaker Oats establishment. The president of the company has given an interview, and I have taken the trouble to have the interview verified, because it is not always safe to proceed upon what we see in the newspapers, with all due regard to my journalistic friends. I have taken the trouble to verify that interview with the president, speaking on behalf of the Quaker Oats Company, which is one of the very largest factories in Canada, and one of the largest consumers of farm produce in Canada, consuming, I believe—I speak subject to correction—40 carloads of farm produce per day. This institution manufactures in the town of Peterborough largely for export, the best possible kind of factory for us to have. It takes the farm produce, it grinds it up, ships it to foreign countries, collects the money, brings it back, and it goes into circulation. We can have no better industry for a farming community than the Quaker Oats industry of Peterborough. Now, eighty per cent of the business of this establishment is done for export. The president of the company says that in the conditions that will exist under the proposed changes in the tariff it will be more convenient and economical for them to manufacture in the United States for export. Their operations in Peterborough, therefore, will be curtailed sixty, seventy, or eighty per cent, with the result that the Dominion of Canada will lose accordingly. Now, I do not at all profess to be able to express an intelligent opinion respecting the business of the Quaker Oats Company, but I call attention to this fact, that these people are not Canadian manufacturers kicking about the duty being taken off when they are manufacturing for the home market. It is easy to understand why a manufacturer would object to a change in a case of that kind. But there is no reason for this company saying that this agreement is against them if it is not. They are not unfriendly to the United States, and they are not unfriendly to our negotiations, and there is no possible reason why we should not accept their statement as being given in good faith.

Will this proposition assist in transferring American capital to the construction of factories in Canada, which has been going on in Canada for several years past at a very rapid rate? Surely we cannot conclude that it will. These factories have been established because it was thought that the fiscal policy of Canada was settled, that we had settled down to a definite fiscal policy, and people came along and built factories here and built factories there, thinking they were perfectly safe. I have no doubt that those who are engaged in putting up factories will continue and complete their work; they cannot afford to do anything else. But is it reasonable to suppose that many business men with money to invest in factories will readily decide to do so unless they get some definite assurance that what has happened in this particular case is not going to happen again? I do not see how they can get the assurance; I do not see how it will be possible for parliament to prove that what has been done in this case will not be done in every case in which ministers, with the best motives, may see fit to do it.

Take the question of pulp and paper. The province of Ontario and the province of Quebec have decided, in their wisdom, that it is a good and patriotic policy for them to insist upon their pulpwood being manufactured at home. I am aware that some gentlemen who are of estimable character and good information have said that it is not a wise policy, but I do not believe there are many people in Canada who would agree with them. I believe that there is no policy, no item of policy which has been followed by any of the governments of Canada of late years which has met with more universal approval than the action of the government of Ontario, and later of the government of Quebec, in deciding upon the conservation of their resources by securing the largest possible revenue and benefit from the various resources which they possess. Well, that was the position. It is known of all men that the United States people would like to get cheaper paper made from Canadian pulpwood. Now, if there was anything that was perfectly clear in connection with our tariff relations with the United States, and if there was anything perfectly clear in connection with the paper and pulp question, it was that all the Dominion of Canada had to do was to sit down and wait, and leave the subject severely alone. That obviously was all that ought to have been done. We have not done that. We find this clause introduced into the treaty. What does it say? If it means what our negotiators intended it to mean, it means this, that there is a bonus put upon the abrogation of the regulations which the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario have made. It does not mean that the regulations are abrogated, because this parliament has no power to abrogate them; but it means that we put a bonus upon their abrogation, and that is the worst possible thing that we could do.

Take this question of our perishable products that we send to Great Britain. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) dealt with that. He is familiar with the subject, and my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who, I understand is to follow me, is more familiar with it, perhaps, than any man in the House. But it is a fact that for years there was difficulty in finding a market for our perishable products. The country went to work and educated the farmers to prepare their products for the British market, instituted cold storage, under the Department of Agriculture, upon steamships, induced the steamship companies to put it in, provided for connections in Great Britain, and did everything possible at great labour, trouble and expense, extending over a period of nearly twenty years, for the purpose of opening up markets for these products in Great Britain. The policy succeeded entirley. We are sending those products to Great Britain now, to a great, stable, safe, free market, from which we have never been excluded, a market that is improving all the time, a market in which we are finding fresh extensions and fresh points of advantage every year. What do we propose to do? We propose to ship our stuff to the United States instead and to throw away all the advantage of all the work that we have done, the whole of the cold storage facilities upon the steamships crossing the Atlantic provided for in past years, to break down the business connections we have made, to allow our competitors to go in and take that market, buttress it around in such a way that we can never get into it again, and put ourselves in dependance upon the markets of the United States. How long will they remain open? Nobody knows. It may be one year or five years. Nobody knows. A year ago the United States were brandishing a club over our heads and threatening to impose the surtax upon our goods—only one short year ago. Now, they say that the United States is friendly. Well, perhaps it is. What will it be in a year from now? Does anybody know? Nobody knows. The United States is at the present time, I am told, abrogating the Blaine treaties of reciprocity which were made with the Latin republics a few years ago, without even the courtesy of negotiation or discussion as to the reasons for the abrogation of those treaties. How much better will our position be at any time when an occasion for irritation may arise? There are dozens of things which might happen to cause irritation between the United States, Canada and Great Britain. I could mention to my right hon. friend who leads the government, if I desired to do so, but I do not desire to do so—it is a matter within everybody's knowledge—some things that might cause irritation between the United States, Great Britain or Canada, not serious enough to have important international consequences but serious enough to make it very desirable for a political party in the United States to court popularity by doing something which might be of an unfriendly character to Great Britain and Canada. Then, when our market is closed, when we have shut ourselves out from Great Britain, what is the position? Sir, we are putting our head into a noose.

What are the compensations? It is said that the farmers will have better prices and better markets. It is very difficult for a private individual to make an exhaustive examination of prices. He can only be expected to go into a limited number of subjects, and his information must necessarily be limited. I have made as careful an examination as I could of the prices of the various staples which the farmers of Canada sell in the open markets, and I have before me the result of that examination. It is not necessary that I should enter into any considerable number of details, but will give you a few of the conclusions which appear to be absolutely established by the facts. First, I will take hogs, one of the most important products of the province of Ontario. The average price in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec is better than it is in the United States. As far as cattle are concerned the prices are variable, and as far as eggs are concerned the prices of the better grades are higher, and of the other grades, lower. It is said that the market for lambs will be good if we get reciprocity with the United States. From the 1st of December up to the present time lambs have been cheaper in Chicago than in Ontario. The best creamery butter sells at a higher price in the United States, but all the lower grades are cheaper, and it seems to be quite clear from an investigation of the market conditions by those who are familiar with the subject, that we shall lose our local market for butter and eggs—in the case of eggs to the United States and in the case of butter to countries like New Zealand, Denmark and possibly Australia. While we may get some advantage by selling a small portion of the higher grade of the product to the United States, we shall lose upon a great portion of the lower grade, which, as everybody knows, is the greater proportion of the product. In poultry the higher grades will be higher and the lower grades will be lower. Hay is one product that is substantially higher in the United States than in Canada. Barley is higher and oats lower. Looking over the whole case, it is not possible to figure out any general advantage to the farmer in getting these markets even if we take prices as they are without having any reference to the general effect upon the market which may take place in other ways. As to the quality, everybody knows that there is a perfectly good market for all that our farms produce. There is no glut in the market of Canada if the produce is reasonably prepared, and if it is not reasonably prepared for the market then the United States market will be of no assistance to the man who allows himself to be in that position.

Then, there are some general features of the case which require to be considered.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a conclusion which you cannot possibly escape: Under this arrangement, which means free trade in farm products, the markets for farm produce will be absolutely dominated by the United States and favoured nation countries. There can be no possible question about that. The meat packing industry will be destroyed. What is happening in some other places? I have taken a clipping from the Ottawa 'Citizen' of February 25, which has since been confirmed by other information. It is not a political article, but a Canadian press cable, and it is as follows:

London, Feb. 25.—A despatch to the 'Chronicle' from Melbourne says the federal Minister of Trade and Customs declares that the Australian commonwealth will spare no expense to 'oppose sinister operations of the American meat trust in seeking to control the Australian trade.'

The meat trust in Australia and New Zealand is so sinister in its operations that the government of the commonwealth has to take the field against it, and we are here taking down the barriers and inviting it to come in and dominate the market of Canada. That trust will oppress our farmers, it is not a beneficent institution, it is not a philanthropic institution, and when it dominates the market, we will say of Ontario, and any hon. gentleman on this side of the House or on the other side of the House finds that the farmers of his constituency are not getting fair play in the matter of prices, may I ask what that gentleman will do, may I ask what his remedy will be, may I ask how he is going to apply that remedy if he has any? I do not know what the remedy will be. The head office of your trust will be in Chicago or New York, it will be outside of our jurisdiction and there is only one thing we can do, just one thing—we can put the duty back where it is now and start all over again to build up the local industries which we are threatening to destroy.

The whole tendency of this arrangement is to induce the farmer to adapt his raw product to the United States market. The whole tendency is to do away with the by-products which are so essential for intensive farming, the whole tendency is to break down the system of interrelated industries which makes the present prosperity of the province of Ontario and the other provinces. Under that system, Mr. Chairman, brought about by the policy which my hon. friends upon the Treasury Benches have pursued for the last 13 years, the great province of Ontario raised $250,000,000 worth of farm produce last year and nobody heard that there was no market for any of that produce.

Take the province of Quebec—my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is going to follow me, I believe, and he of course knows infinitely more about farming in the province of Quebec that I do—but I am going to ask him to address himself to one question in connection with this agreement, because I have not been able to get any light on it in favour of the treaty, and if there is any light to be thrown on it I would like to get it. The province of Quebec has bright prospects before it at the present time. Our transportation system is growing so enormously; the city of Montreal is growing so enormously; the prospects of the pulp and paper industry are so good that unquestionably in the province of Quebec in a few years there will be an enormous home market—perhaps the largest home market of any province in the Dominion. The province of Quebec is not very well farmed at the present time—there is good farming in some parts of it, there is poor farming in a good portion of it, and moderate farming in other portions of it. The agricultural problem of the province of Quebec is to induce the farmer to keep his hay at home and to follow a system of intensive farming. That is the agricultural problem of the province of Quebec. Lately we had the Deputy Minister of the Department of Agriculture for Ontario at Quebec; he came there at my special request to deliver a carefully prepared address upon the subject of the improvement of agriculture in the province of Ontario, explaining at great length and with great care the magnificent system of agricultural education and improvement which has lately developed in the province of Ontario as the result of 20 or 25 years of laborious work, which is now approaching its period of fruition in that province and beginning to make its influence felt. We wanted it explained in the city of Quebec, and we had it explained and we are printing thousands of copies of Mr. James' address in the French language and circulating them in the province of Quebec for the purpose of getting the authorities of the province of Quebec to undertake an aggressive movement for the improvement of agriculture. What happens—comes along this treaty and puts a bonus on poor farming by inducing the farmers of the province of Quebec to ship their raw products to New England, and deplete the fertility of their soil.

Take the prairie provinces—I am perfectly aware of the fact that there are a great many people in the western provinces who think that this treaty will be a great thing for them. I have before seen premature conclusions arrived at in the course of 23 years in public life during which I have had an experience that not many members of the House have had because I have had the honour of representing to-day in this House the same people who elected me first as a young man to the legislature of Manitoba, and in the legislature or in this parliament I have been their representative ever since. During that time I have seen a good many questions of this kind come up as to what was going to benefit the farmer and as to what would be in his interests, and I am not so sure, when this question comes to be discussed, that the farmer of the Northwest will be impervious to reason and common sense and good judgment when he gets the case put before him. It was first said: Well, but the farmer of the Northwest is going to get more for his wheat; the price of wheat south of the line in Dakota is higher than it is in Manitoba. That is true. It is a little higher; it always or nearly always rules a little higher, and they said: If the farmer can get into that market he will get more for his wheat. Now comes along Mr. Hill, the president of the Great Northern railway who is a great advocate of reciprocity and a very fine man and in a way a friend of my own, and he says: The duty does not make any difference; it is true the Dakota farmer gets a little more for his wheat but it is not on account of the duty, it is on account of the local circumstances. Now, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Hill is either right or he is wrong; there are just two ways to look at it. If he is right and the duty does not make any difference, then the Manitoba farmer will not get any more for his wheat when the duty is taken off. That's clear. If he is wrong and the duty does make a difference what is going to happen? Why, what is going to happen is this: That so soon as the immense exportable surplus of the Canadian Northwest is let into the Dakota market then the Dakota man's wheat goes down to the export level, and the Dakota man gets less, but the Manitoba man does not get any more. There is no doubt about that; it has happened already. Here is the New York 'Evening Post' of February 16, and as everybody knows the New York 'Evening Post' is a most reliable paper, and this is what it says, speaking of wheat:

As matters stand now values are off over 24 cents from the season's top. The range on May wheat this season has been from $1.15 to 90⅞ cents, the highest price having been made November 4. With the adoption of the treaty there would be about 13,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat now in sight which would be available for moving into the United States provided it is needed. This, with the 43,000,000 bushels in the United States, visible supply would make 56,000,000 bushels available. Part of the Canadian wheat has already been hedged by sales of futures in the different markets and considering the drop of 12 cents in a month, it would seem as though any possible effect of the treaty on values had been largely discounted.

Of course nobody would suggest that it went down all of 12 cents by reason of the difference between the markets on the two sides, or by reason of the difference between the Dakota price and the export price, but every one knows that when the price of wheat gets a shock in that way it keeps on going down on account of the panic on the market.

There is, however, another factor to be considered in the shape of a surplus of 133,000,000 bushels in the United States that must be taken care of. This means that values must go to an export level at which a liberal disposition of the wheat can be made. With the adoption of the Canadian treaty it is expected that the prices will be kept on an export level most of the time.

There is no doubt about the position so far as the price of wheat is concerned. I say here that I deliberately give it as my opinion, representing a constituency of Manitoba farmers and having represented them for 23 years, that the Manitoba farmer will get less for his wheat in the long run as the result of this agreement.

Now, what have we been trying to do for years past in regard to this question of wheat? We have been trying to keep the wheat of the Manitoba farmer pure. We had an Inspection Act—upstairs in the House of Commons here we laboured for weeks, yes for months to get that Inspection Act into good order so that the wheat might be properly inspected and properly graded with the object that it should be kept pure and placed upon the English market in a pure condition. And why? Because we know that if the Canadian wheat is put upon the English market in a pure condition it will bring on an average of from three to four cents per bushel on the higher grades, more than any other wheat in the world. A few years ago we revised the Inspection Act, and the result was that our wheat was put upon the market pure for a year or two, but somebody found out how to get around the Act, and the grades began to go off, and the grades have been off for several years past, and the farmers have been complaining and properly complaining in regard to the condition of things in the terminal elevators. These terminal elevators have been in the hands, to some extent, of men who are themselves buying and selling grain and handling millions of bushels of other people's grain, while they were buying and selling their own. What happened—grain mixed, grades have gone down, and the farmers have lost and lost very heavily, and they have a just and proper right to complain. Now, the government has introduced in the Senate a Bill to appoint a commission for the purpose of taking charge of that wheat, and I believe the government policy is good. And if the commission takes charge of this business as they ought to there is no reason why they should not keep control of that wheat. And, Sir, they can only solve the trouble by taking control of the elevators first, not owning them, but controlling and inspecting them properly and keeping control of the wheat right through until it gets to Liverpool. There is no other way. It is not difficult; it is not half as difficult as it looks; it can be done by a competent commission of men without any trouble at all. And in addition to that, if that is done the commission in the working out of the system by which they can do that, can give a very substantial preference to the Canadian routes so that we will get advantages in that way as well, and they can give advantages to the Canadian routes without it costing any more to get the wheat to Liverpool. Here is the position in which we are. If we keep control of that wheat and that market, we shall be able to get for the western farmer, by a proper system of handling, a better price than he will get in any other possible way. More than that, with the increase in the volume of business from the Canadian Northwest, our railroads will in a short time be in such a position that we can reasonably ask to have the rates substantially reduced on export grain; so that instead of the Canadian farmers getting a bonus of three cents a bushel for sending their wheat by the eastern Canadian channels, as was tentatively suggested by the hon. member for St. Anne if the inspection and transportation matters are properly handled by the commission which is to be appointed by the government, and the question of the freight rate is dealt with, we will secure for them within a reasonable time, not three cents a bushel, but six or seven cents a bushel more than they can get in any other possible way. But if that is to be done, you must keep the control of the trade in your own hands, otherwise you can do nothing.

Now, what is to happen? I wonder if my hon. friends of the government have thought of that, in connection with this treaty. The Grain Exchange has met in Winnipeg and has passed a resolution to the effect that the Inspection Act must be changed. What must be done under this treaty? We must change the Inspection Act, and we must make the grades the same as the American grades; that is, we must permit of mixing; and to all intents and purposes, we must hand the control of our grain market over to Minneapolis. That is the position. To get a better price? No.

Then there is the question of cattle and that is one question in respect of which there is no doubt that the western farmer will get a benefit under this agreement, for the present at least. There is no doubt that the market for the second grade of cattle in the prairie provinces, is a poor market at the present time—why? Because it is a new country. It is only a short time since the country was sufficiently settled to have a sufficient production to organize this business. In fact, we have hardly got to that point yet. The result is, that there is at the present time a very poor market for cattle in the western provinces. But that is no reason for throwing the country away, or for considering that we can never have a market. That is a reason for taking up the subject and dealing with it in an intelligent way. The farmers' delegation, which came here recently, said to the government:

> We wish also to draw attention to the danger we are in while we leave the opportunity open for the United States meat interest to capture and control the export trade from our country.

What are they going to do now? They will capture and control all the cattle of the Northwest—the very last hoof will be controlled from Chicago. What I say is, that we should establish a chilled meat industry. It has been done in Australia and New Zealand. Dr. Rutherford has reported in favour of it. There would be no great difficulty in the government doing this, and it would be worth while taking the trouble when you have a country like the Northwest of Canada. We could afford to hire ten men at $10,000 a month rather than lose this business. The members of this House know that I am an enthusiastic friend of the Northwest. The best years of my life were given to the settlement of that country, and I cannot tell you how I feel about that great country being made a backyard to the city of Chicago. I have differed with my friends in my own constituency, and I do not know, but that there are many men who have supported me for years, who differ with me on this subject; but I take the liberty of thinking that I know as much or more about it than they. I have studied these questions all my life with the object of learning the way in which the affairs of that country should be organized so as to be of some benefit to themselves and the rest of the country, and I say that we should organize that country in a business way. If we do, we shall have duplicates of the stock yards of Kansas City, Omaha and Chicago in our own Northwest.

What is the general effect of this treaty? The general effect is, that we put the Dominion of Canada on an absolutely free trade basis, so far as farm products are concerned. The farmers of Canada are on a free trade basis for what they sell and on a protective basis for what they buy—protection for the purchaser, free trade for the seller. Do you think they are likely to stand that for any length of time? I do not. I tell you, that if you have had delegations from the Northwest, you will have them again if this treaty goes through. After it has been in force for a few years, I venture to say that there will not be any question of the duty on agricultural implements or on any other manufactured goods, for we shall be compelled to take all those duties off, and have practically commercial union with the United States. As men of common sense, let us apply to this question the same business rules that we apply to any other business matter. We open our market to the world. Read the list of favoured nations along with the United States, and if there is in that list of countries of production anybody who can raise any one of the commodities in this list, cheaper than it is in the Canadian market, a commodity unsaleable and unmarketable, it can be shipped and dumped into the Dominion of Canada. I cannot conceive of what our friends in the government were thinking of. I leave this question of markets and prices, and record my conviction, that if ever a government made a monumental mistake, if ever a government got in wrong on a subject from first to last, my hon. friends have got in wrong on this subject. The House may think that I am very much in earnest about it. Sir, I would not break away from the political party with which I have acted for 23 years, practically all my life, if I were not in earnest about it.

What is the commonest phrase in the mouths of the people of Canada ? We hear it in the speeches of public men, we read it in the editorials of newspapers; we even see it in the compositions of our school boys—what is it ? Binding the scattered provinces of Canada together. I would like to know if this treaty is intended to bind the scattered provinces of Canada together. It binds, but it binds the other way; it binds British Columbia to Oregon and to Washington and to California; it binds the provinces of the Northwest to the states immediately to the south of them; it binds Ontario and Quebec to the states south of us; and it binds the maritime provinces to the states of New England. And we are expected to believe that a policy of that kind is a broad national policy, one to promote a broad and strong nationality. What have been the main features of our transportation policy ? We have spent scores of millions of dollars for what purpose ? What has been in our mouths at all times, Liberals and Conservatives alike, on every platform? Send our goods through Canadian channels, from one province to another, and from the eastern provinces across the sea. What did Sir John A. Macdonald mean when he nailed his colours to the mast and said that the Canadian Pacific railway must be built around the north shore of Lake Superior, and appealed to the people of Canada on that policy and got their support ? My right hon. friend the leader of the present government later came before this House and said: We shall build another line of railway from ocean to ocean, every foot of it on Canadian soil, and he appealed to the people of this country for their support, and they supported him in doing it. They said: Yes, we believe in that policy. Why should we turn from that policy now?

If it does not make any difference which way the traffic goes, why spend $50,000 or $60,000, or $133,000 per mile to build a railway from Quebec through to Moncton and duplicate the Intercolonial, which we had before? Why do that, if it does not make any difference whether or not the traffic goes over Canadian soil? For my part, I can see no reason. What is the reason for the right hon. gentleman's change of view? I could take the 'Hansard' and read to you the strong words of the right hon. gentleman when he said, in this House, that of all things in connection with the policy of Canada as related to the United States, the one thing we must do is to be independent of the Americans. That is a policy, Sir, which I believe in. He never said a word in the whole course of my close association with him with which I agreed more fully than I did with that statement, but the difference is that I believed it then and I believe it now, and so long as I have the honour to have anything to say about the public affairs of Canada in the most humble capacity I shall continue to support what I believe to be the loyal policy that the people of Canada desire to have followed. We know why it is that the other policy is being supported. We know why the milling trust of St. Paul and Minneapolis are in favour of this proposal; it is because they want to get the hard wheat of the Canadian northwest without paying duty and drive our millers out of the export market. That is just as easy as adding two and two together. The northwest miller of the United States gets $2 or $3 a ton more for his offal than the miller in Canada, and that makes the difference; the Canadian miller has no chance in the world in the competition which is brought about in this way. The northwest miller of the United States would get the wheat free now if he could. The meat trust would get meat free if they could. We have often been told that they might take the duty off if they wanted to, but they cannot take the duty off, because they have a population of farmers who do not propose to permit these gentlemen to manipulate the duties to suit themselves. But we understand why the milling people would want this arrangement in regard to transportation, why the meat trust would want it and why the United States Steel Corporation want to get into our markets. We can understand why the Chamber of Commerce in New York, always in favour of reciprocity, should favour this arrangement, because in this last year they have been conducting an inquiry to ascertain why Montreal has been growing so rapidly and becoming a rival of theirs in connection with the export trade. We know why it is that the New England States, looking jealously upon the commercial development of our St. Lawrence route, should support this treaty to get the great trade which is building up Montreal and the St. Lawrence route down by their own channels. But can anybody in the world tell me why a Canadian, devoted to the interests of Canada should support the arrangement which we have here?

What will be our future relations with the United States? I read the argument presented by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) upon that aspect of the case. I see no possible answer to it. It seems to be perfectly clear to me that every day in which we adapt ourselves to the markets of the United States, that every day in which we cater to those markets, that every day in which we adapt all our arrangements to catering to those markets strengthens the grip of the United States upon Canada. And while everybody, of course, repudiates as absurd the idea of any conscious interference either with our political independence, or with our commercial independence, I do not believe that if this treaty goes into effect there will ever again, so long as it goes on, unless a rupture takes place, be a revision of our tariff in which United States interests, United States lobbyists, and United States pressure will not be brought to bear on this parliament. What is the only possible effect? The only possible effect is domination of the smaller by the larger, and if you say you do not think there is any danger of any domination I say that I think the domination has come now, that we have it in the discussion of this treaty. How did it get here, what brought it about? For 30 years the United States had nothing to say to us, and then, when we have finally, definitely won our commercial independence and put ourselves into such a position that we were perfectly independent, what happened? They shook a club over our heads, they threatened a surtax. It was threatened a year ago. Then our friends of the government were asked to make concessions in order that this surtax might be avoided. The government made some concessions. I think they were very trifling in character; I do not think they were of much importance, but I do think it would have been as well if the government had stood its ground at the start. Nevertheless, we all know that in international matters it is necessary to leave a great deal to the government. You cannot know everything that passes, and you must leave a great deal to the discretion of the government in international matters. But I am prepared to say now that I think we all made a mistake. I think the time to have stood our ground was the first time the club was flourished. What has been the history of our relations with the United States? For the last 30 or 40 years we have been ignored and buffeted by them, and during all that time we have taken our way secure, firm, serene under the strong arm of the British Empire. Now we come to the point when we are of some use; we are just beginning to be of some use. Up to nearly the present time we have been more or less of a nuisance to the empire; now we are beginning to get to the point when we add something to the prestige of the British Empire, to the point when, if necessary, we can send some men, or some ships, or some money; we can be of some use to the empire that has given us our liberties and all the traditions of our citizenship. When we get to that point what happens? The United States beckons from Washington and we are asked, the first time anybody beckons, to turn from the path that leads to the capital of the empire, and to turn towards the path that leads to Washington. I say, so far as I am concerned: Not for me.

What is the reason, I ask you gentlemen of this committee, representatives of the Canadian people, trustees of the Canadian people, of their highest and their best rights and liberties, I ask you what is the reason that is being put forward by the representatives of the people of the United States for proffering to us the terms which they are giving. There is the representative, Mr. Clark, of the Democratic party. I decline to discuss for a second the suggestion that he was not speaking seriously. If it had not been for Mr. Clark and the Democratic party this treaty never would have got through the House of Representatives; it was he who put it through; let him speak for himself. He says that he and his party are in favour of this proposal because it leads to annexation. What did Mr. Taft, the leader of the Republican party, say? The Dominion of Canada is a strong country; it has a great storehouse of natural resources. He says it has been pursuing a strong and successful policy of development, but it has got to the parting of the ways. He says: Now, before the Dominion of Canada is irrevocably fixed in the policy which leads to the consolidation and the strengthening of the British Empire, we must turn her from her course. Is there any dispute about it? It cannot be disputed. I say to my hon. friends of the Liberal party, as well as to my hon. friends of the Conservative party: Stop and think; you are all grown men, you are all men of wisdom and discretion. Is it a safe thing for the representatives of seven and a half millions to say to the representatives of ninety millions of people: You may say what you like; we will take your terms, but we will not take the price? Sir, for my part, I say that I do not think such a course is wise, and I do not think it is possible. I say that if we accept the terms we shall assuredly be called upon to pay the price.

Sir, I oppose these resolutions, because, in my judgment, they reverse the great and successful policy under which the people of Canada, fighting against poverty, against natural obstacles, against geographical conditions, have made of their country one of the most enviable in the world. These resolutions, in my judgment, spell retrogression, commercial subordination, the destruction of our national ideals and displacement from our proud position as the rising hope of the British Empire.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). Mr. Chairman, I venture, before undertaking to present some facts and observations in regard to this reciprocity arrangement to say a few words of introduction in reply to my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton). Let me at once accord to him my meed of praise for the manner in which he has presented his views to the House. It is only what we might expect from his experience, his ability and his position. I value political allegiance and party feeling as much as he does. I appreciate the fact that party feeling must not be allowed to carry one down to the point where, on important questions, one differs with one's party ; and I say frankly to him that if he differs with the government on this question, it was not only his right but his duty to come before the House and the country and declare that difference. Sir, I am not myself in the same position, because I believe that, in this arrangement with the United States, the government of the day have continued and carried on that wise and careful administration of the tariff of Canada which has characterized their work since their first tariff legislation in 1897. But did I agree with my hon. friend from Brandon, I would leave the government of which I am a member—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FISHER. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh. I suppose they cannot conceive that a man would do such a thing. They have just been cheering the hon. member from Brandon for having left his party and joined them. Because I do not choose to leave my party on this question and join them, they jeer at me. But I venture to say that if I had followed the hon. member for Brandon, they would cheer me as they have cheered him.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). You promised to, on the temperance question.

Mr. FISHER. I never found anybody on the other side of the House to follow on the temperance question. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt of the importance of this question. There is no doubt that a change in the tariff, embracing a considerable number of items as this does, is a matter of importance, of sufficient importance for anybody to change his party allegiance upon it. But one or two things that my hon. friend said, I would like to refer to at once. Very early in his remarks, he said that there was no general demand in Canada for reciprocity in the last forty years. I venture to take direct issue with him on that point. He acknowledged that the Liberal party had been in favour of reciprocity for many of those years. But he implied, though he did not say it, that the Liberal party, in that respect was alone in the country. But I am within the judgment of the House and the country when I say—and before I sit down I propose to prove—that the Conservative party of Canada has always been in favour of reciprocity with the United States. Therefore, when my hon. friend from Brandon says the Liberal party have been in favour of reciprocity, and I can prove that the Conservative party have been in favour of it, it is idle for him to say that Canada has not been in favour of it.

My hon. friend speaks about comparative prices. I propose, in a few minutes, to give comparative prices in Canada and in the United States of things which are affected by this arrangement. But I am going at once to express my difference with him in his statement that the government of the day were not informed upon this question, and had not taken the utmost pains to inform themselves in regard to every detail of this arrangement. In the first place, this arrangement was in the hands of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) of Canada. It is well known that on two occasions especially, the government of Canada, through a committee of its members, held an exhaustive and careful examination into the tariff affairs of the country. Before the tariff of 1897 was brought down to the House, the government adopted the policy, which had never been adopted by our opponents, of taking the people into counsel, of going through the length and breadth of the country and affording every class and every interest an opportunity to come before them and give their opinions upon the question at issue. In 1905, before the last revision of the tariff took place, the same thing was done. I venture to say that in no way could men obtain a more complete grasp of the tariff conditions and tariff interests of Canada than by such means. And the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs took a leading part in both those investigations. In addition to that, year by year —I might say week by week—the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs receive representations, by delegation and otherwise, of industries which are interested in the tariff. That is a privilege which nobody else to the same extent can possibly enjoy, an advantage which they only possess; and it is infinitely superior to any information which can possibly be obtained by any other men in the Dominion, I care not who they may be. It is true—my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) has spoken of it—that certain manufacturing interests may know their own business and may come before the ministers and deal with those particular interests. It is true that the transportation companies know their own particular business as well as the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Customs. But not one of these people can know the whole interests of the country in anything like the degree that these are known by the ministers who have charge of these interests on behalf of the government and the country. There is this difference between responsible ministers of the Crown and these people who come here and make representations to them ; the latter come, as is the fashion of business men, looking at the subject from their own particular standpoint ; whereas responsible ministers of the Crown have to look at these things from all sides, and make comparisons and institute investigations as to what may be the incidence of each change in the tariff, not only upon a particular item but upon all the items, and all the interests of the country. That is the position of the gentlemen who negotiated this arrangement at Washington, a position which is not only absolutely defensible, but which is altogether unassailable.

The hon. member spoke about a reciprocity policy as having been abandoned by the government for many years back. That is very easily explained. My right hon. friend the leader of the government, after negotiations in Washington in 1898-9, came back having failed to obtain that reciprocity from the American government and people which we had hoped for, and my right hon. friend said, wisely, I think, there will be no more pilgrimages to Washington. I think it may be said that the whole Canadian people were at his back in that stand. But that did not mean that the people of Canada would not be ready to accept overtures from Washington. My hon. friend from Brandon was a member of the government and one of the leaders of the Liberal party, when that government declared through its head that there would be no more pilgrimages to Washington, that Washington would have to come to Ottawa. It did not mean, if Washington came to Ottawa in a reasonable and friendly spirit that Ottawa would reject the offered hand, that Ottawa would not be glad to enter into an arrangement that would promote friendly sentiments and greater commercial intercourse between us and our great neighbours to the south. Sir, what has led up to this? My hon. friend seemed to say that we were entirely to blame for the initiation of this question. Nothing is further from the case. What was the condition of affairs last session between Canada and the United States? There was no question then of reciprocity. But we had this condition of affairs, that the Payne-Aldrich tariff of the United States contained an article which empowered the president, nay, which commanded the president, in case other countries has legislation discriminating against the United States, to proclaim against those countries a maximum tariff, a tariff which meant absolute non-intercourse, in the case of Canada. Now I would like to ask my hon. friends opposite, I would like to ask my hon. friend from Brandon, whether they think that this government, responsible to the people of Canada, would have been justified in allowing that non-intercourse to come into effect if it could be avoided, that they would have been justified in casting back into the teeth of the executive of the United States, the greatest commercial nation in the world, the invitation which was made to us to come to some arrangement which would avoid the necessity of proclaiming non-intercourse? Surely neither the leader of the opposition nor the member for Brandon would dare to take that position. I think they have not studied the effects that were sure to follow from such a course upon the prosperity and progress commercially of the people of Canada.

In this connection I may refer to another incident in our history, an incident which occurred some years ago at a time when the Conservative party ruled this country, and when a threat of non-intercourse was held over our heads then as there was last year. What was the action of the Conservative government on that occasion? Did they lightly defy the threat of non-intercourse? Did they say to the people of the United States: We do not care what you do? I allude to the condition of affairs in 1888 when, by reason of the seizures of American fishing vessels on our Atlantic coast a non-intercourse Act having been passed by Congress, the government of Sir John A. Macdonald did not wait for overtures from the United States, but they appealed to the executive of that country to enter into negotiations which would obviate the imposition of a non-intercourse edict. What was that non-intercourse edict? I have it here. After covering a large number of points in regard to the fisheries, the edict went on to this effect:

And also to deny the entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of the said Dominions or other countries coming from the said Dominions to the United States.

It was absolute prohibition. Now what was the conduct of the then Conservative government? I remember it well, I was in the House at that time, my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was here also, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was sitting on the government side of the House, as were also the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I remember well when Sir Charles Tupper, then Finance Minister, came back from Washington, and in his speech which I have under my hand, advised the House of Commons to accept what is known as the Chamberlain-Bayard Treaty in regard to the fisheries. They did not ignore the situation, they did not defy the Americans on the contrary they sought to reach a treaty between Canada and her great neighbour. Let me say a word or two about that. Sir Charles Tupper was joined in Washington by Mr. Chamberlain in the negotiation of the treaty. They had some difficulties, and as Sir Charles Tupper said, they had to make concessions, and they did make concessions. We have today in existence one of the concessions which they made, it is what is called the modus vivendi.

That was made not as a part of the treaty, but as an adjunct to it; so that, if by chance the treaty itself did not go into effect, the modus vivendi would continue for the purpose of removing friction between the two nations and of preventing a recurrence of the situation with regard to the fisheries. Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington and this is what he says about the condition of affairs:

After the statement of the President of the United States in his message of 1885, asking for a commission, after the letters which passed between Mr. Bayard and myself, you will readily understand that I went there expecting and looking forward to a settlement of this question on very much the same lines as those upon which it had been settled in 1854, and to some extent, in 1871.

You see that Sir Charles Tupper declares his intention of securing a fisheries and reciprocity treaty on the lines of the treaty of 1854.

I am right in saying that the instructions with which I was charged by this government were to obtain, if it was possible, as near an approach to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 as I could obtain, that is, the policy of carrying out free exchange in the natural products of the two countries.

And yet my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton), a few minutes ago, said that Canada was not in favour, and had not been in favour of reciprocity. Here is the evidence of Sir Charles Tupper, that in 1888 he went to Washington for the purpose of getting reciprocity.

I was to urge that policy, and I think you will have no doubt as to the course pursued by me after reading the proposition that I made in the conference on the 3rd December, 1887:

Sir Charles Tupper begged leave to submit a note containing the following proposal from the British plenipotentiaries. That with a view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Newfoundland.

I have proven up to the hilt that the condition of affairs in 1888 was just about what it was last winter, with the exception that in 1888 Canada went to Washington, whereas, last winter, Washington came to Canada. Sir Charles Tupper says again:

He turned our attention to the means by which it could be averted——

That is non-intercourse.

—and those were the removal of the causes of irritation between the United States and Canada (for it was Canada rather than Great Britain that was referred to) and by removing those causes of irritation, and giving free scope to this policy to which they were committed, we believed that it would at a very early day give us everything that we could desire in the way of greater freedom of commercial intercourse.

Now, Sir, I said a few minutes ago that last winter we were face to face with a situation involving the possibility, in fact, almost the certainty of non-intercourse by reason of the maximum tariff of the Payne-Aldrich Bill being imposed upon Canada, if we did not give some excuse to the President for not proclaiming Canada as a country liable to have that part of the Bill applied to it. What was the condition in 1888? I have described it to you; it was practically the same. What did Sir Charles Tupper say when he came back and recommended the adoption of his treaty to this parliament of Canada? I do not think that I could as eloquently myself, describe what the results were——

Mr. HUGHES. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton says 'hear, hear.' I am glad to agree with him. I sat for many years in this House with Sir Charles Tupper, and I recognized him as one of the greatest statesmen of Canada at that time, a man who took a statesmanlike view of public affairs, a man with a great gift of expression, a man who could express himself clearly, and I take no shame to myself in acknowledging that I cannot express what I desire to place before the House, as well as Sir Charles Tupper has expressed it in the words which I am about to read. These words, I hope, will carry conviction to my hon. friend from Haliburton (Mr. Hughes), and other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who, perhaps would not be convinced by any words which I might utter:

I have told you what position Canada stood in with regard to the United States of America before the initiation of these proceedings. I have told you that we stood face to face with an enactment which had been put on the statute-book by a unanimous vote of Congress, ratified by the President, providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that that Bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between two countries, but that it involved much more than that. If that Bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in the relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war. Speaking a year ago, I pointed out in my remarks, with a view to prevent the possibility of such an Act going into force, all the advantages that in our present position we could avail ourselves of to protect ourselves against such an unfriendly act on the part of the United States. I said then that it would be a mad Act. I say so now. No man who knows anything of the intimate commercial relations which exist between Canada and the United States could contemplate such an Act going into operation without feeling that it would tear up from the foundation those intimate social and commercial relations which exist between these two countries, which, in friendly commercial rivalry, are making rapid progress which has attracted the attention of the civilized world. It would produce a condition of things the end of which no man could foresee. If that Act had been adopted, we had no means of looking to any increased commercial intercourse between that great country and the Dominion of Canada. Under those circumstances, it behooved the government of Canada to adopt any means in its power to avert such a disaster, which, great as it would have been to Canada, would have been still greater to the United States. But it would be a very poor compensation for the injury which we would sustain, to know that we had a companion in misfortune suffering more than we suffered ourselves.

Those words, with some slight change, according to the circumstances and conditions, might be applied absolutely to the state of affairs last winter as between the United States and Canada. I venture to think that if the Liberal-Conservative party to-day do not appreciate and understand those words and are not imbued and impressed by them, they have fallen far below the statesmen of the older generation, who led the great Conservative party of that time, and who, I grant fully and freely to-day, did good things and did great things for Canada, according to their lights and according to their policy. At the time that Sir Charles Tupper used those words, he was standing at the right hand of Sir John Macdonald—Sir John Macdonald, the great flag-waving First Minister of Canada, the man who, all through his career, said that he was a British subject born and that he would die a British subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, hon. gentlemen say 'Hear, hear.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. Yet, at the time when Sir Charles Tupper said that and when Sir John Macdonald himself, was waving that flag, both of them were trying to get from the United States just exactly the arrangement that we have got to-day. They were trying to get it by going on their knees to Washington, while we have Washington coming to us. They failed and we have succeeded. Probably that is one of the great causes of complaint. These hon. gentlemen opposite, are envious of our success and of the prosperity which it will bring to the country.

I have not finished yet with some words from Sir Charles Tupper. He didn't get his treaty but he did accomplish a friendly act with the administration at Washington, and this is what he said:

That was the condition of things when I went down last Easter to see Mr. Bayard at Washington. If you compare the condition of things to-day with the condition of things that existed then, there is no man, I care not how partisan he may be, how unfriendly to this government he may be, who can judicially look at the position of this question then and now, without coming to the conclusion that we have emerged from midnight darkness into the light of day under the auspices of this treaty.

And that though they did not get a treaty. In regard to what was meant by that treaty, he says:

We have made concessions, as I have said, but we have made them with the avowed object of placing all our people, not only the fishermen, but the agriculturist, the lumberman, every man in this country in a better relation with the United States than he was before.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) referred to me as having been present in the House when Sir Charles Tupper made these remarks. I would like to ask him if he did not oppose Sir Charles Tupper at that time?

Mr. FISHER. Not upon that point. On that point the Liberal party in this House supported the then government. There were details of the treaty that we did criticise.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). My hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) was here then?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I certainly understood that you opposed Sir Charles Tupper then.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend understands lots of things that are not so. My hon. friend is mistaken if he thinks that the Liberal party at that date in any way opposed such a reciprocal arrangement or the desire for reciprocity with the United States which was then professed by Sir John Macdonald and his government. At that time, Mr. Mills was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, the Democrats being in power. Almost before the ink was dry on that treaty, Mr. Mills proposed in the House of Representatives at Washington, and it was carried, a reduction of duties upon articles coming from Canada, and which reduction made a difference of something like $1,800,000 on the duties collected on the volume of these articles then imported from Canada. Sir Charles Tupper glories in that and he says:

> The ink is barely dry upon this treaty before he, as the representative of the government and Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, brings forward a measure to do what? Why, to make free articles that Canada sends into the United States, and upon which last year $1,800,000 of duty was paid.

Later on:

> I do not intend to insult both the great political parties of this country who have since 1854 and long before maintained that the interests of Canada—the interests of British North America—were intimately bound up in obtaining free intercourse with the United States for our natural products—I do not intend to insult the two great political parties in this country by telling them that they were fools, that they did not know what they were doing. Down to the present hour we have adopted the policy on both sides of the House, and we have pledged ourselves to the people to do everything that lay in our power to obtain a free market for the natural products of our country with the United States, and I say you must answer me the question as to whether that was an act of supreme folly or whether it was wise statesmanship on the part of both parties in this country to adopt that policy.

I might ask the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) if he still thinks it is an act of supreme folly to obtain free entry for Canadian natural products into the greatest consuming market in the world.

Mr. GOODEVE. That was thirty years ago.

Mr. FISHER. What I am speaking about is as to the consistent policy of Canada in this respect. My hon. friend from Brandon said it was not reciprocity, and my hon. friend opposite said it was not reciprocity, but I will come in a few minutes to another proof that if in 1888 this was their policy, later on they still had the same policy and kept it up.

Mr. GOODEVE. No.

Mr. FISHER. Does my hon. friend say no?

Mr. GOODEVE. Give us any proof after 1891.

Mr. FISHER. I will give some proof in 1891.

Mr. GOODEVE. I said after 1891.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad my hon. friend has asked that because it gives me an opportunity of telling him a little something about 1891 that perhaps he does'nt know. I am afraid there are many young Conservative members a little fresh in this House, who to-day forget the traditions and the policy of their own party. They have come upon evil times in the last ten years for the Conservative party.

Mr. LENNOX. Evil government.

Mr. FISHER. I said evil times for their party; but not evil times for the country.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the minister allow me?

Mr. FISHER. Let me finish—hon. gentlemen opposite all through this debate have been saying that the country is very prosperous. and that we don't want reciprocity, and that there is no need of it, and that being so it must be a good time for the country but it obviously is an evil time for the Conservative party.

Mr. LENNOX. I did not say there were evil times for the country; I said there was an evil government for the country.

Mr. FISHER. Well, we will see about that in a moment or two. I have been invited to give a little later history of the Conservative party and I shall do so now. During this debate my hon. friends opposite have frequently said: Let well enough alone.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. 'Hear, hear,' says the hon. gentleman opposite, but I have a word to say in regard to that. Was it well enough to have an edict of non-intercourse with the great nation to the south hanging over our heads? Was it well enough to possibly have a maximum tariff face us which would have shut out all the products of Canada from the markets of the United States? I say again, Sir, we were in a situation identical with that which Sir Charles Tupper described, and we took the same course as he did, with the one difference that he went to Washington, whereas Washington came to us. Sir, it is easy enough for people who are not responsible for the affairs of the country to say that they would lightly and recklessly reject the hand of fellowship and friendship from a great nation of nearly a hundred millions of people whose lands border ours for 4,000 miles and who, notwithstanding high tariffs on both sides of the line, constitute with us the greatest intertrading people on the whole earth. It is all very well for those not responsible for the government of the country to declare that the Canadian government should have said to the representatives of this great nation: We will have none of you; go back to Washington; we refuse your overtures; we reject you lock, stock, and barrel. It is easy enough for irresponsible men who have not the destinies of the country on their shoulders to advise in that way, but I venture to say that had the Conservatives been in power to-day they would have tried to follow in the footsteps of their great former leaders, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper. It was said by somebody in the course of debate the other day: we cannot stand still, we have either to go forward or backward. And, Sir, when we had the offer, was it not infinitely the better and more sensible and more reasonable course to grasp the hand of fellowship than to reject it. Now, an hon. gentleman opposite asked me what was the condition of affairs in 1891, with respect to the policy of reciprocity. When the Postmaster General was speaking the other day he said that in 1891 the government of Sir John Macdonald went to the country to get a mandate from the people on the question of reciprocity, and my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) interrupted: We needed it then; we don't need it now.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. 'Hear, hear,' says my hon. friend, and he endorses the sentiment that we needed it then and do not need it now. What is the meaning of that? It means that at that time, when Canada was in a depression and comparatively weak and struggling, and when the bonds of empire, which hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of talking about, were not so strong as they are to-day——

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Much stronger.

Mr. FISHER. That is not the universal opinion of the country; that is not the evidence of the press or in accordance with the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite and everybody else in Canada. But the hon. member for East Grey says that at that time they needed this kind of reciprocity. They were willing then to risk the rupture of the empire; they were willing then to risk annexation and the diversion of trade from the mother country to the Union to the south of us. At a time when Canada was not so strong or so able to resist any blandishments from the United States, or so able to stand on her own feet, or to assert and maintain her own position, the hon. member for East Grey thought it would have been all right then, when a Conservative government was doing it; but he thinks it is all wrong now, and leads to annexation and everything that is bad, because a Liberal government is doing it. Now, I have looked up with a good deal of interest what the platform was on which the Conservative party at that time went to the country. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Liberal party went to the country on the question of unrestricted reciprocity. So we did, and why? Because in the first place, we had full confidence in our own country, and did not believe that would lead to annexation; in the second place, the country was in a desperate plight, and we thought it required a desperate remedy. Our hon. friends opposite wanted, not an unrestricted reciprocity, but a restricted reciprocity, a reciprocity in natural products and as little else as they could get. Do hon. gentlemen opposite deny that? Do they contend that the Conservative government did not in 1891 go to the country on the question of reciprocity and ask for a mandate? I will prove to them what I have said. I have before me the address to his electors, written at that time by the then Minister of Finance, now the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and in that address he went on in this fashion:

> In its trade policy with the United States, the government have always favoured a fair and just measure of reciprocity, and has made repeated propositions looking in that direction. Until lately, however, the United States have made no favourable response.
> Now, however, in the course of diplomatic correspondence, the government of that country, through its Secretary of State, has intimated its willingness to enter into a conference upon this matter with the Dominion government, and has declared its readiness to commence this conference after March 4.
> The trade issue is the great issue in this contest, and it is of the utmost importance that each elector should have a clear idea of the points of difference between the two parties.

The President said that after the 4th of March, he would be ready to begin his negotiations; and what happened? The elections took place on the 5th of March, when Sir John Macdonald went to the country with the avowed object of getting a mandate to continue the negotiations. Mr. Foster in his address, goes on to denounce the unrestricted reciprocity proposals of the opposition, and then he explains the policy of the government in five items. This is the first item:

To continue to develop home industries, and the agricultural, mineral and other resources of the country on the lines laid down since 1878.

We have been encouraging and looking after some home industries, and the agricultural, mineral and other resources of the country, not on the lines laid down in 1878, but on far better lines—on lines which were indicated in our tariff of 1897, on lines which received the endorsement of my hon. friend from Brandon this afternoon, on lines which we are continuing in the present arrangement, on lines which embodied, first of all, a considerable reduction in the tariff, largely on those materials which are needed by the labouring and agricultural classes, on lines which reduced the duties on raw materials to enable our industries to flourish, and on lines which introduced a British preference for our mother land in the markets of Canada. We substituted a better policy for the policy laid down by our hon. friends opposite in 1878, and I would point to the results as indicated in the different conditions of Canada to-day under our improved policy as contrasted with the condition of Canada in 1896, when the National Policy was done away with. I can speak by results; I need not go into details. Hon. gentlemen opposite and their press and everybody in the country, who is opposed to this reciprocity arrangement with the United States, are the best witnesses of the results of our policy. The industries of Canada to-day are flourishing; but they have only been prosperous since we changed the policy of 1878 and introduced our improved policy of 1897. I say, therefore, as far as that item of Mr. Foster's election address is concerned, we have not exactly followed, but we have improved upon, what they did. The second item he mentioned, was:

To keep in our own hands the power of framing our own tariff according to our own necessities.

Does not this arrangement with the United States do that? In what way does it hamper us? Hon. gentlemen opposite, before the arrangement was made, talked about a treaty and objected to a treaty. I remember my hon. friend from North Toronto, in the early days of the session, dilating at considerable length on the danger of tying ourselves down to a treaty. That was the burden of their song; but when they found that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, had arranged what is not a treaty, but an arrangement, under which we retain absolutely in our own hands the power of framing our own tariff, according to our own necessities, they threaten us with the danger that it is not permanent, and that it may be changed at any minute by the United States. It may be changed at any minute by us too. We have just the same power to modify it that the United States have, and the same power to abrogate it. We retain by it absolutely in our own hands, the framing of our own tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FISHER. Hon. gentlemen say no I know that they are appealing to that bogey, to that prejudice, but there is absolutely no foundation in fact for their appeals on that point as there is no foundation for most of their appeals on this question.

Sir, what is the third?

Not to discriminate against Great Britain—our mother land and the great market for our products.

Sir, I read that with a great deal of gusto. I am very much pleased, indeed, to find that at that time that was the policy of that party, but I cannot help remembering that in 1897 when we brought down our tariff of preference the gentlemen on the other side of the House, headed by Sir Charles Tupper, then their leader, followed by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) then and for a while afterwards, until that county and that province rejected him, member for Kings, N.B., threw the burden of reproach on us, saying that we had given a preference to the mother land without demanding a quid pro quo, without bargaining, without forcing our mother land to do something which she did not want to do as the price of getting our preference in our market. Sir, we gave the preference without price, we gave the preference without bargaining.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). To every country in the world as well as to Great Britain.

Mr. FISHER. To Great Britain and other countries as we chose.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). You could not help it.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend talks about the German and Belgian treaties, He has forgotten that although for a moment the arrangement gave the benefits of the preference to Germany and Belgium we were influential enough in the councils of the empire to denounce the German and Belgian treaties, and we gave the preference to Great Britain alone or to such other countries as we chose to give it. We have chosen to give it to British countries.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The Argentine Republic.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about, the British preference does not go to the Argentine Republic.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It goes to some twelve countries.

Mr. FISHER. No, it does not.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Yes, it does.

Mr. FISHER. The British preference goes nowhere except where we tell it to go, in British countries.

I go on to the next item in Mr. Foster's appeal:

To raise our revenue by indirect taxation, on customs and excise and not by direct taxation.

That was brought in because they thought that with unrestricted reciprocity they would be obliged to have direct taxation. We have never proposed to have direct taxation and do not propose to do so to-day. The fifth item is the gist of it:

To meet the United States in a friendly way, and negotiate with them for a reciprocity arrangement on lines that shall be just and equitable, and in accord with the honour and best interests of Canada, so far as it can be done without infringing upon the lines above laid down.

Again, I must plead guilty to my hon. friend, that I am not able myself to put the description of our reciprocity arrangement into as concise and complete a definition as was done at that time by the present member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). That is an absolutely true description. We have made an arrangement which will——

Be just and equitable, and in accord with the honour and best interests of Canada, so far as it can be done without infringing upon the lines above laid down.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when he brought down the arrangement declared distinctly that if in any way it interfered with the preference to Great Britain, we not only would not discriminate against Great Britain, but would see to it that there was still a substantial preference for Great Britain on every item where there was a customs duty.

To keep in our own hands the power of framing our own tariff.

That is done by this arrangement absolutely, and if hon. gentlemen opposite undertake to maintain that it does not, they are simply undertaking to say that the people of Canada do not know how to manage their own affairs, at a time when Canada is prosperous, rich, progressive, at a time when Canada is receiving an influx of people from all over the world who think so much of Canada that they are eagerly rushing to her shores and are bound to become citizens of this country. It is true that Canada with 8,000,000 of a population is face to face with a population of 90,000,000 or 100,000,000 south of the boundary, but that population of 90,000,000 or 100,000,000 to-day recognize and acknowledge the power, the strength, and the influence of Canada on this North American continent. Their views are voiced in the words of Mr. Taft in explaining the reason for this arrangement in Washington; he pointed out the advantages of friendship, amity and trade arrangements with Canada and gave us the best compliment our rising young nation has ever received in its history. My hon. friends opposite would not like to be asked what was their policy in 1891. What was their policy in 1891? It is well known that they went to the electors in 1891 and won, and parenthetically, I am very glad they did. But they went down to Washington, they opened negotiations with Washington in 1891 and tried to negotiate a treaty on the lines laid down by Mr. Foster. They failed again, they are envious because where they failed we have succeeded; that is the only difference.

I shall only add that the other day I was talking to a gentleman who was a friend of Sir John Macdonald in his lifetime. He made this remark to me: You have made the best trade arrangement that could possibly be conceived in the interests of Canada; I would like to see my old friend, Sir John Macdonald jump with both hands outspread at such an arrangement if he had ever got the chance. I believe that that gentleman, who was an intimate friend of Sir John in his lifetime, gauged him pretty correctly. To-day if Germany or France could make an arrangement of this kind with the United States, either of these great commercial nations would jump at it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. We know that Germany was trying to secure better commercial relations with the United States. She has, to a certain limited extent, succeeded, but she has not succeeded half so well as we have, and we know that the disappointment at not having been able to go further in improving her trade relations with the United States is very acutely and keenly felt.

One word with regard to a matter brought up by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton). It may be a taking argument, and I dare say some people in the country have been captivated by it. It is that we have no mandate to do this.

My hon. friend described the general mandate of the party and government in power. My hon. friend was a party to and endorsed the British preference of 1897. That legislation followed the election of 1897. I fail to remember a single statement on the part of the present leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), or any member of the party placing before the people of Canada the principle and details of the British preference brought down to this House in 1897. Did anybody at that time say that we had no mandate for that policy? I can remember well that when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) announced his British preference in this House, it was like a thunderclap to the House and to the people; nobody expected it; nobody dreamed of it. The secret was well kept, so that, with the exception of the men who sat at the council board of that day there was not a single individual in Canada who knew that we were going to bring down a proposal for a British preference on the lines that were announced. My hon. friend from Brandon was one who knew it, and he accepted the responsibility of that step without a mandate from the people, just as we to-day have brought down this arrangement, which he criticises on the ground that we have not the mandate from the people for it. I think we may fairly say that we have some mandate from the people for this arrangement. Reciprocity with the United States has been a demand of the people of Canada for years. Everybody in Canada has said: Give us reciprocity in natural products if you can get it. But people thought we could not get reciprocity in natural products without sacrificing our industry, because the United States would not give us reciprocity in natural products unless we included also a large list of manufactured articles. But in this arrangement we have secured reciprocity in natural products without sacrificing a single interest of our manufacturing industry. (I will speak, a little later, of the packing houses and some other matters to which my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) refers. I say again, we have accomplished what the people of Canada have been asking for, but had almost given up hopes of. The propitious time arose in the conditions of the United States, and we should have been derelict in our duty if we had lost the opportunity to gain that for which the people of Canada have been seeking and hoping for for years. Again, we have a mandate in this: reciprocity has seemed to many people difficult, or impossible because it was said the Americans must come down to our range of duties before we can discuss things with them. The American tariff has been high; our tariff has been lower but everybody in Canada was ready to trade with the Americans if they would come down to our range of duties. Under the present arrangement there is not an item in which the duties on the American side of the line are not made the same, or lower, than on the Canadian side. The Americans have come down to the Canadian range of duties, and we have taken the opportunity to fix them there and make an arrangement which is so favourable to us. There are two items in which we have not even come down to their duties. The first is the item of cement. The duty on the American side is 8 cents and on the Canadian side 12½ cents. We reduced to 11 cents, but the American duty is still three cents lower than ours. In regard to coal, there is a slight discrimination—so slight that it is hardly worth going into. But the Americans have come down to our scale of duties, and we have clinched the bargain.

The hon. member for Brandon said we had no mandate, and that we had committed the country. Why, Mr. Chairman, the present debate, the hon. gentleman's own stand on the question—everything goes to prove that we have not committed the country. We have committed the country if the representatives of the people ratify our bargain, and only in that case.

An hon. MEMBER. They won't do it.

Mr. FISHER. I do not intend to prophesy. My hon. friend from Brandon says he is obliged to leave his party on this question. We have a majority on this side of the House of about fifty, and even if the hon. member for Brandon votes against us we shall still have a majority of 48. I venture to say that the members on this side of the House are just as well able to gauge public opinion in this country as anybody on the other side of the House—

Mr. GOODEVE. Am I to understand by the remark the hon. minister has made that it is not the intention of the government to put this arrangement into force until after they have appealed to the people? Did he say it was to be ratified by the people before it should go into force?

Mr. FISHER. I said ratified by the representatives of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FISHER. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Goodeve) a representative of the people?

An hon. MEMBER. He sure is.

Mr. FISHER. On what ground does he say so? I suppose, because he was elected to this House. Hon. members on this side were elected also and in larger numbers than hon. gentlemen opposite. If these hon. gentlemen opposite arrogate to themselves the honour of representing the people, then the majority in this House may fairly claim to represent the people.

Mr. GOODEVE. The hon. member for Brandon explained clearly that this question was not an issue in any previous election.

Mr. FISHER. And I have just pointed out to the committee that my hon. friend from Brandon himself was a party to putting through the British preference without any better mandate. It is true that, throughout this country, there is being worked up an agitation against this arrangement. It is true that there is very considerable talk of it in the press. I have even seen the names of gentlemen connected with this agitation, who, when that fact came to be known, repudiated what had been attributed to them. I had a rather remarkable instance in Hamilton the other day, when at a meeting, the names of two gentlemen were used as moving and seconding a resolution against this reciprocity arrangement, and the next day both these gentlemen came out and stated over their own signatures that they were not present at the meeting, had not authorized the use of their names, and had not drawn up the resolution. Hamilton is rather favoured in that respect. We have been told that the industries which came over to Canada from the United States and established themselves here to supply the Canadian market would all disappear, and that their big buildings would be emptied and their workpeople left out of employment.

But we had a day or two afterwards a statement that the Oliver Plough Company, which was one of those industries in Hamilton, was not only not going back, but was going to add a plant of $600,000 to serve the increased demand by the Canadian market under the tariff which has just been arranged in regard to agricultural implements. I might mention many other instances, but I will not go into details. Hon. gentlemen opposite may quote newspaper paragraphs and statements of individuals, but I am content to rest on the common sense and the intelligence of the electorate of Canada, and we know on this side of the House that we represent on this question the men of Canada to-day who sent us here two years ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Go to the country. We have heard that cry over and over again. There has not been a parliament since this government came into power when hon. gentlemen opposite have not called upon us to go to the country on the most trivial occasions. But, Sir, we have some responsibility to the country, we have some responsibility to the electorate, and we do not propose to go to the country until we feel the need of a fresh appeal, or until this parliament ends. When we have gone to the country in the past, in election after election, this government has been endorsed by the people, and on the ground of its tariff policy perhaps more than on any other ground.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

IMPERIAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 105) to incorporate the Imperial Steamship Company.—Mr. McKenzie.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I would like to ask the government whether any arrangement has been recently closed with any of the steamship companies in connection with carrying the mails from Canada to Great Britain?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. None.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 130) for the relief of Matilda Emo.—Mr. Hodgins.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, before dinner I dealt with some aspects of this question, and with some of the remarks of my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton). Amongst other things he took exception to the manner in which this arrangement has been made, and gave it to be understood that the representatives of the government of Canada had taken no care or pains to inform themselves as to the point at issue, and as to the details of the trade of the country which would be affected by this arrangement. I take direct issue with the hon. gentleman and I tell him, and I tell the country, that the government did consider these things, went into them carefully, that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) employed those advantages which, as ministers of their departments, they had to obtain information, that when they went to Washington and met the representatives of the United States, who were assisted by their tariff experts, they too had tariff experts from Canada in the person of Mr. McDougald who has now been for about twenty years, I think, Deputy Minister of Customs, and therefore, has at his fingers ends every detail of the customs administration and all the incidents of the customs tariff, and in the person of Mr. Russell who is an expert in these matters, he having been also for many years in the Customs Department, and having been transferred, some years ago, to the Finance Department as a special expert and adviser of the department on the details connected with the tariff administration. Therefore, I say that the hon. member, in making this accusation against the government, did so without full knowledge or without thought and absolutely without foundation in fact.

The hon. member referred to my following him to-day, and said that no doubt as a farmer the Minister of Agriculture knew something about these things. I do not presume to say that I do ; I prefer to leave it to the farmers of the country themselves to put their side of this question to the public at large. Hon. gentlemen who have approached this question on the floor of this House and elsewhere have been very willing and glad to accept the statements of various interests in the country as being the obiter dicta with regard to their particular interests, but they assume to themselves and to everybody except the farmers to give information with respect to the interests of the farmers. Personally I prefer to let the farmers do that for themselves. We had here a little while ago a large demonstration of farmers.

It is the custom to say that they were solely representatives of the Northwest, but as a matter of fact of the 800 delegates, probably 200 were from Ontario, 100 from the Quebec and the eastern provinces, and 500 from the Northwest, and they were not merely individuals expressing their views but most of them represented organizations of farmers throughout the country and came to place before the government the resolutions of representative agricultural bodies. I believe that this great delegation truly represented the farmers of the country. I do not pretend to say it represented the manufacturers, I do not pretend to say it represented the transportation interests, but I can safely say that it represented the agricultural industry of this country, and its views and aspirations, far better than any man not engaged in agriculture himself, possibly could. The farmers of Canada have ever had the advantage of free entry for their goods into the British market, it is the glory of the mother and that she allows food products to enter her market without discrimination or customs duty. There is no good reason to believe that our farmers will in future lose that advantage in the British market because Britain has decided to keep to free trade, and even though she did resort to certain customs duties, those who advocate such a policy, at all events pretend that the products of the dominions beyond the seas would still have free entry. Well, Sir, there is not in this arrangement a word or a line, and there is nothing in the spirit of it, that would tend in any way to cut us off from entering the British market under the same conditions as in the past. The hon. member from Brandon (Mr. Sifton), said in effect that we were throwing away the British market for the purpose of getting the American market, but that is an absolute misrepresentation of the fact. We are not throwing away the British market; we are simply adding to it the American market for the products of our farms, and, we have still the home Canadian market which nothing can take away from us. Again, there is strong evidence that in the near future, if not actually to-day, the American market will be, or is, the best market in the world for agricultural products. My view in this respect may be disputed, but having for some years investigated agricultural problems and the markets of the world, in respect thereto, I believe it is coming about slowly, but surely, that the market of the North American continent is the best market of all markets. The prices on the British market are not so superior as they used to be over the prices in our own market, and they are not in most instances as good as the prices obtained in the United States.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Is it not a fact that you are practically throwing open to the whole world, the home market which the farmer of Canada formerly possessed?

Mr. FISHER. I will deal with that in a moment. My hon. friend from Brandon, speaking of the province of Quebec, did me the honour of saying that I knew as much of the agriculture of that province as anybody else, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that the farmers of Quebec are quite well able to speak for themselves, and the farmers of Quebec are not objecting to the free entry of their hay and dairy and other products into the New England market; on the contrary, they are delighted with the opportunity which this agreement gives them. My hon. friend from Brandon stated, as is quite true, that he has lived in the Northwest during a large portion of his life, that he knows the Northwest, and that he has been enthusiastic for its welfare. That may be, but I venture to say, that he does not to-day so truly represent the feelings and opinions of the Northwest as he did, before he left there. For many years he lived in Ottawa, as a minister of the Crown, and since he left the government he has continued to live here, and I am inclined to think from the information I have received from the Northwest, and from the public expressions of opinion by western farmers, that the hon. gentleman has got out of touch with his people and that the views he expressed in his speech to-day, did not represent them as well as do the views of others whom I could name. I have in my hand an interview with Mr. James Bower, the first president of the Canadian National Council of Agriculture and of the United Farmers of Alberta. Mr. Bower was a member of the great delegation that came here some time ago, and he has come again to Ottawa to specially represent the farmers and to deal further with the government and parliament in regard to their interests. Mr. Bower said, among other things:

> The agreement is a good one and a wise one. By opening up new markets it will without question give a great impetus to the agricultural industry, particularly in western Canada, and will prove equally advantageous to the farmers of eastern Canada, especially in dairy products and hay.
> The speeches I have heard in the House of Commons during the past week by those who are opposed to reciprocity indicate to me that the speakers are either entirely ignorant of how the agreement will affect farmers or they are trying to mislead the public. They appear to be very solicitous as to how it will affect the welfare of the farmers, but the farmers have a few ideas of their own about this matter. At any rate, the anti-reciprocity speakers are absolutely wrong as to how it will affect western farming conditions.
> But perhaps the greatest boon reciprocity will confer upon the farmer of the west will be its indirect results in reducing freight rates, which will mean increased production all along the line. This will, of course, mean a greater demand for manufactured articles in the west, and a greater ability to pay for them.
> As far as the agreement goes, it meets with the unqualified approval of the western farmers, but much dissatisfaction is expressed at the smallness of the reduction in the duty on agricultural implements.
>
> 'What do the western farmers think of the annexation talk?' Mr. Bower was asked.
> 'They think it is all nonsense. If there was any danger of any of the western farmers wanting to be annexed by the United States, it would be because they did not get what they wanted. We want reciprocity, and we shall not be any less loyal if we get it.'

Mr. BRODER. Did the members of that deputation ask for reciprocity when they were here?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. BRODER. I do not think they did.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly they did; the largest measure of reciprocity.

Mr. FISHER. Now, with regard to the general situation of our agricultural products, my hon. friend from Brandon said to-day that we had not investigated these matters, and had given no facts to the House and the country. I will, if the House will be patient for a few moments, give some facts, and I think I shall be able to show that hon. gentleman, and the rest of the country that we have done this with our eyes open and for good and sound reasons. There is an effort being made at the present time by certain interests in Canada to influence the farmers against this arrangement. I do not wonder at it—why? Because this arrangement interferes with the control and monopoly which these people have over the purchasing of our agricultural products in Canada. By this arrangement there will be competition with them in their present preserve. They will have in future the competition of the American buyer, who will come in here and buy from the farmer what he has to sell if he can give a higher price for it, and these gentlemen will have to meet that higher price or go out of their business. I do not think, Sir, that the farmers of Canada will object to having two men coming to buy his products instead of one. My hon. friend from Brandon spoke particularly about wheat; he also spoke about the packers; he did not speak, but I will, about the dairymen and those who have to buy the dairy products of this country. With regard to wheat, I do not profess to be an expert; but I am going simply to meet what the people who oppose this arrangement say with regard to wheat, and am going to point out what I think to be the fallacy in their argument. I do not intend to dispute the facts which they put forward. My hon. friend from Brandon spoke about our wheat being in future taken across the line, and he quoted Mr. James Hill as saying that the duty has nothing to do with the higher price of wheat in the American market. Now, I would just like to ask that gentleman and those who think with him, why is it that the American Congress made arrangements for the Minneapolis millers to grind Canadian wheat in bond for export instead of bringing in the wheat, paying the duty on it, and grinding it in the ordinary way? Because the duty is not only a deterrent and impediment, but an absolute prohibition of their getting the Canadian wheat and grinding it at Minneapolis, and mixing it with their own flour. If, as my hon. friend from Brandon and other opponents of this arrangement say, this is going to result in our northwestern farmers selling their wheat to the United States market, why will they do it? Simply because the price which the American miller will pay for it will be higher than the price which the Canadian miller has been willing to pay for it—I do not say able to pay for it, but willing to pay, in the present restricted market, in which the miller and his representatives in the grain exchange of Winnipeg have controlled the purchase of all the wheat in the northwest. What is the reason that the American millers will want our wheat and be willing to pay for it? The reason is, first, that it is a stronger wheat which they need to mix with their own weaker wheat. It is stronger in the protein qualities, and makes a better baker's flour. They have been buying it and grinding it in bond, at the Canadian price; but when the duty is removed, they will buy it at the American price; and if they do not, others will come in and buy it from the Canadian farmer at the American price. The price will become equalized in the northwestern states and in Canada. It is a fact that the price is higher in the United States than in Canada. If the duty has nothing to do with it the hon. member for Brandon gave no explanation of it. I have no doubt that the two-fold result will take place, that the price will go down a little in the northwestern states and come up a little to the Canadian producer, so that the prices on both sides of the line will be practically the same. If that is the case, I can quite understand that the millers of Canada object to have the competition of American buyers in their preserve, which, with all due deference to them, they have worked to their utmost capacity. A well known miller in Montreal, Mr. Meighen, has written to the press about this matter. Mr. Meighen heads his communication: 'Preserve the Integrity of the Empire.' That is a very common prelude to a very poor argument. I would rather head it on the part of Mr. Meighen: 'Preserve my market for the benefit of Mr. Meighen.' Mr. Meighen destroys his own argument, like some others. He says that the milling plants in Canada can mill for thirty million people. We are giving it an opportunity to mill for ninety million people. If the millers of Canada, who are well established in their business, who have modern up to date plants, as the Ogilvies and the Lake of the Woods and other milling companies have, they ought to be glad to get that market. They ought to be willing to compete, and they are, I believe, quite capable of holding their own in that market. But, like many others, they are timid and do not desire to change. The change could come about in a moment without our intervention, because the United States Congress have the power and the right to take off the duty on wheat at any moment they choose. We are only getting something sure in return for a thing we might have had to face within a month or two—it looked much as if we should have it without compensation. Mr. Meighen says:

> This preaching of the doctrine that by taking down the bars the Canadian farmer would receive a higher market value for his wheat is entirely erroneous.

That is a statement with which, I confess, I do not agree. It does not seem to me possible that if the farmer has two markets, one of them a market in which the price of wheat is higher than in his own, he is not going to get a higher price. Here is another thing Mr. Meighen says—and I suppose this is 'preserving the integrity of the empire':

> I again repeat that the governments of Great Britain and the colonies should grant to one another a substantial preference in duty, and that in so far as their respective revenues will permit the principle of free trade within the empire should prevail. If the Dominion of Canada takes a firm stand on that policy, we will yet see that system adopted in the near future.

I mould remind Mr. Meighen of the fate which met his resolution in 1909 in the ultra-loyal, highly imperialistic Board of Trade of Montreal. Mr. Meighen is the gentleman who, with his friend Mr. McFee, on a certain occasion, secured the passage of a resolution embodying the principle of free trade within the empire. Just two weeks afterwards, the board of trade held an emergency meeting, and those who shouted imperialism—but took precious good care not to do anything for it—rescinded Mr. Meighen's resolution for free trade within the empire. But Mr. Meighen is not discouraged. I admire his pluck—perhaps a little more than I do his judgment. He still harps on this idea, though it was beaten in the stronghold of his friends, the Tory, imperialistic Board of Trade of Montreal.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. May I ask the hon. minister a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the hon. gentleman does not wish——

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the minister tell us what the 300 small mills in Ontario will do under this arrangement, and whether the flour milled in the large mills in the United States will not come into competition with that of the smaller mills in the markets of the world?

Mr. FISHER. In the same way that the flour of Mr. Meighen and the other great millers of Canada comes into competition with that of the small mills, and just as the many small mills scattered throughout the United States live and flourish under the competition of Minneapolis.

Sir, we have and shall still have the English market. And let me point out that if this arrangement takes the duty off Canadian wheat going into the United States, it takes the duty off American wheat coming into Canada. Our mills can import American wheat and mill it, and they have the whole continent to draw from and to sell to, as well as the home market which will still be theirs as it has always been.

My hon. friend from Brandon spoke of the necessity of maintaining the purity of our wheat. He gave us credit for a Bill to improve the Inspection Act, an Act which has already been improved by this government. I cannot, for the life of me see why, if the Inspection Act is enforced in Canada, exactly the same conditions in regard to Canadian wheat, Canadian milling and Canadian flour will not continue as exists to-day. The hon. gentleman says our wheat will go to the United States and be mixed and deteriorated. If so, it will command in the market the price of deteriorated wheat. But, if the Canadian grower, dealer and miller choose they can still keep and maintain the quality of Canadian No. 1 hard, and can send it forward pure and unadulterated, and we propose to give them an Inspection Act by which they can maintain that purity. And that wheat should, more than ever, outsell American wheat and Canadian wheat that goes through these channels, and is deteriorating. That is another of the ad capitandum arguments by which the handlers of goods are trying to pull the wool over the eyes of our farmers and cause them to believe that their interests are being injuriously affected.

As I am on the cereal question, I should deal with the point in regard to Quaker Oats which the hon. member for Brandon brought forward. The present arrangement allows oats to go freely either way. There are oatmeal mills in Canada. Their complaint is not that they object to buying American oats, or that they object to the competition in the Canadian market for the purchase of Canadian oats, but that the offal of their mills, the by-products of their manufacture of oatmeal, is not allowed to enter the American market free. Well, while we think we got a most complete arrangement in the interests of Canada, we could not dictate to our great neighbours, every detail of the agreement. In some cases, we got all we asked for, and in some cases only part; while in some cases—very few—the Americans insisted upon what they wanted, which, had these been the only points at issue, we might not have granted. They did not grant us the free entry of this offal into the United States. The plea is not that our people cannot make oatmeal as well as those of the United States, but that they will not have as good a market for the sale of their offal. I believe the duty is 12½ cents per one hundred. The American maker of oatmeal will be able to sell his offal to the American farmers, our rivals in stock feeding. I venture to say that there are no people in the American union who are as capable and successful stock feeders as the farmers of Canada. We have proved this over and over again when we have gone into competition with them in the great exhibitions of the world and have carried away prize after prize. It is true that there is not, at the present moment, as good a market for that offal as in the United States. But I venture to say that, if this arrangement goes through in its entirety, the encouragement to stock keeping in Canada will, within a year or two, develop as good a market for that offal in Canada as in the United States. Our people will want to feed ten, fifteen or twenty head of stock where to-day they feed one, and they will be able to consume all the offal of the mills in Canada, and will afford as good a market for this by-product of the mills as the American farmers afford for the similar product of the mills of the United States.

Mr. STAPLES. Why does not the minister apply that to hay and barley?

Mr. FISHER. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very anxious to make my argument for me, and to arrange it to suit themselves, but I propose to go through it in my own way.

To-day, Canada does not produce anything like the quantity of agricultural products, especially of wheat and other grains, that the United States does. But I wish to give a few figures to show what the development of our Northwest will lead to in a few years. In 1909—I have not the figures for last year—about 1,000,000 people in our three prairie provinces produced 147,000,000 bushels of wheat off 7,000,000 acres. In passing I may say that in comparison with other parts of the world, our production per acre was far ahead of any of them except the intensively cultivated countries of Europe. In round figures, we have in the hands of settlers 58,000,000 acres; last year something under 14,000,000 acres were cultivated—about one-quarter of the total in the hands of settlers. Then, we have 32,000,000 acres in the hands of railway and other corporations; and 39,000,000 acres surveyed and still owned by the government. Then we have, roughly speaking, about 84,000,000 unsurveyed within the area of possible wheat production. This makes a total acreage in our Northwest of 213,000,000 acres within the wheat producing area. I do not mean to say that all this land will produce wheat, or will ever be under wheat, but I do not think it would be out of the way for me to say that, in the course of 15 or 20 years, one-quarter of that land, say 50,000,000 acres, will be producing wheat. Well, if 1,000,000 people in 1909, cultivating 7,000,000 acres of wheat, produced 147,000,000 bushels, what will the people of the Canadian Northwest produce when that country is fairly filled up and we have 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 between the Great Lakes and the Rocky mountains? That estimate of the future population of the Northwest is not an extravagant one, nor need we look very far ahead for these results. When that time comes, the Canadian Northwest will produce 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat. I venture to say that the farmers will need not only the home country and the American market, but also the European market in which to sell that wheat. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to say: 'Let well enough alone', because, for to-day, and for the moment, we have markets for what we produce. But the acreage of Canada is capable of producing so enormously that we must see to it that we have every market of the world open to us for the sale of our surplus production. When that time comes, there is no doubt, there will be in the United States from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 people, and they will need at least 250,000,000 to 300,000,000 bushels of wheat from us. Are we to forget the future? Are we to slap in the face that great nation, and tell them that we will have none of them and their market, when, in the not distant future, their market will be an essential to the consumption of our surplus production? In the last three years we have increased our population by 273,000, or 35 per cent. At the same rate, in 10 years, we would increase by about 2,500,000 people. And our increase of crops has been commensurate with our increase of population.

Now, I wish to say a word about barley: Everybody knows that before the McKinley Bill of 1890 barley had cheap entry into the United States and that our Ontario farmers were then growing barley with large profit and gratifying success. We have the report of the United States Department of Agriculture that the Canadian barley in quality was the best in the world with the possible exception of some grown in Bavaria. It is well known that the American brewers and malsters wanted our barley. The old duties imposed by the United States on barley enabled the farmers of Canada to send to that country in 17 years, from 1876 to 1892 inclusive an aggregate of 135,250,000 bushels of barley, valued at $90,000,000. But the high duties of the succeeding 17 years brought the aggregate export down to 7,000,000, valued at a little less than $3,000,000. In the first period, the average price was 67 cents under a tariff rate of 15 cents a bushel. But, in the second period, under duties varying from 30 cents a bushel to 30 per cent, the average price was 42 cents. Under this arrangement, we shall have free entry of Canadian barley into the United States market. The farmers of Ontario who were struck by that McKinley Bill, with the pluck, energy, self-confidence and natural pride of a people whom I respect, and whom I consider to be the backbone of this country, took that blow —complained a little, I grant you—but buckled to and overcame the difficulty.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend says, hear hear. But they have overcome it, and they are quite ready to take the advantage again, to reap the profit, and to make the immense sum of money they would have made in the past if free barley had never been taken away from them.

Mr. SPROULE. Do you think that nearly all the barley raised in Canada would not have been kept at home instead of exported?

Mr. FISHER. I think the farmer who raises barley knows enough to sell it to the best advantage for his pocket. If he finds that he can make most by selling it for malting and buying American corn for his stock he will do so. If he finds that it is more profitable to feed it to his stock instead of selling it for malting he will feed it to his stock. But I want to give him an alternative, and I trust to his judgment to make use of the best alternative.

Now, I want to say a word about potatoes and fruit. In twelve years of high duties the United States accepted from Canada $11,000,000 worth of potatoes more than they sent into Canada. Surely if we can get those potatoes into the states without duty, it will be to the advantage of our potato raisers. We sent a large quantity of fruit to Great Britain, which she accepted free, and as the United States had a heavy duty against it, the consequence was that we only sent to the United States $3,000,000 worth of fruit. We imported from the United States two and a third million dollars worth of apples, and we sent her in the same time a much larger quantity.

I would like to contrast the condition of the market gardeners and fruit growers with that of barley growers. The market gardeners and fruit growers, in the last twenty-five years, increased their exports of these articles to the extent of $70,000,000. The farmers in seventeen years lost $90,000,000 on the one export of barley alone. I give this as an instance of what the two peoples suffer.

Now, I want to say a few words with regard to the meat trade. My hon. friend from Brandon says that the packing industry will be destroyed. I say emphatically, no. Why should it disappear? My hon. friend says that the meat trust of the United States will come in and control the packing industry of Canada. He forgets, or does not choose to realize, that while, I grant, the meat trust of the United States seems to be able to defy the courts of that country; no trust in Canada can defy the courts of Canada. We have on our statute-book a Combines Act which forbids the operation of trusts like the meat trust of the United States. We have the machinery by which we can easily deal with them. I will give an instance of what it can do, and it is in regard to a United States organization. Just the other day a court in the city of Quebec declared that the United Shoe Machinery Company must submit to a decision of a board as to whether its actions as a trust are illegal. The United Shoe Machinery Company is one of the most powerful organizations in the United States, it controls the machinery which is used in the boot and shoe trade. They have patents, and a practical monopoly of certain machines. They do as they like in the United States. They came into Canada and tried to do as they liked here, but some of their victims appealed to the courts, and the courts of Canada have ordered them to show reason why they should not be compelled to deal fairly, and not as a trust, with the users of their machinery in Canada. This shows what the meat trust or any other trust in Canada will have to contend with in the future. I can only say to my hon. friend that if the meat trust of the United States undertakes to come into Canada and to act as trusts are generally supposed to act, they will be hauled up short by the Act. The courts of Canada will see to it that they do not carry on the nefarious practices which they are said to carry on in the United States.

Mr. AMES. Is it not a fact that the United Shoe Machinery Company is a Canadian corporation, and that it is against a Canadian company that these proceedings are taken?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, but they are an offshoot in a way of the American company.

Mr. AMES. They have absolutely nothing to do with the American company, so far as their business in Canada is concerned.

Mr. FISHER. But so far as their patents and their machinery are concerned, they are all one. It is their operations in Canada, which are the exact counterfeit of their operations in the United States, of which the courts are taking cognizance, operations of which the American courts do not take cognizance and do not control.

Mr. AMES. Does the minister imagine that the beef trust will come into Canada and be incorporated so that it can be reached by the Canadian courts?

Mr. FISHER. When they do come into Canada and operate, they will be subject to the laws of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the Standard oil trust that has been carrying on operations here for years?

Mr. FISHER. The Act I refer to was only passed last year. I said a moment ago that the packing houses would not disappear. I think my hon. friend had in mind particularly the packing houses in Winnipeg. I have heard it said that the packing houses in Winnipeg would disappear, because Chicago would swamp them when the whole west is thrown open and made subservient to the Chicago market. What is the condition of affairs to-day in the United States? Does the Chicago packing business swamp the packing houses in Kansas city, in Omaha or in South St. Paul? We know, if the hon. gentleman does not know, that these cities are doing a large packing-house business. I have here some figures to show what that business is in comparison with the packing-houses of Winnipeg. In Kansas city last year the local killings of cattle were 1,284,000 ; of sheep, 1,186,000 ; of hogs, 1,900,000. The local packing and abattoir establishments of Kansas city showed, of cattle, 773,000 ; of sheep, 1,256,000 ; of hogs, 1,656,000. In South St. Paul, the local killings were 169,000 cattle, 207,000 sheep, and 823,000 hogs.

Compare Winnipeg:

Cattle—80,000; half of those in St. Paul; one-tenth about of those in Omaha; one-fifteenth of those in Kansas City.

Sheep—30,000; one-seventh of those in St. Paul; one-fortieth of those in Omaha; one-thirty-fifth of those in Kansas City.

Hogs—91,000; one-ninth of those in St. Paul; one-twentieth of those in Omaha; one-twentieth of those in Kansas City.

Sir, I believe that with the same price and with the same opportunity of supply, the Winnipeg packers can do as well as the Kansas City, Omaha, or St. Paul packers. I believe they can compete with Chicago just as well as these others can, and I see no reason to suggest that our Winnipeg men are not quite the equals of the business men of these three great American western cities. Why are these cities able to do so well? Because they have a tremendous field to draw upon, because they have the cattle ranges of the whole western states. Our Winnipeg men to-day have only the ranges and farms of our own northwest, and their supply is limited and small. With the opening of the American market, one of two things will happen. Either the price of the western cattle to these killers in these cities will be higher and the Winnipeg men will have to come up and pay a higher price, or if it is not higher, the Winnipeg men, with this arrangement, can go across the line, compete there, and draw cattle from there to Winnipeg just as well as they can be drawn to St. Paul or anywhere else. Our Winnipeg packers are flourishing in a local way. Practically the whole of the 80,000 head of cattle in Winnipeg are slaughtered for local consumption. There is no export of meat from the Winnipeg packing houses. The whole is for local consumption, and the reason why they are not able to do an export business, the reason why they are not able to increase their work, is because of the short supply of cattle in our own northwest. I will deal with that in a few minutes. But, with this arrangement there is no reason whatever why Winnipeg, instead of staying where she is, away down in the list of those cities west of Chicago, should not be able to keep up and range herself with them. Chicago is and will be probably forever the great centre of the trade of the middle of this continent. Her geographical position, her start and everything else have taken her far ahead of the other American western cities, and there is no doubt that she will stay there. But the fact that Chicago is at the head of this great business is not inimical to the chances of a great number of other cities doing well, flourishing and advancing. I believe that Winnipeg and the Canadians in Winnipeg and other cities in Canada are quite as well able to do that as those cities which I have named.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the minister be good enough to tell us the profits made by these American firms last year. They are given in their annual reports.

Mr. FISHER. You mean in those American cities?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. No, I have not got that.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice that in some cases they made 25 per cent.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. As the hon. the minister has not permitted the question, I cannot allow it.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) talks about the profits they make. With a greater market and with more competition their profits might probably be a little less. I grant with regard to these different interests that are objecting to the farmers getting competition from buyers from the United States that they may have to raise their prices, and, therefore, the farmers of Canada will get the benefit of it. I do not wish to set class against class, but I think the farmers have as much right to a free show and a good opportunity of selling in any market in which they can get more, as the people have who wish to buy from them, and who claim a monopoly of purchase.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman, do I understand you to object to me asking the minister a question?

Mr. FISHER. I will allow you.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I merely want to ask the minister if it is not a fact that these large meat packing firms in Kansas City, Omaha and St. Paul are a part of the meat trust. I have visited these cities frequently and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. FISHER. If my hon. friend says that he knows they are I will not dispute it. I do not know that they are, and I, therefore, will not say whether they are or not. But that does not make any difference. They exist outside of Chicago, and it is the Chicago market that hon. gentlemen are holding up as our bogey. My hon. friend from Grey, earlier in the session, spoke about our live stock trade going down. We have the Canadian and the British market. We have had a great many conditions favourable to our development otherwise, and yet the hon. gentleman made a long speech to prove that the Canadian live stock trade was going down. If that is the case I think the Canadian live stock trade might very well answer hon. gentlemen opposite when they say: 'Let well enough alone' by saying: It is not well enough. My hon. friend, when he says that the Canadian live stock trade is going down, says that it is not well enough. We want to give them another market, we want to give them a better opportunity, we want to give them competition for the things they have to sell, and this arrangement does that. If my hon. friend is correct in saying that the live stock trade is going down then I say it is well that we should help those engaged in that trade in this way.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister says that he proposes to give them another market. Is he aware of the fact that $160,000,000 worth of meat products are shipped out of the United States annually?

Mr. FISHER. I am sorry, but I am afraid that I will have to refuse to respond to these interruptions. I do not object to being asked a pertinent question, but when they are foreign to what I am talking about I cannot allow myself to be interrupted any more. The farmers of the northwest will sell to the American buyer, if he will give them a better price than the Canadian buyer will, otherwise they will not. They will sell to the Canadian buyer if he gives them a fair and just price—the best price they can get—and he will sell to whoever else will give him that price. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) said that the only good market was the British market, that it was a stable and free market. I grant that it is a stable and free market. We have had it. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) says that our live stock business is going down, notwithstanding our possession of that market. I want to give the farmers something that will bring that trade up, and I believe the American market will do it.

Now, Sir, I am going to speak a little bit about the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Brandon said that in Ontario the prices were as good as in the United States. I take direct issue with him. Prices in the United States are higher than they have been in Ontario for the last year on these products that I have been talking about. The hon. member for Brandon reproached us because we had not given statistics, because we had not carefully compared the prices. I beg to tell him that we did compare the prices, that when we made this arrangement we knew what the prices were in the American market, and here, and that is why we wanted to get free entry for agricultural products into the United States. I will give some prices. I have here a few statements. I have a statement with regard to the cattle slaughtered in the west. I have a statement of market quotations for live cattle in Buffalo and Montreal each fortnight from January 5, 1910, to December 2, 1910:

I shall not read each price, but I may say that between January 5 and December 2, 1910 the market quotations in Buffalo every week were higher than in Montreal. It was not an occasional quotation, but taking the whole trade of the whole year, every week the quotations in Buffalo were materially higher for live cattle than were the Montreal quotations. I have another statement here which I need not trouble the House to read, but I will send into 'Hansard,' which gives the market quotations for live hogs in Buffalo and Toronto and Chicago and Montreal. Taking the price of live hogs from January 19 to December 2, for every week in the year with three single exceptions the prices were higher in Buffalo than in Toronto; and in those the difference was very small in favour of Toronto. On January 26 the Buffalo price was $8.75 to $8.85, and in Toronto it was $8.90; on February 2, the Buffalo price was $8.50 to $8.70, and in Toronto $8.65; on June 1 the Buffalo price was $9.75 to $9.85, and the Toronto price $10. Only on these three occasions during the whole year was the price of live hogs as high in Toronto as in Buffalo, and these figures, which I believe to be absolutely correct, and which are taken carefully from the market reports, contradict the statement of the hon. gentleman that the price of these is higher in Ontario than in the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT (Muskoka). Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point I want to ask a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member who has the floor has been interrupted very frequently. I have allowed these interruptions because there was no indication on his part that he objected, but since he has objected I cannot allow the hon. member to be interrupted.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WRIGHT (Muskoka). I want to make an explanation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must resume his seat when the chairman of the committee rises.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to ask whether it is proper to put in 'Hansard' tables of figures that are not read to us and as to which we have no idea what they are like. The Minister of Agriculture has tables there which he says he will send into 'Hansard.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have no control over what may be published in 'Hansard,' but, I understand 'Hansard' does report what is said in the House.

Mr. FISHER. I suggested that these figures might be printed in 'Hansard' without my reading them so as to save time, but since the hon. member (Mr. Armstrong) does not wish to know them, I will not ask that they be put in 'Hansard.' One feature of the live stock trade is worthy of notice, and it is that in recent years there has been a large decrease in the numbers of live stock in proportion to the numbers of people occupying the land. That is a very serious situation. There is more live stock in Canada at the present time than there was ten years ago, but after careful investigation, I have no doubt that there are now fewer animals in Canada in proportion to the population than there were then. The English authorities on the question point continuously to the fact that the supplies from America are decreasing and they are looking more to Argentine and to Australia and to New Zealand for their supplies of meat. Still, America, and the United States especially, send them large supplies. The reason for the falling off in the cattle export from America is that the continent of America affords to-day a better market than does the old country for these products. It is, therefore, very important for us to see to it that the whole market of the whole continent of North America is open to our farmers, and if we do not do that we shall be face to face with the fact that our farmers will be flooding the English market with these supplies and knocking down the price of these products below what is perhaps a living price. Here is another statement which I have no doubt is absolutely correct:

The high prices prevailing during the last two years have evidently not been determined by the prices obtainable for export bullocks, but rather by the strong and growing local demand. Packers and butchers have given expression to this conclusion in different ways and it is a fact that with prices in Great Britain no higher than they are at present there remains no particular temptation to shippers and exporters to direct their purchases across the Atlantic. On the other hand, packers in the east have found a very profitable outlet of late for their cured and fresh meat products in the growing markets of the Canadian west.

Sir, I shall now refer to another matter which affects particularly the province of Quebec, and to a large extent Ontario as well. The hon. gentleman from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) stated that in the province of Quebec there was some good farming, a great deal of bad farming, and some middling farming, but, I know the province of Quebec better than he does, and I may tell him that the fact that the farmers of Quebec export large quantities of hay is no proof at all that they are not good farmers. This may seem paradoxical because it is generally speaking true that the hay should be fed to stock on the farm, and in this way the fertility of the soil maintained, but, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) is not aware of the fact that there are areas of land in the province of Quebec from which hay has been sold to the American and the English market for from 50 to 75 years steadily, and the crop of hay on these lands is just as abundant and as excellent in quality as it was half a century ago. These hay-growing lands are lands which are frequently flooded, and on which there is a constant succession of alluvial deposits, and the land is in that way specially adapted for the growing of hay. That hay has hitherto been shut out of the American market by a duty of $4 per ton, and every one knows that the Quebec farmer, when he did send hay into the United States had to pay a large proportion of that duty, depending on the demand whether he paid more or less. I read in a newspaper a short time ago that a New England farmer told a newspaper reporter that if this arrangement were carried into effect he and his sons would be driven out of their farming in New England because the Quebec hay would undersell them and secure the market in the New England towns. So, in New Brunswick and some parts of Nova Scotia on the dyke lands around the Bay of Fundy, hay has been grown for I do not know how many years.

Mr. BLACK. Two hundred years.

Mr. FISHER. Quite so ; these lands are periodically inundated by the overflow of the sea, and consequently with respect to these particular farms it is good farming, and not bad farming, to grow and sell the hay. Hon. gentlemen from the northwest will tell you that the northwest farmer would be foolish if he did not grow wheat after wheat and wheat after wheat and sell it, and so, in the case of the hay-growing lands I have mentioned it would be foolish for those who cultivate them not to grow and sell a crop of hay. If the farmer in the northwest were to manure the land the wheat would grow and grow and keep green, and would not ripen, and that would be bad farming, and in like manner it would be useless to manure the hay-growing lands in Quebec and the lower provinces because the hay would lodge, it would not cure as well, and the farmer would not get as good a price for it as he does now. Good farming is to avail of the natural conditions of the particular soil you are tilling to the best advantage, and what would be good farming in some localities might be very bad farming in others. Therefore, that is one point in which the member for Brandon maligned the farmers of the province of Quebec. He spoke as a lawyer about farming and not understanding the business he was unable to deal with it intelligently. Again, I want to tell my hon. friend from Brandon who was born and bred in Ontario and lives there now, and seems to identify himself with that province, that in the dairying business the province of Quebec has made more advance than any other part of the Dominion of Canada in fifteen years. The production of butter and cheese has increased more rapidly than in any other part of Canada, and the quality of Quebec butter and cheese stands at the top of the markets of the world. Dairying is very prosperous in the province of Quebec and in dairying I include the production of milk and cream as well as the manufacture of butter and cheese. And why is dairying in the province of Quebec extremely prosperous? It is because for the last two seasons the farmers living along the border —and this is true also of our counties in eastern Ontario which lie along the St. Lawrence river—have been selling cream to the American market, and not as formerly making it into butter and sending it to England. The farmers of the eastern townships were visited the other day by some gentlemen from the city of Montreal, Messrs. Brice, and Maclagan and others, who handle the goods of the dairy farmers, and they told them how bad it would be if American buyers should come across the line and dispute with Messrs. Brice and Maclagan the purchase of dairy products in the eastern townships. Well, the farmers of the eastern townships know their business well enough to know why these gentlemen came to tell them that, and the farmers of the eastern townships know their business well enough to appreciate the advantage of having somebody besides the dealers of Montreal in the market to purchase their products. We have been making butter and cheese in the province of Quebec for many years, and a good deal of it was sold in the home market and the bulk of it was sent to England, but for the last two years American dealers have been coming across the line, and purchasing the cream from our farmers, and taking it to the northern parts of New Hampshire and Vermont, and from eastern Ontario into New York state, and making it into butter for the American market. Now, our farmers who sold that cream had full and free access to the market of Great Britain for their butter, but they found it more profitable to dispose of their cream in this way. These gentlemen opposite will tell you that our market in Great Britain is the great market for Canadian produce. True, it has been, but during this year the price of butter in the New England and New York markets is so high that they could afford to take Canadian cream across the line, pay five cents a gallon duty on it, then make it into butter and pay our farmers a higher price per 100 pounds for their milk than they could get by making it into butter at home, and selling it to these gentlemen in Montreal who forwarded it to the English market. The farmers in the eastern townships do not need any compilation as to the difference in prices on each side of the line to tell them what the truth is. They can see that with their own eyes ; they are selling their goods and pocketing the profits even though these goods have to pay a duty going to the American markets, and by this arrangement they will have free entry to the American market, and they will reap a larger profit. If cream can be bought in Canada and five cents a gallon duty paid on it, and made into butter in the United States, and sold in the great eastern cities, why cannot butter be made in the eastern townships, and eastern Ontario, and all over Canada and sold in these same markets at the same price if there is no duty on either cream or butter? There, the hon. member for Brandon has the answer of the farmers of the province of Quebec as to how they can look after their own interests. Last year there was sent from Canada to the United States $1,677,000 worth of cream, and we sent also a few thousand dollars worth of cheese, and a few thousand dollars worth of butter. The average value of the cream was about one dollar a gallon, and a gallon of cream made about 25 cents a pound for the butter without any expense of make up. The United States have for several years past, imported of dairy products, butter, cheese and cream, to the following extent—in 1907 they imported $6,000,000 worth, in 1908 $5,000,000 worth, in 1909 $6,000,000, and for the 11 months of the last fiscal year $8,500,000 worth, which increase was largely accounted for by the importation of Canadian cream.

Cheese will now be put upon the free list. The United States last year imported nearly $7,000,000 worth of cheese. Now, I want to be perfectly fair. Most of that cheese was brought from Europe; most of it was what is called fancy cheese. But I am glad to say that the dairymen of Canada are rising to the occasion, and are making to-day a very fair quantity of fancy cheese; and under this arrangement they can expand and increase that product, which is the most profitable way to utilize their milk product, and there is no market in the world equal to that of New York, Boston and other large cities of the United States Atlantic sea-board for these fancy cheeses. They are dainty, appetizing things which the rich people want, and will pay fancy prices for; and, while I do not say that the whole of our dairy output can be turned into these products, there will be many opportunities for our scientific farmers to enter into that business, and, instead of being confined, as they are to-day, by a severe duty on cheese, to our own markets of Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, they will have the cities of New York, Boston, Philadelphia and other large American cities to cater to, and the record of our Canadian dairymen which is writ broad on this continent, shows that they can carry on that higher kind of farming better than the Americans can, and beat them in their own markets, if we have a free entry into them.

Mr. hon. friend from Brandon intimated that the prices of butter and cheese were better in Canada than in the United States. I have here quotations of the prices of butter taken on the same day of every month, from January to December, 1910, in Boston, New York, Chicago, Montreal, and Toronto, and in every month of the year in every one of these three American markets, butter was materially higher than it was on the same day in either Montreal or Toronto. The hon. member for Brandon wants statistics and information. Here again are the prices of cheese on the same day in every month in Boston, New York, Chicago, Montreal and Toronto, and in every month the prices in Boston, New York and Chicago were higher than they were on the same day in either Montreal or Toronto. I took also eggs, and here our hon. friends opposite may get a little comfort. The egg prices vary. In January they were higher in the three American markets; in February they were a shade higher in Montreal and Toronto; in April, they were about the same; in May the price in Boston was higher than in the Canadian market, but Montreal and Toronto were both a little higher than New York and Chicago; in June and July the Canadian markets were a shade higher; in August, Montreal was a little higher, but Toronto a little lower than the American market; in September, they were practically the same; in October, Montreal was a little higher and Toronto equal; in November and December, all three American markets were higher than either of the Canadian markets. I also inquired as to dressed poultry, taking Montreal, Toronto and New York, and I found that in every month of the year dressed poultry was higher in New York from one cent to five cents per pound, than it was in either Montreal or Toronto. I will not go into further details. I think I have given some information and statistics. I think I have been able to show that we did not enter into this thing with our eyes shut, but were able to find a justification in the advantages to the Canadian farmer of a free entry into the American market.

The hon. member for St. Anne, and I think the hon. member for Brandon, said: oh, but you do not say anything about the Americans coming in here. Well, I think I have disposed pretty well of the idea of the Americans coming in here, by showing that their own market is higher than ours. The Americans are shrewd, and are not going to send goods into Canada and knock down the Canadian prices, when they can get higher prices at home. But the hon. member for Brandon says: You allow goods to come to Canada from Argentina, Australia and New Zealand and other countries. Quite true, we do. But I would like to point out that for many years, in that free and stable market of the home land mentioned above we had the competition of Argentina, Australia and New Zealand, under conditions that were less favourable to us and more favourable to them, than they would have in attempting to sell their products in Canada, and we have been able to hold our own with them in the English market. We have been able, as a general rule, with the exception of live cattle, to command higher prices than Argentina has—why? Because our products are better in quality, and I venture to say that in the future, as in the past, the Canadian farmer, educated, informed, clean-living, sensible, will be able to produce a better article than the Italian or the Spanish or the Portuguese or others farming in the Argentine. History has told us that we need not fear competition, and I do not think that we need fear it in the future. But my hon. friend from Brandon says they will dump their products on the Canadian market. Well, Buenos Ayres has cheaper freights to London than to Canada, and it has with England, a large trade established, with a return freight, and it can take its goods and put them on the English market much cheaper than it can on the Canadian market. The Canadian has to send his goods to compete with them in England, where the price is regulated by the price of goods in the open stable market of England, and not where they are produced, and we have been able to meet the competition of these people there.

With a market at our own doors, does any person say that these countries can beat the Canadian farmer in his home market? It is absurd on the face of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are simply raising a bogey to frighten the farmers into thinking that this arrangement is a bad one for their business. So far as cattle are concerned, the Argentine, for many years, has suffered, like ourselves, from an embargo on cattle going into Great Britain, by which their cattle allowed to land are slaughtered in the lairages. This continued till 1900, when any landing was absolutely prohibited. In February, 1903, a change was made under which Argentina cattle were allowed to be landed for slaughter in the lairages. In consequence of disease being found, the embargo was reimposed in May, 1903, three months after its partial removal. Now, I would like to point out that this reciprocity arrangement does not interfere—no trade arrangement does—with quarantine. Under our quarantine regulations, Argentina cattle will be shut out of Canada as well as out of England. We cannot allow diseased cattle to come in alive—in England, they do not allow Argentina cattle even to enter to be slaughtered at the port of entry as Canadian and American cattle are. For the three months of which I have spoken, they did allow Argentina cattle, as they allow ours, to be entered and slaughtered at the port of entry. But they had to give that up, and at the present day, not a head of Argentina cattle is allowed to land on the quay in Britain. And I can tell my hon. friends opposite that, until the Argentine can show a cleaner bill of health than they have been able to show for some time, cattle from that country will not be allowed to land in Canada. Not because my duty as administering the quarantine laws calls upon me to interfere with markets or trade arrangements, but because it is my duty to see to it that the flocks and herds of Canada are not contaminated by disease from any outside country.

Mr. AMES. Does the minister——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. minister (Mr. Fisher) has objected to interruptions.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a question of order. Mr. Chairman, is a member of parliament not allowed to make any observation when a gentleman is speaking? I wish to know what are a member's rights?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has the right to rise to a point of order, but not to discuss it.

Mr. SPROULE. I have the right to make an observation, and I distinctly refuse to be controlled by anybody

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has the floor, and no other member has the right to speak while he has the floor. He has been interrupted very frequently. I have told the committee that I allowed these interruptions because the minister did not himself object to them. But when he objected, it became my duty to prevent any interruption. No member except the hon. gentleman who has the floor has the right to speak. The point of order raised is not a sound one.

Mr. LENNOX. May I ask a question of the Chair? Are we to understand that a member of parliament has not the privilege of asking a minister of the Crown a question while he is addressing the House?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. A member has not the right to ask the minister a question while he is addressing the House unless he has the permission of the minister. The minister has distinctly refused to be interrupted, and no member has the right to interrupt him.

Mr. SPROULE. May I ask——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. There is no point of order before the Chair. The Minister of Agriculture has the floor. Unless a point of order is brought before the Chair, the minister must be allowed to continue his address.

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Unless the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) arises to a point of order, I cannot hear him.

Mr. LENNOX. I rise to a point of order. I want information for my guidance. I have no question to ask the minister at this time——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Unless the hon. gentleman has a distinct point of order to raise, he is not in order in speaking.

Mr. LENNOX. It is a distinct point of order. I want your ruling distinctly. Am I to understand that, if I have a question to ask the minister, I am not at liberty to ask it?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. While the minister is addressing the committee, no member has the right to interfere with question or interruption. With the permission of the member addressing the House, it may be done, but, the hon. member having distinctly stated that he desires no more interruptions, it is my duty to see to it that he is not interrupted.

Mr. FISHER. I think I was patient under interruptions. I would be glad to answer questions, but, on several occasions, questions have been put to me almost in the middle of a sentence, and in a way to interrupt the thread of my remarks—questions sometimes entirely irrelevant. Therefore, I feel I must decline to be interrupted. I do not desire to appear discourteous, but I am afraid I shall have to maintain that position.

Adding to what I was saying with regard to quarantine, I may point out that we have dairy laws for this country which have the same effect as quarantine. I do not know that anybody has raised the point in the House, but in different places it has been raised that, in consequence of the free entry of American butter into our markets, oleomargarine, butterine and other things of that kind may be introduced into the country. I have only to say that the Canadian laws which forbid the manufacture, importation or sale of these articles in Canada are as much in force and will be as much in force after this arrangement goes into effect as they are now and have been for years past.

My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) did not say much about conservation, but the question has been raised by some hon. members opposite on several occasions. Conservation at the moment is an attractive and rather popular appeal. We are all anxious to preserve the natural resources of Canada. I think I may say that I have been as prominent in that respect as anybody in this country. I was one of those, with my hon. friend from Brandon, who attended the international conference at Washington called by President Roosevelt to discuss this question. It was I who introduced and put through the Bill for the creation of the Commission of Conservation, and have encouraged, and am a member of, that commission. As I said a moment ago about our animals and dairy products, so the question of conservation is a question of regulation and administration within our own country of our own resources. Conservation is the preservation of our resources from waste, the utilization of our resources under wise and proper management. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) gave a very good illustration of conservation when he talked about the steers and 'what we have we'll hold'. Conservation of forest resources, for instance, does not mean to forbid the cutting of any tree in Canada; it means the cutting of the trees that are ripe to be cut and the proper preservation of those that are not yet ready for cutting from the destructive influences of fire, insects and other enemies of our forests. If conservation means that we are to stop lumbering operations in this country, if it means that we are to keep our trees until they fall from age and rot upon the ground where they will be a hiding place and breeding place of insects injurious to the forests and a means of spreading fire, then, conservation means putting an end to the utilization of our forest resources. It does not mean anything of the kind. Conservation means that we shall so regulate the cutting of our trees that no tree too small to be cut shall be cut, that no tree when it is cut shall destroy other trees around it, that when the tops and the debris of the trees which are cut are left in the forest, they shall be taken care of so that fire may not spread among them, and thereby generate those destructive fires which are the worst enemies of our forest resources. Conservation means that we shall see to it that the insect pests that infect our forests and trees shall be fought and combatted, that fires shall not be allowed to spread, whether originating by settlers, or by hunters, or by trappers, or by railroads. Forest conservation means that forest areas shall be set apart as forest reserves, to protect the sources of our water supply, the sources of our streams, in order that water may be procured for agricultural and manufacturing operations and kept at a continuous flow. Sir, we have done all that. We have set apart large forest reserves. My hon. friend at Quebec the other day, in a conservation meeting, praised this government for the fact that the Minister of the Interior this very session is introducing a Bill to make statutory what was done last year by order in council, namely, setting apart the whole eastern slope of the Rocky mountains as a forest reserve, which will be the greatest on the continent of North America. I think we know fairly well how to conserve our natural resources. The regulation of all these things remains in the hands of the parliament of Canada, and it is only by parliament becoming recreant to its duty in this regard that our natural resources can be depleted.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say, Oh, but these horrible Americans will come in here and eat up our natural resources. I do not know but that to-day a good many Americans own many of our forest reserves, I do not know but that they own some of our mines and some of our water-powers. I am quite sure that a Canadian who owns any one of these resources in fee simple, if an American came along and offered him a higher price for it than he could get from anybody else, he would sell it to him. I think that perhaps our hon. friends opposite would do just like any of the rest of us in that respect. But if an American has bought a natural resource of Canada, he is just as much subject to the rules and regulations of Canada, and to any safeguards we may establish for their conservation and utilization, as any Canadian, or any Englishman, or anybody else in the world. When Americans come in here to invest in our natural resources and to operate them they will be controlled by the laws and regulations of Canada just the same as anybody else. This is the meaning of conservation, and this arrangement has no effect upon conservation at all.

In speaking upon fruits and vegetables, the hon. member for Brandon said that the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) had presented an argument in that respect which was unanswerable. I am afraid I must differ with him a little in that. That argument of the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo, like a great many others, is the argument of a man interested in that business alone. I am not going to attribute any selfish motive to the member for Yale-Cariboo, he is entirely in his right in what he is doing. He spoke of his own interest as a fruit grower, and he spoke of the interests of a majority probably of his constituents. Now I am going to say frankly that it is possible that the fruit growers of the dry belt of British Columbia may suffer by this arrangement a little more than any other interest that I know of. They are to-day growing fruit in the dry belt somewhat similar to the dry belts of Washington and Oregon to the south. They are starting out on a large scale in an industry which has been well tested and well established on a small scale, and they are probably at a stage when for the moment keen and superior competition may stagger them. But I do not believe it will knock them down. I do not believe for a moment that my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo himself is going to sell out his orchards and leave the business. I think he and his friends will continue to grow fruit. They have exactly the same opportunity under this tariff arrangement that their competitors to the south of them have. They are not at the moment quite so well established in business, but I am glad to say that they are becoming established. I am glad to see that for a year or two back they have adopted the best methods of packing that are known, and have been getting a good repute for their fruit, just as good a repute as the people to the south of them. The Okanagan Valley fruit has just as good a record as the fruits of Washington. They can grow just as good fruit, and probably a little better, and they can grow as much of it to the acre. They have beaten their American neighbours time and again in exhibitions by reason of the superior quality of their fruit. They have not had so many acres under fruit as their competitors to the south, and for the moment that competition may be felt. But I have confidence enough to believe that the people of that region, like other Canadians in the east, like the people of the west who have to compete on wheat, will hold up their head and enter into the fight, and show the same results that other people have been able to show in competition between Canada and other countries. I observe that some gentlemen in the fruit business take the same view as themselves. A little while ago I read an article in regard to the fruit growers of that country, and I think the Minister of Customs has read it. It is taken from the Vernon 'Okanagan,' which I understand is a Liberal paper. The article is written by a Mr. Lee. Mr. Lee, this paper says in another number, is the secretary of the Okanagan Farmers' Institute. A few weeks ago he supported a resolution at the annual meeting of the central institute which strongly advocated that not only should the duty on fruit be retained, but that the duty should be raised to a parity with the United States tariff. Mr. Lee spoke warmly in favour of that resolution, which was carried unanimously and forwarded to Ottawa. They go on to say that he ought to be consistent. Mr. Lee, I think is consistent, and I think he occupies about the position many other people occupy in this country. When he moved that resolution he did not know the terms of the arrangement. When he moved that resolution for keeping the duties on a parity, he meant to raise the Canadian duty to the American duty. While the American duty existed that perhaps appealed to a good many people.

But we have put the duties on a parity, they have disappeared and, to-day there is no duty on our fruit going into the United States any more than there is on the fruit of the Americans coming in here. But later, when he knows the details, Mr. Lee writes an article of a page and a half, in which he points out the advantages of the American market to the Okanagan fruit grower. He says that he understands and knows the details of this arrangement and that he believes it is in the interests of the Okanagan fruit grower. That is the spirit of the Okanagan fruit grower, which I anticipated and hoped for, and which I am glad to find in Mr. Lee, although we did not find it in the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell). Sir, we have in eastern Canada too, fruit growers who seem to be a little afraid. I will only speak in very general terms, but I will say this, that if anybody in the world can raise fruit and succeed in open competition with anybody in a good market, it ought to be the Niagara and Lake Shore fruit growers in Ontario. They have every advantage which their competitors to the south have. They have the advantage of teaching from the Department of Agriculture in Ontario, and the Department of Agriculture here, which is superior to anything that there is in the United States. They have quantity of production, they have every opportunity of co-operation and organization, and I am glad to know that to-day the fruit growers of the province of Ontario are organized and are able to put their fruits on the markets either of the United States or Canada equally well, with the fruit of any other producers. Hitherto they have had the Canadian market alone. The Americans had to pay duty to come in here, and our people had to pay duty to go into the United States. Notwithstanding that duty, our people have sent hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of fruit into the United States markets of Buffalo, and places across the line every year. With a free market, with the opportunity of sending their fruit into Buffalo, down to New York and to other big cities south of the line, they will have an abundant market that will stimulate fruit growing in the Niagara peninsula. I have no doubt that it will do so, and that the result will be an immense increase in the business of fruit growing in this province. We have another fruit growing district in the Annapolis and Cornwallis valleys of Nova Scotia. They send out every year hundreds of thousands of barrels of apples. They have been looking with longing eyes to the New England market, but they have been forced by the United States duties to send all those apples across the Atlantic to the London and other English markets. They can do so still, but they will have in addition, free entry to this great market in the New England States. We know that the quality of Ontario and Nova Scotia fruit, especially apples, is superior to that of the United States producers, and that our apples, even with the duty, are sought for there, as being the daintiest, prettiest and the most tasteful of any apples that are put upon the American market.

The hon. member for Brandon stated that prices in the United States were lower than they were in Canada. He referred to the tables which have been published by the Labour Department as being most excellent. I thought I had a general table of the prices of products in Great Britain, United States and Canada, but I am not able at this moment to put my hand upon it. The table shows very clearly that the general trend of prices in Canada and the United States, while varying occasionally, is the same, but that as a general rule, the prices of the articles of ordinary life, are higher in the United States than they are in Canada. It is a truth which I wish to impress, that the continental market is better in the United States than it is in Canada, and that if we can get entry into that market we have a better continental market than we have to-day. The same table shows that the general trend of prices of the same articles is lower in Great Britain than it is in the United States and that, therefore, the American market is one that we will be likely to cater for in the future. We will cater for it, because it is the best paying market and for no other reason.

This brings me naturally to the last thing that I am going to say. Hon. gentlemen opposite and their press especially, have talked about this as being a movement which is going to lead to annexation. Perhaps what I have just said with regard to a continental market here, the American market and the English market, may confirm them in that. I have yet to believe that the people of any country are bound to their allegiance, to their King, or to their flag, by any feelings or influences of commercial ties. I do not believe it. I believe that Canada is loyal to herself, to the empire and to the King, from feelings of sentiment, of attachment to the institutions of this country and of the empire, and inspiration from the traditions of the empire, and consequently the people of Canada are proof against any relaxation with regard to their enthusiasm, loyalty or patriotism which might occur, because of any change in commercial relations. I do not believe it, and I do not think that anybody else believes it. They raise this cry and they wave the flag because they think it is going to bring some votes. I cannot imagine for a moment that the hon. member for Brandon thinks that, because a man in the Northwest, or in Ontario, or in Quebec, gets a little higher price from a Yankee for the goods that he sells him, he is going to want to join that Yankee country. On the contrary, the free entrance of commerce into the United States market removes the only possible inducement to annexation. If we were going to be influenced by commercial reasons, the fact that we were shut out from the American market which we find to be the best market, might induce us to ask for annexation, but when we get free entry into that market without annexation, in the name of goodness, why should we think of annexation? Hon. gentlemen opposite did not think of annexation, or at any rate, they pretended that they did not think of it, and they continued to wave the flag when they were asking for reciprocity. Then they did not think it meant annexation. I did not think it would mean annexation then and I do not think that it means annexation now. They have changed their minds, while we have consistently and continuously maintained our confidence in the loyalty and patriotism of the Canadian people.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). What did Edward Blake say?

Mr. FISHER. Edward Blake ; I have dealt with that and I am not going to go back to it now. My hon. friend from Brandon was not so afraid of the Americans a few years ago. Perhaps, if there is one thing more than another that is striking in his political and public career it is the magnificent inauguration and carrying out of the immigration policy into the Canadian northwest. I give him all credit for it. I have always admired what he did, and I know he did it in the true interests of the country, and with an eye to the advancement of Canada. He succeeded beyond expectation, but the striking part of his immigration policy was the campaign in the United States, and the effort directed to bring Americans into our northwest. It was carried on against great obstacles but with magnificent success, and to-day we have in the northwest hundreds of thousands of American-born citizens the great majority of whom, being here only a few years, have sworn allegiance to our King and our institutions, and are to-day good British subjects. That is the kind of annexation we want, and I venture to think that when those former American citizens, knowing that the only difficulty they experienced in settling in our country was exclusion from their old market, find that the barriers are thrown down, they will be followed by tens of thousands of their former friends, and in a few years we will have our northwest more and more filled by that class of immigrants which the member for Brandon over and over again has admitted were the most progressive and intelligent settlers. And why should they not come to Canada? They tell us they have higher priced lands in the United States ; they say they have harder conditions under which to live ; they say that their labour there costs them more; they say their transportation rates are higher, they say they cannot grow as good crops there; they come to Canada and henceforward they will have the same market exactly as they had before they left their own country. We are removing the last obstacle to the immigration of Americans into our northwest. I suppose some of our friends on the other side of the House may say that the immigration of Americans into the northwest is dangerous, that it is disloyal, that it is improper. I ask them to take the view of their friend the hon. member for Brandon as to that. He has often told us that the American is the best settler in the northwest, because he comes there ready to go to work at once, and he is able to immediately add to the production of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Nobody has ever said anything to the contrary.

Mr. FISHER. No. In that respect I say that this agreement will bring about greater progress, greater trade, greater earnings for the people and consequently greater earnings for our railroads and transportation routes. For a long time we have been developing the St. Lawrence trade route and we have made every endeavour to direct the trade of our own northwest to Montreal and other Canadian ports. Will the lowering of the duty on either side of the line tend to interfere with that? On the contrary I venture to say it will facilitate it, and that in the future the St. Lawrence route will have more of the trade of the northwestern states than ever before. In addition to that, if we get settlers into the northwest who will produce and produce and produce, we will have a great deal more to carry by the St. Lawrence route. I believe that the great St. Lawrence highway is the best route for trade; I am not afraid that any competition will injure it. Our railroads are not afraid. Have we had a scream from the Canadian Pacific railway? No. I saw the other day a paragraph in a paper in which an officer of the Canadian Pacific railway was reported to have said that this arrangement would stimulate immigration into the northwest and increase the value of the land. We all know the Canadian Pacific Railway company has great quantities of land, and we all know that Canadian Pacific railway stock has been going up lately, possibly because of the expected increase in the value of these lands. Sir Donald Mann says he is not afraid of it ; the Grand Trunk Pacific is not afraid of it. Mr. Smithers the president of the Grand Trunk railway in England says he approves of the arrangement and believes it to be a good thing for Canada. And yet, these gentlemen opposite pretend to be very solicitous about the railroad interests of the country. The hon. member for Brandon said that Sir John Macdonald built the Canadian Pacific railway round the north shore of Lake Superior so as to be able to carry Canadian goods through Canada without touching the United States, but the Canadian Pacific railway was built in 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885, and in 1888 and in 1891 Sir John Macdonald sent to Washington to ask for reciprocity. He evidently thought that the building of the Canadian Pacific railway round the north shore of Lake Superior was no impediment to reciprocity. Sir, we have in this country national aspirations, and the policy of the Liberal party has always been directed towards building the country up. The Liberal government commenced with the British preference in 1897, and we have consistently ever since tried to develop feelings of loyalty to our common country. And, how has this been done? Simply by removing restrictions from the trade, and the enterprise, and the business of our people so that they may develop to the best advantage, so that they may reap all the possible advantages in any market in any country in respect to their outward trade and in their internal trade. A contented people is a loyal people; a prosperous people is a patriotic people. We do not believe for a moment that our patriotism and our loyalty would not stand a strain, but at the same time I would prefer not to put a strain upon it. If we can make the world believe that Canada is a good country to live in, that Canada within the empire is prosperous and successful, we will be doing what is best for the empire and best for ourselves. Does trade interfere with loyalty? These gentlemen opposite say they speak for the manufacturers of Canada, but let me ask what class of our community does the most trade with the United States. Is it the farmers? No. I have here a list of the main items of our imports from the United States and I find among them, anthracite coal, $14,300,000 worth, and products of the forest $7,900,000 worth. Is it disloyal, is it leading to annexation that our manufacturers and railroad people in Ontario should buy their coal from Pittsburg instead of going to Nova Scotia or British Columbia for it?

I do not think so. I think they are quite right in their trade to buy where they can get it best and cheapest. Indian corn, $4,600,000. Our farmers buy that chiefly to feed to their stock. We cannot raise Indian corn for grain to advantage in this country, and our farmers go to the United States and buy that large quantity. Are they disloyal, or tending to annexation by doing that? Nothing of the kind. If trade leads to annexation and inspires to disloyalty, they must be disloyal. We know they are not. Tobacco, unmanufactured, $3,000,000. Are all the smokers of Canada disloyal? I am not a smoker myself, and, therefore, I am not going to boast about it, but Sir William Macdonald, in Montreal, I believe, imports from the United States nearly all the tobacco he manufactures. He is not a disloyal man. Cotton wool and raw cotton, $9,361,000. Are all our cotton manufacturers in Canada disloyal and tending to annexation, because they buy their raw cotton in the United States instead of going to India and Egypt and buying it from the cotton producers of the empire? I do not think they are disloyal, but, according to the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, they are. Copper, $2,300,000; wire, $1,250,000; gutta percha, $3,500,000; settlers' effects, $7,300,000. Are we disloyal because we allow settlers to come into the country? Is that tending to annexation in any way, shape or form? My hon. friend from Brandon, through the whole of his administration, exerted his splendid powers to bring all the immigrants into the country he possibly could, and he did not then at any rate believe it tended to annexation. No, Sir; annexation does not follow trade; loyalty does not depend on trade.

Look a little at England's trade. In the last six years she imported from us an average of £18,000,000 and exported to us an average of £15,000,000. As we are a part of the empire, her trade with us no doubt was loyal and anti-annexation, but what did she do with the United States? She imported from the United States £127,000,000, or nearly seven times as much as she did from us, and exported to the United States £47,000,000, or over three times as much as she exported to us. Again, take Germany. Great Britain imported from Germany £55,000,000, or three times what she did from us, and exported to Germany £50,000,000, or three and a quarter times as much as she did to us, Is there any danger that Great Britain is going to be annexed to Germany? Is there any danger that she is going to annex the United States because she trades with them? It is not any accusation of disloyalty against the British merchant and British shipper that he does this enormous trade with Germany and with the United States. Nor is it against us in Canada, equal citizens in the British Empire with the British shipper and merchant—citizens the same as the men of Wales, or Scotland, or Ireland, or England. It is an insult to the Canadian people to say that they will be influenced by the trade of the United States, when our fellow-citizens in the mother land trade with the United States to ten times the amount that we do, and yet are not disloyal and have no tendency to annexation.

My hon. friend says this is not a good enough arrangement for him. I can tell him that it is a good enough arrangement for the government of Canada. It is a good enough arrangement for the people of Canada. It is more than that. The government of the mother land have declared not only that Canada has the right to do this, but that she is wise to do it, and that if it is in her interest, as they seem to believe it is, the better it is for the interest of the whole empire. The government of the mother land represents the mother land. Some hon. gentlemen opposite may question that; some of their friends in England may question that, but I can only say that in the last few years the present government of England has three times appealed to the people of Great Britain and has been sustained by a large majority, and certainly represents the public opinion of the mother country.

I regret that this question has been dragged into the party politics of the mother land by the opposition there, because I think that each part of the empire ought to deal with its own fiscal and other questions on its own merits and in its own yay. I want to leave the people of Great Britain to decide what they will do with their tariff and their other fiscal arrangements as they see fit. I want Canada to do the same. That is the opinion of every man in public life in Canada to-day, and the man who undertook to deny it would go down and out of public life in a very short time. The same is true of Australia, and it is inimical to the best interests of the empire that the arrangements with regard to the domestic concerns of one part of the empire should be dragged into the party politics of another part of the empire.

Sir, I have detained the House at considerable length. I have been obliged, however, partly by the course of the debate, partly by the vast interests that are concerned, and partly by the very widespread effect which this arrangement is going to have on the destinies of the country. I agree that it is an important question. I want to say that it was approached on the part of the government with the utmost care and consideration, viewed from all sides and on all details. There is not one single item in the arrangement the effect of the introduction of which it was not considered with a judicial mind and with reference to all other cognate interests in the country, by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs. It was an international arrangement. As Sir Charles Tupper said in 1888, we may have had to make some concessions. We did make a few concessions. I confess that my only surprise is that we did not have to make many more to get the free entry of Canadian agricultural products into the great market to the south of us. The reasons, however, are obvious—I will not detain the House with them.

Sir, I appreciate that on a question of this kind it is quite within the judgment of any man to leave his party and divorce himself from his political friends. I believe this arrangement is in exact accord with the general policy of the Liberal party of Canada, that it is in full accord with the Liberal principles which have actuated us in our administration of the affairs of this country. I believe that this arrangement does not in any way materially hurt or injure any class or any industry in the country. I believe that it does give an enormous boon to the agricultural class of the country; and, as it helps them and gives them more markets and more riches, it will affect favourably every interest in Canada. I appreciate, Sir, that my hon. friend from Brandon does not view this arrangement in the same way. He has stated that in consequence of it he is obliged to cut himself off from his former colleagues and friends. Nobody regrets that more than I do. I had anticipated from him the ablest possible statement of the views of those who are opposed to this arrangement. I have no doubt that we heard that this afternoon. I know the hon. member for Brandon well enough to know that there is no man in the Conservative party who can put a case better, abler, more intelligently and more clearly. We have seen what he has done. I can only say that I do not agree with him that any of the arguments or any of the facts that he has put forward called upon him in any way to divorce himself from his former associates and from the party with which he has worked for many years. The thing that we are doing is not in any way antagonistic, but, on the contrary, falls in exactly with the principles in which he has been brought up and which he has followed for many years in his public life—the principles of Liberalism, the principles of freedom, the principles of seeing to the interests of the masses of the community, and at the same time trying, and I think succeeding, in doing no injury to any of the classes or interests in the country, and if the arguments which he has put forward, the details which he has given, have been sufficient to justify him in the course he has taken. I think they will not justify him in the eyes of the great mass of the people of the country, who do not see eye to eye with him and will not follow him in that course.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 10.43 p.m.

Mr FISHER.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ORDERS DISCHARGED.

Mr. MACDONELL. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that order No. 49, of Public Bills and Orders, for the second reading of Bill (No. 78) to amend the Railway Act, be now called, for the purpose of enabling me to move that it be discharged from the Order Paper, because it is quite obvious that an opportunity will not be afforded me to bring this Bill before the House as long as it remains on Public Bills and Orders, but in the event of the Minister of Railways bringing in an amendment to the Railway Act, I may have an opportunity in that way to bring the matter before the House.

Motion agreed to, and Order discharged accordingly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. On behalf of Mr. Beaubarlant, I beg to make the same motion with regard to Order No. 28, for the second reading of Bill (No. 12) to amend the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908.

Motion agreed to, and Order discharged accordingly.

Mr. MADDIN:

What amount of bonded freight was checked to, or delivered at, during the last ten years, each of the following ports in Guysborough county, N.S., Sonora, Port Hillford, Oyster Ponds and Country Harbour?

Mr. PATERSON. The Department of Customs has not any record of bonded freight checked to or delivered at the places mentioned. Sonora, Port Hillford, Oyster Ponds and Country Harbour are not points on which the manifesting of bonded goods is authorized.

So far, however, as the conditions governing the selection of non-commissioned officers and men are concerned, the following have been added to those already specified:

(a) The non-commissioned officers and men selected are to be chosen from the most efficient companies of infantry regiments, and each representative must be from a different company.

(b) No application from any one who has already taken part in former contingents on such great occasions as the jubilee of the late Queen Victoria, or the coronation of the late King will be considered.

(c) Preference is to be given to those who have served in the field.

THE PETAWAWA CAMP.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew):

1. What branches of the permanent forces and the active militia respectively, will encamp for training at the Petawawa Military Camp during coming season?

2. When will this camp open and what will be the duration of same?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1. Cavalry, artillery, engineers, infantry and departmental corps.

2. (a) The camp will, in all probability, open about the first week in June.

WEST INDIES STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. LEWIS:

1 Has the government renewed the contract with Pickford & Black for a fortnightly steamship service from St. John and Halifax to the West Indies?

2. If so, in granting such renewal and subsidy, have Canadian interests been protected and provision made that the mails, passengers and freight will be carried in Canadian bottoms?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Yes, subject to the concurrence of the British government.

2. The contractors are required to employ steamships of British register.

RECIPROCITY—PULP AND PAPER.

Mr. PERLEY:

Is the alteration in the pulp and paper schedule of the reciprocity arrangement, as passed by the United States House of Representatives, one that is permissible and satisfactory to the government under the tentative agreement made between the government of the United States and the government of Canada?

Mr. FIELDING:

The pulp and paper item in the schedule has not been altered by the Bill which has passed the House of Representatives. There was an obvious error in the drafting of the Bill as respects that item. The error has been corrected and the Bill as passed is in accord with the agreement in that behalf.

PAPERS ASKED FOR.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the orders of the day are called. I want to ask the attention of the Minister of Finance. The papers in respect to the Farmers' Bank have been brought down, and I supposed that the motion was broad enough to have covered another piece of information that I wanted to get, but it was not among the papers, and the Finance Minister may not have thought it necessary to include it. What I would like to have is a rescript of the meeting of the Treasury Board on the 30th of November, 1906, and the names of the components of the Treasury Board at that time—that is, the whole minutes.

Mr. FIELDING. I see no objection.

APPLAUSE IN THE GALLERIES.

Mr. J. D. REID. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the government to a letter in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of this morning, which reads as follows:

Editor Citizen.—I understand now that it is a rule of the House of Commons that strangers in the public gallery shall not signify their approval of the sentiments of a speaker on the floor. Yesterday I went up to hear Mr. Sifton on the reciprocity question. His observations appealed to me as a patriotic Canadian and I forcibly desired to manifest my appreciation and did so, although quite unaware at the time that I was infringing a House rule. For my action I was escorted from the gallery by the Sergeant-at-Arms and a Dominion policeman, an honour which I appreciated. My object in writing at this time is to invoke your good offices to secure the posting of notices prominently in the gallery warning those, who like myself up to yesterday, may not know about this rule that applause is forbidden.—PETER GLAVEY, 37½ York street.

I understand that this gentleman is a respectable citizen of Ottawa. There is nothing to show that the officials in charge in the galleries are different from any other persons, in the way of uniform or anything of that kind, and I think the government should take some steps to carry out the wishes of this gentleman so that there will not be such an occurrence again. I understand that this gentleman said that had the Sergeant at Arms, or any one else whom he knew to be an official, requested him not to do it, he would have obeyed their request. It is certainly to be regretted that a gentleman should be expelled from the House when he did not know the rules. Therefore I would ask the Prime Minister to see that in future any one in the galleries who happens to make a mistake of that kind should not be expelled, but requested to remain and hear the discussion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend knows that this is a matter which is not at all under the control of the government, but under the control of the Speaker and the officers of the House. But it is a well known rule that no expression of approbation or disapprobation in the gallery is allowed.

MANITOBA LEGISLATIVE BUILDING SITE.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia and of the government to a despatch in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of this morning. It has been reported that there have been some negotiations with reference to the government of Manitoba acquiring the land adjoining the legislative buildings, so that they might erect new buildings. The present buildings are somewhat out of date, and in order to get a proper site, the Manitoba government would like to acquire the land at present occupied by the old barracks. The despatch from Winnipeg is as follows:

Winnipeg, Man., March 1.—The proposal to secure the Fort Osborne barracks site, which adjoins the present parliament buildings, to permit of the building of a new legislative hall has been abandoned for the time.

Representations had been made to the Minister of Militia with a view to the government purchasing the property. Replies to this request were read in the House to-day by Hon. Robert Rogers, stating that the Dominion government asks $1,000,000 for the property and does not want to vacate until 1915. Mr. Rogers said that the price asked was four or five times the value of the site and that it was out of the question.

It seems to me that in these negotiations the Crown, as trustee in the right of the Dominion, is pinching the Crown as trustee for the province of Manitoba, and I am pleased to give the hon. minister an opportunity to remove any such impression, or to emphasize my impression of them that they will pinch everything in sight !

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The question is very easily answered. The Militia Department has its barracks and drill hall in Winnipeg situated on ground very near the parliament buildings. I understand that the government of Manitoba wish to extend their buildings as they find the present accommodation insufficient. A few weeks ago the Hon. Mr. Rogers, member of the Manitoba government, called to see me, and asked if we would be willing to sell our holdings so as to enable the government of Manitoba to make this extension. I replied that certainly we would be glad to do anything in our power to facilitate that extension, and that I would personally take the matter up. I asked him what price he would be willing to pay. He said he did not know, but the government of Manitoba would be willing to pay the value. I then sent an officer to inspect, as the case seemed to be urgent, and estimate the value. That officer returned about three weeks ago, and after consulting my colleagues in council I sent a communication to the government of Manitoba to the effect that we had had the property valued, and that the Dominion government would be prepared to accept a fair valuation, namely $1,000,000. It is only right, perhaps, that I should add, as a special answer to my hon. friend, who has intimated that there was some desire to pinch somebody, that our selling that property would necessitate a rebuilding of extensive barracks at or near Winnipeg, and also the purchase of land in Winnipeg, and the building of a new drill hall. All this would cost just about the amount of money that we ask for that property. The property is satisfactory to us to-day and we do not want to change it, but are willing to sell in order to suit the convenience of the Manitoba government.

EXCLUSION OF COLOURED ALIENS.

Mr. DANIEL. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) a moment to a representation I received from some coloured constituents of mine, inclosing a clipping from a newspaper which I had better read:

UNITED STATES NEGROES BARRED.

Winnipeg, Man., Feb. 24.—The Dominion government has decided to prohibit the immigration of negroes from the United States and stopped at the boundary a party that wanted to go to western Canada. The negroes were turned back because they were regarded as undesirable citizens.

I may say that my correspondents do not object to coloured people being turned back if turned back for other than racial considerations only, and my object in bringing this to the notice of the Minister of the Interior is to ascertain why these particular individuals were turned back—whether because of racial considerations, or because they were undesirable citizens for other reasons.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot, of course, give a specific answer because I have no knowledge of the case alluded to, and have not had the time or opportunity to acquaint myself with the facts, but I can assure my hon. friend that there are no instructions issued by the Immigration Branch of my department which will exclude any man on account of his race or colour except in such specific cases as are provided for by statute or agreement laid on the table.

Mr. DANIEL. Perhaps the hon. minister will find out the exact cause and give later a specific answer.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MONK. There are some delayed returns to which I would call the attention of the government. There was an order of the House on the 5th of December last for a statement of the expenditures made out of the money voted by parliament last year for the navy. I would like to have this as soon as possible. There was also an order of the House of the 7th of December for a copy of the report of the Imperial Defence Committee of the Privy Council in England concerning the defence of the empire. That has been communicated to the dependencies, and I would like to have it on the table here as soon as possible. There was further an order of the House on the 6th of February for a copy of the declaration of London, and of the proceedings of the International Naval Conference at London. Outside of these there were two orders of the 23rd of January for documents and data connected with the concession of the Beauharnois canal. I would like to have these as soon as possible.

THE RECIPROCITY AGREEMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Finance Minister to the message sent by President Taft in reply to a request from the Senate, in which statistics are given as to the different items affected by the schedule in the agreement now under discussion. These statistics include the prices of various commodities such as beef, pork, butter, &c., in Canada and the United States for a series of years, and especially for the last year. In reply to the request the President sent down a list which gave the exact information required by the Senate. During this discussion each one of us has had his own trouble in finding out what the prices were in the two countries. I would like to ask the hon. minister if he has prepared, as no doubt he has, this statistical data, especially as regards the prices in the two countries, and if he will lay the information on the table. It is absolutely important that we should have it if we are to properly understand what we are doing, and I do not see why this House should not have it as well as the United States Senate and Congress.

Mr. FIELDING. I understand the hon. gentleman refers to some statistics moved for in the United States Congress and in due course brought down. Of course we have no access to these any more than my hon. friend has himself. I presume they are now United States official documents which in due course will reach us, but we have no information in reference to them more than he has, that is what is in the public press. As to any such comparison on this side, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) gave extended comparisons and was willing to give more but objection was taken. I presume we could still have them.

Mr. FOSTER. What I want is not what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) or any other minister collates, but the absolute certainty which was used by the government in the negotiations and which we ought to have in order to form our opinions properly with reference to the measure.

Mr. FIELDING. Of course we had to use our own sources of information and hon. gentlemen who criticise the agreement will have to do likewise. We will be happy to give the hon. gentleman any documents. The particular class of information he desires was spoken of by the Minister of Agriculture, a member of the government and he desired to put it on 'Hansard', but objection was taken, otherwise it would be now in the possession of my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not seem that that answers my question. There are certain rules of debate, one is that we cannot hand in a statement and have it published without reading it, but surely the government itself ought to lay on the table of the House for the information of all members of the House these statistics to aid towards forming a good judgment. For instance what are the prices of pork, wheat and these other commodities in these other countries? On that depends the argument pro or con, and as it is we have simply been bandying statements one with the other. In the United States the government brings down authentic data.

Mr. FIELDING. There is a generally understood rule that one cannot put on 'Hansard' anything that is not read, but that rule is violated frequently and by no one more frequently than the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who very frequently asks that some statement he has in his hand should be included in 'Hansard'; and I do not think objection has ever been taken, so that rule should hardly have been cited to prevent the Minister of Agriculture from giving information.

Mr. FOSTER. Since the minister has brought that up I challenge him—

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid I cannot allow a discussion at this point. Perhaps in going into Supply—

Mr. FOSTER. Then may I correct a statement by the minister? He says I have frequently asked to have statements which I have not read inserted in 'Hansard'. I deny that and I challenge proof.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think the matter of sufficient importance to either my hon. friend or myself that we should worry about it, but I am speaking from memory. I have read statements partly in the House and by common consent had them placed in 'Hansard' and my recollection is that the hon. gentleman has done likewise. If he says not I leave the House to consider it and I shall not trouble to hunt through 'Hansard'.

Mr. FOSTER. But will you bring down the statement?

Mr. FIELDING. The Minister of Agriculture, now that it has been desired, will give that valuable information which he tried to give the other night but was prevented.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the Prime Minister propose to go on with the debate on the reciprocity proposal to-morrow or to go into Supply?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will take Supply to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—VENTILATION OF GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. J. B. BLACK (Hants). Before going into committee, I wish to speak on a subject of great importance, the sanitary condition of this chamber, of the rooms provided for the members of this House and the rooms that are provided for the different departmental offices. This is an old subject I know, it has been brought up in this House every session since I have been here and very little has been done in the way of improvement. I notice that there is more air coming into this House—I do not mean hot air, but there is more cold air coming into this House than there was four or five years ago, but we are far from proper conditions, and from the conditions to which we are entitled. We are obliged to sit in this room from 3 o'clock till 6 and again from 8 o'clock to anywhere towards morning. Before sitting in this room most of us go into committee rooms which are worse than this room. We sit for ten or twelve hours a day in rooms in which there is not sufficient fresh air to keep a man in good health. This room has never had a ray of sunlight cast into it since it was built in 1867, I presume for the stained glass was there then and is there now. Any one who has studied the necessity of sunlight to human health must know that we are suffering from this room not being purified by sunlight. Sunlight is the great microbe killer, microbes have been gathering in this room ever since confederation and no sunlight has ever come in to purify it. I am not joking, this is far too serious a matter for any of us to joke about. Younger men may stand this, but the older members will agree with me in saying that they never go home in as good health as they come up here in the autumn. I hate to allude to a personal matter but for myself I break down before the term is over every session. I do not know that the sunlight can be properly let into this room but if it cannot let us get a room somewhere else where it can. A man may have to sacrifice his business, sacrifice his financial affairs for the service to his country, but the day of human sacrifice has gone long ago and I do not think we should sacrifice our lives or our health for the benefit of our country. For one I am not prepared to do it if it can be avoided.

The committee rooms in which we are obliged to work are in a far worse condition than this room. If any one will go say 25 minutes late into the committee rooms, No. 30, No. 32, and No. 34 and pause a moment at the door, he will find that the condition of the air can only be expressed by one word—and I do not wish to use slang—that is the word rotten. In 20 minutes those rooms are foul, too foul for men to remain in and yet we have to remain there a couple of hours. There is no system of proper ventilation. In the addition built to this building and occupied in the autumn of 1908, we had some hope that some modern sanitary engineer would have had some supervision in the matter of providing fresh air for the members there, but the provision in those rooms is worse than in the older rooms, there is no provision at all. There is more attention paid to fresh air in the wigwam of a wild indian than there is in any of these rooms. I do my work in No. 76, which is a fair sample of other rooms. When I arrived in it in autumn of 1908 it had a double window, and the fanlight over the door was closed up, closed forever, I suppose. The room was hermetically sealed, and four men were expected to breath that air over and over again for hours in the day, and in the night. Any member who has gone to the different departments, as most of us on this side of the House are forced to do that disagreable work, must have noticed that there is no improvement there either. Now these are very serious matters affecting our health, and though we talk of them year after year, nothing is done. I would respectfully suggest to the government that these buildings be put under the supervision and care of a sanitary engineer, who shall make the necessary changes, and put the buildings in a first-class condition, such as is required by the up to date knowledge of the laws of health. It may cost a little money, but there is no reason why it should not be done.

Another fault I have to find is that this House in all parts of it is overheated, fuel is wasted to the detriment of our health. There is no thermometer in any room I know of occupied by a member of the House; if other hon. gentlemen have one in their room, they have the advantage over me and those who occupy the same room with me. There should be a thermometer in every room, and proper ventilation should be established. In asking for these things I do not think we are asking for more than we are entitled to.

Now, while I am on my feet, I wish to say a few words about the typhoid epidemic in Ottawa, and about what I consider is the duty of the government in respect thereto. The government, I think, is the largest purchaser of drinking water in the city of Ottawa. I have been given to understand that there are between 3,000 and 4,000 people living in Ottawa who are employed by the government in its various services; no doubt, including the members of parliament and the civil service, there must be as many as 4,000; but I speak subject to correction. I say that these people should have a supply of wholesome water. We are now drinking boiled water in some of the departments. There is no reason why this government, interested as it is in the water supply of Ottawa, should not demand that a supply of pure drinking water be furnished to all connected with the government. There is another reason why the government should interfere in connection with this typhoid epidemic, and that is because the city council of Ottawa has established beyond doubt its incapacity to cope with this matter. For two years and more, and I lay stress on the 'more,' the water of Ottawa has been contaminated. Sample after sample has been tested and has been found to contain typhoid baccilli. If there were any doubt where the contamination originated, if there were any doubt that there is poison in the water, it would be another question. But we know two things for certain: First, that the people of Ottawa are being poisoned, secondly, we know where the poison comes from. Now what has been done to stop the source of supply of this poison? A scientific man comes along any says: If you will take water from some other place where the water is still, the poison will settle down at the bottom and you won't get much of it. Another says: If you put hypochloride of lime in the water it will kill many of these poisonous germs. That is what I call tinkering with a very serious matter. If it were a matter that merely affected our convenience or our comfort, it would be far less serious, but this is a matter that affects our health and our lives. I maintain that the city council of Ottawa have failed for two years or more to take any steps to prevent the poisoning of the people. As I have said, the government is one of the largest purchasers of drinking water, and contributes a large amount of money to pay for it, therefore I contend that the government are justified in taking a hand in this matter and seeing that we are supplied with pure water.

There is another thing I want to mention besides the water, and that is the ice that is supplied us. I have been assured in our dining-room upstairs that the water has been boiled while the waiter puts ice in the water, which of course has not been boiled. But the health officer comforts us with the assurance which I have seen in a paper, and I was astonished to read it, that this ice is perfectly pure, and that we may safely put it in our drinking water. Now I would be loath to set up my opinion against that of the medical health officer of Ottawa, or the health officer for the province of Ontario, or any other gentleman who is a specialist in that matter, though I have given some years of time and some study to the question of public health and sanitation. On this subject of the pollution of ice, I have in my hand one of the best authors on sanitation in the world, Sedgwick, from whom I ask permission to quote a few words:

THE POLLUTION OF ICE.

The processes of harvesting natural ice, and of delivering it to the consumer, still leave much to be desired. The use of horses whose droppings fall on the ice during the 'ploughing' or cutting of the ice-fields; the un-cleanly habits of the workmen employed; the floating of the blocks through less pure, or actually polluted water, on their way to the ice-houses; their storage, often in a packing of old and dirty hay or sawdust; and their final deliverey into family, club or hotel refrigerators by common workmen after only hasty brushing with some ancient cloth or broom,—these conditions illustrate the need of improvement.

There are a great many reasons why ice taken from Nepean bay is not fit for use. In the first place, Nepean bay is the spot where it is estimated most of the poison lies. Water, in freezing, of course, precipitates a large percentage of the bacilli. The ice is purer than the water but under certain conditions the bacilli cannot all be removed by the freezing process. For instance, we will take Nepean bay——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

An hon. MEMBER. Do not mind them.

Mr. BLACK. I am not minding them; I notice that some of them know more about whisky than they do about water. In the process of freezing a large percentage of the bacilli is precipitated. It was at Cave creek at Mechanicsville that some of the water flowed over the ice from Mechanicsville, and in that way the ice was contaminated. As a result of raising the water by stop logs the water overflowed the ice, then it froze on the ice and there was no possible way that there could be any bacilli precipitated at all, but it froze in and on the ice. Over this ice horses are travelling hauling logs, and men are working. I believe the government is storing some of this ice down at government house and next winter when we go down there to dine with the Duke of Connaught, we will be asked to drink water chilled with Nepean bay impure ice.

There seems to be one short piece of cure-all advice given to the people—boil the water. I have read these three words in every town in which there has been typhoid. Many people have taken typhoid by following that rule—boil the water. Boil the water you drink! I say boil the water you drink, boil the water you clean your teeth with, be sure to have the water boiled that the dishes are washed in, and boil the milk pitcher every time. I suppose there are many people in Ottawa who have been following that short direction to boil the water that they are drinking and neglecting to boil it for anything else. The consequence is that some of them have taken typhoid out of their porridge plate which has never been washed in boiled water.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. BLACK. Yes, it will be carried in time. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are not only guilty of standing idly by and not preventing our own water from being poisoned, but we are sending the poison down to our neighbours. Ottawa is polluting the drinking water of Rockland, while Aylmer and Mechanicsville are polluting the water that we drink. It is time that some intelligent process was adopted to stop the drinking of poisoned water. Science shows where it has been done and is being done, but the process of dumping sewage into our drinking water is too barbarous for intelligent people to put up with. Ottawa is one of the most beautiful cities in Canada, and you will pardon me if I say one of the most unhealthy cities.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. BLACK. That gentleman that drinks whisky still wants it carried. The government is contributing a large amount of money every year to beautify the city, and is beautifying it. Now, I think that in the ordinary way of common sense the government should contribute to the health of the city. I have some figures here which will probably astonish some of us. In the city of Ottawa there were born last year, to the 31st October, 1910, 2,100 children. Ninety per cent of those should have lived. Of those born 626 died, or nearly 32 per cent of all the children born in Ottawa up to that date died. This is the highest rate of mortality among infants in any city in the world where statistics are kept. So much for the conditions.

Now, I would beg leave respectfully to make another suggestion; that is that the government which contributes so much to the city of Ottawa, should appoint either a properly qualified officer of public health, or a commission, to assist the city of Ottawa in providing proper water for its citizens. If the city refuses such assistance withdraw the amount which is being paid to it for the beautifying of Ottawa. That is conservation, I think, of a most important type —the conservation of the lives and health of our people.

Before I sit down I want to say one thing more. I want to say that if the government had done what I think they should have done they would have formed a bureau of public health some years ago whose duty it would have been to have enlightened the people in such a way that they would avoid all these useless and needless epidemics. It is either ignorance or carelessness—usually both—that allows such epidemics to begin. If our people were properly educated, if the council of Ottawa, or the council of Montreal had had sufficient education with regard to the laws of health and in the proper way of preventing epidemics in their cities we would not have 1,400 cases of typhoid in the city of Ottawa to-day. I am told by a citizen who knows that there are at least that many in the town although there are only 800 or 900 cases reported. Of course we may be told, as I have been told, that public health belongs to the provinces, that we should not interfere, and that there are grave difficulties in the way. I know there are difficulties in the way of every reform, and I know there are lions in the way in every path we do not wish to follow, and the sons of Anak live in every country we do not want to go into. But if we consider it the duty of the government to conserve the health of the people as well as to conserve the resources of our forests and our water-powers these difficulties will be swept aside and there will be spread among the people knowledge of how to live and how to do away with the useless and sad amount of sickness there is in Canada. We have medical officials enough under the government; you run across them in nearly every department. There is one in the Department of Agriculture, one in the Immigration Department, one in the Marine Department, one in the Railway Department and probably others.

Mr. TALBOT. One in the Militia Department.

Mr. BLACK. There are several in the Militia Department ; they are as thick as bees there. I believe that all these scattered forces should be brought together, and a central bureau of public health established, which, if it distributed literature bearing on the subject would result in great benefit to the people at large. I repeat that there should be a sanitary engineer to take charge of the sanitary condition of these buildings, and, I believe that the government should assist in measures to put down this epidemic of typhoid and to prevent its ever recurring in Ottawa.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Black) has pointed out that the committee rooms are in a very unsanitary condition, and that has been known to us for years past. But, something might be done by the members themselves to improve the conditions. I have often experienced a good deal of discomfort as others have, I have no doubt, because of the unfortunate habit which many members have of smoking in the room. To begin with the ventilation is not good, and before you are long in the room it is much like a place where they smoke meat. This habit is not businesslike, it is not courteous to others, and it does not contribute to health. It seems to me that some one who is responsible for it should have an understanding that smoking would be stopped in the committee rooms in future. As to the water supply, it seems to me that in view of the large sum of money the government is paying for water supplied to the government buildings we should at least have some better method of determining what kind of water we are drinking. The government have their own chemists, analysts and bacteriologists, and why do they not from time to time have the water tested? The government might even go further, and, adopting the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Black) join with the health authorities of the city in ascertaining the source of pollution and adopting means to secure pure water. I do not think the government will be doing its full duty unless it does that.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I have no doubt that the House and the citizens of Ottawa will appreciate the action of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black) in bringing this matter to our attention. His remarks will no doubt be published, and I trust they will receive careful consideration from the municipal authorities. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is disposed to think that the government has omitted to do its duty but I do not think we can do more than we have done. At the request of my department the water has been analyzed by experts.

Mr. SPROULE. How often?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Often enough to know that it is of a very suspicious character, and that it contains matter which is likely to be detrimental to the public health. The evidence we have is sufficient to satisfy us that no man, woman or child is safe in drinking the crude water from the Ottawa river, and that the only safe thing is to have it boiled or sterilized. We are furnishing sterilized water for the members of this House and the employees in this building. I have given directions to have that water analyzed from week to week, and the report we have is that the bacilli have been destroyed and that it is safe to drink it. But no water from the river Ottawa can safely be drunk unless it is either boiled or sterilized. My hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Black) has said that water cannot be made safe by boiling it.

Mr. BLACK. I beg your pardon, I did not say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I misunderstood my honourable friend, the late Dr. Bayard, one of the most eminent physicians in Canada, who resided in St. John, was of the opinion that water otherwise unsafe would be rendered safe by boiling, and he made it a practice to boil the water he used and to advise his patients to do likewise. I should think that the only thing for the city of Ottawa to do is to obtain its water supply from a different source, and the only safe source I would suppose would be found in the mountainous district in the vicinity of the Gatineau. I am told there are opportunities there for obtaining an abundant supply of the purest water. Speaking for my department as representing the government, and having charge of this matter, I would be most happy to co-operate in any way possible in inducing the authorities of the city of Ottawa to proceed towards obtaining a supply from that source. The only thing that we can do is to agree on the amount that we would pay for an annual supply. It is our duty to obtain a safe supply for the members of parliament and the employees of the government, and the only way to obtain it is to have the water brought from a different source. I trust that the council of the city of Ottawa will move along in the direction which I am told they are contemplating, and will soon take steps to obtain a supply from that source.

With regard to the ventilation of this chamber, I want to express my disagreement entirely with the statement of my hon. friend from Hants. I think this chamber is well ventilated when the fans are being operated. There are sometimes hundreds of people sitting on this floor and in the gallery, and my experience of other rooms which have been filled with people compared with this chamber is that the atmosphere here is very good. With regard to the committee rooms, there is no doubt that if a modern system of ventilation had been installed when the building was erected it would have been better. It is difficult, after a building has been constructed, to install a proper system of ventilation. I have asked the chief architect to do everything possible to improve the ventilation, and I will make it my business to convey to him the suggestions of my hon. friend, which I believe are valuable.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask why there was no attempt made to ventilate the new building that was finished in 1908?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that the new building, with the exception of finishing the interior, was built before I became minister. I had nothing to do with the plans for it, and, therefore, at this moment I do not know why it was that the chief architect did not design a modern system of ventilation for those rooms.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I am very much in sympathy with the remarks made by the hon. member for Hants. I understood him to say that the water which the members and employees in this building have been drinking has been made as pure as it can possibly be made, but I would like to ask the minister whether it is true, as reported, that in all the departments of this government the employees are compelled to drink the ordinary tap water. If that is the case, I think it is high time, under the conditions at present existing in Ottawa, that the government took some steps towards remedying that state of things.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that the matter of taking care of the departmental buildings does not rest with my department, but with the Department of Finance, which, under a curious rule, which has been in existence, I suppose, ever since confederation, employs the charwomen who look after the departmental buildings. Some time ago I gave directions that the water to be supplied should be sterilized, and asked my deputy minister to have a conference with the Deputy Minister of Finance on the subject. I will inquire whether the necessary steps have been taken to furnish sterilized water in the different departmental buildings.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland). Mr. Speaker, I am free to say that I rise with considerable diffidence to address this committee on the very important question which is before us for consideration. I feel somewhat diffident, in the first place, by reason of the fact that what I propose to do in connection with this resolution is at variance with the views of those people with whom I have always been associated politically, and, in the second place, I feel that it is impossible for me to approach, much less reach, that high standard of oratory and argument which was set by the member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), who spoke on this question on Tuesday last. But, Sir, notwithstanding that I feel my inability to discuss this matter with the clearness that I would like, I feel it my duty to my constituents, to the party to which I have always belonged, and to myself, to give my reasons for the course which I propose to pursue. I apprehend that it will be generally conceded that I have always been a pretty strong party supporter. I might say that politically I was cradled in the lap of Liberalism and nursed on the essence of the 'Globe' newspaper, and it is rather difficult to get away from the influences of those infantile exercises; but, Sir, it appears to me that this is a question of sufficient importance to make every man in this country stop and consider carefully not only his position politically, but what he should do in the best interest of the country at large, and that, Sir, is my position to-day. I am in rather a peculiar position on this question. I first contested the county of Welland in the interest of the Liberal party for the Dominion parliament in 1891, and as I was elected by a majority of about 500 against one of the strongest men at that time in the Conservative party, the late Dr. John Ferguson, and was elected on the issue of reciprocal trade with the United States as against the National Policy of the Conservative party, it may be asked why change now? I hope to prove that I am not changing from my position as a supporter of the principles of the Liberal party. In 1891 the policy of the Liberal party was strongly for reciprocity; it was unrestricted reciprocity—commercial union—and why? I am free to say that I did not altogether like the proposition, but it was the party policy; I was the candidate of the party, and I argued as well as I could in favour of that policy. But conditions were different then from what they are to-day. At that time business was depressed and everything was stagnant. When the National Policy was inaugurated the cry was sent out that it would be the cause of the erection of tall chimneys and big smoke stacks throughout the land. That was the cry in the county of Welland, which I have had the honour of representing in the local legislature and this House during the last 20 years. That was the cry of Dr. Ferguson and of his predecessor, the late Christopher Bunting, but after 13 or 14 years' experience of that policy, we had no smokestacks, no chimneys, no factories in Welland county, and no home market.

Mr. PATERSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN. And the farmers at that time in that county, Conservatives though they were, were willing to adopt almost any panacea for the evils which then existed, and they approved and supported the then policy of the Liberal party, namely, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Well, the Liberal party did not succeed in that election. In 1896, however, they did succeed, but not on that cry of unrestricted reciprocity. That policy was considerably modified. I was interested on Tuesday night to hear the hon. Minister of Agriculture say that personally he was pleased that the Liberal party had not succeeded in 1891. Why he did not feel any degree of satisfaction at the defeat of the Liberal party in 1891 must have been due to the fact that he disapproved entirely of the policy which that party then advocated. Otherwise there could be no reason for his satisfaction at its defeat. I presume he felt that if his party had succeeded in 1891, it would have been forced to endeavour at any rate to put on our statutes a law which would bring about unrestricted reciprocity, and he did not like to go that far. Nor do I believe that, down in their hearts, the Liberals at that time throughout Canada really wanted to go that far.

Mr. GERMAN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN. In 1896 the Liberal party did succeed, but happily in that year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) went throughout the length and breadth of the country gathering information and ascertaining the ideas of the business people and of the farmers as to what should be the correct policy to adopt as the fiscal policy of Canada. Having gathered that information intelligently, thoroughly and exhaustively, the Minister of Finance made his budget speech in 1897, and in that speech declared for moderate protection and a stable tariff. After having listened to all the delegations and deputations that desired to be heard, the government came to parliament and said: We will stand by—if not the National Policy as then existing—at any rate a modified form of the National Policy—and very little modified at that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN. I am here to say that I do not agree altogether with my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) in all his remarks, nor do I agree with the gentleman who preceded me in this debate, in opposition to the resolution, in all they have said. There is one suggestion to which I take particular exception, and that is the suggestion that reciprocity will bring about annexation. I do not believe that, should this agreement come into force, it will either lead to the annexation of Canada to the United States or create any very great sentiment in Canada in that direction. I am a British subject, but I am dealing constantly with United States citizens, as is nearly every other Canadian. These dealings, however, have never led me to wish to see our country annexed to the United States, and I do not think that I or anybody else has the right to impugn the motives of his fellow-citizens or to say that because they have dealings with our neighbours across the line that will change their hearts and alter their allegiance to the British Empire. I believe that loyalty is founded on something more substantial than commercialism and more enduring than dollars and cents. But having said that, I think I have said about all that can give any consolation to my hon. friends around me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN. As I have said, the Liberal party, in the first budget speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), adopted and approved of certainly the policy of protecting our industries. I do not think that the Finance Minister will deny that. Why, I have heard my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) saying to the Conservatives, in those dulcet tones in which he is accustomed to address the public: Why, you say that we have adopted your policy, but even admitting that we did, we have been able to administer that policy for the benefit of the country, which you were unable to do. That was his plea, and I rather cheered my hon. friend when making it, and I think that the Liberals are entitled to take credit for having administered the fiscal policy of this country in such a way as to create the great prosperity we have had in the last fourteen years. What do we find? We find that in 1898 the Finance Minister followed up his statement of 1897 and in 1899 he reiterated it that the policy for Canada must be a protective policy and a stable tariff. He made that emphatic and strong, and I believe, Sir, that it was the very fact that the business people of this country found by reason of the statements of the Finance Minister that the Liberal party as well as the Conservative party in this country stood by a fair moderate protective tariff and a stability of tariff that brought about the business conditions we have had here lately. Now, Sir, we find that in 1899 the Prime Minister made a statement in this House after the reciprocal negotiations had been gone on with at Washington, the Liberal party having carried out the pledge which they had made, and I believe honestly endeavoured to secure reciprocal trade with the United States. They were given the cold shoulder, they were turned from the doors of the administration building in Washington, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated in 1899:

> If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians would have given many things to obtain the American market, there was a time not long ago, when the market of the great cities of the Union was the only market we had for any of our products. But thank Heaven, these days are past and over now. We are not dependent upon the American market as we were at one time.

I approved of those sentiments, and I will state to the right hon. the Prime Minister that in my opinion the hearts of Liberals throughout the Dominion of Canada throbbed with pride and beat high with expectant hope that from thence on and forever, our leaders were to be free from all entanglements with the United States. That was emphasized by the Prime Minister at the manufacturers banquet in Montreal in November, 1901. As reported in the Montreal 'Gazette' he stated that he would send no more reciprocity delegations to Washington. He said : It is possible they may come to us, if they do, we will teach them the lesson they have taught us, and we shall treat them with all politeness. Sir, I know the right hon. gentleman would treat them with all politeness, but has he taught them the lesson they taught us, namely that they wanted no reciprocal trade relations with them at the present time.

It is said, and some of my friends have told me, that I am deserting my party. Well, Sir, what is a political party? It is an aggregation of men in this country who unite on some principle which they wish to see embodied in law and which they believe will be to the best interests and the best welfare of Canada. That is the policy of the party as enunciated in 1899 and in 1901. In 1900 I resigned my seat in the local legislature at Toronto which I had held for six years, representing the county of Welland, to contest the county of Welland, and to contest it on what? Not Sir, on any reciprocal arrangement with the United States, but on the policy as laid down by the Prime Minister that there were to be no more negotiations with Washington. I so informed the people, and I further informed them that I was delighted to stand before them and say that the Liberal view was to look to the British Empire for our inspiration, and not to look to Washington, that we had made an honest effort to secure reciprocity, but that the United States government refused to consider our proposition, and that the Prime Minister and his government had decided finally to abandon all thought of such an arrangement, and to build up a nation on the northern half of this continent, under the aegis of the British flag, with British institutions and with British aspirations, looking to our own home market, Great Britain herself, as the place to which we should send our surplus supplies. Then in 1904, I contested the county of Welland again; not a word of reciprocity. In 1908, the last election, I contested the county again; not a word of reciprocity. It was never mentioned, nobody thought about it, and, what is more, nobody wanted it. Sir, we were progressing with such rapidity, the staple policy which had been introduced and which had been adhered to, was bringing millions of dollars of capital to our shores to build up manufacturing industries in our land. In the county which I have the honour to represent, millions of dollars of United States capital have been expended in building manufactories. The people of the United States, the manufacturers of the United States knew full well that both parties in Canada being then opposed to reciprocity and in favour of a protective policy it was impossible for them to get the advantage of the great market which was being built up in this country, and to sell their goods to the vast number of people who were coming here to consume their goods unless they built their factories on Canadian territory, and they have begun to do that. With what result, Sir? With the result that the tall chimneys we used to hear of have been erected, seven or eight million dollars have been expended in the county of Welland in building factories employing thousands of men, a home market has been created, a home market right in my own town of Welland, which is practically as good to the farmers of that county as the market of the city of Buffalo. Poultry, eggs, butter, and nearly everything that the farmer has to sell he can sell on the markets of Welland, St. Catharines, and Niagara Falls, at a price nearly equal to what he can get in Buffalo.

Mr. LANCASTER. Sometimes better.

Mr. GERMAN. And sometimes better. I might say this further. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) took two hours on Tuesday to prove to this House and to the country that the Conservative party as well as the Liberal party at one time had endeavoured to secure reciprocity with the United States. He could have told it in one sentence just as emphatically and to just as good advantage as he told it in two hours; because, Sir, everybody knows it, the Conservatives admit it, the Liberals know it. Every one at that time thought that reciprocity between Canada and the United States, in natural products at least, would be a benefit to Canada. But in those days, 40 years ago, Canada was in swaddling clothes; in those days we thought that, like the infant, perhaps we needed a nursing bottle, and a reciprocity treaty with the United States might be the bottle. But that day has long gone by. We have reached in Canada to-day a condition of national manhood; we are to-day in a position to attract the attention of the nations of the earth; we are building up in our own land a great transportation system, we are building up in our own land a great home market, we are building up in our own land large manufacturing establishments to supply, not only our own people, but the people of foreign lands; and I for one, Sir, will not be a party to jeopardizing, much less destroying, that beneficial condition.

Now let us look at the value of farm lands. In 20 years—and I can speak of my own country with knowledge, because I have lived there all the time, and I have had to do with the farmers intimately—in 20 years farm lands in that country have increased in value from 50 to 60 and 70 per cent. Why? Simply because we have built up this great home market. The farmers can dispose of their products practically at their own doors, selling their goods to fellow Canadians, and spending their money among the merchants of Canada in purchasing the supplies they require. Now, Sir, with all this prosperity, everything going smooth, nobody asking for reciprocity, nobody thinking about it, nobody wanting it, with the sky as clear as the noonday sun, we get this thunderbolt; we get an agreement, I say it advisedly, sprung upon this party without consultation, and on the country without inquiry. When they say, as I know most of them do, that I am leaving my party, then I say that I am standing by the principles of the party, and it is the leaders who are deserting those principles. Now, I think that the Prime Minister should have said to the Washington representatives, treating them with that politeness which he said at the manufacturers' meeting he would use towards them, I think he should have used towards them the words that he used to the fruit growers of this country: You are too late. It seems to me those words would have been more applicable to the United States representatives than they were to the fruit growers of this country.

Now the Minister of Agriculture said the other night that they had a mandate from the people of this country to enter into this agreement. He rather argued that even if they did not have a mandate, it was not necessary to have one, because, foresooth, they had inaugurated the British preference without any mandate from the people. He prided himself on the fact that the suggestion for a preference towards Great Britain was kept absolutely secret within the bosom of all the ministers, no word or whisper of this preference was allowed to leak outside the doors of the council chamber. Well, Sir, I differ with the Minister of Agriculture; I think this government did have a mandate from the people of Canada to inaugurate the British preference. They had this mandate, that they were to revise the Canadian tariff as it then existed. The people of Canada, whether wisely or unwisely, did decide that the Canadian tariff as it then existed, and had existed for 13 years, should be revised. The government did revise it, and they revised it, as regards goods coming from Great Britain, by reducing the tariff on those goods to a lower rate than the goods coming from all other countries, and it seems to me that to that extent they did have a mandate from the people of Canada to revise the tariff. But, Sir, have they had any on this occasion? Surely not. In every election we have had since 1900 there has been no word of reciprocity. As I have already said, no man thought of it, no man wanted it, yet even without a mandate, the government took this step. But supposing they had decided to do it without asking the people for their opinion, surely they might have followed the precedent which they set themselves in 1906, and have gone about the country inquiring of the business men how this agreement would affect them. Surely that would have been the part of wisdom on the part of the Finance Minister and his colleagues. The Finance Minister is a gentleman whom I most highly respect, a gentleman I believe who has attained to a greater grasp of the finances of this country, a greater grasp on the confidence of the business men of this country, than any other Finance Minister since confederation. I have admired him exceedingly. But, Sir, I believe he blundered on this occasion. I think he should have ascertained from the business men of the country how they were likely to be affected by this proposition, whether it would be a good thing for them, he should have ascertained from the farmers to what extent they desired this reciprocity before entering into negotiations. But no, these gentlemen go down to Washington, they enter into this agreement, they come back here and they say to the supporters of the party in this House: That is the agreement we have entered into, we want you to support it, and you must support it, or you are not a good party man. Well, Sir, I regret exceedingly that I am in the category of those who are not good party men, but unfortunately I am built that way. If by doing in this matter what I believe to be absolutely right, what I believe the majority of the people of this country believe to be right, takes me out of the category of good party men, then I am not a good party man.

Mr. FOWKE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. German) if he would not kindly address himself to the question as to how the business interests of Canada will be adversely affected by this proposed arrangement.

Mr. GERMAN. Without the suggestion of my hon. friend from Ontario I was just about to tell him what I thought about that question as I have just reached that particular phase of the discussion. Before I proceed with that, however, I wish to say this further. What was the necessity for the great haste in entering into this agreement? The people of the United States had only lately decided that their tariff on goods coming into their country must be reduced. President Taft has told us that this arrangement will reduce the cost of living in the United States and that is his object in entering into it. Could we not well have waited to see what the congress of the United States would do with regard to this matter and if they would not take the duties off our farm produce? It is quite possible that they would have gone as far as this agreement goes and we could and would have got all the benefits and advantages it would give us in so far as our market in the United States is concerned without disturbing our own tariff or our own fiscal arrangements at all. It seems to me that it would have been the part of wisdom to have waited, and I think it is the part of wisdom now to wait and see what the United States Congress will do. We will cut a small figure in this country if we rush this proposition through parliament, bind ourselves to it and then find that the extra session of Congress in the United States turns it down. Why can we not wait? We do not need this thing particularly at the present time. There is no reason why we should not wait until another session. If the United States Congress turns this down and refuses to pass it, as I firmly believe it will, then the matter is ended. Of course, hon. gentlemen may say: Well, if it refuses to pass it then it does no harm; it need not go into force. But, it is on our statute-book and unless repealed it stands there as an offer to the United States at any time in the future that they see fit to pass an Act, no matter what the conditions may be in Canada or how seriously such a thing might affect us. If we pass it and they refuse to carry it out in the United States then we must repeal it or we will be at that serious disadvantage.

My hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Fowke) asked me to direct my remarks to the business interests of this country. I might direct him as to that matter to the leading business men of Canada who speak in volume considerably louder and more emphatically than I can, but when we find almost nine-tenths of the leading business men of this country opposed to this proposition where is the man who can stand up frankly and say he believes it will be a good thing for Canada? I cannot for one.

Mr TALBOT. What about the farmers?

Mr. GERMAN. It has been said—it was said in the 'Gazette' of this morning—that I was to speak to-day from the fruit-growers' standpoint and that I will 'oppose the Fielding instrument which draws a knife across the throat of a thriving native industry.' I do not wish to sail under false colours and I do not wish to be misunderstood. The county of Welland is not what you would call a fruit growing county. There are two townships in the county—Stamford and Pelham—which grow considerable quantities of fruit, but the fruit growers in these two townships are nearly all staunch Liberals and I fancy that they are in favour of this proposition. They grow nothing like the fruit that is grown in the counties of Lincoln and Wentworth, but they grow considerable quantities of fruit, and I know that many of the fruit growers in these two townships are in favour of this proposition. Speaking for myself, from what I know about their business, I cannot see how the fruit growers can be injuriously affected. I cannot really see, but I am willing to allow the fruit growers to have their opinion about that and to concede that their opinion of the matter is better than mine, and I am convinced that it is equally as good if not better than the opinion of the gentlemen who negotiated this treaty. I think that before an agreement of this kind is entered into and before this agreement passes this parliament their views should be carefully considered as well as the views of all the other producers throughout the Dominion of Canada who are likely to be affected. I think that their views should be given all due careful weight and consideration. But no, the Prime Minister tells them that they are too late, that their views cannot be considered now, no matter how seriously this arrangement may affect them; whatever my views on the matter may be they count for nothing, whatever views they may have on the matter count for nothing; however seriously affected they may be they are too late, they cannot enter now, nothing can be done for them, they must stand the loss however serious it may be. I do not think that is the proper system or principle to adopt. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton), the other day, told us all about how it would affect the meat and packing business. I know that the leading men engaged in that business say that it will absolutely put them out of business. I do not know and the Minister of Finance does not know. He said to them the other day after he had heard them: Oh, at every change in the tariff there are certain industries which come here and say that they are going to be seriously affected, but I notice that they continue cutting off coupons. I am not sure that that is the proper spirit to show towards these leading business men. I think that their interests should have been fully and thoroughly weighed and considered and then, having done that an agreement should be entered into such as would not be injurious to them but if possible more beneficial than the existing conditions. What about the millers? The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) said the other night: Why, the millers can grind not only for 8,000,000 people in Canada but they can grind for 100,000,000 people in the United States? I notice Sir, that in forming this agreement, although they say that wheat can go into the United States free, the United States government took care to say that they would not allow flour in free of duty. Can the millers of Canada grind for 100,000,000 people in the United States while they have a duty of 50 cents per barrel to pay which is more than the profit they would make on a barrel of flour.

Mr. GERMAN.

Mr. FISHER. And the American miller has to pay the same duty if he sends his flour to Canada.

Mr. GERMAN. The American miller has to pay the same duty if he sends his flour into Canada, but when did any one ever hear of the American miller sending any flour into Canada. I never heard of it. We manufacture flour for ourselves, we wish to manufacture our flour in our own country for ourselves and for export. I am not objecting to the United States government putting a tariff on flour, or putting a tariff on anything else, but I say that in entering into an agreement of this kind which ties up our business interests we should look carefully after those business interests, and one of the things which these gentlemen should have done in framing that agreement was not only to have our wheat go into the United States free but our flour also.

It is said that the farmers will be benefited. So far as the county of Welland is concerned there are two townships in the county which grow quantities of fruit, but they also grow large quantities of ordinary farm products, and it may be said that the people of the county are almost exclusively a farming community. In 1891 the farmers of that county were anxious to get into the Buffalo market, but, in view of the home market we have established since then they are not now so anxious. I doubt very much, Sir, if the farmers of my county, or any other county in Canada will be very considerably benefited, if benefited at all, by this agreement. Why, Sir, the whole argument of the statesmen in the United States in favour of this proposition is that it will decrease the cost of living in the United States, and how in the name of all that is sensible is it going to decrease the cost of living in the United States and at the same time give a higher price to our farmers for their farm products? I certainly cannot reconcile these two things. But, I do not think it will give any considerable benefit to the farmers of this country and even if it did give some small benefit I think that benefit may be obtained at a cost too high for the general welfare of this country. Now, Sir, let me say that in my own county there is at least one-third of it (comprising the townships bordering on Niagara river) is contiguous to the Buffalo market. The Buffalo market would be a very natural market for the agriculturists there, and they might in some instances get a higher price for their commodities on the Buffalo market, and it might be more convenient for them than to go to the town of Welland where they would get nearly the same price. But, Sir, what would happen—the same vehicles that carry the Canadian farm products to the Buffalo market for sale will bring back from Buffalo the merchandise required by the farmers to carry on their farming operations, and which will be purchased from the United States merchants. That, Sir, is one reason why I object to this problem; that is a reason why the merchants in our locality object to it, and it is a reason why large interests throughout the length and breadth of Canada object to it. And, Sir, what this agreement will do in that county it will do in other portions of the Dominion. It has already been said what the effect will be, and I believe it, that British Columbia will trade with the Pacific coast states, that the western provinces will trade with the states to the south of them, and so on from the Pacific to the Atlantic, our people will be trading with the American people north and south instead of trading east and west among themselves. I noticed some time ago an article in the Toronto 'Globe' headed: 'The National Grange Is Answered.'—referring to the National Grange of the United States—and it is answered by a letter from Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and the 'Globe' newspaper quotes that letter with approval, and this is what Mr. Wilson says:

If this reciprocity treaty becomes the law of both countries our relationship with Canada will become more intimate and our trade with her will extend and increase. The trains that bring farm products to the United States will take farm, orchard, and manufactured products back, and whether a policy of union of the two countries ever comes about or not, we will become more and more one people, developing along similar lines and supplementing each other in many respects. The raw material that comes from the Canadian farm will be manufactured in the United States and what is not needed will be sent to foreign countries. If this is desirable on the part of Canada it certainly should be desirable on the part of the people of the United States.

Well, Sir, I for one stand here as an exponent of the fact that such a thing is not desirable on the part of Canada, and I do not believe that a policy which is supposed to bring about such a result should be enacted by this parliament. That it will do so the 'Globe' newspaper evidently believes, for it quotes that letter with very great approval. Well, that is what Mr. Wilson says and that is practically what every prominent man in the United States says to-day, namely, that it will take the natural products of Canada to the United States to be manufactured there, and what is not needed of these manufactured goods for their purpose will be exported to foreign countries or sent back to Canada to be purchased and consumed by us. Sir, I believe that we must keep our natural products in Canada. I believe that we must have a policy that will keep our natural products in Canada to be manufactured in Canada by Canadian citizens and for citizens of the empire. And, if there is to be a reciprocity treaty at all it seems to me that a true reciprocity treaty would be one which would encompass the empire at large. If we are to have a reciprocity treaty we should have a reciprocity treaty which would give protection within the empire against all countries, so that there would be between British colonies and the British dominions beyond the seas and the mother land, a free trade amongst ourselves. It has been said that if the Unionists in England come into power they may give a preference to Canadian wheat, but I do not believe they will ever get into power on that platform. What I believe is this: That so long as we tax English goods for our own benefit the English people will not tax themselves for our benefit. But, Sir, I do believe that when the Prime Minister of Canada goes to the Imperial Conference this summer, if he will take his Minister of Customs with him, let this matter stand in abeyance in the meantime, and discuss that problem with the statesmen of England, he will come back home with a resolution that we will all agree to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What problem do you refer to?

Mr. GERMAN. The problem of imperial reciprocity.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Free trade within the empire?

Mr. GERMAN. Free trade within the empire. If that policy can be carried out, to my mind it is the true policy for the British Empire. I think that we in Canada, whether we are manufacturers or not, should show our faith in the heritage we have by more than word of mouth, and if we are to have reciprocity, let us have it within the empire on such terms as can be satisfactorily and beneficially arranged. But if we cannot have that, then the only true policy for Canada is the policy which was admitted by the Finance Minister and this government to be the proper policy, that is, moderate protection with a stable tariff. My observation and inquiry lead me to the belief that if we are to build up in Canada a nation commensurate with our capabilities, that is the policy which must be adhered to. And, Sir, we cannot have any jug-handled policy. The right hon. gentleman who leads the government and his associates think that they are satisfying the farmers of the Northwest and many of the farmers of the east; but I can tell them that they are not. The farmers are not getting what they want; they are not getting what they ask for—all that they ask for, at any rate. They asked that the duty be taken off agricultural implements. That will be the cry in the Northwest in the next Dominion elections. The farmers there will say: You have given us reciprocity, which does not do us any good; we wanted the duty taken off agricultural implements, which would have done us good, and you refused. I believe that just as sure as the sun will set in the western sky on the night this agreement goes into effect, in three years you will have the farmers of the Northwest back here calling for protection to their interests, or else for doing away with the whole fabric of protection in Canada. There cannot be anything different, considering that every farming country in the world, with few exceptions, can send its agricultural products into Canada without paying any duty. We are told that these countries are far away and that, therefore, they cannot send any goods here. We do not know what time will do in that regard. The Minister of Finance says that if this arrangement does not work well, we can do away with it at any time. But see what has happened; you have upset all our business conditions and created a want of confidence throughout the country; and if that does not mean anything else, it will mean one thing which I shall honestly deplore, and that is the defeat of the Liberal party. I say that we need the protection which we have now, not only for manufactured goods, but for agricultural products as well. I might say, in the language of the hon. leader of the opposition, adequate protection. The only difference between him and me is that he does not tell us what in his opinion adequate protection is. I believe that the protection we have at the present moment, with, of course, such slight changes as may be necessary from time to time in the interest of the business industries, is all the protection that Canada will require. It has been adequate to bring to our country millions of dollars of foreign capital to be investigated here; it has been adequate to bring to this country millions of dollars of United States capital for the building up of manufacturing industries; it has been adequate to increase our population by millions; it has been adequate to establish and build up thriving industries throughout the length and breadth of the land; it has been adequate to bring to our doors the representatives of one of the strongest governments of the world seeking admission to our markets. It seems to me that a policy that has been adequate to do all these things is good enough to be left quietly alone. It seems to me that the Finance Minister should nail to the masthead of this Canadian ship of state the flag of protection with a stable tariff, under which Canada will continue on the highway of prosperity and advancement which she has travelled in the past, and will be filled with a prosperous and contented people.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.). Mr. Chairman, there is cast upon me this afternoon the somewhat unpleasant duty of attempting to reply to two hon. gentlemen with whom I have been associated in the past in the most friendly relations, who have been my political friends and associates, and who have decided to oppose the government of the day on the question now agitating this country as well as the great country to the south of us. I have nothing but the kindest words to say of these two gentlemen, because I am bound to believe that they are speaking their inmost thoughts and are entirely sincere in the course they have taken and intend to pursue. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. German). I have been somewhat struck with the generalities of the arguments which he has offered, and the absence of anything in particular on which one can meet him in order to see whether his conclusions are well founded or not. Both he and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) have chosen to discuss this question almost entirely from the standpoint of free trade and protection. They have assumed that it means the breaking down of all the barriers which they say have made Canada prosperous in the last 25 or 30 years; they are assuming that we are throwing away our protective tariff and are bringing in a free trade tariff, and they have studiously avoided any reference to the details of the agreement under discussion. It will be my duty to try to bring the minds of the members of this House back to the true condition of affairs and to discuss the question submitted in these resolutions.

I want first, however, to point this out to my hon. friends opposite, especially those members from the west of Lake Superior who so wildly cheered my hon. friend from Welland when he said that in three years, if this agreement went through, he expected to see the farmers of the west come back here and ask for protection for themselves if they did not get free agricultural implements. I wonder if my farmer friends from the west who cheered that so wildly will not be going through the province of Manitoba and the province of Saskatchewan in the next three years telling those people that what they want is free agricultural implements, and condemning this government for not giving them free agricultural implements. I wonder if my hon. friend from Welland and my hon. friend from Brandon would like to vote for free agricultural implements. If they do, then there is an entire absence of logic in the whole argument put up by my hon. friends against this proposed agreement. The trouble is my hon. friends cheer everything which they think may create some little friction on this side. We, however, on this side are not losing any sleep because my hon. friends from Welland (Mr. German) and Brandon (Mr. Sifton) have chosen to take the course they did, and the Liberal party is big and broad enough to treat those two gentlemen as friends, and yet allow them to disagree with us in this matter. But when my hon. friends from the west go around telling the farmers that they want free agricultural implements, how will they square this with these two hon. gentlemen or the rest of their party?

Mr. LENNOX. You do not know the west.

Mr. CARVELL. I have had the privilege of meeting here about a thousand men from the west and of listening to what they said, and I know what they asked for, and I am bound to think that they were sincere. I know that they asked for free agricultural implements, and I would ask my hon. friend who interrupts me if he would vote for free agricultural implements, as possible he may have a chance to do so before this session is through.

This question has been discussed altogether from the standpoint of free trade and protection. My hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) says that we have broken down the bulwarks of protection, and that the citadel itself will soon fall. Let us examine this proposed agreement and see whether it has broken down the bulwarks of protection or not. The government have brought down a proposition to provide for the free entry into Canada of certain articles. I shall not weary the House by going over the list, but I shall give a few in order that my hon. friends opposite may appreciate the true condition of affairs. We propose to bring in under the free list cattle, horses and mules, sheep and lambs and other live stock. Will my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German), or any hon. gentleman opposite tell me how it will injure the people of Canada to have these things brought in free? Do we import any of them? Why, these are among our staple exports. Then, how on earth can it injure us to have free imports of those goods which we are sending out of this country by the tens of millions. We next come to wheat and other grains. As we do not import those grains, it cannot do our people any harm to have them in free. Then we come to fruits, which I shall discuss later on under a different heading. We next come to dairy products. I have not the exact figures at hand, but during the last year we exported something like $20,000,000 worth of dairy products. Surely, therefore, it cannot injure us to have such products on the free list. Then we have fish, and I propose to discuss fish under a different heading. But will anybody tell me that Canada is importing fish to any great extent? Why, we exported last year to Great Britain and the United States something like $10,000,000 worth of fish, and imported practically nothing. How, then, can it injure us to have fish on the free list? We come next to iron and the manufacture of iron. There is, perhaps, taking it all around, the smallest duty on manufactures of iron that there is on any other great industry in Canada. Iron rods have been free for years and rolled sheet iron, which comes very largely from Great Britain, has only had a duty of 5 per cent imposed on it when coming from the United States. Will it hurt the consumer or the Canadian manufacturer to have those articles come in free of duty? Then we have lumber, but lumber has always come in free of duty. How, then, will it injure our purchasers of lumber to have it still come in free? So you can go down through the whole list of free articles, and in none will you find that their free admission can possibly hurt any Canadian interests. Why did our commissioners agree to allow these things in free of duty? Surely you have only to ask the question to answer it. It is in order that we may have the privilege of sending other articles from Canada to the United States free of duty, and the whole question resolves itself into this: Is it in the interests of the Canadian people that we should have the right to send these things into the United States free of duty?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does my hon. friend argue that taking particularly the case of grain—in the case of those products which we export, none will come in if we take off the duty.

Mr. CARVELL. I am not an authority on the question of grain, but I can tell my hon. friend that, as far as the maritime provinces are concerned, no grain will certainly come in from the United States. As regards the west, we are, perhaps, the largest exporters of grain of any other country of the same population, and I cannot see how, under the circumstances, it is possible that we should import grain into Canada to any extent.

Mr. MEIGHEN. How can it do us any good to have the export duties in the United States taken off in the case of products they export?

Mr. CARVELL. I am told that practically all the time during the last 20 years wheat has been higher in the United States than in Canada. If wheat is higher in Minneapolis than it is in Winnipeg surely it must be to the advantage of Canadian farmers to be able to send their wheat to Minneapolis free of duty.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am not disagreeing with the hon. gentleman, but only want to understand his argument. How can it apply in the one case and not in the other?

Mr. CARVELL. I am giving the facts, and I allow my hon. friends to draw any conclusion from those facts which to them may seem proper. In addition to the free articles which we allow into Canada, we allow a larger list of manufactured articles. I shall not go over the whole list, but I want to point out that in all that list I can only find three items on which, under this proposed agreement, the duty will be less than it is under the British preference, and only two on which the duty is made level with the British preference. If that be ture, and I am quoting from the blue-book published by the government, how on earth is it going to injure the Canadian farmer, when the Canadian consumer can bring all those articles which are manufactured in the United States from Great Britain to-day and pay a less duty than he does if he brings them from the United States under the proposed agreement? I am, of course, aware that there are some items in this list which are not imported from Great Britain to any great extent, and possibly in that case the items which come in from the United States will, to some extent, meet, or go into competition with the home product, and I presume it is on that line that my friends urge such serious objections to this arrangement.

I wish to discuss this matter from a maritime province standpoint. We have had very little discussion from the west, none from the maritime provinces, excepting the speech of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) who discussed it largely from the fish standpoint; we have had practically no discussion from Quebec, except from the moneyed interests of the city of Montreal in the person of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). I shall not go into the history of this matter, as has been done by so many hon. gentlemen but if I have been able to read history aright, I believe that the wish of everybody from the maritime provinces, Conservatives or Liberals, has been to have free access to the American market for our natural products. I have been led to believe that that has been the wish of a very large section of the people of Ontario and Quebec, and I believe it is so to-day. I know that it is practically the unanimous wish of the maritime provinces electorate. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) says that in 1891 the Conservative party buried the question of reciprocity and also that in 1898 the Liberal party buried the question of reciprocity. I do not propose to go back to 1897 or 1887, what I want is to get down to the present and see how this proposed agreement is going to interest or affect our people at the present time regardless of what the opinions of either party may have been in the past. I represent a purely agricultural district, and the same may be said of my hon. friends from York, Queens and Sunbury, Kings and Albert, Victoria and Madawaska, and two or three other constituencies. There are three or four others, like Restigouche, Gloucester, Northumberland, Kent and Charlotte, which are largely interested in lumbering and fish. What I have said of New Brunswick is true to perhaps a greater extent of Prince Edward island and to at least as great an extent of Nova Scotia. I have gone into this agreement with a view to seeing how it affects people in the maritime provinces and have made a list of the articles we export, which our people are compelled to export in order to earn the necessary money to send to Ontario and Quebec and other parts of the world in order to buy manufactured articles, because remember that while the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) told us what a great development had taken place in his constituency and in the province of Ontario in manufacturing. I am sorry to say that has not been the case in the maritime provinces, and I do not believe that outside the steel industries in Sydney there is as much manufacturing going on in the maritime provinces to-day as there was twenty years ago. That is a very broad statement, but I make it with considerable knowledge of the conditions and I repeat that I do not believe there is as much manufacturing as there was twenty years ago. I know there is not as much in my town or in Fredericton, and I believe that it is true of all the cities and towns in the maritime provinces with the exceptions to which I have referred.

I have here a list of the farm products which we produce and which we export, and the countries to which they are exported. It is not very long and I shall read it because I think it speaks more than any words I can utter so far as this matter affects the people of the maritime provinces. The figures I give are for the financial year ending 1909:

Article.	Exports to Great Britain.	Exports to United States.
Horses..	$ 66,815	$446,971
Lambs..	.....	415,912

Article.	Exports to Great	Exports to United Sheep..	11,441	153,767
Poultry..	27,468	137,290
Berries..	.....	148,676
Oats..	508,300	534,680
Hay..	922,718	673,220
Maple sugar.	1,843	127,082
Potatoes..	259	345,903
Turnips	550	173,933
Grass and clover seeds..	239,507	489,180

Mr. DANIEL. I think the hon. member has made a mistake in his figures with regard to potatoes. The amount given for the year 1910 in the United States publication was 97,138 bushels amounting to $36,770. It is not the figure given by my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL. At page 39, of the pamphlet, Tariff relations between the United States and Canada, correspondence and statements, 1911, which was brought down to the House by the government I find the figures I have quoted. This is the Canadian report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1909. It must be correct, my hon. friend must be in error.

Mr. EDWARDS. I took the trouble to make a comparison between the blue-book——

Mr. CARVELL. I do not object to my hon. friend asking a question, but I want to be allowed to make——

Mr. EDWARDS. If my hon. friend compares the book he has in his hand with the statement issued by the United States in book form he will find——

Mr. CARVELL. I will answer that question. I have taken the figures which the Finance Minister has furnished this House; I believed them to be correct then, and I believe them to be correct now. I can tell my hon. friend that from my own constituency alone, last year we must have exported twice the amount of potatoes which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Daniel) has quoted. I know something about this business. I represent the greatest potato constituency in the Dominion of Canada. Last year we did not send nearly as many potatoes to the United States as we have done formerly. I can tell him that from my constituency alone last year we exported to Cuba as many as 250,000 barrels, this year we are not exporting as many. But last year we exported to Cuba and to the United States, and this year we are sending none to the United States, all going to Cuba and to western Canada.

Mr. CROCKET. Would my hon. friend give the prices of potatoes in the States?

Mr. SCHELL. I would like to confirm the statement of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). According to the figures furnished me by the Customs Department, and which confirm the figures given by the member for Carleton, the exports of potatoes in 1910 from the maritime provinces to the United States were only 296,631 bushels at a valuation of $144,302. The total exports from the Dominion of Canada to the United States were 678,632 bushels, at a valuation of $345,930.

Mr. CARVELL. Those are the exact figures.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the hon. member allow me to give my reasons for making the statement I did?

Mr. CARVELL. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I hold in my hand a little book called 'Canadian Reciprocity' which was published by the government of the United States, and distributed by the Finance Minister, and which I got out of our distribution office upstairs. It contains President Taft's message, and contains all the figures which relate to the articles mentioned in the reciprocity treaty. At page 68, under the heading of imports from Canada into the United States during the fiscal years from 1906 to 1910, under the year 1910, the valuation for potatoes $36,770, the very figures I gave the hon. gentleman just now.

Mr. CARVELL. Now the hon. gentleman ought to remember that I was quoting Canadian figures for the year 1909, and he is quoting United States figures for 1910. I have told my hon. friend that last year, 1910, there were very few potatoes sent to the United States. I have admitted that, and I do not see any necessity for this discussion. I know the figures I have quoted are right, I could give the figures for my own constituency almost without any blue-book. Now if hon. gentleman will allow me to proceed I will follow this out a little further. I find that of turnips we exported to Great Britain only $550, and to the United States $174,000. Of grass and clover seeds, to Great Britain, $239,000; to the United States, $489,000.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would the Speaker allow me to interject a question?

Mr. CARVELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have put up with almost every thing, but I think this is going rather too far.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. With his permission, of course.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not object to my hon. friend asking me a question, but when it comes to asking me to adjourn my speech in order that he may have a conversation with the Finance Minister, that is asking too much.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I will only ask this question, I want information. I find for instance, in a report published by the United States government, they say that we exported from Canada $2,317 worth of wheat whereas Canadian statistics show that we imported here $55,000.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friend, I am not discussing wheat at the present time, I do not know anything about the document which he is quoting. Now I want to be fair with this House, and I admit that there are other articles exported by the farmers of Canada in which the trade with Great Britain is very much greater than with the United States, but those are articles which we do not export to any extent from the maritime provinces. I refer to butter, cheese, bacon, wheat, wheat flour and cattle; these are not exported to any great extent from the maritime provinces.

Now I want to take up the question of fish, but I will not go into details. I find that during the last year we exported altogether of fish to Great Britain to the extent of $5,368,000, while we exported to the United States fish to the value of $4,524,000. But of the goods exported to Great Britain $4,573,000 consisted of canned salmon and canned lobster. If you substract that from the total export to Great Britain, you have left the beggarly sum of $794,000 as the total exportation of all fish products in their natural state, or including smoked products; whereas of the same class of articles we exported to the United States nearly $4,500,000 worth.

Then take the question of lumber. Now if there is a portion of Canada which is vitally interested in the lumber question, it is the maritime provinces. I submit this table of our exports of lumber:

	Great Britain.	United States.
Sp. deals	$ 5,825,732	$ 572,003
Laths	130	1,852,211
Logs	39,324	958,918
Shingles	1,274	2,298,055
Planks and boards	1,387,439	17,877,349
Scantling	487,262	593,428
Sleepers and ties	15	328,277
All lumber products	10,635,643	22,241,166

I want to point out that no man can manufacture spruce deals without having considerable by-products in the way of laths. In nine-tenths of the cases, the profit which the manufacturer makes upon spruce lumber lies entirely in the money which he gets out of the by-products, and these he cannot sell to Great Britain, indeed you could hardly give them away to Great Britain. Our market for by-products during all my lifetime has been in the United States. We have been compelled to send them there during the past in the face of a duty at the present time of $1.25, which was previously $1.50, and $2 per thousand.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO.

Mr. CROCKET. Those figures are for the year ended 31st March, last.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes. Then I have taken up the pulp and paper question, and I have found the following results :

PULP AND PAPER.

	Great Britain.	United States.
Wood pulp chemically prepared	$ 21,094	$1,597,319
Wood pulp mechanically ground	888,898	2,557,990
Printing paper	527,851	1,246,795
	$1,437,843	$5,402,104

Now, Sir, these are the principal products of the maritime provinces that will be affected by this agreement. Let us look at what our people have been working against for the last year. We have to pay the following duties, in order to get these goods into the United States :

Horses, from $50 to $75.
Lambs, 75 cents each.
Sheep, $1.50 each.
Poultry, 5 cents a lb., almost prohibitive.
Oats, 15 cents a bushel.
Hay, $4 a ton.
Maple sugar, 4 cents a lb.
Potatoes, 25 cents a bushel.
Turnips, 15 cents a bushel.

Mr. HENDERSON. Turnips 25 per cent.

Mr. CARVELL. I thank my hon. friend for correcting me. I have not the figures before me ; I am just speaking from recollection.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is about 3 cents a bushel.

Mr. CARVELL. They are only worth 10 or 12 cents a bushel, and this is pretty good protection. On all kinds of rough lumber up to two years ago we paid $2 and upwards per thousand, while now we are paying $1.50. In the face of these almost prohibitive duties the people of the maritime provinces and of eastern Quebec have been compelled by the necessity of the case to send to the United States ten times as much of their products as they have been able to send to other parts of the world. Now, I want to know if the people of the maritime provinces ought not to want this agreement to go through if the statements that I have given are correct. I am not going to discuss the fish question to any great extent because that was discussed by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) who understands it so much better than I do, that I will not trespass upon that ground, but I have just this general remark to make that of ordinary fish products, except canned goods, while we are sending $700,000 worth to Great Britain, we are sending almost $4,500,000 worth to the United States. Does any man say that our people who labour in the fields, and in the forests and who toil on the deep do not want a chance to sell their products in the best market that they can find?

They hold up this bogey of annexation, and some of the ladies of Toronto, as well as the men of Toronto, tell us that we must be loyal and that we must not put this thing through. They say that we will be disloyal if we do. The farmer, the fisherman and the labourer of the maritime provinces will not say that we are disloyal if we attempt to give them a better price for their products than that which they are now able to obtain.

Mr. DANIEL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who pays the duty on lumber that enters the United States?

Mr. CARVELL. Well, I will give the hon. gentleman my personal experience. Perhaps that is the best kind of evidence that anybody can give. I can tell him that in my own constituency we raise hay for export.

Mr. DANIEL. I am speaking of lumber.

Mr. CARVELL. Of lumber? Oh, I thought you wanted everything. The exporter in every case pays the duty.

Mr. DANIEL. Does he?

Mr. CARVELL. I know he does ; I am interested in that business, and I know what I am talking about. I challenge my hon. friend to furnish figures to show that he does not. I represent a constituency which lies for fifty miles up and down the border line, my father's farm adjoined the boundary, and I was born within half a mile of the international line. I know something about the business. The man who has stumpage for sale on the American side of the line can get from $4 to $5 a thousand for spruce lumber as it stands. The man who has that same lumber on our side of the line, almost within speaking distance of the American lumber, has to sell it for from $2.50 to $3.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. J. R. Booth, here, says that the American pays the duty.

Mr. CARVELL. Well, my hon. friend will have a chance to answer me later on. He asked me and I am giving him my evidence, and I know what I am talking about. I am interested in the export of laths and I know that we have to pay the whole duty of 50 cents. I know a man who manufactures laths in Aroostook county, just across the imaginary line from my home and he gets 50 cents more for his laths than I can get. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Crocket) was very anxious to know about the potato question. It is a fact that this year potatoes are worth more in the county of Carleton than they are in the county of Aroostook, Maine. They are worth probably to-day 30 to 35 cents a barrel more on our side than they are on the American side. That is due to the fact that there was an absolute failure of the potato crop in western Canada. There were no potatoes at all raised in southern Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, we have the potatoes for sale, and they are going to that western country by hundreds of carloads. I know that there are exporters of potatoes from my own county and in Victoria and Madawaska who have shipped into that western country hundreds of carloads during the past four months. That extraordinary condition of affairs has created a market which is redounding to the advantage of our people at the present time. We are delighted to have it continue, we are able to sell our potatoes at a splendid price, but in the last twenty-six years at least which I recollect very distinctly there has only been one other occasion when potatoes were worth as much on our side of the line as they were in Aroostook on the other side of the line, and that was in 1907 when the customs tariff was revised the last time. Because they were sending potatoes from the United States to Canada I was able to induce my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to increase the duty from 15 cents to 20 cents a bushel. That is the only time in the history of this industry when potatoes were worth as much in New Brunswick as in the state of Maine, or in Canada generally as in the United States. I knew that my hon. friends wanted to get this information, and I have given it to them. But we hope that a kind providence will cause the production of a full potato crop in western Canada, and if that takes place the potato market will revert back to its original condition and potatoes will be worth more in the United States than in Canada if this deal goes through. I want my people to share in that benefit. Let me tell my hon. friend that during the last 20 years, from my constituency alone about 1,000 of our very best farmers have sold out and gone, not to western Canada, not to the big cities of the United States, but just across that imaginary boundary line into the county of Aroostook and to-day they are prosperous and happy. These men have had the advantage of the American market under the same conditions as we shall if this agreement goes through, and as an illustration of their prosperity let me tell you that on the first day of July last I myself counted 42 former Canadians who are now resident farmers of the United States and who crossed over to a Dominion day celebration in their automobiles. I wonder how soon will the Canadian farmer be able to enjoy such a luxury. I trust that in the near future under the benefits of this agreement, our Canadian farmers will be able to sell their potatoes in the United States market to the same advantage that our Aroostook friends have been able to in the past.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss to any great extent the effects of this arrangement upon the fishing industry of the maritime provinces, but I want to point out something local that comes within the purview of my own observations in the province of New Brunswick. I refer to the sardine fishery in the county of Charlotte. I am told, and I am satisfied from my own research that it is a fact, that there are about $325,000 worth of small herrings caught in the waters of the county of Charlotte alone and exported to the neighbouring county in the state of Maine to be manufactured into sardines. Under the general United States tariff there is a duty of ¾ of a cent per pound on fresh fish, but in some way, by means of their tariff regulations, this particular kind of fresh fish are allowed to go into the United States free of duty provided they go in an American vessel commanded by an American master. In that way they go in as American fish. As a matter of fact, the Canadian fisherman catches the fish, puts them in hogsheads, and then they are transferred from his vessel to an American vessel commanded by an American skipper, in which they are taken to the packing establishment, distant not more than three or four hours' sail. The result has been that hundreds of our vessels have been transferred from the Canadian register to the United States register, and hundreds of our citizens, who are the owners and managers of these vessels, have been compelled to become United States citizens, and, in fact, to reside in the United States before being allowed to man these small vessels in which the fish are carried away. If this arrangement goes into effect, the result will be practically this: Our fisherman will be able to catch his fish, as he has always done; he will register his vessel in a Canadian port, so that it will become again a Canadian vessel; he comes back and becomes naturalized as a British subject; he is able to live at home; he increases our population, and he can carry on a legitimate business, catching these fish with his own labour and that of his sons, and taking them to the United States and getting the same price that he gets to-day. When you consider that in the present conditions we are sending $325,000 worth of these fish from one county alone to the United States, you can understand to some extent what the free entry of fish into the United States means to the maritime provinces.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would these sardines have free entry into the United States?

Mr. CARVELL. They would not go in free as canned fish; they would go in free as fresh fish. They go in free now, but it is by manipulation of the United States customs regulations; but the trouble is that our fishermen are compelled to alienate themselves and their vessels from their native country in order to get them in free. The duty of ¾ of a cent per pound on these small fish is prohibitory, because the average price the Canadian fisherman gets for them does not exceed ¾ of a cent per pound, and as the United States manufacturers are dependent upon our people for their supply they have winked at the regulations, construing them differently from what they were intended to be, and have got the fish in in that way.

There are other fisheries all along the maritime coasts of Canada and up the St. Lawrence river to the province of Quebec, and what applies to the county of Charlotte, applies to the other portions of maritime Canada, even to a greater extent, because in the case I have described the people of the county of Charlotte actually get their fish into the United States free of duty, while in all other portions of maritime Canada the fishermen are not in a position to take advantage of the regulations, and, therefore, are compelled to send their fish there in the face of a duty of ¾ of a cent per pound, and when you come to consider that compared with the total price the fisherman gets for his fish, it is a terrible handicap, which in many cases is prohibitive.

Up to the present time I have discussed this question very largely from the standpoint of the maritime provinces. I would like to know what some of our Conservative friends from the maritime provinces think of this proposition. I am sorry there are none of them in their places this evening. However, I shall have to say what I intended just as if they were here, and I hope they will do me the honour of reading it in 'Hansard,' and possibly at some future stage of the debate reply to some of the statements I make. I would like to know what my hon. friend from the county of Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Fraser) has to say about the right of his fishermen to send their fish and his farmers to send their potatoes, their turnips, their oats, their hay and all their other products to the United States free of duty. I would like to know what my hon. friend from the county of Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes) has to say about this. I would like to know what my hon. friend from the county of Digby (Mr. Jameson) has to say about this. Surely he knows what it means to his fishermen much better than I do; he knows what it means to his farmers, his lumbermen and to every labourer in the province of Nova Scotia. If my hon. friend votes against this proposition I would like to know how he is going to square himself with his constituents. Then I come to my own province. My hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Daniel) will no doubt vote against this proposition, because he has no fishermen in his constituency. He seems more interested in the negro question than in reciprocity. But I come to my hon. friend from York (Mr. Crocket), who represents an agricultural constituency which bounds mine for 25 or 30 miles, and is vitally interested in this question. I would like to know what he thinks about it. I am sorry he is not here, because I shall be compelled to read something that affects him particularly. While he may possibly screw up his courage to the point of voting against these resolutions on the broad ground that they are disloyal and will lead to annexation, I want to show the House what was the opinion of the hon. member for York only a short year ago on one very important item in these schedules—I refer to shingles. In the last fiscal year the Dominion of Canada exported to Great Britain shingles to the magnificent value of $1,274, and in the same year she exported to the United States shingles to the value of $2,298,055, and I think I am safe in saying that nearly two-thirds of all the shingles exported by Canada to the United States went either from the maritime provinces or from eastern Quebec. Only one short year ago, when my hon. friend from York had no idea that there was going to be reciprocity with the United States in natural products, when he had no idea that his manufacturing friends in the city of Toronto, who control him, would be able to dictate how he should vote, he wrote the following letter to the Minister of Finance:

House of Commons,
Ottawa, March 11, 1910.

Honourable W. S. Fielding, Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Fielding,—I have a communication from the Scott Lumber Company, Ltd., who operate two or three mills in my constituency, requesting me to lay before you, in connection with the recent negotiations between the Canadian and the United States governments upon the tariff matter, the representation that the recent increase in American duty upon shingles has seriously affected the business of Canadian mills, particularly in the maritime provinces. They claim that the rate of 50 cents per thousand is unreasonable and almost prohibitive, and that in the interest of this trade, our government should at least endeavour to have it reduced to the old basis of 30 cents a thousand.

I trust that if the question of revision of the two tariffs is taken up, you will bear this communication in mind.

Yours truly,
OSWALD S. CROCKET.

My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) this afternoon wanted to know what evidence I had that lumber was worth any more on the other side of the line, or who paid the duty. Let me refer him to the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) who is an authority with the hon. gentlemen opposite. He says that fifty cents per thousand on shingles is almost prohibitive. I say so too. I know something of the shingle business, because I have clients who are probably the largest shingle producers in the maritime provinces, and I tell my hon. friend that there will be no boon which the lumber manufacturers of the maritime provinces will prize so highly as a reduction of 20 cents a thousand on shingles. And what is true of shingles is true of laths and boards and scantlings and hay and oats and almost everything which these provinces produce.

Before leaving this branch of the case, I should like to give the House some figures on the potato question, because that seemed to bother my hon. friends opposite this afternoon more than anything else. During recess I took the trouble to look up the exports of potatoes from Canada to the United States during the last ten years, and I think it is only fair that the House should be in possession of all the facts. These exports were as follows:

1901	$ 67,151
1902	327,046
1903	56,969
1904	742,537
1905	18,301
1906	128,363
1907 (nine months only)	4,250

1907 was the year to which I referred before dinner, during which I said potatoes were much higher on our side of the line, and that is the only time in my lifetime up to this year when that condition existed.

1908	$ 15,459
1909	251,907
1910	345,903

This is a complete history from the Canadian standpoint, of the exportation of potatoes to the United States up to 1910.

Mr. DANIEL. Exports from Canada to the United States?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes. I have discussed that question from the standpoint of the maritime provinces, and propose now to discuss it briefly from the general standpoint.

Mr. DANIEL. Could the hon. gentleman give the imports into Canada from the United States of potatoes during those years?

Mr. CARVELL. I have not the figures at my hand. No doubt in some years potatoes have been imported by us to some extent, but nothing like the extent to which they were exported.

Mr. DANIEL. Last year there were more imported.

Mr. CARVELL. The debate so far has been confined to the discussion of a very few articles. We have had the wheat question discussed in nearly all its phases. We have discussed cheese to some extent, bacon to a great extent, wheat, flour and cattle and also fruit.

Mr. LENNOX. And hay.

Mr. CARVELL. I discussed that this afternoon. I want to take up first the question of cattle. My hon. friends opposite say that if this agreement should go into effect, the cattle industry would be entirely driven from the British market through Canadian channels into the United States, and I think that my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) said that the cattle industry would become centred in a few years in Chicago instead of Winnipeg. Let us follow that up. I find that last year we exported to Great Britain cattle to the etxent of $9,979,000, but I find that the United States exported cattle last year to the extent of from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000, practically all of which went to Great Britain. But, exclaim my hon. friends opposite, if you put this proposed agreement into effect, you will ruin the cattle trade. I ask why? It cannot ruin the cattle trade because if we send our cattle to the United States it will only be because the American buyers will pay more. Will that hurt the Canadian farmer? I fail to see how it will. I do not believe that my hon. friends opposite would say that they do not want our Canadian farmers to get the best prices possible. Well, should they be right in their contention, and should our cattle be driven to Chicago, that can only happen because our cattle will there command better prices. This, however, is what I believe will happen. I believe that the best quality of our cattle will still go to Great Britain, as in the past, but the poorer quality will go to the United States and sell there at better prices than we have got in the past. Let me explain why. The purchasers of cattle for the British market will only take animals up to a certain standard because the freight is paid, not by the pound, but by the animal. I am referring now to water transportation. The space taken in a steamship by an animal weighing 1,400 will not be greater than that taken by an animal weighing 1,000 pounds; and owing to this difference in freight rates, it is impossible for our farmers to sell their lower grades at anything like what they can get for their higher grades. But should this agreement come into effect, these lower grade animals will go into the American market, and will there command the same prices as we now get for our higher grade. That is what this proposed agreement means to the cattle producers all over Canada. They will send their better animals to Great Britain to the same extent as heretofore, but they will get a much better market than they now enjoy in the United States for their inferior cattle. Further, I believe it will not be long before the United States will cease exporting cattle. I find that three or four years ago the United States were exporting $24,000,000 worth of cattle per year, whereas last year they only exported some $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 worth; and it is quite within the realm of possibility that within the course of a few years the United States will cease exporting cattle altogether. The price in the American market will then go up, and our farmers all over Canada will reap the benefit. No one will seriously argue that our farmers should sell to the British market at reduced prices when they can get better prices in the American market. That is a species of loyalty I have never seen worked out yet practically. My hon. friends opposite prate about loyalty but not one of them would sell his cattle at five cents less per head in the British market than he could get in the American market. Give him the slightest advantage in the world and he does not care two cents where the article goes, he will sell it where he can get the best price and if he can get a better price in the United States than in Great Britain that is where it will go. That is how they will tell us the cattle trade is going to be ruined.

I come next to the question of pork. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) said that if this arrangement went through the packing industry in Canada would be absolutely ruined and every hon. gentleman opposite who has spoken has said the same thing. Their newspapers have said that for a month, it is the stock argument of the Conservatives that the packers of Canada will be ruined, particularly in the packing of pork. Last year we exported to Great Britain bacon to the value of $6,422,747 and of hams $413,645. I shall not take the trouble to quote many figures regarding the price of hogs because that was thoroughly given by the Minister of Agriculture. The minister stated that every week in the last year, with possibly one exception, hogs were higher in the American markets than in the corresponding Canadian markets. While the hon. member for Brandon was speaking, I sent to the reading room for the 'Globe' and 'World,' and compared the prices of hogs in the different places in Canada and the United States for the preceding day, February 27. I found that the prices were as follows: Belleville, $6.50 to $6.60, 100 pounds; Peterborough, $6.75; St. Thomas, $6.60 to $6.65; Buffalo, $7 to $7.30; and Chicago, $6.85 to $7.15. In other words, on February 27 hogs were worth at least 25 cents a hundred pounds more in the United States markets than in the corresponding markets in Canada, and the Minister of Agriculture gave figures showing that that condition had existed for the past year. Let us see what will happen if this goes into force. My hon. friend says that the packer will be ruined. Why ruined? Because he will be compelled to pay the Canadian farmer what his hogs are worth. Is that any disadvantage to the Canadian farmer? I fail to see it, and if the Canadian packer wants to do business let him pay what the hogs are worth. Does any man tell me that the Canadian packers, with all the combination they have in force at present, and with a duty of 1¼ cents per pound protection, cannot pay the Canadian farmer what his hogs are worth? If he cannot I am afraid the Canadian packing industry is not of very much benefit to the people of Canada. But, Sir, I do not believe that statement, I do not believe them when they say they cannot pay this price. I know they can, I know they will. Possibly their dividends will not be as great as they have been in the past, but I think the farmers of Canada can well afford to allow the packers to receive a little less in dividends and give them what their hogs are worth in the open market.

Coming to cheese and butter, we sent last year to Britain $22,000,000 and to the United States $22,000. We had an entirely prohibitive duty against these products going into the United States. My friends may say: Oh, you are selling to the same market as the United States producer is. I want to give only one concrete illustration of what this meant to the Canadian farmer, that is the illustration referred to here by the Minister of Agriculture. When the Payne-Aldrich tariff was brought into effect two years ago, by a mistake the duty on cream was placed at 5 cents a gallon instead of 5 cents a quart. The result was that whereas in 1908 we practically sent no cream to the United States, last year from Quebec alone we sent $1,500,000 worth of cream. I wonder if the Canadian farmer in Quebec finds fault? Do you suppose he sent that cream to the United States because he got less for it than in Canada? No, Mr. Chairman, the farmer down in Quebec is just as human as the farmer in New Brunswick and he does not care what the destination of his product is, it is the money he is after, and if he sold that cream to the United States to the extent of $1,500,000 he did so because there is more money in it than in selling in the Canadian market. If this happened in one year the result in four or five years in the export of cheese and butter would be simply astonishing when the market is thrown open to these products.

The hon. member for Brandon stated that the Quaker Oat Industry of Peterborough would be absolutely ruined if this arrangement went into effect. I shall discuss this first from a local standpoint. The local consumption of this product with 8,000,000 people, must be considerable, and we pay enough for this in the maritime provinces. The men who can take ordinary oats and by treating them can sell them at the price charged does not lose much. If they want to sell in the local market, they have to-day the modest protection of 50 cents a hundred pounds, or half a cent a pound on the product of oats. That duty is as prohibitive as a duty of 200 cents a hundred pounds. That will be the case if this agreement goes through. To-day they have a protection of 60 cents per hundred pounds, and they say because that is reduced from 60 to 50 this industry, which I am told has cost $2,000,000, will absolutely close down and go out of business. Does any reasonable man believe that statement? Why, Sir, you only have to state the proposition to show the utter nonsense of it from the local standpoint. Let us take the export standpoint. It was argued—not by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) because he very wisely gave no reason for his statement, and if I admired him for anything in his speech it was for his acuteness and astuteness in making statements and not backing them up by facts and arguments—it was said that the Quaker Oats establishment would go out of business. The Quaker Oats people say that the duty does not affect them so far as the foreign market is concerned. They say they send the great majority of this to the British market, which I believe is true. The oats may cost them a little more, I believe they will because owing to this arrangement the price of oats will be higher, although I must confess that in the great markets of Canada and the United States perhaps there is no product of Canada which so nearly equals the price of the same product in the United States as oats. To-day there is not more than one cent in favour of the American product. But, suppose he has to pay three or four cents a bushel more for his raw material, he starts out on practically the same footing, and it will not cost any more to produce the article for shipment to England than it does to-day. Oh, they say, there is the offal, the bran products and all that ; we cannot export that to the United States because there is a small duty upon it of 12½ cents per hundred pounds. The argument is that we cannot send offal over there, and that is where our profit comes in, and the result will be that the manufacturers will transfer their factories to the United States, they will be able to export the finished product to the British market the same as from Canada, and sell the offal on the American market. Now, I looked up this matter in the 'Trade Returns,' and do you know that of all the millions and millions of bushels of grain that are grown in Canada, including wheat, including oats, including every sort of grain that you can imagine that is exported, during the last fiscal year we only exported the bran of all kinds of grain to the paltry sum of $1,000,000. I do not suppose the export of offal from that oat factory down in Peterborough would be probably more than $5,000 or $6,000 ; but it must be almost infinitesmal when you come to consider that of all the manufacturing going on in Canada, of all the grinding of grain going on in Canada, only $1,000,000 worth of this offal has been exported.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the by products of the Peterborough factory only amount to $5,000 or $6,000?

Mr. CARVELL. No, I said that is all that was exported. Why dont they use that offal to-day? Dont our farmers buy that offal? The offal from an oat factory is not very good; there is some nourishment in it, and there must be hon. gentlemen in this House who have used it, but I have not. I wont feed my horses with it, I want something better than that. They use it for cattle to some extent, but they have been buying it in the past, and wont our farmers buy it in the future? Do you mean to tell me that you are not going to raise any more cattle in Canada in the future, that this country is going entirely to the dogs, and there will be no more sale for offal? That is as ridiculous as the hog argument. The result will be that they will go on manufacturing in Peterborough the same as we have done, and they will make just about the same profits, notwithstanding all the cry they are making, after all the argument put forth by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton). I tell you here to-night that there will not be any closing down of the factories in the oat industries, business will go on as the demand all over the world increases, and just so will our business increase in Canada.

Lastly I come to wheat. Now wheat is a big problem. I admit it is something which I do not profess to know much about, in fact what I am going to give the House about wheat will be largely information which I have gleaned from listening to speeches during this debate, and from a study of the situation from the trade and navigation returns. I told my hon. friend from Portage (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon, in reply to a question, that I knew wheat was worth from 2 to 4 or 5 cents a bushel more in Minneapolis than it was in Winnipeg and Fort William, and such has been the case continually. Why it is, I cannot tell you. I am told that it is in some cases because the American miller wants the wheat, and on account of the transportation conditions, the Dakota farmer is able to get 2 or 3 cents more for his wheat than our farmer gets.

Mr. BARKER. Has the hon. gentleman ever considered whether the increased price was not due to our wheat being a sounder and stronger wheat?

Mr. CARVELL. No, because the American wheat has the greater price, the American gets 3 cents a bushel more than our people do. I do not see my hon. friend's point.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the American wheat is better than Canadian wheat?

Mr. CARVELL. Why, no, Mr. Chairman, I did not make any such foolish statement as that. I do not think my hon. friend does me much credit when he asks me if I made such a foolish statement as that. I think my hon. friend ought to give me credit for knowing better than that. I know that our wheat is the better, there is no question about it. I know that when wheat is made free the Americans will buy our wheat because it is better, and I know that our producers will get a better price than they are getting to-day. Now let us see what we are doing. Last year we exported to Great Britain somewhere about 27,500,000 bushels of wheat, and Great Britain imported from all countries in the world 163,000,00 bushels of wheat, and of that quantity she took from the United States about 24,000,000. I will admit that if for all time the United States were able to export to Great Britain the same number of bushels as we do, and conditions remained the same in the British market, and there was no preference given to our wheat, as an ordinary rule, if we had the same transportation facilities as they have, if we had the same commercial relations as they, the prices should be the same. I want to be quite fair about that. But remember it is only a few years ago when the American people were almost monopolizing the wheat market in Great Britain, and if present tendencies continue as they have in the last ten years, I believe that in ten or fifteen years the United States will cease to be a wheat exporting country at all. When that time arrives will it not be of some value to us to have free access to that market? I know the answer will be: But they are bound to buy our wheat any way. I tell my hon. friend that they can buy Argentine wheat if they want to, and let it in free. It may surprise them to be told that last year Argentine exported twenty per cent more wheat to the British market than we did, and Argentine is one of the greatest wheat producing countries in the world. If Argentine wheat went into the United States free of duty, would it not be better for our farmers to have that market in addition to the British market? Because in Great Britain everything is always open to it. I do not think there is much danger of the British workingman ever voting to put a duty upon the wheat his family uses. Depend upon it, the British market will remain free for all time as it is to-day, and we will have that market open to us. Now in addition to that, when the United States becomes a wheat importer, we are on the ground floor, we are in a position to do the business, provided we do not throw away the opportunity and fetter ourselves with customs regulations which will prevent us from taking advantage of it.

Mr. BARKER. If our wheat is of a higher grade and of a greater value, why should we not establish our own market and sell our own wheat at its proper price rather than mix it with American wheat?

Mr. CARVELL. Who has been talking about mixing? It is only my hon. friend who is mixed. The hon. member for Brandon was mixed on Tuesday. These are the only men I have heard that are mixed on this question. They tell about this wheat being mixed, I think it was the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster)—and we are pretty safe in attributing to him any erroneous statements of that kind—I think he said in this debate: You might as well dump the elevators of Fort William and Port Arthur into the lake; when you get this trade agreement in force everything will go by American routes, our railways will go out of business and we are done forever. The hon. member for Brandon did not make quite the same statement, but he arrived at the same results, because he said there would be no more grading of our wheat, that you could not grade it, it would be mixed with United States wheat and would lose its identity, it would be mixed with an inferior wheat, causing the price to go down, and the result would be that the Liverpool market which regulates the values of wheat would place a lower price on it. But who is talking about dumping elevators into the lake? Only the prophets of blue ruin opposite. Take the experience of the United States under present conditions. My hon. friends say that all this wheat is going by United States transportation channels. Last year we exported of our wheat through United States channels 25,950,000 bushels. How do my hon. friends account for that? There was no reciprocity then, there was no trade arrangement, there was no treachery or treason on the part of the Liberals. Everything was going along squarely when things were well enough—as my hon. friends say. Yet 25,000,000, almost 26,000,000 bushels of our wheat went through United States channels. Worse than that; of that amount 19,478,000 bushels actually went through the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur. How do you account for that? A child ten years of age could account for that, and the explanation is that it is purely and simply a question of transportation. I come back to my proposition of a short time ago. Give a staunch Tory one-tenth of a cent a bushel more on his wheat through American channels than through Canadian channels and he will jump at it every time; so will the Liberal. We are all alike in that way.

Mr. BARKER. That is what you are arguing for.

Mr. CARVELL. Their loyalty is only lip loyalty and it is confined to that holier-than-thou community called Toronto. What is the future of the wheat industry from the transportation standpoint? We will get the advantage of whatever the American market gives to us, if there is any advantage. If there is no advantage the wheat will continue to go to Europe as it has in the past. It will go by United States channels if these channels are cheaper than ours, but if we can do anything to get our transportation rates down to the same level, or to a point one-tenth of a cent a bushel less than the United States rates, then the wheat will be shipped through Canadian channels. Does any man mean to tell me, that, with the history of the past in view and remembering how we have been going ahead in the last five or ten years, we will not be able to handle all the wheat that we raise in the next three or four years? I have here a comparison which shows the change that is taking place in the transportation of wheat. In 1903 we sent through the port of Montreal 8,000,000 bushels, whereas there were exported through the port of New York 14,000,000 bushels. I presume that that means both Canadian and American wheat. In 1908 the export through Montreal had jumped to 30,000,000 bushels and the New York trade had gone to 16,000,000 bushels. In 1910 Montreal had dropped to 20,000,000 bushels and New York had fallen to the insignificant amount of 6,000,000 bushels. Can any man read these figures without coming to the conclusion that Montreal is going ahead in the transportation of wheat faster than any other place? It is only a short time when, if we pursue the proper methods, the Canadian route will entirely control the transportation of wheat. We have only commenced to improve our transportation routes. It may be, as our hon. friends say, that we have spent $150,000,000 in building the National Transcontinental railway that is going to reduce the cost of transportation of the stable products of the west to Great Britain. We are, I believe—I hope so—entering into the project immediately of deepening the Welland canal. The government cannot start that work one day too soon to suit me, and I am told that next year we are going to commence the project of building the Georgian Bay canal. When we get these transportation routes perfected, even leaving out the Georgian Bay canal, and when the water in the Welland canal is deepened to 21 or 22 feet, does any man mean to tell me that we cannot transport wheat through Canada cheaper than they can through the Erie canal with a 6 feet depth of water? You only have to state the proposition in order to see the utter nonsense of the argument on the other side. I believe, and the figures prove that I am correct, that in the next five or ten years, the exportation of Canadian wheat will practically cease through American channels and we will be able to control it all through Canadian channels. I hope this government will go on with these improvements and if they do it will not be very long until we are able to carry not only all our own wheat but a great portion of the American wheat at the same time. We are reaching that point much faster perhaps than hon. gentlemen oppositie realize unless they have given some thought to the subject. We have improved our trade routes to such an extent within the last three or four years that we are able to compete with the American routes as is shown by the fact that last year Montreal exported three times the quantity of wheat than New York did. During the present winter, so I am informed by officials who know, more than half of the wheat that is being shipped through the Port of St. John is American wheat; the result of improving our transportation facilities as we have been doing. The government is not doing it all; the railways are doing wonders too. The Canadian Pacific railway will spend in the next three or four years $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 in perfecting their rail haul from the Georgian bay to Montreal. They have double tracked their line to Smith's Falls or Sharbot Lake. We had a Bill before the Railway Committee not long ago by which they are getting a charter for another road. We had a friendly little scrap over it; the Canadian Pacific railway wanted to build the road through a certain portion of the country because they thought that they could get a three-tenths of one per cent grade by going by that route and the committee, I think rightly, alowed them to go that way. We have had the Grand Trunk railway improving their trade routes and we will have the Canadian Northern men, who are entitled to occupy almost the highest place among Canadian railway men, extending their road from the Georgian bay to Montreal and Quebec in a short time. When these improvements are brought into existence I have no fear as to the carrying of Canadian wheat through Canadian channels. I am taking up more time than I had intended.

Mr. BARKER. If my hon. friend is going to continue and increase the shipment of wheat by the Canadian route through Montreal how is he going to get the western farmer a higher price for wheat down south?

Mr. CARVELL. I thought I explained that. I thought I explained that wheat is higher at the present time in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg. If it were the same price and we both continued to ship in the same quantities and to the same market we would still get the same price. I want to make myself perfectly plain. I want to be perfectly fair and to make my argument logical. I said that I was going to take up one other question which has been considered in this House and the country during the course of this debate and that is the fruit question.

Well, we got a shock this afternoon. My hon. friends pounded their desks when my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) was talking. I think that some of them must be really in a worn out condition physically this evening, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) for instance. All of my hon. friends opposite certainly did a lot of honour to my hon. friend from Welland and when my hon. friend from Welland, who was supposed to be the star actor, next to my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Sifton)——

Mr. CROCKET. Who is to be the next?

Mr. CARVELL. There will not be very many more. I will tell my hon. friend I can tell my hon. friends opposite that with the exception of those who have spoken there is not a 'next' on this side of the House. All the others accept the agreement loyally, believing that in helping to make it law they are doing something that will redound to their own credit and to the everlasting advantage of the Dominion. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) dealt with the fruit question and he lives in a fruit district and he gives it as his opinion that his constituents will benefit by this arrangement and he ought to know. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell you that it is going to ruin the fruit industry, that 800 fruit growers petitioned the government some time ago not to carry out the agreement, but between my hon. friend from Welland on the one side and gentlemen opposite on the other, for my part I would take the evidence of the hon. gentleman from Welland because he knows.

Mr. BARKER. He said he did not know.

Mr. CARVELL. He said he did know.

Mr. LENNOX. No, he said he preferred to take the opinion of the fruit growers.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not wonder my hon. friends want to get away from that point because it is all in our favour.

Mr. CROCKET. The member for Welland said he would accept the opinion of the men in the trade because he did not know himself.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friends are welcome to whatever comfort they can get from that.

Mr. BARKER. Thank you.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) told us it was going to ruin the fruit industry of British Columbia, and Mr. McBride says so, and the whole Tory party of British Columbia says so, and the whole Tory party of Canada of course are bound to say so, but a newspaper printed right in the capital town of the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) says the agreement is the best thing that ever happened for the fruit growers. Now, I am inclined to believe that newspaper. I do not believe that the fruit growers of British Columbia, who can raise the best fruit in the world, are not able to compete in the mining and manufacturing centres of the west with the fruit growers of California or elsewhere. As to the Niagara peninsula fruit growers, the morning after the Minister of Finance brought down these resolutions, I met a gentleman who is intimately acquainted with the fruit industry there, and he told me that the result of the arrangement would be that the Niagara fruit growers would have more of a consuming population within one night's run of the Niagara peninsula than they have now in the whole Dominion of Canada, and that he was very much mistaken if they would not have a very greatly enlarged and more profitable market. I think I will take that gentleman's statement in preference to the statement of those who know nothing about it.

Mr. BARKER. Who was it?

Mr. CARVELL. Perhaps it would not be fair for me to give his name.

Mr. BARKER. Oh, yes it would.

Mr. CARVELL. I will give it to my hon. friend in confidence.

Mr. BARKER. Oh, let us have it in public; he was not a Canadian.

Mr. CARVELL. He was a Canadian, and a good one at that.

Mr. BARKER. Name him then.

Mr. CARVELL. But Mr. Chairman, British Columbia and the Niagara peninsula are not the only portions of Canada which raise fruit. There is a portion of Canada comprising about one-eighth of the population of this country—and we think more than one-eighth of the brains and ability of this Dominion—called the maritime provinces, and in proportion to population the maritime provinces produce fruit to as great if not a greater extent than do British Columbia and the Niagara peninsula. Go to the Annapolis valley and it is in the knowledge of every gentleman in this House that, be they Grit or Tory, the farmers of that wonderful fruit growing valley—and there is nothing to equal it in the world to-day for raising apples—are enthusiastically in favour of this arrangement. To-day the apple growers of the Annapolis valley are compelled to devote their energies exclusively almost to growing a winter apple which they can export to Great Britain. True, they raise a summer apple called the Gravenstein, but at present they have no considerable market for them, and the production is limited in quantity. But, with the market of the United States, which this agreement will give us, the possibility of raising summer apples in the Annapolis valley is almost unlimited. Had these farmers had a market of the United States for the past ten or fifteen years they would export quadruple the quantity they export at the present time. In my own constituency, twenty years ago we were growing a summer apple called the New Brunswicker, which is very much like the Duchess. It was developed by a Mr. Sharpe, who devoted his life to the industry and made a success of it, and twenty years ago we were shipping apples to Boston by the carload and people were planting orchards all over the country. But the duty was put on in the United States and the market was taken from us and our orchards went to decay. Give us the United States market and these orchards will be resuscitated, and new orchards planted, and where to-day we do not sell a carload of that fruit in the United States, in a few years to come when the young trees which will be planted are in bearing, we will send hundreds of carloads.

Mr. CROCKET. What was the American duty against Canadian fruit 20 years ago?

Mr. CARVELL. It was nothing; that is just what I am telling you; it was free. When fruit was free in the United States we could send our apples there, but when the McKinley Bill came into operation against us our orchards went into decay.

Mr. CROCKET. Is the hon. gentleman quite certain that under the United States tariff of 20 years ago Canadian fruit was free?

Mr. CARVELL. I do not like to make a statement that I cannot back up with proof, and I have not the tariff of 20 years ago here, but I think I am right, and my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) will bear me out in the statement.

Mr. BLAIN. I will not. Nobody would suggest that in the United States 20 years ago there was not a very heavy duty against apples as there is to-day.

Mr. CARVELL. Within my lifetime fruit was free going into the United States, and the apples were sent there in large quantities and they cannot go there to-day because of the duty.

Mr. LOGGIE. Before the McKinley Bill.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes. I believe it is 21 years ago since the McKinley Bill came into force, and I mentioned 20 years ago, but the correction is only a quibble. That is about the size of some people.

Mr. BLAIN. Since the hon. gentleman is personal, does he say there was no duty against fruit in the United States until the McKinley Bill came into effect?

Mr. CARVELL. I am not going to get into an argument with my hon. friend. I made the statement, and if I am wrong he can correct me.

Mr. CROCKET. We merely wish to understand your statement.

Mr. CARVELL. We can raise in the Annapolis valley strawberries, raspberries, currents, and small fruits to twenty times the extent we are raising them to-day if we had the United States market, and the same is true of the St. John valley. About a fortnight ago a very prominent Conservative lawyer in the city of St. John, perhaps one of the most prominent Conservative lawyers in the province and who is interested in the steamboat business on the River St. John, told me in Ottawa that if this arrangement went into effect, from the constituency of Queens and Sunbury alone, in three years there would be a special line of steamers running on the St. John river direct to Boston in the summer time in order to carry this fruit, and this man knows what he is speaking about. He has been for years interested in steamboating on the St. John river, and during the last three or four years they have been sending these small fruits to some extent by these steamers which tranship them to the International Steamship line at St. John for Boston, and I give his statement for what it is worth, and the hon. members for York and St. John know the gentleman to whom I refer. What is true of Kings and Sunbury is true of the county of York, the county of St. John, and every other county on the western side of the province of New Brunswick, as well as of many constituencies in Nova Scotia; and where we produce to-day one dollar's worth of fruit, we shall produce in a few years ten, fifteen or twenty dollars worth. That is what it means to the people of the maritime provinces.

Now, I want very briefly to discuss this matter along the general line which the debate has taken. Our hon. friends opposite would try to make the country believe, and try to convince themselves—for I think they are hollering to keep their own courage up—that this is a great big measure of free trade. Well, Sir, it is not half so big as I personally would like to see it. We are told that the Liberal party when they came into power borrowed protection from the Conservatives; but remember that we came into power pledged to obtain reciprocity from the United States if we could get it on fair terms, just as the Conservative party were pledged to obtain reciprocity, and would have been glad to have it down to 1896. We sent a deputation to Washington to endeavour to get reciprocity, and we would have been delighted to have got the arrangement which we have to-day. We could not get it. I presume we could have obtained reciprocity if we had conceded a large enough list of manufactured articles on our side; but we would not do it. Our delegation returned home, and we introduced the British preference. Our hon. friends opposite may say that we introduced it in order to cater to the feeling prevailing at that time that we should do something to help out the British people and to prove our loyalty. I do not believe that was the object at all. I believe the British preference was meant by the government who introduced it, and I am sure it was accepted by the Liberal party and by the country generally, as intended to ameliorate to some extent the sufferings of the consumers and producers of Canada from the National Policy under which we had been suffering so long. The government first reduced by one-fourth the duties levied on articles from Great Britain, and a year or two afterwards they increased the preference to 33⅓ per cent, so that now we pay on articles coming from Great Britain only two-thirds of the duty that we pay on articles coming from the United States or from any other part of the world. Is that not a benefit to the consumers of Canada? That was the object, as I understood it, of introducing the British preference, and that was the reason my hon. friends opposite opposed it. There are members sitting in this Chamber to-night who have opposed the British preference from the day it was born down to the present time, and who would oppose to-night as strongly as before any proposal to increase it—why? Not because it helps the farmers, the lumbermen, the fishermen and the consuming masses of the Canadian people, but because they are afraid that it will interfere with the dividends of their friends the manufacturers. But I can assure the government that there is no way in which they can more ingratiate themselves with the people of Canada or do more good to the people of Canada than to bring down before this parliament adjourns a measure increasing the British preference to at least 40 per cent. Why did not my hon. friends opposite cheer the hon. member for Welland this afternoon when he said that he wanted reciprocity within the empire? They were as dumb as oysters when he said that, because they knew that if they accepted that proposition they would be flying in the face of the manufacturers, and that is one thing none of them will dare to do, from the leader down to the hon. member for York.

Mr. CROCKET. Would you suggest that the government should do it now?

Mr. CARVELL. I do most assuredly, and I believe I am voicing the sentiment of a great number of the members on this side of the House, and I know that I am voicing the sentiment of a majority of the electors of this country. We have been told in this debate to let well enough alone. We have been told that this country has progressed for thirteen years past as it has never done before. We have been telling hon. gentlemen opposite that all along, but they would not admit it. Now they say this country has never been so prosperous as it is to-day. The hon. member for Welland, the hon. member for Brandon, and the hon. member for North Toronto, have all said that it is prosperous because we have had a protective tariff, and they say that the tariff that we have had since 1896 is practically the same as the tariff we had from 1879 down to 1896. If the tariff which we have had from 1896 down to the present time has made this country prosperous, I ask why it did not make the country prosperous before 1896 if it was the same tariff? I tell you it is not the tariff that has made Canada prosperous. It is the tariff that has kept Canada from being as prosperous as it might otherwise have been. I can tell you what has made Canada prosperous. When the Liberal party came into power in 1896, the hon. member for Brandon introduced an immigration policy which will stand to his credit even if he should pass over to the opposition side of the House, and under that policy we brought immigrants into the country, at first to the number of over 50,000 yearly, and latterly in still larger numbers. The result is that we have in the Northwest to-day a population which is using the manufactured articles of Ontario, and it is their consumption of these articles that is making Ontario prosperous. We in the maritime provinces cannot send our products to the Northwest or to Ontario because transportation is against us. We have sent practically nothing to Ontario but a little coal, and in the last few years a few potatoes.

Mr. SPROULE. You have been sending fish for the last forty years.

Mr. CARVELL. Not to any great extent. I wish we were sending ten times as much as we are. We are not sending to Ontario anything like the quantity we are sending to the United States in the face of an almost prohibitive duty.

Mr. CROCKET. Is the hon. gentleman aware that two factories in Fredericton are selling goods in British Columbia?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, I am, and I am aware that they sold boots to British Columbia before the National Policy was ever thought of. We have not in the maritime provinces reaped the benefit of this increased population from a manufacturing point of view, though we have as good artisans as they have in Ontario, the same protective policy, as good brains, the power, and everything necessary to make a successful manufacturing country. We have failed, while Ontario has succeeded—why? Because Ontario has a great consuming population at its doors, and we have not. That is what has made Canada prosperous in the last ten or fifteen years, and not the tariff policy which this government has continued from its predecessors.

I would like to take a few moments to analyse this agreement in its results. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) did that admirably, much better than I can hope to do it, but I want to analyse it to some extent, in a rather different way, for the benefit of my friends from the maritime provinces. Our hon. friends opposite complained that we have abandoned the British preference, that we have thrown over the mother country, that we are leading this country into annexation, that we are disloyal, that we are everything but good Canadians and British subjects. And why? Because, forsooth, we are asking for the right to sell our natural products in the best markets we can find, and are content to pay the same duties as we have been paying in the past on everything we are manufacturing. Analyse that agreement and see what it amounts to. I have taken a leaf from the book of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and counted the number of items in the different schedules. On the free list there are 70 items, and of those there are 40 which we do not bring from Great Britain at all. Of the other 30 there are a number of which we import from Britain less than $10,000 worth, and of the whole 70 there are only two of which we import more than $100,000 per year from Britain. Those two are salt and grapes. I find, also, that the total imports from Great Britain of the articles on that free list last year only amounted to $4,190,000. If you deduct from that amount sheets of rolled steel, of which our imports amounted to $3,490,000, you have got the beggarly sum of $699,000 imported from Great Britain out of the hundreds of millions of our total imports from that country. Out of those hundreds of millions only the beggarly sum of $699,000 was the amount which we imported from the mother country of those articles on the free list, leaving out the item of steel. Yet we are told that this thing is not only injuring, but ruining the British preference. Then I counted the number of items on which the duty will be higher under the British preference than under the proposed agreement, and I find that these are only three, and that the imports of these three only amount to a few thousand dollars altogether. So that, even without increasing the British preference, the rates of duty on British imports will be still lower in every instance than the duties which the United States will pay should this arrangement go through. If there be any fault to find with this proposed agreement it is that under it the consumer is not getting his goods cheap enough. But if we should increase the British preference we would then put the consumer in the same relative position as he has enjoyed in the past.

I come now to the dutiable list, and I find that there are in it 101 items. Of those 29 are not imported from Great Britain at all and never have been. Of the items, the imports of which from Great Britain are under $10,000 per year there are 44, and there are only seven items of which we import over $100,000 from the mother country. That is the dutiable list. And I find that altogether on that dutiable list we imported last year from Great Britain only $2,196,000, a mere nothing, whereas we imported from the United States, of the articles on this same list, to the extent of $32,359,000. And all we are asked to do is to take the duty off these goods to some extent—not to any great extent. Why, the reduction is a mere bagatelle. We are only reducing the duties from 32½ per cent to 30 per cent and 27½ per cent, but still even that is some little relief to the consumers. Take item after item, and you will find a duty of 15 per cent, 25 per cent, 30 per cent and 32 per cent still left on articles brought from the United States under the proposed agreement. Take automobiles; last year we brought about $150,000 worth from the United States in spite of the duty of 35 per cent. I admit that if there be anything on which a revenue ought to be collected it is automobiles, because they are a luxury. But the duty is simply prohibitive. Under that duty it is almost impossible to bring in an automobile from the other side of the line. In my opinion it would be better both for the consumer and the manufacturer if that duty were reduced.

Mr. BARKER. Why?

Mr. CARVELL. Because we would get a better article, because then the manufacturer would not dare put on the market the thing he puts on to-day and call it an automobile.

Mr. BARKER. Our own people would make more, no doubt.

Mr. CARVELL. I know what I am talking about. I do not want to knock the manufacturers, but my hon. friend had better not ask me too many questions. If he wants information I can give it to him.

Mr. HENDERSON. Are you a manufacturer?

Mr. CARVELL. I am a consumer. And what is true of automobiles is true practically of other manufactured articles. I admit that we cannot have free trade in Canada, because we require a revenue, and, perhaps, the only way we can raise a revenue at present is by a customs tariff; but I do submit that it would be better, both for the manufacturers and the consumers if our customs tariff were reduced to such a point as would give us revenue and give the manufacturers whatever protection they can obtain incidentally from a revenue tariff. That question, however, has been threshed out during many years, and I do not propose to go into it now. But in my opinion a reduction of our tariff would be a good thing even for our manufacturers. In many instances they are twenty years behind the times. Their factories are not properly organized, they are not pursuing business methods, they are using the antiquated machinery of 25 years ago.

Mr. AMES. Name some of them.

Mr. CARVELL. I might offer some of my own experiences, because I have had a little experience myself in manufacturing, and I can tell you that we lost money because we did not have the proper machinery. Take the woollen manufacturers; will any one tell me that you could not make wool cheaper than it is made in our factories to-day if they were properly fitted with up to date machinery? Take any of our industries that are making money, and you will find that they have modern machinery and improved methods. If you would reduce the tariff you would compel our manufacturers to adopt these methods.

Mr. BARKER. Why do you not go into the woollen business and try it yourself?

Mr. CARVELL. I do not want to refer to my own experience, but I have had a little experience in the woollen business, too, and I will tell you the results. There was a woollen mill in our town established some 15 years ago under the protective tariff. It had old machinery and poor management, and was run into debt until it owed the bank some $6,000 or $7,000. Finally the bank took it over, put in a little new machinery and better management, and ran it until the debt was wiped out. Then the bank said: We do not want to run that business any longer, and they stopped it.

Mr. BARKER. Why did you not continue it?

Mr. CARVELL. The bank stopped it because it was not the business of a bank to run a factory.

Mr. BARKER. You know how it can be done with profit?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, by better methods and better machinery. But what does this system of protection do? In nine cases out of ten it simply takes money out of the pockets of the consumers and puts it into the pockets of the manufacturers. If a factory is up to date and properly run, it gives enormous profits. If not it only drags along. Let me refer to something with which I am perfectly familiar, and that is electrical machinery. I do not want to refer to my own business, but I was challenged by the hon. member and I will give an illustration. There are practically to-day only two great manufacturers of electrical machinery in Canada, the Westinghouse and the Canadian General Electric, and these people are charging us to-day for everything we buy, and I have bought thousands and thousands of dollars worth in the last few years, the cost in the United States plus the duty almost entirely. These people are putting out a splendid article, they have modern up-to-date machinery, well organized methods and they are making money, and if you cut their duty down to 20 per cent or even to 15 per cent they will still continue to do business in Canada because 15 per cent is enough to force them to come here, they will come and do business in Canada, and every man buying a piece of electrical machinery would get the benefit of the reduction in price. It means a lot to our people, more to the small consumer than to the larger one, but that is a concrete illustration of what protection is doing in Canada. I tell the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) who is interested in one of these companies as it is in his constituency, that it would be better for the people of Canada if they pensioned off the 5,000 employees employed in this industry than to continue them and have to pay the present increased price owing to the duty.

Mr. BARKER. What will the farmers say?

Mr. CARVELL. That there are only a few of them.

Mr. BARKER. Ask the farmers.

Mr. CARVELL. They will say: Cut the duty down, give us the machinery cheaper.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why not put it in the treaty?

Mr. CARVELL. That is the trouble. My friend the Minister of Finance was too good to the manufacturers, he saved them and look at the thanks he is getting for it. Another illustration. No industry in Canada has made the strides, has given us the results and has made as much money as the manufacturers of agricultural implements. Our agricultural implement manufactories should be a matter of pride to every Canadian. Massey-Harris and Frost & Wood, are two of the finest examples of energy, honesty and upright dealings in the history of Canada. They have developed and developed and made money. Under what? A 20 per cent duty, 22½ per cent I think until 1907, then reduced to 17½ per cent, and now proposed to be reduced to 15½. If you want any evidence of what the farm machinery manufacturers have done, I find that in the last fiscal year these people exported from Canada farm machinery, mowing machines, reapers, binders, seeders, &c., to the magnificent amount of $4,300,000, and yet you tell me that a manufacturing industry cannot get along in Canada without 30 per cent or 35 per cent protection. My hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) gave the whole thing away. He says you are attacking the outworks of protection and very soon the citadel will fall. The only men who are hit, practically, are the farm machinery men and they are saying nothing about it. I would like to know where you can get a better example of what can be done in Canada under a revenue tariff than the case of the agricultural machinery. We know that a revenue tariff produces revenue, because when the duty was reduced one-third, under the British preference, our revenue was quite doubled, not only our imports increased but our revenues. We know that such a tariff stimulates importation. People buy things cheaper, buy more of them, the home manufacture goes on just the same, the farmer gets more for his money and every one works more and we have a better condition of society. What happened when this arrangement was sought to be brought into effect? The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs went to Washington with the idea that if they could not get a reciprocity treaty practically in natural products they would not treat at all. They were carrying out the principle for which we have contended ever since I was a boy and for which the Conservatives contended when they were in power. I did not believe they would get it; nobody did, they did not believe it themselves, and they were so careful of the manufacturers that they did not do for us what they should have done. Let me give an illustration. The Minister of Finance, on account of the protest put up by the coal barons of Montreal was only able to reduce the duty 8 cents in order to bring it on a par with the American duty. Another illustration. I myself applied to the Minister of Finance to reduce the duty on an article which could be manufactured in St. John in enormous quantities, right on the shores of deep water, whence it could be shipped to the United States, an article of which millions and millions are sold every year. The minister could not do it because an industry in the province of Ontario might be affected and he did not do it. I do not know whether he was offered it by the American commissioners or not, as he has a faculty of holding his peace. I know he did not take off the duty and that the city of St. John cannot have that industry which would employ hundreds, I believe thousands of men in the next five years and would become one of the greatest industries in New Brunswick, simply because some protectionist gentlemen in Ontario felt that they would be affected.

Another illustration. The papers yesterday contained a statement of Senator Carter in the United States Senate to the effect that the United States commissioners wanted to make meats and flour free of duty and to put them on the reciprocal list, but that our commissioners would not consent to this because they were afraid it might interfere with manufacturers of the Dominion of Canada. I give these two illustrations of the way in which the manufacturers have been protected, in which all the interests of Canada have been protected, and yet men like the member for St. Antoine, to whom I give credit for being perfectly frank, says: You have attacked the outworks of protection and before long the citadel would fall. Fall? Because under this agreement we are going to allow in from England $699,000 worth more goods than last year, if you bar out rolled steel, and a few millions of dollars from the United States.

Mr. AMES. Please do not put words into my speech which I did not utter. If you read the part where I said the outworks were attacked you will see that is not the reason.

Mr. CARVELL. I fail to see what the reason can be. I listened attentively to the hon. gentleman's speech and read it, and that is the meaning I took from it.

Mr. AMES. Do not entirely misinterpret my speech. If you read the portion referring to the outworks you will see it is entirely different.

Mr. CARVELL. I hope my hon. friend is recanting.

Mr. AMES. Not a bit.

Mr. CARVELL. I thought not, it comes back to that, that the protectionist manufacturer will not allow my hon. friends opposite to accept this proposal. The hon. member is a manufacturer, and every man who buys a cheap shoe for his family knows the member for St. Antoine is a manufacturer, and he is as good as any of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Will the hon. gentleman say he has not himself recanted when he is so jealous of the citadel of protection?

Mr. CARVELL. I am not; I am saying that the commissioners were jealous of the citadel of protection. I have made myself plain. It was the commissioners who were jealous of the citadel of protection, and who tried every way in the world to protect these people. And what is the result? All over Canada, all the financial interests, all the bankers, some of the railroads—not all of them—the boards of trade, the manufacturers, have started a campaign against this arrangement. You would think that the whole citadel of protection was stormed and captured by reason of the paltry few millions of dollars involved in this arrangement. Now they say that the transportation interests are going to be ruined, that all the millions of dollars we have spent in opening up lines of transportation east and west are going to be wasted, because trade will now go north and south. I can only refer to the statement I read earlier in my remarks regarding farm products. In face of what would almost be considered a prohibitory tariff, three-fourths of all the farm products of the maritime provinces, yes, five-sixths, go to the United States now. But free trade in these natural products will hurt the railroads, we are told. I have shown what would happen to wheat. It cannot hurt wheat, it cannot hurt cattle, it cannot hurt hogs; and it is only trying to draw a herring across the track when they say it is going to hurt the transportation interests.

Then the bankers say: You must not put this thing through because you are breaking down the bulwarks of trade—they do not say protection—you are unsettling all the conditions of trade. They say it is disloyal for a man to sell his horse, or his sheep, or his fish to the United States, although he can get a better price for them. The gentleman who was the leader of that famous sixteen in the city of Toronto did not think it was disloyal when he financed the cotton crop of the United States with the money of the Canadian people, and other banking institutions have taken Canadian money by the million out of this country and invested it in the United States. I tell my hon. friends that in many places our banks are nothing but savings banks, and if the farmer or any one else wants $100 or $200 he has got to get a number of his relatives to endorse a note before he can get that sum of money out of the banks. Still the bankers will take this money by the million to the United States or anywhere else they can. I remember that in 1907-8—I am saying something that I know—the banks in the maritime provinces increased the interest rate up to seven per cent and made that payable every three months, and when I remonstrated with them they frankly admitted that they could take their money to New York and put it out on call loans and make more than seven per cent out of it. And still they got that money for three per cent from the farmers of the county of Carleton. This is perhaps a little aside from the question under discussion, but I have in my hand something which was sent out by the banks, or at least by the 'Monetary Times' of Canada, closely associated with the banks, and they have an impudence which excels anything I have ever seen. I find in an article called the Parliamentary Bank Act, on page 16, they say the government will hear the arguments, and then it goes on:

> It is not to be expected that ministers will lend countenance to the extreme or revolutionary proposals that emanate from individual members of parliament.

I want to know if you ever heard such impudence as that addressed to members of parliament. I want to tell these gentlemen that if I am alive I will be in the Banking and Commerce Committee when the Bank Act comes up, and perhaps I will be guilty of some of the revolutionary proposals which this article refers to.

Mr. AMES. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is discussing the Bank Act instead of this trade arrangement.

Mr. CARVELL. It evidently hurts my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). Now I come back to the subject. I want to tell my hon. friends, however, that while they may stand by the banks, and while they may stand by the manufacturers, and while they may stand by their interests, the farmers of this country, the lumbermen of this country, the fishermen, the labourers, all the toilers of this country, will stand by the government in the course they have mapped out for this country to-day. I have pointed out what it means to the agriculturists of the maritime provinces, I have pointed out what it means to the lumbermen of the maritime provinces, and I have tried to point out what it means to the agriculturists of the rest of Canada. I have pointed out what it means to the fishermen of the maritime provinces; and while as I have said, I do not feel capable of discussing the fishing industry in its details, I want to read to this House and to place upon the 'Hansard' a statement made at a banquet in Halifax not long ago by the Hon. Mr. Murray, than whom no abler, no more patriotic, no more loyal, no more sincere politician is in public life in Canada to-day, a man who knows the needs of the farmers, the needs of the fishermen and of the lumbermen in Nova Scotia better than any banker, any manufacturer, or any other gentleman I believe who occupies a seat on the floor of this House. Here is what Mr. Murray says:

GREAT FREE MARKET.

> For a quarter of a century this great portion of our population longed for a free market with the nation to the south. Now that great wish has been satisfied and hope is filling the heart of every man who follows the sea for a livelihood. We have seen the tremendous development that Liberal legislation has wrought in our coal industry. I do not wish to be over emphatic here to-night, but I will say this. I believe no man to-day can foresee what a free market for fish will bring to the population of our sea-board. I see no reason to-day why the fishing fleet of Nova Scotia should not increase three-fold. I see no reason why we should not become the principal fish food producers of this continent. (Cheers.) And yet there are men in this province who would expect the honest toiler of the deep to listen to some befuddled arguments about endangering the British flag, or injuring the railroads that run east and west. They would even ask him to besmirch his sacred ballot by condemning a policy that means so much to him and to the generations to follow him. Does anybody say that because the Nova Scotia fisherman sells his fish to an American at better prices, that his loyalty is being impugned? If this is the case the electors of Yarmouth and Shelburne would be open to the gravest suspicion.

Whatever our views may be upon other political issues, surely we can all agree upon this. When any one expects the fisherman who produces results by his own unaided efforts to refuse the privilege of selling in the dearest market; I say, when any man expects the fisherman to defeat by his ballot the realization of his long sought hopes, he offers an insult to that fisherman's intelligence, or else he believes that the fisherman is willing to stultify his conscience for party expediency. I believe, however, that the lesson of life has been too well learned by our fisherfolk for either result to follow.

I commend that to my hon. friends opposite, and I commend it to every thinking elector in the Dominion of Canada. I accept this trade agreement without any reservation whatever. As I have said before, it is something which the people of my province and of my constituency have been praying for ever since I was a boy. It is something the people of the maritime provinces have been praying for, that the people of Quebec have been praying for, that the people of the Northwest asked for when they came down here a few weeks ago. It is something that will build up this country, and will bring immigration into this country in a greater flood than we have ever seen it yet. Instead of our people leaving the maritime provinces by the thousands for the United States, they will come back by the tens of thousands. If in my humble capacity I can be of any assistance in helping to bring about this great boon to the people, then I will feel that my advent into public life has not been in vain; and if I retired to-morrow, I would feel that I am well repaid for all the trouble, all the energy I have expended, and all the time that I have lost in my ten or twelve years of public life.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey). I do not propose to follow seriatim the arguments used by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), though I may touch upon some of them as I proceed in the remarks I propose to make. My hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., made one or two remarks which are to me so obviously incorrect that I think perhaps he will pardon me for saying a word with respect to them. I observe that he spoke with reference to the fruit trade of New Brunswick and he said that if the agreement were passed it would enable the people of New Brunswick to cultivate certain varieties of fruit and that they would find a very profitable market in the United States. He said that there was an apple called the Gravenstein that would be very favourably received across the line and that in four or five years, to use his own words, they would quadruple the quantity produced in New Brunswick. Would the hon. gentleman tell me how they will be able to quadruple the quantity in four or five years when it takes ten years for the apple tree to mature sufficiently to profitably produce fruit?

Mr. CARVELL. I did not say that at all; I said: In ten or fifteen years.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. No.

Mr. CARVELL. I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. My hon. friend said within six or seven years and later on he said that in a few years we will have increased the quantity ten, fifteen, or twenty times the present amount. If my hon. friend can tell me how he will increase the quantity ten, fifteen or twenty times in the number of years he has mentioned I would like to hear him. Then my hon. friend said that away back before the National Policy was inaugurated they used to export boots from New Brunswick to British Columbia. That would be six or seven years before the Canadian Pacific railway was built and then they would have to pay the duty, send them through the United States down to San Francisco and then up to British Columbia which only had a population at that time of 25,000 or 30,000. These are a few of the extravagant statements that my hon. friend made. He said something about cattle and the remark he made in reference to that was that Canada exported last year about $10,000,000 worth of cattle, that the United States also exported $13,000,000 worth of cattle; and that therefore—I suppose his argument was—that it was a good thing for Canada to have free intercourse with the United States with respect to cattle. If that argument proves anything it proves that as the United States exported $13,000,000 worth of cattle it is not our natural market but that our natural market is Great Britain, the country that takes the surplus of both Canada and the United States. But my hon. friend forgot to say that while the United States export of cattle had somewhat decreased the export of chilled and frozen meat was rapidly increasing. The country which can export frozen or chilled meat, as compared with live cattle, is the country that is doing most for its people because, by exporting the manufactured product you are keeping your cattle at home, you are giving employment to men in the abattoirs, you are giving employment to men who are converting the skins of the cattle into leather and the leather into shoes and harness, and when you compare the two nations that which is doing the former is in a much better position than that which is doing the latter. Therefore, when I say that the exportation of chilled beef from the United States is steadily increasing I am simply saying that the United States is wise and is deriving the benefit of that business. Then, my hon. friend referred to the question of wheat. I confess that I am unable to understand his argument. If this treaty means anything to the farmers of western Canada it means that the amount of wheat from the northwest provinces that is to-day sent to the United States is going to be increased. If it means anything it means that the price on the other side is greater than the price on this side, and that therefore the quantity of wheat passing from this country to the United States is going to increase. If it does not mean that this agreement is of no use whatever to the farmers in so far as the question of wheat is concerned. My hon. friend says that last year we sent to the United States 25,000,000 bushels of wheat. I am only sorry to say we did. I think it does not say very much for the progress of Canada that we allowed 25,000,000 bushels of wheat to be transported over American roads and probably to be ground for us into flour thus depriving us of the bran, shorts and by-products which otherwise would have been available for the farmers on this side. Does he mean, by taking off the duty of 25 cents a bushel, to increase that unsatisfactory condition? If he does, then the wheat of the northwest is going to go that way. We have had hon. members on the other side of the House, I think the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy), I think the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely), I think the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), I think the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), stating that when the agreement was first placed upon the table they were somewhat of the opinion that the price of wheat would be materially enhanced to the western farmer. These gentlemen all also admitted on the floor of the House that practically speaking the price would not be increased by its transfer to the United States because the price was fixed by the Liverpool market. If that is true, where is the benefit to the western farmer? The only apparent justification of it that was made by any hon. member in so far as I can remember was made by the hon. member for Humboldt who said that the western farmer would be profited because there are some lower grades of wheat that might be admitted to the United States and that they would probably get a better price for this wheat over there. The lower grades of wheat are nothing more nor less than the raw materials of the farmers of this country, and if we ship out the lower grades of wheat we are shipping out that which we should keep for the purpose of feeding our hogs and cattle. Once more I say that you are in that respect doing injury to this country.

I was very much amused the other day when the hon. member for Red Deer was making his speech. We are all pleased to hear the hon. member for Red Deer because he always makes a very interesting speech, but I always feel sorry for him because he is the one man in this House who sticks to his free trade principles and is not afraid to make them known. I always feel that he is lonely when he is making a speech, that he is ploughing his lonely furrow, but it does always seem strange to me that he will advocate these principles notwithstanding the policy that has been practised in this country. He says that this agreement is to him a long step in the direction of free trade and he thinks that because free trade has been beneficial to England in days gone by it will be beneficial to Canada. The hon. gentleman is totally disregarding the conditions of the two countries. He said nimself the other day that Great Britain exported 1,600,000,000 dollars worth of manufactured goods. As compared with that Canada exports something like 30 million dollars worth. He knows that Canada is exporting about 150 million dollars worth of agricultural products; at the same time Great Britain is importing about 1,000 million dollars worth. The conditions in the two countries are entirely different. He also forgets the fact that there was a time in the history of Great Britain when she was in somewhat the same position that we are in to-day; that is that under a protective policy she so matured her manufactures that she eventually became supreme in the world and that she attained that position under and by virtue of a protective policy. After she became supreme in the world of manufactures protection became a thing that she no longer required and about forty years ago she abolished that system. The first move in the direction of abolishing the policy of protection for manufactured goods in Great Britain came from a protectionist government. Under the protective policy the industries of Great Britain grew to such an extent that she became supreme causing, to a certain extent, the farmers to abandon the fields, come to the towns and increase the consumption of the home products thereby decreasing the number who were engaged in agriculture. Therefore, agricultural produce became scarce and for that reason we find them taking the duties off corn. Hence we had the repeal of the corn laws.

But, the position of Canada to-day is exactly the reverse because we are producing more of agricultural products than we are consuming, and, if my hon. friend's argument is good as to England then the reverse of his argument is good as to Canada, and consequently the policy of a moderate protection is the proper policy for this country. The hon. gentleman from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) spoke truly when he said that annexation would be a revolution, and that revolutions took place only when there was discontent among the masses of the people. I grant that. He cited as instances of his proposition the beheading of Charles Ist, the French revolution, and the Rebellion of 1837 when the masses of the people were discontented, but what the hon. gentleman said with regard to political revolutions is just as true of fiscal revolutions. The fiscal revolution in Great Britain in 1840 was caused by the cry of the masses for cheaper bread; the fiscal revolution of 1878 in Canada when the Conservatives introduced the National Policy was a revolution caused by discontent, hard times, and soup kitchens. But, to-day both parties in the country admit that we were never in so prosperous a condition before, and that never were the people so contented, and yet this is the time chosen by the government for introducing a very real fiscal revolution in this country. Is there a man in this House, or out of it who will deny, that had a non-partisan plebiscite of the people been taken one year ago upon the question of whether or not they desired a reciprocal arrangement such as has been submitted by the government, less than 25 per cent of the people would have voted for it. Before taking this leap in the dark the people of Canada would have looked at the condition of the country. They would find that our trade had increased from $116,000,000 in 1866 to $533,000,000 last year; they would find that the deposits in our banks had increased from $33,000,000 in 1866 to $925,000,000 last year, and bank deposits are considered an evidence of the prosperity of a people; they would find that the railway mileage increased from 2,200 in 1866 to 24,000 miles last year, or sufficient mileage to encircle the globe; they would find that exports of manufactures had increased from $2,000,000 in 1866 to $31,000,000 last year; that the export of farm products had increased in the same period from $20,000,000 to $145,000,000, and last but not least, that owing to the increase of our manufactures and the consequent increase of the home market the people of Canada are themselves consuming from 80 per cent to 85 per cent of all the farm products produced in the country, and that of the balance, 80 per cent goes to Great Britain and not to the United States. Taking these facts together with the fact that there obtain in Canada today the best prices ever before known, would not the people of Canada declare that it was unwise to risk any change in our present prosperous condition. The hon. gentleman from Brandon (Mr. Sifton) quoted some figures to show the relatively high prices of food products in Canada as compared with manufactures, and on that important point I shall quote from the report of the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour as you know went to a great deal of trouble to ascertain the prices of food in the Dominion compared with the prices 10 or 15 years ago, and this is what he says in his report published this year:

For some time past, and especially since the beginning of the present century, one of the most important features of the general economic situation in Canada has been a rapid and continuous advance in prices and the cost of living. Reaching in 1907 a level unprecedented in many years previously, prices receded to some extent in 1908; the check, however, proved but temporary, and in the closing months of 1909 the high cost of living had become the subject of discussion throughout the community affecting as it did the immediate well-being of nearly every one, especially those of the wage-earning and other classes dependent on a fixed income.

In the United States as in Canada public feeling was greatly aroused. Boycotts against the use of meats and other provisions were undertaken in several localities, and numerous investigations into the nature and causes of the increase were conducted both on public and private initiative. 'When the history of 1910 come to be written,' says the editor of 'Bradstreet's Journal,' in an article published during March, 1910, 'not the least memorable of its happenings to be chronicled will probably be the great agitation, partaking of the proportions of a national revolt against the high prices of food.'

After going fully into the matter, under the heading 'What the Analyses Show,' he says:

From the above and other analyses several important central facts as to the general situation at present are set forth in the report. Of the great producing industries, agriculture seems to show the largest increase in prices. Crude farm products (grain, fodder, meat-producing animals, milk, eggs, wool, fruits, vegetables) have advanced by over 37 per cent, compared with the base decade. The products made therefrom (meats, bran, flour, hides, leather, &c.) have increased by over 34 per cent. On the other hand, imported foods are lower than they were during the decade 1890-1899. Fish products are nearly, but not quite, so high as farm products. Products of the mine are only slightly above the level of the decade, and, if coal be excluded, are below that average. Coming to Canadian manufactured products, the general level is about 14 per cent above the level of the base decade. Included in this estimate are various grades of Canadian lumber, which on an average, are 50 per cent dearer than during the base period. If lumber be excluded, the manufactured products of Canada show a gain of less than 10 per cent, compared with the decade 1890-1899.

This shows, according to the minister's own report, that farm products have advanced in price 37 per cent, and that manufactured products, excluding rough lumber have only advanced 10 per cent. Now, I want to say to the Minister of Finance this: Taking all these things into consideration, taking into consideration that 80 per cent (some say 85 per cent) of our farm products are consumed at home and that 80 per cent of the balance goes to Great Britain, and taking into account the fact that the price of farm products has increased 37 per cent as compared with 10 per cent increase in the price of manufactured articles, and taking into account that every one in the country appears to be satisfied—the western farmer alone complaining and pretty nearly every hon. member who has spoken in the House has admitted that the price of grain, which is the chief product of the western farmer, will not be increased by selling it in the United States—taking all these things into consideration I ask the Minister of Finance what was his warrant for making this arrangement with the United States. We are met with the argument that the United States could have taken off the duties, and that as a result the consequences of the present treaty would have taken place, meaning, of course, that had the United States taken off the duties our products would have gone into the United States anyway. Let us follow that up. For the last 45 years since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty the United States has maintained their duty against us and our products have not been admitted free into that market. But, the very moment that the United States wanted to get our agricultural products into their country free that very moment they could have placed them upon their free list, and the very fact that they asked us to enter into this arrangement was the first intimation we had that such an arrangement was necessary in the interests of the United States, and that they were demanding it because of pressure from within. The government must take either one of these two positions —either that the United States have granted us this treaty only because we have given them something in return, or that they would have done it anyway. If they take the ground that by reason of the concessions given to the United States this treaty has come into force, then they must stand or fall by the treaty as it is now, and we must in that case assume that there would have been no treaty if they had not given the concessions ; or they must take the other ground, that the United States would have taken off the duties anyway, in which case they stand in the position of having given all these concessions for nothing, of having disturbed unnecessarily our manufacturers, of having the farm products of thirteen or fourteen countries coming in free as well as those of the United States, of having killed our fruit industry, injured our packing, transportation and other industries, all for nothing. They must take either one horn of the dilemma or the other.

Now, let us inquire why the United States desired this reciprocity agreement. For fifty years they have held aloof; for fifty years their conduct was such that we were forced to carry on a trade with Great Britain. Let us see now what were the reasons why the United States changed that programme. The first reason was the high cost of living in the United States and the desire to lessen that cost, both Republicans and Democrats vying with each other in the struggle for ascendency in the coming elections; secondly, a desire to conserve their limited natural resources by the exploitation of ours; thirdly, a desire to increase their manufactures by an increased importation of raw materials and in return an increased exportation to us of the finished articles; fourthly, a desire to compel our trade routes to run north and south into the United States instead of east and west through our own provinces; fifthly, their policy of exclusion and our policy of commercial independence having resulted in our prosperity and the building up of an enormous trade with Great Britain, they feared that it would result in a greater preferential trade within the empire; and last, but not least, the successful negotiation of such a treaty would tend to the ultimate annexation of Canada to the United States, a dream always dear to the hearts of the American people, which would appeal to them irrespective of party.

Now, let us see the effect of the arrangement, speaking generally. The argument of our hon. friends opposite seems to be this, that if the price of agricultural products on the American side of the line is sometimes higher than the price on this side, that is the proper market. Looking at the matter casually, perhaps one would be apt to conclude that that is so. But Mr. Taft and all the other representative men on the other side of the line are advancing the argument there that the effect of this treaty will be to reduce the price of agricultural products on the other side. If it reduces the price on the other side, of course we lose the benefit of an increased price which might at first result on this side. In the meantime our trade will have found its way to the other side through American channels; and if an increased amount of product of the farms on the other side decreases the price there, it will decrease the amount here and consequently increase the price on our side. I do not think that can be disputed on general principles. But suppose at first the farmer here gets a little more for his agricultural products, what is the effect of that? These things go in cycles. If the farmer gets more for his products, the labourer and artisan who buys them have to have an increased wage; if they do, the manufacturer must have an increased price for his manufactured article; and when the farmer goes to buy a manufactured article, he finds that by reason of a little increase in the price of his product, he has to pay an increased price for the manufactured article he has to buy. Thus the thing seems to go round in a circle. But, generally speaking, the effect of this arrangement will be to decrease the price of agricultural products in the United States, so as to reduce the cost to the home consumer there, and if it does not do that Mr. Taft may annul this agreement any day he chooses to do so. It seems to me a very natural thing that since the United States exports a large quantity of agricultural products, and since we do the same, our natural market is Great Britain, which has a great deficiency, and not the United States. If you shove a bushel of grain into Minneapolis while the United States has a surplus to-day of 150,000,000 or 160,000,000 bushels of wheat, you are simply shoving another bushel out at New York; but the injury you are doing to the Canadian is that you are allowing the Yankee to take that bushel of wheat from Minneapolis to New York, and thence to Great Britain, thereby depriving the railways of Canada of the benefit of the transportation. That is the only effect it has. If it does not increase the amount of wheat that goes to the United States, it does not have the effect that hon. gentlemen opposite desire. I am not going to ask the House to accept my opinion on this. I am going to give a few quotations to show what the Americans think is going to be the result of this treaty; and I am not going to take them from the newspapers, but from the official documents. On the 13th of February last, a letter was written by James Wilson, the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture of the United States, and that letter was deemed of such importance by the American Congress that it was printed in the 'Congressional Record.' In that letter Mr. Wilson said:

> The United States produces a surplus of wheat. This is sold in foreign countries. The price of our exported surplus is governed by the world's requirements, being regulated by the supply and demand, and the price of wheat in the United States is governed by the price at which the surplus is sold.

I may interject that if that surplus is sold, then the price of wheat to the western farmer will not be affected by the removal of this duty. Then he goes on to say:

> While Canada is exporting wheat and other grains and the United States doing the same, there is no particular reason why Canadian wheat should come here, unless it be that a mixture of Canadian and American wheat may be desirable on the part of our milling exporters, and our millers may find it profitable to handle the Canadian surplus. But the price to the Canadian for this surplus wheat will be substantially the same whether sold in Europe or United States. However, if the handling of Canadian wheat by the United States railroads, merchants and mills has a tendency to reduce the price, it will be reduced to Canadians. In the western states, where the farmer has turned from grain-raising for sale, to the production of crops for feeding domestic animals on the farm, the new departure has been so profitable that lands in those states have risen in value to $100 to $200 per acre, and rents for from $4 to $6 an acre.

Let me read what was said by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCall) who introduced the Bill in the United States Congress. On the 4th of February last he spoke as follows:

> Both countries have long been exporters of wheat, although the surplus of Canada is steadily increasing and ours steadily diminishing, and yet we raise a very considerable surplus. In 1909 our exports of wheat and of flour in terms of wheat amounted to more than 114,000,000 bushels. In the same year the exports of wheat from the United States to Canada were greater than from Canada to the United States. The price of wheat in the United States, Canada, Russia and other wheat exporting countries are substantially adjusted with reference to the Liverpool price.
> For every bushel of wheat that would come in from Manitoba, so long as we raise a surplus another bushel would go out at New York. If we did not restrict its importation a tremendous impetus would be given to our flour-making industry and the trades dependent on it. The clearing of the transactions would create a business of an important financial character, much of the purchase price would be likely to find its way into the general channels of trade, and our American railways would have a profitable business which would aid in the maintenance and result in remunerative employment of labour. It may be said that the prosperity of Canadian railways would correspondingly decline. They would undoubtedly lose in the transportation of wheat, but they would gain in other directions.

He does not indicate in what directions. I do not think they would.

> Obviously they cannot simultaneously increase their production of wheat, barley, potatoes and other agricultural articles included in the Bill except as the number of her farmers increase.

What does President Taft say? He says in his message to Congress on January 26, 1911:

> Excluding the element of transportation, the price of staple food products, especially of cereals, is much the same the world over. . . . The currents of business and transportation facilities that will be established forward and back across the border cannot but inure to the benefit of the boundary states. . . . That the broadening of the sources of our food supplies, that the opening of the timber resources of the Dominion to our needs, that the addition to the supply of raw material will be limited to no particular section does not require demonstration.

On the same subject I quote:

Geo. E. Roberts, Director of United States Mint, as reported New Orleans 'Item'. February 4, 1911, said:

If our railroads can get into the Canadian Northwest and participate in the haul of wheat in that territory to the sea-board, they will benefit by the treaty. Employ more labour and that will be to the general benefit of the farmers as well as every one else. If that promotes the growth of our cities, such as Des Moines, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Chicago, there are certain to be incidental benefits to the farmers.

I find the following in the Buffalo 'Courier' of the 5th of February:

Buffalo 'Courier,' 5th February, 1911.

Any one familiar with political conditions in Canada realizes the remarkable growth of the sentiment that Canada is capable of getting along very comfortably and successfully without asking or receiving any special tariff favours from the United States. Years ago the high tariff wall on this side forced her to seek markets in other foreign countries, and she has succeeded so well, that a great many Canadians, who in former years advocated reciprocity with the United States are to-day opposed to the recently negotiated agreement, and undoubtedly the agreement would be rejected at Ottawa but for the commanding influence of the Laurier administration. . . .

The most surprising thing in connection with the pending agreement is that in view of the course of events during the last twenty years the Canadian negotiators consented to such broad and liberal concessions. Failure on our side to treat favourably the outcome of the negotiations would come to be regarded as an exhibition of folly so amazing as to be a national humiliation.

With the exception of the last two, these are all official quotations from the American representatives. Let me say a word or two on the question of barley, which I merely take as an illustration. At the first glance, when you take the articles covered by this agreement, and compare the prices in Canada with those on the other side of the line and find that the prices of some articles on the other side are higher than those on this side, you are apt to conclude that it would be beneficial to this country to export these to the United States; but if you examine the matter closely, you will come to a different conclusion. A fair illustration is the question of barley. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) said last night that it would be a great boon to our farmers if we could get our barley into the United States free of duty and my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said the same. I admit that, looking at the matter at first, I came to the same conclusion, but I have taken the trouble to go into the figures and find out the results. In 1890, when the McKinley tariff was put into operation, a duty of 30 cents per bushel was imposed on barley. The year before namely, 1889, we exported to the United States 10,000,000 bushels, but when that duty was imposed our exports fell in the year 1891 to 190,000 bushels. But what was the result? You would have thought that the farmers of this country would have stopped raising barley. That would be the natural inference, but I followed the matter out further, and I found that whereas in 1889 we produced some 28,000,000 bushels, in 1909 our farmers raised 55,398,000 bushels. And this in spite of that fact that although in 1889 we exported 10,000,000 bushels to the United States, in the tenth year that followed we exported only 268,000 bushels. Where, then, did the difference go? We are only exporting to all countries about 2,000,000 bushels; so we are consuming over 53 million bushels. Our farmers must have found it profitable to raise the barley or they would not have raised so much as they did, namely, 55,398,000 bushels in 1909. They would not have increased the amount raised in 1889 the year before the McKinley tariff was enacted, when they raised 28,000,000 bushels, to 55,000,000 bushels in 1909 unless it paid them to do so. How can we find out what made it profitable for them to raise this increased crop? The only answer is that the difference between what we raised and what we exported was being consumed in this country. The difference was being fed to our own hogs and cattle. Then figure it out in this way. Take the reports of the agricultural college at Guelph and you will find that from 3 to 3½ pounds of barley will make a pound of pork. In the 'Farmers Sun' I find that during the past five years the average price of hogs was $7 a hundred. Convert barley into pork and it figures out in this way. Three pounds of barley give a pound of live pork. At 7 cents per pound that figures out $1.12 per bushel. Or if I allow 3½ pounds of barley to a pound of pork, that still gives 96 cents a bushel for that barley. What is the result? You have 96 cents a bushel for your barley, giving the most unfavourable computation; and instead of sending your barley to feed the porkers on the other side, you have kept it at home, you have used it in raising your own hogs, in giving employment to your own butcher and packer, and in addition, instead of impoverishing your soil by sending your barley to the United States, you have enriched your farm by feeding the barley to your stock. You have put the product back into your farm and enriched your soil. Thus it was a Godsend, that duty of 30 cents imposed under the McKinley tariff. It was like putting an export duty on barley; just as that is true of barley, it is true of every other raw material which goes into the manufactured product, and by manufactured product in this connection I mean cattle, hogs and other animals.

It is claimed that it will be a good thing to our farmers to send their wheat to the United States and get two or three cents more per bushel for it, but in sending their wheat our farmers are sending the bran and other by-products, instead of keeping them in this country to feed to their cattle.

What my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) said is quite right, namely, that our better class of cattle is shipped to Great Britain and the inferior class, the stockers, to the United States. But what are these inferior cattle fed with in the United States? They are fed with the corn and with all these by-products which we send to the United States when we send them our wheat and other grains. Yet they tell us this is going to be a benefit to this country although they admit that the price of wheat is only two cents more and some even say it is no more.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) referred to preferential trade. If the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) were here I would say he would be very much surprised when he found the position taken by his leader on that question. My hon. friend says he came to this country in 1896. If he had come before 1896, if he had followed the tortuous sinuosities of his honoured leader in respect to the trade question, it would make him dizzy. Since 1896 we have had only one trade policy in this country, as was testified by the member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) and the member for Welland (Mr. German) this afternoon, and that is the National Policy. I could tell my hon. friend that while he was taunting the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) with having advocated mutual preferential trade he little knew he was taunting his own leader, that while he taunted the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) with setting up a wax doll he was taunting his own leader for the same offence. It was in 1896, the year the hon. member arrived, that the Prime Minister said, speaking at Toronto on June 13, as reported in the 'Globe,' with reference to imperial preferential trade:

> I agree with him (Sir Charles Tupper) in regard to preferential trade. This is a new idea and one which in itself is fraught with greatness not only for the Canadian people, but for the British Empire at large. And now the principle is proclaimed that there shall be preferential trade within the empire at large. That is to say that England and her colonies should trade upon a footing of preference over other nations. Imagine what would be the consequences if the products of Canada, the wheat, the barley, the oats, the butter, the cheese, which we are sending to England were to be accepted in the British markets on terms of preference over the products of the United States, of Russia and all the other countries which are competing with us in the market. The advantages are obvious, so obvious that the moment I saw the idea I jumped at it and immediately declared myself in favour of it.

The Prime Minister jumped at the wax doll of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) as soon as the idea was suggested to him. I am sorry to say the Prime Minister did not adhere to his policy. I heartily concurred with the Prime Minister when he made that statement and I think that is something for which we should strive to-day, notwithstanding what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite.

In November last, speaking in this House to the Prime Minister, I said:

> He is about to negotiate for reciprocity with the United States. I ask him not to forget reciprocity within the empire when he is carrying on those negotiations with the United States, I ask him to place nothing in the way of that mutual preferential trade within the empire the attainment of which I think is only a matter of years. I ask him to place no stumbling block in the way of that reciprocity but to follow the policy which he enunciated in Toronto.

Mr. PATERSON. When was this said?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. About the 26th of November.

Mr. PATERSON. It was then contemplated that there were to be reciprocal dealings?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. This was not sprung on the people?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. No, the point I make—

Mr. PATERSON. That is the point I am making.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. It was then known that the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance were in the United States negotiating for a reciprocity treaty, and I asked the Prime Minister then not to overlook the question of reciprocity within the empire. Notwithstanding that the First Minister of this country said about 13 or 14 days before he was elected by the people of this country, that if placed in power he would go to Great Britain and endeavour to get Great Britain to immediately inaugurate a policy of preferential trade whereby the farm products of Canada would receive a preference in Great Britain, notwithstanding he did that and was elected on that promise, the very first thing he did was to go to England and say: We do not want a preference in your market at all. And then they say Great Britain has not done for us what she should have done for us in the way of mutual preferential trade, when they themselves went over and gave a black eye to the policy.

It is said there was no discrimination as to the present preferential tariff in the proposed arrangement now before the House. I do not think any one can seriously contend that. But, I observe that the Minister of Finance telegraphed to Mr. Asquith as follows:

So far as British importations into Canada are concerned the British preference would be scrupulously maintained.

And the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), in speaking in this House, said:

I am absolutely convinced in my own mind that I am correct in what I state, that in no way, shape or form, in no way, general or particular, we are interfering with British interests in Canada by the proposal now before the chair.

Let me give two illustrations from the large list to prove that this is absolutely incorrect. When the Finance Minister said that the British preference would be scrupulously observed he was certainly not within the facts. We were receiving from England at the time this arrangement was made, in the last fiscal year, $3,500,000 of rolled iron plate, which came in from Great Britain free. If Great Britain had had to pay the same duty as the United States on that quantity we would have collected in duty from her $175,000. Under the proposed arrangement she has not that advantage over her rival, because it is now made free to the United States; and at the same time we were collecting actually from the United States $137,000 on what we imported from her. To-day the United States will pay nothing whatever. In the face of that, how can any one say that the British preference has been scrupulously observed? Just another instance.

In the last fiscal year we imported from Great Britain $256,000 worth of salt and from the United States $141,000. The English salt was free, but the United States came in at 5 cents a hundred pounds, or about $36,000 duty was saved to Great Britain, while the United States paid $25,000. To-day the United States pay no duty whatever and Great Britain has no preference of $36,000, with respect to the duty on salt. In the face of these facts, how can any one say the British preference has been scrupulously observed?

I find the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in his speech saying that:

Rolled iron plates represent seven-eighths of the British free list represented in schedule 'A.'

And further on:

When you look at the schedules of the goods that come in from Great Britain you will find they are made up nearly all of goods that sell on their own brand or patent. By reason of their inherent virtue they not only come into this country but in the face of a 40 per cent to 50 per cent duty they go into the United States and are sold there.

The hon. gentleman says he is justified in taking the duty off these other articles because they now go into the United States and climb over a duty of 40 per cent or 50 per cent. That means that this is a case where the British preference is not a preference, so that when hon. gentlemen have been maintaining that they have given Great Britain a preference upon this particular article and that the same article can climb over a 40 per cent or a 50 per cent wall in the United States, it is clear that the importations into Canada are not due to the preference at all. But if you apply the same argument that these particular English goods sell because of some particular brand, or because of their known qualities, then I suppose that argument would apply to a great number of all the remaining importations from Great Britain, because most of the importations of Great Britain come in because of their particular brand, or their particular quality, or their known virtue. So the argument if carried out to its logical conclusion, would be that you do not need the British preference at all, because the goods sell on account of their particular brand. I would like to ask the English merchants if they think that is a fair argument to them? I do not think they would accept it as a reason for decreasing the British preference. But while this arrangement makes an inroad on the present British preference, that is practically nothing in comparison with the fact that it strikes a death blow to the hope of mutual preferential trade. You cannot have a mutual preferential trade between Great Britain and Canada whereby you expect to have a preference on your agricultural products in Great Britain, if you are allowing the same class of agricultural products to come in, not only from the United States, but from thirteen other nations of the world as well. The minute you do that you say good-bye to that mutual preferential trade which the Prime Minister himself led the people of this country to believe we would obtain when, in 1896, he said in Toronto: Place me in power and I will give you mutual preferential trade. You will say good-bye to that same policy, too, of which the Prime Minister, in 1909, spoke as follows:

Canada has opened her doors to Great Britain in hopes that she would ultimately receive similar preferential treatment from the mother country.

That is what he said in 1909, and yet his government brings down a measure to-day which absolutely kills the prospect of mutual preferential trade within the empire. I say that considering the former fiscal policy of Great Britain, and the policy of free trade in Great Britain, as enforced since 1842 until the present day, and that except during the last twenty years or so no man in Great Britain would dare to suggest any other than a free trade policy; considering the fact that in the elections of January, 1910, there were 379 Liberals in the British House of Commons before the dissolution, and that in a month afterwards when the elections were over, there were only 275 Liberals, a decrease of 104; and considering the fact that in January, 1910, before the dissolution, there were only 157 Unionists who favour tariff reform, and after the election there were 273 Unionists, with a diminution of 104 in the Liberal majority and an increase of 116 in the Unionist minority, it is evident that a fiscal revolution is taking place in Great Britain, and that a preference within the empire would shortly be within the reach of the Canadian people if this measure were defeated. But unfortunately, as I say, the present agreement kills that. Let me now read what Sir George Ross said, speaking only last November, on the same subject:

So long as the British Empire endures we may expect the British market to be accessible to us. If we have any favours to bestow that is the market with the strongest claim, or if we anticipate any favours such as a preference over foreign traders it is in the British market that these favours are most likely to be obtained, we certainly would not look for them in the markets of the United States. One thing is certain we cannot have reciprocity in wheat and British preference at the same time.

Now let us see how this arrangement affects the farmer. Firstly, it gives to the farmer, in answer to his demands for free, or a greatly reduced duty on agricultural implements, a paltry reduction of two and a half per cent, which will result in no reduction in the price. I have no hesitation in making this statement; if I had, I would quote the speech of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) when he said:

It, (meaning this treaty) cannot materially affect trade with the United States or imports from the United States, because there is not enough reduction in any instance to allow American manufacturers to compete with the Canadian manufacturers.

I may point out that under this arrangement no change can be made whatever if the government thought it wise to reduce the duty on agricultural implements, because that would end the treaty. By diverting the grain through American channels, this arrangement lessens the use and the chance of adoption of government owned or operated elevators. For the same reason it lessens the prospect of usefulness and of building the Hudson Bay railway and the Georgian Bay canal. Because its tendency is to send coarse grains and by-products as raw material to feed American cattle and stock it will lessen the amount of stock raised in Canada and thus lessen the use of cold storage or chilled meat systems and lessen the use and prospect of government operation of same and place the meat trade more than ever in American hands and give a death blow to prospects of mixed farming in the west. Because it will lessen traffic on Canadian railways it will tend to maintain present high rates. Because at one fell swoop it opens all the food and agricultural products of the United States free to the Canadian market with all the uncertainties attached thereto, and gives him no reduction on the manufactured goods he has to buy. Because it opens the flood gates and allows free importation of all farm products to practically every country in the world to compete with the Canadian farmer. Let me read what the New York 'Journal' says on this very question. Commenting on Austen Chamberlain's speech it says, on the 12th of February:

He said that the result of diverting Canadian wheat to the United States would be the cultivation of other crops in that country and the constantly increasing drain on Canadian supplies heretofore sent to England. If this is so, the corollary would be that more of these supplies would go to England from the United States. He also said, that the railroad trains that brought these supplies into the United States would carry back American manufactures to the detriment of British producers. Another result would be that an enormous stimulus would be given to stock raising in the United States.

It goes on to comment:

Whatever the force or validity of this argument from the narrower British, or the Chamberlain point of view, it is distinctly in favour of the reciprocity arrangement regarded from the American point of view.

Then the Springfield 'Republican' of the 13th February says this:

But removal of tariff would greatly benefit our transportation interests and enable the currents of trade to move in their natural channels, north and south across the border, instead of compelling unnatural movements, east and west, . . . if we could sweep away all tariffs between the two countries it would have the effect upon our trade of another Louisiana purchase. And this Bill is drawn on the way to that great end.

I will not go into details as to the effect this trade would have on the different industries, but as to market gardeners in my section of the country, it will affect them very injuriously, and I suppose it will in every other section of the country. I find that in 1910, notwithstanding the duty upon vegetables and other market-garden products coming into Canada, they sent into this country $830,000, worth with a tariff averaging about 30 per cent. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly those representing constituencies where market gardening is flourishing, what effect that is going to have in their constituencies. If that amount of goods are brought in under a 30 per cent tariff, market garden industry, will be ruined under free trade. Now, the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., in referring to the question of wheat, admitted this argument would not increase the price of wheat but he did not discuss the effect of letting it in free from all the other countries. I want to point out that we have not sufficient data and statistics from the government upon which we can make a reasonable computation as to the result. But after endeavouring to get what I could, after resorting to what information is contained in the Library, and after getting information from the Board of Trade in New York and the Board of Trade in Montreal, getting in this indirect way information which should have been given to us by the government, I have come to the conclusion that the farmers are going to suffer to a much larger extent than we expected by reason of allowing the farm products of these foreign countries to come into our markets free.

Let me take the question of wheat. The Argentine Republic had in 1895 a population of 3,954,000 ; in 1908 she had a population of 6,489,000. In 1895 the area under cultivation in the Argentine Republic was a little over 12,000,000 acres ; in 1909 the area was over 46,000,000 acres. The acreage brought under cultivation, therefore, has increased four times more rapidly than the population. That is the best kind of proof you can have that Argentine is a strictly agricultural country. The amount of wheat exported by Argentine in 1900 was 48,000,000 bushels in 1909, 106,000,000 bushels. That is just twice as much as Canada exported. Under this arrangement it is permissible for that wheat to come into Canada free. I make this statement that a bushel of wheat can be sent from Buenos Ayres to Halifax more than twice as cheaply as a bushel of wheat can be sent from Regina to Halifax. The Postmaster General said the other evening that a labourer in the Argentine Republic received 64 cents a day without board. Hon. members from the west know better than I do what labour can be got for in the west; they know that you have to pay $55 or $60 a month at least with board. With the conditions in the Argentine Republic they can grow wheat more cheaply and deliver it at Buenos Ayres much more cheaply than we can deliver it at Regina. Wheat can be shipped from Buenos Ayres to Liverpool, according to a letter I have here from the New York Produce Exchange, for 8 shillings 6 pence per ton of 2,240 pounds, which, figured out, gives us 5⅞ cents per bushel. The Minister of Agriculture the other night said that Halifax was farther away from Buenos Ayres than Liverpool. I believe that Halifax is a little nearer than Liverpool, but a question of 100 or 200 miles in marine transportation, after you have the product loaded, does not amount to anything. Wheat from Buenos Ayres can be laid down at Liverpool, and therefore, at Halifax, for 5⅞ cents per bushel. According to the rates given me by the Canadian Pacific railway you have to pay 5 cents a bushel from Fort William to Montreal, and they add to that 11 cents a bushel from Regina to Fort William. Thus, the rate is 16 cents from Regina to Montreal as compared with 5⅞ cents from Buenos Ayres to Halifax. They give the same through rate down to St. John as to Montreal. What does that mean? Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and Prince Edward Island all consume more wheat than they raise. Ontario alone consumes 11,000,000 bushels more wheat than she raises. If these figures are correct, and I have no doubt they are, with the cheaper wheat of Buenos Ayres and with the cheaper transportation to Halifax, Argentine wheat is going to supply Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario, because all these provinces consume more wheat than they raise, and if they can get it cheaper from Argentine they are going to buy it. The result will be that Argentine wheat will supply the whole eastern portion of Canada, and the western wheat will be driven down into the United States. I have only taken up one article. I could take the question of chilled meat. The Argentine Republic exported $21,000,000 worth of chilled meat last year. The rate for chilled meat to Liverpool is less than a cent a pound. With cheap labour in the Argentine Republic, with cheap wheat that is necessary to feed cattle and hogs and a transportation rate of less than a cent a pound, do you mean to tell me that you cannot flood this country with cheap meat from the Argentine Republic, and that it will not be possible to destroy our home industry with reference to cattle and hogs? That is only one country. I have not had time to go into the 12 other countries. My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) pointed out the same thing with reference to New Zealand and Australian butter, lambs, and chilled mutton, and I think that if we were to go into this matter we could prove the truth of this argument with reference to a great many other countries. But we have not the time, and they have not given us any information. My hon. friend from St. Antoine tells me that Argentine meat can be laid down for less than 7 cents a pound, duty paid. If that is the case there seems to be no doubt in the world that it will undermine entirely the home meat trade.

Let me show you how it affects my own little town with respect to transportation alone, and I have no doubt that every man could adduce some argument with reference to his own constituency. Owen Sound has a population of 13,000 or 14,000 and the Canadian Pacific railway lake terminal is situated there. This year, according to the board of trade reports, I find that we brought down from the west in mill products and grain 160,000 tons, and we sent back in package freight a like amount—160,000 tons. If you figure that out you will find out that it would give a cargo of 1,000 tons to 320 ships, and I may say that we have a great marine traffic at Owen Sound largely composed of grain, flour and by-products coming down and packing freight going back. If this arrangement has the effect that hon. gentlemen claim on behalf of the farmers of the west it will have, that is if it sends grain from the west through the United States, that grain will never reach Fort William. They say it is going to send it to Minneapolis, and St. Paul, and if it does not do that it is not going to benefit the farmer of the west as they claim and he is not going to send his wheat to the United States. But, I am assuming for the purpose of my argument that this arrangement is going to do what they say it is, that is it will send the greater portion of this wheat down to Minneapolis and St. Paul over American railways, and the consequence will be that the town of Owen Sound will be deprived of this remunerative and beneficial trade which gives employment to 320 ships with an average cargo of 1,000 tons each.

In another way it will injure Owen Sound—by reason of the increased traffic in grain coming down and in package freight going back, so large has become the shipping in the port that a dry dock must be established and I understand the plans submitted to the government for a dry dock at Owen Sound have recently been approved. And, if the carrying of that freight is going to be diverted from our lake ports as the government say it will be, and if that wheat goes to Minneapolis and St. Paul we will have less use for a dry dock at Owen Sound. I could point to many other instances where this policy will injure the people of Canada, but these occur to me now in relation to my own town of Owen Sound. A word now to the western farmer and I trust he will pardon me. I would ask him if it would not be far better to continue to foster our trade with Great Britain which now takes eight-tenths of our exports of agricultural products; I would ask him, would it not be better to have our trade continue in channels east and west, and because of competition between the railways, and with the assistance of the Railway Commission thereby reducing the rates. If this agreement should have the effect it is said it will have, it will decrease the traffic east and west by increasing the traffic north and south to the United States, and if the traffic of the Canadian railways is decreased our railways will have to increase their rates to make the roads pay. If you decrease the railway freight traffic in western Canada by sending it over American railways, what is going to become of the Grand Trunk Pacific with respect to which we have provided that if it becomes a failure we have to take it over and operate it. I fear that this arrangement will have the effect of throwing on our hands the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Then, I ask the western farmer: Would it not be better for him to have for the wheat going through Canada, government operated or owned terminal elevators; I ask him would it not be better for him to have government operation of the Hudson Bay railway; I ask him would it not be better for him to have established a complete system of government cold storage and chilled meat plants; I ask the western farmer would it not be better for him to have a substantial reduction in the duty on agricultural implements, and I ask him would it not be better for him and for all of us to have complete control of our own tariff, to maintain our self respect, and to strengthen the ties that bind us to the old land by mutual preferential trade. I think, Sir, that the consummation of these policies I have enumerated would be much more beneficial to the western farmer than would the carrying into effect of the arrangement which the government proposes. Now, a word or two with reference to the annexation question and, the remarks which I shall quote on this point, I shall take from official sources. I shall first of all cite the opinions of eminent statesmen in the United States as to the bearing of this treaty on the question of annexation. Senator Sherman made a speech in 1888 in which he gave his opinion as to the effect of reciprocity, and he said:—

> The way to union with Canada is not by hostile legislation but by friendly overtures. This union is one of the things that must inevitably come in the future. The true policy of the government is to tender freedom in trade and intercourse and to make the tender in such a fraternal way that it shall be an overture to the Canadian people to become a part of the republic.

That is the language of a man who occupied a very prominent position in the United States.

President Taft in his message, says:—

They are coming to the parting of the ways. They must soon decide whether they are to regard themselves as isolated permanently from our markets by a perpetual wall or whether we are to be commercial friends.

President Taft in his speech at Columbus, Ohio, on the 11th of February last, used this language:—

The greatest reason for adopting this agreement,' he said. 'is the fact that it is going to unite two countries with kindred people, and lying together across a wide continent, in a commercial and social union, to the great advantage of both. Such a result does not need to be justified by a nice balancing of pecuniary profit to each. Its undoubted general benefit will vindicate those who are responsible for it.

'I say this in order that by answering the arguments directed to the detailed effect of the agreement upon different classes of persons I may not be thought to abandon the broad ground upon which the opportunity to confirm this agreement ought to be seized.'

I will not quote Champ Clark's speech in the House of Representatives in which he, as we all know, declared his object was annexation, and while it is sought by some to make out that he was joking I think the leader of the opposition has thoroughly disproved that. This is what Champ Clark said upon the hearing before the Ways and Means Committee on the 4th of February last:—

Mr. CLARK. What are you going to do if we annex Canada?

Mr. FINK. That is something I had not thought of.

Mr. CLARK. You had better think of it, because that is what we are all fixing to do.

Senator McColl, who introduced the Bill into Congress, according to the report of 'Congressional Record,' said in his very first sentence, and I suppose it was the thought uppermost in his mind:—

The Bill takes a long step towards establishing for the continent of North America a policy of unrestricted trade and commerce, recognizing natural conditions that have been too long ignored.

Then, Representative E. J. Hill, of Connecticut, speaking in Congress on the 13th of February last, said:—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. If instead of this very limited reciprocity now proposed between these two countries, the question was presented to this House to-day of complete political union of both peoples in one magnificent government holding full control over all the North American continent between the Rio Grande River and the Arctic sea, no man here would say it 'nay.' (Applause.)

Congressman Martin, of South Dakota, speaking on February 13, said:—

I have often said I would like to see Canada annexed to the United States.

Then Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, an open letter to the National Grange on February the 10th, wrote:—

If this reciprocity treaty becomes the law of both countries, our relations with Canada will become more intimate and our trade with her will extend and increase. We will become more and more one people. The adoption of the pending treaty would from the national standpoint be as much an act of wisdom as was the adoption of treaties in the past that have added to our common country more than half its present area.

I quote from a speech delivered the other day in Chicago by P. C. Knox, Secretary of State of the United States, and this speech was delivered after Champ Clark's utterance and therefore was even more guarded than usual; Mr. Knox said:—

A trenchent writer on Canadian politics has observed that: a bitter cry went up (in Canada) for annexation to the United States after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty with the United States in 1886.

Now, it will be noted that the only word printed in italics in this whole speech is the word 'after,' and what is the inference from that? Mr. Secretary Knox desires this treaty to be passed; he knows that Champ Clark's utterances have injured the prospects of its carrying in Canada, and he is very guarded, but notwithstanding he deems it necessary to use the word 'after' in the quotation given above and the word 'after' is italicized and the inference is that after the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was concluded annexation was likely, and that after the present reciprocity treaty goes into effect annexation will again be more likely to be consummated. Later on he said:—

In the higher atmosphere and broader aspect of the situation it is certain that if there should be any great world movement involving this continent Canada and the United States would, as a matter of course, act in the most perfect concert in defence of the common rights of a common blood and civilization.

He concludes his speech in these words:

So that the reasons for reciprocity are very real and striking, and ought to lift the consideration of the result of the recent negotiations to a high plane and large-minded comprehension of the greater reasons and motives of human and national relations and rise above the mere balancing of trade advantages.

They have been telling us all along that it is a mere question of dollars and cents. Here is the Secretary of State of the United States saying that it is not a question of dollars and cents, nor a mere question of trade advantages, but he says it should be regarded from the 'high plane and large-minded comprehension of the greater reasons and motives of human and national relations.' Any one can read between these lines and see perfectly well what is the intention.

Let me point out to you the letter written by the United States Secretary of Agriculture which was printed on February 13, 1911, as a public document by the United States Congress. Why was it necessary for him to cut out of that letter, before it was printed on the records of Congress, the words which I am going to read? Because he knew that they expressed what was in his mind too freely, and he did not want them to appear in a public document which would probably be read in Canada. These are the words he cut out:

The several additions to our territory in the west from foreign nations were made over the protest of many people of the days in which they were made. But a majority of the statesmen of the days took the broad view and the fair view of the future of their country, and these several purchases were made. Without them, especially the Louisiana purchase, the United States would be a much less important country to-day than it is. There was vigorous opposition to the acquisition of territory from Mexico, notably with regard to Texas, but the statesmen of that day took the broad, national view and the purchases along our southwestern border are to-day exceedingly important. There was an objection made to the purchase of Alaska. It was regarded as unwise, but the broad view and the fair view were taken by Seward and other statesmen of that day, and Alaska was added. This might be said of other purchases.

Whether any more additions are to be made to the United States in this hemisphere the future will have to tell. Nothing is being said at the present time in either country with regard to political union with Canada. Far-seeing statesmen on the other side of the Atlantic say that the United States has opened the door a little to Canada, and that it may be opened wider in the future. However that may be, any one who glances at the map of North America, and whoever studies the trade relations between the United States and Canada, will have to conclude, unless they are immediately interested in the effects of reciprocity, that the closest possible trade relations between the two great peoples would seem to be desirable.

I would like to know why the Secretary of Agriculture omitted that passage from his address. There seems to be no other conclusion than that he had in his mind the thought that reciprocity would lead to annexation, and that the appearance of this passage in the official record might interfere with the adoption of the treaty by Canada.

Now, I will give you what some of the newspapers on the other side have said W. R. Hearst the proprietor of the New York 'American,' a couple of months ago said:

Let us have commercial union first, and political union afterwards.

The New York 'Mail,' of the 9th February, 1911, said:

Let not Americans fix their gaze so intently upon barley or wood pulp that they miss the comprehensive view.

What does that mean? The 'comprehensive view' means ultimate annexation.

The Newark 'Star' of the 11th of February said:

But we should not begrudge advantages under reciprocity to Canada, for they are bound to come back to us with much greater value. Every American farmer who settles in Canada takes his nationality with him and helps to loosen the tie which unites Canada to Great Britain. The thousands of American farmers who settle in the northwestern provinces look to Washington rather than to Ottawa. They are imbued with American traditions and American patriotism. They have no idea of expatriating themselves. The time is not far distant when the question of the annexation of Canada to the United States will have become a burning issue on both sides of the border. And when that time comes the American element in Canada will make itself heard and felt.

The New York 'World' of the 11th of February said:

Trade between the United States and Canada should be as free as trade between the states. There is no more sense in dividing them by a tariff wall than in dividing New York and Pennsylvania.

Which means that we should become a state of the American union. The Detroit 'News' of the 8th of February said:

Lord Lansdowne confesses much when he says:

Reciprocity means a diminution of the advantage enjoyed by British trade under the preference now given by Canada, and also the deflection of wheat to the United States. The whole history of the empire is surely altered if the great Dominions are encouraged to develop, not on national and imperial lines, but in accordance with geographical conditions.

The Buffalo 'Times' of the 9th of February said:

Every howl which comes across the water from those British Bourbons furnishes an argument for the friends of reciprocity in the United States and Canada.

I am simply giving these opinions because I want to photograph public opinion on the other side of the line, and put that against what hon. gentlemen opposite are saying, and I cannot photograph public opinion better than by quoting what the officials of the United States and the newspapers of the United States say. The New York 'American' of the 11th of February says:

Mr. James J. Hill was probably not far from the mark when he said in his speech in St. Paul the other night that if reciprocity with Canada falls through at this time negotiations for a trade agreement may never be renewed between the Dominion and the United States. What may effectually block the resumption of reciprocity conferences is in brief British Imperialism. Without Canada the Chamberlain dream of an Imperial federation can only succeed in part, if at all, and without the Dominion it can scarcely be effective

The New York 'Evening Post' of the 10th of February, commenting on Mr. Balfour's speech, says:

Mr. Balfour has condemned the Canadian reciprocity agreement as 'an Imperial disaster.' To the tariff reform Imperialists the probability that effect will be given to the agreement is indeed galling.

I have given these quotations for the purpose of showing what the sentiment is on the other side of the line. But some hon. members in this House have said that because we trade very intimately with a country that is no reason for supposing there is any danger of political annexation or absorption. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) and the hon. member from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) have pointed to the great trade existing between Germany and England, saying that there was no danger of annexation there, and therefore there was no danger of annexation between Canada and the United States. I think they were begging the question entirely. What is the difference between the two cases? Great Britain has a population of 45,000,000 and Germany has a population of about 65,000,000. Great Britain is separated from Germany by a sea on which Great Britain is supreme. Canada is separated from the United States by an imaginary line 3,000 miles long. Great Britain is separated from Germany by a foreign language; here both countries have the same language. The difference between Great Britain and Germany in population and capital is not very great as compared with the difference between Canada and the United States.

What I say is this. A better and a truer comparison would be, not to compare Canada with Germany, but to compare the little several states of which Germany is composed and see what was their fate and then you will find an example or what may happen here. Because where do you find Germany to-day? You find that she has absorbed all these little states around her. She was originally Prussia, but by reason of her strength and prowess she absorbed all the little surrounding states, whose people were practically of the same race and spoke the same tongue; and by reason of the position she occupies to-day, she is the dominant power in the whole continent of Europe. There can be no doubt about that. Austria and Hungary dare not to-day be anything else but her ally and they know it. Hungary dare not be anything but an ally and practically a portion of the kingdom of Austria, because Austria, and not Hungary is the dominant power, and Germany is the dominant power over the whole of them. The result is that Germany, by reason of her power of absorption, is to-day the dominating influence in Europe; and the result in Canada, should this arrangement go through, will be just as it has been in the states surrounding Germany. Just as Germany absorbed these little states so will the United States absorb Canada, and we will be politically annexed to that country. Is there a man in this House who will say that he would contemplate any such future with any degree of content? Why, what is the position in which we are to-day as compared with that in which the United States were a hundred years ago. The United States then had a population of 6,000,000, just the same as we had in the beginning of the present century, and that population was scattered along the eastern coast of that country from Maine to Florida. They had not a single railway going from east to west. They were simply a fringe of humanity looking out on the ocean, with their backs to the west which was practically unknown. They had not a railway or canal or the advantage of modern transportation in any respect. They had not a city on their western coast or any distance inland. At the beginning of the present century we start off with a population exactly the same as the United States had at the beginning of last century, namely 6,000,000. We consist of nine provinces bound together by two or three transcontinental railways. We have cities, not only on our eastern coast, but all away across the continent—Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria. We have a railway mileage of some 24,000 miles, whereas the United States then had not a single mile of railway. We have all the advantages of modern agricultural methods and of modern traction methods. With these advantages there is, therefore, no comparison between what the Dominion of Canada may expect in the next hundred years as compared with what the United States had reason to expect a hundred years ago. If that be so, why not keep on the course in which we have started? Why not go on developing our resources for the advantage of our own people and not hand them over to the United States.

Taking all things into consideration, taking in view the fact there is such a great increase in the prices of agricultural products, that to-day, by the evidence of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) himself, the prices of agricultural products in Canada are 37 per cent higher than they were in former years, I fail to see how the government can have made up its mind to push through this treaty, more especially considering that no opportunity has been given our people to formulate their views on the subject.

The other evening the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) said this—and I presume it is the best possible argument that could be given why the government should submit this agreement to the people before putting it into operation. He said:

It is well known that on two occasions, especially the government of Canada made an exhaustive and careful examination into the tariff affairs of this country. Before the tariff of 1897 was brought down the government adopted a policy which was never adopted before, of taking the people into council, of going through the length and breadth of the country, and taking evidence, &c., before giving an opinion on the question at issue.

Could there be a more complete answer to the question, why not submit this agreement to the people, than the words of the Minister of Agriculture himself, with reference to a revision of the tariff in 1897, far less radical than the one now proposed. In 1905, when another revision, far less radical, was proposed, the government took the opinions of the people in the same way. Why not then take the opinion of the people when we have a fiscal revolution proposed of the character presented in this Bill? My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) said that such a course was never taken before the present government took it. Let me call his attention to this fact. He entirely omitted to mention that when the hon member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), then Minister of Finance, proposed to bring down a revision of the tariff in 1894, a committee composed of Mr. Foster, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Mr. Clark Wallace and Mr. Angers, held meetings throughout the whole Dominion for the purpose of getting the opinion of the people, and such meetings were duly advertised. Yet the Minister of Agriculture says that 1897 was the first time such a commission was put into operation in this country.

In conclusion I will say that unless the people of Canada prefer annexation and consequently absorption by the great country to the south of us, in preference to what has always been our ambition, and what we are rapidly realizing—the dream of a mighty nation within the empire— they will repudiate the present pact.

There are many things impelling us in the direction of annexation, and it is not necessary to make a charge against hon. members opposite of purposely aiming at annexation. But I say that our position, our environment is such, that this agreement, if carried out, must inevitably lead to that end. I say that with our present position, with an imaginary boundary line of 3,000 miles, with a joint commission looking after our waterways, with another looking after our fisheries, and with another joint commission which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has failed to bring down so far, but which he has threatened to bring down later, and which is apparently going to control our telegraph, express and telephone rates—with all these, and with a population of 8,000,000 striving with one of 90,000,000 to 100,000,000, with all these compelling forces, with the natural attraction of small bodies towards large ones, especially when such attraction is facilitated by the fact that the two people are of the same race, language and environment, and with the keen desire of the American people for amalgamation, is there any man so wise and so prophetic as to be able to say that ere many years shall have passed we shall not have lost our identity in the realization of that long cherished dream of our southern neighbours, the annexation of this country to the United States.

Of what avail then the boast of Sir Wilfrid Laurier that if the 19th century belonged to the United States, the 20th will belong to Canada. It looks as if the 19th century not only belonged to the United States but the 20th as well would belong to that country and Canada with it. Long before the sunset and evening star of our 20th century, long before its twilight and evening bell, yes, long before its noontide arrives, we shall as a nation have crossed the bar, lulled to sleep and lured to death, through this insidious pact, into commercial, political and national absorption with the great republic to the south of us, only to add a few more stars to the original thirteen on the banner of the American republic.

For all these reasons, I say that those who have the best interests of the country at heart should come to the conclusion that this Bill ought not to pass.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DRINKING WATER.

Mr. LEWIS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 131) respecting drinking water.

He said: The Bill I wish to introduce is as follows:

AN ACT RESPECTING DRINKING WATER.

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. This Act may be cited as The Drinking Water Act.

2. No corporation or municipality shall take any water for drinking purposes from any stream or river which has had sewage or refuse put in it above the intake pipe, without first having such water sterilized.

3. Any corporation or municipality violating the provisions of section 2 of this Act shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine of not exceeding two hundred dollars for each day during which such violation continues.

4 This Act shall come into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

My object is to call the attention of the government to the serious condition now existing in this city and to the necessity of taking immediate active steps to remedy that condition and at the same time guard against epidemic in other parts of the country. When I introduced a Bill with reference to sewage, I stated that there was no such thing as an epidemic of typhoid in England or France, but that the disease in these countries was confined to some isolated cases. In that respect these countries are in remarkable contrast with our own. In this city, one out of every 50 inhabitants is down with typhoid; and medical men say that while a great many of the cases are of a mild character, the disease is dangerous even in its mild form. In the pulpit and in other public places in this city, we are told that where typhoid is epidemic, those responsible should be indicted. It must not be forgotten that the sewage which this city discharges into the Ottawa river travels some 700 miles and thus is apt to contaminate the cities of Montreal and Quebec which are not so far distant. It may be objected that this is not a matter which comes under federal jurisdiction, but which belongs to the provinces, but I would point out that in a matter so grave as this, and which may become interprovincial at any moment, this parliament surely ought to have jurisdiction. We all take pride in the city of Ottawa. It is our national capital, and I do not believe there is better air anywhere than one can breathe outside these buildings, but it is a blot on our country that the seat of government should be afflicted with this epidemic. Every day the epidemic is increasing, and I ask the right hon. the leader of the government and the hon. the leader of the opposition whether it is not high time that parliament should do something to eradicate it. Will it not be wiser to vote Supply and prorogue this House and call an extra session later? As a writer of a very pertinent editorial on the subject has said, instead of combatting the evil when it comes, it would be better that we should erect such civil and national barriers against it as will prevent its entrance at all. It is with that object that I submit this measure, and I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister to take notice of the serious condition of affairs, much more serious even than it is reported in the press.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 132) to correct certain clerical errors in the French version of the Inland Revenue Act.—Mr. Templeman.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BURRELL. I would like to call the attention of the government to a despatch in this morning's 'Citizen' from Washington to the following effect:

United States Consul General John G. Foster, at Ottawa, Canada, is already here on a summons from President Taft and a member of the Canadian cabinet is hurrying to Washington, according to a report here, to confer with President Taft concerning possible amendments to the reciprocity treaty.

The summons to Washington was rumoured at the Capitol shortly after midnight and helped to strengthen the view of some of those members of the House who have been all along holding out hope that Congress might not be called into extra session. According to the report in circulation, the Canadian cabinet minister will be here to-day.

Is there any truth in the report?

Mr. FIELDING. No Canadian minister has gone to Washington.

GOVERNMENT SHIPYARDS AT SOREL—NOTICE OF MOTION AFFECTING MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne). Mr. Speaker I beg, on behalf and at the request of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin), to give notice to the government and to the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Lanctot), that, on Monday next, the 6th March instant, before the orders of the day are called, there will be presented, as a matter of privilege, a motion touching malversation and fraudulent misappropriation of public moneys paid out as wages for work done for private individuals and property, at the government shipyards, shops and works at St. Joseph de Sorel and at the city of Sorel, and touching the said hon. member for Richelieu, in connection therewith. I shall, on behalf, and at the request of the hon. member for Champlain, furnish, this afternoon or to-morrow, to the government and to the hon. member for Richelieu, copies of the motion to be presented in pursuance of the present motion.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PERLEY. The hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal (Mr. Ames) has asked me to mention to the Minister of Public Works two returns which he has asked for. One of these was ordered on the 14th of December last, and relates to the expenditures on public works since 1880, and the location of wharfs, &c., and one ordered on 11th January last, with reference to government post offices and repairs and some other matters. He would like very much if these returns could be expedited.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Attention is being given to these returns. As the hon. member (Mr. Perley) will understand, it will take a couple of years, in the ordinary course, to get them ready?

Mr. PERLEY. When does the hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley), think he will have them ready?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Unless I employ quite a number of additional officials, it will take a very long time. I cannot hope to have them this session. I hope to have them next session.

Mr. LENNOX. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), to an order of the House, of December 5 for a return relating to contracts between the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company and M. P. Davis. There is another return, for which, I suppose, I must look to either the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), or the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), concerning the number of public buildings used wholly or in part as post offices, the cost of such buildings, the revenue, &c. Then, on January 11 last, there was an order passed on motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal (Mr. Ames) in which I am indirectly interested. There was another order on January 18 last in reference to aliens in the service of the government residing out of Canada. Also I have been requested to call the attention of the government to the fact that on December 14 on motion of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) two orders were made relating to travelling expenses. I desire also to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) to an answer to a question, given in this House, on 27th February last, and reported on page 4390 of unrevised 'Hansard.' The question and its answer related to the Indian reserve at Christian Island. I think we have reason to complain of the kind of answers we sometimes get in the House, but not usually those from the Minister of the Interior. In this case, I asked distinctly:

> In order to obtain its object, did the government erect a residence for the agent upon the reserve, and at what cost; has the Indian agent ever resided in this house, and by whom is it occupied?

This latter part has not been answered, I think. Another part of this question was:

> 4. Where does the Indian agent reside, and when did he last visit the reserve?

I may say to the minister that I have reason for desiring more specific information than is given. The answer given is:

> He has moved to the reserve, and from information received he was there a few days ago.

I am told that the Indian agent has not been residing on the island, has never resided in the house referred to in the answer, and that this house has been occupied by somebody else. It is possible that since I got the information—a week or ten days ago—this agent has gone to reside upon the island. I understand that he has not resided on the island and that some one else has been occupying this house which was built by the government, with the express understanding, I believe, that the agent should reside on the island to instruct the Indians in agriculture, &c.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg to assure my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) that if the answer is not sufficiently detailed to meet his purpose, it is not on account of any intent to deny him information.

Mr. LENNOX. I quite appreciate that.

Mr. OLIVER. I shall be glad to supplement the answer with the fullest details possible. But we were not able to give all the details asked for and yet answer his question as quickly as he wished.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister will look into the matter.

Mr. MURPHY. As to the return ordered on 14th December last at the instance of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), if that is the one relating to the travelling expenses of officials of all the departments, my attention has been drawn to the fact that one department will require about a year to get the information.

Mr. LENNOX. It will involve a great deal of expense?

Mr. MURPHY. The point is that there are a large number of officials, and they are scattered throughout the country.

Mr. FIELDING. Another of the returns referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) is in preparation by my department, and I will see that its completion is expedited.

Mr. MACDONELL. May I ask about a belated return to an order dated December 12, respecting certain information regarding the International Waterways Commission. The information there asked would be of use in discussing the order which the minister has on the paper.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall have inquiry made at once.

Mr. FOSTER. I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to a return to an order of the House dated February 6, 1911, of curator's reports in the case of banks in which curators have been appointed. The first return relates to the Bank of Yarmouth. There is a note from the department saying that the curator did not make a report to the Department of Finance as to the condition of the bank, but did report to the Canadian Bankers' Association, with regard to the false and deceptive returns made to the department which advice was communicated to the department. In a letter from the Deputy Minister of Finance, dated March 17, 1905, to the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, a request was made for a report of the bank's affairs. It says: The attached is a copy of the report made. When I come to that it is from the secretary-treasurer's office, Bank of Montreal, March 21, 1905, to Mr. Courtney. It reads:

Dear Sir,—Referring to your letter of the 17th inst., I have now received a report from the curator of the bank of Yarmouth, of which the following statement is a synopsis:

I did not ask for a synopsis of the report and the Act does not contemplate that the Department of Finance, or the House shall be put off with synopses. There is attached a page of typewriting giving the synoptical report. If we are to have anything we should have what the law allows, which is a full report.

Mr. FIELDING. I am sure if there is such a report in the department we have presented it. I cannot answer offhand, but in view of what my hon. friend has said I will have the matter investigated and see where the omission is if there be one.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is no report the minister has a right to one.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The statute says that the curator shall make all returns and reports and give all information touching the affairs of the bank which the minister requires of him.

Mr. FIELDING. I shall be very happy to look into the matter.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I wish to ask about the following returns: Order of December 14, 1910, showing what ministers abroad in 1908, 1909 and 1910 with their business and expenses. Order of December 14, 1910, showing total payments made by the government to the Eclipse Furniture Company, the Office Specialty Company and Ahearn & Soper. Order of January 11, of payments made to Dussault & Lemieux. There is also a very belated return dated March 22, 1909, showing the names of villages, towns and cities in the various provinces where public buildings have been erected in certain years.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Those in my department are being expedited, but a reference to the orders will show how voluminous a number of the returns will be, and, of course, the motions have to take their turn. I cannot promise my hon. friend just how soon the returns will be presented, but there will be no unnecessary delay so far as my department is concerned.

RECIPROCITY—ATTITUDE OF DAIRYMEN'S ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (E. Lambton). I ask the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to withdraw a statement made on February 16 last in the course of some remarks that I was presenting to the House. I was discussing the position of the cheese and butter market when the hon. gentleman made use of this statement:

Does the hon. gentleman remember that the dairy associations of eastern and western Ontario unanimously desire that this treaty should go into effect?

I have before me a letter from a director of the Western Dairymen's Association, and he distinctly and emphatically states that the Minister of Customs is mistaken in making that statement. He refers to the statement of the minister as published at page 3826 and says:

This statement is absolutely incorrect so far as the Dairymen's Association of Western Ontario is concerned. I am a director of that association, and have been for twenty years. I was present in Stratford when this question was introduced. We consulted every director and officer of the association, and unanimously agreed not to permit the question to go on the programme of the afternoon for discussion.

He closes with an emphatic denial of anything of that nature being discussed there that afternoon by the Dairymens' Association. I will ask the minister, in the face of that statement, to withdraw the statement he made in this House on the 16th of February.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I think I said that I had read in the newspapers, when in Washington, an account of the meeting. I do not see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong) himself says that no such discussion took place there. I have no desire to misrepresent the facts or state anything that I do not believe. If I have said anything that is not in accordance with the facts, I can only say that I regret having done so. I did it in good faith. I read in a newspaper a report of proceedings I think at Stratford, in which the subject was discussed and in which reciprocity in dairy products was approved. Whether it was after the association had adjourned or not I do not know. I gave what I understood to be the case and still believe to be the case. If I have stated anything not in accordance with the facts, of course I regret it, as I do not wish to do anything of that kind.

SUPPLY—ATTACHMENT OF CIVIL SERVANTS' SALARIES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. A. M. BEAUPARLANT (St. Hyacinthe). I would beg to make a few remarks on a matter which hitherto, owing to the rules of the House and other causes, I have not had a chance to place before parliament. The question I wish to discuss is whether the salaries of prominent public officers are to be continued under special privilege conditions or whether they should be placed on the same conditions as the salaries of other people with regard to the payment of debts. From the first occasion on which I introduced this Bill into the House, I never pretended that I was advancing a new idea by attempting to place all debtors on the same footing, by compelling those who earn high salaries to pay their debts just as those earning lower salaries are compelled to pay theirs. This is so evident that no one can to-day claim to have been the first to think of it. Many members in the past have advocated a like measure before this House, among them the Solicitor General, the ex-member for Lisgar, Mr. Richardson, and the ex-member for Laval, I think, now the Hon. Mr. Justice Fortin. Whatever may be the result of the discussion of my proposition, I cannot claim the merit of having introduced by it any new idea before this House. What is now the position of Dominion public officials with regard to debts? Their salary is not liable to attachment, seizure or garnishment, while the salary of any other debtor is. There is no law allowing an attachment of the salary of a Dominion civil servant. Article 599, paragraph 9, of the Code of Civil Procedure of the province of Quebec, and the unwritten but well-known principle of English common law, which prevails in all other provinces and which was affirmed in many cases, notably in the case of Fraser & McArthur, reported at page 165, of the Nova Scotia 'Digest,' a legal work due to our distinguished friend and colleague the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Congdon), who was at that time a lawyer practising in Nova Scotia, join together to make such an exception in the case of a Dominion official. My proposal now is that we should pass a law striking out such an exception. If I may be allowed to make a suggestion to the government it would be that they might take this measure up and enact it into law. For the purposes which I have here outlined, I would propose to add to the Civil Service Act, 1908, the two following subsections, immediately after section 47:

47a. All moneys or salaries due or accruing due to any person employed by the government of Canada shall be liable to attachment in each province of Canada, according to the laws and rules of procedure in force in such province.

47b. The attachment or garnishee summons or order may be served on the minister, deputy minister, chief officer, secretary or assistant secretary of the department in which the debtor is employed, or on the chief officer or clerk of such department or branch thereof if the debtor is employed outside of the city of Ottawa.

It should not be necessary for me to make any argument in support of this proposition. I trust that it will be accepted if it is as good a proposition in principle as I contend it is. I might remind the House that five years ago we had no law to prevent strikes and lock-outs. Since then we have passed a law to deal with that subject, and the people generally are satisfied with it. The people have derived some benefit from it and our example is to be followed by other countries, namely, South Africa and the United States. This goes to prove that a law, although new, may be a good one. Australia passed an indirect, but very effective, law during the session of 1901-2, which will be found at page 339 of the statutes of the Commonwealth of Australia for that year. I quote from that law the following:

1. If an officer is on an indictment or presentment convicted of any offence he shall be deemed to have forfeited his office and shall thereupon cease to perform his duties or receive his salary.

That is a preliminary remark.

2. If the estate of an officer is sequestrated either voluntarily or compulsorily for the benefit of his creditors, such officer shall apply as soon as he may legally do so to a court of insolvency for a certificate of discharge. If it appears to such court that the applicant has been guilty of fraud, dishonourable conduct or extravagance, such court shall direct the clerk of the court thereupon to report the same to the minister or permanent head or chief officer of the department in which such officer is employed. If such officer does not apply as aforesaid for such certificate of discharge or if he applies and it appears from the report that such officer has been guilty of fraud, dishonourable conduct or extravagance, such officer may be dismissed from the public service or reduced to a lower division class or grade therein or fined, reprimanded or otherwise punished by order of the Governor General.

PENALTIES.

67. On receiving notice of any pecuniary penalty imposed upon any officer under the authority of this Act the officer who pays the salary of the officer so punished shall deduct the amount thereof from such salary.

With the permission of the House, I will quote a resolution which was passed on the 25th May, 1910, at the meeting of Federation of the Chambers of Commerce of Quebec, held in Montreal, and which reads as follows:

EXEMPTION FROM DISTRAINMENT OF THE SALARIES OF FEDERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. BOUCHARD. I shall be short, for I am convinced that every one here believes, as I do, that civil servants who generally earn a good salary should be, like all others, obliged to pay their debts.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, Mr. Beauparlant, has devoted his attention to this question in the House of Commons where he introduced a Bill to that effect. That Bill will be again submitted at the next session and our representative expects that it will carry. Therefore, it is expedient, I think that the Federation of Boards of Trade should pass a resolution in favour of the Bill and advising the local boards of trade to meet their respective representatives and to endeavour to have them vote in favour of the Bill.

I beg to move that it be resolved that the Federation of Boards of Trade of the province of Quebec emphatically endorse the principle of the Bill presented by the member for St. Hyacinthe to render the salaries of federal officers liable to seizure and that they prompt parliament to pass the necessary legislation to that end the very next session.

Mr. AQUILA JASMIN, from Lachine. I second the motion.

Everybody: Carried.

I will also read the following communication from the secretary of the Montreal Board of Trade:

Mr. A. Beauparlant, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir, Reply to yours of 8th ult., has been delayed by reason of the adjournment of the council meetings over the Christmas holidays, but I now beg to inform you, as follows:

First, that the council objects to the system of garnishment for debt.

Second, that as the system of garnishment for debt exists it heartily approves of your Bill, which places Dominion civil servants in this respect, on the same level as other citizens.

I am dear Sir,
Yours truly,
GEO. HADRILL,
Secretary.

I have received this statement from the secretary of La Chambre du Commerce of Quebec:

Quebec, February 1st., 1911.

A. M. Beauparlant, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—I have been directed to inform you that the Quebec Board of Trade are entirely favourable to the idea of that excellent Bill which you have introduced in the House of Commons, providing for the garnishment of part of the salaries of civil servants under the control of the federal authorities. The immunity enjoyed by these officers in respect to the seizure of the salaries coming to them gives rise to grievous abuses, to shameful impositions on the good nature of business men and other creditors, on the part of debtors in bad faith, and it is certainly high time that the unfairness of such a procedure should be recognized and that means should be taken to safeguard to a certain extent the interests of bona fide and deceived creditors. You may rest assured that you have the sympathy and moral support of all business men and particularly of the members of the Board of Trade.

Your obedient servant,
T. LEVASSEUR,
Secretary.

The 'Mail and Empire' of the 3rd December last published the following editorial note:

Civil servants have in the past been debtor-proof. Owe what they might their salaries could not be garnisheed. Mr. Beauparlant, one of the Quebec members, has introduced a Bill to change all this. Under his measure salaries of civil servants can be attached precisely as those of private individuals may be. Officials who pay their way will not object to a Bill of this kind. The only possible objectors would be non-payers, and their opposition is an argument in favour of the change. Why the public officers have been exempt from the law for so long is a mystery.

The Kingston 'Standard' of the same date contained the following:

SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

A Bill has been introduced into the Ottawa House to amend the Civil Service Act so that the salaries of the gentlemanly, but often impecunious employees of the government shall be subject to garnishment. It may or may not become law; but there is no doubt of this fact—that the prayers of every retail merchant in the country will go up nightly in favour of it; for of all the dead beats that ever swindled a tradesman the civil servant dead beat, as he is seen in certain outside cities——

It is never in the city where the newspaper is published.

—is the worst. The salaries of these men have not hitherto been subject to garnishment because it has been considered 'contrary to public policy' to allow this to be done. In some mysterious way that no one can find out, the business of the country will suffer, according to this theory, if these dead beats are made to pay their debts by having their salaries garnisheed. This is simply a theory borrowed from some older lands where the civil servants were the sons, cousins or some other connection of the parties in power and were by this means protected from having to pay their honest debts, when confiding tradesmen trusted them and relied upon their promises. 'Contrary to public policy' forsooth! What a hoary fiction that is! As if the public good would not be better served by making these men pay their debts like every honest citizen and live up to their contracts.

To emphasize the need for this legislation it would be well if every retail merchants' association in the country were to send down a deputation to Ottawa to urge the passing of the Bill.

We in Kingston here will, it is true, not be affected by the Bill, because here our civil servants pay their legitimate debts, but for the principle of the thing we should all contend, namely, that in the eye of the law and in respect to their debts, civil servants are and should be like other individuals. Other cities are not so happy in this respect as in Kingston.

The Peterborough 'Examiner' of December 12, says:

Mr. Beauparlant, M.P., for St. Hyacinthe, has introduced into parliament a Bill which should pass into law. Heretofore civil servants at Ottawa have enjoyed a remarkable exemption. Their salaries were not attachable for debt. They might run bills for groceries, dry goods, and what not, and they were uncollectable by process of law. Under the proposed law the civil servants are to be legislated into the ranks of ordinary honesty, and respectability. The old law of exemption for responsibility for debts incurred was a premium on dishonesty. There are civil servants by the thousands in Ottawa and it stands to reason that practical freedom from paying honest debt must have exercised a bad effect upon merchants and business. In the ordinary course of things collection of debts is difficult enough; and this difficulty adds to the difficulty, of business men making ends meet. Few realize how much the payment of even a small obligation exercices a cumulative effect; a sum like, say, ten dollars, goes the rounds, so to speak, and can possibly, in a hundred cases, help to make up an amount necessary to meet an obligation, and effect a balance with the bank. Pay-as-you-go is a splendid lubricant for the wheels of business, and pay promptly when you don't pay down, is the next best thing.

I beg to quote from a letter which I have received, the following:

A. M. Beauparlant, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Let me congratulate you in connection with the Bill which you are introducing and which provides for the garnishment of the salaries of Dominion civil servants and does away with a remnant of the oppressive privileges of feudal times.

The salary of the poor workingman may be seized, while hands must be kept off the salaries of these wealthy gentlemen who earn as much as $1,000 or $2,000 per annum, and avoid paying their just debts.

That was a dark spot and an anomaly, an anachronism in this democratic era of ours.

I have found in my protracted career, that this exemption was practically a safeguard for prodigality and dishonesty.

You are doing a meritorious act and the country should be grateful to you for so doing.

I enclose a letter of approval from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to whom I had submitted the matter.

Please accept, together with the compliments of the season, the assurance of the high esteem in which I hold you.

(Signed): G. Z. MAYRAND,
Notary.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the expressions of opinion I have read to the House are opportune to this discussion, and that something ought to be done to remedy the evil now existing. It is needless to remind the House that it is only just and honest that every one should pay his debts; it is also needless to say that most of the Dominion officials are faithful to their obligations and do not need any law or legal rule to compel them to pay their debts, the moral rule being sufficient. However, a certain number of these officials refuse to pay their just debts, although in a position to do so, and some of them even go so far as to insult their creditors when they are asked for what they honestly owe. Why the salary of a workingman who earns $30 or $40 a month should be liable to garnishee and the salary of the Dominion public official who earns from $100 to $500 a month is not so liable, is a discrimination which ought not be suffered to longer exist. Either an end should be put to the system of attaching small salaries or the same attachment should be allowed on high salaries. We are all aware that the operation of the law allowing or prohibiting the seizure of the salaries of those not in the Dominion service is within the sphere of the provincial legislature, but, the allowing or disallowing of the attachment of the salaries of employees of this government is within the purview of this parliament, and I trust that in the near future this parliament will put an end to the present system of exemption. Why should any class of men be granted such a privilege; why above all should the high salaries—and generally speaking the salaries of the Dominion public servants, may be considered comparatively high salaries—why should the high salaries be exempt from seizure while the low salaries of other wage earners are not. I expect to be told in reply that the system I advocate would create disturbance and inconvenience in the different departments by compelling some chief officials to go to the courts from time to time to make the required statement as to the amount due to the official in default, but the same inconvenience is now experienced by banking institutions, by municipal and provincial institutions, by railways, and by all kinds of industries, and the people prefer to suffer this inconvenience so that by complying with the requirements of the law, they may ensure that the principles of honesty shall prevail. Should not the Dominion government which is the chief institution in this country give to all others an example of fairness and honesty by compelling their officials to keep faith with their creditors. There is a department of justice specially created for the purpose of causing the principles of honesty to prevail in the whole community—and allow me to state en passant, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of Justice could not have at its head a more able, or a more devoted man than the present minister—and in conjunction with the departments of the attorneys general of the different provinces their mission is to make honesty and justice prevail by safeguarding the rights and properties, as well as the lives and liberties of the citizens. Why should not the several departments of this government be ready to sacrifice their convenience to some extent if need be, in order that principles of honesty and justice should prevail among their employees.

The new system would have some inconveniences, we shall, perhaps, be told, but there is a reply, I trust, to every objection. The new system would be fair to the creditors, and would be desirable for the public officials themselves. It would be an advantage for the good ones, whom the present system does not help as they deserve, and also for the others, who, precisely because they rely upon this privilege, are led to incur obligations beyond their means. I expect to be told, also, that government employees, on account of the deference due to authority, ought to be free from the rules applied to other citizens. Sir, I am a Liberal, and I believe in equality and in the responsibilities resulting from equality, rather than in privilege. When public officers are expected to be true to their promises and faithful to their obligations in business matters, this is the best guarantee that they will be true also to the government which employs and pays them. I believe that the community are not made for the government, or for the chief officers of state, but that the government and the chief officers of state are made for the community, with all due consequences of that fact. I may be looked upon as not being up to date in saying that I still believe in the possibility of one condition and one rule of conduct for all men living in the same country, but I feel some pride in the hope that I may be of some use in that respect to the community in which I live. If the government cannot do something this year in the direction that I have proposed, and if I am still here next year, I will bring the same measure down again, because I think it is fair to all, and above all because it is honest.

Mr. GUSTAVE BOYER (Vaudreuil). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to add a few words to what the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Beauparlant) has said.

I have no hesitation in saying that whoever incurs debts is bound in honour to free himelf of such indebtedness. Before the government decide what should be done in connection with the measure introduced by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, I wish to make a few remarks in respect to occurrences of a different character though connected with the question.

The remarks of the member for St. Hyacinthe have reference mainly to those who are permanently in the employ of the government; but there is still another class who are paid from the public chest, I mean the contractors, the temporary employees, that is to say those who work during the summer months, in connection with the crews on the dredges and the hydrographic surveys. Means should be taken whereby business men in the localities to which such contractors resort for their supplies and provisions, might be protected. Now, to my own knowledge it happened in the very district from which I hail, that contractors carrying on some dredging work for the government neglected on several occasions their most important duty, which is to pay for their supplies. More than once I have been under the necessity of applying to the minister direct in order to get these people paid.

I say the government should not lose an opportunity of taking all necessary means to oblige these contractors to meet their obligations by exacting that they should settle with their purveyors. Within the last two years, the Department of Marine—and I take this occasion of congratulating the Minister in regard to it—has applied a new policy in connection with their men in the hydrographic survey. Formerly it was the department who directly undertook to board the men. For two years past, a special purveyor has been appointed for that purpose. In that manner the department has effected a considerable saving, as shown by the public accounts to which I have had access.

The Department of Public Works has applied the same policy in regard to its dredges. That was an excellent move; I approved of it at the time, and I still approve of it to-day. However, it has its drawbacks, purveyors are not always responsible men and they go into debt. To my knowledge, suppliers of these dredges, after buying from butchers and merchants the necessary goods for the board of the men, have subsequently failed to pay the bills. Application had to be made to the Department of Public Works, to the deputy minister and the claims of these men set forth. Such occurrences are very aggravating, and the department should leave nothing undone towards providing some security to merchants as regards the payment of goods bought from them by the purveyors.

In conclusion, I agree with the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe as to the desirability of such a Bill as this. I say that a man, whether he be an employee of the government or not, should lay down as a rule for himself to follow in the footsteps of all honest men living in this beautiful country of ours: pay his debts and not endeavour to shield himself behind some kind of privilege.

In recent years we have been called upon to increase the salaries of civil servants. We have granted the application, in spite of the opposition of a good many outsiders who did not view the proposal kindly. After all, public servants are well paid, and there are very few in business or industry, either in Ottawa or in the metropolis of the Dominion, or other cities, who earn as high salaries. I may add that civil servants, while drawing higher salaries, are generally better treated, that is, they have shorter hours. People engaged in business and elsewhere are bound to pay their debts; the law reaches them at all times. Why should a different rule be laid down in the case of civil servants? We pay large salaries to government employees, and why should they, under cover of the law, pile up accounts and then avoid paying them. I say that we would not be justified to allow such a state of things to persist. I congratulate the member from St. Hyacinthe on having brought the matter up ; it is a question which concerns everybody and I am satisfied that the government, with their usual foresight, will find a remedy which will be fair to all parties interested.

Mr. J. P. TURCOTTE (Quebec county). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say in respect to this question. In the province of Quebec we have a principle of common law under which the whole belongings of the debtor are the common security of his creditors. That law, strictly enforced, means the utter depriving the debtor of everything in his possession for the benefit of his creditors. It was considered that such a law, under certain circumstances, was rather too harsh, and numerous exceptions were made, exempting in the first place those things which cannot be dispensed with in every day life; then, as regards salaries, we have a provision which allows only a part of them to be garnisheed, in order to leave the debtor with enough to meet his own needs and those of his family from day to day. That principle has been applied to the civil service of the province of Quebec. Formerly no part of the salary of a civil servant could be garnisheed. This, it was contended, was a matter of public interest, and the prevailing idea was that as soon as one became a public servant, his salary was beyond seizure.

As I have just stated, an act has been passed providing for the garnishment of part of the salary, said part varying in proportion to the amount of the salary. As regards small salaries, one-fifth may be garnisheed, and the higher the salary, the greater also the proportion which is liable to garnishment, until it reaches one-third.

That law works very well. It is derived from the general principle that the belongings of a debtor are the common security of his creditors, with this humanitarian compromise that a certain part cannot be seized so as to avoid leaving the debtor without any resources whatever.

Considering that such an enactment gives beneficial results in one great province of the Dominion, and the oldest of them all, considering that the results so far have been of benefit, not only to the creditor, but also to the debtor, who thus frees himself by degrees, I cannot see why such a principle should not be applied in respect to employees of the Dominion government.

Of course the government might shield themselves behind the constitution, a provision of which states that all matters relating to indebtness under the civil law fall under the purview of the local legislatures and not under that of the Dominion parliament. However, Mr. Speaker, at this very session, this House has voted a Bill providing that on certain government works public servants shall not be required to work more than eight hours per day.

That shows a disposition on the part of the House to take a fair and broad view of the public interests and to bring certain classes of people, not directly under federal control, within the scope of that enactment, Since the bill introduced by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has reference to employees of the Dominion government, paid out of moneys voted by this parliament, I fail to see why we could not apply such a restriction to these men, in the same way that we interfered in favour of those employed on the Dominion government public works. The principle is the same in both cases. If we had authority to legislate in favour of our employees, why should we not have the same right to legislate to their disadvantage? I say to their disadvantage, inasmuch as a part of their salary would be liable to be garnisheed, as provided by those enactments of the local legislation. Such a measure might not be to the taste of certain government employees, but it would certainly be in their interest, since it would put them in a position to free themselves of their debts.

I believe that the Dominion parliament should stand out as a model as regards the observance not only of laws of public order, but also of that general law of honesty and justice which is indestructible. I believe that once that restriction has been enacted, through the experience acquired by the superior officers of justice in the every day routine of their calling, we shall succeed in framing such an enactment as will enable the creditor to recover his due and the debtor to free himself, without in any way impairing the efficiency of the public service.

For the above reasons I wholly approve of the remarks uttered by my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation). I did not intend speaking on this question, but after listening to certain remarks made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Boyer), concerning the manner in which some contracts are carried out, I deem it my duty to say a word.

A few years since, as hon. gentlemen will remember, the House discussed again and again the desirability of changing the practice then followed in regard to boarding the men working for the Department of Marine. That question came up several times, and finally the unanimous opinion of the House seemed to favour the idea of the department granting a contract to some employee who would undertake to board the men and all the passengers sojourning on the vessels. The outcome was altogether satisfactory. We concluded with the stewards on the various vessels an arrangement whereby we paid them an amount of 50 cents per head per day for the men composing the crew, and 60 cents for the officers. The result has been most satisfactory. I received the other day a report showing that last year a saving of several thousand dollars had been affected in this way.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil has given to understand that in one particular instance the steward had not paid for the supplies received from various points. I am very sorry to hear so. I only wish the hon. member were in his seat just now, and I regret he has been obliged to leave the House, temporarily. However, he will read what I said in 'Hansard.' Had he been here, I would have asked him to give me the name of that man, and if he is still in our employ, I will surely see to it that these suppliers are paid, otherwise he will not be kept on.

As regards the Bill introduced by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Beauparlant), I agree with him. I know, and it has been stated to me on several occasions, that civil servants as a rule are in favour of such a measure. When I say that civil servants are in favour of such a measure I mean those who have no reason to fear the putting in force of such an enactment. I know that in the province of Ontario, in Ottawa, for instance, the same difficulties are not met with as in the province of Quebec, as here, the law provides a means whereby a creditor may to a certain extent, and in an indirect manner, lay hands on the salary of the government employee.

As regards the province of Quebec, it is a different matter. We have a law providing that salaries of local government employees may be garnisheed not wholly, but in part, as stated a moment ago by the hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Turcotte). It is much to be desired that such a measure should be voted by this parliament in respect to Dominion government employees so as to oblige them to pay their just debts.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). We are indebted to my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Beauparlant) for the great attention he has given this matter and I personally feel certainly under obligation to him for having seen fit to address the Chair in the English tongue, although, judging by the facility he has displayed in that language, that is no trouble to him. At the outset I wish to say that, in my ideas on this subject, I am not actuated by any feeling of sympathy for the civil servant who does not pay his debts. To pay his debts is a man's first duty, if indeed he be not acting contrary to his duty in incurring debts. But none the less, I must say that I look upon a proposition to change the law regarding the garnishment of the salaries of civil servants as one of very doubtful expediency indeed. The question is simply one of expediency, and the condition of the law which now prevents the seizure of the salary of civil servants is one which exists, not out of any consideration for these employees, but simply and wholly out of consideration for the public interests. It is entirely from that point of view that I question the desirability of making the change advocated by my hon. friend. I have seen it stated in legal works, as the reason for this rule of law, that the King cannot be brought into court against his own will, and, of course, we all recognize that it is the prerogative of the King to be sued only with his own assent upon the advice of his attorney general. That prerogative I regard as something of substantial advantage to the public, and I have no doubt that it may be quite accurate to describe the foundation of this immunity from the process of garnishment which civil servants enjoy as resting upon that principle of law that the King is not to be brought before his own courts and his own judges except upon his own assent, in the constitutional manner I have indicated. That difficulty, which may be considered as of more or less technical character—though I think it has a good foundation in the public interest—that difficulty has been felt by my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Beauparlant), and in framing the measure to which he refers he sought to overcome it by providing that the process of garnishment should be served upon some minister, deputy minister, chief or other officer of any department of state in which the debtor is employed. That might remove the technical objection, but it does not touch the root of the matter. The root of the objection is, in my judgment, that it would not be in the public interests that this should be permitted. Let me say why I am of that opinion. It is practically the same principle of law which precludes a civil servant from assigning his salary. The transfer of his salary which he might make, before receiving it, to any friend, if he wanted to protect himself, or to any creditor, or any person who might buy an instalment of his salary, would not be valid because it is against public policy. That has been the law from the earliest times, when law grew up in England by judicial decisions or judicial interpretations of what is the common law of that country. The principle of the thing is put by Baron Parke, recognized among English lawyers as one of the great masters of English common law in these words. Speaking of the Civil Service, he said:

> The compensation allotted to him under this Act is by way of salary, the object of which is to enable him to maintain such a position in life as will save him from the necessity of risking his character, by incurring those temptations which persons reduced to poverty are necessarily exposed to, and which would render him an unfit person to be again employed as a servant of the Crown. For this purpose, public policy requires that he should not be permitted to assign it away.

Exactly the same principle applies to this proposition to permit a creditor to garnish instalments of salary or sufficient of it to pay what is due him. That is but another form of effecting a transfer, or assignment. A civil servant, knowing that he cannot make a transfer, or assignment, of his salary by direct means, may co-operate with his creditor and enable him to get into the same position by taking proceedings before a judge to attach the salary and have an order served on the Crown to pay that salary to the creditor instead of to the civil servant. What, then, is the effect? The effect necessarily is, if you assume, as you must, the case of a civil servant who is not paying his way—the effect necessarily is that the man whose salary has been attached and ordered to be paid to some creditor is harassed by the daily needs of his daily outgoings, and consequently is not in a position to give his undivided attention to the discharge of the duties of the public office which he fills. It is in the interests of the general public that they should get the best possible return for the money they pay, and that cannot be accomplished if the civil servant is liable to the duns of the continually besetting creditor, and not only to that annoyance, but to seeing possibly his salary taken from him against his own will, leaving him unable to provide for the actual necessities of his family.

I have not the slightest sympathy for the civil servant who gets himself into that position. It may be, of course, that through some unexpected adversity, some misfortune or illness, he may temporarily find himself in a position where he cannot pay as he goes, but his salary is assumed to be sufficient for his station in life. In fixing his salary it was the intention of parliament that it shall be adequate and that its payment should be assured—that there was to be a certain fixed and definite amount paid upon a certain fixed and definite day. It is the duty, the business, of the civil servant to cut his coat according to his cloth, and except in the case I have mentioned of some unexpected calamity, he has no business to be in debt at all, and no more has the creditor any business to let him go into debt. Every man is presumed to know the law, and the creditor is presumed to know that he has not the right to seize the salary of his debtor who is in the public service, which he would have if his debtor were not working for the public. The creditor knows, or ought to know, that he has no right to take from that man a transfer of his salary. He knows presumably, and in most cases he does actually, what that man's salary is, when it is payable, just how much he can rely upon, and, therefore, the creditor acts with his eyes open if he allows a civil servant to get heavily into his debt. Under these circumstances, I do not feel much more sympathy with the creditor who is not able to enforce payment by process of law than I would feel for the civil servant who allows himself to get into the position I have described.

I think the law as it stands is in the interest of the people of the country who have the right to get, for the money they pay to the civil servant, the best possible return in the shape of his whole time without his attention being distracted by the annoyance and harassing of creditors such as I have spoken of. It is to be remembered, in this connection, that the civil servant who takes his position of immunity, and it may be said in that sense of advantage over the working man or employee of a private employer, has disadvantages to correspond. The civil servant is not in a position to strike for higher wages. Some civil servants in France, not long ago, went on strike; and they found at once that they had committed an infraction of the law. It certainly would be an illegal act for any number of civil servants to enter into a combination among themselves to go on strike if they did not get higher wages. It may be a perfectly lawful thing for a man in public employment to agitate and urge an increase in his salary; it may be not an unlawful thing that two or three, or half a dozen, should combine together to endeavour to exert united influence. But the moment that these same men combined to strike and leave the public service deserted and not performed, they would be doing an illegal thing in respect of which they would be liable to prosecution. There are, therefore, countervailing disadvantages so far as the civil service is concerned. But I am not looking at it from this point of view; I am considering it from the standpoint alone of the public interest when I say that it would be better to leave untouched the wisdom of generations in this regard and not seek to make any change in the law which forbids the civil servant either to assign his salary directly or to effect the transfer of it by any other means.

Mr. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie). Not having had any notice that the subject introduced by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Beauparlant) was to be discussed this afternoon, I come before the House without any preparation for the present debate. Nor would I have risen had not the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) in his treatment of the case, in my judgment, departed from those principles of common sense which usually distinguish him in the application of legal formulas to the practical affairs of life. I listened very carefully to the defence of the present system which the Minister of Justice brought forward, and I must say that I fail to recognize any objection offered by him to the change which would not apply with equal force to many if not all the classes of cases in which salaries are garnishable at the present time. The Minister of Justice states that the present rule is based on the doctrine laid down by Baron Parke, that the salary of the civil servant is in the nature of a gratuity and that it is made for the purpose of enabling that servant to render to the public the greatest possible service in the capacity in which he acts, and to prevent him from being harassed by creditors or others to the detriment of the public service. To that statement of the doctrine, I have no exception to take. That doubtless is correct. But wherein does it apply? Does not the same doctrine, in so far as it affects this argument, apply to the servant of the railway companies, the servant of the provincial government—both of whose salaries are garnishable at the present time. The salary paid to any one may very well be put on the same basis as that laid down by Baron Parke as a matter of legal doctrine. But the whole question before the House is: What is the interest of common honesty and of equal rights among not only civil servants but all servants throughout the country. It may be that the civil servant is in a better position to offer free and unhampered service to the public if he is hedged about by the wall—the artificial wall—which now protects him from the ordinary process of garnishment. But I cannot see why the public as a corporate body has any higher rights than the ordinary citizen in this regard. It seems to me that the public as a body politic is in the same position as the Canadian Pacific railway, or any other company, or any private employer. Why should it be otherwise? Is not the Canadian Pacific Railway Company entitled to the very best possible service from the employees whom it pays? They are entitled to that just in the same sense as is the government of Canada. Is not a farmer on the plains entitled to the best possible service which the body and brain of his hired servant is able to give him? Certainly he is. The same rule applies throughout our commercial life. Why should we single out the government and say that, because it is stronger or represents more people that it is, in any higher or loftier sense, entitled to the unhampered efforts of its servants than any other employers in the community? I see no distinction so far as the interests of the country are concerned.

And why is the civil servant entitled to protection? The minister says he has no sympathy with the civil servant who runs into debt. That, doubtless, is just as true of the civil servant as of any other servant. But the minister says also: I have no sympathy with the creditor who allows the civil servant to run into his debt. The minister also said—let me do him ample justice—the creditor who permits the civil servant to run an account knows the position of that civil servant, knows his income, and consequently is warned beforehand, and incurs the credit at his own peril. That is equally true throughout the whole range of our commercial life. It is true of the employees of the great companies; it is true of the labouring man.

But what is the difference? These men do not incur the debt all with one creditor; if they did there would be some force in the argument of the Minister of Justice. But they go from one man to another; they concurrently run bills here and there, the same as other classes of servants all over the country. There are the same exceptions in the matter of frugality in the civil service as anywhere else.

How is one creditor to know that he is the only one, and even if he permits the civil servant to incur only a modest expenditure, he knows not, but what that man at some other store, or with some other creditor is doing the same thing as with him. Consequently there is absolutely no distinction, the creditor is no more on his guard in this case than in any other and he is liable to be innocently mulcted. The law has never denied to the creditor in any other case where he permits a man to live beyond his means, the right of recourse, that man has all the weapons for the collection of his debts he would have had, if he had acted paternally with reference to that debtor and told him he was not to be permitted to buy what he could not pay for. He has all the redress possible in that case, and why should he be denied it in this? It seems to me that when the minister comes thoroughly to consider all the aspects of the case, he will not permit his mind to be warped by legal doctrines which are after all, only a relic of days gone by, and which are being one by one overruled at this time in behalf of the broader principles of common sense and equal rights. The minister referred to the civil servant in another aspect. He said it was quite true that in so far as garnishment is concerned, we protect him, we say that his salary is not to be garnisheed. We also say he is not to be allowed to assign it. In both of these regards, I say he should have the same rights and should be restricted by the same methods as any other servant. In our provinces certain rights to assign not only of civil servants, but of all servants, have been very seriously restricted. That has been done in what was believed to be the public interest, but no distinction was drawn between the civil servant and any other servant, the restriction applying to all, and was intended to guard the improvident and particularly those who who have wives and families, from anticipation of their means. The minister said we should protect the civil servant in the matter of garnishment, excuse in other regards he is restricted, he is not permitted to strike. A moment's reflection will surely convince the very clear mind of the Minister of Justice, that that is not a strong argument. Surely the right of striking is not a right which the civil servant can complain of being deprived of. It seems to me nothing but the use of words to say that the civil servant suffers anything by the provision of our law, which forbids him to strike. The civil servant now has in his possession all the weapons that would be of any use to him in securing an advance of his salary, and the weapon of striking would be absolutely worthless to him. I think the civil servant is better equipped in this way than the ordinary employee. I say, let the civil servant of Canada suffer garnishment if he goes behind in the same way as any other man, and then we shall have advanced at least one step further in the progress of democracy in Canada.

Mr. CARVELL. I wish to heartily endorse the sentiment just expressed by my hon. friend from Portage, who has, to my mind, covered the whole range of this question, and I congratulate my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Beauparlant) for bringing this matter up. The Minister of Justice has argued in his usually careful and lucid manner, but I fear the Minister of Justice is arguing from the standpoint of a lawyer, who wants to maintain his case on account of the precedents. There is no doubt of the force of the arguments in the decision of Baron Parke quoted, but that does not make it irrevocable. I cannot understand why a civil servant should not be placed in exactly the same position as any other labourer, or servant or employee. He is as well paid, if not better paid than other men doing similar work for outside employers. He may be under one disadvantage, in that he is a member of a class and has not the chance for advances in salary that he would have in a big corporation or employment in the ordinary business of the country. I do not believe to any great extent in the doctrine of the right of the creditor to garnishee the wages of any man. I believe it is against the best interests of the civil servant himself to know that he is subject to this exemption. It may be that he and his family are anxious to shine in social circles, and his security from having his salary attached, I believe, may cause him to run into excesses that he would not otherwise indulge in, and this may have placed many of these people in the unfortunate position in which they find themselves. I believe this should be changed, and that if you put the civil servant exactly on a parity with every other labouring man or man working for a salary in the different provinces, and made him entirely subject to the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities with reference to garnishment, it would be to his advantage.

HAGUE ARBITRATION, ATLANTIC FISHERIES.

Mr. C. JAMESON (Digby). A few days ago, a resolution standing in my name, calling for the bringing down of certain correspondence which led up to the settlement of the North Atlantic Fisheries case for reference to the Hague Tribunal, was passed. I do not think it should have been necessary for a member to ask for the bringing down of this correspondence, because, it seems to me, the subject matter of that case was of sufficient importance for the government to have laid before the House all the information in their possession. So far the only information which they have brought down, printed and distributed is contained in a book issued a few days ago containing the award and some fishery regulations recently based on the award.

The Hague Award, when published on September 7, 1910, was hailed with a great deal of satisfaction by the government of Great Britain and the government of Canada, and was considered of sufficient importance to be made the subject of a reference in the speeches from the Throne at the opening of parliament in Canada, the opening of parliament in England and the opening of the legislature in the province of Nova Scotia. It was also considered of so much importance that the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) has made sundry journeys up and down the country for the purpose of enlarging upon its virtues and expatiating upon its merits. One important feature in connection with this award, however, is that it does not apply to the Bay of Fundy, probably the largest bay in the western hemisphere and certainly, from the standpoint of the fisheries, the most important. Although the award makes a very important declaration respecting international law with regard to bays, the Canadian fishermen find themselves debarred from the benefit of that declaration with respect to the Bay of Fundy.

I may be permitted, Sir, to trace very briefly the history leading up to the submission of this question by Great Britain and the United States to the international court of arbitration at The Hague. In 1908 an arbitration convention or treaty was entered into between Great Britain and the United States of America. That was signed at Washington on April 4, 1908, and ratified on the 4th of June in the same year. The first article of the convention provided that differences which might arise relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it had not been possible to settle by diplomacy, should be referred to the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague. The second article provided that in the case of a reference to The Hague a special agreement defining clearly the matter in dispute and the scope of the powers of the arbitrators should be entered into and the same article goes on to state:

> That His Majesty's government reserving the right before concluding a special agreement in any matter affecting the interests of a self-governing dominion of the British Empire to obtain the concurrence therein of the government of that dominion.

And it also provides that no such special agreement shall be binding until confirmed by an exchange of notes between the two contracting parties. The third article merely relates to the ratification of the treaty, and the fourth and last article provides that this convention is concluded for a period of five years, in other words, until June 4, 1913.

On January 27, 1909, the special agreement under which the reference regarding the North Atlantic fisheries was made, was entered into between Great Britain and the United States, and signed at Washington on the date which I have mentioned, by Mr. Bryce, the British Ambassador, on behalf of Great Britain, and Mr. Root, Secretary of State for the United States, on behalf of the United States. Question 5, of the questions which were to be submitted to The Hague Tribunal under this special agreement, reads as follows:

> From where must be measured the 'three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbours' referred to in the said article.

The article referred to was article 1 of the old convention, or treaty of 1818, between Great Britain and the United States with reference to the fisheries. The feature particularly referred to in article 1 was contained in the following words:

> And the United States hereby renounce forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, or cure fish on, or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbours of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits.

'The above mentioned limits,' were in treaty waters, and did not affect the Bay of Fundy.

Under this question 5, referred to the court of arbitration at The Hague, one would have supposed that the exclusive rights of British subjects in the Bay of Fundy were to be settled. The question as will be seen, embraced all bays: no bays were excluded from its scope, and it would be reasonable to suppose that the question as to all bays on the Atlantic coast in His Majesty's North American possessions would be settled, with regard to fisheries.

Section 4, on page 20, of the award of the tribunal, relates to the extraordinary contention of the United States with respect to these bays. It reads:

> 4. It has been further contended by the United States that the renunciation applies only to bays six miles or less in width 'inter fauces terrae,' those bays only being territorial bays, because the three mile rule is, as shown by this treaty, as principle of international law applicable to coasts and should be strictly and systematically applied to bays.

But the tribunal did not concur in that view. It went on to state in its answer to that question what I shall now read:

But the tribunal is unable to agree with this contention.

(a) Because admittedly the geographical character of a bay contains conditions which concern the interests of the territorial sovereign to a more intimate and important extent than do those connected with the open coast. Thus conditions of national and territorial integrity, of defence, of commerce and of industry are all vitally concerned and with the control of the bays penetrating the national coast line. This interest varies, speaking generally in proportion to the penetration inland of the bay; but as no principle of international law recognizes any specified relation between the concavity of the bay and the requirements for control by the territorial sovereignty, this tribunal is unable to qualify by the application of any new principle its interpretation of the treaty of 1818 as excluding bays in general from the strict and systematic application of the three mile rule; nor can this tribunal take cognizance in this connection of other principles concerning the territorial sovereignty over bays such as ten mile or twelve mile limits of exclusion based on international acts subsequent to the treaty of 1818 and relating to coasts of a different configuration and conditions of a different character;

(b) Because the opinion of jurists and publicists quoted in the proceedings conduce to the opinion that speaking generally the three mile rule should not be strictly and systematically applied to bays;

(c) Because the treaties referring to these coasts, antedating the treaty of 1818, made special provisions as to bays, such as the treaties of 1686 and 1713 between Great Britain and France, and especially the treaty of 1778 between the United States and France. Likewise Jay's treaty of 1794, Art. 25, distinguished bays from the space 'within cannon-shot of the coast' in regard to the right of seizure in times of war. If the proposed treaty of 1806 and the treaty of 1818 contained no disposition to that effect, the explanation may be found in the fact that they first extended the marginal belt to five miles, and also in the circumstance that the American proposition of 1818 in that respect was not limited to 'bays,' but extended to 'chambers formed by headlands' and to 'five marine miles from a right line from one headland to another,' a proposition which in the times of the Napoleonic wars would have affected to a very large extent the operations of the British navy;

(d) Because it has not been shown by the documents and correspondence in evidence here that the application of the three mile rule to bays was present to the minds of the negotiators in 1818 and they could not reasonably have been expected either to presume it or to provide against its presumption;

(e) Because it is difficult to explain the words in Art. III of the treaty under interpretation 'country . . . together with its bays, harbours and creeks' otherwise than that all bays without distinction as to their width were, in the opinion of the negotiators, part of the territory;

(f) Because from the information before this tribunal it is evident that the three mile rule is not applied to bays strictly or systematically either by the United States or by any other power;

(g) It has been recognized by the United States that bays stand apart, and that in respect of them territorial jurisdiction may be exercised farther than the marginal belt in the case of Delaware bay by the report of the United States Attorney General of May 19, 1793, and the letter of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Genet, of November 8, 1793, declares the bays of the United States generally to be, 'as being landlocked, within the body of the United States.'

Now, Sir, if this doctrine had been applied to the Bay of Fundy it would have been declared territorial waters with exclusive rights to Canadian fishermen, and this doctrine would have applied to it, but for the so called understanding by which the Bay of Fundy was shut out. I read from the report of the award of the tribunal, the last clause in answer to question 5:

It is understood that nothing in these rules refers either to the Bay of Fundy considered as a whole apart from its bays and creeks or as to the innocent passage through the Gut of Canso, which were excluded by the agreement made by exchange of notes between Mr. Bacon and Mr. Bryce, dated February 21, 1909, and March 4, 1909; or to Conception Bay, which was provided for by the decision of the privy council in the case of the Direct United States Cable Company vs. the Anglo-American Telegraph Company, in which decision the United States have acquiesced.

Here suddenly we find that the whole situation had been changed and instead of the Bay of Fundy being dealt with under question 5, it was expressly excluded by some understanding or some mysterious subsidiary agreement which was entered into. I would like to ask the minister how it was that this was done, and why it was done? At whose instance and upon whose advice was it done, and who is it that is going to take the responsibility for the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy from the operation of this award? At this particular moment, and before I proceed further, I would ask the minister to give an answer to that question.

Mr. BRODEUR. Certain correspondence of many years ago between the United States government and the imperial government dealt with the question of the Bay of Fundy, and later there was an exchange of notes on the matter between Mr. Bryce and the United States Secretary of State.

Mr. JAMESON. What correspondence does the minister allude to?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is correspondence which took place in the year 1843. Had I been aware that my hon. friend would bring up this matter I would have had this correspondence here.

Mr. JAMESON. I gave notice last night.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman did not mention the Bay of Fundy especially.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What we want to know is whether there has been any arrangement made with reference to the Bay of Fundy excluding it from the treaty?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. I tried to explain when addressing the House on this subject on the 2nd December last, the position with regard to the Bay of Fundy, as fully as I was able to. When the difficulties first arose between the United States and Nova Scotia in regard to this treaty as early as 1840, or before that year, the principal subject of the difficulty seemed to be the fishing by United States fishermen in the Bay of Fundy. The legislature of Nova Scotia insisting that the Bay of Fundy was, notwithstanding its size, within the renunciation made by the United States in the treaty of 1818, addressed the imperial authorities upon that subject. The matter was referred to the law officers of the Crown in England and they supported the contention of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia and delivered their opinion that the Bay of Fundy had been renounced by the treaty of 1818. The matter continued to be one of much agitation diplomatically between the United States and Great Britain and finally it was closed in the year 1845, I think in the month of March, by a despatch from Lord Aberdeen the foreign secretary, to the United States minister at the Court of St. James, in which Lord Aberdeen stated that while maintaining the legal right of Great Britain to exclude United States fishermen from the Bay of Fundy they would relax their right so far as that bay was concerned. Ever since then the bay has been treated as open to the fishermen of the United States, and it has been so treated by both parties. When the arrangement for submitting these difficulties to arbitration at the Hague was under verbal discussion at Washington in January, 1909, Mr. Root as representing the United States said as though it were a matter of course—and I think using these very words: Of course nothing in this submission is to affect one way or the other the position of the Bay of Fundy, or of what was termed 'Innocent Passage through the Gut of Canso.' That was made a sine qua non of the reference to the arbitration of the Hague at all. The contention was: The question of the Bay of Fundy has been settled between ourselves and Great Britain now more than 60 years ago, and there is no question of reopening it. It was at one time proposed that a clause to that effect should be inserted in the agreement of submission to arbitration, but it was thought better—indeed I think it was my own suggestion—that instead of putting it upon the face of the agreement to arbitrate, informal notes stating the understanding in that respect should be exchanged between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root. Such letters were exchanged in either February or March of 1909. They were before the tribunal, and it is the circumstance of their having been so exchanged that leads to the tribunal making the observation in the award which the hon. gentleman has read, that it is understood that nothing in the rules which they were then suggesting should be taken to refer either to the Bay of Fundy or to the Gut of Canso, which were excluded by these notes of the 21st February and the 4th of March, 1909.

Mr. JAMESON. The minister has given a pretty lengthy answer to my question, and I may say with all deference, that it is very unfortunate that he should express this view, as also the view he expressed on the 2nd December last, upon this same subject. I do not think, in the first place, that the correspondence that took place between Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett in 1845 can possibly bear out the extreme construction placed upon it, and the extreme claim founded upon it by the United States. I also think that the treaty of 1908 between Great Britain and the United States made special provision for a settlement of matters in dispute, or on which there was any doubt, in regard to subjects of this kind. The minister himself, on the 27th of January, 1909, when this case was being settled, says he suggested that there should be an interchange of correspondence, and in that correspondence the reservation of the rights of both parties and the contentions of both parties were made. It seems to me, under these circumstances, that it was clearly a subject which should have been arbitrated. If there were no rights there on the part of Great Britain and Canada, what rights were being reserved? If there were rights, why should they not have been arbitrated? But, Sir, the statement which the minister has made, which has gone on record, is unfortunate, because he has taken almost the extreme view that the United States has taken, and in future negotiations it will very seriously militate against this country. I am going to refer to the correspondence between Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett. The letter, to which reference was made by the Minister of Justice, was dated March 10, 1845, and the clause which has particular relation to the subject matter now under discussion, and which is to be found at page 141 of the appendix to the British case, reads as follows:

The undersigned has accordingly much pleasure in announcing to Mr. Everett, the determination to which Her Majesty's government have come to relax——

Observe the word, Mr. Speaker.

—relax in favour of the United States fishermen, that right which Great Britain has hitherto exercised, of excluding those fishermen from the British portion of the Bay of Fundy, and they are prepared to direct their colonial authorities to allow, henceforward, to allow the United States fishermen to pursue their avocations in any part of the Bay of Fundy, provided they do not approach, except in the cases specified in the treaty of 1818, within three miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

That was the offer of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Everett, and it was an offer which clearly contained a condition. Here is the reply of Mr. Everett, or the important part of it, which will be found on page 142 of the same volume, under date of March 25, 1845. After acknowledging the receipt of Lord Aberdeen's letter, Mr. Everett goes on to say:

While he desires, however, without reserve, to express his sense of the amicable disposition evinced by Her Majesty's government on this occasion in relaxing in favour of the United States——

Again observe the word, Mr. Speaker.

—the exercise of what, after deliberate reconsideration, fortified by high legal authority, is deemed an unquestioned right of Her Majesty's government, the undersigned would be unfaithful to his duty did he omit to remark to Lord Aberdeen that no arguments have at any time been adduced to shake the confidence of the government of the United States in their own construction of the treaty.

At this point, just let me say that the contention which the United States were putting forward then, which they always thereafter put forward, and which they put forward at the hearing of this case before the Hague Tribunal—the same extreme contention with respect to bays, that was made with respect to the Bay of Fundy in this correspondence—was made on behalf of every other bay, when the matter came to be arbitrated in 1910 at the Hague. Mr. Everett's letter continues:

While they have ever been prepared to admit, that in the letter of one expression of that instrument there is some reason for claiming a right to exclude United States fishermen from the Bay of Fundy (it being difficult to deny to that arm of the sea the name of 'bay' which long geographical usage has assigned to it), they have ever strenuously maintained that it is only on heir own construction of the entire article that its known design in reference to the regulation of the fisheries admits of being carried into effect.

The undersigned does not make this observation for the sake of detracting from the liberality evinced by Her Majesty's government in relaxing——

The word 'relaxing' is again used—— —from what they have regarded as their right; but would be placing his own government in a false position to accept as mere favour that for which they have so long and strenuously contended as due to them under the convention.

Here we have the conditional offer of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Everett, spurned by the representative of the United States, who said in effect: You are giving us nothing; you are merely offering to us what we already have, and therefore, we will not, on our part, meet the conditions which you have imposed. They did not permanently change anything by that correspondence, and no concession was ever made after that. It was a relaxation for a time only and conditional at that. There was a finality attached to it, and that finality was brought about by certain actions on the part of the government of Canada with the assent of the British authorities.

Now, I may say that there were several reasons in addition to the reason I have just given, why this should not be considered as more than a temporary relaxation. For instance, during the hearing of the Halifax Fishery Award Argument, it was declared by Mr. Thompson, in arguing the case on behalf of Great Britain, that it was only a relaxation, and a temporary relaxation. The United States did not contend at that time that this relaxation of Lord Aberdeen's gave them rights in the Bay of Fundy. They were then founding their alleged rights, not upon that chiefly but rather upon the award of Mr. Bates, in connection with the arbitration with reference to the Schooner 'Washington,' an American vessel, which had been seized for fishing within what was then known as the three-mile limit in the Bay of Fundy, that is outside of the Grand Manan islands. The matter was referred to a tribunal of three, Mr. Bates being the umpire, and giving a decision adverse to Great Britain, and the sum of $3,000 damages was paid. The United States claimed under that chiefly, rather than under Lord Aberdeen's letter.

In 1870 the Hon. Peter Mitchell, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, placed certain restrictions upon American fishermen with regard to the fishery regulations of this country, and Lord Grenville sent a despatch to Mr. Mitchell in which he said that 'Her Majesty's government hopes that the United States fishermen will not, for the present, be prevented from fishing except within three miles of land or in bays which are less than six miles broad at the mouth.' So that on that occasion, there was a clear illustration of the view that the Canadian authorities held that this did not operate in any way as giving a permanent right to the Americans in that bay and the British authorities when they used the expression 'for the present' regarded the relaxation of the enforcement of their exclusive rights in all bays more than six miles broad at the mouth, as being a temporary relaxation only.

Again in 1886 the parliament of Canada passed an Act respecting Foreign Fishing Vessels. That Act did not meet with the approval of our friends in the United States, and consequently an interchange of correspondence took place between Mr. Phelps, then representative of the United States at the Court of St. James, and the Marquis of Salisbury. Here is an extract from a letter, dated January 25, 1887, from Mr. Phelps to Lord Salisbury referring to this Act of 1886, which was passed by the parliament of Canada. Mr. Phelps says:

> Since the receipt of Lord Iddesleigh's note, the United States government has learned with grave regret that Her Majesty's assent has been given to an Act of the parliament of Canada, passed at its late session, intituled: 'An Act further to amend the Act respecting Fishing by Foreign Vessels,' which has been the subject of observation in the previous correspondence on the subject between the government of the United States and of Great Britain.

Mr. Phelps goes on to state:

> It has been pointed out in my note to Lord Iddesleigh above mentioned that the three-mile limit referred to in this Act is claimed by the Canadian government to include considerable portions of the high seas, such as the Bay of Fundy, the Bay of Chaleurs and similar waters, by drawing the line from headlands to headlands. And that American fishermen have been excluded from those waters accordingly.

So that there is no foundation for the assertion that since 1845, the date of the interchange of correspondence between Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett, the United States had the privilege of the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy without any objection on the part of Great Britain or Canada. I say that that citation which I have made—a citation from the letter of the representative of the United States at the Court of St. James—is the strongest evidence of the fact that the British and Canadian authorities considered that the United States had no rights in these waters, and that when Her Majesty's assent was given the Act—and the assent of the Governor General of Canada was withheld pending the sanction by the imperial authorities of that Act—it is evident that the British authorities claimed that the Bay of Fundy was British territorial waters.

Now, Sir, to return again to the arbitra- by the Hague Tribunal.

In April, 1909, a document was brought down in the imperial parliament which contained the special agreement entered into at Washington on the 27th January, 1909, and embodied the correspondence between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Bacon of 6th February, 1909. There is nothing, however, in this document to indicate that any arrangement had been made to exclude the Bay of Fundy from the scope of the arbitration which was to be undertaken under this agreement.

Again in September, 1909, we find that another document was printed and presented to both houses of parliament in Great Britain. This contains the special agreement entered into on the 27th January, 1909, at Washington, and also two notes interchanged between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Bacon, who had succeeded Mr. Root as Secretary of State for the United States. The first is from Mr. Bryce to Mr. Bacon:

> British Embassy,
> Washington, March 4, 1909.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note informing me that the Senate of the United States has approved the special agreement for the reference to arbitration of the questions relating to the fisheries on the North Atlantic coast and of the terms of the resolution in which that approval was given.

It is now my duty to inform you that the government of His Britannic Majesty confirms the special agreement aforesaid, and in doing so confirms also the understanding arrived at by us that question 5 of the series of questions submitted for arbitration—namely, from where must be measured the '3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbours' referred to in the said article—is submitted in its present form with the agreed understanding that no question as to the Bay of Fundy, considered as a whole, apart from its bays or creeks, or as to innocent passage through the Gut of Canso, is included in this question as one to be raised in the present arbitration, it being the intention of the parties that their respective views or contentions on either subject shall be in no wise prejudiced by anything in the present arbitration.

This understanding is that which was embodied in notes exchanged between your predecessor and myself on the 27th January, and is that expressed in the above-mentioned resolution of the Senate of the United States.

I have, &c.,

JAMES BRYCE.

Here now we have the most extraordinary statement that, at the same time that the agreement was entered into, there was an 'understanding' outside of that agreement which varied it and lessened the benefits of it, so far as Great Britain and Canada in particular are concerned.

Let me read the reply:

Department of State,
Washington, March 4, 1909.

Excellency:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 4th instant, in which you confirm the understanding in the matter of the special agreement submitting to arbitration the differences between the governments of the United States and Great Britain concerning the North Atlantic fisheries, as expressed in the resolution of the Senate of the 16th of February, 1909, and as previously agreed upon by the interchange of notes with my predecessor of the 27th of January, 1909.

I therefore have the honour to inform you that this government considers the special agreement as in full force and effect from and after the 4th day of March, 1909.

I have, &c.,
ROBERT BACON.

In this document brought down to the British House of parliament on September, 1909, a reference is made to an understanding entered into on the 27th January of that year, the same date that this special agreement for the submission of these matters to the Hague Tribunal was signed and sealed. And the strange part is that in the document brought down in February no reference is made to any such understanding, and the agreement, as brought down to the Imperial House might well be misleading so far as the scope of question 5 is concerned. For would not the members of the Imperial House have the right to believe that every question with regard to bays in His Majesty's North American possessions on the Atlantic, was to be settled by that tribunal under question 5? Yet here we have this mysterious understanding which suddenly crops up in this blue-book submitted to the imperial parliament in September, 1909.

Mr. FOSTER. The other was February.

Mr. JAMESON. Yes, and this was in September, or eight months after the clandestine understanding was arrived at. I ask the hon. minister why it was that this understanding was entered into, at whose instance, upon whose advice, with whose consent, and who is to accept the responsibility. The minister in effect stated that this understanding was arrived at under his instructions or with his knowledge and consent.

One thing is sure, and that is that this government cannot escape responsibility for it; because that responsibility is absolutely nailed down by Article 2 of this treaty of 1909, which I have already read, but which I will repeat at this juncture:

His Majesty's government reserving the right, before concluding a special agreement affecting any of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire, to obtain the concurrence therein of the government of that dominion.

So that it is to be presumed, apart altogether from the statement of the Minister of Justice, that the government had full cognizance of this matter—they were party and privy to it, and the responsibility is entirely upon them for the failure to include the Bay of Fundy in the subjects submitted to the Tribunal under question 5.

I must say that it is a surprising thing to me, notwithstanding the statement of the Minister of Justice, that the understanding was arrived at with his concurrence, that he preferred to have the understanding separate and apart—as I gather from his remarks—from the special agreement itself. I cannot understand the advisability of that. Here was a special agreement entered into on the 27th of February, 1909,—the documents signed and sealed at Washington on that day. The documents were exchanged between Messrs. Bryce and Root, on the 6th of February, 1909. Up to that time, there was not a word upon the record, or in the document itself that any change had been made or was to be made in respect to its scope. Again, on the 16th of February, 1909, we find that the Senate of the United States approves of that special agreement, subject to the exclusion from the operation thereof of the question regarding the Bay of Fundy, the 'innocent passage of the Gulf of Canso,' and some question with respect to Conception Bay. We cannot find out what was said in the Senate of the United States, with regard to this matter, because what went on there, was carried on in camera. There were secret proceedings all round. And it was not until the 18th of February, 1909, that 'the injunction of secrecy was raised in the United States Senate from the special agreement between the United States and Great Britain for the submission to the permanent court of arbitration at the Hague, of questions relating to the fisheries of the North Atlantic coast.' That is the record that appears in the congressional record of February 20, 1909, in regard to the Senate of the United States. Now, this understanding, as I have said, was evidently arrived at with the concurrence and by the consent of the government of this country or of its representatives in that behalf.

Mr. FOSTER. Were the papers not brought down?

Mr. JAMESON. No papers with regard to this subject have ever been brought down, printed and distributed to this House, with the exception—I think I am stating the facts—of this blue-book distributed on the 27th of February last, entitled: 'Papers in regard to differences between Canada and the United States, referred to the Hague Tribunal, also amended fishery regulations' (in other words, the award of the Hague Tribunal and some fishery regulations enacted thereunder) and a return brought down in response to a motion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), on the 27th of February, 1909, which embraced, I believe, the copy of the special agreement entered into on the 27th of January, 1909. It, however, was not printed. But no correspondence relating to this matter—none of the notes which passed on the 27th of January, 1909, and which varied this special agreement—have been laid before this parliament or so far as the documents in our hands evidence were ever presented to the imperial parliament.

The mysterious part of the matter is, here is a special understanding arrived at on the 27th of January, 1909, between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root, excepting the Bay of Fundy from the scope of this inquiry and from the operation of the award. The United States Senate, according to all the records we have, did not pass upon that matter until the 16th of February, 1909, so we have an agreement on the part of the representatives of the Canadian government that the Bay of Fundy should be excluded from the award, actually entered into twenty days before the Senate of the United States demanded it. I say that is a most extraordinary condition of affairs, and is something which certainly needs explaining by the Minister of Justice, or whoever it was had this matter in charge.

It will be observed, also, that, while Mr. Bryce agreed to exclude these questions, of the Bay of Fundy from submission to The Hague Tribunal, he clung to our rights by the paragraph in his letter to which I have alluded. Although the minister has stated, in effect, that he does not regard us as having any territorial rights in the Bay of Fundy outside the three-mile limit, I wish to enter now a protest against that statement in the strongest terms possible, because I do not think the statement is one which should go unchallenged. Though a layman, I take that stand, and I trust I shall be supported in it by gentlemen of legal attainments whose opinion on that matter would be worthy of consideration. I feel it would be detrimental to the interests of the country and detrimental to our interests in any future negotiations we may have in regard to this important bay that the statement should go unchallenged.

In what condition are we placed by reason of this 'understanding' arrived at on the same day the special agreement was entered into? Where does that leave us with regard to future arbitration in respect to the Bay of Fundy? Are we precluded by it from arbitrating in regard to the Bay of Fundy? Are we precluded for any specific time, by this mysterious understanding of which we get no particulars? Or are we shut out for all time? I say, these are important questions. The life of the treaty of 1908 between Great Britain and the United States, as I have pointed out, is five years from the 4th of June, 1908. It expires on the 4th of June, 1913, that is, there is practically only two years left of the life of that treaty. I do not know, from any information I have, or can obtain, whether or not we are shut out from arbitrating our rights with respect to the Bay of Fundy by reason of any 'understanding,' which may have been arrived at between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root by the consent, and with the concurrence of the government of Canada or their representative.

What the toiling fishermen of the Bay of Fundy shores want to know is, what are the Canadian rights in the Bay of Fundy. Are they certain or are they indefinite? Are they exclusive, or are they otherwise? If indefinite, when will the government ever have another opportunity such as they had in 1909, to clear up the question and settle it for all time? If our rights are exclusive does the United States recognize them as such, and does the government of Canada intend to enforce our rights in that regard? Two considerations hang upon this, if the Bay of Fundy is British territorial waters, the government of Canada can first exercise supervision and control of these fisheries from shore to shore. And, secondly, that the fishermen of the world can be excluded from the benefit of those fisheries.

I have heard it stated in this House by supporters of the government that the fishermen of the maritime provinces are going to serve as recruits for the Canadian Naval Service. Sir, I believe that the fishermen of the Atlantic coasts of Canada will always be found ready and willing to do their duty to their country whenever they are called on. Of that I am absolutely confident, and I do not think it needs assertion or reassertion. But, Sir, what I say is, that if the fishermen of the maritime provinces are to be expected to recruit our navy, if they are to be expected to come to the rescue, the defence, and protection of Canada and Canadian interests, surely it is the duty of the government to guard and protect their interests when they are entrusted to them, as they were on the occasion to which I have alluded. In that connection the government has absolutely failed of its duty. It was the most complete backdown in matters diplomatic which has ever taken place in connection with any Canadian affair. The people of this country wish to live on friendly terms with the people of the United States, of that there can be no question whatever. The two peoples are sprung largely from the same stock, speak pretty generally the same language, have largely the same laws, literature and customs, but with all that I believe that the people of Canada would hesitate to purchase that friendship at the cost of their rights as British subjects in our own fisheries. I believe that the people of Canada will shut their eyes to irregularities in different departments of government, that they will even shut their eyes to worse than extravagance in that connection, but if I know their temper and their mettle they are not likely to tolerate a sacrifice of their national interests either through weak-kneed diplomacy, or through the inefficiency of this or any other government; and so far as the documents I have inspected give me light on this subject, the government of this country has absolutely failed of its duty in connection with the Bay of Fundy, and with the preservation of the rights of our fishermen in that most important bay.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). When my hon. friend in the course of his remarks asked an answer to a question not long ago, I made an answer, which was possibly longer than it ought to have been. I understand it was long enough to lead to complaint of its length on the part of the hon. gentleman. That was my fault, my misapprehension, I suppose, because I had in all sincerity taken it that the question was asked because he wanted information. I think he has made it evident enough that it was not information that he was seeking, but rather some foundation, if by any possibility, even a foothold or a toehold for it could be obtained, for making an attack on this government, and I am agreeably disappointed in the gravamen of the complaint which is made by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman gave notice last night that to-day he would discuss some points in connection with this award. The points in connection with the Hague award are literally too numerous to mention. A matter that took the better part of the summer for discussion and in respect to which the award itself, which is probably as compendious a summary of the points involved as could possibly be put upon paper, and which extends over the number of foolscap pages this award occupies, is of such a character that to speak of some of the points in regard to the case, is like saying that all the words he intends to use would be found in an unabridged dictionary. Thus, I was not able to refresh my memory on particular points or to bring with me the papers bearing on the matters to be brought up. The burden of the hon. gentleman's complaint is that the government is very seriously to blame because something or other has been lost or has been given away or somebody's case has been weakened or prejudice has in some manner or another arisen out of these recent proceedings in regard to the rights of Canadian fishermen in the Bay of Fundy. The answer to that is very simple, very brief; the answer is simply that whatever such Canadian rights were before this arbitration was entered upon such and no less are Canadian rights to-day since this arbitration is ended and an award has been made. The reference to arbitration did not touch the Bay of Fundy one way or the other, and the notes which were exchanged between Mr. Bryce and the American authorities on that subject pursuant to the verbal arrangement in that behalf which had been entered into, say in so many words that nothing in connection with these proceedings is to prejudice the rights of either party or the contentions which either party is at liberty to make in regard to the effect of the treaty of 1818 upon the Bay of Fundy. Surely nothing can be plainer than the position in which matters with regard to the Bay of Fundy are left by that arrangement. There was no arbitration about the Bay of Fundy, that is all that has happened in regard to it. There was arbitration in regard to the remainder of our bays, and whatever position the Bay of Fundy was in before this agreement to have an arbitration was entered into, in that identical position the Bay of Fundy is to-day unless it may be, as I think it may well be, that the position of Canada in regard to that bay is made stronger by the success which Canada's contentions have had before the tribunal last summer.

It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to deplore the fact that the Bay of Fundy was excluded from the arbitration of last summer. The position which was taken by the United States with regard to that sheet of water was simply: We will not arbitrate about it. It takes two people to make a bargain, it takes two people to make an agreement to arbitrate just as much as it takes two people to make any other agreement and with the United States saying: We will not submit any question to The Hague Tribunal with regard to the Bay of Fundy, the position of Great Britain was just simply this: Will we arbitrate with regard to the other bays, will we arbitrate with regard to the other questions which are in issue, leaving any question with regard to the Bay of Fundy untouched by this arrangement for arbitration? The hon. gentleman may have the opinion that it would have been wiser for Great Britain to have refused to arbitrate at all than to have entered into any submission to arbitrate when the Bay of Fundy was excluded from that submission. He is entitled to that opinion if he entertains it. Speaking for myself, I entertain exactly the opposite opinion, and I think it was a vast advantage to this country to obtain the submission of the leading, in fact, all the questions which had ever, in the course of ninety years, arisen with regard to this treaty, even although we did not at the same time get the decision made applicable to the Bay of Fundy. We have not in any degree lessened our rights in the Bay of Fundy. The agreement which is made with regard to that piece of water and the notes which have been referred to expressly declare that the rights or claims of Canada are not to be prejudiced as far as the Bay of Fundy is concerned by anything which takes place in this arbitration. Equally the rights and claims of the United States with regard to that bay are preserved and kept from being prejudiced by this arbitration. It was, as I said when I was on my feet a little while ago, simply made, on the part of the United States, a sine qua non of entering into this arbitration that nothing with respect to the arbitration should affect the position of either party with regard to the Bay of Fundy. I am not concerned, I think, in discussing the effect of the correspondence of 1845 and of the earlier years with regard to that bay. I am perfectly aware that the effect of that correspondence is a matter about which a good deal can be said on either side, and from more than one point of view. If the hon. member will take the trouble to peruse the oral argument which took place last summer at The Hague he will find pages and pages of discussion by the learned gentlemen on both sides of this matter devoted entirely to a minute and critical dissection and analysis of all the correspondence which culminated in the letter of 1845 written by Lord Aberdeen. The attitude of both parties in the previous years in the course of the prolonged diplomatic discussion, while it related immediately to the Bay of Fundy, had the most important possible bearing upon the general question of the interpretation of this clause of the treaty, and just for that reason every word, I may say every letter, of that long diplomatic correspondence was scrutinized with the utmost care, was presented before the tribunal and was discussed over and over again on both sides of the question by the various counsel who were concerned in the case. In those circumstances I should be a very bold man if I were to express my own opinion in so far as I have formed one as to the effect of that correspondence, and it would not, in any circumstances, be fitting that I should do so. The hon. gentleman indicates the opinion of it which he has and he believes that there is nothing in it which in any way precludes Great Britain or Canada asserting to-day the right to exclude the fishermen of the United States from the whole Bay of Fundy. That may be so, but if that is a matter which is ever to be again in debate between the United States and Canada I think it would not be desirable that I, at any rate, whatever other hon. gentleman may see fit to do, should discuss it in this House, or express an opinion with regard to it.

SUPPLY—HAGUE ARBITRATION; ATLANTIC FISHERIES.

The Order for Public Bills having expired, the House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion to go into Committee of Supply.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had shown, I think conclusively, that whether or not Great Britain gave away the Bay of Fundy in 1845, we certainly did nothing in the nature of giving away either the bay or any contention with regard to the bay when we entered into the arrangement for arbitration on the subject of the fisheries, two years ago. But the hon. gentleman who addressed you this afternoon makes the complaint as well that the reservation of the rights of the respective parties with regard to the Bay of Fundy which took place in 1909, was something secret, clandestine, mysterious, which nobody can understand. Well, I do not know what the grievance is if that were so. It is not so as a matter of fact; there is not a particle of foundation for it that I am able to discover anywhere. But if it were so, who is injured by it? What is the grievance? What difference would there have been if it had been published in all the official gazettes between here and Kamschatka? The arrangement was entered into in the shape of an interchange of notes between the British embassy and the United States Secretary of State simply as a means of recording the agreement which had been come to. An agreement of any kind does not take shape at once, as any one knows who has had anything to do with the practical work of framing an agreement between parties. Ordinarily it is built up piece by piece and by slow degrees; always it must be preceded by either verbal negotiations or written communications between the parties, and in this instance, just as in the case of the most ordinary business agreement which might be entered into between any two men, there were a great many verbal communications on the subject of what should be submitted to arbitration, between the British Ambassador, on the one part, and representatives of the United States Department of State on the other part. Ultimately, out of these negotiations and communications there came to be something put into writing as a proposed draft of, it may be the terms which were embodied in the formal document of agreement to arbitrate, or it may be at first of the questions which it was proposed to have submitted—I cannot say which, as a matter of memory. It was the subject of communication backward and forward between the different people who were interested in the matter for months before the final meeting in January, 1909, at which the terms of the agreement were definitely put into their last shape. It had been an understanding more or less distinct, for more than a year before that, that these differences would be referred to arbitration before a tribunal at the Hague. At the Imperial Conference of 1907, Sir Robert Bond, then First Minister of Newfoundland, asked the help of his colleagues from the sister colonies in the effort to get these differences settled. It is to be remembered that Canada had at that time, no question of acute difference with the United States with regard to the fisheries. Canada had been getting along for 20 years or more under the modus vivendi of 1888, and there had been, so far as I at present recollect, not a single dispute, unless it might have been some letter or protest about some more or less trifling matter which may have occurred in that interval. But in 1907 things had come to be in a very acute condition between the United States and Newfoundland, and Sir Robert Bond asked his fellow-members of the Imperial Conference to exert their influence and assist him with the British government in an effort to get these difficulties referred to arbitration at the Hague. Finally, perhaps some time during the year 1908, it came to be understood or more or less definitely agreed, that the matters would be referred to a tribunal to be arranged out of the members of the permanent court at the Hague. Then the question arose of what points should be submitted to this tribunal. Any agreement for arbitration would of course be between the United States on the one part, and on the other part, not Canada, not Newfoundland, but the whole British Empire; and the British government was not merely theoretically but literally taking charge of the work of the negotiations for this reference to the Hague. Communications were had from time to time with this government in Canada, and we were kept informed of what was going on, and the proposed drafts of submission to arbitration were from time to time forwarded here, whether those drafts were proposed on the part of the British Ambassador, or on the part of the United States. I cannot now, speaking from memory, state at what stage of the matter the first reference to the Bay of Fundy appeared; but I am quite sure that it was at a very early stage of the efforts to frame the questions which should be submitted. It was Canada which was mainly interested in having settled the question as to the bays. Quite true, Newfoundland was interested in that question also. They have many large bays upon their eastern coast and upon the eastern half of their southern coast, in regard to which it was their contention, just as it was ours in Canada, that in the treaty of 1818 the United States renounced their right to fish. But the question of the bays, so far as Newfoundland was concerned, was not presented as being of the first consequence. To us it seemed probably the most important question of any which had been suggested, so that from the first time that Canada had anything to do with suggesting questions which ought to be included among those to be submitted to arbitration, the question which now appears in the list of questions as number 5—how the 3-mile limit is to be measured, or, in other words, what are the bays from which the United States fishermen are to be excluded—always had a place. That was in the first draft that went from Ottawa in connection with this matter; and it always remained there in some shape or other until its final inclusion, when the agreement to arbitrate was settled two years ago. As soon as that question appeared upon any draft going from here, I venture to say, speaking from recollection, the United States at once said: Very well, we have no objection to arbitrate that question with you, but it must not affect our position with reference to the Bay of Fundy, that question must not include the Bay of Fundy; we are not prepared to arbitrate with reference to the Bay of Fundy. And let me remind the hon. gentleman who has spoken that there is a great deal of reason in that position.

Without saying anything as to the true meaning of the arrangement with regard to the Bay of Fundy which was made in 1845, this at all events is certain as a matter of history, namely, that from the time when that letter of Lord Aberdeen was written in 1845 up to the present, no one on the British side has asserted a right to exclude the fishermen of the United States from that Bay. Whether or not that be what the letter means, that is what has happened. The United States fishermen, ever since that letter was received by them from the British government, have exercised what they call their right to fish in the Bay of Fundy, and no attempt has been made to prevent the exercise by them of that right. Sixty and odd years had gone by when, in 1909, we were framing a submission to arbitration. Was it unreasonable on the part of the United States to say to us: We will arbitrate, if you like, with regard to the bays which you say we are excluded from, but we will not arbitrate with regard to the Bay of Fundy. There are no differences to arbitrate with regard to that bay. There have been no quarrels regarding it ever since 1845. What, then, was there to arbitrate? If we had resisted their demand that the Bay of Fundy should not be included, and if they had taken the position I have just mentioned, what answer could we have given? It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to cry out now in the light of our victory and inquire why we did not include the Bay of Fundy and succeed as to that as well as to the others, but the fact is we had been making no claim to exclude the fishermen of the United States from that bay for sixty-four years when this treaty of arbitration was entered into. There was, in fact, no question then outstanding with regard to it.

As the United States took the position that they did not intend to submit any question with regard to the Bay of Fundy to arbitration, there was no other course left if we were to have an arbitration at all than to arbitrate the remaining questions which had arisen, some before 1845 and some later and some of which were of pressing, practical importance.

Then, the manner in which the understanding was expressed that the Bay of Fundy was not to be included in the arbitration seems to me a matter of very trifling consequence. It had been originally proposed as an independent article of the agreement to arbitrate. It appeared in this draft agreement to arbitrate which reached us from Washington. I do not know which side framed it, and I do not suppose there was any dispute about it. It was simply a couple of lines saying that this agreement to arbitrate was not to affect the claims of either party in respect of the Bay of Fundy. That was the position of the draft, or proposed terms, of the arrangement in January, 1909, when I went to Washington in order to get the matter brought to a final termination. In the verbal discussions we had over the subject it was, as I have said, myself, I think, who suggested that instead of having that clause on the face of a formal instrument it would answer every purpose and be better if put into the shape of an exchange of letters between the British ambassador on the one part and the United States Secretary of State on the other. That form of expressing a collateral understanding, or agreement, is a very common one among lawyers when for any reason it is thought preferable by either party not to express on the face of a formal instrument some understanding or provision. Instead of doing this, letters expressing such understanding are interchanged between the parties, and are of equal weight. This is done just as a matter of convenience, or probably because some one connected with the affair expresses a preference to have it that way. Everybody else agreed, and it was done accordingly. My hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) thinks, however, that there was something terribly mysterious about this, that it was secret, clandestine and improper. Well, one hears a good deal on some occasions of such expressions. I suppose they are intended to impress somebody or other somewhere in the country with the idea that things are done in a sort of underhand fashion. I do not know for what other purpose such charges are made or such expressions used in this House. Similar charges might be made regarding the most ordinary transactions. If two men enter into a bargain in every-day life, do they unnecessarily publish it abroad? Why should they? If any lawyer, making an agreement between his client and the client of a fellow-practitioner, were asked that this agreement or the pourparlers which preceded it should be published in the newspapers, he dare not consent under penalty of losing his practice. If he did consent, nobody would go to him. Why on earth should we act differently in public affairs? Again, let me remind the hon. gentleman that it was not Canada making this agreement with the United States. This agreement was, not only in terms and name, but literally, the agreement of His Majesty under the advice of his own advisers in Great Britain. It may be said that it was the home authorities who led Canada and Newfoundland into this difficulty. It was certainly they who got them out of this difficulty. They made it, as they might very properly do, their own matter, and this treaty, or agreement, of arbitration was entered into by them through their ambassador. It is perfectly true that they consulted Canada and Newfoundland and acted with the concurrence of these colonies, but it is none the less true that they acted upon their own view as to what was right and proper.

The hon. gentleman says that nobody knew of this agreement until it appeared in a British blue-book in September, 1909. He might quite as well have said that it appeared contemporaneously in the printed appendix to these proceedings, and, as a matter of course, was open to any one to read who was interested enough to look through the volume. It is something which took place contemporaneously with the signed agreement to arbitrate, and the documents show on their face the nature of the circumstances which led to that agreement being entered into. The agreement to submit these differences to arbitration was signed on the 27th January, 1909, between Mr. Root and Mr. Bryce. I may now say that another understanding, which is not expressed in this agreement, an understanding verbally expressed, was that it was not to be acted upon unless the government of Newfoundland afterwards assented to it. It was of great importance that it should be signed at the time it was, the 27th January, 1909. Mr. Root was leaving office immediately after affixing his signature to this document, and it was he who had negotiated on the part of the United States the whole matter from the beginning.

He was the man who had conducted the diplomatic correspondence with Sir Edward Grey in connection with these disputes for years before 1909; and, this being something which he was, on the part of the United States, more familiar with than any other single person, it was certainly of some consequence to get it closed, if possible, before his final retirement from the official position of Secretary of State. He resigned immediately after the signature of this document. It had been, up to that date, impossible to submit the document in its final shape to the government of Newfoundland. The Attorney General of Newfoundland was in Washington, but he was insisting that it should be submitted to his first minister, Sir Robert Bond, and, although the document was actually signed by Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root on the 27th January, it was with the understanding that it would not be acted upon unless and until it had the approval of Sir Robert Bond and of his government. Receiving that approval, in due course it came to be submitted to the Senate of the United States; and, being so submitted, at some date before the 21st February, 1909, within the next three or four weeks after it was signed, the Senate agreed to it only upon the condition that all question with regard to the Bay of Fundy should be excluded. The Senate made that an integral part of their acceptance of this arrangement. The resolution is worded:

It is agreed by the United States and Great Britain that question 5 of the series submitted namely, 'from where must be measured the three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbours referred to in said article,' does not include any question as to the Bay of Fundy, considered as a whole apart from its bays or creeks.

Then, there is the reference to innocent passage through the gulf of Canso and to the respective views or contentions of the United States and Great Britain not being in any wise prejudiced by anything in the present arbitration, 'and this agreement on the part of the United States will be mentioned in the ratification of the special agreement, and will, in effect, form part of the special agreement.' So, the Senate of the United States, having given its assent to this matter being sent to the Hague only on the terms of that resolution; it became absolutely necessary that the resolution should be notified officially to the government of Great Britain as one of the terms of the ratification. It was in that way that these notes were exchanged between Mr. Bacon, who, by that time, had succeeded Mr. Root as Secretary of State, and Mr. Bryce. Mr. Bacon wrote his letter immediately on the resolution being passed on the 21st February to Mr. Bryce, stating:

In giving this advice and consent to the ratification of this special agreement, and as a part of the act of ratification, the Senate states in the resolution its understanding—— the effect of which I have already given. Mr. Bryce, having received that letter on the 21st February, when he came, under the proper authority from London, to exchange the formal ratification of the agreement with the government of the United States, wrote his letter of 4th March, 1909, to Mr. Bacon in which he acknowledged the receipt of the letter of 21st February and proceeded to say that the British understanding of the situation with regard to the Bay of Fundy was exactly that which was expressed in the resolution of the Senate. These notes having been exchanged between the representatives of both nations and the agreement to refer this matter to the Hague having been ratified and entered into only on the condition that anything resulting from the arbitration should prejudice in no way the claims of the United States to the Bay of Fundy—and equally should prejudice in no way the claims of Great Britain in regard to the Bay of Fundy—who is hurt by it? What foundation is there in fact for the charge of the hon. gentleman that there has been some dereliction of duty on the part of this government in not having the Bay of Fundy included, and the Bay of Fundy settled? It was simply in the position that the United States was willing to arbitrate other questions, but refused to arbitrate that one, saying that there was nothing to arbitrate in regard to it, and the whole question for determination was whether we would arbitrate all the rest—which were the only things we were quarrelling about—leaving the Bay of Fundy in regard to which there had been no question of difference for nearly seventy years, on one side. I think we should have been very remiss in our duty, if we had insisted on making the inclusion of the Bay of Fundy a point in this matter, if we had endeavoured to waken up questions which had remained absolutely quiescent for nearly seventy years in regard to the Bay of Fundy and had made the inclusion of them a condition precedent to entering into arbitration with regard to the others. As I have pointed out, nobody has been in any way damnified by the fact that the Bay of Fundy has not been included in this arbitration. The condition in regard to it remains exactly what it was five years ago—not any worse certainly for us; I think it is a good deal better, because the result of the award having been to confirm our contention in regard to bays generally, it has gone a very long distance toward confirming the like contention about the Bay of Fundy if we are in a position to set up that contention about the Bay of Fundy. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jameson) thinks we are, upon his view of the correspondence of 1845. It may be so; I am not disputing it for a moment. I know that other people take a very different view. I know the United States takes a very different view. I know that ever since 1845 the United States has treated that letter of 1845 as an absolute concession to them on the part of Great Britain of all their contentions in regard to the Bay of Fundy. I am not saying they are right in doing so; I am only stating as a matter of fact that they have done so all these years. Now, if at any time it is thought desirable on the part of Canada to revive the contention which Nova Scotia made before 1845, to reassert in 1911, or at any subsequent date, the position which Nova Scotia took in 1841 and the subsequent years, there is nothing in the arrangement for this arbitration of last summer to interfere in the least degree with their doing so. Whether or not it would be desirable that it should be done is for hon. gentlemen to consider. Let me say in that connection that I think there are a great many other things to be considered than those which have been mentioned this afternoon. And, whatever there may be to be considered now, there were a very great many more to be considered two years ago.

It is always very easy to be wise after the event, but I ask hon. gentlemen to reflect upon the position matters were in in January, 1909. I am able to say I think, having followed the course of these proceedings day by day and hour by hour last summer with the keenest interest, that with things as they were, our success upon this important question of bays was a close enough affair. There were five members of that tribunal, one of whom in the end was adverse; of the other four members of that tribunal one was the representative of the United States. Looking at the situation as it existed before the argument and before any indication of opinion had been given by the arbitrators on the subject of bays, it was reasonably manifest that the fate of our bays depended upon one of the five arbitrators who was not a representative of either of the nations interested, and it was certainly, on the part of all the counsel or lawyers who were engaged in the case, a matter of not only the greatest doubt and anxiety, but literally of the greatest uncertainty until the very moment when the award was handed out what the decision on the subject of bays would be. We were undertaking a pretty heavy task, when, in the face of the declared policy of the British government in regard to the non-territoriality of European bays which are more than six miles across we were undertaking to argue that great bays like the Baie des Chaleurs, 16 miles across at the entrance, were territorial, inland, closed waters to which other nations had no right of access, and I say again, as I said before when I was speaking three months ago, that in my opinion we are vastly indebted to the ability, the learning and the skill of the Attorney General of England and his argument before the tribunal that we succeeded upon our bays at all. Looking at the situation as it existed when this agreement of arbitration was being negotiated in 1909, I am certainly by no means prepared to say that it would have been a wise thing for us to have asked that the Bay of Fundy should have been included, that it would have been a reasonably prudent thing for us to have included the Bay of Fundy in the subjects for submission to the tribunal at the Hague, and looking at it to-day, after the event, and in the light of what took place during the argument, and of the words in which the award itself is made, I am glad that we got through that arbitration without the Bay of Fundy being included and without having had to have the burden of proving that a sheet of water 60 miles in width at its entrance was a territorial bay of Great Britain.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How does its width compare with that of Placentia bay?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. Speaking from memory I am not able to say, but of course it would depend entirely on where you marked the entrance to Placentia bay.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I mean the entrance as marked by the tribunal?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. Again I am not able to say from memory what the length of the lines would be across Placentia bay, which the tribunal has recommended the parties to adopt. The hon. gentleman, of course, will not overlook the fact that the tribunal has decided nothing in regard to Placentia bay, but has recommended simply that the parties interested should adopt certain lines which it has defined.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In what respect has it not decided with regard to Placentia bay what it has decided with regard to the Baie des Chaleurs?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. The position in regard to Placentia bay is the same as in regard to Baie des Chaleurs, the tribunal has not undertaken to pronounce any piece of water to be a bay but it has declared in answer to the question how the three marine miles mentioned in the treaty are to be measured that when you are dealing with bays, you ought to treat as the entrance of the bay the place where the bay first loses the characteristics and configuration of a bay, and contenting itself with making that general answer that you are to mark as the entrance to the bay the point at which if you were proceeding seaward, you would first cross the line which would mark the situation where the bay ended or where the characteristics and configuration of the bay came to an end, the tribunal has proceeded to recommend that certain lines be adopted across Placentia bay, Baie des Chaleurs, Bay Miramichi and the other large bays in question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Having regard to the general character of the award what would have been the danger of including the Bay of Fundy in the terms of the submission?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. The idea was as I have stated that it would have increased the burden of difficulty upon us which was already heavy enough; it would have been certainly the largest of the bays we would have had to contend for, and would have given our adversaries opportunity to point to it as being the thing we were contending for and to say to the tribunal: Is it possible to hold that that sheet of water is territorial and not open sea? In making that argument, the United States would also have had the advantage of the concession, whatever it was, which was made in 1845, and if the Bay of Fundy had been included as a thing to be arbitrated upon, the United States would have been able to point with the utmost confidence to the course, which Great Britain had herself taken in regard to that bay in 1845 as being not only an indication of willingness to give up all further contention about the Bay of Fundy, but equally an indication of willingness to do the same thing in regard to other bays, if the Bay of Fundy had been before the tribunal in the same category with the remaining bays upon the coast. I venture to think our position was better before the tribunal without any reference to the Bay of Fundy being included in the matters for decision, the arrangement being that nothing in the proceedings should prejudice our claims with reference to the Bay of Fundy or the claims of the United States in reference to the Bay of Fundy. That bay was simply put upon one side.

It could be referred to for the purpose of illustration and for matters of argument, but it was not anything that we were fighting over upon that particular occasion. We are not in the least degree precluded from fighting over it as a separate matter, if at any future time it is thought desirable to do so. But, before that course could be taken, either two years ago, or at any future time, you have first to get the consent of the British government, and, secondly, the consent of the government of the United States. It is not for me to offer any opinion as to what course the British government would take, if they were asked by Canada to raise now the old question with regard to the Bay if any such proposition were now made by 1845. I have not any doubt, however, that if any such proposition were now made by Canada to Great Britain, the exact language of the letter of Lord Aberdeen in 1845 would be carefully considered and no British statesman of to-day would, for a moment, be willing to recede at all from what, in his opinion, the fair meaning of that letter may have been. But, if the British government agreed with us, that it was desirable to arbitrate now any question with reference to the Bay of Fundy, it is plain surely that the assent of the United States to such an arbitration is equally necessary, and unless the United States were put in such a position by reason of seizures in the Bay of Fundy or by reason of our seeking by active means to exclude their fishermen from that bay, that they felt it a matter if importance to them to go to arbitration with regard to it, I am not able to see what other inducement would exist for them ever to agree to any arbitration in the world about it. They are perfectly content with the present situation. My hon. friend thinks that the letter of 1845 does not mean any more than a temporary relaxation of the right of Great Britain with regard to the bay. The United States is, at any rate, quite content with its present situation upon the language of the letter and the manner in which, since the letter was written, the fisheries of the Bay of Fundy have been administered by Great Britain and by Canada. The hon. gentleman urged that the effect of these contemporaneous letters upon the agreement to arbitrate was, in his judgment, greatly to weaken the case of Great Britain. I have tried to show why I think that is not so, but I am quite willing to let it go in the shape in which the hon. gentleman put it. He thinks that our arranging to leave the Bay of Fundy out greatly weakened our case. Be it so, weakened as it was, our case was strong enough to succeed.

Mr. JAMESON. The hon. minister misunderstood me. I said that the omission of the question of the Bay of Fundy would weaken any future case which we might desire to press, with regard to the Bay of Fundy.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. If the hon. gentleman, when speaking of the case being weakened, was not referring to the case which has been already arbitrated, I have nothing additional to say. As to the future, I think I have plainly enough shown and that the language of the document abundantly establishes that nobody's case is weakened any, but that on the contrary, the reasons for the decisions which have been given by the arbitrators in their considered judgment, certainly do not weaken, but rather strengthen any claim which we may now put forward with regard to the Bay of Fundy. They have, as the hon. gentleman himself has pointed out, in the extracts which he has read, used words which might fairly be applied to the Bay of Fundy, and which in any future arbitration, if any future arbitration ever exists, could certainly be used as a strong argument in favour of the contention that the Bay of Fundy is territorially altogether British.

With regard to the animadversion which has been made with respect to the papers not having been brought down, I am utterly astonished. There has never been the slightest idea on the part of anybody of keeping back papers. There is certainly nothing to keep back. While the matter was yet under consideration before the tribunal, however, probably a different situation would have arisen had anybody asked for papers. As I have said, it was the British government conducting this arbitration, literally and entirely so. They were in charge of it and anything we had to do, was under their direction. I was attending there not only in the capacity of a member of the government of Canada, but as the agent for Great Britain, under the appointment of Sir Edward Grey, responsible to him, reporting to him periodically during the arbitration, and the arbitration was in every sense of the word conducted on the British side by the British government assisted, as far as it was possible, by the governments of Canada and of Newfoundland. I may say to the hon. gentleman that long after this arrangement or agreement to arbitrate was entered into, even down to the 1st of June, 1910, when the actual oral argument began, the British government placed its prohibition upon this government and, I have no doubt, upon the government of Newfoundland as well, against the making public of any papers in connection with the case. Even the documents and the case which were printed and interchanged between counsel and between the governments on the 1st of October, 1909, were held as confidential. Only a few copies were in Canada, and these copies were under the strictest injunctions of confidence or secrecy down to the very day of the beginning of the oral proceedings at the Hague. I was not myself, able to understand the necessity for these injunctions of secrecy, but they were given me personally and given to others in the strictest possible manner, and for reasons which were considered sufficient, the British government preferred to insist upon the papers in connection with this matter remaining of a confidential nature, until the actual hearing of the case had begun. In these circumstances, if any application for the production of these papers had been made twelve months ago, it is quite possible that it could not have been acceded to. But, in the absence of any suggestion from any person of a desire to have these papers brought down to examine them or to look into them, or even a verbal request to see them, I do not understand upon what principle it is that the hon. gentleman now complains that the government has been remiss or has been attempting to hide something or to keep back from the information of the public, any of the papers in connection with this matter. No cause whatever, exists for seeking to attach to this government or to anybody, any blame in connection with the preparation or custody of these papers or the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy from the arbitration. Nobody has been in the least degree injured by it, and the whole gist of the complaint is, that whereas we submitted seven questions to the tribunal, we did not submit an eighth question in regard to the Bay of Fundy which would have been one in reference to which the United States told us distinctly they had nothing to arbitrate, and would not consent to any submission.

Mr. J. W. MADDIN (South Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, it is much to be deplored that the Minister of Justice did not reply to the able argument of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) in the urbane and dignified manner which usually characterizes him. I cannot understand why the Minister of Justice should charge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jameson) with attempting to get a toehold of him in this debate; I cannot appreciate by what process of mental gymnastics or intellectual athletics the minister should introduce a toehold into a debate on arbitration before the Hague Tribunal. I submit, Sir, that the hon. member for Digby, realizing that the wealthy and important fisheries of the Bay of Fundy had been withdrawn from submission to the Hague, owed it to his constituents, to the people of his province, and to the whole Dominion to endeavour to ascertain the true reason why the Bay of Fundy was excepted and to fix the responsibility. The Minister of Justice complained that short notice had been given him, but I would remind the minister that when he saw that a paragraph appeared in the speech from the Throne attaching what I consider a great deal of undue importance to this decision, and when on the 2nd of December he rose as Minister of Justice in this House to describe the proceedings before the tribunal, he did not give notice beforehand that he would do so, nor has he up to the present hour placed before this House the documents in connection with this alleged important arbitration.

Mr. BRODEUR. When the Minister of Justice made his statement on the 2nd of December he laid on the table a report of the proceedings before the Hague Tribunal.

Mr. MADDIN. All of which had been published in the press a long time before. My complaint is that on the 2nd of December when the minister discussed the treaty under which the tribunal was constituted, and the special agreement, he pointed out that the Bay of Fundy had been excluded, and he offered reasons why, but he did not submit to the House previous to that date a copy of the agreement, nor the correspondence under which the signed agreement was interchanged between the plenipotentiaries, or the correspondence concerning the final confirmation and ratification of the agreement as executed by Mr. Bryce and Mr. Bacon. I point out that article one of the treaty of the 4th of June, 1908, provides:

> Differences which arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretations of treaties between the two contracting parties and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at the Hague

Now, Mr. Ewart, K.C., in his letter to the press points out that the important functions discharged by the Minister of Justice, were the constituting of the Arbitration Committee of the Hague Tribunal, and framing the questions which were to be submitted to it, and there certainly being differences with regard to the Bay of Fundy why were they not submitted under article one of that treaty. When the Minister of Justice spoke on the 2nd of December he was not obliged to explain why the Bay of Fundy had been excluded, but he did undertake to offer reasons, although he did not furnish to the House the documents which should have been furnished long before, and which he says were preserved with the greatest secrecy. Let me tell him that one of these very secret papers was laid before the imperial parliament, printed in September, 1909, and offered for sale by the King's Printer in Great Britain at a penny a copy. This was one of the documents, which according to the Minister of Justice, no one was to look at until June of 1910. But, the Minister of Justice not having laid these documents before the House on the 2nd of December, he got before the Canadian Club at Ottawa, and he offered them explanations in regard to the efficiency of this award.

He went before the Barristers' Society in Osgoode Hall in Toronto, and there again extolled the virtues of this splendid piece of arbitration at the Hague. Now, I submit that it was not incumbent upon him to offer any reason why the Bay of Fundy had been excepted; but when he did take it upon himself to explain how it was that it had been excepted, I submit that it was his duty to take this House into his confidence and tell them the true and correct reason. He did not do it when he spoke here on the 2nd of December; he did not do it when he addressed the Canadian Club; he did not do it when he spoke before the Bar Society of this province at Osgoode Hall; but he did it tonight in his effort to reply to the hon. member for Digby. When this matter was under discussion by the hon. minister on the 2nd of December, speaking of the Bay of Fundy, he said:

> The colonists of Nova Scotia, I have no doubt, felt their case immensely strengthened and thought they would have behind them all the prestige and power of the British government itself in defending the claim they were making to the Bay of Fundy as part of their territorial waters. But in 1845, the Lord Aberdeen of that day, then Foreign Secretary of Great Britain, wrote a letter which had been prepared as a piece of diplomatic correspondence, after the most careful and matured consideration, in which while affirming the right of the colonies, while standing upon the opinion which had been expressed by their legal advisers and by the legal advisers of the British government, none the less, on the part of His Majesty's government, as a pure matter of grace and concession, expressed his willingness to forego, so far as the Bay of Fundy was concerned, the extreme right of the British subject in that regard, and assented to the use, by the fishermen of the United States, of the fisheries of the Bay of Fundy, in common with the inhabitants of the British colonies, upon which stipulation that as to the remainder of the maritime coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, the claims of United States fishermen should cease. The representative of the United States government at the court of St. James, to whom that letter was addressed, acknowledged courteously the concession which had been made, but continued to argue that it was really no concession, but only the recognition of a right which the United States fishermen had. And I am sorry to say, that the stipulation which had been attached by the British government to the concession was, I think, at no time recognized by the United States, and their claims continued as strongly pressed as before to equal enjoyment in all the other bays of the maritime coast of British North America. But the result of the argument made during the present summer and the award pronounced two months ago has been to uphold to the fullest extent the British contention and to demonstrate, I think, that if the concession regarding the Bay of Fundy had not been made in 1845, that bay, as well as the other large bays of our maritime provinces, would to-day be declared British territorial waters.

To-night the hon. Minister of Justice tells this House that he is glad and proud that this question with regard to the Bay of Fundy was not submitted to the tribunal. On the 2nd of December he was frank enough to say that if it had been submitted, the Bay of Fundy would have been declared to be British territorial waters.

There is one other aspect of this treaty which I propose to deal with, and that is the part of article 2 which says:

> It is understood that such special agreement on the part of the United States will be made by the President of the United States by and with the consent and advice of the Senate thereof.

After these documents changed hands and were signed on the 27th of January, 1909, they went before the Senate of the United States on the 16th of February for confirmation, as required by this part of article 2. The same article goes on to say:

> His Majesty's government reserves the right, before concluding a special agreement in any matter respecting a self-governing dominion of the British Empire, to obtain the concurrence therein of the government of that dominion.

Why, Sir, it is not so very long ago that the distinguished Prime Minister of this administration said: 'Where is the man or woman in Canada who will not be thankful for the day when this country will be rid of British diplomacy?' Here is a provision expressly set out in the treaty of 1908 which gives this government, in regard to disputes which affect the Dominion of Canada, the right to affirm and approve of an agreement regarding this country before it becomes effective. But the hon. Minister of Justice said: I was there as the appointee of Sir Edward Grey, responsible to him alone; I was not there as representing the government. Who, Mr. Speaker, was representing this government at Washington? Who was acting on behalf of this administration? Who was going to discharge the duties that are placed upon this government by section 2 of the treaty? For the first time in our lives we were to be free from the difficulties involved in the clumsiness of British diplomacy, and were going to have a matter settled to our own liking. But how does it turn out? The hon. minister says that the British diplomats took charge of the case absolutely, every detail of it, that he was not responsible, that he had nothing to do with it. If that be so, he was remiss in his duty, or the government of this country was remiss in its duty, in not seeing that the agreement was approved of by this government as well as ratified by the Senate of the United States. The hon. minister says that the question of the Bay of Fundy was raised very early in the discussion. He says that an agreement of any kind will never be carried out in the market place, that it is not published in the press, that a lawyer would not think of drawing an agreement and publishing it, or if he did he would have to close his office. That is absolutely true; but, Sir, this was a matter affecting the people of Canada and the government of Canada; it had been negotiated up to the point at which the result of the agreement was submitted to the tribunal; the tribunal had passed judgment upon it; His Majesty had referred to it in the speech from the Throne; the hon. minister was to explain the operation of it, and I say that was the time to have come out in the market place and to have taken this House into his confidence and to have exhibited every document connected with the matter, in order that a fair and intelligent discussion might be had in regard to the award and the manner in which it has been arrived at. The hon. minister says that it was very early in the discussion that the question of the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy and the right to navigate the Gut of Canso for peaceful purposes were introduced into the negotiations. He says that it was himself who suggested that the question of the Bay of Fundy be abandoned.

He offered also the suggestion that it is not unusual to incorporate in the interchange of notes an exception from the original agreement. Well, as a lawyer, I can understand how, when a document is drawn up, signed and sealed, and the parties subsequently agree to some exception or alteration, instead of disfiguring the original agreement by interlineations they make a supplementary agreement, which could only be done in writing by an interchange of notes or otherwise. But that is not the position in this case. The hon. minister says that in the oral negotiations, an understanding was entered into that the Bay of Fundy should be excluded from the operation of question 5. Then I ask, if that were the case, why was it not expressed in the document signed and sealed on the 27th of January, 1909?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Hear, hear.

Mr. MADDIN. The agreement was signed on the 27th of January, 1909, and on the 6th of February we find Mr. Bryce writing to Mr. Bacon as follows:

I have the honour to inform you, under instructions from His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that I am now in a position to complete the formalities incident to the conclusion of the special agreement for submission to arbitration of the question of the fisheries on the North Atlantic coast. I transmit herewith signed copy of the agreement in my possession which, when signed on the 27th ultimo, was for the terms to be held in suspense, and I have to request you to be so good as to acknowledge its receipt in a note forwarding to me the copy now in your possession and to take note of the fact that formal delivery of the document has now been duly effected by our action on behalf of our respective governments.

I shall not read the whole of this note because time will not permit, but suffice it to say that on February 6, 1909, ten days after the original agreement had been signed and sealed, signed copies of the subversion were exchanged between Mr. Root and Mr. Bryce as it went before the Hague Tribunal; and neither in the signed agreement nor in the notes exchanged under date of February 6, was there one syllable excepting the Bay of Fundy. I submit that if, in the oral negotiations leading up to the execution of these documents, the understanding had been arrived at to except the Bay of Fundy, that should have appeared on the face of the agreement dated January 27; but if it was subsequently to be referred to in an interchange of notes, the time to have made that interchange was on February 6, when this exchange of signed documents took place between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root, as shown by the White document brought down to the imperial parliament. This however, was not done. At a later date, on April 4, there was a letter written by Mr. Bryce to Mr. Bacon, who had succeeded Mr. Root. In that letter, Mr. Bryce says:

I have the honour to inform you that I have been instructed by His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to place on record, on behalf of His Majesty's government, with reference to the general arbitration treaty just signed by you and myself, that the final sentence of article 2 has been inserted in order to reserve to both governments the freedom of action secured to United States government under their constitution until any agreement which may have been arrived at shall have been notified to be finally binding and operated by an exchange of notes.

To this Mr. Root replied on April 4, and in this correspondence there is no reference made to the exception of the Bay of Fundy. On March 4, 1909, Mr. Bryce wrote to Mr. Bacon as follows:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note informing me that the Senate of the United States has approved the special agreement for the referenec to arbitration of the questions relating to the fisheries on the North Atlantic coast and of the terms of the resolution in which that approval is given.

It is now my duty to inform you that the government of His Britannic Majesty confirms the special agreement aforesaid, and in doing so confirms also the understanding arrived at by us that question 5 of the series of questions submitted for arbitration—namely, from where must be measured 'the 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbours' referred to in the said articles—is submitted in its present form with the agreed understanding that no questions as to the Bay of Fundy, considered as a whole, apart from its bays or creeks, or as to innocent passage through the Gut of Canso, is included in this question as one to be raised in the present arbitration.

Here on March 4, 1909, is the first intimation that the Bay of Fundy is to be excluded from the operation of this agreement to arbitrate.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the last paragraph of the award of the tribunal with regard to question 5 In that paragraph the arbitrators say:

It is understood that nothing in these rules refers either to the Bay of Fundy, considered as a whole, apart from its bays and creeks, or as to the innocent passage through the Gut of Canso, which were excluded by the agreement made by exchange of notes between Mr. Bacon and Mr. Bryce, dated February 21, 1909, and March 4, 1909.

Now the hon. minister (Sir Allen Aylesworth) tells us that it was by an oral agreement, which led up to the consummation of the special agreement dated 27th of January, that the Bay of Fundy was excepted. We are told in a letter signed by Mr. Bryce, that the bay was excepted by an understanding had some time before, but the arbitrators discover an entirely different letter and one to which, up to the present, hon. members on this side have not had access. There was a letter written on the 21st of February, 1909, and it was in that letter as well as in the letter of the 4th March, that the Bay of Fundy was excepted. In reply to that letter of the 4th March, Mr. Bacon wrote to Mr. Bryce:

I have the honour to acknowledeg the receipt of your note of the 4th inst., in which you confirm the understanding in the matter of the special agreement submitting to arbitration the differences between the governments of the United States and Great Britain concerning the North Atlantic fisheries, as expressed in the resolution of the Senate of the 16th February, 1909, and as previously agreed upon by the interchange of notes with my predecessor of the 27th January, 1909.

It is to be observed that Mr. Bacon refers to this understanding as expressed in an interchange of notes on the 27th January, 1909. The special agreement also speaks for itself, which was executed on the 27th January, 1909. Both these authorities are in direct contradiction with the Minister of Justice, who says the exception of the Bay of Fundy was an oral understanding, but I submit that the significant part of the matter is this, and the hon. minister gave it to us to-night. For the first time he gave the real reason why the bay was excepted from the operation of this agreement. He said that the United States refused to arbitrate on any other condition and that the Senate of the United States on February 16 made the same exception of the Bay of Fundy. Well, the hon. minister suggested to the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) that if our foresight was as keen as our aftersight, we should be very superior men. And I must confess to him that, in preference to having the perfect subsequent knowledge of events, I would like to have that prescience by which the hon. minister and his friends arrived at the conclusion on the 27th of January that the Senate of the United States on the 16th of February, would strike out the Bay of Fundy from this arbitration.

So much with regard to the manner in which this agreement was brought before The Hague Tribunal. I would like to point out to the minister that when he made the statement that he thought he should not discuss this question of the Bay of Fundy in view of the fact that there might be future negotiations, he is closing the door a little too late, and, perhaps, he has been talking too much already with regard to this award. At pages 73-74 of the oral argument, which took place in connection with this case, we find Sir Robert B. Finlay pressing upon the tribunal with regard to no less a sheet of water than the Bay of Fundy—and pressing with considerable force and effect—the speech made by Hon. Amos Tuck in the House of Representatives of the United States in 1851, as reported in the 'Congressional Globe.' Sir Robert quoted from this speech as follows:

From the first of September to the close of this season, the mackerel run near the shore, and it is next to impossible for our vesesls to obtain fares without taking fish within the prohibited limit. We differ with England in regard to the measurement of these 'limits,' they claiming to run from 'headland to headland' and we to follow the indentations of the coast. But the real difficulty is not here. The British have never taken a vessel as a trespasser when not within the limits which we acknowledge that we have renounced. They have given particular directions to the officers of their vessels not to do so, and the reason is plain. They know that if they exact a strict observance of our renunciation, on our own construction they break up our mackerel fishery. Hence, it would be a folly in them to raise an issue on the 'headland' doctrine, on which most people, I think, would hold our construction to be the true one.

Sir Robert Finlay says:

I am not going to stop to controvert the statements there made by Mr. Tuck, for I am citing him for the purpose of showing the facts with regard to the mackerel fishery, which led to the raising of this controversy. Mr. Tuck goes on:

I do not think it generally known that the whole difficulty about the fisheries is about our right to take mackerel. The cod fishing privileges are adequate already; and no vessel in that business has ever been seized or interfered with. I think it is proper to go still further and to state frankly what, after a patient investigation of every source of authentic information within my reach, I believe to be the real difficulty.

The truth is, our fishermen need absolutely and must have, the thousands of miles of shore fishery, which have been renounced, or they must always do an uncertain business. If our mackerel men are prohibited from going within three miles of the shore, and are forcibly kept away, (and nothing but force will do it), then they may as well give up their business first as last. It will be always uncertain, and generally unsuccessful, however, well pursued.

Perhaps, I shall be thought to charge the commissioners of 1818 with overlooking our interests. They did so, in the important renunciation which I have quoted; but they are obnoxious to no complaints for doing so. In 1818, we took no mackerel on the coasts of the British possessions and there was no reason to anticipate that we should ever have occasion to do so. Mackerel were then found as abundantly on the coast of New England as anywhere in the world, and it was not until years after that this beautiful fish, in a great degree, left our waters. The mackerel fishery on the provincial coasts has principally grown up since 1838, and no vessel was ever licensed for that business in the United States till 1828.

So Sir Robert B. Finlay, in pressing his argument before the arbitration tribunal at The Hague, quoted from Hon. Amos Tuck—I wonder with what success, if we subsequently submit the question as to His Britannic Majesty's rights in the Bay of Fundy to a new tribunal. I wonder what effect the speeches of the minister on the 2nd December last, and before the Ontario

Bar Association on the 29th December, 1910, would have? Speaking before the Ontario Bar Association at Osgoode Hall, he said:

Take the whole coast line of Nova Scotia, never mind the Bay of Fundy for the present——

The Bay of Fundy was a tender spot with the minister when confronted with the whole array of the Ontario Bar.

—and we remember how it is indented every few miles with harbours and inlets of different dimensions, shapes and sizes, but all alike bays, and many of them across the entrance much more than six miles in width. Now the United States fishermen wants to get into those bays—probably there is the best fishing there, at any rate he says when I am abreast a wide bay like the Baie des Chaleurs, or if you please, Miramichi bay in New Brunswick, Egmont bay in Prince Edward Island, or Mahone bay on the south coast of Nova Scotia, and I find a sheet of water which measured across from headland to headland, might be anywhere from 10 to 15 or 20 miles, and I am supposing I am in the centre of that 10 miles from the land on either side of me, and perhaps 100 miles from land ahead of me, do you mean to tell me I am in territorial waters? I am in the open sea, and I am not within his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, and so in a case such as I have put, like the Baie des Chaleurs, which is 16 or 17 miles across at the entrance and up which you can sail for 70 miles without getting within three miles of either shore, the fishermen of the United States said, we are here fishing not under any treaty at all, we are here fishing by the common right of nations, because we are in the open sea exactly as much as though we were on the great banks of Newfoundland itself. And Nova Scotia, taking the opposite view and ably supporting it by its learned attorney general of 70 years ago, Great Britain adopted that view of Nova Scotia, and maintained at least from 1840, that the true method of measurement was by going from headland to headland right across the mouth of any bay regardless of its width. It was impossible to reconcile these two views.

I wonder how the following part would sound before a tribunal, which may subsequently be convened to determine our rights in the Bay of Fundy. He goes on to say:

In 1845, Great Britain as a concession, stating it to be a concession, gave up, or to use the language of the diplomatic letter which at that date Lord Aberdeen wrote to the minister at St. James, of the United States, Great Britain decided to relax her right so far as the Bay of Fundy was concerned, and since then there has been no more difficulty over the Bay of Fundy; but that was the extent of any relaxation which Great Britain was willing to make or ever did make. So in all the years, from 1840 to the present time, Great Britain had consistently maintained the contention that all these bays and inlets in the remainder of British North America, that is to say, in what is to-day Canada, are bays and inlets, the right to enter which the fishermen of the United States have for ever renounced.

These were his observations with regard to the Bay of Fundy before the Bar Society of Ontario. I read his observations of December 2nd., in this House and he further makes the statement to-day that from 1845 down to the present, no one has asserted on behalf of Great Britain, rights over the Bay of Fundy. I join issue with the minister when he makes an assertion of that kind. I would point out that a relaxation is a concession, but a concession is substantially more than a relaxation, the word concession is the broader of the two and covers the lesser term relaxation. The word relaxed, was used in Lord Aberdeen's letter of March 10, and as the minister pointed out on December 2nd, not only was this relaxation made, but it was made conditional, and the minister himself expressed regret that the conditions had not been complied with. Does the minister wish to treat members of this House as if they knew nothing of the law of contracts? One of the elementary principles of contracts is that it requires two persons to make a contract, and that there must be a consensus of mind between the two parties, that they must agree together upon the terms of the contract upon which they are entering or there is no contract at all. No reasonable man, be he lawyer or layman, can take the correspondence of March 10, 1845, in which this relaxation took place, and in which it was expressly stated that the United States were to abandon for ever their claim to the coasts of other bays of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec, and read the reply of Mr. Everett, without arriving at the conclusion that the offer of relaxation at all events, as it was made on the part of Great Britain, for the purpose of reducing the friction then existing, was spurned by the American minister at St. James, and was never acted upon from that day to this. The hon. gentleman says that Britain has never asserted her claims in regard to this matter. He pointed out in the House, as he did in Toronto, that that distinguished Nova Scotian, James W. Johnston, had prepared an argument on the headlands and submitted it in 1841 to the law officers of the Crown of the imperial government, in Great Britain, that the law officers, Her Majesty's advisers, approved and endorsed the views expressed in the memorandum set forth by Mr. Johnston, in 1886 the parliament of Canada passed an Act, and when it came to receive the assent of the Governor General, it was held in suspense, until correspondence had been exchanged with the home Secretary of State, in the old country, and then acting on the advice of His Majesty's advisers in England that Statute of 1886, was assented to by the Governor General of Canada and became part of the statute law of this Dominion. Under that statute, assented to after inquiry and advice, the Dominion government undertook to regulate the fisheries of the whole Bay of Fundy. Objection was raised to it but a few years afterwards, in 1870, Mr. Peter Mitchell, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, issued instructions to His Majesty's government vessels for the protection of Canadian fisheries as follows:

The limits within which you will, if necessary, exercise the power to exclude United States fishermen, or to detain American fishing vesels or boats, are for the present to be exceptional. Difficulties have arisen in former times with respect to the question, whether the exclusive limits should be measured on lines drawn parallel everywhere to the coast, and describing its sinuosities, or on lines produced from headland to headland across the entrances of bays, creeks or harbours. Her Majesty's government are clearly of opinion that, by the convention of 1818, the United States have renounced the right of fishing, not only within three miles of the colonial shores, but within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of any British bay or creek. It is, however, the wish of Her Majesty's government neither to concede, nor for the present enforce, any rights in this respect which are in their nature open to any serious question. Until further instructed, therefore, you will not interfere with any American fishermen, unless found within three miles of the shore, or within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek which is less than ten geographical miles in width. In the case of any other bay, as the Bay of Chaleurs, for example, you will not admit any United States fishing vessel or boat, or any American fishermen, inside of a line drawn across at that part of such bay where its width does not exceed ten miles.

On June 6th, 1876, Lord Grenville telegraphed to the Governor General as follows:

Her Majesty's government hopes that the United States fishermen will not be for the present prevented from fishing, except within three miles of land, or in bays which are less than six miles broad at the mouth.

The result was that the Hon. Peter Mitchell modified his instructions on the 27th of June, 1870, making the last paragraph read:

In the case of any other bay, as Bay des Chaleurs, for example, you will not interfere with any United States fishing vessel or boat, or any American fishermen, unless they are found within three miles of the shore.

I submit to the minister that, as the letter written by Lord Aberdeen on the 10th of March, 1845, contains an assertion of Britain's rights in the Bay of Fundy, and a statement that, as a matter of grace and favour, these rights would be relaxed in favour of the United States, granting American fishermen common fishing in the Bay of Fundy, on a certain condition, contained in a proviso which was never accepted or acted upon, that relaxation can not be construed as conveying any right to the United States. What does he say with regard to these instructions with reference to the Baie des Chaleurs? On the 27th of June, 1870, the Canadian government acting on instructions from Lord Grenville, issued instructions which in specific terms say:

As to the Bay of Chaleur, for example, you will not interfere with any United States fishing vessel or boat or any American fishermen, unless they are found within three miles of the shore.

Was not that a broader, a greater relaxation of right than Lord Aberdeen had made in 1845? There is this difference also that it was an unqualified concession. There were no stipulations, there was nothing that the United States was obliged to do in order to enjoy the fisheries of the Baie des Chaleurs three miles from the shore.

Mr. BRODEUR. Do I understand my hon. friend that this document was communicated to the American authorities? This was a document issued by Lord Granville to the Canadian government and it was purely and simply a question between the imperial government and the Canadian government.

Mr. MADDIN. It was a pronouncement by Lord Granville to the authorities of the Dominion of Canada with regard to what he conceded at that time to be American rights in the Baie des Chaleurs. He gave instructions not to interfere with American fishermen.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The instructions were publicly given, were they not? They became a public document of state.

Mr. MADDIN. They were public and were subsequently used against the British government in the Halifax award from which I am reading them at the present time. In the matter to which I referred a few moments ago, in 1886 when this government legislated with regard to the whole of the waters of the Bay of Fundy, there was no question at all rasied by the government of the United States, and I wish to say in connection with this matter that the United States did not at any time argue and have not argued their rights to fish in common with British fishermen in the Bay of Fundy. They have not argued that they had the right to fish by virtue of the relaxation contained in Lord Aberdeen's letter of 1845. I want to refer you, Mr. Speaker, for a moment to Mr. Everett's reply to that communication. I desire to call attention to the exact words that were used in the Aberdeen-Everett correspondence of 1845. This correspondence grew out of the claims that were set up with regard to the seizure of the 'Argus,' in what is sometimes called St. Ann Banks off the coast of Cape Breton, and also in regard to the seizure of the 'Washington' in the Bay of Fundy. It was during the course of the correspondence in connection with these seizures—seizures which were being vigorously protested against by the United States, and out of which grew so much of the friction of that time—that the letters to which I desire particularly to draw attention were written. Lord Aberdeen wrote a letter on the 10th March, in which, after some preliminary statements, he says:

The undersigned has accordingly much pleasure in announcing to Mr. Everett, the determination to which Her Majesty's government have come to relax in favour of United States fishermen that right which Great Britain has hitherto exercised, of excluding those fishermen from the British portion of the Bay of Fundy, and they are prepared to direct their colonial authorities to allow, henceforward, the United States fishermen to pursue their avocations in any part of the Bay of Fundy, provided they do not approach, except in the cases specified in the treaty of 1818, within three miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

There was an offer with a condition attached to it and we all know that in order to get the benefit of that offer it should have been accepted and the stipulations and provisions attached to it should have been complied with. There could be no evasive reply which in years afterwards could be construed as an acceptance. No contract is complete without an offer and an acceptance. Here then we have the offer on the part of Lord Aberdeen to relax certain rights and making certain stipulations with regard thereto. How does Mr. Everett treat this situation? He says that:

While he desires, however, without reserve, to express his sense of the amicable disposition evinced by Her Majesty's government on this occasion in relaxing in favour of the United States the exercise of what, after deliberate reconsideration, fortified by high legal authority, is deemed an unquestioned right of Her Majesty's government, the undersigned would be unfaithful to his duty did he omit to remark to Lord Aberdeen that no arguments have at any time been adduced to shake the confidence of the government of the United States in their own construction of the treaty. While they have ever been prepared to admit that in the letter of one expression of that instrument there is some reason for claiming a right to exclude United States fishermen from the Bay of Fundy (it being difficult to deny to that arm of the sea the name of 'bay,' which long geographical usage has assigned to it), they have ever strenuously maintained that it is only on their own construction of the entire article that its known design in reference to the regulation of the fisheries admits of being carried into effect.

There is no acceptance, Mr. Speaker, of the offer which is submitted by Lord Aberdeen. But now let us see how he spurns this generous offer with contempt. He says:

The undersigned does not make this observation for the sake of detracting from the liberality evinced by Her Majesty's government in relaxing from what they regard as their right, but it would be placing his own government in a false position to accept as mere favour that for which they have so long and strenuously contended as due to them under the convention.

He spurned the offer. He said: We have been fishing there, you have seized our vessels and now you put a proposition up to us and call it a relaxation of your right. We do not acknowledge that you have such a right because we have been exercising our calling there as a matter of right. On the 25th March, fifteen days later, Mr. Everett wrote to Mr. Calhoun, the United States Secretary of State, referring to the correspondence which had taken place between himself and Lord Aberdeen as follows:

I thought it proper, in replying to Lord Aberdeen's note, to recognize in ample terms the liberal spirit evinced by Her Majesty's government, in relaxing from what they consider their right. At the same time I felt myself bound to say that the United States could not accept as a mere favour what they had always claimed as a matter of right, secured by the treaty.

Yet, in 1909, for the first time, since 1845, we find in the correspondence of the British plenipotentiary in these negotiations at Washington that a construction was put upon that old correspondence which is to give it the meaning of a concession by which we are alleged to have abandoned our rights in those large and important waters. The minister has used the term 'concession' repeatedly in the House, and before the Bar Society at Osgoode Hall. There was a relaxation which was spurned by the American minister and which they never accepted up to the present time. When the question of the fishing rights in the Bay of Fundy was suddenly dragged into the proceedings of the Halifax award in 1877, Mr. John S. D. Thompson (afterwards Sir John Thompson)—than whom no abler constitutional and international lawyer ever sat in this House,—contended before that tribunal that His Britannic Majesty's subjects had exclusive rights of fishing in the Bay of Fundy. The American contention then was not based on the correspondence of 1845 and the alleged relaxation, but, on the decree of Mr. Bates, who was the umpire in the case of the seizure of the 'Washington.' In the 'Washington' case the United States selected a representative and Great Britain selected a representative, and these two agreed upon Mr. Bates as umpire, and the tribunal met in 1856. Mr. Bates was not a lawyer; he was an American citizen, but at that time he was the junior member of an English banking firm residing in London, and having been agreed upon as umpire he rendered the decision in the 'Washington' case. The question submitted to that tribunal did not in any sense involve territorial rights in the Bay of Fundy; it was merely a question involving money damages for the seizure of the 'Washington' in the Bay of Fundy, and Mr. Bates found for $3,000 damages, but he also found something he was not asked to find, and which probably neither country would have entrusted him to adjudicate upon, namely, that the vessel was seized on the high seas. As a matter of fact the 'Washington' was seized on the western side of Grand Manan island near the entrance to Campobello bay in the Bay of Fundy, and almost three miles outside of Grand Manan. The Minister of Justice told us to-night that he thought the British case would have been prejudiced had we set up claims to a great bay like the Bay of Fundy which is nearly 60 miles across. As a matter of fact since the declaration of 1783 by which Americans reserved their rights to fish in certain of His Majesty's North Atlantic waters, no one has ever contended on behalf of Britain that she had any exclusive rights in that part of the Bay of Fundy which stretches 60 miles across. The minister was deceiving the House—whether he was doing it intentionally or not is a matter only known to himself—but when he said the Bay of Fundy was 60 miles across, he was speaking of the width of the bay at a point from near Brier island over to near the state of Maine, and it was never contended by Britain that she could treat the intervening waters there as territorial waters. What Britain did claim, and what the minister conceded would have been awarded to her had it been submitted, was the right to draw a straight line from headland to headland within British territory. Under the Treaty of Ghent the boundary line between the United States and Canada in the Bay of Fundy was defined as running at a point midway between the island of Grand Manan and the coast of the eastern portion of Maine. Under the British contention on this definition, we would draw our headland line from Grand Manan to Brier island, and from Grand Manan across Passamaquoddy bay to the nearest headland on the western part of the province of New Brunswick. This was all that any one ever claimed on behalf of Britain and the minister knows, or ought to know, that in the argument before the Hague Tribunal maps and plans were submitted which show a line betweeen these points and which show the length of that line to be 24 miles and not 60 miles. I submit that when a straight line is drawn from Brier island on the coast of Nova Scotia over to the island of Grand Manan, and from the island of Grand Manan to the nearest point in the province of New Brunswick that that is the true headland line which has been recognized at least in principle by the Hague Tribunal, and which as the minister admitted would have been drawn by that tribunal in connection with the Bay of Fundy, had the Bay of Fundy not been excepted.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is St. Mary's bay outside or inside the limit which has been mentioned by the hon. gentleman?

Mr. MADDIN. Does the minister mean outside of the line drawn from Brier island to Grand Manan?

Mr. BRODEUR. I refer to the points the hon. gentleman has spoken of.

Mr. MADDIN. Well, St. Mary's bay is outside of that line; it is almost 100 miles outside. The hon. minister said that we—that is, I presume, those who had charge of Britain's case—were undertaking a very great job in trying to get The Hague Tribunal to recognize our doctrine in regard to bays, and intimated in this House and in the discussion of this matter outside of the House, that some great and new principle of international law had been announced. Why, Sir, the method to be pursued in measuring bays and headlands laid down by this tribunal is as old as Grotius, one of the oldest authorities on international law. The hon. minister asks, wherein is it there is a dereliction of duty on the part of the government in connection with this matter, and, in answer to the hon. member for Digby, who wishes to know what our rights in the Bay of Fundy were, he said they were exactly what they were before the agreement of the 27th of January was signed, no more and no less. No one could answer a question more unsatisfactorily. What does he concede to be our rights in the Bay of Fundy under the treaty of 1818? What effect does he think this correspondence of 1845 had with regard to our rights, in the light of the claims subsequently made by this parliament, which have never been successfully refuted by the people of the United States? It was of the greatest importance to the people of this country that this question should have been determined by this tribunal when it sat last summer. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Digby, the treaty of 1908, by which these matters were to be adjusted, is to remain in force only five years. Two years from next June it will expire. Does the minister hope to get the difficulties with respect to the Bay of Fundy settled before that time? I submit that he was guilty of a dereliction of duty in connection with this matter when he permitted the Bay of Fundy to be excepted at all. The Senate of the United States had no right to put a rider on the agreement excepting it, because article 1 of the treaty of 1908, which had been concurred in by the Senate of the United States, expressly stipulated for the adjudication of just such disputes as have been continually arising with regard to Canadian-British rights in the Bay of Fundy, and it was the duty of the minister to have pointed out to the United States ministers the terms of that treaty, and that, in adding to the agreement the rider excepting from the adjudication of the tribunal a disputed question under the treaty of 1818, they were violating the treaty of 1908, which they themselves had ratified. The question of fishing in the Bay of Fundy is one which is important to the people of the whole Dominion of Canada, but more especially to those people who inhabit the shores along the bay in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The Bay of Fundy every year produces in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000 worth of fish to Canadian fishermen. When we estimate the number of fishermen from the United States who trawl these waters and fish them from one end of the year to the other, and in violation of the Canadian fishery regulations, we may fairly estimate that the Bay of Fundy, from the headlands claimed by the British authorities, yields up each year $2,000,000 worth of fish, and when the minister stood by and neglected to have the question of the right to fish in that great and valuable fishery go before the tribunal he was guilty of a dereliction of duty. I want to point out to him that square mile for square mile the Bay of Fundy, within a line drawn from Briar Island to Grand Manan, is richer than the richest belt of soil between the lakes and the Rocky mountains, and he might just as well have ceded up an equal area of the prairie provinces to the United States as to have permitted their people to come in and enjoy in common with us the right to exploit those fisheries, which, as a matter of fairness and equity, belong to the people of His Majesty's dominions. The minister thinks that, perhaps, if he had insisted on including the Bay of Fundy in the question submitted to this tribunal he might have prejudiced the Canadian case. In fact, he expressed his pride that he himself was the one to suggest that the Bay of Fundy should be struck out. I can hardly see how he can reconcile the wish he expressed to-night with the statement he made in this House on the 2nd of December, when he said that had the question of the Bay of Fundy been submitted to the tribunal, no doubt it would have been declared to be British territorial waters. I submit that, as the Minister of Justice of this country charged with safeguarding the interests of Canada, it was his duty, even if we had only a substantial colour of right, to have submitted that question of right for the consideration and adjudication of that tribunal. How have the United States, in their negotiation with us in the past, dealt with their claims? Have they considered their claims from time to time to be shadowy? Do we not know that, after promising to admit our fish free into the United States, they imposed a duty and then pretended that it was on the tin boxes that contained the fish, and not on the fish? Do we not remember how, on another occasion, they placed a tax on the tonnage of the vessels passing through their canals, and then claimed that it was aimed at the cargoes and not at the vessels? If the minister will take a lesson from a writer on international law, he will find in 'Blackwood's Magazine' for October, 1893, an article on 'The United States in International Law,' in which it is said:

> Further, the United States in consistent pursuance of the older view of international law, have shown a remarkable tendency to assert the very oldest titles and claims that the prehistoric view of law would support by the most shadowy interpretation.
> (a) Thus the right of the United States to the navigation of the Mississippi, as against the claims of Spain, were based on the rights obtained through France by the voyage and discoveries of La Salle, as well as upon 'the sentiment written in deep characters upon the heart of man,' i.e., the law of nature as understood in America.
>
> (b) Thus the right to navigate the St. Lawrence as against the territorial authority of Great Britain, was based upon 'natural law and obvious necessity,' not admissible grounds in diplomatic negotiations.
>
> (c) Thus the claims of the United States to the Oregon territory were based on the shadowy claims of Spain, themselves based on papal bulls, and those of doubtful authority in view of previous bulls to Portugal.
>
> (d) Thus the right of America to Texas is also based on the traditional landing of Lasalle at the Bay of Esperitu Santo.
>
> (e) Thus the claims of the American fishermen to use the British fisheries in North America was based on the previous condition of citizenship of the British Empire, from which they had deliberately cut themselves adrift.
> (f) Thus the American claim to jurisdiction on Behring Sea was based on claims which Russia had put forward for quite other purposes than the prosecution of the seal fisheries, which had been repudiated by the United States at the time, but which were resuscitated when the Americans became possessed of the Russian territory.

Thus we find the United States ready to blow hot and cold in matters that involve international rights. And I submit that by all the rights of international law—and if the hour were not so late I would take up some of the authorities from Grotius down to the present—the doctrine of the headland rights has been recognized. The tribunal which recently rendered its decision of this matter certainly dealt a very vigorous blow to the party which boasts so exultingly of the diplomacy of the hon. minister because, in referring to clause 5 of the argument of the United States regarding question 5, the tribunal finds as follows:

In this latter regard it is further contended by the United States that such exceptions only should be made from the application of the three-mile rule to bays as are sanctioned by conventions and established usage.

That would apply to the Bay of Fundy.

That all exceptions for which the United States of America were responsible are so sanctioned; and that His Majesty's government are unable to provide evidence to show that the bays concerned by the treaty of 1818 could be claimed as exceptions on these grounds either generally, or except possibly in one or two cases specifically.

The award goes on to say:

But the tribunal while recognizing that conventions and established usage might be considered as the basis for claiming as territorial those bays which on this ground might be called historic bays, and that such claim should be held valid in the absence of any principle of international law on the subject, nevertheless is unable to apply this, a contrario, so as to subject the bays in question to the three-mile rule, as desired by the United States;

(b) Because neither should such relaxations of this claim, as are in evidence, be construed as renunciations of it; nor should omissions to enforce the claim in regard to bays as to which no controversy arose, be so construed. Such a construction by this tribunal would not only be intrinsically inequitable but internationally injurious; in that it would discourage conciliatory diplomatic transactions and encourage the assertion of extreme claims in their fullest extent.

I submit that the relaxation contained in Lord Aberdeen's letter of the 10th March, 1845, cannot be construed as running perpetually. It has since been renounced by Great Britain and by this parliament with the acquiescence of Britain, when the late Sir John Thompson was Minister of Justice. It seems to me that this decree expresses a principle from which it will be very awkward indeed for any future tribunal to exclude the Bay of Fundy from being declared British territorial waters. Our difficulty, however, is that there is no possible prospect of having the rights of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick insisted upon by this government. If the waters of the Bay of Fundy are British territorial waters, we should make fishing regulations with regard to them. We can control these fisheries, we can preserve and enrich them, we can also exclude all other people than His Britannic Majesty's subjects from the right to fish within these waters. In view of the regulation of these fisheries, the matter is sufficiently important to warrant the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in insisting on a speedy determination of our rights with regard to this important bay.

My hon. friend from Digby is not the only person in Nova Scotia anxious to get some information with regard to our rights. In the Morning 'Chronicle' of January 17, there is an article under a two-column heading in letters of three-quarters of an inch long, entitled 'Steam Trawling in the Bay of Fundy.' That article is as follows:

(Special to the 'Morning Chronicle.')

Ottawa, Jan. 17.—The Department of Marine has asked the Justice Department for an opinion as to whether under the terms of the award of the Hague Tribunal which dealt with the North Atlantic fisheries case, the Bay of Fundy should be considered as territorial waters from which Canada can exclude fishermen of foreign countries.

In a letter setting forth the facts of the case, Mr. Alexander Johnston, Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, wrote to Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, on November 4 last, pointing out that the Fisheries Department was anxious to regulate steam trawling in the Bay of Fundy and other coast waters, but unless the government had authority to shut out American or other foreign trawlers, it would not be wise to make regulations prohibiting steam trawling in the bay by Canadian fishermen.

Mr. Johnston pointed out that up to 1853 Canada had asserted its right to control the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy and to regard it as a closed sea. In pursuance of this right an American fishing vessel named the 'Washington' had been seized when fishing in the bay six miles off the coast. By the treaty concluded in 1853 between Great Britain and the United States, the question as to the right of Canada to thus seize the vessel was submitted to the adjudication of an umpire jointly chosen by the American and British governments. This umpire was a Mr. Bates, who was a junior member of a United States banking firm in England. His decision was that the bay could not be considered as territorial waters, and under his award Canada was compelled to pay damages for the seizure of the vessel.

Mr. Johnston urges that this decision should not be considered as final, inasmuch as it was more particularly concerned with a pecuniary claim, and inasmuch as the recent Hague decision seems to lay down the general principle that the coast line should run from headland to headland. The Bay of Fundy was expressly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal at the Hague, and beyond the general principle of law laid down, and its application, the cases of individual bays in Newfoundland and Canadian waters, there has been no specific determination of the point now raised beyond the above noted award in 1853.

Another important point raised is that the award does not clearly indicate whether Canada has a right to exclude from territorial waters vessels of other countries than those which were parties to the treaty of 1818.

Here we have the Deputy Minister of Marine intellectually at sea, he wants to know, just as my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) did, what are the British rights in the Bay of Fundy. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) suggested that the member for Digby should read the oral argument with reference to this case, and that if he did, he would find in it a great deal of enlightenment. Well, I should like to venture the observation, that my hon. friend from Digby has read perhaps more of the oral argument in connection with this award, and perhaps more of the appendices to the argument and the case, and the counter case than even the Minister of Justice himself. While certain great newspapers in this Dominion have been giving to the Minister of Justice great praise, in connection with this decree, handed down at the Hague Tribunal last year, I am not so sure that, even on his own declaration and confession, he is entitled to all the bouquets that have been handed to him by the press supporting this government. When a press despatch announced, early in the year, that the minister was to be dubbed a knight, there was some doubt in the minds of the people of Nova Scotia whether this was due to his active promotion of that great national waterway, the Newmarket canal, or for his forensic arguments before the Tribunal at the Hague. On his own admission, supplemented by the letter published by Mr. John S. Ewart, who had charge of getting up this case, I think it can hardly be based on his services rendered in connection with the Hague award. I propose to read this letter of Mr. Ewart as it was published in the Montreal 'Gazette,' of January 9, 1911:

The Editor of the 'Gazette.'

Sir,—I have several times felt impelled to write correction of the frequently recurring statements of the newspapers with reference to the preparation and presentation of the case in connection with the recent fisheries arbitration. Till now I have refrained because of the unpleasantness of the task, and because its performance would necessarily leave me open to disagreeable reflection. I am at length convinced that I must face all that.

The Canadian newspapers credit Sir Allen Aylesworth with the preparation and presentation of the case. The Ottawa 'Citizen' for example said that the bulk of the work of preparation of the case fell on his shoulders and the wonderfully thorough presentation of the argument was the talk of the nation for some time. The 'Montreal Star' said that Sir Allen's masterly presentation before the Hague Tribunal won him international reputation. Other newspapers use similar language.

Sir Allen made generous answer to previous statements similar to these in his address before the Canadian Club at Ottawa. He said:

You will naturally ask me to what I attribute our success. I say in the first place, we succeeded because we had a just and good case. In the next place our success is due to excellent preparation, and I say that with the more freedom because notwithstanding the kind words of your president and any personal part I had in it, I give to you as the man entitled to the credit for the excellent preparation of our case Mr. John S. Ewart. Mr. Ewart took charge of this work fully two years ago and he has worked at it faithfully day and night from that day to this.

The result was that when we reached the Hague last June and throughout the proceedings in the case we found Mr. Ewart to be the man who practically knew more about this case than any other person concerned in it; we found him one to whom upon every occasion of need we could go for information with the full assurance that our desires would be gratified. I give to him first and to Mr. Tilley second the credit for the magnificent preparation which this case had at their hands.

Had Sir Allen been more familiar with the actual work he would not have omitted the name of Mr. Wormwith. Mr. Tilley did good work. His devoted and energetic services well merit encomium. But with a little help save that supplied by Mr. Wormwith the research work was almost finished, and the whole of the argument drafted, before Mr. Tilley's connection with the case commenced.

The fact is that Sir Allen not only was quite inactive with reference to the preparation of the case, but that he sedulously kept himself apart from it. He never inquired what was being done. Until after almost the whole of the research had been completed and the arguments had been drafted (nineteen months work) he and I had no conversation other than of the most general character about it. From the commencement of the work until the last word had been spoken at the Hague I can recall but one point which he and I discussed and that was only partially canvassed. Sir Allen never read a word of the hundreds of documents contained in over 1,200 folio pages of small type which contained the result of the research until after the whole of it was in print and had been delivered to the United States. Most probably he has not read a twentieth of it. That was not his part of the work and most properly he did not do it.

All that need be said about the 'masterly presentation' before the tribunal is that Sir Allen was a spectator and not a debater there. He did not even attend the daily conferences of counsel which were held at the close of each day's session when the happenings of the day were discussed and the plan for the next day arranged. That too was not his part of the work and most properly he did not do it.

Owing to lack of familiarity with the preparation of the case Sir Allen inadvertently in his speech in the House of Commons, gave Sir William Robson a little more than his due. About this I must be permitted a few words: Sir Allen said that Sir William referred to certain treaties in support of an original argument upon the question of 'bays' and that the argument 'was due altogether to the research and ability of Sir William Robson.' Taking this statement as a very serious reflection upon my work, I spoke to Sir Allen about it. I pointed out to him that the treaties were cited and an argument upon them not very dissimilar to that of Sir William's presented in my 'memorandum of facts and arguments' which has been prepared before I left Canada and before I knew of the existence of Sir William; that the treaties were all printed in the appendix to our case and delivered to the United States months before Sir William began his study of the case; and that in my address to the tribunal (which preceded that of Sir William), I had called attention to the treaties and based another argument upon them. Sir Allen was good enough to express regret at having been unaware that the research had not been done by Sir William. Sir William made a splendid address before the tribunal. Too much cannot be said in its praise. But quite naturally he did no research work.

Turning now to the work which Sir Allen did, let me say that it was of the very highest importance; that it was extremely well done; and that it amply entitled him to the gratitude of Canada. His official position precluded monetary remuneration. His knighthood is (if he values it) a most fitting reward for his work. He has already more than earned it by his splendid support of Canada's interests against the treachery of Lord Alverstone in the Alaska boundary case.

Sir Allen's work related to the negotiations with the United States which led up to the arbitration; to agreement upon the form of the questions to be submitted (a form which he never had reason to regret) to the selection of the arbitrators (a most important point); to the arrangements with Newfoundland to the settlement of all the difficulties which arose in so many unexpected ways during the three years which elapsed between the inception and the completion of the work. His too was the official responsibility for all that was done and for the selection of the men to do it. Had we failed him, he would have got the blame, and so far as I am concerned Mr. George Foster would have been able to say: 'I told you so.'

No one knows better than I do the difficulties which Sir Allen had to encounter and with what patience, tact and ability he met them and dissipated them. Personally I feel myself under deep gratitude to him not only for the implicit confidence which he placed in me but for the great consideration and kindness which he evinced at some very critical junctures.

I trust that for this letter I may be forgiven. I should rather unthanked, work up another fisheries case than write such a letter.

JOHN S. EWART.

Ottawa, January 17, 1911.

Mr. Speaker, I submit, in view of the disclosures made in that correspondence given to the public in January last, it ill becomes the Minister of Justice to suggest to a layman like my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), that he peruse the oral argument. That letter, which was written under such painful circumstances, forced with great regret and reluctance from the man who was charged with preparing the case for His Britannic Majesty, was evoked, no doubt, by the fact, that the minister had gone up and down this country, speaking before the Canadian Club, before the Bar Association, in this House on December 2, last, and in Halifax, during the Christmas holidays, lauding men who were not entitled to his laudation, paying tribute where it was not due, heaping encomiums upon men who were not worthy of them.

It was under circumstances such as these that this letter was so reluctantly and painfully given to the press of the country in self-defence by one man who had contributed more than all others combined to such success as we may be able to gather from the award that that tribunal handed down last summer. It does appear to me that the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Justice might very well have so arranged their case as to have submitted the case of His Majesty's subjects in the Bay of Fundy to that tribunal. There is no doubt that under the first section of the treaty of 1908 which was solemnly entered into by the United States and ratified by the Senate such questions as our rights in the Bay of Fundy were intended to be dealt with. It was not legitimately possible for the United States Senate to insert that rider excepting the Bay of Fundy from the operation of this award. The minister should have stood by the people of this country and by the rights of the fishermen of the North Atlantic coasts of Canada. But, Sir, there were contingencies, the minister has served some considerable time in the public life of this country. I suppose he was looking forward to the time when he would be retiring from public life, and when this rider was introduced into the agreement by the Senate of the United States, and it was submitted to the Minister of Justice he as the man who was responsible as he told us to-day, only to the imperial authorities, agreed to it; but, Sir, we had then the first opportunity in our diplomatic relations since confederation of asserting our colonial rights and the minister who was there for the purpose of protecting those rights, lamentably failed in preserving to the people of the maritime provinces the fishing rights which belonged to them in the Bay of Fundy, and it is due to his utter disregard of these rights that the Bay of Fundy was not described in the award as territorial waters. The minister could have submitted in reply to the resolution brought down in the Senate of the United States that he was not prepared to leave this question affecting the Bay of Fundy open for years to come, he should not have permitted this question, which has been an open question since 1818, to go unsettled. As the price of meat goes up in the United States and Canada, fish is becoming more and more a staple article of diet and the fisheries of the North Atlantic coast of Canada are becoming more valuable every year. We will never be able to preserve those fisheries in the Bay of Fundy in these modern days of steam trawl unless we assert our rights and treat the Bay of Fundy as territorial waters. The Minister of Justice had the opportunity of doing this but he comes home from the Hague and seems to feel quite satisfied with the result as indicated in the conclusion of his speech before the Ontario Bar Association when he said:

I am sure we on our part, with our fellows in Newfoundland on their part, will loyally submit to and support the decision where it is against us; and I am sanguine to believe that with equal loyalty the decision will be supported in the United States upon the points which may seem adverse to them. I think that this world-wide and more than century long difficulty which undoubtedly on more than one occasion has brought the two great Anglo-Saxon nations to the very verge of war itself, has been definitely and finally settled, and I welcome the view that there is at least an end to this long difference and a great step forward taken in the work of international arbitration which looks to the day of universal peace. (Great applause.)

I wish to say that the fishing rights of His Britannic Majesty's subjects in the Bay of Fundy according to the minister's own statement to-night are exactly no more and exactly no less than they were before the agreement was entered into which submitted the questions under consideration to the tribunal at the Hague in June last. It was clearly the duty of the minister to have replied to the Senate of the United States that he would not entertain the arbitration of these questions unless the Bay of Fundy were included in the reference. We all know very well how cases are brought before tribunals. If in any British Court of Appeal counsel cannot agree on the questions which are to be submitted to the tribunal, the court may be moved to come to their assistance and adjust the questions between them, and so the minister in this instance in answer to the proviso that was inserted in the Senate of the United States could have said: No, we will not arbitrate the remaining coast waters except the Bay of Fundy, but will submit the whole case and leave it to the tribunal to say whether or not we have such rights in the Bay of Fundy as entitle us to have them defined. He could have appealed to the very tribunal constituted for that purpose and have had that tribunal fix the case in spite of the Senate of the United States, because the Senate of the United States had already affirmed a treaty for the express purpose of dealing with such questions as arose in the Bay of Fundy. Why did he not do it? It is said of Sir Charles Tupper that when he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries on one occasion on which negotiations were being conducted at Washington, when Mr. Joseph Chamberlain was associated with him as His Majesty's representative from England, when the British diplomat tried to make concessions which Sir Charles considered unfair to Canada, Sir Charles returned to his hotel, asked what time the train left for New York and Ottawa, ordered his trunks to be packed and said he was leaving in the morning. This brought them to time, they came down and suggested that he remain, they modified the question involved and the negotiations were carried on. The Minister of Justice owed it to the fishermen of eastern Canada that he should have backed them up rather than submit the people of this country to the humiliation and the shame of having left unsettled and undefined the rights of His Britannic Majesty's subjects in these coast waters. He was looking into the near future when he was about to retire from public life. Does he realize that if there was no arbitration there would be no knighthood, and that there should be an arbitration in any event; that if sacrifices were to be made in order to bring about the arbitration it was as well that the sacrifices should be made against the fishermen of eastern Canada, and that those of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick might as well make the sacrifices as any other of His Majesty's subjects.

So I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the presence of the diplomats of the United States and of the plenipotentiaries and ministers who were gathered at the Hague, it must have humiliated the people of Canada to realize the fact that such important rights as we have in the Bay of Fundy would go undefined and unsettled now for a period of ninety-three years, that they should remain in the same position as they were ninety-three years ago, and that, after a tribunal had been especially constituted to determine and define those rights. The minister will never again in his public career have an opportunity of having those rights defined. The Hon. Amos Tuck, in the House of Representatives in the United States, said that it was only force that would keep the United States fishermen out of the Bay of Fundy. Was the minister afraid of this veiled threat on the part of United States diplomacy in 1852? Why Sir, if our rights in Canadian waters are to be dealt with in this light, if they are to be sacrificed in such an indifferent way as this, if the United States can come in under a pretense of right and exercise fishing privileges in our territorial waters, for well nigh a hundred years, and if we are to stand by and permit them to enjoy those privileges without protest, we had better destroy our armies and navies and use our money for some more peaceful purpose. For what object are we spending $20,000,000 a year for a navy and $800,000 for agriculture, if our rights in the fisheries of the Bay of Fundy are to be set aside, notwithstanding this treaty, at the instance of the Senate of the United States? Evidently the Canadian navy is not exciting the American diplomats to view with any dismay any consequences that might arise from the assertion of British rights in the Bay of Fundy or they would not probably have insisted on the withdrawal of the Bay of Fundy from the matters which were to go before the tribunal.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 6, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.—CHARGES AGAINST THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE GOVERNMENT SHIPYARD AT SOREL AND THE MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU.

Mr. P. E. BLONDIN (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege to present the motion of which notice has been given two days ago to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) and to the hon. member for Richelieu.

Neither the hon. minister nor the hon. member will be surprised at my move, because they already know since a long time the facts which I will communicate to the House.

I would have been particularly grateful to them if, during the long months that have elapsed since, they had undertaken, themselves, as is was proper, to avenge the honour of the minister and the reputation of the member. But they have done nothing. They have kept about the whole thing a very long silence which I would dare to qualify as incriminating. I for one cannot allow this silence to last longer without feeling myself as conniving, or at least as failing seriously in my duty as a member of this House.

I shall read in English the declaration and the motion, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read in French, in their original form, the affidavits which have been given me. I have added also, since the notice I have given, the years 1908 and 1909 to the year 1910, because new affidavits have come to me.

I, Pierre Edouard Blondin, a member of Parliament for the electoral district of Champlain, in the province of Quebec, Dominion of Canada, declare that I am credibly informed, and I believe that I can establish by satisfactory evidence:

10. That in the course of the years 1908, 1909 and 1910, irregularities, abuses, frauds, malversations and robberies have been committed in the shops and stores of the government of Canada at St. Joseph of Sorel and in the city of Sorel, in the electoral district of Richelieu;

20. That barrels and tins of paint and other goods of this nature have been illegally and fraudulently taken and carried away from the said stores and shops and transported to the house of Mr. Adélard Lanctôt then and now a member of the House of Commons of Canada, for the electoral district of Richelieu, which house was then being built on George street, at Sorel above mentioned, and ready to be painted;

30. That with these goods and paint, paintworks, decoration and varnish works, have been done by the employees of the government of Canada under the supervision of the painters' foreman employed by said government at the said place, at the government's expense and during the hours supposed to be devoted to the government and for which said employees were paid by the government, these men registering each day as if they had really worked for the government, and this during weeks and months; the materials and time, thus furnished, are valued at about one thousand or twelve hundred dollars;

40. That said goods were so fraudulently appropriated to, and said work so fraudulently done at the expense of the government of Canada for the benefit of the said Adélard Lanctôt then and now a member of the House as aforesaid with his knowledge, assent and approval, the said Adélard Lanctôt abusively and fraudulently profiting at the public expense and to the public detriment by his position of member of the House;

I found the belief I have just expressed upon affidavits which I desire to read and produce in support of the motion I am about to make:

(Translation).

Canada,
Province of Quebec,
District of Richelieu.

I, the undersigned, Alfred Douaire, painter, of the city of Sorel, 51 years of age, solemnly declare:

That I have been in the employment of the federal government at its shipyards situated at Saint-Joseph de Sorel, from January, 1906, inclusively to the 5th of November, 1910, as painter under the orders of J. Bte. Pagé, foreman of the painters department at the said shipyards, during the last two years;—that during these two said years, principally during the last year, and especially in July, August and September, 1910, I have been requested by the said J. Bte. Pagé to go to Sorel, at the house of Mr. Adélard Lanctôt, M.P., then being built on George street, in order to paint, cement, polish and varnish, &c., &c., the said house and that, as it was well understood, after having registered at the shipyard as present and working on behalf of the government, and my departure each morning was to be from the said shipyard.

That, as a matter of fact, I regularly registered and punched as previously mentioned, and that in conformity with my orders I left the shipyard each working day and went, as above stated, during the months of July, August and September, 1910, to the said Lanctôt house, where I have worked at the painting, varnishing and staining of the said Lanctôt house.

That this work was also done in part by Messrs. Théodore Emond, Edmond Brault, Adélard Letendre, Albérique Letendre, Omer Pagé, Arthur Trempe, Louis Paul, Adélard Alie, all painters, employed at the time by the said government, and on the working hours due to the government and each of them having punched at the same time as myself as aforesaid.

That during the time that work was going on, the said J. Bte. Pagé and Adélard Lanctôt, M.P., were visiting the job from time to time, looking at the progress of the work, Pagé giving orders for having some paint brought from the shipyard and also for the execution of the work, and that, many times to the knowledge and cognizance, and in the presence of the said Adélard Lanctôt,—this gentleman knowing also where the paint came from and that the work was being done by employees of the government whom he was seeing often and often at work.

That the said Adélard Lanctôt never spoke of paying these painters, and in fact was not paying them, but they were regularly paid their salaries by the government at each pay day, as if they had worked for the department.

That the above mentioned persons who have worked with me at this painting have given to that work, some four weeks, and others from four to ten weeks.

I positively declare:—that Mr. Adélard Lanctôt knew at the time that the paint and other goods which were used in the painting of his house, were coming from the said shipyard of the government; 2. that this work was done by the then regular employees of the government who were paid, for the time they were doing that work, by the government itself, and that for that purpose the time of each employee was punched as employee of the government.

On the seventh day of December, 1910, at 10 p.m., Mr. Alfred Lavallée, lumber merchant, of Sorel, came to my house at Sorel, asking me to go immediately to the house of Mr. Adélard Lanctôt, at Sorel, who desired to see me without fault; I went immediately and found Mr. Lanctôt who was waiting for me and who, after the ordinary salutations, showed me and read me the solemn declaration which I had given during the said month of December to the same purpose as the present one, and spoke to me the following words:—'Is it you, Mr. Douaire, who gave this affidavit?' I answered: 'Yes.' He added: 'You have signed it?' I answered 'Yes.' He asked me if I would see Albert Thibaudeau and try to lay my hand upon certains papers relating to this affair, which he did not like to see circulating. I answered that it was not easy to get hold of these documents, principally the affidavit dated at Sorel, the 30th of November, 1910. Mr. Lanctôt added: 'I will look to that myself, and I will try to get hold of them. Mr. Lanctôt wanted me to change my course of action, he offered me a position under the government, which I refused. He told me that if some one was troubled about that affair, principally Mr. J. Bte. Pagé, I would be treated the same way he would be. I answered that I was not afraid. Before leaving, I told him that the affidavit which he had in his hands, and which he got, I did not know from whom, was true and signed by me in perfect knowledge and without any outside influence, as I gave the present one.

And I make this solemn statement, believing it conscientiously to be true, and knowing that it has the same force and effect as if it was made under oath, under the witness law of Canada, and I have signed.

I, the undersigned, Henri Proulx, painter, of the city of Sorel, aged 34, do solemnly declare:

That I have been in the employ of the Dominion government at its shipyards situated at St. Joseph de Sorel, from February 16, 1909, to November 5, 1910, as painter and under the orders of J. Bte. Pagé, head of the painting department.

That in the course of the month of August last (1910) the said J. Bte. Pagé instructed me to proceed, in company with Omer Pagé and Henri Paul, two government employees, painters like myself, working under his orders at the time, to proceed to the paint shop of the department for the purpose of taking the paint there, the property of the government, and carrying it to the said Lanctot house at Sorel, with instructions in going through Sorel to follow Augusta street so as to avoid being noticed, as would have been the case had we gone directly to the spot.

That accordingly I proceeded in August, 1910, together with the said Omer Pagé and Henri Paul, to the paint shop, and that there we loaded ourselves with boxes, barrels, and packages of paint neither weighed or measured, as well as of oil and varnish and thence carried our load of wares to the said Lanctot's house in Sorel, following Augusta street, so as to let people believe that we were coming from the shops in Sorel, in accordance with the instructions received from the said J. P. Pagé; that on reaching the said Lanctot house we deposited on the floor our three loads of paint, in the presence of the said Adélard Lanctot, who was then at the said house. There Messrs. Théodore Emond, Edmond Brault, Adélard Letendre, Alberic Letendre, Omer Pagé, Arthur Trempe, Louis Paul, Adélard Alie and Alfred Douaire, all at the time in the employ of the government, as painters, under the orders of J. B. Pagé, their chief, with the knowledge of the said Adélard Lanctot, who knew these men, who knew where they were supposed to be working, took hold of the paint and utilized it to whitewash the inside and outside of the Lanctot house, while every morning having their cards punched so as to get their pay from the government, which as a matter of fact they did get, and this again to the knowledge of the said Adélard Lanctot who was aware that the government was paying these men for the time they had spent working in his house.

I know personally that morning, noon and night the said Pagé proceeded with me from the Lanctot house to where the punch was located and that he punched on his own account, and that as long as the work lasted. It is also to my knowledge that in the course of the said work, Cuthbert Champagne, another government employee, and keeper of the punch, had instructions to punch on behalf of the aforesaid painters who did not see to it themselves, in the course of said work, at the said Lanctot house, and that indeed he punched once for me before my arrival, stating: your card is punched as well as the others. Besides, I declare that the said J. Bte. Pagé, while I was present, addressed the said Cuthbert Champagne, then close to the punch, and inquired from the said Champagne, keeper of the punch, whether he was careful to punch regularly on behalf of the men working at the time at Mr. Lanctot's. Mr. Champagne having answered in the affirmative, Mr. Pagé declared himself satisfied.

I declare lastly that on the afternoon of the twelfth day, January 6, 1911, I was requested by a friend of Mr. Lanctot to proceed to the latter's office. Accordingly, I went and found there Mr. Lanctot, Mr. Joseph Proulx, of Sorel, and Mr. Napoléon Proulx, of St. Victoire, two of my uncles, and here is what happened: 'Mr. Adélard Lanctot, M.P., inquired: 'Mr. Proulx, I heard that you were anxious to get your position; I can have you reinstated provided you sign the paper which I have prepared and which I shall read to you. The grist of the paper he then read, was as follows. Hon. minister, I request that you put aside the statement which I signed on November 10, 1910, which you have in your hands. I signed that paper when in a passion and after thinking over it I realized that some things which I had included had no foundation in fact, and that in the interest of the party as well as in my own personal interest such a course would be preferable, and at the same time I beg to be pardoned by you and by the member.' Having ascertained what use the member Lanctot intended to make of this letter, I answered that it was useless to read any more. 'You should have a better knowledge of the Proulx family; we are not of the kind who sign on Monday and withdraw their signature on Tuesday. I want you to bear in mind Lanctot that all the affidavits declared and signed by me will remain exactly as on the day I signed them.' Then, Joseph Proulx, ticket agent addressed Lanctot as follows: 'You should not have a grudge against my nephew, but instead against those d——— fools on the other side whose inspirations you follow.' And the discussion on that subject lasted a couple of hours.

And I make this solemn declaration believing it conscientiously to be true and knowing that it has the same force and effect as if it had been made under oath under the Evidence Act of Canada, and I have signed,

I, the undersigned, Dieudonné Péloquin, joiner and contractor of the city of Sorel, do solemnly declare:

1. That I am 34 years of age and that I have never obtained any contract, or favour, or employment from any of the political parties, and that I am independent of them.

2. That, to my personal knowledge, during the past five or six months, several men employed in the Dominion government shipyards situated at St. Joseph de Sorel, accused each other of thefts and plunderings of cement, lumber, iron, paint, and especially of time as government employees working for private persons while in the departmental pay; the whole being evidenced by several solemn declarations which have been put in my hands in the course of the last two or three days for the purpose of enlightening me and inducing me to request an investigation.

3. That in the course of November last and of December instant politicians, officials of the department high and low, accusers and accused, have travelled to Ottawa; one of the storekeepers has been suspended, then reinstated as he threatened to tear asunder the curtain which covered many a deed. Finally calm was restored, and it was rumoured that matters would be set right, the accusers giving way as a rsult of promises of employment, and the accused being compelled to pay back the value of the goods and time received. Hence an unforeseen appraisal for the purpose of determining the value of certain things which parties interested put down at $292, and which people who have no interest in the matter figure at $800 or $1,000, or even as high as $12,000.

4. That basing myself on the written and oral statements which have been made and communicated to me, and on rumours deemed trustworthy here, I believe that the government, within the last two years, must have suffered a loss of over fifty thousand dollars, through fraud, embezzlement, etc.

5. That to my personal knowledge painters in the employ of the government have painted the inside and outside of the house of our Dominion member of parliament, Mr. Adélard Lanctot, who was aware that such work was being carried on by these men, at his house situated on George street, in the city of Sorel; one of the best finished and the best painted in this city, and the painting of which is estimated at prices varying several hundred dollars.

And I make this solemn declaration believing it conscientiously to be true and knowing that it has the same effect and force as if it had been made under oath, under the Evidence Act of Canada.

I, the undersigned, Andronique Sénécal, carpenter and joiner, of the city of Sorel, agd 45 years, do solemnly declare:

1. That I am employed at the Dominion government shipyards, situated at St. Joseph de Sorel, at the present time, and have been so employed for the last nine years; that on or about the third of May, nineteen hundred and nine (1909), Oscar Champagne, a man in the employ of the same government, in the same place, as time-keeper, summoned me from my work to his office and instructed me to proceed at once to Sorel, to the house of Adélard Lanctot, then in course of construction on George street, that there I would find Lanctot waiting for me and would be told what to do. That accordingly, in compliance with that order from Champagne, I left forthwith, taking with me two ferry tickets, the property of the government, which Champagne handed to me to reach the place of the said Adélard Lanctot at Sorel. On my way I saw Mr. Lanctot at the Hotel Quebec, notwithstanding which I proceeded to his house and waited for him until the following day. In fact, on the following day, I met Mr. Lanctot at his residence about nine in the morning, and told him that Mr. Champagne had sent me to him for some work that was to be done.

Mr. Lanctot then instructed me to work about the house on his property, repairing and resetting the fence which surrounded it; I got to work at once and worked three days in succession without interruption. I was paid by the government for these three days' work spent at Mr. Lanctot's; I was working under the latter's instructions and he must have seen to have my card punched by obliging hands, for I was paid in full as usual.

And I make this solemn declaration, believing it to be conscientiously true and knowing that it has the same force and effect as if it had been made under oath under the Evidence Act of Canada,

And I have signed,

Mr. BLONDIN.

Canada,

I, the undersigned, Napoléon Laroche, formerly painter and at present joiner, in the parish of St. Joseph de Sorel, do solemnly declare:

1. That in the course of the winter, spring, summer and part of autumn of last year, 1910, I was employed at the Dominion government shipyards, situated at St. Joseph de Sorel, as painter and under the orders of J. Bte. Pagé, head of the painting department.

2. That to my personal knowledge, in the course of that year, 1910, a complete staff of painters, then employed, as myself, by the government and paid by the government, was painted, varnished and decorated the inside and outside of the house of Mr. Adélard Lanctot, M.P., for the electoral district of Richelieu, then in course of construction on George street, in the city of Sorel.

3. That, as a matter of fact, Messrs. Omer Pagé, Louis Paul, Alfred Douaire, Théodore Emond, Edmond Brault, Octavien Lafernière, Arthur Trempe, Adélard and Alberic Letendre, all painters employed and paid by the government and on government time, have painted, varnished and decorated the inside and outside of the said Lanctot house, and that with that object in view they worked almost uninterruptedly from about the end of June up to late autumn; work which to the best of my knowledge I estimate to be worth between twelve and thirteen hundred dollars.

4. That these persons registered or caused themselves to be registered as being present and working for the government, since they came up at every pay-day for the purpose of getting their money, and indeed were paid by the government for time which they supplied to a private party.

And I make this solemn declaration, believing it conscientiously to be true, and knowing that it has the same force and effect as if it was made under oath under the Evidence Act of Canada.

I, the undersigned Herminégilde Lambert, of the parish of St. Joseph de Sorel, aged 37, do solemnly declare:

1. That I have been in the employ of the Dominion government at their shipyards, situated at St. Joseph de Sorel, from 1900 to 1910, inclusive, that is to say ten consecutive years, the first four years as caulker, and the six last as overseer of labourers. I have given up that work on December 28 last, and have not taken it up since, although I have been offered an increase of salary of fifteen cents per day.

2. That while I was thus in the service of the said government, especially within the last three years, Mr. Alex. Gendron, then and still of the labourers' department, head man, and consequently my superior, has often instructed me to send sometimes one, sometimes two and sometimes three of the men under my orders and in my gang to work at Sorel for private parties, especially for Alfred Baril and Oscar Champagne, two high officials at the time, and still in the same department, and for Adélard Lanctot, M.P., to carry on works and repairs at various buildings.

3. That on receiving these applications, I sent the number of men required to work for the benefit of these persons, and when each foreman was called to give to the head foreman the time of these men, I said to Mr. Alex. Gendron: 'I have one, or two or three men who have been working at Sorel for the above mentioned.' Then Alex. Gendron, when he was present, and Adolphe Joubert, his clerk representing him, when the latter was away, would say: 'Do not mention the absences which go unnoticed; these men have punched and will be paid by the department.'

4. That Mr. Oscar Champagne, employed in the government stores, has had turf taken at St. Joseph's taken to Sorel to grade his property and embellish the grounds around his house at Sorel, which work was done by Michel Lambert and André Cotnoir, two men in the employ of the government, who worked between three and four days, while at the same time having their cards punched every morning and getting their pay from the government, at the knowledge of the said Oscar Champagne.

5. That in the course of the summer of 1910, that same Mr. Oscar Champagne caused to be drawn, by government teams and by men in government pay, iron pipes taken from the government and had these carried to Sorel and utilized for a tunnel in a stream going through his property, and that this whole expenditure has been supported by the government, which is the looser in this last instance of about $200. That to my knowledge instructions have been given to the men entrusted with the drawing of the pipes to do so in such a way that the great Chief Papineau should have no knowledge of it. As a matter of fact, the drawing was effected about seven o'clock in the morning previous to Mr. Papineau's arrival.

6. That in every instance where time or material was thus embezzled, urgent departmental work was interfered with.

7. That if, to the losses aforementioned, are added those inflicted on the department in the shape of thefts of wood, iron, cement, etc., I may say that these aggregate an enormous amount.

8 I am free to acknowledge that Mr. L. G. Papineau (great chief) of the department, is an honest man, but I will add that either through lack of sternness or some other cause, he finds himself unable to keep in the right path certain subalterns who are not very scrupulous in the handling of the punch. That without the benefit of an investigation for the purpose of finding out those actually at fault, the country will still suffer considerable losses.

And I make this solemn declaration, believing it conscientiously to be true and knowing that it has the same force and the same effect as if it had been made under oath under the Evidence Act of Canada.

H. LAMBERT.

Declared before me, the undersigned, at Sorel, on this 18th day of February, 1911.

VICTOR A. BOURGEOIS,
Notary.

Canada,
Province of Quebec,
District of Richelieu.

I, the undersigned, Alfred Douaire, painter, of the city of Sorel, aged 51, do solemnly declare that I have been in the employ of the Dominion government at their shipyards, situated at St. Joseph de Sorel, for several years, especially during the years 1909, 1910, and 1908; that, in the course of the month of October, 1908, J. Bte. Pagé, then employed in the same yards as head of the paint department, instructed me to go and paint the house of Mr. Adélard Lanctot, member for the county of Richelieu, at the time and still representing the said county, a house which he had rented from Mr. Bruno Leclair, on Roy street, in the city of Sorel.

That, as a matter of fact, following my instructions, I went to paint the said lodgings, then occupied by the aforesaid Mr. Lanctot, tenant, and did so at the knowledge and in the presence of the said Adélard Lanctot, and on government time, as an employee of the said government.

That I was paid in full and without any dockage by the government for the time I had spent painting the said Lanctot house, and never did Mr. Lanctot, or any body else on his behalf or in his name offer to pay me a cent for such work effected for his benefit, and which lasted two or three days.

That, besides, Mr. Lanctot knew that I was then the employee of the said government and that I was drawing my salary from the said government for the work thus effected in his said house.

And I make this solemn declaration, believing it conscientiously to be true and knowing that it has the same force and the same effect as if it had been made under oath under the Evidence Act of Canada.

And I have signed,

ALFRED DOUAIRE.

Declared before me, in the city of Sorel, on this 5th day of March, nineten hundred and eleven.

VICTOR A. BOURGEOIS,
Notary.

Mr. Speaker, the charges which I have just read are sufficient, it seems to me, to allow me dispensing with making any comment. I venture to hope that the government will grant the motion which I have the honour to introduce:

That, under the circumstances, I move that the declarations and matters above set forth be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of this House to inquire fully into the same, with power to send for persons, papers, records and such articles as may be necessary for such investigation, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, and that the committe do report in full the evidence taken before them and all their proceedings on the reference and result of their inquiries.

I even entertain the hope that the hon. member for Richelieu will join hands with me in requesting that the government grant this inquiry so that he may be in a position to vindicate himself, if possible, and enable us to continue having for him that esteem we have always had heretofore.

Mr. ADELARD LANCTOT (Richelieu). I must say that I have no objection whatever to the motion of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) asking that the charges preferred against me as a member of this House be referred for investigation to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am glad he has brought this matter to the attention of the House, and I court the fullest and most complete investigation of it.

The facts are simply these: During the month of June last, I was building a house in Sorel, and when it was ready to be painted I had at the time to leave Sorel very frequently to go to Saranac lake where my wife was lying ill. Not having sufficient time to bring painters to Sorel from any outside place, and knowing that none could be had in the town of Sorel except at the Marine Department shops, and at the Richelieu and Ontario shops, I went to the Marine Department to ask the superintendent Mr. Papineau, to send me a few painters to finish my work. Mr. Papineau being absent, I spoke to Mr. Champagne, the timekeeper, and requested him to send me painters when he could spare them without delaying the work of the department, and I told him to keep an exact, accurate and separate account of the time of these men while working at my house; at the same time, I informed Mr. Pagé, the foreman, that I had asked for painters from Mr. Champagne, and that Mr. Champagne would keep the time of the men while they were working at my place. I told Mr. Pagé to get all the necessary materials from Cyrille Labelle & Co., with whom I was dealing, and where I had an account current for supplies used in my building. I also explained to Mr. Pagé that I was leaving for Saranac lake to join my wife, and that I relied upon him to see that the men did their work properly, requesting him at the same time to render me the accounts as the work was proceeding that I might pay them, to avoid any misunderstanding in the matter. Men were sent at various times between the months of June and November to do this work, and during that period, when I asked at different times that the account be rendered to me, I was told that it would be more simple and would involve less work to render the account when the work was finished. The men did the work, and when the same was finished, the bill was rendered to me by Mr. Champagne for the department and I immediately paid it in full upon its production.

Some of the paint, varnish and other materials used were obtained from the shops of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. An accurate account of such materials was kept, and goods of the same quality and to the same quantity were purchased to replace the same, and the account for the goods so purchased together with costs of carriage to Sorel was paid by me and goods were returned to the department immediately.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—TYPHOID EPIDEMIC IN OTTAWA.

Mr. J. B. BLACK (Hants). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On Thursday last, I made a few remarks in which I referred to the water service of the city of Ottawa. I also referred to some statistics of infantile mortality in Ottawa. In Saturday's Ottawa 'Citizen,' there was an editorial commenting upon what I said. The editorial reads in part as follows:

DR. BLACK'S STATEMENTS.

The attack of Dr. Black, M.P., upon Ottawa water conditions in the House of Commons has, unfortunately, attracted much outside attention. The term unfortunate is used because it is a matter of regret that a statement destined to attain such publicity should have contained assertions which are, in many cases, not borne out by facts.

Dr. Black made the surprising claim that Ottawa water has been polluted for several years past and that the presence of typhoid bacilli had been demonstrated therein. As a matter of fact such a statement is at variance with the records. The tests of city water, conducted perhaps irregularly, have never shown any trace of typhoid bacilli, and to this more probably than anything else was due the irregularity of the tests. Had these shown typhoid germs at any time the medical health officer certainly would have made the fact known. Typhoid has yet to be demonstrated in Ottawa water.

Dr. Black also asserts that it is known where the present outbreak has originated. If so, it is not a matter of common knowledge and Dr. Black is not using the city fairly by withholding such information, particularly at this time. We may be getting poisoned, as Dr. Black intimates, but we can still conscientiously plead that we don't know how any more than at the beginning of the present outbreak.

It might also be interesting if Dr. Black were to give us the source or authority for the statement that 626 infants out of 2,100 born in the year ending October 31, 1910, in this city, died in infancy. The figures seem alarmingly large, but if correct, the city owes the honourable member an expression of thanks for calling attention to such a condition.

I need not read the rest of this article. In referring to what the editor says, let me take the last statement first. The 'Citizen' wants to know where I got my figures. It affords me pleasure, and no little comfort to inform the 'Citizen' that I got these figures from the 'Citizen.' When I gave these figures, I was quoting from the 'Citizen' of December 29, 1910. I will read the paragraph to show that I made no mistake:

The city hall figures show that, excluding entirely 143 deaths in two children's homes——

I want you to note that the paragraph divides the death rate into two different lots, giving the percentage of one and not of the other, while I added them and gave the percentage of the whole.

——483 deaths of children under one year took place in the year ending October 31 last. The last birth rate published for 1908 gave 25·5 births per 1,000 in Ottawa. Taking this as a rough basis, we find that there would have been last year 2,100 births, of whom 483, or 230 in 1,000 died. Compared with the rate for all England in 1907, the rate there was only 117 per 1,000, while in Ontario in the census year it was 132 deaths per 1,000.

Add these together as I did, and you will see that, according to the 'Citizen's' figures, I am exactly right. Now, what do you think of that for a great moral and religious family journal? The 'Citizen' does not remember what it published, a short two months and a week ago, and accuses me of spreading broadcast through the country, statistics detrimental to the good name of Ottawa. These figures are so startling that, when I first saw them, I could not believe them. I admit that I am not educated up to the point of believing everything that is in the Ottawa 'Citizen,' so I had these figures verified at the city hall. I state again that these figures, according to the city hall, are perfectly correct. The 'Citizen' says:

If correct, the city owes the hon. member an expression of thanks for calling attention to such a condition.

I will waive all this, I will give the whole of that to the 'Citizen'—after you, my dear Alphonse! Now, we will come back——

Mr. SPEAKER. If I understand the hon. gentleman is rising to the correction of a statement?

Mr. BLACK. I am rising to the correction of a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. He will have to limit himself to that correction.

Mr. BLACK. I am limiting myself to it, and if I get beyond that please correct me. This paper said that I said that typhoid bacillus was in the water. I did unfortunately say that, but it was a slip of the tongue, and not due to a lack of knowledge of the matter. My mind was so full of typhoid at the time that I said 'typhoid bacillus' instead of 'colon bacillus'. The merest tyro in water analysis knows that the typhoid bacillus is the most difficult bacillus to find in water. Sometimes, with great difficulty, it is found in milk, but it has been shown over and over again that colon bacilli are present in the Ottawa water and have been. Colon bacilli and typhoid bacilli are room mates living side by side in the same space in the human system. Their lives run parallel in the human body and when present in the Ottawa river their lives run parallel and the tendency is to die. You find colon bacilli quite readily by analysis, but the typhoid bacillus is very, very difficult to find, so difficult that whenever colon bacilli are found it is assumed, as a matter of course, that their running mate, the typhoid bacillus is there also. When colon bacilli are found it follows as a natural assumption that typhoid will result. Colon bacilli have been found in the water year after year, and this proves that the trouble exists in the water. To contradict this statement, I want to say this: There are four wavs in which typhoid is carried—water, milk, flies, contact. Let us take them one by one.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman think this is the correction of a statement?

Mr. BLACK. I think it is a contradiction. This editor says that I am wrong, that there is no evidence that there is typhoid in the Ottawa water.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is not the time to discuss that question; there is nothing before the Chair. The hon. gentleman has risen to a question of privilege. If the hon. gentleman desires to correct a statement he must confine himself to that and not discuss typhoid at this stage.

Mr. BLACK. I do not want to discuss typhoid, but I want to show that I am correct with regard to typhoid in the Ottawa water.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point is not well taken at this stage because there is nothing before the Chair. When the hon. gentleman says that he will limit himself to a correction he should do so.

Mr. BLACK. Well, I am very sorry, but I think I have been greatly wronged here, and I want to make myself right. I do not want to break the rules of the House, but I want to make myself exactly right. The 'Citizen' says that I am wrong, and I am positive that I am right.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity when we move to go into Supply.

Mr. BLACK. All right.

NAVAL SERVICE EXPENDITURES.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) asked me the other day to comply with an order which had been passed by the House on the 5th December for a statement of the expenses in connection with the Naval Service. I may inform my hon. friend that the report which he is seeking was laid on the table of the House on the 16th December. I suppose the matter escaped his attention.

Mr. MONK. I got the report from Mr. Dubé upstairs that there had been no return to that order of the House, and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. BRODEUR. I see the following entry in the Votes and Proceedings of December 16, which I suppose covers the case:

Mr. Brodeur presented return to an order of the House of the 15th December, 1910, for a statement showing the detailed expenditure to date out of the sum voted by the House in connection wtih the new navy, giving in each case the amount paid, to whom paid and the object of the expenditure.

Mr. MONK. The report evidently has not been entered upstairs.

Mr. BRODEUR. I suppose the clerk will look after that.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) if he has yet brought down the information I asked from him the other day—the minute of the Treasury Board of the 30th November, 1906, and the names of the component members of the board?

Mr. FIELDING. I gave directions to have that prepared. I will try to have it brought down to-day.

CORONATION CONTINGENT.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden). Perhaps I can do it better by reading the following despatch:

ABUSE OF PATRONAGE

Claimed in Connection With the Coronation Contingent.

Ottawa, Feb. 20.—(Special.)—Members of parliament are considerably aroused over what is claimed to be a shameful abuse of patronage in connection with the selection of the officers for the Canadian coronation contingent. About thirty officers are to be chosen, and in Toronto and other places the local patronage committees are dealing with the matter and passing their recommendations on to the Minister of Militia.

It is stated: 'Instead of a fine body of men chosen to represent Canada on their merits being sent to the coronation, faithful friends of the government will be among the elect.' Officers whose service and seniority entitle them to place are being ignored.

I do not know anything of the correctness of this report, but I thought I would give the minister an opportunity to deny it here.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Who sends the telegram?

Mr. BLAIN. It is a newspaper despatch; I will hand it over to my hon. friend.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. From what newspaper?

Mr. BLAIN. It is a despatch from Ottawa to Toronto 'World.'

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Oh, from Ottawa! Mr. Speaker, a question was asked in the House by two or three hon. members as to the principle upon which the selection would be made for the coronation contingent. I answered the question very fully. As far as the selection of the men who will compose the contingent is concerned, they will be selected absolutely and entirely by the commanding officers of their respective corps from which the men are taken. There will be a proper percentage selected from every corps, or every regiment in the whole Dominion. No selection will be made from Ottawa; the headquarters' staff or the minister will have absolutely nothing to do with the selection. That is, as far as the non-commissioned officers and men are concerned. In so far as the officers are concerned, the principle upon which they are being selected is also laid down in the answer which I gave. No officers who have already attended a similar function, for instance, the coronation of 1902 and the jubilee of 1897, will be allowed to attend the coronation. Officers who have had war service and medals will be preferred. No officer will be allowed to serve in a rank junior to that in which he is serving in the militia. That is to say, no officer will be allowed to attend the coronation in a rank junior to his own if he is not within the age limit of that junior rank, the reason being that there are officers who are very keen to attend this function, who, being majors, we will say, or even lieutenant-colonels, would be quite willing to attend in a junior rank for the sake of going. We have made it a regulation that, say a major, will not be allowed to attend in any rank junior to the rank of major unless he is within the age limit. For instance, it might be convenient to take a major as captain—the next rank below—but he would not be allowed to serve as captain unless he is within the age limit of a captain.

Mr. CARVELL. If a subordinate is willing to go as a sergeant, or even as a private, what would be the rule?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I do not think that would be right. I do not think we should allow any commissioned officer to serve as a non-commissioned officer, or as a private; that is the position I have taken. Now, as regards this telegram, I can only say it is a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end; perhaps that is the best way to describe it. Whether Liberal committeees, or Conservative committees for that matter, may have met and passed resolutions; I do not know for a fact, although I do not think it is a fact. But if it were a fact I wish to say at once, Mr. Speaker, it would have no influence whatever on me. Regiments have met—one regiment of the city of Ottawa has indicated that they wish a certain officer to be taken if any officer is to go from that regiment. The officers of the 5th Royal Highlanders of Montreal have also met and selected an officer, and I would think, Mr. Speaker, that assuming the officer so selected came within the regulations, I should be under an obligation to accept that officer if any officer is to be taken from those regiments. I wish to say, if I may add a word, that the difficulty of the situation is very considerable. There are to be chosen 48 officers altogether, eight or ten of whom will necessarily be of the permanent force, so that there will be some thirty-eight officers to be chosen from the active militia of Canada, which comprises between 3,500 and 4,000 officers. There are something like 100 or 120 different military corps, regiments, squadrons, or units in the militia, so that on an average there will be one officer from every 3 or 4 corps.

Mr. BLAIN. Will there be representatives taken from each province?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. LAKE. Is it the purpose to send a detachment of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There will be, as there was in 1902, a certain percentage of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police in the contingent, but that is being attended to by the department in charge. It is, perhaps, convenient for me to say now that the first thing we have to do is to carefully consider the relative number of the different branches of the service, cavalry, artillery, infantry and some of the minor services, and if possible, and so far as possible, to properly divide the contingent up according to strength among these different branches of the service. Then we have to consider provinces; every province in the Dominion must be represented by both officers and men. Some of the provinces may not be entitled to more than one officer, but every province will receive its fair share of representation among the commissioned officers, the non-commissioned officers and men. It is a difficult task. I am getting the best help I can from headquarters here and from other parts of the militia throughout the country to enable me to solve the difficulty fairly and with due regard to all interests, and also to enable Canada to present, on such a memorable occasion, a contingent which in every respect will be worthy the country it represents.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Have the commandants been selected? It is reported in the newspapers that Col. Woods and others have been selected?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The commandant is to be Col. McLean, a member of this House. No other selections have been absolutely determined. At an early date, perhaps when the militia estimates come up, I hope to be able to submit to the House at least a progress estimate as to what has been done.

Mr. DANIEL. If one of the officers of the contingent should be serving in a rank junior to that which he holds in the militia, what uniform will he wear in the contingent, that of his actual rank or that of the rank he is serving in?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. That is a question of detail which I would not like to answer, but as I understand it—I think it was done in 1902—an order in council will be passed appointing all the officers to this special service, so that I should think—although I speak now under correction—that the officer should wear the uniform of the rank in which he serves in the contingent.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). What will be the strength of the contingent?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I think we are invited to send a contingent about 700 strong, which would, of course, include officers.

Mr. LAKE. Perhaps the Prime Minister would tell us now how many officers and men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police will be sent on the contingent?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That has not yet been arranged.

RECIPROCITY AND THE FARMERS.

Mr. LENNOX. Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to a statement appearing in the 'Globe' in reference to a meeting held recently at Woodstock, at which the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) spoke, and at which he was reported as saying:

He thought the manufacturers opposed reciprocity because of what might follow the thin edge of the wedge; but he had been assured by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding that nothing of the sort would follow. They had gone as far in the farmers' interests as they would.

I wish to ask the Prime Minister if it is correct that the hon. member who was speaking had been assured by him and by the Minister of Finance in the way the hon. member said, and, if so, is it a fact that the government have gone as far as they will go in the interests of the farmers? Is this to be considered as final as regards the representations made by the grain growers of the west, for instance, and is this the reason that the Prime Minister has prevented the further discussion of the motion made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) in reference to a reduction of the duties on farming implements?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have to say to my hon. friend, with regard to the latter part of his statement, that I have not prevented the hon. member for Portage la Prairie going on with his motion. It is on the Order Paper and is liable to be discussed if it is called again in the present session. With regard to the other question, I think my hon. friend had better wait until the hon. member for North Oxford is in his seat.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand that on one occasion, some time ago, perhaps for very good reasons, when the motion of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie was called, the right hon. the Prime Minister said, 'Stand.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is quite correct. On one occasion I did not see the hon. member for Portage la Prairie in his seat, though I was afterwards informed he was in his seat.

Mr. LENNOX. There can be no reason for letting my question stand so far as the assurances given by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance is concerned. He knows whether he gave that assurance or not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, but I do not know exactly what the hon. member for North Oxford said:

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. (127) to incorporate the Capital Life Assurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Low.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FISHING RIGHTS ON NELSON AND JAMES BAY.

*Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. When was the lease of fishing rights on Nelson river and James Bay granted to Markey?
2. What territory in square miles does it cover?
3. For how many years is it granted, and what is the annual rental?
4. What amounts have been expended for inspection?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH:

1. The lease of fishing privileges in the Nelson river was granted to Mr. Markey 19th April, 1904, and was on that date transferred to the British-American Fish Corporation, Limited. It did not embrace fishing privileges in James bay.
2. The area covered by the lease is the Nelson river and tributaries from West river to its mouth, the estuary of the Nelson from Cape Tatnam to Owl river, extending three miles from land; the Hayes river and tributaries, the portion of Pigeon river in Keewatin and Great Slave lake.
3. 21 years. $10 per annum.
4. The inspection has been made by the inspector of fisheries for the district. No separate statement of the cost of this particular work has been kept.
5. $10 up to the year 1910.
6. In September, 1908.
7. To take the necessary proceedings to bring about the cancellation of the lease.
8. No record was made of the date when Mr. Shepley was first consulted in the matter. It was in a personal interview between Mr. Shepley and the Minister of Justice, which took place some fifteen or sixteen months ago.

9. It will depend on the extent to which his services may be required.

NAVY REGULATIONS.

*Mr. MONK:

1. Has the government adopted regulations under the recent Navy Act passed by parliament?

2. If so, have the said regulations been printed for distribution?

3. Have said regulations been translated and printed?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. These regulations have been translated and have been printed and published in English and French in 'The Canada Gazette.' Booklets have been printed in English and French for distribution, embodying the regulations for joining the naval service, and for the entry to the naval college.

*Mr. EDWARDS:

In addition to the following countries, viz.: Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Columbia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela, that will have the same privileges as the United States in importing goods into Canada, as stated by the honourable the Minister of Finance, in answer to question on February 23, 1911, what other British possessions or dominions will have the same rights on account of their coming under the Favoured Nation Treaty or their being British possessions?

Mr. FIELDING. All British countries, without exception, where they are not already in the enjoyment of similar concessions through the operation of the French Convention Act, or where they are not enjoying the more favourable rates of the British preferential tariff, under section 3 of the Customs Tariff Act, will receive the benefit of the reductions proposed in the agreement with the United States.

QUEBEC BRIDGE.

* Mr. LENNOX:

1. Referring to the item of about $7,000,000, stated by the minister as the cost of the fallen Quebec bridge, how did the government finance this expenditure?

2 If by loans, at what dates, for what sums, at what rates of interest, and at what cost for placing the loans?

3. How are the interest charges met?

4. What amount has been charged up as interest on the above sum since the above return?

Mr. FIELDING:

1. When the bridge was taken over by the government from the Quebec Bridge company, the funds required, were provided out of the general consolidated fund of Canada.

2 and 3. No special loans were made on account of the bridge.

4. No amount.

2. How many tenders were received, from what parties and at what amounts?

3. Is the contract signed, and at what figure?

4. Does the contract contain a fair wage clause or schedule?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Yes, to McLaughlin Brothers, Ottawa.

2. 11 tenders were received.

McLaughlin Brothers, Ottawa, Ontario, $5,975; Leacey, W. M., Prescott, Ontario, $6,370; Bridge & Wharf Builder Company, Montreal, Quebec, $6,484.37; Carbonneau, C. MARIEVILLE POST OFFICE.

* Mr. MONK:

1. Has the government purchased a site for a new post office at Marieville, county of Rouville, province of Quebec?

2. If so, from whom was said site purchased, at what price and what are its dimensions?

3. Was there a valuation made of said site and by whom?

4. What is the municipal valuation of the said property?

5. Upon whose report was the property purchased?

6. Was any order in council passed in regard to said purchase? If so, at what date?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. From corporation of town of Marieville, for $1,500, is 84 feet on Dupont by 61 on Ste. Marie street.

3 & 5. Site was purchased on the report of an agent of the department, who personally visited Marieville and inspected and valued the property.

4. Not assessed.
6. Yes, on 19th June, 1908.

MILITIA SUPPLIES.

Mr. CROSBY:

1. Is it the intention of the Militia Department to call for tenders for all supplies required for the incoming year?
2. If so, is it intended to have the different tenders for the different supplies separated as much as possible in order that the person to supply the goods may be able to tender for that portion which they themselves produce or manufacture?
3. When will the tenders be asked for?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1 & 2. Tenders for provisions, supplies and barrack services for the permanent force, for the 12 months beginning April 1, 1911, have already been called for in the usual way; the only change in the procedure being that arrangements are being made to procure the supply of tea and coffee required from wholesale dealers or importers, instead of from retailers as before; and that the supply of yeast required is to be obtained from the manufacturers, instead of from retailers.

3. Tenders for supplies for the permanent force were called for some weeks ago. Tenders for supplies for the various camps of instruction will be invited from time to time during the spring and summer. The dates have not yet been fixed, either for the camps themselves or for the calling of tenders therefor.

Mr. BEST:

1. How many buildings were decorated during the time of the Eucharistic Congress at the expense of this government?

3. If any were decorated, what was the total cost to the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

2. (a) Minister of Marine and Fisheries.
(b) Deputy Minister Public Works, and chief architect.
3. $480.

MUTILATION OF MAILS, DELAYS IN DEAD LETTER BRANCH.

Mr. ARMSTRONG:

1. Has the government ever tried using elastic bands instead of string to hold bundles of letters together, in outside offices? If so, with what success, and if not, why not?
2. Has the government recently investigated the carriage of mail matter between Kingston and Ottawa? If so, what irregularities have been found as to delays in transmission of mail, irregular delivery at Ottawa, and careless handling of His Majesty's mail?
3. If this investigation has not been made, why not, and will the government institute an immediate investigation into these complaints?
4. Has the government inquired into the cause of delay in returning letters sent to the dead letter office, and have instructions been given to return them more promptly to the owner?
5. Does the government make frequent tests of the tensile strength of the paper out of which the mutilated envelopes, sent in along with complaints, are made?
6. Does the government make inquiry into all the complaints received regarding mutilated envelopes? If so, what action is taken to improve the system?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. No. It has never seemed a necessity to do so, as tying them with twine has been an absolute success, and is in use in every postal country in the world. Elastic bands after being once or twice used could not be relied upon, owing to the loss of elasticity, and would be of no use in keeping letters together. The use of elastic bands would, as compared with the cotton twine now specially manufactured for the purpose, immensely enhance the cost of the transmission of the mails, since, in addition to the perishability of the bands, a large variety, as regards size, thickness and width, would be required to be held in stock at every post office. Moreover, no complaint has been made throughout the whole of Canada, except by the one business firm.

2 and 3. The department has no reason to believe that other than the schedule time is required for the transmission of mail matter between Kingston and Ottawa. A search of the departmental records covering a period of one year, however, reveals the fact that three complaints were received from the E. B. Eddy Company, Limited, Hull, respecting delay in the transmission of their correspondence between Kingston and Ottawa, and investigation showed that in only two of the cases was delay attributable to the postal service. The first case concerned a letter mailed at Kingston on the evening of Friday, the 25th of November, and which, it was stated did not reach the addressees until Monday, the 28th of November. In some way or other this letter was missent upon the mail clerk of Ottawa and Calumet, and if Sunday had not intervened, delivery could have been effected one day earlier. The second case referred to a letter mailed at Kingston on the 22nd December, and said not to have been received until the morning of the 24th. Careful inquiry failed to locate responsibility, but it should be pointed out that this alleged delay occurred during the extraordinary pressure of work consequent upon the Christmas season when the mail service was naturally somewhat congested with the enormous quantity of matter in course of transmission. The final case related to a letter posted at Kingston at 6 p.m. on the 27th of December, and received by the addressees at 11 a.m. on the 28th. No delay occurred in this instance and the complainants were so advised.

4. The department has no reason to believe that there is any avoidable delay in the disposal of mail matter received at the dead letter office. The matter was very fully taken up with the dead letter office less than a month ago, and every possible effort is being made to secure promptness in the return of dead letters.

5. No. The complaints which have been received in regard to this matter have been exclusively from one source. In this case, the company in question make use of envelopes which are much larger than those usually employed besides being of a more or less brittle character. The consequence is that the damage complained of is probably due as much to the unusual size of the envelope as the character of the paper of which it is made.

6. Careful investigation is always made into each complaint, and when it is ascertained that the irregularities complained of could be properly charged against the postal service, steps are taken to prevent their recurrence.

DIXON POST OFFICE.

Mr. ARMSTRONG:

1. Is the Postmaster General in possession of affidavits of sixteen responsible persons from the locality of Dixon, Ontario, affirming that after the resignation of the postmaster of the Dixon post office in 1907, the office was for several months temporarily located on a site at the factory corner, a few rods east of old site of 30 years standing, viz.: at factory corner, of excellent convenience to the general public, and from thence transferred to the present location, a distance of over one-half a mile away, out in the country, where it is giving no extended accommodation to a single individual outside the regular post office patrons?

2. Is the Postmaster General also in possession of additional affidavits from six responsible persons residing at the east of this section contiguous to Northfield Station post office testifying that the Dixon post office has always been their office, and if located at the business centre of village would be far more convenient for them than Northfield Station post office, as Dixon is their business centre?

3. Is the Postmaster General in receipt of two petitions signed by over three-fourths of the people of the locality of Dixon respectfully asking that their post office be transferred to the proposed site, viz.: at factory corner, on the ground that the inconvenience to the general public due directly to the present location of said office is in the ratio of at the very least calculation, five to one?

4. Has there been a loss of revenue to the Post Office Department by said transfer? If so, how much?

5. Is the Postmaster General in receipt also of the report of the assistant post office inspector, Mr. Coolican, in regard to this matter corroborating the statements contained within the above-mentioned affidavits?

6. If these allegations should be correct, will the Postmaster General restore to the people of Dixon their rights of a centrally located post office?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Yes. An affidavit to this effect, signed by sixteen persons, was received.

2. Yes. An affidavit to this effect, signed by six persons, was received.

3. Two petitions were received asking for the removal of the post office to the proposed site. A petition was also received asking for its removal to the present location.

4. There has been a diminution of $22.75 in the revenue of the office. But the revenue of this office has varied considerably during the past few years, and the decrease in revenue is not necessarily due to the change in location.

5. The post office inspector's report does not support the statements contained in the above affidavit. On the contrary, the inspector stated that 'the present site of the Dixon post office is as near the geographical centre of the district it is intended to serve as it is possible to get.' The inspector further reported that many of the names on the petition for the proposed change were those of persons who received their mail at the neighbouring post office at Northfield station.

6. It is not considered advisable to make any further change in the location of the office.

MR. JOHN JARDINE.

Mr. BARNARD:

1. Referring to question and answer re Mr. John Jardine, set out in column 3926 of Unrevised Hansard, did Mr. Jardine receive any money for work in excess of what he was authorized to do? If so, how much?

2. Was such money paid to or received by said Jardine without the knowledge of the government, as stated in said extract?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1 and 2. Mr. Jardine was paid for all work done by him which exceeded by $4,986.77 the amount he was instructed by the department's resident architect at Victoria to do. He was paid by the department on accounts duly certified and sent in by the resident architect out of the general vote for Williams Head quarantine station for the fiscal year 1908-9.

2. What was the weight and value thereof, and the countries from which it was imported?

3. What was the number of dozens of eggs imported during the same months, the value thereof and the countries exporting same?

Mr. PATERSON:

'REXALL.'

Mr. LENNOX:

1. Has the United Drug Company of New York obtained or applied for registration under the name of 'Rexall' or registration of the name 'Rexall' in the Dominion of Canada?

2. Is it a fact, as alleged, that this company has been refused registration in the United States?

3. Does the government propose to grant registration to this company in Canada?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. The United Drug Company of New York has not obtained or applied for registration under the name of 'Rexall,' as there is no statute of the Dominion of Canada providing for the registration of such a company. The word 'Rexall' was registered as a general trade mark on the 21st April, 1903, in the name of Nelson Burgess and Henry Edwin Hill of Toronto, Ontario. It now stands in the name of the United Drug Company of Boston, Massachusetts.

2. The government has no information on this question.

3. Answered by No. 1.

CLEARANCE OF CANADIAN VESSELS.

Mr. LANCASTER:

1. Is it possible, under existing regulations, for a citizen of the United States of America to clear a Canadian vessel at a Canadian custom house?

2. If so, what are the regulations governing such a clearance?

Mr. PATERSON. The reports of vessels at the Custom House are usually made inwards and outwards by the masters of such vessels. The following provisions, however, respecting reports by the purser of coastwise steamers are contained in the Coasting Trade General Regulations, approved by order in council, April 17, 1883:

Sec. 13. The reports inwards and outwards coastwise required by these regulations may, in the case of any steam vessel carrying a purser be signed by such purser, with the like effect in all respects, and subject to the like penalty on the purser, and the like forfeiture of the goods, in case of any untrue statement, or violation of customs laws as if the report was signed by the master; and the word 'master' for the purposes of these regulations shall be construed as including the purser of any steam vessel; but nothing herein contained shall preclude the collector or proper officer of customs from calling upon the master of any steam vessel to answer all such questions concerning the vessel, passengers, cargo and crew, as might be lawfully demanded of him if the report had been made by him, or to exempt the master from the penalties imposed by these regulations for failure to answer any such questions or for answering untruly or to prevent the master from making such report, if he shall see fit to do so.

Under this section, if the purser were a citizen of the United States, he could sign these reports.

ALGOMA TIMBER PERMITS.

Mr. BOYCE:

What amount of dues were paid to the Department of Indian Affairs for timber cut in the township of Laird, district of Algoma, during the year 1910, and upon what quantity of timber was the same paid?

Mr. OLIVER:

No dues have yet been received by the department for timber cut in the township of Laird, for 1910. Sworn returns of last season's operations by the licensee have not, so far, been received by the department.

WEST INDIES STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. CROSBY:

1. What arrangements are being made, if any, for steamship communication between Halifax and the West Indies?

2. As the present contract expires shortly, when will the tenders be asked for the new service?

3. What specifications will be placed before the public regarding boats for the service?

4. What will their passenger accommodation and freight capacity require to be, and what will be the speed required of the boats?

5. Has the government decided whether we are to have a weekly or tri-weekly service instead of the present service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. The government is awaiting a call for tenders which the British government, who pay half the subsidy, has informed the Canadian government will be issued simultaneously in the United Kingdom, Canada and the British West Indies.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3 & 4. Adequate passenger and freight accommodation will be required, and tenders, including speed, will be considered upon their respective merits.

5. Alternative tenders will be asked as to frequency of the proposed new service.

2. What were the rate of duties imposed by Canada on the several classes, respectively, in each of said years?

Mr. PATERSON:

CANADIAN COASTING ACT.

Mr. CROSBY:

With regard to the new Canadian Coasting Act which comes into force the beginning of next year, whereby no foreign vessels are allowed to trade between Canadian ports, is there any possibility or expectation of this law being changed, or is it to be carried into effect without any alteration, so that only vessels of British register and carrying British flags shall be allowed to enter our interprovincial coastwise trade on and after the expiration of the present time allowed?

Mr. PATERSON:

The government has not decided whether to take action or not in regard to the opening of the coasting trade in part to foreign vessels after 31st December, 1911.

Mr. PATERSON.

OTTAWA TYPHOID AND SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Huron):

Is there any truth in the rumour that on account of the fearful epidemic of typhoid fever now prevailing in Ottawa and the consequent danger to the lives and the health of the members of parliament, their families and others, the government intend in the near future to prorogue parliament and afterwards to call a short summer session after the coronation for the purpose of finishing the public business?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Everybody in this city is aware that the epidemic of typhoid which has prevailed here for some time past appears to be not abating but rather spreading and increasing. The government, however, have seen no reason, so far, why they should adopt such an extreme course as to prorogue or even adjourn parliament. But, of course, we do not know what will take place in the future; and if such a contingency should arise we will be guided largely by the views of members of this House.

ANIMAL INDUSTRY IN CANADA.

Mr. MAGRATH moved:

For a copy of all reports, data, statistics, documents, papers and information of every kind and description in the possession of the Department of Agriculture or of any department of the government touching the animal products of Canada, the packing industry, the meat trade, the advantages of a well organized system of cold storage and refrigeration, and generally touching all matters connected with the development and improvement of the animal industry in Canada.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Magrath) spoke to me a few minutes ago. I had explained to him that this was a very comprehensive and omnibus motion and that it would take a very long time to obtain the information called for. He said he would be glad to confer with me and explain what he needed. On these conditions, I should be glad to have the motion adopted.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a copy of the order in council appointing or providing for the appointment of the engineers to prepare and determine upon plans and specifications and superintend the construction of the Quebec bridge, and of all instructions, correspondence, writings and documents in connection with these appointments, including the two additional engineers; and also a copy of any subsequent orders in council, or any instructions, correspondence, &c., relating to the refusal of any of the engineers to act, or continue in office, or the retirement, or substitution of engineers. —Mr. Lennox.

For a copy of the report of the engineers who investigated over-classification, over-break or other alleged over-allowances on progress or final estimate on the eastern division of the Transcontinental railway, the evidence taken, or other data collected, and of all letters, instructions, agreements, plans, drawings, photographs, memoranda and writings sent, given, had or used in connection with said investigation, not already brought down, together with a reference to the previous return where papers are already down; also a copy of the previous report made by Messrs. Schreiber, Kelliher and Lumsden; immediately before Mr. Lumsden's resignation.—Mr. Lennox.

Copy of all papers, reports of appraiser, letters and correspondence relating to the appraising and passing the customs of the vessel 'Wanda,' owned by one William R. Travers, Toronto, on the 20th October, 1909.—Mr. Sharpe (Ontario.)

SUPPLY—HAGUE ARBITRATION; ATLANTIC FISHERIES.

House resumed the debate on motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) for the House to go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). Mr. Speaker, resuming the adjourned debate on the question raised by my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), let me say at once that I find no fault with the hon. gentleman for bringing this question before the House. It is certainly an important question, and, under the circumstances, perhaps it is advisable that the matter should be discussed. At the same time, it must be admitted that there is great difficulty in discussing a question which may be, later on, the subject of further negotiations between Great Britain, on behalf of Canada, and the United States. In such a discussion, views might be expressed that would later on impair the value of negotiations. Consequently, perhaps, it would be better that parliament should refrain as much as possible from discussing such questions. But in such discussions, we should certainly eliminate considerations of party advantage. These international questions are of such importance that the country should be a unit upon them. If it were found that great differences of opinion existed between members of this House upon questions which may be the subject of future negotiations, the freedom of negotiation would be impaired. My hon. friend from Digby and my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) have thought fit to bring into the discussion questions of party politics. I am extremely sorry that such a thing should have been done. I may be in a position, later on, to show that, so far as the government is concerned there is certainly no responsibility, because what has been done has been done in such a way that the government could not be held responsible. If hon. members opposite find it prudent to discuss the question from the party point of view, I would call their attention to the fact that this question of the Bay of Fundy was practically settled by the treaty of 1888, which was negotiated by Sir Charles Tupper, who was at one time leader of the Conservative party and thought fit to exclude the Bay of Fundy from the effect of the treaty.

Now, Sir, my hon. friends opposite have found it advisable to discuss the part taken by the Minister of Justice in connection with the settlement of this question, and of other questions which were settled by the Hague Tribunal. The hon. the Minister of Justice, along with the British Ambassador, had charge of those negotiations, and I think the success which Canada has achieved before that tribunal shows that very great credit is due to the Minister of Justice for the work he performed in relation thereto. My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) and my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) have said that the Minister of Justice had gone up and down the country giving lectures upon this question. That is quite true, but it was not done at the initiative of the Minister of Justice himself, but in obedience to invitations from clubs and public bodies to discuss these important national questions. He could not do otherwise, under the circumstances. The facts that he brought out in those addresses have given us more information upon the subject than the community generally was aware of. It is certainly unfair to disparage the work which has been done by the Minister of Justice in connection with the Atlantic fisheries. He devoted many months to that work, not only in the preliminary negotiations, but in the preparation of the case, and in the conduct of the case after the matter was brought before the court at the Hague. I think Canada must feel great satisfaction in the fact that we have won on the two most important points submitted to that tribunal, namely, our right to legislate with regard to the treaty coast, and on the question of the bays. When I was in Washington the other day with the Minister of Justice I was able to observe the high opinion which is entertained of him by the representatives of the United States government, and the respect which they have for his legal attainments. His opinion is regarded there, as it is regarded here, as that of a gentleman of the highest legal ability.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend from Cape Breton has thought proper to introduce into the discussion a letter which was written by Mr. Ewart some time ago, and which was published in the newspapers. Mr. Ewart thought that the construction which was put upon his letter was not an accurate one, and when he knew that this debate had been adjourned, he called upon me and asked me if I would be kind enough to read before the House a letter which he gave me. I will read the letter, because I think it is only fair to the Minister of Justice, and to Mr. Ewart also, that it should go upon the 'Hansard'.

March 4, 1911.

Dear Mr. Brodeur,—Mr. Maddin is quite mistaken in his belief that my letter 'was evoked, by the fact that the minister had gone up and down this country, speaking before the Canadian Club, before the Bar Association, in this House on December 2, last, and in Halifax during the Christmas holidays, lauding men who were not entitled to his laudation,' etc. It was written, as it says, because of newspaper statements.

I was present at the Canadian Club luncheon, at which Sir Allen spoke and afterwards I thanked him for his kind reference to my work, saying that he had been 'altogether too generous'—meaning that while he had praised my work in connection with the preparation of the case, he had said nothing as to his own, in connection with the diplomatic side of it. So far from objecting to his addresses in Halifax and Toronto, I was aware of his invitations to those places and I ventured to offer him some suggestions that might be useful to him.

And it is not the fact that I am in the least envious of Sir Allen's praise of Sir William Robson's work. I doubt if language could be found which would fully express my own admiration of it, and, I may add, of the work of Sir Robert Finlay. I envy the force and style of those men and not any encomiums which their merits have brought them.

I am, dear Mr. Brodeur,
Yours sincerely,

JOHN S. EWART.

Now, Sir, in the discussion which has taken place on this question, some disparaging remarks have been made in reference to the part which Mr. Bryce, the British ambassador, has taken in matters in dispute between Canada and the United States. I am extremely sorry that anything should have been said in this House underestimating the value of the co-operation which Mr. Bryce has given to the Canadian government. Not only in this instance, but in all other disputes between the two countries. Mr. Bryce has performed services of very great value to Canada, and not only to Canada, but to the whole British Empire. Mr. Bryce, on account of his famous book on the American commonwealth, in which he described so accurately the institutions of the United States, was in a high degree persona grata to the people of the United States. I may say, however, that when Mr. Bryce was first appointed British ambassador at Washington, there was some feeling among certain classes in Canada that he was likely to be too favourably disposed towards the United States. That feeling, I can assure the House, was not at all shared by the Canadian government, but it is a fact that some feeling of that kind did exist in certain sections of this country. I am glad to say now that this feeling has entirely disappeared, and it is now recognized on all hands that Mr. Bryce has succeeded in bringing about more cordial and friendly relations, not only between the United States and Canada, but between the United States and Great Britain. He has succeeded in maintaining harmoniously both Canadian and British interests, and I may say that he has come to be regarded even as the ambassador of Canada. Some time ago we were glad to see him visit this country, in order to get acquainted with our people and with our institutions, to inform himself upon public questions, in order that he might be more useful in aiding to settle the issues between the two nations. His visits to Ottawa have been fruitful in that respect, and I hope we will often have an opportunity of seeing Ambassador Bryce in this country. The effort to disparage the work which has been done by Mr. Bryce since he has been the British ambassador at Washington is certainly unfair to him when we consider what he has accomplished while he has filled that important position. He was appointed in 1908. I find that since that time no less than ten treaties which concerned Canada and the United States have been negotiated by Mr. Bryce. These treaties are as follows:

1. General arbitration treaty 4th April, 1908.
2. Protection of food fishes, 11th April, 1908.
3. Demarcation of boundaries, 11th April, 1908.
4. Conveyance of prisoners, 18th May, 1908.
5. Reciprocity in towing and wrecking, 18th May, 1908.
6. Boundary waters, 11th May, 1908.
7. North Atlantic Coast Fisheries Arbitration, 27th January, 1909.
8. Passamaquoddy Bay boundary 1st May, 1910.
9. Pecuniary claims, 18th August, 1910.

Then there is the agreement which was made the other day when my hon. colleague the Minister of Justice and myself were in Washington, to settle the legality of the legislation which has been passed by the Canadian parliament concerning fisheries on the Atlantic coast. There is also the treaty with reference to pelagic sealing. I do not know whether that treaty has yet been signed, but it is certainly to be signed in a few days, if not already signed. Every hon. member of this House knows that the North Atlantic Coast Fisheries Arbitration Treaty, signed on the 27th January, 1909, made provision for the settlement of a difficulty which has been existing between the two countries for nearly a century. So, Mr. Speaker, within a period of a little more than two years, Mr. Bryce has been able to settle all of these outstanding difficulties, some of which were in existence for many years and, under these circumstances, I say that it is unfair to disparage the work which has been carried on by him.

Mr. MADDIN. If I have the permission of the minister, I would like to say there was no observation made from this side of the House on Friday afternoon last disparaging to the British ambassador or casting any reflection upon him whatsoever. He will read 'Hansard' in vain to find any reflection. But, it was pointed out from this side of the House that the Canadian government had the right to confirm any contract which was submitted to the tribunal, and that this government in ratifying that contract or agreement, or in failing to ratify it, had neglected the rights of the Atlantic fishermen, and we cast the responsibility upon this government and not upon the British ambassador.

Mr. BRODEUR. There were some things with which the government had not a great deal to do which were brought before the House the other day, but I am very glad to see that my hon. friend states formally that they did not intend to disparage the work which was done by Mr. Bryce. But, there were some references made to a mysterious subsequent agreement which was made by Mr. Bryce. It was stated in another part of the discussion that it was strange that with the documents brought down in February no reference had been made to a subsequent mysterious understanding. It was stated again that there was a mysterious understanding and these statements were made in such a way that I thought they were to be construed as disparaging to a certain extent the work that had been done by Mr. Bryce. I am very glad to hear my hon. friend declare formally that he did not intend to do anything of the kind. It was stated in connection with this matter that the proceedings of the United States Senate were held in camera. The treaty-making power in the United States, as my hon. friend must know, is not vested in the King with the advice of his ministers as it is in Canada or Great Britain, but is vested in the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate. The treaty-making power which exists there is the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate. When the Senate of the United States acts in its executive capacity its sittings are always secret. That is a well recognized fact and nobody can dispute it. The United States Senate while acting in its executive capacity and sitting in secret, simply acts in the same way as the Privy Council in Canada or in England would. So that, when my hon. friend the member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) referred to these proceedings being carried on in camera he was stating what no doubt was true, but he was merely stating the procedure which obtains in connection with the negotiations of this kind.

My hon. friend was surprised that there were some notes or modalities attached to the treaty of the 27th of January, 1909, which were not embodied in the treaty. My hon. friend must be aware that this is the procedure which is followed in many instances. He quoted extensively from the Appendix to the Case presented on the part of the government of His Britannic Majesty before the Hague Tribunal. He will find on page 11 of this same book the modalities or notes which had been exchanged between the contracting parties, but which were not included formally in the treaty itself. It very often happens in these negotiations that these notes are not included in the treaty, but form part of what we call modalities.

Mr. JAMESON. Is the note exchanged between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root of the 27th January, 1909, to which I referred included and printed in the case which he has in his hand?

Mr. BRODEUR. I see it is not printed, and I do not know whether there has ever been any such document exchanged. From reading over the documents which we have before us I get the impression that no such note was exchanged between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root on the 27th January, 1909. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice has stated the circumstances under which that agreement came to be made, and I do not know why I should not immediately discuss this point. In negotiating the treaty they came to the discussion of the merits of question number five which was as to whether the three marine miles should be measured from headland to headland of bays and whether the Bay of Fundy should be included. Mr. Root, as has been stated by the Minister of Justice, took very strong ground and said:

> Nothing in that submission is to affect one way or the other the position of the Bay of Fundy or what is termed, innocent passage through the Gut of Canso.

That, as the hon. Minister of Justice says, was made a sine qua non by the United States of the reference to arbitration.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that an exact statement by Mr. Root, and if so from what source is he quoted?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is from a statement made by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Marine did not read it from any document?

Mr. BRODEUR. I was reading an extract from the speech of the Minister of Justice reported in 'Hansard.'

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a mere matter of memory or is it a matter of record?

Mr. BRODEUR. The Minister of Justice informs me that in the first draft the Bay of Fundy was specially mentioned excluding it, and then that a formal understanding was arrived at that the arbitration would not affect the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a matter of record?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. I explained on Friday night the position of matters in that regard, saying that according to my best recollection the very first draft agreement to refer to the arbitration contained a separate clause that nothing in connection with the arbitration was to affect the rights of the United States in the Bay of Fundy. That clause always thereafter appeared in each subsequent draft. When it came to be a matter of settling the final details I did not like the language of the clause and I made the suggestion myself that the same purpose could be effected by an interchange of notes between the parties. That course was accordingly taken.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is abundantly clear that the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy was not a question for which this government is responsible, but was a condition sine qua non set up by the United States government before entering the arbitration.

Mr. JAMESON. We have not yet cleared up the question in regard to this note of January 27, 1909.

Mr. BRODEUR. So far as the Minister of Justice remembers there was no formal note exchanged on that date.

Mr. JAMESON. The minister seems to think I have spoken of the absence of this note, or the non production of it as being suspicious. Perhaps he did not mean that, but that was the tenor of his remarks. I wish to say that if he has not the note before him I would refer him to a mention of it in a letter from Mr. Bryce to Mr. Bacon, dated March 4, 1909. Just read what is said by Mr. Bryce in that note:

Mr. BRODEUR. I will come to that in a minute.

Mr. JAMESON. Would it be convenient to refer to it now; the minister does not appear to have seen the reference?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have.

Mr. JAMESON. That is clear evidence that there is a note of that date.

Mr. BRODEUR. Before we come to the 4th of March; let us see what was done after January 27, 1909. There was a draft signed between Mr. Root and Mr. Bryce, but of course that did not make the treaty effective because under the constitution of the United States a treaty must be assented to by the Senate which in that respect discharges executive functions. The United States Senate did approve of this treaty but with the condition that the Bay of Fundy should be excluded from the consideration of the tribunal; and on that point I refer to a letter sent by Mr. Bacon to Mr. Bryce, which has not yet been read to the House, but which is to be found in the appendix to the case of the United States, and which reads:

Department of State, Feb. 21, 1909.

Excellency, I have the honour to inform you that the Senate, by its resolution of the 18th inst. gave its advice and consent to the ratification of the special agreement between the United States and Great Britain, signed on January 27, 1909, for the submission to the Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague of questions relating to fisheries on the North Atlantic coast.

In giving this advice and consent to the ratification of the special agreement, and as a part of the act of ratification, the Senate states in the resolution its understanding:

That it is agreed by the United States and Great Britain that question 5 of the series submitted, namely,'from where must be measured the three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbours referred to in said article,' does not include any question as to the Bay of Fundy considered as a whole apart from its bays or creeks or as to innocent passage through the Cut of Canso, and that the respective views or contentions of the United States and Great Britain on either subject shall be in no wise prejudiced by anything in the present arbitration, and that this agreement on the part of the United States will be mentioned in the ratification of the special agreement and will in effect, form part of this special agreement.

In thus formally confirming what I stated to you orally, I have the honour to express the hope that you will in like manner formally confirm the assent of His Majesty's government to this understanding which you heretofore stated to me orally, and that you will be prepared at an early day to exchange the notes confirming the special agreement as provided for therein and in the general arbitration convention of June 5, 1908.

I have the honour to be, with the highest consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,

ROBERT BACON.

His Excellency the Rt. Hon. James Bryce, &c., &c., &c.

This document, I think, answers the question which has been put by the hon. member for North Toronto, as to whether there was some document showing that there was an understanding when the treaty was signed on the 27th of January, 1909. The fact that Mr. Bacon, the Secretary of State, states in his letter to Mr. Bryce that there was an oral understanding before, makes me believe that there was no exchange of documents between them, and I am informed by the Minister of Justice that Mr. Bacon was present during all the negotiations which were carried on between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root, and he took the place of the Secretary of State on the day of the signing of the treaty, or the next day afterwards. Now, here is the United States Senate saying: We are willing to approve of that treaty, but on the condition that the Bay of Fundy shall be excluded, and later, on the 4th of March, there was an exchange of notes ratifying the treaty made between the British ambassador and the United States Secretary of State. I suppose it is not necessary for me to read them.

Mr. JAMESON. My question had reference to the interchange of notes on the 27th of January.

Mr. BRODEUR. There was no interchange of notes on the 27th of January.

Mr. JAMESON. That is what I asked the minister to permit me to explain, but he would not allow me to do so. That there was an interchange of notes on the 27th of January, 1909, between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root is evidenced by the fact that Mr. Bryce, in his note of the 4th of March to Mr. Bacon, uses these words:

This understanding (that is, that the Bay of Fundy should be excluded from the operation of the award) is that which was embodied in notes exchanged between your predecessor (that was Mr. Root) and myself on the 27th of January, and is that expressed in the above mentioned resolution of the Senate of the United States.

The note of the 27th of January is the one we are looking for.

Mr. BRODEUR. The Minister of Justice tells me that he did not know anything about these notes, but there seems to be some difference between the two letters. In the letter of the 21st of February, 1909, which I have just read, from Mr. Bacon to Mr. Bryce, there is reference to an oral understanding. Of course, Mr. Bryce, in his letter of the 4th of March to Mr. Bacon speaks of notes that were exchanged between his predecessor and himself on the 27th of January. Well, that does not alter the situation very much, because whether the objection was made by the Senate itself or by the United States representatives, there is no doubt of this, that the United States would not make a treaty unless the question of the Bay of Fundy were excluded When we come to discuss the treaty of 1888 we shall find that the United States then took the ground that the question of the Bay of Fundy should be excluded, and that it should not be treated the same as other bays mentioned in that treaty.

Mr. JAMESON. The minister misses the point altogether. The whole point is this, that according to the interchanged note of the 27th of January, 1909, the government of Canada consented to the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy on that date, whereas the Senate of the United States did not resolve that it must be excluded until the 16th day of the following month.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not think that it makes any difference at all, or that I have missed the point of my hon. friend. He charges the government with being responsible for the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy. I say that charge is not well founded, because when we came to negotiate the United States would not consent to include it. During all these negotiations the United States were against including the Bay of Fundy in the question to be adjudicated upon by the tribunal. In this connection I may say that my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) stated that the Minister of Justice was in these negotiations representing His Excellency Lord Grey, the Governor General of Canada. I think he must have misunderstood the Minister of Justice, because it was never stated by him that he was representing His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. MADDIN. Sir Edward Grey. I would like to point out to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that 'Hansard' is so mutilated and so badly reported that he cannot place very much reliance on it. That is absolutely true of 'Hansard' for the last four Friday evenings. It is not only my experience, but the experience of other hon. members who had occasion to speak in the House. I am quite sure, speaking from the front bench, my accent and pronunciation are clear and distinct enough to enable me to be properly reported in 'Hansard.' It was not done, and any one who was in the House will recognize a very mutilated report of last Friday evening. It was Sir Edward Grey that I had reference to, and not His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is not a matter of great importance to the discussion whether the Minister of Justice was representing Lord Grey or the Minister of Foreign Affairs. As a matter of fact, in the negotiations carried on at Washington he was acting for the Canadian Government, and later on, when the case was submitted to The Hague Tribunal, and the preparation of the case was entrusted to him, he was not acting as the representative of the Canadian government, but as the agent of the British government, and in that way was representing, of course, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Sir Edward Grey.

Mr. JAMESON. Who was representing the government of Canada on that occasion?

Mr. BRODEUR. The case was submitted, as all international questions are submitted, by the British agent, who is, of course, responsible directly to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, but in this case the Minister of Justice represented Canada also. There were counsel engaged and paid, I think, exclusively by the Canadian government, such as Mr. Ewart and some others. Why was the Bay of Fundy excluded? I have just shown that throughout the negotiations the United States refused to include it. In the report which I have just quoted of the proceedings of the Senate, I find a letter from Mr. Bacon to Mr. Bryce on the 21st February, 1909, which also shows that the American authorities were insisting on excluding the bay. Why did the United States authorities take this course? Well, the question as to whether the Bay of Fundy was covered by the treaty of 1818 is a very old one. That treaty provided that the Americans could not fish except at three miles outside the bays. But what was the meaning of the word 'Bay'? Did it cover bays like the Bay of Fundy, the Baie des Chaleurs, Plecentia Bay in Newfoundland, and some others which are more than six or ten miles across? That question caused a good deal of friction, particularly between the province of Nova Scotia and the United States, because the other provinces were not interested with the exception perhaps of New Brunswick. The main contention seemed to have been between the province of Nova Scotia and the United States. We have very often had it said that the blame for the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy should be put on the shoulders of Lord Aberdeen, because of the letter which Lord Aberdeen sent to Mr. Everett on the 10th of March, 1845, which letter I shall quote in a few minutes. But it is only fair to the British authorities that I should mention the fact that this step then taken by Lord Aberdeen, who was at the time British Minister of Foreign Affairs, was taken at the suggestion of some members of the cabinet of Nova Scotia and of the governor of that province. Mr. Everett, then United States minister, contended in his letter of May, 1844, that the Bay of Fundy was not a bay, which came within the treaty prohibition, although he admitted that the smaller bays within the Bay of Fundy did come within it. Of these smaller bays, there are not less than five, which are not more than six miles wide each. In his letter of May, 1844, to the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Everett said that the American fishermen had the right to go into the Bay of Fundy, but admitted that they could not fish in the other bays inside that bay. This letter of Mr. Everett was submitted to the government and the cabinet of Nova Scotia; and as the result of their deliberations, Lord Portland, then governor of Nova Scotia, sent the following letter to the Colonial Office, which will be found interesting under the circumstances. It will be found at page 136 of the Appendix. Here is what he said:

In respect to the expediency of relaxing the strict rule which has hitherto been declared applicable to American vessels found fishing within the limits of the Bay of Fundy, I have found it difficult to arrive at a conclusion, because although some members of the Executive Council believe, with myself, that such a concession, provided it led to no other of a like nature, would not be productive of injury to Nova Scotia, and might in fairness be granted, other members of the board, among whom is the Attorney General, entertain a strong opinion to the contrary.

When, however, I perceive that Mr. Everett, in his note of the 25th May, 1844, addressed to Lord Aberdeen, admits that (in estimating the distance of three miles from the shore within which American fishermen are not permitted to approach) it is 'the intent of the treaty as it is in itself reasonable to have regard to the general line of the coast and to consider its bays, creeks and harbours, that is the indentations so accounted, as included within that line,' which I take to be an acquiescence in the opinion of Messrs. Dodson and Wilde, that the distance within which American fishermen must not approach is three miles from the line drawn from headland to headland, taking the general configuration of the coast; I cannot but conceive that a great portion of what I have contended for (in my despatch No. 75, date May 8, 1841, addressed to Lord John Russell) on the part of the province, is conceded, and it is therefore my unreserved opinion, provided always that this interpretation of Mr. Everett's phraseology be correct, that that which is now asked by the Americans may be granted, without evil consequences, if due care be taken that no further pretentions can hereafter be founded on the concession.

In this letter we have the admission by the governor of Nova Scotia if the Canadian rights in the other bays were reserved, he did not see a great deal of harm in the concession asked for, namely, that the Bay of Fundy should be considered as an open sea. It seems to me that the letter which my hon. friend read must be interpreted in the light of the correspondence between Mr. Everett and the governor of Nova Scotia and the Minister of Colonial Affairs.

When my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), says that there is a condition mentioned in the letter of Lord Aberdeen which has not been complied with, I think that he is making a mistake. The contention made by the American authorities is that the condition gave the exclusive right to the fishermen of Nova Scotia, to fish in the bays which are within the Bay of Fundy, but that the relaxation was made in such terms that American fishermen could fish in the bay itself. In other words, the province of Nova Scotia was willing to accept that the Bay of Fundy should be excluded, or that there should be a relaxation of the conditions though the other bays within the Bay of Fundy were not to be excluded. My hon. friend interprets the condition made in the letter of Lord Aberdeen as being a condition in regard to all the bays of Canada. He is mistaken. Let us read again this part of the letter of Lord Aberdeen:

The undersigned has accordingly much pleasure in announcing to Mr. Everett, the determination which Her Majesty's government have come to relax in favour of the United States fishermen, that right which Great Britain has hitherto exercised, of excluding those fishermen from the British portion of the Bay of Fundy, and they are prepared to direct their colonial authorities to allow, henceforward, the United States fishermen to pursue their avocations in any part of the Bay of Fundy, provided they do not approach, except in the cases specified in the treaty of 1818, within three miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

Now, if we take the last words and compare them with the words we find in the letter of Mr. Everett, we come to the conclusion that, when they speak of the condition excluding them from other bays of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that means bays within the Bay of Fundy and not outside.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The minister (Mr. Brodeur) differs from the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) in that respect. At page 671 of the Revised 'Hansard,' the Minister of Justice describes that stipulation in these words:

Upon the stipulation that as to the remainder of the maritime coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, the claims of United States fishermen should cease.

Mr. BRODEUR. Precisely. If it had been a question of other bays in Quebec and Newfoundland, it would have been so stated in the letter, but it was not stated, it was simply a reference to bays of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and in reading the letter of Lord Horton and Mr. Everett, I am led to believe that there is a great deal of force in the contention of the Americans that this applies purely and simply to bays within the Bay of Fundy. I may be mistaken in my interpretatilon of the law, but I think the hon. gentleman will see from the letters I have mentioned that there is a great deal of force in the contention of the American authorities.

Mr. JAMESON. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) says I am mistaken in the view I took the other evening, he says that the Minister of Justice is mistaken.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not say that the Minister of Justice is wrong, but I say there is a great deal of force in the argument made by the American authorities. My hon. friend says that this is a condition which the Americans have not fulfilled. The Americans say: We have fulfilled our obligation; we contend that the reservation was of the bays within the Bay of Fundy and this we have not violated. Mr. Everett in his answer to the letter of Lord Aberdeen, maintained the absolute right of the United States fishermen to go into the Bay of Fundy. This letter was dated 25th March, 1845, and the following is an extract from it:

March 25, 1845.

While he desires, however, without reserve, to express his sense of the amicable disposition evinced by Her Majesty's government on this occasion in relaxing in favour of the United States the exercise of what, after deliberate consideration fortified by high legal authority, is deemed an unquestioned right of Her. Majesty's government, the undersigned would be unfaithful to his duty did he omit to remark to Lord Aberdeen that no arguments have at any time been adduced to shake the confidence of the government of the United States in their own construction of the treaty. While they have even been prepared to admit, that in the letter of one expression of that instrument there is some reason for claiming a right to exclude United States fishermen from the Bay of Fundy (it being difficult to deny to that arm of the sea the name of 'bay' which long geographical usage has assigned to it), they have even strenuously maintained that it is only on their own construction of the entire article that its known design in reference to the regulation of the fisheries admits of being carried into effect.

The undersigned does not make this observation for the sake of detracting from the liberality evinced by Her Majesty's government, in relaxing from what they regard as their right; but it would be placing his own government in a false position to accept as mere favour that for which they have so long and strenuously contended as due to them under the constitution.

One point is very clear, and that is that a relaxation was granted under the letter of Lord Aberdeen as to the right of the Americans to fish in the Bay of Fundy. Whether there were or were not conditions attached, and whether these have been fulfilled there may be differences of opinion, but the fact remains that there has been a relaxation, and from 1845 until to-day that relaxation has always been maintained by the British authorities. If the relaxation had been made on the conditions that my hon. friend claims, and if these conditions had not been fulfilled, I suppose we should see some correspondence by which the British authorities would have mentioned the matter to the United States government. But they have not done so, and until to-day they have always declared that the Americans might fish within the Bay of Fundy.

Now, there is another point that has not been brought out in the discussion which, I think also proves to a very large extent that the contentions of the Americans that the matter was settled by a treaty, has a great deal of force and should carry weight in any negotiations we may have. I do not wish to be understood as stating that I approve of the contentions made by the Americans in that respect, because I do not think it will be advisable to do so in view of the negotiations which may be made later on. But there is a great deal of force, I must admit, in the contention that the Bay of Fundy question has been settled by the Treaty of 1853. The Americans contend, first, that there was a relaxation by the letters of Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett, and also that the Treaty of 1853 disposed of this question of the Bay of Fundy. This treaty is called the Russell-Ingersoll treaty, and is dated 20th February, 1853. It was made between the United States and Great Britain.

The article of the treaty provided that the pecuniary claims which were made by certain parties should be submitted to a court of arbitration, to be composed of two men, one appointed by the United States government and one appointed by the British government. The treaty further provided that if these two men could not agree upon any point then a third arbitrator should be appointed. Amongst the claims which were referred to this tribunal under this treaty was the claim made by the United States concerning the seizure of the schooner 'Washington,' which has been mentioned several times in the debate. This vessel was fishing about ten miles from the shore of the Bay of Fundy, and she was seized by the Nova Scotia authorities, I think, as fishing within the territorial waters. A great deal of correspondence was exchanged with regard to that seizure. It was contended on the part of the United States authorities that as the vessel was seized in an open sea, that as the Bay of Fundy was an open sea, consequently the Canadian authorities had no right to make the seizure. It was contended by the British authorities that the Bay of Fundy was a bay, and that consequently the United States had no right to fish there. The matter was referred to that court. I will read article 2 of that treaty in which the procedure is set out:—

The high contracting parties agree that all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, upon the government of the United States, and all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the government of Her Britannic Majesty, which may have been presented to either government for its interposition with the other since the signature of the treaty of peace and friendship concluded between Great Britain and the United States of America at Ghent, on the 24th of December, 1814, and which yet remained unsettled, as well as any other claims which may be presented within the time specified in article 111 hereinafter, shall be referred to two commissioners, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say. One commissioner shall be named by Her Britannic Majesty, and one by the President of the United States. In case of the death, absence or incapacity of either commissioner, or in the event of either commissioner omitting or ceasing to act as such, Her Britannic Majesty, or the President of the United States respectively shall forthwith name another person to act as commissioner in the place or stead of the commissioner originally named.

The commissioner shall then, and before proceeding to any other business, name some third person to act as arbitrator or umpire in any case or cases on which they may themselves differ in opinion. If they should not be able to agree upon the name of such third person, they shall each name a person; and in each and every case in which the commissioners may differ in opinion as to the decision which they ought to give, it shall be determined by lot which of the two persons so named shall be the arbitrator or umpire in that particular case.

Well, under the provisions of that treaty the 'Washington' claim was referred to the commissioners, who sat and heard the case. The majority of them decided that the Bay of Fundy was an open sea, and that consequently the ship's owner had a valid claim against the Canadian government. The Canadian authorities, or the British authorities, I do not know which, paid the $3,000 which were awarded as the amount of damages sustained by the seizure of the vessel.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the commissioners agreed on the $3,000 damages?

Mr. BRODEUR. Two of them agreed, the majority.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the two commissioners did not agree, they absolutely disagreed, and the umpire gave the decision.

Mr. BRODEUR. The two commissioners disagreed, and the umpire sided with the American commissioner, which constituted a majority of the tribunal. On that point I may quote the conclusion of the award on page 217, which says:—

The conclusion is therefore in my mind irresistible that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, not a bay within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

Now that was the question discussed, or reported, in the leading cases of international law at page 125. After mentioning the facts concerning the treaty of 1818 and the question of the Bay of Fundy, we read:—

It was subsequently held by a commission appointed to adjudicate on certain claims arising between the two countries, in the case of the schooner 'Washington' which had been seized and declared forfeit for fishing in the Bay of Fundy, although at a distance of ten miles from the shore, that that bay, which is over sixty miles wide and about one hundred and forty miles long, and which is as to one of its headlands within United States territory, did not constitute a territorial bay or water within the meaning of the exclusive clause of the treaty, but must be considered an open arm of the sea.

He quotes Scott, page 153, and Taylor, page 297. Now that was the situation until 1888, until the Chamberlain-Bayard treaty. My hon. friend from Digby has tried to throw a great deal of responsibility on this government. As I have just shown, by reading the conclusion of the award, the tribunal decided that the Bay of Fundy, being an arm of the sea, the vessel could not be seized in its waters.

Mr. JAMESON. Is it not because they thought that declaration on the part of the referee, was an obiter dictum?'

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend will not dispute this fact. A seizure was made of a vessel in the Bay of Fundy. Is it true or not that what the arbitrators appointed to dispose of this question decided, was that the seizure was illegal because it was made within the Bay of Fundy and the Bay of Fundy was an arm of the open sea?

Mr. MADDIN. I would like to point out to the minister that the tribunal were only asked to fix damages. They were not asked to determine whether the water upon which the seizure took place was an arm of the open sea or a bay. They were not international lawyers, they were not men trained in the law. Mr. Bates was a member of a banking firm who knew nothing about international law, but who did know how to assess damages. He fixed the damages at $3,000 and there his function ended. It was not part of his duty to determine whether the Bay of Fundy was a bay or part of the open sea.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am afraid that the argument of my hon. friend is not founded on the facts as we find them on record. There was a claim made against the Canadian government as a result of the Canadian government having seized a vessel in the Bay of Fundy. There was not only a question of damages. If it had only been a question of damages we did not need to negotiate a treaty for the purpose of dealing with it. No treaty was necessary for that purpose, but the tribunal which adjudicated the case was called upon to decide whether the seizure was legal or illegal. The tribunal decided that as the seizure was made in the Bay of Fundy and as the Bay of Fundy was, in their mind, an arm of the open sea, damages were due to the owners of the vessel. If the Bay of Fundy had not been, in the mind of the authorities of the United States, open to question with regard to our jurisdiction why should they have submitted this question to the court? They submitted it for the purpose of having a decision and the decision was rendered in their favour. That was the situation until 1888. In 1888 negotiations were entered into between the British, the Canadian and the United States authorities for a new treaty with regard to the fisheries. Sir Charles Tupper represented the Canadian government, and he was also one of the negotiators who signed the treaty. My hon. friend states that this government has been derelict in its duty in connection with the fact that the Bay of Fundy has been excluded from the reference to the Hague Tribunal. But what does he say of Sir Charles Tupper who, in 1888 excluded the Bay of Fundy? My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who was an active member of the government at that time, approved of the treaty although it excluded the Bay of Fundy. Provision was made for the delimitation of bays in a certain way, but in that treaty which was made by Sir Charles Tupper, in the treaty which was approved by the Canadian parliament, in the treaty which was approved by the government of that time, it was stated formally that the Bay of Fundy was excluded. I suppose this fact will not be disputed by my hon. friend. Let me read to him the treaty of 1888. First I will take article 4:

At or near the following bays the limits of exclusion under Article 1, of the Convention of October 20, 1818, at points more than three marine miles from low water mark, shall be established by the following lines, namely.

Then they start with the Baie des Chaleurs.

At the Baie des Chaleurs the line from the Light at Birch Point on Miscou Island to Macquereau Point light; at the Bay of Miramichi, the line from the Light at Point Escuminac to the light on the Eastern Point of Tabisintac Gully; at Egmont Bay, in Prince Edward Island, the line from the Light at Cape Egmont to the Light at West Point, and of St. Ann's Bay, in the province of Nova Scotia, the line from Cape Smoke to the Light at Point Anconi.

Then they speak of the bays in Newfoundland. Coming back to Canada they say:

At or near the following bays the limits of exclusion shall be three marine miles seaward from the following lines, namely:

At or near Barrington Bay, in Nova Scotia, the line from the Light on Stoddart Island to the Light on the South Point of Cape Sable, thence to the Light at Baccaro Point; at Chedabucto and St. Peter's bays, the line from Cranberry Island Light to Green Island Light, thence to Point Rouge; at Mira Bay, the line from the Light on the East Point of Scatari Island to the northeasterly point of Cape Morien; and at Placentia Bay, in Newfoundland, the line from Latine Point, on the eastern mainland shore, to the most southerly point of Red Island, thence by the most southerly point of Merasheen Island to the mainland.

Long Island and Bryer Island, on St. Mary's Bay, in Nova Scotia, shall, for the purpose of delimitation, be taken as the coasts of such bay.

We see by the provisions of article 4 that they determine where the lines are to be drawn There is no word as to the Bay of Fundy. Why should not Sir Charles Tupper have provided also for the Bay of Fundy? Why was the Bay of Fundy excluded? Because I suppose the Americans contended, as they are contending to-day, that this question was settled by the correspondence of Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett, or by the treaty of 1853? At all events Sir Charles Tupper did not mention the matter at all in this treaty. But I go further and say—yes, he did mention it. If the Bay of Fundy is an open sea the question is disposed of, but if it is a bay what does he say in Article 3?

The three marine miles mentioned in Article 1, of the Convention of October 20, 1818, shall be measured seaward from low water mark; but at every bay, creek, or harbour, not otherwise specially provided for in this treaty, such three marine miles shall be measured seaward, from a straight line drawn across the bay, creek or harbour, in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed ten marine miles.

What is the meaning of that? First, the treaty provides that some bays will have to be delimited in such and such a way. The Bay of Fundy is not included. Then, in article 3 where the bays are not specially mentioned they say that the three marine miles shall start from the point at which the bays narrow to a width of ten miles. What is the result? The result is that according to the treaty of 1888, the line of the Bay of Fundy will not be at a point opposite the county of Annapolis or opposite the county of Digby, but near the Basin of Minas and near Chignecto bay. That is absolutely clear and my hon. friend will not dispute it, I think. How can the hon. gentleman say that the Minister of Justice was remiss in his duty in excluding the Bay of Fundy when his own former political leader Sir Charles Tupper when he was in power—and the hon. member for North Toronto was a member of his government—approved of the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy? In view of all this, is it not unfair and unjust to state that we have neglected our duty. Surely, it is plain from the correspondence exchanged between Lord Aberdeen and the governor of Nova Scotia in 1845, that the Bay of Fundy was excluded at that early date. The Americans contend it was excluded by the treaty of 1853, and in the treaty of 1888 we have a formal declaration that the Bay of Fundy, as to which my hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) says we have not fulfilled our duty, was also excluded.

Mr. JAMESON. The Minister of Marine apparently misses the point. In the case of the treaty of 1888 Canada was getting an undoubted title to the other bays as territorial waters, and was giving up or relaxing the question as to the Bay of Fundy out of the ten mile width. In the present case the whole subject matter of all the bays of Canada was to be arbitrated upon, and had the arbitration gone adversely to us we might have lost the whole of them. That was the difference between the two cases.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is it very likely that Sir Charles Tupper asked for the inclusion of the Bay of Fundy in 1888, and I suppose the representatives of the United States met that request with the same argument that was presented to us, namely, that they wanted the Bay of Fundy excluded from the reference. It was not mentioned in the treaty of 1888, and I have proven that that part of the Bay of Fundy about which the hon. gentleman is so anxious was declared to be absolutely an open sea, and that it should not be considered as a bay.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRODEUR. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I was discussing the effect of the treaty of 1888. I showed that that treaty had virtually withdrawn the Bay of Fundy from any claim as to our right to exclude American fishermen. In fact, as I have shown, some bays were withdrawn as being delimited in such and such a way, and no specific mention is made of the Bay of Fundy. There is a general clause in the treaty that the bays which are not specifically mentioned should be considered as territorial waters only where they are less than ten miles wide. That brings the Bay of Fundy, according to the treaty of 1888, among those which are open to American fishermen. From the mouth of the bay at Grand Manan to Chignecto, while Chignecto bay and Minas Basin can be considered as territorial waters. Now, the leader of the opposition the other day put a question to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice in regard to Placentia bay, which is in Newfoundland territory. I do not know whether he intended to state that that bay was open from its mouth to its entire depth. From the way the question was put, I inferred that the hon. leader of the opposition believed that Placentia bay, by the treaty at Washington as well as by the Hague award, was closed from its mouth, that is, Point Sculpin to Cape St. Mary. I do not know whether I interpreted clearly the opinion which my hon. friend expressed or whether my inference from the question he put is correct.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand that for all these bays the line of demarcation, apart from the recommendations, is to be taken from headland to headland.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend is mistaken as to Placentia bay, which by the Hague award is declared to be open sea from the mouth marked by a line 'from Latine point, on the eastern mainland shore, to the most southerly point of Red island, thence by the most southerly point of Merasheen island to the mainland.' That means that the bay from the mouth to Merasheen point, which would be about 40 miles inside, is open sea. My hon. friend the other day showed me a map with a straight line drawn. This line is not the one determined by the Hague award as the line to be recommended.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend knows that the award is one thing and the recommendations another. The same is true of all these bays, and Placentia bay does not stand alone in that respect.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is only a recommendation; but it is to be presumed that if the Bay of Fundy had been referred to the tribunal, the same judgment would have been rendered as in the case of Placentia bay, because at the mouth these bays are about the same width, namely, 45 miles, though the Bay of Fundy is much longer than the other. It is to be presumed that in such a case the tribunal would have recommended that the Bay of Fundy should be determined in the same way as it was determined in the treaty of 1888. In that case all the other parts of the bay would be open to American fishermen. Though it is only a recommendation, I suppose that the two interested parties might expect that some day a definite agreement would be arrived at based on that recommendation; and so far the interested parties have been willing to act upon the recommendations that have been made. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice the other day raised the question that if we had succeeded in having the Bay of Fundy included in the reference, perhaps it would not have been especially advantageous to us, because it would have raised the question as to whether it could be considered a bay. As my hon. friend is aware, one of the headlands of this bay is American territory. If a line were drawn from Brier island to Grand Manan, and from Grand Manan to the other side, it would extend to American territory, and that would have raised a question which might have embarrassed a settlement of the other question. For that reason I think my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was fully justified in saying that in the interest of the whole case it would perhaps be just as well to leave the matter as it is. I say that the situation to-day, with regard to the Bay of Fundy, and which is the result of the treaty made in 1909, is far more favourable than what it was under the treaty of 1888. By the latter, the Bay of Fundy was opened to the American fishermen with the exception of its northern part, whereas by the present treaty, according to the agreement and according to the notes interchanged between Mr. Bryce and Mr. Bacon and according to the statement made in the United States Senate, it remains as it was before, and we have the same rights, advantages and privileges that we might have had formerly before the signing of this treaty. My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), said that while the situation may not have been very advantageous under the treaty of 1888, still we had something in return. True, but we had nothing in return with regard to the Bay of Fundy. We obtained some provisions regarding the exchange of products, but, in so far as the Bay of Fundy itself was concerned, we got no compensation at all. Those who are trying to belittle what the government has done, will find that the treaty we made in 1909 is far more advantageous than the treaty made in 1888 by a former government. By this award we have gained a great deal, and I am sorry to find some of our hon. friends opposite trying to belittle its results. All Canadians who are anxious to see good relations between the two countries, should rejoice in the fact that we have already on two important matters, gained a great deal. We have gained first, the admission that we have the right to legislate with regard to those treaty coasts. That is a right which the Americans were denying us. They denied that we had the right to enact any legislation which might affect American fishermen fishing on the treaty coasts. On that point, the Hague award, which is the the result especially of the work done by my hon. colleague the Minister of Justice, has given us a complete vindication. It declares that these are territorial waters, over which we have the sovereign control and with regard to which we consequently have the right to legislate. What else have we obtained? We know that, under the instructions given by Mr. Mitchell in 1870, when he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, American fishing vessels could come and fish in our bays, provided they did not come within three miles of the coast or inside the bays. But what is the decision of the award in that respect? Take the Baie des Chaleurs, under the instructions given by Mr. Mitchell, when Minister of Marine and Fisheries in 1870, American fishermen could go throughout all that bay. But under this award, that bay will be closed from Berch Point on Miscou Island to Point Macquereau where the bay has a width of sixteen miles. Take the other bays, they will be clased to American fishermen inside limits as follows:

Miramichi, 14½ miles.
Egmont 17½ miles.
St. Peter's Bay, 18 miles.
Barrington Bay, 13 miles.

So you see the judgment has given us great satisfaction and should be acceptable to all those who are anxious to see good relations between the two countries.

I do not want to detain the House longer but I thought it necessary to put before the House all those facts which prove conclusively that those who try to belittle the work done by my hon. colleague the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) and the results of the treaty, are anything but fair or reasonable. I may also say that we are greatly indebted to Mr. Bryce for the assistance he gave us and the efforts he made in order to bring about a settlement of this question, which during nearly a century was the cause of dissension between the two countries.

If the Bay of Fundy was not referred to the tribunal, that was not due to this government or the British authorities, but to the fact that the United States authorities refused absolutely to consent to its reference. Under the circumstances, would we have been justified, would my hon. colleague, the Minister of Justice, have been justified, in insisting on that point and thus preventing any reference as regards Canada and leaving solely the disputes between Newfoundland and the United States to be adjudicated by the Hague Tribunal without our being present at all? The questions which affected Newfoundland were not absolutely the same as those which concerned us. In some respects they were, but in others, they were not. Take the question of the Bay of Fundy, Newfoundland had not the same interest in that matter as we had; and if today we have succeeded in having this question settled once for all, it is due to the efforts made by those I have just mentioned and especially to the arduous work of the Minister of Justice. The matter has now been definitely settled. The United States had very good grounds for the position they took in the correspondence between Mr. Everett and Lord Aberdeen in 1845 and the treaty of 1853, and the award we have to-day is far more satisfactory than was the treaty of 1888. By that treaty, the Bay of Fundy was absolutely sacrificed, and that treaty was accepted by the government of that day and Sir Charles Tupper was one of those most prominent in negotiating it. It was accepted also by the parliament of Canada. To-day, however, according to the notes interchanged, the question is still an open one, and in the meantime the Bay of Fundy is declared Canadian territory as it has always been considered by the British and Canadian authorities.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, this matter has been debated at such length that I do not intend to occupy very much of the time of the House in dealing with it. In fact, I rise more particularly for the purpose of correcting my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) in respect of some arguments he used. Before doing that, however, I would like to say that it certainly is a matter for congratulation to both countries that this treaty of arbitration was entered into, and that a settlement of some at least of the outstanding questions between the two countries has been arrived at. I only hope that the day is not far distant when a wider treaty of arbitration between Canada and the United States will be consummated, so that all questions, not only those within the scope of the present treaty, but also questions of even graver import, may be referred to the arbitrament of The Hague Tribunal. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) in the course of his speech on the 2nd of December last, went pretty fully into this question. I then congratulated my hon. friend and the government upon the fact that a settlement of some of these difficulties has been arrived at. I do not know that my congratulations would have been quite so warm if I had understood the award and the scope of the questions that were put as thoroughly as I think I do at present.

The Minister of Justice referred in terms of special commendation and eulogy to the work of Sir William Robson, now Lord Robson, who was one of the counsel for Great Britain before that tribunal. I have not a word to say in criticism of that; I have not the slightest doubt that Sir William Robson deserves all the encomiums that were heaped upon him with rather a lavish hand by the Minister of Justice. But I did, at the time, regard it as a little singular that several very able counsel who appeared on that occasion for Great Britain were hardly mentioned by the Minister of Justice. I have the honour of knowing Sir Robert Finlay, and happen to have been associated with him in the discussion of legal questions before the highest court of appeal on more than one occasion, and I should be surprised indeed if the argument of Sir Robert Finlay, delivered before The Hague Tribunal on behalf of Great Britain and in support of the rights of Canada and Newfoundland were not worthy of just as high praise as that which was lavished upon Sir William Robson. I think also that a word of commendation might be said for the very earnest and devoted work which Mr. J. S. Ewart bestowed upon his duties both in connection with the preparation of the case and in the discussion of the rights of Canada and Newfoundland before that tribunal. Upon Mr. Ewart devolved a double duty. In the first place, he had a very long work of investigation, to which he devoted his time and energy without stint, for, I think, eighteen months or two years before the hearing began. And not only in that respect did he do splendid work for his country, but any one who takes the trouble to read his argument delivered before that tribunal can see plainly for himself that it was an argument of great ability and of very high order.

I think also that it might not be amiss to congratulate the country that it had as a representative upon The Hague Tribunal a man of the public experience and distinguished legal ability of the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. I venture to say that all that could properly be done in the interests of this country by the British representative upon that tribunal was done by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick on that occasion, and that this country owes not a little to his ability, his tact and his discrimination throughout the course of these proceedings.

I wish to speak for a moment upon one or two of the questions involved in the hearing. The first question was with regard to the rights of Great Britain over the territorial waters in which the fishermen of the United States, by the terms of the treaty, were to enjoy rights in common with the fishermen of this country and of Newfoundland. The United States put forward, as the hon. minister has very well said, an exceedingly extreme contention in that regard. They claimed the right not only to legislate in respect of these waters, but to enforce their legislation by having their own warships, if necessary, go into these waters to carry out the behests of the Congress of the United States. The government of this country had full rights in respect of the framing of the question which was submitted to the tribunal in that regard, and the Minister of Justice has made that absolutely plain. He said that the parties were so far apart from each other with regard to this question of the inherent sovereignty of Great Britain over these waters that no common understanding could be framed, and, therefore, each party was left to state its contention to be put forward before the tribunal. The contention of Great Britain was put forward in these words:

That the exercise of liberty to take fish referred to in the said article, which the inhabitants of the United States have for ever in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, is subject without the consent of the United States, to reasonable regulation by Great Britain, Canada or Newfoundland in the form of municipal laws, ordinances or rules.

That is the contention on behalf of Great Britain, and it goes on to state examples of the regulations which might be made. Now, the tribunal sustained the able contention which had been put forward by Mr. Bryce on behalf of Canada and Newfoundland. I refer to the words of the Minister of Justice as given in Revised 'Hansard,' page 681:

When the award came to be pronounced on the 7th of September last, the tribunal adopted verbatim et litteratim the language which Mr. Bryce used two years ago in stating the British contention under this clause of the treaty.

I pause there for a moment to say that no hon. gentleman on this side, as I understood the argument, has said a word which could, in the slightest degree, reflect upon Mr. Bryce. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has stated that some people in this country had apprehensions as to what might be the result when Mr. Bryce was named the British ambassador at Washington. So far as I am concerned, I have heard of none of these 'apprehensions' and know of no one who entertained them, unless it be the Minister of Marine and Fisheries himself. I believe that Mr. Bryce has acted conscientiously and with ability and energy on behalf of the interests of the mother country and of Canada throughout the course of these difficulties at Washington. Any criticism of the form in which this treaty was made and in which these questions were shaped is criticism not of Mr. Bryce, but of this government who were plainly responsible for every incident in these proceedings from the first to the last. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries cannot doubt that when he looks at the terms of the treaty itself, for it would have been impossible for Mr. Bryce, representing the mother country, to bind either Canada or Newfoundland in respect to this matter without the consent of Canada and Newfoundland.

The treaty in its terms provided that Great Britain had the distinct right, and therefore having the right, would be impelled to the duty of obtaining the consent of Canada and of Newfoundland in every case where the rights of Canada or of Newfoundland came into question.

Well, I was dealing with the mode in which this question had been framed, and with the award which was made thereon. Now the Minister of Justice has quoted a portion of the award which he says sets forth verbatim et litteratim the exact argument, and the exact contention that was made by Mr. Bryce. The Minister of Justice in that respect stopped at a certain portion of the award, and I think it is only right that the whole position in that regard should be made clear to the House. Let us look at the reasons for the award—and I distinguish the reasons of the award from the operative part thereof—let us look at the reasons which were given by the tribunal in coming to the conclusion at which they arrived, and which is expressed in the operative part of the award. At pages 19, 20 and 21 of the copy of the award that I have, the United States put forward this contention:

That a concurrent right to co-operate in the making and enforcement of regulations is the only possible and proper security to their inhabitants for the enjoyment of their liberties of fishery, and that such a right must be held to be implied in the grant of those liberties by the treaty under interpretation.

The tribunal in dealing with that gave the following reasons for not acceding to that claim:

Because every state has to execute the obligations incurred by treaty bona fide, and is urged thereto by the ordinary sanction of international law in regard to observance of treaty obligations.

Further on:

But no reason has been shown why this treaty, in this respect, should be considered as different from every other treaty under which the right of a state to regulate the action of foreigners admitted by it on its territory is recognized.

Further on:

Because the exercise of such a right of consent by the United States would predicate an abandonment of its independence in this respect by Great Britain, and the recognition by the latter of a concurrent right of regulation in the United States. But the treaty conveys only a liberty to take fish in common, and neither directly nor indirectly conveys a joint right of regulation.

Further on—I am still reading from the reasons of the tribunal:

Because on a true construction of the treaty the question does not arise whether the United States agreed that Great Britain should retain the right to legislate with regard to the fisheries in her own territory; but whether the treaty contains an abdication by Great Britain of the right which Great Britain, as the sovereign power, undoubtedly possessed when the treaty was made, to regulate those fisheries.

Further on:

The sovereignty of Great Britain over the coastal waters and territory of Newfoundland remains after the treaty as unimpaired as it was before. But from the treaty results an obligatory relation whereby the right of Great Britain to exercise its right of sovereignty by making regulations is limited to such regulations as are made in good faith and are not in violation of the treaty.

Now all that sustains the portion of the award which the Minister of Justice read, and I will read it again in order that the matter may be perfectly clear. On page 23 of the award:

Now, therefore, this tribunal decides and awards as follows:

The right of Great Britain to make regulations without the consent of the United States as to the exercise of the liberty to take fish referred to in article 1 of the treaty of October 20, 1818 in the form of municipal laws, ordinances or rules of Great Britain, Canada or Newfoundland is inherent to the sovereignty of Great Britain.

The exercise of that right by Great Britain is, however, limited by the said treaty in respect of the said liberties therein granted to the inhabitants of the United States in that such regulations must be made bona fide and must not be in violation of the said treaty.

Now so far the award is in exact accordance with that interpretation given by the Minister of Justice. But that unfortunately is not all; because if you come back to the reasons which are to be found at the bottom of page 22, you find these observations by the tribunal which have special relation to the form in which the question was proposed on behalf of Canada and Newfoundland by this government:

While, therefore, unable to concede the claim of the United States as based on the treaty, this tribunal considers that such claim has been and is to some extent conceded in the relations now existing between the two parties. Whatever may have been the situation under the treaty of 1818 standing alone, the exercise of the right of regulation inherent in Great Britain has been, and is, limited by the repeated recognition of the obligations already referred to, by the limitations and liabilities accepted in the special agreement, by the unequivocal position assumed by Great Britain in the presentation of its case before this tribunal and by the consequent view of this tribunal that it would be consistent with all the circumstances, as revealed by this record, as to the duty of Great Britain, that she should submit the reasonableness of any future regulation to such an impartial arbitral test, affording full opportunity therefor, as is hereafter recommended under the authority of Article 4 of the special agreement, whenever the reasonableness of any regulation is objected to or challenged by the United States in the manner and within the time hereinafter specified in the said recommendation.

So up to the present time we have, in the first place, the reasons set forth plainly and distinctly by this tribunal, which confine the inherent power or sovereignty of Great Britain only within these limits, that regulations made with regard to these fisheries must be bona fide and must not be in violation of the treaty. Then that is followed by a clear and distinct statement from this tribunal that the right of Great Britain is restricted by 'the limitations and liabilities accepted in the special agreement, by the unequivocal position assumed by Great Britain in the presentation of its case before this tribunal,' showing that the inherent sovereignty of Great Britain must be cut down to the mere question as to whether these regulations are reasonable or not. And so in addition to that portion of the award which was read by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, we find this in the operative part of the award, that part of the award which binds this country as well as the United States:

Regulations which are (1) appropriate or necessary for the protection and preservation of such fisheries, or (2) desirable or necessary on grounds of public order and morals without unnecessarily interfering with the fishery itself, and in both cases equitable and fair as between local and American fishermen, and not so framed as to give unfairly an advantage to the former over the latter class, are not inconsistent with the obligation to execute the treaty in good faith, and are, therefore, reasonable and not in violation of the treaty.

For the decision of the question whether a regulation is or is not reasonable, as being or not in accordance with the disposition of the treaty and not in violation thereof, the treaty of 1818 contains no special provision. By reason, however, of the form in which question 1 is put, and by further reason of the admission of Great Britain by her counsel before this tribunal that it is not now for either of the parties to the treaty to determine the reasonableness of any regulation made by Great Britain, Canada or Newfoundland, the reasonableness of such regulation, if contested, must be decided not by either of the parties, but by an impartial authority in accordance with the principles hereinabove laid down, and in the manner proposed in the recommendations made by the tribunal in virtue of Article 4 of the agreement.

The result of that, Mr. Speaker, seems to me capable of being stated in a very few words. In the one case the power of Great Britain—that is of Canada and Newfoundland—to regulate the fisheries is subject only to the qualification that the regulation must be bona fide and must not be in violation of the treaty. That is a position that we could have maintained if this question had been prepared for the tribunal in the way in which the government should have proposed it. In other words, if the contention which, as the Minister of Justice declares, was put forward by Mr. Bryce, had been maintained in the questions submitted by the government to that tribunal the part of this award which I first quoted would have been the only part to which the tribunal would have given utterance, and we would not have been put in a position to which I shall now devote one or two words. In the one case, the power of Great Britain (i.e. Canada and Newfoundland) to regulate the fisheries would be subject only to the qualification that the regulation must be bona fide and must not be in violation of the Treaty. The other case, the case that confronts us actually at the present time, is in which the government stated our position, we have come down to the question of reasonable regulations which will undoubtedly be considered from the actual conditions confronting the United States fishermen. Under the award the United States can object to the reasonableness of any regulation that we may make and can insist upon a hearing and a decision of the Hague Tribunal, or some other body constituted under the decree of that tribunal. The right to regulate has in effect passed from Canada and Newfoundland, who possessed it by virtue of the inherent sovereignty of Great Britain in these waters, and it has passed to a foreign tribunal which would undoubtedly deal with this question in a spirit of compromise and cut something out of any code of regulations however reasonable. We have in effect abrogated our sovereignty over these waters in this respect. An exercise of our inherent sovereignty to regulate the fisheries can always be questioned by the United States and decided by a tribunal in which we have only one voice out of many. The Minister of Justice will see how remarkable a difference there is between the one position and the other. In the one case at any time, under our inherent sovereignty, we could have adopted any regulation whatever provided that regulation was bona fide and not in violation of the treaty of 1818. That right, by reason of the form in which the question was put and by reason of the decree of the tribunal founded upon that question, has been cut down to a pure question as to whether or not our regulations are reasonable having regard to the conditions which confront the American fisherman, and whatever regulations we may make can be questioned by the government of the United States, and when so questioned must be dealt with by a tribunal in which we have only one voice out of many. I think that is an unfortunate position, and I think it is a position which was entirely unnecessary. I am adopting in that regard the statement of the Minister of Justice himself who says that the portion of the award which he read—and he did not read the qualification—and which maintains the inherent sovereignty of Great Britain over these waters, was put forward by Mr. Bryce; and after it had been put forward by Mr. Bryce I see no reason why it was departed from because had it not been departed from it is perfectly obvious from the reasons of the tribunal that it would have been fully maintained in the award.

Now, I come to another question—the question of bays and harbours. The Minister of Justice seems to be under the impression that in so far as that is concerned some new and important rule of international law was settled. I venture to doubt that with great deference to the Minister of Justice, for whose ability and experience I have the utmost possible respect. As I understand the award it did not settle any new principle of international law. I have the minister's own language, but I will not stop just now to read it. He seemed to think not only that a new and important rule of international law had been settled, but that the tribunal, basing its decision upon the argument of Sir William Robson, had determined a different rule of international law for the waters adjoining the coast of this continent from that which has prevailed in Europe. With all deference to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and with hesitation owing to the view that he has expressed to the contrary, I venture to differ from that opinion. As I understand the award it simply construed the words of the treaty of 1818, taking into consideration the circumstances and conditions when it was made. The word 'bays' in that treaty had to be construed either as a term of international law—that is in what one might call the juristic sense, or it had to be construed otherwise as an ordinary geographical term, in the popular sense, in other words, as a cartological term. The tribunal simply adopted the latter construction. They said that when the negotiators of the treaty of 1818 used the word 'bays' they simply used it in the popular and geographical sense at the time and I do not find any new rule of international law laid down. Perhaps I might refer for one moment to what the Minister of Justice has said in that regard. He said that Sir William Robson had made a very novel and beautiful argument founded on the research that he had made into former treaties, and that his argument led irresistibly to the conclusion that a different rule of international law prevailed in North America from that which obtained in the rest of the world. The tribunal, as he claimed, had decided accordingly, and the tribunal in so deciding had laid down a new and important rule of international law. I am not giving the exact language of the Minister of Justice because I do not wish to take up the time of the House in listening to long quotations, but I am giving the effect of his statement on the subject in December last. But Sir William Robson does not appear, as Mr. Ewart has said, to have conducted any particular research into these treaties, because they had all been set out in the Appendix to the British case from pages 1 to 24. I looked at this volume only the other day, and I saw that they are all there. This Appendix was prepared a year before Sir William Robson made his argument. They had been referred to in this very argument by previous counsel before Sir William Robson made his excellent argument before the tribunal. I do not think that the tribunal has laid down any different rule of international law in respect to America from that which exists elsewhere. I have the award in my hand, and I shall forbear from reading to the House the reasons of the award which lead me to arrive at that conclusion. There is only one possible passage in the award that can afford the slightest foundation for the view which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice expressed in the House, but if you take that particular paragraph which is to be found at the bottom of page 35 of the edition I have in connection with other reasons which are to be found from pages 31 to 35, it does not seem to me that you can reasonably come to the conclusion that the Minister of Justice reached in that regard. I have not one word to say in deprecation of the eulogiums which the Minister of Justice lavished upon Sir William Robson, but in so far as I understand the real character of this award, the real meaning of the award it does not justify the view that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice seems to entertain.

The Minister of Marine seems to deprecate the discussion of this award, but it was the Minister of Justice who began the discussion in this House on the 2nd of December, and because two hon. members on this side representing constituencies that are directly affected by this award put forward their views on it with great ability and fairness, the Minister of Marine thinks party politics have been introduced into the question. Well, the same hon. gentleman was not very slow to endeavour to make party capital out of the French treaty, and I should think he would be the last person to make the insinuation he has made. I congratulate the hon, member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) for bringing this question to the attention of the House. It was his clear duty to take that course. The Minister of Marine put forward some very remarkable arguments with regard to the exclusion of the Bay of Fundy from the reference, and I may say that it would appear to me that he devoted too much of his speech to advancing the favourable points in the American contention rather than the favourable points in the Canadian contention. It was not necessary that the minister should do that because from the first to last throughout the negotiations, the preparation of the case, and the argument before the tribunal it is very apparent that the negotiators and the counsel for the United States in every single instance put forward their claims in the most extreme form, which in my opinion was not done in the same way by those representing this country. The hon. gentleman attached undue importance to the award made in 1854 for damages on account of the seizure of the ship 'Washington.' If that decision has the far reaching effect attributed to it by the Minister of Marine it would have controlled not only the Bay of Fundy but every one of these bays, and yet all the other bays brought within the scope of the arbitration have been declared by the tribunal to be British territorial waters so far as the fishermen of the United States are concerned. The real explanation of the 'Washington' case was given by Mr. Dana interrupting Mr. Thompson in the argument before the fishery tribunal in Halifax, in 1877, when he said:

> This subject was referred to a commission and the commission decided, not on general grounds but on the grounds that one headland was on the American territory.

This vessel was seized outside of the line which we claim to-day. If you take a very extreme limit it may be said that one headland is on the coast of Maine and the other is on the coast of Nova Scotia, but the later contention, as I understand it is, that you must draw a line between Canadian territory in Nova Scotia and Canadian territory in New Brunswick. However, I will not waste more time on that point.

The Minister of Marine derives great comfort from the Chamberlain-Bayard treaty of 1888, when dealing with the Bay of Fundy, and he says that by that treaty the Bay of Fundy was excluded and that all the other bays were dealt with along the lines of the recommendations made by the Hague Tribunal. But, the distinction is obvious beyond question. Let us grant for the sake of argument—I have not investigated the negotiations to speak definitely with regard to them—but let us grant that Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Tupper agreed that in consideration of having the sovereignty of great Britain recognized in respect of all those other bays, they would not make any further claim in respect to the Bay of Fundy in which the American fishermen had been enjoying rights under the relaxation allowed by Lord Aberdeen in 1845. That simply amounts to this: That they were getting a certain distinct, clear advantage in consideration of not departing from the relaxation of 1845, but surely the Minister of Marine knows that the Chamberlain-Bayard treaty was not the foundation of this agreement for arbitration. Can he not see the distinction between that case and this? In that case, rights which were disputed by the Americans were made absolutely secure to us and we did not press for the discontinuance of the relaxation which had already been granted in respect to the Bay of Fundy. In 1909 the situation was entirely different because then we were not securing undisputed rights in respect to all these bays. The Americans put forward their extreme contention that the three-mile limit and that only was to be recognized in respect to all these bays. Therefore, when the whole question of right was being opened up in respect to these bays that were secure to us under the treaty of 1888, why should not the question of right be opened up with respect to the Bay of Fundy? Why was it that that which the Americans had agreed to give in 1888 they were at liberty to depart from under this agreement, and that which we had agreed to give up under the treaty of 1888 we had not the right to open up, but had to let it remain secure to the United States under the provisions of this agreement. The distinction is as plain as a pikestaff; it need only be mentioned so that any one may understand it. If the two nations had taken the treaty of 1888 as a basis the Minister of Marine would have some ground for his argument, but in as much as everything the Americans were supposed to concede by the treaty of 1888 was left open under the terms of this reference there was not the slightest reason for not contending that the Bay of Fundy should also be included and our rights asserted in respect to it. What did this tribunal decide? I will first give one or two of their reasons; I quote from page 35:

> The description of the coast on which the fishery is to be exercised by the inhabitants of the United States is expressed throughout the treaty of 1818 in geographical terms; not by reference to political control; the treaty describes the coast as contained between capes.
